Mrs. Fairclough: I can understand that certain officials, particularly in the higher executive brackets, would necessarily give a portion of their time to that work and still be occupied with their duties in national health and welfare. Are there any members of the staff of national health and welfare still continuing in the department 100 per cent of whose time is now given to civilian defence?

Mr. Martin: I would not say 100 per cent but a great deal of their time.

Mr. Pouliot: Do they wear a uniform?

Mr. Martin: No.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can understand that there must be some confusion this year—

Mr. Martin: There is no confusion.

Mrs. Fairclough: —as the department has probably not been set up and the estimates cannot be split accordingly, but it would seem to me that where a major portion of a person's time is devoted to this new activity he or she should be transferred from the department so that we would have a proper picture.

Mr. Coldwell: This illustrates what I referred to just now. There is no estimate as such for civil defence in the Department of National Health and Welfare but moneys are being spent by that department in connection with the civil defence program.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: Would it be possible for the minister to bring before the house a mimeographed statement of the moneys being expended on civil defence by the two departments so that we may have an estimate before us? As it is, there is just confusion at the present time.

Mr. Martin: I agree with what my hon. friend is saying. At a quarter to ten that is the very thing I wanted to do acting upon the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary East, and I now propose to follow that course. As my hon. friend will note, the transfer of responsibilities from the Minister of National Defence to the Department of National Health and Welfare took place at a time after the estimates of the Department of National Defence had been formulated.

Mr. Coldwell: I know that.

Mr. Martin: That explains why we are operating in this quasi-dual position at the moment.

Mr. Fleming: Jumbled position.

Mr. Martin: The civil defence estimates, broken down by the usual primaries, are shown as my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence has indicated, and as I suggested the other night. Anticipated expenditures for the present year total $4,196,202. Because of the necessity of placing orders now for equipment or materials and supplies which will not actually be delivered or paid for until 1952 or 1953, authority is also being asked for permission to enter into commitments against funds for 1952-53 totalling $900,000, and against funds for 1953-44 totalling $1,822,500. That does not include all that is being spent on federal account for civil defence. As the hon. member for Hamilton West has properly indicated, certain officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare are engaged in a great many activities which under strict accounting would be charged to this particular division. Nor does it include the very significant sums of money that are being spent by the provinces. Nor does it include the significant sums that are being spent by the municipalities. The hon. member for Nanaimo in making his criticism, quite properly from his point of view, said that he thought that the figure which had been given for civil defence in Canada was an unsatisfactory one. I can only say that if he will compare that figure with the figures now proposed in the United States for civil defence, and with the figures proposed and budgeted for in the United Kingdom for civil defence at the present time, he will find that we are by no means lagging behind in financial commitments for this purpose.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the minister give us those figures?

Mr. Martin: I will give the whole picture now that the question has been asked. I do not believe it is fair to the people of Canada to suggest that the determination of an adequate civil defence program represents the mere expenditure of dollars and cents. The only proper way in the long run to really provide for adequate civil defence in Canada is by recognition of the principle of mutual aid at the closest operational level, the municipality. That sort of thing is incalculable. If anyone thinks we are going to have an adequate civil defence program just by the expenditure of money, I would take strong issue with that point of view. All over this country organizations are developing composed of men and women many of whom are devoting a great deal of their leisure time to this work without any thought of reward or compensation. If it were possible to total all work of that kind the figure would certainly be much more impressive than it seems at first glance. I also want to say that if I came before this house with a figure on federal account that as much larger than the figure I have indicated, I know what hon. gentlemen opposite would say. They would criticize us for the unnecessary expenditure of money in a field where private voluntary effort can do so much.

These figures have been gone over with the provinces, with whom we had a meeting on February 23 under the chairmanship of my colleague the Minister of National Defence. At that meeting there was a very wide measure of agreement. Only last Friday I conferred with the minister responsible for civil defence in our largest and most thickly populated province, and I can say he and I are fully agreed on the common plans we are each pursuing. He knows the expenditures we are making; and while I would not go so far as to say he agreed with everything, I know he and I see eye to eye on this important matter. Tomorrow I am having a conference with the minister of welfare of Saskatchewan, who is in charge of civil defence for that province. While he thinks we should assume certain responsibilities in connection with their training schools, when we outline the division of responsibilities as between the province and the dominion I am sure I would not do him an injustice if I said I am sure he would generally concur in the position we have taken.

The project we have in mind may be grouped under five general headings: purchase of equipment, purchase of material and supplies, construction of technical training schools, production of training aid pamphlets, and so on. Under the purchase of equipment $2,441,500 is being asked to cover expenditures this year, with an additional $650,000 commitment authority against 1952-53 funds and $1,072,500 against 1953-54 funds. That is subject to change depending upon the assessment we get from the only authoritative source, the chiefs of staff. The program can be accelerated, depending upon that advice. I am certain that as long as I am in charge of this difficult assignment I am not going to go ahead and build up an organization which in the event of disuse would rust and do more harm than good. I believe it is the feeling of those in charge of this work that we should be in a position to act in the light of the assessment we get as to probabilities, as to the state of international tension, and so on. We may make a big miscalculation; there can be no doubt of that possibility, but certain risks have to be taken in this matter. Those risks have to be borne not only by the armed forces but by everyone in Canada, for that is the nature of total war, and no minister of the crown or anyone else can alter that unfortunate fact.

The largest expenditure under this item is for fire-fighting equipment. We propose to spend $977,500 for such equipment this year. Actually we are now concluding an arrangement with the province of Ontario in respect of which we have signified our willingness and intention to provide something in the neighbourhood of $300,000, depending upon the presentation of details, to assist them in a program of standardization of hose couplings. That is a very important item in civil defence work, for the disaster that comes through fire is one of the most important considerations to be borne in mind. An amount of $300,000 in addition may be committed against next year's funds and $697,500 against the 1953-54 funds under the program of standardization of hose couplings; but that, too, depends on the ability of the fire chiefs and those in the provinces in charge of fire work generally to bring about a common standard in the use of hose couplings. We estimate that under this item $900,000 will be spent this year on this phase of the program. From conversations I have had with Sir John Hodsoll, the director of civil defence in Britain, and with Governor Caldwell, his opposite number in the United States, that is an expenditure which in the light of their experience they regard as fundamental, and one of the initial expenditures that should be undertaken.

Another large item under this heading is radiation detection instruments, for which $962,000 will be spent this year with an additional $50,000 being ordered but paid for next year. The sum of $550,000 is required, we estimate, for medical equipment, $100,000 to be actually spent this year and orders placed for an additional $450,000 worth of equipment, approximately half of which will be delivered and paid for next year and the remaining half possibly in the ensuing year. That, too, is subject to acceleration, depending upon the appraisal we get from the responsible military authorities.

Other items being purchased and paid for this year under this heading are: sirens, $252,000; special rescue equipment, $35,000; certain vehicles, $45,000; training equipment, $10,000; communications equipment, $20,000.

That last item has an important relationship to the question put by the hon. member for Nanaimo as to the warning system, and I may as well deal with his question now. In connection with the warning system the plan is that we will be responsible for the warning to the municipality, but from then on the municipality will have to act in the light of that warning. I would not want to say the warning system is complete. It is by no means complete, but we are developing that system just as quickly as it is possible to do so.

Since April 1 orders have actually been placed for the following equipment: 70 radiation detection instruments, $11,515; 1,300 stirrup pumps at a cost of from $1.50 to $3.50 each, totalling $3,300; 10,000 steel helmets at 80 cents each, $8,000; stretchers, $1,400; 500 suits of protective clothing, $1,750.

Mr. Adamson: Did the radiation equipment total $11,000?

Mr. Martin: I gave the total as $962,000 to be spent this year.

Mr. Coldwell: For what municipality are the stretchers being bought for which $1,400 is being paid?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is not going to suggest by that good-humoured question that this is an attempt to provide stretchers for the whole country. He knows that is not the case.

Mr. Coldwell: What is it for, then?

Mr. Martin: It is for the training centres. If my hon. friend would come out with me tomorrow to the school at Connaught Ranges he would see why we must have some stretchers available. Some of these stretchers will also be used at the school in Saskatchewan, at the school that is going to be established in British Columbia, and at the schools that are to be established in two other provinces. As to the equipment in the municipality, that will be provided by the municipality in accordance with arrangements made by the provinces following action to be taken by the Canadian Red Cross Society, and with the assistance that will be provided by the St. John Ambulance Corps, which are taking a great share of the load in the business of first aid training.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister give the figures on steel helmets again?

Mr. Martin: Yes; $8,000.

Mr. Fleming: At how much?

Mr. Martin: Ten thousand steel helmets at 80 cents each. We are getting them at a bargain price. Now I will deal with the purchase of other material and supplies. $800,000 is requested to cover this year's expenditures on materials and supplies with an additional $250,000 commitment against next year's funds and a further three-quarters of a million-dollar commitment against 1953-54 funds.

The largest item under this heading is for clothing civil defence volunteers; approximately $400,000 is required this year and an additional $500,000 to be committed against 1953-54 funds.

To meet the cost of necessary stockpiling of medical supplies, to be carried out in conjunction with the armed services program, will require an expenditure this year of $250,000, with an additional $250,000 worth to be ordered this year and paid for out of future funds when deliveries can actually be made.

I hope I am not going into too much detail.

Mr. Fleming: Not enough.

Mr. Martin: But rather than be criticized for not giving enough, I propose to give the detail in extenso.

The sum of $75,000 will also be spent this year on the purchase of respirators with an additional $250,000 worth being ordered and paid for next year when deliveries can actually be made.

Other items under this heading, to be purchased and paid for this year, are:

Protective clothing, $10,000.
Gasoline, oil and lubricants, $4,000.
Catering for training school, $62,500.

On the production of training aids and pamphlets there will be spent this year $51,500 in accordance with the plans that we have had as a result of our discussions with the provinces who regard that—and I think properly so for the most part—as our responsibility. In addition to the pamphlets that we are preparing, we will also have the use of pamphlets which have been prepared in the United Kingdom and in the United States and which have been re-adapted for use in this country.

We expect that $25,000 will be spent this year on the purchase of certain civil defence films. Two of them have actually been purchased and are being used for educational purposes. These films are not intended to provoke undue fear and panic but rather to indicate the kind of precautionary measures that can be taken by the civilian population in the event of the kind of disaster which none of us wishes to see happen.

Those figures will give an idea of the expenditures we propose to make this year. I can well understand the argument that might be made that this is not enough. All I can say is that in the light of the organization as it exists, in the light of the arrangements we have made with the provinces, and with the assumption by the municipalities all over this country of the responsibility that they are now assuming, we feel that this represents the wisest expenditure at this time. I can only say that a situation could arise whereby there would be an acceleration of that program, but that would depend on other non-existing circumstances.

I do not want to repeat the general outlines of our policy as given in my earlier statement. It seems to me that those principles will commend themselves to most reasonable people in this country. They represent a recognition of the federal character of this country, and of the impossibility of the central authority doing this job fully. The job is one for the provinces. It is one that must be carried on primarily in each municipality. The basis of the civil defence organization will be the voluntary effort that will be put into this matter, by the Canadian people. I can only say that, in the light of the situation as we see it, we will do everything that we can to give, in co-operation with the other two levels of government, a civil defence program as adequate as it is possible to give. From my contacts with authorities in the United States and with Sir John Hodsoll, the civil defence director in the United Kingdom, I have reason to believe that we are proceeding on sound lines.

Mr. Pouliot: I was most interested in listening to the minister's explanation and to the detailed information he has given with regard to the expenditures we are making for civil defence. In particular he mentioned approximately $900,000 for the purchase of fire-extinguishing apparatus.

Mr. Martin: Hose couplings.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, hose couplings. Suppose that there is a former soldier or officer who is put in charge of civil defence in any locality, and he wants to organize the protection of his municipality in case of an enemy attack. He may rely on the goodwill of the people of his community. Then I understand that the first thing he will have to do will be to get in touch with the provincial minister who is supposed to be the contact man for the organization of civil defence. Is that right?

Mr. Martin: That is correct.

Mr. Pouliot: With regard to the amount, whatever it is, that is spent by Ottawa for civil defence—$900,000 approximately for hose couplings, and all that—I understand that it will be given by Ottawa to the provinces; will it be given by Ottawa to the various bigger municipalities such as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver or Winnipeg, or will it be given to the provincial authorities? It is nearly eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming: It is past eleven.

Mr. Pouliot: I hope that the minister will be kind enough to give the information when the committee meets again.

Mr. Martin: I will do that with great pleasure.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall take the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Drew: In what order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We shall start with national defence.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PRINTING BUREAU—REFERENCE TO INFORMATION GIVEN IN SESSIONAL PAPERS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 18, 1951, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) asked me to explain the difference between certain amounts that were given in answer to questions put by two hon. members concerning the site for the printing bureau in Hull. The answer is a lengthy one, but I think I should put it on Hansard.

The Federal District Commission Act, 1927, chapter 55 of the statutes of 1927, was amended by chapter 51 of the statutes of 1946 to provide for the establishment of the national capital district, which is defined in the amending act as the national capital district established pursuant to this act.

The responsibility for selecting the location of sites, inter alia, for public buildings within the confines of the national capital district is vested in the federal district commission by virtue of section 6A of the said act as amended in 1946.

The national capital planning committee was established by the federal district commission, under authority of order in council P.C. 1266 of April 18, 1946, for the purpose of drawing up a master plan for the development, improvement and beautification of the national capital district.

By letter dated December 5, 1946, directed to the Minister of Public Works, the chairman of the federal district commission advised that upon the advice of the national capital planning committee the federal district commission had recommended the expropriation of a property in the city of Hull by the dominion government, the commission having approved the site for the erection thereon of the printing bureau and other departmental buildings incidental to the future building development, the said site being described by the commission as follows:

That area bounded on the north by Brewery creek, on the east by Maisonneuve street, on the south by Boulevard Sacre Coeur to St. Henri street to Marsden property line to St. Redempteur street to Elgin street to Brewery creek, saving and excepting the property already owned and occupied by the Reverend Oblate Fathers.

The expropriation of the above described area, as approved by the federal district commission, was further authorized by the governor in council under P.C. 842, dated March 6, 1947.

The first question referred to by the leader of the opposition in sessional paper 107-D, dated May 17, 1951, as asked by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), was as follows:

How much was paid for the site on which the building is being erected?

Estimated cost, $496,817.56.

The figure contained in this answer is an estimate covering the cost of the acquisition of land acquired for the purpose of the erection of the printing bureau proper, and is exclusive of the land contiguous thereto that was acquired for the purpose of future building development in accordance with the approval of the federal district commission. Of this estimated cost, the sum of $455,080 has to date been paid. The balance of $41,737.56 is the estimated cost of the settlement covering the remaining lands in the printing bureau site proper as aforesaid.

The second question referred to by the leader of the opposition in sessional paper 107-B dated March 27, 1950, as asked by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson), was as follows:

What was the cost of the site of the proposed printing bureau in Hull, Quebec?

The answer was:

Cost of the site to date, $824,979.72.

The figure contained in this answer represents the cost at that date of the lands acquired in accordance with the recommendation and approval of the federal district commission for the purpose of erecting thereon a printing bureau and development of the contiguous area for government buildings in the future. The figure is, of course, not exhaustive of the cost of the acquisition of the entire area, but will be supplemented in accordance with the adjudication by the exchequer court, or settlement reached, as the case may be.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

EXPENDITURES FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES—REFERENCE TO INFORMATION GIVEN IN SESSIONAL PAPER

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a return tabled the day before yesterday in answer to a question of mine which was passed as an order for return. The information is given to me in sessional paper 75-A.

The point I wish to raise is that the answer given in the return is not an answer to the questions asked. To illustrate the point, let me say that the question was divided into two parts, the first of which was as follows:

What was the total paid by the Department of National Health and Welfare for professional and special services in the fiscal year 1950-51?

Then the second part of the question read:

What person, persons, firms or companies received payments of $25,000 or more under this heading in the said year, what was the actual amount of each payment, and for what service was the payment made in each case?

The answer to question No. 1 gives the sum of $5,012,422.15, and this figure is followed by two paragraphs which give general information as to the type of services for which this amount was paid. However, there is no answer to the second part of the question. No names are given, and there are no specifications as to individual amounts paid to persons, doctors or hospitals. I would ask, therefore, that the question be restored to the order paper so that a more complete answer may be given.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to see that it is completed. I believe the information would be of assistance to some persons in my hon. friend's constituency, and I shall see that the information is supplied.

MANPOWER

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL—QUESTION AS TO NATIONAL REGISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. On May 21, as reported at page 3219 of Hansard, I asked a question of the Minister of Labour or, in his absence, the parliamentary assistant, in these terms:

In the absence of the Minister of Labour I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary assistant. Has the minister been informed that today's Citizen contains an article stating that the national advisory council on manpower does not think it necessary to conduct a national registration at this time? In view of the fact that this is an important question, would the parliamentary assistant care to make a statement?

The hon. member for Verdun-La Salle (Mr. Cote), parliamentary assistant, replied:

I am aware that the Minister of Labour has followed very closely the work of the advisory council on manpower. I would not go any further at this time. I shall be pleased to bring the question to his attention.

Is the Minister of Labour prepared to make a statement now?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I was out of the house for the first few days of this week, including the day the question was asked. The council met last Friday and Saturday, as was pointed out by the parliamentary assistant. I did keep in touch generally with its proceedings. Upon my return yesterday I received its report. I am now studying the report, and it is my purpose this week to submit the relevant parts to my colleagues.

Mr. Johnston: Will the minister make a statement with regard to it?

Mr. Gregg: The subject was initiated during the discussion of my estimates a week ago, and I shall be pleased to discuss it further when my estimates are again before the committee.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. What progress has been made in the discussions with the United States government as to a proposed amendment to the Migratory Birds Convention Act in respect to the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), as he informed the house some time ago, did arrange for officials of the Department of Resources and Development to speak with their opposite numbers in the United States government. Since it was the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) who brought this to my attention in the first place, both by correspondence and through discussion, I think he would wish me to say that I have, in reply to the letter he wrote me, given him a full report of developments to date.

I believe I should add that the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley), who represents a constituency to which this problem is of great concern, has been interested in the matter. I have told him about the arrangements arrived at with the United States authorities.

I received notice of the question just as I came to the house, so that I have not had an opportunity to review the correspondence. Briefly, however, the arrangement is that pending a further study of the problem, which may take a year or two, to obtain statistics and information of various kinds as to rate of growth, decline in population and the like, the section of the act concerned will not be applied; and the officials in Newfoundland responsible for the administration of the act have been so informed.

Mr. Higgins: We do not care so much who gets the credit, so long as we are allowed to have these birds in Newfoundland.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050,000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

Mr. Pouliot: The minister said he would make a statement with regard to the distribution of hose couplings.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Last night I outlined the provisions that had been made in the estimates to provide assistance to the provinces as a result of our agreement in February last with the provinces in respect to the standardization of hose couplings. The hon. member asked me particularly as to the procedure to be followed. The procedure would be for the civil defence authority, in this case the minister of social welfare in Quebec, to advise as to the priority claim of a community in relation to the over-all plan. As a result of that information there would be negotiations between the federal and provincial governments to provide assistance along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. Fleming: Last night the minister agreed to furnish to the committee a functional break-down of the present staff, and I presume that he will also be in position to furnish a break-down of the functions of the staff as previously proposed.

Mr. Martin: First of all there is the civil defence co-ordinator, who is assisted by an administrative officer, grade 1; an administrative officer, grade 3; two administrative officers, grade 6; an administrative officer, grade 7; three technical officers; eight technicians; one messenger; three clerks; five stenographers; six typists.

There are 32 positions available, but as I said last night, there are only 27 filled. In addition there are a cook, storeman, cleaners and helpers at the school here in Ottawa. As I said last night, plans exist for 60 others but there has not yet been final determination as to these; it would depend on circumstances.

Mr. Fleming: Surely some thought must have been given to the functional distribution of the enlarged personnel that was apparently involved in the first plans of the government in connection with this matter. When this question was first raised last night the Minister of National Defence said that the staff was to be 80. Now the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated that 27 positions have been filled, and he cannot say what will be done about the others. When thought was first given to this matter and something was done that led to a tentative decision to have a staff of 80, surely some planning was done or thought given to the functional distribution of the 80. Cannot the minister give us any information in that regard?

Mr. Martin: I gave it last night. As I have said, there are 32 positions available on the staff of the civil defence group as such. When civil defence was under my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, he did not have the personnel in his department that we have in the Department of National Health and Welfare. He had to give consideration to filling positions with persons such as we have in large measure in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I have not indicated the extent to which the 60 remaining posts will be filled in accordance with the plans which were conceived before the transfer took place. That will be decided upon in the light of circumstances as we see them. I can give no more complete answer than that.

Mr. Fleming: I think it is most regrettable that the minister cannot give us more information. Surely he can tell us what work will be assigned to individuals if these other positions are to be filled, or how many personnel from his own department are going to fulfil the functions in whole or in part of civil defence administration. Surely there is information of that kind available.

Mr. Martin: I have already given it in principle, but I shall give it again. The original intention was that preliminary training of civil defence officials would be done in Ottawa. There have been three courses at the school since January. Since that time some thought has been given to the problem, and it would seem—this is not the final decision—best to decentralize the training apart from the technical instructions which we will continue to give. The school in the province of Quebec started today, and two other provinces are opening schools. The result is that it will not be necessary for us to have as many instructors as we had originally contemplated, nor will it likely be necessary to have as many employees at the school, in the way of cooks and the like, to work along with the inevitable stenographic staff, and so on. If we carry out the present policy of decentralization we shall not need as many personnel in that particular. It is circumstances of this kind that have to be looked at.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed with the question I was asking yesterday. In the first place, I want to say to the minister that he rendered a great service to the Canadian people when he awakened them in the stirring speech he made not so long ago. Now that the Canadian people have been awakened to the danger of war, they want to know what to do with regard to civil defence.

Last night the minister indicated that the procedure for any community to follow would be to get in touch with the provincial representative who had been appointed to look after civil defence within the province. My interpretation of his remarks has been approved by the minister. During the last war the civil protection in the House of Commons consisted of placing sandbags on each of the floors near the elevators. Later, in order to improve the situation, wooden boxes were provided, painted red, in which the sandbags were placed. That was supposed to provide fire protection for this fireproof building in time of war. I remember I brought one of those sandbags to Mitch Hepburn and he could not believe that that was the kind of protection we had in the House of Commons. Finally before the end of the war the boxes and the sandbags in them were taken away.

Civil defence is a much more serious thing than some people believe it to be. I take it seriously myself, and I give credit to the minister for his effort. I agree that he has one of the most difficult jobs of anyone in the government at the present time. We have heard for years about the danger of war at this spot in Europe, that spot in Asia or the other spot in Africa. All over the world there are danger spots. The newspapers for a long time have been printing stories to the effect that we may have war at any moment. We must be ready for it. I am extremely glad that the minister is in charge of civil defence in this country.

The minister spoke about hose couplings. I do not see the use of hose couplings without hose. This morning I telephoned to the bureau of statistics to ask them if they had any information about the length of fire hose available in each municipality. The answer was: We have no information. I was not at all surprised at that answer. Now that the minister has spoken about hose couplings, I will ask him if he has any information about the length of fire hose available in each municipality of Canada.

Mr. Martin: I am afraid that, offhand, I could not answer that question; but I should be glad to try to get for my hon. friend as quickly as possible the information he has requested.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister, and I agree with him. But may I tell him that if the chief co-ordinator were worth his salt, the first thing he would have done with his stenographers, his skeleton staff and the others, would have been to write mimeographed letters to the various city clerks or city treasurers asking them what they already had in the way of protection against fire; because in the event of war, the greatest hazard is destruction by fire.

Mr. Blair: You will get that information in the next census.

Mr. Pouliot: At any rate, my hon. friend agrees with that. So long as he agrees with it, I am satisfied.

What is important for the chief co-ordinator and his staff to do is to come down to earth and to use a little bit of common sense and a little bit of perspicacity in their dealing with this problem, which is a difficult one because of the size of the country. It is impossible to copy what is being done in England for civilian protection, in view of the fact that the area of Canada is ten or twenty times greater than that of England. Our problems are entirely different. The United States have a much larger population than we have, and our problem is different from that in the United States. What the co-ordinator should do, under the able direction of the minister, would be to use his own judgment in considering local conditions in Canada as they should be considered in order to face the problem as it must be faced.

Suppose that I am in charge of civilian protection in my community. Any member may be in that position, or anyone else may be. Suppose I get in touch with the provincial representative who has authority within the province. There is not enough fire hose available. I write to him. He gets in touch with Ottawa and he does not get the hose; he gets couplings. What can we do with couplings without hose? If the department has bought such a large quantity of couplings, I wonder from whom it has bought them. Who is the manufacturer or the inventor of that device? How is it that the department is buying so many couplings and no hose at all?

Then there are to be considered the necessary water connections by means of which to fill the fire hose with water in order to fight a fire. What are those facilities in each municipality? I wonder if the minister has some information about that matter, through the chief co-ordinator.

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend will agree, since he asks me the question directly, that it is important to recognize, as he himself has said, that our situation in Canada is not the same as that in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom is a unitary state. Here we operate not only through the municipalities but also under the federal character of our country through the provinces. Fire protection is primarily a matter for the provinces and for the municipalities. The question that my hon. friend has asked, quite properly, in his zeal and his interest in this matter, is one which I am sure he will agree should also be addressed to another authority.

We have had to recognize the federal character of our country in trying to build up an organization, as he himself in his remarks so far has suggested we should. We have had a meeting with the provinces. We have pointed out to them, as they have pointed out to us, that one of the great hazards—particularly in respect of potential atomic attack, let us say, or bombing—would be the resultant fires and that more damage and destruction can come from fires than from anything else. We have said: How can we assist in providing for the greatest amount of mutual aid? That is what will be required if a disaster should come; and we all pray that it will not.

The situation is that the hose coupling is an extremely important factor, because there is no standardization throughout the country. The aim of the provinces—as a result of the decision which they themselves have come to through their fire marshals, their municipal bodies and so on—is that the federal government should give them some assistance in the installation of hose couplings in order to make it possible for community A to use the hose of community B, something which is not now possible in many cases because of a lack of standardization of the hose couplings. As to any community that may be short of hose itself, that is a matter on which no province has yet advised us that it requires financial assistance. I will note what my hon. friend has to say in that regard, and see what the situation is. But I am sure that with this brief explanation with regard to the standardization of hose couplings he will appreciate how important this matter is. It is not only important in one province; it is important as between one community and another on the border; in my own community, in Windsor, for instance, and in Detroit, and in the two Sault Ste. Maries. In those cases, by the use of adapters, it is possible to meet the problem that arises out of the lack of standardization.

I thank my hon. friend for what he has said about the other phase of the question, and I hope I have given him a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister for the good will he shows. When I ask questions about this matter it is because it is of vital importance. My constituents are interested in it, as are the constituents of every other member. It is not so much a question of money as of co-ordination with respect to the part Ottawa is to play under the authority of the minister himself. With regard to hose couplings, if the diameter of the hose is not standard how would it be possible to use couplings except of different sizes? And by the way, who manufactures those couplings; who is the inventor?

Mr. Martin: There are many kinds of couplings. That is one of the problems in trying to get standardization.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister again. Will these couplings be distributed by Ottawa to the provinces or to the municipalities?

Mr. Martin: No, Mr. Chairman. We are not providing the full cost of standardization of hose couplings. We have undertaken to provide one-third of the cost, with the provinces and municipalities to supply the balance, either the provinces alone or the two together. They will make their own purchases; they will decide as to the need. Those are questions we must leave to them, and which we propose to leave to them. This will be an assistance grant which will not completely cover the cost, the expenditure this year being in the neighbourhood of $900,000.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the minister again, and I appreciate what he has said. In my humble view all possible information with respect to civil defence should be publicized to the limit. It cannot do harm to anyone, and it will help us all to know how the authorities, whether municipal, provincial or federal, will look after the protection of the Canadian people. If we spend $900,000 on hose couplings to be distributed by Ottawa to the provinces or the municipalities, or if we have a certain number of steel helmets, it will be impossible to distribute them in an emergency because that emergency may arise so quickly. Everything happens in such a little time, especially when jet planes are used. If a jet plane should attack any part of Canada, would it be possible to send hose couplings and helmets from Ottawa to the part of the country that was bombed? I do not think it would. I tell the minister again that it is not so much a question of money as one of good, plain common sense and co-ordination.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. Pouliot: I am very glad the minister says hear, hear; and I mean co-ordination between all those interested in the protection of the country, which means everybody.

Now I am coming to another matter, in which I hope I shall have the support of the minister in charge of civil defence, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of Transport, because this matter concerns several departments. It is a fact that in any future war the best protection will be mobile units, and there are no units more mobile than the R.C.A.F. Therefore it is of vital importance to have airports at as many places as possible in this country. Many were built during the last war. We need many more good, large airports. In my humble view they would serve as a better protection for the country than any helmets or hose couplings or other devices of that kind.

In my county, for instance, we are 120 miles from Quebec city, where there is an airport; we are 80 miles from Mont Joli, where there is an airport; we are 100 miles from Caribou, Maine, where there is an airport. If I want to come to Ottawa by air I have to drive to Quebec city, a distance of 120 miles, or to Mont Joli, a distance of 80 miles, or to Caribou, a distance of 100 miles. There is no protection. For the protection of this country I hope the minister will discuss the matter with the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Defence Production and the members of the cabinet. For a time there was some discussion about the establishment of an airport at Cacouna in my constituency.

Mr. Martin: It is a fine constituency, too—a lovely country.

Mr. Pouliot: I know, and it deserves protection, as does the whole country from Newfoundland to British Columbia, and especially Fraser valley, the garden of Eden of the west. The Minister of Defence Production told me one day in the railways and shipping committee that he wanted just a word from me with regard to the building of that airport, for which surveys had been made by the Department of Transport. That was in time of peace, and naturally there was an agitation about it. Now that we are in a period of emergency I hope the government will consider the matter anew and will not hesitate to build an airport at Cacouna according to the surveys and plans already made by the Department of Transport. No one will dare create any agitation about it, because it will be for the defence of this country. If an airport is built in every constituency of Canada it will be the best way to protect Canadian people.

I am not going to insist further because the ministers who are here now realize the importance of the matter. The Prime Minister, who lives in my constituency during the summer, knows how important it is. I hope that will be done at the earliest possible opportunity, and I will defend the action of the government just as I would defend a similar action in any constituency in Canada. I will ask the minister of civil defence as well as the Minister of National Defence to tell the committee what they think about my suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I listened to the hon. member for Temiscouata I wondered what the coupling would finally be coupled to; I knew there would be something for Temiscouata before he concluded.

The minister mentioned the fact that our country is different from a unitary state in that we have the federal system; that is perfectly true. But the United States also has the federal system. I intend to ask some questions relating to plans in the United States and to the extent to which the experience of the United States is being applied in Canada. The hon. member for Temiscouata said it is mainly a question of co-operation—

Mr. Pouliot: Co-ordination.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —co-ordination, and not the expenditure of money. I do not quite follow him in that. There are certain responsibilities of the federal authority. There may be a good reason why this very important subject of civilian defence was transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but the reasons, other than the capacity of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, are not immediately apparent.

As I see the situation, this is one subject which particularly comes under the Department of National Defence. It is part and parcel of our plans and of the expenditure of this country for national defence. True enough, the final responsibility for providing personnel is a matter for the provinces and the municipalities. But in the national field the decisions as to shelters, medical stockpiles, the dispersion of industry, emergency housing and public works to facilitate civilian defence preparedness on a scale adequate to meet the expected needs, must fall upon the federal authority. I have discussed this matter with a number of mayors and councillors of municipalities, and I do not misinterpret their view when I suggest to the minister that, while they are prepared to supply voluntary personnel to meet the responsibility of fire fighting and the like within their respective municipalities, they are not receiving today the direction from the national authority that they have a right to expect.

The minister has only recently taken over the responsibility in this direction. He made a most persuasive and inspiring speech on the subject of civil defence. But more than that is required. The publication of the pamphlet to which he has made reference will go part of the way, but I feel that an intensive educational campaign must be launched by the federal authority. People do not want to believe there is going to be atomic bombing of Canada. The thought disturbs our equanimity. We like to look at the situation as though we were protected and insulated by many thousands of miles of sea and a northern ice cap. It is going to require an educational campaign to make the people realize the danger in which we find ourselves.

I looked up some of my clippings of a few years ago, and I have one here which I picked at random. It is dated April, 1948, and says "Big radar fence against aircraft". It went on to say that it was going to cost a great deal of money, several billions of dollars, and that it had been started in 1948. This is 1951, and the least said about that big radar fence the better. Those were some of the plans. Today the people have been lulled into a false sense of security. One of the lessons that came to me as one of the representatives of this parliament at the parliamentary conferences in Wellington and Canberra was a sense of deep foreboding as to the possibilities that faced our country, the other countries of the commonwealth, and the United States. Our people need to be aroused in this connection. Voluntary work has its place, but you can only get voluntary workers when, in the national field, there is the type of message given by the minister and other members of the government that will arouse the people to a realization that there are going to be no second chances this time.

The first point I bring to the attention of the minister is the need for direction and an educational campaign. Second, as to the matters to which I have referred, such as shelters, medical stockpiles, the dispersing of industry and the like, the responsibility rests upon the federal authority. It is all very well to say we have a distribution of authority among the federal, provincial and municipal governments. That is true, but the provision for civil defence in the national field must, as I say, rest upon the national authority. The only way in which that can be done is by grants in aid. I would not go before any members of this government and ask for expenditures unless I believed the plans were either self-liquidating or necessary. An expenditure of $4·5 million this year is totally inadequate to meet the responsibilities with which we are faced. You cannot place that responsibility upon the municipalities. Today the municipalities are bearing rates of taxation that do not permit any further increase. National civil defence, administered on the provincial and municipal levels, means assistance in coping with the danger in which we find ourselves today as a nation.

One of the best articles I have read on this subject—I am not going to quote from it in extenso—is "The Defence of the Free World." It is a record of the proceedings of the academy of political science at a meeting held in November last. There is an article on the subject of civilian defence by the director of the New York state civil defence commission. He points out that we must realize one fact that was not generally admitted at this parliamentary conference. Most of the members were of the opinion that Russia had the atomic bomb. One of the representatives at that conference, who held a high position in the British cabinet during the days of war, claimed that Russia did not have the atomic bomb. But the general consensus was that it had, and that it would be used without warning. That is the view taken by this authority who spoke at the meeting to which I have referred. He accepts the principle outlined by the minister, that the administration cannot be one of a central agency by itself. There must be the central agency for direction, but the basic responsibility for the carrying out of the national policy must rest with the municipalities, under the direction of and in co-operation with the provinces.

In the United States, detailed mutual assistance agreements have been entered into between states and between cities. The states of New York and New Jersey have entered into a joint agreement for their defence, much as the northeastern cities bordering on the Pacific have entered into a joint pact binding on each of them. The general plans of the various states are co-ordinated in a national plan. But in this country, if we are to have something that is in keeping with the dangers that face us, the municipalities must receive a greater measure of assistance than is contemplated by the estimates now before this committee. The municipalities—and again I refer to the speech that was made before the political science association—have the responsibility of organizing volunteer welfare services to receive, feed, clothe, shelter and provide essential social services for evacuees in an orderly and efficient manner.

These local responsibilities can be discharged by the municipal authorities; for they have the agencies for them. They have the health department, the police force and the engineering organization in the respective cities. But in the larger field, in the field wherein national responsibility is pre-eminently of importance, I feel there has been too little assistance given nationally.

Before this session terminates I hope that the minister will be in a position to bring before the house a co-ordinated plan, which will provide for a larger measure of financing on the part of the national authority, and that financial assistance will be given through grants in aid provincially to the end that municipalities will not have added in their respective jurisdictions a financial burden which they cannot properly assume.

The other day I was speaking to a farmer in my own province of Saskatchewan. He pointed out the dangers inherent in communist infiltration in this country, and he brought to my attention something that I had never thought of before. He mentioned the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba—and the same applies agriculturally throughout the dominion—and the extent to which mechanization has taken place in the last fifteen years. Suppose war broke out tomorrow and the gasoline stocks in Saskatoon, Regina, Calgary and Edmonton were attacked. Where would there be production on the prairies with the mechanization we have today? That is one of the responsibilities involved in civil defence. It is a responsibility that is capable of being discharged by the municipalities through their police forces and through the setting up of voluntary police organizations. But before they do that they must receive from the federal government a national plan which may be co-ordinated and which will result, in place of the present haphazard plans, as they naturally are at this time, in a plan directed federally but administered through the provinces and the municipalities so far as detail is concerned, but dependent for its implementation on the national leadership.

Our people need to be aroused to the state of affairs existing at the present time. There is no more important problem before the Canadian people today than that of preserving our civilians; for they themselves will indeed be in any front line. Should war come between Russia and the United States of America we would find ourselves in a desperate position. While the plans of 1948 were made and announced in eloquent terms, in 1951 we are little further ahead.

I want to say one thing more, Mr. Chairman. In the statements I have made there is no criticism of General Worthington or of his capacity and ability, or of the committees operating with him or of the various municipal defence authorities that have been set up. All that they have today is a general picture. They need a sense of direction from the national authority, and they need much greater financial support than is being given today.

Civil defence is as large a part of our national defence as is the obtaining of manpower and the production of the necessary sinews and munitions of war. It is for that reason that I suggest the Minister of National Defence give to the Minister of National Health and Welfare greater assistance than these estimates indicate is to be given.

Mr. Low: I have been keenly interested in what has been said about civil defence. We have talked about fire-fighting equipment and standardizing hose couplings. We have heard discussions about warning systems, decontamination, radiation detection, medical equipment and all that sort of thing, and it has all been interesting, timely—

An hon. Member: But academic.

Mr. Low: It is academic; that is true. I listened with great interest to what the hon. member for Lake Centre said, and I must declare here, Mr. Chairman, that with practically everything he did say I found myself in agreement. I do not intend to repeat what has already been said in the debate. However, there is one thing that I should like especially to emphasize. After saying that not enough money has been voted or set aside this year for civil defence, I am quite certain—

Mr. Martin: May I interrupt for a moment? Constant reference is made to that. It would be very helpful to me if I could have some suggestions. I should like my hon. friend to know how much is being spent in the United Kingdom and how much is being spent in the United States. He would be very surprised to realize the extent to which in Britain they are spending. This year they are appropriating $20 million. In the United States the Senate is appropriating $86 million, and the House of Representatives $84 million. I ask my hon. friend to compare these figures, and particularly to compare the situation in Britain with what it is here.

This is not essentially a problem involving dollars and cents. The reason I rise at this time—I am sure my hon. friend will not mind—

Mr. Low: Not at all.

Mr. Martin: The reason I rise at this time is that, as the minister responsible for civil defence, I am quite properly expected to try to give some leadership in the matter, and that I am endeavouring to do; but it would be unfair to insist on leadership on the one hand, and to say something on a matter with which I did not deal, unless I was given some proper direction.

I want my hon. friend to know that we have discussed this matter with the provinces. We have discussed this matter with the corresponding officials in Britain and in the United States. The plans that we are following are based upon consultations that we have had with the provinces, the United States and the United Kingdom. If in the light of our obligations, which primarily I believe must be to the armed forces in time of total war; if after providing for all these things, I believe in my heart—as I see the whole picture, as my advisers see it and as the government sees it—that more should be appropriated, I will not hesitate to make the necessary recommendations; but I do not propose to make a recommendation for the expenditure of any more money than is necessary.

I believe that the real emphasis is where I sought to place it, where Sir John Hodsoll, the greatest authority on civil defence in the world, because of his own experience, places it, namely, on the mutual aid principle, on every man and woman in this country or in the free world who has to face, unfortunately, the challenges of modern total war.

Mr. Low: I thank the minister, and I appreciate this statement. But I still find myself thinking that perhaps some country in the world—and it might as well be the Canadian government as any other—will take the lead, and will not wait to find out what the United States has done or what Great Britain has done.

What do we care about comparisons? Let us look at the situation as if we were facing the real problem tomorrow. Let these other countries fiddle along, if that is what they want to do. I do not believe in that procedure, at all. I do agree with the minister however that there is no sense in appropriating and spending more money than is absolutely necessary for civil defence. But let us be sure that we spend as much as we should spend at this time, so that our people will be prepared.

Mr. Martin: I agree.

Mr. Low: That is all I am concerned about. There is one practical aspect of the matter with which I should like to deal briefly—because I believe most other factors have been discussed fully. This practical aspect concerns the leadership that can be exercised by the government and by members of the House of Commons generally.

I was interested the other day in a statement emanating from Dr. William T. Salter of Yale university, who said:

> The best protection against atom bomb attacks would be for everyone to pack blood plasma and bandages into a suitcase and go to live in the country.

Well, that is all very well for those who have a bag, in the first place, and who in the second place can afford blood plasma and bandages, and a place to live in the country.

Mr. Martin: That would be the worst thing to do, in any event.

Mr. Low: I did not find myself in too much agreement with that part of the statement. He did make a further statement however which, to my mind, is of importance, when he said:

> We should follow a program of decentralization and of converting all our households into small granaries and medical units.

With that I thoroughly agree—and there are good reasons why. If we are wise we will counsel every Canadian family to make small granaries and medical units of their household. That is a practical thing that the people could do for themselves, if they were given just a little leadership and were offered a few suggestions. Some people, acting upon advice received from wise leaders, during the course of the last year or two, and at great pains, have accumulated a year's supply of certain foodstuffs which, today, they are constantly using and replacing. As I said, this was done painfully and at great sacrifice. They are using and replacing this supply today with newer material. An examination of what they have laid in will show that the permanent core of this store is a bushel or two of wheat in some sort of airtight metal container. That constitutes the small granary.

Mr. Hatfield: And a flour mill.

Mr. Low: And perhaps a small flour mill, like one I now have. It is a well known fact that, with wheat and water—just those two things—human beings can survive almost indefinitely.

Mr. Hatfield: And a flour mill.

Mr. Low: Yes, or even a small coffee grinder. With a little wheat and water a human being can exist in fair health for an indefinite length of time. It seems to me the domestic store should contain not only the wheat in an airtight metal container, but water in stone or glass containers which would always be kept filled with fresh and clean water.

We all know one of the greatest dangers to any city in a time of air attack or bombing would be the contamination of the water supply. Under these circumstances it seems to me that one of the most practical things the minister and his staff could do would be to make the people of Canada in their homes, from one end of the country to the other, conscious of the necessity of doing something for themselves. And one of the best things they could do would be to set up in their own homes small granaries and medical units.

Mr. Hatfield: There has been considerable talk about hose couplings. Does the minister mean hose couplings or hydrant couplings? Surely he does not mean hose couplings?

Mr. Martin: Yes, we mean hose couplings.

Mr. Hatfield: But you do not need hose couplings unless you have hose. In Canada we do not have uniform hydrants in our different cities. What we need is couplings to fit the hydrants. I suggest we do not need hose couplings unless we have hose, but I am pointing out that we require different couplings for different types of hydrants. In one town or city we will find hydrants with threads differing from those in other towns and cities. Then, throughout the country, we find old hydrants with couplings of different sizes. What we need is hydrant couplings, not hose couplings at all.

Mr. Martin: I will have my hon. friend's observations brought to the attention of all the provincial governments, who have asked for hose couplings.

Mr. Johnston: It would seem that in the last while the minister has been getting into some difficulty and has been subjected to a good deal of criticism.

Mr. Martin: I thrive on it.

Mr. Johnston: In this instance criticism is good, because there is no subject of greater importance than that of civil defence. Nothing could cause greater havoc in this country, nothing could bring about greater disruption in every sense than a poorly-organized civil defence.

In my view however the measure of success or failure in this respect must be the progress being made, and progress that we can see. While I listened to the debate I was wondering what actual and visual preparation is being made in, let us say, the city of Calgary. In the event of attack where would the people of that city go and what would they do to seek assistance? It is not enough to say that we are preparing this or that, and that sooner or later we will have it done. The people should be aware of it now.

Mr. Martin: If that is a direct question I would answer from a report from the government of Alberta.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to hear it.

Mr. Martin: The government of Alberta advises us that a number of cities such as Edmonton, Calgary, Lethbridge and Medicine Hat are in an advanced stage in training—and then there is other information which, obviously, is quite secret. However, I would be prepared to show it to the hon. member privately. We are advised by the government of Alberta that civil defence directors have been appointed in these cities, and that the planning there has reached an advanced stage.

Mr. Johnston: I am glad some cities in the country are making progress. Again, Alberta is taking the lead—with the assistance of the minister, of course. They are advising him, and perhaps helping people in the more backward cities of Canada to use that knowledge.

I have listened carefully to the discussion, but I have not heard reference made to the progress in connection with communications and transportation. We can talk all we like about preparations for civil defence, but without proper co-ordination between air, rail and highway transportation systems, we would be at a loss. No greater confusion could come about in the case of air attack than that which would be caused by lack of proper co-ordination between our transportation systems.

This was brought out clearly not so long ago when the railroad employees were out on strike. We saw then what might have happened without highway transportation. We would have been in a very bad position. In order to add to the effectiveness of the statement I have made I should like to quote from an article which appeared in "Bus and Truck Transport" magazine and which refers to statements that had been made by General Worthington, the civil defence co-ordinator. I think this article is so applicable that I should take the time of the committee to read it. This article appears on page 35 of the May issue and is entitled, "Ottawa forms defence transportation committee." A paragraph entitled, "Tremendous Problem" reads as follows:

> Civil defence faces a "tremendous problem of transportation," General Worthington told the committee at its first meeting. The success or failure of civil defence in Canada could hinge on communications and transportation, he said.
> A major function of transport would be the supply of aid to a devastated area from nearby communities. As well, it might be necessary to organize evacuation and to move great numbers of people over great distances. The wide separation of Canadian cities presented a problem not encountered in Europe, nor, to so great an extent, in the United States.
> Where an area was chosen as a reception centre it was estimated that the number of people who could be taken in from other cities was 50 per cent of the area's normal population. That alone would be an immense problem and, for such emergencies, there must be an over-all co-ordinated plan.
> "In the case of railways we must know where their rolling stock is and how best we can use it," General Worthington said. "In addition we have to face the fact that we may lose some parts of the railway system through enemy action and, in those cases, road transport must be ready to step in.
> Air transport will be needed to bring in the most vital commodities to an attacked area—most likely medical supplies and medical personnel. This would be done by the heavier aircraft; lighter aircraft would be employed in air reconnaissance for fire fighting and, perhaps, highway traffic control."
> Turning to the role of road transport, General Worthington said two main needs were to arrange adequate fuel supplies and traffic control. "Police control inside the cities will probably not be too bad," he told the defence committee. "There will be civil defence traffic routes, and only authorized vehicles will be allowed to use them. But we will have to anticipate traffic jams on the open roads, away from target areas, because we feel that as soon as an attack begins, many people will jump into their private cars and the highways may become blocked. One job of this committee is to figure out how highway traffic can be controlled and kept moving."

Apparently a government-sponsored civil defence transportation committee was set up early last month in this city. It has held its initial meeting but I understand that it will not meet again until the latter part of July.

Mr. Martin: One of the working committees is actually meeting this afternoon.

Mr. Johnston: So far as I know the minister has not mentioned this very important subject of transport communications.

Mr. Martin: Yes, I did. I said also that one of the working committees is meeting this afternoon.

Mr. Johnston: I mean the minister has not dealt with it in this debate.

Mr. Martin: I dealt with it in my main statement.

Mr. Johnston: I do not think this committee has attached the importance it should to this matter.

Mr. Martin: It is of great importance.

Mr. Johnston: Certainly its importance is not recognized. As General Worthington has said, all our defence preparations depend entirely and immediately upon the proper co-ordination of the transportation and communication systems.

I am glad the minister referred to the preparations being made in Alberta. In discussing this matter with cabinet ministers there I know that they are cognizant of the necessity of doing something and they have been working on this. Concrete results have been achieved. But I think we should know what preparations have been made in the other provinces.

For example, take the matter of air raid shelters. What preparations are being made in Canada in that regard? What preparations are being made in Ottawa to provide air raid shelters? I do not know of one. If we were attacked by atomic or other bombs, where would we go? It is all right to say that we are working on it, but an air attack can come suddenly. We know from experience that the enemy does not wait upon our convenience to attack. If an attack should come unexpectedly, where would we go in this city to seek assistance? There is not one place that I know of, and I do not think any other hon. member knows of one place. Those are the things that people should know if they are to avail themselves of the facilities which are supposedly there.

Every assistance should be given to the committee which the government has set up to co-ordinate the communications and transportation systems. It should also be made clear just exactly what progress has been made and what are the future plans.

Mr. Martin: I know that the hon. member for Temiscouata has a rather important engagement so I should like to answer a question he asked which I should have answered more promptly. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that the matter to which he referred is one over which I do not have direct jurisdiction, nor has my colleague, the Minister of National Defence. I am sure that the Minister of National Defence and I will be most anxious to see that the effective representations made by the hon. member for Temiscouata are brought to the attention of our colleagues, the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of Transport. We shall take great pleasure in passing on the information at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, at this time I do not wish to pick a fight with anyone who holds views with respect to civil defence which may be diametrically opposed to those which I hold, but I do feel that the discussions so far—

An hon. Member: Louder.

Mr. MacDougall: I was called to order the other day and berated for speaking too loudly. I have modulated my voice this afternoon so that I shall not offend the sensitive auricles of various hon. members of the committee. In that regard I might say that it is not often that in a matter of this kind I disagree with my good friend the hon. member for Lake Centre. But it seems to me that in the matter of civil defence we are now speaking in terms of dollars and cents. Personally, I do not believe that is the proper tactic for us to adopt at this time. I think it will be more or less universally agreed by everyone here that there is resting on the individual member of the House of Commons a responsibility which is as great as, if not greater than, that which rests on the government.

Certainly our plan of civil defence at the present time is not complete, and it is not perfect. I do not think that anyone in his right senses would expect it to be. But I would imagine that, in the near future, with the vote which it is now stated is going to be given to civil defence preparations, certain things will be brought about with respect to information for every hon. member. Rightly or wrongly, it is my considered opinion that the preparation and the successful carrying on of civil defence, as far as we are concerned, can best be accomplished in the 262 federal ridings of the Dominion of Canada by the members who sit in the House of Commons, provided they will go back to their constituencies and tell them what is needed after we have more information than we have at the present time and when the plan has gone forward to a more complete state of fruition than it has reached now. We should individually and collectively make it our bounden duty to see to it that we stress the importance of what is needful with respect to an adequate civil defence.

I do not think that the most essential factor in civil defence is the granting of a lot of federal money; but I believe that one of the essential factors is that the people have some information about the potential destruction in the event of an aerial attack. Let us put it this way. We know perfectly well that the destruction from the Hiroshima bomb was colossal. We know now—it is no secret—that had the victims of the Hiroshima bomb had adequate medical attention within forty hours or forty-eight hours, the casualties resulting from radiation would have been cut by at least 40 per cent. We also know that when you have atomic explosions—this is also no secret, and I am not quoting from any book—if there is a warning that is understood by all the people, atomic casualties will be cut by another 40 per cent. In my opinion, therefore, it is logical to conclude that one of the first things that should be done by the members of parliament and the government is the giving of consideration to a universal system of warning that will be the same in Newfoundland as it is on Vancouver island, in the province of British Columbia, and all the intervening terrain.

How can we best bring about a decrease of casualties? I think it is generally known that in all the industrial areas of all the provinces of the Dominion of Canada we have the nucleus of a volunteer service that cannot be matched in any other country in the world. I refer now to that great body of men and women who are fully trained and qualified in first aid. In my opinion they can and ought to be considered a volunteer nucleus from which can develop in each locality across the Dominion of Canada a tremendously important factor in the reduction of casualties. That force is completely and entirely voluntary. It will not cost the government of Canada a dollar to put that force into operation. I am convinced that every man and woman in that group would be delighted to tutor, maybe once or twice a week, various groups in his or her particular community who would be able to carry on any first aid work in a most adequate manner.

With respect to atomic explosions, we also know that in hospital areas and congested metropolitan areas the likelihood of casualties among physicians will, in all probability, go to fifty per cent. If that is true—and I believe it is—then every one of us must do something with regard to the education of his constituency in that matter. Let us consider my own riding in the city of Vancouver. It has the largest hospital in the province of British Columbia; I refer to the Vancouver general hospital. We have there a tremendous area of hospitalization. Suppose an atomic bomb should hit close to or upon the Vancouver general hospital. The loss in professional services—those both of nurses and of physicians and surgeons—would immediately be at least fifty per cent.

A great deal can be said for decentralization of hospitalization; but the fact remains that we must deal with the situation as it now is. The hospital is there, the facilities are there, and the personnel are there; and they are going to remain there unless something in the nature of a flood or a holocaust of some sort or other occurs without Uncle Joe pulling the string. We must face the facts with respect to this whole situation. Candidly, I believe that we are about to get a great deal more information from our civic defence authorities. At the present time there is no one in any part of Canada or the United States who can say that we have the complete blueprint for security in the event of an atomic explosion. But as individual members of the House of Commons we at least have a duty to perform when we go back to our constituencies, namely to give to the people what, in our opinion, might be the potential of an atomic explosion anywhere in our district. That is something for each of us to do. Certainly the government can help by giving the necessary information; but whether it is an atomic explosion, a flood or any other holocaust a great deal of the aid given in the first instance will be voluntary, coming from your next door neighbour.

This afternoon there was some mention of couplings, and one hon. member said he did not mean hose couplings but hydrant couplings. I am not going to enter that argument—

Mr. Martin: There is no argument on that subject. Do not confuse the people.

Mr. MacDougall: We know perfectly well what happened at Rimouski not so very long ago. We also know what has happened in various parts of Canada during the last few years when great fires have occurred. The hydrant facilities in adjoining municipalities have not been co-ordinated. Certainly to standardize the threads on all hydrants across Canada would cost the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars, and I do not think that expenditure would be justified. I do believe some consideration should be given, however, if it has not been given already, to the use of adapters that could be utilized on hydrants of adjoining municipalities where the threads are different. In many instances I believe that would reduce the number of casualties and would be a much cheaper way of giving adequate protection in the event of a large fire.

Furthermore, while I may be old fashioned in my ideas with respect to the response of the Canadian people in the event of attack, I think there is something in the spirit of the early pioneers on the prairies that could be adopted right across Canada in both rural and urban areas. On my way down to the opening of this session I stopped off in Saskatchewan to visit my brother. He has a huge barn, though I do not know whether it is as large as that of the hon. member for Springfield. As has been stated this afternoon, the farms across Canada have been largely mechanized, and many large barns are not used to anything like full capacity. I am as sure as that I am now speaking to you that in the event of any holocaust in Saskatchewan —and I use that just as an illustration, for I am sure the same thing would apply from coast to coast—the neighbourliness that has been born of hardship and experience would be a tremendous factor in providing aid and assistance to those in need. We also know that in a good bank barn you are perhaps as well protected as you could be anywhere. In my view the voluntary aspect of civil defence is far more important than the expenditure of a large sum of money for the purchase of equipment which may not be used this year or within the next five years.

So I leave this thought with you, Mr. Chairman, for what it may be worth. I do not believe the government should be too severely condemned because some people, perhaps without adequate information, feel that the appropriation for civil defence is not large enough. To me the voluntary part of the program is much more worthy of consideration than the pouring of millions of dollars into equipment that may or may not be used. We know perfectly well that Uncle Joe is not going to telegraph and tell us if and when an atomic attack is going to occur. So I conclude on a note very similar to that on which I opened. If we are to adequately meet the needs of civil defence it must be particularly by way of voluntary effort. I do say the government should give the lead, and I am thoroughly convinced that the minister will do so, and will give every member of this house the necessary information so that we may go back and impress upon our constituents the importance of civil defence and the part to be played by voluntary effort. If we do that I am quite sure the response of the Canadian people will be adequate to meet the need. I am also sure that if the minister finds it necessary to increase this appropriation you and I as taxpayers will have no objection at all. We should always remember, however, that in these matters the neighbourly feeling counts for much more than a terrific expenditure of money.

Mr. Martin: I do not want to repeat what I have said already in my initial statement, but in the light of the discussion that has taken place I believe there are some things that will have to be said in the public interest. I do not desire to shut off any hon. member, but I thought I should say now that I do intend to try to more or less close the matter and bring it to a head. If any hon. members wish to speak before I do so, they have a perfect right; I am just giving an indication of my intention. I believe many of the things that have been said have perhaps arisen because hon. members have not had an opportunity to really see what has been going on not only in Ottawa but in every province and almost every major municipality. If anyone wishes to anticipate me, I am prepared to wait, but I should like to more or less summarize what I have to say in order to bring the discussion to a conclusion more readily than perhaps would otherwise be the case.

Mr. Blair: It is not my intention to speak on this subject at length. Last September I covered the different types of warfare as far as Canada is concerned. I dealt with gas and chemical warfare, explosive bombs, atomic bombs, and those things which might represent a danger to our country. I must say I was pleased last evening when the minister came out with a complete account of his expenditures. If we had been given that statement by the Minister of National Defence in the early part of the debate we might have been a good deal further along in the consideration of the estimates. For that part, I congratulate the minister. I was disturbed, though, last night by one part of his speech to which I should like to refer. He said, as reported at page 3387 of Hansard of May 24:

> I am certain that as long as I am in charge of this difficult assignment I am not going to go ahead and build up an organization which in the event of disuse would rust and do more harm than good.

Further on he said:

> We may make a big miscalculation; there can be no doubt of that possibility, but certain risks have to be taken in this matter. Those risks have to be borne not only by the armed forces but by everyone in Canada, for that is the nature of total war. No minister of the crown or anyone else can alter that unfortunate fact.

I said I was disturbed when I heard him use those words. I have read the statement several times this afternoon, and there seems to be a tone in the minister's speech which is suggestive of something like gambling. We are going to take a chance. In so far as the defence of this country and of our people is concerned, I do not believe we should ever take a chance. So far as money is concerned, let us compare the amounts allotted for this purpose. We are going to spend something like $5 billion on the armed forces for our defence, while we are going to spend something like $5 million for the defence of the people of this country. It is rather difficult to understand this, because the conditions of warfare have changed a great deal in the last twenty-five years. If we have to come to grips with an enemy—there is one enemy in our minds—the thing that would determine our success would be the large manufacturing and industrial capacity of Canada and the United States. If the war followed the pattern of the last war, in which we bombed the Ruhr valley which contains the manufacturing centres for war materials for Germany, it would naturally follow that our enemy would bomb our industrial areas and the industrial areas of the great country to the south. That is something to be considered, because the bombing of those areas has become part of warfare as it exists at the present time.

We are striving, and other nations are striving, to put industries which manufacture war materials, such as guns, aeroplanes and that type of thing, out of business. For that reason, I believe it would be a possibility that this country and the country to the south of us would be bombed. For that reason I feel that, even as the hon. member who just spoke, while a great deal of the work done in such an emergency would be voluntary, yet there is an onus on the government to build up a very elaborate plan for the defence of this country. The same thing happened in England during the last war. During the bombing of the industrial areas the civilian population suffered, and suffered severely. Practically one-third of the houses were destroyed at that time, along with the casualties which existed at that time. The same condition could exist in Canada. I do not like that note in the minister's address in which he intimated that we are more or less going to take a chance. We are not going to build up an organization that is going to rust. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the time will ever come when we should take a chance on this country or the people who live in it.

Mr. Martin: I do not want to interrupt, but I think this is rather important. I believe the hon. member would agree that I did not say we should take a chance. I said that there is a great risk involved, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. Blair: There is a risk involved in not doing something, and that is the point I am advancing. We cannot afford to take that risk. If we can spend $5 billion on the army, navy and air force for our defence, which will probably be used outside this country because we hope the war will be as far from Canada as we can have it, $5 million seems a very inadequate allotment for the protection of the people living in this country.

I wonder if the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare have been cut down in favour of the estimates of national defence. We must draw the line some place. So far as disuse is concerned, sir, we may do a great deal of this work by voluntary effort, and by the use of voluntary agencies existent in Canada at the present time. After all, a great deal of this work must fall on the government, and there will be expense. This afternoon we were talking about hose couplings. There is no reason why the same type of hose couplings could not be in common use across Canada. We have had disasters in Canada before. In the last year we had to deal with one in the Fraser valley; we had a flood in Winnipeg, and we had the terrible fires in Quebec. Those things are happening and causing a great deal of suffering. This agency would not be allowed to rust in disuse because of the things I have cited that have happened in the last year or two. They may happen again in the future.

So far as the training of people in the care of casualties is concerned, that is not something that is going to rust. If the lessons in the care of casualties and first aid are well learned, people are not going to forget them. They can be of use at any time. The stockpiling of medical supplies and food are things that can be used at any time. The hon. member who has just spoken mentioned the possibility of hospitals being bombed. That shows us that arrangements should be made outside those areas to take care of casualties, because the hospital is just as apt to be destroyed as any other place. In his reply, I would ask the minister—after all he is at the head of this organization and it is a difficult assignment, but I am going to ask him these questions—to indicate what arrangements have been made in the matter of an air raid warning across Canada.

Let us suppose that by means of radar we are warned of the approach of enemy planes. Is there one warning that will be spread all across Canada? So far as sirens are concerned, I wonder how many municipalities in Canada have sirens that could warn the people? Some days ago we heard some noise from a new siren on the Hunter building. Then, this morning, I read in the newspaper that we are going to do some excavating and dig down about two floors below the parliament buildings to have some protection. Possibly there are some members who would like to crawl into such a hole during these debates. But this matter is not going ahead, and if this emergency should occur at the present time we are still taking chances. Will the minister tell us what has been done by way of keeping the water and food supply in Canada free from contamination. Are the large reservoirs of the cities protected? I doubt if any municipality in Canada is mounting a guard or taking any steps to maintain a proper water supply for the people.

As of now, how many of our people have been trained in chemical and germ warfare? Has this matter been brought before the people by means of booklets or pamphlets, telling them that something like this could happen? The average person feels that this is something one reads about. In looking at this whole picture, they feel that it cannot happen here. We are only talking about this. I wonder what surveys have been made in Canada for bomb shelters. I wonder how far the training has advanced in all the cities and towns of Canada where there are possible targets. How far has the training of people in the care of casualties advanced? I ask the minister what has been done about stockpiling food and medical supplies, and whether these supplies have been placed in areas outside the large cities where they could be reached in the event of the city being bombed. Lastly I ask the minister this question: How far have we gone into the possibility of fire either from bombs or from fifth columnists? Certainly the fire brigades of every town or organized municipality in the country should be receiving training along that line. As part of their training the municipalities might like to have their own air wardens or their own fire wardens, apart from their fire system, because, as you will realize, in a city even the size of Ottawa, the present fire brigade would find it difficult to control the whole community.

In the last war in England they set up fire wardens who took charge of certain areas, and they had fire watchers. It was a good organization. These people stayed on; they worked for weeks, months and years. But I again come back to the minister's statement of last night which, while he has corrected the statement that I made, did smack somehow of a feeling that, well, we will take a chance. We are going to have to take a chance; there is no way out of it. We will just have to do the best we can.

It may be that out of the asking for more money in this debate today for civil defence nothing will happen, but I would like to believe that the minister, or any member of the government, if nothing happens in the next three years, will not say: There now, we knew there was no occasion to spend this money. We, your wise government, did not spend this money and inflict taxes on you because we felt nothing was going to happen.

I ask the minister now: Does he honestly feel that nothing can happen? If it could happen, why cannot we be prepared and fully prepared? The amount of $5 million that we are spending is only a drop in the bucket in comparison with the $5 billion we are spending for defence. Therefore I think the minister finds himself in the position where he feels that he would like to do a great deal more than is being done.

I do realize it is difficult to establish an organization across Canada which would be adequate for the protection of this country. No doubt the size of the country and the population make the matter of civil defence a difficult question to deal with. But even with that, we have certain cities in certain parts of the country which would be vulnerable targets in the event of an attack such as has been visualized by some hon. members since the debate started.

Therefore in closing I feel that even if these things that we are doing for our protection—and I include the lot from air raid shelters to the training of civilians—even if these are never used, we should still go ahead and protect the people of this country, and, so far as the training is concerned, ensure protection against fire. That brings up the matter of hose couplings which has occupied a great deal of the time of the house. They could all be used at any time. Having suffered from disasters, three or four in the past year or two, we could still with advantage use the set-up for civilian defence in the time of an emergency, even if there were no enemy attacks.

Again I cannot help comparing the small amount set up for civil defence of this country with the total expenditure on defence, and drawing the minister's attention to the fact that in war as it exists at the present time, and looking back at the first war, civilians suffer, and they sometimes have been in more danger than the people in the army. It is part of present-day warfare; it is part of the strategy of the enemy air force.

This matter brought on, both last night and today, a debate in which I am glad to say a number of members were interested. But I say to the minister that the advice of the members and their feelings in this matter are expressed in an attempt to safeguard the people of this country and to help them in the event of a tragedy of this type coming to pass.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, my remarks in connection with this debate will be very brief. I am inclined to agree with the speech made by the hon. member for Red Deer yesterday who said that in his opinion, in dealing with these defence estimates, the house had wasted practically four days. In that connection I have noticed that our friends in the C.C.F. party have not spoken in this debate, and I am presuming that they are more or less in accord with government policy. There has been very little criticism from the Social Credit group; but we find the grand old Conservative party going to bat in connection with this debate, and we also find them not in agreement. The aged member for Nanaimo apparently has disagreed—

Some hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): He has been in the house a long time, and he disagrees with the more youthful member from the other seat in British Columbia. They have disagreed on procedure. We find today—

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, there has been no disagreement between myself and any other member, and I am not so very old, after all is said and done.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Well, the record of the house speaks for itself.

Mr. Graydon: He looks younger than you do.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, I merely want to confirm the hon. member for Nanaimo in both particulars.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Well, Hansard will speak for itself. If these two gentlemen were in agreement then a great misuse has been made of the English language.

Mr. Pearkes: By you.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Thus we find today again that while the hon. member for Calgary East said yesterday that in all fairness to the government in the last year or so considerable progress had been made in the matter of defence, yet we find the hon. member for Lake Centre today saying that little had been accomplished since the year 1948.

An hon. Member: One is a soldier.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): One is a soldier, that is correct.

Mr. Harkness: On a question of privilege, the hon. member for Yorkton should consult Hansard again and keep his records straight. I was speaking yesterday on certain things that had been done in the army, navy and air force. The hon. member for Lake Centre was speaking of civil defence entirely. They are two different things.

Mr. Graydon: You are all balled up.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is all right. Apparently my hon. friends in the official opposition are getting balled up and are getting excited now, and even the young soldier who has just joined the house is getting impatient. I say that my friends of the official opposition ought to get more co-ordination. I have stressed that all along. They have disagreed on procedure; they have disagreed on whether the government is doing a good job or not.

Mr. Drew: No; there is complete agreement on that.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Let me make this prophecy. I have exhorted them in this house previously to try to get together and get a little co-ordination in their affairs, or they may not even be the official opposition.

Mr. Harkness: We are co-ordinated; your thoughts are not.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I think I am correct in saying that the official opposition has successfully wasted at least three days in talking on procedure in this house. I quite agree with the hon. member from the Social Credit ranks who said that Stalin himself would have enjoyed the performance put on by the official opposition in this house in the last few days. The inference today again, as it was last night, was that the government was not spending enough on civilian defence. We have before us billions being spent on defence generally, and very little if any criticism has been offered by the official opposition in connection with that expenditure. Thus far they have argued chiefly about procedure.

Are we to take it for granted that they are satisfied with the main estimates for this department? They imply that, because of the vote for home defence, the government is taking a chance, that it is not going far enough, and that it is not spending enough. Well, I would point out that in connection with home defence the total amount is not being spent by the federal government. One must always take into consideration the amount being spent by municipal and provincial governments.

Anyone who has followed the procedure in connection with bombing and air attacks knows that the best defence for Canada is on our northern boundaries. He must also know that that defence is being looked after by the Department of National Defence. One of our greatest expenditures is for that purpose. He should also know that a country, even one as intelligent as Russia, is not going to bomb small communities throughout the Dominion of Canada. If they did get through our defence of radar and our aircraft in the north country, they would not do that. That is only common sense. Certain targets will be picked out in the most strategic centres in Canada and the United States, if Russia happens to be our enemy. For instance it is idle for the leader of the Social Credit group to suggest that our people should flee to the barns, and establish their homes there. I do not think any intelligent nation would bother bombing ninety per cent of the farms in Canada, even if they could get across our boundary. They are not going to fly from Russia in their large bombers, and waste atom bombs on cities such as the city of Yorkton, or such places. They will pick out certain strategic points of military value. I doubt even if they would bother with the city of Ottawa.

The chief defences should be in those places of military value, and should not be wasted. I was down to California again last winter. Down there they have a population of about eight million people congested in a small area. Those are the places where—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): You make your speech, buttercup, later on. You are up all the time; now give somebody else a chance.

Any nation of intelligence—and the Russians have some intelligence—will pick out those centres of heavy population and strategic military value. They are not going to waste bombs on small communities throughout Canada. There is no reason, of course, why those communities should not have fire-fighting equipment; but it is idle for anyone to urge that the government and the department should spend money in every community of Canada to build dugouts, concrete shelters and everything else for the protection of those people.

If Russian planes did get through they would pick out strategic points in Canada—and I believe the government of this country has intelligence enough to have picked out those points, and to have arranged for their protection, to see that those points are amply protected.

But the idea of spending millions upon millions of dollars in the defence of towns and villages that have no more chance of being attacked than the man in the moon is just a waste of money. Further, those members who advocate such a thing are unnecessarily exciting the people. In two wars we lost 100,000 in killed, and if another war comes it will be a total war in which civilians as well as others will be attacked, and will be in the same position as the reserve troops. While we do not want a war, it might have the healthy effect throughout the dominion of uniting the people a little more closely together than they have been in the past, through equal suffering.

No one in Canada should get the idea that he or she will be free of trouble if another war breaks out. But, as for the spending of more money on shelters, and all that sort of thing, I say the government would be well advised to pick out the strategic points first and to make sure that they are protected. The government is well advised to spend money on our northern defences, and all that sort of thing, to keep the enemy out of the air.

I do not think the small points in Canada need worry much about having large bombs dropped on them, nor do they need to follow the suggestion of the leader of the Social Credit party, and flee to their barns. I do not think that will be necessary.

As I said at the outset, I did not intend to take up much time.

Mr. Hees: Oh no.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): My young friend, the young soldier of the last war, is very good at interrupting. If he has a question to ask, then let him get up on his hind legs and ask it.

The official opposition have complimented the government upon the selection of General Worthington. We have a good man at the head of civil defence, a man who has been across the Dominion of Canada. I am sure that in my province of Saskatchewan he will receive splendid co-operation in every city.

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): They are not stampeded, at all. I think members generally from the west, in all parties, are not receiving protests from their cities—at least they have not said so in the house. Even Rome was not built in a day. The fact that there are not complaints from the larger urban municipalities in the western provinces shows that the people are reasonably well satisfied with what is being done, and are reasonably satisfied with the contribution they are making. They are not complaining about what the federal government is or is not doing in the matter of civil defence.

As I said earlier, the best civilian defence is military defence through our air force and our navy, and the troops we are training. That is the best defence we could have. If it comes to a total war, we will all be in it, in any event—and I would repeat that that might do more to mould Canada than anything we have seen in the efforts of the official opposition in the House of Commons.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to open my mouth this afternoon; but following the speech of the hon. member for Yorkton I am wondering whether we should not ask the director of civil defence to have a squad here, to take care of us.

This matter of civil defence is serious. The minister has been stressing that point constantly, and I think hon. members agree as to its seriousness. My understanding is that this debate started last night only. It has not yet gone on a full day. Why hon. members suggest there has been delay and waste of time in this important matter I, for one, do not understand.

There may be some reason for the hon. member's indulging in personalities, and in describing people as being youthful or aged —but what that has to do with an important subject of this kind, I cannot see. I think if the hon. member were to look into his speech he would realize, upon reflection, that this whole matter of civil defence is one requiring the most careful consideration of people throughout the country. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said this afternoon, it is as important to each member as it is to the government. Surely that is consistent, is it not?

I would not think it proper to indulge in the kind of personalities and the type of discussion we have been having. The official opposition may be hamstrung in numbers, but it is trying to do its job as best it can. If it believes this is the way in which we should proceed, then surely it ought not to be criticized as it has been criticized this afternoon. This is an important subject—and I leave it at that.

I have risen to ask the minister one or two questions. He has had discussions with the provinces, and plans have been worked out. I am speaking only for the province of Newfoundland. A director of civil defence was appointed for Newfoundland, but he resigned some three months ago and no one has been appointed in his place. I do not know what has happened and I do not believe anyone else does.

I do not think we need to enter into the realms of imagination to consider Newfoundland as being strategically important. There are United States bases and airports located there, and it is important in operating a convoy system. But we do not know what is happening. The answer may be that which was given by the hon. member for Lake Centre, that it is a question of finance. Perhaps the province has not the money to take care of these matters. I submit that the minister should make a full explanation this afternoon and tell us what has been done in Newfoundland.

There has been nothing in the newspapers in the past month to indicate what has been done. The minister may be able to explain. I feel like the hon. member for Lake Centre, and with all due respect to some of the previous speakers, this is something in connection with which the government should give full direction and I think also that the great bulk of the money should come from the government.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the hon. member for Yorkton and other Liberals who may hear members of the opposition making suggestions to the minister or criticizing what the minister has been doing will not take us to task and introduce into this discussion petty party politics. Personally I think that this matter is of too great concern to the people of Canada for a minister or any government supporter to place any criticism offered on a party political basis.

I am not in agreement with the hon. member for Yorkton when he says that the people of Canada are reasonably satisfied with what has been done in the matter of civil defence because no complaints have been registered with the minister. He indicates that if they were not satisfied complaints would be pouring in to the minister. I think the people of Canada just are not civil defence conscious at the present time. They are not turning their minds to civil defence.

As one hon. member has stated already, we hate to think of ourselves being in the midst of war. We hate to think of war coming to this country. It is difficult for the people of Canada to realize such a possibility and as a result very little thought is given by the ordinary citizen to the matter of civil defence.

I agree with the minister that civil defence is primarily a co-operative and volunteer effort on the part of the body of Canadian citizens. I realize that the essence of the job is education. It is not just a matter of spending money; it is not merely a matter of buying equipment or providing it for the provinces and municipalities; it is a matter of teaching the Canadian people what to do under certain circumstances and what precautions to take. It represents one of the biggest jobs that any government has to do.

I feel that that job cannot be done without a nucleus of full-time personnel, not only in each province but in each county or township or area of the provinces. If an effective job is to be carried out by volunteer workers there must be a core of full-time, well-trained people to give direction and leadership to those who are ready to volunteer their services and to assist in getting these ideas across to the people as a whole.

I presume the minister has given some thought to the contrast between the amount provided in the estimates for civil defence and what is provided for the other branches of national defence. I understand the estimates provide $5 million for civil defence, but we find that $8,621,000 has been allocated in the national defence estimates for professional and special services. That is much more than is allocated for civil defence purposes. The minister's department and the provincial departments will require a considerable number of personnel well-trained, full-time—at least for a while—if anything is to be achieved in the realm of civil defence.

Has the minister any information of what preparations have been made by the various provinces for civil defence? Has he any information regarding the number of permanent or full-time employees engaged by the provincial governments in civil defence work? Has he any knowledge of how many people have been trained to date in the special courses and who could give leadership in this field?

Mr. Martin: About 450.

Mr. Noseworthy: With that information we would have some idea of the over-all picture of just what the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government are doing.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister replies I should like him to deal, in so far as he can without breaching any security provisions, with what progress has been made in providing for early warning by the armed forces to the civil defence authorities in the event of enemy attack. When the minister made his statement on May 11 he described the priority in that regard and stated that it was the duty of the military to provide the means of receiving warning through radar and other devices which have been referred to, that they would also have the duty of warning the civil defence authorities, whose duty it would be to alert the various localities which were expected to be the targets of that particular raid. It seems to me that that is one of the most important things in this whole matter. I refer to the details for receiving early warning. I should be glad if the minister could tell us about that.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, I think the time has now come for me to deal with a number of the questions that have been raised. May I say this—and I say this in full appreciation of the value of the discussion, which I think has been useful—if any hon. member thinks that I have taken to heart personally anything that has been said, I am sure that hon. member does not know me. I really think this has been a most useful debate because this is an extremely important matter and it is by no means an easy one to deal with.

I know that the hon. member for Lanark would not want to misinterpret what I said when I used the words "take a calculated risk". But I feel that one in government and holding this particular post at this time must be courageously frank and not give the impression that it would be possible to provide a complete civil defence for this country. That cannot be done in any country. All we can hope to do—in the light of the appraisal of the situation as given to us by military authorities—in co-operation with other jurisdictions of government, is to build up the best and most effective civil defence organization that is possible, and to do that without in any way prejudicing the primary effort that must now occupy every free country in the free world, recognizing that if war should come it can be won only by giving first support to the armed forces of the nation. That effort necessitates that we do not provide for a needless diversion of energy or of resources. I know that everyone in this committee will agree with that statement. That is the sort of thing I had in mind when I was speaking.

If the hon. member for York South who has just spoken will permit me to say so, I think he made a good speech. I say that not because he agreed with what I said—although I suppose I am somewhat encouraged to so appraise his effort because he has spoken as he did—but because I believe that what he said is surely what we all really believe, namely, that this business of civil defence is essentially one of mutual aid.

If there is one field in which I admit without any hesitation that I am not fully satisfied by any means, it is the field of education. I believe that the municipalities, the provinces and ourselves will have to accelerate the techniques we have for bringing home to the people the important facts involved in civil defence. I say that frankly without depreciating what has already been done and without underestimating the value of plans which we have in that very connection. There are in our own services in Ottawa, and also in those of at least nine provincial governments, individuals who are devoting their full time to the job of trying to find the most effective way of bringing home to the individual citizen—the boy and the girl in the school, the teacher, the worker in the factory, all of us—those methods that can most effectively be employed in the event of the kind of disaster which could happen but which none of us wants to happen.

I must say that the speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had this suggestion with which I know we will all agree, namely, that each of us has a responsibility. We are members of parliament and we can do a great deal to bring home to the people a proper appreciation of this problem, without creating panic or fear, by letting them know that it is only good common sense to develop certain techniques in this matter of civil defence.

I believe that the statement I made the other night possibly has been forgotten in the present discussion. If hon. members will do me the honour of referring to it, they will see there a statement of principles which I believe will find ready acceptance by most people in this country and by most hon. members of the House of Commons. There was a frank recognition of the fact that at the centre you cannot do this job completely, that the primary responsibility must rest at the local level and therefore the primary influence must be voluntary effort based on the principle of mutual aid.

The hon. member for Peace River made an excellent suggestion, namely that each home was the place where civil defence should begin. I think he used the words "domestic granary". That was the basis of Britain's civil defence scheme during the last war. Sir John Hodsoll told me in Washington the other day when we were discussing this matter—Sir John Hodsoll being the director of civil defence in the United Kingdom—that the people of the United Kingdom were able to deal with air raids more successfully than were the people of Hamburg for that very reason. While some of them took to the tubes, the vast majority of the people of the United Kingdom showed defiance and used their own homes as the centre. That is an experience that I think we might well bear in mind in considering the matter of shelter, whether it be communal or private, or whatever may be the scheme devised. It is not without significance that at the present time His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom—and I use the United Kingdom as an example not because we must emulate some other country but because of their experience and because of their proximity to attack—are not at the present time engaging in any expenditure on shelters.

I believe that if we will look at our own situation in the light of the character of our country, we shall find that we have three levels of government: the federal, the provincial and the municipal. The ten provincial governments and ourselves have agreed as to what should be done. While hon. members here may criticize—and may properly do so from their point of view—what we have done, I can only say that what we are doing is the result of agreement of those in the ten provincial governments who have jurisdictional influence over the local government in each of those ten provinces. I have given a statement of what we have done, and have told of the various committees that we have set up and that are working, such as the transportation committee, the medical committee, the welfare committee, the telecommunications committee and so on, and the responsibility for the training of instructors to carry on the work of civil defence in the community. I have told the house all about that.

I hold in my hand a report given to me by each of the ten provincial governments of our country. Each province has designated one of its ministers as the minister of civil defence. Each minister has built up an organization on the provincial level corresponding in many particulars to the organization that we have at the national level, and in turn has stimulated action in the various municipalities. As I said last evening there is not more than one city of 50,000 or over which does not have its own civil defence director. That is the first thing for a community to do. That director, paid by the municipality in every case, is the centre around which is built the local organization.

At one time in our discussions with the Red Cross and St. John Ambulance they wanted to work, particularly the Red Cross, as a national disaster organization. We took the position, with which the provinces agreed, that the Red Cross and other national organizations should act in co-ordination with the plans of the locality. As a result the Red Cross in my own city of Windsor, for example, does not operate as part of a national body but is integrated into the local scheme. That is a very important matter, for if an attack should occur it is not what may be done in any central capital that is going to count; it is what can be done in the particular municipality where the job has to be carried out. The effectiveness of that kind of mutual aid will depend upon the kind of direction the local civil defence director has been able to give in enlisting the support of the people of that community.

Those are basic considerations that so far in this debate have been overlooked. In Montreal, one of the important cities of our country, Brigadier Gauvreau, a distinguished soldier of the last war, has been appointed civil defence director, and he has done an excellent job in the short time he has been at work. I mention the city of Montreal simply to indicate that many hon. members have failed to appreciate the tremendous amount of work that is being done; and that work was begun in the first instance as a result of the stimulation by the present civil defence co-ordinator in Canada, General Worthington. In Montreal, wardens and other civil defence personnel, working on a voluntary basis, have been and are being enlisted. The other day they had a meeting at which several thousand were in attendance; and that work is going on, along with the contribution being made by welfare organizations, medical bodies and others. The doctors themselves are now holding special clinics and preparing for the problems that may have to be met.

Then in the city of Sault Ste. Marie the other day on both sides of the border exercises were held in anticipation of a possible air raid. Thousands of individuals, including nurses, doctors, welfare workers, St. John Ambulance personnel and Red Cross members took part in those exercises. A similar exercise on a more modest scale took place not long ago in Detroit and in Windsor, where I am happy to say one of the best civil defence organizations is being developed under a director who had extensive training in the United Kingdom during the last war.

I mention these cities not because I prefer them to others but simply to indicate the work that is going on. I do not say it is perfect. I know there is a great deal yet to do. I will not be satisfied until this job is done and the danger is past; but on the other hand I do not want anyone to underestimate the work already carried out at the provincial and municipal levels. I have before me a report from British Columbia, for instance. I do not want to go into all the details, but there they have an organization composed of representatives of health and welfare organizations, the army, voluntary organizations, industry and all the other groups in a community upon which one would have to rely in a situation such as this. The hon. member for Lake Centre spoke of the agreements that have been made between state and state in the United States. Well, long before the United States thought of that this country had achieved and completed such agreements. Here, for instance, is a report on the nature of the agreement between Alberta and British Columbia, which also shows the extent of the preparations that have been made in British Columbia, the courses being given, the training being carried on, the schools being set up and the instructors being provided. The report deals with the activities of the civil defence director in circulating civil defence bulletins all through British Columbia in an endeavour to keep up interest in civil defence work, and so on.

I could go on. I have here the report of the province of Alberta, of which I have given some indication already in reply to the hon. member for Bow River. I note here, for instance, that in connection with publicity and education Mr. Gerhart inaugurated a series of broadcasts early in January, which is still continuing and which is carried over most of the Alberta stations. They are doing everything they can to bring home to the people some of the elementary facts of this program. I want to give fair warning now that we have plans at the national level for a heavy educational program. That is likely to cost a great deal of money, and I would hope that no hon. member who today is criticizing our lack of educational effort will rise in his place next year, when I bring in a report of the expenditure through our information service in the Department of National Health and Welfare, and protest the amount we have spent in carrying on work to supplement that being done by the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: As long as you keep it separate.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says as long as I do something. I know I will not be able to do anything that will completely satisfy my esteemed and hon. friend. Here is the province of Saskatchewan, which has a civil defence training school. Someone may ask why Saskatchewan should worry about the possibility of air attack, since it would not be regarded as a primary target. That may be so, but it is a very important reception centre. From our experience in the flood disaster in Manitoba we know how essential it proved to be to have machinery in Saskatchewan for the reception of thousands of hospital patients, numbers of old people and others who found refuge there. The experience of those days is being used in building up a very effective civil defence organization there, as in other places.

As to the province of Ontario, as I said last evening, only last Friday I had a long discussion with the minister in charge of civil defence matters, Mr. Welsh. Every community in Ontario of major size has a civil defence director—with the exception of the city of Ottawa—and Mr. Welsh wrote me yesterday saying he had written the authorities in Ottawa asking them to emulate in that particular the example of every other community of any consequence in this province. With that single exception, every community of any significance in Ontario has its own organization. The plan in Ontario is to have the organization on a county unit basis, to have the major community in the county serve as the centre. That direction was given by Mr. Welsh about two weeks ago, and as a result a considerable acceleration in organization has taken place already. The other day in London I was talking to Colonel Eric Harris, the civil defence director for that city. He outlined for General Worthington and myself the whole plan not only for the organization of the county but for the organization of that whole district, covering some eight or nine counties. So that while one can only give here a general picture of what is being done in each of the provinces, one can see that in the province of Ontario, too, a very considerable amount of organization is under way. The Ontario government has not yet appointed its civil defence co-ordinator, but Mr. Welsh has been extremely active in formulating plans for his province.

In the province of Quebec a school began operations today. There, too, the municipalities have appointed their civil defence directors, and direction is being given to them by myself and my department in conjunction with the co-operative arrangement that we have with the provinces. Similarly in the province of New Brunswick. Incidentally, we have trained eleven civil defence officials for the province of New Brunswick, and they have now returned to their province to take positions of leadership in the direction of the civil defence program. The same is true of Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia one of the significant things is the prominent part being taken by women in giving leadership in the building up of all local civil defence organizations.

I have just mentioned these provinces, and for the sake of a complete reference I would not want to leave out the province of Prince Edward Island, where a total of four civil defence officials have received training at federal expense. They are now giving leadership in various civil defence activities in that province. The province of Newfoundland has its civil defence provincial committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Curtis. Five civil defence officials who were trained in our school are assisting him in the planning of the work for the whole province. So, when one comes to make an assessment of what is being done in this field in Canada, one must see not only what is being done in Ottawa under federal direction but also what is being done under municipal and provincial direction.

The result is we are building an organization for civil defence which I feel, in the light of all the circumstances, represents if not the most complete, at any rate a commendable effort. The time to look for completion of achievement is after the danger has passed. Before I take my seat, I should note that the hon. member for Lanark referred to stockpiling. I have already dealt with that. I have told him of our plans to stockpile medical supplies at strategic centres, for which arrangements have been made in conjunction with the Department of National Defence. As I said the other night, I agree with him about the importance of encouraging the greatest amount of first aid training. We have made special arrangements with the St. John Ambulance Corps for that purpose; that is something we must do whether we accelerate our program or not. I agree fully with him that that is a useful kind of training, and will always be of great benefit to this country.

We hope to be able, through schools, service clubs and church organizations, primarily under the direction of the St. John Ambulance, to carry on an increasing amount of first aid training all over this country. It is something that will serve us in good stead in the days of peace, in the days of twilight between peace and war, or in the days of war itself. I can assure the hon. member for Lanark there will be no relaxation of that effort. I have already explained what we are doing about defence against A B C warfare. The school we have at Connaught Ranges, which some of us are going to visit between six o'clock and adjournment tonight, is the school which is dealing with that as well as with other matters. I want to say, therefore, to the hon. member for Lanark that he can be assured that no effort in the important field of medical and welfare endeavour is going to be overlooked. If what has been done to date does not fully satisfy him, that may be because a full appreciation of what has been done has not been given. But I can assure him that the fullest contact exists with our nursing association, with the Canadian Medical Association, and all those bodies upon whom we have to depend—the men who will stimulate action, not at Ottawa nor in Toronto nor in any one of our capitals, but on the part of the health workers in the village or town concerned where the civil defence organization is being built up.

Now, we are proceeding with this as wisely and as energetically as we know how. We are not looking for commendation as to whether our achievement is worthy of praise. I am saying that no effort is being lost to develop an effective organization. If it is effective, we are not looking for praise. That will be due to the collaboration we are receiving from every one of the ten provincial governments of Canada who are in full concurrence with the principles I have outlined and with the point of view which I have taken.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister deal in detail with the question of the warning system? Is it intended to station civil defence personnel at fighter command headquarters so that they can receive the warning at the same time?

Mr. Martin: Last night I dealt with this question in part. I stated that the warning system was by no means complete. It is the job of the Royal Canadian Air Force, through radar and through the air observer corps, to get information respecting unidentified aircraft to the air defence communication centres. At that point a civil defence liaison officer will be stationed on a twenty-four hour basis. It will be his duty to see that when the signal comes in the warning is sent down the civil defence communication line to the various target points. Once the message is transmitted to the target area, it is the job of the local civil defence authority to set up its own communication system.

Sirens are being provided. The responsibility for their installation will rest upon the municipality. I may say that we are not only using these air raid detection agencies. For instance, as the leader of the opposition will know, the province of Ontario has an excellent detection service operating under the department of forestry. That is an extensive organization, and that, along with similar units, will be used in trying to bring the warning to the municipalities. Only this afternoon General Worthington is conferring with two telecommunication officials, one representing a big communication company in this country, who is going to give this service to the government without compensation and to assist in that particular matter.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

JACQUELINE YVONNE SUZANNE STUCKER GRANT

The house in committee on Bill No. 142, for the relief of Jacqueline Yvonne Suzanne Stucker Grant—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Martin.]

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: I should like to ask the sponsor a question. Is he sure that the evidence in regard to this bill has been circulated?

Mr. Winkler: The information I have, Mr. Chairman, is that all the evidence of all the bills before the house in committee at the present time was circulated through the mails to everybody except those who requested that they be omitted.

Mr. Coldwell: I have not been able to find a copy of this bill. I was wondering whether the sponsor of the bill could give a little information about it. How many children are affected by this bill?

Mr. Winkler: Perhaps somebody else would find this evidence. I have not been able to locate the first four in my stack of bills. I know I had it the last time, but I have not been able to find it at this time.

Mr. Coldwell: There is the trouble. Even the sponsor cannot locate the first four of these bills. I cannot locate Bill No. 142, but my hon. friend behind me says that he has a copy of the bill and that there are no children affected by it. Therefore probably he knows what the contents of the bill are; I do not, and neither does the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, this bill deals with the case of a woman who is suing her husband for divorce. Apparently she has been successful so far as the Senate is concerned. The bill has now come to us for endorsation. I have been amused by the assertion in certain newspapers that we are conducting a filibuster on such bills as this. It is a question as to what is the definition of a filibuster. I intend to have no filibuster on this bill unless spending ten minutes on a bill which breaks up a home can be considered a filibuster. A filibuster may be a lot of time spent upon one bill, but I do not think that spending ten minutes on one bill can be considered as a filibuster. I intend to spend some ten minutes upon it.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Knight: Has the hon. gentleman a point of order? I can sit down and let him expound it.

Mr. Sinnott: Kill a little more time.

Mr. Winkler: Which clause are we on?

The Deputy Chairman: Clause 1.

Mr. Knight: I was saying that in regard to this particular bill there could be no filibuster upon it in ten minutes. We have spent some five hours on thirty divorce bills.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member has already said that he was not participating in a filibuster. He must speak to clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Knight: Very well.

Mr. Dickey: Say it again; it will take up the same time.

Mr. Knight: The point about this bill is that it has certain things in common with other bills, Mr. Chairman. I presume I can say that. The investigator in this particular bill claims that he does not know the co-respondent. I notice that in a great many bills the co-respondent who is used as the basis, or, shall I say, as the subject, of the evidence, is not known. Now, this investigator, who is an investigator by profession, and whose business is to investigate, does not know the name of this lady upon whom the evidence is based. To me that is a remarkable thing.

I am going to suggest to you, sir, that some of these people who are employed giving evidence or, let us not say giving evidence, but becoming exhibit No. 1 in certain of these divorce cases, are simply like the investigators, professional people in the business who are paid so to do. I cannot make that assertion with any proof on this particular bill, but I am convinced of it in regard to many bills similar to this one. In other words, not only are there investigators professionally, but these women who submit themselves to this sort of thing in order that they may give evidence are, in many instances, professionals. I believe that is the reason that in these particular divorce cases the name of the particular operator—and I am using that word advisedly—does not come before the public. If the name of the operator in these bills were brought before the public, then her usefulness as an operator in that connection would be at an end, and she might have to find some other means of making a livelihood. I make that protest in connection with this bill and in other like bills.

My next point in connection with this bill, and in others like it, is that in obtaining evidence these investigators use means which to my way of thinking are not ethical. The other night we had someone breaking down a door. That is illegal. Then we had illegal entry into a room. We had an instance where an investigator lied. He said he had come to obtain an overcoat which he had left there the day before. May I hasten to say, in case the chairman is looking at me too severely, that in the case of this particular bill there is some such similar matter.

These investigators apparently think that it is all right to depart from the truth in any case whatever so long as they may obtain evidence. That, to my mind, is getting evidence under false pretences.

I have little more to say about this particular bill; I hope to have more to say on others. I had hoped that my hon. friend would move that these bills might stand over and allow the other private members to go on, and I would be agreeable to that, but he was blocked in his efforts the other night.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. That is certainly not on clause 1.

Mr. Knight: Then I shall discuss these bills and other bills like it, unless some other members wish to discuss them in my stead, until we get to the end of this group of bills. I shall proceed with the discussion. I think there is nothing more to be said about this one. There are no children involved in this case, as there are, unfortunately, in many of these cases. I have never read any of this evidence before, in my five years here; but it is interesting to note that this bill is unique in one respect, in that the lady in question was careful enough to be married twice. I do not think there is any doubt as to the adequacy of the first ceremony but, although the couple were first married in the state of New York by a clergyman in that state, upon returning to Canada the lady took her husband before a judge and had the marriage solemnized a second time. Despite this fact we have the unfortunate circumstance that, although these people have been married and lived together since 1939, they have come to the end of the road, and are before parliament seeking a divorce.

ETHELBERT DENISTON JOSEPH BARTHOLOMEW

The house in committee on Bill No. 143, for the relief of Ethelbert Deniston Joseph Bartholomew—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: This is another bill the evidence of which is not in the possession of either the sponsor or myself. I understand the chairman has not a copy either.

The Deputy Chairman: No, I do not have a copy of the evidence.

Mr. MacInnis: A copy of the evidence should be with the bill. Do I understand the chairman has not a copy of the evidence with the bill?

The Deputy Chairman: No; the general procedure is to refer the bill to the committee of the whole. Then, according to the procedure which has been followed traditionally, the evidence is distributed to members in their offices. They may use the printed copies when they discuss these bills.

Mr. Coldwell: We find ourselves in a strange position. The sponsor has not a copy of the evidence, the chairman does not have a copy and neither have I.

Mr. Low: Nor I.

Mr. Coldwell: I doubt very much if any hon. members have copies of the evidence. Yet we are called upon to pass a bill dissolving a marriage, when none of us has any evidence upon which to decide whether that dissolution of marriage is justified or not. This indicates the manner in which we are dealing with these divorce bills, and it illustrates forcibly the position in which we find ourselves. I thought the evidence accompanied the bills, and that when a bill was finally passed the evidence was returned to the Senate committee,—because it is not circulated to the press, and it is not supposed to get out of the hands of members of parliament who receive copies of it.

We now have before us a bill, with neither the sponsor nor I, nor apparently anyone else in the committee, including the chairman, having a copy of the evidence. How can we come to a decision on this bill when we do not have the evidence upon which we are supposed to base that decision? I do not know what we can do about it.

Mr. Ward: I have just sent for a whole bundle of them for my hon. friend.

Mr. Coldwell: I am very glad the hon. member for Dauphin has done that. I have some here, mind you—but I am glad he has sent for a bundle of them. I suggest this case should stand over until the chairman has a copy of the evidence, or until the sponsor can produce a copy of it, so that we may know what we are dealing with.

Therefore I move:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

I do this so that the chairman may be able to get a copy of the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Before putting the question perhaps I should outline just what is before the committee. I would point out that the bill is before the committee. The evidence is taken in the Senate committee. That evidence is referred to the house with the bill. At that stage Mr. Speaker sends the bill with the evidence to our own committee on miscellaneous private bills. When it comes back to the committee of the whole hon. members are free to use the copies of evidence they find in their mail boxes. But, so far as the chairman is concerned, I would point out that we are not dealing with the evidence; we are dealing with sections one and two, the preamble and title of the bill.

I do not need to have the evidence, and therefore I suggest the hon. member need not express astonishment by stating that even the chairman does not have a copy of it. If we were sitting as a miscellaneous private bills committee I would say that I should have the evidence—but not here.

Mr. Coldwell: I think, Mr. Chairman, that you are quite right. I would request permission therefore to withdraw my motion.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Knight: Unlike the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, while I have not the bill I have the evidence.

Mr. Graydon: You fellows ought to get together.

The Deputy Chairman: I might add that if it is the wish of hon. members to have the bills and the evidence placed underneath their desks, as it is done in connection with other bills, such a suggestion could be studied and perhaps complied with. However, that request has not been made thus far. The system followed traditionally has been to have the evidence distributed in the mail boxes of hon. members.

Mr. Knight: I would suggest, with respect, that if no one has a copy of the evidence and if no one reads it, then surely the distribution of it must be a waste of public money. I understand that the distribution of this evidence costs the people of this country about $20,000. If this is an indication of the way it is used I suggest this publication and distribution is a waste of time and money.

I have the bill before me now. I notice that on the evidence there is no mark to identify the one to one correspondence as between the evidence and the bill. If we are going to do this regularly, then I suggest it would be better to have them marked properly so that, for the convenience of hon. members, we could identify each bill with the evidence.

Mr. Weir: Are not the names the same on both?

Mr. Knight: Yes, but there is no number.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member will find that the name appearing in the evidence appears also in the bill.

Mr. Knight: I have nothing in particular to say about the subject matter of this bill, although I shall have a word or two to say about the next one. In this instance, however, I notice that two children are affected. I have stopped asking the sponsor any questions because he, for whom I have the greatest respect and sympathy, tells me that he accepts no responsibility in the matter.

However, I should like to know what is to be done with the two children aged fourteen and twelve? At the moment they are in custody of the father's sister in Trinidad. I suppose they are there because there is no one to look after them in Canada. It is an immigration policy in reverse. As far as I am concerned, I think that is all I want to say and section 1 can pass.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Right to marry again.

Mr. Shaw: Reference has been made to the fact that the evidence in these cases must not be made available to the press and the public. I understand that that assertion was made.

The Deputy Chairman: It was not made tonight.

Mr. Shaw: Reference was made to that by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I understood Your Honour to nod agreement.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry but I did not hear the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar make a statement of that kind, although he may have. I might inform the hon. member for Red Deer that the practice followed by the Senate committee is not to invite the press to be present when evidence is given before the committee.

Mr. Coldwell: My understanding is that it is not circulated to the press; that the evidence is sent here and returned to the Senate. These bills are circulated to hon. members, but apparently none of them are on our files tonight. I thank the hon. member for Dauphin for sending these to me but even now they are the wrong file.

Private Bills—Divorce

IVY ELIZABETH WHITEHEAD SIMPSON

The house in committee on Bill No. 144, for the relief of Ivy Elizabeth Whitehead Simpson—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: In this case it is noted that Senator Aseltine, chairman of the standing committee on divorce, draws certain things to our attention. The first is that the committee recommended that the parliamentary fees payable under rule 140 be remitted save for the payment of $125. Can the sponsor tell us the terms of rule 140 under which the fees in this particular case were reduced to $125?

Mr. Winkler: I would suggest that the hon. member address his question to the Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. Knight: Again I discover that the sponsor of hundreds of these bills has no information with regard to the procedure followed. I think it is necessary to put that on the record, much as I respect the hon. member. Apparently the fee was reduced to $125, and I should like to ask the sponsor what is the regular fee?

Mr. Winkler: All that information was put on the record Tuesday night. I might say further that since that time I have discovered that there were two cases in which the fees were reduced to $50.

Mr. Knight: What were the reasons why the fee in this particular case was reduced to $125?

Mr. Winkler: The only persons who could answer that would be those who sat on the case.

Mr. Knight: I suggest that the body which has information about these things should be dealing with them. In this particular case there are two grown sons involved. The marriage occurred in 1925. I am going to suggest that this fee was reduced because this unfortunate woman is earning her livelihood as a bookkeeper and apparently has no other source of income except what she earns or receives from her sons.

There are two points I should like to make. I have made them already, but I shall make them again. The first is that this is another case in which the female co-respondent is unknown to everyone. But I do not believe she is unknown to everyone. I believe she will be appearing in other cases and the same evidence will be presented to break up another home.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Knight: I do not know. Nobody knows, but I am suggesting that that is what it is. In other words, the investigator who found out everything else did not find out this name. There would appear to be people who are making their living out of this sort of thing.

An hon. Member: What sort of thing?

Mr. Knight: I have tried to find out.

Mr. Fulford: Why, do you want to work too?

Mr. Knight: I will just leave my hon. friend alone. I should like to draw to your attention the fact that in this particular case the investigator lied in order to get the necessary evidence, but apparently that was not considered unusual by the court in the other place. In other words, the court which is presently looking after bills of this kind is prepared to take the sworn evidence of a man who lies when he is not under oath. As far as I am concerned I am equally ready to accept the word of a man, whether he is under oath or not, if I accept it at all.

This man was asked how he got into a particular room in order to make his investigation, and he said that he had said he was the watchman and that there was a smell of smoke in the hallway. In the case we considered last week the investigator said he had come back to get his overcoat which he had left in the room. In this case he smelled smoke. Apparently he felt that where there was smoke, there might be fire. I would not believe that man either on oath or not on oath.

Those are some of the things that we as a court, and we are a legally constituted court, should consider in dealing with these cases. I do not think ten minutes is too long to take in considering this bill.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Deputy Chairman: If there is no objection to any other particular bill shall I call them collectively?

Mr. Coldwell: No, one at a time.

Mr. Knight: I must insist that we take them one at a time.

CAROL ELIZABETH CHUTE LEVESQUE

The house in committee on Bill No. 153, for the relief of Carol Elizabeth Chute Levesque—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Knight: This is another case where fees have been remitted. Serving in my capacity as a member of the committee which studied—I beg your pardon, I do not mean studied—which handled these bills in bulk, I have a comment or two to make about how they are handled. There is in this one again the remission of fees, to the sum of $125. I note the coincidence in the figures; they are $125 in each case. While the sponsor informs me that I can get the information elsewhere, either he has not the information himself or does not care to give it to me at this time. But both fees are $125. There must be some reason for that.

Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria): May I ask the hon. member a question? Is he a member of this miscellaneous private bills committee, and has he asked any questions about these bills when they were before the committee?

An hon. Member: Certainly not; not one.

Mr. Knight: We are talking about clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. Ferrie: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knight: Does my hon. friend wish to enter this discussion?

Mr. Ferrie: I wish to explain that every time this is done—and I have been in the divorce committee in the Senate—it is purely and simply an act of mercy. The people cannot afford to pay the full fee, and the Senate has the right to cut the fee.

Mr. Knight: What is the point of order?

An hon. Member: None.

Mr. Knight: Is there a ruling on the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Ferrie: Oh, sit down.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member must realize that the chairman cannot decide a point of order unless he has heard one. I have not heard any, and there is no reason for me to decide anything. This point is not a point of order. Therefore there is no ruling to be made.

Mr. Knight: I am delighted at the intervention of my hon. friend. I should like him to know about these matters.

Mr. Ferrie: Why does the hon. member not go to the divorce committee and learn something?

Mr. Knight: There are twin children in this case and they are in the custody of the mother. I would suggest that the remission of the fee to the amount of $125 was probably useful and justified in her particular case. It is a sad thing to think that these children who were only born in 1950, already find themselves the heirs to a broken home and completely unsupported by their father.

In connection with this bill, I think we should have some way by which these children could be cared for. We should have some court which has some jurisdiction over the children. How is this woman going to get support for these children? Is she going to start action in another court? Must she go to law again and pay the fees of lawyers, to get a decision whether or not she has legal custody of her children? All that we know now is that, if we pass this bill tonight and if it reaches the stage of third reading, the marriage has been dissolved. Let me point out once more—and I think this will be the final time tonight because I think the other hon. gentlemen who are sponsoring bills should have an opportunity to sponsor them—that in this particular case the woman who formed the subject of the evidence was apparently unknown to anybody in the court which was held in the other place.

Mr. Weir: I wish to rise on a question of privilege at this time, in particular with respect to the hon. gentleman who is chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee and whose name happens to appear as the sponsor of most of these bills. The insinuation has been made here time and time again that he either has not the information asked for or is unwilling to give it. To me that implication is wholly unfair to the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring these bills. The rules do not require him to take responsibility for these bills. All he is required to do is to be assured that they are in order and in the proper state to be presented to this house. When they are referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills—and the hon. member for Saskatoon is a member of that committee—all the evidence from those who are interested can be given and reviewed.

Mr. McIlraith: They can call evidence in the committee.

Mr. Weir: Yes, they can call evidence in the committee. All I want to say is this, and it is not in defence of divorces coming before this chamber. That is not the question at all, so far as the remarks I am about to make are concerned. It does not interfere with it in one way or the other. But this is the method that has been followed. Those who are interested in having divorce bills handled must have someone sponsor them in the house.

I take a measure of responsibility for the name of the chairman of the private bills committee being put down as sponsor of these bills. He can decline and refuse to sponsor them. My name happens to be attached to a few of these bills, and I put it there as a matter of convenience to the officers and staff of the house, as well as to those who may be interested in dealing with these divorce bills before the committee. It is largely a matter of convenience.

The other course to follow is to let whoever is dealing with the bills run all around the House of Commons and pick out some members, here and there and all over, who will sponsor these bills. From what has been going on, I think that is likely what will happen in the future. I am not so sure that I will sponsor any more divorce bills or sign my name to them in order to assure the committee that they are in order. It just so happens that it is convenient for the staff and for those who are dealing with these matters to know where they can go and get the proper direction with regard to having these bills handled. That is the reason that the name of the hon. member for Lisgar happens to be put down as the sponsor of most of these bills.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this committee, that it is wholly unfair to have the insinuation made that he has not the information with respect to these things or that he is unwilling to give it. It is not necessary for him to have it when it is available to the committee, when every one of these bills is before it.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, may I say immediately that I do not think anyone wishes to reflect on the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. Weir: The record speaks for itself.

Mr. Coldwell: We understand precisely the position that he is in. But in asking these questions we are bringing before parliament and the public the fact that these bills are dealt with in a manner which is—or should be, if it is not—unsatisfactory to the House of Commons and to this parliament. That is the point. May I say to my friend the hon. member for Lisgar that I realize it is utterly impossible for him to be able to give information to this committee when—

Mr. McIlraith: It is no part of his duty to do so.

Mr. Coldwell: —on this order paper today there are perhaps two hundred of these bills ahead of this committee at the present time. Consequently what is being done is to try to illustrate how ridiculous this procedure is, so that we may banish these cases from this chamber and send them to a court of law where they properly belong.

Mr. McIlraith: There appears to be an illustration being sought to be made to the public of this country about how wrong the procedure is. Like other hon. members, I do not like the idea of having to deal with these bills in the House of Commons; but it is quite wrong for a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee to come into the House of Commons and ask another member for information about a bill that was before that committee, when the member could have had witnesses brought before the miscellaneous private bills committee and could have obtained all the information there.

Mr. Argue: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the hon. gentleman is in order in discussing the question of divorce procedure when he should be discussing the clause of a specific bill.

Mr. McIlraith: If I may continue my remarks, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order which was raised affecting the privilege of an hon. member, I am merely basing my remarks on some previously made. The point that was being illustrated was that the chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee did not have all the information about the details of these divorces readily available in order to answer another hon. member who himself was a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Saskatoon is a member, and all the information he has asked for tonight and other nights ought properly to have been obtained by him in the miscellaneous private bills committee. If he was not satisfied with the information obtained by the committee of the other house he should have had the witnesses summoned before the miscellaneous private bills committee where they could have been examined in the ordinary way. I think it only fair to hon. members that this point of law should be made clear.

The Deputy Chairman: I believe the discussion on the question of privilege has been sufficiently extensive. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa indicated that in his opinion it might be unfair for hon. members to say that the sponsor of these bills does not have the information requested by members of this committee, when he is chairman of the committee on miscellaneous private bills where his duties consist of examining the bills to see whether they are in accordance with the rules. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has explained that whatever is said here is no reflection upon the hon. member for Lisgar. Similar declarations have been made during previous studies of these bills; the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have stated that whatever was being said about these bills was no reflection on the hon. member for Lisgar, so I think these statements should satisfy the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa on that score.

As to the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa West that an hon. gentleman who was a member of a standing committee should not ask questions in this committee of the whole when he could have obtained the information in the standing committee, I think that is a matter an hon. member must analyse and assess for himself. This is the committee of the whole. If an hon. member wants to ask questions here he has the right to do so, whether or not he could have obtained the information anywhere else. If he feels that he should ask his questions here he is perfectly in order in doing so. I believe that should dispose of the point, and we should resume our discussion of section 1 of this bill.

Mr. MacInnis: I believe there is another question in connection with the point of privilege that should be explained. When a member of this house becomes the sponsor of any bill other than a divorce bill, hon. members have a perfect right to expect him to know something about the bill. If that is true of other bills it should be true of divorce bills. I have not asked the hon. member for Lisgar any questions; I am not going to ask him any questions, but if anything were needed to show the ridiculous way in which we handle this situation it is that one man should sponsor two or three hundred of these divorce bills, on which any member of this house, under the rules of procedure, is entitled to ask questions.

Mr. Winkler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I must say that I feel no discomfort in this matter, except physically. My understanding is that these are bills which have been passed by the Senate committee, and therefore I am prepared to sponsor them in this house as a matter of form. I am not expected, I take it, to read all the evidence; I merely have to satisfy myself that they have been passed in the other place, and that is good enough for me.

BELLA RASHKIN DEUTSCH

The house in committee on Bill No. 161, for the relief of Bella Rashkin Deutsch—Mr. Winkler—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Coldwell: I am not going to delay the committee very long, but if hon. gentlemen have the evidence in these cases before them they will see that precisely the same investigators produced the evidence for Bill No. 161 and Bill No. 162, as they have on a very large proportion of these bills; and they will notice that in almost every instance the evidence is somewhat similar. It is true that in these two bills the evidence of the investigators is slightly different, but they manage to get into an apartment or into an hotel. In one case they put a cigarette box against the door and left it there until early morning when they went back to see if it was still there. Posing as firemen or something of the sort they got into the room. Here the witness was asked:

Q. What is your name? A. Harry Maxham.
Q. What is your age? A. 36.
Q. Where do you live? A. Montreal, Quebec.
Q. What is your occupation? A. Private investigator.

Then he either picks up or calls in his assistant, Mr. Golden in every case, and we have the same sort of evidence:

I put a cigarette box against the door and I decided to see what would happen.

I drew attention to these two investigators a week or so ago when almost identical evidence was given as to the manner in which they forced their way into hotel rooms and so on. It seems to me that if some of these cases were thoroughly investigated a few people who make their living in this way might be in a court of law for perjury. I do not think there is any question but that this is the way in which some investigators make their living. I am not going to delay these two bills further; I just wanted to point out once more the sort of evidence given by these professional investigators. As my hon. friend says the name of the co-respondent is never given, and sometimes I wonder if the things that are described ever occurred. I have been told that in at least one instance nothing of the sort did happen. I cannot prove that because my informant would not allow me to give the source of my information, but I was told so on very good authority. The whole procedure is so sloppy here that I think applications for divorce should go to a court of law, where perjury might be discovered occasionally and the people committing it might be properly punished.

Mr. Knight: I did not rise to reply to the hon. member for Ottawa West, but I would like to say that I am a member of the miscellaneous private bills committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the hon. member speaking to a question of privilege? If not, he must speak to section one. That matter has been settled.

Mr. Knight: This bill is for the relief of Philip Rosen. I want to point out that this bill was brought up before the miscellaneous bills committee, and was thoroughly studied with counsel on each side. We made up our minds in regard to it. This is one bill, sir, in which I would say there was some investigation made, and therefore it was not passed blindfold.

Mr. Winkler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that this came before the private bills committee because it was appealed. None of the others were appealed.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment that has been moved on this bill. The amendment seeks to have this pipe line follow an all-Canadian route. I am not opposed to the company. I am not opposed to the personnel of the company. I do not know the officers concerned. I am concerned, however, about this pipe line bill not including a section to the effect that the pipe line will be built through Canadian territory. So far as I can see, and I am satisfied now after investigating the point, there is no physical reason why the pipe line could not be built through Canadian territory much cheaper than through United States territory. There is ample evidence to prove that point. Today I believe the issue is merely financial interests versus Canadian interests. By "Canadian interests" I mean the general welfare of the Canadian people which is involved in getting this pipe line to serve our country first.

Unfortunately this bill will be passed in spite of all the arguments that we can put up against it, because the government majority will put it through. This bill, like all the bills concerned with taking gas to the coast, has met with the same objections from the provincial government of British Columbia, city councils, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and all the bodies within that province who are opposed to the passing of this bill without the particular clause I mentioned. I believe the government should now assume its right to direct the flow of our natural resources along lines that will give Canadians as a whole the greatest benefit.

Sending our gas and oil to the United States, as we are proposing to do under this bill, does not indicate a sound policy on the part of the government, if the government is going to try to build Canada first. We can easily understand why the United States wants our gas and oil. They have exploited their own to the full, and the resources in California are now petering out, as is well known to everyone. According to a statement made by the American gas association, the natural gas industry in the United States is finding that new discoveries are not keeping pace with production. The ratio of reserves to production in the United States, according to the American gas association, has dropped from 32·49 in 1949 to 26·17 in 1950. They are taking steps to conserve the remaining supply. In the meantime, their policy obviously is to import all they can from Canada, and thereby deplete our resources as well as their own. Unfortunately, Canada has not a sound national policy for the conservation of our gas and oil. At least, I do not feel that we have. We may well find our own supplies exhausted in a very few years' time.

I believe that the conservation of resources is a moral obligation upon all members of parliament, and on the government. We must assume that obligation not only for the protection of our generation but in the interests of generations of Canadians who will occupy this land when we are gone. I am not opposed to any surplus gas being sold to the United States. I think they are entitled to it, but only when it is surplus and after it has supplied Canadian needs.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being nine o'clock, the hour reserved for private and public bills has been exhausted, and the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence forces—

245. To provide for the defence forces of the navy, army and air services and defence research and development, and to authorize total commitments for this purpose of $3,831,270,000 including authority notwithstanding section 29 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, to make commitments for the current year of $1,924,170,835 and commitments against future years of $1,907,099,165 against which commitments it is estimated that actual expenditures in 1951-52 will not exceed $1,595,050.000 of which $183,050,000 will be provided from section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, as supplemented by item 246, $1,412,000,000.

The Deputy Chairman: We are considering item 245, the sub-item civil salaries and wages, civil defence.

Mr. Harkness: I had a few specific questions that I wished to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Mention was made on numerous occasions today and last night about hose couplings. The minister told us that something in the neighbourhood of $977,500 is going to be spent on fire-fighting equipment, chiefly these hose couplings. The thing we have not found out, and which I should like to know, is whether any decision has been made on a standardized coupling.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Chairman, the decision, of course, does not rest with us. There are a number of different plans, and of course the objective is to bring them all into a common system. The fire chiefs have had a meeting, both on the national and on the provincial level, discussing this very matter. They have not finalized their decisions.

The business of standardizing hose couplings of course is not only a civil defence matter, but of permanent all-time value, as my hon. friend will appreciate. However, the government has thought it desirable that we should endeavour not to wait until there is full national accord. It was for that reason that we did make a tentative arrangement, subject to plans being submitted and approved by the province of Ontario, in the discussion that I referred to that was held with Colonel Welsh last week; and he has taken steps to bring about such uniformity and standardization in the province of Ontario. It is hoped that as a result of that action uniformity may be stimulated elsewhere.

Mr. Harkness: If I understood the minister correctly, they are proceeding on a provincial basis, in the first place as far as Ontario is concerned, in the hope that the standardized coupling adapted for use throughout Ontario will then be adopted throughout the rest of Canada. Do I understand by that that the only province in which any money has been advanced to aid in the standardization of these couplings is Ontario, and that it will be the only one in which they have agreed on some standard?

Mr. Martin: No. The arrangement that we have made with the province is that we would pay one-third toward the cost of these hose couplings. The offer applies of course to all provinces.

Mr. Harkness: The point I am getting at is that apparently no agreement has yet been made that this standardized coupling be used. So far, the only thing that is being done in a practical way is this grant to Ontario to standardize its couplings. That is correct, is it?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: What steps is the minister taking in his position as being in charge of civil defence for the dominion to get the other provinces to agree to take this same standard coupling? In the event that they do not take it, what is to be the result? It would seem to me that this is a matter of such importance that the dominion government should ensure by some means or other that general agreement is reached on the part of all the provinces before any of the money is put out. I do not know, but it would seem to me that would be the wise course.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend may be certain that everything that we can do to get uniformity will be done, but we cannot force municipalities or provinces to do anything contrary to their will. The most effective means, of course, is the one of persuasion, and that is what we are engaged in. The practice I have followed in the case of Ontario is being followed with every other province. As a matter of fact, I had some discussion today with another government in connection with the same matter.

Mr. Gillis: I want to ask the minister a question. From what he said a moment ago I assumed that the intention of the department is complete national standardization. Is that correct?

Mr. Martin: Standardization of hose couplings.

Mr. Gillis: Any attempt to do that is impracticable, is it not? For example, there are many different types and sizes of hydrants, and the hose coupling that you may perfect for the province of Ontario may not fit the hydrant in any of the other provinces. Is it not the logical thing to do to make a a survey of a province, determine the type of hydrant used in that province and perfect the coupling that can be used and standardized as between municipalities in that province?

Mr. Martin: That is what is being attempted.

Mr. Gillis: I do not think that complete uniformity or standardization in this country on a national basis is possible. I do not see where there is any possibility of using the equipment, or the fire-fighting machinery, from the province of Ontario in the province of British Columbia or in the province of Nova Scotia. I think the thing to do—and perhaps the minister's officials are doing it—is to get a complete provincial survey of the type of hydrant and the size of hydrant and manufacture for that province the type of equipment that is adapted to the hydrants in that province, because you need standardization as between one municipality and the other.

I do not see anything happening in any province where it might be necessary to move in fire-fighting equipment from another province. Complete standardization was possible in Britain because they had a unified set-up to start with. Because of the distances that exist in this country the local unit is the place to start the survey on a provincial scale.

Over a year ago I listened to the fire marshal of Nova Scotia address a banquet, and at that time I was led to believe that there was almost complete uniformity and stardardization in that province. Rather than taking it on a national scale and deciding that Ontario is going to be the focal point, perfecting equipment that might suit in this province and then saying that you must get uniformity in the sixty or seventy different types of hydrants throughout the country, a start should be made in one province. After all, the hydrant is the key in the thing.

I wanted to say that because I got the impression from the minister that they were going to take Ontario as an example, and from the ivory tower in Ottawa say to the provinces that they have to re-equip to suit the type of coupling that we are going to have in this province. I just thought I would leave these thoughts with the minister.

Mr. Martin: We do not disagree on that.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know too much about this matter of hose couplings, but my understanding is that you can get an adapter which you can use on any hydrant.

Mr. Hatfield: You cannot do that.

Mr. Harkness: The hose can be put on by means of that adapter. Whether that is correct, I am not sure, but that is my understanding.

One of the difficulties in this thing of not having the same equipment throughout the whole of the dominion is that every province except Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island abuts onto some other province and you are very likely to have help going from one to the other.

Another matter that I wish to ask about is the item that was mentioned, namely, radiation detection instruments, for which $962,000 is to be spent this year, with an additional $50,000 being ordered to be paid for next year. Can the minister tell us what these radiation detection instruments are, and whether it is intended by means of this vote, or subsequent votes of this kind, to equip all of the municipalities with these instruments?

Mr. Martin: To answer the latter part of my hon. friend's question, we will naturally provide the equipment in those areas where we believe, in the light of the assessment that is made, there is a prior necessity, and we will proceed on that basis. Obviously, it would be impossible, when you have not got unlimited quantities, to try and supply them to all communities. However, we are saying that in these places where we believe the need in terms of priority is greatest we will supply them.

Mr. Harkness: The minister did not say what sort of detection equipment this was. It was also part of my question. In view of what the minister has said I should like to ask another question. Is the dominion government paying the entire cost of this detection equipment, or is it on a one-third basis, the same as the hose couplings?

Mr. Martin: The present agreement is that we shall supply these.

Mr. Harkness: What kind of equipment is it?

Mr. Martin: What does my hon. friend mean by the question? There are many kinds of equipment.

Mr. Harkness: Are these geiger counters.

Mr. Martin: These are first of all to try to ascertain the existence of radioactivity. Also there are supplementary auxiliary units of use in the medical field, which, where there is radioactivity, are applied to the human body, and yield positive, negative, minor or major results.

Mr. Harkness: The next item comprises a series of things, and refers to sirens, to the extent of $252,000. Is the dominion government supplying sirens to all municipalities, or is this on a one-third basis?

Mr. Martin: As I said in my statement in chief, the sirens are being provided in communities of 20,000 and over in Canada, or to communities of lesser population within a target area.

Mr. Harkness: And the dominion is paying the full cost, I presume?

Mr. Martin: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Harkness: Then there is mention of training equipment, and mention of pamphlets. In addition to pamphlets, what does "training equipment" include? The minister mentioned stretchers which is a separate item. What are the kinds of training equipment, apart from stretchers and other things, which are specifically required?

Mr. Martin: Rescue sets. Then, of course, pamphlets have a primary purpose of serving in an educational program. However, there will be pamphlets not intended merely for public education, but to help in connection with specific things such as a greater measure of first-aid training, and to encourage some phases of home nursing. The other type of pamphlet will be designed to bring home to the general public the kinds of protections which, in the light of experience in heavily bombed-out areas such as those in the United Kingdom, and in areas such as Nagasaki and Hiroshima, are thought to be the protective measures which should be taken.

Some of that information is now out in various ways. Some comes through in the form of films, some in the form of radio talks and dramatizations. It is done most effectively through films. As I said last night, we have arranged for the use of films produced in the United States, and we hope also to be able to get two films from Great Britain. It may be necessary to make some readaptations for our own local use.

Then the stretchers about which I spoke last night are the stretchers we are providing for the school in Ottawa, the school in Saskatchewan, in Montreal, and so on.

Mr. Harkness: Possibly the minister did not understand my question. I asked what this training equipment is, apart from the pamphlets, the stretchers and the films which are mentioned specifically.

Mr. Martin: Well, I referred to rescue equipment, or rescue sets. We are having a rescue set built at our training school at Connaught Ranges which a number of us visited this evening.

Mr. Harkness: The next item refers to communications equipment, to a value of $20,000. Who will be supplied with that equipment, and to what extent is it being supplied by the dominion government? This is one of the most important things, so far as civic defence is concerned.

Mr. Martin: We are using the communications division of the Department of Transport particularly, and also working closely with the Department of National Defence. This afternoon we spent several hours examining two alternative plans for the use of the communications equipment submitted by a number of the large communications companies in the country. The terms of that use have not been established, but the discussions carried on today will continue next week. That is still by no means perfected, but it is certainly in the stage of receiving attention.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has not yet said what the $20,000 is for. That was my specific question.

Mr. Martin: I shall have to send for the details, and give them later.

Mr. Harkness: The minister has not got it. Then, I should like to bring up one other point. I understand one of the chief means of communication in each locality which will be depended upon in the matter of civil defence is through so-called hams. These are the people who own and who have as their hobby radio sending and receiving stations. In Calgary there are twenty-two or twenty-three hams who have their receiving sets installed in automobiles, or have them in a state where they can be installed.

If all other forms of communication fail, which might very easily happen in Calgary and the surrounding neighbourhood, we have this form of communication. However, they are seriously handicapped in the matter of training because they have not yet been allotted wavelengths. They have been waiting for wavelengths for some considerable time, and until those wavelengths are allotted they cannot carry on training in the way they would wish. This is a matter of considerable annoyance to them, apart altogether from the fact that it makes it difficult for them to train.

They have been asked specifically to take part in the civil defence scheme, but they have not been given the wavelengths which are required. Does the minister know anything about this matter? If he does not, I would ask him to look into it specifically and immediately, and to have it ironed out so that these people who are located not only in Calgary but throughout the country can go ahead and carry on their training in a reasonable manner.

Mr. Martin: While, personally, I cannot give very much help in the matter, I can say that the telecommunications committee has this as well as other matters under study.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister know why these wavelengths have been held up? From knowledge gained in the army and from other sources I know that even in peacetime in Canada there are a large number of these shortwave lengths. There should be no difficulty at all in allotting wavelengths to these hams. There must be red tape somewhere or other that is holding it up.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member may be sure that I will do everything I can to remove red tape.

Mr. Fulton: Referring to the early warning system, the minister said before six o'clock that national defence military personnel would receive the first warning of the approach of enemy aircraft, that they would send that information to civil defence centres which, in turn, would be responsible for sending it from the centres to the various municipalities and other civil defence sub-centres so that the whole civil defence scheme might be alerted.

Is it anticipated that there will be a special civil defence communications network to receive from the Department of National Defence military personnel the first warning which the minister said would go to the civil centres? Is that to be a special network, or does it rely upon existing civilian or private communications systems, and then from there on down to what might be called the sub-centres or the civil headquarters in the various municipalities? How does word get down? Is it by private communications systems or is there a special communications system being set up?

Mr. Martin: From the time the warning is given to the defence communication centre, where there will be civil defence personnel in 24-hour attendance, consideration is now being given to separate schemes that will provide for a special communications system.

Mr. Fulton: I am not sure whether I understood the first statement made by the minister, but I gather that the first warning would be received at a purely military centre. I asked the minister earlier whether there would be civil defence officers in attendance at, for instance, the various fighter commands or at the military centres. I understood him to say that that would not be the case but that through such installations as the fighter commands the warning would go to the civil defence centre and from there down through the civil defence network.

Mr. Martin: The warning would go to the defence communications centre at which there would be in attendance a representative of the civil defence unit on a 24-hour basis. We are now giving consideration to two separate schemes for a special communications set-up.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister refers to the defence centre do I understand he is referring to a military centre?

Mr. Martin: A centre under the direction of the armed forces, air force or otherwise.

Mr. Fulton: There will be civil defence personnel at the military centres?

Mr. Martin: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: The minister says that further consideration is being given to two alternative schemes, one relying on the existing civilian set-up.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend will understand why I do not want to give too many details, but I shall be glad to discuss this with him or any other hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: Is this one of the things to be studied by the committee on communications to which reference was made?

Mr. Martin: That, and the general civilian defence committee in Ottawa.

Mrs. Fairclough: Has consideration been given to using the facilities of the independent radio stations? I understand that some of our Canadian stations have been called into consultation with their United States neighbours, and up until a week or so ago I had not heard of their being called in by our own government.

Mr. Martin: That must be my fault. We have had excellent co-operation from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the private stations, representatives of whom are serving on a panel to deal with that very thing.

Mr. Hees: In answering the question asked by the hon. member for Lanark I do not think the minister gave the plans for making sure that water sources do not become contaminated.

Mr. Martin: That is right; I did not, and I should have. That is an extremely important thing. The industrial engineering division of the Department of National Health and Welfare is I suppose one of the best agencies in the country for this purpose because of its experience in water purification. This is a problem of the greatest concern. I do not think it is necessary to explain why I am so reluctant to say anything that might be regarded as indiscreet, but my hon. friend can understand that the continuation of water supply and the purification of water for our cities is an extremely important matter and is one that is receiving our attention.

Mr. Hees: The minister outlined steps that had been taken at Montreal where the people had participated in a drill, and he outlined other practical steps they had taken.

Mr. Martin: It was not a drill in Montreal. I simply referred to Montreal as being one community which had a great scheme under the civil defence co-ordinator for getting together a voluntary civil defence organization in that city. I referred to a large meeting which had been attended by several thousand people and cited it as an example of the activities that were being carried on in many municipalities, altogether apart from anything we do here. In appraising what is being done in the civil defence field in Canada assessment should not be confined only to what is being done here at the centre.

Mr. Hees: Are similar steps being taken in Toronto? I am particularly interested in my own city because I think it will be one certain target of enemy air attack. I am afraid I do not know much about what plans are being carried out in Toronto and I would appreciate if the minister would let me know what is being done.

Mr. Martin: Air Vice Marshal Lawrence has been appointed as civil defence co-ordinator and assumed his duties within the last ten weeks. He has before him the guide on organization which was prepared by our civil defence co-ordinator's staff, based pretty well upon the United Kingdom and United States experience and which is being used in most Canadian communities. I understand that Air Vice Marshal Lawrence and those associated with him in Toronto are proceeding along these lines.

Mr. Fulton: Just so that I may understand the system which the minister has outlined in very general terms, is this the way the early warning system will work out? Will a centre such as the north-west air command, where presumably warning would be received because they have the type of planes that would be used, have a civil defence officer in attendance who would sit in and watch the chart, be alerted and then have the responsibility of sending a warning down to the civilian defence centres? Is that the system?

Mr. Martin: That is it. I have not gone into details about regionalization and things of that sort, but I shall be glad to discuss these with any hon. member. I do not think I should go beyond that.

Mr. Fulton: That is the sort of general approach that I wanted to establish.

Mr. Martin: That is it.

Mr. Pouliot: Let us offer practical suggestions. I live in a large house at Riviere du Loup, quite close to the river. If the minister would fix up the cellar of this house there would be shelter accommodation for 100 people. If an excavation was made 50 feet under the house at least 1,000 people could be accommodated. As the benefit that

I would receive would be no more than would be received by anyone else it would not be necessary to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. Harkness: You could put all your poll captains in there.

Mr. Pouliot: I wonder if they would take up much room.

Mr. Fulton: Does the hon. member anticipate being attacked personally?

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend was a generalissimo of the enemy I know I would be the first one to receive a bomb. I make this offer to the minister and I am sure he will consider it seriously because it is a practical suggestion of how 100 people can be taken care of, in one instance, and 1,000 in the other.

Mr. Martin: Outside my own mother's roof, I do not know of any other roof I would want to spend time under than that of my hon. friend.

Mr. Pouliot: The minister would be safe there.

Mr. Green: Earlier in the week a press dispatch indicated that there was some thought of using the Pacific Coast Militia Rangers for civil defence duties. I do not know whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare would know anything about that or whether it comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence. But this dispatch stated that there would be a reorganization of that group which contained about 16,000 men during the last war, and also that they would be doing civil defence work. Can either of the ministers tell me whether or not that dispatch is correct, and just what plans have been made; also whether any steps have been taken to reconstitute the civilian observer corps?

Mr. Martin: Perhaps that is a question which should be addressed to the Minister of National Defence. Would the hon. member mind waiting until we have completed the civil defence discussion? While it has a civil defence aspect, it really goes much beyond that. Perhaps he would care to wait and deal with it later, so that we could deal with the civil defence matter first.

Mr. Green: The dispatch says that the duties they are to undertake are civil defence duties. Presumably, therefore, they would come under the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: As I said, they have a civil defence aspect. But undoubtedly, as I said this afternoon, there is the other aspect. For instance, we have made arrangements to use the detection service of the Ontario department of forestry. They have a vast army—perhaps I should not say it is a vast army—but very efficient operation groups of forest fire observers, as the leader of the opposition knows much better than I do, one that serves in outlying posts and in all forest areas. We will be using them. But I thought that my hon. friend was taking the matter from another angle; and I thought from that other angle, in so far as it applied to the Department of National Defence, he might care to wait until we dealt with the purely national defence items.

Mr. Green: If this group are to be used, there would have to be a reorganization. It is not like using a body that is already functioning.

Mr. Martin: I am aware of that.

Mr. Green: Can the Minister of National Defence say whether they are taking steps to reorganize them, or under which department would that reorganization come?

Mr. Claxton: The Pacific Coast Rangers which did an extremely useful job during the war were reorganized in 1947 as the Canadian Rangers. Now they have companies operating from end to end of Canada. Their role is primarily to supplement that of the active and reserve forces of Canada, but they have civil defence roles as well. So far, there are twenty-one companies organized and they form a component of the Canadian army reserve. They are being organized just as rapidly as we can organize them in every part where there is no ordinary reserve army unit. Their jobs are to provide guides to organized troops within their own area; coast watching; assistance to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and provincial police in the discovery, reporting and apprehension of enemy agents or saboteurs; the reporting of other suspicious activities; immediate local defence against sabotage by small enemy detachments or saboteurs and to assist and augment civilian protective arrangements against saboteurs, within the area in which the organization is authorized to operate; reporting, locating and rescue work, including first aid treatment in connection with aircraft in distress.

These Canadian Rangers are organized on much the same basis as the Pacific Coast Rangers. I remember that I took part at the inauguration of this plan in 1947. General Worthington, who is the co-ordinator of civil defence, is the honorary colonel commandant of the corps of Canadian Rangers, and that organization is proceeding.

Mr. Green: I am glad to hear that. They certainly did splendid work during the last war. Apparently they come under the Department of National Defence. How many have been enlisted?

Mr. Claxton: The present establishment is set at 5,000. I have not that information as to the exact number enlisted. As I say, they are organized in twenty-one companies; and from a map I have seen in the northwestern command, they cover fairly well the whole area of the Northwest Territories, the Arctic, the coast of British Columbia, and are now extending over the Hudson bay area and the north Atlantic coast.

Mr. Green: What about the Canadian air observer corps? Is that a separate corps?

Mr. Claxton: It is under organization now under the Royal Canadian Air Force. There is not anything yet in addition to the organization plan. I do not want to minimize it because we want to get everyone in it that we can; but, on the other hand, its utility with regard to aircraft that may be flying at 20,000 feet or more is limited. Nevertheless, its utility in connection with landings is very important.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure the minister will pardon me, but I think he made a slip of the tongue when he said that these Canadian Rangers were being organized in every part of Canada. Surely they are being organized only in those northern areas where there are no militia units.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister's first statement was "in every part of Canada", which would give the impression that they were being organized in the settled parts of Canada.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member is quite right. I think the record will indicate that I said it was being organized where there are no organized reserve army units. The hon. member is quite right.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, I was not particularly happy with the answer the minister gave me this afternoon to my question on civil defence in Newfoundland, and I should like to refer to it again if he would not mind. From what I could gather, either the information was such that the pipe line between himself and the civil defence authorities has a poor coupling or else the pressure is such that the information does not get through to him. It certainly does not get past him because it is not made public to the province. As I believe the minister knows, the situation is this. Some time in the early part of the year, an extremely public-spirited gentleman was appointed director of civil defence. He is fully aware of that.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Curtis, was it not?

Mr. Higgins: No; Mr. F. M. O'Leary. He came to Ottawa and attended meetings up here. Following that, he went home and shortly afterwards resigned. In his explanation he said that apparently the authorities at home were not taking the matter of civil defence seriously and were not prepared to co-operate with him. Since that time, as far as the public is concerned, nothing has happened. Today the minister said that under Mr. Curtis, the attorney general, there is a committee of five working. They may be working, but so far as the public or the province is concerned no plans have been outlined and nothing has been done. I should like the minister to tell me if he knows something that we have not been able to find out yet.

Mr. Martin: I cannot add anything to what I said this afternoon. The civil defence minister, Hon. L. R. Curtis, I am sure is a gentleman of great perspicacity and one who is greatly concerned about this matter, as I am sure my hon. friend is. I have no doubt but that he will pursue this with the same diligence with which it is being pursued in all provinces.

Mr. Higgins: He must be hiding his light under a bushel.

Mr. Martin: Ministers sometimes do that.

Mr. Pearkes: I think this debate which has now lasted for several hours has brought home to the committee the seriousness with which hon. members on all sides view this very important subject of civil defence. The minister himself stressed its importance. He has emphasized various aspects, including the need for co-operation at the various levels of government in the plans that are now beginning to be worked out; the need for the support of everyone throughout the land in order to make these plans effective, and so on. The minister has pointed out that it is not the amount of money allocated to this branch of defence that is the prime factor; yet as he went on he discussed the need of equipment, the need to develop communications services, and the need for greater personnel. So I think it will be obvious to everyone that before this plan can go into effect much larger sums of money will be required in order to make it really effective. I think we can assure the minister from this side of the house that we realize the importance of this work, and that if co-operation is required it will be forthcoming to the fullest possible extent.

Mr. Martin: Thank you.

Mr. Pearkes: We shall do everything we can. I come back for a moment to a point I made earlier and upon which the minister touched. It is contained in this excellent pamphlet the minister has issued, in which it says that the effectiveness of the civil defence system will depend in the first instance upon an adequate warning system. We realize that. The minister has told us how in the course of the last twenty-four hours steps have been taken to obtain the co-operation of the communications companies of this country. Obviously they are working toward these ends. Perhaps the minister should not be as emphatic as he was last night in pointing out what he thought were certain inaccuracies in what I had said, particularly when I mentioned that an adequate warning system did not exist at the moment.

I have just one other comment to make. In this pamphlet considerable stress is laid upon providing shock-resisting features, fire prevention requirements, basements suitable for shelters and so on in any construction work being carried out. We know a great deal of construction is being carried on by the dominion government, some of it by the Department of National Defence. That department is erecting married quarters and barracks for single men in strategic centres which might be considered likely targets by the enemy. I hope these suggestions in regard to providing basements which can be converted into shelters will be noted by the Minister of National Defence, and that where these barracks blocks are being constructed consideration will be given to these matters. That has not been the case in the past; there are no basement shelters now. As construction goes on I hope those things will be provided. As I said before, I think we have underlined the importance of civil defence, and I do not intend to pursue the subject further.

Mr. Harkness: One question was brought to my mind by the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo. In outlining these specific expenditures for civil defence the minister mentioned the sum of $350,000 for the acquisition and construction of buildings and works including the acquisition of land. Is that intended for administration buildings, or is it to make a start on some type of shelter, or is it for experimentation in regard to shelters, or what is it for?

Mr. Martin: That was intended for a structure to house the technical training school now in operation at Connaught Ranges. While I am on my feet I might give the hon. member some information I could not give a short time ago. The $20,000 for communications equipment will be used largely for a certain type of walkie-talkie set that has been found useful in this work. I only want to say to the hon. member for Nanaimo that in the spirit of understanding he has shown I thank him for his offer of co-operation which in any event, apart from his declaration, I was sure would be forthcoming.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the debate on civil defence is now concluded?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the sub-item carry?

Sub-item agreed to.

Professional and special services, $200,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Could we have an explanation of this?

Mr. Fulton: I observe that the same amount is allocated to this sub-item this year as last year. Would the minister give us a breakdown of the purposes for which this money is spent and the persons by whom it is received?

Mr. Claxton: This has to do with inspection service. It provides for inspection by commercial firms, to which I referred last night; the U.S. navy, the U.K. government and Canadian Arsenals Limited; also for payment to the Canadian Commercial Corporation on a pro rata basis for the Canadian corps of commissionaires required for security purposes at No. 2 building, Ottawa. The details are armaments branch, guns and carriages, motor transport, ammunition, $75,000; technical services branches, chemicals, $10,000; ships branch, material, $92,000; clothing stores branch, textiles and barracks stores, $22,400; Canadian corps of commissionaires, to which I have already referred, $600. The figure is the same as for last year, and is all related to professional services in relation to inspection.

Mr. Fulton: I understand these are commercial firms which are employed in addition to the inspectors paid under the preceding item about which we had a good deal of discussion?

Mr. Claxton: That is right, except that we also pay the U.S. navy, the U.K. government and Canadian Arsenals Limited as well as the corps of commissionaires that small amount of $600.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister tell the committee what kind of service the Canadian Commercial Corporation renders this department for which it has to pay under the administration item?

Mr. Claxton: We share a building with C.C.C. and pay half the cost of guarding the building by the corps of commissionaires.

Mr. Fulton: Well, I may have misunderstood the minister. I understood he said the department pays $600 to the corps of commissionaires. That was one item. Then, there were three large items on which I thought he said that either the $92,000 or the $22,400 went to the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Claxton: No, I am sorry. The only payment under this is to the Canadian corps of commissionaires $600 for half the cost of guarding the building which we share with the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry that I did not keep up with the minister. Will the minister tell me again what the $22,400 item is?

Mr. Claxton: Clothing and stores branch, textiles and bag stores, $22,400. It is paid to outside inspectors to inspect these items.

Mr. Fulton: That is, the Canadian Commercial Corporation were making sure for the department that the clothing ordered is up to standard?

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: Are there any oculists employed or paid under this item?

Mr. Claxton: No; the only oculists that we have would be under the payments for the navy, army and air force, votes for medical services.

Mr. Higgins: I have a matter I want to discuss under this item, sir. I do not know of any other way in which I can do so except under this particular item. To me, it is an important matter. At the annual meeting of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association held in Toronto between May 7 and 11, there was a very interesting discussion concerning the use of BCG and the tuberculin testing of recruits for the services. Arising out of that discussion, which I may say was participated in by doctors from all across the country, a resolution was passed. Really, it was the adoption of the resolution of the management committee, which had been passed and sent to the Minister of National Defence in September of last year. I should like to have this resolution inscribed, Mr. Chairman, so that you can follow the matter. The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas the tuberculosis control program throughout Canada has led to a marked increase in the numbers of negative reactors and whereas it is acknowledged that through contact with infectious tuberculosis the chances of negative tuberculin reactors developing tuberculosis is materially greater than otherwise; and whereas a negative X-ray plate can provide no indication of the tuberculin status of the individual, therefore, the Canadian Tuberculosis Association recommends that the tuberculin status be determined by the use of the tuberculin test at the time of enlistment examination, and if possible, extended to all service personnel at present enlisted. In further support of this resolution, consideration is given to the increased risk of tuberculosis infection in countries other than Canada and the United States, and the consequent influence on pensionable cases resulting from such circumstance.
> The association regrets that the Department of National Defence has not seen fit, up to the present, to adopt this procedure. The C.T.A. urges that prompt action be taken in this matter, considering the present world situation.

The Canadian Tuberculosis Association also endorsed a further resolution of the management committee dated September 25, 1950, which reads as follows:

> That, whereas the number of negative tuberculin reactors in the recruiting ages is rapidly increasing, and whereas this situation means an increased susceptibility to tuberculosis, and whereas such people if sent in the course of duty to countries where infectious tuberculosis is much more prevalent than at home, and whereas BCG vaccination of negative tuberculin does provide an appreciable degree of protection against the development of tuberculosis, therefore the Canadian Tuberculosis Association recommends that negative tuberculin reactors be vaccinated with BCG vaccine to reduce the hazard of tuberculosis as experienced in the course of duty.

Now, Mr. Chairman, both of those resolutions were adopted by the management committee of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association on September 25, 1950. They were both communicated to the Minister of National Defence at that time; and, as I understand, the reasons were given for those resolutions being passed. The minister was urged to follow the course suggested by the resolutions. Up to the present at least no action has been taken in the matter. I understand, though I do not know of my own knowledge, that the medical men of the services are in full accord with this program. Certainly, all the doctors that were present at that annual meeting, as I say, doctors from all across the dominion, thoroughly approved of it. The suggestion is that sending recruits, say to Korea, without proper testing is sending them into very great danger indeed of contracting tuberculosis if they have not been inoculated with BCG.

I am told that the cost is very, very little indeed. The cost of testing, and the cost of inoculating with BCG would be less than ten cents per recruit. The time required is, I believe, not more than forty-eight hours. I understand that negative reactors to the tuberculin tests, when they have received an inoculation from BCG, have more or less about 90 per cent protection against contracting tuberculosis. Now, Mr. Chairman, when we take into account, not only the humanitarian principle involved but the possibility of boys and young men being inducted into the forces without proper protection against this germ, that of itself is a very strong appeal indeed. Then, when we look at the financial part of it, and when we look at the huge amount that must be paid out for pensions for those who have contracted tuberculosis while in the armed services, the cost of sanatorium treatment for them, then indeed it becomes a very serious problem. I understand that in the last war when the men from provinces which have a very low incidence of tuberculosis, such as Saskatchewan, were exposed to tuberculosis in the course of their duties, they picked it up much quicker than those from provinces which had a higher incidence of the disease.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me as being of the utmost importance that these recommendations of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association should be adopted. I see no reason at all, no excuse on the ground of delay, in getting the men into the forces or on the ground of the costs. In fact, I cannot see any grounds at all for not following that course. I am told that the minister's idea is that this should be a more or less voluntary decision on the part of a recruit, whether or not he will submit to it. Many hon. members are fully aware of what the ordinary recruit would do if such a proposition were put to him. I suggest quite definitely to the minister that this program should be adopted, and there should not be any question of its being voluntary. It should be a compulsory inoculation at the time the recruit is inducted. I should like to hear a comment from the minister.

Mr. Claxton: I can appreciate the representations put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East. I think it was in 1944 or 1945, when I had the honour of being Minister of National Health and Welfare, that we introduced the BCG through Dr. Frappier, particularly in connection with the prevention or arrest of tuberculosis among Indians. The area in which the tests were first conducted by us on a large scale in Canada was in Qu'Appelle in the province of Saskatchewan. That was in 1945, I think. Then I also became familiar with this in Paris in 1946, at the Pasteur institute and in other places had representations made to me about it. Canada has made good progress in this direction.

In the province of Quebec, my own province, this testing or inoculation is carried out particularly with young infants, and it seems to have been very successful.

With regard to personnel in the armed forces, we have X-rays and very careful medical examinations. The incidence of tuberculosis among members of the armed forces is small. There are some risks and uncertainties involved, but we are in close consultation with the Canadian Tuberculosis Association, the Department of National Health and Welfare, particularly, and the great expert of Canada, Dr. Wherrett. We shall be very glad to take into consideration the representations of my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: As I recall, the minister said that in connection with the vote of $200,000 the amount of $75,000 was for inspection in the manufacture of guns, commercial inspection. It is quite a large item. I did not keep up with the minister in my notes but, as I recall, it was for that purpose. Can the minister give us the relationship between what is paid for this type of inspection of armament production and the quite large number of inspectors within the department, of whom we just heard 727 are paid under the vote that we have just passed? If we are paying these people—and I think it is quite important that we should have at any rate inspection of production of our armaments—why then, if we have these presumably well qualified people who are in the various plants producing for us, should we in addition have to pay for professional and special services? Why should we have to pay other people to do the same work?

Mr. Claxton: I think the answer to the hon. member is that this payment, which is relatively small, in view of the amount spent in inspection, and also the amount spent for equipment, is due to two causes. Either we have peak loads where we have a shipment of arms to another country on a special order, or else we are producing arms on the orders of another country such as the United States or the United Kingdom and we pay their inspector to inspect for us as well as for themselves; and of course we either give the goods away or else collect the amount in the total payment we receive.

Mr. Fulton: Do I understand that this would be in the nature of a contingency as though perhaps the 727 people who it is anticipated will be paid during the coming year out of the vote we have just passed may not be enough to do the various jobs that we may be called upon to do, or it may be necessary to employ outside people? Is that the nature of this particular portion of this $200,000? Is it in the nature of a contingency fund?

Mr. Claxton: Part of this amount would be paid for the inspection by the United States individual inspectors of equipment that we buy in the United States, which is delivered to us. The other element is payment to Canadian inspecting firms to take care of peak loads and is contingent, based on our experience during the past year.

Mr. Fulton: If it is a contingent item to an extent, at any rate, what was the expenditure last year?—because I observe that the estimates for the two years are the same.

Mr. Claxton: We have the expenditures estimated for the year 1950-51—the books are not closed yet—in primaries, but we have not got that broken down because the bills have not all been added up. I can get that for the hon. member.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister say a word or two in enlargement of the general situation that there are peak loads where I understand it is necessary to employ outside personnel? Is it considered that it is not efficient or possible to anticipate just how many inspectional personnel you need in the department, permanent staff, to be paid out of the item "civil salaries and wages"? Would it be considered less efficient to employ enough persons to provide for this contingency, and estimate accordingly in the first sub-item, rather than providing this fairly large sum of $200,000 for unforeseen contingencies? If we are to have this contingency, to what extent are we unable to anticipate it?

Mr. Claxton: We have a good deal of difficulty in anticipating them, because this year we will be spending several hundred million dollars on equipment; and how much we get from the manufacturers at any time depends on some events outside our own control.

Now, if we maintain an inspection staff sufficient to deal with the peak, then it will be uneconomical because they will be unemployed at certain times. Also, we cannot anticipate when the peaks will occur, because they may depend on the flow of United States components in Canadian equipment. Therefore, in some instances it is more economical to employ outside inspectors to supplement our own inside inspectors rather than to keep a large staff going and not have them fully employed the year round.

Mr. Fulton: I think that is a reasonable explanation. Would the minister then be able to tell me where he would turn for this type of inspection services? Can he give us, for instance, the names of some of the firms he employed? Can he give us the names of those he employed to inspect delivery of guns? May I put a concrete question? Surely the minister would not employ the inspector from the firm which is making the guns? Where does he find these people? How is he able to pick them out so as to employ them and to turn them on to somebody else's produce?

Mr. Claxton: There are a considerable number of firms with professional standing who do this kind of work. I could not, quite frankly, give the hon. member details as to our employment of any of these firms in the year ahead. But there are such firms as Warnock, in the field of mechanical engineering, and Rankin; and J. T. Donald and Company in the field of chemicals.

Mr. Fulton: And for clothing?

Mr. Claxton: I do not think we would use one for clothing. We have our own inspectors for clothing.

Mr. Fulton: I thought the minister told us that one of the components of the $200,000 was for the inspection of clothing.

Mr. Claxton: I gave the figure of $22,400 for clothing and stores branch, technical and barracks stores. I would be surprised to hear that our inspectors do not inspect all the clothing. It may be possible that we might employ an outside firm to help us over a peak load. We have had several peak loads. However, I will look into that.

Sub-item agreed to.

Defence services—
Travelling and removal expenses, $379,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks. I am going to ask the minister whether this item provides for officers to take ladies to cocktail parties when off duty. Before he answers I wish to bring to his attention certain facts. The hon. member for Fraser Valley in the public accounts committee, as well as some other hon. members, directed the attention of the committee to the fact that army cars were being used improperly, at times, and brought certain incidents to the attention of the deputy minister, who was a witness at the time.

The deputy minister replied that a series of checks was made, on occasions, or generally, and that the system was, that if a private soldier who was driving a general who used an army vehicle improperly cares to report that general, he may do so. Well, I can see a private reporting a general! That would be the end of the private.

I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the Vancouver Sun of May 19, which contains a whole page which apparently is intended as a build-up for the army's gala ball. The heading is, "Army Polishes up for Gala Ball". It shows a type of advertising and pictures that would make Cromwell turn over in his grave. We see in the top picture a luscious beauty in evening dress reclining, somewhat after the fashion of Cleopatra. She is reclining in a most languid manner while being shown the operation of a machine gun. I cannot believe that that would add much to the Canadian recruiting drive.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh, I think so.

Mr. Herridge: One would think we were trying to defend a Hail-Hail-The-Gang's-All-Here sort of civilization. I wish to bring to the attention of the minister particularly another picture about six inches by eight inches in size. This is the picture of a jeep in which there are two officers and two attractive looking women. Under the picture it says:

> The army has never been the same since the first jeep was built. The busy little vehicle plays a dozen important roles in its military career, but here's a brand new one. This gay foursome has commandeered one for party transportation as they attend a pre-military ball affair.

I made inquiries as to what the "pre-military ball affair" was, and I am informed it was a pre-military ball cocktail party.

Mr. Pearkes: What is that?

Mr. Herridge: A cocktail party prior to a military ball.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh.

Mr. Herridge: But my point is this, that we see in this picture an army vehicle paid for out of public money, and operated with gasoline paid for at public expense, which would possibly be meeting workers coming out of plants, workers with lunch buckets in their hands. Does that build up morale—when they are being asked to pay 20 per cent surtax only to have officers and their wives or friends ride around in government jeeps and government property, as the picture indicates? And it is not only this picture, but if hon. members would look at the Vancouver Province of May 19, the same date, they would see another picture of a jeep showing two army officers and two other ladies being invited in to have a ride. Apparently in that case however the ladies thought it would be rough riding, and they did not go.

This indicates however that these army vehicles are being used for other than army purposes in off-duty periods. There is much more of that going on in this country than, I am sure, the minister realizes. What would be the attitude of a working woman walking down the street and seeing these people, who live at a very high standard compared with that of the average worker—people dressed in furs and frills riding down the street in an army jeep at public expense?

Then, in addition to that, a gentleman came to me out of the gallery of this chamber this afternoon and told me he was from Montreal. He said, "I have been interested in this discussion"—and he was referring to questions asked by hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party, sitting to my right. He said to me, "My near neighbour is a provost marshal in Montreal, and you can tell the minister for me that that gentleman, regardless of what the deputy minister says, has his children driven to a private school every morning in an army car, by an army chauffeur, and brought home every night in that army car by the army chauffeur, and taken on week-end trips at the country's expense."

I would like the minister to explain why these vehicles are used on those occasions, and if that is permitted under army regulations, and under his administration.

Mr. Mott: I think I know what the hon. member is referring to. I saw that in the paper, but I do not think he is making it clear. Was that not when the new brigadier was taking over command in British Columbia at Vancouver?

Mr. Herridge: No, this was for the pre-gala ball party.

Mr. Mott: If the hon. member would look at it he would see that the ladies are in evening dress, and that the jeep was just photographed for the purposes of the newspaper. It is only a little bit of advertising of the officers ball on that occasion, and I suggest the hon. member should not have brought it up in the way that he has, or should not have made the suggestion that it is being driven around Vancouver for that purpose.

Mr. Herridge: The newspaper says so.

Mr. Mott: I know it says so—but you know what newspapers are.

Mr. Fulton: It is in the Vancouver Sun.

Mr. Claxton: I am obliged to the hon. member for Kootenay West who has brought this matter to my attention. First, with regard to the officer in the provost corps at Montreal, if what the hon. member says is so, then I must say it is strictly against regulations and will be dealt with accordingly. I shall look into it.

Mr. Herridge: Thank you.

Mr. Claxton: Then, with regard to the occasion to which he has referred, and to this picture of officers, and others, attending an army ball—well, I do not know; I am not terribly familiar with those things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: But I should think that anyone who was would recognize at once that these pictures were taken with some view to having them appear in a social column or some other column of a newspaper for publicity purposes.

I am not too sure they are bad publicity; that is a question of opinion. Perhaps I might think they are bad or good publicity while others might not. I saw this, and looked into it, and I am assured, with regard to this picture of the two officers and their wives in the jeep, that the picture was taken in the armoury at the request of the photographer of the Vancouver Sun and that, for the purpose, the jeep was backed up against the wall of the armoury, and not one ounce of gasoline was used.

Mr. Wright: I have been totalling up the travelling and removal expenses and freight, express and cartage for the army, navy and air force and I find it comes to about $32 million. How does the department divide this business between the two main railroads?

Mr. Claxton: I could look up the traffic for 1950-51, but as I remember it is almost 50-50. Where one railroad provides a better service, we use that railroad. Where there are alternative services available an attempt at equalization is made. As I remember, and I do not necessarily indicate the exact figures, it was about $1,500,000 for one and $1,400,000 for the other.

Sub-item agreed to.

Telephones, telegrams and other communication services, $26,500.

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that the army has a special telephone service of its own, and under army a large sum of money is provided for that purpose, well over $1 million. Under headquarters we have this item of $26,500 which apparently is paid for services other than those provided by the army. Is that paid to civilian companies? Does the army service the administration branch of the department?

Mr. Claxton: This amount of $26,500 is paid to outside telephone and telegraph agencies. The total cost of the tri-service communications system is far greater than that. I would say that 95 per cent of all communications by telegraph or radioteletype between the three services are carried across Canada by tri-service communications set-up.

This service went into effect at the beginning of last year. The navy, army and air force cover all the main centres of Canada on a 24 hour basis. There is no duplication. The navy operates the terminals at Esquimalt and Halifax, the army operate in Montreal, the air force in Winnipeg and so on. The service duplicates to a considerable degree the existing commercial services across Canada. There are between 1,500 and 2,000 personnel involved. In addition to carrying almost all the traffic for the armed forces a good deal of traffic is carried for other government departments. As indicated before, during emergencies this service is used to carry commercial traffic as well.

The service is almost fully occupied today and is capable of carrying a heavier load in the event of war. We consider it essential to maintain it in peacetime and keep it built up so it will be available in the event of war. It has the most modern equipment. There is some radioteletype and some line-teletype, and the whole system is connected with similar systems in the United States, Great Britain, Australia and throughout the world. It carries all ordinary traffic that can be sent by wire.

In addition to the operations of the magnitude I have indicated it is necessary for many telephone calls to be sent out, and this vote of $26,500 is necessary. For instance, there may be a conference of senior officers or a collecting of last-minute recruiting returns. Telephone calls may even be necessary in order to answer parliamentary inquiries. There is an increase of only $1,700 over last year.

Mr. Pearkes: This is most interesting because I believe this is the first official announcement, certainly the first in parliament, of the establishment of this tri-service communications system. Has it been used in time of national emergency, such as the emergency which caused the special session of parliament last year?

Mr. Claxton: I am not so sure that it was used in connection with the emergency that necessitated the special session, but it was used in a major way in connection with the Fraser valley floods. The ordinary commercial communications broke down and the services took over and carried all communications into the Fraser valley and also into Vancouver to a considerable degree as well as to many other areas. I remember authorizing the dispatch of 23 operators by air from Montreal in order to help to carry the load. For several days most personal and commercial traffic was carried by this service.

The same thing occurred during the Winnipeg flood, but to a minor degree. During a snowslide in British Columbia the same thing occurred. I remember visiting one of these stations in Winnipeg and I was told that it had carried commercial traffic, including 20,000 words for the Canadian Press, during the previous 24 hours. There was a breakdown in the maritime services and our service carried everything for 24 hours for both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National telegraph systems. It has been of great value in meeting civilian emergencies.

It meets all service needs. We carry thousands of messages each month for other government departments. All communications with the Northwest Territories and the Arctic are carried by this service.

Mr. Pearkes: When the service is used by other government departments do they pay for that? Would the Canadian Press pay for what service they obtained, and would the Canadian Pacific pay for what messages of theirs were carried?

Mr. Claxton: Other government departments do not pay, but commercial users would unless the message was carried on compassionate grounds.

Mr. Pearkes: I appreciate fully the value of this tri-service system in the event of war or national emergency and I realize the importance of having it maintained with trained personnel, but I wonder if the minister can give any indication as to how the cost of maintaining such a service would compare with the cost of using similar civilian transcontinental services?

Mr. Claxton: I am afraid I would not be able to obtain an equivalent figure for the civilian services. But it is not competitive in a real sense because we engage in training personnel, operating in isolated centres, operating non-commercial routes. I am afraid, therefore, that I could not give any comparison. It has just been suggested to me that the cost would be higher because of security requirements. Over this system we can carry all kinds of security restricted messages which could not be carried over commercial systems but which require processing through the ordinary ciphering and deciphering equipment and so on.

Mr. Pearkes: Is there any duplication at all in connection with the government telephone services which are also provided in remote parts of this country under the Department of Transport?

Mr. Claxton: Following the inquiry that was made, I think in the public accounts committee, we have looked into the matter and we can find no duplication at all.

Sub-item agreed to.

Printing of departmental reports and other publications, $122,500.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Harkness: I notice that this particular item is a little bit more than twice what it was last year. I was wondering if the minister could tell us what the reason for this increase is and what publications and departmental reports this item covers other than this report of the Department of National Defence which we all received. I ask that question particularly because I notice that the same item appears in the navy, the army and the air force, and quite large sums are involved in each of those branches. I was wondering exactly what was covered by this particular item so far as headquarters is concerned, the administrative department.

Mr. Claxton: In answer to the hon. member, I can say that almost all the increase is accounted for by the fact that this year we are providing quite a considerable item for civil defence in the estimates of this department. The amount provided for 1950-51 was $60,000. The amount now asked for is $122,500. The increase is $62,500. Of the increase, $51,500 is applicable to civil defence, so that only $11,000 is applicable to the Department of National Defence, and that is owing to the increase in activities and the expansion of the size of the department.

Mr. Harkness: What other publications are put out, so far as headquarters are concerned, besides this report on national defence? This year the only other thing I have seen is "Canada's Defence Program" which is practically a reprint of the minister's speech on February 5 in this house, with a little addition to it. What other publications are put out besides those two?

Mr. Claxton: In the department we issue a good many appeals for support; that is, requests for support for the work of the armed forces. For instance, there was a letter I recently addressed to over 3,500 or more employers asking them to support the work of the armed forces of Canada. I believe that comes out of this item. During the year there are a good many similar letters or appeals that require to be issued in that way. There are no other major items. This is made up of a multitude of small items.

Mr. Fulton: As the hon. member for Calgary East has pointed out, this same item is duplicated in other parts of the departmental estimates. To be specific, it is duplicated seven times, and the total of those other seven items is in the neighbourhood of $2 million. That makes me wonder whether this could not be done in another way. For instance, at page 270 the navy has an item of $344,000; the army has an item of $495,000; and air has an item of $1,049,000; under aerial photographic survey there is an item of $1,650; and under defence research and development there is an item of $100,550, to name some of the larger ones.

I should like to ask whether any of these sums and any of the sum before us of $122,500 is in connection with the recruiting program. Whether it is or whether it is not, I should like to know why all the various departmental reports—because the wording of the item is "printing of departmental reports and other publications"—are not centralized under the departmental administration. It occurs to me, at first sight at any rate, that for the army to have a separate publications branch and for the navy, the air force, defence research and development, and aerial photographic survey each to have a separate one, is something that indicates a little bit of inefficiency. It appears to me that if each of these was to be centralized, a more efficient, a more closely interrelated, and probably a less expensive job could be done. I come back to the point that these other seven items in the department total $2 million.

Mr. Claxton: I can understand the hon. member's difficulty. But the printing is not done by the navy, the army and the air force. All printing contracts are placed by the service concerned, through the deputy minister's office, with the king's printer or under his authority with some outside printer. There is no competition and no inefficiency of administration. The printing of course amounts to a large sum, as the hon. member knows, having been an officer himself.

Mr. Fulton: Does it include all departments?

Mr. Claxton: It includes a lot of work instruction books, drill books, pamphlets, training manuals and the like. Each service is responsible for the production of the material for those, but the order for their printing is placed, through the deputy minister, with the king's printer or, through him, with an outside printer. That is subject to few exceptions, in respect of which we do some printing within the department itself, largely relating to security material. When you consider that this relates to the three services, and the defence research board, which has a good deal of printing of restricted material to do, you can understand why it appears under seven headings.

Mr. Fulton: I understand the minister to say that the only control or co-ordination is through the deputy minister. These various branches or services put their requirements up and they go through the deputy minister who, I presume, must approve them. I am just wondering whether it would not be better to have a central office. Since you have an item under departmental administration, I am wondering whether it would not be better to have that office, as it were, co-ordinating all the printing requirements. Does it include, for instance, such things as the part II orders of the various services?

Mr. Claxton: No; part II orders are mimeographed. Naval service orders, army orders and air force orders are printed through the king's printer but all the subordinate orders are done in mimeographed form.

Mr. Fulton: But these various items would cover the cost of that, would they not?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The words "other publications" are quite wide. Does this include anything in connection with recruiting?

Mr. Claxton: I take it my hon. friend is now referring to item 9 in the summary of standard objects. That does not include recruiting, which is the next item, No. 10, which deals with films, displays, broadcasting, advertising, and so on.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to anticipate that item, but there is no item 10 under departmental administration.

Mr. Claxton: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to anticipate another branch or item that will come later, but I do suggest that national defence headquarters should control the recruiting program and its set-up, whereas we find it broken down under army, navy and air force. How does that work?

Mr. Claxton: We are anticipating, but I am very glad to do it. To deal with recruiting for the three services we have set up under the direction of the personnel members committee an interservice recruiting committee. As hon. members may recall, the personnel members committee consists of the heads of personnel of the three services. In the case of the navy it is the chief naval personnel, the CNP as he is called. In the case of the army it is the adjutant general, and in the case of the air force the air member for personnel. This committee deals with all personnel matters affecting the three services, including recruiting. Subordinate to them is the joint service recruiting committee and the joint service advertising committee consisting of officers appointed to represent the navy, army and air members of PMC. They make recommendations to PMC in regard to recruiting matters. We have at least two general sessions a year, which I usually attend as do the members of the PMC, the joint services recruiting committee and the advertising agencies concerned. We draw up programs for recruiting advertising. Those programs are modified and changed from week to week and month to month, because this is a very sensitive operation; but there is complete tri-service co-operation.

Once the recruiting plan has been agreed to as between the three services and approved by myself, we work it out in financial terms. There is a financial adjustment, which is almost always downward, and the actual procedure of accounting is handled through the deputy minister. So there is complete unified control of the whole operation from start to finish.

Mr. Fulton: I will not pursue that at the moment beyond saying it seems a little odd that the expense should be allotted to the services, which must be rather arbitrary, instead of the over-all recruiting program being accounted for under departmental administration. However, that detail can be discussed later.

I should like to follow up the same point, if I may, in connection with item No. 9 in the general summary of standard objects, which is the printing of departmental reports and other publications. How do you decide which service will have so much money to spend; or why is it not simply decided that so much money will be allowed for the printing of departmental reports and publications and put that money under departmental administration. From there on you could control the expenditure by each branch of the service so the total amount would not be overspent.

Mr. Claxton: We are dealing only with administration at present, and as the hon. member can see the increase is very small.

Mr. Fulton: It is $62,500.

Mr. Claxton: Of that $51,500 is applicable to civil defence, which we did not have at all in the previous year. To answer the other question as to the build-up of budgets, of course we get into a pretty big field there. Each service builds up the budget for that service. It plans its work for the year ahead, in fact for three years ahead. It discusses those plans with the other services in the chiefs of staff committee and at other levels. The deputy minister or his representative sits in at all those discussions, and common factors for the build-up of all the budget elements are agreed to so that it is worked out that a man in the army will cost as much as a man in the air force doing the same job, and so on. All those things are pretty well worked out now, and we have very good methods of computing costs.

With regard to manpower, they relate this to the expected build-up through the year month by month, and increase or decrease the grants for pay and allowances accordingly. The same thing is done with regard to food, and so on, averaged out for the year. Then they look ahead and see what construction is needed, and this is considered so as not to be out of line with the other services. Equipment is the biggest and most difficult element. We have endless sessions from about August to November within the department working on our own estimates as between the three service heads and the deputy minister, and finally with myself, but always in consultation with representatives of the treasury. Ultimately we bring forward to the cabinet defence committee a plan for the next year, and that is discussed at a good many meetings. They settle on a plan; then we go back and cost that plan, and having costed it put it forward to the defence committee again, and bring it on to the cabinet. Then it enters into the estimates.

That is the process followed in every country, as far as I know. It is very convenient to have it done under the heads of the navy, army and air force, each keeping their own figures, making their own estimates and looking after their own appropriations; and that is all done subject to tri-service co-operation and departmental control through the deputy minister. I know of no other country where it is so unified as in our case, where we have a single vote, a single deputy minister, a single minister and a single department.

Mr. Fulton: The only other question I think I will ask on this has to do with a comparison between the vote this year and last year. This shows here that the vote for 1950-51 was $60,000, but when I look at the estimates for last year under departmental administration, the only place where I can find figures for the corresponding item is under the sundries item, where it states that sundries including printing and stationery, et cetera, amounted to $186,637. Is that $60,000 the amount which was extracted from the $186,000 which was for printing?

Mr. Claxton: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Fulton: Is that an estimate or an actual expenditure?

Mr. Claxton: It is an estimate.

Mr. Fulton: Have you got the figure for the expenditure as yet?

Mr. Claxton: Not yet.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this $122,000, $51,500 is for civil defence or something along that line, which leaves $71,000. So far as I can make out that $71,000 was the expenditure for printing this report of the Department of National Defence, the odd white paper such as this one which was issued a short time ago, and the printing of a few thousand form letters which the minister sends out from time to time. It seems to me that is a great deal of money for these printing activities. Can the minister tell us what the actual cost of printing this report of the Department of National Defence was?

Mr. Claxton: That is done by the king's printer, and it would not cost very much. But the inspection services, for example, which have to provide technical specifications with regard to a great number of items would be provided for out of this item.

Mr. Harkness: This is for the printing of reports and other publications. From everything the minister said before, I have certainly understood it was to cover the cost of printing this report, these white papers and some form letters that he sends out from time to time. Surely, this does not cover inspection services of any sort.

Mr. Claxton: This is the ninth of the headings laid down by the treasury board for the uniform presentation of estimates to parliament. This is the first year this has been done, and we have conformed to the system laid down. This is item 9, and we have put under it items that the treasury told us should be put under that item.

Mr. Harkness: What are they, then, besides the actual printing of these reports?

Mr. Claxton: That is the printing for the department, not paid for by the navy, army or air force; the report, the circular letters; printing by the inspection services, and by the director of public relations for the department.

Mr. Green: Any speeches?

Mr. Claxton: None at all.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am still rather in the dark as to what these other items of printing are in addition to the reports and letters the minister has mentioned, as well as the odd white paper. What printing would be put out, so far as the administration branch is concerned, by those people he has mentioned?

Mr. Claxton: I shall be glad to get that information for you.

The Chairman: Shall the sub-item carry?

Mr. Harkness: Subject to this information being given.

Mr. Claxton: I shall open with a statement containing this information the next time the committee meets.

Sub-item agreed to.

Office stationery, supplies and equipment, $111,000.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Chairman, in connection with films, displays, advertising and other informational publicity—

Some hon. Members: No, it is office stationery.

Mr. Johnston: I am talking about the films, displays and advertising—

Mr. Fulton: On what page is that?

Mr. Johnston: I am on page 271.

Mr. Fulton: We are on page 269.

Sub-item agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall revert to legislation and take up Bill No. 198, an act to amend the Customs Act. It is in committee, and we have completed about half of it. Then, we shall take up Bill No. 293, an act respecting units of length and mass; then Bill No. 191, an act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; Bill No. 192, an act to amend the Petition of Right Act; Bill No. 338, an act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) to amend the Veterans Insurance Act; the bill respecting the Canada post office. If we were fortunate enough to be able to complete that business, I would move to go into supply and call three departments.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

INCREASE IN PRICES IN CAFETERIA—TEA AND COFFEE TO REMAIN AT FORMER PRICE

Mr. J. H. Rooney (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. May I congratulate you, sir, and the members of the parliamentary committee upon the prompt action that has been taken in rescinding the increase in the price of tea and coffee and allowing it to remain at five cents. The numerous letters and phone calls I have received prompt me to take this action. I speak, too, on behalf of those hundreds who would like to shake your hand and to say, "Sir, we thank you."

AIRPORTS—T.C.A.—LEASING OF PARKING SPACE

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Is parking space at T.C.A. airports leased to private operators who are permitted to charge a parking fee?

2. If so, what fee or charge?

3. Are uniform fees charged at all airports?

4. Are airport employees granted free parking space?

Mr. Benidickson:

1, 2 and 3. There are no Trans-Canada Air Lines airports. All airports at which Trans-Canada Air Lines make regular scheduled landings are operated by the Department of Transport, the Department of National Defence or municipalities.

It is presumed that the reference is to airports at which Trans-Canada Air Lines make regular scheduled stops.

Toronto, Ontario, (Malton) airport, is the only airport operated by this department at which there is, at present, an arrangement with a private operator for the operation of a car parking area.

Public tenders were called and eight applications received, that of Downtown Garages being the highest was accepted and a formal lease is being prepared. The terms are a basic rental of $4,800 per annum, payable $400 per month, plus 35 per cent of the gross revenue per month.

No stipulation is made as to what fees are to be charged by the operator. The charge at Toronto, at present, is 25 cents for eight hours.

4. Airport employees are granted free parking space.

WOOD ISLAND, P.E.I.—CARIBOU, N.S. FERRY SERVICE

Mr. McLure:

1. Was an application made to the government by the Northumberland Ferries Limited for assistance to provide new equipment to meet the demands for greater ferry service between Wood Island, Prince Edward Island, and Caribou, Nova Scotia?

2. If so, on what date?

3. What action, if any, has been taken on this request?

4. Has any decision been arrived at and if so, of what nature?

5. Who has the authority in Canada for decisions on such applications?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. Yes. An application was made to the Canadian maritime commission by the Northumberland Ferries Limited for an additional subsidy to purchase a new vessel for service between Wood Island and Caribou.

2. April 5, 1951.

3. Application has been investigated and considered and the applicant has been informed that it is not considered advisable to undertake the construction of a new ferry vessel at this time.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Under the Canadian Maritime Commission Act, the commission is charged with the responsibility of recommending the payment of subsidies.

UNITED NATIONS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION—MEMBERS OF OPPOSITION

Mr. Cruickshank:

1. When opposition members of parliament are selected as delegates to the United Nations, who selects them?
2. What duties and responsibilities have they as delegates at the United Nations?
3. Do they serve on committees? If so, have they voice and vote?
4. Have opposition members of parliament the right to initiate discussions and formulate policy?
5. Are they obliged to make any kind of report to the government when they return from a United Nations meeting?
6. What remuneration do they receive by way of (a) per diem allowance; (b) living allowance; (c) transportation allowance?

Mr. Lesage:

1. The government. At the time of the San Francisco conference it was decided that the Canadian delegation should be selected on an all-party basis. Accordingly, opposition members of parliament were appointed by the government, with the approval of the party leaders concerned, to serve in the capacity of delegates to the conference. In August, 1947, prior to the second session of the general assembly of the United Nations, the practice of designating opposition members as "delegates" was discontinued on the ground that it was unfair to place members of opposition parties in a position where they would appear to be acting as spokesmen for the government. From that time opposition members appointed to Canadian delegations have been designated as "parliamentary advisers" and have thus been absolved of any appearance of responsibility for the formulation or expression of Canadian policy. In accordance with this arrangement opposition members of parliament, selected by agreement with the party leaders concerned, have served as parliamentary advisers to the Canadian delegations to the second and fifth sessions of the general assembly in 1947 and 1950 respectively.

2. Their function is to observe the proceedings of the general assembly, to attend meetings of the Canadian delegation, and to convey to the chairman of the delegation such views as they may care to express on matters before the assembly.

3. They do not serve on committees and thus have no voice or vote.

4. They have the right to initiate and participate in informal discussions within the Canadian delegation, but the responsibility for the formulation of policy rests with the government.

5. No.

6. (a) Nil; (b) normal actual and reasonable hotel expenses, including meals; (c) first-class transportation to and from site of conference.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we wish to have this government notice of motion dropped, because the subject matter thereof is contained in the next government motion which appears on page 8 of today's routine proceedings.

RETURNED SOLDIERS INSURANCE ACT

PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BENEFICIARY RESTRICTIONS, APPORTIONMENT OF INSURANCE, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act for the following purposes:

To strike out from the act certain parts that no longer apply due to the fact that the time of taking out new contracts of insurance has expired;

To increase the amount of insurance moneys payable under the policy at the time of death of the insured;

To reduce to some extent administration difficulties now found in the act and to bring the act more in line with the Veterans Insurance Act in the matter of beneficiary restrictions and particularly in the manner of changing of beneficiaries and altering mode of apportionment of insurance;

To remove certain restrictions respecting the payment of insurance benefits to the estate of the insured; and

To waive premiums on life contracts when the insured reaches his eighty-fifth birthday.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA LANDS SURVEYS ACT

REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF DOMINION LANDS SURVEYS ACT—REMUNERATION OF BOARD OF EXAMINERS, ETC.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to repeal the Dominion Lands Surveys Act and to enact in substitution thereof the Canada Lands Surveys Act, a revision and consolidation of the former. Provision is made in the revised act for increased remuneration for the members of the board of examiners and the secretary of the board and for special examiners.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUESTION AS TO CLOSING OF HOSPITAL AT SASKATOON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question either to the Minister of National Defence or to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, to both of whom I have sent notice of the question. In view of the many representations that have been sent to the government by organizations in northern Saskatchewan and by individual members of parliament, are the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Veterans Affairs prepared to consider means of retaining the D.V.A. hospital at Saskatoon?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having sent me notice of his question. The decision which I announced on May 17, that the veterans hospital at Saskatoon would be closed owing to urgent requirements for the air force training plan, had been agreed to by a medical co-ordinating committee of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs. Since then a committee of medical officers of the services and the Department of Veterans Affairs has visited Saskatoon in the course of a study of hospital accommodation throughout the west and has made certain recommendations which are still under consideration by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, and by myself.

Representations have been received from veterans bodies and other groups, and I should like to give the assurance that the requirements of hospitalization for veterans will be given full weight in the consideration of this matter and in any decision arrived at.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR SHIPPING POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Announcements in the press of Saturday indicate that Canada and the other nations of the North Atlantic treaty organization have completed plans for a shipping pool in the event of war. Could the Minister of Transport give us some statement with regard to these plans?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): While the hon. member was kind enough to send me notice of his question, I have not yet had an opportunity of examining the press release to which he has referred. Since the matter is one of some importance concerning security, I think I had better look at the press report and then decide whether or not I should make a statement. If the hon. member will allow the matter to stand on that basis, perhaps I can do that within the next two or three days.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY ACT AND TO FACILITATE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act—Mr. McCann—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 4—Overpaid duties not returnable after six months.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I propose to have one of my colleagues move an amendment which will provide for a new section 125 of the act.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that section 4 of the bill be amended by deleting section 125 as set out therein and substituting therefor the following:

125. (1) Where it is established by a decision of the deputy minister, an order or finding of the tariff board or a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction that money, taken to account as duty, was paid under an erroneous construction of the law, no refund shall be made unless a written application therefor is made within six months of the date of payment, and in every other case of overpayment of duty or payment of duty in error, no refund shall be made unless an application therefor is made within two years of the date of payment.

(2) A written request for the review of a tariff classification, an appeal to the tariff board or the institution of legal proceedings for the recovery of an overpayment of duty or a payment of duty in error shall be deemed to be a written application for the purposes of subsection one.

(3) Nothing in subsection one or two shall affect or prejudice any refund pursuant to an application pending at the coming into force of this section.

Mr. McCann: We are moving the amendment in connection with subsection 1, because often there are claims made against the crown for a remission of taxes going back as far as three years. We believe that that right should not be extended when there is a change by reason of a finding of the tariff board, a decision of the minister, or a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. We believe that permission should be given to go back over entries for a period of six months, and if money is coming to people who have paid customs duty by reason of a change, then a remission or refund should be made there.

In other cases where there have been overpayment of duty as the result of an arithmetical error or something of that kind, the applicant shall have the privilege or right to go back for a period of two years in claiming that refund. We can readily understand that, by reason of judgments of the tariff board, there have been cases in which very considerable sums of money have been paid at a rate of duty which was higher because of the classification that the department made than the duty under the classsification made by the tariff board, and that there was money coming to certain people who had been importers. But then there arises the question who gets the benefit of the remission. The importer has likely charged up the original duty in his costs and added his profit to that. The goods have been sold to customers throughout the country, and when he gets a remission, especially if it goes back beyond a period of six months, he is getting a fortuitous gain to which we submit he is not entitled.

As an illustration I should like to mention something that happened fairly recently; it is an example of what occurs under the law as it now stands, and it will help to explain the point I have in mind. An importer took issue with a departmental ruling, and he went to considerable effort and some expense to appeal that decision to the tariff board. The departmental ruling was reversed by the board and the importer then became entitled to a refund. The company filing the claim covered three years' importations, involving a refund of slightly more than $100,000. Immediately following the announcement of the board's decision, twelve other importers, who were in no way parties to the appeal and who had not contested the department's ruling, filed claims also covering three years and varying from less than $100 to as much as $59,000. The total involved was $160,000. One importer claimed a refund of $59,290, a second $34,631.44, and two others $10,955 and $10,825 respectively. It is more than likely that these refunds remained in the hands of the claimants and were not passed on to the actual purchasers who had assumed the tax in their purchase price. Such a wide distribution would in any case be difficult for the importer to effect unless his records had been set up for such an eventuality. Furthermore there would be no obligation on him to do so, as the purchaser would have no legal right to claim any refund or any portion of the refund made to the importer, unless of course some such clause existed in the terms of sale, which would be most unusual.

As this is a typical example, it will be seen therefore that what actually happens is that a number of importers suddenly and sometimes most unexpectedly find themselves, owing to the separate action of another, with a right to reclaim taxes paid over a period of three years and to obtain a refund, which would be in effect a fortuitous additional profit. We do not collect duties short paid by reason of an error, unless we notify the importer within a month of the time that the error was made. We feel that we should not have to go back beyond six months for remissions to importers in the case of a change in the law, or beyond two years in the event of any error on our part.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Undoubtedly the amendment has eased the very stiff provision of section 4 of the amending bill as it stood, which I think was oppressive. In the first place, two years are now allowed in cases where payments are made by mistake. That of course was obviously necessary, because unless a man is following up his accounts month by month he might not discover the error in time. If by chance he is making his check at the end of the year he might find that the six months period had already elapsed. Subsection 2 of the amendment is also an aid, because it makes clear that a request for tariff classification and so on shall be deemed to be a written application for the purposes of subsection 1. I admit frankly that is an alleviation of the harshness of the original section; nevertheless I submit very earnestly to the minister that the reasons he has given for making this most substantial change from the three years in the original section are inadequate, and I suggest that it is creating an unnecessary hardship. The minister may say that six months is long enough. You might say that six months is long enough for an individual; nevertheless ordinary debts remain collectible within a period of six years. In our ordinary relations the usual limitation is six years. The government cut it down to three years, and now they propose in certain cases to cut it down to six months.

I suggest that the minister has given very inadequate reasons. In the first place I repudiate the idea that this section is being passed in order to prevent sharp practice, or something almost worse than sharp practice, on the part of certain businessmen. That seemed to be the argument. I think one thing we can trust our government to do is to be hard enough on individual citizens. There was a case brought up the other day by the hon. member for Eglinton where it seemed to me the government department had been unnecessarily hard. Be that as it may, I still submit that to cut in two, namely to three years, the time which ordinary people are allowed in their transactions with each other is going quite far enough. I submit that the cases which the minister has given, if I understood them correctly, do not suggest any loss on the part of the government. Indeed the minister referred rather slightingly to a man exercising a right which had been in existence for more than six months. If it is a right, what is wrong about exercising a right? Nevertheless it almost seemed as if the minister were asking us to take the view that of course no reasonable man would think that anyone should exercise a right after the six months period had elapsed.

I understand that the present period was itself a reduction from a longer period. I do not know how long ago that was. But I am told that the original period used to be even longer than three years, that it was six or seven years. If I am wrong the minister will correct me. At any rate, that is as it may be; I am basing my argument on the three years. I am suggesting to the minister that nothing he has said shows that the public interest is suffering; therefore there is no need for this change, and I still hope that the minister may be prepared to withdraw the section.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, when I read the amendment first proposed I thought it was pretty harsh. The amendment introduced this afternoon certainly makes it much better than what was contained in the bill as originally introduced. Still I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Greenwood to this extent, that the reduction from three years to six months in the one case is very substantial, and it seems to me that "erroneous construction of the law" would mean that it was really an error on the part of the department itself. I believe a period longer than six months should be allowed within which the importer should be permitted to make an application. I am wondering if the minister would increase that period to one year, leaving the two years in the other case. I believe that would be much more satisfactory; for it seems to me six months is pretty harsh. I imagine that in some businesses a mistake of this kind might not be discovered until, perhaps, there was some inquiry into the affairs of the company by accountants.

Mr. McCann: All the judgments and changes are published.

Mr. Coldwell: It refers to a decision of the deputy minister, an order or finding of the tariff board, or the judgment of a court. So far as a judgment of the court is concerned, I suppose that might be considered conclusive, and even a judgment of the tariff board; but the decision of the deputy minister, in the first instance, means a decision of the officials administering the act, and it seems to me that is a little too much like a judge and jury coming to a decision without giving the other party an adequate chance to make an appeal. So far as a judgment of a court or of the tariff board is concerned, of course that would be carefully gone into and both sides heard. I am referring to the decision of the deputy minister, and in that particular instance it seems to me the period should be longer.

Mr. McCann: I hardly think the hon. member for Greenwood is being fair when he says I referred rather slightingly to some of the cases that have come under this section; however, we will let that pass. There cannot be any injustice done to anyone, because in the great majority of cases the limitation will result in no hardship on the importer, and where any hardship does occur the governor in council may provide just relief by a refund under section 33 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

As to the decision by the deputy minister, any such decision would be made known to importers throughout the country. The judgment of a court is published; the tariff board is equivalent to a court and all its judgments are published. So it is not a question of taking advantage of anyone or inflicting a hardship on anyone, but I believe the revenues of the crown should be protected to the extent that no one should make a fortuitous gain by going back two or three years. In the case I cited, the customer got no relief, but somebody made a good deal of money.

I do not know that I can accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood that the period be extended to one year. This matter has been given careful consideration by the cabinet, and the amendment that was decided upon is the amendment now proposed.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): One point has occurred to me that I should like to raise; it is a matter of draftsmanship. Subsection 2 says:

> A written request for the review of a tariff classification, an appeal to the tariff board or the institution of legal proceedings . . . shall be deemed to be a written application . . .

That seems to make it perfectly clear that at the worst the importer is bound to know what is going on, because he will have made an appeal himself. I am troubled about subsection 1, however, where it says, "Where it is established by a decision of the deputy minister". Is it not possible that in that case there might be a decision to which the importer might not be a party in the sense that he was notified of it? And is it not conceivable that in such a case he would not get effective actual notice of it, and that the six months might slip away before he learned of it?

Mr. McCann: Usually these matters are not confined to one person. On representations being made by an importer that he is going to make an appeal, our office usually notifies all other importers in a similar line of business.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That would be an appeal to whom?

Mr. McCann: An appeal to the minister, or it may be brought before the tariff board. In this instance if he is making an appeal for remission of customs duties it is probably on the basis that the law has been changed by the tariff board to the extent that the goods he imported were wrongly classified and should be under another item on which the customs tariff is lower, so that having paid the higher rate he would be entitled to a refund. We say if he makes application for refund within a period of six months he comes within the law and is entitled to a remission.

Mr. Drew: I realize that, as the minister has said, this is a decision of the cabinet, and for that reason he proposes to stand by the amendment now before us. I would point out, however, that the reduction in time in this instance is very substantial. It is not a reduction from three years to two years or to one year; it is a reduction from three years to six months, or only one-sixth the time that was previously given. It does seem to me that if over the years three years was regarded as a satisfactory time, conclusive reasons should be given before an amendment is adopted which might very easily deprive some company or individual of a substantial sum of money because, acting in perfectly good faith, they did not know they were entitled to it and failed to give notice. The minister has said the cabinet has decided, but after all I assume the cabinet decides on all these bills that are brought before us.

I urge the minister to reconsider his decision, or in any event to give us a positive and clear example by specific reference which would indicate the reason for such a substantial reduction. It may well be that those on this side of the house discussing this matter cannot give specific cases in which they think hardship would arise. In the very nature of things that information is not available to them. Before an existing legal right is taken away in this manner we should have much more information than is before us at the present time.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to supplement one thing that was said with respect to subsection 1. The fact is that many cases are test cases, and frequently people who are contemplating appeals will not themselves initiate those proceedings if they know someone else has taken that action, because they are waiting to see what happens. It is a proper and recognized form of procedure to await the outcome of some other case. Now, the likelihood is that proceedings before the tariff board or negotiations with the deputy minister—particularly the proceedings before the tariff board or an appeal to a court—will occupy all the six months before a decision is rendered. This would have the effect of precluding those who were awaiting the outcome of the test case from making any application, because the six months would have run out. The six months runs from the time of payment, not from the time of the decision being rendered. I would strongly urge, therefore, there is good ground for suggesting that the period be not reduced so substantially, that it be not reduced from three years to six months but that the minimum time should be one year.

I should like to take up another point dealing with subsection 3 of the amendment, which reads as follows:

> Nothing in subsection one or two shall affect or prejudice any refund pursuant to an application pending at the coming into force of this section.

I can appreciate the purpose of this section, and I agree with it. I wonder, however, whether it is completely clear, since you have now changed the definition of the application, making it necessary for the application to be in writing. Then, in subsection 2 you say what shall be deemed to be a written application. Is it sufficiently clear what is meant by subsection 3, that is whether any form of application will be sufficient to bring it within subsection 3, or whether it must now be an application in the form referred to in subsection 2?

Mr. McCann: Subsection 3 means that any applications that have been made to date, whether written or verbal, are not ruled out.

Mr. Fulton: What about the point with respect to the suggestion that the waiting period be six months from the date of the decision, or else a year from the date of the payment?

Mr. McCann: Those cases would be given consideration, and in the event of undue hardship an application can still be made for a remission. Under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, that remission could be made. I may say that in practice it is not the minister or the deputy minister who makes the remissions. They make a recommendation, and the recommendation goes to the treasury board; then the remissions are made by order in council. I submit, therefore, that the interests of all taxpayers and citizens who are importers are amply protected by the present provision.

Mr. Fulton: But treasury board could not give effect to a recommendation from the minister if the statute contained the six months' limitation. Surely the treasury board could not take compassion upon someone and give him a refund if more than six months had elapsed before he made his application. I am not clear on that, but my first impression would be that even treasury board could not override a statute.

Mr. McCann: If it were a case of undue hardship—I am not saying they could override the statute—a remission could still be made.

Mr. Hatfield: I want to give an example of a situation in which this section would work a hardship. In 1948 a company of mine imported a production machine from the United States. The duty on it was a substantial amount, and there was about $400 sales tax assessed against that machine. In talking about the price of the machine a year afterwards, I recalled an amendment going through this house to the effect that a production machine was free from sales tax. I took up the matter with the authorities, and we secured a refund. If the tariff board make a mistake, does it ever make a refund without an application? If this provision had been in effect at that time, we would never have secured the refund.

Mr. McCann: The tariff board has nothing to do with refunds. It may direct one, or, by virtue of its decision, may put an importer in the position where he is entitled to a refund.

Mr. Fulton: I do not wish to cross-examine the minister too closely on a question of law, because I know it is not proper to do that in the committee. As a result of an answer the minister just gave, I am a bit concerned about this matter. As I said a moment ago, I am interested in a test case, and others are perhaps awaiting the outcome of the test case before making an application in the normal way. As I see it, the amendment in its present form—since most of these cases would take six months to be decided—would preclude those who were awaiting the outcome of that case from making an application for a refund. The minister has said that in case of hardship, on the recommendation of the minister or deputy minister, the treasury board may pass an order in council providing that a refund shall be made. At first sight, that would appear to take care of the type of case to which I have referred. On the other hand I should be quite surprised if, in the face of what will now be a specific provision in the act, the treasury board could in fact have such an order in council passed unless there is a general provision in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. I should like to ask the minister whether there is a section in that act which says that, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act, in cases of hardship the treasury board may pass such an order in council.

Mr. McCann: There is a general provision of that kind. So far as the matter of notification is concerned, all the party has to do is write a letter to the department and indicate that he proposes to appeal pending the decission of the tariff board.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The more I think about this six months' period, the more it seems to me the possibilities for great unfairness are substantial. We all admit there has to be some limit. We cannot have things outstanding for ever, but this provision would cut the time down to one-sixth. Let us consider what may happen. A man pays his rate, and he is not very well satisfied. The amount involved may not be very large, and after all there are always expenses in connection with making applications. As a matter of fact, he does not make an application. Other applications along the same line have been made, and his six months expires on a certain day. The day after the six months have expired, a ruling is made which makes it quite clear that if it had been made two days earlier he would have been entitled to a refund.

If I followed the minister, he had the feeling that that was wrong—I want to be fair in what I am saying. The minister seemed to think it was unjust to the public that other people should come in, if I interpreted him correctly.

Mr. McCann: I was just describing an incident.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Very well, but I shall put my own interpretation on it, and the minister can alter it. It seems to me that to cut this down to six months is very harsh and oppressive. Six months sounds like a long time, but we all know that in business it can be a short time. Various things may happen and it may be difficult to reach a decision, particularly perhaps if the amounts involved are small, or perhaps if they are large. I suggest that the very greatest kind of hardship can arise if I have described the situation correctly. Here is a man who is in doubt. He lets the six months period elapse, and the very next day it turns out that he did have a right which is now established by the action of somebody else. I take it that the minister will say: Why should he profit by the action of somebody else? I think he should profit by being entitled to have his rights, according to what the law is now determined to be.

I now come back to the question of what is reasonable. I do not suggest that it should be ten years or twenty years. We all know that there must come a time when things are finished. But I suggest that three years was not an excessive time, and I suggest that one-sixth of three years is a very short and unfair time.

May I just say this also. I tried to listen carefully to what the minister said, and I did not observe any suggestion of any kind that there was any loss or hardship being suffered by the government. It did not seem to me that the minister made any case for this proposal. The more I think about it, the more it seems to me to be harsh, oppressive and unnecessary.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, just let us compare the two procedures. If we find that there has been an error in the matter of paying customs duty, we go back not more than a month and attempt to collect where there was an error; it may be an error in computation, or it may be an error in classification. We go back a month. We allow the importer to go back six times that amount. We allow him to go back six months; and if he makes a written application within that time, his case for remission will be considered. If you are going into multiplication tables, one is six times the other; and the six months that we propose now, in comparison with the former length of time of three years, is just the same thing, namely six times.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister will not wring any tears out of me by that sad story. In the first place, I am not commenting on the decision to make it a month, whether it should be that long or shorter. I am not commenting at all on that matter. All I am saying is that the minister and the department have a purse which is limited only by the pockets of the people of Canada, whereas to the subject, to the man who is at the other end of the line, this may be a matter of vast importance. The department has thousands and thousands of cases, and they average out. The government, I presume and hope, have made a wise decision in adopting the month's limit, but that does not seem to me to have any bearing on this matter at all. It is a question of what is fair between the crown and the subject, to use those old-fashioned words. I again suggest that cutting this period down to six months is harsh, unnecessary and—I had a third word.

Mr. McCann: I know of no instance in which it has ever been passed on to the consumer. It is a gratuitous gain for the importer. He has added it on to his costs. Probably he has disposed of the goods in that length of time; when he makes an appeal he gets the money by reason of the change and in no instance that I know of has that money ever been passed on to the ultimate user of the imported article.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have two comments to make on that, with great respect. First of all, that is none of the minister's business. He is not the keeper of the consciences of the importers; I hope their consciences are good. Nevertheless that has nothing to do with the legislation, and the fact that the minister introduces it convinces me more strongly than ever that this has been decided on an unsound basis. It is irrelevant.

The second thing is this. The minister says: I know of no cases. To me that is not very effective evidence at all. I am sorry he said it, because it implies that there are no cases. He does not know, and he cannot know. But I repeat that as a reason for cutting down this three years it is utterly irrelevant and, what is worse than that, it is improper.

Mr. Gibson: I am just wondering about this amendment. I will be specific with the minister. As he knows, we are having a little bit of difficulty out in British Columbia on this interpretation of tariff item 411a as applicable to logging trucks. I am wondering if this six months period will be sufficient, by the time the matter has been taken to the tariff board and a decision has been arrived at. For instance, if you collect higher duties on tires and on some logging trucks for a period longer than six months before we actually get a decision from the tariff board—I understand the case will be up on June 12—I am wondering if six months will take it back; I do not believe it will. I think there will be some proper claim that will go back a great deal longer than six months.

Mr. McCann: The matter to which my hon. friend refers is now before the tariff board and will be heard. It was not initiated by the importers; it was initiated by the department.

Mr. Gibson: Yes, of course, by the department. We were going along very well out there on the interpretation that the department originally put on it. Then, I suppose unquestionably because of abuses by some section of the industry—I can appreciate the position of the minister and the department—we suddenly find that the interpretation has been changed and they now charge duty under a different item. I am wondering if a six months period is sufficient for us if the tariff board, for instance, rules that the present decision of the Department of National Revenue is wrong. If the tariff board rules in that way, will this six months give us a chance to collect moneys that have been paid?

Mr. McCann: I think subsection 3 covers that. It says:

(3) Nothing in subsection one or two shall affect or prejudice any refund pursuant to an application pending at the coming into force of this section.

If the importers in that instance would notify the department that, pending the decision of the tariff board, they proposed to give notice or to make application for remission should there be a change, that will be sufficient to protect them.

Mr. Gibson: Yes; but he would have to do that on his own initiative.

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Gibson: I am quite certain that there are some small loggers out in British Columbia who may have bought trucks under this provision and who, if a new schedule is determined by your department, will say: Well, I guess we got hooked for it. They do not read the papers closely. I am concerned about this question whether, if they have paid the higher duties, the six months period will be sufficient.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister is quite right when he says that all importers are informed about tariff hearings. Suppose the tariff board brings out a case where another importer has paid too much duty and the goods in question had been imported a year before; what happens in that case?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. McCann: He would not get the refund.

Mr. Hatfield: The man who made the appeal would get it. Why should not the fellow also get it who had made importations previously?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Because the six months have gone.

Mr. Hatfield: The six months have gone, yes. But that is not fair.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

Mr. Hatfield: Another thing the minister said was that if they collect less duty than they are required to collect according to the regulations, they do not go back any further than one month. I know of a case in which they went back two years.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, let me explain that. The hon. member says we go back two years. That has been in the case of fraud.

Mr. Hatfield: No, it was not a case of fraud.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to point out to the minister that he still has not answered my two questions. He has not given me any satisfaction with regard to my question whether the public is suffering any real loss or hardship. The other thing I want to point out is that he has not answered my suggestion which I will put in this way. In a way we are here under a misapprehension. This is not an act to amend the Customs Act. It is an act for the punishment of the Canadian importer. That is practically what the minister said. He suggests that he does not know of cases in which the importer has turned back the money. Indeed, he was generous enough to say that in certain cases it might be difficult for him to do so. Nevertheless the minister gives as a reason for this proposal the strangest reason I have ever heard given in connection with the Customs Act, namely, that some people were making improper profits. He is going to condone them so long as they are made within six months, but he feels that those over six months have some special delinquency attached to them. I still maintain that this is being put forward on an unsound basis, and that the basis of six months is unfair.

Mr. Gibson: There must be some difference between capital and consumer goods. I can understand that a tank car of vegetable oil would be considered as consumer goods. But anyone who paid $20,000 or $30,000 for a logging truck would have a long memory in the matter, and would know that he paid 10 per cent, 12½ per cent or 17 per cent as the case may be.

Mr. McCann: In capital goods, where there would be a hardship they would be taken care of by way of application for remission under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have heard the minister's explanation, but I should like to know the actual reason for reducing the period of three years down to six months. Is it to benefit the department at the expense of the individual, or what is the real or primary purpose? What harm was done when the period was three years, when there was an erroneous construction of the law and payment was made as a consequence of that erroneous construction? What possible harm could there be in continuing the period of three years?

Mr. McCann: My answer is that there is a loss of revenue to all the people of Canada in favour of a return of revenue to a few who have been in that position. In order to promote good business methods, I do not think it is proper that we should have to go back over a period of three years. I do not know of any private concern or insurance company that would go back that far.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is six years.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. I want to take up a word the minister has just used. The reason he gives now is somewhat different. He says now that there is a loss to the people of Canada and a gain to some Canadian citizens. But apparently there is no suggestion in his mind that this money which presumably will be recovered is money to which they have a right. Apparently we are asked to pass a measure so that the people of Canada as a whole may be able to oppress those who otherwise would have a right. As I said a moment ago, we do not suggest it should be ten or twenty or fifty years, but we do suggest that three years is a short time. When we owe debts to each other they are not outlawed for six years, yet we are asked to outlaw this in six months. I say that three years was a more reasonable figure—you were much more reasonable in 1927 than now.

Mr. Drew: It seems to me that the nub of the argument made by the minister in favour of the amendment is that someone, or some people as a result of their business practice, might benefit by the fact that they would recover money which they would not pass on to someone else. There does not seem to be any other reason—because surely the government cannot complain if it is called upon to pay back what has been improperly charged.

Nothing can be payable, under the existing requirement which limits the time within which it will be paid to three years, unless there is in fact something owing as the result of a charge having been improperly made. An amendment to the Customs Act should not simply be something to relieve the government from its own mistakes, and this is what this amounts to, as it is put before us today.

While I am not suggesting that we continue this argument to the extent that the argument was continued in regard to relief of another kind to which reference was made in the house recently, I urge that we should not accept too lightly the contention that, merely because something may be done which would give to certain people a benefit they had not expected, we should deny anyone his legal rights within a sensible or reasonable time.

The minister has said that no ordinary or private business would be called upon to make a payment of this kind. The statute of limitations makes the individual liable for a period of six years. The three years now in this act is half of the period applying to a private individual; and I submit nothing has been put before the committee to show why it should be reduced to one-sixth of that time simply because of a speculative possibility that someone may gain some benefit that he would not pass on to someone else.

There is another point which comes before us at the moment, one which should not be forgotten. No doubt the minister heard what was said in the house a few days ago in another matter, upon which occasion a very clear statement was made that an amendment to an act would not have the effect of denying any legal right to anyone. It was explained to us in some detail that some legal rights had been in fact denied. The answer by the government was to the effect that it was quite possible for the opposition to have known that the effect of the bill then under consideration would be to deny such rights, in spite of the assurance that was given. I understand clearly the argument that is put forward now, but in view of the fact that reference was made in some detail only a few days ago to another case in which an amendment became operative in a way which was not fully disclosed at the time, we should be assured on this occasion that there is no case within the knowledge of the government at the moment in which legal rights would be denied because of this suggested change.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister's argument so far has referred to goods imported for resale. What about capital goods?

Mr. McCann: I answered that.

Mr. Hatfield: Does it affect capital goods?

Mr. McCann: I answered that in reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Where a hardship or injustice might result in connection with capital goods, an application would be accepted.

Mr. Hatfield: But the measure does not say so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Suppose at this date a case comes within the provisions of section 125 as now constituted. A person has a right within a period of three years to make application for refund. In effect, does not this amendment deny the existing right?

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to see anything indicating that it does not. For, unless there is something to the contrary, it applies to all cases after this date. It applies to all who are in the position of having a right to apply for refund. In order to remove all doubt in this connection, and to show that the government is not intending to penalize some who at the present time have rights, it should be clearly stated that in no way is it to be applicable to cases now in existence.

As a matter of fact I doubt whether anyone could raise a dissent. Let us suppose there is a person who today is in the position of being within the three-year period. Then the amendment comes into effect in the suggested form. Is it substantive law or is it procedural?

Mr. McCann: If application has already been made it would come within the law as it stood.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But if application had not been made, what happens then? They are still within the period of two and one-half years. Under the law as it is constituted today they are in position where they can make application, but this amendment will have the effect of depriving them of rights which they have had for the past two and a half years.

Mr. McCann: It would terminate their rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That being so, this would appear to be a most dangerous piece of legislation because it in effect takes away rights that individuals have at this date which are constituted rights and which entitle them to a refund. If there is to be a change in the period from three years to six months it should not cover those who today are within the three-year period under the law as it is now constituted. Otherwise it would be a confiscation of the rights of individuals affected thereby. That is going a long way. As I see it, such a section should not be passed by parliament. If there are reasons other than those already given for so abruptly changing the period from three years to six months, they should be stated.

I suggest to the minister that there be an additional subsection in section 125, or in some similar section, to the effect that these changes do not apply to any rights at present accrued, whether or not notice thereof has been given. As a matter of fact this section could easily be got around by a person giving notice, whether he believes he is entitled to pay the duty or not. By making application for a refund, that would be the end of it. The result would be a lot more work because you would have applications from everybody. At the time they paid the duty, whether they believed they were liable or not, they would simply notify you on the chance that some day they might have an opportunity of getting a refund. They would simply give you notice at the time they made the payment. Would the minister not agree to that amendment? As he says, this amendment is necessary administratively, but I suggest that it should not interfere in any way with the rights of persons as of this date under the original section 125.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Whether we are right or wrong, I think the minister will admit that we are in earnest about this matter. The minister has introduced an amendment to remedy what I think we all realize was most oppressive. Will he not let this section stand? Serious suggestions have been made and I would hope the minister would be prepared to let the section stand so that he can take another look at it. I think he realizes that the arguments we have raised are not trivial and I suggest that it might be allowed to stand.

Mr. Hatfield: The minister has admitted that it is a hardship on the importer of capital goods. Would he be willing to change the amendment so that applications with respect to capital goods could still be made in the three-year period?

Mr. McCann: I do not think that I have admitted it is a hardship. In the case of hardship, consideration would be given. Capital goods could be imported and offered for resale in a short time.

Mr. Hatfield: Why not change the amendment? Will the amendment have an effect on drawbacks?

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Hatfield: What is the period allowed for drawbacks?

Mr. McCann: I am informed it is two years.

Mr. Hatfield: It would have an effect on drawbacks.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am still waiting for an answer from the minister.

Mr. McCann: We propose to allow the amendment to stand as indicated.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. McLure: It seems to me that this amendment is brought in just to benefit the department. How much money does the department expect will be saved by changing the period from three years to six months? There is going to be a loss to the importer. How much loss is there going to be and how much does the department expect to make out of this drastic amendment?

Mr. McCann: There is no way of estimating the amount.

Mr. Drew: We are being asked to pass this bill to reduce a long-standing legal right, in fact to wipe out a long-standing legal right simply on the general statement that it will be of benefit to the department from an administrative point of view and will prevent certain fortuitous profits. We are now told by the minister that he cannot indicate the measure of saving that will come to the government as a result of this. It seems to me that this is a most improper way of doing it. Having regard to the fact that the minister has already given consideration to this matter and that the amendment does appear to be objected to, I suggest that the section should be allowed to stand, if necessary until later in the day, so that the law officers in consultation with the departmental officials may have a chance to consider the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. McCann: No one could estimate the revenue that would be involved in a thing like this. No one can estimate the appeals that will be made to the tariff board and what judgments will be given. It is an absolute impossibility for anybody to know the amount of money that would be involved. I may say that this amendment has been given most serious consideration over a long period of time and has been discussed with competent people in the department and in the government. We feel that to protect the revenue of the crown a period of six months is sufficient in which to give notification that an appeal for remission will be made.

Mr. McLure: Has it been discussed with any of the large importers of this country? Were they taken into the discussions?

Mr. McCann: Yes. We have had no objections from importers.

Mr. McLure: I asked the minister whether they had been taken into consideration. Did you bring them into your discussions in order to get information from them? They certainly would not object if they did not know this was coming up.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister says that they have had no objection from importers, but will he say that there have been no objections on behalf of importers? My understanding is that definite representations have been made to the minister.

Mr. McCann: I think my hon. friend is correct in that. What I meant was that there have been no objections by individuals. We have had some correspondence with the association.

Mr. Gibson: Why could not the tariff schedule list what items are capital items and what items are consumer items? It could be made relatively simple. Frankly I am appalled at the far-reaching decisions it is possible for the deputy minister to make. I must say that they are always made with great courtesy and in a kindly way by the people in the department. I am appalled as a matter of fact at the extent of the powers they possess and the amount of money that is involved. They make these decisions. You can appeal if you wish but the decision is made, and it becomes a question of being forced to law if you want to change it. Therefore on the whole people usually accept it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly the minister may be able to help the committee by giving the number of decisions made by the deputy minister since the first of January, 1950, with respect to payments of duty having been made under an erroneous construction of law. How many orders of the tariff board and how many judgments of courts have there been? Those figures would be available. Since the first of January, 1950, how many cases have fallen in the categories covered by the amendment? I should like, first, decisions of the deputy minister; second, orders of the tariff board; and third, judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. McCann: I cannot give that answer offhand. As to the number of cases there have been, in the ordinary course of events there are cases by reason of decisions of the minister, of the tariff board, or judgments of courts. We do not keep a record of the number. I have no record of the number.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, this department must have such records. The minister has not, but his officials are before him. Let me put it this way. Have they got this information? How much has been paid by way of refunds under the old section 125 since the first of January, 1950?

Mr. McCann: We have that record, but I have not got it with me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Both the numbers and the amount would furnish the committee with information, because this has all the appearances of something being hidden.

Mr. McCann: Refund claims for the fiscal year 1950-51 involving overpayment of customs duties amounted to $7,500,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many cases did that cover?

Mr. McCann: I do not know.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have the officials not got that?

Mr. McCann: I will try to have the answer for that when the estimates of the department are being considered.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. I do not mind the matter standing until the information is given. In order to arrive at the total the officials must have the number of cases.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I submit to the minister that the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre is entirely relevant to what we are considering now. I think his question goes to the very root of the matter because it gives us an idea of the amounts involved, and I think $7,500,000 is worth talking about.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

Mr. Hatfield: I have a case right now where I have paid 25 per cent duty on a piece of machinery. I contend the duty is 25 per cent if it is made in Canada. I paid 25 per cent duty on that piece of machinery.

If it is not manufactured in Canada the duty is only 10 per cent. There are hundreds of items in the tariff where if the goods are not manufactured in Canada they carry a 10 per cent duty and if they are manufactured in Canada the duty is 25 per cent. How long is it going to take to prove to the customs department that it is not manufactured in Canada? I do not know how long it is going to take me. I may have to appeal to the tariff board.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No. Have these officials not got information as to the number of cases in these various categories?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): He told you he did not have the information.

Mr. McCann: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If they have not got it, it is a pretty funny thing because the minister says they have been discussing this matter for a long time and—

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that this is the product of much thought and consideration. If it is, then certainly the information is available.

Mr. McCann: We were discussing the principle involved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to know why this change is being made destroying constituted rights.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

The Chairman: Those in favour of clause 4 as amended carrying?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman, clause 4 is not going to carry yet because I think we must have some reason why we cannot have this relevant information. They could not have decided this matter in a vacuum, and when they had these substantial figures—

An hon. Member: I am not so sure about that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You may be right. At any rate they cannot ask us to decide it in a vacuum. The hon. member for Lake Centre has asked for information which is relevant. We have got a figure of $7,500,000. It is very relevant to know whether fifty or five thousand people were involved. I hope it is relevant not merely to people who sit on this side of the house. I think we should have that figure and if we cannot have the information the clause should stand until we get it.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Mr. Drew: No. Two other questions were asked. I must confess that I find it difficult to imagine that, with the long consideration that was given to this matter, no one thought of asking the officials how many cases would be affected. Even if that is so, there are still two other questions. Questions have been asked as to the number of decisions by the tariff board and by courts of competent jurisdiction. May I ask the minister if he knows the number of cases where decisions of that kind were made by the tariff board or by courts of competent jurisdiction?

Mr. McCann: No, I cannot answer that question. I do not know the number.

Mr. Drew: I think an attempt has been made to keep this argument on a very moderate basis, but it seems that we are not to be given even a summary of the minimum of information that the government must have required before it reached a decision of this kind. Subject only to terms of cabinet secrecy and otherwise, I submit that the house before passing a law of this kind is entitled to a summary of the basic facts which led the government to reach a decision of this kind. I can only say that if the government reached such a decision with as little information as has been disclosed to the house, then every member of the house should be alarmed at the way the government reaches its decisions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Question.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Public Works is asking for questions. I have a question.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They are not always serious.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to know from the minister why he does not think it would be just and fair and quite workable to follow up the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre with regard to the provision that this amendment will not take away established rights. If the minister does not accept our argument that six months is too short, and he has not accepted it, would he not accept the proposition that people who at the present time have the right to make application up to three years from the date of payment should not have that right taken away from them, that the time might be limited to six months in the future, but that there should be a very simple addition to the effect that the amendment will not abridge the right established now to the three years time in the case of those who have already paid? It seems to me that a simple way to put that into words would be that this amendment shall not affect the rights of anyone with respect to claims for refunds of duty already paid before this amendment comes into force. That would limit it clearly to payments made before the amendment comes into force.

Mr. Drew: Since the minister is not answering that question, will he give this house the unqualified assurance that the proposed amendment is not designed to avoid the results of any decision of which this house has not yet been informed?

Mr. McCann: I do not quite understand that question. Would the hon. member repeat it?

Mr. Drew: Will the minister give the members of this committee his unqualified assurance that the purpose of this amendment is not to deny legal rights resulting from any decision of which this house has not yet been informed?

Mr. McCann: Yes, I can give that assurance, that it was not done designedly for that purpose.

Mr. Fulton: Might it accidentally have that result?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fulton: I thought the minister was consulting with his officials to get the material necessary to answer the last question. I took it that he intended to answer it, and I would appreciate it if he would answer the suggestion I made just before the leader of the opposition spoke.

Mr. McCann: I cannot give the hon. member for Kamloops any assurance to that effect. We do not know what people are considering by way of appeals, and we are not prepared to go back beyond six months from the date of application.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think the minister understood; I am sorry if I did not make myself clear. The government now takes the position that all applications for refund must be made within six months of the date of payment. While we on this side do not agree, let us accept for the sake of argument that this is going to be the law from now on, and that any claim for refund must be made within six months. Up to the moment this amendment becomes law there is the right to make application for refund within three years from the date of payment. My suggestion is simply that today a man who paid duty six months ago has another two and a half years within which he may file his application. Instead of taking that right away from somebody in whose favour it exists at the moment, why not by a very simple addition to the amendment provide that this amendment shall not abridge rights now in existence with respect to claims for the refund of duty already paid?

Mr. McCann: We do not accept that position.

Mr. Fulton: I was only asking the minister, so we could see the force of the position, whether he would be kind enough to tell us why the government cannot accept that suggestion, which seems so logical and reasonable.

Mr. McCann: It would have the effect of postponing the application of this amendment for a period of three years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What the minister has said simply amounts to this, that in order to facilitate the administration of this legislation parliament is asked to pass a law that has the effect of confiscating the rights of individuals, and that is a serious thing.

Mr. McCann: We are not confiscating anybody's rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what one calls administrative lawlessness, interference with and destruction of the presently existing rights of the individual. I cannot understand why the minister, who is usually so reasonable about everything, cannot realize how dangerous legislation such as this may be. I have my rights under the law. Those rights are fixed under section 125. Parliament is now asked to say that my rights shall be terminated because some administrative officials do not like the law as it now stands. No reasons are given, no statistics, no information as to the number of cases. We are simply asked to say that rights now in existence are to be wiped out. We do not know whether any people have these rights. We have no information as to the number of decisions of the deputy minister, of courts of law or of the tariff board which might affect the rights of individuals. I suggest that parliament should not be asked to give blanket power to destroy vested and inherent rights now in existence without far more reason than has been given. I would have liked the minister to give the number of cases that might conceivably be affected by this most drastic provision. It is simple; it looks innocuous; in fact it means that parliament is asked to abrogate, abridge and actually destroy existing rights.

I for one am not satisfied to accept that. I ask the minister whether he will not consent to a simple amendment which will provide that this change in the law will not affect constituted rights under the law as of this date.

The Chairman: Shall section 4 as amended carry?

Mr. Low: No, Mr. Chairman. I should like to know what the Minister of Justice thinks about this clause. He has been listening to this argument, as I have, and he must have a definite opinion on it. Could we have his views?

Mr. Garson: I am afraid my views would not be worth a great deal. This is a matter of tariff law policy and no legal problem is involved, as I think all lawyers in the committee will agree.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is just rights or no rights.

Mr. MacInnis: I hesitate to take any part in this discussion, but I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Kamloops is most reasonable. I say that because the hon. member for Melfort and I were putting our legal heads together a little while ago and we came to a somewhat similar conclusion. I think what we want to do here is protect the person who had a transaction before this amendment came into effect. I think that would be the idea, going beyond the application itself to a transaction in respect of which an application might be made later. It seems to me the amendment might be made to read something like this: "Nothing in subsection one or two shall affect or prejudice any refund pursuant to a transaction which took place before this act came into effect." It seems to me that would not be detrimental to the interests of the country and would protect the just claims of persons who might be affected in this way.

Mr. McCann: I would be prepared to accept an amendment which might meet the objections that have been raised to this section, to the effect that it shall come into effect six months after the passing of the bill. That would be equivalent to giving the importers six months' notice of this change. Perhaps that would be a compromise that would be fairer to the public than what we have at present.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not go too far, but it does give those whose rights would be adversely affected notice that they have a period of six months within which to protect their rights. To me that covers the situation. It gives notice, and it does not summarily confiscate rights that exist. I believe that is a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. McCann: My colleague, the Minister of Justice, will move that amendment.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I would move:

That clause 4 of this bill be amended by adding thereto as subclause (2) the following:

"(2) This section shall come into force six months after this act comes into force."

The Chairman: Shall this amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Penalty for practising without a licence.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, section 5 creates an offence if any person attempts to transact business as a custom-house broker. I do not find anywhere a definition of a custom-house broker. Supposing I went down and tried to get an article from the customs department, would I be holding myself out as a custom-house broker?

Mr. McCann: Any private individual has a right to go to the custom house, claim his own goods and pay the duty on it. What are known as custom-house brokers are agents who act for importers, and who are licensed by a board set up by the department.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is there a definition of a custom-house broker, so that it is clear when it is being infringed and when it is not? Supposing I go down, not to get my own goods, but to get goods for the member for Peace River.

Mr. Low: And I agree to pay you fifty cents.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We will say twenty-five cents or, since he is a generous man, he may make it fifty cents. All I am asking is, is there a clear definition of what is and what is not a custom-house broker? Let me change my illustration. Suppose I go and do that without a fee, just as a friend, and I get the goods out of customs. Am I contravening this section?

Mr. McCann: No. If you are acting for a number of firms in that capacity, and are doing it without a licence, you are breaking the law. If you do it for yourself or for your family, it is all right. But if you made a practice of doing that, and were accepting a fee, then you would be contravening the section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think that answers the question.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Power to conduct inquiry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister a few questions concerning section 6. In the explanatory notes mention is made that there is a similar provision in the Excise Act. I realize that there is. Some years ago there was a case under the Excise Act in the province of Saskatchewan where the accused was brought before an inspector of the mounted police, who had been appointed as the investigating official under the Excise Act. The accused refused to answer certain questions that were put to him without being accorded the protection of the courts within the meaning of the Canada Evidence Act. Under this section will a person who is forced to testify against himself under an order made under this section, if it is passed by the house, be allowed his constitutional right of objecting on the ground that his answers may incriminate him and therefore ask for the protection of the court?

Mr. McCann: He may ask for the protection of the court and get it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the opinion of the law officers in regard to this section?

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mention this, because in the case in Saskatchewan to which I referred, Rex v. Hicks, I was counsel for the appellant. In that case a judge of the Court of King's Bench, Mr. Justice Taylor, held that the individual had his constitutional right of refusing to incriminate himself, although not of refusing to answer provided protection was granted. My recollection is that in Nova Scotia within the last two or three years there was a judgment of the late Chief Justice Chisholm to the effect that the individual did not have his constitutional rights under a similar section, and he was not entitled to protection but had to testify. It is for that reason I ask the minister whether or not the law officers of the crown, realizing that there is a judgment of a Saskatchewan superior court to the effect that the constitutional rights are preserved under the Excise Act and there is a judgment of the appeal court of Nova Scotia to the effect that the Hicks case in Saskatchewan was wrongly decided, have concluded that the constitutional rights are preserved under the section in question.

If there is one thing we want to guard against in this country it is bringing into effect the trial of the individual by an administrative court, wherein the individual is actually under the control of the state. It is a dangerous precedent, and it is one that in the neighbouring country in recent years has brought the law into contempt. What I mean is this. The state shall not be placed in the position where it may deny the individual his rights, however great the interest of the state may be for denying the citizen his constitutional freedom. It is for that reason I ask the minister this question. If we in this country want to preserve our British system, we must prevent administrative officials from securing powers to interrogate an individual, and place that individual in a position where he must become a witness against himself.

Mr. McCann: I understand the hon. member's point, and in a discussion with the law officers I am given the information that the rights of the witness are protected.

Mr. Fulton: Before this section carries, I believe some doubt arises under subsection 3, paragraph (c), subparagraph (ii). Will the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Justice tell us whether or not the question of what is a proper question was also considered? It is obvious that under the Inquiries Act a commissioner is limited to the same powers as a civil court, and therefore could not compel a witness to answer against his will but would have to allow him the benefit of section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act. At line 20 of the bill it says that every person who refuses to answer any proper question is guilty of an offence. This would seem to give the person conducting the inquiry, in addition to the powers under the Inquiries Act, the power to determine of his own accord what is a proper question. I wonder if that is not going further than the situation just described by the minister? Was that matter also considered by the law officers, and have they specifically considered whether that is not an enlargement of the powers of cross-examining a witness and compelling him to answer?

Mr. Garson: To reply to my friend the hon. member for Kamloops, if he examines the Inquiries Act I think he will find that this provision is really an alleviation of the section which would otherwise be relevant, in that this provides for the prosecution of the guilty person—that is, the person guilty of withholding information—before a court rather than having the person in charge of the inquiry itself impose the fine upon him. In that sense I would think it would be more satisfactory to my hon. friend than the Inquiries Act itself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think the matter is quite as simple as that. The Minister of Justice will, of course, remember the case in the court of appeal of Nova Scotia, under the Excise Act, just about three or four years ago. In that case, Sir Joseph Chisholm, giving the decision of the court, held that the Hicks case in the province of Saskatchewan was not good law. In the Hicks case the accused refused, on the advice of counsel, to answer any questions until protection was granted under section 5 of the Canada Evidence Act. When the accused Hicks refused to testify, prosecution was taken against him under the identical section that appears in the Excise Act.

Mr. Garson: Identical with what? My hon. friend suggests "an identical section". Identical with what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is, refusing to answer any questions put to him by the person conducting the inquiry or investigation.

Mr. Garson: Oh, yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The accused was prosecuted before a police magistrate who dismissed the information. The crown carried it to appeal before a Court of King's Bench judge and that judge, Mr. Justice Taylor, dismissed the appeal and held that the individual had his constitutional rights to refuse to testify unless protection was granted to him. In that case I was counsel for the accused. Then I noticed that the appeal court of Nova Scotia, some two years later, gave a judgment in which it was stated by Sir Joseph Chisholm that no accused had the right to refuse to testify even though protection was not granted. As the minister will admit, the great danger with provisions such as the one in question is that the individual's rights are pared down and the hope of securing justice under our system will be denied. Administrative officials naturally like anything in the nature of change in the laws of evidence which will make more expeditious the proving of a case. This is one of those sections; it reminds me of the suggestion with regard to wire tapping, to which there has been considerable reference in the press during recent weeks. Naturally the crown officials would welcome the opportunity to tap telephone wires and telegraph wires. But I hope that, as long as the Minister of Justice is in the position he now occupies, this type of invasion of the constitutional rights of the individual will not be allowed.

I would not have withdrawn my objection to this section, as I did a few moments ago, by acquiescence, had it not been for the fact that the minister, following consultation with the law officers of the crown, gave it as his opinion that no person will be denied, under this section, the right to rely upon his constitutional right, non-incrimination. It is too bad that one of these cases was not carried to the Supreme Court of Canada because, as the position of affairs now is, the Court of King's Bench has decided one way in the province of Saskatchewan and the Court of Appeal of Nova Scotia has decided the direct opposite in a similar case. I welcome the reply given by the minister that this section will not be another in this gradual invasion of the rights of the individual; because if there is one thing we need to do for the preservation of our democracy it is in this country to ensure that the rights of the individual shall not be abrogated or suspended at the caprice of the crown.

Mr. Fulton: I am not clear, Mr. Chairman, just why it is necessary to repeal the original section and to re-enact this one. I do not claim to be familiar with the Inquiries Act. I certainly have not the intimate knowledge of these matters possessed by the hon. member for Lake Centre. But at first sight it would appear that the Inquiries Act confers upon the commissioner power to enforce the attendance of witnesses, to allow payment of expenses and so on. In the first place, why is it the desire to say that any person designated by the minister may conduct any inquiry and shall have the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act, which would seem to give him ample powers, and then go on, in an apparent attempt to revise the powers that he has, to provide that every person who refuses to answer any proper question put to him shall be liable to punishment on summary conviction?

That is the first question. Why is it necessary to do that? My concern about this matter arises out of this supposition. The person before whom the inquiry is being conducted seems to me to be given, by that provision in line twenty, the power to decide what is a proper question, over and above the power he would have under the Inquiries Act; simply by refusing the protection of the Canada Evidence Act and yet holding that this is a proper question, he exposes the witness to prosecution and punishment on summary conviction. I doubt if the witness would have any recourse. If the commissioner said: "This is a proper question and it is not one where you are entitled to the protection of the Canada Evidence Act," then the witness must answer or his refusal to answer, it seems to me, is automatically bound to be followed by fine under the summary convictions act. So I wonder why it was necessary to put that provision in, when the Inquiries Act would seem to give the necessary powers already?

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would not agree that, other things being equal, it is better not to legislate by reference. If we have a provision such as this which appears in the bill before us, for the bringing of a person before the proper officials to be interrogated, and it is desired to provide certain penalties for his not answering questions, it is surely desirable to have the whole law relating to that point stated in the Customs Act itself, so that the people concerned and the solicitors who are dealing with the matter can, by reference to the Customs Act itself, discover what the rights of the client are and how they are to be disposed of. On that ground alone, a great deal can be said for this provision.

If my hon. friend will, as I see he has started to do, take the provision which is in the bill before us and compare it with section 10 of the Inquiries Act, I think he will see that the provisions are fairly similar. I have not compared it carefully but I would have thought, reading it casually, that it is almost identical language, and the penalties are the same.

Mr. Fulton: They are very similar.

Mr. Garson: I do not think it could be maintained that there has been any greater penalty imposed upon anyone guilty of not answering these questions. I believe the hon. member would agree with me that it is always desirable to have all provisions relating to customs matters, for instance, contained in the Customs Act itself. It should not be left to people who are dealing with it, people who sometimes may not be lawyers, to read the act only to discover that when they want to deal with the law they have to run it down in some other act which they may not have at hand. Then there is the additional point that this section almost matches a similar section in the Excise Act.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the minister for his answer. We can take it that the opinion of the law officers is that there is no enlargement of the powers already given in the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Drew: But if that is so I must confess I find it difficult to understand why we should be asked to pass this amendment at all. The minister has suggested—and I do not think he has gone beyond suggesting—that it is more convenient to have these powers contained in the Customs Act itself, rather than to make it necessary for a layman, or someone else who is not in a position carefully to examine the effect of the law, to determine what his rights may be.

I would point out however that the section as it will stand will still refer to the Inquiries Act, because these are the words used:

—and any person so authorized has all the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Drew: It is obvious that anyone who wishes to ascertain the powers of a person appointed in this manner must of necessity go to the Inquiries Act to find out what those powers are. If it is necessary to go to that act to find out the powers of the person appointed, why is it more difficult for him to ascertain from the Inquiries Act exactly what the obligations are, as well?

The minister says the provisions are similar. I suggest it is unwise to depart from the exact wording that has been interpreted by judgments of the courts, unless there is some very special reason for departing from that exact wording and introducing the new words into a section of another act. If there is going to be any part of the Inquiries Act which must be interpreted either by a layman or by a lawyer to ascertain the rights of an individual, then I suggest we might as well leave it the way it is, and have both the obligations as well as the rights of the individual determined by reference to the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I must confess there is a good deal of point in what the hon. member says. However, I think no great problem is posed here, because it is much simpler to say in the present bill that the persons conducting an inquiry under it shall have the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act. This avoids repeating quite a long list of sections in the present bill. But when it gets down to specifying for those who might be disposed to disregard these provisions what the penalty should be, then I think there is nothing contrary to good practice when we indicate in the Customs Act just what those penalties are. They cannot be stated in clearer or fairer terms. He who runs may read:

Every person who (a) fails, without valid excuse, to attend an inquiry or investigation as required under this section,

(b) fails to produce any document, book or paper in his possession or under his control, as required under this section, or

(c) at any inquiry or investigation under this section

(i) refuses to be sworn or to affirm, or to declare, as the case may be, or

(ii) refuses to answer any proper question put to him by the person conducting the inquiry or investigation, is guilty of an offence and is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding four hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars.

That is, a gentleman who is conducting an inquiry cannot proceed to penalize summarily. The person affected must be taken before a proper judicial official who has jurisdiction on summary conviction. Then the person affected can see, by reference to the legislation, he is exposed to a penalty not exceeding the amount specified.

Admitting the force of the argument by the leader of the opposition, I do not see how very great exception can be taken to the provision because it is spelled out here in a manner which I suggest is desirable. These penalties should be in the Customs Act, rather than in some other act to which a person reading the Customs Act would have to refer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): A moment ago the minister said that it was better not to legislate by reference.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thought I understood that. Yet, are we not forced in this instance to construe the word "proper"? I suggest that in a sense we are forced to deal with it in relation to something else. We have to drag in some other reference in order to know what is proper and what is not. In other words we would not get the full meaning of the word "proper" by looking in the dictionary. Do we get it by looking back to the Inquiries Act, or do we look elsewhere in the Customs Act?

Mr. Garson: No; I mean that if this bill were drawn—as it is not—to say that the customs officer conducting the investigation shall have all the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, including the imposition of penalties and everything else, then someone who, not being a lawyer or legally trained, was reading the act, might not become aware of the penalties being visited upon him under the terms of the Inquiries Act. I suggest it is preferable, if there are to be penalties for non-observance, to have such penalties set out in the act under which a person is being asked questions by customs officers.

In this way a person who had the Customs Act in front of him would know his position exactly, and he is not left to deduce that because customs officers have certain powers under the Inquiries Act he will be exposed to certain penalties under that act for not answering their questions. I think the hon. member for Greenwood would agree that, generally speaking, our laws should be in the form in which they can be best understood not only by lawyers but by laymen.

Mr. Fulton: I think the minister said that there would be some abridgement of the powers given a commissioner under the Inquiries Act because now it would be necessary to lay informations and to proceed by way of summary conviction to enforce a penalty, whereas under the Inquiries Act the commissioner himself could set the penalty. I believe the minister would wish to change the record because, if my reading is correct, the procedure is the same in both instances.

Mr. Garson: Yes, the hon. member is correct. When at his request I entered the discussion I was not too familiar with the details of this legislation, and spoke from memory of the Inquiries Act. However, I have checked since, and the hon. member is quite right.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Contravention of act in other respects.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the meaning of "attempts to violate"? Possibly with the assistance of the Minister of Justice the minister could give an example of that. I would have thought that the word "attempt" would have been sufficient.

Mr. McCann: Rather than try to explain it, perhaps I could give an example. A trucker comes along with a load of refrigerators which he is attempting to smuggle into Canada. An arrangement has been made whereby another trucker comes to the crossing point ready to transfer the refrigerators on to his truck and convey them into Canada. That would constitute an attempt to violate. I might say to the hon. gentleman that there have been instances such as the one I have indicated.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Loopholes like that have to be plugged.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Or by railway, highway or air transport.

Mr. Drew: In view of the rather far-reaching nature of this section I wonder if the minister could explain in some detail the reasons for this amendment? I would prefer to hear his explanation before I make some comments I wish to make on this section.

Mr. McCann: This amendment makes it possible to provide sufferance warehouses for the convenience of highway or air transport. The lack of such warehouses has been an obstacle to highway and air transport, as well as creating administrative inconvenience at Canadian customs ports. The amendment spells out the obligations which up to the present have been stipulated only in the bonds taken from the operators of sufferance warehouses where such persons were authorized to operate such warehouses under regulations and provisions of the act.

The actual practice is to have goods arrive by truck at the frontier point where they are cleared and then trucked to the interior destination. This amendment would permit clearance either at the frontier point or at the interior point and thus relieve the present congestion at the frontier. The present system is to have goods come to border points like Windsor, Fort Erie, Niagara Falls or hundreds of other points, where they have to be unloaded, an appraisal made, the customs duty paid, either by the person in charge of the transport or more likely by a customs broker, and then reloaded on Canadian-owned trucks for delivery to the point of destination.

Under this amendment the motor or air transport companies would themselves institute sufferance warehouses at interior points where the customs officials would supply the facilities for the appraisal of the goods and the collection of the customs. Let it be understood that the warehouses would not be built by the government. They would be licensed and bonded by the government. I submit that this is simply an evolution of transportation which has been taking place over the past few years.

It is true objections have been raised, on behalf of the railroads in particular, that this would mean a loss of business to other carriers. I submit that there would not be any loss. The practice is not to transfer from the truck coming to the border to a railroad for shipment to the point of destination, but to transfer to another truck. Take goods coming to a point like Hamilton, say from Philadelphia. These goods would cross the border at Fort Erie or Niagara Falls and under the present practice would have to be unloaded, appraised, reloaded and then they would go on after the customs duty had been paid. If this amendment goes into effect the officers at the point of entry would place a seal on the truckload of goods which would then go to the warehouse at Hamilton operated by a trucking company or a combination of trucking companies. Our appraisal officers would appraise the goods at the warehouse and collect the duty. As I said, there have been some objections, such as those from the Ship-by-Rail Association of Canada, but I think they can be well answered.

I hope hon. members will not confuse these two phases of trucking in bond as there is only one referred to in this amendment. The other phase was the trucking in bond that took place during the war where a truck would enter Canada, say at Niagara Falls or Fort Erie, cross the southern part of Ontario and leave Canada at Windsor and on to Detroit or whatever point in the United States it was destined for. That was an international arrangement between Canada and the United States that terminated at the end of the war. This second arrangement has to do with the setting up of sufferance warehouses under which the customs department will supply the needed facilities to carry on the business.

I shall attempt to answer any further questions that are asked, but I think what I have said will serve as an introduction.

Mr. Drew: It is clear from the explanation given by the minister that the primary intention of the amendment is to provide for the delivery by trucks of goods to sufferance warehouses. It is true that the amendment includes air transport as well, but there are obvious reasons why it could not apply in the same way to air transport. A truck could come right through to a sufferance warehouse whereas an aircraft must land at an airport. It is very unlikely that sufferance warehouses of a size to deal adequately with the kind of distribution contemplated would be constructed at many airports, certainly at this time.

For that reason I think it would be well to direct our minds particularly to the effect of this amendment upon transport by highway. As the minister has pointed out, there is a very clear distinction between the subject matter of the amendment now before us and the practice carried on during the war whereby bonded trucks were allowed to pass through Canada from a port of entry to a port of exit. This practice led to certain discussion at that time.

Mr. Lesage: In transit.

Mr. Drew: As explained by the minister the effect of this amendment would make it possible for goods to be imported into Canada to be loaded on a truck at their point of origin, pass the border and then be unloaded at one of the sufferance warehouses, constructed and operated either by an individual trucker or by a group of truckers. The minister made one very significant statement. He said that under the present regulations it is necessary for the truck to unload at the border and then be reloaded. I noticed that he said that the goods would be reloaded on Canadian trucks—

Mr. McCann: Or American.

Mr. Drew: —and brought to their destination.

Mr. McCann: Or the original truck that brought them there. They can be reloaded on it.

Mr. Drew: I noticed the minister said they would be reloaded on Canadian trucks. I am quite prepared to accept the explanation that they might also be loaded on the original trucks.

Mr. McCann: That is right.

Mr. Drew: The fact is, the course indicated by the minister in his remarks with regard to reloading on Canadian trucks would be the more likely one to follow, because very much larger trucks are being used in the regular transportation of goods of this kind in the United States than in Canada. Some of these trucks run to 50 or 55 tons, and even more. At the present time such trucks could not and should not use some of our highways. In fact many of these trucks would create a very real danger to the bridges on a number of our highways. For that reason the present provision is one that has results which are rather parallel to the results that followed from the action taken in regard to the bonding of goods on trucks in transit from one border point to another, which came up for discussion during the war and immediately afterwards.

At that time objection was taken, as the minister will recall, to the passage of trucks in that way not only by the railway companies but also by certain provincial jurisdictions. The minister will recall that it was pointed out at that time that these very large trucks were damaging our roads to an extent that made it a very real problem to maintain roads for ordinary truck and motor operation. To some extent the same danger would be repeated by any provision which encouraged the entry into Canada of these very large trucks. I would certainly agree with the minister and anyone else who suggests that we should adjust ourselves to changing events and the improvement of transportation methods. The first requirement, however, in dealing with changes in transportation methods is to make sure that our facilities for handling those transportation methods are adequate to the task. I believe that right across Canada we are rapidly improving our general situation with respect to highways.

The fact remains, however, that no matter what general improvement has taken place we have not yet the same network of carefully levelled highways suitable for the very large trucks that are being used in the United States today. Therefore I suggest that is a reason, apart from some of the other reasons I shall mention, why it would not be wise to make this amendment at this time. The amendment would encourage the movement of such trucks into internal ports in Canada, in many cases over highways which would be seriously damaged by the weight of such trucks moving often in great trains.

Then I come to another aspect of the problem. There is a great difference between bonding a freight car and bonding a truck. A freight or baggage car travels over clearly defined routes. The car having been bonded moves on a railway right of way which is under fairly constant supervision, and which is subject to a measure of observation and checking that would not apply to a truck once it had passed the border. May I say at once that I am not in any way reflecting on the good faith of any of those well established trucking organizations which may believe that this would be a convenience. Nevertheless it must be remembered that our customs officials, expert and courteous though they are, have no crystal glass in which they can gaze to determine whether the people operating a particular truck are going to conform exactly with the regulations or follow a particular course.

It is possible for trucks to depart from a direct route in a way that is not possible when goods are being moved by railway transportation. Moreover it is possible for trucks to be opened in a way that would be most unlikely in the case of railway transportation.

Mr. McCann: There is the same type of seal on them as on railway cars.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of National Revenue is too practical and has too good an understanding of the construction of trucks to be unaware of the possibilities of seals not being effective on trucks where they would be very effective on railway cars. Very little imagination suggests that there are many ways in which it would be possible to avoid the effect of sealing unless one were going to seal a truck with such a bond of wires that it would almost look like a bird cage. In saying that, I repeat that I am not impugning the good faith of any of those who may be applying for concessions of this kind. I suggest, however, that it must be obvious to every hon. member that a truck passing a border point, and having received a seal, would be able to do many things that would not be possible in the case of a railway freight car.

I think it must be obvious to everyone that a very extensive problem of policing and supervision is involved, which would mean the requirement of a very much larger number of men than are now employed for tasks of this kind, in order to be reasonably sure that there was no infringement of regulations of this nature.

Then there is another problem, of course, not related to the question of the good faith of any of the truckers who may be carrying out this task. There is an invitation to interference with the operation of trucks, which does not exist in the case of a railway car or any other method of transportation. I think there are a number of reasons why the members of this house should be very cautious about passing an amendment which would invite a type of bonded transport which will create increased difficulties for the customs service, which will increase the possibility of evasion, and which will provide some encouragement to the present descendants of the highwaymen of old. These are very real considerations which should not be lightly brushed aside.

I suggest also it should be remembered that this change is not going to affect a great many communities. It will affect those large communities close to the border, where there will be a possibility of breaking load and perhaps effecting delivery a little more rapidly than can be done by rail. In view of the fact that the number of places that could benefit would be comparatively limited I think great caution should be exercised in adopting an amendment of this kind, when in this particular case there might also be great uncertainty as to whether it could become effective in any event. I would remind the minister that whether or not there was agreement on the course followed, at least one province did take action in regard to the movement of bonded goods by truck transport. That decision was taken because of the damage being inflicted upon the highways of that province without any compensating advantages which would indicate that it was not wiser to have those same loads carried by rail. This amendment may invite similar action. It might also raise very real questions as to whether it is desirable to encourage the entry into Canada of these very large trucks at a time when there is a real shortage of the steel and cement needed for the improvement of our highways. Right across Canada today the construction of cement-surfaced highways is being held up because of the shortage of steel and cement. Steel, nails and cement are required not only for the construction of new highways but also for the repair and maintenance of existing highways. No matter what arguments may be put forward as to the desirability of an amendment of this kind at some future date, in addition to the other reasons I have given the need to conserve our highways as much as possible in view of the shortage of these supplies is such that I suggest this is not the appropriate time to bring in an amendment which will invite heavier traffic of this nature on our highways.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): May I ask the minister if this amendment would facilitate the changing of loads of merchandise brought up the Alaska highway by United States trucks as far as Dawson Creek, for example, to Canadian trucks? Very often these loads in bond to the territory of Alaska are for defence purposes, and I wonder if this amendment would facilitate such a transfer.

Mr. McCann: This amendment would make provision for that case, because probably there would be a sufferance warehouse at that point, and the goods could be transferred to Canadian trucks there. I understand the principal difficulty in that case is that they prefer lighter trucks from Dawson Creek on; but this would make provision for that.

Mr. Lesage: I do not wish to reply to the leader of the opposition, but I wonder if he contends that this amendment would supersede the traffic laws of the province of Ontario or any other province. I do not believe it would supersede any traffic laws or regulations of any province. This is for the benefit of those provinces which agree that United States trucks may come there, and which provide the sufferance warehouses where the goods may be delivered. As the leader of the opposition rightly said, this does not provide for trucking in transit. In that connection the laws of the United States go much further than ours. According to their laws Canadian trucks may go through the United States in transit in bond. That is the case with trucks from all provinces, even though some Canadian provinces have not granted reciprocal rights. An example of this traffic is the transportation by Canadian trucking companies of automobiles manufactured in Ontario to markets in western Canada. They go through United States territory, and have permission to do so. We are not going as far as that here, in spite of the fact that article 5 of the general agreement on trade and tariffs, which we have signed, provides that there shall be freedom of transit through the territory of each contracting party via the routes most convenient for international transit. Because of that obligation we are now discussing the matter with the province of Ontario, but there is nothing in this bill covering trucking in transit. It only has to do with warehouses. I believe that if we do not go some distance in granting reciprocal rights to the United States trucking industry there is some danger that we may lose the right we now enjoy to have our trucks go in transit in bond through the United States, a right we need in connection with western Canada. I do not think we are going very far here; and moreover this legislation cannot supersede or take the place or reverse the effect of the traffic regulations or laws of any province.

Mr. Drew: First of all, there is no suggestion that this supersedes any existing provincial law. The only case where the provinces so far have been called upon to deal with this problem is in connection with the movement of goods in bond in transit through Canada from a port of entry to a port of exit.

Mr. McCann: We had it on the Alaska highway, too, during the war.

Mr. Drew: And it applied also to the Alaska highway. As has been pointed out, and as I pointed out in my opening remarks, this is not on all fours with that except to the extent that this does deal with the possibility of the entry into this country of the same type of trucks which were causing a very serious problem in the other case. It is all very well to say that we have signed some international agreement which calls for extending transport facilities through the adjoining territories of the countries signing this agreement. Common sense, however, will obviously impose the requirement that all international agreements of that kind shall be subject to appropriate restraints, having relation to the surface of the highways and the strength of the bridges over which the trucks must pass.

At this time, so far as I am aware, there is no provincial law of any province which would deal with the situation. Certain provinces were called upon to consider the effects of another provision which related to transporting goods in bond from one port to another at the boundary. I repeat my point, and the minister himself has indicated that one of the main effects of an amendment of this kind would be to avoid the necessity of breaking a load at the border and reloading it in smaller trucks. I am suggesting that is a very desirable result. I am suggesting also that it will be a very desirable result if these are Canadian trucks. Still further am I suggesting that at this time, when there is a shortage of cement and all other repair materials, we would be well advised to see that our rails are used as much as possible during this period of national emergency. For these reasons I intend to oppose section 11, and the effect of the amendment.

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mr. Johnston: I wish to say a few words on this subject. First of all, I wish to congratulate the government on putting this section in the bill. I think it is something that has been needed for quite a while. I want to speak generally about the matter just now, and then I shall go into greater detail at another time. I was not at all impressed by the remarks made a moment ago by the leader of the opposition, when he spoke about the trucking industry destroying our roads.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I did not speak about the trucking industry destroying the roads. I spoke about the fact that in the United States today we see great trucks running up to fifty and fifty-five tons being used. It was those trucks to which I referred, which damaged our roads in the past and would damage them today until we have an opportunity of creating road surfaces and bridges adequate to handle them.

Mr. Johnston: I am not going to bicker over terms used. The inference left was that heavily loaded trucks would destroy the roads. In the sense that they were overloaded, I would agree. We had an experience with that in the province of Alberta, particularly during the war and the building of the Alaska highway. Some very large trucks came up from the United States carrying exceedingly heavy loads, big steel girders and steel pipes that were going into the northern territories. They did not destroy our roads to the extent one would gather from a reading of the leader of the opposition's words. Every province, Mr. Chairman, as has been pointed out, has laws regulating the weight of the traffic passing over its highways.

This difficulty has been overcome in a number of ways. We have been steadily improving the construction of our highways. Improvement has been made in the construction of the trucks. It is now possible to carry a twenty or thirty-ton load over a road and not do so much harm as it used to do. Some provinces are requiring that the load be spread over a greater number of axles so that the weight will be more uniformly spread over a greater road surface. This helps to maintain our roads. I am in favour of maintaining our roads, but I am not in favour of delaying this type of legislation any longer. I believe it has been delayed long enough.

I was quite impressed by the minister's remarks when he said he thought we should adjust ourselves to the changing times, particularly as that applied to transportation. It seems to me that this country has been very backward in adopting the more modern forms of transportation. Perhaps we have not got enough of—I was going to use the term used in the United States—express highways. When one travels over those roads, particularly between Detroit and Chicago, one can see the tremendous advantages transportation has in the U.S. over Canada. There is a tremendous amount of traffic hauled over those roads. It is true, of course, that in that particular instance the road is built to carry those loads. But we must adapt ourselves to these changing times. In Canada we are not doing that very rapidly. It is true that we have started on the proposal to build the trans-Canada highway, but that is going to take at least seven years—I venture to say even longer. Surely, we are not going to wait for that length of time to adjust ourselves to these new types of transportation.

I was not very impressed with the remarks made by the leader of the opposition concerning the difficulties of bonding a truck. A moment ago it was pointed out by the member for Montmagny-L'Islet that our trucks now go through the United States in bond. For the many years I have enjoyed being a member at Ottawa, Mr. Chairman, with the exception of 1942-1946, I have driven every year through the United States on my way home. I have seen the advantages of Canadian trucks going through the United States in bond. Why we should not give the United States that same privilege, I do not know. It would have been very embarrassing for us if the United States had not extended that privilege, because we have no transcontinental road running east and west in Canada. We would have been up against a very difficult proposition if we had not enjoyed that privilege. I believe we should reciprocate, and give the United States the same advantage if they desire it.

The bonding of trucks is not difficult. Those trucks all go through a port of entry, and they can be sealed there just as efficiently as a box car. No one is going to say that a box car has never been broken into. It may happen in the odd case with a truck. Most of the business firms who are employing large trucks in their service are reputable companies. The suggestion that they are highway robbers is outrageous.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, nothing more remote from what I said could be imagined than the statement just made by the hon. member.

Mr. Johnston: I never said that the hon. member said that. I am just saying that to suggest that any of these reputable trucking firms could be accused of highway robbery, such as we used to have in the old days—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, it should be possible for an hon. member to conduct the argument without getting so far from the truth as has the hon. member at the moment and without creating an inference that has no relation to what I have put forward in my contention.

Mr. Johnston: I am sorry if the hon. member thinks that I was referring to him.

Mr. Drew: Oh, well—

Mr. Johnston: Of course, if he inferred that they may be highway robbers, then he can take that as he likes.

I want to ask a question or two with regard to the sufferance warehouses. It is understood that these warehouses will be constructed where there are now custom-houses?

Mr. McCann: Yes. They will be constructed at frontier points and in cities where there are already custom-houses.

Mr. Johnston: Border points?

Mr. McCann: I said frontier points or border points, and in cities where there are already custom-houses. But they will not be constructed by the government. They will be constructed by the transport people. All this bill does is to say that in the event of the transport people's building warehouses, we will be prepared to make regulations and service the warehouses. Let me read the provision:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the appointment of sufferance warehouses in which goods arriving by railway, highway or air transport may be stored before entry, when such goods have been duly reported.

Then section 2 makes an amendment which says that the keeper of the warehouse is to be liable for the duty. We hold him liable. If he puts the goods in the warehouse there, we hold him liable. Then we have set out the application and a provision with reference to the storing of goods. All of this talk with reference to the highways, although it is relevant in a manner to the whole question, is not relevant to this particular amendment. That is a matter for the provinces to deal with. If the province of Ontario says, "You cannot put a fifty-ton truck on our highway; the maximum is twenty tons or twenty-five tons", then all well and good. The trucking people will have to take that problem up with the various provinces. The provinces will, I presume, have a right to put on any licence fee that they want to. But we believe that this is a part of the evolution of transportation that should be taken care of, and we believe that we should take time by the forelock and tell these people: If you are going to build these warehouses, pay for them and operate them, we will provide the facilities for the examination of your goods there, under certain conditions. You are to be responsible for them. You are to see that the duty is paid. You are to apply for a licence and you will get that licence; and it is just a matter of giving them the facilities at these points where the warehouses are built. The other problems are entirely ones as to which they, the transport people, will have to deal with the several provinces.

Mr. Johnston: I think the trucking industry will appreciate that. What I had in mind when I asked that question was that the trucking industry would be allowed to build their warehouses wherever they saw fit, provided there was enough traffic to warrant it, and then the government would provide a customs official at that point; but that the trucking industry themselves—

Mr. McCann: But there will be what are commonly known as common warehouses. We would not provide facilities for every trucker that is going to have a warehouse; but when a combination of them go together, we would.

Mr. Johnston: I understand that. For instance, there would be one in Calgary and one in Edmonton; and there would probably be one in Lethbridge. I am speaking of my own province because I know that one better than any other. There would probably be one in Camrose where there is a custom house already. I think that would cover any objection that the transport concerns may have in regard to this. In fact, I think I can assure the minister that they are quite pleased that he is taking the progressive step that he is taking in seeing to it that these sufferance warehouses are being built.

Once again may I say that I do not think there is any danger of over-abuse of the privilege because there is sufficient inspection now in progress to look after any safeguarding that is necessary.

Mr. Drew: On a matter of privilege, in the event that my words may have been in any way open to the surprising interpretation placed upon them by the hon. member who has just spoken, I wish to make it clear—

Mr. Johnston: I cannot hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Drew: I say that in the event that it is at all possible that my words may in any way have been open to the surprising interpretation put on them by the hon. member who has just spoken, I wish to make it quite clear that when I was referring to the possibility of practices developing in regard to interference with the trucks, I was not suggesting interference by the trucking companies but rather interference with the trucks themselves by others.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulford: I cannot help viewing with alarm section 11 of Bill No. 198, because I feel a certain amount of international business will be taken away from the railways. Certainly this is not the time to take business from our Canadian railways.

I agree with the minister when he says that one cannot set back the wheels of progress, and we realize that we are in a period of transition, so far as transportation is concerned. But at this particular time I wonder if it is wise to make these concessions to the American truckers. I wonder if we are not depriving Canadian railways of business which is legitimately theirs.

I notice further in the minister's remarks that he said that goods coming in by truck are, after examination at the border, loaded into Canadian trucks.

Mr. McCann: They are continued on in the American trucks.

Mr. Fulford: It continues on in the American trucks?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Fulford: Then one of my worries has been dissipated by the minister's remarks.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member would permit me to interject the statement that a great number of Canadian truckers truck goods into the United States. They have the right to do so. Then they come back, loaded with American goods for Canadian importers.

I have before me a list of trucking companies actively engaged in the transportation of package freight as between the United States and Canada. They are: Consolidated Truck Lines, Toronto; Colville Cartage Company, Toronto; Direct-Winters Transport, Toronto; International Cartage Company, Windsor; Maislin Bros. Transport, Montreal; Bingaman Motor Express Company Incorporated, Montreal; Montreal and New York Express Limited, Montreal; Lavigne's Red Wing Express, Montreal; Dench of Canada Limited, Calgary; Canadian Freightways Limited, Calgary; Smith Transport, Montreal; Seattle-Vancouver, B.C. Motor Co. Limited, Vancouver and British Columbia-Seattle Transport, Vancouver.

I do not believe that is a full list of the big trucking companies carrying package freight from Canada to the United States, and coming back with return loads. Those people, of course, would continue with their Canadian trucks to the point of destination. And in the event that it works the other way, American trucks which come into Canada would go to their point of destination, probably pick up a load in Canada and take it back to the United States.

Mr. Fulford: While I am pleased to have that information, I think it proves my point that these international trucking concerns are interfering with the express and freight carried by the railways. Has a survey been made, or has there been any estimate as to the loss of revenue to Canadian railways as a result of allowing these trucks to come through the border in bond, to points in Canada?

Mr. McCann: I do not know that a survey has been made with reference to that. However I can say, on the assertion of prominent trucking companies, that as a result of what happened last summer during the railway strike, at which time the truckers carried on the business of moving package freight and other freight in this country, they did retain about 35 per cent of that new business. I point that out to show that they are not an unimportant factor in the transportation business of our country.

Mr. Gibson: Have the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. made representations opposing this change?

Mr. McCann: No, they have not.

Mr. Simmons: I heartily congratulate the hon. member for Bow River upon the remarks he made this afternoon concerning section 11 of Bill 198. The movement of goods by bonded truckers along the Alaska highway means much to us in the north, where transportation facilities are limited, indeed. I believe every consideration should be given to the transportation of goods by truck in remote areas, and I congratulate the Minister of National Revenue upon having introduced this amendment to the Customs Act.

I do not agree with the remarks of the leader of the opposition respecting difficulties in sealing trucks carrying bonded goods, especially along the Alaska highway. I have noted for some time the manner in which these trucks have been sealed, and I know that the trucks operating along the Alaska highway can be sealed as securely as any railway box car. These trucks are sealed with Canadian customs Tyden seals which are numbered, and each one of which must be accounted for. Therefore I cannot see any reason why any freight in bond should be pilfered or stolen. I hope every encouragement will be given to these truckers in the north country, and especially in the remote areas of the Yukon Territory, northern British Columbia and other parts of Canada. It means a great deal to those of us who live up there to have this service.

Mr. Johnston: The minister referred to the different trucking companies employed in this kind of business, and referred particularly to Dench of Canada Limited. Is not Dench, in Calgary, owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway? If that is true, then the C.P.R. is trucking goods into the United States in the manner which has been described.

Mr. McCann: I must admit I do not know anything about the ownership of Dench of Canada Limited.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have one or two questions. The minister said, as I understood him, that there had been no representations from the railways.

Mr. McCann: I corrected that. I said there had been representations from the Ship-by-Rail Association.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What discussion was there with the interested parties? The minister referred to the trucking association. Was there any discussion with any other interested parties?

Mr. McCann: Personally, I have had discussions only with the secretary of the Ship-by-Rail Association. There have been other representations. Here is a communication from the Canadian Retail Federation which says:

Dear Dr. McCann:

I have been instructed to tell you that the Canadian Retail Federation view with much satisfaction the contents of the House of Commons Bill 198, section 11, by which provision is made for goods to be brought into the country under bond and by highway transport.

The federation is of the opinion that this will be helpful to the retail trade, and we wish to express our appreciation for the action that has been taken to make this possible.

Yours truly,

E. F. K. Nelson
General Manager,
Canadian Retail Federation

Then there is one from the recording secretary of the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of Ontario, expressing opposition to Bill No. 198. Then there is one from the hon. member for Nipissing. There is also one from the Ship-by-Rail Association, to which I have referred already. Then there is one from the Canadian Industrial Traffic League under date of May 14, reading:

> The Canadian Industrial Traffic League, national organization of industrial traffic managers, has noted with satisfaction the intention of the government, as set out in Bill 198 currently before the house, to recognize by legislative action the principle of permitting the entry into Canada in-bond of shipments by highway transport.
> The league has been on record in the past as favouring this principle which will make it possible for importers to clear highway transported goods at Canadian interior points.
> On behalf of this organization which represents many of the companies interested in this principle, I take pleasure in bringing the above views to your attention.

There is another one from the Canadian Importers and Trading Association, under date of May 14, addressed to myself and reading:

> Dear Dr. McCann:
> Members of this association were delighted to see that you propose to amend the Customs Act so as to allow goods to enter the country in highway trucks in bond.
> We feel that this change in the act, when translated into practice, will be of very great benefit to the import trade of Canada and wish to express this association's hearty approval of the proposed change.
> Yours sincerely,
> Canadian Importers and Traders Association, Inc.
> H. C. MacKendrick,
> General Manager

I do not think it is necessary to place all this correspondence on the record. I am just taking the letters as they are on the file. They all appear to be letters in appreciation of the action that has been taken. They are from influential bodies. Here is one from the Canadian Automotive Transportation Association, Toronto, under date May 11, and reading:

> I wish to express the sincere appreciation of the Canadian trucking industry for the action which you have taken, on behalf of the government, in introducing Bill 198 amending the Customs Act to permit "in bond" trucking.
> With regard to the Customs Act, it has long been the view of this association that, in the language of the bill it was "necessary to extend the power to cover goods specifically arriving by highway."
> The amendment to the act places all forms of transportation on an equal footing with regard to "in bond" transportation and establishes for the shipping public the same privileges in the movement of international traffic by the several media.
> If it develops that this bill is to come before a house committee at which witnesses will appear, it is the desire of this association to have a representative present to register the trucking industry's strong support of the bill.

The other letters on the file are my replies to the different people who have written.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister would put them all on Hansard we could see them.

Mr. Casselman: Put the answers on the record.

Mr. McCann: I am reading them as they come; I am not picking them out.

Mr. Drew: You have missed a few.

Mr. Casselman: You are reading every fourth letter.

Mr. McCann: There they are. It is just what happens in the case of almost everything that comes before the house. Just as we have opposition so do we have letters from people who commend our action. It is a case of majority rule.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it from what the minister has said that this privilege will be granted to all trucking companies. The minister read quite a long list and I take it it will be general.

Mr. McCann: Yes. There would be certain regulations that would apply to all companies, and one would be the matter of bond. This was raised by the leader of the opposition, although he did not express it in just this way. We would not bond a truck that was put together with hay wire. It would have to be sufficiently substantial that it could not be broken into.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that this matter has been before the minister's department and I suppose other departments for some years, that is the matter of bonding trucks.

Mr. McCann: Representations, yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Has this been a gradual development or has something happened this year, perhaps in the way of special representations to the department, to change the view which I understand has prevailed in the past?

Mr. McCann: No, nothing especial happened during the year that I know of except increased transportation by truck. These people claim that they should be treated on the same basis as the other transportation companies.

Mr. Drew: I gather from what the minister has just said that he feels that truck traffic of this kind is being impeded by the existing restrictions upon the movement between Canada and the United States.

Mr. McCann: I am of the opinion that they think they are not getting as much of the traffic as they would if they were allowed to truck in bond to interior warehouses.

Mr. Drew: Without going into too precise detail, could the minister inform us what the regulations would be before a truck of this type would be permitted to ship in bond?

Mr. McCann: We have not gone exhaustively into the matter of regulations, but a trucking company would have to put up sufficient bond, based I presume upon its volume of business. When it received a licence it would have to put up a bond that it would be responsible for the customs duties on the goods held in the sufferance warehouse.

Mr. Drew: The minister has given us a long list of trucking companies already moving between Canada and the United States and I recognize quite a number of them as being highly reputable trucking firms. I gather that there would be no limitation on goods being carried in bond so long as the trucking companies could meet the requirements of the department?

Mr. McCann: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: That being so does that not impose upon the department the requirement of providing fairly extensive supervision, such as is now the case with regard to the railroads?

Mr. McCann: As the hon. gentleman knows, the railroads are bonded. I do not think it would impose a lot more work on the department in the way of supervision. If the quantity of goods coming in is worth X dollars, they would have to be examined at one place or the other, thus distributing the load to a certain extent. If you needed examiners in a sufferance warehouse in Toronto you probably would need fewer at Niagara Falls and Fort Erie. But this is a business that is increasing enormously. A few months ago I visited our points of entry from the United States at Lacolle, Black Pool, Windsor and other places. The amount of business coming over the bridge from Detroit and through the tunnel is enormous, and it is the same at Lacolle, Black Pool and these other places. There are great big yards where scores of trucks wait their turn, and probably have to wait a day or two. I suggest that if these trucks could have a bonded seal put on them, and they had to go to Toronto, Guelph or any of those interior points, you could clear them in much less time, let them proceed, have their loads unloaded there and put in a bonded warehouse, let the appraisers do their work, collect your customs, and you would be speeding up the business for the department and giving better service to the public.

Mr. Drew: In indicating the nature of this movement, the minister referred particularly to places fairly near the border.

Mr. McCann: That is only an illustration.

Mr. Drew: I was not raising it by way of criticism because as a matter of fact I agree with him. That is the place where this facility would really be of the greatest advantage. I noticed that he placed in order Guelph and Toronto, and I was not going to question the appropriateness of the sequence of the names of the two cities.

Mr. Martin: You had better place Windsor first.

Mr. Drew: Just as an example, I would be interested to know what northern cities in Quebec and Ontario we can take that would have facilities of warehouses of this kind.

Mr. McCann: Probably in Quebec there would be Arvida, Shawinigan Falls, Chicoutimi, and Quebec city itself. In Ontario there would be North Bay, Timmins, Sudbury, places of prominence where shipments and importations to those particular places would warrant it.

Mr. Drew: The minister has mentioned a large list of trucking services, and I will agree that in every case he has mentioned they are highly reputable firms with a long established background of service in their own particular type of transportation. Nevertheless he indicates this would be available to an extended list of trucking services, and all those would have the opportunity to operate this bonded service through to the points north that he has mentioned. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. McCann: Yes.

Mr. Drew: The minister indicates that is so. May I raise the question as to whether he does or does not think that this would call for a greater measure of supervision than is called for now in the case of railways operating over certain limited lines to these same northern points which he has just mentioned.

Mr. McCann: It might well be that would be the case, but we would be prepared to give that service to the public.

Mr. Gibson: May I ask whether there is any limit on how far south we can go? The minister said a short time ago that it was a reciprocal arrangement with sufferance warehouses on the other side. Would there be any limit at all?

Mr. McCann: I do not know of any limit. I know that a lot of these trucking companies that go into the United States have made arrangements with the different states into which they go. I do not think one general permission allows them to go into any state in the union. The states have different state laws, but the big trucking companies probably do a substantial business to the state of New York or to Pennsylvania, and they would arrange for permission to travel over the highways of those states.

Mr. Drew: Can the minister inform us whether it is not a fact that there are a number of states that have restrictive laws which would not permit delivery of this kind?

Mr. McCann: That is true. They have got to make their own arrangements.

Mr. Drew: Will the minister tell us what states permit delivery of this kind and what states do not?

Mr. McCann: I cannot name all the forty-eight states, although I used to be able to. I know that a lot of Canadian trucks go as far south as Florida, and many of them go into Pennsylvania and the western states along the coast. They go into the states of Washington, California, and so on. I would point out to the hon. gentleman that I do not know of anybody coming to reside in Canada and moving household furniture from the United States, or moving it from Canada to the United States, who would not sooner do it by truck than by rail.

Mr. Drew: But they are not affected by this.

Mr. McCann: It is a part of the business.

Mr. Drew: They are not affected by this amendment.

Mr. McCann: Not at all. It is a part of their business, and I am stating that to show the demand there is for truck service.

Mr. Drew: That is quite true, and that is exactly why I am asking some of these questions. I know and have reason to know the nature of the activities of some of the trucking services he has mentioned. Some of these trucking services do travel as far south as Florida and they come back with loads the other way.

Mr. McCann: That is true.

Mr. Drew: But this amendment would not affect them at all. These are the kind of trucking services that would carry a load of one kind to Florida and carry a load of fruit back. There are a number of trucking services on the other side of the line that would carry their loads here, clear customs in the ordinary way at the border and carry a load back. This is something entirely different. This is a case of bulk movement in something that approaches the volume of railway services. I think one thing that members should keep in mind is that we are getting into something quite different from ordinary trucking services. I heard some reference made today to the fact that certain hon. members had seen the advantage of these facilities as they travelled to western Canada by United States roads. That is so.

We know that a great number of cars and other things available for sale are moved in that way, but there are also a great many things that are moved from the United States into Canada in that way and through Canada. This applies to the handling of goods in bulk under bond, and that is not something that the ordinary trucking service is handling. If it were not that I have such a complete belief in the responsibility of ministers I might be led into the belief that there might be a bill of goods sold to the minister with regard to some of these details. I hope that is not the case. I do not want to suggest anything of that kind, but I should like to feel that the minister is absolutely convinced that there is a need for the particular facilities that are being given in this case as distinguished from the movement of goods back and forth by truck which is open to everyone now without an amendment of this kind.

I do not want to inject a controversial note into this matter, but the minister knows, as I know, that this is something that has been urged for some time, and that strong objections have been raised as well as arguments in its favour. I should like to know why it is that, at the very time when we have reason to be most careful about the maintenance of our highways and the weight of the loads that will come here, we should make an amendment which in its effect might conceivably facilitate the trucking of loads and their delivery but at the same time would certainly result in heavier loads being moved over these highways.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, we have got into a general discussion of the trucking business. To answer the hon. member's question, I am absolutely convinced that the time has arrived to set up sufferance warehouses in Canada for the benefit of the general public, to meet the needs of the department and to put the trucking business on an equal basis with other common carriers.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCann: May I add that nothing has occurred at this particular time to bring it about. The amendment has been in contemplation for some time. We wanted to bring it in a year ago. Owing to the condition of the order paper it was postponed for a year.

Mr. Drew: I can understand the minister's explanation, in view of the pressure of work at that time; but I would point out that if there are no special circumstances which call for this amendment at this time from the point of view of extending this service, there are reasons against it. I do not want to labour this point except to suggest that if this change will produce a larger volume of goods moving in bulk, this is not the time to take such a step. Over and over again in this house we have heard of the difficulty in obtaining cement and the other supplies essential for the maintenance and extension of road services in this country. I do not believe for one moment that our friends in the United States will in any way question our good judgment if, when highways are going to be placed under heavy use and supplies are not as freely available as they were previously, we decide we should not do something which would have the effect of increasing the wear and tear on those highways.

Mr. Catherwood: I believe the minister said this afternoon that sufferance warehouses would not be set up in any locality where there was no customs office. I believe we all agree that the object of subsections 4 and 6 of section 11 is good. Now if a transport company wanted to establish a sufferance warehouse at a point where there is no customs office at the present time, would the minister give consideration to the establishment of such a warehouse if business warranted it?

Mr. McCann: The gist of my hon. friend's question is "if business warrants it." If business warrants changes, either in the opening of customs offices or the establishment of sufferance warehouses or anything else, certainly we will use our best efforts to bring facilities up to date.

Mr. Hatfield: Take the case of a truck going to Florida with a load of potatoes and coming back with a load of fruit. Would it have to go through a bonded warehouse to get cleared? Could it not clear at the point of entry?

Mr. McCann: Certainly; it could either clear at the port of entry or go through to a bonded warehouse.

Mr. Drew: The question and answer just given indicate exactly why I hope no hon. members will be under any illusions as to the effect of this amendment. In the ordinary case a truck with a uniform load will not be affected in any way by this amendment; it will be cleared at the border in the usual way. It is these huge bulk loads that need to be broken up which call for this change at this time. In view of the nature of the discussion, in view of the fact that the minister has said no special circumstances have arisen which call for this amendment, I move that this bill be referred back to the committee on railways and shipping so we may hear the evidence which would support an amendment of this nature at this time.

Mr. McCann: The hon. gentleman appears to think this could be done all in a few weeks. I do not anticipate that this is going to have practical application immediately. We are passing the legislation which will give us authority to handle sufferance warehouses when they are established. Before they can be established in any province these trucking companies will have to take up the matter with the provincial government and ascertain what regulations that government has in reference to the use of its highways, and many other matters that will no doubt come up. So it is not a question of whether they can get steel and other materials to build super-highways. That may happen, but it will be sometime in the future.

Mr. Drew: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise and report progress, and that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways and shipping.

Mr. McCann: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I submit that at this stage the bill cannot be referred to a committee.

The Chairman: That is right. However, I will accept the motion that the committee rise and report progress; that is in order.

Motion negatived: Yeas, 19; nays, 57.

The Chairman: Shall the section carry?

LENGTH AND MASS UNITS ACT

DEFINITION OF CANADIAN STANDARD YARD AND POUND

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 293, respecting units of length and mass.

Mr. Fulton: Is the parliamentary assistant going to give any explanation?

Mr. McIlraith: I can make a statement concerning the bill either now or in committee, as hon. members may wish. I am completely in the hands of hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fulton: I believe the minister should make an explanation, if he will, of this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the primary standards of weights and measures are now defined in the Weights and Measures Act. The unit of length is fixed with reference to a specific bar, and that of the Canadian pound by reference to a specific weight of metal. In defining the primary standards to be used, it is obviously desirable that there be uniformity of standards all over the world. On the other hand, it must be realized that any given bar of metal or a given weight will vary slightly from time to time. It is quite true that the change is very slight in any one year. It is so slight it is almost impossible to measure it. But over a period of decades the amount of change may be of practical significance.

The present Canadian fundamental standards of length and mass were received from the British government in 1873, when our first Weights and Measures Act was passed. They were accurate copies of the imperial standards which, at that time, were representative of the finest technique in precise measurement. In the intervening eighty years there has been a great deal of advance in the science of metrology, including the establishment of special laboratories in all the principal countries of the world for making precise measurements, such as our own division in our national research council laboratory.

This development has led to the recognition of the fact that the old standards of yard and pound are changing very slightly. On the other hand, the international metre and kilogram standards established at the international bureau of weights and measures at Paris have been found to be remarkably constant. For these reasons it was suggested, at the royal society empire scientific conference in 1946, that the standard yard be referred to the international metre and the pound to the international kilogram by fixed ratios. If all nations agree to the same ratios between yard and metre, and between pound and kilogram, then there will be only one standard length and one standard weight. Therefore, even if there should be very slight changes in these fundamental standards in the course of centuries, no difficulty will arise in international commerce and international science.

Actually in the United Kingdom there is an order in council of 1898 that defines the ratio of the pound and the kilogram, and there is a similar act in the United States giving the same ratio. This bill proposes to establish this same ratio for Canada. This ratio is the same as the present Canadian standard pound, so that there would be no change except that any future change of the actual standard pound would be of no consequence. The ratio used in the bill for the yard and the metre is between that actually applying to the standard yard of the United Kingdom and the United States, and is that recommended by the royal society empire scientific conference. It has the endorsation of many standardizing bodies and scientific societies, both in the countries of the commonwealth and in the United States.

By this bill units of measurement will be based on standards, the stability of which has been proved as nearly perfect as can be attained. The second part of the bill establishes that the operation of maintaining the standard yard and the standard pound at the proposed values is the responsibility of the national research council, and that they will supply reference standards calibrated in terms of the fundamental standards to other government departments. That is a logical step to take. It will be recalled that in the national research council legislation one of the powers of the council has to do specifically with maintaining units of weight and measurement.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As a matter of information, is the parliamentary assistant in a position to say whether those standards are kept in Canada, that is the ones he referred to, the bar and the weight? Second, what instruments are used for the kilogram and for the metre? Are they similar to those referred to in the first place?

Mr. McIlraith: The present Canadian primary standards are maintained at the national research council. The international metre is maintained at the international bureau of weights and measures at Paris. The method of measurement of that particular bar, which is the most constant one of all the bars of measurement in the United Kingdom, the United States, France or Canada, is by wave length of light.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What about the pound, then, and the kilogram?

Mr. McIlraith: With respect to the kilogram, I am afraid it is too technical to explain. I could very easily get the explanation for the hon. member, if he wants it. It is checked periodically by the international conference of scientists, that is the kilogram, and it is the more technically perfect unit.

Mr. Fulton: I have two questions. Did I understand the parliamentary assistant to say that the ratios adopted by the United Kingdom and the United States are slightly different? The other question is, are there any important countries with whom we have any volume of trade and commerce who have not adopted similar standards, so that some difficulty would be created in trading with them?

Mr. McIlraith: If I may deal with the last point first, Mr. Chairman, any difference between the present primary standard of length and the one now proposed is so small as to be beyond any industrial significance at all. It would be something less than one part in one million. With respect to the present Canadian pound and the one defined in the bill, it is rather interesting, but at the moment it is identical. That pound is also identical with the British pound, so that at the moment the three are identical.

With respect to the yard, there is a slight difference between the U.S. yard and the United Kingdom yard. In this definition we are adopting a definition of the empire scientific conference, which is in between the United States and United Kingdom standard and is slightly different from the old Canadian primary standard, something less than one part in one million.

Mr. Fulton: I take it then the difference between the three is so small it is not of any significance at the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: It is of no industrial significance whatever. It is a matter of getting a scientifically accurate definition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There seems to be one thing which is vital. Can the parliamentary assistant certify to us of his own knowledge that the pound is forty-five million, three hundred and fifty-nine thousand, two hundred and forty-three one-hundred-millionths of the international kilogram? It seems to me we do not get anywhere unless the parliamentary assistant can certify to that.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a rather interesting sidelight on the activities of a parliamentary assistant that sometimes in the course of his duties he has some interesting conversations with some of our scientific men. The physicists tell me that is so, and I am afraid I have to take their word for it. I must say that some of the conversations are most interesting on that subject, but for the life of me I could not represent that I knew very much about it.

Mr. Gibson: Can the parliamentary assistant certify what the imperial quart is?

On section 3—National research council to maintain standard.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is a statement here that the national research council shall maintain standards of length and mass calibrated in terms of the units defined in this act. Does that mean that the national research council will maintain standards which have been compared with the international standards at Paris?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, that puts the duty squarely on them. For instance, when the other legislation comes before the house having to do with weights and measures, it will be seen that it is their duty to maintain the Canadian standard yard and to maintain what are called the departmental standards in terms of the Canadian standard.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will they use the old standards?

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes; the old standards will still be retained.

PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

STATUTORY REMISSION OF SENTENCES, NORTHWEST AND YUKON TERRITORIES, AND CUSTODIAL CARE, ALBERTA

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 191, to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.

Mr. Knight: Is the minister going to make a statement at this time?

Mr. Garson: I will make a short statement, Mr. Speaker. The parliament of Canada, under its authority over the subject of criminal law, has passed in the Criminal Code a statute which defines the various crimes and offences in this country and prescribes the penalties which must be imposed upon those who have been convicted of such crimes and offences. It also provides for the manner in which such sentences shall be served.

For the purpose of considering the present bill, the governing provision here is section 1056 of the Criminal Code which provides that everyone who is sentenced to a term of imprisonment of less than two years shall, if no other place is expressly mentioned, be sentenced to imprisonment in the common jail of the district, county or place in which the sentence is pronounced, or if there is no jail there, then in the common jail which is nearest to that locality. It is in line with that provision in the Criminal Code that the Prisons and Reformatories Act is passed. It actually is an extension of this idea which is set out in section 1056 of the Criminal Code. The Prisons and Reformatories Act provides, in part I of it, for provincial prisons and reformatories generally. Then in parts II to IX the act is made applicable to different types of reform institutions in the various provinces, part II dealing with Ontario, part III with Quebec, part IV with Nova Scotia and so on.

Clause 1 of the bill before the house has to do with a provision in part I of the Prisons and Reformatories Act—that is the part which has a general application to all the provinces—for a statutory partial remission of sentence for good conduct. To grant such a remission as this is the normal procedure in most jails in the provinces of Canada. It is considered—and that is the reason why we put this clause 1 into this bill—that the same privilege should be applied to prisoners in the Northwest and Yukon Territories. The granting of this remission for good conduct is provided for in sections 18 to 21 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act. These sections do not have effect until they are proclaimed, and up until the present time they have not been proclaimed in the Yukon or Northwest Territories.

The present section 18 provides that if there is in any province a prison of such a character as to render practicable the administration of remission of sentence for good conduct, and if the lieutenant governor in council has made rules for keeping a correct record of such conduct, the governor general in council may, by proclamation, declare these sections in force within such province from and after the day named in such proclamation.

While the word "province" in these sections, by virtue of the Interpretation Act, includes both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, there is an absence of rules made by the lieutenant governor of the province in those two territories, because there is not any lieutenant governor. The purpose of clause 1 is to make it clear that, in those two territories where there is no lieutenant governor of a province, the necessary rules can be provided by action of the governor general in council.

[Mr. Garson.]

Then as to clause 2 of the bill, from time to time over the years various amendments and additions have been made to the act in order to provide for special types of institutions in the various provinces. For example, in the province of Ontario there is the Ontario reformatory and the Andrew Mercer reformatory for female prisoners; and as of recent date, there is a new type of prison in British Columbia known as the New Haven. The occasion of this clause 2 being before the chamber is that on November 18, 1950, the deputy attorney general of Alberta wrote to the Department of Justice a letter from which I should like to quote. He said:

> In this province—

That is, Alberta.

> —we are establishing a new penal institution at Bowden and it is proposed that first offenders and persons who have committed minor offences might be screened out of our jails and sent to this institution which will be operated somewhat along the lines of the prison farms in the province of Ontario.
> In order to enable the province to transfer prisoners to this new institution, I think it is necessary to make provision for the same in the Prisons and Reformatories Act and I have drafted a new part to the act to be made applicable to the province of Alberta.

It is, of course, pursuant to this request that clause 2 is introduced in the present amending bill.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, from what the minister has said, I understand that this bill, under the new section 18, gives to the governor in council discretion to declare a prison in a province to be of such a character that sections 19, 20 and 21 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act, 1927, might well be applied to it; and further, gives to the governor in council the power to declare those sections in force with regard to that particular prison.

In those provinces which qualify, there is an opportunity for a prisoner to earn certain remission of the sentence to which he has been condemned. Apparently, among the qualifications of these prisons, there must be in that prison provision for the keeping of a correct daily record of every prisoner in such prison. The terms of the clause are as follows:

> (b) rules for keeping a correct record of the daily conduct of every prisoner in such prison, noting his behaviour, industry, diligence and faithfulness and the strictness with which he observes the prison regulations . . .

I have put that on the record for the purpose of saying that, in my opinion, that is a great achievement if it will be applied in many of these institutions, because it implies a study of the individual. It is a final admission that it is only upon the basis of the study of the individual that we can put into effect a reform rather than a punitive approach. In other words, a reform program will have to be handled on the basis of the individual, whereas a mere punitive program could be handled on the treatment of the mass.

As I sat here this evening, thinking about this subject, I sent for a copy of Hansard for November 15, 1945. My mind harks back to the very fine speech made by the late member for Kindersley. I thought it was a memorable speech. While I did not have time to read all of it this evening, I did jot down one or two of the points made by the late Mr. Jaenicke on that occasion. I have noted that he praised the Archambault report and said in connection with it:

> Our penitentiary system is more a system of punishment than a system of paying attention to the reformation of the convict.

And later:

> Our present system makes real habitual criminals out of those who could be reformed and made useful members of society.

He stated further that there had been no attempt at segregation. Incidentally, Mr. Jaenicke had made a practical study of the matter by visiting Kingston penitentiary, and I believe certain others. In that connection he said:

> I find that no real progress has been made with respect to education since the commission made its report.

Then he followed by a criticism of the standard of education and the standard of training of teachers in that institution. At page 2169 he said:

> The most important item of reform which we need in Canada is the establishment of proper institutions for the treatment of young offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years.

He went a step farther and said he would include those up to twenty-three, as is done in England. It is on that that I would base the few general observations I should like to make about our penitentiaries, their inmates and the manner in which I believe our present system could be improved.

Before going further I would say—and I may elaborate on this later—that our prison system has been improved over the last few years. Nowhere is the old adage of prevention being better than cure more true than in the field of penology. Treatment and re-education are replacing the old and wasteful punitive approach. When I say "wasteful" I am not thinking altogether in terms of money, but wasteful also in terms of human resources. In passing however I would direct the attention of hon. members to page 26 of the estimates where they will see that our penal system is costing us, in round figures, $9,072,000.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to raise a point of order when the hon. member is speaking, but I would point out that the bill with which we are concerned is directed to provincial reformatories and prisons. It has nothing whatever to do with any of our federal penitentiaries.

One of the drawbacks of bringing in a discussion about federal penitentiaries in a debate dealing with provincial prisons is that if any remarks are made in extenso concerning federal penitentiaries I shall feel bound to make some reply. In this way the time of the house would be diverted to the discussion of a subject which is not before the house. I wonder if the hon. member might not see fit to make his worth-while observations, all of which we shall be delighted to hear, upon some other occasion—perhaps when the estimates of the Department of Justice are before the committee of the whole.

Mr. Knight: I would point out to the minister that the rules affecting federal penitentiaries are applicable to most of the provincial prisons. Certainly the system of education, and the treatment of young offenders, with which I propose to deal, is applicable to both. I thought when we were discussing the principle of this bill I might record my views in this connection. If on the other hand the minister has any decided objection, and would like me to postpone my remarks until we are considering the penitentiaries estimates, I could do so.

Mr. Garson: From having heard my hon. friend in the past I know that anything he will contribute will be a first-class effort, that it will be a thoughtful and helpful contribution toward the administration of our penitentiaries. But it really does put me in a very awkward position, because the bill we have before us is concerned with two simple points, namely as to whether a new part X is to be applicable to the province of Alberta and, secondly, whether this provision in the Prisons and Reformatories Act dealing with remission earned by a prisoner by good conduct shall be made applicable to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, in each case in reference to a provincial institution. In order that hon. members may have before them the whole picture I should like to be in a position to reply to any observation the hon. member may make in regard to our federal penitentiary system. That subject is not really before us at the moment.

If it will not embarrass the hon. member unduly I think perhaps it would be better if he were to discuss the matter when the justice estimates are before us.

Mr. Knight: I am always more embarrassed in making a speech than in not making one, and I would suffer no embarrassment from having to stop at the moment. I must admit that some of the points I shall make apply directly to the penitentiaries. At the same time I believe some of them apply to the type of prisons we are discussing here—because I had intended to discuss the matter from the standpoint of the psychological treatment of prisoners, particularly the younger ones. However, I see the minister's point. Probably it is well taken, and I shall reserve my remarks until a later stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Conditions on which sections 19, 20 and 21 may be declared in force.

Mr. Gillis: This bill does nothing more than to give the governor in council the right to bring certain western provinces within the scope of the national act. That act lacks something which is now going to be passed on to the provinces. It is a matter I have discussed on two or three occasions in the house. In many parts of the country prisoners are often sentenced to long or short terms in the penitentiary, and then found to be suffering from contagious diseases because of which they cannot be taken into the penitentiary. The department is now expanding that by bringing the provinces under the general national rule.

Mr. Garson: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but before he gets deeper into this argument perhaps I should indicate a correction. Apparently I did not make as clear as I tried to the distinction between the provincial prison system and the federal penitentiary system. What we are discussing here is the provincial prison system. It may seem rather anomalous that the foundation for that should be a federal statute but, as I indicated, in exercising our jurisdiction over crime we have to provide for sentences imposed in respect of violations of the Criminal Code. Where the sentence is less than two years, under our arrangement the convicted person would go to a provincial prison. To that end it is necessary for us to pass a federal statute by which we lay the foundation for provincial prison custody of those prisoners guilty of offences under the Criminal Code. I think the point my hon. friend is raising has to do with the federal penitentiary system and not with this particular matter.

Mr. Gillis: As the minister indicated, it is rather tangled up. I have no intention of arguing the thing; I merely want to ask the minister if any progress is being made in establishing a central institution to take care of those who are not acceptable in the regular penitentiaries?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am a little tangled up also. Is the minister really saying that the subject matter of this bill refers only to provincial institutions?

Mr. Garson: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And therefore it is not competent for us to comment on those provincial institutions in this debate?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all. It is quite proper to comment upon the provincial institutions, but not upon the federal penitentiary system. If we did that we would get into a lengthy debate that would have nothing to do with the matter before the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The present section 18 reads:

> If, in any province, there is at any time, a prison of such a character as to render practicable the application of the three sections next following to such province, and if the lieutenant governor makes rules for keeping a correct record of the daily conduct of every prisoner in such prison, noting his behaviour, industry, diligence and faithfulness,—

Is that in effect saying there are many provincial institutions where it is not possible to keep a correct record of the conduct of prisoners? Is that the implication?

Mr. Garson: There is no implication, it is a specific provision to the effect that where there is in a province a prison of such a character as to render practicable the application of the next three sections, which provide by statute for earned remission for good conduct—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister describe what is meant by "such a character as to render practicable"?

Mr. Garson: I think I am speaking correctly when I say that it is a character shared by all provincial prisons in all of the ten provinces of Canada. That is, it should be a properly constituted prison, properly staffed. We satisfy ourselves that they can administer a provision of this sort and then we say to them, "If you have this proper character of prison and if the lieutenant governor in council of your province will make rules for the keeping of correct records of the daily conduct of every prisoner so that you can demonstrate to us that this is not a haphazard business, but that when a man is given a statutory remission he is given it because he has earned it by his conduct according to your records; when you have done that we will pass an order of the governor in council making the sections 19, 20, and 21 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act applicable to that provincial prison". The present amendment is brought before the house because there is no lieutenant governor in council in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and therefore there is no lieutenant governor to make such rules and thus enable us to apply the statute. It is in order to enable us to provide machinery to comply with the statute and to make these same rules available in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories that this present bill is before the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then I take it that once we are satisfied that the institution is capable in the manner indicated of so conducting its affairs as to make these three sections applicable, we as a federal parliament not only have no duty but have no right to go further and comment on that provincial institution?

Mr. Garson: That is quite right.

Mr. Knight: Did I understand the minister to say that the prisons in all ten provinces are of such a character as to come under this clause?

Mr. Garson: I am speaking just from memory; I have not checked it within the last while, but I believe they would all be of that character. If anything turns on that I shall be glad to check and give the information to my hon. friend on the orders of the day tomorrow.

Mr. Knight: Is it true that every prison in every province works under rules for the keeping of correct records of the daily conduct of every prisoner?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister sure of that?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend should not come to any wrong conclusion. The good conduct which is referred to here is the good conduct provided in the following three sections, 19, 20 and 21. Perhaps I had better read those sections. They are as follows:

> 19. Any judge sentencing any prisoner to imprisonment in any prison named in the proclamation in the last preceding section mentioned, may sentence such prisoner for a term not more than one-sixth longer than the maximum term at present prescribed by law for the offence; and any such sentence may be carried out in such prison, although it is for any term not exceeding two years and four months.
> 20. Every prisoner sentenced to such prison shall be entitled to earn a remission of a portion of the time for which he is sentenced, not exceeding five days for every month during which he is exemplary in behaviour, industry and faithfulness, and does not violate any of the prison rules; and if prevented from labour by sickness, not intentionally produced by himself, he shall be entitled to earn, by good conduct, a remission not exceeding two and one-half days for every such month.
> 21. Every such prisoner who commits any breach of the laws or of the prison regulations shall, besides any other penalty to which he is liable, be liable to forfeit the whole or any part of any remission which he has so earned.

Therefore I think the good conduct which is referred to in the sections here is perhaps a rather narrower type of good conduct than that which the hon. member for Saskatoon had in contemplation regarding the general over-all welfare of the prisoner, but it is the usual statutory earned good conduct remission which is available to prisoners in provincial jails in Canada.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. Knight: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Now, by leave of the house.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 192, to amend the Petition of Right Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think it may be fairly claimed that this bill represents an important step in our legal history. As is well known, all legal proceedings by the subject against the crown in the right of Canada must be taken in the exchequer court pursuant to the Exchequer Court Act and the Petition of Right Act. The latter of these two acts requires that before the petition of right filed by the subject with the Secretary of State can be proceeded with, a governor general's fiat must first be obtained. The purpose of this bill is to abolish the necessity for securing this fiat. Thus what we propose is the abrogation of an age-old precept of our constitutional and public law. In this year 1951 we are writing the final chapter in the history of an important legal doctrine which can be traced back to the time of Edward I.

The purpose of this legislation is to place the crown in right of Canada in petition of right proceedings in the exchequer court in substantially the same position as an ordinary litigant. This will be accomplished by removing the necessity of obtaining a fiat before a petition of right can be proceeded with. If this bill be passed, as I am sure it will be, it will be possible for a citizen under the Petition of Right Act to institute proceedings against the crown in the exchequer court without the crown's consent given by fiat, just as individuals now conduct litigation against one another in that court.

In order to make the new right of the citizen more effective, the bill also provides in other respects for simplification of procedure in the exchequer court. The result of the bill will be to provide a citizen with a simple, direct, and as far as possible economical method of proceeding as of right against the crown. Since the bill marks a new phase in our legal and constitutional development, it seems appropriate for me to describe briefly its historical background. Its historical setting can be traced, as I have already indicated, to the time of Edward I in the thirteenth century, although its origin undoubtedly extends to even more ancient times. Both the legal theory and the rule of procedure adopted in consequence of that theory are now being discarded by this bill.

In their historical origin our courts were the king's courts. They were created by the king to hear and determine suits brought between subject and subject in accordance with rules of the common law. Since the courts had been created by the king and, in a very real sense, represented the monarchy in the exercise of its judicial function, it was not possible for a subject to sue the king in his own courts. However, even in those early medieval times subjects occasionally had legal claims against the crown and, since they could not sue the king in his own courts, subjects could only hope to get redress by petitioning the king for justice. Thus from very early times these petitions addressed to the king for the redress of wrongs committed by his officers have been known, as they are known in Canada now, as petitions of right, a petition to the king that right should be done.

When the king received these petitions of right it became his practice not to decide for himself, because he had set up courts for the purpose of considering matters of that sort, whether any such petition should be granted. But the king, in relation to these petitions of right, issued an order or fiat addressed to his own courts directing in effect: Let justice be done. In this way issues between the crown and subjects were brought before the courts and there determined in accordance with the law. That is the sole basis in 1951 on which petitions of right against His Majesty in the right of Canada are decided in this country.

It is this old doctrine of constitutional and public law which the government is now asking parliament to abrogate. From this point on, with the passage of this measure, the crown in proceedings in the exchequer court will be in substantially the same position as a subject. It will no longer be necessary for a subject with a claim against the crown to ask for a fiat from the crown before his case can be heard. While the taking of this step marks the formal end of an ancient legal rule, this legal change in a way is a recognition of what is already in substance an accomplished fact. It hardly needs to be said that the crown and the executive arm of government are today in no sense comparable to what they were in the thirteenth century under Edward I. The progress of our constitutional history from the day when the theory of the divine right of kings prevailed, as marked by the growth of parliament and the development of responsible government, brought us to the position today where power is vested in parliament and the people. This same development has made the crown and the executive truly responsible to parliament and the people. From time to time statutes were enacted in Great Britain to assimilate the procedure by petition of right to the ordinary procedure in the courts. That was a development in our courts parallel to the development which was taking place in parliament and in our constitution.

Soon after confederation this parliament enacted legislation designed to facilitate the trial of matters between the crown and the subject.

The first Petition of Right Act was enacted in 1876 and established the basic principle that the procedure in cases between the crown and the subject should be assimilated to that of ordinary litigation; that is to say that apart from this necessity of getting a fiat, once the fiat was obtained and the case before the courts, from that point on the proceedings were pretty much as in ordinary litigation.

In 1887 parliament created the exchequer court as the appropriate forum for the hearing of matters within the legislative jurisdiction of parliament including matters between His Majesty in the right of Canada on the one hand and any subject on the other. Since that time, as is well known, both these statutes have been amended from time to time, always with the purpose of enlarging the substantive right of the subject and of facilitating and simplifying the prosecution of his claims against the crown.

All through the piece, however, it has been necessary for the subject to secure his fiat before commencing his action. He has never been able to commence his action as a matter of right; and he still requires the permission of the crown to institute proceedings in the exchequer court. In earlier years the dominion did occasionally refuse to grant a fiat, but in later years such instances have become increasingly rare. For many years past it has been the invariable practice to grant a fiat; hence the subject really has not been obstructed from asserting his right by any technical advantage arising out of this ancient legal precedent. Indeed, it was found that the procedure of first requiring a fiat—and I mentioned this when the same subject matter was under debate on a previous occasion—was not without its practical advantages. While the request for the fiat was being considered it was often possible for a clearer view to be taken of the respective rights of the crown and the subject. As a result settlements were made in some cases, and unsubstantial claims were often dropped, which might not have been the case if steps had been taken automatically as will be possible from this point on. While we are now abolishing the fiat, in practice, as I have contended before and still maintain, as long as these fiats were granted almost automatically the necessity of obtaining them did not appear to work a practical hardship, and the delay occasioned by the necessity of obtaining a fiat quite often served a useful purpose.

However, in recent years the expanding role of government has given more prominence to the position of the crown as a litigant in court proceedings. As the role of government has grown its activities have impinged much more frequently upon the citizens at large, and as a result there has been some increase in the volume of litigation between the crown and the subject. The government has given careful study and consideration for some considerable time to the position as it now stands. As I have indicated, there have been several changes in the Petition of Right Act and the Exchequer Court Act, each having the effect of enlarging the right of the subject and making it easier for him to pursue it. As hon. members will recall, last session parliament adopted a special measure in respect of certain operations of a business or quasi-business nature carried on by virtually all the crown corporations of this government. That was the Statute Law Amendment Act, 1950. This statute placed a large number of crown corporations and agencies in the position of being amenable to the jurisdiction of Canadian courts in much the same way as ordinary corporations. These statutory corporations, created for the exercise of limited functions, are agents of the crown, it is true; but their activities are now governed to a large extent by the rules and laws applicable to ordinary persons and companies in the country. The legislation enacted last year, one admits at once, was directed to a more specialized problem than that raised in the present bill; but it does indicate the concern this government feels for the position of the individual citizen in this modern world, when he is confronted with the operation of government agencies in many places and in connection with his own business.

In these changes I have referred to and in the one now recommended we have had to keep in mind two important balancing factors. On the one hand there is the obvious consideration that the citizen, as a litigant, should have an economical and effective method of pursuing his claims against the crown. I suggest, however, that this must be balanced by an equally important consideration, namely that in the interests of the general body of the citizens as taxpayers this litigation against the crown should be carried on as economically and efficiently as possible. These two balancing considerations should be taken into account not only in the substantive rights of subjects in proceedings against the crown but also in respect of the procedure to be adopted in providing remedies for those substantive rights; and it is in line with this development that the government now feels it is proper to recommend to parliament that the ancient rule of requiring a fiat before the crown itself can be sued ought to be completely abolished.

The step which is being taken in this bill follows logically from the development of our whole legal history and in particular from the successive measures that have been enacted by this parliament since confederation. For some considerable period of time our citizens have been able to proceed against the crown as a matter of course because fiats were in no case refused. The enactment of this legislation will enable them to do so as a matter of right. This bill, therefore, represents a real milestone in the development of our law and our constitution. It represents a clear recognition of the realities of our modern life; and its enactment will not only make it easier for a citizen to pursue his claim against the crown but will give all people absolute assurance that in the conduct of its operations the government is not sheltering behind a refusal to grant a necessary fiat.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister and the government on the change of heart that has taken place with respect to the subject of this bill. It is not long ago that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) pointed out in this house that there was really no need for the removal of this bar to the right of the subject to equality in the courts. My memory recalls when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated that as far as he was concerned he would not agree to the introduction in this house of any measure that would remove the necessity of the subject petitioning for the issue of a fiat whose formula reads "let justice be done". I congratulate the government on having gone as far as it has, though my optimism does not equal that of the minister when he claims that the subject in the king's courts is now on terms of equality with the king.

Before dealing in general with this bill I would say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) that I have some doubts as to whether his manner of introducing this bill will give legality to the bill when it becomes law. As the minister has stated, since the days of Edward I the king has been in the position of superiority in so far as his relations with his subjects are concerned. One of the few prerogative rights remaining to His Majesty the King is his right not to be sued in the king's courts excepting with his leave and fiat. I feel the minister should give consideration to acquainting the house with the fact that His Excellency the Governor General has consented to this bill being introduced, for without that consent I doubt whether this bill can lawfully be passed by parliament.

Mr. Speaker, in the introduction of money resolutions there is a formula that is always used. A member of the king's cabinet invariably announces that the governor general has been made aware of the contents of this resolution, and recommends it to the consideration of the house. In the bill providing for the removal of the need of a petition of right, unless the governor general has been apprised of this bill and has consented to it, His Majesty and his representative are without consent, being divested of a prerogative that cannot be removed without that consent. By way of illustration I should like to indicate for the information of the Minister of Justice the manner in which similar legislation was introduced in the United Kingdom. On March 4, 1947, the crown proceedings bill was introduced by Viscount Jowitt, the lord chancellor, who used these words:

> In moving the second reading of the bill, I have it in command to acquaint the house that His Majesty the King, having been informed of the contents of the Crown Proceedings bill, is prepared to place the interests of the crown at the disposal of parliament in connection with the bill.

I waited, and I waited patiently, for the minister to make a similar statement, for I doubt whether the prerogative of His Majesty the King, of not being sued except by his consent, can be taken away by the House of Commons and the other place without the consent of the governor general as the representative of the king.

When the same bill came before the House of Commons, even though in the House of Lords the formula had been used by the lord chancellor, the attorney general, Sir Hartley Shawcross, in moving the second reading himself realized the need of the king consenting to the removal of one of his prerogatives which goes back to medieval days. He used these words:

> I have it in command from the king to acquaint the house that His Majesty, having been informed of the contents of the Crown Proceedings bill, is prepared to place the interests of the crown at the disposal of parliament in connection with the bill.

In my opinion the Minister of Justice will have to give consideration to a similar formula being used in this house, and also to the need of acquainting the governor general with the fact that the House of Commons is desirous of removing one of the prerogative powers of His Majesty the King. After all, the right not to be sued is one of the great remaining prerogatives of the king, and it goes back to the days of Edward I. The king's courts were and have continued to be available to the subjects of the king in litigation as between the subjects of the king, but denied to the subjects of the king against him because "the king can do no wrong." There should be no failure to carry out every fundamental constitutional requirement, for by this legislation parliament will take from the king a power and prerogative that antedates our own constitutional development and carries us back in the British tradition to the year 1347.

I agree with the minister when he says that this is an important constitutional change but with the qualification that it does not go as far as it should. It allows the subject in Canada, without the necessity of a fiat, to take proceedings for such matters as have hitherto required a fiat. It does not extend the right of the individual to take proceedings. His rights are covered by the Exchequer Court Act, section 18, wherein the exchequer court is given exclusive original jurisdiction in the cases set forth. Under this legislation the subject will not have the same rights against the crown that he has against the subject. He will not have the right to take actions in tort, in other words, civil wrongs that give rise to causes of action, except as to those torts comprised within the present provisions of the Exchequer Court Act.

In the United Kingdom when they came to wipe away this archaic survival of the doctrine of the supremacy of the king and his position above the law, the legislation granted to the subject the right to take proceedings in tort, such as for slander, for libel, malicious prosecution and for actions arising out of excessive jurisdiction on the part of courts martial convened in the name of the king. The individual, under United Kingdom act of 1947, has equal rights of action against the servants of the king for all wrongs as he would have if committed by another subject.

It is interesting to read the debate in the House of Lords. Under the act passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom the right to take proceedings in tort was granted to every subject with a few exceptions. The Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) is in his seat and will be interested to know that the post office was specifically excepted from action for any wrongdoing in the transmission of messages. It became necessary too to except the army, navy and air force from certain types of action. For instance, as stated by Lord Jowitt, an exception was incorporated in the bill, that no action could be taken for negligence by a non-commissioned officer or soldier against a superior officer; otherwise one could conceive of an action being taken against Lord Raglan by a soldier for injuries received in the Battle of Balaklava. In the course of his remarks the lord chancellor said:

> To give a simple illustration, let me take the charge of the Light Brigade. Could a trooper who took part in that charge, whose leg was shattered by a cannon-ball, have brought an action against Lord Raglan (I think it was), to recover damages on the ground that Lord Raglan had blundered?

He concluded action might be taken if not specifically denied.

After he had finished his speech Lord Raglan, a descendant of the general who gave the order at Balaklava, rose and said this:

> The noble and learned viscount having referred to my great-grandfather by name, I would just like to say that his responsibility for the charge of the Light Brigade is not regarded by historians as by any means so certain as the noble and learned viscount suggested.

There was living history and tradition. The right of the subject to take action against the crown will be assured without the necessity of the issue of a fiat only so far as the restricted jurisdiction of the exchequer court now provides when this bill is passed but his right to sue in tort will not be widened. It will still be restricted to proceedings against the crown as provided for under the Exchequer Court Act. Having regard to the extension of government into business, referred to by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), and the many ramifications that arise by reason of the variety of relationships between emanations of the crown and the individual, I suggest that the time has come to extend to the individual in this country equality in the matter of rights of action in every respect as provided for under the act in force in the United Kingdom. Otherwise all parliament will have done is to remove what the Minister of Justice states is a mere formality, claiming as he does that seldom if at all has the crown in recent years, in the right of the Attorney General of Canada, refused any subject his right to take proceedings in the courts of law. Our constitution is constantly being changed to meet changing conditions; and this bill makes for a constitutional change to meet changing conditions.

The chief justice of Canada, the distinguished father of the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), in a case in the supreme court provided a definition of the constitution in words that I am going to use at this moment:

> The constitution of Canada does not belong either to parliament, or to the legislatures; it belongs to the country and it is there that the citizens of the country will find the protection of the rights to which they are entitled.

This constitutional change will add to the rights of Canadians.

Were one on this occasion to be inclined to self-adulation, one might point out that member after member on this side of the house has been asking for several years for the removal of this clog upon the right of the individual to take proceedings. Among them were the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), and the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith); and personally, I raised the matter over ten years ago. It was suggested too that when legislation was introduced to remove this archaic survival of ancient days in our constitution, the rights of the individual should be extended beyond those that now exist, and that the subject should be placed in equality with regard to the king as he is in actions that can be taken against fellow citizens. In modern days the principle of requiring a fiat has become indefensible. The king was and is the fountain of justice, yet when an action is to be taken, justice could be refused by the custodian of the king's conscience. That requirement has now been removed and that is a step forward. For that step I congratulate the Minister of Justice. But at the same time I suggest that having gone so far along the road in extending to the subject equality with the king, one thing more remains to be done, namely to extend the rights of the individual so that there will, in fact, be in the king's court equality of the individual with the king and his representatives.

My hon. and learned friend also avers that procedure has been simplified and that one of the aims of this legislation is to assure economy to the subject seeking the king's justice and also at the same time to assure economy in so far as the taxpayer is concerned. With those two objectives I agree; but I submit that in order to secure economy and in order to extend the ambit of the field of justice to individuals in our country, wherever they may live, another step should be taken, namely to abolish the exclusive jurisdiction now possessed by the exchequer court and the giving to the subject of the alternative right to proceed against the crown in the ordinary courts of the land.

Furthermore in simplifying procedure, rules should be made—and I think they would have to be passed by parliament—to enable discovery of documents as against the crown. The individual in an action against the crown has the right to ask for the discovery of documents; but His Majesty's ministers have the right to say that it is not in the public interest to produce the documents asked for. I feel that the right of the minister to exercise that authority in the public interest should be circumscribed to a certain extent. Certainly the safety of the state and the public interest are of foremost consideration. But the minister, representing one of the crown corporations of our country, in actions against the crown corporation, should not be allowed to raise as an answer to the request for the production of documents that it is not in the public interest to produce those documents, without having those documents produced to the judge trying the case so that he himself may conclude whether there is foundation for the claim or reservation made by the minister.

I can think of two or three cases against the wheat board, and other emanations of the crown, wherein the stand has been taken that it is not in the public interest to produce documents. That excuse might be used as a means whereby documents are not to be produced, because of the fact that the interests of the government might sometimes be regarded by ministers as the interest of the state. I feel some measure in that regard should be brought into being in order to simplify the procedure.

There have been two cases in connection with the discovery of documents as against the crown, neither of which I have looked up for the present debate, but I recollect the events and circumstances connected with them. In one case from Australia there was an appeal in connection with the refusal on the part of the minister to produce documents of a crown corporation, on the ground that it was not in the public interest. The privy council held that when a minister avowed it was not in the public interest, that was the end. On the other hand during the days of the war, the First Lord of the Admiralty refused to produce certain documents on the ground that it was not in the public interest to produce them. The House of Lords held that the documents had to be produced to the trial judge who, after perusal, would conclude whether or not there was a sound basis for the refusal on the part of the king's minister to produce a document.

I am not going into anything controversial on this occasion, but it is conceivable that a refusal to produce documents by a crown corporation could result in a denial of justice within the king's courts. The decision that the public interest would deny the production of a document should rest with the judiciary.

The minister very properly stated that business and government, or government in business, is expanding at a very great rate —and that is true. The rights of the subject are being diminished as the powers of the executive are being increased. We find year after year that the executive has been entrenching upon the rights of the individual and, in statutes and also by orders in council, has been denying the right of the individual to question in the courts of law any act performed by a minister of the crown under a statute or order in council, or by anyone acting through or under him.

Sir, if our democracy is to mean freedom of the individual, then no citizen should be denied the right of appeal to the courts when, in the opinion of that citizen, an injustice has been done. In introducing this measure the minister has granted a right to the individual which, as he has said, was almost ephemeral in so far as its material existence was concerned. He would perpetuate his name as a great minister of justice were he to insist that no statute or order in council, wherein the right of an individual to appeal to the courts is denied, would longer be countenanced by him or the government.

I think of several orders in council which provide that no individual citizen in this country could lodge any proceedings against the crown for wrongdoings. The opposition took a strong stand in that behalf when the Foreign Exchange Control Act came before the house and a section was inserted in the act which provided that where there was wrongdoing on the part of the officials of the crown under that act a citizen could take proceedings, but would be restricted to nominal damages, and no costs.

I suggest to the minister that, having regard to his desire as expressed tonight to assure to the individual equality before the law, he should take the bureaucrats off the pedestals they sit upon, immune from responsibility to the courts, and place them in a position where citizens whose rights have been interfered with illegally shall have recourse to the courts when injustice has been done to them. That would be a step along the road toward raising the status of the citizen. To use the minister's expression, that would be a milestone in the achievement of the rights of the individual.

While parliament sits, orders in council are still being issued placing ministers of the crown in a position of absolute power. The king's courts are being denied to those whose rights are interfered with. I have in my hand an order in council dated May 16, 1951, dealing with priority regulations, the purpose of which is a good one. It grants to the minister the power requiring any person who produces or deals in or has in his possession any essential supplies to deal with them as directed and to furnish information as directed.

Those powers may be necessary, although I cannot justify the right of a minister to place a minister or a bureaucrat above the law. The order in council contains the following term:

> Where any person fails to fulfil any contract or obligation whether made or assumed before or after the effective date of these regulations, and such failure is due to compliance on the part of such person with any order made under the authority of these regulations after such contract or obligation was made or assumed, proof of that fact shall be a good defence to any action or proceeding against such person in respect of such failure.

While parliament is sitting a minister of the crown by order in council is granted the power to decide that where a breach of contract takes place, where the rule of law has been abrogated the fact that a breach of contract resulted from his orders shall be a defence in the courts of law. In my opinion power such as that above the courts should not be entrusted to a mere human being, no matter how high his position in the ministry of the country may be.

Under this bill the rights to sue the crown without leave in the courts of the land will be granted to the individual, and the fiction that the king can do no wrong, which goes back, as the minister has said, to the days when the king was absolute, when justice was an emanation of the crown, will be terminated. Parliament should go further and remove the unjustifiable abrogation of the right of the individual which places a minister of the crown or anyone acting on behalf of the minister above the king's courts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Filing of petition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What consideration was given by the minister or by the law officers of the crown to acquainting the governor general with the fact that the House of Commons intended to abrogate an ancient prerogative, one of the few still possessed by the king? And, second, was the governor general made acquainted with the contents of this bill and did he indicate he was prepared to place the interests of the crown at the disposal of parliament?

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has raised what perhaps may be an important point. I have not given consideration to it. I assume that if there is anything to the point raised by my hon. friend, it has been fully considered by the law officers of the crown and that the assent to which my hon. friend refers may have been considered to be appropriately given when, as my hon. friend knows, the representative of the king assents to the bill before it finally becomes law.

However, as my hon. friend has raised this point I shall certainly make it my business to confer specifically with the law officers of the crown concerning it. If it is necessary that assent should be obtained in a preliminary way, as he has indicated on the basis of the precedent which he brought to the attention of the house, then that assent will be obtained and announced on the third reading. In that way we will clear the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend says he takes it for granted that, when the crown gives assent to the bill and it becomes law, that will be assent on the part of the crown. I point out to him that in connection with money bills the final offering of the governor general's signature does not legalize the expenditure or the taxation unless the governor general has been made acquainted with the purposes for which the resolution was introduced in parliament and has given his approval.

As I pointed out in my earlier remarks, in the House of Lords and the House of Commons the attorney general, Sir Hartley Shawcross, and the lord chancellor, Viscount Jowitt, both made it clear before they moved second reading that His Majesty had consented to having removed from his power a prerogative power, namely, the right not to be sued in the king's courts of law except with his consent.

I feel that further consideration should be given to this matter. I doubt whether the use of the formula on third reading suggested by the Minister of Justice would be sufficient, for it would be impossible to ratify what had been done earlier by consent acquired after parliament had in fact passed the bill through the House of Commons and the other place. The minister might get some help from the fact that a similar question in connection with the queen's prerogative took place during the reign of Elizabeth.

We may say that all of these things are traditional; we may say that the introduction by a minister of the crown of a money bill is traditional; but we must never lose sight of the fact that parliament is composed of the crown, the Senate and the House of Commons. I have brought up this matter so there will be no possibility of the question being raised in the future that parliament acted hastily without securing the consent of the king's representative to remove from his person one of his ancient and remaining prerogative powers.

Mr. Coldwell: Is not the formula followed in the house by a minister when introducing a resolution fiction rather than fact?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would be illegal if it were not pronounced.

Mr. Coldwell: Is it not fiction rather than fact? Is it not the fact that under our parliamentary system and our system of budgeting, of necessity the government or the cabinet alone must approve of the recommendation to the House of Commons of expenditure of money in order to keep the budget intact? Consequently that fiction is used. I well remember the late prime minister explaining on one occasion how this fiction worked. I am not going to give the explanation he gave because it was perfectly clear to me thereafter that it was not a fact but rather was a fiction. The right to sue the crown has been established in various parts of the British dominions without consulting His Majesty or his representative, and without any disrespect to either His Majesty or His Majesty's representative. I know that in Saskatchewan, for example, where they set up certain crown companies, the right to sue was included in the statutes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have that in many of ours.

Mr. Coldwell: And in many of ours. That is true. Consequently it seems to me that, while the point is an interesting one and one that perhaps is worth bringing before the house and placing before the government for consideration, it should not carry any weight against the passage of this bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why would the lord chancellor and the attorney general see His Majesty?

Mr. Coldwell: Why would the lord chancellor and the attorney general see His Majesty regarding this? I think that in Great Britain, close as they are to His Majesty the King, they rather like to preserve these niceties to a greater extent than we are apt to do in the overseas countries where we have not the king but the king's representative. After all, under our constitutional practice the king can do no wrong because of course he does what parliament decides shall be done. It is no longer possible for the king or indeed the king's representative, except in theory, to veto something that the lords and commons have done together, or that the House of Commons and the Senate have done. We have had two or three examples of this in our history.

I remember reading the story of the passage of the legislation doing away with the purchase of commissions in the British army, I think it was. When Gladstone took the bill to Her Majesty Queen Victoria the queen, who disliked the bill very much, said when she got down to it in the pile: "I am not going to sign that bill." As I remember the story, it runs something like this. Mr. Gladstone said very respectfully: "But Your Majesty must sign that bill." The queen said very indignantly: "How dare you say 'must' to me? I am the Queen of England." Mr. Gladstone said: "Yes, Your Majesty, and I represent the people of England." The queen signed the bill.

Then there was the passage of the British parliament act in 1911, I believe, as to which there was some objection on the part of the crown, but the crown gave way when the prime minister indicated very clearly that it was the will of the elected representatives of the people, and there was also withdrawal of opposition on the part of many of the lords on perhaps another consideration. I think the time has come when we all realize that in reality His Majesty is the symbol of authority rather than the ruler. While we respect that symbol, we none the less regard ourselves as supreme in our own right as representing the people in democratic legislatures. I must confess that, while I think the point is a very interesting one, I do not think it has any bearing on why we should or should not pass this particular measure.

Mr. Garson: The point now before the committee has to do with whether or not it will be sufficient to signify this approval on third reading. Addressing myself to that one point, I would refer the committee to Sir T. Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, fourteenth edition, page 784, where it says:

> In the case of bills which have been mentioned in the speech from the throne, no communication is required in respect of the king's interests until the third reading. But the fact that a bill affecting the interests of the crown—

I understand that is my hon. friend's argument.

> —has been mentioned in the speech from the throne does not exempt it from the need of such a communication.

That is, at third reading. In case my hon. friends do not recall it, in the speech from the throne toward the end the following statement appears:

> You will be asked to consider measures respecting federal grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation of crown property, the abolition of the requirement of the fiat in the case of petitions of right, and the bequests of Laurier House and Kingsmere.

Therefore I think there is no question but what, since this matter has been referred to in the speech from the throne, the indicating of the king's approval, if that be necessary in the present instance—and I wish to confer with the law officers as to whether that be the case—will be available at quite an appropriate time if it is brought down on that occasion.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask a question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I was a little surprised at the rather casual manner in which he wiped out the formalities as doctrinaire, and I think he also used the word "fiction". I should like to ask him this question. In the instance he gave of Gladstone and Queen Victoria he does not refer to Gladstone as saying: It does not matter whether you sign or not. Gladstone said, "You must sign." In other words, it was a very essential part of the effectiveness of the law. When we pass measures in this house, as I understand, we resort to the Senate and the governor general or his representative is there and he approves of the legislation. Then and not till then does it become effective.

If that is so, why does the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar treat, as I understood him to do, as a sort of trivial formality, something we could dispense with if we liked, the preceding consent of the governor general before the bill in proper cases is introduced into this house? As I understood the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, he thought that was something we did just because it was a pretty thing to do, but that it was not essential. Where does essentiality begin and end? I find it very puzzling to know just how many of these things, if any, you have to regard merely as pleasant relics of antiquity, and how many you have to regard as essential. I was very interested in what the hon. member for Lake Centre said tonight on the point of this measure being produced here without apparently being referred to His Excellency. I note that the Minister of Justice proposes to take that point seriously and to deal with it. I am glad of that.

As a matter of fact, the very first day I ever sat in this house I think I remember the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar commenting with great approval on the ancient ceremonies that we follow. I have heard other members say that when they first came here they thought they were rather trivial and unnecessary, but that they had entirely changed their minds. I suppose that is partly because we feel our roots are in the past and that ancient observances have a great importance in that way. I come back again to my question. I should like to know the distinction which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar makes.

Mr. Coldwell: A question has been asked me as to what I consider to be essential and non-essential. I would say this is not as essential as might be the actual consultation with the king's representative on a money bill. If hon. members here who are members of the privy council will tell us how essential that is regarded and how often the governor general is apprised of the contents of a bill according to the formula they recite, then perhaps I might be able to answer the question as to what is and what is not essential. I quite agree with the hon. member for Greenwood that if this bill is passed, as I presume it will be, it will be then presented to the governor general for his signature, and I have no doubt he will sign the bill in spite of the fact that he was not apprised of its contents before it was introduced into this house, since it does not involve the expenditure of money. So I would leave it to hon. members who are members of the privy council to tell the hon. member for Greenwood how frequently the interesting formula recited to the house before the introduction of a money bill is actually a statement of fact rather than an interesting fiction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it possible that it is a statement of fact and no consultation takes place? I do not think so.

Mr. Fulton: It is with some hesitation that I express an opinion here. I was extremely interested in the quotation read by the Minister of Justice to the effect, as I think he said, that the situation would be cured by making the pronouncement on third reading. I wonder if I might suggest that the quotation does not quite take care of the situation in which we find ourselves here. Surely the situation is that while all the members of the cabinet are members of the House of Commons, they are the king's ministers. As I understand, all legislation is laid before the house in the name of His Majesty: "His Majesty by and with the consent of the house enacts as follows". Ministers who lay legislation before us do so in their capacity as king's ministers. If this bill seeks, as it does, to take away from His Majesty one of his remaining prerogatives, and on the authority of May His Majesty's consent must be obtained before that can be done, how then can his ministers ask this house to give its consent to this legislation unless they are in a position to say "We have it in command to inform the house that His Majesty consents"? They have asked us to give approval in principle on second reading. That approval we have given, though the point was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre. We are now asked to pass the bill through the committee stage and give it third reading. The house does not know because the minister has not told us—and from what has transpired I think I would be safe in saying the minister cannot tell us—that His Majesty's representative the governor general is satisfied that this prerogative should be removed.

So if the point has substance, as I think it has, I doubt whether merely making the statement on third reading will validate the proceedings. I take the liberty of expressing doubt whether it is proper for the House of Commons to proceed with this legislation which removes one of His Majesty's prerogatives until we have been told whether or not His Majesty's representative consents. I do not take the position the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar takes with respect to these formalities or relics or whatever you may call them. They may be legal fictions to a certain extent, but it is quite often the case that having due regard to a legal fiction is vital if the result is to have any validity. The fact is that the ministers are here as His Majesty's ministers. If you wish to call it a fiction that they are responsible to the king's representative I would not be prepared to enter into any extensive argument on that point. Admittedly they are members of this house and are responsible to it, but it is a fact, whether you call it a fiction or not, that under our system all authority stems from the crown. So it seems to me that obtaining the consent of the crown to the removal of this prerogative is not a formality or the mere observance of a fiction, but is something which if ignored might invalidate the whole of the proceedings the government is trying to put through.

Mr. Garson: If I am not mistaken the hon. member for Kamloops accompanied other members and myself to the other place when the king's speech was read at the beginning of the present session. In that speech His Majesty's representative indicated that this legislation to do away with the fiat would be placed before hon. members. That is a circumstance I think my hon. friend completely left out of account in the argument he just made.

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Garson: That signification of the king's view in the matter is not without significance; and the quotation from Sir Erskine May which I read a few minutes ago applies precisely to that state of affairs, where in the speech from the throne there is an indication of legislation. While that reference does not obviate the necessity for a signification of his assent, it does make it proper that the assent should be given on third reading of the bill; and that is the only question involved here. If hon. members are interested I could read a citation from Bourinot to the same effect.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to labour the point, but in regard to the matter raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to the prerogative powers of the king I refer to page 2 of May:

> The crown of these realms is hereditary, being subject, however, to special limitations by parliament; and the king or queen has ever enjoyed, by prescription, custom and law the chief place in parliament and the sole executive power. The right of succession—

I stress the next words particularly.

—and the prerogatives of the crown itself are, however, subject to limitations and change by legislative process with the consent and authority of the sovereign.

The references under that section are to the changes that have taken place in the king's title in recent years. I think the minister will find that in all those cases the representative of the king in the House of Lords and the attorney general, holding the position the Minister of Justice holds in our country, have recognized the prerogatives of the king not as fictions but as actual, existing evidences of the executive power of the king. I raised the point so that no question could be raised in the courts some day as to whether or not parliament had acted properly. Certainly the lord high chancellor of England, Lord Jowitt, one of the greatest authorities of our day on constitutional law, and Sir Hartley Shawcross, the attorney general of Britain and one of the greatest lawyers of this generation, did not for amusement only, before introducing the bill in question, point out that the king had specifically agreed to a release of his prerogative rights. If there was no purpose in that, neither of these outstanding representatives in the administration of British justice would have found it necessary to use words that had no purpose but were merely superfluous.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think possibly I might shed a little light on the analogy drawn by the hon. member for Lake Centre between the Governor General's recommendation of a money bill, and the assent which he is presently discussing. I am quoting from Bourinot, page 413, where it says:

A misapprehension has sometimes arisen as to the time when the "consent" of the crown should be given to a bill. The procedure with respect to signifying the consent is different from that in giving the recommendation of the crown. The recommendation precedes every grant of money; the consent may be given at any stage before final passage, and is always necessary in matters involving the rights of the crown, its patronage, its property, or its prerogatives.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask a question on the content of the bill. The member for Lake Centre referred to a situation in England where, when they opened very wide the right of the subject to take proceedings against the crown, they made specific reservations of one or two matters of public administration. There was a specific reservation in the case of the post office, and another one in the case of the armed forces. It occurs to me, particularly in view of the amendment to the Exchequer Court Act which was passed in 1938, and which had the effect of removing the limitation on the right of the subject to bring actions against the crown for negligence of a public servant. Formerly the limitation was that the negligence must have been in connection with a public work, but now it is the negligence of a servant in the course of his duties.

Although I do wish to see the right of action extended so far as is feasible and practicable, I believe it would be undesirable to go too far. Will the minister say what consideration was given to this question, now that the necessity for a fiat is taken away, and whether it does not open up the possibility of actions of a sort against the military forces of the country which it would not be desirable to establish.

Mr. Garson: The hon. member realizes, of course, that the actions to which he refers are those contemplated by the Exchequer Court Act. Section 19 (c) which reads:

Every claim against the crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment . . .

I rather think that those cases about which the hon. member is apprehensive are not cases in which it would be possible to establish negligence. I think that is the test. For example, there have been cases, in respect of military acts, in which it has been impossible to prove negligence, so the plaintiff has not succeeded. On the other hand, there are provisions under manoeuvre regulations, aviation crash regulations, and gunfire regulation, where consideration is given on an organized basis of compensatory payments ex gratia, even although in a particular case negligence cannot be proven, that is that the damage in question is not caused by the negligence of any person. For example, if you have a loss arising out of concussion from gunfire, in certain circumstances compensation can be made on an ex gratia basis without any negligence being involved.

I believe the hon. member's apprehension as to any unlimited liability of the crown leaves out of account the fact that in these cases the plaintiff has to prove negligence. That is not always an easy matter to prove, even where it may exist. While I am on that subject, I believe that, in fairness to our own legislation, I should point out that the hon. member for Lake Centre rather tended to leave the impression that the scope of our act was quite narrow. I believe I should point out what it does cover.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Narrower than the British act.

Mr. Garson: Yes, it is narrower than the British act. Yet I believe it would be wise to put on the record what it does cover. Even in relation to the British act it is quite wide. First of all, it says:

> The Exchequer Court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases in which the land, goods or money of the subject are in the possession of the crown, or in which the claim arises out of a contract entered into by or on behalf of the crown.

Those are two cases.

> Every claim against the crown for property taken for any public purpose.

That makes three.

> Every claim against the crown for damage to property injuriously affected by the construction of any public work.

That makes four.

> Every claim against the crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property resulting from the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment.

That makes five.

> Every claim against the crown arising under any law of Canada or any regulation made by the governor in council.

That makes six.

> Every claim against the crown arising out of any death or injury or loss to the person or to property caused by the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment upon, in or about the construction, maintenance or operation of the Intercolonial railway or the Prince Edward Island railway.

That makes seven. There is a similar provision for the Canadian National Railways and all its subsidiaries, as a crown corporation.

> The amount to be paid whenever the crown and any person have agreed in writing that the crown or such person shall pay an amount of money to be determined by the exchequer court . . .

That is on a reference to the court. That makes eight.

The exchequer court has jurisdiction in cases of conflicting application for any patent of invention, or for the registration of any copyright, trade-mark or industrial design. That makes nine.

> . . in all cases in which it is sought to impeach or annul any patent of invention, or to have any entry in any register or copyrights, trade-marks or industrial designs made, expunged, varied or rectified.

That makes ten.

> . . . in all cases in which a remedy is sought respecting the infringement of any patent of invention, copyright . . .

And so on. That is eleven. Then No. 12 is where an application to the patent office for a patent has been refused, the subject has an appeal to the exchequer court, from the decision of the commissioner of patents. That is twelve.

Again, in fairness to our legislation, it should be pointed out that the hon. member for Lake Centre has already referred to the fact that under the British legislation they provide that the crown shall be subject to all these liabilities in tort as if it were a private person of full age and capacity. But these liabilities are in respect of torts committed by the servants or agents of the crown and not by the crown per se.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The crown could not commit a tort.

Mr. Garson: I will grant that the torts that are committed by the crown, in the nature of things, are usually only committed by its servants or agents. But I also say it leaves quite a wrong impression to indicate or to imply that when we in Canada have taken care of the tort of negligence we have not taken care of by far the greater number of torts that the crown through its servants or agents can commit. I do suggest that with respect to such other torts as trespass, assault, false arrest, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, libel and slander, deceit, trover and conversion, and slander of title, it is not likely the average servant of the crown, in the course of his duties, would ever commit these torts. Therefore it does not leave an entirely correct impression to say that the British act is of much wider scope than our own; because in taking care of the tort of negligence, which accounts for the vast majority of the claims that are made against the crown, we are taking care of the great bulk of the foundations of legal liability against the crown.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) with respect to the difficulty of proving negligence in those cases to which I referred arising particularly within the armed forces. I agree that that would be exceedingly difficult on occasion. But I should imagine that there are other cases where it would not be impossible by any means to establish negligence.

They might be cases of a type where, in the general interest of the forces themselves, it should not be contemplated that a member of the forces can bring an action against the crown for the legal negligence of another member of the forces. For instance, I have in mind the type of thing arising out of accidents in preparation for actual war, in time of actual war or time of apprehended war when safety precautions are to an extent relaxed, and when what are in military eyes practically inevitable accidents occur, but in terms of legal liability it may well be possible to establish that there was negligence on somebody's part.

It is an exceedingly difficult matter and one involving public policy but I suggest, with respect, that the minister's answer that there are cases where it is almost impossible to establish negligence, nevertheless does not dispose of the whole field. I suggest to him seriously that it might be desirable, in order to deal with those particular cases, to consider whether some particular amendment—I think probably to the Exchequer Court Act—should not be introduced. I am reinforced in that view by an article which I saw in the press recently. I meant to bring the clipping down, and I regret that I did not do so. It was an article reporting a recent decision of the exchequer court awarding $30,000 damages to, my recollection is, an airman who was injured while being driven in a jeep by another airman.

The judge of the court who delivered the judgment, according to the report as I recall it, concluded by saying that this may have very important implications, particularly with respect to the payment of pensions in the future, and that it may be something which calls for legislative action. "But", he said, "that is for parliament to decide, not for me. I am interpreting the law as it exists today." I wish I had brought the clipping down with me, because it would be much more satisfactory to read it than to refer to it generally. But it seems to me to indicate that there are possibilities which should be considered.

Having removed, as I say, that former limitation that the negligence of the crown's servant must be upon a public work, it seems to me that now to take away the necessity for a fiat opens up further considerations. In Britain it was felt necessary to provide for a specific provision in their bill, to the effect that members of the armed forces and certain other people in the public service could not sue the crown for negligence of their fellow employees on the same sort of duty. I should like strongly to urge on the minister that further consideration should be given to that matter here.

Mr. Garson: I should be glad to give consideration to my hon. friend's point. But when one takes into account the fact that one must prove negligence, and that one must prove that that negligence was committed by the servant of the crown within the scope of his duties, it narrows the field considerably. For example, once in a while there are actions brought against the crown in respect of a motor vehicle accident involving servants of the crown using public motor vehicles not in the course of their duty but after hours and the like. That is not negligence in the course of duty.

Mr. Fulton: No. But may I refer the minister to an illustration of the difficulty which was given in this case by Viscount Simon in discussing the bill in the House of Lords. He was approving of the fact that there a limitation had been put in the bill making it clearly impossible for one member of the armed forces to sue the crown for the negligence of a fellow member. He said:

> To take a simple example, if a government aeroplane crashes—

I think for my purpose I should substitute "if an R.C.A.F. aeroplane crashes."

> —and it is found that the crash is due to the negligence of the pilot in landing, no member of the crew can bring any action against the pilot for damages, and, what is more, no action can be brought against the crown.

Then he goes on. It seems to me it is perfectly easy to visualize that sort of action taking place. I do not want to theorize here, but I would imagine that the approach there would be that pensions for loss of life while on service were provided to take care of hazards of the service. That is exactly what the judge of the exchequer court had in mind in the recent case to which I have referred when he said that this matter may have some important bearing in connection with pensions. "But," he said, "if legislative action is necessary, that is for parliament to concern itself with, not for me. I am interpreting the law as it exists."

I do not want to labour the point, but I think it is something that should be looked into further.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Carried. Shall clause 2 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Since it is close to eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, will the minister accommodate us by allowing us to call it eleven o'clock and give this matter consideration overnight?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up third reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act. Then we will try to pass this Petition of Right Act, and get it to third reading anyhow. Then we will take up Bill No. 338, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act; the resolution in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) to amend the Veterans Insurance Act; then Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office. If we are fortunate enough to pass all those pieces of legislation, we will move to go into supply and call three departments.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton) presented the fifth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE CONFERENCES

CANADA-U.K. CONTINUING COMMITTEE, BRITISH WEST INDIES, FRANCE, NEW ZEALAND

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement regarding trade conferences. Last week, as hon. members know, a meeting of the Canada-United Kingdom continuing committee was held here in Ottawa, and during the week end my colleague, the minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson), issued a short summary of the profitable discussions which took place. Discussions with the British West Indies followed the United Kingdom talks and are now completed.

A delegation of officials of the French government arrived in Ottawa this morning to discuss a number of problems pertaining to trade between our two countries. Members of this delegation spent yesterday in Toronto at the international trade fair, where they were welcomed as honoured guests and were able to see the merchandise of many countries now on display there. This afternoon the French delegation will begin meetings with officials of government departments concerned. It is expected that these discussions will be carried on for two or three days. The tariff agreement completed recently at Torquay between Canada and France was evidence of the desire which exists on both sides to create opportunities for trade.

Tomorrow, May 30, the minister of customs of New Zealand, who is also the associate minister of finance of that country, will arrive in Ottawa to discuss trade problems with the Canadian government. We welcome this timely visit of a distinguished minister of the crown from a sister commonwealth country. Canada has traditionally enjoyed valuable trade relations with New Zealand, and we hope that the groundwork will be laid at the present meetings for further expansion.

RECOMMENDATION OF ANGLO-CANADIAN TRADE COMMITTEE FOR COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement that has just been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and his reference to the discussions with the Anglo-Canadian trade groups, may I ask if further consideration has been given to their suggestion that a commonwealth conference should be held with an aim to increasing trade within the commonwealth?

Mr. Howe: The continuing committee made no such suggestion. We think that the work of that committee was a commonwealth conference, as it affected two countries of the commonwealth. We think the meeting with New Zealand will be a commonwealth conference, as it affects two members of the commonwealth. We hope from time to time to meet with other members of the commonwealth to discuss problems of mutual interest.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that I directed my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in view of the information he had given us about certain trade meetings. I asked if the government had considered the recommendation of the Anglo-Canadian trade committee, and I understood the minister to say that no such recommendation had been received. I find the following in the Montreal Gazette of May 19:

> The Anglo-Canadian trade committee today recommended that commonwealth governments should, at the earliest practicable date, call a commonwealth economic conference to investigate mutual trade problems.

It was to that statement, to which there was general reference subsequently in the press and elsewhere, that I was directing my remarks. The officials, some of whom are now meeting the government, were those who make up this continuing committee. I was directing my question to that committee and to the hope that this recommendation had received consideration.

Mr. Howe: I should like to set my hon. friend straight on his information. The Anglo-Canadian trade committee is made up of private citizens of both countries. It has no relation whatever to the continuing committee, which is composed of officials of the two governments with the purpose of discussing trade matters as between the two countries. I have never seen the recommendations of the Anglo-Canadian trade committee. They have never been furnished to the government, as there is no reason why they should be. I have not had the advantage, as my hon. friend has, of seeing them quoted in the press.

Mr. Drew: I point out that I used words in my earlier reference which correctly described this committee, and I would also remind the minister that I directed my earlier question to him in regard to this same statement. I am surprised to find him unaware of the recommendation.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

RULES RESPECTING STRANGERS IN THE GALLERY AND SUBJECTS OF QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE—ASKING OF QUESTIONS—READING OF SPEECHES

Mr. Speaker: May I be permitted to make a statement at this time. A few days ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) brought to my attention a practice which is becoming very common in the house of hon. members rising on so-called questions of privilege. This irregularity has also been brought to my attention by other hon. members from time to time throughout the session, and more especially during recent weeks. It has also been the subject of unfavourable comment in the press.

There are only two types of questions of privilege. One affects a member personally and is a matter of personal privilege, and the other is one which affects the privileges of all hon. members of the house. It is neither a question of personal privilege nor one which affects the privileges of all hon. members to inform the house that an athletic organization or any organization, or any citizen or citizens, have brought distinction to a member's constituency by winning a championship. Nor is it a question of privilege to bring to the attention of the house the fact that certain school children or others are in the gallery. No reference should at any time be made to the gallery except on the occasion of the attendance in the gallery of a distinguished representative of another country. It is highly improper at any other time to refer to the gallery. If the practice continues, either of referring to championship teams or to school children in the gallery, every hon. member will feel called upon to do likewise when occasion arises, as otherwise he will feel that his constituents may think that he is ignoring them. May I therefore suggest to hon. members that they refrain in the future from making these references.

There is another matter to which I think reference should be made at this time. It is with respect to the procedure regarding the asking of questions. I would refer hon. members to standing order No. 44. This standing order provides for the placing of questions on the order paper, which is the usual procedure, and should be followed whenever possible.

It has nevertheless been the practice in our house to allow a certain number of oral questions, and it is not my purpose to discourage members from asking questions of the proper type, as I feel that these questions create a more lively interest in the business of the house. These oral questions are asked when the orders of the day are called, and are frequently asked without notice. I would, however, emphasize that these oral questions should be asked only in connection with very urgent and important matters of public concern, and only if it would not be in the public interest to place them on the order paper and receive answers in accordance with the method provided for in the standing orders. They should always be brief. No debate is permitted, and the reply should be as concise as possible. The questions should not be prefaced by the reading of letters, telegrams, newspaper extracts or preambles of any kind. See Beauchesne's third edition, paragraphs 297, 298. I ask the co-operation of hon. members in observing these rules.

While I am making these references, may I also take the opportunity of thanking hon. members for the co-operation which they have given me in my endeavour to enforce the rule which prohibits the reading by private members of previously prepared speeches. On February 20 of this year I reminded hon. members of the rule, and for a short time it was generally observed. However, during the debate on the budget a very considerable number of members reverted to the undesirable practice of reading their speeches. The reading of long speeches, especially by private members, would not be tolerated at Westminster, and I might point out that we would be required to follow the usages and customs of the British house if our standing orders did not prohibit the reading of speeches. The House of Commons is not a debating society nor an assembly which is gathered together to listen to the reading of essays. It is a forum where members may express themselves freely in accordance with the established rules on all matters of public interest.

I believe that during this session fewer speeches have been read than in former sessions, but I am very hopeful that the practice of reading speeches, except in the case of government statements or important statements by the leader of the opposition or by leaders of other groups, will be wholly discontinued.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 335, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation.—Mr. Macnaughton.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE SET UP TO INVESTIGATE WRECKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. According to the press, a committee has been set up to study the reasons—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: There you go.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I be permitted to suggest to hon. members that in asking questions they should endeavour from today onward to follow the rule strictly.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I also suggest that from today onward the ruling should be made by you and not by members by suppression of speech.

Mr. Sinclair: It should not be a speech. It should be a question.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are all right so far.

Mr. Fraser: Will he ask the Minister of Transport to keep the house informed as to the recommendations of the committee set up to investigate the wrecks on the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I will.

INQUIRY AS TO SATURDAY CLOSING OF SMALLER STATIONS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. H. Hatfield (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport whether it is correct that all the smaller stations on the Canadian National in New Brunswick will be closed all day Saturday after June 1.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman has just sent over to me a telegram indicating that one station at least is to be closed on Saturdays. In order to determine whether or not this is the policy on a broad basis I shall make the necessary inquiries and see that the hon. member is provided with an answer in due course.

PROVISION OF RADIO COMMUNICATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Can the parliamentary assistant tell me whether approval has yet been given for the installation of radio communication between Colinet island and the mainland and a number of other communities in Newfoundland, as was promised by the minister during the discussion of the estimates?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to give the department notice of this question; but in view of the fact that this question was raised on the estimates and the hon. member is reported as estimating that it would involve an expenditure of only $600 or $700; in view of the fact that the Minister of Transport indicated that this was being considered as a 1951 budget proposition for the Canadian National Railways, and in view of Your Honour's recent instructions, I wait for you, sir, to indicate whether or not an answer should be given now, or whether the question should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: If the parliamentary assistant has the information, I think he should give it now.

Mr. Benidickson: I am pleased to be able to inform the hon. member that this is a project which I believe has been approved by the Canadian National for development in Newfoundland some time this year.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO MONTHLY STATEMENT OF REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES —SURPLUS FOR APRIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, first pausing to congratulate him on having become Dr. Abbott. I have given notice of my question. It refers to a statement made by the minister recently showing a surplus of $121 million for the month of April, or four times his budget estimate for the whole year.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Graydon: He is diagnosing it for the doctor.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question is with respect to the minister's words when he says that these figures are not to be taken as indicative—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is just a very short explanation of what the minister said. He said that these figures are not to be taken as indicative of the probable result of the fiscal year as a whole.

My question is: If these figures are as misleading as the minister evidently considers them to be—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: That is a speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): —is it not possible for the department to make a statement in a form less calculated to confuse and mislead the public mind?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that questions at this time should not be questions that lead to debate or are provocative.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I thank the hon. member both for giving me notice of his brief urgent question, and for his felicitations on my being made a doctor. I have so many in my department that it is splendid to be one myself.

Answering the first question, the monthly statements which I issue with respect to revenues and expenditures are, I hope, always clear. They are certainly not misleading, as my hon. friend would appear to indicate. If the form could be more helpful we will see what we can do about that; but it is the usual factual statement of receipts and disbursements issued once a month. I have been in the habit at times of issuing some explanation with it, pointing out that one swallow does not make a summer and that it is well to wait until the end of the year before coming to a conclusion as to the final results.

Mr. Graydon: A nice bedside manner, doctor.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question to ask the Minister of Finance which I am sure is in order. Does not the minister think his figures, whether misleading or not, entirely bear out what was suggested from this side of the house some time ago, that he could well afford to do without the increase in the sales tax?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, by no means.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, based on a press item which I need not read. Is the government considering the setting up of a special committee, similar to last year's committee on old age security, to study and report upon a program of national health insurance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I answered that question earlier this session. The answer is no.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY ACT AND TO FACILITATE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the third time and passed.

ABOLITION OF GOVERNOR GENERAL'S FIAT

The house resumed, from Monday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 192, to amend the Petition of Right Act—Mr. Garson—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Filing of petition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Last evening the minister spoke of the subject being placed in a position of equality with the crown. Any action the individual may desire to take against the crown must be taken in the exchequer court. The crown, however, may take proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction of any province. When the crown chooses to take proceedings in a court set up within a province—the court of king's bench, the supreme court, trial division, or the county court—the subject may raise matters in defence as against the crown but is denied the right to counter-claim. That places the subject in an impossible position, and I suggest for the consideration of the minister that a change is due in that respect. Where the crown chooses to accept the jurisdiction of a court other than the exchequer court and commences its action there, the citizen should not be placed in such a position that a counter-claim may not be presented in that court. This is a matter which might well be considered by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. Garson: I do not think my hon. friend quoted my remarks accurately, so perhaps for the record I had better repeat what I said as reported at page 3479 of Hansard:

> The purpose of this legislation is to place the crown in right of Canada in petition of right proceedings in the exchequer court in substantially the same position as an ordinary litigant.

That is what this bill does. My hon. friend raises a question which I think he will admit is quite different from that which is involved in this bill, namely, that in those infrequent cases in which the crown chooses another court in which to sue the subject, consideration should be given to enabling the litigant against whom such suit is taken in that other court to raise such defences or offsets as are available to him in the exchequer court. I have no hesitation in saying that we should be very glad to give my hon. friend's suggestion due consideration, but it is hardly relevant to the bill before the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the narrow ground of relevancy to the matter in issue here, I am not in disagreement with the minister. But when so much ado is made about the position of a citizen in his relation in litigation—

Mr. Garson: In the exchequer court.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —in the exchequer court, yes; but most laymen would not get the distinction that lawyers would make in the use of the words "the exchequer court". I know of one or more cases in which the defendant has been unable properly to defend himself in the court chosen as the forum by the crown, by reason of the fact he was unable to make a counter-claim.

Let me refer again to the matter I mentioned last evening. Under this legislation, parliament is actually divesting the crown of one of its most ancient prerogatives without having secured the consent of the crown to the legislation. I mentioned that because, after all, the king is one of the three component parts of parliament. The king, it is true, acts upon the advice of his privy council; nevertheless there are certain cases in which the king is freed from acting on the advice of his council.

My reading of the constitutional development of kingship indicates that this prerogative is not a mere fiction or formality, but rather one of the most prized positions that kingship holds, not only by virtue of tradition, but also by reason of the fact that the king occupies so important a position in the constitutional development of the country. Last evening the member for Rosetown-Biggar said that, after all, we have not a king in Canada. That is scarcely in accordance with the constitutional development about which I have heard boasting in this house in recent years, particularly since the Statute of Westminster. To those who say that the king occupies an unimportant position and is merely a symbol, the answer is that so long as there is a king there can be no dictatorship within the British commonwealth. The king is above politics; he chooses his advisers following the decision made by the electors; in fact, he determines who shall be his prime minister and his first citizen.

That kingship is no mere symbol, and that the king has tremendous influence was indicated in England in 1922 or 1923, when everyone in the Conservative party believed that the king would call Earl Curzon to be prime minister, but the king chose to call Mr. Baldwin to that office. I repeat that the office of kingship is no mere formality. It is a symbol which binds us together. But in addition under our constitutional development, the kingship denies the possibility of there ever being a dictatorship so long as that kingship exists, and so long as the king carries out that responsibility which rests with him and no one else. Therefore I ask that nothing be done by this parliament which would in any way appear to detract or subtract from one of the prerogatives of kingship, namely, that the king can do no wrong. This principle antedates cabinet responsibility and all that cabinet responsibility means. The significance of it is that the king is above the law by reason of his prerogative right of not being subject to the king's courts.

The minister has had the opinion of the law officers of the crown, and I have done my duty. But certainly one can take Hansard after Hansard back to 1835, and wherever there has been any removal or subtraction of the right of kingship—indeed, even a change of title to be given to His Majesty—the announcement was made by the king's minister that His Majesty was willing to accept whatever decision was made by parliament. Even when Edward VIII abdicated in 1936 that formula was used, and he in fact consented, as the constitutional monarch, to the removal from him of all his prerogatives before parliament accepted his abdication.

Mr. Hosking: Since this debate has been a legal member's paradise, as an engineer I should like to take this opportunity of asking the member for Lake Centre a question. Is he in favour of a citizen who has a judgment against him not satisfying that judgment because he is working for the crown? In my riding there is a man who has a judgment against him for approximately $3,000, but he refuses to pay it because he is working for the crown. I suggest to the Minister of Justice that this is a most unfair situation. If the member for Lake Centre is proposing to have that condition continued, I hope that the minister in his fairness will see that there is some legislation brought in which will compel a citizen of this country to pay his debts when employed by the crown.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I pass that question on to the Minister of Justice, whose responsibility it is to recommend whether or not that should be done.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, the answer to the question of my hon. friend from Wellington South is that the federal crown is not at the present time bound by a garnisheeing order. I believe that is what the hon. member has in mind. The gentleman against whom the judgment is obtained is, I take it, an employee of the federal government. In an effort to collect the judgment it is desired to take out an order garnishing his salary. One of the reasons for the fact that the federal crown is not bound by a garnisheeing order is the great administrative difficulty of acknowledging and taking care of those orders from all parts of Canada. But I think there is considerable merit in the point raised by the hon. member. It is a matter to which careful consideration will be given.

Mr. Fleming: It is both interesting and refreshing, Mr. Chairman, to hear the Minister of Justice this afternoon drawing attention to certain limitations of the bill now before the committee. Last evening, if one is to judge from his remarks in certain places, one would have thought that in its effect this was a broad and sweeping measure. As is shown by the report of the proceedings in the committee, at page 3489 of Hansard, the minister complained that the hon. member for Lake Centre had put a rather narrow interpretation on the effect of the measure. At the bottom of the page the minister is reported as follows:

> While I am on that subject, I believe that, in fairness to our own legislation, I should point out that the hon. member for Lake Centre rather tended to leave the impression that the scope of our act was quite narrow. I believe I should point out what it does cover.

Then the minister went on to deal with some of the sections of the Exchequer Court Act, a statute which has such a direct bearing on the subject now under discussion. But this afternoon the minister has done a service in assisting the committee to realize that the measure, after all, is somewhat narrow in its terms and in its effect. He has drawn attention to certain narrowing words that he used in introducing the measure, as reported at page 3479 of Hansard, when he said:

> The purpose of this legislation is to place the crown in right of Canada in petition of right proceedings in the exchequer court in substantially the same position as an ordinary litigant.

It is highly commendable that the minister this afternoon should have placed such great emphasis on those words "in petition of right proceedings in the exchequer court," because otherwise the effect of the statement made by the minister last night, it seems to me, was to exaggerate considerably the effect of the present measure. The minister has now helped the committee to see the bill in its proper perspective which, after all, is quite a narrow one.

In effect, this measure deals with a procedural question and eliminates a step in procedure. It does not affect the substantive law. If the principle upon which the government is proceeding is sound, and I believe it is, we should have had with this measure corresponding amendments to the substantive law of Canada, so that what we are doing here, in deference to a principle, should have real substance and not be simply a change in what is, after all, little more than procedure and form. While commending the present measure as far as it goes—and I regret that it does not go very far—I wish to record my regret that the government has not gone as far as it might well have gone, and ought to have gone, in view of the soundness of the principle supporting this type of legislation.

I could not help recalling a debate that occurred in the house on December 13, 1945. At that time the present Prime Minister was minister of justice, and I asked him this question on his estimates, as reported at page 3467 of Hansard of that session:

> What progress, if any, is being made in the department with reference to the matter of petitions of right? It has been such a sore point for so long, and I think the courts and the bar are looking for some leadership in this matter. I know the Minister of Justice has had this matter brought actively before him for a long time. When may we look for some action in the direction of elimination of petitions of right in actions against the crown?

And the answer came back, very swift and very firm:

Mr. St. Laurent: Not while I am Minister of Justice.

It is evident that since the present Prime Minister ceased to be minister of justice there has been a change of heart on his part; and I think the committee will be glad to see such a change of heart on the part of the government, because the position taken by the then minister of justice, the present Prime Minister, is, I think, a position which the government, in introducing the present measure, has shown to have been entirely unsound. I am glad the government has made sufficient progress at least to have discarded the position taken in 1945 by the Prime Minister and to have introduced the present measure, limited though its effect may be.

A good deal has been said in this discussion about the historical background of the immunities of the crown, and about the way in which the procedure for petition of right has grown up and has been observed for centuries. An interesting description of those immunities was given by Chief Justice Duff in the case of the King v. Central Railway Signal Company, 1933 Supreme Court Reports, where, at page 564, after reviewing the immunities enjoyed by the crown in respect of torts and certain other forms of action, the chief justice says this:

It has sometimes been said that this immunity of the sovereign from processual coercion, "the grandest of his immunities," to use the words of Maitland . . . rests upon the principle that the king by his writ cannot command himself, and this was laid down in the Sadler's case; the immunity has also been ascribed to the fact that the courts are the king's own courts and to the same principle as that of the immunity of the feudal seigneur from process in his seigneurial court.

What the government is proposing in this measure is that there should be a measure designed to strip the crown of some of the procedural or formal aspects of what has here been called the crown's "immunity from processual coercion", "the grandest of the immunities of the crown". If the principle of this bill is sound, it is sound enough to be extended to the substantive law, where it should be given full recognition. It is not given full recognition today.

In his remarks last night the Minister of Justice dwelt at some length on some of the subsections of section 19 of the Exchequer Court Act; but I think the Minister of Justice will agree that there are still great areas of what would be liability in the case of an ordinary litigant, in which fields the crown is still immune, regardless of however tortious the acts of the crown or the crown's servants might have been, if those acts had been committed by a private litigant or by servants or employees of a private litigant.

There is much to be said in this day and generation for a discarding of this type of immunity of the crown. We recognized the same principle last year in the Statute Law Amendment Act, when so many emanations of the crown in the form of statutory corporations were brought, by enactment of parliament, under liability to action in the courts for breach of law. That was a sound type of legislation. It is a recognition not simply of the soundness of a principle but also of the fact that, as the power of government grows, expands, and is wielded, more and more of the area of what years ago had been regarded as fields closed to government and belonging exclusively to fields of operation on the part of private citizens is now enclosed within the scope of governmental operations. Therefore, old principles and old immunities which had a sound bearing in days when the activities of the crown, so far as the ordinary business of life was concerned, were on a very narrow scale indeed, do not fit the situation that obtains today, when governments are operating in so many fields of what were previously exclusively private endeavour. Last year's amendment was sound; this amendment is sound, but I still say that it does not go far enough in bringing about justice and fair play to litigants.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred this afternoon to a situation where, in an action brought by the crown against a private litigant, the litigant is not free to make a counter-claim in the proceedings. That smacks of injustice and a lack of a sense of fair play in days such as these. I do not believe that the people of Canada have any patience in these days with immunities of the crown which have no sensible bearing upon the hard facts of governmental operations.

The Canadian Bar Association has for years been pressing the government on this subject.

Sir, there are good precedents for widening such provisions as we find in the present section of the bill under discussion. Some of the provinces have taken wholesome steps in this regard. One that I have had some experience with, and which the minister and his advisers may find interesting, is section 87 of the Ontario Highway Improvement Act, with respect to actions arising out of non-repair of highways. It contains a simple provision, so far as the substantive law is concerned, that the crown shall be liable for damage suffered as a result of non-repair of the king's highways. It is a plain statement of substantive law; and then follow the procedural aspects of the matter dealt with in succeeding subsections, in which it is provided that any actions of that kind may be brought in the ordinary way in the courts and the defendant may be described as His Majesty in the right of the province of Ontario represented by the minister of highways. Therefore you have the complete code—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I draw your attention to the fact that clause 1 was carried last night, as is indicated on page 3491 of Hansard, where the following took place:

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?
Some hon. Members: Carried.
Some hon. Members: No.
The Chairman: Carried. Shall clause 2 carry?
Some hon. Members: Carried.
Some hon. Members: No.

And then the house adjourned. But clause 1 was carried. I believe that the hon. member is discussing the principle of the bill.

Mr. Graydon: It is the Votes and Proceedings that govern.

Mr. Lesage: Votes and Proceedings do not mention the clauses separately.

Mr. Graydon: On that point, lots of times Hansard is wrong and Votes and Proceedings are always right.

The Chairman: There is no mention of sections of bills in Votes and Proceedings. Votes and Proceedings do not mention sections that are carried in committee. I was under the impression that the clause was carried; it is not mentioned in Hansard that the clause is agreed to; but my impression is that it was carried. I would ask the hon. member to conclude his remarks as soon as possible.

Mr. Fleming: With respect, I was not in the house at the time that happened, but I was given to understand that in the ordinary course you asked, at the time of a pause, "Shall the clause carry". Some members on one side said "carried", and some members in this part of the house said "no".

Mr. Lesage: The chairman said "carried", and he called clause 2.

Mr. Fleming: The chairman often says "carried" when there is not a final adoption. He frequently says that to ascertain if there is to be any further discussion on the item. That is what he was doing at that time.

The Chairman: Yes, but when I called clause 2 nobody asked that we revert to clause 1.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It was carried all right.

[Mr. Fleming.]

The Chairman: When I called clause 2 there was no objection.

Mr. Fulton: If I may be permitted to say a word, I would ask the committee to look at pages 3491 and 3492, where I made the following remarks.

Since it is close to eleven o'clock, Mr. Chairman, will the minister accommodate us by allowing us to call it eleven o'clock and give this matter consideration overnight?

I made that request under the impression that clause 1, on which this point has been raised, and to which I was asking that consideration be given, was still before the committee.

The Chairman: Since there is some doubt about it I will call clause 1 and allow the hon. member to go on with his speech.

Mr. Fleming: Thank you; I was nearly finished, anyway.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming: I think it will be found that no time has been lost. I had just finished mentioning what I thought was a useful kind of precedent from one of the provinces in a situation of this kind to deal with the substantive law, giving recognition, with respect to the substantive law as well as to the procedural law, to a sound principle.

During the war we had certain orders in council dealing with claims brought against the crown arising out of operations in Canada of the armed forces, and these orders in council were carried forward into peacetime. You will find them in P.C. 43/1880 of May 14, 1947, amended by P.C. 254½/2727 of May 28, 1949. This first order in council contains this as the third clause:

Every claim against the crown arising out of any death or injury to the person or to property alleged to result from the negligence of any officer or servant of the crown while acting within the scope of his duties or employment shall be dealt with under this order.

And clause 2-D of the order defines officer or servant of the crown as follows:

"Officer or servant of the crown" means an officer or member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada, or an employee of the department.

Then follow the detailed provisions governing procedure in claims arising under clause 3.

It seems to me that the time has come when there should be an effective consolidation, with the necessary broadening of the provisions, of our law, whether statutory or in order in council form, as in the case of these two orders in council, and others I believe as well, to meet the needs of the present day, and also to give effective codification to the substantive law in relation to liability of the crown. I expect some hon. members have had experience with these orders in council that were in effect during the war, and with perhaps the two to which I have just referred, which came into effect after the war. I think the experience of any who have had cases under these orders in council has been unsatisfactory. They must have come to the conclusion that these are entirely unsatisfactory provisions for the statement of the liability of the crown for acts of the officers or members of the armed forces of Canada or employees of the Department of National Defence.

I remember a case that occurred in connection with naval gunnery practice in lake Ontario, close to fishing claims very near to Toronto, where great damage was done to the fishing as well as to the nets and other property of the licensee of those fishing claims. The affidavits of about eight eye-witnesses of the shelling and the consequent damage to fishing and fish nets and equipment were submitted to the Department of National Defence in due course. I regret to say that the matter received pretty summary treatment in the Department of National Defence, and the claim was not entertained.

There is only one way in which private claimants will at best feel that they have had a fair hearing of a case or that justice has been done, and that is if they are allowed to take their cases to the courts for adjudication. If the judicial processes offered by the crown to govern disputes between private litigants are good enough for them, they ought equally to be good enough for the government which is largely responsible for prescribing those judicial processes for the settlement of the claims of others. Our conception of the rule of law should not be impaired or restricted by any narrow limitations which trace themselves back to regal immunities which simply do not fit the hard facts of times such as these, when governmental activities cover so many fields.

I urge upon the minister the broadening of the substantive law by statute, and I urge upon him also that he take orders in council of this kind under review to see to it that the government, having made a sound departure from the untenable and unsound position taken by the present Prime Minister in December, 1945, go further and, rather than contenting itself with half measures or a half-hearted recognition of a sound principle, bring in a measure that will give full and complete recognition to the desirability of extending the judicial process in the broadest possible sense to the settlement of just claims brought against the crown.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I notice from the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre and the previous speaker that apparently the Minister of Justice will never be able to satisfy the official opposition in this house, nor will any other minister of the crown. I would point out that no government supported by my friends in the opposition has done anything to solve this problem. The Minister of Justice is to be complimented upon going as far as he has gone in this matter. This is the first real step that has been taken to bring in legislation of this kind.

So far as the attachment of debts is concerned, I understand that even in Ontario under a Tory government you cannot yet attach debts; all you can do is send a notice to the attorney general and he may hold up the salary for a while.

Mr. Fleming: That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): There is a Conservative government in Ontario, and the creditor is not able to collect his debts as this procedure will to a certain extent permit in connection with the federal government.

Mr. Graydon: You have enough trouble in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is all right. I usually manage to get a rise out of some of these Tories seated to my left.

Mr. Fleming: Is the hon. member saying that the bill now under discussion will have the effect of permitting the attachment of debts owing by a servant of the federal government?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): No, I am not contending that for a minute. I am going to deal with that next. This bill does give a certain remedy against the federal government that was never given by any Tory government that I know of. In connection with the attachment of debts, the Minister of Justice has said that the matter is being given consideration. As I say, in Ontario there can be no attachment of debts under that Tory government. I believe that federal civil servants should pay their debts if they are able to. I think every citizen of Canada feels that way about it. They should not have any exemption from attachment any more than any other citizen if they are able to pay.

I know there are administrative difficulties, but in connection with the railroads, which are spread across the dominion, debts can be attached. They wire that the attachment has been served at one of their branches. In Saskatchewan you can attach debts, and even the provincial payroll can be attached. I trust that the minister will follow this up. Instead of the attachment having to be served the last day of the month, I suggest that it be permitted to be served at any time which will give sufficient time to notify headquarters that the attachment has been served. I am sure that after considering this whole problem the minister will agree that a federal civil servant who has borrowed money from another citizen of Canada should be required to pay that debt within a reasonable time. We might limit the amount of the attachment so that the civil servant could have so much of his salary every month, but the rest of the salary should be subject to the attachment.

If the attachment were made applicable the first week of the month, or in any event in sufficient time to notify Ottawa, the administrative staff could figure it out, the money could be held and the debt required to be paid within a reasonable time. I know the minister will give this matter his consideration, because despite what the official opposition has said, the Minister of Justice has made the first real advance in the way of making collections from the crown on damage actions.

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member is too easily satisfied.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): My hon. friend sat here for years and was so satisfied that he kept mum under Tory governments that got nowhere.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is one truth in the remarks of the previous speaker; whenever he rises he tries to get a rise out of somebody else.

A number of members seem to think that the step taken by the Minister of Justice is a wonderful victory for the ordinary citizen. It is quite the contrary, because it is an intrusion upon the privilege of the crown to protect the citizen. As has been stated in the debate by the hon. member for Lake Centre and the Minister of Justice, the petition of right is a traditional right of the citizen to address directly the king. It goes back to the thirteenth century, and was intended to protect the citizen against the government.

There is a great deal of loose thinking in connection with constitutional matters, and people easily confuse the government with the king. The fact is that the king is a separate branch of government. The hon. member for Lake Centre raised the point that the king's representative should have been consulted before this legislation was introduced. The present section 4 reads:

> The petition shall be left with the Secretary of State of Canada, for submission to the governor general, so that he may consider it and, if he thinks fit, grant his fiat that right be done; and nothing shall be payable by the suppliant on leaving the petition.

As the Minister of Justice and other lawyers know, in the courts of equity in England the king exercises a similar function. People who are unable to get satisfaction in the courts of law can apply directly to the king and the lord chancellor, and the lord chancellor grants the petition. There is the right of the citizen to apply directly to the king. Therefore this is not a great victory on the part of the citizen.

As the hon. member for Eglinton has said, in these hard times the government is rather less determined to prevent the citizen from obtaining his full rights. Gradually a right has been given to the citizen, and that right is being enlarged so that he can take actions in more cases than formerly. Therefore I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he has given any further consideration to the point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre last night, that the matter should have been brought to the attention of the governor general and his consent should have been signified formally before the legislation was introduced.

Mr. Garson: As I indicated in my remarks last night, the king's pleasure in this matter will be signified in the house on or before third reading.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Are you satisfied that is correct?

Mr. Garson: I think out of an abundance of caution it is a wise precaution to take.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Fulton: Has the Minister of Justice had an opportunity to give consideration to the matter I raised last night arising out of a recent decision of the exchequer court?

Mr. Garson: Yes. Would my hon. friend mind repeating his question? I read it carefully in Hansard, but it was in two parts and I was not completely sure that I got his point. If he will repeat it now, I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. Fulton: It was whether some safeguard should be inserted in the statutes to prevent the possibility arising of, for instance, one member of the armed forces suing another member of the armed forces or the crown for injury or death occurring during the course of his employment in the armed forces. I understand it is not desired to create that situation, but I believe it is one which is liable to result from the position we are now in.

Mr. Garson: I appreciate my hon. friend restating his position, but I rather gathered the impression from his remarks last night that he was relating this question to some extent to the matter of negligence. For example, he said at page 3490 of Hansard:

I appreciate the argument of the Minister of Justice with respect to the difficulty of proving negligence in those cases to which I referred arising particularly within the armed forces.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Garson: He continued:

I agree that that would be exceedingly difficult on occasion. But I should imagine that there are other cases where it would not be impossible by any means to establish negligence.

Mr. Fulton: That is right.

Mr. Garson: I will try to answer what I take to be my hon. friend's point, and if I fail to do so I hope he will draw my attention to my failure so that I may cover it completely in the end. To begin with, I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday to the effect that, in so far as section 19 (c) of the Exchequer Court Act and the liability thereunder is concerned, the crown is only liable in tort if negligence by an officer or servant of the crown acting within the scope of his duties or employment is first established. The case to which my hon. friend referred as being covered by the clipping which he sent to me bears that out. That was the case of Dame Elizabeth Cornell Oakes v. His Majesty the King. The first paragraph of the judgment of Mr. Justice Cameron of the exchequer court refers to the point of negligence in these terms:

This is a petition of right in which the suppliant claims damages from the respondent. On June 5, 1945, George Walsh Oakes, then an airman in the Royal Canadian Air Force, was a passenger in a motor vehicle owned by the respondent; that vehicle was struck by a train of the Canadian National Railways in Montreal east, and Oakes was killed. At the trial it was admitted that L.A.C. Oakes was then on duty, that the motor vehicle was operated by L.A.C. R. E. Hitsman, a member of the air force of Canada and then acting within the scope of his military duties, and that the said accident occurred because of the fault and negligence of the said Hitsman.

Therefore nothing turns, in the point raised by my hon. friend's question, upon whether there was negligence. In fact there was negligence in that case. My hon. friend's question must turn on another point and if I understand correctly the point that my hon. friend is driving at, I think perhaps I can answer his question in these terms. I will go back a bit in order to cover the preliminary ground. In Meloche v. The King (1948) 4 D.L.R., 828, Mr. Justice Anger of the exchequer court held that a petition of right will not lie under section 19 (c) of the Exchequer Court Act for death or injury to a member of the forces in the course of his employment on the ground that parliament had by the Pension Act provided a special remedy for such death or injury; that is even where there may be negligence, and which otherwise would make the crown actionable.

In Bender v. The King (1947) S.C.R. 172, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a government employee who had received compensation under the Government Employees Compensation Act was nevertheless entitled to claim damages under said section 19 (c). Perhaps I should explain that the Government Employees Compensation Act is an act passed by this parliament to provide for federal civil servants a protection analogous to that which is enjoyed by workmen under the workmen's compensation acts of the various provinces. The Government Employees Compensation Act is another reason why comparisons between the liability of the crown under the Canadian Exchequer Court Act and under analogous British legislation are rather invidious because here is a whole field of torts arising out of the relationship of master and servant which is pretty well completely covered by the Government Employees Compensation Act in this country.

After the judgment in Bender v. The King, the Government Employees Compensation Act was revised by chapter 18 of the statutes of 1947, and section 9, subsection 5, thereof now reads as follows:

No employee or dependent of such employee shall have a claim against His Majesty or any officer, servant or agent of His Majesty, except for compensation under this act, in any case where an accident happens to such employee in the course of his employment under such circumstances as entitle him or his dependents to compensation under this act.

That is simply the principle followed in workmen's compensation acts, that once workmen's compensation acts are put on the statute books all claims based upon negligence as between master and servant, and as between one employee and another employee, are washed out, and the provision made by that act in the form of workmen's compensation insurance takes their place. Coming down to the case of Oakes v. The King to which my hon. friend has referred, Mr. Justice Cameron of the Exchequer Court of Canada, on May 17 last, handed down his decision in that case holding that he was bound by the reasoning of the supreme court in the Bender case to overrule the judgment of Mr. Justice Anger in the Meloche case. Therefore, by that process of reasoning, he awarded Mrs. Oakes, the wife of the airman killed in the course of duty as a result of admitted negligence, the sum of $20,000 in addition to any rights she might have in regard to pension and the like.

That is the situation as it stands today. If I understand my hon. friend's point—though I have not been too clear about it up to the present—it is that we should consider whether section 19 (c) does not go too far in the light of this judgment in the Oakes case, in that it will be imposing quite a burden on the taxpayer if, in addition to all the benefits under the Pension Act et cetera that may be available to the dependents of any member of the armed forces in the event of his death while on duty, it should be possible as well to enter suit against the crown and recover substantial damages, as for example the amount of $20,000 in this case. Is that not my hon. friend's point?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that is the point.

Mr. Garson: Our position in relation to that matter is this. The judgment in this case was handed down on May 17, a very short time ago. We are now considering whether it would be advisable to appeal. It is quite a long judgment, and we have not reached a decision on that point. If it were appealed and affirmed, then I should think that, by a parity of reasoning with our action in connection with the Government Employees Compensation Act, we would have to give consideration to bringing an amendment before this parliament. If on the other hand the judgment in the Oakes case were appealed and overruled by the Supreme Court of Canada and the effect of the judgment in the Meloche case re-established, no consideration of amendment would be required. My hon. friend has said that I understand his question correctly. Does this answer his question?

Mr. Fulton: I think it does, because I understand from the minister that consideration is being given the whole matter, and that was the point I wished to raise. I did not mean that the minister should immediately introduce some amendment just because I suggested it. I did feel that in the light of these cases particularly, and in the light of the provision that was placed in the British statute dealing with this general subject, certainly the time had come when we should give the matter consideration. I am sorry if I did not make my point immediately clear. However, the minister has understood it, and he has certainly satisfied me by saying that consideration is being given the matter, which consideration may possibly lead to the introduction of an amendment. That takes care of the point I wished to make.

Mr. Knowles: I noted a few moments ago that the minister said it was his intention before third reading to indicate either the royal or vice regal consent to this legislation. I have no serious objection to the minister doing that, particularly when he puts it on the basis he does, namely out of the abundance of caution; but I should like to take a moment or two to express my own view that this course is quite unnecessary and I think it is unfair both to the houses of parliament and the crown.

With regard to my first point I suggest that in our legislative functions we are governed by the British North America Act, which contains only two qualifications with respect to the way in which we pass bills. Those two qualifications are found in sections 53 and 54. Section 53 provides that money bills must originate in the House of Commons. Section 54 is the section which says that before any money bill is proceeded with the approval of the governor general must be stated in parliament. The only reason royal consent or approval to some bills is indicated is that with respect to those particular bills, that is money bills, it is actually required by the British North America Act. Frankly, if it were not in that act I should think the practice might be reconsidered for a reason I shall indicate in a moment. But why should we go beyond what is required by the British North America Act and bring in a formula with respect to a bill which is not required either by the British North America Act or by the standing orders of this house?

The other point I wish to make is that I regard it as unfair, both to the houses of parliament and to the crown, to follow the proposed procedure. After all it is in parliament, in the Senate and House of Commons, that these decisions are really made. To carry forward the fiction that we make only such decisions as we are permitted by the crown to make is I think unfair to the two houses of parliament and out of keeping with the democratic practice under which we in parliament initiate and pass legislation. Similarly I think it is unfair to the crown. The Minister of Justice brought in this bill, moved first reading, moved second reading, and has piloted it through the committee stage. Obviously the government decided to go ahead with this bill. The House of Commons has accepted it; indeed we have approved of it right along. Now the minister says that just before third reading he is going to announce to parliament that the crown gives its approval to our considering this bill. Well, that would seem to mean that the minister has personally consulted either the king or the governor general and has requested that approval. Under our modern set-up the crown will not refuse such a request; in other words the crown is told what to do, and I submit that we are going through forms just for the sake of keeping up forms which are not necessary and are a bit unfair to both parties. We keep up the form with regard to the introduction of money bills because it is spelled out in the British North America Act. But why go further? Why make such an announcement in connection with this bill, which is not a money bill? The British North America Act also requires that before any bill which has been passed by both houses of parliament becomes law, it must have the royal assent given in the name of the king. That will come later; surely that final royal assent is sufficient.

As I have said, I have no serious objection to the minister following the course he has indicated in response to the request that was made of him by the official opposition, but I still feel that it is quite unnecessary.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the hon. member indicate how it is unfair to the crown?

Mr. Knowles: I thought I had indicated why I felt it was unfair. When the crown indicates its approval, supposedly the crown does so of its own initiative and free will. In this case the crown is only doing it because the Minister of Justice has made the request, and the chances are that the minister will be doing it himself, on the crown's behalf.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, the governor general, having been informed of the purport of Bill 192, an act to amend the Petition of Right Act, gives his consent as far as His Majesty's interests are concerned that the house may do therein as they shall think fit.

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

INVESTMENTS IN CORPORATE BONDS OR DEBENTURES—LOANS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 338, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the parliamentary assistant say a word about this?

Quebec Savings Banks Act

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for just three very minor amendments to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. This act applies to two small savings banks in the province of Quebec. One is the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, and the other is the Quebec Savings Bank. Both are old banks, one having been incorporated in 1846 and the other in 1848. They are not commercial banks in the ordinary sense of the word and do not come under the Bank Act. This Quebec Savings Banks Act applies quite severe restrictions on the investments and loans which these banks may make, such as no commercial loans, and personal loans being limited to $1,000. At least fifty per cent of the bank deposits must be in government bonds. The banks have been permitted to invest in the bonds or debentures of a manufacturing company, provided, among other things, there have been paid upon the common stock of the company regular dividends of at least four per cent per annum for the five years preceding the investment. In the case of no par value shares there must have been a dividend of at least four dollars per share per annum the five years preceding the investment. The banks are also permitted to lend money without collateral security to certain companies if, among other things, similar rates of dividends have been paid on the common or no par value stock.

The reason for this amendment is that, whereas in other days the common practice was for common stock to be worth around $100, and the four dollar dividend represented a rate of return of four per cent, there has been today a splitting of the stock down to values of $25 to make it more popular. The four dollar dividend demanded would, therefore, mean a higher rate of return. It is proposed to amend both of these provisions to require that the dividend rate upon the common shares in each year of the five-year period must be at least four per cent of the average value at which the shares were carried in the capital stock of the company during the year in which the dividend was paid. I might say that a similar amendment was made to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Under the act as it stands today these two savings banks are allowed to lend up to five per cent of their deposits on first mortgages. This has worked out pretty well, and they ask that they be now allowed to lend up to ten per cent. That, in fact, is the third amendment. If there is any desire on the part of the opposition that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, I would so move.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I would be grateful if the parliamentary assistant would refer it to the banking and commerce committee. So many of these things look very simple, and they may be very simple, but an opportunity is afforded in the committee to study them.

Mr. Sinclair: I would so move, that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the procedure would be for the bill to receive second reading, and then instead of referring it to a committee of the whole, refer it to the banking and commerce committee. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AMOUNT PAYABLE AT DEATH, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act to extend the scope of the act and the period during which a contract of insurance may be entered into; to increase the amount payable at time of death and, in certain cases, to permit the estate of the insured to receive the full amount payable under the policy contract; to provide for the insertion in the policy contract of a war clause in certain cases; and generally to improve the administration of the act.

Mr. Brooks: Is the minister going to make any explanation of this?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, any explanation which I shall make of this resolution at this stage necessarily will be quite brief. As hon. members know, the Veterans Insurance Act, which was passed in 1944 and came into force in 1945, authorized the minister to enter into a policy of insurance with world war II veterans, and certain other groups of persons were added by an amendment in 1948. The time during which this authority could be exercised was extended and certain other groups were included. It is proposed now to further extend the period of time during which an insurance contract may be entered into until December 31, 1954. It is also proposed to give a veteran the right to enter into a contract within ten years after his discharge, if that date should be later than December 31, 1954.

One other provision is to authorize the sum of $2,000 to be paid in the event of the death of the insured. Hon. members are probably aware of the fact that, under the act as it stands now, the sum of $1,000 can be paid at the time of death, and the balance of the policy is paid in the form of annuities over a period of five, ten, fifteen or twenty years. In some cases it has been found that this method created certain difficulties in the settlement of the estate and the payment of medical and funeral expenses. It was felt, therefore, that the sum of $2,000 should be substituted for that $1,000.

Another provision which we have in mind is that, if no beneficiary or contingent beneficiary survives the insured, the face value of the policy would be paid to the estate. Under the present act only the insurance money to the extent of the reserve falls into the estate in case the insured dies without beneficiary or contingent beneficiary. We are also clarifying some of the sections in the act. For instance we want to make it clear that in the case where an applicant dies before the contract has been accepted and entered into by the department following his application, and where the premium has been paid, the insurance will be paid, provided it is an application that would have been accepted had the applicant not died before the acceptance. The reason for this change is that all these contracts are processed at headquarters, and there possibly could be some delay during which the insured might die before his application had been examined and accepted.

We are also clarifying the section of the act referring to the waiver of premiums in the event the insured suffers total and permanent disability. Under the present act, when such is the case, premiums are waived. But in the actual administration of the act it has been found exceedingly difficult to define or to determine the question of permanence of a disability and the period during which it has existed. We are therefore intending to make this legislation more easy to administer by specifying in the act that any insured who has suffered total disability continuously for one year will be considered as being totally and permanently disabled for the purpose of the waiver of premiums.

There is also another provision which we wish to introduce, since the question has been raised at various times as to whether insurance contracts under this act come within certain provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act. I think hon. members will recall that the same question arose with regard to the Veterans Land Act some years ago, and a special section was included in the act so that the veterans of world war II who otherwise qualify, even if they are members of the House of Commons or of the Senate, can benefit under this act.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the minister for his explanation. I think it has been generally recognized for some time that amendments should be made to this act. It will be before the veterans affairs committee of the house—

Mr. Lapointe: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: —and we will have a better chance there of seeing the officials and of getting further information. I have no further comment to make at the present time.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is the total amount to which insurance is granted now? What is the highest amount?

Mr. Lapointe: The highest amount for which a contract can be entered into is $10,000.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is it on an actuarial basis as in any other insurance company?

Mr. Lapointe: I understand that it is, yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 352, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may we have leave of the house to move the second reading of this bill at this time? This bill is going to the veterans affairs committee, and that is where it will be studied. If hon. members have no objection to our doing that, it would perhaps expedite matters.

Mr. Brooks: I can see no reason why there should be any objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lapointe moved the second reading of Bill No. 352, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

Post Office Act

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General) moved the second reading of Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office.

Mr. Drew: Is it the intention of the minister to make a general statement on the motion for second reading?

Mr. Rinfret: This being a complete revision of the Canada Post Office Act, and seeing that all the questions will be discussed separately on the various sections in committee, I thought that it might be more appropriate if I made my statement in committee.

Mr. Drew: I propose to speak on the motion for second reading, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that it is desirable for the minister to make a statement at this time because I am going to suggest reasons why we should not proceed with second reading until there has been further consideration of this bill.

Mr. Rinfret: I am absolutely in the hands of the house. This being a complete revision of the act, and as each section would be discussed in committee—

Mr. Drew: In order that the minister will not misunderstand me, may I explain that I would not be objecting to that procedure were it not for the fact that I feel that there are certain objections to second reading which I shall put forward.

Mr. Rinfret: Mr. Speaker, as I said when introducing this bill on first reading, its purpose is to bring the post office legislation up to date, to bring its provisions in line with present practices and conditions, to simplify and clarify sections where necessary, to eliminate redundant and unnecessary provisions and to improve the general style and arrangement by reducing the law to a systematic form.

Hon. members will notice that in the printed bill reference is made in the explanatory notes to the relative sections of the existing act, and I want to make it clear that, even where this reference is made, although the essence is the same, the wording may vary in some cases, as an attempt has been made to simplify and clarify the section. It is my intention to ask the Clerk of the House to put on the table a number of copies of the old act so that, although the old act is not reproduced in this present bill, hon. members will be able to follow one section after the other.

There are thirty-nine provisions in the existing act which have been deleted. These include provisions which are now covered by other statutes or which have become obsolete.

They also include certain extraordinary powers now vested in the Postmaster General and which I think should not be there.

Few people realize that under section 7 (p) of the present act, acting with the approval of the governor in council, the Postmaster General is authorized to impose pecuniary penalties not exceeding $200 for any one offence against any postal regulation, whether the person offending is or is not an officer of the post office. I do not know how long it is since a postmaster general has used this power. I know that I have not. This section is, of course, deleted and the power vested, as it should be, in the courts of justice.

It might be a shock to the population of Canada to be refused change when they go to buy stamps; but any postmaster refusing to make change would be following the provisions of section 33 of the present act which binds him not to give change and to accept only—and this is the wording of the act—"the exact amount of the postage payable which must be tendered to him in current coin". This has been deleted.

Under section 34 of the present act the governor in council may direct that:

> At any port or class of ports vessels shall not be permitted by the officers of customs to enter or break bulk until all letters on board the same have been delivered at the post office, nor until the master has made declaration, in such form as is prescribed, that he has delivered all such letters accordingly.

This also has been done away with.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): What is the section?

Mr. Rinfret: Section 34 of the present act, which forbids the master of a vessel to allow passengers or cargo out of his vessels until and unless he has made a declaration that he has personally delivered all letters to the post office.

Present section 38 authorizes any person to seize any letters conveyed, received, collected, sent or delivered in violation of the present act.

These are a few of the sections which have been eliminated. I do not wish to burden the house with an enumeration of all the sections that will disappear with the enactment of the present bill.

The new bill introduces nine new definitions, fifteen new or amended provisions, eight sections dealing with the post office savings bank, section 47 and following, which are the same as those contained in the present Savings Bank Act, which is repealed by section 78 of the present bill. Section 55 and following dealing with offences and penalties are not strictly speaking new. They have been recodified and amended in accordance with the form adopted with regard to new or revised acts. Hon. members will notice that sections 55 to 66 inclusive deal with indictable offences and sections 67 to 72 inclusive deal with offences. Section 73 is the penalty section.

It is not my intention, nor would it be proper at this stage, to discuss in detail each of the new provisions, but I am sure it will be noted by the hon. members that a distinction has been made between the administrative powers of the Postmaster General, which have been consolidated under one heading, namely, section 5, and his general powers to make regulations which itemize the outstanding features in regard to which regulations are required, section 6.

In this connection, I would like to draw hon. members' attention to the Postmaster General's power to fix rates. Rates in regard to letters and publications generally are fixed by statute, by parliament; rates in regard to printed matter, parcel post and fees for services by the Postmaster General by regulation.

As regards letters the Postmaster General under section 8 has an exclusive privilege or a monopoly and it is therefore desirable that there should be parliamentary control of the rates charged the public.

Newspapers and publications are in a special class. Ever since the Post Office Act was enacted in 1867, the charges on newspapers and periodicals have been in the nature of a subsidy rate because they are media for the dissemination of news of religious, scientific, agricultural or current topics. In some cases, certain newspapers are even handled and carried without postal charge. There is, of course, no monopoly of the post office with regard to the handling of newspapers and periodicals. Publishers are at liberty to use whatever means of transportation and handling they may decide upon. Although there is no monopoly, there is, nevertheless, an element of government policy involved and for that reason, in the proposed act, no change has been made in the practice hitherto followed of having the rates on newspapers and periodicals fixed by parliament.

The situation is entirely different in regard to printed matter and parcel post. Government policy is not involved. There is no monopoly on the part of the post office and it is in competition with other agencies. The rates fluctuate and a degree of flexibility is essential in order that they be readily adjustable to take care of varying conditions at all times.

Hon. members will have noticed that the present bill proposes increases in the rates charged on newspapers and periodicals. These increases have been distributed equitably over each class of publication in relation to the strain imposed by each one on the facilities of the post office and to the varying cost of handling each.

In view of the mounting cost of postal operations, the government, in order to meet expenses, has had to increase its postal revenues. Some time ago, on April 2, we effected, by regulation, increases on parcel post, printed matter and registration fees, which could be done by regulation. Today, we are asking parliament to approve a somewhat similar increase on periodicals.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on Hansard the cost to the Post Office Department of handling newspapers and periodicals, second-class matter. In the last fiscal year which ended March 31—and I might say that the figure for next year will be somewhat higher on account of increases that have been given in wages and transportation costs—the cost of handling newspapers and periodicals was $15,816,015. The revenue we got from newspapers and periodicals was $3,995,963, leaving a deficit in this one division of the post office of close to $12 million.

Letter rates are not touched but we are providing for the assimilation of war tax to postage in order to conform with the current practice. There is an apparent discrepancy between the new section 10, as to rates, and the old section 21 which mentions only one cent for so-called "drop letters", but the section of the Excise Tax Act providing for the extra 2 cents is repealed by the new section 78 of the Post Office Act.

Dealing now with the "drop letter" rate within certain municipal boundaries, I have received many representations from interested parties from this side of the house as well as from the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), from the city council of Ottawa and other persons outside this house, and I believe the bill now before the house will give the Postmaster General the necessary authority to cure the situation by authorizing him to establish and alter the limits of postal areas within which delivery of a letter therein posted may be effected for 3 cents.

I cannot in advance bind myself to follow exclusively the municipal boundaries, as a strict adherence to this principle enunciated by the leader of the opposition would forbid me to deliver, at the reduced rate, in areas not within the municipal boundaries which now receive that privilege. I feel sure that the leader of the opposition would not wish me to so describe the Ottawa postal area so as to exclude, for instance, Rockcliffe, or surrounding municipalities which now receive the drop-letter rate.

Last year, on June 27, I made a statement in the house that persons against whom a prohibitory order had been made would be given an opportunity of making representations to a fact-finding board created for that purpose. Hon. members will notice that this promise has been fulfilled.

Another new feature of the bill is that totally unpaid letters, except of course, those covered by franking privileges, will not be forwarded. The intention of this section is to prevent persons from maliciously sending unpaid letters with the intent of causing annoyance and inconvenience to the addressee.

Franking privileges have been extended in two directions but do not cover special, more costly, services. Under the present law, letters could be forwarded to members of parliament during the ten days before the meeting of parliament free of Canada postage but letters written by members of parliament and sent by them were subject to postage. The new law provides that mail shall be transmitted free during that ten-day period when sent to or by a member of the House of Commons. A new section also grants the same privilege for the ten days following the session, which was not provided for under the old law.

Hon. members will also note that we are recommending the reduction from six to three weeks for the displaying of public notices inviting tenders for mail contracts. The six-week period was stipulated in 1867 and we think that three weeks is adequate under present-day circumstances and faster means of communication. This will speed up the awarding of contracts and establishment of services.

Under the same heading we suggest an increase to $1,000 of the amount under which the Postmaster General may enter into a contract without inviting tenders. The amount suggested is to bring the discretion of the Postmaster General in proportionate line with that which existed in 1867 when the figure of $200 was stipulated. There is no change in principle or practice from that which already exists and the Postmaster General is still under the obligation of not exceeding the amount ordinarily paid for services of a like nature under contracts made after inviting tenders. This proposal will also have the effect of speeding up the awarding of contracts and the establishment of services.

The same proportional increase is suggested in the awarding of contracts with persons operating a railway, air, steamboat or bus service.

We are also asking the authority in case of emergencies to make whatever arrangements for conveying mail are necessary in the interests of the public service. The washout of the railway lines in British Columbia and the recent railway strike are examples of these possibilities.

I have given the house the highlights of the bill now before it. I shall, when in committee of the whole, give more information about each of these items.

I would suggest for your consideration that details in regard to operating features, as distinct from items of principle, could more adequately be dealt with when the relevant item is under discussion in the post office estimates, but on the other hand I do not wish in any way to restrict discussion on any related postal problem and shall be glad to deal with any postal matter of importance which hon. members may wish to introduce.

However, I think everyone will agree that it will facilitate the work of the house if we limit as much as possible at this time any discussion on matters of operating detail.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the suggestion of the minister that, so far as a discussion of operating details is concerned, in the ordinary course of events it will be better and more convenient to deal with them in committee. However, I do propose to discuss one feature of the bill now before us which goes far beyond any question of operating detail in the effect it will have upon the daily and weekly newspapers of this country.

The minister has reviewed generally the effect of the bill. I think that the amendments which simplify procedure, improve definitions, and provide for the extension of facilities will be welcomed generally by all hon. members. I welcome particularly the provision in the bill to which the minister has referred which makes it possible for him to remedy what I have described as an injustice where there is a different rate within a municipal boundary. I hope that the minister will exercise the power which the amendment proposed would confer upon him in such a way that wherever possible the municipal boundary will be the area within which there will be a uniform rate.

I do not propose to discuss this in any detail at the moment; I simply want to repeat what I have said on earlier occasions and to emphasize the fact that, where there is a different rate within a municipal boundary, not only is there an injustice upon the person mailing letters or other postal matter, but there is a much greater injustice upon the person receiving this matter because in complete innocence many people direct heavy packages and circulars of all kinds to other people within the municipal boundary thinking that there is a uniform rate, and where such a differential exists penalty postage is imposed on many people simply by virtue of the fact that there is a general assumption that a uniform rate exists within the municipal boundary. I repeat that I welcome this amendment and hope that it will have the widest possible application when it is adopted.

The subject that I wish to discuss in some detail at this time is the increase in the postal rates on daily and weekly newspapers. This is not just a question of dollars and cents; this is not just a question of working out by process of arithmetic what it will cost to handle postal material of this kind. The distribution of news has been recognized for centuries as one of the vital parts of the processes of democracy. The minister pointed out that in recognition of that accepted principle rates have been so arranged for daily and weekly publications ever since confederation that the widest possible distribution of news and cultural information may be available to the people of our country.

We must examine in that light the extent to which the bill now before us proposes to increase postal rates, and consider the effect of the increases in postal rates on daily and weekly publications which are a part of the very living body of democracy in Canada. I think that the rates suggested, when they are carefully examined by hon. members, will be found to be too high as postal rates in the first place in any event, and in the second place they will be found to discriminate against newspapers because magazines and similar publications will pay a great deal less in relation to actual weight and cost of handling.

We have always attached great importance to freedom of the press. May I point out, however, that freedom of the press in itself is relatively ineffective unless there is freedom of distribution and freedom of accessibility which gives to freedom of the press an effective opportunity to leave its imprint upon the minds of the people who determine the course of democracy by the decision and impressions that are very largely formed from this source.

I intend to examine some of the changes that are proposed. I do not intend to discuss the bill section by section because that would not be appropriate on second reading. In order to consider what the effect will be of adopting the rates proposed, it is however necessary to understand the practical effect of these changes in relation to different types of publications in this country. Canada is in an unusual position. I doubt if the situation in any other nation can be taken as an exact parallel to that which we find in Canada. We are the third largest nation in the world. The only two nations larger in actual geographical area are Russia and China, one a nation with a population of some 200 million people and the other a nation with a population of close to 450 million.

In our country, only a little smaller than China, we have some 14 million people. Because of that very fact the facilities available for the distribution of news to this widely scattered population become a vitally important part of the whole machinery of democracy which we are doing so much to preserve at this time. While we have large urban communities and many old and well settled smaller communities scattered across this country from the eastern boundaries of Newfoundland to the western boundaries of Vancouver island, nevertheless there are great areas where people are able to have the news in written form only if the facilities are made available on other than a strictly arithmetical postal rate.

In the bill now before us some of the increases are very substantial indeed. In the old act the rates were not only lower but very much lower than those included in the present measure. I would point out that in addition to the burden that will be imposed upon readers through the rates now indicated, there are other burdens which bear directly upon readers of periodicals in Canada. There is a very general tendency to regard taxes of various kinds on corporations as taxes that do not bear directly on the individual Canadian. The sooner we all recognize that taxes imposed upon any business providing a service or a commodity for the public must in the end be paid by the public, the better it will be for our general understanding of the effect of any of these taxes. In Canada it must be remembered that there are already taxes which bear directly on newspapers, and daily newspapers particularly, which are not imposed in the same way upon other types of publications. For instance, there are sales taxes which apply to daily newspapers from which very large publications of much greater weight are exempt. The question may be asked what bearing this has on postal rates. It has a very considerable bearing, because it is part of the general increase in the cost of delivering to individual Canadian readers those publications which keep them informed on what is taking place in this country.

The new postal rates will have some very interesting results; and so that we may see exactly what the effect will be let me offer a few illustrations of what these changes will mean in the postal rates on newspapers of different sizes. The new act provides that newspapers and periodicals with a circulation of ten thousand or more copies per issue will pay four cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof. Let us see what will be the actual effect of this on the newspapers of this country. A newspaper of over ten thousand circulation averaging 45 pages for each publishing day now pays $3 a year. Under the new rates it will be called upon to pay $7.64 a year. A newspaper of ten thousand or more circulation with an average of 32 pages for every day of delivery now pays postage of $2.34 a year. The new rate will amount to $6.24. A newspaper of 28 pages in this group which now pays $1.80 postage will pay $4.90 under the new rates. A newspaper of 24 pages which now pays $1.56 in postage will pay $4.19. An 18-page newspaper which now pays $1.36 will pay $3.62. A 14-page newspaper in this group which now pays $1.14 will pay $3.05 if these provisions are adopted.

Then let us take newspapers with a circulation of less than ten thousand. A newspaper with an average of 12 pages and a circulation of less than ten thousand now paying 93 cents will pay $1.54. A newspaper with a 10-page average in this group, which now pays 87 cents, in future will pay $1.31.

Certain changes have been made in regard to newspapers having a limited advertising content. Certain surcharges were imposed upon publications which carried more than 50 per cent of advertising, and that surcharge is done away with. However, there are certain disadvantages as well as advantages in this connection. The fact is that this surcharge did offer encouragement to maintain a certain percentage of news space. The removal of that surcharge also removes that incentive; and regarding this as part of the processes of democracy that should not be considered only as an advantage.

Now I come to the question of the percentage of increase. From the figures I have quoted it will be seen that in many instances the increases are substantially more than 100 per cent. It is very significant that, although such measures have not been adopted, there is a proposal for an increase of 60 per cent in the United States. But they are not suggesting that this increase should take place all at once; they are proposing that it be spread over a three-year period, if in fact they adopt the proposal at all. So in a country much more sparsely populated, where the reasons for giving special consideration to those postal services which carry newspapers to the distant parts of the land are much greater than in the United States, it will be seen that we are proposing greater increases than they are even considering over there.

The minister spoke of these special rates as something in the nature of a subsidy. I suggest they have never been regarded as a subsidy, but that they have been regarded and should be regarded simply as part of the whole machinery of democracy, to use the term I have used already. We do not hesitate to spend money on various activities related to the effective working of our democratic system. The various steps carried out under the election act, which in many cases call for the expenditure of substantial amounts of money, would be only partially effective unless the means were provided well in advance of the date of an election for the people to obtain all the essential information they wish to have as to the events taking place from day to day in the local, provincial, national and international fields. I believe the postal rates were mainly regarded as a means by which the rural population of Canada could be supplied with newspapers and periodicals which would give them the essential information they should have. I believe that is the principle which has been accepted in connection with postal rates on matter of this nature.

May I also point out that the newspapers themselves have co-operated in making information available in this way. I believe the record will clearly show that the annual rates at which newspapers are offered to the public give lower returns to the newspapers than any other type of delivery. Just to give one example, an urban daily in any one of the larger cities which sells for five cents a copy, and which in that way would cost $15.25 per year, is generally sold at $10 per year when delivered by post. That, of course, applies to the larger newspapers. In the case of smaller newspapers, there is a lower annual rate charged, although in most cases the street sale is now the same. Thus, it is apparent that the newspapers have been playing their part in making the news available to the widest possible number of readers throughout the whole community.

It is for that reason I believe the minister would be well advised to defer the second reading of this bill, and to review that part of the measure which he is now placing before the house, with the idea that postal rates which will make it easy to continue the widest distribution of daily and weekly newspapers to people in remote parts of this country will be supported by members of this house as part of Canadian democracy itself. I put forward that suggestion in all earnestness. The minister is well aware that there could be little possibility of newspapers absorbing these increased postal rates. It would be contrary to the general business practices in any business in this country to expect that very substantial increases of this kind will be carried by the newspapers, although I should think it likely that they will bear some part of the increase.

The bill, as it is before us, would have the effect of discriminating against newspapers at a time when newspapers are more important to the people of this country than they have ever been. No one recognizes more than I do the value of radio, from both the cultural and the news distributing point of view. I certainly welcome the facilities afforded by the radio, as do all hon. members of this house. I am convinced, however, that for the purpose of understanding the issues of the day nothing will ever entirely take the place of the printed word. People's memories may be very good, but it would be very difficult to remember everything that is heard, even in the very best radio programs. I repeat, therefore, that at a time when democracy is threatened, as it has not been threatened for centuries, we should not do anything which will make it more difficult to have the widest possible distribution of the news, or which will be inclined in any way to limit the circulation of those newspapers which have served Canada so well, to the most remote parts of this country from the east to the west, and from the southern boundaries of Canada to its most northerly part.

Some very strong statements have been made about these proposed changes, which indicate the extent of the objection which is being taken to these proposals. One thing that is emphasized over and over in the statements which have been made already is that it will be the people in the rural districts who will suffer most from a change of this character. It has always been regarded as of the utmost importance that those in the most distant and far-flung points should have these facilities available to them. As was stated in one discussion on this subject, "This is a direct tax on the intellectual food which is vital to millions of Canadians." I am not suggesting for one moment that at this time the members of this house can disregard the cost of any service that we are called upon to provide through the legislation we adopt. I suggest further that there are ways in which money could be raised from other sources to take care of a substantial part of this deficit to which the minister has referred.

I believe it would be to the benefit of Canadians if comic publications, sex magazines, and crime comics which are still circulated in large quantities were taxed heavily to provide some of the money needed to assist in the distribution to the people of this country of real news about the vital things that are directing the course of affairs in Canada. The strange part about it is that, instead of being taxed, these useless and in some cases dangerous publications actually pay less than those publications which are an essential part of democracy itself. I am not suggesting at all that we should try to decide what the people of this country can read, so long as it is not something that comes within clearly defined criminal or other prohibitions. But I do suggest that the postal service rates and other taxes should be imposed in inverse ratio to the usefulness of the publication. The publications which provide news and cultural information should pay the lowest rates.

Mr. Lesage: Like the Conservative papers.

An hon. Member: That stopped him.

Mr. Drew: I am rather interested in that interjection; in fact, I am interested in the two interjections. I hope that Hansard will have recorded those words, because if Hansard has recorded those words it will indicate the way that some of the members on the other side of the house regard this vitally important question.

Mr. Lesage: My interjection was made to show you how impossible it is to decide what kind of paper is more useful than other kinds; that is all.

Mr. Drew: I hope that Hansard will record that one of the parliamentary assistants was apparently treating with some measure of levity and lack of seriousness an argument which is in keeping with the view that I am satisfied expresses the general thought of our people right across Canada at this time. I do not suggest that the interjections which were made reflect the attitude towards this subject of the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret), and I trust that those interjections would be regarded by him as being quite as objectionable as they must be regarded by other members who recognize that distribution of the press is just as important as freedom of the press.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, may I say that I believe that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is imputing motives to me. I know that it is a serious question, and the only reason for my interjection is that I was wondering who was going to decide which paper is more useful than the other ones; that is all. This is a serious matter and I do not believe that the leader of the opposition has any right to impute any motives of levity, as he has, because I myself consider that this is an important matter.

Mr. Rowe: It did not sound like it.

Mr. Drew: I am glad that it has been possible at least to convince the hon. member of the importance of this subject during this discussion, and that encourages me to hope that the argument may carry some weight with other hon. members as well.

Mr. Lesage: I had already read all your arguments in the papers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think it would be better to get back to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps it is worth commenting on this point. If the hon. member has read all my articles that have appeared, he must of course be referring to articles on other subjects because I have not previously made any statement in regard to this subject, either in articles or otherwise.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but the press has something else to print than your statements. The newspapermen have their own ideas.

Mr. Drew: I am proceeding on the assumption that other members regard this subject more seriously than does the parliamentary assistant who is interrupting at this time.

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I feel I must rise again on a question of privilege. I do not believe it is fair to impute any motives, and I believe that the leader of the opposition should withdraw what he said just now.

An hon. Member: Explain your interruption.

Mr. Drew: I am quite sure that Hansard will accurately record what the hon. member has said, and I hope that it will. I also hope that it will carry quite clearly the extent to which my argument at least has brought him some distance along the path that I am suggesting.

I have sought to put forward for the consideration of this house certain reasons why I think that it would be desirable if the minister would withhold this bill from second reading, something which could be done by motion which would, I am sure, be carried by this house if he makes it. If that were done, then before the bill passes to the committee there will have been an opportunity to re-examine those sections which provide these increases in postal rates on the scale that I have mentioned. The minister himself would then not be confronted with the necessity for any hastily-drafted amendments if the arguments which were made by the members in committee convinced him that some changes should be made. If the arguments that I have put forward have merit, I believe that it would assist the minister and the members of this house to have these sections re-examined carefully, without undue haste, so that when the bill has its second reading and goes to committee the minister may have had an opportunity to draft alternative provisions which I think would be consistent with the opinion and with the wishes of many of the hon. members of this house.

At this stage I have sought to avoid some of the exceedingly strong terms which have been employed in editorials and in other public comments on this part of the act. I have refrained from employing some of the strong adjectives that have been employed in responsible newspapers and by responsible men to describe what they think is a serious infringement of democratic rights in this country. I have sought to put forward what I believe would be the wish of the people of Canada, because it will be the people of Canada who will pay the substantial part of any increases of this kind, and it will be they who will suffer if the processes of democracy are weakened in any way at this time.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is entitled "An act respecting the Canada post office". From what the minister said in his introductory remarks on the motion for second reading of this bill, I assume that it will be in order to discuss some matters pertaining to the post office which are omitted from the bill, as well as those matters which are specifically mentioned. I refer particularly to what the minister termed the operative details of the post office services. While I agree with the Postmaster General that in some respects it would be more convenient to postpone debate on those operative details until the minister's estimates are before the house than it would be to discuss them under this bill, I suggest that there are matters of grave concern to the Canadian public which, in my opinion, cannot afford to wait until the minister's estimates are before the house.

In a previous speech on this subject in the house I and other hon. members suggested that the time was ripe when either a commission or a special committee of the house should be appointed to investigate the whole question of the post office administration. Under the minister's estimates there will be no opportunity to debate that question in full, and I submit that it is a question that we may well consider while this bill is before us. The leader of the opposition has suggested that second reading of the bill should be deferred. He gave his reasons for asking for that deferment. I would suggest that second reading be deferred in order to consider not only the subject raised by the leader of the opposition but the question of the appointment of a commission or a special committee of the house to investigate the post office administration across this country.

My two chief reasons for suggesting that are that I am constantly, as I am sure all other hon. members are, receiving complaints from citizens that at the present time the post office is not rendering the kind of service for which it has gained a reputation during past years, and the kind of service which the Canadian people expect of the post office. I hear constantly of citizens in areas where there is supposed to be a daily mail delivery having to go for two or three days in succession without delivery of mail; of citizens who are continually obliged to receive their mail delivery after six o'clock at night. I know that I am referring to the Toronto area, and that conditions prevail there which may not prevail in other metropolitan areas. But a very serious situation has developed, and nothing that the Postmaster General or his officials have done within the past month or six weeks in an effort to remedy the situation appears to be very effective.

Only yesterday I met numbers of post office delivery men who still maintain that they are required to work twelve hours a day to cover their routes. That is a condition which, since it still prevails, and since the Post Office Department has already had at least two months or more since the condition was called to their attention to remedy it, and since effective remedies are not being applied, calls for some investigation. I do not think that the government, which in fact should set an example to other employers in this country, should be requiring employees, who by their terms of contract or work are required only to work, or supposed to work, eight hours a day, to work ten and twelve hours a day without any special remuneration for these extra hours. I am sure we would not condone that practice if engaged in by private employers.

This house would frown upon any employer who engaged men to work for eight hours a day, and then required them to work for ten and twelve hours a day without any remuneration whatever for the extra two, three and four hours a day that they may be called upon to work. These two considerations, the fact that the public in the Toronto area is not now getting the high type of service that is expected of the post office, and that the post office presumes to be giving, and the fact that the delivery men have to work long hours, prompt me to ask that second reading be deferred.

I read in the minister's report that it is the continued effort on the part of the department to cut costs without impairment of service to the public. In the matter of the one delivery a day recently introduced the government has attempted to cut costs. It has also impaired its service to the public by so doing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Applewhaite for the second reading of Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Gillis.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this bill which is most important to the people of my constituency. The constituency of Kootenay West, because of its geography, topography and other local circumstances which necessitate some people living in isolated places, is to a great extent dependent upon telephone service. A good and efficient telephone service is most necessary for the district which I have the honour to represent.

Before passing on to my other remarks may I say that we from British Columbia appreciate the interest that some eastern members have taken in this bill. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) who showed sufficient interest in this bill and the welfare of the people of British Columbia to speak when the bill was last before the house. I want to congratulate the sponsor of the bill upon the presentation—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member for a moment? Several days have elapsed since this bill was before the house. I recall that the last time we considered the bill the question of whether the amendment was in order was before us. It was decided that the amendment was in order and my recollection is that it was decided also that discussion should be strictly relevant to the amendment and not to the motion for second reading. If my recollection is correct, may I suggest to hon. members that they discuss only the amendment at this time. The amendment reads:

> That Bill No. 116 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

I think the discussion should be relevant to the question of whether or not the subject matter of this bill should be referred to the committee.

Mr. Herridge: That is exactly what I was going to do. I was going to give reasons why I believed this bill should be referred to the committee. Before doing that I want to express my appreciation of the very able way in which the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), who has no direct interest in this bill because the company does not operate in his constituency, sponsored the bill and presented the relevant information to the house. I think it only fair to say that, because there have been some occasions on which we have had slipshod presentations of important bills.

We recognize that throughout recent years the British Columbia Telephone Company have carried on extensive expansions in British Columbia and we give them credit for that. But we feel at the same time that we should take advantage of this opportunity to present the requirements of our constituents. Before I give the reasons why I think this amendment should pass may I say that I understand that throughout British Columbia the company has most excellent relations with its employees. I have found that to be generally the case throughout my district. I have found also that in the interior the public relations officials of the company have been most satisfactory. Before proceeding I want first to pay a tribute to the employees of the company in my constituency. Under the most trying conditions during the winter months they have undertaken the most hazardous tasks at times to maintain telephone service to many of our isolated communities.

British Columbia Telephone Company

It is not my intention to repeat the arguments so well advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), but I do want to say that one major reason we consider that this bill should be referred to the committee is that we believe the company is asking for too great an increase in capital at one time. If there was a reduction in the amount of capital asked for it is quite probable that in four or five years they would have to come before this house again and in that way we would have the opportunity to examine what they had been doing during that period.

Another reason why we think the subject matter of the bill should be referred to the committee is, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned, the very peculiar administrative situation that exists with respect to this company. While the board of transport commissioners has control over tolls, tariffs, and rates, no one has control over services. I understand the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned the fact that the public utilities commission of British Columbia have admitted that they had no power over the services and the development of services of this company.

We believe that there should be an amendment to the act so that some body would have control over services and the development of services according to the requirements of the communities concerned, the same as there is control over power and other utilities. We contend that that would be a very simple matter. Under the health of animals act, the fruit and vegetables act and the forestry act certain provincial officials are empowered to represent the federal government in the administration of certain regulations. We suggest that the act could be amended so that the public utilities commission of British Columbia would represent the board of transport commissioners and be empowered to deal with services and to see that they were properly carried out.

I am going to give other reasons why I think the subject matter of this bill should receive the consideration of the committee according to the amendment. I want to bring to the attention of the house certain complaints that have been brought to my attention with regard to the service given in Kootenay West by the British Columbia Telephone Company. I am going to start with Trail, the silver city of British Columbia, where one of the great metallurgical smelters in the British commonwealth is in operation.

Mr. Byrne: They get their silver ore from Kootenay East.

Mr. Herridge: I know that, but the manufacturing is done at Trail. That relatively small city makes a great contribution to the industrial welfare and defence production of Canada, yet it is without a modern dial telephone system. For some time they have been asking for an improvement in their telephone services. To illustrate the position briefly, I am going to read an editorial from the Trail Times of March 3, 1951, which reflects public opinion in this matter in that city in my constituency. The heading of the editorial is "Outmoded Telephones". It reads:

> The Bell Telephone Company has released some interesting statistics on telephones and one of the most interesting figures, so far as this district is concerned, is that more than 65 per cent of all the world's telephones are dial operated.
> The British Columbia Telephone Company, which operates most of the telephone lines in the province, including those in the West Kootenay, makes no distinction in its published reports between dial and other type of instruments but it says there are 4,328 telephones in the Trail area and approximately 230,000 in all of B.C.
> Over-all figures on telephone operations show that Canada has an average of one telephone for every five persons. Trail conforms to this average fairly closely. The question of automatic telephones is a far different matter. Trail has no dial telephones. At a time when more than 65 per cent of all telephones in the world have reached the automatic stage it is a sad commentary on a local situation when telephone subscribers here still are plagued with the inconveniences of the "Number, Pulease" system . . . This should not stop Trail from seeking an end to the present central system. After all, so long as there are no protests, the B.C. Telephone Company may imagine Trailites are quite happy with their old-fashioned phones.

I am making a protest in that connection on behalf of the residents of the city of Trail. I want to deal with the golden city of British Columbia, the city of Rossland, which has produced so much gold throughout the years. I wish to read a letter addressed to me by the secretary of the Rossland board of trade, a very responsible organization that considers all things necessary for the advancement of that community. The letter reads:

> Dear Mr. Herridge:
> Thank you for your letter of February 10 re the British Columbia Telephone Company proposed amending bill.

Of course I had written to find out if they had any complaints.

> Also please accept my apology for the delay in replying to same. However, as your letter arrived after our February meeting it was rather hard to get action on it until now. However at last night's meeting the matter was brought up and I can give you the suggestions as handed to me. First of all, I might say that the Rossland board has been dealing with B.C. Telephone company officials during the last year complaining about the service here in Rossland, and at that time we were given to understand that if this proposed bill went through for authorized capital, the Rossland service would be on the program for an improved system. Naturally then we are in favour of the proposed bill. The suggestions were as follows:

(1) Installation of a new up-to-date system in Rossland as we have been given to understand that the present party line system is carrying its maximum load and cannot be extended.

(2) That if improvements are contemplated, consideration be given to the installation of a modern dial phone system.

On behalf of the board I should like to thank you once again for your letter and assure you that you are dealing with a matter which is being followed very closely by this board.

That is the opinion of another considerable section of my constituency. I come to the city of Nelson, the commercial centre of the constituency. There again I have received letters from organizations and individuals complaining of exactly the same conditions complained of by the people of Trail and Rossland. Then I go from there to the capital of the Arrow lakes which the hon. member for Vancouver South knows quite well, the village of Nakusp. It is a small place with a population of some 750 which last year produced 600 carloads of lumber, nearly 550 carloads of cedar poles, and large amounts of farm produce. What do they have to say about it? They are very interested in this telephone bill and in securing improvements in the district surrounding. This is what they ask for, and they have been asking for these things for some time. That is one reason, Mr. Speaker, why we believe the amount of capital being asked for is too large. We believe these companies should have to come to the house fairly frequently for their increases in capital so that members of the house will have an opportunity to give expression to the complaints of their constituents. This letter is from the secretary of the Nakusp board of trade, and reads:

In reply to your letter re the B.C. Telephone Company which came to hand last week, would advise you that at our regular meeting held on Tuesday 20th, I was asked to give you the following points for consideration in the matter:

1. Twenty-four hour service.

We have not got twenty-four hour service. The operator has to be wakened at night if someone is sick and we wish to telephone Nelson, Trail or some other outside point. The letter continues:

2. Individual lines in town, or at least for business premises.

3. Fewer phones on existing party lines.

These are matters which we have been tackling for some time but we just get promises and no action. Hoping something can be done in this direction in the near future,

Yours truly,

Thos. Mitchell

There is another reason why we wish to see the money that will be raised as a result of this bill spent to a somewhat greater extent in the interior of British Columbia. I come now to Slocan which is producing a large amount of galena, lead, zinc, silver and metals of that type. I have heard from their board of trade, and they have been trying for years to get some improvements in that mountainous area where telephone service is very necessary, particularly when the roads between Sandon and New Denver, and other points, are blocked by slides in winter and when the only communication is by telephone. This is what I am advised by the secretary of the Slocan district board of trade with its headquarters in New Denver, a very lovely village, the Switzerland of North America. The letter reads:

Dear Mr. Herridge:

Re: B.C. Telephone Company

Thank you for your letter of February 10, and I trust that this reply is not too late to reach you before the proposed amending bill comes up for discussing in the house. We have been in correspondence recently with the B.C. Telephone Company requesting a regular twenty-four hour service in the New Denver exchange, but as yet have received no satisfactory reply. There is also a pressing need for more lines to Silverton, the present thirty-six phones in that thriving base metal mining community being served by only six multi-party lines. The number of telephones in Slocan city should also be increased, but we are not prepared at this time to recommend what form the improvement to service in that centre should take.

This district has received excellent service and co-operation from the company's district agent at New Denver, in spite of the fact that her work has been made most difficult due to the overcrowding of lines, shortage of adequate help due to the fact that the present emergency service set-up precludes a regular shift schedule being followed, etc. As a matter of fact, this lady is now under medical care at the coast following a nervous breakdown. We certainly hope that something can be done to bring the telephone service here into line with present-day business demands, as we feel that this is one part of the province where the increase in demand for telephones approximates the increase in capitalization being requested by the telephone company.

That letter is signed by Mr. N. F. Brookes, secretary of the Slocan district board of trade. Then I come to a somewhat unusual situation with respect to the Salmo and district valley where we have several large gold producers and several other mines including the Emerald mine, which will shortly be producing tungsten for the defence effort, and a large mine which is now being developed by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the Hudson Bay mine. For some years they have been trying to get improvements in service in that small community where there is an immense production of wealth, and so far they have not received the attention from the company that they deserve. In that connection I want to read a letter from their secretary. It is as follows:

I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 10—

You will note that I wrote them all on the same day.

—concerning the above, for which we thank you. Please be advised that this board is not at all satisfied with the telephone service now being provided in the Salmo area. At present the B.C. Telephone Company provides line service to the exchange in the Salmo post office and to the F. R. Rotter Lumber Company, but does not operate a service in the area itself. This service is managed on an individual proprietor basis by Mr. L. H. Lund, the present postmaster. This board has set up a special committee to go into the whole problem of improving the telephone service in the area. On numerous occasions in the past, the officials of the B.C. Telephone Company at Nelson have been contacted with a view to interesting them in providing a service for this area. The present holder of the phone franchise, Mr. Lund, has invited the company to make him an offer for his exchange, lines and equipment. This the company has refused to do, explaining that the equipment is valueless to them and that therefore they cannot reasonably pay him anything for it.

This board takes the position that, as a public utility, the B.C. Telephone Company has an obligation to provide an improved phone service in this area, regardless of whether or not they can expect a profit from operations in the region. Their profits from operations in larger centres would assuredly take care of any operating deficit in this area.

Anything you could do to convince the company that they should make an effort to provide a sorely needed improved service in this area, would be greatly appreciated. It seems that, in order to set up such an improved service, the company would have to buy out the service rendered by Mr. L. H. Lund, and then set up either an exchange or a dial system, such as is being installed in Castlegar and Fruitvale. We feel that the expansion going on in this area justifies consideration of such a step by the company in any event.

We would appreciate any information you can give us on the above problem.

Yours very truly,
(sgd.) F. T. Middleton,
Secretary

This community still suffers from a poor telephone service.

I am not going to read any more letters, because others will want to say a few words on this bill. These illustrations, I think, indicate the need for some authority within the province to exercise control over the service rendered by this company to the people of British Columbia, particularly in the rural areas. The same thing applies to Kaslo, a small incorporated city in my district, from which I have had communications along exactly the same lines. They are not satisfied with their telephone service. Only recently in that city there have been great developments in connection with the utilization of carbon dioxide for dry ice. Already a large sum has been spent, and they expect within two or three years to have a million dollar plant in that little city. The same thing applies at Castlegar, at the end of the Arrow lakes, and at Robson and other Arrow lake points. The same thing applies at Fruitvale, a growing community which is trying hard to get improved telephone service. There is need for improvement and expansion all through the district, and the people I represent have been doing their best to get that improvement and expansion. This is the only opportunity I have to bring their needs to the attention of the house.

Before concluding I should like to deal with another peculiar situation; that is the matter of telephone service in the Lardeau valley. At one time the Canadian Pacific Railway operated a railway line between Lardeau and Gerrard, a distance of about 32 miles. In 1941 they abandoned that line, turning the roadbed over to the provincial government for a highway, and also turning the telegraph wires over to the provincial government for the use of the forest service. Since then the whole line has deteriorated and been allowed to fall into disrepair. Here we have an area with 500 million feet of virgin standing timber within an area of a few square miles, as well as large mineral deposits and 16,000 acres of the best land in British Columbia awaiting settlement. Various residents of that area, as well as the board of trade, wrote to ask if I would bring the matter to the attention of the federal government to see if they would do something to assist them in maintaining this telephone service. The minister informed me the matter would be investigated. It has been investigated, and I am advised that the cost would be too great to be considered at the present time but that the Department of Transport will give technical advice to the settlers of the area if they wish to maintain the line at their own expense.

My point is that this service should be undertaken by the British Columbia Telephone Company. Why should they be allowed to have the profits from the rich districts like Vancouver, New Westminster, Victoria, Burnaby and so on, the cream of the telephone crop, and refuse to give service to other areas? There again if we had some authority in British Columbia to deal with these matters these companies that have monopolies could be required to give service to the outlying districts, to serve the non-profit areas with the profit areas. That is what we understood would be done when these people obtained their franchise.

I do not wish to speak at greater length, except to repeat that we take exception to this bill on two principal grounds. The first is that this company is asking for an increase in capital from $25 million to $75 million.

We believe that should be reduced to at least $50 million, so that in a few years the company would have to come back to this house and plead their cause again, when hon. members would have an opportunity to present the complaints and needs of their constituents. Then we believe there should be some amendment of this bill to provide for the direction of this telephone service by some authority within the province, such as the public utilities commission which directs the services supplied by power companies and other utilities in British Columbia.

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): If this amendment is passed at this stage of the session, whatever may be the wording, inevitably it will mean killing this bill. This legislation has been on the order paper since March 1, the day it finally passed the other house. With the order paper crowded as it is with private bills, if this legislation is not put through this house now so it can go to committee in the ordinary way, it cannot be satisfactorily handled this session. Therefore I would urge hon. members to defeat the amendment, give the bill second reading and refer it to the committee to which the hon. member wishes it sent. It will go there anyway under standing order 104, and before that committee I undertake to have all the senior officers of the company present for questioning. I would remind hon. members that details can be discussed in that committee, and if the house so desires the bill can be further debated on third reading.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): I should like to say a word on the amendment. I would like to see this bill go to committee, and I hope the sponsor does not prevent that being done. The part of the province from which I come wants to see this company get an increase in its capital, but we are definitely opposed to the increase that is asked; and I believe members from other parts of the province have the same feeling. If the sponsor and the company see fit to introduce an amendment themselves, as was done in the case of another company sponsored by the hon. member for Vancouver South, I am sure there would be no difficulty in getting the bill through.

I hope this bill will be referred to the committee tonight, but I want to make my position very clear. It is not going through the house without an amendment being moved, because it is inconceivable to me that this company should need the increase of $50 million now, for which it has asked. Then we know rumours have been heard around this building that because of opposition to this bill four hundred men in British Columbia have lost employment. I would like the sponsor or anyone else to verify that statement. To say that because a company with a capitalization of $25 million has not been able to get that capital increased it has been forced to lay off four hundred men is utterly ridiculous, and I think any hon. member who has circulated that story around this house—

Mr. Applewhaite: I regret very much delaying the debate at this stage, but on a question of privilege the hon. member has referred to the sponsor and then to any other member circulating this rumour. I definitely deny that I or anyone connected with me circulated any such rumour.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member will check Hansard tomorrow he will find I did not say the sponsor circulated the rumour. I said the sponsor could deny the story. I said these rumours had been circulated, and I am glad the sponsor says they are not true, which I presume he is saying. Of course the company has not laid off four hundred men as a result of the very limited discussion that has taken place here, and I am glad to hear the sponsor make that statement; that is exactly what I wanted him to say. I intend to have a good deal to say on this bill in committee of the whole, since I am not a member of the standing committee. I will personally see to it that an amendment is moved, if it is not moved by someone else, reducing the amount of the increase asked for. If the company will agree to that amendment then to the best of my ability I will see that the bill goes through, but certainly not for the full amount. The main reason, Mr. Speaker, that I am speaking again tonight is that I resent these unfounded arguments. I am glad to hear that the sponsor of the bill agrees with me that they are entirely unfounded. The company must have money, and advertises that it must have money to expand its services to meet the increasing demands. I have before me an advertisement from the Vancouver Sun which is headed "Marriage still claims large number of telephone operators. Many more needed to take their places." That proves, Mr. Speaker, that no one is better qualified to refer to the telephone company of the province of British Columbia than the member for Fraser Valley. I described the beauty of the operators, and the company pays money to advertise that they are leaving every day to get married. I shall do my utmost, sir, to see that this bill goes through this house on third reading, providing the request for capitalization is reduced to a moderate amount.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, at this stage I only wish to speak for about two minutes to say that while, as I believe every member who has spoken tonight has said, I am not opposed to this bill receiving second reading, nevertheless I have not had answers to my objections to certain parts of the bill which I expressed on an earlier occasion before the amendment was moved by the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). My objection has to do mainly with certain provisions regarding preference shareholders. The point I made is that I think their rights are likely to be unduly prejudiced if the amendment passes in its present form. I do not wish to do more than say that my objection has not been answered either by the sponsor of the bill or by the solicitor for the company, with whom I have had correspondence. I intend to move an amendment in committee, but I do not intend to hold up the bill at this stage, except to say that my objection still stands and has not been answered.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that on one particular point I speak for all the members from British Columbia, and particularly those from greater Vancouver, when I say that we want the bill to receive second reading. We believe that the company needs a certain amount of new capital for the expansion of its services. But there are a great many of us who are opposed to granting the amount of capital the company is requesting in this bill. We would like to see the bill passed in an amended form with the amount of capital reduced. I agree with the member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) that if the amendment carried it would have the result of killing the bill. However, it would not prevent the committee from recommending that the bill be again introduced with the amount of capital reduced.

The members from British Columbia cannot, without aid from members from other parts of Canada, get the modifications in the bill that they would like. If I understand it correctly, the purpose of moving this amendment was that, if passed, it would serve as an indication to the company of the temper of this house in regard to the bill. The purpose was not to kill the bill. If this amendment fails and second reading is given to the bill, it will automatically go to the proper committee where, if there is sufficient support from other members, the bill can be amended. I assure you that this company has a monopoly on telephone services in British Columbia which it exercises with almost complete disregard of the welfare of the people and operates wholly in the interests of the shareholders, not only of the British Columbia Telephone Company but of all the other companies connected with it. I should like to see this bill passed and referred to a committee, so that we could have representatives from the city of Vancouver where the bulk of the people served by this company reside. It is a very important issue for the people of the city from which I come.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the present time the debate is on the amendment moved by the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Accordingly he cannot speak again.

Mr. Gillis: I did not intend to speak at all, I just wanted to make a reference to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: But the hon. member moved the amendment, and cannot make a reference to it again without the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid that the hon. member has not the unanimous consent of the house, so he cannot speak again. Is the house ready for the question on the amendment? Those in favour of the amendment will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Fulton: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose the amendment can be lost on division, and if so I declare it lost on division.

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF EASTERN CANADA

The house resumed from Friday, May 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 176, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Eastern Canada—Mr. Ross (Hamilton East)—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved that Bills Nos. 200 to 266 inclusive be read the second time.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, should not these bills be called for second reading one at a time?

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Croll: No. Things have changed since you left. We take them in bunches again.

Mr. Speaker: It has been the practice of the house to read the bills together with one motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure that the standing orders are quite clear that a bill is a bill and is supposed to be read separately. Just because there is a whole lot of them that are very much the same does not do away with the fact that they are individual bills. I think that if the house is going to do this job it should take it seriously and do it in a proper way. Even if there is no discussion on many of these bills I feel that they should be called one at a time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. On previous occasions the bills had been read together with the unanimous consent of the house. If there is not unanimous consent, I shall call the bills individually. Will it meet with the pleasure of the house if I call the bills slowly by number?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROMEO PARADIS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 206, for the relief of Romeo Paradis.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 206 is carried, I should like to express the hope that when this bill goes to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills this case will be given thorough consideration rather than just consideration in bulk. I do not know whether or not the case is contested, but I know that it is one that occupied considerable time of the committee of the other place. The volume of evidence with respect to this case is a fairly thick one. There is one son fourteen years of age. I do not wish to discuss other details at this point. I merely rise to express the hope that even if this case is not contested, the committee will consider it carefully.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Private Bills—Divorce

JOHN ATHERTON CRITCHLEY

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 232, for the relief of John Atherton Critchley.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to suggest to the sponsor of these bills—and I believe the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) is the acting sponsor—that he allow this bill to stand and that we go on and deal with the others that are on the order paper. This is a case that is contested. I have certain information about it, but I am prepared to speak to this bill on another occasion, if the hon. member for Spadina would agree to my request that this bill stand.

Mr. Croll: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Bill 232 stands.

Mr. Cleaver: All the rest in bulk.

Mr. Knowles: No. Those days are gone for ever.

Mr. Cleaver: Fine nuisance value.

JULIA STARR MELNICK

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 233, for the relief of Julia Starr Melnick.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before Bill 233 passes, I think I should take note of the remark just made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) to the effect that what I am asking for is in the nature of creating a nuisance. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is the right and the duty of parliament to deal in a proper manner with bills that come before it. I do not think that what the house is doing tonight is really satisfactory.

An hon. Member: Oh, give it a rest.

Mr. Knowles: Any members who want to make interjections are free to make them and to get them on the record, but I suggest that parliament should realize what it is doing in passing these divorce bills just as fast as Your Honour can read the numbers. That is no reflection on what Your Honour is doing; you are doing what the house has asked you to do. But I submit that any suggestion that a nuisance is being created by asking that at least a few seconds' consideration be given to each of these cases is entirely out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will endeavour not to read the numbers of the bills quickly, but will hesitate long enough between the bills so that any member who objects to any one will have an opportunity of expressing his objection.

[Mr. Knowles.]

JOYCE MARGARET WRIGHT ROXBURGH

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Weir) moved the second reading of Bill No. 262, for the relief of Joyce Margaret Wright Roxburgh.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I inquire why it is that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler) sponsors most of these bills but that occasionally the sponsor is the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir)?

Mr. Croll: It is quite possible that the hon. member for Lisgar was not in his office that day and that the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa was available.

Mr. Fulton: Just a stroke of the pen.

Mr. Knowles: The easiest divorce court in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

JOHN COOK DONALDSON

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 311, for the relief of John Cook Donaldson.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise once again to express the hope that this case will be looked at closely by the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills. Indeed, while I have singled out two or three for special mention, I hope that as a result of the attention that has been drawn to these bills, that committee, when it reports back, will be able to say that it has considered all of the bills more carefully than has been the case thus far.

One of the reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I have permitted these second readings to go through with such expedition tonight is that this is not the last time that this bill, or these bills, will come before us. They will go now to the committee on miscellaneous private bills, and then they will come back to the committee of the whole house and subsequently be up for third reading. Nevertheless this bill, like all the others, is an act of parliament, standing on its own feet; and the more we go through this practice of putting these bills through in what amounts to batches, the more convinced I am that this is not the place where bills of this kind should be dealt with. The place where Mr. John Cook Donaldson should have been able to get relief is a court of some sort. I earnestly hope that it will not be long until John Cook Donaldson and all others who require this kind of relief will be able to go to such a court.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): On division, and that applies to all these bills.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to on division.

Motion agreed to on division and bill read the second time.

MARION CRUICKSHANK MACARTHUR

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 318, for the relief of Marion Cruickshank MacArthur.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member for Fraser Valley interested in this case? I see he has just come in. I am asking the hon. member for Fraser Valley if he is not interested in Bill No. 318, since the names involved are Cruickshank and MacArthur.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I did not know I was going to be brought into this debate. I have exactly one minute to make a few remarks. I do not know this lady or this gentleman. Even if they are Cruickshank and MacArthur I hope that people of these names will never be called upon to come before the House of Commons to get their divorce, but that they will live in a province that has a court of justice to handle such cases.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): On division.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the second time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

CHAMPION PIPE LINE CORPORATION LIMITED

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 321, an act to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited.—Mr. Macnaughton.

Mr. Speaker: I might point out to the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill that if it is called now and not proceeded with it will go to the bottom of the list. I think it is only fair that if he wants the bill not to go to the bottom of the list I should not call it at this time.

It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Rinfret for the second reading of Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office.

Mr. Noseworthy: When the house rose at six o'clock for dinner I was in the process of explaining why I thought the Post Office Department needed a thorough housecleaning job done. I shall conclude these remarks with one more reference. I think, Mr. Speaker, it might be an appropriate time to consider whether or not it would be advisable to have the administration of the post office removed from the jurisdiction of a department of government, such as is at present the case, and have the administration placed under a commission similar to that which now operates our Canadian government railways. I am quite confident that such an arrangement would offer fewer opportunities for the practice of political patronage in connection with the Post Office Department than exist at the present time.

To my own personal knowledge it is just about impossible today for anyone who is not a well-known supporter of the Liberal party to get permission even to operate a sub-post office in some little cubby hole of a back shop or store in our cities and suburban municipalities. There are many opportunities for the distribution of political patronage in the post office system outside the civil service and from all I can gather the present administration takes full advantage of those opportunities.

I want to turn now to the matter raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the change in rates for the carriage of newspapers and periodicals. The minister told us last year that his department lost approximately $12 million on the handling of newspapers and periodicals. The department is asking us to condone a reorganization of the department in connection with mail deliveries, a reduction in the public service, for the express purpose of saving something like $3 million. It is not reasonable that we should condone an economy of that nature and at the same time condone a loss of $12 million by one branch of the postal service. I am not familiar with these rates but I presume that the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) and his officials have estimated the new rates so that they will just about cover the cost of these services. There is more information we need but it probably will be forthcoming in committee.

I should like to know whether periodicals published and printed outside Canada and distributed in Canada will be subject to the same rates as periodicals published in Canada. I should like to know if the recent increase in the postal rate on unsealed drop letters containing mimeographed and printed notices from one cent to two cents, an increase of 100 per cent, is based on the cost of the service. I should like to know if the Post Office Department was losing half what it cost to provide that particular service; that the service cost the department just twice as much as it was receiving.

I contend that the various branches of the Post Office Department should pay their own way. I do not think the Canadian public want to subsidize the newspapers and magazines of this country to the extent of $12 million. Many of these magazines and newspapers, particularly the large metropolitan dailies, are operated at a considerable profit. We have had numerous opportunities to learn what those profits have been.

I do not agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that the public service rendered by these newspapers is of such a nature as to warrant our subsidizing them to the extent of $12 million, or to any extent as far as that goes. There may be a place for assisting certain Canadian periodicals, and here I am in agreement with the leader of the opposition. But there are other classes of periodicals, such as crime and sex comics, which should be taxed by way of increased postal rates. The country would not lose anything by a reduction in the number of that type of periodical that was circulated.

Some of our Canadian magazines have a difficult time to survive in competition with United States and other magazines. It would be a tragedy if the better class Canadian magazines were forced to go out of existence and Canadian readers left only with magazines published and printed in countries other than Canada. If there is room for assistance to such magazines that assistance should be given by way of a straight subsidy and acknowledged as such. The purpose for which it is given should be made clear to the Canadian public. I do not think the general Canadian public should pay for the postal services provided to these magazines.

The leader of the opposition put up a good argument in support of his opposition to section 11. He based his argument on the ground that these newspapers disseminated essential information, I think he said particularly at election time. I should like to comment briefly on that. I do not feel that our newspapers are providing us with essential information at election time or that they are giving us impartial news reports, particularly at election time. In this connection I should like to call attention to an article which appeared in Maclean's Magazine of August 15, 1949, just after the federal election.

This article refers to two Toronto dailies which, by the way, are the largest English language evening papers published in Canada. Both these papers profess allegiance to democratic ideals and have declared that it is the duty of a newspaper to give impartial information on all sides of any question that is of public interest. As a matter of fact, the heads of both newspapers are on record to that effect in the editorial columns of their papers. Here is how impartial these papers were during the last election campaign. During the last week of the campaign the Toronto Daily Star gave five times as much news space to the Liberal party at it did to the Progressive Conservative party. The Toronto Telegram gave five times as much space to the Progressive Conservative party as it did to the Liberal. Both are supposed to be independent in politics. I would say that both, like many other newspapers in Canada, at election time at least degenerate into party propaganda sheets. The Star gave the C.C.F. party 2.4 per cent of its political news coverage in that week, and the Telegram gave the C.C.F. 2.6 per cent. There is not much choice between them.

During that week of June 20 to June 25 the Toronto Daily Star gave the Liberals 1,734 inches of space, and the Telegram gave them 290 inches. During the same week the Star gave the Progressive Conservatives 355 inches and the Telegram gave them 1,402 inches. The Star gave the C.C.F. 52 inches of space and the Telegram gave them 46 inches. During that week the Star was sprinkled with 85 photographs of a political nature covering approximately 3,250 square inches, including captions. Of the 85, 73 were photographs of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), his family, Liberal candidates, and their supporters. All but one of the remaining twelve were printed with the express purpose of discrediting the Progressive Conservative party. The only two photographs of the leader of the Progressive Conservative party were such as were designed to discredit him with the Star readers.

Mr. Fraser: The generous Star.

Mr. Noseworthy: Concerning the political events of the time, on Wednesday, June 15, the Star covered eight Liberal rallies which the Telegram ignored, and the Telegram covered four Progressive Conservative speeches which the Star ignored. It printed four other political items all anti-Liberal. On June 20 the Star noted that when Mr. Drew disembarked at the railway station in Quebec City a total crowd of about 400 met the train. The Telegram had him greeted by a crowd of close to 3,000.

Mr. Fraser: Well, there is the truth.

Mr. Noseworthy: With reference to a meeting in Lacombe, Alberta, on May 28 the Telegram reported that the meeting indoors at the fair grounds was made up almost entirely of farm folk. It reported that the spontaneous enthusiasm of the meeting was a pleasant surprise to Progressive Conservative organizers.

Mr. Shaw: Was the election result a surprise?

Mr. Noseworthy: The Star reporter wrote that the afternoon meeting was attended by only about 600 people, and was made up mostly of high school students let out of classes for the occasion. I submit that, when you have two of our great dailies, both of which profess the ideals of democracy and that a newspaper should be impartial in its news reports—

Mr. Knowles: They are impartial but on which side?

Mr. Noseworthy: —when we have such reporting as the examples I have given, I can see no reason why, in the interest of the dissemination of essential information at election time by these papers, we should give them from the public treasury a subsidy amounting to millions of dollars. I think the Canadian public as a whole will support the minister and his department in increasing the cost of postage on newspapers and periodicals to a point that will bring them closer to paying their own way.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) also spoke of the freedom of the press and the fact that freedom of the press depended to a large extent on freedom of distribution. In theory that is correct, but in actual practice I wonder how much freedom of the press we have in Canada today. I wonder to what extent national advertisers, who support to a great extent our large national magazines and daily newspapers, influence the policies of these publications. If the truth were known, I think it would be readily agreed that not one of these papers or magazines would dare offend these national advertisers by advocating any policy, political or economic, that these advertisers did not approve.

There is another movement on foot in Canada that needs close watching, and which will interfere with the freedom of our press. I refer to the practice of one individual or company gradually securing control of large chains of newspapers, big and small, and submitting all these newspapers to one editorial policy. That process is taking place in Canada. Large chains of newspapers are already organized and come under the domination of one individual or one small group of individuals. I submit that process is much more harmful to the freedom of the press than increasing their postage rate from, in the case of the larger newspapers, $3 a year to $7.60, and in the case of the smaller ones from 87 cents to $1.31, as pointed out by the leader of the opposition. On the whole, Mr. Speaker, we will approve this section of the bill, but I think we will be asking the minister for more information than is available to us at present, particularly on the two or three points I mentioned earlier in my remarks.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I welcome this opportunity to consider this bill, which is designed to bring post office legislation up to date. It has been our belief for quite some time that an opportunity should be provided to thoroughly consider all matters relating to general post office policy. On more than one occasion we have urged that a committee of the house be set up for the purpose of considering post office estimates, or at least to consider general post office policy, and again we urge that this course of action be followed. Our feeling is that this bill should be referred to a committee of this house.

My understanding of what the minister said this afternoon is that this bill has two specific purposes, first to bring post office legislation up to date and second to eliminate redundant sections of the old act. We have no argument to offer with respect to those two purposes. Certainly it is time the act was brought up to date, and certainly these redundant sections should not longer remain in the legislation. I agree with the minister that such matters as actual operating details should be considered when the post office estimates are before the house, and that we should relate our discussion specifically to policy when considering this bill.

I do not intend to occupy the time of the house now by referring to any specific sections of the bill, which I assume would be out of order; but I would like to serve notice upon the minister that I for one intend to question him in quite some detail on a number of very important aspects of policy. One has to do with the appointment of postmasters. My conviction is that the present method is entirely wrong. When we come to the relevant section I propose to elaborate upon that assertion, and may refer to certain specific cases to indicate why I feel the policy is wrong. Moreover, I think the time has arrived when we should give serious consideration to the conditions under which certain postal employees work, their hours of work, conditions of work and salaries.

Perhaps at this point I should say that during the years I have been privileged to serve as a member of the House of Commons my relationship with local postmasters, with district office officials and with head office officials has been most cordial. I have frequently commented upon the excellence of the work done by these various groups of post office employees. I have often wondered, however, how many of them chafe from time to time under certain restrictions and conditions under which they work. How they must chafe when trying to carry out certain aspects of post office policy which I think, if the truth were known, they believe should have been changed long since.

Another matter I intend to pursue at some length in the discussion of the bill is the service given in certain communities. I have always been led to believe that the motto of the Post Office Department is service, but I have discovered that no matter how legitimate my case may be I am inevitably met with this road block: will that single specific operation pay? It does not seem to matter whether settlers have been in a community for forty or fifty years. It does not seem to matter whether they are entitled to the service. That question is always asked: will this single specific operation pay? In the light of that and certain other facts I suggest that perhaps we should give some consideration to that motto. Perhaps it is redundant. Possibly it should be modified to more properly meet present conditions. Let me repeat that in spite of anything I have said or may say before we finish with this bill, I have great admiration for those people who so conscientiously endeavour to maintain our postal service. I believe they have been restricted altogether too much. I think they have worked under conditions which many of us would characterize as intolerable. In spite of that, however, in the main they have continued to render excellent service to the people of Canada.

I am not going to take more time at this stage, Mr. Speaker. We feel that we can more appropriately express our views as the specific sections are considered by the committee.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I want to say a word with respect to this bill, which is of great interest to the people of this country. I have had quite a lot to do with the institution of rural routes but very little to do with the appointment of postmasters, except in minor offices. I have been in politics for a long time, and the only postmasters I have tried to replace as such were those who had taken the positions of Liberal postmasters when Mr. Bennett was elected to office. I have left them alone except when there were complaints from interested parties, customers of the post office, for technical reasons. I did not even visit them. I believe I am one of the few members of parliament who have not visited each post office in their counties. My impression is that when we hear no complaints about a post office it means it is well run; that has been my experience. So long as I had no complaints I did not want to interfere with the management of the post office. But at times there were complaints. I remember Mr. Veniot, who was one of the greatest postmasters general whom I have known, and the next best is the present incumbent. In the meantime, there were postmasters general of various abilities. Some were very hard to deal with, and others paid very little attention to the duties inherent in their position. Some others organized a system of secrecy concerning the reports coming to the department, and which are not supposed to be known to members of parliament.

If there is a request made for any change or any improvement in the Post Office Department, a member of parliament should be entitled to know what report was made by the local inspector; what report was made to Ottawa by the district inspector; what recommendation was made by the head of the branch to the deputy minister; and what recommendation was made by the deputy minister to the minister. I have admiration and affection for the present Postmaster General, and he may rely on my support because he deserves it. I say the same of his parliamentary assistant. But so long as I support the minister and his parliamentary assistant, it does not mean that I have to swallow all the high officials we have in the Post Office Department in Ottawa. Some of them have been there for a long time, and some not so long.

My idea of a good civil servant is one who respects his minister, and who shows loyalty to the head of the department; not only that, but one who understands that for the good management of any department there shall be respect for the hierarchy within the department. The deputy minister is not the head of the department. He is the deputy head, and he should behave accordingly. The man who has the responsibility for the management of the department is no one else than the head of the department—this applies to all departments. Since I was first elected I have known very few postmasters general who have been just as assiduous in their parliamentary as in their departmental work, but that is the case with the present Postmaster General of Canada. The tribute that I pay him tonight is a well deserved tribute, because I have a profound respect for anyone who works with so much intelligence.

I wonder if I should recall what I said one day in a caucus in the province of Quebec. I said that the present Postmaster General is an intelligent man. There was loud applause. Then I said, "Your applause, gentlemen, is no compliment to his illustrious predecessor, but I will not insist." Sir, the members of parliament are supposed to be the collaborators of the cabinet ministers, especially of the Postmaster General. I do not see much partisan politics in any department; but since the time I had the postmasters and mail carriers reappointed who had suffered great injustice from the Bennett regime, I have not recommended anyone merely because he was one of my supporters. I have enough respect for the intelligence of the people in my constituency not to recommend any one of my supporters who was not perfectly qualified to occupy a position in the Post Office Department or elsewhere.

Members of parliament, sir, make recommendations for the appointment of postmasters to minor post offices. For post offices having a gross revenue of $3,000, the appointment is made on the recommendation of a member of parliament, and above that it is by the civil service commission. Well now, what I have tried to do was to make the civil service commission understand the danger of appointing one who was not fully qualified to serve the community as it deserves to be served. Until now we have been quite successful, and in my constituency the Post Office Department has been abiding by the provisions of the Post Office Act, and the Civil Service Act concerning military preference.

Every time that a returned man was asking for a vacant post office, so long as he was qualified he was recommended. But what happened was that after their appointment some resigned. They said they would not keep the job. Then the department had the trouble of appointing other men who sometimes also resigned. Those are difficult matters, especially with regard to men suffering from disabilities. The matter should be looked into with a view to making the least possible number of appointments within a certain period of time and seeing to it that in the first place men who will be the most useful are selected.

I give credit to the minister for his co-operation. I also give credit to most of the officials of his department, especially those outside Ottawa. I do not complain of all of the personnel of the post office department in Ottawa but I remember well that among the high officials there is one whom I could not thank at any time because I had some trouble with him. The only way to fix it up was not to deal with him at all. He was vicious; he still is. I hope he will soon go. This is one example.

Others try to create trouble for members of parliament, in the name of efficiency, with the pretext of streamlining the department on all sides. Others play at intrigue by coaxing some members of the press gallery, apparently giving them false scoops. They are hard to deal with. But to establish and to maintain order in any department is not fascism; it is order. The idea of order has been so much lost sight of in the minds of the people that whenever anyone tries to establish it he is accused of interfering with the efficiency of a smooth-working system.

You know well, Mr. Speaker, what is the basis of good government. It is plain common sense, fair play and respect for sound, established practices.

There is something else to which I wish to refer. There is to be taken care of not only the distribution of mail in the Post Office Department but also the delivery of mail to all the recipients of it throughout the country. The Post Office Department is a big one with a revenue of, I would imagine, about $100 million a year and with a large number of employees. I pay tribute to the personnel of the Post Office Department, as I said, with the exception of a few plants that have grown too high. In the spring it is time to cut the weeds. But the average personnel is good and has a good spirit. That is something which has been inspired by the minister himself, by the parliamentary assistant and by those employees of the Post Office Department who have been trained in the right manner by those who have a high sense of duty and who have more public spirit than private selfishness and ambition.

To come back to the mail routes and to the delivery of mail, as hon. members know the delivery is made in cities by letter carriers who are appointed by the civil service commission outside of the jurisdiction—and most of the time outside of the knowledge—of members of parliament. The staff of the city post offices is also appointed by the civil service commission. I have not much more to say, but with regard to rural routes there is one thing that should be considered, namely the differences of level, the differences in the kinds of roads on which the mail carrier will have to go in order to deliver the mail, the hills, and so on. It is impossible to have a flat average of $50 per mile. There may be some cases where it is a reasonable payment for the services of the mail carrier, but in others it is not. If a man has to climb hills for the delivery of mail, he evidently deserves more than the one who travels on a flat route. This is one point which should be left to the good judgment and the fairness of the minister, at least in appeal from the decision previously rendered by those in charge.

I am glad that, in virtue of the new act which is before the house now, the minister will have authority to make his own decisions up to $1,000, I believe. Is that it?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, $1,000. It is of great importance, and otherwise mail carriers complain that they cannot make both ends meet, and they abandon their contracts. New tenders are called for, and the work is always starting anew.

I thank the present minister for the establishment of a letter carrier service in the city of Riviere du Loup, which was inaugurated yesterday, and which is welcomed by all. I thank him also for the establishment of numerous rural routes in my constituency, to the benefit of the farmers. According to my knowledge, it is the policy of the minister to give the best possible service to Canadians who live in cities, and also to Canadians who live in the country. It is a great satisfaction to all of them to be able to wait at home for their mail, which is delivered to them by letter carriers in the cities, and by mail carriers in the country. There are still some small post offices that will render a great service.

In each municipality there is a main post office. Just a minute ago I heard the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) speak of the good relations that exist between him and the postmasters of his constituency. I could say the same thing except that at times we had some difficulty, again coming from Ottawa—it was before the minister came in to be in charge of the department—just on account of the closing of post offices on Sundays after mass. It was just an order that came from Ottawa. It came from the sky. It was an old tradition to have post offices open for an hour on Sundays. It was not an inconvenience to postmasters to give the letters and the newspapers to the farmers who wanted to have them to read on Sunday. There is nothing wrong in reading one's correspondence and the newspapers on Sundays. But the post offices had to be closed. Fortunately there were many postmasters in my constituency who were bright enough to understand that such an order had not to be followed very closely.

Other than that, the regulations of the department are well observed, and I am satisfied with the Post Office Department, although there are some obstacles in the way of progress and in the name of super-efficiency. Efficiency is very good; super-efficiency is just a wee little bit too much.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall leave the floor to others, and I shall have other occasions to discuss the post office business. But I wanted to pay tribute to the minister, to his assistant and to all the competent civil servants of good will in the Post Office Department in Ottawa and elsewhere throughout the country. I am sure that the study of this legislation, which is of paramount importance, will be inspired by no partisan bias. I think enough of my hon. colleagues to be sure that they will not fail to discuss the new provisions of the Post Office Act with their usual candour and—wisdom.

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe): I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has added the word "wisdom" to his rather eloquent tribute to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret).

I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house on this issue. I agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata that it is a very important one. I do not propose to support everything that he has said with reference to the administration of the Post Office Department. I agree with him that the Postmaster General is a very congenial gentleman. In this legislation I know that he is only expressing the desires of his government.

I feel that it is rather strange and worthy of note at this time that a democratic government should be imposing such penalties on the dissemination of news. They are doing it at a time that news is so important in the life of this country and of every other country.

In the daily newspapers we read of the enormous surpluses that the government is enjoying at the present time, surpluses, Mr. Speaker, I believe five times as large in the first month of the fiscal year as the government expected to have in the whole year.

An hon. Member: Four times.

Mr. Rowe: Someone said "four times". Do not doubt my word for one point.

It has long been recognized in the development of any country, and that is especially true of this young country, that transportation, immigration and education are features that should be divorced from what you might call a profit and loss balance sheet of government administration. If there is anything in the life of any young country, and especially the life of Canada, that is of importance it definitely is the freedom of the press, and that is traditional in our way of life.

There are small weekly newspapers, and other small dailies, that have been disseminating news and have been sending it to the far-flung areas of this dominion at less cost per year than what the government now proposes to levy against them as an increase. In these inflationary times we have all had experiences of the increased cost of living, the increased wage rates that we negotiate from time to time, the increased cost of materials all along the line, the increased freight rates, if you like, and the increases on every side. But Canada is a large country; Canada is a young country; Canada has many people in far-flung areas, far removed from educational circles and communities, bush workers, miners,—

Mr. Gibson: Tories.

Mr. Rowe: Yes, and some like the hon. member, independent of any party. All across this dominion we have these people depending upon the dissemination of news. They want to read the daily papers.

There are those, Mr. Speaker, who have not had the opportunity of educational advantages. I have seen men who have sat to the right of you, Mr. Speaker, since I have been in this House of Commons, who had very little education. In fact, without naming them, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) knows whom I mean. One of the most brilliant minds we had in this dominion admitted in this house that he had very little education, but perhaps like Churchill he had picked up things as he went along. He learned a little from the daily press, as the Minister of Agriculture must do when he reads his speeches. After he reads them he must be surprised. The daily press means so much to the life of this country.

An hon. Member: What about the weeklies?

Mr. Rowe: I am not forgetting the weeklies because if there is any press that is more or less non-political, if there is any press that is non-partisan, if there is any branch of the press in Canada which helps to form an important part of this great fourth estate of this great dominion, it is the weekly press. I pay my tribute to the weekly press of Canada. I hold no brief, and as I grow older I hold less brief, for those who disagree with the party I support. I know there are some that do not support the Conservative party very solidly; there are others that support it rather clumsily; but we do have freedom of the press, of the fourth estate as it is called, that means so much to the life of the country.

Our press means much in the education of this country. Not all hon. members within sound of my voice, let alone many men in the far-flung areas, are able to send their boys and girls to universities. There are many families that cannot afford to do that. There are many families that have to work hard; there are many great minds in Canada who have learned to toil with their hands but who have learned from the daily press. I pay that tribute to the press of Canada. Thank God we have a free press in Canada. They have done more generally and broadly for the education of our people, for the inspiration to try to do better in the future, for the inspiration of trade and industry, for the inspiration to develop charitable and social services, for the inspiration to develop and increase social services and church work, than they are given credit for.

We find now that the government seeks to impose a penalty which in normal times or in times of the slightest depression would be a crushing blow to many small weeklies. There is not one within sound of my voice who does not know of many weeklies throughout the country that have been selling annual subscriptions for $2 and still having difficulty in getting enough subscribers to make their advertising rates profitable. In 1930 the tax per ton on newsprint used for the dissemination of news in this dominion was fifty cents, and today the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) proposes that it shall be $10.20. The Canadian producers of newsprint receive less for the newsprint they deliver to Canadian publishers, but the Canadian publishers pay substantially more than the United States publishers. The United States publishers pay $106 per ton, but with these taxes as they stand now the Canadian publisher will pay $111.20 per ton, when all these taxes are included. There is a ten per cent sales tax on the daily and weekly papers, yet the crime and sex comics and all these nonsensical sheets which add nothing to the culture of this dominion pay no sales tax.

Let us be fair. I agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that the Postmaster General is genial and always looks like a fair fellow. In so far as I am concerned I think he has been fair. I urge him to take this back to cabinet council and review this act. I know that no government of Canada could impose this tax at the present time without realizing that there are bound to be many repercussions. I know we have the bureau of publicity here in Ottawa which is growing like a mushroom. We have the C.B.C. and the other means of disseminating news for the government. In fact, the government is becoming the greatest publisher in Canada. Now we have the government curtailing others.

We have the publications sent out by the Department of Agriculture. I know the Minister of Agriculture authorizes all this and I try to read it, but my wastepaper basket is full of the things I receive from that department which I have not time to read. The Department of Trade and Commerce do likewise. Being somewhat interested in the newsprint industry I would say that if it were not in short supply I might almost welcome the waste of newsprint there is by the dominion government.

It does surprise me that now they are curtailing its use by the imposition of this tax. They are going to impose a tax of approximately $3 on many of the rural newspapers in Canada, or double their present rates. I ask hon. members to pause and realize what it will mean to those in the far-flung areas, the miners, the people in the bush and others in isolated sections who have hesitated to send in subscriptions at $2.50 if they are now asked to pay $5.50?

This seems to be in keeping with the trend of a government that has been in power too long. This is a trend toward the curtailment of the press. It is a trend that has been indicated all along the line in the curtailment of the press in different ways, to submerge the news instead of disseminating it. There are many services that are necessary in this great country, vast as it is, sparsely settled as it is. This fact has been recognized since the days of confederation. The transportation of our vast resources, the transportation of our people in the far-flung areas, has been paid for more or less by the state. Immigration which is needed to improve and increase our population is paid for by the state. The dissemination of news for the education of our people should also be considered part of our nation building.

This seems to me to be a grave error on the part of the government. At least it is an oversight. I would be unfair if I said that it was intentional, but whether it is intentional or an oversight it will discourage the dissemination of news. It will weaken the prestige of the fourth estate in this dominion. It will curtail the freedom of the press. It will create hardship for many who feel it is a hardship to pay the present annual subscriptions but who still want to know what goes on outside their local districts. It will create a hardship for those whose only means of learning is the daily and weekly press.

I urge the government to reconsider its move in this regard and try to get the revenue somewhere else. You have the comic strips, you have the sex magazines, you have the crime sheets and other sources of revenue.

An hon. Member: The racing form.

Mr. Rowe: I am not any better reader of the racing form than the hon. member, and certainly he is not too good. Put it on that publication if you wish, but do not put it on the papers that mean so much, that are one of the delicate hands behind the culture of this dominion.

Observant as the Postmaster General is, he must have observed that in the last few years there has been an increase in the literature going out from the dominion and in many other countries we have seen a gradual decrease in what is allowed to be published. If there is no other way of doing it, they ration newsprint. That is what is done in many socialist countries. The newspapers are not allowed to have enough newsprint to disseminate news, no matter what their political faith may be. They may be a little to the left, they may be too far to the right, but in many cases they are not permitted to print news outside of what is of local interest.

No matter what the issue is, no matter what policy is being followed, the people should know what is going on. This tax imposing a restriction on the dissemination of news is more dangerous to our democratic way of life in these modern times than at any other time in our history. There has never been a time in our history when people have craved knowledge more than they do now. There has never been a time when the dissemination of news has been more vital to our very existence. If the freedom of the press never dies in Canada, communism will never live in Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to comment on the subject that has just been discussed by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) as my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), has already dealt with that matter. I feel, however, that I must say that I was a bit surprised to hear the press of this country referred to as having "delicate hands". We all agree with the position he took as to the importance of the freedom of the press, but I wonder if that freedom is to be curtailed by the slight increase per year in postage rates proposed in the bill now before the house, the purpose of which is to ask newspapers to pay their own way. As for the freedom of the press and its impartiality, the hon. member for York South has already given evidence as to how far various newspapers lean in their presentation of facts, particularly when they relate to political matters.

However, the reason I was anxious to get on my feet was because I felt the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would be disappointed if I did not rise at the earliest opportunity to take issue with some of the things that he said when he spoke in this debate a little while ago. I refer in particular to his views as to the part that he thinks members of parliament should play in the internal affairs of the Post Office Department. There is one thing about the hon. member for Temiscouata. He does not hide his belief in the practice of patronage. He not only admits that there is such a practice but he glories in it, and carries on his practice of it right out in the open. For that I suppose we should commend him, much as we dislike and deplore the practice itself.

I did not know that there was anything in the Post Office Act that said that members of parliament should make recommendations for the appointment of postmasters for post offices having below a certain gross revenue. I have looked through the bill before us to try to find some section that even hints at that. Maybe it is there but I cannot find it.

Mr. Fraser: It is only in Grit type.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) says that it is only in Grit type. At any rate, I have not seen it. It may be that there are some regulations to that effect. I would be surprised to learn that, but it is pretty clear from the way in which the hon. member for Temiscouata spoke tonight that there are some members of parliament who make a practice of making recommendations as to the appointment of postmasters, and apparently have the experience of having those recommendations accepted.

Mr. Gibson: How about the insurance officers in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knowles: Don't try to get me off the track. I feel that the practice urged by the hon. member for Temiscouata is thoroughly out of keeping with our modern democratic process. After all, if that principle is to apply to the post office what about the Canadian National Railways? What about the Polymer Corporation? What about Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Ferrie: What about the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knowles: If the hon. member for Temiscouata is going to carry on that practice he would have members of parliament say who should pilot our North Stars. I would much rather have Trans-Canada Air Lines make decisions of that character, and I think the same applies to the post office. We have the right and the obligation on the floor of parliament to debate matters of policy, but when it comes to internal administration I suggest that that should be done on a civil service basis and not on the basis of patronage. May I remind the hon. member for Temiscouata, and others who are interested, that a short while ago a delegation from the Canadian Congress of Labour waited upon the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and other members of the government to express among many other views the hope that some improvement would be made in the relations between the civil service and the government. The specific request was for the provision of collective bargaining, but according to a dispatch that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen the Prime Minister said:

> We want the civil service to enjoy as good working conditions as provided by good employers throughout the nation . . .

Then he went on to say:

> We want the civil service to be fairly treated but we do not want any preferential treatment accorded them . . .

Then I should like to read this paragraph:

> Mr. St. Laurent recalled that years ago it was considered there was too much political patronage involved in appointments to the government service. To improve this situation, parliament appointed the civil service commission.

Thus you have the hon. member for Temiscouata on the one hand boasting of the patronage method, and you have the Prime Minister on the other saying that the reason for the appointment of the civil service commission was to get away from patronage.

I have been glad to note certain items in some newspapers to the effect that the deputy postmaster general does not like this business of patronage, and that he has even been treading on the toes of some members of parliament in that respect. It may be that that is the reason for the speech made tonight by the hon. member for Temiscouata. Maybe he has had his toes stepped on, or maybe he is speaking for someone who has.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise on a question of privilege. According to the standing orders of the house, no hon. member can impute motives to any one of his colleagues. What I have said has been said. I have nothing to add to what I have said. I want the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to withdraw from his speech any comment imputing motives to me. What I say I say from experience which is much longer than his and which has been satisfactory to my constituents. If they had not been satisfied with my recommendations they would have voted against me. I challenge the hon. gentleman to repeat in my constituency the speech he is making tonight. It would help me a lot.

Mr. Knowles: I confess the hon. member puts me at a bit of a loss. He wants me to withdraw something, and he has not said specifically what it is he wants me to withdraw. Then he says he wants me to go down to the county of Temiscouata and say the same things again on the ground that it would be to his benefit.

Mr. Gibson: Withdraw.

Mr. Fraser: What has he got to withdraw?

Mr. Knowles: The rule is that a member must not impute a motive to another member other than a motive that the hon. member acknowledges, so I would like to know what—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had no intention of imputing any motive to the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Knowles: I agree with you perfectly, Mr. Speaker.

I was about to say that if press reports are correct concerning the deputy postmaster general, to the effect that he is trying to stamp out patronage in the post office, he has my wholehearted support; and I am glad to know that he is listening to that comment at this moment.

However, I really rose to speak on one matter of principle that is covered by the bill now before us. I shall reserve any more extended remarks about it until we get to the section of the bill dealing with the letting of contracts, but since this is the time we discuss the general principles involved I felt I would like to say a few words about this matter now.

I refer to the practice of letting out under contract the collection of mail from post office letter boxes scattered around our cities. I should not speak for all cities in Canada, but I do know the situation in my own city of Winnipeg and I have reason to believe it is similar if not identical to that in other cities. In Winnipeg we have these trucks painted red with the words "Canada Post G.R." on the side, which travel about the city picking up letters and parcels from the street letter boxes. Similar trucks deliver mail from the post office to the trains, to airports and so on. I have no doubt most people in my city assume that those trucks and various delivery vehicles are owned by the Post Office Department and that the men who drive them and do this work are employees of that department. In the city of Winnipeg that is not the case. This work is let out by contract; as a matter of fact there are a number of contractors depending on the particular service in question. This in turn means that the drivers of these trucks, sometimes referred to as mail couriers, are not civil servants and employees of the Post Office Department, but are employees of the contractors to whom this work has been let.

My plea to the Postmaster General and his department is that consideration be given to placing that work directly under the aegis of the department. I make that plea particularly in the name of the employees concerned. In my view the mail couriers in Winnipeg are not getting a proper break in the matter of wages, hours, holidays, pension rights, sick leave and all the other working conditions, comparable to what is enjoyed by civil servants. When from time to time some of us take up the plight of these people with the department we are simply told that the Post Office Department is not the employer of these men, that they are employed by the contractors to whom this work has been let, and that they must apply to their immediate employers for any improvement in working conditions. I find further that there are different types of contracts, and that these contracts have varied over the years. Some have escalator clauses; others have not. Sometimes when a group of employees appeals to the contractor for an improvement in wages or working conditions, the employer appeals to the government for an increase in the amount paid under the contract. Sometimes the government answers that plea, an increase is given and the improvement takes place. On other occasions the contractor does not pass on the plea, or if he does the government does not see fit to increase the amount paid. As a result there are variations between one type of service and another, as well as between cities, in the wages and working conditions of these men.

My study of this whole matter, arising out of close contact with the men involved, leads me to assert that the whole situation is quite unsatisfactory. The men can go on pursuing the present practice of trying to get their employers to improve their conditions, which sometimes results in their employers trying to get better contracts. But there is always a lag as far as the men are concerned, and they are woefully behind the conditions enjoyed by other civil servants and people doing comparable work in a place like my own city.

That is the case. I shall deal with it in more detail when we reach that section of the bill; in fact when that time comes I shall present facts and figures as to wages, hours of work, lack of pension privileges and matters of that kind. I did feel, however, that at this stage when we are discussing the principle of this new legislation, I should bring to the attention of those who deal with these matters the urgent need of reviewing this whole situation as far as mail couriers are concerned and with respect to these trucks that they drive about the city picking up the mail.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct some observations to the minister in reference to this legislation in the hope that some of my ideas that have been expressed in the house on previous occasions may yet prevail. Before doing so, however, I should like to follow up the excellent observations made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) in connection with this indirect tax upon the dissemination of news in Canada.

These days we read of the suppression of newspapers like La Prensa in Buenos Aires; we read of the request by French journalists and newspapers for the allocation of additional newsprint to help promote, establish and maintain the principles of our free way of life, and it seems to me that we in parliament have an obligation, as the minister and the government have a very special duty, to see to it that while we are attempting to establish those principles in the broad international field we do not do something to undermine the very same principles at home by means of domestic legislation such as this. It may be argued, as it has been argued in this debate, that the tax is not ruinous, that it will not be felt so heavily. In my view, however, the imposition of additional financial obligations upon those disseminating news in Canada is a retrograde step for which I do not think the government can take much credit at this time. I should like the minister to consider the possibility, even at this time, of leaving things as they are at least for the time being, while this nation and others who feel as we do are engaged in a strenuous struggle for survival and for the continuance of our free way of life.

I do not want to indulge in unnecessary forensics in connection with a matter of this kind, but I think it goes to the very root of our democratic system. While we have free postage on Hansard containing our speeches in this house; while we have the free distribution of all the propaganda, if you like, coming from government departments in the form of news, statements of policy and the like—and I have not heard of any tax going on that—in the final analysis I wonder—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): How about the opposition speeches?

Mr. Graydon: You do not send them out because you have good public relations without them. In any event, in so far as the speeches of the members are concerned which leave this parliament to go to the various constituencies, they are only a drop in the bucket. So far as the real dissemination of news of this parliament is concerned, that rests with the members of the press gallery, the eyes and ears of the nation. I dare say if you were to remove the members of the press gallery for one session of parliament there would be scarcely anyone in the country who would take the slightest interest in what was happening in parliament, because the eyes and ears of the people are in that press gallery. Along with our parliamentary system, they form our democratic system. You cannot separate the two. One is complementary to the other. When you attempt, even by this method which is employed here, to impose a burden upon the dissemination of that news, you not only attack the press itself but indirectly you are attacking parliament. I cannot, therefore, be too emphatic in expressing to the minister my belief that he should review that part of this post office bill.

If I may, I should like to come to another point which has not been dealt with in this debate, and that is why we have to keep on forgetting the forgotten man. This has been going on now not for years but for decades. There never seems to be enough influence brought upon the minister or upon the government with respect to the plight of the rural mail couriers to have the government act in any definite way. Here we have a great shake-up—at least, I suggest one may call it a shake-up—in our Post Office Department and a number of amendments made to that act. There has been some talk about overhauling an act which has been there since 1867. If we are going to overhaul the act, then why do we not overhaul some of the regulations that need overhauling the most? Here we are taxing newspapers and the dissemination of news, and at the same time doing nothing for the rural mail couriers across this country. While perhaps for some urban people the rural mail courier just appears to be another contractor, that is not the case. Those of us who have been served by rural mail during the many years of our farm life realize that the rural mail courier is much more than just a contractor. He is an institution in the rural life of every rural community.

Mr. Rinfret: What is your suggestion?

Mr. Graydon: I am coming to it. Since he is an institution, I feel that he ought to have more consideration than he is receiving in this particular bill. Of course, the minister will say that these couriers are contractors. They have put in the lowest tender. He will say it is because they have tendered low that they are now in this serious plight. I want to tell the minister that I was never able to see the justice or the logic in picking out certain people in the Post Office Department and asking them to tender. When the minister is appointed, his position is not put up for tender.

Mr. Knowles: How do you know?

Mr. Graydon: When the parliamentary assistant is appointed, his position is not put up for tender. When the deputy minister is appointed, his position is not put up for tender. One could go all down the line. I cannot see why we continue, year after year, picking out the poorest paid of all our people in the Post Office Department and allowing that condition to be continued. I have made this suggestion before, but I am going to make it again. I realize the difficulties facing the Postmaster General in this regard. It is not an easy matter to solve. I believe a move ought to be made to solve the problem; and for that reason I urge, I hope with a little more effect than in the past, that the rural mail couriers be brought before a special parliamentary committee in Ottawa to explain their suggestions as to how this matter can be properly worked out.

Mr. Rinfret: What is your suggestion?

Mr. Graydon: That is my suggestion. I do not think that anyone could make a better suggestion than to have the rural mail people come down here and discuss this matter with a parliamentary committee. They could tell us how this contract system could be improved or changed, because it seems to me that almost any change would be better than the present system. After all, the fact that from time to time bonuses have had to be given to contractors across Canada after the contracts have been in force for some considerable time, and also the fact that departmental officials are tied hand and foot in attempts to try to work out something for rural mail couriers in various instances, are indications of the need for a change.

There is case after case where a courier takes a contract only to find that before the termination of the contract the number of boxes on his route has increased immeasurably.

Mr. Rinfret: He gets a proportionate increase.

Mr. Graydon: He gets a proportionate increase, but it is not always the type of increase that is required under the particular circumstances. More than that, I want to say that when we are dealing with an institution that is as important as the rural mail couriers, surely we owe it to them to bring them down to Ottawa so they can tell us what they regard as a proper solution of this difficult problem. After the rural mail couriers have come to Ottawa and given their complaints to a committee, then I would be satisfied with whatever decision was made. I want to emphasize to the minister that I think we at least owe that much to them.

In view of the fact that this is an opportunity for dealing with the Postmaster General's department in general, there is another point I wish to bring to his attention. In places like the constituency I represent, which has been growing perhaps more rapidly than most sections of Canada and in which there are literally hundreds of houses going up year after year with new areas opening up, it seems to me that the question of extending the rural mail or postal delivery service to meet that condition is essential and urgent today. I know that the department is making some effort to meet the situation as they find it. If a committee is formed—I hope the minister has not entirely closed the door on that—that is one question I should like brought before the committee. In the United States there has been adopted some scheme whereby these suburban communities are being serviced by a sort of in-between system, that is between the postal delivery service and the regular rural mail delivery. I should like to see the committee deal with that question as well.

So I say to the minister that when the act is being overhauled, these matters ought to be considered. Once the act is finally passed with such amendments as may be necessary during its tour through the legislative chamber, we may not have an opportunity of satisfying the rural mail couriers that their case has not been glossed over by any procedure of parliament which does not give them an opportunity of being heard.

I am not asking for impossible reforms. All I am asking for is to have them heard. If it is then determined that the present system of contract is the best, I think the minister will have satisfied the couriers, the public and parliament. More than that, he will have done something which is perhaps more difficult: he will have satisfied me.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted, first of all, to endorse unreservedly the words of praise directed a moment ago to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret). I may say without hesitation that, in my constituency, there has never been any patronage because the contracts have invariably been let to the lowest bidder.

I wish to make a few suggestions to the minister with respect to this bill and I hope he will give them his earnest consideration.

Subsection 2 of section 11 of this bill, with reference to the new rates for periodicals and newspapers, reads in part as follows:

(a) for those published daily

(i) with a circulation of ten thousand or more copies per issue, four cents for each pound weight or fraction thereof.

In the province of Quebec, the daily newspapers, that really provide a source of information for our people, come from only four cities: Montreal, Three Rivers, Quebec and Sherbrooke. In order to reach the rural population, these newspapers must, of necessity, use the postal services over a considerable expanse of territory. Would it not be fairer and more practical to increase postal rates for newspapers in direct proportion to the area covered by their own mailing lists, as in the case of the railway passenger fares?

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, allow me to suggest to the minister the establishment of a postal zoning system whereby rates would be increased in direct proportion to distances travelled. For instance some papers in Quebec city have sixty thousand subscribers outside the city. It would only be fair to these subscribers to increase postal rates in proportion to the distance involved. The situation in Quebec province is not the same as in Ontario where cities are clustered together and where most dailies can be delivered to their subscribers, who are limited to these centres, by light delivery vans.

Since the minister generally listens sympathetically to the suggestions which are directed to him I do hope that he will carefully consider this idea of a zoning system which would help to prevent an unreasonable increase in newspaper subscription rates for people who live in rural areas.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the arguments that have been brought before the house by the opposition members, and by some on the government side, are in the main all related to one subject, namely the increase in the rates on newspapers. It has been said that these new rates are taxes. May I say that they are not taxes. They are fees for services rendered. Up till now we have been rendering these services for $15 million and have been collecting only about $3,900,000. With the proposed increase, we shall add another $2 million only on the services rendered the newspapers. That will amount to about $6 million that we shall collect from the newspapers and magazines, out of an expenditure of some $16 million this year and probably much more next year on account of the increase in the cost of transportation, wages, et cetera.

It has been suggested that the second reading of this bill should be deferred until time has been given to review this section. If the house would like to have the assurance that the section itself might be deferred for further consideration, I have no hesitation in giving it in order to weigh all the arguments that have been made here. I might say, however, that consideration has already been given to practically all of these suggestions. I must point out to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that deferring the second reading of the bill would of itself prevent the establishment of certain postal areas in which he might be interested.

The increases that we have made here are not confined to Canada. Similar increases have been made in the United States. It has been suggested that the increase in the United States is only 60 per cent and spread over three years. That is correct. But one must remember that in the United States the deficit in the postal department for the last operation year was $599 million. I should not like to see my department facing a somewhat proportionate deficit.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to answer all the questions at this time. I will come to them in committee. There is one thing, however, that I must answer, namely the question of charging more to certain types of newspapers. Reference has been made to comic magazines. The comic strips included in the papers of course are carried at the same rate as the newspapers. When we come to the comic magazines my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has not been well informed, because comics do not enjoy the privilege that he has quoted. Comics have to pay on the regular circular rate of two cents for one ounce or a fraction thereof, and one cent for each ounce over that. Therefore the comic magazines or the sex magazines that have been mentioned pay nine cents a pound as compared with the four cents that we are charging for the big newspapers.

I might point out here—it might be of some interest—that if we had collected the amount of $12 million deficit that we had in the department on newspapers and magazines we would have sufficient revenue to reduce the forward letter rate from four cents to three cents throughout Canada. That is, if we did not have this deficit of $12 million we could reduce all the four-cent rates that exist at the present time to three cents so as to make a uniform three-cent rate throughout Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: May I ask the Postmaster General a question?

Mr. Rinfret: If it were at all possible I should like to answer questions in the committee stage.

Mrs. Fairclough: With respect to the $12 million which the minister has said they have lost on newspapers, is that loss not on all second-class mail?

Mr. Rinfret: Newspapers and periodicals I should have said. Newspapers and magazines; that is the second-class mail.

Referring to the treatment that is given our letter carriers and the question raised by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) I should like to announce to the house—the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) asked me a question the other day—that the department has recommended to the civil service commission and to the treasury board that overtime for letter carriers incurred during the transition period incidental to the introduction of one delivery walks be paid for in cash, effective with the date of change, if any, in the letter carrier walks operating from the office, the actual time of change to be the effective date. There will of course be variations, as all walks in every instance were not changed from the same date. The matter is now before the treasury board, and with the little experience I have gained I think the treasury board will see the well founded effect of this.

Mr. Knowles: Overtime at what rates?

Mr. Rinfret: Overtime as is customary in the post office at the ordinary rate, but that will be retroactive to the date of the introduction of the walk after an official check has been made of that walk. We are pressing our inspectors to make the checks as soon as possible; but the letter carriers can be assured of one thing. Even if a check does not take place today, or if it takes place only in a month's time, they continue to accumulate overtime, and will be paid for that.

I do not think that there is any more that I should like to say at this time. I reserve the right to answer all questions that have been asked at the committee stage, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Graydon: Don't forget the rural mail couriers.

Mr. Drew: May I just clarify one point? The minister referred to the remarks that I made about comics, and what are described as crime books and sex books and things of that kind. Is it not true that these books are exempted from the sales tax that does apply to newspapers? Not the sales tax, but the tax that applies to newspapers?

Mr. Rinfret: That is what I said. The rate that is applied to them is the circular rate, which is two cents for two ounces, and one cent for every ounce over that, which gives for one pound the rate of nine cents as compared with four cents for the big newspapers, or one cent and a half for weeklies.

Mr. Drew: That is the postal rate, is it not?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Drew: I am talking about the tax; I am not talking about the postal rate.

Mr. Rinfret: I thought the leader of the opposition was referring to the rates.

Mr. Drew: No. Is it not correct that they are exempted from the tax upon the newspapers?

Mr. Rinfret: That is not my department; I am sorry.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will move to go into supply and ask for interim supply. We will not call any new departments. I understand that this is a formality. Then we will revert to the study of the post office bill.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. What is the total mileage and expenditure, by provinces, for the fiscal year 1950-51 on the trans-Canada highway?

2. What is the total amount paid or credited to each province by the federal government for (a) construction work; (b) allowances and mileages of sections previously constructed by the provinces, for the fiscal year 1950-51?

3. What is the amount of such expenditures and mileage, by provinces, that have been authorized for the fiscal year 1951-52?

4. What is the mileage and cost in each province, of sections of the trans-Canada highway, for which the provinces have asked for credit or payment?

5. Have the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government agreed on the route of the trans-Canada highway in that province? If so, what expenditures thereon have been made, and what mileage is under construction (a) to date; (b) authorized for the fiscal year 1951-52?

Mr. Winters:

1. The mileage under construction as of March 31, 1951, and payments made by federal government to each province for work done during the fiscal year 1950-51 are as follows:

Province	Mileage Grading	Mileage Paving	Payments $
Newfoundland	153		957,843.79
Prince Edward Island	19		134,135.43
New Brunswick	30		—
Ontario	145	66	2,749,328.63
Manitoba	30	44	273,958.99
Saskatchewan	151		392,169.26
Alberta	15	42	193,055.70
British Columbia	29	38	2,504,392.39
Total	572	190	7,204,884.19

2. The amounts paid to each province by the federal government for (a) construction work and (b) allowance for sections previously constructed by the provinces for the fiscal year 1950-51 are as follows:

Province	(a) New Construction	(b) Prior Construction
Newfoundland ..	957,843.79	—
Prince Edward Island	134,135.43	—
New Brunswick ...	—	—
Ontario	2,749,328.63	—
Manitoba	245,514.99	28,444.00
Saskatchewan ...	392,169.26	—
Alberta	193,055.70	—
British Columbia	2,236,587.04	267,805.53
Total	6,908,634.84	296,249.35

Note: It is difficult to estimate accurately the mileages for which claims have been allowed until all the claims for any particular section have been finally considered.

3. No agreement is necessary between the federal government and the provinces regarding the annual construction program. Projects are planned by the provinces and are then submitted to the federal authorities for approval prior to tenders being called. Complete information regarding the mileage of new construction contemplated in 1951 has not yet been received from all the provinces.

4. Two provinces only have submitted claims for credit or payment for work done prior to the passing of the Trans-Canada Highway Act. Manitoba has submitted claims for $297,266.84 for 49·64 miles of prior construction. British Columbia has submitted claims for $2,168,716.59 for 58·84 miles of highway, nine bridges, and overhead structures constructed prior to passage of the Trans-Canada Highway Act. The above figures represent Canada's share, which according to the terms of the agreement is not to exceed 50 per cent of the cost.

5. No agreement has yet been concluded between the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government regarding the construction of the trans-Canada highway.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—LOSS OF BUILDINGS AND EQUIPMENT BY FIRE

Mr. Fraser:

1. What was the total loss by fire of national service buildings, equipment, etc., during the year March 31, 1949, to March 31, 1950; navy, army, air force?

2. What was the total loss by fire of national service buildings, equipment, etc., during the year March 31, 1950, to March 31, 1951; navy, army and air force?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Blanchette:

1. $1,173,861.88.

2. $1,126,831.12—subject to change on receipt and review of investigation reports.

KOREA—ENLISTMENTS OF CITIZENS OF JEWISH RACIAL ORIGIN

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. With the exception of those engaged in office or administration work, how many citizens of Jewish nationality are enrolled at present for active service in Korea?

2. What percentage of the population of Jewish nationality in Canada does the above-mentioned number of enlistments represent?

Mr. Blanchette: As there are few persons of Jewish "nationality" in Canada the questions refer presumably to racial origin. It is not the practice to keep records of the racial origin of members of the armed forces, and it is not considered to be in the national interest ordinarily to keep or publish such information.

PROPERTY AT 7 DELAWARE AVENUE, OTTAWA

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the government or any department or agency thereof purchase or rent the house at No. 7 Delaware avenue, in the city of Ottawa?

2. If so, from whom, on what terms, and for what purpose?

3. Who negotiated the sale or lease on the part of the government, on the part of the owner?

4. Was any commission paid by the government to any person involved in the transaction? If so, how much?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I should like to answer this question orally. In answer to parts 1, 2 and 3, I may say that on the 2nd of February of this year, at the request of the Department of National Defence, expropriation proceedings were filed against this property, the owner being Mr. Omanique. Since then the Department of National Defence has been negotiating as to the price. It has had a valuation made by a well-known firm in Ottawa, but the negotiations are not completed.

The answer to part 4 is no.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many orders in council have been passed between (a) January 1 and December 31, 1950; (b) January 1 and May 1, 1951?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I gather from this question that what the hon. member would like to know is the number of orders in council, not including the minutes of treasury board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Including treasury board by itself—all orders in council.

Mr. St. Laurent: Then this question might be made an order for return. There will be a statement as to treasury board minutes, and a statement as to the various summaries of orders in council that have been tabled in the house from time to time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS, HALIFAX

Mr. Balcom:

For a statement showing (a) a list of construction projects in Halifax, Nova Scotia, for which tenders were invited by the Department of Public Works, from January 1 to April 30, 1951; (b) tender number; (c) location and type of work; (d) names and addresses of those submitting tenders, and the amount of each tender; (e) names and addresses of those securing contracts, and the amounts in each case.

Mr. Balcom:

For a statement showing (a) a list of construction projects in Halifax, Nova Scotia, for which tenders were invited by the Department of Defence Production from April 1 to May 26, 1951; (b) tender number; (c) location and type of work; (d) names and addresses of those submitting tenders, and the amount of each tender; (e) names and addresses of those securing contracts, and the amounts in each case.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would consent to letting these motions stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER SOUND-AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister consider asking the house to appoint a committee, as was proposed by Mr. Speaker on March 15, for the purpose of giving further consideration to the question of installing an amplification system in this chamber?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This is a matter that is particularly for the house to decide; it is not something in respect to which the government would wish to give any directive. However, I would have no objection to placing a notice of motion on the order paper, and, if and when the whips of the different groups tell me that they have arranged for the members to constitute such a committee, I could submit the motion for the consideration of the house as one upon which all hon. members, wherever they sit, would feel quite at liberty to express their own views.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask if the Prime Minister would consider having the motion go on the order paper in such a form as would permit Mr. Speaker to select the committee? It seems to me that it would be difficult for the whips to nominate a satisfactory committee. I have had the idea that Mr. Speaker might name a small committee to assist him and make recommendations.

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not care to have inscribed on the order paper a motion imposing any duty upon Mr. Speaker. I can confer with him, and if it is agreeable to him that the motion be in that form I shall put it on the order paper in that form. Otherwise it would be in such form as to leave the matter to be worked out by the whips of the different groups.

Mr. Coldwell: Knowing the Prime Minister, that is precisely what I would have expected him to do.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION TO PRESS GALLERY OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is true that the Massey report has been printed and that copies have been circulated to members of the press gallery, but that it is not to be tabled in the house until Friday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am informed that the report has been printed, but I do not know whether it has been circulated to members of the press gallery. That certainly was not done by or on behalf of the government, if it was done. I was informed that the chairman of the commission would have the report to present to me as leader of the government tomorrow at 12 noon. I am arranging to have a meeting of council before the afternoon sitting so that it can be transmitted officially to His Excellency the Governor General and tabled in the house at three o'clock tomorrow.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As a matter of personal explanation, I have just realized that in answering the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I spoke of the arrangements for the tabling of the Massey report as having been made for tomorrow. They actually have been made for Friday, and I was just a day ahead in considering that Friday might be tomorrow. It is for twelve o'clock and three o'clock on Friday that the arrangements have been made.

WHEAT

OVERAGES SHOWN BY COUNTRY ELEVATORS DURING PERIOD OF FIVE-YEAR POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister examined the situation in respect of overages shown by country elevator companies in their operations over the past five years? If so, does he consider that any action is necessary in this connection?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. I have certainly looked into the matter of these overages. In the case of wheat, I find that out of 1,427,587,096 bushels of producers' wheat handled in the five-year pool, there were overages of 3,470,789 bushels, or ·24 of one per cent in country elevators, and 2,151,149 bushels, or ·15 of one per cent in terminals. Upon further examination I find that the bulk of these overages occurred in the crop years 1945-46 and 1946-47, which followed about three years of congested conditions in the elevators in which no weigh-over had been possible in many of the elevators. This situation was common to both the producer-owned and the privately-owned companies. Because the companies had not been able to weigh over their own houses that were congested, the overages in question actually occurred over some seven or eight years of operation rather than in the five-year pool period only.

Those who are familiar with the provisions of the Canada Grain Act know that the board of grain commissioners have no power to weigh-over country elevators or to take possession of overages that occur. I believe it would be mistaken policy to take such powers, because the principle of seizing overages implies that the crown should make good on losses. Because of the competition prevailing among the country elevator companies, the underwriting of losses would lead to competitive abuses in that direction.

Where the board of grain commissioners do have power to act is in the setting of the shrinkage allowances in determining the net weight of wheat delivered at the elevators. It is common knowledge that there is invisible loss in the handling of grain. To compensate for this, a shrinkage allowance is made on all grain taken into the elevator. A shrinkage table is displayed in a prominent position in each elevator. From November, 1923, until the end of the 1947-48 crop year, a shrinkage allowance of one-half of one per cent on receipts of straight grade wheat at country elevators was in effect.

As soon as the board of grain commissioners were able to review the country elevator operations and found that substantial overages had occurred during the period of congestion, they lowered the shrinkage allowance on straight grade wheat from one-half of one per cent to one-quarter of one per cent, effective for the crop years 1948-49 and 1949-50. Operating under these reduced shrinkage schedules, country elevators showed a wheat shortage of ·02 per cent on total handlings for 1948-49, and a very slight overage of ·002 per cent for the 1949-50 crop season.

In these circumstances, the board felt justified in partly meeting the representation of elevator companies for increased allowance, and accordingly adjusted the shrinkage rate on wheat from one-quarter of one per cent to three-eighths of one per cent for the 1950-51 crop year. The effect of this recent revision in shrinkage schedules will not be known until the elevators furnish their sworn statements to the board on their 1950-51 operations.

The point I am making is this. The board of grain commissioners acted over three years ago to correct a situation which was revealed when the country elevator congestion was relieved. The action they took at that time effectively wiped out the overages in the subsequent years of operation. I have every confidence in the ability of the board of grain commissioners to maintain effective oversight of this situation. As a matter of fact, I have asked the board if any further action could or should be taken, and they have advised me that no further action at this time is necessary. The whole problem of overages is reviewed annually, and will be a matter of further study at the board's tariff meeting to be held in July, when they should have the results of this year's operations.

GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF 1950 REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): On Thursday last I addressed two questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and in his absence his parliamentary assistant answered the first one but said he would refer the second question to the minister. The second question had to do with the annual report of the board of grain commissioners. I asked if the minister would have this report referred to the agriculture committee for the purpose of hearing evidence on overages from representatives of producer organizations and other interested parties. Would the minister care to answer that question now?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This session is dragging so badly, so little work has been accomplished and so much is left for the month of June that I think it is hardly appropriate to add the work of another committee to that already undertaken by the house. Perhaps in another year we could have the review which my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. Wright: The agriculture committee is a standing committee, and it has not met for two years. I do not think it would interfere with the business of the house to have this matter placed before that committee.

HISTORIC SITES

QUESTION AS TO DEMOLITION OF BUILDING AT FORT AMHERST, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant of the Minister of Transport. Has the department received a protest from the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire of Newfoundland with regard to the demolition of a building at Fort Amherst, St. John's? If so, what action is proposed in the matter?

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I find that the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire have written to the department in that respect, as have Premier Smallwood and several others. The department has referred the problem to the national historic sites and monuments board, and will abide by the recommendation and decision of that board.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMY PROMOTIONS, TRANSFERS, ETC.—QUESTION AS TO PUBLICATION IN "CANADA GAZETTE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of National Defence tell us why it is that for the last two or three months a list of army promotions, retirements, transfers, etc., has not appeared in the Canada Gazette?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I shall have to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $206,696,711.58, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items (with the exception of items 62, 121, 204 and 470) to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $1,578,279.67, being one-twelfth of items 41, 86, 177, 226, 229, 231, 233, 235, 238, 239, 328, 394, 426, 456, of the said estimates be granted to His Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952.

He said: Mr. Chairman, the bill to be founded on this resolution will provide for the usual one-twelfth of all the items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1951-52, with the exception of items 62, 121, 204 and 470, on which eleven-twelfths have already been granted. An additional one-twelfth of certain special items to cover services of a seasonal nature on which heaviest payments fall due in the early part of the year is also requested. These items, as in the case of previous interim supply requests, are such items as the quality premiums on high-grade hog carcasses, administration costs, special expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in connection with geographical surveys, and similar expenses for the Department of Resources and Development, where the heavier part of the expenditures is made early in the year.

The form of the bill is exactly the same as the bill passed at this time last year and in previous years. It will provide for carrying on the services of the government until the end of the month of June. The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize and discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for consideration from time to time throughout the remainder of the session, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Graydon: I did not rise on this question when the Speaker was in the chair, because I did not wish to provoke a debate. I wish, however, to ask a question which has been asked by others on previous occasions, about a matter on which I believe the committee ought to be brought up to date. There is keen interest throughout the country in the position in which Canada has found itself with respect to emergency famine relief for India. The matter has been mentioned in the house time after time, and the Prime Minister has indicated that he will announce the policy of the government at the appropriate time. There is growing concern on the part of the people in the question whether we are missing a challenging opportunity with respect to oriental relationships with the Occident. It has been emphasized more particularly during the last few days.

The fact that the Red Chinese government has now made some bilateral arrangement with Tibet, which borders on the northern provinces of India, and that the information concerning the possibility of a highway from the eastern boundaries of Russia to the Orient itself—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I believe the hon. member will realize that he cannot initiate a debate on that question on the resolution which is before the committee.

Mr. Graydon: I am going to ask a question, but I wanted to give the basis upon which my question is founded. These facts being incontrovertible, and the urgency of the matter being apparent, will one of the members of the government make an announcement? Perhaps the Prime Minister is the one to whom I should have directed the question, but he seems to have been called out on some business at the moment. Perhaps some other member of the government would be in a position to say something about it, because time is running out. Canada should really make her position known. There have been some criticisms of other nations for not taking time by the forelock in connection with this problem, and I should like to have the ministry give this committee some information as to what the government intends to do to help India out of a very serious famine condition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say a word at this point concerning the somewhat abbreviated conversation I had yesterday with the minister. I want to raise once more this question of the almost fantastic surplus we have in the first month of the fiscal year, a surplus which would run over a billion dollars a year. I suggest to the minister that even after all the necessary adjustments are made, there may be considerable disturbance in the public mind. I observe that the press is already making certain references to it. So far as one may respectfully make suggestions to the press, I suggest there is now an opportunity for the people of this country, if they are interested in this matter, to show it in no uncertain way. As the situation is now, there is every encouragement to the members of this house to press firmly the suggestion which has already been made, and with which the minister is familiar, that his addition to the sales tax is by no means necessary. I should like to warn the minister that he may hear more about that when the time comes.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I shall answer that now. Yesterday, in answer to my hon. friend's question, I said that one swallow does not make a summer. If he were as familiar as I am with the proposed expenditures on defence for the coming year he would not be unduly concerned about the apparent surplus for one month out of the twelve. In case he has forgotten, I might point out to him that for the first month of the last fiscal year we had a surplus, speaking from memory, of between $80 million and $90 million. This year there is a surplus of receipts over expenditures of something in the order of $120 million. But again I emphasize the point that we are a long way from the end of this fiscal year, and many of the expenditures for our defence program are just beginning to come in. So far as I am concerned, I have nothing to apologize for and nothing to defend in the present position of my budgetary estimates.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My only comment on what the minister has said is that, in so far as he gives last year as a warranty for what is done this year, the answer is not a good one, because he proved to be terribly wrong last year.

Mr. Graydon: May I have an answer to my question with respect to emergency famine relief in India?

Mr. Pearson: Possibly I might say a word in reply to the question of the hon. gentleman, although I confess my inability to deal with this matter in all its details in the absence of a little bit more notice than I have been given. The situation with regard to famine in India and Canada's possible contribution to the relief of that situation is briefly as follows.

As the committee knows, some weeks ago, when this matter was brought to our attention as a government, we indicated to the representative of the government of India that we would be in a position to make available to the government and the people of India low-grade wheat, No. 5 and No. 6, which was the only wheat at that time in our possession. That wheat would have been given to India as part of our contribution under the Colombo plan.

The reason we made that offer in that way at that time has, I think, already been given to the house. The Indian government at that time indicated that they would prefer not to accept the offer, because they had some doubts as to the advisability of wheat of that type getting into their rationing system. They thought that it might create misunderstanding thereby, and indicated that they would prefer to wait until better class wheat would be available from the next harvest. However, subsequently, we got in touch again with the acting Indian high commissioner in Ottawa, and with the Indian government through our representative in New Delhi, to inquire whether the Indian government would be inclined to receive as a gift—quite apart from anything we might do under the Colombo plan—a contribution of the only wheat which was available to us. We thought that if it were given in that form, it might be used as famine relief exclusively. It could go into the famine areas, be given to those suffering from famine, would not be included in the ration and might not create the difficulties that the Indian government had previously mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would it be included in the amount to be given under the Colombo plan?

Mr. Pearson: No. It would be in addition to anything we might do under the Colombo plan; it would be sent to India as a gift for famine relief and be distributed as famine relief only.

Mr. Graydon: How many bushels?

Mr. Pearson: We first inquired whether that procedure would meet with the wishes of the Indian government. I think it was only yesterday, or at least a day or so ago, that we received information from the government of India to the effect that while they greatly appreciated an offer of this kind, they would still prefer to wait until wheat of a better quality might be available. Possibly one reason for the stand they took at this time was an arrangement which they informed us they had been making with neighbouring countries, for the supply of additional quantities of rice which they hoped would tide them over the period of greatest danger. They had also been making arrangements for food supplies of other kinds from neighbouring countries. In the circumstances, therefore, they thought that possibly they would suspend any decision on our offer of a gift of No. 5 or No. 6 wheat. Meanwhile we have been canvassing the situation in Canada as to whether other kinds of food might be available for Indian famine relief, in particular special health foods.

Mr. Coldwell: Canned milk or dried milk?

Mr. Pearson: Dried milk is one of the types of food we have been looking into. That matter is still under active consideration. We have also made some inquiries as to whether it would be possible to divert to India from other customers better grades of wheat which could be replaced to those customers later on when the new crop becomes available in Canada. Those matters are still under consideration.

I therefore think I can say, Mr. Chairman, that we have not lost sight of this matter and that we are attempting to do what is possible to show in a practical way our good will to the people of India in the extremely difficult situation which faces them.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has consideration been given to the sending of medical supplies to India? In addition, I understand that there are a number of organizations in Canada which are anxious to take it upon themselves to send food and supplies of one kind or another as a gift to India. Is the government making any move towards facilitating, by way of collection, transportation or distribution over there, any gifts that may be made from Canada on an individual basis?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, we should be glad to help in any way we can with respect to private donations or private gifts for famine relief in India. So far as I know, that question has not yet arisen. Meanwhile, we are concentrating our efforts on trying to do what we can do as a government to help in this situation.

Mr. Coldwell: In view of the misunderstanding as to why India would not accept low-grade wheat, would it be possible for the minister to tell the committee why it is that flour extracted from these low-grade wheats is unsuitable for the type of bread that is used in rural India? I think there is a misunderstanding in the country. I have heard people ask this question: Why will they not accept No. 5 and No. 6 wheat? I believe the real explanation is that such flour as can be extracted, such as it is, cannot be used in the type of flat cake bread baked over an open fire that is commonly used in the rural parts of India.

Mr. Pearson: I am not an authority on this matter. Maybe my friend the Minister of Agriculture knows more than I do about baking bread in India. But I am informed that the wheat which we might have sent would have been converted by the consumers in India to a 98 per cent extraction flour, known, I think, as atta, and from that into a loaf called chapatti, and that this particular kind of wheat which we would have sent to India would not lend itself to that kind of treatment. We are also informed that if it had gotten into the ration in the ordinary way, it would have resulted in a kind of product to which the Indians were not accustomed, and this might have created some misunderstanding. There is a technical explanation for the attitude of the Indian government in this matter; and of course we do not criticize them for that attitude.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Abbott moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $206,696,711.58, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the items (with the exception of items 62, 121, 204 and 470) set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1952; and

2. The sum of $1,578,279.67, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 41, 86, 177, 226, 229, 231, 233, 235, 238, 239, 328, 394, 426, 456, of the said estimates, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the commitee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 353, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1952.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Abbott: Now, by leave.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, by leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the second reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On section 4—Account to be rendered in detail.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? There is nothing out of the way in these sections?

Mr. Abbott: No, they are in exactly the same form as similar provisions of bills in previous years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is this item:

To provide for quality premiums on high grade hog carcasses and administration costs, $5,536,000.

Why is this in as a supplementary request by the minister?

Mr. Abbott: We are asking for an additional one-twelfth there. We have already been voted one-twelfth; we are now asking for another one-twelfth, which would be for two months, but the requirements in the early months of the year, my officials inform me, are somewhat higher, and this is to enable the current payments to be made.

Section agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Abbott: Now, by leave.

Mr. Knowles: That's right, by leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT

MEASURE TO CONSOLIDATE, CODIFY AND AMEND EXISTING LEGISLATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada Post Office—Mr. Rinfret—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, yesterday we had a very interesting speech from the hon. member for Temiscouata, and he was followed later by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who attempted to make an attack on the hon. member for Temiscouata. He was very critical of the hon. member's remarks. At page 3532 of Hansard of May 29, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, in reference to the hon. member for Temiscouata:

There is one thing about the hon. member for Temiscouata. He does not hide his belief in the practice of patronage. For that I suppose we should commend him, much as we dislike and deplore the practice itself.

I want the committee to note carefully the words of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre: "much as we deplore and dislike the practice itself," in view of what I have to say later on of the practices of the only C.C.F. government we have ever had in Canada or ever will have, namely, the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

I do not think the hon. member for Temiscouata needs any defence from anybody in this house, because he seems to be quite able to handle himself on the floor of the house. In addition, I think the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were unfair to him, because the hon. member for Temiscouata made it clear that private members should not be criticized for looking after the small post offices and those rendering public service to the people. That is what he said. He said he interfered only—he made that quite clear—when people complained, and he felt it was in accordance with his duty. He also made it clear that he replaced or recommended replacements in certain post offices only where the former Liberal appointee, for no reason whatever but politics, had been discharged by the succeeding government. These were the only cases in which he interfered at all. He also said that if there were no complaints in operation he never interfered at all, or even visited the postmasters, which I am sure some hon. members, even in the C.C.F. party, cannot say that they have not done.

He also made it clear that he had not recommended any persons merely because they were among his supporters, but only those perfectly qualified to occupy a position in the Post Office Department. That was the statement of the hon. member for Temiscouata to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre took such violent exception. But I want to repeat in this house the words of one of the oldest members in the house of the C.C.F. party: "much as we dislike and deplore the practice of patronage itself." I am going to tell the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that if there ever has been a government in the history of the whole of the Dominion of Canada, either provincial or federal, that has practised patronage to the hilt, it is the government of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Sinnott: And he knows it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And I will point out to the committee clearly some of the appointments that they have made that any reasonable member—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should ask the hon. member for Yorkton whether this discussion which he has initiated springs from the fact that some reference has been made on this clause to the subject to which he has referred? I have looked at Hansard, and it seems to me the bill was considered in committee of the whole only shortly before eleven o'clock last night. Therefore there was no discussion on this section pertaining to patronage, and any such discussion, if relevant, must have taken place in the debate on second reading. If it did take place at that time, the hon. member should have entered the debate then. Now, when we are in committee of the whole on section 1, he may discuss the bill generally, but such discussion must be relevant to the bill. I suggest it is not relevant to refer to what is done by provincial governments.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member rise to a point of order?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. Strange as it may seem, I wish to defend in part the right of the hon. member to do what he is doing. There is another point which might be raised against his present procedure, but I must draw attention to the fact that there are citations in the authorities which state that the debate on a bill through all its several stages is to be considered as one debate. There are citations which state clearly that it is possible in committee of the whole or on third reading to refer to statements made at earlier stages in the debate. Therefore, so far as that aspect of the matter is concerned I must defend the right of the hon. member for Yorkton to refer back to what was said by the hon. member for Temiscouata in the debate on second reading, as well as to what I said at that time.

There is, however, another point, and that is as to whether there is any relationship between this bill and what may or may not happen in Saskatchewan. I submit we are supposed to be talking about a bill concerning the Canada Post Office.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said that any hon. member may speak with respect to what has been said throughout various stages of the study of a bill. The hon. member is correct. But when he refers to the right to say anything about a bill, he refers of course to anything relevant to the bill.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: In the debate on second reading the discussion must be relevant to the principle of the bill. I do not think it is relevant to a discussion of the principle of a bill respecting the Canada Post Office to discuss the patronage system in operation in Saskatchewan. In any case the principle of the bill is not now under discussion; that has been settled by the acceptance of second reading. The hon. member may now discuss generally what is contained in the bill, because by practice we have permitted such discussion on the first clause. However that discussion must be relevant to the bill. It was when the hon. member for Yorkton began to discuss patronage in Saskatchewan that I interrupted him.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I would suppose, Mr. Chairman, that you are willing to listen to my further argument in the matter. On the first section I understand I may deal with any subject, and I would point out that under one section of the bill the Postmaster General may make appointments involving sums up to $3,000—an increased amount—without reference to the civil service commission. If he has that power, then automatically the matter of patronage comes in.

In arguing the matter of patronage, surely I should have a little leeway to show what patronage is, whether it is in Saskatchewan or in Timbuktu—so long as it deals with patronage, and how patronage can or cannot be carried out. I say that leeway is fairly important in a matter of that kind, when there is the power of patronage in the minister up to $3,000 a year. If I am not allowed to give examples of patronage, its evils, and how it is carried out, then with due respect I suggest that it would be limiting unduly my argument.

Mr. Knowles: May I say one further word on the point? I submit that we are permitted to discuss patronage as it is practised by the Post Office Department, but that you, sir, should not permit me or anyone else to discuss patronage in the Department of Transport or any other federal department, or in any of the provinces. I agree with your contention, Mr. Chairman, that we have before us a bill respecting the Canada Post Office. We must stick to matters relating to the post office.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Surely the general evils of patronage can be established only by pointing out some such lurid examples as we have in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, if you wish to let the hon. member go ahead, you will of course accord to us the same right, so that we may answer him and discuss other cases of patronage. I have in mind that of Mr. Marion, the Liberal M.L.A. in Saskatchewan, and so on.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): We are willing to do that.

The Deputy Chairman: I have already ruled that patronage questions outside the scope of this bill are not to be discussed. As the hon. member for Yorkton has said, it may limit the scope of his speech; but I must see that the rules are observed. Therefore I shall have to ask him not to discuss patronage which may be in operation elsewhere. It must be related to whatever is in the discretion of the Postmaster General and related to the bill.

An hon. Member: Throw that speech away.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I shall have to defer to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I am not going to give just a part of the speech. I will get it in on another occasion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it was my intention to say a few words on this section. I should like to ask the Postmaster General one or two questions. Yesterday, as reported at page 3528 of Hansard, the hon. member for Temiscouata said:

> Members of parliament, sir, make recommendations for the appointment of postmasters to minor post offices. For post offices having a gross revenue of $3,000 the appointment is made on the recommendation of a member of parliament, and above that it is by the civil service commission.

Then the hon. member said:

> Well now, what I have tried to do was to make the civil service commission understand the danger of appointing one who was not fully qualified to serve the community as it deserves to be served. Until now we have been quite successful, and in my constituency the Post Office Department has been abiding by the provisions of the Post Office Act, and the Civil Service Act concerning military preference.

Then the hon. member described how he has operated in his own riding. Is there anywhere in the bill now before us a provision which says that for a post office having a gross revenue of less than $3,000 the recommendation for the appointment of a postmaster is to be made by members of parliament?

Mr. Rinfret: There is no direct section to that effect. However, section 5(1) states:

> Subject to this act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada Post Office, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may . . .
> (b) appoint postmasters and assistants when such appointments are not otherwise provided for by law.

Appointments of all postmasters and assistants in post offices where the revenue is less than $3,000 are provided by law and are governed by the civil service commission.

Mr. Knowles: The minister means in excess of $3,000?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, in excess of $3,000 they are appointed by the civil service commission. The others are appointed by the Postmaster General. The hon. member for Temiscouata in his speech referred to members of parliament. I would say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that recommendations have been made by members of parliament, not only those on this side of the house but also those on the other side.

An hon. Member: But are they ever taken?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, they have been accepted. In connection with appointments, in this department we are following exactly the same rules as are followed by the civil service commission. When there are veterans on the list we took into the question whether they are receiving pensions. They have the first call. When there are no pensioners we choose the man next in line, and he would be a veteran with overseas service provided he is a resident. If there is no such person then we take the next step and choose a man who has been in the armed forces and is a resident. If there is no such man then we come to one who is a civilian resident. If there is no such person then we look for somebody else.

Mr. Knowles: I take it then that, although there is no section that specifically says that patronage is to be practised, under the subsection to which the Postmaster General referred it is possible for members of parliament to make recommendations. It appears that whether or not those recommendations are accepted and acted upon by the Postmaster General depends on a number of factors. It appears from what the hon. member for Temiscouata said last night that his recommendations are accepted pretty generally. He seemed completely satisfied with the administration of the present Postmaster General in this regard.

I have respect for the hon. member for Temiscouata, and all of us have. I know how he feels about this question. I do not think it is out of place for me to say that he has talked to me about it privately as well as across the floor of the house, and he thinks that it is the thing for a member of parliament in a constituency such as his to do, namely, to recommend to the authorities who should have these various posts. My hon. friend, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, interjects and asks about defeated candidates. It seems to be the practice in some places, particularly where the constituency is not represented by a government member, that the defeated Liberal candidate in the last election is asked for his recommendation.

I want to protest most strongly against the practice. I think that the whole idea of the civil service commission, as was indicated to the Canadian Congress of Labour by the Prime Minister a few weeks ago, was to get rid of the practice of patronage which I do not think we should be carrying forward. I am bitterly disappointed that at this time, when we are revising and recasting the whole Post Office Act, we are carrying forward this provision, this loophole, which makes the practice of patronage still possible. It is not as vicious today as it was in the early days of this country and as it was in the early days in the United States—

Mr. Hatfield: It is pretty bad.

Mr. Knowles: —but it is still pretty bad. I am thinking of that defeated candidate in New Brunswick, D. R. Bishop, who still pretty well runs the show in that part of the country.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, you have prohibited me from dealing with patronage generally; yet the hon. member's speech is dealing with patronage generally when he claims an individual runs the show.

Mr. Knowles: I did not hear the point of order raised by the hon. member, but I suspect—

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The point of order is that the hon. member is now going into the matter of patronage. He is arguing that the government is going into patronage, and he also claims that a certain man in New Brunswick, who has nothing to do with this thing, is indulging in patronage. I want to say that I know that the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan does nothing else but indulge in patronage to those who favour their opinions.

Mr. Knowles: I made reference to Mr. D. R. Bishop in New Brunswick because he handles patronage with respect to the Canada Post Office for that part of the country, and I have plenty of documentary evidence to prove that point. Some hon. members will recall the long story I told about this man a year or so ago, and he is still carrying on.

An hon. Member: Stick to your own province.

Mr. Knowles: There is one thing that is quite clear now from what has been said by the hon. member for Temiscouata yesterday, from what has been brought up by way of defence by the hon. member for Yorkton, and from what has been said by the Postmaster General. The point is clear that patronage is being practised. We do not have to argue that. When I placed questions about this matter on the order paper the Prime Minister tried to suggest to me that he did not know about patronage, but it is being practised, and is being practised in the post office. Here we are revising and recasting the whole Post Office Act in this modern year of 1951. Surely this is the time to get rid of the practice of patronage completely so far as the post office is concerned. I think it should go everywhere, but your ruling is correct, Mr. Chairman. We are dealing here with the post office, and I shall stick to this department.

I said last night that I had been pleased to note press reports to the effect that the deputy postmaster general was endeavouring to get rid of patronage so far as the administration of that department is concerned. When I referred to that last night and wondered whether that was the reason why the hon. member for Temiscouata had made his speech, I noticed that he rose on a point of privilege. I have re-read his speech, and it looks to me as if the hon. member for Temiscouata has a quarrel to pick with the deputy postmaster general. He does not like the fact that the deputy postmaster general is trying to run his department on a basis of efficiency—super-efficiency, he called it. The hon. member for Temiscouata still wants to be able to go to his political colleague, the Postmaster General, and get him to approve appointments that he recommends for the county of Temiscouata. I do not care who is making the recommendation, whether he is a Liberal, Conservative, a member of this party, or from any section of the house. I do not think appointments should be made that way.

I strongly protest against the whole principle of patronage. I repeat the sentiments I expressed last night, which the hon. member for Yorkton has quoted a number of times. It does not matter to me where it is shown that there is patronage. I doubt the charges the hon. member is making about Saskatchewan, but wherever it can be shown I register my protest against it. Right now we are dealing with the Post Office Department. Right now we are rewriting the Post Office Act. Let us not carry forward this practice which is so completely out of date and so wrong in principle.

Mr. Rinfret: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not wish the appointments of postmasters to be made in the way they are made at the present time, in the way he thinks they are made. There is in his mind a definition of the word "patronage" that does not seem to enter my mind or the minds of any of the officials of my department. If the hon. member will tell us what he thinks patronage is I will tell him what my definition is. We have a certain job to do, and when we have to appoint a postmaster we ask those who are in a position to tell us who are the best men to appoint. Then we send a notice to the Canadian Legion, and they have a certain time to make a recommendation to us, without any reference to the member of parliament. We wait until we get an answer from the Legion before we appoint anybody. A suggestion is made by the member of parliament, whether he be Liberal or Conservative. We have appointed many postmasters on recommendations of other than Liberal members. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could hear all the squawks we get for not having appointed persons whose applications were recommended by Liberal members, then he would have something to say. No automatic appointment is made after a recommendation made by a Liberal member. All members of parliament are on exactly the same footing.

Mr. Brooks: No, no.

Mr. Rinfret: That is so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not so.

Mr. Rinfret: That is so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is absolutely not a fact.

Mr. Brooks: My defeated opponent has always made the recommendations.

Mr. Rinfret: That may have been so under Conservative administration but it is not under the Liberal regime.

Mr. Brooks: In addition, Liberal committees meet and make recommendations so far as the post office is concerned.

Mr. Rinfret: There is no recommendation made by any caucus.

Mr. Brooks: I can quote instances.

Mr. Rinfret: So far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned, I asked him last year and he bluntly refused to be consulted on any appointments in his constituency. If he wants to refer to Hansard of last year he will see that he himself refused.

Mr. Knowles: I still do.

Mr. Rinfret: All right. Then what is the complaint?

Mr. Knowles: I contend that no member of parliament should be consulted on these appointments.

Mr. Gibson: Who is more competent?

Mr. Rinfret: Members of parliament are the ones who are best qualified to recommend to the government who are the best persons to do the job.

Mr. Knowles: Then the Postmaster General is defending patronage.

Mr. Rinfret: It depends on what patronage means in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: The Postmaster General is defending it according to his own definition.

Mr. Rinfret: Last year my hon. friend brought up the question of Bishop and he brought before the committee the request made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. I did it entirely on my own initiative.

Mr. Rinfret: It was shown by that order paper, as the hon. member will remember, that we had not acted in the case he brought before the house. We did not follow the advice or the recommendation of Mr. Bishop at that time and we appointed somebody else.

Mr. Hatfield: The post office at Bath, New Brunswick, is a civil service post office with a revenue of more than $3,000. This position has been occupied by a temporary postmistress for over two years. The branch of the Legion at Bath has been trying to have this vacancy opened up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I listened with interest to the Postmaster General when he outlined the circumstances connected with appointments to post offices and stated that the Legion is communicated with and names submitted by them. The Postmaster General stated that appointments to post offices with a revenue under $3,000 are made on the basis of the first preference being given to those who served overseas, the next to general ex-servicemen and finally, if there be none of those, to some other suitable applicant.

Mr. Rinfret: In the first instance to pensioners.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. In view of that statement I ask the minister how many appointments have been made during the last two years to post offices with a revenue of less than $3,000, and of those appointments, how many were veterans? I ask that because I have before me one or more letters from Legion branches in Saskatchewan which indicate that they are rather disturbed at some of the appointments that are being made. The minister said he did not understand what patronage meant. I do not know what another person's definition would be, but to me patronage is a matter of political fitness.

If the minister is in position to give a statement such as I have asked for, then I intend to ask about certain post offices in my own province where appointments have been made on a basis which to ordinary eyes would appear to be simply a qualification on the part of the applicant of political fitness. I ask that because there may be misunderstanding. The minister has replied with such heated animation as to indicate that he feels strongly on the subject. Certainly I should like to have from him a summary such as I have asked for. The minister referred to section 5 a moment ago. This reads:

> 5. (1) Subject to this act, the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada post office, and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may
> (b) appoint postmasters and assistants when such appointments are not otherwise provided for by law.

I take it that that subsection means that appointments are not required to be made under the Civil Service Act. Is that correct?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The explanatory note reads:

> New. Re-establishes authority deleted in 1927 revision, latterly done by order in council.

While the minister is getting an answer to my earlier question I should like to know on what date the order in council was passed that re-established the right of the minister to make appointments except those specifically covered by the Civil Service Act and when he actually legislated respecting a matter that was deleted in the 1927 revision.

Mr. Ferrie: Does not the veterans charter take care of the whole thing?

Mr. Rinfret: My hon. friend will understand that I cannot furnish the list of appointments that he asked for, but I will see that it is prepared and supplied to him. It might delay the passage of this bill and if my hon. friend would like to have it on the estimates I shall see that it is furnished to him before that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As long as it is available. I do not want to hold up the minister, but I would have thought he would have that when he was able to speak with such certainty on this subject and say that in every case where there was a veteran available the position was filled by such veteran; first, a pensioner; next, a serviceman with active service; next, a general serviceman and then down through the various grades of qualification that he pointed out.

Mr. Rinfret: The reason I spoke with such certainty is that it is a fixed rule of the department which I know is followed. As to the second point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre and his reference to the explanatory note, this section will re-establish an authority that was deleted in the 1927 revision. In latter years it has been done by order in council under the authority of the treasury board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that order in council passed?

Mr. Rinfret: They are passed one after another, after the appointments are made.

Mr. Knowles: Ten thousand and upwards.

Mr. Rinfret: That authority was deleted in 1927. The civil service commission felt that it was too much of an imposition upon them to have to appoint postmasters in all these twelve thousand small post offices and they asked to be relieved of that obligation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What year was that?

Mr. Rinfret: 1927.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In what year did they ask to be relieved?

Mr. Rinfret: I will check the exact date. The section of the Civil Service Act that covers this is section 57A.

Mr. Hatfield: How long is a vacancy allowed to stay open in a civil service post office with a temporary postmaster being in charge?

Mr. Rinfret: The particular case referred to by the hon. member is not one where we have to advertise the vacancy as it can be filled by promotion. The assistant there is the wife of the former postmaster. She had been there for many years and she can be promoted to the position.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Would the Postmaster General read section 57A of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. Rinfret: Yes, it reads as follows:

> The provisions of this act shall not apply to the position of postmaster of any revenue post office the revenue of which does not exceed three thousand dollars per annum; but the preference provided by section twenty-nine of this act, in favour of the persons mentioned therein, shall be applied in respect of appointments to such positions.

Mr. Shaw: It does occur to me that the debate in which we are presently engaged could more properly take place on section 5 (b). Since we are engaged in it now, there are two or three things which I should like to say. The admitted fact that members of parliament are consulted with respect to post office appointments—

Mr. Knowles: Liberal members.

Mr. Shaw: —particularly Liberal members, does not concern me particularly. This arises partly from the fact that I have realized that that has always been done, and probably will be the method employed in the future. The minister has asserted that a member of parliament is better qualified than other persons to make such recommendations. I believe that hardly includes a person who desired to be a member of parliament but was defeated. On the basis of the minister's assertion, I assume that any member would be better qualified than the hon. gentleman who had been defeated. What I object to most strongly are those cases where a defeated candidate has been able to override the decision of the minister in an appointment that has been made. I am not making specific reference to anything that has occurred during the term of the present Postmaster General, but such events did occur during the term of the former postmaster general.

An appointment was made on the recommendation of the then district director. An air force veteran, who had been so seriously injured that he could hardly be expected to carry on any other type of work, was given the appointment. There were no other applicants. It is true that it was on a temporary basis. Suddenly he found himself out on the street, even though it was admitted his services were satisfactory. When I put questions on the order paper concerning this situation, it was admitted in the answer to the final question that the change took place at the instigation of the defeated Liberal candidate. Now, that is the sort of thing I am more concerned about. I do not mind admitting that upon more than one occasion I have been consulted, let us say unofficially, with respect to a contemplated appointment to a post office position. I do not mind admitting that upon one occasion I recommended that a certain person be not appointed, knowing all the while he was a very strong supporter of mine. I well recall giving my opinion upon another occasion that a certain person was admirably suited for the position, even though I knew that person was a very strong Liberal.

I am primarily concerned about the calibre of the persons who are appointed to these positions in my constituency. No one will hear me complain, provided that individual is giving the type of service to which the general public is entitled. What I do object to is some of these defeated Liberal candidates taking it upon themselves to actually interfere after appointments have been made, and in certain cases successfully upsetting the decision arrived at.

The minister will notice that I have mentioned no specific case. I can do so, but I do not intend to do it right now. The returns are on file, but I am not going that far at the moment. So far as the district I represent is concerned, I hope that never again will I have to register a complaint about that sort of thing.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to mention something to the Postmaster General that is slightly different, and I believe this is the section upon which to do it. While it does not concern the principle of the bill, it does definitely concern certain aspects of the postal service. I bring the matter to the attention of the committee, because I believe it concerns a general condition surrounding all our metropolitan areas. I refer to sub-post offices that find themselves in rapidly growing districts, what is known as mushrooming districts. There are two in my own constituency of York West; one is Hollywood and the other is Browns Line. I have received every consideration from the Post Office Department in connection with these places.

I believe that some amendment or some consideration should be given to a provision in the act that would take care of conditions such as exist in these areas. Mr. Chairman, a sub-post office carries on very well in a store where the postal business consumes an hour or two a day; that is a suitable adjunct to the rest of the operations of that store. The district may grow tremendously, and you may find that the post office business entirely overrides the normal business of the store. What happens then? First of all the owner of the store and the owner of the sub-post office finds himself completely unable to handle the enormous increase in the volume of business, and the service to the residents in that area suffers materially. Now, that happens in the industrial areas where large industries have come in. It is very important that they be serviced, because their mail is important first-class mail. If they are kept waiting the efficiency of their operation deteriorates. I feel, Mr. Chairman, on the point of service to the public, that where such a situation exists the postmaster in Toronto should be empowered to make recommendations to the Postmaster General, so that steps could be taken to prevent this congested situation and the deterioration of the service.

There are one or two other things which I do not see in the bill, but which I believe militate against the postal service. As I understand, there is two per cent allowed on the sale of stamps in these sub-post offices, up to a certain amount of revenue. But then the percentage drops from two per cent to one per cent, and I would suggest that that possibly is a business practice which is not followed in any other line of business, because under normal conditions as your sales increase so your income or revenue increases.

I should like to refer now to emergency services at cost. There are many towns, particularly in the suburban areas of our major cities—it happens in my own case and I imagine it would happen in many other cases—where a firm or individual wants an important piece of mail delivered quickly. The only way that can be done is by putting on a ten-cent special delivery stamp and hoping it will catch the right mail. But, Mr. Chairman, that does not help a great deal except in your built-up areas. There are times when I myself have letters that I would willingly pay two or three dollars to have delivered in an emergency. I know of many firms who feel the same way. I should like to suggest to the Postmaster General that an extra service, at say two or three dollars for special delivery service, might be considered. I mention the case of delivering contracts where there is a deadline, or of delivering legal papers which must be in at such and such a date. I see the Minister of National Revenue looking at me; there is also the question of getting tax returns in before certain deadlines.

Mr. McCann: For which you have had four months.

Mr. Adamson: Some people are perhaps not as prudent as others. I know of business returns that have come in in the last week, and those concerned have not been able to finalize their tax returns until the last week before the deadline. They would appreciate a special service at cost—it would not matter how much it cost per letter—if it was possible to guarantee the delivery of a letter or a legal document or something of that nature within a special short time.

I know that in the Post Office Department in England there is a certain service—it is not actually in the Post Office Department but is almost a semi-official department—of district messengers whereby you can telephone for a district messenger, and the receipt by the district messenger is legal proof of the mailing of the postal package. I merely make that suggestion because I know of several cases in which people have had to miss a deadline by a day or two because they could not get that special service.

There is another question I wish to mention, that of adequate pay for letter carriers and postal employees. I know of many many letter carriers who are seriously considering going into industry. With industry paying considerably higher wages than the post office is allowed to pay under the act or under the regulations, I feel sure that it is getting increasingly difficult for the department to keep their good letter carriers in the service. Despite the fact that they are entitled to civil service benefits and pensions, nevertheless with industry paying wages which are much superior to those it is possible for the post office to pay, I feel that some consideration might be given so that the good letter carriers may be encouraged to remain in the service.

There is another matter, namely the length of walks and the weight of the packs. I have had complaints; but I must say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the Postmaster General that they have not been from the letter carriers themselves. I must congratulate the minister on having an extremely good and loyal bunch of servants; certainly that is so in my district. But I have had complaints from other interested citizens who have said that the letter carriers' packs have increased greatly in weight in the last few months and that there does not now seem to be any limit to the weight and size of the pack the letter carrier is expected to carry. There probably are regulations, but the complaint I have had is that those regulations are not adhered to.

There is one more thing I wish to mention. I understand that there is a regulation in the post office to the effect that no two sub-post offices may be established within a certain distance of each other. I believe the distance is a mile, although I am not absolutely certain of that.

Mr. Rinfret: One-half mile.

Mr. Adamson: The minister says it is one-half mile. When you are dealing with a densely populated area, split by two arterial roads close together, and thus there are two definite centres of population separated by a short distance, it is quite inconvenient, particularly under extremely dense traffic conditions, for people to cross these two arterial roads to do their business with the post office. I feel that, under special circumstances, the half-mile rule should be done away with. I agree that, under normal circumstances, it is quite a good rule. In one or two circumstances I know of, however, I think it could be done away with. I am speaking of the Kingsway area, where there are two main arteries; one is Dundas street and the other is Bloor street.

In making those suggestions, I want to say that I have received every co-operation from the deputy minister and from his staff. I am not complaining in any way, but I wish to bring these matters to the attention of the Postmaster General because they have been a source of great inconvenience to the citizens of my own constituency.

Mr. Rinfret: Before answering my hon. friend, I might tell the hon. member for Lake Centre that as to the reference I made a moment ago to the Civil Service Act, the assent was given on May 26, 1932. It dates back to that time.

I have taken note of the remarks made by the hon. member for York West. On his first point, may I say that the difficulty is not a defect of the act, as he knows, but rather the difficulty of getting the proper person as postmaster. We have given the postmaster in Toronto carte blanche to do whatever he can, and we have given him specific instructions to do everything he can to settle the matter. At the present time he is investigating the possibility of having a trailer to do the job.

Mr. Picard: I was greatly interested in the remarks that have been made this afternoon up until now. I was, however, somewhat surprised by the objection made to the text of the new act which states that the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Canada Post Office. The reason for my astonishment is this. We are talking a great deal about democracy. We are sending our sons to fight for democracy. The way that we apply democracy in our form of government is to entrust the administration of the country to a group of men chosen from the ranks of those who have been elected by the people at the previous election and chosen by the Prime Minister who usually heads the group which has the majority in the house. My objection is not that they would administer too much. My experience over the past is that too many of them are too inclined to pass the administration to subordinate officers or deputy ministers or officials. This clause is found generally in the acts creating all the different departments. How it is applied is another thing to look into, and that deserves the remarks made by some of my hon. friends; but the text of it and the powers it gives I think are justly given to the minister. I think it is the duty of a minister to know his department, to administer his department. After all, he is the one who is elected. He represents the majority of the people of Canada who have sent the government here, of which he is a member, to take charge of the administration.

I do not approve the tendency of many cabinet ministers in the past—now I am not criticising anybody in particular—of having the administration carried on the shoulders of deputy ministers who may be able men, but who are not responsible to the people of Canada directly. Therefore I do not think we should be scandalized at all by the powers given to the minister. That these powers be not used solely on the basis of party politics is quite right. I would be against the appointment of government officials of a department if we took into consideration only their political affiliation, but we have the civil service commission, and they watch that very closely.

The only point of controversy seems to be the appointment of postmasters in rural areas or in small post offices where the revenue is low and where many other considerations besides ability need to be taken into account. When you appoint a postal clerk in the city he goes to the post office and works there. When you appoint a postmaster in a village he must have the post office in his own home. Therefore there are many more considerations that have to be taken into account.

I think it would be hard for anybody to suggest a system that would do away entirely with the minister having to take some suggestions somewhere from people who know the constituency well. That the man should be recommended only by a member of parliament is not enough. On the other hand, how will you establish rules to appoint postmasters in rural constituencies? First of all, you must have a man who has a home in the centre of the village. The government does not supply the post office. No matter how able a man may be, no matter how clever he may be, if he lives two miles away from the centre he will be of no use to the village if he is appointed a postmaster. Therefore you have to select a man who lives in the centre of the village. Then, you may have some people who are of relative value intellectually, but they may have had trouble in the past in their own business or otherwise; it may be that a man is not reliable.

I do not think that politics should be the main factor or should enter into consideration as the main qualification, but I do not see any objection to members of parliament, as the hon. member for Red Deer said a moment ago, having something to say. They are the ones who know the constituency. They have been elected, good or bad as we may think of one another. We have been elected in the various parties in the house by the people of Canada, and the people of Canada cannot all be wrong. We respect one another here in the House of Commons, and I think we might also respect our suggestions to the Postmaster General for the appointment of a man in a rural district. That it should be the only basis, no. I agree with that. It is not right; but I cannot find a suitable system of appointing these men through the civil service commission. I have looked into the matter myself at times when I could not get the man I wanted appointed, but I could not find a proper system of appointment through the civil service commission.

I come now to the mail couriers. On February 20, 1947, I made a good speech on the subject, but I will not repeat it today. I only want to refer the minister and the house to it. Here is another case where it is very hard to apply any rule as to how the appointments should be made. Some people say that these men should be made permanent, but permanent on what basis? Today a man is appointed on the tender system. He has a contract. The time comes when the figure at which he has tendered is not sufficient. He has equipped himself. He has the winter rigs, the snowmobiles, or whatever you call them. He has all the necessary equipment. To get a raise of $100 or $200, he has to resign. Then, new tenders are called. A new man who just wants to get the contract and does not realize the work entailed, a man who is less responsible in many ways, will submit a lower tender. He may think he can use for that purpose one of his horses and a junior son to handle the mail at ridiculously low prices. I do not think it is fair. On the other hand, what is the basis on which to choose rural mail couriers outside of politics entirely? You cannot have a competition. Would you choose the man who has the best looking horse or the best looking car to do the job? How can you judge the qualifications of a man to carry the mail in a rural district? We now do it by tenders which is a suitable way when the contract is vacant by expiration or if a man wants to resign his job. If he resigns his job, very well. But when there is a need for reclassification will you force the man, as under the present law, to let tenders be called and take the risk of having gone to all this expense to equip himself well, and lose the contract to an irresponsible person?

In this regard I think we have to follow the example of what happened when the department resorted to the sort of system which is envisaged here, namely, that of the Postmaster General adjusting prices up to a certain amount? During the war that was done under the War Measures Act. I think most hon. members will agree that there were no abuses when the prices were reclassified, and I may say that we had a difficult time to get them raised. I think a given price in the district was more or less understood as being fair, and an amount much below that price was raised to the average price by the department officials. I have done that in a number of cases without ever going to the Postmaster General. I am not talking against any of those who had the job before, but I did not care to go there because I thought I would rather go to the official who knew that particular branch quite well and appeal to his good sense and show the problem to him. In this regard I may say that in my province, and I think throughout Canada, the people have confidence in the present Postmaster General. He is a man of intelligence and integrity. He is a hard-working man.

I would not say he is the first Postmaster General who knows about his department, but he works very hard to get to know and understand the whole working of his department, and I think it is for the good of the country that a member of the government should go so deeply into his own department as to know what it is all about and what is going on. He should be congratulated on that. I do not think anybody here need worry about the provision under which the minister can do these things, because we had an example, as I say, of what happened under the War Measures Act. The cost of living was increasing. There was difficulty in getting material, and the men were asked to carry the mail over winter roads, over hills and far distances at very low prices. There was no way for them to get a reclassification in their prices under the Post Office Act. Reclassifications were made, if I remember correctly, in a number of cases under the War Measures Act. I have yet to hear of any injustices being done or that prices were very high. We had to fight every time to get very meagre increases from the department's officials. And I think it is right; they have to make sure no abuses are committed.

I admit however that it is not fitting to place in the act anything detrimental to the good of the country, or to leave in it any implication that there is danger of patronage ruining the department. I do suggest however that the elected representatives of the people are the ones who would know something about their constituencies, and who would be best able to advise the minister and to express their opinions respecting matters affecting their constituencies. That is particularly true of hon. members who have returned to the house on many occasions. I suggest that they are well informed in matters affecting their constituencies and are often better informed than officials stationed at Ottawa who must pass judgment on cases concerning which they have received a meagre report from an inspector who may have spent no more than half an hour in the locality in question. On the other hand the member may have lived there all his life, or at any rate he would know it well.

I say in conclusion therefore that I have no fear for the fate of the country, even if the bill is passed as it now stands.

Mr. Hatfield: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the Postmaster General's consulting members of parliament, but I do object to his consulting and accepting the recommendation of defeated candidates. I had an instance in my constituency where, shortly before the Christmas holidays, civil service postmasters sent to the post office inspector at Saint John a request for assistance during the Christmas season. Along with the request they sent in a list of names of experienced persons, those who had had experience in, and on former occasions had worked for, the Post Office Department.

About a week before the Christmas rush began they received a wire from the director of postal services at Ottawa in which it was pointed out that the defeated candidate would pick those who would furnish the help for these post offices. Why was that done? Why was not the list accepted as it had been before? Why did the director of postal services send a wire to the civil service postmasters stating that the defeated candidate would choose the help during the Christmas season? As it turned out, he chose people who had not had experience.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hatfield: I want an answer from the Postmaster General.

Mr. Rinfret: No such instructions ever went from the department here. It might be that the defeated candidate had himself sent certain suggestions. But certainly they were not sent by the department at Ottawa.

Mr. Hatfield: Do you want me to furnish the telegram from the director of postal services? I will try to furnish that telegram.

Mr. Rinfret: I would like to see it.

Mr. Hatfield: Of course I do not have it in my desk, but I can get it. I have seen the telegram, myself.

Mr. Rinfret: I would like to see it.

Mr. Hatfield: Well, I will try to get it.

Mr. Rinfret: Would you, please.

Mr. Hatfield: I do not like to get anyone into trouble.

Mr. McLure: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words concerning the subject now before the committee. I was disappointed that we had not even begun discussion of the estimates for the Post Office Department before having this bill presented to us. I would say to the Postmaster General that the bill would have had easier passage if the estimates had been approved. We find however that the bill is presented before the estimates; why, I do not know. The house has been in session for eighty days, and there has been ample opportunity to have brought at least some of the estimates before the committee.

Mr. Rinfret: Motions to go into committee of supply have been blocked consistently.

Mr. McLure: The minister has had eighty days in which to prepare.

It is my understanding that the present measure scraps completely the old act. If in this bill some portions of the old act are embodied, they appear here only after a thorough process of face-lifting and varnishing so that, as I see it, they will give far greater control and power to the Postmaster General and his officials, or directly to the government itself. The regulations will come up from time to time as discussion of the bill proceeds.

One subject that has been discussed for years, and mentioned again yesterday by some hon. members, was that of the injustices done to rural mail couriers. After reading the bill I am convinced that the injustices they have suffered will now be worse than ever, because we will find when we discuss the regulations that control is now entirely vested in the Postmaster General.

Mr. Rinfret: Up to $1,000.

Mr. McLure: When I first discussed the matter in 1945 or 1946 the then postmaster general promised a committee to look into the matter of rural mail couriers. That committee never was set up, and these matters have had to be discussed privately. The problem grows worse and, because of the measure of inflation we now have, the condition with respect to tenders and contracts is not improving. When an effort is made to get low tenders someone is going to be scalded in the operation.

I believe I can speak with most authority about my own constituency, because I know the conditions there so far as the rural mail couriers are concerned. In the dual constituency of Queens we have seventy-nine rural mail couriers, and in addition we have five districts in which there are twenty-six couriers, making a total of one hundred and five.

I should like first to deal with contracts in my constituency that have been let for distances ranging from six miles up to fifty, and in this connection I should like to place on record some of the dealings concerning the men employed. I would draw attention first to what might be called inconsistencies, or perhaps discrimination, that exist in connection with the tenders and contracts awarded. These men are all responsible and trustworthy, and I should like to mention a few of them in particular.

I want to mention one in particular in the constituency of Queens, and I should like the Postmaster General to consider whether or not it is fair treatment. I do not wish to mention names so I will call it exhibit No. 1. Mr. A, a courier, drives eighteen miles, serves fifty-nine boxes and receives an annual fee of $1,560. Mr. B, no distance from this other man, drives 17·5 miles, serves forty-two boxes and receives $591.27. For driving half a mile farther A gets a lot more money. It is true he serves seventeen more boxes but for driving half a mile more and serving seventeen more boxes he gets $969 more than Mr. B. I should like the Postmaster General to say whether that is fair treatment. Another point I should like to make is that the man who is receiving the highest payment is not getting one nickel too much for the service he is rendering.

He receives $1,560 for making six trips a week or approximately 310 trips in a year for which he receives the princely sum of $5 a day. If he uses a car, we all know what the expenses of operation would be and the depreciation; but if he uses a horse and carriage in the summertime and a horse and sleigh in the winter there is also a cost there. A horse cannot be fed at the present time for less than $1 a day, and in addition there are other costs. The man would only be receiving at the highest $3 a day for wages for himself. Contrast that with the wages of the employees in the department, and you will find that this man even at the highest price is only getting a bare living wage.

What about the other poor fellow with his contract for 17·5 miles? For doing almost the same work they only pay him $590 or $1.90 per day for himself and his horse. He would not be able to buy a half ton truck because at the end of four years he would not have the truck paid for even if the whole amount he received was paid on it. There must be some way to overcome this situation. Such great discrimination should not exist.

Mr. Rinfret: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is the frequency the same in the two cases?

Mr. McLure: Yes.

Mr. Rinfret: Six times a week in both cases?

Mr. McLure: Certainly. I say "certainly" because I have the record from your office; if it is wrong do not blame me. I want to put another case on record in order to really convince the minister. I could give him a dozen different ones, but I should like to place this case before him so that he will almost cry out loud and say: Who lost the golden rule in my department in dealing with these cases? Somebody must have. I will call this case exhibit No. 2. Mr. A drives 21½ miles, serves seventy-six boxes and receives $1,700. Mr. B drives 30·5 miles, serves 126 boxes and receives $1,440. Mr. A drives eight and a half miles less than Mr. B and serves only half as many boxes. Yet he is paid $260 more.

Again it is hard to understand, and I would say to the members of this committee that I do not believe anyone here would approve of a tender system of that kind which is so unfair to certain individuals. Again I repeat that Mr. A with his $1,700 is not getting one nickel too much for the service he is rendering, but in justice to Mr. B there should be something coming to him.

I will give one more case and then rest the matter at that point. This will be exhibit No. 3. Mr. A drives 18·8 miles, serves sixty boxes, and receives $1,560. Mr. B drives 21 miles, serves 132 boxes, and receives $1,200. A drives over two miles less, and serves only half as many boxes, but for doing less work, with shorter mileage and fewer boxes, he gets $360 more. Again I say that the man getting the highest price of $1,560 is not getting one nickel too much for the valuable service he is rendering, but discrimination exists so far as the other man is concerned who may not be as shrewd and accepts somewhat different arrangements with the department.

I should like the minister to go into these cases carefully. I can give him a dozen more in my own constituency but I do not want to weary the committee. I will only say that for all contracts involving distances up to six miles there is a discrepancy of $100 annually. For all contracts covering seven to eight miles there is a discrepancy, injustice, or whatever you wish to call it, of $135 between contracts. When you come to ten miles the difference in the contracts goes up to $250, and some do a great deal less than others. When you come to twelve miles the same thing exists only that the difference between the high and the low is $340. It amounts to quite a sum at the end of four years. On fourteen mile contracts the difference goes down to $250, the high being $850 and the low $600. When we come to the sixteen mile routes it goes up again to $270.

But here is the pippin of them all. When we come to routes of 17 or 18 miles in length serving practically the same number of boxes we find, in the case of the 18-mile route, a discrepancy between the high and low contracts of $968.73. The highest contractor receives $1,560, which is just a small wage for himself after he pays expenses; but imagine the poor man with a wife and family at home who handles a route 17.5 miles in length and serves 42 boxes for which he receives only $590. Where does that discrepancy come in? The high man is not getting too much, but the low man is being starved.

On the 20 and 21 mile routes there is a discrepancy of $700. You can carry it right through the list, including the 26 and 28 mile routes where there is a difference of $1,000.

Mr. Warren: On tender.

Mr. McLure: On tender. For the longer routes of 30 and 32 miles there is a discrepancy of $865. Surely there must be some other system by which all individuals could receive fair treatment. I know some of these men who tender for these contracts. I am thinking particularly of two of them who have lower paid contracts. They have no fight in them. I went to one man whose contract was coming up again and I suggested that he should not accept such a low price when John Jones ten miles away was getting twice the money for performing half the service. He did not put up the fight he should have and the department now hires him at starvation wages.

Mr. Warren: On his own tender.

Mr. McLure: It is not fair. I do not think there are any hon. members of this house who would want such things carried on by a government of which they are members. There are other things I should like to deal with but perhaps I can take them up when we are on other sections of the bill.

But I do want to refer to the postal rate on newspapers. This was dealt with yesterday by some speakers, but I do not believe the position of newspapers in my province of Prince Edward Island can be compared with the position of newspapers in the larger centres. There is one newspaper in Prince Edward Island with a circulation of 13,000 or more which is a fairly large circulation in a province with the population of Prince Edward Island. Of that total circulation of 13,000, 8,000 are delivered through the post office at Charlottetown for which they pay an average rate of $40 per day.

Under the new legislation they will have to pay 4 cents, which means that their daily cost will be $90 to $100 for every day except Sunday. This is more than double what they pay now as their rate is being increased 166.6 per cent. That is beyond all reason for a newspaper providing news throughout the constituency and to all parts of the island. No newspaper in a province like Prince Edward Island can accept that. It will have to find some other way of getting their papers to the public.

As a solution I suggest to the Postmaster General that he institute a zoning system for the carriage of newspapers similar to that in effect for parcel post. Such a system would give this newspaper a chance to live. When you consider that a newspaper that distributes 8,000 copies through one post office must pay that office $50 a day, sufficient to pay three or four employees, it means something. To ask 166·6 per cent more for providing the same service is beyond all reason.

I understand that the minister is going to give this matter serious consideration. I advise him to do so before Friday because I understand they are going to come before him. He should adopt something that will be agreeable to these newspapers who are to be penalized by this extra expense. Another item I should like to deal with at some time is the commission paid on the sale of postage stamps. It may not be possible for the minister to reply to the two matters I have brought up, but I would like him to look into them very carefully.

Mr. Rinfret: First I should like to deal with the matter of the rural mail couriers. The position of these couriers is the result of the tender system. All the cases that have been cited are under tender. The different routes have different characteristics that must be considered, not only by the department but by the person making the tender. The length of the route is one factor, the number of boxes is another; then the type and variety of equipment necessary to operate the route must be considered, as well as the condition of the roads and the volume of the mail; consideration must be given to the time of day when the service is required, to the climatic conditions, to the availability and use of equipment, to the necessity of combining the route with other types of transportation, and to general economic conditions. All these questions have to be taken into consideration by the person making the tender for a particular route. The route immediately next to it might be completely different, but in each case it is the person offering the tender to the department that must make the appraisal of the conditions of that particular route. The department receives tenders from various persons, and chooses the lowest of those tenders. The department cannot be accused of imposing a rate on one particular courier, because he is the one who has made the offer. If his offer is too low he has the sole responsibility for that condition.

A long time ago the department realized that the tender system was not the best system that could be devised. We have been looking at various ways of curing the situation. We thought of a zoning system, but that would be still worse than the situation as it exists today. If we were to level off all the contracts in one given area, that would mean that those which were above the average before the levelling off would receive less than they were entitled to receive, whereas those below the average would get more than they were entitled to get. There would be a discrepancy, and there would be injustice. That was one of the reasons for suggesting section 23 in the postal act. We hope that it will produce the necessary results.

The hon. member for Queens said that in 1945 my predecessor suggested a committee be formed, and after that nothing happened. I remind the hon. member that in 1946 the Supplemental Payments Act was introduced, and bonuses were given to all the couriers who applied for them. In the end, about eighty per cent of the couriers did.

Mr. McLure: That only went to a few people at first, until we got wise to it and had it applied to all of them.

Mr. Rinfret: On March 31, 1949, when the law was finally repealed, eighty per cent of all contracts had been re-adjusted.

Dealing with rates on newspapers, the hon. member suggested a zoning system. We have examined the question of zoning newspapers. If a system similar to the parcel post zoning system were adopted, the rates now suggested for newspapers would be applied to the first zone. Any additional zone would involve an extra charge, because we have to meet the deficit that we have. The purpose of the proposed rate is to reduce the deficit in handling newspapers and periodicals. Unless the additional zones in the zoning system produced the additional revenue the purpose of the new rates would be lost. The extra charges would fall chiefly on the national magazines, as those are the publications which have dominion-wide distribution. They are possibly less able to bear the additional charges than are the large dailies, distribution of which is chiefly restricted to the province of publication or the adjacent province.

Zoning would involve increased costs to the department, as it would be necessary to segregate newspapers according to zones so as to check the weights and charges involved. It would also mean extra cost to the publisher, as he would have to segregate the newspapers according to zones and calculate the postage at the different postal rates in effect. In the United States, where zoning has been adopted, the deficit for second-class material is over $160 million per year. While it is not intended for one moment to attribute this loss to zoning, there is no doubt that some of it is caused by extra administration and handling costs which the zoning arrangement entails.

There is a final argument against zoning. In my opinion the zoning of newspapers in this country would create a balkanization of Canada. At the present time the Post Office Department is helping to a great extent in the dissemination of news. There is nothing in the rates that would prevent a paper from British Columbia going to the province of Quebec or a paper from Halifax going to Toronto. The rates are the same. It is in that way that the thoughts of the people out west will be known by those in the east, and vice versa. If we were going to make small states of each province, or if we were going to make small areas of about two hundred miles, I am sure that the newspapers of the area would remain in that area. I am absolutely opposed to that because it would be against the unity of Canada.

Mr. McLure: I suppose the minister is going to do away with the zoning for parcel post?

Mr. Rinfret: That is a commercial proposition which has nothing to do with the dissemination of news.

Mr. McLure: We know that, but you could have zoning for newspapers in certain localities. Mention has been made of the large publications from Toronto and Montreal. They are sent all over Canada, so to speak, but why put the same regulations into effect for the smaller ones? For instance, in our province you do not even give us the same number of officers to look after our affairs as you do in the other provinces. We will leave that out of consideration for the moment, though, and deal with that later.

When the Postmaster General mentioned these contracts, and the fact that consideration had to be given to road conditions, weather conditions and so on, whether it was a turnpike road or a hard-surfaced road, the cases I cited which had these great differences had the same conditions.

Mr. Warren: You pick them out.

Mr. McLure: Take a look at yourself when you go out, will you? The conditions are the very same. I hope the Postmaster General will consider this when dealing with our province.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the Postmaster General whether there has been any general increase during the past two years in the cost of rural mail routes? If there has been, what was the extent of it?

Mr. Rinfret: Does the hon. member mean the tendency?

Mr. Fair: Yes.

Mr. Rinfret: The figures I have here are from March 31, 1949, when the Supplemental Payments Act ceased to operate to date and the tendency would be approximately seventeen per cent higher than it was at that time on similar tenders.

Mr. Fair: Then may I ask what happens when some contractors supply tenders containing increases which the department thinks too high? Do they accept the lowest tender, or what happens?

Mr. Rinfret: The officials of the department have a fairly good idea of the value of a route. When they think that all the tenders are too high, they go back to all the tenderers at the same time and ask for a revised tender.

Mr. Fair: If they do not get a tender that is satisfactory, what happens next?

Mr. Rinfret: When all the tenderers have had a chance of reducing their tender and the official is still of the opinion that the tender is too high, the service has to stay in abeyance until we can locate a proper tenderer.

Mr. Fair: I am glad to have the statement the Postmaster General has given just now. There is another small matter I wish to mention. I am not complaining about it in any particular manner, but I believe an improvement could be made and the revision of the rural directories brought up to date better than they are. On certain occasions

I have sent out some literature to my constituents and from time to time I get a stamp on the envelope saying: "Please revise your mailing list". If my understanding of this matter is correct, the revision is made by the postmaster in each particular district. Apparently it is either being left undone or not being brought right up to date. I wonder whether the department could see that some better attempt is made to bring this revision up to date?

Mr. Rinfret: We will do that.

Mr. Pearkes: By this evening's paper I notice that a uniform postage rate is being established in greater Ottawa. Is the same principle being applied in other cities? For instance, will the same principle apply in the city of greater Victoria? There a person may live at a certain number, say, on Quadra street and receive his mail for three cents, but if he happened to live at a slightly higher number, a hundred yards or so farther up, he would have to pay the four cents. Anyone looking up the address in the telephone directory would see the two numbers on Quadra street. But the person addressing the letter would not have the faintest idea whether it was to be a three cent stamp or a four cent stamp which would have to be placed on the mail. I hope it will be possible to apply the same principle to a city like Victoria.

Mr. Rinfret: I am sorry to say that I have not as yet seen the Ottawa evening paper, but I am sure of one thing and that is that I have not issued any directive in that connection. I could not do so because under the present act I have not the necessary power. Only when the bill is sanctioned will I have the power of establishing or altering postal rates. I do not know where the reporters got that information. They certainly did not get it from my office.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I have given the wrong impression. The actual wording is "was in prospect today".

Mr. Rinfret: That is different.

Mr. Pearkes: I hope the same bright prospects will be held out for Victoria.

Mr. Hatfield: I wish to protest against this increase in the postage rate on daily newspapers and weekly newspapers; but I especially protest against the increase in the rate on weekly newspapers. I think this increase is going to put the newspapers practically out of business. The radio has practically put them out of business. The C.B.C. do not pay their way. Why should the Post Office Department and the postal services do so? I consider them as a service to the country. I never expected that they would ever pay their way. I thought it was a service that was given to the people of the country. Why should the Post Office Department be obliged to raise their rates in order to pay their way when a great many other departments do not pay their way? They have a deficit. The radio has done a great deal of harm to both the daily newspapers and the weekly newspapers. A great many people do not take a newspaper at all now. The newspaper is extremely important to the people all across Canada. I want to make a protest against the increase in the rates on both daily and weekly newspapers, because they render a service to the people. I would point out that the C.B.C. do not pay their way. Why should the Post Office Department have to pay their way?

Mr. Balcer: I should like to be on record as opposing the new increase in rates for daily and weekly newspapers. I am opposing the increase as a Quebec member, because I think this new amendment will affect my province more than any other in Canada. As we all know, in the province of Quebec the daily papers are confined to the four largest cities: Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers and Sherbrooke. As a result, most of their distribution—at least outside Montreal—is done through the mails, and all the literature and news that the rural people of my province read must go through the postal service. I realize that some people may say that our dailies are good business concerns; but it must also be remembered that they are really rendering great services in giving us the news and some good editorials.

I think the rural people deserve better treatment than they are getting, because we can be sure that in the end these increases will be borne by the ordinary people. In many places the newspaper is about the only literature and the only news service that the people can afford. I want to protest against this increase, in particular with regard to the small dailies. I know that in Montreal we have a few dailies which are good newspapers but which have small circulations. The main circulation of some of them is outside the city of Montreal, and they depend to the extent of more than 50 per cent on their rural customers. These newspapers are rendering a real service to the country and to their communities. I would not be surprised if the new increase in the rates would put them out of business completely. I think it is unfair to the papers, to the newspapermen and the various employees who are working in their plants.

The minister has rejected the zoning proposition with regard to these new increases in rates. One of his arguments was that it was a great thing for national unity that somebody from Prince Edward Island could receive a daily newspaper from Vancouver. But we must not forget that a daily, coming from Vancouver through the mail, will get there about eight or nine days later; and the news will be rather stale by then.

Mr. Rinfret: Twenty-four hours after mailing, by air mail.

Mr. Balcer: Air mail will make it a fairly expensive newspaper, and it would not be of any service at all. I think this argument based on national unity is just a big excuse. I hope the minister will reconsider his decision and will treat the rural people in the same way as the city people are treated.

Mr. Noseworthy: Mr. Chairman, I have had considerable criticism to offer with regard to the Post Office Department; but at this time I am happy to be able to congratulate the minister on one important step. I was happy to hear him make the statement last night that the letter carriers who have been working for longer than eight hours a day may rest assured that they will be paid for the extra hours worked. I was also very happy to learn that steps are being taken to rectify a situation which exists in the Toronto area regarding mail delivery service. I am quite sure that nothing that the department has done since the institution of the one delivery a day system will do more to raise the morale of the employees than will the assurance which the minister gave the house last night regarding the accumulated overtime which these men whose walks have not yet been checked are building up for themselves and will receive when their walks are adjusted.

I want to assure the minister that the situation as far as the Toronto postal service is concerned is still bad. It has deteriorated within the past two months. I myself have had occasions when letters posted in our post office in the building, letters that I posted on Tuesday, were not delivered in Toronto until Saturday morning. I have had a number of instances of that kind. I have today one example that I presume is an accident of some kind. I received a letter today that I mailed here in the post office on February 3. It went through the Ottawa post office on February 3. The first Toronto date stamp on it is May 17, three and a half months after. The addressee had moved in the meantime. The letter that was stamped in Toronto on May 17 returned to me this morning with the Ottawa stamp, May 30. That I take it is one of those accidents which should not occur in the post office but which probably do, and would under any system. I take it that is an exception, but the length of time which is required for the ordinary daily mail to be delivered in Toronto is rather exasperating.

Businessmen tell me that if they want a letter from Ottawa delivered in Toronto the following day, which has been the usual practice for years, they must now use the special delivery stamp to assure that the letter is delivered within twenty-four or thirty-six hours after it is mailed in Ottawa. Therefore there is a real need for a thorough check-up on the service in the Toronto district. I am quite confident that the restoration of the morale of the post office employees will do more to improve that service than anything else will.

Reference has already been made to the wages which letter carriers are receiving. I think the minister will probably have to face up to the question that in the competition which the post office is meeting today in regard to employment more and more difficulty will be experienced in getting reliable letter carriers or to retain in the service many of his best and most experienced men at their present wages. The minister will agree that in the Toronto district there have been, within the past two or three months, a considerable number of resignations by letter carriers who up to a few months ago regarded themselves as being permanently employed in the Post Office Department, and were satisfied with their working conditions, but who have since resigned because of the upheaval which has taken place within their work. I feel as sure as an earlier speaker who threw out certain suggestions that the minister may have to give consideration to a revision of the wages which are being offered today in the advertisements for letter carriers, and that revisions will be needed to restore the efficiency of the department.

While I am very happy to hear that these men will receive overtime pay, I want to remind the minister that if this were a private enterprise company or an industrial employer they would think in terms of overtime pay not at regular rates but at time and a half, and in some instances double time. There are very few industries in the country today, very few industries are left, in which employees are required to work three or four hours a day overtime without getting more than regular overtime pay for those overtime hours.

The debate on the existence of patronage in the Post Office Department reminded me of my first experience seeking employment in the Canadian post office back in my undergraduate days nearly forty years ago. During the Christmas holidays I applied for a job assisting in mail delivery. At that time there was a Conservative government in power in Ottawa. The Conservative candidate in the ward of the city in which I resided had been defeated in the election.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was before the establishment of the civil service commission by a Conservative government.

Mr. Noseworthy: When I went to the post office and applied for the job I was directed to apply to the defeated Conservative candidate. That was nearly forty years ago. I judge that the debate this afternoon would indicate that the Liberal regime has not improved much upon the old Conservative regime of that day, and that the government still finds patronage a very useful political weapon.

There is just one other matter that I should like to call to the attention of the minister. In previous debates on the Post Office Department I called attention to the fact that neither in Forest Hill village nor in York township have we as yet a single postal station. Here is a community of over 100,000 people. Their postal stations are situated in the municipality of the city of Toronto. There is a real need for one or two postal stations north of the present postal station on St. Clair avenue west and west of the present postal station on north Yonge street. Because Toronto happens to envelop the village of Forest Hill and York township the people in those two municipalities must travel to city post offices to transact any post office business that cannot be carried on in the small sub-post offices located in stores throughout the riding. I know surveys have been made and various reasons have been given.

During the war years no new post offices could be constructed, but I have heard of some being built since the war. I sincerely hope there is no relation whatever between the fact that neither Forest Hill nor York township has a postal station and the other fact that that particular riding has not at any time in its history elected a Liberal to the House of Commons. I trust that is not a factor in the department's refusal to give us a postal station in one or both of those municipalities.

I call this matter to the Postmaster General's attention once more in the hope that, since the population in these municipalities has grown, we may have another survey.

Mr. Pouliot: Would not the granting of the hon. member's request by the Postmaster General be one act of patronage about which he complains so much?

Mr. Noseworthy: No. If a member of parliament has any rights at all, then surely it is his right and privilege to bring to the attention of the department the needs of his constituency. My objection to political patronage is to those instances where political affiliations of the applicant are the first and determining factors in an appointment. For instance, I find that applicants in my riding who went last week to secure appointments to assist in taking the census were asked first of all: What is your political affiliation?

The Chairman: Order; we are discussing a bill concerning the post office. Shall the section carry?

Mr. Pouliot: Before it carries I should like to know from the hon. member whether he makes a distinction between requests made during a speech delivered in the house and requests made privately to the Postmaster General. According to what he has said one would conclude that if he makes a request in a speech recorded in Hansard, it is not patronage; but, according to him, if he writes to the minister or asks orally to have the same thing done, it is patronage, if granted.

Mr. Noseworthy: I made no such distinction. I do not hesitate to say that on more than one occasion I have written to the Postmaster General asking that a survey be made of my riding, and that consideration be given to granting us a post office.

Mr. Rinfret: Has consideration been given?

Mr. Noseworthy: I made my objection clear.

Mr. Pouliot: Excuse me, but it is not clear at all.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is clear to everybody else.

Mr. Pouliot: It is not clear at all. It would seem that so long as the hon. member makes a request, it is not patronage; but if a member supporting the government makes a similar request it is patronage. I am sure that even if a Progressive Conservative member makes a request to the government, it is patronage that must be condemned: the only thing that is right, the only thing that is honest, the only thing that can be done in the public interest, according to the hon. member and some others in his group, is what is being asked for by the C.C.F.

Let us look at what happens in Saskatchewan—how the Conservatives, the Liberals and the Social Crediters are martyrized by the government of Saskatchewan.

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing the post office bill. Shall the section carry?

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Mr. Paul E. Cote (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to revert to motions. On behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) I desire to lay on the table one copy in English and one in French of the annual report of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951. The report of the director of vocational training, for the same period, which in former years was tabled separately, has been included in the annual report.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will go into supply and take up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Resources and Development.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 31, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN THE "ENSIGN" OF JUNE 2

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of acknowledging publicly that an error of which I complained in this house on May 18 has been corrected. The error appeared in a recent issue of the Ensign and had to do with Quebec and Newfoundland divorce cases. I did not ask the Ensign to make the correction, but that newspaper has done so on its own initiative. I desire to acknowledge that fact and to express my thanks. The correction appears on page 2 of the issue dated June 2, and I might be permitted to quote the last sentence, which reads:

Actually, Knowles wants the federal exchequer court to handle divorces from these provinces.

I thank the Ensign for setting the matter right.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AUDIBILITY OF DEBATE—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER SOUND-AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Yesterday I undertook to confer with you, Mr. Speaker, as to the most convenient procedure to be followed to set up a committee to deal with the matter of an amplification system for this house. I should like to report to the house that after conferring with Your Honour, with the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew), the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) we find that the most convenient and expeditious way might be to set up a small striking committee to confer with Your Honour for the purpose of reporting a list of members to constitute that committee. I have prepared a motion of which I will give notice, which would read as follows:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Weir, Tremblay, Casselman, Knowles and Shaw be appointed to confer with Mr. Speaker, and with his assistance to prepare and report a list of members to compose a select committee of the house to consider with Mr. Speaker the matter of an amplification system for this house, with power to send for persons and papers and report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

I think that would be the most expeditious way of getting a committee set up and started at its work. Since this is non-controversial, some time would be saved if I could have unanimous consent to make this motion now, seconded by the leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMY PROMOTIONS, TRANSFERS, ETC.—QUESTION AS TO PUBLICATION IN "CANADA GAZETTE"

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) asked why for the last two or three months the list of army promotions, retirements, transfers and so on has not appeared in the Canada Gazette. Publication of these lists has been held up during the last couple of months in order to arrive at a uniform system for the three services in view of the enactment of the National Defence Act and the proposed bringing into force of a complete new set of regulations for the three services. We have been working toward arriving at a uniform system of publication for the three services. That has now been worked out, and it is expected that the first list on a common basis will be issued shortly.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

GENERAL REVISION—AUTHORITY FOR CLASSIFYING WEIGHING AND MEASURING DEVICES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 355, respecting weights and measures.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): The weights and measures bill was given first reading in this house on April 6, and was withdrawn on May 18. The provisions in that bill for setting up the primary standards of weights and measures were removed from it, as was explained at the time the bill was withdrawn, and put in a separate bill intituled: An act respecting units of length and mass. That bill has been passed by the house. The bill now before the house is a re-introduction of the original weights and measures bill which was given first reading on April 6, with the changes consequent upon the withdrawal of the provisions for the primary standards of weights and measures.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TITANIUM

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. What quantity of titanium is exported each year by Canada to the United States, and at what price?
2. What quantity of titanium is imported each year by Canada from the United States after treatment, and at what price?
3. What percentage of the titanium imported from the United States has previously been exported from Canada?
4. Are there any reduction plants in Canada?
5. If not, how many reduction plants would be needed to prevent importation and meet the requirements of the Canadian industry?
6. How much would it cost approximately to build such plants?

Mr. McIlraith: It is not possible to answer this question in the form in which it is asked.

There are no integrated plants for producing titanium metal or other titanium bearing products from titanium ore in Canada.

One company is developing a large ilmenite deposit at Allard lake on the north shore of the lower St. Lawrence river. This company has a reduction plant at Sorel, Quebec, which will process this ore to recover pig iron and a high titanium bearing slag which will be shipped to the United States for processing into titanium oxide. As yet the company has only one furnace in operation and the operation has not proceeded beyond the pilot plant stage. Any shipments of titanium slag can as yet only be regarded as experimental to determine its amenability to treatment by the existing American plants.

Imports from the United States of titanium bearing products are in the form of titanium oxide for the paint and pigment industry and as ferro-titanium for ferro-alloying industry. A small amount of the imported titanium oxide is converted into titanium metal, by Dominion Magnesium Company, of Renfrew, Ontario, and the major part of this metal is exported to the United States. As only one company is making titanium metal, figures of production are not available for publication.

Imports of titanium oxide are of the order of 15,000 tons a year, valued in excess of three million dollars. Approximately 500 tons of ferro-titanium of 25 per cent grade are consumed in Canada annually.

No actual estimate of the cost of erecting a plant capable of meeting Canadian demands for titanium dioxide is available.

ARMED FORCES

QUESTION AS TO SUPPLYING CANADIAN CIGARETTES TO PERSONNEL ON ACTIVE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Information I have received suggests it might be of interest to the house and to the people of Canada to know what arrangements are being made for the supplying to our armed forces in Korea and elsewhere, of Canadian cigarettes and other Canadian products of the kind which they would commonly use.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I am glad of the opportunity extended by the question of the leader of the opposition to say something about this matter. In the first place, it may be pointed out that the Canadian brigade group now forms a part of the first United Nations—commonwealth—division. The supplies for this group are furnished, like those for the other commonwealth forces, from United States sources. It would not be economical for us to have a separate supply line.

We do have the service of No. 426 squadron carrying special supplies, including mail and other amenities, to the Far East for our forces. Under existing arrangements Canadian cigarettes can be purchased from one of the manufacturers by residents in Canada and shipped by mail, tax free, to individual personnel in the theatre of operations. I understand that these arrangements are well worked out, and that shipments are rapid.

In the second place, it is also possible for Canadian cigarettes to be purchased by Canadian personnel through their own paymaster, but the supplies have to be forwarded from Canada. We are endeavouring to make arrangements whereby cigarettes, in addition to the supplies of other peculiarly Canadian products desired by the troops, will be immediately available out of stores arranged with the United Kingdom or United States authorities. If necessary, we shall set up our special Canadian agencies.

Mr. Drew: Hon. members might be interested in a brief comment I received in a letter from a number of men who are serving in Korea which indicates that there may be reasons why civilian organizations could do something in this respect. The letter indicates that some of these cigarettes were being sent to me—and I may say to the member for Fort William that I have not smoked them.

I quote one paragraph:

> We are enclosing a sample of some of the cigarettes we get. I believe you will agree with us as to their quality. We figure that if we keep smoking then we will all be back in Canada by the time our throats recover.

I know that is written in a humorous way, Mr. Speaker, and I welcome the explanation. It might be well if Canadians generally realized that it will be of considerable assistance to our troops overseas if civilian organizations do something about forwarding Canadian cigarettes and other things of that type to which the men are accustomed.

Mr. Claxton: I quite agree, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. member has sufficiently described the cigarettes in question to indicate that they are not Canadian. As a matter of fact, we have had a number of officers out there to make arrangements of this kind. We have to work with our friends in the United States and Great Britain in this regard, and they are very co-operative. It is a long way off, though. We hope to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the problem.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is there any truth in the rumour that Canadian soldiers in Korea are supplied with margarine? I want an answer.

Mr. Claxton: I do not know. We shall have to look into that.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is a disgrace, and should be looked into.

BANK LOANS

QUESTION AS TO CREDIT POLICY—MARGIN ON STOCK MARKET TRANSACTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Have there been any recent discussions between representatives of the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks with regard to further restrictions on credit, particularly the margin on stock market transactions? If so, will the minister give the house a summary of what has taken place?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the governor of the Bank of Canada had one of his periodical discussions or meetings with the general managers of the chartered banks a week or ten days ago. There are no further restrictions on credit. The purpose of the meeting was generally to review the result of the bank's policy in that connection, but the credit policies of the banks continue to be based on the principle set out in the statement issued on February 22, I think it was, by the Bank of Canada following the meeting held on that date with the chartered banks.

As to the margin transactions in stocks, the Montreal and Toronto stock exchanges established margin requirements of fifty per cent on marketable securities. The banks voluntarily undertook to maintain similar requirements, and those limits are still in effect.

Mr. Adamson: Have they not been in effect for some time?

Mr. Abbott: My recollection with respect to margin requirements is that they were in effect shortly prior to February 22, and that, following the discussions which the governor had with the chartered banks, the banks adopted the same policy.

Mr. Adamson: I think it was before that.

Mr. Abbott: That may be so. It is quite possible they did it concurrently with the action taken by the stock exchanges. From memory I cannot say just what the situation was.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

INCOME TAX BUILDING, LONDON, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): On April 16 an order for return was passed in this house on a motion standing in my name for the production of papers. Those papers have not been forthcoming. May I expect them soon?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Were those papers with regard to the purchase of a building in London?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Yes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I initialled them yesterday. They will be tabled within a few days.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Thank you.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO B.N.A. ACT—PROGRESS OF MEASURE AT WESTMINSTER —CONSEQUENTIAL CANADIAN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to direct two questions to the Prime Minister with reference to the amendment of the British North America Act to give parliament authority to enact legislation with regard to old age pensions. In view of the fact that the bill for this purpose was adopted yesterday in the House of Commons at Westminster, when is it expected that the bill will be adopted in the House of Lords, receive royal assent and come into effect? And how soon thereafter does the government intend to introduce a bill in this house with regard to the matter?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have had no official information as yet about the procedure at Westminster. I read in the newspapers that the House of Commons had disposed of the three readings of the bill, and that it had gone to the House of Lords; but we have no other information than that which we get from the commonwealth relations office that all stages will be expedited in both houses. No forecast was made as to when the proceedings would be completed. Just as soon as possible after they are completed, I expect to have a statement to make to the house with respect to Canadian legislation consequential upon the amendment.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS FOR SHIPPING POOL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, recently the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked a question as to the accuracy of a certain press release concerning the North Atlantic planning board for ocean shipping. I have now had an opportunity to read the announcements in the press concerning the NATO plans for shipping in the event of war. I find that the communiqué reported is that authorized by the defence shipping authority following its London meeting which took place in the latter part of April of this year. The London meeting was attended by delegates from eleven of the twelve governments signatory to the North Atlantic treaty. The only absentee was Luxembourg, which was represented by Belgium.

I find that there is very little I can add to the press statements. The house will understand, of course, that the details of the plan are of such a nature that they cannot be made public at this time. Perhaps the best answer I could give would be to send over to the hon. member the text of the press release which was approved, which is substantially the same but with some modifications to which he referred.

Mr. Green: Would the minister have any objection to making that press release part of his statement?

Mr. Chevrier: No. I shall be glad to table this text. It is entitled: "Text of press statement prepared by the North Atlantic planning board for ocean shipping".

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Green: Perhaps it could be included in the minister's statement and appear in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Chevrier: I was simply saying that I should be glad to send it over to my hon. friend. But if it is the wish of the house that I should table it, I shall be glad to do so.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Green: The reason I make that request is this. An extensive statement has been made, I think, by Mr. Justice Clyne, the Canadian representative at this conference; also there have been these statements in the press. We have had, however, no statement whatever in the house about the matter; it is of the utmost importance, because it affects all of Canada's deep-sea shipping. If this release sets out the full picture, then it should be given to the house, and could be printed in Hansard with the minister's answer.

Mr. Chevrier: I have not seen the report made by Mr. Justice Clyne, but I am sure it would not go beyond that which was approved in London by the NATO planning board for ocean shipping. In any event I could not put this release on Hansard unless I had the unanimous consent of the house. If I have that consent, I shall be glad to do so. If not, I am sending it over to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this statement should appear on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Green: Then I would ask the minister to table it. I cannot understand why there would be objection to putting an important statement of this kind on Hansard.

Mr. Chevrier: I am in the hands of the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $336,942.

Mr. Larson: There are just one or two points which I feel should be put on record at this time. We have voted $5 billion for defence to be spent over the next three years. This is a large sum of money, but it is an important thing for us to do because we must keep our country secure in times like these. However, one of several things could happen. We may be in the middle of a war before the three years are up, or we may have reached some sort of amicable settlement with our potential enemies, in which event there would be little likelihood of war. Should the situation continue as it is now, the things that we have been building with the money we have been spending would no doubt be becoming obsolete, and the expenditures made on them would have to be repeated. If we continue to tax ourselves as we are doing, and if we have to continue to put all our energies into this type of thing for the next twenty or thirty years, our potential enemy, communism, will have won its point. It would break us financially. If we could make our position safe through the NATO organization and the efforts we are making ourselves, then we would defeat our potential enemy, communism, provided that we could continue to develop our own country along with what we are doing in matters of defence. In manufactures we are well developed, but in agriculture there are certain things that are likely to suffer. But there is one project which has been considered by the federal government, and on which it has spent a great deal of time and money, that I hope will not be delayed because of the situation in which we find ourselves today. I refer to the South Saskatchewan river project.

People in Ontario, where there is all this beautiful greenery, rivers and all the amenities of summer life, probably do not realize what the condition of the country is around Outlook and south of Saskatoon. People are trying to grow wheat and field crops under very adverse conditions. Many areas do not produce enough to give them a living, and we in this House of Commons are faced with such things as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and direct relief. I have some figures on how much money has been put into this kind of thing. In the area I believe some $42 million have been put into relief and some $14 million into P.F.A. Instead of the federal government putting out money in this way, had some sort of irrigation development been carried on, had the government assisted in the erection of the dam, the result would have been a real capital asset to the people of Canada.

I hope the chairman will not mind if I quote extensively from information that has been compiled by the Department of Agriculture, because it gives a good many figures, and I should like to have them right on the record. The capital cost of this whole project will be about $103,700,000. The sum of $68,600,000 would go to the actual construction of the dam itself and the reservoir. The irrigation distribution system would cost about $19,500,000; land improvement, and deficit period—that is, the period until it starts to operate—$5,600,000; and the power plant that would supply the power would cost $10 million.

It has been proposed that the federal government put into this project $68,600,000, to impound the water and construct the dam and the works that necessarily go with it. This expenditure would be spread over a period of ten years. In the first few years the cost would be low, but it would be accelerated toward the end when the major works were installed. The province and the farmers would pay the balance of $35,100,000. It should be remembered that the engineers of the federal government have determined that this project would be feasible. They have investigated it, and they know it will work. The investigation cost us a lot of money.

The government of the province of Saskatchewan seemed to doubt whether the project would be feasible, but I understand that they have now decided they can go into it and that it will be a real asset to the people. They are prepared to lay out the money. The power plant, to cost $10 million, will be built by the province, and they will take the power. Also the province will complete the irrigation works, at a cost of another $25 million. The water stored would provide irrigation for 500,000 acres, of which 431,000 are good irrigable land. The population would be increased tremendously on that type of land, and the assurance of a decent livelihood would be increased tremendously as well.

There is a sufficient flow of water to develop 375 million kilowatt hours of energy, firm—that is, firm power that could be guaranteed; and another 100 million of secondary energy at times when the water flow is high.

The industrial life of Saskatchewan has been impeded owing to the fact that we did not have the plant to produce enough power to give industry all the power it needed. With this project we would have plenty of power. The provincial authorities, through the power commission, say that they could use that power.

The irrigation system itself would increase the number of farmers on this area from 1,245 to 2,700. On this basis it is expected that the irrigation system itself would meet the cost of operation. The power commission, on the other hand, would value the firm energy at some 5½ mills and the secondary energy at 3 mills at the dam site. The gross value would be $2,088,000, and the net value $1,300,000. These facts leave no doubt that the irrigation and the power plant would carry themselves.

The climate around the area to be irrigated is very much the same as it is in the Lethbridge irrigation district, where the irrigation cost was $57 an acre. The province of Alberta attempted to carry it in a kind of co-operative way, I believe, without too much success, because the increase in produce and the power would not be enough to pay the expenses. The $57 an acre could not be borne by the farmers; therefore in order to make the project possible it will be necessary for the federal government to put up enough money to create this reservoir. Under the P.F.A. legislation it has been pretty well decided that it is the federal government's job to impound the water, provided that the water is used.

The Meek report indicates some of the changes in the country around this irrigation project, the St. Mary storage project. It says:

> In 1924, when the Lethbridge northern district was first irrigated, there were only about 300 families in the area. Now about 900 families occupy farms on the project.

Where these people formerly lived was semi-arid country. Now they are living in a country that has trees, flowers and community life. They are living close together. They are farming more intensively, and their lives are more or less comparable to life on farms around Ottawa where there is plenty of moisture. The community advantages resulting from irrigation deserve special emphasis. The report goes on:

> The social and community advantages resulting from irrigation deserve special emphasis, though these benefits can only be partly indicated statistically. These advantages were observed by the committee on all projects visited, and a good example is found in the Lethbridge northern irrigation district. Here an area of some 360 square miles, equivalent to ten townships, has been transformed in less than two decades from sparsely settled prairie, subject to periodical crop failures and soil drifting, to a thriving community of farm homes, towns and villages.

In less than two decades the area has been transformed from the kind of conditions I have been describing to the kind that you see around this city. The population increased from 1,500 to 10,000, thereby making it possible to improve the schools and to establish rural electrification, and for the people to have all the other things that make life on the farm more pleasant.

It is unthinkable that a project such as this should not be proceeded with. I will admit that it is costly. But if you take a year at a time, a few millions of dollars each year would transform that whole area from a semi-arid region into one of which Canada could be proud.

There is another point I should like to stress. As Canada developed it was found necessary to develop the west, and as the west developed, Canada became a greater nation. There have been many complaints about our talking about wheat; but when it is realized that we send out of the country each year 300 million bushels of wheat and bring back the money—nearly half a billion dollars—to the farms in the western provinces, where there is very little manufacturing, and when we know that nearly all that money eventually goes to industries in central Canada, we appreciate the importance of western Canada to the rest of the country.

The development of the west has been an important factor in the industrial development of central Canada—indeed in the entire development of this country as a nation. I would urge that this project be given the go-ahead signal immediately, so that we may open our arms to more of the world's population. On the basis of this project alone, we could probably double the population in Saskatchewan within twenty-five years. I do not see how anyone could urge that a project such as this should be delayed. All such developments should be proceeded with immediately.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a very few words. I concur in what has been said by the hon. member for Kindersley. I do not think it is necessary to recapitulate the arguments he has made. The project in question has been discussed in the house for a good many years. On February 21, 1938, I introduced a motion calling for consideration of irrigation in western Canada, with particular reference to this project. That was soon after I had become a member of the House of Commons. Consideration of the proposal has always been deferred.

I suggest to the minister that, since the federal government has come to tentative agreement with the government of Saskatchewan, the time has arrived when, in the words of the last speaker, the go-ahead signal should be given. Completion of this project would have great value in Saskatchewan, and also in relation to the economy of the whole of Canada. If we are to continue to be prosperous in a large part of the prairie provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan, this work should be proceeded with at once. The prosperity of Canada as a whole depends to no small extent upon it.

We never know when we shall have another of the prolonged droughts that we experienced in former years. At the present time the moisture prospects are good, and there is sufficient moisture in the ground for this year. But we have no guarantee that within the next two or three years moisture may not be used up and drought develop, so that we might have another relief problem.

Having urged this development for a good many years, I would earnestly request the minister not to delay further but to undertake the work at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I join with the two hon. members who have spoken in support of a project that is necessary, agriculturally, to the survival of central Saskatchewan. This matter has been argued on previous occasions, and the facts have been recapitulated by the hon. member for Kindersley. Without regard to party considerations or strife, all of us from Saskatchewan are united in the demand that this work be proceeded with.

The population of Saskatchewan has been decreasing for the last twelve or fifteen years. In considerable measure that decrease is due to drought and crop failure.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And the C.C.F. government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I never like to place so heavy a responsibility upon any government. I have been trying to deal with the matter entirely apart from considerations of that kind.

This project is necessary to the future not only of Saskatchewan, but of Canada as a whole. Industry will not be decentralized as it should be unless power is developed in agricultural areas. In Saskatchewan we have available for development hundreds of thousands of horsepower. We have before us the example of the government of the United States, which in recent years has endeavoured to instil into its people the realization of a need for the decentralization of industry.

Without industrial development in Saskatchewan we begin to wonder how our population will be maintained. As the hon. member for Kindersley said, from time to time, from as far back as 1775, when the first records were available, vast areas have been almost denuded of crops as a result of drought conditions in the southeasterly section of the province, extending from Saskatoon.

This piece of work is necessary in the interests of the industrialization of Saskatchewan. It is necessary to provide an assured and continuing agricultural income. It has been found feasible, and it will be self-liquidating. It will assure a development never before experienced in Saskatchewan, and will pay dividends in national development.

I wish to deal with farm income in 1950 as it affected not only my own province but the dominion as a whole. The incomes of Canadian farmers went down to $271 million less than they were in 1949. Cash income in Saskatchewan in 1950 was $407,600,000 as compared with $560,700,000 in 1949, or a drop of $153 million. In considerable measure that decreased income in Saskatchewan is the result of climatic conditions the effect of which would have been considerably if not entirely removed if this irrigation plan and power development on the South Saskatchewan river had been proceeded with.

In Alberta, farm income fell during the year by $92 million, and in Manitoba by $46,800,000. I rise for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the minister a question that is of prime importance to western farmers and concerns the prosperity of the country as a whole. I realize that the marketing of farm products, including wheat, is the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but the production of those commodities is the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture. Over 200 million bushels of wheat are being marketed under the international wheat agreement. At the present time the price paid under that agreement is about 37 cents less per bushel than the wheat board is receiving from the sales elsewhere of class II wheat. The loss has already run into $10 million, and it is bound to increase if the world remains as it is today, in a state of three-quarters peace or, as described by the London Economist, as a world of fear wherein wheat as a major commodity of sustenance will become in greater demand. The present disparity of 37 cents between the price under the international wheat agreement and what the farmer would otherwise receive is likely to increase if the demand continues, with a correspondingly greater loss to the western farmer.

The international wheat agreement contains a provision for revision of prices upward under certain circumstances. All the signatories to the agreement are nations which have joined together to meet the onrush of communism. All realize that there can be no assured unity until all the peoples of the nations joined together in this effort are united and have a high morale. There is a provision in the agreement for the prices that will prevail during the next few years. In 1950-51 the maximum price will be $1.80; in 1951-52 the maximum price will be $1.80, and there will be the same maximum price in 1952-53, when the agreement will end. In 1952-53 the minimum, as compared with today's minimum price fixed under the agreement, is 20 cents lower than the first year's minimum price.

With other hon. members I have urged the Minister of Trade and Commerce to make application to the nations signatory to this agreement with a view to securing an upward revision of prices. Unless there is such a revision, the wheat farmer is going to become more and more disgruntled as the days go by and the price of class II wheat increases, provided that world conditions continue in their present fearful state.

The international wheat agreement contains a provision which I believe allows for a revision upward or downward as the case may be. Article VI deals with prices, and section 5 of that article reads:

5. If any exporting or importing country represents to the executive committee that any price equivalent established under paragraph 2, 3, or 4 of this article is,—

Those are the paragraphs which establish the price equivalents for bulk wheat:

—in the light of current transportation or exchange rates or market premiums or discounts, no longer fair, the executive committee shall consider the matter and may, in consultation with the advisory committee on price equivalents, make such adjustment as it considers advisable.

I submit that since the agreement was entered into in 1950 there have been increases in transportation costs in Canada; there have been increases in freight rates and also in other costs which might be considered by the executive committee in deciding whether or not an adjustment should be made. I realize that the Minister of Agriculture is not in a position to act because of the portfolio he holds, but I urge him to appeal to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the Canadian people to make an application for a revision upward. Conditions cannot go on as they are, the farmer being faced with increasing costs of production while being required to sell his wheat at a price that as time goes on will represent less and less profit under the international wheat agreement.

The answer given the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that there were thirty-seven importing countries and only three exporting countries which were signatories to the agreement. I believe that if those forty countries, whether exporting or importing, are as anxious as we are to mobilize to the utmost in order to preserve ourselves against the potential communist challenge, they would be just as anxious as we are to do everything possible to remove any injustices under that international agreement.

The Minister of Agriculture represents a western constituency, and I know he is desirous that prosperity be maintained on the prairies, without which there cannot be any Canadian prosperity. I ask him to use his prestige and influence upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce in an effort to have him do what up to the present he has not shown any desire to do. Indeed, he adopted the attitude, when asked a question about this matter, that there was no use in doing anything, because after all one would be too optimistic to believe that anything could be done.

The Canadian dollar has fallen considerably in purchasing power since the agreement was entered into. I have not the exact figures, but, speaking from memory, at the time the agreement was entered into the index for Canadian commodity prices was about 160, whereas today it is approximately 180. There has been a pronounced increase in the cost of the commodities which the farmer must buy. This is a matter that transcends any political considerations in the western provinces. As I see it, it is a matter that demands a united front on the part of all the western provinces to the end that at least an application be made for revision. Whether or not action can be forced we do not know, but we can at least try.

Surely we have the right to ask that the Minister of Trade and Commerce shall not be permitted to stand in the way of what would be fair and just. There is not a farmer in Alberta, Manitoba or Saskatchewan to whom I have spoken who is not in favour of an upward revision in prices. The time is now, not in 1953, when the agreement will be concluded. We must take action now if we are to assure the maintenance of a high degree of production, which, as I see it, cannot be done unless the morale of the western farmer is kept up. If that morale is to be maintained he must have at least the hope that something definite will be done to revise upward the price of wheat under the international wheat agreement.

When that agreement was made, many felt that it was an excellent thing, for it assured a degree of security. At that time no one could have predicted just how serious the world situation would become; and it is getting more serious day by day. Having regard to the changed circumstances I feel that the Minister of Agriculture should join hon. members in all parts of this house from the western provinces—and we have always received the support of the east when we have had a just case—to insist that something be done to the end that prices be placed upon a basis that is fair and just to Canadian wheat farmers.

Mr. Thatcher: Before discussing the main topic in which I am interested I should like to associate myself with the remarks just made by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Certainly the people of Saskatchewan believe that a request should be made to have wheat prices under the international wheat agreement revised upward. It may be that the purchasing countries concerned will not agree, but certainly no harm would be done by attempting an upward revision.

I should like also to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Kindersley. During this session I have been pleased to hear a large number of members from Saskatchewan on the government side speak in favour of the South Saskatchewan irrigation project. It is something we in this party, together with hon. members of other parties, have been advocating for many years. This afternoon the people of Saskatchewan are waiting anxiously for the remarks the Minister of Agriculture will probably make in a few minutes, indicating whether or not the project will be proceeded with this year. There have been rumours and newspaper reports that the cabinet has been discussing the matter, and that the minister has been trying to sell his colleagues on the project. I hope he has been successful, because, as I said a moment ago, there is nothing more needed in Saskatchewan today.

I was speaking to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle the other day, just after he had returned from the west. He told me that last week the dust was blowing so thick you could hardly see. In the plane in which he was travelling ten or twelve people were ill as a result of the high winds; and of course at this time of year in the dust bowl when the wind is high the dust is very bad. Often at this time of year I have driven out in my car and have been unable to see beyond the engine. Frequently you have to drive with your lights on in the middle of the day. This irrigation project would not change that completely, of course, but certainly it would go a long way toward alleviating it.

I am not going into the advantages of the project; everyone in this house knows them. If anything is needed to give our province stability, it is this irrigation project. I know of nothing else in Canada today, with the possible exception of the St. Lawrence waterway development, which is more important or which deserves greater consideration from this house.

I was interested in reading some old Hansards the other night to see the reasons that have been advanced since I have been in parliament for not proceeding with the South Saskatchewan development. I realize that no one wants this project more than the Minister of Agriculture, but either he has not been able to sell it to his colleagues, or something has always happened to prevent its commencement. In 1946 the reason given for not proceeding was the shortage of men and materials. In 1947 the lack of progress was blamed on inability to locate a suitable dam site. In 1948 the reason was that eastern members had to be sold on the project. Last year the reason was unique; the minister made the statement that we must have assurance from somebody that an organization would be set up to utilize the water and to pay a share of the cost sufficient to ensure that they would take some responsibility for seeing that the work is carried on. Then he went on to point out that the provincial government should bear a share of the cost. Up to that time I had never heard the suggestion that the province would have to pay part of the cost, and I think that was a harsh proposal, in view of the financial position of Saskatchewan. Nevertheless our provincial government has now agreed to that plan and is willing to bear roughly one-third of the cost; I believe it has indicated that fact to the minister. Therefore I can see no reason why something should not be done this year. After all, we are going to spend $3,700 million this year. Surely it should not be hard to find the $10 million that is needed to get this project started.

I remember that in one of his speeches out west the minister said we could make this area of Saskatchewan the Essen of Canada; and if that could be done, no one would be more delighted than I. That statement was made just before an election, but still I think it was a reasonable thing to say, and something which could be accomplished. I believe the citizens of Saskatchewan and the west generally, whether they be Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F.'ers or Social Crediters, will be disappointed if the minister gets up today and tells us that, in view of our defence and other needs, once again this much needed undertaking will have to be postponed. The excuse that men and materials are not available will no longer suffice. That is the reason we were given back in 1946, and it seems to me if such an excuse is given today we shall be going around in a vicious circle. If we do not proceed at once, and war should come, we may go on for decades without getting this development. Therefore I hope the minister will announce that it is to be proceeded with at once.

Mr. Low: In connection with the development of the South Saskatchewan project, I want to indicate how the neighbours of that province feel about that development. We in southern Alberta have witnessed the transformation that can be made through the proper use of irrigation. I lived in a very dry area where we were never certain of crop returns at any time. My father was among those who developed the first irrigation system in our province, the old Alberta railway and irrigation system, and I recall the many weeks he was away from home working on that project. I mention this only because I want to convey to hon. members the fact that I have witnessed the change that can be brought about when water is made available. I saw that dry section of the country become almost a beautiful garden; and I also saw the coffers of the provincial and federal governments enriched by the returns from that land which produced more abundantly than ever before. When I think of what happened in southern Alberta, and when I think also of the present situation in the province of Saskatchewan, our sister province, I cannot help but express my hope that the government of Canada will find it possible to lend a substantial hand in the building of the dam across the South Saskatchewan river so as to provide the much needed water for those parched and thirsty lands in Saskatchewan. I am certain that if the federal government does so that inhabitants of the sister province of Alberta will support the effort. I feel that wherever worthy projects of this kind can be seen, it should not matter in what province the development is to take place. We, as Canadians, must look at it as Canadians. I am speaking now I think for the people of the province of Alberta when I say that we welcome the development of water resources for the province of Saskatchewan. We will certainly give financial support, through taxation measures or any others that need be, to see that that development takes place.

I recall, Mr. Chairman, while I was in the provincial government quite a number of years ago now, along with some of my colleagues, taking the first step towards the conservation of the east slope of the Rockies in order that we might conserve our water resources and make it possible for the province of Saskatchewan—possibly western Manitoba—to have a share in the run-off waters from these slopes. Serious fire hazards had beset these areas for many years. Some of them had been almost denuded of trees, and we were not certain whether there would be water. I believe it was about 1937 I came down and discussed the matter with officials of the federal government with a view to establishing some form of co-operation between the province and the dominion so that we could conserve the forests on the east slope of the watershed. I am pleased to say, Mr. Chairman, that the federal government came to realize the importance of that conservation. They did set up the Eastern Rockies forest conservation board, which is doing a fine job. They have made it possible for the people of Alberta and Saskatchewan—perhaps some in Manitoba—to be assured of water resources in the future. Not only did that commission take steps to conserve the watershed, but it decided upon a division of the waters as between Alberta and Saskatchewan. With that division assured, it seems to me that the next step ought to be the development of a dam and reservoir so that the people of Saskatchewan might be able to realize what we have already realized in a good many areas in Alberta, that we can have abundant production in those sunny areas with the rich soil if we can get the water. I join with the member for Kindersley, and others who have spoken, in expressing the hope the federal government will see its way clear to doing something towards the development of water resources in the province of Saskatchewan at an early date.

I now wish, Mr. Chairman, to say a word about this question of the international wheat agreement. I do not expect to go into that too fully at the moment. I would say that the member for Lake Centre made a pertinent and reasonable request. Now is the time to ask for a review of the whole agreement. I should not like to see the same thing happen with respect to the international wheat agreement as happened in connection with the British wheat agreement. If we leave it too long, however, there is likely to develop much the same dissatisfaction amongst the farmers of Canada. I must say right here, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers of western Canada that are affected by this long-term agreement are not asking for anything unreasonable when they ask for a revision, because world wheat prices, at least in some cases, are thirty-eight cents above the international wheat agreement price. That means, of course, that the farmers of the country, when they are forced to sell most of their wheat under the international wheat agreement at a figure that represents a considerable loss, feel that now is the time to ask for an upward revision.

Then, one should remember that the farmers of Canada, who number not more than twenty-five or twenty-seven per cent of the total population of this country, are today still making it possible for the Canadian people to have cheaper bread than they would have if the wheat were all sold at world prices, or somewhat above the international wheat agreement figure. The farmers are selling to the millers of Canada at a rate that means that the farmers, one-third of the population, are subsidizing cheap bread for the rest of the population of Canada. That situation ought not to exist. It was true all during the time the British wheat agreement was in force, and the farmers of Canada lost not less than $48 million. Many people, of course, believe they lost a good many millions more than that. The important thing is that this is the time to ask for a review of the agreement, and as the member for Lake Centre said, to ask for some upward revision of the price.

On going into supply on May 1 I raised the whole question of the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I pointed out particularly some ways in which the administration of that act was discriminating against certain farmers in the Peace River country. Lands that are not marginal but perfectly good farm lands, and which in normal years would produce a good crop, last year were subjected to two very tragic events. In the first place a wide strip of the country was riddled with hail, and the crops did not recover because it came too late in the season. Then, we were visited with a heavy frost early in the season, with the result that in a large part of the country the yields from the lands were below what would be necessary to qualify for a prairie farm assistance payment.

Now, because many of these farmers hold land under what is called a crown lease agreement, as a result of the amendment which was put through this house in 1950 they are prevented from getting benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am sure I do not need to review the situation for the minister. He was here the day I spoke about it. I am just asking the minister if he would indicate, when he speaks, whether or not it would be possible to make some change in the act, so as to enable these farmers who are holding leases on the ten-year term to get benefits from the act. Each year they are paying their one per cent contribution, and they feel that they have been discriminated against in this last year because they were barred from any of the benefits under the act.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, owing to the geographical position of my constituency I could hardly be expected to keep silent during the course of this debate. I shall not add much to it in the way of argument because I believe the matter has been discussed time and again in committees like this. It has been discussed time and again in my hearing by the Minister of Agriculture in his various speeches throughout the province of Saskatchewan. I am thinking particularly of the time when I began to take more interest in those things, probably back in 1944, and I remember quite vividly some of his speeches. I have referred to some of them on a previous occasion in this chamber. I do not want in any way to taunt the minister in regard to what one might consider to be breach of promise in regard to this particular construction. I believe it is probably true, as we have heard today, that the minister has been pressing for the construction of this particular dam. As someone else has done, I shall say that I hope that is a fact and that in his effort he will be successful.

This is not a party matter, Mr. Chairman. I should like to congratulate my friend the hon. member for Kindersley upon his speech and upon his approach to the matter in this chamber. The hon. member for Moose Jaw has, I think, disposed of most of the arguments which have been advanced against the construction of this dam. I have said something about the geographical situation of my own city. I might supplement that by saying this, and I think it is perhaps more true in the west than it is in the east, particularly in the part of the west from which I come: the prosperity of the people in the city—not only businessmen but workers—depends upon the prosperity of the farmers, not necessarily those in the immediate vicinity but those even a long distance away, because distances in those provinces are great.

There is something sentimental about the way in which prairie dwellers look upon the matter of water. Down in the east here, people do not think too much about water because, I suppose, they get too much of it; at least, that is my own impression. The Saskatchewan river wends its slow way along, not far distant from where I live in the city of Saskatoon. My hon. friends from the east may have some difficulty in believing it, but on every fair summer Sunday afternoon—and we have many of them in that province—long rows of cars draw up along the north end of Spadina crescent and simply sit there in order to watch the water running over the dam. That dam might seem to have no specific use and people often wondered why it was built. My own impression is that it was built partially at least to give relief work back in the years of depression. At any rate, it is there and it is a little bit of running water and it adds to the beauty of our city. Saskatchewan people like to look at running water.

There are so many stories about drought that I am almost tempted to tell one or two—some of them are humorous—but I think perhaps it would be wasting the time of the committee. I am interested in irrigation and I am interested in what my friend the hon. member for Peace River has said about Alberta. One of the first jobs I ever had in Canada—and I think it was back in 1910, if I remember aright—was driving a team of horses and a scraper on an irrigation ditch which was being constructed out of the Bow river in the province of Alberta somewhere —I am not sure of the vicinity—near the village of Brant not far from Strathmore where the Canadian Pacific Railway people had that fine herd of Holstein cows. I do not know whether or not they have it there now. I am thinking now about our own people looking at water and the influence which it has, or which the lack of it has, in our lives on the prairies. I remember those Indian braves, on their way to the stampede. I was not fortunate; I could not go to the stampede because I had to drive my team with a plow breaking up one of the quarter sections which the Canadian Pacific Railway sold as ready-made farms or under some such title to Americans. The people of the United States were so enamoured of the success of irrigation in their own country that when they were able to come up into Canada and when they were offered land at $75 an acre—they said: Is this land irrigated? Irrigated land at $75 an acre?—they were prepared to buy it. I hope they made out well on their investment. I often wondered about the success of that project, because they were breaking land, some of which was fairly rough; and I was wondering how the grain would ripen in the bottom of the valley as compared with that on the tops of the hills in the same section.

I remember as I was plowing along there, with six horses on a gang plow at that particular time, I used to watch those Indians from the Blackfoot reserve pass on their way to the Calgary stampede, and boylike, I envied them. I noticed how they would camp alongside the irrigation ditch. Those Indian braves would often stand on one foot—I do not know why—with a bright blanket around their shoulders, while the ladies in the tribe —that is not the name we generally use—would unload the democrats, light the fire and proceed to prepare supper. I envied the Indian braves for that, because I had to cook my own supper.

Perhaps that is enough of reminiscence. I merely want to say that we in the west love water. We go to it on every possible occasion. Prairie people, when they go for a holiday or a week-end vacation, go to a lake. Unfortunately we are obliged to go farther and farther in order to get to our lakes because the water level—largely owing to our own foolishness, I think—is becoming lower and lower; and on the bed of many of the lakes which I knew as a boy, and on which I shot ducks as a boy, oats are now being grown; and the tourist business in that particular district at least is no more.

I think one would have great temerity to say that the greatest problem the world is faced with is not that of world peace. I had better not say that, because it is a statement that might be challenged in various quarters. But I will say that an equally great problem is that of growing food for the people of the nations of the world. I do not think that we can expect to live on this island of security here where plenty of land is available for the growing of food while at the same time thousands of people are starving in other parts of the world.

You know, we are a wasteful people. I think of ourselves in the west. I have seen a Prince Edward Island farmer come out there, take a look at the way we drive around our fields and sometimes drive the binder close to the fence; we do not even bother coming back upon it. He will say to us "You fellows waste more grain than we would grow on our whole farm".

It occurs to me that there are small acreages of wild land all across this country which European people or Oriental people would be delighted to use. For instance, the Greeks can be seen coming down from the mountains with their mules, with the pannier on each side filled with lemons and oranges grown on a half-acre patch somewhere up on the side of the mountain. Or you can go to the hills of Scotland, or to my native Ireland, and you will find people walking along there, plowing with one horse on a slope where they could not use two, walking in the space between the stones, plowing those little fields no bigger than this chamber, hedged around with piles of stone that through the centuries they have picked off the land. Farming under those conditions is subsistence farming, it is true; but at least it is a subsistence, and many of the peoples of the world have not that.

I suggest that one of our greatest problems is how we are to grow food for the increasing population of the world. That takes me back to Saskatchewan. I think the greatest problem in Saskatchewan is the tendency to depopulate that province through the mechanization of farm operations. I am not suggesting that we should go back to the two-horse team or to the walking plow. We must advance. We cannot turn the clock of progress back, but we have to change something, because the population in these western provinces—I mean the prairie provinces—is tending to decrease. I do not mean that it is decreasing over-all, but the farm population is decreasing because fewer and fewer men are needed to farm those acres. I remember when we used to thresh, and I am sure the minister has seen lots of outfits that I could describe with their old Reeves steam engine, which used to have a twenty-six man crew, a cook, a bull cook, strawboss, stook team men, spike pitchers and field pitchers, twenty-six or more men in all. Did I hear the minister interject?

Mr. Gardiner: I was just saying to the hon. member for Fort William that he and I used to fire the engine.

Mr. Knight: Yes, with straw, no doubt, I have not done that job, but I have done most of the others. The point I want to make is that it took anywhere from twenty-four to thirty-two men to do the work that an old man and a boy—and by the way most of the farmers in Saskatchewan are pretty old in their average years—can do today. As a matter of fact, they can do more work than the whole of us did years ago all put together. What does it mean in the life of a province; what does it mean in the life of the population? Here you have a great new province with thousands and thousands of miles of roads to be developed. How are they to be developed? Only through the payment of taxes, only by population. You have your schools to run, and all the rest of it. We have just about reached the limit of the depopulation of the country through mechanization, and if we are to restore that population, or restore any of it, we have to get a different type of farming. Well, somebody says that we have relied on farm mechanized straight grain farming. We have been told for years that we should go into mixed farming. Down in this eastern part of the country and in Prince Edward Island they say: Well, you crazy people in Saskatchewan do not even keep a milch cow. The minister and some of the others of us know why we do not keep a milch cow in certain districts. We have seen, as I saw in 1933, a man coming home in his buggy with one bale of hay in the back of the buggy to keep the one surviving cow alive, the others having been shot because there was nothing for them to eat.

I do not want to paint that as being a picture of ordinary conditions in the province of Saskatchewan, but those conditions have occurred and they may occur again. There is a good deal of land in the Palliser triangle where you may graze a few head of cattle on a quarter-section in the summertime, but you cannot be assured of winter forage for them there.

The experience of irrigation in Alberta near Lethbridge, I think it is, where the beet industry has started up and where beef steers are fed proves that if we had something like that in Saskatchewan it would at least provide winter forage for such cattle as we could graze in the summertime.

I do not think that this good market, this increase in the price of beef, is altogether a transitory thing. I think we may have it with us for some years to come. Irrigation would be a great encouragement to the cattle industry.

There are other problems of course. There is the question of flood control. We have abused the natural resources which we have. Our lands in places are becoming eroded. We have cut down the timber in the north which preserved the water level, and we have a situation of flooding in spring which has become all over this country a pretty serious matter. Just to the south of my own city we have what used to be a lake. It is no longer a lake in anything except name. It is called Pike lake. By the way, it used to be a summer resort, and it was only a few miles away. Now we have to go 175 miles or more to find good water. The farms in this area become flooded every year, and sometimes it is just touch and go whether the flood will subside in time so that the farmers will be able to put crops in. Again we have south of my city two or three little experiments in irrigation. Water is pumped out of the Saskatchewan river and ditched through the co-operation of one of the minister's divisions, the provincial government and the municipal authorities. These ditches can be damaged seriously by the effect of a flood.

I am told that one of the results of a properly controlled irrigation water development scheme in Saskatchewan would be to lessen the chance of those districts being flooded.

I have talked longer than I had intended to, because I had prepared absolutely nothing on the matter, but simply rose to endorse the arguments which have been advanced by other hon. members. I should like to take the position that this is not simply a plea for something which would assist in my own city, much as it would do that; nor is it just a plea for something which will help my own province, much as it would do that. I think it has reached the stage where this thing has become a national project, and I would plead with the minister, if that is necessary, to use that great influence he has upon his colleagues so that they may do something about it.

We may say that something is being done. It is true that surveys have been made there. Some reference has been made to elections. I have to be honest and say that before the last election there was a certain amount of activity. There were cars driving around there and surveyors were there. I am not saying that there was any connection between the two.

Mr. Gardiner: They are still there.

Mr. Knight: They were there, and I am glad they are there still. I presume they have largely done their work now. I do not know what the next step is. I do know that, so far as any actual work which would mean the production of water for those parched lands is concerned, nothing has been done. In other words, no sod has been turned in that particular irrigation project. I know about the preliminaries, and I know about the surveys. What we want is to get something done. I know that the provincial government, as the hon. member for Moose Jaw has said, and I agree with him—I think they were offered a rather hard deal in the matter—has at least risen to the occasion and has said that they would fulfil their share of the contract, the terms of which they and the federal government apparently have already agreed on. They have risen to the occasion and are prepared to go ahead.

I understand that in the estimates this year there is only the amount of $1 million. A million dollars will not go very far. I remember a speech made by the minister. I have referred to it before, and I have been corrected once or twice by the minister because I have quoted him as saying in my presence, because I listened to him that night in the technical school at Saskatoon, that it was a $110 million project, and apparently the money was going to be provided for the project by the dominion government. That was previous to the election of 1945. I must say in all honesty that the minister corrected me and said that at least some of those millions he had mentioned would be spent on the St. Mary scheme in Alberta; but whatever it is, I should like to see some of it spent on actual work which would produce not reports of engineers and technicians but some water upon the lands of Saskatchewan. There is of course now—I shall not use the word "excuse"—the reason that we are faced with defence expenditures which might preclude this sort of thing; but as I have said, progress must go on. We are not going to get out of these defence expenditures in the next three months, three years or ten years. In the meantime do hon. members not think that one of the best defences against anything which might happen is to make this country strong internally so that it might have food with which it might supply its own homes and the homes of its allies in other parts of the world?

I shall leave it at that, sir, with the plea that the minister and hon. members will all work to the end that that scheme so long planned, so long projected, so long a reason for hope on the part of the people of the western plains, will finally and soon be fulfilled.

Mr. Ferrie: Mr. Chairman, I should like on this occasion to say what has been in my mind for a long time. Some years ago at a municipal convention in Saskatoon I delivered a speech concerning the South Saskatchewan river project, and I should like to discuss the subject at greater length on this occasion.

In doing so may I direct the attention of hon. members to some facts. In Canada we have witnessed a concentration of what we have described as defence measures. People have been brought to the point where they think that defence is the only matter of importance. We have listened to speeches from hon. members on both sides of the house who have referred to economies that could be made, and it has been said that for the sake of defence every possible economy must be carried out.

My personal view is that in establishing this standard public thinking has gone a little too far. We realize that it is right and proper to defend our country, and that it is right and proper to have our people believe that they must sacrifice for the good of all. But it must be clearly understood that we cannot economize in agriculture, because to do so would be to economize on the very thing that will make our country strong.

There was an old saying that the army travels on its stomach, and I suggest that, whether it be in the east or in the west, the manufacturing industry is in the same position. The man who produces in eastern Canada travels on his stomach. Those of us in western Canada are not asking to have anything to do with war contracts. It is understood that we have out there a climate entirely satisfactory for flying. We enjoy many hours of daylight and of sunshine, which have enabled the Department of National Defence to establish airfields in western Canada. While I am not entirely satisfied with the location of those airfields, I am satisfied to have them in western Canada. That is our contribution, and that is what Canada is doing to reward us for our loss of war contracts.

The development on the South Saskatchewan river depends on the view taken of that project by people in eastern Canada. We need money from the east to develop what we have in the west. I could talk for some considerable time about what I believe should be done in the far north. We have fought hard for a development in that area involving the area from Flin Flon up to Sherridon and Lynn Lake. The development in that area is just beginning.

To return to the development of the South Saskatchewan, I would point out that industry in eastern Canada enjoys protection, and that it supplies the west with goods. Between 1920 and 1948 we produced in western Canada over 12 billion bushels of wheat. Just think of that! We have sold that wheat on the markets of the world, and thus have given to the industries in eastern Canada a good standard of living.

Let me add that people in eastern Canada will not be hurt in any way by the development of the South Saskatchewan river. That dam will supply energy and water, and eventually will supply the people of eastern Canada with more money. It will not cost them anything, because it will pay for itself. All we are asking you to do is to develop this project, and to keep in mind what it will mean for the people of western Canada to have a lake about a hundred miles long. It makes very little difference, perhaps, to the people of the east, because they do not suffer from lack of water power. We have plenty of water, but it runs away, and we have no control over it. Our rains come at this time of the year, but the water flows away in torrents, down the Saskatchewan river, out into lake Winnipeg, up through the Nelson and out into Hudson bay. That water is lost.

All we ask is a chance to save it, to control it and to see if we cannot develop something worth while in that dry area. If that is done I am satisfied that we will have the benefits of cheap power, as it is enjoyed in eastern Canada. Out west it must be developed at the present time from coal and steam, and it becomes very costly. In my town it is generated by a diesel engine. I wonder if hon. members have any idea what the cost is. I will tell them that for light and power I pay twenty-seven cents per kilowatt.

We cannot continue on that basis. If it were not for the extra hours the farmers work we could not afford electricity. However, that is not the subject before us at the moment. I am trying to tell the people of eastern Canada we are not asking them to give us anything: we are asking them to put up the money and to begin work on the project, so that in future we can show that it has been worth while.

And it is worth while. I hope there is no one in the eastern part of Canada who will suggest that it is not worth while and should not be started. We need this development, and we enthusiastically support the control of that body of water. It is vital and necessary to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words at this time. I have listened with considerable interest to what has been said by some of my colleagues and I rise really to support the very sensible observations made by the hon. member for Kindersley. I do not want to enlarge on this at this time, but the South Saskatchewan river development is a very vital project. As far as the riding of Meadow Lake is concerned, the results will be indirect as I am in somewhat the same position as the hon. member for Peace River. I think the hon. member for Peace River should be commended for looking on this as a national project. I think that is about all that requires to be said with regard to the South Saskatchewan development. It will benefit all of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Low: All of Canada.

Mr. Harrison: That is just what I was going to say. Anything that benefits the province of Saskatchewan is going to add to the economy of the whole nation. I was interested in what the hon. member for Lake Centre said with regard to reopening negotiations under the world wheat agreement. I come from a wheat growing area and I am just as much interested in increased returns for the wheat farmer as anyone else. However, I think a matter of this kind should be gone into with some caution because when you reopen an agreement for re-negotiation it can be revised two ways, upward or downward.

Canada is not in a very commanding position as far as the revising of the world wheat agreement is concerned. On the average we have 200 million to 250 million bushels of wheat to dispose of annually on the world market and as such we are not in position to set the price. Some years ago the United States used to sow about 56 million acres to wheat, but in recent years the average has been from 75 million to 79 million acres. Their farmers have found it profitable to continue that production and the result is that annually they have a surplus in the neighbourhood of 500 million bushels of wheat.

The United States is able to sell 80 per cent of its grain on the home market and can thus set a domestic price. That price is set higher than the world price with the result that the 500 million bushels or the 20 per cent surplus is pretty well paid for by their own economy and costs them virtually nothing. When you have something that costs you virtually nothing you are able to put it on the market at a very low price if you so desire. With a surplus of that kind they are able to say what the world price should be.

I think they have set the price pretty well at $1.80 and they are the people who will likely set the price if the agreement is re-negotiated. I do not think there is much chance of the price being revised downward, but it is a possibility. We are just a minor stockholder in this company, as it were, because we contribute only a small portion of the wheat. As I say, the United States has 500 million bushels of an exportable surplus, with a domestic economy that consumes 80 per cent of the total production. That creates a situation where they can set a domestic price and pay for the 100 per cent out of the 80 per cent sold domestically. They are then able to dispose of the 20 per cent surplus pretty much as they see fit and at any price they wish.

I do not have anything against what the hon. member for Lake Centre said. If it could be arranged, I think it would be a good thing. But I think we should hold in the back of our minds the realization that we might run into some trouble if we insisted on re-negotiation. If anything along this line is done I think it would be best to first have some private talks with the United States to see what their opinion would be and if they might cause us any trouble we would be better off not to ask for any re-negotiation of this world wheat agreement.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words with regard to the South Saskatchewan river dam and a few of the other problems facing agriculture today. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Meadow Lake and the hon. member for Mackenzie speak on this matter. Like myself, they represent constituencies which are not directly affected by the irrigation scheme on the South Saskatchewan river. We would benefit indirectly through the power development. My own constituency and that of Mackenzie would also benefit indirectly from the flood control that would result. In those two constituencies, as well as in Churchill constituency, there are large areas in the delta of the Saskatchewan and Carrot rivers which are flooded annually. If this flooding could be controlled, more land could be brought into cultivation for less money than we will have to spend on the South Saskatchewan river dam. The indirect benefits to agriculture in the central part of the province will be much greater probably than the benefits to the northeast section.

I had the opportunity last year to visit Idaho, Utah and Washington, returning home through Alberta. I was able to see many irrigation works in those areas and the changes brought about therefrom. The developments that have occurred in those areas as a result of irrigation are really astonishing. I am sure that every member from western Canada is one hundred per cent behind this development. I am sure also that the members from eastern Canada, realizing what it will mean to western Canada and indirectly to their own part of the country, will support this particular project.

We have talked about it for a long time. I know the Minister of Agriculture is behind it one hundred per cent. The difficulty seems to be to convince the treasury board and to get the necessary funds voted for the development. To many of us from western Canada it seems that it is easier to have money voted for projects in the east than it is to get the treasury board to pass similar votes that affect western Canada. That should be overcome. I am sure the eastern members will agree with us from western Canada that this development should be proceeded with at once, rather than two or five years from now. I understand from the report of the engineers that it will take at least seven years to complete this dam. It is to be a packed-earth dam which cannot be built in one or two years. It is a process that has to go on for from five to seven years before it can be completed. If we wait another two or three or four or five years before we start, that simply means it will be that much longer before we get any power. I believe $10 million is all that could be spent this year, and I do not think that would be missed from our budget. I believe this is something to which the government should give consideration, something the whole house should support, and I would like to hear from some of the eastern members with respect to it. I know they have heard a great deal about our problems in western Canada; I know they have a great many problems of their own here in the east, but I am convinced that this project should be commenced at this time.

I was surprised at some of the statements by the hon. member for Meadow Lake as to the difficulty in arranging any discussion of the world wheat agreement. I believe his reasoning was a bit wrong. Among other things the hon. member said he thought the United States was responsible for setting the ceiling of $1.80. I do not believe the United States was at all responsible for setting that ceiling. That was a negotiated ceiling, and naturally the consuming countries rather than the producing countries were anxious to keep it as low as possible. It was only after long negotiations that the final price for floors and ceilings was fixed under the agreement. The hon. member suggested that we were rather a small toad in the puddle. As a matter of fact that is not so; we deliver more wheat than any other country under that agreement. Anyone who has studied the agreement understands that 1,000 votes are given the consuming countries and 1,000 are given the producing countries. The number of votes given a country is based upon its deliveries under the agreement, or in the case of the consuming countries upon the amount bought by them. Of the 1,000 votes given the producing countries Canada has 445, so it will be seen that we represent the largest single block of votes among the producers.

I believe this matter should be given serious consideration at this time. As a matter of fact I believe the wheat board should be placed under the Department of Agriculture. It is now many years since wheat was placed under the Department of Trade and Commerce. At that time wheat was probably our most important exportable product; certainly it was a very important item in our export trade. It is still an important item, but it does not have the significance it had at that time. Today our exports of wood products, pulp and paper, minerals and so on have greatly increased, so wheat does not have the same importance in our external trade that it had when it was placed under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Today the wheat board handles not only wheat but coarse grains as well. In those coarse grains they handle the product which eventually determines the production of dairy and meat products in Canada, since that production cannot take place unless you first produce the coarse grains which enter into those commodities. It seems to me that if the Department of Agriculture is to have the control it should have over our agricultural industry so we can have a balanced agricultural program for Canada, the department should have control of the marketing of wheat and coarse grains.

Earlier this session I suggested that the wheat board should be enlarged. Two years ago we passed an amendment to the wheat board act which would permit the appointment of two additional members, making a board of five. When I mentioned the matter earlier this session the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated he was prepared to appoint additional members if he could find suitable men who would work harmoniously with those already on the board and who had the ability to do the job that would be expected of them. The minister asked if I could suggest any men who would be suitable for these positions. Well, it is not my place to make such suggestions, but since that time I have consulted several farm organizations who have told me they know of men who would be suitable for appointment, so I think the number of members of the board should be increased. In appointing new members I believe two points should be taken into consideration. In the three present members of the board we have men who thoroughly understand the selling of our grain. That has been their business; they have been at it for twenty-five or thirty years; they have come up through the various grain organizations, and they understand that part of the board's work. But in the handling and selling of coarse grains it seems to me we should have on the board someone who has a broader view of the whole agricultural industry of this country. I would suggest that in making these two additional appointments one man at least should be a livestock producer from western Canada or a man from one of our western universities who understands the wider aspects of agriculture rather than just the selling of our grains. In the other appointment I think we would be well advised to consider someone from the east who understands the livestock situation and knows something about the distribution of feed grains in this part of the country. Then we as producers and sellers of grain in western Canada would have on the board a representative of those who consume the greater portion of our products, who would be able to give advice on the best methods of keeping our eastern markets. It seems to me that in this way we would have a more effective board and would be better able to handle our coarse grains.

Earlier this session I made a suggestion in reference to the handling of coarse grains, which at present are sold on the Winnipeg grain exchange to the extent of about 75 per cent of the total. I have the figures in a return of February 9, giving the number of bushels sold in that way. I have placed them on record before, so I need not repeat them today, but they show that 75 per cent of our coarse grains are sold through the grain exchange at the present time, with the other 25 per cent being sold by the board direct to the consumer. I am convinced that if we are to maintain our market for coarse grains in eastern Canada we must find some more direct method than selling through the Winnipeg grain exchange. I believe we should move our coarse grains to the east while they are still under the control of the wheat board, using government facilities in eastern Canada for the storage of the grain and establishing direct sales agencies which would deal with the eastern consumers. It seems to me that is the only way we are going to be able to maintain and develop our market for coarse grains in eastern Canada, and for that reason I am convinced that we should have a representative from eastern Canada on the wheat board, together with another agricultural man who would understand the relationship between the price of coarse grains and the price of livestock. In that way we could maintain a better balance and could get back into the production of livestock in both west and east.

If you are to build up a livestock industry, there must be a reasonable relationship between the price of coarse grains and the price of livestock. It seems to me that we need more co-operation between the east and the west, between the livestock producer and the grain man in Canada today, if we are to get back to a reasonably balanced type of agriculture. I am convinced that it could be done through our wheat board if we enlarged the number on that board to include representatives from other sections of agriculture than the producers and sellers of grain. I hope the minister will give some consideration to this matter of placing the wheat board under the control of the Department of Agriculture rather than the Department of Trade and Commerce.

For a great many years we did not have agricultural legislation in this country which permitted the producers to set up the necessary marketing boards to market their products. Under the British North America Act agriculture is in a dual position. It is partly under the control of the province, and partly under the control of the dominion. As a result of this there was a great deal of what army people term "passing the buck" so far as agricultural legislation was concerned. In the last fifteen years we have gotten away from that a bit, so that today we have on the statute books four major acts dealing with agriculture. First, there is the wheat board act, passed in 1935 by the Bennett government and since amended many times. It is doing a reasonably good job in the marketing of wheat. As I said, there are still some improvements that could be made to it.

The second major piece of legislation which we have concerning the marketing of agricultural products is the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939, and the Wheat Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939. Then we have the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944, and the Agricultural Products Marketing Act of 1949. Those are the four major acts dealing with agriculture which we now have. You will notice one thing that is common to them all, and that is that they were all passed in a year before an election. When they were passed many fine promises were made as to what their effect upon agriculture would be. Some of them have had the desired effect, and some have not.

The Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act passed in 1939 was an act for the marketing of agricultural products through co-operative organizations. Under that act the dominion government will guarantee an initial payment up to eighty per cent of the average price for the three years previous on a product which is being marketed by a co-operative organization. There have been quite a number of co-operative organizations selling agricultural products under that act. Since the act was put into force there has only been one occasion that I know of when the dominion government became liable for a payment under that guarantee. I believe in 1947 a guarantee was made to the silver fox producers in Canada, and there was a deficit under that operation. It seems that not only the co-operatives handling fox pelts were guaranteed, but a lot of other organizations were apparently able to come under the act. Even the Hudson's Bay Company was able to qualify for a payment of several thousand dollars on fox pelts marketed by the company. I believe the original intention was that the act should deal only with co-operatives, but it was certainly extended on that occasion. The act is a good one. It permits orderly marketing by co-operative organizations by reason of the dominion government guaranteeing their bank loans for the initial payment up to eighty per cent of the average price over the past three years.

As a matter of fact, floor prices could be placed under agricultural products through the operation of this act. The act has never been used for that purpose. In no case of which I am aware—perhaps the Minister of Agriculture can correct me—has an initial payment been guaranteed up to eighty per cent of the average price for the last three years. As I say, there may be cases in which that has been done. I do not know whether the co-operatives have ever asked for a guarantee as high as that.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a matter of negotiation, and, as has been said, I do not believe there has been any case where the guarantee has been as high as eighty per cent. The act provides for eighty per cent, but it is usually around sixty per cent.

Mr. Wright: That was my understanding, that it was usually around sixty per cent.

The act could be used, however, if there was a disastrous drop in the price of any particular agricultural product which was being marketed by a co-operative, such as the alfalfa produced in northern Saskatchewan. I believe those producers are using this act since their incorporation.

The third act which was passed was the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944. When that act was passed it was to support agricultural prices during the transition from war to peace. As hon. members will recall, the act was renewed from year to year until last year it was made permanent legislation. Again this is a good act, but it has its limitations. When the minister introduced the act, he gave us to understand that it would be used to support agricultural prices at a level which would equal the cost of production in this country, plus a reasonable return for any sacrifices which the farmers had made during the first two or three years of war, during which time everyone recognized that agricultural prices were below the cost of production. Unfortunately that formula, if it was a formula, has not been used, and year after year agricultural organizations from eastern and western Canada have been asking the government to have some formula in the act which would indicate the floor to which the price for any agricultural product may fall. I believe the government should give consideration to placing some formula in the act.

Today we are operating alongside the United States, and this government has indicated that it believes our prices must be allowed to find their level somewhere near the level of prices in the United States. But we find that the farmers in the United States have floor prices under a great many of their products, in particular their major products. In the matter of wheat, for instance, the United States floor price is in the neighbourhood of $2 per bushel, and the price has been consistently above that. The Canadian floor price as announced by the minister, or the initial payment—I am not going to argue with the minister over terms—is today $1.40 for our coming crop. Now, that is a difference of 60 cents per bushel. Yet I believe our production costs in Canada are as high as the production costs in the United States, with the exception of the cost of land. So far as farm machinery and other production costs are concerned our costs are as high, and yet we find our floor price is 60 cents below the floor price in the United States.

It is the same with many other agricultural products. If we are to have legislation which is to be effective, which is to mean anything to our industry in this country, I think we should have a formula under our Agricultural Prices Support Act so that agriculture in this country would feel secure in going ahead and expanding production. To my mind that is the main reason why we are not getting the expanded production that we might expect in meat products at this time when prices are high. I believe that the main factor is the fact that the average farmer does not feel secure in starting in to build up a herd, at present prices. Unless he has some guarantee in the form of some formula in our price support legislation, which will justify him in going ahead and expanding his production, I am afraid we shall continue to produce at the level at which we are now producing, and probably at an even lower level than we have at the present time. Under present conditions large shipments of our breeding stock are going to the United States. That situation will continue, and we shall find our herds decreasing in this country unless there is some security, some guarantee to the producer that if he goes into production he can expect these prices to be reasonable over a period of years.

The other piece of legislation which we have on our statute books is the Agricultural Products Marketing Act which we passed in 1949. Here again we have a good piece of legislation if it has authority and if it will do the things which the Minister of Agriculture indicated to the house might be accomplished under it when the act was passed.

Hon. members will recall that back in 1934 we had an agricultural products marketing act passed by the Bennett government at that time but which was found to be ultra vires and was discarded. This time we have started from a different angle; and the minister indicated to the house that, having obtained the view of the law officers of the crown, he believed our present act would do for us the job that it is supposed to do. There is, however, still a great deal of doubt with regard to the legality of the act if it is extended to set up central selling agencies wherein two or more provinces will get together to market their products in interprovincial and export trade. I do not suppose that we shall know definitely whether that act is legal or not until an actual case has been tried. But we have never had from the government any assurance that I know of to the effect that if such action is taken to prove the act to be ultra vires, if and when it is operated by two or more provinces, the government will see that the act is amended or that the necessary amendments are made to our constitution in order to make the act do the job that it was intended to do; and until the government will come forward and give some definite assurance that it is their intention to stand behind this act and that, if it is not legal in its present form—if central selling agencies are set up by various provinces in order to market their products in interprovincial and export trade, and if a test case is taken and it is found that the act is not legal—that it will stand behind the organizations and see that the necessary amendments are made to the act or that the necessary amendments are made to our constitution to see that the act is operative.

These are a few of the things that are facing our agricultural producers today. Various members who have spoken have indicated that the agricultural income during the last year has fallen in Canada by something over $200 million. In the province of Saskatchewan alone—owing, as other hon. members have stated, partly to weather conditions and partly to the fact that our crop was not all marketed last year—the drop in income this year has been approximately $160 million. On the other side of the picture the increase in our cost of production has been approximately $50 million in that province; it is more than that across the dominion. Those are serious problems for the man who is doing the work and producing the food. I feel that some consideration should be given to them and that certain amendments to this legislation which I have indicated should be brought before this house either at this session of parliament or at the next one.

Mr. Hatfield: Mr. Chairman, I agree one hundred per cent with the hon. member who has just taken his seat. Some of the members from the west say that they cannot sell the South Saskatchewan river project to the eastern members and to treasury board. I have been in this house for eleven years and I have never heard a member from eastern Canada oppose any irrigation project for western Canada. I think that any worthwhile legislation will be supported by members from eastern Canada.

I should like to get out of the west for a few minutes and get down to a section that is farther east than the one which hon. members have been talking about, namely the maritime provinces.

Mr. Knowles: Potatoes.

Mr. Hatfield: I consider that we have not received fair treatment in the maritime provinces. I know that we have not received fair treatment in regard to the production of potatoes in the two provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We have a plan down there. We have had one for the last two months. It is working out and giving good results. But the farmers down there who are now planting the crop, or have practically finished doing so, do not know what is going to come out of that plan. They know that some arrangement was made by the New Brunswick and the Prince Edward Island marketing boards with the Department of Agriculture in the two provinces and the department at Ottawa whereby an arrangement was made under the co-operative marketing act of 1939. I understand that a producer's initial payment of $1.20 per barrel or 44 cents a bushel was set up. But I have never been able to find out whether or not that is correct. What I should like to know is this with regard to the potato growers of those two provinces who sold their potatoes last fall at the ridiculously low price of 60 cents a barrel, the farmers that were forced to sell. They were mainly veterans who returned from the war and took up farms under the Veterans Land Act and who could not hold their potatoes until spring, or until the last two months. I should like to know whether they are going to receive an initial payment of $1.20 a barrel. That is what I should like the minister to tell the house when he makes his statement.

I should like to see fair treatment clear across Canada for the primary producers of Canada. I will favour that as long as I am in the house. I should like to see fair treatment for all farmers. The United States have given great support prices for agriculture. I think they went too far in the United States. However, when in 1949 they paid out sums such as $822 million for cotton, $767 million for corn, $750 million for wheat, $241 million for flaxseed and linseed and $170 million for peanuts, I think they went too far in the United States. We received no such treatment in Canada. When the prices support act was introduced in 1944 we expected to get fair treatment. I do not think that act has been enforced as the minister explained to us it would be when he introduced it in parliament. I am sure we have not had fair support under it.

I understand that the minister hopes to have the crop of potatoes in the two maritime provinces which is now being planted under the co-operative marketing act. I understand that a plan is to be worked out with the marketing boards of the two provinces to deal with the crop now being planted. A few weeks ago the minister told me that he hoped to have this done. I understand that under the present act the initial payment has to be set in the spring of the year when the crop is planted. It is similar to the way wheat is dealt with. The initial price for wheat grown in western Canada was announced in this house a few weeks ago. I have heard nothing about potatoes since the starch program was set up some time ago. I believe that some potatoes were shipped apart from the starch program, I suppose under the co-operative marketing act. When the minister speaks I want him to tell the house just where we in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island stand in regard to the 1950 and 1951 crop of potatoes.

Mr. Sinnott: What about the rest of Canada?

Mr. Hatfield: You look after yourselves. All that I have heard in the eleven years that I have been here is about western Canada, and that is all I have heard since this item came up. If you cannot talk of wheat you talk of water. You must have more than water out there. What we want is fair treatment.

Mr. Sinnott: That is all we are looking for.

Mr. Hatfield: We are willing to support the west in getting fair treatment. Fair treatment should be given to every primary producer, because if you force the farmers off the farms—and they have been going off the farms by hundreds weekly down in the maritime provinces and coming to Ontario and Quebec—I do not know what you are going to do for food, because food does not come out of the kitchen. It is not manufactured in the kitchen. I takes a lot of work to produce food. If you are going to bring all the farmers off the farms and into the factories of the two central provinces, I do not know where you are going to get your food.

The plan which has been in effect in the last two months has been a wonderful help to the two maritime provinces. The price of $1.20 a barrel in New Brunswick and 44 cents a bushel in Prince Edward Island does not give them the cost of production. However, it is better than the price of 60 cents a barrel and 20 cents a bushel, and they are thankful for it. But I should like to see some help given to the farmers who were forced to sell their potatoes for practically nothing last fall. They should have the same price as the grower who is able to hold his potatoes until spring. These people were not able to hold their potatoes. They had not the storage; they had not the finances to hold their potatoes until spring. Therefore they had to sell them for very much less than the cost of production. I hope the minister will make a statement on this matter and tell us where we stand in these two provinces.

Mr. Fair: I want to thank the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton who has just taken his seat for the co-operation he has offered on behalf of the eastern members when we come here seeking a square deal for our own farmers all across Canada.

I feel that the farming industry has been neglected far too much in the past. The importance of this industry is not recognized by those in office. Until that is done we will not have a prosperous Canada, which it is possible to have if proper policies are pursued.

I am sorry to see at this time that the estimates of the Department of Agriculture have been slashed by something like 35 per cent. In my opinion that is not good business at this time. We have been told that we must devote all our energies to defence, but I think we should also point out that the people of this country, and the people in other countries with whom we are allied, must have food, and lots of it. And that has been proven—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, with the hon. member's permission may I say this? We will have to go to the other place in a few minutes and we must have Mr. Speaker in the chair. Would the hon. member mind if I moved that we report progress and ask leave to sit again this day?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

CONSUMER CREDIT

CONDITIONAL SALE CONTRACTS AND ENFORCEMENT PROVISION—AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1950-51—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 195, to amend the Consumer Credit (Temporary Provisions) Act.

Mr. Knowles: By leave. What is the amendment?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): The third section of the bill provided that where it was suspected that there had been an infraction of the regulations an official of the department could take the books in question and hold them up to ninety days. Members of the Senate felt that, although this is the same provision as is found in the Income Tax Act and the Foreign Exchange Control Act, the period was too long, so far as merchants were concerned, and they cut it back to thirty days. Our department feels that if we take photostats of the documents it will be possible to observe that thirty-day rule. Therefore we have accepted the amendment.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

DEFENCE CONFERENCE

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH MINISTERS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you, by leave of the house, to revert to motions so that I may make a brief announcement that is to appear in the London papers tomorrow morning.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government of the United Kingdom has today issued the following announcement, but with the restriction that it is not to appear in the newspapers until tomorrow morning. Those newspapers will be published within a few hours after the time I make the announcement here. The announcement is as follows:

It has been agreed to hold a conference of defence ministers from the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and Southern Rhodesia. The ministers have decided that London will be a convenient meeting place and the conference will open there on June 21. It will consider certain defence problems arising in regions of common concern to these countries including the Middle East and also consequential questions of equipment and training which are of mutual interest to them. Canada will be represented at the conference by an observer.

That is the end of the announcement to be made in London. The desirability of holding such a conference was discussed on the occasion of the meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in London last January. It was then the feeling of the governments of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia that it would be helpful to hold a conference of the defence ministers of those countries to consider problems arising in regions of special concern to them, including the Middle East.

Canada has, of course, special and direct defence responsibilities in the north Atlantic region. Our interests in the regional defence problems which will be under discussion at the forthcoming conference are less direct than those of the other commonwealth countries which will be represented there. The government has accordingly decided that it would be appropriate to be represented at the conference by a civilian and a military observer. Our position in this respect is fully appreciated by other commonwealth governments concerned.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $336,942.

Mr. Fair: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose before six o'clock I was pointing out the importance of agriculture to all Canadians, and was thanking the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton for his co-operation in seeing that agriculture got a square deal. I pointed out also that some members are giving practically all their support to the defence program, but without food the defence program would not be very far-reaching. For that reason I feel that agriculture is of great importance to this country. I was about to quote the figures in the estimates for agriculture for the fiscal year 1950-51 and for the present fiscal year. The agricultural estimates were $81,805,497 for the fiscal year 1950-51, whereas for the present fiscal year they amount to $53,131,838. There is a decrease of $28,673,659, or approximately thirty-five per cent. I am not feeling happy about this decrease in a department as important as agriculture.

During the afternoon we heard speakers from the various parties deal with the question of irrigation. Many good recommendations were made, to which I want to add my support. I do not feel it is necessary to reply to the different arguments, but even though the irrigation projects are not in my constituency I feel that they are of interest to Canada as a whole. Realizing that we cannot deal with our own particular district, I feel we should give all support to these programs because they are of benefit to the country as a whole. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River. On another occasion, I believe May 1, he gave some particulars as to the effect of this act on farmers in his part of the country. The minister could see some flaws in this legislation, and brought in amendments to remove certain injustices. While I was a member of the agricultural committee which dealt with those amendments, I did not foresee the difficulties which exist in the Peace River district now. I do not believe the Minister of Agriculture foresaw them either, because whenever flaws in the legislation were pointed out to him he did not waste time in having them remedied. The particular reason for bringing in the amendments at that time was to prevent settling on marginal land. I feel that there is a new problem in the Peace River country, but I have no doubt that the minister will give further consideration to it before this session is completed, and bring in the necessary amendments to rectify the injustices which exist in that section of the country. This act is man-made, and I do not see any reason why we cannot pass some amendments to make it more effective in the interests of agriculture in all parts of the country.

The question of the international wheat agreement has also been dealt with. We find quite a lot of dissatisfaction throughout the country, particularly in the western provinces, because the Ontario wheat growers did not come under the international wheat agreement. There have been quite a few complaints around my part of the country about that, but I am not going to discuss it because the Ontario farmers grow a different grade of wheat which is useful for different purposes. So far as the international wheat agreement affects us, I feel that there are injustices in that agreement that should be rectified. It is not my intention to go into it in detail, but I feel that, if the recommendation of the hon. member for Acadia had been implemented at the time this agreement was first discussed in the house, we would not have had the present injustices. I expect many people are not aware that class II wheat is now being sold by the wheat board for nearly 40 cents per bushel more than the wheat that is being delivered under the international wheat agreement. I feel that that loss, in addition to the many million dollars that have been lost under another agreement just concluded, is a little too much for the prairie wheat growers to take without complaint.

The suggestion made by the member for Acadia was to the effect that the price of wheat should be tied to the price of other commodities in the countries where our wheat was sold. When the prices of other commodities went up or down, then the price of wheat would follow. This provision would give everyone a square deal, and that is all we are requesting for our farmers both east and west. As the agreement stands now, provision is made for a decrease of ten cents per bushel per year without any consideration whatever being given to the rapidly rising cost of production. But as matters stand at the present time, it looks as though the costs are going to increase while the price of our product will decrease as time goes on. As I have stated already, we are losing close to 40 cents a bushel on every bushel sold under the international wheat agreement at the present time, as compared with the price of class II wheat. That is too much for the farmers to be asked to lose. No compensation whatever, of course, is provided for. In spite of the champions of the grain exchange inside and outside the house, I am still firmly convinced that the wheat board system of marketing our grain is the one and only system that will give the farmers anything like a square deal. We had experience with the grain exchange many years ago; and if it is a good system for the sale of our wheat and other grains, why do not manufacturers and other producers take advantage of that system? Perhaps you would have the price of cars, lumber and household goods away down in line with agricultural prices today. If that were the case, I do not think you would have much complaint coming from the farmers of this country.

We find that some people who should know better—including some of the great self styled champions of the west who came here on the strength of the farmers' vote—even at the present time are going out and preaching against the wheat board, against international agreements and in favour of the Winnipeg grain exchange which has been rightfully described as one of the legalized gambling dens of the country. I am just as firm in my opinion today as I have ever been that the gambling den should be put out of existence.

Earlier this session I suggested that the marketing of our grain should be taken out of the Department of Trade and Commerce and placed under the Department of Agriculture. I admit immediately that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is an extremely efficient man in his own line. But when you put him in a wheat field or a potato patch. I think he is entirely out of place. Perhaps the settlement of that agreement just about a year ago now is some of the best evidence we can get to back up the statement I have just made. The Minister of Agriculture has farmed, has worked among farmers and knows his department and the intricacies of production and marketing as well as, or perhaps better than, most other hon. members of the House of Commons. I think that the growers of grain and other products should have the advantage of the experience of the Minister of Agriculture.

We are devoting a great deal of our time and our money to producing more and better food. But if government policy and government administration is going to give that food away without proper compensation to the farmer, why should the farmer continue to boost his production and improve the grade of the things he is producing? Even at the present time, while many hon. members are still commenting on the alleged raid made on the treasury by the farmers of the prairie provinces, we must realize that the consumers all over Canada—including the members of the House of Commons—are eating bread that is subsidized by the wheat growers of the prairie provinces to the extent of almost 40 cents a bushel. While many of them are well fed on that subsidized bread, we still have them coming here and complaining about the alleged raid made on the federal treasury by the farmers. But even after that crumb that fell from the rich man's table was paid to the farmer, let it not be forgotten that over a four-year period, from 1945 to 1949, the wheat growers are still in the red to the extent of approximately $450 million on that deal, taking in the British wheat agreement and the subsidizing of the Canadian consumers. I therefore feel that a little bit more consideration should be given to our agricultural population.

In case there should be anyone who thinks we are being properly treated, I should like to ask this question and to receive an answer: Is there any other occupational group in this country which is treated in the same way. We do not have any cost plus system in figuring out the price of our farm produce; and when we come to examine the financial statement of many of our farmers, we do not have the large amounts that have been cited here in this chamber recently in connection with corporation profits.

We have been criticized here for rising and advocating a better deal for agriculture. In my opinion—and I believe the same opinion was expressed by the Minister of Agriculture some few years ago—we do not have nearly enough representatives of agriculture standing up for the rights of the farmer in the House of Commons. On this occasion when agriculture is being discussed, I should like to see members from the Atlantic to the Pacific stand up for the rights of the farmer; because when you have a prosperous agriculture, then you have guaranteed employment for labour, organized and unorganized, and for all other industries within the country. I feel that the time is long past when agriculture should have been brought up to the same level as other industries within the country. I believe the Prime Minister realizes the need for that step also because, speaking in southern Ontario only a couple of months ago, he raised that question; and it has been cited in the house here on one other occasion. I am not going to deal with it further tonight.

When it comes to fighting wars, where do you go to get your help for the factories? Where do you go to get your best fighting men in all services? You go to the farms of Canada. As proof that conditions on the farm are not what they should be, we find statistics showing that over 80,000 farm workers left the farm and moved to the city during the past calendar year. If that is not sufficient proof, then I think people ought to get around and see conditions as they are, not sit around here and listen to some of the old stories that have been told for years in connection with farmers and their business.

Since coming to the House of Commons I have been pleading, as my colleagues have been, for parity prices for agriculture. If we have that situation, I believe we shall have a much more prosperous, contented and united Canada than we have at the present time.

Mr. Argue: Before this item passes, Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to comment briefly on some remarks that have been made during this afternoon and evening with respect to the general condition of agriculture at this time. I believe that the farmers throughout Canada are looking to the government for action to enable them to lead a secure life, under conditions that will allow a reasonable standard of living. As has already been said a number of times today, the farmers are not asking for handouts. They are not asking for the highest prices the traffic will bear. What they ask for is some reasonable stability in their prices and in their costs of production.

So far as we in western Canada are concerned, in order to have a more stabilized agriculture one of our primary needs is to have a proper scheme of crop insurance. For that reason we in the C.C.F. have always supported the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and we have always fought for its extension and its improvement at every opportunity. I must say that since this act was first passed in 1939 certain improvements have been made; but last year an amendment was brought down in this house which meant that farmers who once had received prairie farm assistance, and who once were eligible for it, were deprived of its benefits. I hope the time is not far distant, although I might add there is no indication that it will be soon, when this government will take steps to increase the benefits payable under that act. The maximum benefits are $2.50 an acre on half of the cultivated acreage, and these benefits first applied under the original act over ten years ago. In spite of the fact that the costs of production have doubled or trebled since that time, there has been no upward revision of the benefits under the act. However, at times amendments have been brought in which have reduced the area in which the benefits might be paid until a far greater percentage of the farmers who do have a crop failure are eligible for the bonus.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River this afternoon. I agree with him that the amendments last year which have deprived certain farmers of the benefits of that act without any rhyme were a backward step and are working a hardship on a great many farms, particularly in Alberta. Although a great many of the farmers, because of that amendment, are not allowed to receive the benefits of the prairie farm assistance, nevertheless they are forced to pay into the fund one per cent, year in and year out.

When any person or any group of persons is obliged by law to pay premiums into a certain fund, they should not be deprived of benefits. I should like to point out to the hon. member for Peace River that last year in the agriculture committee I moved a motion asking that that backward step, which would deprive thousands of farmers of the bonus, be not taken. Even though I moved that motion I did not have the pleasure of the support, on the vote of the members in that committee, of the Social Credit party. I believe that the leader of the Social Credit group now believes that these amendments were unjust, and I am sure that the members of the agriculture committee from his group will agree with him, although, as I say, last year, when I attempted to take out of those amendments the retroactive feature, I was not fortunate enough to receive support from the members of the Social Credit group on the committee.

As I have said, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been of considerable benefit, but certain definite amendments should be made to that act, and should be made immediately. The maximum benefit of $500 now will buy only half or one-third the amount of goods that it would buy in 1939. The farmer who has two or three crop failures in a row, and is dependent upon the $200, $300, $400 or $500 he receives from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, is certainly not going to be able to continue in the business of farming and maintain his family in decency. The amendments moved last year were absolutely unfair and uncalled for. They provided that, with certain exemptions, lands disposed of by His Majesty after the 31st day of December, 1940, would be no longer eligible for the bonus. As I said in the committee at that time and in the house during the last session, I would have no objection at any time if the government would bring in amendments so that submarginal land properly defined would no longer be eligible for benefits provided that of course some other steps were taken to take care of the people who might be involved. But certainly arbitrary amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, such as we had last year, depriving people of benefits that they had enjoyed for over ten years, while forcing them to pay a premium into that fund year in and year out, are grossly unfair and should be corrected at an early date.

I agree with those who this afternoon pressed upon the government the need for doing something to revise the present ceiling prices in the international wheat agreement. I might say that I believe I was the first member who raised the question in the house, when on May 16 I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he would not consider getting in touch with the other nations signing the agreement to see if an upward revision of prices might not be negotiated. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce threw up his hands and suggested that he was not going to scuttle the agreement, inferring that I was suggesting that such a thing should be done. Mr. Chairman, there was no such suggestion from me or from anyone else that Canada should in any way abrogate the present international wheat agreement.

The only suggestion that we made was that in view of the terrific increase in the cost of production, our government, on behalf of the farmers, should suggest to the other signatories to that agreement that some upward revision in the ceiling price should be made.

It has been suggested in this house that Canada is a pretty unimportant member of the international wheat agreement, but I would point out that of the 1,000 votes held by exporting countries under that agreement Canada holds 445. We certainly are an important country in that agreement, second in the exporting field only to the United States. Our quota is some 221 million bushels; the United States quota is 248 million bushels.

As has already been said, the United States government is subsidizing every bushel of United States wheat that is sold under the international wheat agreement. The United Grain Growers estimate that the subsidy the United States is paying will cost approximately $100 million. I am sure their government would be happy to take any practicable steps which might result in an upward revision of the ceilings, and consequently a reduction of the subsidy that the United States government is now paying. I want to point out, too—I do not think this can be pointed out too strongly—that the United States government subsidy on wheat being sold under the international wheat agreement has resulted in a satisfactory price for wheat to the United States farmer. The American public is paying as much for its wheat as any other country in the world, including even those countries outside the international wheat agreement. But the situation in Canada is entirely different.

Not only will this government not guarantee the farmers of Canada a parity price, but they are disposing of Canadian farmers' wheat to Canadian consumers at 38 cents a bushel less than class II wheat.

I suggest the government should establish a parity price for wheat, and parity prices for other farm commodities. They should be prices bearing a fair relationship to farmers' production costs. The farmer is not asking for a handout; but when the government sets the floor price for the coming crop at a figure as low as $1.40 a bushel, and forces the Canadian farmer to subsidize the Canadian consumer to the extent of 38 cents a bushel, then in my opinion the government is not playing fair with the farmers of Canada.

True, we have certain floor-price measures, but they are almost depression floor prices—28 cents a pound on cheese, 58 cents on butter, $32.50 per hundredweight on hogs, 38 cents a dozen on eggs. In my opinion all those floors are far below the cost of production. When the producers of Canada see that floor prices are so low, naturally they reduce production. And when they reduce production, then of course there is a shortage of those commodities, with the result that prices to the consumers become high.

Our farmers are prepared to produce in abundance all these various agricultural commodities; but they ask that the government will guarantee to them reasonable floor prices based upon parity, which shall have some relation to their cost of production.

Before concluding I would refer briefly to the South Saskatchewan river dam. I noticed this afternoon that almost every member who spoke, and certainly every member who referred to the subject, agreed that the building of the dam would be a good thing not only for Saskatchewan but for Canada. I do not think I need to dwell upon the benefits which would result from the building of such a project. I believe those benefits are well known.

I feel however that some members are using an argument which is somewhat fallacious when they say that the construction of the dam and the provision of irrigation on some 750,000 acres of land would result in an increase in the farm population of Saskatchewan. I believe any economist in Canada who is conversant with the agricultural situation in all our provinces will see that one of the problems is that a substantial percentage of farmers are trying to make a living on uneconomic units. In other words, their farms are too small for proper efficiency. We know that situation has prevailed and continues to prevail in southwestern Saskatchewan. That is one of the reasons there has been a movement of farm population from that area to areas of higher production.

But the fact that so many farmers are today farming on uneconomic units is the very best reason I could advance for the government's going ahead with the South Saskatchewan river project. Irrigation out there does not mean just irrigation farming; it means the production of feed and fodder on irrigated land for the stabilization of a large area of agricultural land surrounding the irrigated parts.

Anything the government can do to provide the farmers in that part of Saskatchewan with twenty or thirty acres of irrigated land will certainly go a long way toward providing agricultural stability. I think what hon. members are interested in is what the government actually intends to do. If the government announced that it was going ahead with the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam I believe it would receive unanimous approval of the project from all sides of the house. I do not know of one group in the house that has opposed this suggestion. I believe that irrespective of which part of Canada we represent, we are all good Canadians and at all times we will consider favourably legislation that will benefit any particular province. Certainly the government of Saskatchewan is not standing in the way of that development.

On February 10 the premier of Saskatchewan in a letter to the Minister of Agriculture agreed that the Saskatchewan government would go ahead with its share of the cost of the project just as soon as the federal government would make a definite announcement. So all we are waiting for is an announcement by the Minister of Agriculture that the government of Canada is prepared to proceed. Because of the support of this project from all sides of the house, and because of the great advantages which would flow from the construction of that dam, I urge upon the minister when he speaks this evening to tell us when the government will be prepared to embark upon this much-needed project.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I notice that one of the members from Ontario has risen. But I think probably I should reply to some of the arguments which have been presented, most of which have had to do with the western part of Canada, and that part of our farm economy which has to do more particularly with the prairie provinces. If he will permit me to do that now, I would prefer to discuss the other matters when I have completed this discussion.

This afternoon one question which was raised, and which I think probably I should say something about—it is not quite in the classification to which I have just referred—was that having to do with the marketing of potatoes. The matter was discussed by an hon. member from New Brunswick. Reference also was made to marketing plans being carried out in Prince Edward Island, as well as in New Brunswick.

It was suggested that the plan now in effect was organized under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939, and that is the case. I should say however that, when I made the statement which was referred to before the dinner hour to the effect that this plan should be applied in much the same way as some of the co-operative marketing plans have been applied to other products, the change in the procedure which was followed with regard to potatoes was not intended in any way to interfere with the procedure which would require to be followed if we were going to market the potato crop of the whole season.

As I stated on a previous occasion, those who represent the potato growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island came here some little time ago and represented to us that there were 2,000 carloads of potatoes of top grade to be marketed. The hon. member, who gives us most information with regard to potatoes, stated on that occasion that he did not think I had set the figure sufficiently high. There has been some evidence since to indicate that probably he was right and that there were more potatoes than our officials had stated were to be marketed at that time in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Nevertheless the figures which I used on that occasion were presented to us by those who were asking for assistance, and that being the case I thought they would pretty well cover the quantity which would be marketed.

Two boards were set up, one in New Brunswick and one in Prince Edward Island, to deal with the potatoes in the two provinces. I suggested that they could best gain experience with which to set up similar organizations to market the coming year's crop if they made an attempt to market what was left of this year's crop under a plan of that kind. They accepted the advice and have carried out the plan of attempting to market the potatoes which were left.

We suggested to them that after discussion with the two plants which process potatoes into starch they said they would be prepared to pay 60 cents a barrel for potatoes to be utilized in the making of starch. I think it was agreed by all parties to the arrangement that 60 cents a barrel was not a sufficiently high price for grade A potatoes which could be used for table purposes, that table potatoes should bring a higher price than potatoes to be used in the making of starch. But in any case the highest price the starch producers thought they could pay for the potatoes was 60 cents, and they agreed to pay that. Therefore 60 cents was made the advance payment to the farmers on all potatoes delivered to the board.

It was understood that as large a percentage as possible of the potatoes would be sold for table use and it was hoped that they would bring at least $1.20. However, they would be sold for whatever price could be obtained on the market. After the results of the experiment had been obtained a full report would be made to the government as to what the returns had been for all the potatoes. We agreed that we would contribute something toward the pool that was set up that would make it possible for a further distribution to the producers. The maximum amount set was $300,000.

We have not yet had reports which make it possible for us to give consideration to what the payment ought to be and therefore I am not in a position to say what the final payment will be. We had a request by wire today from one province indicating that sales have been higher in quantity than were anticipated and they ask for a reconsideration of the amount which would be paid in, but the agreement up to the moment is that up to $300,000 would be available to take care of providing a higher return at the end of the marketing of what was left of this year's crop.

[Mr. Argue.]

That is applying the principle of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act of 1939 to the marketing of part of the season's crop.

Mr. McLure: Is $300,000 available to Prince Edward Island and a similar amount available to New Brunswick?

Mr. Gardiner: No; the total figure is $300,000 to the two boards which are operating together on the plan.

Mr. Hatfield: Is no payment to be made for sales made in the fall at very low prices?

Mr. Gardiner: There is nothing in the agreement that has anything to do with sales made before the agreement was signed. The agreement covers potatoes which had not been sold at the time it was signed.

Mr. Hatfield: As I understand it, the 1939 marketing act covers the whole season.

Mr. Gardiner: It can be made to cover a whole season, but in this case it was not.

Mr. Hatfield: It should.

Mr. Gardiner: If it is indicated by those who are operating the board and by those who produce potatoes that this is a suitable plan to apply to 1951, then an agreement will be made in advance and they will go on from there to market. But there was no agreement made with regard to 1950 potatoes until a few weeks ago when this one was entered into. This indicates something of the principle which is followed in one of the pieces of legislation referred to this afternoon as being helpful. I do not think that I need to say anything more at the moment with regard to potatoes. By the time we get down to the particular item I may have more information that I can give.

There is another piece of legislation which does not have to do with the two matters that have been discussed most of this afternoon, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This was referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and has been referred to on two or three occasions by the hon. member for Peace River and by other hon. members, particularly from Alberta. I disagree a little with those who suggest that the matter which has been referred to as affecting the Peace River country at the present moment was not considered at the time amendments were made to the act a year ago. It was discussed fully and the very question which has arisen was discussed at that time. While we were discussing it I think I said that we ought to try out the amendments which had been made for at least a year, and then have another look at them. There may be this weakness in that suggestion, that if there should be cases that ought to have been dealt with this year we may not have all the information necessary if it were thought wise later to pass legislation which might be retroactive.

I want to repeat what I said last session and made very clear when we were discussing the matter in committee. At that time I said we as a government did not think it should be the practice of municipalities, provincial governments or the federal government, if we had control of any land, to bring land into cultivation unless there was a very good chance that it would be able to operate without help under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. For that reason we stated there could be no question about land coming in that had been removed from government control prior to this act being placed upon the statute books. That land had been dealt with in certain ways; individuals had been encouraged to go upon it, and as far as that land was concerned it should remain under the act automatically. However, we did question the advisability of any government going into areas where it had been shown that in nine years out of ten the farmers had required assistance under this act, and putting still more people on land there. Under the P.F.R.A. we are spending money to get people out of those areas. We are setting up pastures and providing water supplies in those pastures. It is costing us some millions of dollars to get people off that kind of land, and we do not think that under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act they should be given help to get back on it. I believe the hon. member for Peace River agrees 100 per cent with that idea.

Mr. Low: Yes, I do.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not so sure that the hon. member for Assiniboia agrees with it to that extent.

Mr. Argue: I do not agree at all.

Mr. Gardiner: That means, of course, that the area he is thinking about is one from which people have been moved off the land.

Mr. Argue: No.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps not the particular land he has in mind, but in the area I am sure there must be a good deal of land which people have moved off, some of which we have fenced into pastures because we know it is not advisable for people to settle there. Well, we rather discourage the giving of prairie farm assistance on land brought under settlement in those areas. I know the Alberta government agrees with us because they said so at the time. This land referred to in northern Alberta, however, is in a different category. Admittedly it is land that has not had settlement, with perhaps very little settlement in the district. It is new land. The same is true in northern Saskatchewan. At the time there was some question in my mind, and I think in the minds of other members of the committee, as to whether that land should be denied the right to come under the legislation. With regard to that land, and a limited amount of land in other parts of the province, we suggested that we operate under the act for a year and then have another look at it.

I want to disagree with one suggestion made this afternoon. From the first it was never intended that this act should take care of hailed land, and there is good reason for that. Any man can insure his land against hail. If he does not do so that is a choice he makes himself. Most farmers in western Canada do insure their land against hail. However, we found it almost impossible in administering the act to enforce the provision that if a man is hailed out he is not paid. It was almost impossible to decide between those who were dried out and those who were hailed out, so in practically all cases we have permitted land to be considered for payment where hail has destroyed the crop on exactly the same basis as land where the crop was destroyed in some other way. But I repeat that in those areas where governments have permitted land to be brought under cultivation, and where it can be said, as was said this afternoon, that in eight years out of ten those areas would have good crops, it was never intended that this legislation should apply. Our experience has been that generally speaking when you get eight crops out of ten you are not so badly off, particularly if one of the two crops lost was destroyed as a result of hail. In that event the individual has scarcely done everything possible to look after himself if he has not insured his crop against hail.

Finally let me point out that we have not had a complete year of operation under this legislation as it was amended last year. I suggest that if we do give any consideration to the matter it should be after one year of operation, so if there are to be any amendments we should not have them this session but next.

Mr. Fair: Then make them retroactive.

Mr. Gardiner: I have suggested to our people that where claims are made they get all the information so we can decide at the end of the year whether or not those claims are justified; and I do not think we can go further than that this year.

I wanted to say something in regard to the reference this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre—I am sorry he is not here at the moment—to the reports that have been put out by the bureau of statistics with regard to farm income. These reports are given to the press in the form I hold in my hand. If you read the press reports carefully you will find that they say what is in this report I have, but I have not heard anyone who has discussed the matter in this house discuss what is in this report. This is a very full report on farm income for 1950 as compared with 1949, and here is what it says in regard to the question that has been quite fully discussed this afternoon and at other times:

> The decline in the 1950 farm cash income is largely attributable to a drop in the cash receipts from the sale of grains and substantially smaller grain equalization and adjustment payments. While nearly $50 million were paid to prairie farmers in the form of participation and equalization payments during the past year, approximately $220 million were disbursed in 1949.

Now, the $220 million is just the amount which it was stated in the press the farmers' income was down in 1950 as compared with 1949. It says it was down because these participation payments had been made in the previous years.

> A lowering of the initial price to producers and a poor quality crop combined to offset increased marketings during 1950 and to give a cash income from the sale of wheat of $380 million, almost 20 per cent below the returns realized in 1949. Commencing August 1, 1950, the initial price to producers on No. 1 northern wheat in store at the lakehead was lowered from $1.75 to $1.40 per bushel. Severe frosts in the prairie provinces during August caused considerable damage to the crop and sharply reduced the average grade.

What has happened to that since that time? There has been another payment on the wheat. It is true that it was not made before the first of January, but there has been another payment on the wheat of 20 cents per bushel. Then, in addition to that, there has been the payment on the oats, and the payment on the barley, that was delivered prior to January 1, 1951. Although I do not want to start another debate on it, there was another $65 million which was paid on some of the crops of the past. If you take all those figures, put them together and apply them on the payments made on the crops of 1950—which will eventually be done when those amounts are adjusted—you will find there is very little difference between the income for 1949 and 1950.

Mr. Wright: You will find a difference between 1949 and 1951 if you are going to keep that up.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend has been dreaming that for the last fifteen years, and he has always been wrong. He has always been one year ahead of the actual statistics in telling us that the farmers are going to suffer. As a matter of fact he now admits that the argument he has been pressing on this house on the last two or three occasions he has been on his feet, to the effect that the farmers' income is away down, turns out not to be correct. The farmers' income was almost exactly the same in 1950 as it was in 1949.

An hon. Member: His expenses have gone up.

Mr. Gardiner: His expenses have jumped some, yes, but his returns are just about the same. Now, I believe that should be said, because there are some arguments being used which are based upon the suggestion that his income is away down, and they are not fair to the people who are in other lines of activity in Canada, nor are they altogether fair to the farmer. I am going to tell you why. There is a great deal of lip service paid to the farmers of this country. Scarcely anyone ever gets on his feet outside this house—perhaps I should not say inside the house—without saying that agriculture is the basic industry in this country.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that not right?

Mr. Gardiner: Certainly it is right. If they would stop there, it would not be so bad, but they do not stop there. Agriculture is the basic industry in this country—I think I had better agree that it is not always outside this house, either. Then, after saying agriculture is the basic industry in this country, they completely pass over the fact that up until recently wheat brought more new wealth into this country than any other product—gold, oil or anything else. You can raise more interest in this house by discussing gold or oil—

An hon. Member: Or subsidies.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the subsidies to newspapers. You can raise more interest in this house discussing those items than you can by discussing wheat. When we discuss wheat members are inclined to say, "Oh, well, this is a day off for us." That is not very far from the truth, as most members in this house will agree. Let me repeat that more new money has come into this country from outside of it—if one were to take the last ten years one could say more than from any other source—in order to repay those of us who are producing surpluses to send out to get the wherewithal to buy the products of other countries. I believe we ought to emphasize that, and keep it before the people who are constantly referring to the wheat grower as though he were the poor relation of this country. The wheat grower is not the poor relation of this country.

I should refer to something else that was said this afternoon. I was going to correct it at the time, but I did not. Someone was arguing that the marketing of wheat ought to be administered by the Department of Agriculture. I might agree with that, but it is not. As a matter of fact, it has not been. The thing that I object to in what was said this afternoon is that it was put in the Department of Trade and Commerce because of its great importance at the time it was put there. As a matter of fact, wheat did not have very much importance in this country in 1896, and it did not have very much more in 1897. Wheat was put into the Department of Trade and Commerce at the time the Canada Grain Act was first passed or the Manitoba Grain Act, away back around 1900, in order to put sufficient activity into the department to warrant placing a man there as minister of customs and trade. This man had been looked upon as a financial critic in this country over a period of years in opposition and they wanted to take a younger man into the government as minister of finance. They gave the older man the smaller department, and wheat was put into it at the time when there was very little wheat to market.

An hon. Member: Now they should give the small man the wheat.

Mr. Gardiner: That might help; and it has remained in the Department of Trade and Commerce ever since. On the last occasion when the matter was discussed here I recall the then acting leader of the opposition stating when I had made the remark that two heads were better than one, and that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I agree very well—when we both offered opinions on a matter, it went along very well—the then leader of the opposition suggested that would be all right if either one of them were a real head. My remark at the time was that there was only one political party in Canada at that time that did not have a real head. I am not going to say that tonight because we have a leader in the house leading that party. I am going to say that we should realize the importance of wheat in creating a sound economic position in the Dominion of Canada.

Now, that brings me to the discussion of a question that was raised this afternoon, and that is the international wheat agreement. Over the years, in spite of what we have been thinking and saying in recent years, wheat has been dealt with under different governments and in different ways. I have in my hand the London wheat agreement of 1933. It is sometimes suggested that wheat agreements are a product of socialism in Britain; at other times it is suggested that wheat agreements are a product of the minds of this government; and at still other times it is suggested that they are the product of the thinking of farm organizations.

The first international wheat agreement that we ever had was set up in 1933. When I look back to see who were the gentlemen who were there from Canada to set it up, I find that one was the then prime minister of Canada, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He was the chairman of the committee that met in London in order to set it up. I find that another was the Hon. M. A. MacPherson, provincial treasurer of the province of Saskatchewan; and the third was Mr. Norman A. Robertson of the Department of External Affairs, who is still with us.

Those three men went to London to attend a meeting which made an agreement which came to be known as the London agreement, under which the wheat of the world was to be marketed through an international board. That agreement was signed by the government of the day and agreed to. The only reason it did not function was that the government of the Argentine broke the agreement later and it did not go into effect. But we set up in Canada four different organizations to operate under this agreement. One was set up here at Ottawa and one was set up in each of the three prairie provinces. Legislation was brought into the house in each of the three prairie provinces to set up the machinery to provide for the operation of those boards. I am not going into the detail in connection with it. I am only giving the history because of something that I read today in the Searle letter which is being quoted largely in the discussions in connection with this question. In that letter they say this, quoting from Patrick Henry:

> I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided; and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging the future but by the past.

Then they go on to suggest that we should not judge the future by the past, and that we should not even judge the present by the past. Everyone in this committee knows that under the operations of the grain exchange, which is sometimes called the free marketing of grain, we never received, over a five-year period, a dollar a bushel for our wheat; never at any time under that system did we receive a dollar a bushel for our wheat over a five-year period. The only times that we have ever gone over $1.50 a bushel for our wheat were under boards set up by governments which operated for the purpose of getting every cent they could for the farmers.

It is obvious that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, the leader of the government back in 1933, was convinced that that was the proper way to have the wheat marketed. It is true that we did not always agree with his methods of applying boards; but I recall that on the first occasion that I ever discussed board marketing of wheat, I discussed it on a platform in Calgary when the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was the other speaker; we were both supporting the pooling of wheat. That was before he became prime minister of Canada and before I was a member of the government of Canada or had anything to do with it. We were there as western public men, speaking on the platform in Calgary; he was a supporter of the board method of marketing wheat and so was I. I say that tonight in order to point up my suggestion that we should be extremely careful in the criticisms that we make.

Nearly everyone who has risen on the other side of the house has stated that we ought to do something about the international wheat agreement. I have the international wheat agreement here in my hand; and in spite of what has been said, I cannot find anything in it which gives any government the right to change the price of wheat or even to suggest that the price of wheat ought to be changed, under this agreement, inside the four years. The section which was read this afternoon, and which has been read on other occasions, is on page 24, and numbered 5. It is under article VI. Article VI sets out, in subsection 1, the maximum and the floor prices of wheat. Then it goes on, under subsections 2, 3 and 4, to deal with the methods by which you are going to adjust the payments in different countries and under different facts that may arise in connection with the value of currency, in order to meet the situation. Subsection 5 states as follows:

> If any exporting or importing country represents to the executive committee that any price equivalent established under paragraph 2, 3 or 4—

It does not say "under paragraph 1".

> —of this article is, in the light of current transportation or exchange rates or market premiums or discounts, no longer fair, the executive committee shall consider the matter and may, in consultation with the advisory committee on price equivalents, make such adjustment as it considers advisable.

I again submit that that does not say it was anticipated at the time this agreement was made that somebody was going to come along in two years' time and suggest that it ought to be changed. I can scarcely understand how persons who advocate the bulk system of marketing as against the open-market system, can suggest that you make an agreement to last for two years, three years or four years and then that you come along in the middle of the agreement and say: Now we are going to change that. In other words, you have not a long-term agreement at all.

If I understand the views of the farm movement, and more particularly that part of the farm movement that is associated with the marketing of grain, the situation is that they believe first in the wheat board method of marketing grain and they would apply it one hundred per cent to the marketing of all grains. They would apply it not only to wheat but to all other grains. That is their belief, whether we agree with them or not. Then when they pass that mark, they say: We are in favour of having an international agreement—and they have always fought for it—that covers a period of time. The period of time that they have insisted upon over the years was about five years. When this agreement was made it was for four years and not for five. I venture to say that no matter what anyone thinks about it now, there was not anyone who really sat in on the drawing up of that agreement—and the leaders of the farm movement sat in on it; that is, all the leaders of the farm movement that are associated with the marketing of grain sat in on it—who expected that there was going to be a change within the four years.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister a question at this point?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Fair: Did the leaders of the farm movement marketing grain have anything to say in connection with the price obtained under that agreement?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, they were there as advisers. Now that you have asked me the question, I think they had just about as much to say as anybody had to say, excepting a very few. The people who always have the most to say about a thing of that kind are the people who have something to sell and the people who are paying for it. We do not have to look very far to find out who had the money on this occasion and who had the grain. It has been discussed tonight. It has been pointed out that under some changes that have been made in the agreement, which do not concern prices, the United States now delivers more wheat under this agreement than Canada, although when the agreement was drawn we were to deliver considerably more than the United States. But circumstances have developed since which have changed that.

Something was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia to which I think I should refer. The suggestion was made that we ought to have a parity price for wheat. Well, now, how did they arrive at $1.80 when the question was being discussed at the time the agreement was formed? The first suggestion was that the ceiling should be $1.50, and the floor should be $1, and that those prices should prevail over the five years. In the meantime parity in the United States rose to $2 for wheat. The United States government guarantees 90 per cent of parity and 90 per cent of $2 is 1.80. The government of the United States guarantees the farmer $1.80.

Mr. Argue: It was $1.99 last year.

Mr. Gardiner: It was $1.80 at the time they were discussing the question. The United States government agreed to a figure of $1.80. That is five cents higher than what the British considered agreeing to up to the last few days of the discussions. They suggested that it ought to be $1.75 when they took under advisement the highest figure that they thought should be paid. But eventually there was a compromise between the two and they all agreed to $1.80, which was 90 per cent of the United States parity price. That is the way it was done. So far as we were concerned we said that since the United States which has the cash and a great deal of the wheat, and the British who are the buyers of most of the wheat, the largest block of it, at least, are in agreement, there is no reason why we should not sign too. We have gone along with the arrangement. Australia said the same thing. Every other signer of the contract said the same thing.

We are all in this together. If the suggestion made a few moments ago to the effect that the United States is ready to reconsider prices is correct, well, the United States will reconsider it, and I have no doubt that again most of us will go along. But to say to this government that it is in a position even to suggest, let alone demand, what ought to be done in connection with the matter is to take the wrong attitude with regard to it; and I do not think that the leaders of the farm movement who are interested in the marketing of wheat are taking that attitude. I wanted to say that because we ought to keep this thing moving along both east and west on the basis of the facts as they are, and not get into the position of shouting for something which may suit people other than those who are in agreement with the plan which is being followed.

Again coming back to the Searle report, I find that they say we have lost 37½ cents a bushel. We have been told in this house that we have lost 37 cents. All I want to say with regard to that is I am still satisfied to go along with the people who a few years ago put forth the arguments and the facts which convinced both the larger political parties in this country that this type of marketing was a good thing for the farmers. If you go back far enough you will find that we were all opposed to it, but the farm movement eventually convinced us that they were right. I have had no reason for changing my opinion. I still think they were right, and so I believe that we ought to go along under this agreement, meeting the conditions which are written into the agreement to the end of the four years, and then if we think the agreement was not good enough, let us try another one which will be better. In the meantime I think the only way that we are going to justify this kind of trading is to carry out what is written into the agreement.

I wanted to say that because I did not want anyone to misunderstand the position I will be taking with the Minister of Trade and Commerce or anyone else. In fact I intend, when this matter is being discussed outside the house or in it, to put forth the arguments which have been put forth by the farm organizations from time to time. I believe they were right in the beginning. I believe they are still right, and I base my decisions upon this little piece that I read to the committee a few moments ago. Experience teaches me that we are right; and I think it is better to take a little less for the product when production is at the peak and get a little more for it when production is not at the peak, even though sometimes, if you take a short enough period to do your calculating, you may be a little down in returns as compared with others.

Mr. Wright: May I ask a question? The minister says that he agrees with the farm movement in regard to the international wheat agreement. Does he agree with them also on their stand that the domestic market should pay the class II price for wheat?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, that is another matter about which it is a little difficult to be too confident. After all, if one goes back to his own sound principles, no matter to which party he belongs, in connection with matters of that kind, I think he usually concludes that countries that do keep their costs of production at about the same level as other countries with which they are dealing are more likely to come out of the general run of transactions in a sound position economically. I do not know whether it would be a good thing to raise the cost of living to all consumers in Canada any higher than the cost of living is in the countries to which we deliver wheat. It may not be a good thing for us in the long run. I would not give a snap judgment on this question yes or no.

Mr. Wright: The cost of bread is higher in this country than in most countries, because it is subsidized in most countries.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not time to go into that in detail tonight; it is really not on my agenda, in any case, and I am discussing it only because others have discussed it tonight, and I am discussing it because I come from the section of the country that is concerned with it, apart altogether from what department I am in.

I now come to the South Saskatchewan project. Discussions tonight have been very much in line with the discussions that have taken place on previous occasions with regard to this project. I agree with the statement that was made by the hon. member for Assiniboia a few moments ago that if you were to put the question to this house tonight, or I think on any other night, we perhaps could get a unanimous vote in favour of it; at least no one would get up and say that he was opposed to it. Again, if I may be pardoned, I might just suggest to the house that there was one previous occasion when that happened, but when it was all over there were many who did not agree. After all, a government is never excused for being wrong, no matter who supported it at the beginning. And it is the government's responsibility to be right. Some people say we were not right on another occasion, and that it cost the people something. I do not agree with them. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre looks a little mysterious, as though he does not understand. Well, I will make him understand: Everyone in this house agreed that it was a good thing to have a wheat agreement with Great Britain—when it was put through. But not everybody agreed when it was all over.

And the same thing can happen in connection with projects of this kind, and because there is not anyone here more responsible for anybody wanting the South Saskatchewan dam than I am, I want to be sure that I am right this time—even if some people thought I was wrong last time, when I did not think I was, and do not yet.

There is nothing particularly new about this project. It is quite old. I made a little review of the history of it in order to carry out what is said in the Searle suggestion that experience is a good thing. I find it has been discussed since away back about 1856.

Mr. Diefenbaker: 1854.

Mr. Gardiner: It was first discussed by men sent out from the old department of the interior, even before we had a dominion of Canada—or from what was the forerunner of the department of the interior. They were sent out to look over that section of the country.

But, coming down to a much later date than that, a geological survey of a possible dam site was made by John A. Allan, consulting geologist, and a report prepared on July 9, 1943. In this report Professor Allan says:

> I was previously acquainted with this part of the South Saskatchewan valley when in 1918 I examined the geology along the valley between Empress and Saskatoon.

And that is the very area we are talking about. Empress is on the Saskatchewan-Alberta boundary, and Saskatoon is a few miles below the point we are proposing for this dam.

To come down to more modern times, as early as 1918, Professor Allan was asked to make a report. At that time natural resources were all in the federal government. And so it is evident that the federal government did have some ideas, even back there, that this might be a possibility.

Now, following that up, under P.F.R.A., we had Professor Allan appointed again, and then later on in 1947 we had another report on it which has been tabled in the house. Those reports are all favourable. I must say to the committee that all my reports to the government have been favourable, and they will continue to be favourable. I have reported to the government on each occasion we have obtained a report to the effect that in my opinion it would be a good thing to build this dam.

An hon. Member: This year?

Mr. Gardiner: Three or four years ago—five years ago, for that matter—every time there has been a report. I think it would be a good thing to build this dam.

Now, I am not an engineer; but I think everybody understands that I think that putting a body of water anywhere in the prairie provinces is a good thing. The hon. member for Saskatoon made a remark this afternoon which I found difficulty in understanding. He said he did not know why we put the dam in Saskatoon, and he has suggested that it might have been as well without it.

Well, I will tell him this, that I think now that dam has been there about twelve or thirteen years—

Mr. Knight: If I might interrupt; the minister has misinterpreted my statement. I certainly did not mean it that way. I do not know what he understood.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the way it sounded. But if this does nothing more than give the hon. member an opportunity to correct it, I think he will be pleased after he has read Hansard. I say that because I do not know of anything that is a greater asset to the city of Saskatoon than the fact that they have that dam.

On the other hand there is another point involved in it. There is only one thing I find it difficult to settle in my own mind with regard to the South Saskatchewan dam; and I would not have been able to satisfy my own mind had it not been for the fact that we had the dam in Saskatoon. The last criticism I have heard about the South Saskatchewan dam was that the dam would fill up with silt. Well, I have said Yes, that it may fill up with silt, some time—but it will be a long time after we have gone.

What I wish to say about the Saskatoon dam is that it is only twelve feet high. I think at least as much water has been flowing over the Saskatoon dam every year as will ever go over the South Saskatchewan dam yearly. The same amount of sediment would be there as would be behind the bigger dam, and that silt has not filled up the area above the dam at Saskatoon. It still looks like a very nice lake, and if it does that with a 12-foot head of water over twelve or thirteen years, since the other dam will be 210 feet high I think it will take a lot of silt to fill up the 210-foot one if all the silt that comes down has not filled up the 12-foot one.

Mr. Low: About 150 years.

Mr. Gardiner: Most of us will agree that it has done a good job if it stays there that long.

What about the lake itself? I am satisfied I cannot come before you at this time, or before any other body, and prove the case, if you check this dam on this project only from the point of view as to whether it will pay directly interest on the money that is invested in it. I do not think I could do it to the satisfaction of the members of the House of Commons.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have not the engineers given a favourable report?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, they have given a favourable report. But a favourable report does not make that too sure. I think the best answer I can give to the question which that raises is a statement which is made in the report we had when we built the St. Mary dam. This has to do with the Lethbridge-Northern irrigation plan which is just north of Lethbridge, and the one which most nearly agrees in all of the facts in relation to it with the areas that will be affected by the building of the other dam.

The experience with the area in connection with the Lethbridge-Northern is something like this: they sold debentures under a 1915 Alberta act, and those debentures were guaranteed by the government of Alberta. They found that the cost was about $57 an acre for putting in their irrigation system. They tried to operate on that basis and collect from the farmer. The provincial government has paid the cost to the farmer concerned down from $57 an acre to $17 an acre. In other words, they have provided $40 an acre out of the treasury of Alberta, as I understand it. The hon. member for Peace River will know about this, because he was connected with it at the time.

Mr. Low: That is right.

Mr. Gardiner: They found it necessary to do that. I venture to say that men can get up in the house and prove that at least $25 million out of the $103 million would never be paid back to the government of Canada under any part of the scheme; and they might be able to prove that even $40 million might not be paid back. I am going to read what an independent investigator said about the northern Lethbridge project, and then I want you to ask me the question: Do you think it was worth while? Here is what was said:

> In 1924, when the Lethbridge northern district was first irrigated there were only about 300 families in the area. Now about 900 families occupy farms on the project. Belts of fine trees shelter small fruits, flowers, and vegetables which grow in abundance. It is estimated that the project directly supports 10,000 people. A railway parallels a gravelled highway to Lethbridge and power lines bring the conveniences of the city to the farms. At Picture Butte, near the centre of the district, there is an up to date sugar factory, beautiful homes, trees and green boulevards. A few miles west of Picture Butte is Park lake now a provincial park, with ornamental and shade trees, a beach, dressing rooms, playground equipment, stoves, picnic tables, and benches. A few years ago all this was treeless, waterless, drought scorched prairie.

I do not think you could get a better description of a conversion of an uninhabitable area into one that is inhabited by people with a very considerable degree of comfort. I continue:

> The social and community advantages resulting from irrigation deserve special emphasis though these benefits can only be partly indicated statistically. These advantages were observed by the committee on all projects visited and a good example is found in the Lethbridge northern irrigation district. Here an area of some 360 square miles, equivalent to ten townships, has been transformed in less than two decades from sparsely settled prairie subject to periodical crop failures and soil drifting to a thriving community of farm homes, towns and villages. During this period the number of farm holdings increased from 300 to over 900 and the population, rural and urban, increased from 1,500 to 10,000. As a result educational facilities have been greatly improved by the establishment of modern consolidated schools; electrical power has become available; a gravelled highway has been constructed through the project; a branch railway line constructed since the district was erected provides shipping facilities; and a park established in connection with a storage reservoir on the project provides recreational facilities for the surrounding area.

Again I repeat that the putting of a lake 135 miles long and 185 feet deep at the dam in the middle of the best farming section of the prairie provinces will do something which nature has done in other places. We all know that all nature has to do to create a lake is to leave a bar of rock across a stream. But nature did not do that here. However, all the facilities are there to do it. What we are asking the two governments to do is to provide the ways and means of putting that bar up which will in turn create a lake. With the lake there I am sure that in two decades you can do to that whole area what was done in two decades to the northern Lethbridge area.

Some hon. members are going up to Chalk River tomorrow. Some hon. members were with me when we went to Churchill. Other hon. members have been to other places. But if hon. members want to have their eyes opened as they have never been opened before, if they have never been out there, I suggest that they take a plane to Medicine Hat.

Mr. Wylie: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: But do not stop in Medicine Hat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gardiner: Take a car out of Medicine Hat. If you let us know, I feel sure we can arrange to have the P.F.R.A. provide busses to drive you from Medicine Hat to Lethbridge any time around July 1 or the end of June. If you do that and you are not one hundred per cent an advocate of this plan after you come back, then I miss my guess.

While I have driven the road many times before, I drove it for the first time last year at that particular time of year. I decided to go to the stampede and I was accompanied by three people. During the drive south from Medicine Hat they kept wondering for mile after mile why people stayed there.

Knowing what was ahead of the people who were staying there I did not say anything. About the middle of the afternoon we crossed a road allowance and then everyone in the car thought they were in another country. They felt sure it was not the same country they had been driving through. They were reminded of trips they had made to California and other places. The growth was what you would expect in semi-tropical areas. The difference between the two places was such that you could not understand why people were living under one set of conditions in one place and under another set of conditions right alongside.

I said to them that the reason those people had been staying there for twenty years was that they had been led to believe that somebody was going to put water on their land and make it look like the country we had entered. We have just completed the St. Mary river dam which will put water on that land. What we suggest now is that we should make the central part of Saskatchewan the same.

What does the government permit me to say to you tonight? They permit me to say this: They know I am convinced, they know the people out west are convinced, they think likely when we are all through that they are going to be convinced also, but they want to be sure that they are right when they make the decision to go full blast ahead. They asked me to do one thing more for them. I said, "What is the one thing more?" "There are one, two or three experts that we would like to have look at this thing. We are not going to ask you to get any more engineering reports because we think you have all the information; will you submit that information to one, two or three experts that we will agree upon and let them tell us whether they are as much convinced as you are?" I have agreed to do that. I think it is a reasonable suggestion and I hope we will be able to get it done before we meet again, even if we meet this fall.

Mr. Coldwell: May I make a suggestion to the minister? Why not take the members of the government out with him and drive from Medicine Hat to Taber and demonstrate to them what has been demonstrated to many of us?

Mr. Knowles: Take the treasury board along, too.

Mr. Gardiner: I would like to do that. In concluding my remarks, I want to say that I do not think I can convince this house or the experts that you can sit down with a pencil and paper and prove that something is going to provide the interest and pay back all the money put out on it. But I think I can convince them that twice as many people can live in Saskatchewan if that dam is put in. That means our population will be going up instead of down as it is at present. When I repeat what I said a few moments ago, namely what wheat has meant to the rest of Canada; when I am able to say, as I am convinced, that there will be twice as many people in a certain area to do business with people in other parts of Canada; then I am sure all the rest of Canada will be interested in the building of this dam. My old friend the late John MacNicol used to stand before us in this house and make those of us who came from the west ashamed that we did not have the information he had. He would go out there and walk these streams and study them, and he had every fact at his fingertips. He would tell us what a great thing it would be for the city of Toronto if only we would do this job.

An hon. Member: And he was defeated.

Mr. Gardiner: As my hon. friend says, he was defeated; but it was not for that reason, and he had been here a long time. I only mention that tonight because I do not think this is a party matter, or something we ought to be bickering about. I believe it is something we should be trying to get done; and to get it done I think it will be only necessary to put before the members of this house the statement I will place before the government, coming from experts they choose. Then I am sure hon. members will say this will be a good thing for this country.

Mr. Thatcher: Does the fact that these experts are going to be called in necessarily mean that the project cannot be proceeded with this year?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we have a million dollars in the estimates. We can continue to spend that, but I do not think we could have gone ahead with the letting of the contract this fall in any case. Hon. members coming from western Canada know that in the letting of a contract on which work can proceed for only six months out in our country, unless you have everything ready at the beginning of the season there is not much use trying to get on with it in that year. We have enough money to put us in the position that if the decision is favourable we can be all ready to go ahead another year. Then if funds are available, if we are not in international difficulties which would slow it up, we can go along just as quickly as if we were to start now.

Mr. Coldwell: Have the minister and the government agreed on the experts?

Mr. Gardiner: No, but we have agreed to agree at a later time. I do not think there will be any difficulty about that.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister said he hoped that before we met again something might be agreed upon.

Mr. Gardiner: A name was mentioned today. I do not know the man personally, and I could not very well mention his name here; but I am quite satisfied that the opinion of the gentleman who was named would be generally acceptable in this country.

Mr. Thatcher: If the opinion of the experts is favourable this year, could the minister give the committee any assurance that next year construction will definitely commence?

Mr. Gardiner: I would not want to do that. So many things are developing these days that one cannot be sure of anything. All I can say is that the government is favourably inclined, as we are all favourably inclined. We just want to be sure on this last point. I think that is reasonable, and I have agreed to it.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure this will be a bitter disappointment to the minister as it will be to the people of Saskatchewan.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I hope the few words I have to say to the minister may be as convincing as what the minister has said to us this evening. First I should like to comment briefly on this irrigation project in the west. I believe all Canadians are anxious to see the natural resources of this country developed to the fullest possible extent, but I am reminded of the tourist who went to Egypt. He was shown the pyramids and was told it took 150 years to build them. His comment was, "Oh, I guess it was a government project". I hope we do not have to wait that long to have this project constructed. There are also those who are a little sceptical, who think the greatest activity seems to occur at about the time of a federal election. After listening to the minister this evening it would seem that about 1952 or 1953 might be the most opportune time to commence this work.

I did not intend to deal with these broad subjects this evening; I wanted to get down to the details of some of the problems affecting the farmers. Since everyone seems to have had something to say about the wheat agreement, however, I might as well mention it also. This is the type of marketing for which the western members have been fighting as long as I can remember, but now they have it they do not want it.

I want to say a word or two about taxation. Taxation affects everyone, but some more than others. It was Edward Gibbon, the historian, who said that in the final analysis all taxation falls on agriculture. When a tax boost is announced the better organized groups in the country immediately add the tax to the price of the product they sell. We have seen that happen just recently. The less organized groups pass on as much of the tax as possible to the ultimate consumer. Agriculture is in the position that it can add no tax to the price of the product it sells. So no matter what the tax may be on the articles the farmers buy, they have to pay it.

Today I had a complaint from a constituent with respect to the basic herd of a farmer who sells his livestock. I know the minister will say this is a matter for the Department of National Revenue, but I hope he will work in co-operation with that department to bring about a solution to this problem. This man went to his legal adviser and said he was going to have a clearing auction sale of his livestock. He asked about the problem of setting up a basic herd and was advised that it was not necessary to do so, that he could establish that with the income tax department at the conclusion of the sale. Then to his sorrow he found that was too late, that a time limit had been set and that this had to be done at least a month before the auction sale. Now this man finds himself in a position shared by many others in this country. After long years of thrift and industry he is now going to be legally robbed of what was his by the income tax people. It seems to me it would not be a very difficult problem to establish to the satisfaction of the income tax branch the fact that he had twenty or thirty cattle or whatever the number might be during the year or years prior to the auction sale, not just the month before. Now, no other group or class in the country is required to set up a similar workable plan before they sell any article or articles. I would suggest, therefore, that the Minister of National Revenue look into this matter. If an ordinary investor buys stock which he sells after the value has increased, that is a capital gain—unless he happens to be a dealer in stocks or bonds. If I buy real estate and the value increases, when I sell it that is a capital gain.

The Chairman: Order. I believe it would be better to discuss that matter on the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was just referring, sir, to the effect that taxation has on agriculture. I believe I have made the point clear so I shall not press it further, except to say that when livestock is held over a period of years once the basic herd is established, it is only the increase that is taxable as income. I am asking the department to look into this and see if some change can be made.

I wish to point out also that nearly everyone has been saying something about the cost of living index. I have here a report of the dominion bureau of statistics dated September 22, 1950, over the name of H. F. Greenway. It is called the "Market Basket" and refers to the requirements of the average family. They take the purchasing power of an hour's labour in 1926 as one. This basket represents, first of all, all living requirements such as food, fuel and light; shelter, rent, clothing, home furnishings and services. Then there is a miscellaneous item which includes health maintenance, personal care, recreation, transportation and insurance. Compared with 1926 an hour's labour in 1939 would buy one-third more of all the living requirements. In 1949 it would buy one and six-tenths more. Of the miscellaneous items, compared with 1926, an hour's labour today will buy almost twice as much as it did in 1926.

Then I come to the Economic Analyst of October, 1950, which gives the average annual market margins on nine selected commodities from 1935 to 1949. In 1935 the margin on potatoes was 9·5 cents on 15 pounds, but in 1949 the margin was 26·6 cents; eggs, all grades, in 1935 the margin was 7·7 per dozen, in 1949 it was 15·4; half-pound packages of cheese, the margin in 1935 was 9 cents, and in 1949 it was 20·4 cents; common quality beef, in 1935 the margin was 6·8 cents per pound and in 1949 it was 17·5. This illustrates where some of the consumers' dollar goes that the farmer does not get. The farmers' share of the retail prices of these same nine selected commodities is given. I shall quote four of them as examples. In 1935 the farmers' share in potatoes was 50 per cent, while in 1949 he only got 49 per cent; in eggs the farmer got 70 per cent of the retail price in 1935, and in 1949 he got 73 per cent; in common quality beef he got 51·1 per cent in 1935 and 64·3 per cent in 1949; in canned tomatoes, in 1935 he got 15·8 per cent and in 1949 he got 20·6 per cent. This shows you, sir, that not all the money the consumer pays finds its way into the pockets of the farmer.

There is one other item I want to mention, and that is the stock foods and tonics that are sold to the farmers for livestock feeding. There are many of these articles processed and manufactured in Canada, but some are imported. It has been proven to my satisfaction that one of the brands contains over forty per cent salt, and is sold at fabulous prices. These preparations are in competition with Canadian products that are required to meet higher standards. I discussed this with the Department of Agriculture officials some time ago, but nothing has been done. I hope that before too long this will be looked into by the department and some action taken.

Mr. Low: I should like to say a word or two about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act mentioned by the minister. The Minister of Agriculture stated that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was not designed to take care of farmers whose crops were destroyed by hail. Originally, I believe, that was true; but in spite of that he admits that where hail has reduced the yield in any qualified district to eight bushels per acre or less, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act does pay some compensation. The minister has stated that anyone can insure his crop against hail, and that he should do so if he is wise. Possibly that point is well taken, but the minister knows that people are inclined to insure only when they feel there is a risk. In the Peace river country damaging hail storms are rare, and for that reason people do not feel that they face a risk. It would not pay the farmers in that part of the country to insure against hail year after year, at least they feel that way, and that is the manner in which they have conducted their affairs. It is only once in a great while that any section of the country is hailed out.

Our biggest hazard, of course, is frost. Sometimes hail and frost come together or one follows the other, so it becomes very difficult to tell which one has caused the yield to fall below the limit to qualify for compensation under the act. I believe, therefore, the minister must admit that it is not a strong argument to say that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should not pay compensation on crops destroyed by hail in an area of that kind, because as I have pointed out the hail there would be just as rare as drought in some other sections.

Mr. Gardiner: If I might make myself clear on that point, I am not arguing that there should not be a payment for hail there if there is going to be a payment at all. But I say that merely to argue that the crop was hailed out is not a good reason for bringing the district under the act.

Mr. Low: Yes, that is a fair statement, and that is what I was saying. It is not a strong argument against paying compensation. I am sure the minister did not mean it as a strong argument. There was this other point the minister raised. He said that in any district where a crop can be expected in eight out of ten years the farmers ought to be able to take care of themselves in the two bad years when they come. I should be inclined to agree with the minister in that statement if these facts that I shall cite had not been fully established as a result of experience over quite a number of years.

In the first place, in the Peace river country, widespread drought that drastically reduces the yield is only rare. In the second place severe frost and early snow are quite frequent. They are the great hazards, as I have already pointed out. Consequently grades suffer in many years. When grades suffer the returns to the farmers often fall very low. This hits all farmers and it is a serious matter.

The third important point is this. Most farmers whose cases I have been pleading here are comparatively new farmers. They are people who came into the country and took up land under the Alberta crown lease arrangement, covering a period of ten years. The lease arrangement is almost like a ten-year purchase plan. At the end of the ten-year period they got title to these lands. They have had only a few years' experience. Some have had only one, two or three years' experience up there. They have just got started, they are just digging in, as it were. They are facing this situation. In one of the early years of their farming experience in the Peace river country, along comes a tragic or drastic hailstorm, followed by an early frost that reduces the yield in many cases to nothing, and in many of them to much below the qualifying number of bushels. These people are in need. They cannot quite understand why, since they started farming, they should be required to pay the one per cent levy on what crops they market but are not to expect any compensation when their yield falls below eight or four bushels per acre. It is that group I plead for particularly. I would certainly ask the minister to give serious consideration to some change either in the act or in the regulation in order to enable compensation to be paid to them this year. Those people are finding it extremely difficult to meet the cost of putting in their crops—getting seed, buying fuel and repairs to machinery—this year. I should like to ask the minister this question: Has he considered this matter sufficiently to be able to say whether it would be possible to pay compensation on those lands without a change in the act? My feeling is, after studying the act, that it would not be possible. I do not know; I am not an expert.

Mr. Gardiner: I must say that I missed the description of the land the hon. member spoke about.

[Mr. Low.]

Mr. Low: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Gardiner: I missed the description of the type of land the hon. member is speaking of, when I was asking my officials for some information.

Mr. Low: I merely asked this question. On these crown leases—which as I said amount practically to a ten-year purchase plan—where the farmers are paying in to the government of Alberta a percentage of their crops each year over a period of ten years, and at the end of that period they get their titles, would it be necessary, in the minister's judgment, to change the act before compensation can be paid on such land this year?

Mr. Gardiner: My memory is that the act as we amended it last year provided for taking in some areas in the province of Alberta and also, I think, in Saskatchewan, where the lands had been leased by the government; but I think it confines it to those that were leased at a certain period.

Mr. Low: Yes; before 1940, I think.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Low: I was afraid that would be the case. On lands that were taken in since 1940, it would be impossible for the P.F.A.A. administration to pay compensation for the losses last fall, without a change in the act. If that is the case, is it impossible for the minister to bring in a slight change to the act this year, in order to take care of the situation? I think he will admit that it was not contemplated, when the 1950 amendment was put through, that it would cut off such lands as I have described.

Mr. Gardiner: I must say, to be absolutely honest, that it was contemplated. It was not only contemplated but it was discussed in the committee; and after the discussion, it was indicated that we might go along, that after a year's experience we might find that we were doing some things that were not advisable and we might come back for an amendment. What I am saying is that I do not think we would be justified in coming back for an amendment until we have had a year's experience. We have not had the year's experience yet. We should like to go along until the end of the year.

Mr. Low: There is just one thing. I do not want to labour this point, but in referring to the amendment the minister himself made this important point, as reported at page 3310 of Hansard of 1950:

> I want to make it perfectly plain that the bill—
> I am speaking now of the amending bill in 1950.
> —does not deal with submarginal lands as such. It deals with lands which up to a certain date everybody considered were not good enough either to homestead or to buy. It is true that having set the date at December 31, 1940, there will be a few pieces of land in Saskatchewan particularly that were homesteaded after that date, and there will be a few parcels that were purchased after that date but they are largely in areas where the act would not apply in any case.

All of that I think has reference to submarginal lands and lands in drier areas.

Mr. Gardiner: That particular discussion that is referred to there had a bearing on the area that was settled in the south. There is no question about that.

Mr. Low: The point I was trying to make was that actually in all the discussions that took place—and I thought I got fairly close to it here—there was no mention of lands of the type I have described to the minister up in the Peace river country.

Mr. Gardiner: There was in Saskatchewan. There was mention of that type of land in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: I want to say that I was much amazed to hear the statement of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the South Saskatchewan river dam. Up until well into the body of his speech I had hoped that an announcement might be forthcoming that construction would take place immediately. I can remember back in 1947 when the minister told us in this house that it would take two years from 1947 to decide whether the project was feasible or not. Then in the 1949 election the minister himself said to the people of Saskatchewan to send him back to complete the job. Then in the first session after that election the minister said: The Saskatchewan government has to pay some $30 million, and we do not know whether or not they are going to do that. Those were brand new conditions, but the Saskatchewan government has met those conditions. I see by the press that the latest survey made on that project says that it is feasible. Yet the minister gets up in the house tonight and says that a brand new survey is going to have to be made by a brand new set of engineers. Then he is asked whether when that survey is made—

Mr. Gardiner: That is not correct.

Mr. Argue: A brand new set of experts.

Mr. Gardiner: No, no. There is no survey going to be made at all.

Mr. Argue: What are they going to do?

Mr. Gardiner: A survey that has been made is going to be submitted to a few experts, to get their opinion.

Mr. Knowles: There is going to be a survey of a survey.

Mr. Argue: All right then. They are not going to do a survey. They are going to take all the surveys that have been made and they are going to read them again. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, they are going to do a survey of the surveys; and maybe next year there will be a survey of the survey of the survey.

Mr. Gardiner: I know that my hon. friend is preparing for a by-election in his area. He is not satisfied with what other members of his own party were inclined to agree with a few minutes ago.

Mr. Argue: What was that?

Mr. Gardiner: He just does not want this thing settled. He has just got through saying—

Mr. Argue: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Gardiner: Just a minute. My hon. friend—

Mr. Argue: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is questioning what I said a moment ago, and I am up on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: I am already up on a question of privilege.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the minister has accused me of preparing for a by-election in my area. I am fighting for the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam. I think it is a good thing for the province of Saskatchewan, and he should not suggest that I am doing it for political purposes.

Mr. Gardiner: It is quite all right. On a question of privilege, what I want to point out is that my hon. friend just got through saying that toward the end of 1947 I had said there was two years' work still to be done before anyone could be convinced as to whether or not it should be proceeded with. This is still early in 1951. If it took two years to convince me, and others who were close to it, as to whether it could be successfully gone ahead with, we are not very far off the line that was laid out at that time. As a matter of fact, when you add the sessions together we are quite within reasonable distance of the time. I was convinced at the end of the two years. I think I have indicated to the committee tonight that I am convinced. There are a few others that I have to convince. There are ways of doing that, and I do not want somebody to tell me, because it would be true if they did, that I am not an engineer and do not know whether we could make that dam stay there or not; or that I do not know whether the water can be successfully utilized for power after it is over. Some of the people who have been quoted tonight as being absolutely satisfied have stated to me that you can produce power there cheaper with coal than you can with water. I do not agree with them, but it has had the effect of making some people wonder. I am so far convinced about the matter myself that I am quite satisfied all the facts should be submitted to experts, and I think the experts will come to the same conclusion that I have come to.

Mr. Argue: The minister's arithmetic is not too good. In 1947 he said it would take two years to find out.

Mr. Gardiner: At the end of 1947.

Mr. Argue: If I can add, the period from 1947 to 1949 amounts to two years. All right; the minister has just said that it was feasible.

Mr. Gardiner: I was convinced.

Mr. Argue: This is 1951, and he is still trying to convince the members of the government that it is feasible. He has not convinced them today.

Mr. Gardiner: I will agree with my hon. friend excepting for the one word he uses. He says that because I am convinced, I know. Well, I may think that I know, but there may be other people who think that I do not know. I am convinced.

Mr. Argue: He has been convinced since 1949, and he has not convinced any member of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, no; don't go that far.

Mr. Argue: He says that there is disagreement. He took one position and the treasury board or some other members of the government took another position. From 1949 to 1951 is two years, and in that time he has not convinced the members of the government; he has not convinced anybody. Now it is going to go to some experts. They are going to go over all the surveys, and the Minister of Agriculture cannot say, even when that is done, whether or not construction will start next year, if the decision is favourable.

Mr. Gardiner: If I did, the hon. member would say: there is an election coming up.

Mr. Knowles: The minister knows it.

Mr. Hodgson: He is going to wait for it.

Mr. Argue: That shows the mind of the minister. He knows, and he will not be prepared to say construction will take place until just before another election. He said in 1949, on the eve of the election, as quoted in the Regina Leader-Post of June 23, 1949, and I am quoting from the speech he made at Lemberg, Saskatchewan:

> "The South Saskatchewan project would provide cheap power and encourage building of industries in small towns, provide an incentive for young people to stay in this province. I think we have made a fairly good start now," said Mr. Gardiner. "Send us back to complete the job . . ."

Mr. Gardiner: Sure, and they did, too.

Mr. Argue: They were sent back to complete the job, and two years later the minister is still having a survey made. He is no further ahead than he was in 1949.

Mr. Gardiner: No, that is not right.

Mr. Argue: It is not good enough for the Minister of Agriculture to say to the people of Saskatchewan in 1949: Send me back and I will complete the job, and then two years later to be doing nothing toward the completion of the job, and not be able to say that construction on that project will even commence next year.

Mr. Wylie: I intend to make my remarks very brief. I say, Mr. Chairman, that this is one time that I can speak in this house without being critical of our dominion government on their irrigation program.

Mr. Hodgson: Have they an irrigation program in Alberta? Did they build an irrigation project there?

Mr. Wylie: You should come out and see it.

Mr. Hatfield: It is oil that has done that.

Mr. Wylie: I must say that through the co-operation of the dominion government and of our good friend the Minister of Agriculture and our provincial government we have irrigation within sight of Medicine Hat. I hope when the minister comes out in two years' time or three years, or perhaps even at election time, we shall have the water in those ditches just west of Medicine Hat so that it will not be necessary to drive to Taber to see the change in the country and the change that water can make when it is put on land such as we have in that area.

Irrigation means so much to our western provinces, not only to Alberta but to Saskatchewan and perhaps to some parts of Manitoba as well. I might say that perhaps in Alberta we are situated in the driver's seat. We have the water there not only for the St. Mary-Milk river project but for the Bow river development project, which has been taken over by the dominion government. We have a few small projects. One I might mention is the Ross creek irrigation project, a project which will bring under water 2,500 acres of land. I do not want to say any more about that at the present time because I have one or two questions I want to ask the minister when we get on to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

On occasion the minister has wondered why so many people stay on the dry lands surrounding Medicine Hat. The minister knows the answer just as well as I do. There they have been waiting to utilize water that is running down and being wasted in the South Saskatchewan river. We have come to realize that that water must be used, not only to the advantage of the settlers on the land but to the advantage of the cities, and not only to the advantage of the cities but to that of both senior governments. Because we all realize that when we put water on the land that land can be reassessed at a better value. Land assessed at $1 an acre today may be assessed at $30 when water is put on. So that we can all benefit by it.

I am very happy at this time to compliment the Minister of Agriculture and his government, and I am mighty happy to compliment the Social Credit government in Alberta upon co-operating with the dominion government to make the irrigation project possible.

Mr. Thatcher: I wish that at this time I could compliment the Minister of Agriculture upon the job he has done so far as irrigation in Saskatchewan is concerned. I am very sorry however that I cannot, because tonight he has made an announcement that will shock the people in the whole of that province.

I cannot help going back to the first time I ran in a federal election in 1945. I remember the leading newspaper advertisement carried by my political opponent, a whole page in our local newspaper, saying, "South Saskatchewan irrigation project has been approved; it will be commenced as soon as men and material are available." That was in 1945.

As I said earlier today, every year goes by and some other reason is found for not proceeding with it. Tonight we heard the minister give a very interesting speech on what had been accomplished in Alberta. He said that where formerly we had a dust bowl we now have tree belts and springs, and that everything is growing. He said that was why he wanted to sell the committee on the proposition of doing something similar in Saskatchewan.

Well, everyone will agree that there are advantages; but we would like to know why some action is not being taken this year. Whom could not the minister sell? Tonight we had another illustration that there is some division in the cabinet. The minister said: I recommended it to the cabinet, but they would not proceed. Who would not allow him to go ahead? Is it Mr. Abbott? Is it Mr. Howe? Is it treasury board? Is it the Prime Minister himself? I wish the minister would tell us. The minister said tonight that we have to get a couple more men to make a survey. Well, I think it was only three years ago he told us almost the same thing and in the same words. He said: we have to see that this dam will hold—that it might go out, and the whole city of Saskatoon might be wiped out.

Well, surely after three years the minister and his department must know whether the thing is feasible or not. I am a little dubious about the reason he has given for having several more experts go over it, because when the leader of this party asked who those experts are he said that he did not know. When I asked whether, should the experts report favourably next year, work would start then, the minister said he could not say definitely.

I said a moment ago that I do not think the minister's explanation holds water; it is not good enough. It may be that I am biased; but I say now that this dam is being held until the year before the next federal election, so that the minister can go to the people of Saskatchewan, and say that he is starting. I regret that I cannot, like the hon. member for Medicine Hat, compliment the minister tonight, because regardless of their politics our people are bitterly disappointed.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Mr. Chairman, I am going to speak for only a few moments. I had not intended to say anything until I heard the two C.C.F. members speak. I think this matter has been covered fairly well by members on the government side of the house, and was particularly well covered by one of the newer members this afternoon.

I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Medicine Hat on the fairness of his remarks, and his expressions of appreciation of what has been done in his own constituency. However, I listened to the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Moose Jaw—and it will be remembered that this government has handed an airport and several other things to the hon. member for Moose Jaw, but he is still howling—

Mr. Thatcher: Don't be bitter.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I just want to say this, that that same hon. member from Moose Jaw and the same hon. member from Assiniboia are the type of C.C.F.'ers who never did make a success of governmental industries. They bought a boot factory, and put it right in Moose Jaw, under the nose of the hon. member—

Mr. Thatcher: On a question of privilege, the hon. member has just suggested that I am the type of member who has never been able to make a success of provincial business. Let me tell him that last year the government of Saskatchewan made $3.8 million on a net investment of about $27 million in their crown corporations.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is not correct.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The debate, of course, boils down to the point that hindsight is better than foresight. The Minister of Agriculture is using foresight in this instance. It is not being used in our province now, and the money that was made, to which the hon. member has just referred, was made mostly out of certain public utilities, such as our power commission and telephones.

Mr. Thatcher: Which had a deficit of $200,000 when you were in it.

The Chairman: This discussion must relate to the item before the committee.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): That is right, Mr. Chairman. Those institutions, of course, were established by a Liberal government in Saskatchewan.

I am going to say this, respecting the item under discussion. The Minister of Agriculture says that after careful investigation and after deep thought by himself he became firmly convinced two years ago that this was a feasible project. Before any minister spends public money he should do that. Unfortunately that has not been done by certain men in Saskatchewan who lack business experience. They come into the government, and they do not know what they are doing, in business or in anything else.

Mr. Thatcher: On a question of privilege, the hon. member has made the categorical statement that they have not been business-like in Saskatchewan. Let him go ahead and prove his assertion.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I would love to do it.

The Chairman: The hon. member must discuss the item.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): I shall obey your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but when I am in order I would be delighted to do it. I would be delighted to show what a farce the whole government of Saskatchewan is. However, in the light of your ruling I cannot do it. But on a future occasion, right in Moose Jaw, I will be pleased to meet the hon. member and to destroy some of his efforts.

An hon. Member: What about patronage?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): And we will deal with patronage.

Mr. Knowles: Get back to the dam.

Mr. Thatcher: You should know about it.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): The Minister of Agriculture and other members of the government want to be certain, before public moneys are spent in these ventures—and I am not out of order when I say that public money in Saskatchewan has been thrown into ventures that were absolutely useless. They were run at a loss and finally closed up. Men who did not know beans about business had tried to run them. I am not referring to the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I think he is in strange company because he himself is a capitalist and is interested in four paying concerns.

In so far as the Minister of Agriculture and this whole dam proposition is concerned, I think the government will be convinced. Those of us who have travelled from Red Deer across the United States border down through Idaho and have seen what has been done with irrigation have some idea what can be done in our part of the country. I think all of Canada will be behind this project. I cannot imagine members in eastern Canada bucking western prosperity.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I had to attend the veterans affairs committee this afternoon but I am told there was considerable discussion in this committee this afternoon with regard to wheat. This evening I heard the minister replying to statements that had been made this afternoon. The minister warned hon. members who were supporters of the wheat board and long-term international wheat agreements that they should be careful in criticizing these institutions because it might weaken them. I want to make it quite clear that I am a one hundred per cent supporter of the wheat board and of long-term international wheat agreements but I think it necessary at times to point out any weaknesses that may develop.

This afternoon the minister pointed out that there was no provision in the international wheat agreement under which the ceiling or floor price could be changed during the term of the contract. I agree that that is right, but I would point out that back in 1948 and 1949 when the agreement was up for discussion in the house I urged the government to try to get the price of wheat tied to the price level so that if in the future the general price level went up, the price of wheat would go up, and if the price level went down, the price of wheat would go down.

If that had been done we would have avoided the criticism that we hear today that the world price of wheat is $2.28 per bushel while wheat sold under the international wheat agreement returns only $1.89. Personally I do not think there would be any difficulty making an arrangement of that kind. Certainly the price for the first year of the agreement could be arranged without any difficulty and then the future prices could be tied to the price level. That would be of advantage to both the selling and the buying nations.

Apparently the government did not advocate that at the time the international wheat agreement was signed, and apparently the farmer organizations did not ask for that. It is quite evident today that the farmer organizations are realizing that a provision of that kind should be introduced into the wheat agreement and they are now asking for an escalator clause. When the present international wheat agreement expires I hope the government will try to have some form of escalator clause included in the agreement.

When the Minister of Trade and Commerce was referring to the marketing of wheat during the past five years he stated that in that time the farmers had received a better return for their wheat than in any other five-year period in the history of Canada. That statement is not quite correct. The only period in the history of Canada during which the farmer received a parity price was the five-year period 1916-20. During that period the farm population represented one-third of the population of the country and the farm income was approximately one-third of the total income of Canada. So at that time the farmer actually received a parity price for his farm production.

Having that in mind I asked the bureau of statistics to prepare me some index figures, using 1916-20 as 100. I asked for index figures on wheat prices and prices of farm machinery for the period 1925-29, which is often referred to as being a period of prosperity for agriculture, and also the period 1945-50, which was referred to by the minister. The figures are quite interesting because they show clearly that the farmer has not received anything like as good a price for his wheat in the last five years as he did in the 1916-20 period. These are the figures compiled by the bureau of statistics:

Period	Wheat	Farm Machinery
1925	66·5	129·3
1926	58·9	128·9
1927	54·1	128·8
1928	43·2	128·9
1929	56·8	128·8
1945	86·5	152·0
1946	86·5	156·9
1947	87·6	166·8
1948	89·7	187·1

That demonstrates clearly that farm costs had climbed to such an extent that the farmer was far worse off in 1945-49 than he was in the period 1916-20. I am not suggesting that the wheat farmer cannot keep up provided he gets a fair crop each year, but it is altogether unfair to merely take the price of wheat without referring at the same time to the cost of production. As will be seen by the figures during the past five years, the cost of production has been increasing.

There is just one other point I should like to refer to before eleven o'clock, the matter of irrigation. I want to say to the minister that the farmers of Acadia constituency very much appreciate the work that has been done under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, that is, the building of dugouts and dams on various creeks for irrigation purposes. A number of fairly large dams have been constructed on Berry creek and Sounding creek with the idea of impounding waters to irrigate quite a considerable area of land. Unfortunately, owing to an insufficient runoff of water, until this year there has been very little water in those dams and irrigation could not be carried on. This spring, however, the dams were overflowing. We had a fine runoff of water, and there will be enough to provide for quite a large amount of irrigation. That irrigation will have to be done by sprinkler systems; there is no other way it can be carried on with the type of dams we have built, and of course sprinkler equipment is quite expensive. It is not going to be easy for many farmers to obtain the equipment necessary to irrigate their land; but the eastern irrigation association are working to get farmers to co-operate with one another and provide sprinklers so a real trial of the system can be carried out in that area.

Of course the irrigation scheme the farmers of Acadia are really interested in is the Red Deer diversion project. When that is finally completed it will provide a steady supply of water to be carried to the dams already built on Berry creek and Sounding creek. Last year the minister said he hoped that by the fall of 1950 the surveys for the Red river project would have advanced sufficiently to make it possible to sign an agreement with the provincial government. Could the minister, either tonight or when we come to the item on irrigation, say just what the situation is?

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps it would be better to leave it until we reach the item.

Mr. Quelch: That will be quite satisfactory. When I travelled through the constituency I told the farmers what the minister had said, but I warned that because of the international situation it was quite possible the government would have to curtail expenditures on some irrigation projects in order to provide for greater expenditures for war purposes. The farmers are reasonable; they realize the situation, and they will not be over-critical if the government is not able to proceed right away. However, good progress has been made with the surveys, and the farmers are now using the dams already built for small-scale irrigation. They realize that if they show the government they can make good use of the water already provided the government will be more likely to provide additional water in the future.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. McLure: No, Mr. Chairman. It is getting close to eleven o'clock. Would you call it eleven o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of hon. members that I call it eleven o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Gardiner: Tomorrow we will continue with these estimates. If we complete them we will take resources and development, and if we complete those we will take fisheries.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 1, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table copies, in English and in French, of the report of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences.

The report was presented by the chairman of the royal commission at twelve o'clock noon today, and placed before the governor in council immediately before the meeting of the house this afternoon. The government has, therefore, not yet had any opportunity to give consideration to the report, and, in fact, none of the members of the government has yet read it.

My colleagues and I have, however, confidence in the members of the commission, and we have no doubt whatever that the report will constitute a valuable guide to our future national development in the fields which it covers, and that the recommendations of the commission will be of the greatest assistance to the government in determining appropriate policies for such federal action as may be desirable in these fields.

In accordance with previous indications I have given to the house, I wished to lose no time in having the report made available to members of parliament and to the public, both because of the widespread interest in its subject matter and because the report itself will obviously call for careful study and discussion, not only by members of the government and of parliament but by the public at large.

In tabling the report I should like, on behalf of the government, to express deep appreciation of the untiring and devoted service given to this task by the chairman and members of the royal commission since it was established two years ago. I am sure that the work of the commission and their report will be a significant milestone in the development of our national heritage.

Mr. Knowles: After the government has had an opportunity of reading the report, will the Prime Minister indicate to the house, within a reasonable period of time, whether any legislation based upon it will be introduced at this session, or this year?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to predict what would be the attitude of the government concerning recommendations that the government has not yet had an opportunity of seeing. All I can say is that the government set up this royal commission because it felt the commission would be helpful in pointing the way to whatever policies it might be appropriate for the federal government to adopt in the wide fields covered by the reference; that is still the attitude of the government.

CANADIAN GRAIN MISSION

TRADE WITH UNITED KINGDOM AND OTHER EUROPEAN COUNTRIES—TABLING OF REPORT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to lay on the table copies of the printed report of the Canadian grain mission. Hon. members may recall that in the autumn of 1950, the members of the mission visited United Kingdom and other European countries, and called upon the grain trade, millers and government authorities, with a view to facilitating trade in Canadian wheat grain and flour in that area. I believe hon. members who are interested in the marketing of Canadian wheat will find the contents of this report of considerable interest.

UNITED NATIONS

VISIT OF SECRETARY GENERAL, MR. TRYGVE LIE, TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: All hon. members would, I am sure, wish me to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of the distinguished secretary general of the United Nations, Mr. Trygve Lie. We all welcome the presence of one who for more than five years has dedicated himself steadfastly to the promotion of the high purposes and principles set forth in the charter of the United Nations.

Mr. Lie was elected to be the first secretary general of the United Nations in February, 1946, and recently his term of office was extended for a further three years beginning February 1, 1951. Since assuming this high office, he has won general admiration and respect for his devotion to the work of the United Nations in all its phases.

I am not sure that it is wholly proper to refer to the national origin of such a noted internationalist, but I think that I should remark that Mr. Lie had a very distinguished career in the public life of Norway as a lawyer, statesman and diplomat before devoting his whole time to the service of the United Nations. Apart from holding many important portfolios in the Norwegian government—he was, for instance, foreign minister of the government in exile during the war—he was head of the Norwegian delegation at the San Francisco conference which resulted in the establishment of the United Nations. At this conference he served as chairman of the commission which drafted the provisions of the charter relating to the security council.

All hon. members, I am sure, would wish me to extend to Mr. Lie on their behalf the warmest possible welcome to the House of Commons of Canada.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 354, to incorporate First Canadian Reinsurance Company.—Mr. Henderson.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT AND SUPERANNUATION OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to provide for the appointment and superannuation of certain officers and employees necessary for carrying out the provisions of the act, and to provide further that no projects involving an expenditure in excess of ten thousand dollars shall be undertaken without the consent of the governor in council.

Mr. Thatcher: Explain.

Mr. Gardiner: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

The explanation is, I think, all in the resolution as worded. This organization was set up in 1935 as a temporary organization to do certain things over a period of five years. It has been extended in its time to the point where it is now recognized as a permanent organization, and the staffs are to be brought under the civil service commission.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO ROUTE FROM WINNIPEG TO ONTARIO BORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Resources and Development of which I have given him notice. Is the minister in a position to give final details with regard to the route of the trans-Canada highway from Winnipeg east to the Ontario border?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The minister of public works for Manitoba has recommended, and we have concurred in, a route which runs from the Ontario-Manitoba boundary via existing highway No. 1 to a point near West Hawk lake, thence southwesterly past Falcon lake to a point north of Glen, thence westerly to a point east of Ste. Anne, thence northwesterly to the boundary of St. Boniface.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO B.N.A. ACT—PROGRESS OF MEASURE AT WESTMINSTER—CONSEQUENTIAL CANADIAN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he as yet received formal notification from the United Kingdom that the parliament there has passed the amendment to the British North America Act which will enable the new old age pensions legislation to be brought in? If so, can the Prime Minister tell us when he will be making a statement to the house, as promised yesterday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just before coming into the house I again communicated with both the Department of External Affairs and Government house in order to ascertain if any official word had yet come from London. I was informed that none had yet come, although this morning there was a dispatch sent to our high commissioner asking him to let us know just as soon as the matter had been finally dealt with. There has not yet been any answer to that message.

MANPOWER

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL—QUESTION AS TO NATIONAL REGISTRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. On May 21, as reported at page 3220 of Hansard, I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour if the national advisory council on manpower intended using the national census for some of its purposes. The parliamentary assistant at that time stated that he would take the question as notice. Is the minister prepared to answer the question today?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I have noted the hon. member's question, and I think I can answer it immediately. The national advisory council on manpower will not use the data collected under the census administration for any other purposes than those for which similar information has been used in the past. In other words, it will not be used as an alternative method of registration.

Mr. Higgins: May I just say to the minister that in the advertisements of the dominion bureau of statistics, there is given an undertaking that no statistics will be revealed to any department under any circumstances.

An hon. Member: Statistics?

Mr. Higgins: None of the details.

BUTTER AND MARGARINE

QUESTION AS TO COMPARATIVE COST OF PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What is the cost of producing a pound of margarine for the market as compared with the cost of producing a pound of butter?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. McLure: This is a question of which I would have given the minister notice, but I received it only a few minutes ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, if that question is to be discussed, I think it had better be on my estimates.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, $336,942.

Mr. McLure: Last evening just before the house adjourned I rose to make a few remarks, and the chairman very kindly called it eleven o'clock. A few moments ago I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture, and he said that he would answer it when we came to deal with his estimates. I shall now present the question again, since it is based on an urgent request from a couple of farmers who came to my office today. I repeat the question, so that the minister when he is answering other questions will answer this one. What is the cost of producing a pound of margarine for the market as compared with the cost of producing a pound of butter for the market?

Since we have started to deal with these estimates I notice that a great many western members have taken up the cause of the farmers of the west. In all discussions on farming and administration of the Department of Agriculture the western members stick together as though they had a common cause in the interest of the western farmers. It is difficult to tell whether they are Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F. or Social Credit. If there is a farmer's problem before the house they are all inclined to stick together, and they get their demands granted by the government by so doing. We had an example of that not so long ago when all the members from the west took up the cudgels for the farmers and they were granted a subsidy of some $65 million.

In the course of their remarks some of the western members were inclined to think that the eastern members are not so much interested as they should be in the cause of the western farmers. But I say that the eastern members have always been and still are interested in the western farmers, and a large majority of them are doing more for the western farmers than the western members are doing for the eastern farmers and their problems.

I do not take any objection to the members from the west, of all political parties, grouping together and making one demand. In fact I congratulate them on their having a co-operative spirit. We in the east sometimes take our politics a little too seriously, with the result that the agricultural problems of the east are not getting the attention from the department or from the government that the western farmers get.

The one important problem at the present time—the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton brought it to the attention of the minister—is that of marketing our surplus potatoes. For the first time in this house or anywhere else the amount that was allocated to assist the potato grower to market his surplus product has been mentioned. As the minister stated yesterday, that amount is some $300,000. It has been allocated to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. This will not be more than $150,000—probably it will not be over $100,000—for Prince Edward Island. It is only a small item when you compare it with the $65 million that the wheat growers received. When you compare these two amounts you see the unfair attitude taken by the department and by the government toward the eastern farmers. We have had discussions of the price that was to be paid to take care of the surplus potatoes in our province. I understood it was to have been 44 cents a bushel. This is at least 16 cents below the cost of production. However, as I said a moment ago, no evidence has been given of an order in council having been passed to pay the farmers for their surplus potatoes.

In the discussion that took place yesterday on this matter I find quite a difference between the views of the minister and those of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton. They seem to disagree as to how this price should be paid and how much each government is to pay. There is a little difference in our province, because at the time that this question was uppermost in the minds of the farmers a provincial election was in progress and the farmers, rightly or wrongly, were led to believe that they would get 22 cents from the starch factory, 22 cents from the local government and 22 cents from the federal government, which would make 66 cents. I do not say that the Minister of Agriculture put out that proposition, but it was current during the election. It was good campaign material, judging from the results of the election that took place on April 26.

However, there is some misunderstanding with regard to the payment of 22 cents from the starch factory. If they are unable to take all the product that is being offered, will the government, either the federal government or the local government, take the amount that the starch factories are not able to take? In other words, instead of dumping two or three million bushels of potatoes, will the government pay the same price of 44 cents in our province, and a little higher price by the barrel in New Brunswick? That is a matter which the farmers are considering at this time when they are planting their potatoes. It would be of great assistance to most of them to know just how they are to be treated with regard to the dumping of potatoes, which will have to be done in many instances.

It seems strange that a good food such as eastern potatoes should be dumped when other parts of the world are experiencing famine. We know that the government endeavoured to assist the farmers of western Canada by selling wheat to some of these distressed areas—wheat that was not fit for flour purposes. I think they should have considered at the same time selling millions of bushels of extra choice potatoes, instead of having them dumped, when food is so scarce.

I shall not deal with any other matters, with the exception of the one pertaining to potatoes. However I would ask the minister when he replies, to answer these questions:

1. Was there or is there a proposal to pay the potato growers of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island $300,000? If so, when was this proposal passed, and how much was allocated to the Prince Edward Island growers?

2. Will the farmers be paid 44 cents a bushel for all potatoes dumped?

3. Will farmers who were forced to sell at very low prices receive a sum of money which will place them in the same position as those receiving 44 cents a bushel?

4. Is there to be a plan for the marketing of potatoes in 1951, and, if so, will the minister outline that plan?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon and evening several matters pertaining to agriculture were discussed. I am sure hon. members from the maritime provinces will forgive me if I do not refer to the potato problem, because I do not know very much about potatoes—other than possibly the difference between mashed and French-fried.

One other subject of interest to wheat farmers was the international wheat agreement. The discussion was introduced, I believe, by the hon. member for Lake Centre, when he suggested that the government should ask for a renegotiation of the contract. This sounded all right. I do not know whether it would be beneficial or not. I think all will agree that all members of the government are interested in seeing that we get as much as possible for our wheat.

We come now to the subject which has been discussed at some considerable length I refer to the South Saskatchewan dam Along with other hon. members, if at all possible I am in favour of getting started on the dam. The suggestion was made that the work might be held up until the time of another election. I suppose that was thrown into the discussion more or less as a joke.

Mr. Thatcher: What do you mean, a joke?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Because there would be no good reason for holding it up until the time of another election. It would take ten years to build the dam and if that would elect the present government the hon. member will be sitting where he is for a considerable length of time—at least until after another two elections.

The suggestion was made that we are united on the subject and that we would not play politics with it. With this I agree. I have no criticism of the government I support in respect of its playing politics. The only quarrel I have is that at times they are not political enough, and I have been urging some of the ministers to realize that on occasions they should be a little more political.

The suggestion was made that the South Saskatchewan dam was required because we need more electricity in that province. In the constituency I have the honour to represent is found the chief supply of electricity for the province. This supply is found in the Estevan-Bienfait area; it is made possible by cheap coal. I am not going to discuss the question whether a supply of water would give us cheaper electricity than coal. I do know, however, that at Bienfait, south and east of Estevan, the coal companies supply the power commission with coal to make their electricity at a price of less than a dollar a ton. I am informed that on that basis we can manufacture electricity from coal at just about the same price as it can be produced from natural gas. I am not sure of the cost of electricity at Estevan, but I understand it is produced at the plant for less than one cent a kilowatt.

In the Estevan area we have been interested in getting a smaller dam on Long creek. I understand this is being held up because of a report which is expected from the international joint commission. I shall not discuss the matter further. I have discussed it with the minister on many occasions, and I shall speak to him privately again. However, if the South Saskatchewan development, which might be considered more important, does not go ahead, I would be hopeful that money would be made available for the dam at Estevan on Long creek.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Hodgson: I cannot let it carry just yet. If one may judge from what has been said by hon. members who spoke yesterday and today, I believe it can be said that the farmers, and people generally in the east, are agreeable to the development of the dam on the South Saskatchewan river. If the result will be the production of more wheat and flour, if it will make the western provinces more prosperous, then I am sure all the people in Canada will be in favour of it. There is no doubt in my mind that through the years it will pay for itself.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture said that as far back as 1947 he was sold on the idea. The minister has had four long years to sell the idea to the rest of the cabinet, but, according to what he said yesterday, up to now that has not been done. We know that the hon. gentleman is one minister who is thoroughly familiar with his department, and we know also that he is a clever politician. I do not like to see projects of this kind carried over from year to year. If it was a good thing for Canada in 1947, it should be good in 1951; it should not be left until 1953 or 1954, just before an election, before work is commenced. Why put off until tomorrow what you can do today, if it is necessary and if it will make our country more prosperous?

I think the irrigation scheme is a proper one; it has worked out successfully in other parts of southern Alberta, and at various other places in Canada. There is no doubt it will be successful in the South Saskatchewan area. My late colleague, Mr. John R. MacNicol, who sat in the house for a number of years, talked about this project for many sessions. It was not a matter of selling the idea to the government, because the government must have known about it for a long time. The late Mr. MacNicol was an engineer by profession. He knew the area, and had travelled by river from one end of it to the other. He was convinced that the dam could be built, and that when built it would stay there.

Some Liberal members referred to the production of power, but I am not in favour of the dominion government developing power. It is quite all right to build a dam for irrigation purposes, but the production of power should be left to the provincial government or to a corporation similar to the Ontario hydro. After all, the C.C.F. government have been bragging about the situation in Saskatchewan, and I think they are quite capable of taking care of the power situation.

There is one question I should like to ask the minister which he can answer later. A few weeks ago the price of butter jumped ten cents a pound. I should like to know why that sharp increase occurred, and also why the price of margarine immediately jumped ten or twelve cents a pound. These things should be controlled. I am not going into the question of price control, because the chairman would stop me, but I think this is information we should have from the minister.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of saying anything about western wheat, because that is about all we have heard for the last eleven years I have been here. I have no objection to the western wheat farmer getting all he thinks he should get or should have got out of his wheat, but I do not think the treasury should be bled to meet the losses that have been sustained. If the marketing was not done properly, then we should go back to where the fault lies rather than try to take it out of the treasury. That is all I have to say about that.

The dairy industry of Canada is in about the worst condition it has been in for a long time, for several reasons. One reason is the entry of cheap oils to be used in the manufacture of a spread as a substitute for butter. The dairy industry cannot compete against them. If the government or the Minister of Agriculture is not any more interested in the dairy industry than to let that sort of thing happen, then we cannot expect very much.

Mr. Gibson: The minister is just one man.

Mr. Cardiff: You cannot compete against cheap oils. If people want to buy margarine, that is all very well, but the dairy industry cannot compete against such a spread. I suggest to the government that milk production should be pooled. I do not know whether any thought has been given to this in past years, but it should be considered. There is no reason why a farmer producing milk on one side of the road should receive a different price from that received by the farmer on the other side of the road simply because he sells to a creamery, a cheese factory, a concentrated milk plant or what have you.

Milk production should be pooled and the products sold at the same price according to grade. If it was handled in that way it could then be put into the production of whatever commodity was most needed. That is the only way you will ever have sufficient butter to supply the demand. You will not get it even at 58 or 60 cents a pound, because too many farmers are allowing calves to suck cows because they cannot see their way clear to working ten or fifteen hours a day and paying income tax at the same rate as other people who work only an eight hour day. A farmer must work ten or fifteen hours a day to get up into the taxable income bracket, while other people can make the same money working an eight hour day. If a farmer gets into the income tax paying bracket it is because he works long hours. There should be some adjustment.

I should like the minister to tell us why the price of hogs went down about four or five cents a pound a few weeks ago and yet the retail price of pork did not drop at all. Then the price rose again after a short period. The only one who suffered was the farmer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister where the Nova Scotia potato grower stands with regard to the subsidy on potatoes. There are quite a few potato growers in Nova Scotia. It is true that they do not always have to take as low a price as the potato growers in Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick, but sometimes they have to take less than the 44 or 45 cents per bushel which was mentioned last evening and this afternoon.

I support the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, who have asked for a support price for potatoes in the maritime provinces. This is a large item of production in those three provinces, especially in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. I do not see why a farmer who has put in long hours growing potatoes should have to sell them at 25 cents or 30 cents per bushel with no floor under his price, while the western farmer gets a good price for his wheat and has the benefit of a floor under his price. The same goes for butter. The potato grower should receive the same consideration. I want the minister to tell us why Nova Scotia was not brought under this agreement. It may be the fault of the provincial government. I understand they have a good marketing board in that province. I should like to see a support price for potatoes, to govern not only the old crop but to be carried forward in connection with the new crop.

Mr. Higgins: Mr. Chairman, so that there may be no misunderstanding in the minds of the minister and hon. members I should like to put in a word for the newest province. There may be some who wonder whether we produce anything down there except fish. But we do grow some potatoes and other vegetables, and I submit that our dairy industry also should receive some consideration. We have a peculiar situation in that the United States bases fly in their milk from Prince Edward Island and thus by-pass the richest part of the newest province. It seems to me that the western part of the province could supply the needs of these bases.

When the minister replies, as I believe he will, I should like him to give us his views on price support. I believe he is entirely in favour of support and floor prices for agricultural products. I am satisfied that he has always felt that that is a good thing. I should like to know whether there is anything bad about floor prices. Is there any reason why floor prices cannot be applied to all commodities produced in Canada? Is there any disadvantage in putting floor prices under the different commodities produced all across Canada?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Charlton: I think the minister is willing to answer these questions before the item carries.

Mr. Gardiner: This is scarcely the time for cross-questioning. I think the best time for that is when we get to the items concerned. I am quite prepared to give a general reply to what has been discussed, but I doubt very much if at this stage I should discuss every individual item. They are all covered under specific items. When we come to dairying we can discuss dairying much better than we can discuss it now.

On the general question which has just been referred to, I would say to the hon. member that I am going to Newfoundland on Sunday.

Mr. Higgins: You are very welcome.

Mr. Gardiner: I intend to spend three or four days there next week and make myself better acquainted with their situation in relation to agricultural production. I hope that following that visit I shall be in a better position to discuss matters of that kind. I would point out, however, that the only criticism I heard from Newfoundland with regard to potatoes came at the time of our conference last year, when it was being suggested that we should subsidize the marketing of potatoes in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

An hon. Member: What about Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gardiner: Nova Scotia of course had put forward their suggestions too. However, I was told that the practice in Newfoundland had been to encourage their people to produce potatoes for consumption by those who live in Newfoundland, and that the practice of the government in the past had been to encourage a rather higher price for potatoes. They had developed a condition under which the farmers were able to produce their potatoes and obtain for them, in the local markets, prices which paid them fairly well. They took some objection to our subsidizing the marketing of potatoes to make it possible for someone to come in and undersell them. I think there is some reason in that. It was definitely stated at the time that they did not follow along with some others who were advocating another policy.

On the general question of the marketing of potatoes, we have no objection whatsoever to doing the same thing in one province as in another. It is for that reason that we have insisted on the producers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick organizing under some system that could be applied in other provinces if other provinces wished to apply it. The system now being followed there in connection with the marketing of surplus potatoes for this past year is that of making use of the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act under which they set up boards which take delivery of the potatoes and pay to the producer a certain initial payment.

The suggestion was made a few moments ago that 22 cents a bushel is paid by the people who process the potatoes into starch, and I think that is about the correct figure. It was also suggested that someone else was going to pay some other amount. Everything that has to do with that is written into the agreement, and, so far as I can recall, the only order in council—I do not have it here at the moment, but it will be here later when we come to that matter—is the one giving me authority to sign the agreement. The agreement is with the marketing boards in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. If Nova Scotia desires a similar agreement, it will be necessary first for the producers in Nova Scotia to form a similar organization and come here with the idea of obtaining similar support.

Dairy products were referred to, and I notice that the member who asked some of the questions is not here at the moment; but there was a general question having to do with the price of butter at different times. I might tell him, and others who are interested, something that apparently is not generally understood. There never was a time last year when we were short of butter in Canada. As a matter of fact we had 10 million pounds of butter still in storage on the first of April, which is a higher amount than we had in seven out of the last eleven years. The first of April is the beginning of the month when our production again reaches the amount of our consumption. There was no shortage of butter in Canada at any time last year. I think if we start from there we can reason much more—

Mr. Cardiff: Why did you import some?

Mr. Gardiner: We did not import any. As a matter of fact we tried to stop some people from importing it, but they did import it.

Mr. Charlton: The government allowed the importation of the butter.

Mr. Gardiner: Eventually, after it was purchased, and purchased in spite of our views on the matter, we permitted that butter to come in, with the suggestion that it was to be put absolutely at our disposal when it came in; but that was not done. All that can be fully explained when we come to discuss dairy products.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask the minister a question.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend asked me to make a speech on this matter, at the outset, and if he will permit me to make it, we can have a discussion when we come to dairy products.

Mr. Charlton: The question is relevant. The minister has referred to butter, and I think this would be the right time to ask the question.

Mr. Gardiner: Ask it.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will realize that on the first item we have a general discussion. The Minister of Agriculture is now giving a general reply to the general discussion which has taken place. However, when it comes to answering questions, I think the practice has been to wait until the specific item is before the committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in any debate in this house a member may rise and ask a speaker if a question can be asked. Why is there any objection? The minister is willing to answer.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will understand that whenever an hon. member wants to ask a question of the member who has the floor, that member must give his consent.

Mr. Green: The minister has.

The Deputy Chairman: Usually the member who has the floor acknowledges that he consents to reply to the question by taking his seat. The Minister of Agriculture took his seat, as did the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth, when I stood up. Therefore it was apparent that he was not giving his consent. As a matter of fact he said that he would deal with it when we come to the item. That is by no means giving consent to the question asked by the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, the minister said he would allow the question, so I think it would be all right. Why did the government not give out information regarding the number of pounds of butter being held by the government if there was no scarcity?

Mr. Gardiner: The government not only gave out the information, but I read it very carefully from my place in the house. If the hon. member will refer to Hansard for this session he will find that at the time I announced the floor price for butter for the coming year as 58 cents, I pointed out clearly, and emphasized the fact that there had not been any shortage of butter, and there was not any shortage on the first of April of this year. We had approximately 10 million pounds.

Mr. Charlton: That was long after the price had gone up to 85 cents.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: It was not long after the price had gone up to 85 cents. It was just about in the middle of the experience.

Mr. Cardiff: Who got the difference between the price at which it was brought in and the price at which it was sold?

Mr. Gardiner: If we had followed the policy my hon. friend has been advocating for some years, they would have had that margin all the time. As a matter of fact by following the policy we did, butter was absolutely controlled during all the time that we had butter. We had butter until the week of March 24. While we had butter the price remained at 62 to 64 cents, but when the government had no more butter—butter was still in the country, nevertheless, in storage—the price went up as high as 84 cents. I believe a question which is just as important as why it went up is why it went down again. It went down 12 cents in two days. I have a better idea as to why that happened than I have as to why it went up. I can explain that fully when we come to discuss dairy products. It is for that reason we are interested in seeing to it that the government does have some control over the product, and for the last two years we have been attempting to have that control.

At the end of the year preceding the one about which we are now talking, we were accused of having too much butter, and we had 28 million pounds. Everyone said that was too much, and we should not have had it. It was a surplus that we could not sell. Then, when we got down to 10 million pounds we were told we did not have any butter at all. Going back over the years we have found that when we had 10 million pounds on the first of April we had all the butter we ought to have. In the years preceding this year, the men who are now being accused of having taken too much for butter always had the right to charge more for butter in the wintertime than they paid for it in the summer. When a committee of this house investigated the matter a few years ago, it was admitted by those who are now being accused of having taken too much for butter and margarine that they did have a margin of profit of about 12 cents a pound on butter. I have not any doubt that for the short period of two or three weeks this spring these people had a margin which gave them a considerable profit.

The question which has been asked is, why did this government not do something about it? The real answer to that is that the authority is with the province. During that period any one province in which butter was stored could have controlled the butter. This government has no control over prices in that sense except during wartime. The trouble with some of my friends is that all their experience in public life has been during wartime or since the war, and they believe the authority of this government is the same in peace as it is during a war.

Mr. Cardiff: How could the provinces control the price?

Mr. Gardiner: In exactly the same way as they now control the price of milk. A further suggestion is made that we should do something to ensure that the price of milk for all purposes is the same. Again that comes under the control of the provinces. There is an organization already set up under the provincial legislation to handle cheese in Ontario. There is no reason in the world why they cannot handle all the milk, butter, and everything else that is produced from milk in the province of Ontario in the same way as they are handling cheese under that act. Each time the question has been discussed here the method suggested is the same method as being used in connection with potatoes in the maritimes, namely that the milk be delivered to one central farmers' co-operative, and that the same price be paid for the milk no matter what use is going to be made of it. Then, there should be a final payment made on the same basis. That has been operating with regard to whole milk in every province in Canada ever since milk boards were set up, but it has not been operating in connection with milk which goes into the production of cheese, butter and canned milk.

In so far as whole milk is concerned there were quotas set before the war ever started, and the price was set. An individual was told the price at which he could sell whole milk, how much of it would go to the cheese factory or somewhere else, and that was just the beginning of the plan suggested by the hon. member. I am sure that every dairy farmer in Ontario realizes that is a matter which could be handled under the present provincial legislation in the province of Ontario, and it has been handled that way for some considerable time.

Mr. Charlton: I did not intend to make any remarks at this time, but I cannot let the minister get away with the statements he has just made regarding butter. It is not good for the industry to have butter prices as high as they were this winter. The minister says that we were never short of butter. On the one hand, he tells us that the price did not go up until after the government stores were depleted, while on the other he tells us the government had 10 million pounds.

Mr. Gardiner: I did not say the government had 10 million pounds. I said that there were 10 million pounds in storage, but we did not have it. The trade had it, and they charged what they liked for it.

Mr. Charlton: Is it not a fact that the government did allow a further importation of 4·5 million pounds of butter, knowing very well that there were still 10 million pounds in the country, and also allowed the trade to make practically half a million dollars' profit on that transaction?

Mr. Gardiner: That is not true either, but go on and make your speech.

Mr. Charlton: According to a statement the minister made at Macdonald college the price of that butter to the trade was 40·4 cents. I have not the clipping containing that statement here, but I have it in my office. That is the minister's own statement.

Mr. Gardiner: The price of that butter to the men who purchased it, laid down in Halifax, was 56·5 cents. Never at any time have I said it was 40 cents. I have said that if it had been delivered in Canada at the same price at which it was sold to the British, it could have been delivered here at 40 cents, but it was not.

Mr. Charlton: Obviously, then the minister was misquoted because the 40·4 cents was mentioned in the clipping.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I have not seen that. I have seen the statements in most newspapers, and they have never said that. The statement I made on the subject appeared in Hansard, and you can read it there and check it.

Mr. Charlton: I can bring the clipping down and read it to the minister. I used it in the budget debate, but the minister was not here so it was lost.

Mr. Gardiner: Then it is not a correct statement of anything I have ever said. What I have said is in Hansard, and the hon. member can read it there.

Mr. Charlton: It is rather odd, Mr. Chairman, that that is the only time the 40·4 cent price ever appeared in a newspaper or anywhere else. Every other time this 56·5 cent price has been given out. I wonder whether the trade was a little displeased about that price being quoted by the minister at Macdonald college. It appears obvious that they may have been. There is no doubt that it was in that clipping dealing with the speech the minister made at Macdonald, and it was not refuted when I quoted it in the budget debate.

Mr. Gardiner: In order to get the record straight, the first time that statement was made was during a speech I read to the federation of agriculture in the city of Calgary. It is all on the record. I read it in the newspapers, and it was broadcast.

Mr. Charlton: I heard it.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend heard it, and he knows what I am now stating is correct. The statement was that if butter had been laid down in Canada on the same basis as it was sold to the British it could have been laid down here at 40·4 cents.

Mr. Charlton: There is no use arguing about it until I get the newspaper clipping; then I shall let the minister see it. It will prove to him that he did make that statement, or he will probably say he was misquoted.

Mr. Thatcher: There is one matter which I should like to bring to the minister's attention. Many young farmers in my riding have written to me concerning the difficulties they are experiencing today in buying land. This is due to the high cost of the land, and the amount of equipment that is required on a farm. Many of these young people are finding it extremely difficult to get into farming on their own. As a result of that many of these young people are drifting into the cities, and there is an increasing amount of land being worked by tenant farmers. I believe the Saskatchewan federation of agriculture presented a brief to the cabinet a short time ago making this recommendation, and I should like to put it on Hansard.

> We recommend that the federal farm loan act be amended to make provision for a program whereby fully qualified young farm people under proper supervision may secure the greater part of their capital which would be repaid on a long term amortization basis.

I presume that other provinces have the same problem. I should like the minister to tell me today whether or not the federal farm loan act could be amended in some way so that it would enable these young farmers to purchase their land at least partially through a loan. Perhaps the province should contribute some part of it. Maybe there could be a dominion-provincial agreement. But I should like to tell the minister that this is a serious problem for many of our young rural people. I do not know what the answer is but I think it should be feasible that this federal farm loan act should be extended so that young farmers could buy their farms.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Thatcher: No. I wonder if the minister can tell me if that matter is being considered?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: It does not come under my estimates. I do not think I can. It is under finance. The farm loan board is administered under the Department of Finance. It is not administered under my department.

Mr. Cardiff: Does the minister care to make a statement with regard to what I had to say about hogs a little while ago? I think the farmers of this country have been extremely kind to the packers.

Mr. Gardiner: Again this is one of those questions that we could deal with better when we come to hogs. But as I remember the statement, it was to the effect that some time a few weeks ago hogs went down three or four cents.

Mr. Cardiff: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: Then I had said to someone here just while the hon. member was asking about that: I wonder if he wants me to tell him why they went up again three or four cents a few days later. Then he proceeded to ask me that question himself. I cannot keep track of all the changes in price that take place at Toronto, London, Stratford or wherever one might be delivering his hogs. I know that there was for a few days a drop in the price of hogs. Then in a few days hogs went back up again. In other words, I presume that the persons who were buying hogs had a scare of some kind of something that was done in the United States or something somebody said we were going to do here, and the bidding was down; or there may have been too many hogs on some markets, and the bidding was down for a few days. But whatever happened, the price of hogs went up again inside of a few days.

Again that is a matter which is not under our control. If an Ontario farmer delivers a hog to anybody in the province of Ontario, the price control with regard to the delivery of that hog is under the provincial authority and not the federal. If a farmer tries to deliver a hog over into Manitoba, that is another question. But if one farmer is delivering a hog in the province of Ontario to somebody there, the only control over that transaction is with the province.

Mr. Cardiff: I should just like to say one further word. The fact is that you have to deliver your hogs at a certain weight. If you keep hogs over a certain weight, you will be docked. When there is a heavy run of hogs or a delivery of hogs, down goes the price two or three cents, and those farmers who have those hogs lose that money. There is nothing fair about that. The buyers seem to know exactly when to put that price down a few cents; they get a nice run of hogs and then back up again it goes. I do not think there is any other reason in the world for it than to get a few cheap hogs.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry to have to refer to this matter again, but the minister just said that the farm loan act would come under the Department of Finance. I realize that he is correct about that. But at the same time I know that there is no use of that coming up under finance unless the Department of Agriculture thinks that this scheme would be feasible; that is, of providing capital loans to young farmers who are trying to get started.

Mr. Gibson: Why not to young loggers?

Mr. Thatcher: We help many people who live in the cities to buy their homes. Why would it not be just as sensible to have an act something like the National Housing Act so that young men in rural parts of the country could become established on farms? That is the only way that I can see that we are going to be able to prevent this continuous drift to the cities. I wish the minister would just say whether the department has considered that procedure. If it is not feasible —and maybe it is not—I wish he would tell us.

Mr. Gardiner: The present provision of the farm loan act, as I recall it, is that one must have security equal to about 50 per cent. Perhaps I am going too far when I say it is in the act. It is at least in the regulations under which the act is administered. One who is making a loan from the farm loan board must be able to give security equal to 50 per cent of the loan at least. That is where the young man runs into his difficulties. He says: I cannot give security equal to 50 per cent. It is not considered wise to make loans on any other basis at the rate at which the loans are made under the farm loan act. As I recall it, the rate is 4½ per cent. It is considered that if you were going to take any greater risks than are taken, you would have to have a higher rate. That is the answer that always comes back when anyone applies for a loan on a farm. They say: How much security can you give? If the young man is able to give 50 per cent security, he can get the loan. If he is not, he may find some difficulty in getting it, unless he can get someone who is willing to give that 50 per cent security for him.

Mr. Thatcher: If I may, I just want to say to the minister that a few years ago that was not too bad when the amount involved was only $1,000 or several thousand dollars. But today, with the high cost of land and the high cost of equipment, even $10,000 in my part of the country will not go too far when you start out to equip a farm. I therefore think that the time has come to amend this act and to make it more extensive.

Mr. Charlton: I have the quotation from Hansard here. Obviously I must have read the clipping, in view of the fact that it appears in Hansard. I can get the clipping later and show it to the minister. But if I may be allowed to do so, I should like to read the quotation as it appears in Hansard, as taken from the Globe and Mail of March 1, 1951. It is as follows:

Food Producers Merit Fair Prices, Gardiner Holds

Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec, Feb. 27—Canadian Press—Agriculture Minister Gardiner said today that Canadian food producers have two primary objectives—to produce enough food for our own people and to sell at a sufficiently high price to encourage them to keep on producing. New Zealand butter, which Mr. Gardiner said the government did not want to see brought into Canada, was laid down at Halifax at a cost of 40·4 cents a pound. The floor price in Canada was 53 cents. Canadian farmers could not compete with New Zealand butter. The butter dealers were selling the imported butter at 56½ cents a pound.

"The market price in this country must be comparatively high," said the minister.

Mr. Gardiner: That is obviously pretty badly mixed up. I have here the statement which was made. It is as follows:

Britain would have been quite prepared to buy all New Zealand's surplus, but New Zealand thought she could sell considerable outside the agreement at a higher price. She asked to have 10 per cent released from the agreement, but after considerable negotiation Britain got 92 per cent—

Since this speech was made I learned that she really got 90 per cent.

—at 33·3 cents per pound f.o.b. New Zealand. This is equivalent to 40·4 cents landed at Halifax.

The New Zealand Co-op sold the 8 per cent to Canadian importers at 56½ cents a pound landed at Halifax.

My hon. friend listened to this statement when it was read to him and others at Calgary. Why does he try to make me say something else, when he sat and listened to me read it? It does not matter what the Globe and Mail says I said. He knows what I said.

Mr. Charlton: If the minister is saying that I did not read the article right, may I say that I read only what is in the article. I did not hear what he said in Macdonald. I only heard what he said at Calgary.

Mr. Gardiner: It is just the same as what I said everywhere. The statement continues:

The New Zealand Co-op sold the 8 per cent to Canadian importers at 56½ cents a pound landed at Halifax. If you deduct 5 cents for duty, this leaves about 11 cents a pound profit over the British price.

That is the statement. Different arguments were based upon that statement but these are the facts in connection with it.

Mr. Sinnott: I have a few remarks to make before this item is carried. Before I start my remarks I wish to say that hon. members on this side of the house and over there in what we call the "rump" are very thankful for the effort the Minister of Agriculture is making to help agriculture all the way through. If the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth would be a little more helpful to the Minister of Agriculture instead of jumping on him with both feet at every chance he gets we would get along a little better.

It has been clearly demonstrated this afternoon that those who want to obtain a federal subsidy on potatoes have to work through the provincial governments. The provincial governments have to ask for it. When I mentioned potatoes in Manitoba last year I was told that the amount produced there did not warrant a subsidy. However I want to assure the Minister of Agriculture that the hundreds of farmers along the Red river, both north and south of Winnipeg on both sides of the river, produce hundreds of thousands of bushels. If other governments are applying for a federal subsidy then I shall have to make it my business to inform the provincial government of Manitoba to apply for the subsidy on behalf of those farmers out there. They are not blaming the Minister of Agriculture for not paying a subsidy heretofore. The sole responsibility will be put on the provincial government.

A little while ago butter was mentioned. I am in agreement with some of the hon. members who have criticized the amount of labour it takes to produce a pound of butter and the amount of labour it takes to produce a pound of margarine. There is a great difference in producing a pound of margarine as compared with a pound of butter. It takes much more labour to produce a pound of butter. It is up to this government to stop the seal oil and whale oil coming in at low prices. It is coming in at 23 cents odd, and last year it was as low as 11 cents odd. Since I happen to have a little invested in the whale oil business myself I know what it is being purchased for. Last year Canada Packers purchased from the Adanac Whale and Fish Company many thousands of gallons of oil at 11 cents odd a gallon, and that same oil is being manufactured into margarine.

An hon. Member: It was 11 cents a pound.

Mr. Sinnott: Eleven cents a pound, rather. Here is something to which I object rather strongly. The people of Canada are told by the press in big headlines that now you can colour Parkay margarine in two minutes or less. In other words, they are trying to make the white margarine into a package that looks like butter, and therefore they are trying to fool the public. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are paid out in advertising margarine. If the public is going to fall for that stuff it is their fault. It would be to the advantage of the dairy farmers and the dairy producers all through the country to counteract these margarine advertisements in the paper and tell the people just what they are getting for their money.

Mr. Sinclair: Good food.

Mr. Sinnott: It may be good for the pigs, or something like that, but not for the people. We now have interruptions from the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, who was responsible for making the manufacture of margarine legal in Canada, thereby doing a great disservice to the consumers of the country.

Mr. Sinclair: The Supreme Court of Canada did that.

Mr. Sinnott: Possibly. Let me relieve him a little of his misgivings. The power is now given to the provincial governments to ban margarine. I must give the province of Quebec and the premier of Quebec great credit for prohibiting the manufacture of margarine in that province.

Mr. Sinclair: Tory reaction.

Mr. Sinnott: If the Tories in Ontario would do the same thing, and if the government in Manitoba would bar the manufacture of margarine—

Mr. Brooks: How about the groups in the maritimes?

Mr. Gardiner: Jones did it.

Mr. Sinnott: If you have a bone of contention, bring it forth and see if you can get the legislation passed.

Mr. Brooks: My contention is, you should not leave them out.

Mr. Sinclair: Are you a Liberal?

Mr. Sinnott: The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance asks me if I am a Liberal. Let me say this to him before it is too late. Hundreds of thousands of farm boys are leaving the farms because they cannot produce butter as margarine is produced. If my hon. friend to my left had milked a few cows himself and had cleaned a few barns he would know what labour goes into a pound of butter. Probably this year when he is on his way home I will invite him in to see how the barns are cleaned.

Mr. Sinclair: You won't have to clean barns if you use margarine.

Mr. Sinnott: No, but at this time when we need every Canadian dollar we can get we are importing all this cheap oil from the United States and also the ingredients that go into the manufacture of margarine. It is time to put a stop to it.

Mr. Carroll: Talk to the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Sinnott: We have had a little information from Saskatchewan with regard to the dominion government helping those people on land. All I can say is that this is another matter which should be left to the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: Why should it be?

Mr. Sinnott: I will tell you why.

Mr. Thatcher: Why?

Mr. Sinnott: Just a minute. It should be left to the government of Saskatchewan which at the present time is making it as difficult as it can for the—

Mr. Thatcher: Don't you think that the C.C.F. government—

Mr. Sinnott: Just a minute until I am finished. Then you can have your say. If the government of Saskatchewan would give the farm boys a chance, would give them an opportunity to buy some of that provincial land—

Mr. Thatcher: They are doing it.

Mr. Sinnott: They are not giving any farm boy in Saskatchewan a chance to buy one acre of land.

Mr. Thatcher: That is nonsense, and you know it.

Mr. Sinnott: The provincial government of Saskatchewan will not sell one acre of land—

Mr. Thatcher: That is nonsense.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will address himself to the Chair. I do not believe he should discuss policies which are enforced by the provincial government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: He is not discussing anything.

The Deputy Chairman: He should relate his remarks to agriculture as administered by the federal government.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was just following up the discussion—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. An hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Carroll: It may be a little late, but I do not think that the subject of oleomargarine is a proper subject to be discussed in this house. I think it is absolutely out of order, especially on the estimates that are before the committee at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Carroll: The ingredients that go into the manufacture of margarine come within the customs department, and should not be discussed when the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture are before the house.

Mr. Cardiff: Do you think it has nothing to do with agriculture?

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will realize that while the hon. member is discussing the production of margarine he is also discussing dairy products, and that therefore he may be in order in the general discussion. In any event, the hon. member has raised his point of order, and has put the question up to the Chairman. I must remind him, in any event, the point of order is raised, as he says, too late. The matter is over now.

Mr. Sinnott: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was just following up the matter that the hon. member for Moose Jaw took up with the Minister of Agriculture, and I was pointing out very clearly why it was so difficult for the young fellows in Saskatchewan to get a start under the government of that province. In regard to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who interrupted me by saying that we had no right to discuss—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond raised a point of order on which I have ruled. The hon. member may continue his speech.

Mr. Sinnott: We are now discussing agriculture. Until something comes along to displace it, I think we would be doing the farmers of Canada a great disservice if in the House of Commons we did not come to their protection. The farmers in the House of Commons are unorganized and do not stand in the same category as hardware men, lumber producers, or any of these high-powered selling organizations.

Mr. Sinclair: And they never got $65 million.

Mr. Sinnott: I wish the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance would address the Chair when he speaks. That $65 million refers to agriculture, too. I would tell him, however, that it will be a long time before the farmers of Canada will have anything like 90 per cent of parity.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to ask the minister two general questions. Perhaps they should be asked later, but this would seem to be an opportune time. The first has to do with the over-all policy of the Department of Agriculture. Since we have been discussing wheat at this session, and since so many people from other parts of Canada seem to feel so unhappy because the farmers of the west are given some consideration, I wonder if it would not be wise for the minister to lay down the over-all policy of the government in respect of agriculture. Is not the government trying to be just as fair to the potato producers in the maritime provinces as it is to the wheat producers? Is there any such thing as discrimination between the treatment of one group and that of the other? I do not believe there is. But if the minister were to lay down what the policy is it would prevent those who represent certain other portions of agriculture from everlastingly making remarks to the effect that the amount they are getting is not fair.

Mr. Brooks: We never got $65 million.

Mr. Blackmore: And we have to take all that kind of nonsense, too. Why do not the members from the maritimes get up and make a plea for their own welfare, rather than criticize others? Why do they not do something positive? Let them state what they want and why they want it, instead of everlastingly whining and complaining because others are getting what they are seeking.

The same thing applies to Ontario. As a member of parliament I am prepared to support the interests of agriculture in any part of the country—and I do not care what part it is. I expect all people from all parts of the country to feel the same way about it. The sooner we all do that, instead of acting like a lot of silly crabs, the better we shall get along. But we should have a policy laid down so that every member will realize that there has been an attempt to treat all parts of the country fairly.

Mr. Riley: Mr. Chairman, I suggest the language being used by the hon. member for Lethbridge in respect of the maritime provinces is unparliamentary, and that he should withdraw it. He referred to maritime members as whiners and crabs. I suggest that, in a manly fashion, he should withdraw those remarks.

Mr. Blackmore: If my remarks have offended the hon. member, then, in as manly a fashion as I can, I shall withdraw.

I should like to mention one further matter. I believe we are safe in saying that the business of agriculture is to see to it that we have the food for Canada that we need, and that we have food for export where we can export it profitably. Would the minister tell the committee what the general policy of the government is toward ensuring adequately the production of various commodities in Canada we are going to need. I am sure the minister has some policy in mind, but it has not been stated before the house up to the moment. For instance, I have been alarmed, as I am sure other hon. members have been, to see the number of milch cows being so rapidly depleted in Ontario. To my mind that would seem to be a completely unsound situation, and I would like the minister to tell us in a general way what the Department of Agriculture has in mind to balance up the over-all production in Canada so that we shall not be running into the danger of a shortage of milk in various parts of the country.

I hope I have made my two requests clear. I am asking, first, for the over-all policy of the government in its attempt to be fair to the producers of all kinds of food in Canada, whether it be in connection with the production of potatoes, cheese, pork, beef, wheat or any other commodity. Secondly, I would like the minister to state the over-all policy pursued by the government in an endeavour to maintain a proper supply position in Canada, so that our granary, our pantry, our larder, whatever we choose to call it, will be normal and equal to the demands which may be made upon it.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it would be as convincing for me to outline a plan or the plans which have been put into effect, and I do not know just why I should be asked to do it. At page 1494 of Hansard for this session, I placed on record at the request of hon. members the results of the policy.

I think it was agreed then that we had paid $731 million over a period of about ten years to the farmers in subsidies, premiums and payments of other kinds, including somewhere in the neighbourhood of $18 million a year in freight assistance in order to make it possible to have many of these products produced at a cost lower than they otherwise would have been produced for a considerable section of Canada. Anyone who examines that record will agree, I suggest, that we did divide the money as equally as possible among all the farmers, in accordance with their needs, at the time the action was taken.

That general policy has been carried out since 1944 under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which I hold here in my hand. One member after another has risen in his place and suggested that we should follow the policy that has been followed in the United States. I do not like to make critical statements about what has happened in another country; but one has only to mention what did happen in connection with potatoes, which have been discussed here today. One need only mention what happened in connection with eggs, and in connection with other farm products which are more or less perishable because of the policy of encouraging production which was followed in the United States.

You may follow policies which are based upon some formula that some college professor works out—and they may lead you farther than expected. These formulae which are supposed to settle everything are all very nice when they are set out, but when you see the results of some of them you hesitate to put them into effect. We have not followed the plan in that regard which has been followed in the United States. In other words, we have not set parity at a certain level and said that we were going to guarantee 90 per cent of parity. We said something a little different. In order to recall to hon. members' minds what we did say, I am going to read one section of the act of 1944 under which assistance has been given to farmers in whatever section of Canada they may be living and whatever they may be producing. Section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act reads:

(1) For the purposes of this act, the board shall, subject to and in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council, have authority

(a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market;

Just to call your attention to what we are doing, we say: "We will buy all the butter anyone will sell us at 58 cents; we will buy all the eggs that anyone will deliver to us in the fall of the year at 38 cents; we will buy all the pork that is delivered to us on the basis of $32.50," and so on. In other words, we have acted under that section in connection with many farm products. The next paragraph reads:

(b) to purchase at such prices any agricultural product, if such product, on inspection, meets standards as to grade and quality prescribed by or under any act of the parliament of Canada; provided that any agricultural product, for which dominion government standards have not been established, may be purchased by the board on such basis of quality as the board may prescribe;

(c) to pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, as determined by the board, at which such product is sold in the market during a specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price;

It is under that section that we can distribute $300,000 to the potato growers.

Mr. Blackmore: Was it under that particular provision that the $65 million was paid to the wheat growers of the west?

Mr. Gardiner: No. It definitely states at the beginning of the act that it does not apply to wheat. All that we would have needed to do in order to have wheat on the same basis as any other farm product would have been to amend the act. Then we could have paid $65 million to the wheat producers as a subsidy in the same way as we have paid $149 million to the dairy industry. When hon. members get up in the house and say that we have paid out $65 million to the wheat growers, in the first place that was not done in the sense that you can pay a subsidy under this act. It was done for other reasons. Other products have been brought under this particular legislation during this period of time.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister is telling me exactly what I wanted to hear. Is there any protection for the wheat grower under any particular act?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no special protection. Wheat is delivered to the wheat board under the terms of the international wheat agreement which was drawn up by some 40 countries meeting at Washington. They agreed as to what price would be paid for the distribution of certain quotas of wheat from different countries. The farmer has the protection that wheat will not be sold during the present year under $1.30 per bushel; that is, he cannot be compelled to sell at under $1.30 per bushel, and the consumer is protected at the other end by the provision that the producer cannot demand more than $1.80 for it. Whether you can call that assistance or protection, the fact is that he is operating under it.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister is discussing the international wheat agreement.

Mr. Brooks: The minister is referring to the payment that could be made to the potato producers under this act, and he said that the wheat producers were not under it but that the $65 million could have been paid under the act.

Mr. Gardiner: No, could not have been paid.

Mr. Brooks: Could have been paid if wheat had been included. Were the payments to the dairy producers and others based more or less on the cost of production and was the price in the case of wheat—

Mr. Gardiner: If I may rise to a point of order, I am trying to put on the record the answers to what my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge has suggested and I think it would be better if they were to go on the record.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member for Lethbridge seemed to be satisfied with what he was hearing, but I do not feel that I am satisfied that the potato producer and the wheat producer are in the same category.

Mr. Gardiner: You will be better satisfied if you let me finish reading this. The next paragraphs read:

(d) to sell or otherwise dispose of any agricultural product purchased by the board;

(e) to package, process, store, ship, transport, export or insure any agricultural product;

(f) to enter into contracts or appoint agents to do anything authorized under this act;

(g) to purchase at market or contract prices and export any agricultural product under any contract between His Majesty in right of Canada and any other government or agency thereof and to do all things necessarily incidental thereto;

(h) to purchase at the request of any department of the government of Canada any agricultural product required by such department;

(i) to appoint commodity boards or other agents to undertake the purchase and the disposition of agricultural products;

(j) to appoint a committee or committees to assist the board in an advisory capacity.

Those are all the different paragraphs of subsection 1 and they indicate what the government can do about prices. Then when we come to deal with the question as to whether we should have a formula to indicate what parity is and operate under that, that is dealt with in subsection 2 in this way:

(2) In prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

That does not use the word "parity", but it sets out in clear language that costs are to be taken into consideration when the price offered by the government is set. We took into consideration the cost of producing butter when we said that we are prepared to pay 58 cents. We took into consideration the cost of producing other products when we suggested that we were prepared to buy them at particular prices. I think the results that we have obtained in that regard all along the line have been fairly satisfactory. In the case of butter, we started out at 58 cents and we operated for one year. As I remember, nearly every hon. member who spoke in this house criticized us because we were getting too much butter. They said that we would not be able to sell it. Then we cut it down 5 cents and now they tell us we did not get enough butter.

Mr. Brooks: The minister was worried himself.

Mr. Gardiner: We have put it up 5 cents, and it is again at 58 cents.

Mr. Charlton: Will the minister suggest that is the cost price of producing butter?

Mr. Gardiner: I would suggest that farmers —and I am speaking of the general run of farmers, not some fellow who is farming on $500 an acre land just outside the city of Toronto or some other place—who are milking half a dozen to a dozen cows on their farms, and farmers in our section of Canada where all the surplus butter is produced if there is any produced, have produced it for very much less.

Mr. Charlton: That is not answering the question.

Mr. Gardiner: If I were to ask my hon. friend whether he thinks 25 cents would be enough he would probably say "no" quite readily. If I were to ask him whether 75 cents was too much he would probably say yes. The actual cost is somewhere in between, and I would say to him that I doubt whether there are any two farmers in Canada whose costs are exactly the same.

Mr. Cardiff: That is true.

Mr. Lennard: The real cost is in between what?

Mr. Gardiner: Seventy-five and twenty-five. Fifty-eight cents is not very far from halfway between. In any case, after giving consideration to all the facts as they were presented to us we said: We will buy any butter that is offered to us at 58 cents. We said that one year and we got 60 million pounds. We said 53 cents the next year and we got 34 million pounds. We have said 58 cents this year and up until today we have not got any, but that does not mean we will not get any between now and next fall. We may get some at 58 cents some time. If we do not it will be because butter is selling at a higher price right across Canada, and for no other reason. Figured on the same basis as 58 cents was, I am told that butter is now selling at approximately 63 to 64 cents. If it is, the farmer is selling in a market that is 5 cents higher than the floor that we set, and I do not think any farmer is going to criticize the fact that he is getting 5 cents more.

I do not know just what our position is going to be next winter, but we have taken care of that as far as we can in making provision that this coming year if any butter is imported from New Zealand it will be imported by the government. That provision has already been made, and that fact has been made known to our friends in New Zealand. Therefore we think the matter is pretty well under control. Some of the money I spoke of was made available prior to 1944, but with this legislation on the statute books we have paid to farmers in different parts of Canada since that time a very considerable amount of money. To make it absolutely clear that wheat is not included in any way I will read the definition section of the act. It is as follows:

In this act and any regulation hereunder, unless the context otherwise requires:

(a) "agricultural product" means any natural product of agriculture, except wheat, designated by the governor in council, and includes processed meat, dairy and poultry products if so designated...

It denies us the right to designate wheat as coming under this act.

Mr. Lennard: There is one question I should like to ask that seems peculiar to this department. I see that there are two special assistants to the minister who apparently receive more individually than the assistant deputy minister. I do not know of any other department of the government that is set up that way. Can the minister explain that?

Mr. Gardiner: I did not just follow the question. The suggestion is that there are two men getting more than the deputy?

Mr. Lennard: I did not say that. I said they were getting more than the assistant deputy minister.

Mr. Gardiner: Than the assistant deputy.

Mr. Lennard: It is right in the estimates at page 73. My glasses are not steamed over.

Mr. Gardiner: I wish my hon. friend would read the items.

Mr. Lennard: I will. It is under administration service, departmental administration. The deputy minister receives $15,000, two special assistants to the minister receive $19,752, or will for this year, and the assistant deputy minister receives $8,000.

Mr. Gardiner: The explanation of that is that one of the special assistants referred to is Dr. Barton.

Mr. Lennard: The deputy minister.

Mr. Gardiner: No, he is not the deputy minister. Mr. Taggart is the deputy minister. Dr. Barton was the deputy minister for many years, as members of the house know. We extended his time for two years. He had been utilized over a period in connection with the activities of FAO, our international obligations in connection with the United Nations organization. When Mr. Taggart took over the position of deputy minister we asked Dr. Barton to remain as an adviser to myself to attend these functions and take on the responsibilities with regard to them. I think everyone in the house will agree we could not have any better person to do that. His payment is the same as he obtained when he was deputy minister, $15,000. The other item is one of $4,700 which brings the total up to $19,700. That is for a man in my own office who draws $4,700. When you put the two of them together it almost appears as if there were two persons getting more. There is only one getting more. I think the assistant gets $8,000.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of his remarks with respect to the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944. I think he said that since 1944 the department had paid over $700 million. I did not get the exact amount.

Mr. Gardiner: No. If I gave that impression it was the wrong one. What the record that was put on Hansard indicates is that over a period of about ten years, which includes most of the war and up until the present time, there has been $731 million paid out, but only a part of what has been paid out since 1944 has been paid out under this act. It is not $731 million. It is a lesser amount. I have not got the figure readily available but I could get it.

Mr. Brooks: Could the minister let us know now or at some other time how much has been paid to each province out of this amount under the Agricultural Prices Support Act?

Mr. Gardiner: In 1946 $170,748.48 was paid to Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick for potatoes, and in 1948 $1,646,839.34. I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to put this table on the record rather than reading all the figures. There is about a page and a half.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the minister have leave to put this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The table is as follows:

MEMORANDUM

12. First grade creamery butter produced in 1950-51	—459,855.00	1,408,216.12
13. Shell eggs out of storage at an appropriate date late in 1950 if stored to the board's specifications as grade A large and grade A medium	....	—
Total net cost to March 31, 1951		$9,872,475.51

The following items are at present under support:

14. Shell eggs out of storage at an appropriate date late in 1951, if stored to the board's specifications as grade A large and grade A medium.
15. Hogs: Pork products on the basis of Wiltshire sides processed in accordance with the board's specifications.
16. First grade creamery butter produced in 1951-52 and 1952-53.
17. First grade Canadian cheddar cheese produced in Ontario and Quebec in 1951.

The agricultural prices support board has no stocks on hand at the present time and the above represents its complete net cost to date with the exception of a few small items of expense related to the 1950-51 butter program for which bills were not rendered in time to be paid in the fiscal year.

Mr. Jones: Apparently this act could cover fruit, and I should like to refer particularly to apples. Has consideration ever been given to bringing apples under the operation of the act? I feel that the apple growers, particularly in British Columbia, who have been very hard hit and find it difficult in some years to find markets through conditions beyond their control—for instance loss of the United Kingdom market and so on—should be given some consideration. I presume the minister has given consideration to bringing apples under the provisions of the act. If he has, I should like to know, and if he has not I would ask him if he would see if help could not be given to those growers.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, when this list appears on the record tomorrow, as it will, it will indicate payments in respect of apples grown in the designated areas in Nova Scotia in 1947 amounting to $3,119,274.22; apples grown in designated areas in Nova Scotia in 1948, $1,443,231.39; then, apple shipments to the United Kingdom from the 1949 crop in Nova Scotia and British Columbia, to the maximum cost of $1,500,000, an amount of $1,499,569.40. I would call the committee's attention to the fact that during the last year we did pay $2 million under this act to British Columbia, and we paid $500,000 to

Nova Scotia, so I believe the apple growers have pretty well received their share under the act.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the minister intend putting a definite floor price under maritime potatoes for the crop that is now being planted, and if not why not?

Mr. Gardiner: I may say that the matter is pretty much in the hands of the producers in Nova Scotia. Before we would even consider the matter, it would be necessary for them to be organized in a manner similar to those who have been helped.

Mr. Stanfield: Will you do that in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

Mr. Gardiner: They have not asked us yet, but I expect they will.

Mr. Blackmore: Is the minister in a position to tell the country why wheat was not included in this act? What is there about wheat that puts it in a class by itself, so that it has to stand out in the storm?

Mr. Gardiner: The main answer to that is the statement which was made on the floor of the house at the time—1944—a part of which has been quoted quite a few times. When we put this act through to provide $200 million with which to take care of difficulties that might arise in connection with other farm products, it was clearly stated at that time that if it became necessary to handle wheat under the conditions that existed in the thirties, it could not be done with $200 million. It was suggested that wheat be left out of this act. Just to indicate the difficulty to the committee, I remind members that in the areas where wheat is grown we paid out $186 million for relief in the thirties. With all the experience that was behind us we thought, and I believe we were right, that if we brought a measure into this house saying that we were going to spend $200 million on all farm products including wheat, most representatives of farm constituencies in this country would have said that wheat would get all of it. Wheat was left out. It was definitely said at the time that if it were ever necessary to deal with wheat it could be dealt with under the wheat board which is definitely set up for the purpose of marketing wheat. It was felt that that was the proper place to deal with it.

Mr. Wright: I notice that in connection with the first item, administration, there has been a reduction of some $40,000 for staff. I notice that the reductions have all been in the permanent positions, rather than for temporary assistance. In reducing staff, I would have thought that temporary assistants would have been the first group to lose their positions, rather than the permanent staff. Perhaps there is a logical explanation for it?

Mr. Gardiner: It is an increase, not a decrease.

Mr. Wright: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Quelch: Is Dr. Barton still the chairman of the committee on commodity problems under the FAO?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, he is.

Mr. Quelch: Then, is it in order to discuss the FAO? There is only one question I want to ask. I understand that the committee on commodity problems handled surplus food products from the United States. They informed member countries of the FAO that they were prepared to dispose of certain surplus food products. As a matter of fact, I understand a great deal of surplus food was actually given away. My question is, has Canada disposed of any of her surplus food products through this committee?

Mr. Gardiner: This committee receives information from all the countries in the world who are members of the United Nations —I believe some that are not members too— concerning the production of food in those countries and any surpluses that they might have available. In that sense the committee has knowledge of our position in Canada. Any surpluses that we have are made known to other countries, and that does assist in having them distributed.

Mr. Quelch: What I mean is that the United States apparently gave away surplus food products. Has Canada given away any surplus food through the committee?

Mr. Gardiner: We have given away food products. I have not a list here but we are talking now of giving some food to India, and that would be dealt with in a similar way.

Mr. Blackmore: I have just one more question following along the lines of the questions I have asked of the minister concerning wheat. By what criterion would the government determine the point at which it would become necessary to assist the wheat grower?

Mr. Gardiner: I must say that it is not really in our hands at all. It comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, because that department is handling the marketing of wheat. Perhaps I should not say it does not come under our department at all, because the matter of production is under this department as well as the provincial departments. What we do say to the provincial governments when they ask us to help the wheat grower is that the province is responsible for providing seed, for example. This spring many of the farmers said that the seed was not good. The oats were frozen, the barley was frozen, and they were really concerned about sowing wheat that was frozen. Some of them wrote to us and asked whether we were going to assist with seed. We wrote back saying that that was a provincial responsibility.

When they come and ask us for assistance because the farmers are experiencing difficulties, we would say that our assistance is provided through the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. We contend that any assistance which should be given by the dominion government is made avalaible through that act. If there is to be any further assistance to individuals it ought to be made by the province or the province and municipality combined. That is the line of discussion which takes place.

In the matter of marketing wheat, it is marketed under the wheat board. The question has not really arisen since the passing of this act. The main belief when this act was passed was that, long before this, the bottom would have fallen out of farm prices. The bottom has not fallen out of farm prices. The problem that was really in people's minds when this act was passed has not arisen. We have made provisions for floor prices under the act in connection with farm products, and they have been set at a level which was never anticipated when the act was passed.

Mr. Blackmore: I am not sure that I conveyed to the minister just the question that was in my mind. If I recall correctly, he used words somewhat like these when he was discussing the act a moment ago; that if the time ever did come when it would become necessary to assist the wheat producers—do I quote substantially the minister's remarks?

Mr. Gardiner: That is what I said in 1944.

Mr. Blackmore: What I am trying to give the minister an opportunity of expressing to the house, as I am sure he is able to do, is this: By what criterion would he determine, at any given point, whether or not the time had come when it was "necessary" to assist the wheat growers?

Mr. Gardiner: I would only say that if it became the opinion of the government that wheat should be dealt with under this act it would be dealt with in just the same manner as are all other farm products. We made a complete record of the prices of farm commodities, or at least the board that was set up under this act made a complete record of the prices of farm products over a three-year period, 1944 being the third year.

At that time the farmers said: We have had the best return for our farm products, over 1942, 1943, and 1944, that we ever had in our history. They said: We want that position maintained as long as it can be maintained. We said: All right, we will try to do that under this act. We therefore made a record of the prices and, so far as we could, of the costs of production at that time.

That record is there. When we come to consider what ought to be done this year with regard to any product, we go back and check with that record. When we last discussed this question the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth was present, as were one or two other members of the house, down at Niagara Falls two years ago, I think it was, at the federation meeting. We had the United States authorities there. Both the United States authorities and Mr. Hope, who checks these matters for the farm federation, finally stated at that meeting that our bases of establishing the cost relationships as between what the farmer is selling and what he is buying had really been a little bit more effective up to that time than those that had been followed elsewhere. We think they still are.

If we were called upon to deal with wheat, we would deal with it in exactly the same manner. We have all the records with regard to the prices of wheat back in this three-year period. We would take that as the basis. We have the records, so far as they are available to anyone, of the costs of production of wheat in that period. We would compare the present costs of production with the costs then. I do not say that would prove that the farmer is entitled to some support. It might be possible that it would. Nevertheless, that would be the plan that would be followed.

Mr. Blackmore: I greatly appreciate that statement. It is becoming more definite all the time. We have more or less been wandering around in the dark because we did not have anything definite to work on. In effect, the minister has told us that the base period for computing this necessity is that of 1942, 1943 and 1944. Has the minister at any place put on record the figures which obtained with respect to wheat in those years or in that base period?

Mr. Gardiner: They are on record in the report. I have the report here for every year since 1914. They are on record, and I presume hon. members have them. They keep quoting them all the time—for example, when it was stated here the other day that the net return to farmers in the last year, 1950, was lower than it was in 1949. If that quotation is taken from a document, it is taken from the report of the bureau of statistics. In that report of the bureau of statistics all the farm products are dealt with. You can go right back over the years. They are all on file. You can get them for any year in a few minutes' time by going down to the department and asking for them. They can tell you exactly what the price of wheat was at that particular time, averaged over a period. They can also tell you what the costs were over that period of time, in so far as they have figured them. It is those figures that we use as the basis when we start to compute what the position is.

Mr. Blackmore: Since the minister has said that he has the figures before him, would he mind giving us the prices for 1942, 1943 and 1944? It seems to me that this is an appropriate place for them to be placed on the record. I refer to the figures showing what the farmers received for their wheat and the cost of production.

Mr. Gardiner: Being "before me" is not quite so simple a matter as my hon. friend takes it to be. The information is before me all right, but it is in this pile.

Mr. Blackmore: Maybe the minister would rather give that information a little later on.

Mr. Gardiner: I think it is better to have that kind of information given when we are discussing the item.

Mr. Blackmore: On the item of wheat, then.

Item agreed to.

Administration service—

2. Information service, $347,412.

Mr. Catherwood: I feel that this information service given by the department is extremely valuable to farmers. I hope that it continues to be put out. The days of the ordinary farmer are a thing of the past. Today the farmer must be highly specialized. He must be an expert in matters pertaining to the soil and to fertilizers. He must be an expert mechanic. Today agriculture is highly mechanized, and to be a real agricultural producer you must be thoroughly acquainted with all modern methods of agriculture. I hope that this question of information is given constant review by the department. I think this is an important matter. I think the department should keep the farmers up to date on all the newest methods; because in this day and age we must have for the farmer all the advanced methods.

Mr. Wright: I approve what the hon. member has just said. I would ask the minister if any pamphlets have been issued this year with respect to chemical weed sprays. They play an important part in grain farming today.

Mr. Gardiner: A pamphlet is being put out, but it is not quite ready for circulation.

Item agreed to.

Administration service—

3. Advisory committee on agricultural services, $5,000.

Mr. McLure: Who are the personnel of this advisory committee, and what travelling do they do to account for a cost of $5,000?

Mr. Gardiner: As to the members of the national committee on agricultural services, the chairman is the Minister of Agriculture. The provincial ministers of agriculture are the other members. There are ten of them. There are therefore eleven altogether. I think it will be agreed that if you call meetings of those particular individuals, $5,000 is not a high amount.

Mr. McLure: No, not when you have eleven.

Mr. Lennard: Are travelling expenses paid by the provinces? This item is for the minister's own travelling expenses, is it not?

Mr. Gardiner: The out-of-pocket expenses are paid by us. The provinces pay their salaries, of course.

Mr. Lennard: It is travelling expenses; and I would think that the provinces themselves always have expense accounts. They pay their own expenses, do they not?

Mr. Gardiner: The main part of the payment actually has to do with those who come along to advise. They are the advisory committee. Quite a number of them are the members of staffs of agricultural colleges where there is no special provision made for this kind of thing.

Item agreed to.

Science service—

Botany and plant pathology—

10. Operation and maintenance, $1,345,552.

Mr. McLure: The science building at Charlottetown was completely destroyed by fire last winter, and all their records and everything else were lost. I was just wondering whether a new building was under erection there yet and what was being done with regard to the safety of their records in the future.

Mr. Gardiner: The plans for the rebuilding of the building are all prepared, and it is expected that they will be able to let the contract in about four or five weeks' time.

Mr. Cardiff: What is the reason for the increase in the cost?

Mr. Gardiner: It is the new laboratories that were opened. Hon. members will recall that they were opened last year, and it is the new cost in connection with them.

Item agreed to.

Botany and plant pathology—

11. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $178,600.

Mr. Blackmore: Before we get too far away, under what item does the minister suggest we should ask for the prices of wheat and the cost of production of wheat during the years 1942, 1943 and 1944, which years he has specified as the base period?

Mr. Gardiner: Under production service.

Item agreed to.

Agricultural chemistry—

12. Operation and maintenance, $503,410.

Mr. Catherwood: Chemistry is one of the basic ways of dealing with agricultural experiment and study. There is a slight increase of some thousands of dollars in this item. This is one that we should all approve. Can the minister give us a little information as to what this item covers? What is the work they do?

Mr. Gardiner: The services to the various departments of agriculture across Canada have been increased somewhat, but a considerable part of the amount is for the same reason that I gave in the other instance. The places that have been opened require further expansion in connection with chemistry.

Item agreed to.

Agricultural entomology—

14. Operation and maintenance, $1,663,234.

Mr. Wright: I am not sure whether the question I want to ask comes under this item, agricultural entomology, or under forest entomology. It has to do with the epidemic of caterpillars at present prevailing in Sault Ste. Marie, and in other parts of the province of Ontario. I hold in my hand an article which states that these pests are serious this year. The method of fighting them that has been used up to the present time is the use of D.D.T. Has there been further investigation of other methods of fighting the tent caterpillar? I believe we have a new laboratory at Sault Ste. Marie dealing with forest entomology. Have there been any new developments in the method of combating these pests?

Mr. Gardiner: The federal government provides the technical staff to make investigations of that kind of thing, but the actual work in connection with the fighting of pests of that kind is done by the province. The province pays for the necessary ingredients that are used in fighting them. We have put on the technical staff.

Mr. Wright: I understood that the research work on this was being done by the minister's department.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the technical end of the work, the research in connection with it. But when the task of fighting it is taken on in accordance with the views that are held by the technicians it is done by the provinces. I am informed that no new methods have been found recently.

Mr. Wright: There have been no new developments in this field?

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Item agreed to.

Forest entomology—

16. Operation and maintenance, $1,153,447.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the care of forest trees come under this item? In the maritime provinces, as the minister knows, the birch trees are dying. Thousands and thousands of acres have been destroyed. I was wondering if that came under this item or under the Minister of Resources and Development.

Mr. Gardiner: The same answer would be given as I gave a few moments ago in connection with the other matter. We do the technical investigation in connection with the matter. We have a team of men down in the maritimes now looking into the prevalence of the disease there, but the actual work in connection with it is done by the provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: How long have the men been down there?

Mr. Gardiner: They have been there for three years working on the matter.

Mr. Brooks: Are they studying the disease in the birch trees known as dieback? I think that is what it is called.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what they are considering.

Mr. Brooks: Have the branches of this department any buildings in the different provinces? Are they working in conjunction with the universities, or not? I ask these questions because the university of New Brunswick has a large forestry school, which I think would be equipped to do work of this kind in conjunction with the federal government.

Mr. Gardiner: At the university in Fredericton we have a building which does take care of all of the activities in the maritimes, and we are considering putting up another building at Debert this year.

Mr. Gibson: Can the minister tell me whether his department carries on the same work in forestry in British Columbia?

Mr. Gardiner: We have a laboratory at Victoria which does the same work in British Columbia. We carry on this end of the work right across the country.

Mr. Gibson: I understand you have a boat out there as well.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: Can the minister tell us the areas in the maritime provinces in which work in connection with the disease of the birch trees is being carried on?

Mr. Gardiner: They are working in the northern part of New Brunswick, and the work that is carried on from that location also carries on into Quebec.

Experimental farms service—

20. Experimental farms service administration, $162,185.

Mr. Lennard: In connection with the central experimental farm, the minister may recall that some few years ago in this house when the former member for Wellington North, the late Dr. Blair, was a member, we sometimes had full dress debates on the Landrace hogs that are at the experimental farm. Great numbers of them are still there. I do not know why they are still experimenting with them, and that is the reason I have risen. The most popular hog in Canada today for general purposes and for bacon production is the Yorkshire. There are a considerable number of Yorkshires out at the experimental farm. They are not all the even type. As is well known amongst those who are producing hogs today, the large English white is apparently the coming hog, at least in central Canada. Just a few weeks ago I visited a farm near Milton owned by Mr. E. L. Taylor who has what is considered to be one of the best herds of hogs that I have ever seen. He has the best hogs that I have ever seen in any one spot in Canada, and I have seen a few. Why do they continue to experiment with some types of hogs, when I do not think there are many breeders in Canada who are taking advantage of those experiments—at least I have never seen any, in my travels. No publicity is given to it at the agricultural shows, and I have never seen any of those hogs at the shows. I realize of course that I have not seen all the shows across the country. However, I would ask the minister to make a statement concerning the Landrace hogs, which have been at the central experimental farm for fifteen years at least. What headway is being made, and why are they being kept for experimentation if the desired results are not being obtained?

Mr. Gardiner: There were Landrace hogs at the experimental farm when I came to the department about sixteen years ago. It is not clearly within my memory when experiments were begun with them, but I do know they began in view of the fact that a similar hog is produced in Denmark. At that time the Danes would not permit any of the breeding stock to leave Denmark. We got these Swedish hogs, which are of a similar type, and brought them here for the purpose of satisfying some people, one of whom was an hon. member in the house at the time, who thought these hogs were particularly good.

They were brought here, and we carried on the breeding of them until such time as we were satisfied that they were not any improvement on our own Yorks. I recall dealing with the matter in the house, and pointing out that, in connection with the Landrace, the litters were smaller in number, but the pigs were larger when they came. But when we took the two facts into consideration, first that our litters were greater in number, when everything was taken into consideration the outcome of it all was that we thought our own Yorks suited our situation better.

I am told no more of the purebred Landrace are left, but that we have a hybrid which is a cross between the Chester white and the Landrace hog, and that experiments are still being carried on with it. It is not the purebred type we brought here, but a type having some of the characteristics of the Landrace.

I do not know that I can give any particular reason for continuing the experiments. It could happen that at some time we might be producing hogs for a different market, or a market different from that for which we have produced them over the years that have gone by. For that reason perhaps it might be well to continue the experimental work in connection with different types in case that, in certain sections of Canada, we might advise their production. However, I cannot give any better reason than that.

Mr. Lennard: I was out to the farm several weeks ago and saw what appeared to be a cross. They are a lop-eared hog, and look very much like the original Landrace.

Then I would draw to the minister's attention another point, namely, that most of the pens in the hog barn are supplied with shavings litter. In my experience with suckling pigs the use of these shavings is dangerous. Many instances have been brought to my attention where little pigs got some of the shavings or sawdust in their intestines or stomachs, and that just about finishes them. I know of many cases where that has happened.

As this is more or less a model farm, and one to which there are many visitors, I suggest there should be straw litter. People go to the experimental farm to see what is done there, and then they return to their homes and follow that example. I feel that if they use these shavings it will lead to trouble.

Mr. Gardiner: I am told we have not had any experiences such as the hon. member has described. There is only one reason of course why they are using shavings. They would prefer to use straw, for a number of reasons, one of the chief ones being that mentioned by the hon. member. It is better to be doing at the experimental farm what the farmer should do at his own farm. We would prefer to have straw for bedding purposes for all the livestock; but I am told it is not possible, or that certainly it is very difficult to get straw for all the purposes for which it is used.

In any advice given to farmers it is always pointed out that straw can be more easily secured, on the ordinary farm, and that it is better to use it in any case because, first of all, it can be used more readily as manure than can the shavings. Advice is given out along those lines. But practical experience has been that they must have some bedding in the form of what is generally known as excelsior or shavings.

Mr. Cardiff: I looked at the hogs out there, and I wondered why they were being kept at all. I looked through the different litters and I did not see one of more than four or five. They may have been there, but I did not see them. The litters are uneven, and I thought it was poor production—very poor production. The quality of the hogs was poor. I do not know why they would want to continue to experiment with that kind of hog.

Mr. Gardiner: It must be kept in mind that an experimental farm is operated for purposes somewhat different from those of the ordinary farm. Experiments are carried on, for example, in connection with inbreeding, and the results may be very bad. But it is done so that they may advise people to keep away from the very thing they are doing in their experimental work. It is carried on to demonstrate the actual results.

[Mr. Lennard.]

Perhaps that does not apply so much at the central farm as it does in some of the others. For instance, at Saskatoon the college is operated in connection with a sixteen-hundred acre farm. Provision is made there to bring in hogs from different farms throughout the area. They are all fed alike, and we indicate the results of the different types of breeding carried on by individual farmers. We show the results of feeding as applied to hogs bred in certain ways.

All that kind of work is carried on. One can go to the central farm and see pens of hogs he probably would not want to have on his own farm—but that is probably why they are there. They would be there to serve as an example, so that the farmer would know it would not be a good thing to have them.

Experimental farms service—

21. Central experimental farm, operation and maintenance, $1,686,674.

Mr. Catherwood: What experiments are being carried on in connection with the feeding of livestock, including hogs, at the central experimental farm? I believe it is doing an excellent job in developing new strains of grain and seed, but I do feel that in connection with the feeding of hogs, cattle, sheep and poultry not enough experimental work is being done. I feel that the farm should do more experimental work along these lines.

Mr. Gardiner: We have certain livestock at the central experimental farm. We have Ayrshire and Holstein dairy cattle, and we also have Shorthorns. In this particular area we pay perhaps more attention to dairy farming, but experimental work is carried on to assist farmers in the matter of breeding. We do not do much artificial insemination as that is done at Kemptville by the provincial government. They have an experiment there which I have looked over on one or two occasions. It is getting good results and is of considerable assistance to the people of the area.

We also have hogs at the farm, as has been indicated by the previous discussion, and we advise with regard to breeding. We do not make a practice of putting out a considerable number of sires. On occasion we import livestock in order to improve the breed in the country generally. We place the sires that we import at different farms across the country, and some are placed here in Ottawa.

Mr. Catherwood: I am thinking particularly of feeding and rations experiments that might be carried on in an effort to find out what best results could be obtained. This is the type of work the farm could carry out most effectively and I wonder if the minister would just comment on what is being done.

Mr. Gardiner: That type of experimental work is being carried out at all the experimental farms.

Mr. Lennard: Are any bulletins issued?

Mr. Gardiner: Bulletins indicating the progress reports are issued to all who write in for them.

Mr. McLure: I notice there are 506 employees at the farm and I was wondering what system they have to prevent people walking over one another.

Mr. Gardiner: Five hundred and six may look like a large number, but when you see the buildings there and know the different purposes for which they are used you will understand that it is not. It is the headquarters for our experimental farm work right across the country and the staffs necessary to carry on that work at headquarters are here. A very considerable amount of experimental work is done which requires the employment of persons. One only has to go out there and see the number of people moving about to realize that there have to be quite a number of attendants to take care of the shrubbery, flowers, livestock and everything associated with the farm.

Mr. McLure: I happened to be there on one occasion last winter, on a rather cold day, and when I went into the horse barn I found quite a few of them asleep in a stall. I do not know whether they were being kept there as surplus.

Mr. Gardiner: It might all depend on when you were out there. I recall as a boy that it was a custom on all farms, that is those on which I worked in Ontario, to have a nap in the straw in one of the stalls after you had had your lunch. There is irregular feeding to be carried on and some of those men may have been up at unusual hours. They may have done their work before most of us got up and were taking a nap in the middle of the day.

Mr. McLure: I would recommend that they do not let the public see them because it might create a wrong impression. I was not anxious to see them, but I could not help it.

Mr. Catherwood: What was the revenue last year from the central experimental farm?

Mr. Gardiner: The revenue from all the farms was $569,000 with $94,000 from the central experimental farm.

Mr. Knowles: Following what has been said by the hon. member for Queens I might remind him that there are 262 of us here in one room and we do not walk over each other although we may get in each other's hair once in a while.

An hon. Member: If you have hair.

Mr. Knowles: As the minister knows, across the years I have been interested in the salaries paid to some of the people in his department, those with scientific training and holding university degrees as well as the labourers and workers generally. I am glad to note that the wages and salaries are a little better than they were a few years ago, but it seems to me that there is still room for improvement. I have in mind the still rising cost of living and I also have in mind the fact that the qualifications required of some of these people are pretty high.

I should like to ask the minister the duties and qualifications of two or three of the people covered by this item as indicated on page 89. I note there an assistant technician at $1,560 per year. That sounds like a pretty small annual salary, although there may be some explanation.

Mr. Gardiner: This assistant technician is not a university graduate.

Mr. Knowles: I would hope not.

Mr. Gardiner: I have never been ready to agree that a university graduate ought to get more than certain other people. The salary range here is $1,560 to $2,088. If this man is getting only $1,560 it would indicate that he is new on the staff and will gradually increase until he is receiving $2,088. The pay for all these positions is fixed right across the board in all departments. For similar work the pay is the same.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister might give me some information as to what this man does. I recognize that he is in a bracket that permits him to move up to the higher salary rate later on. But this year he is getting $1,560. What does he do for that?

Mr. Gardiner: My officials sitting here do not know who the man is the hon. member is talking about. I do not know how he would expect me as minister to know. If he can tell me the name of the man he is talking about, we will try to find out what he does. This is the salary paid for that particular job, for a technician, grade 1. It is stated there, and it is said there is one of them.

Mr. Knowles: This is the sort of thing that the Minister of Finance encourages us to get information about in committee of supply. The minister has so much information in front of him—

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, to shorten the discussion, I am told there is nobody in the job at all. That is one reason why it has not gone up beyond $1,560.

Mr. Knowles: These fellows over here are doing a lot of chattering, Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: You have chattered all your life.

An hon. Member: You are the greatest liability in this parliament.

An hon. Member: Talk about chattering!

Mr. Knowles: I point out to the minister and his rooting section over here that if they will look at page 89 of the estimates—and I hope each of them has a copy—they will find that in the year 1950-51 there was no request for this position at all. Similarly if they will look at the right-hand column they will find that no money was voted in 1950-51 for this position. This is a request for a new position at a salary of $1,560 for a job as assistant technician, grade 1. I think it is a perfectly reasonable question to ask what would be the duties of a person filling this position.

Mr. Boisvert: Maybe it will be to read your speeches.

An hon. Member: Open and shut the gate.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact no information can be given with regard to the individual because he is not there. The process by which you get the position created is that you must take the matter before treasury board, which some people pass critical remarks about occasionally. I think I heard one last night from over in that corner.

Mr. Knowles: Right.

Mr. Gardiner: Treasury board has to agree that the position is necessary.

Mr. Knowles: Then why did you ask for it?

Mr. Gardiner: We asked for it because our people at the farm have made representations that this man will be needed during the coming year. New work will be commenced of one kind or another, and this man is not doing the kind of work which would be laid out or he would be getting a much higher salary. I have asked my officials if he feeds livestock, and they say that if he were feeding livestock he would get more money than that. In other words, he is not one of the highly paid necessary persons, but there are many people who are required to do other types of work. He would be one of the lowest paid persons out there. We have had the position set up because it is thought that another man is needed in that particular classification. We have asked for him. We have submitted to the treasury board all the reasons why we want him. We finally secured the right to hire him, but we have not hired him yet.

Mr. Knowles: I want to make it clear that I did not rise in this discussion in any critical mood at all. As a matter of fact I think the minister recognized that when I started. He knows from what I have said about this item in former years that I am ready to back him up in trying to get better salaries for the people who work in the various branches of his department. When I started I did not know that there was no man drawing this salary, that this was just a request for a position that has not yet been filled. My purpose was to try to find out what the man was asked to do. I was sure that no matter what you asked him to do if you need him at all he should be paid more than $1,560 in this year 1951-52. I am rather surprised that I cannot get the information because the minister knows his department inside out. I am surprised that he has not got some sort of answer.

Mr. Gardiner: I can give the hon. member some sort of answer if that is what he desires. The fact is—and I am not going to attempt to say that this applies to this individual case because there is no man in the position—that the kind of work which these men are called upon to do is usually part-time work. Perhaps we are doing some experimental work in connection with chemistry or some other pursuit, and during the summer months we may need a young lad or young person who is taking a course at one of the universities. We hire him to assist in this particular work. It is not a highly paid job. It is much in the same class as the boys who are taken from the engineering staffs and put out on road work, and that kind of thing.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister correctly described his answer before he gave it, namely, that it is some sort of answer. I call his attention to the fact that further down in the list on page 89 there is an item for seasonal student assistants, so this man is hardly in that category. There is a special category for that type further down the page. There is a request for fourteen of them, and incidentally this also is a new item which was not in the list last year. I have no objection to the new item being added. I am not one of those fellows who are always saying: Cut down government expenditure.

I think the government should pay what these people have coming to them. This other item for fourteen seasonal student assistants works out to about $800 a year for each of them. If it is part-time summer work it is a lot more than the minister and I were able to get—

Mr. Gardiner: That is not for a year's work. It is for part of the summer.

Mr. Knowles: —when we were going to university, but obviously the other man is not in that category.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to make my answer as correct as it can be, that would not prevent us from hiring a student to do this other job. In the particular class to which you have referred we could not hire anybody else but students because it is so classified, but we can still hire a student to do the other job. We could hire any person who is capable of doing it.

Mr. Gibson: He does not need to take it for that money.

Mr. Knowles: When we come back to this matter next year I hope that the minister will have a report on who was hired for this position—

Mr. Gardiner: If he is hired I will be able to tell you all about him.

Mr. Knowles: —that only pays $1,560. I think he might also report to us on how he managed to keep body and soul together.

Mr. Gibson: He does not have to take the job. It is a free country. There are lots of jobs.

Mr. Knowles: I want to point out as well, and the minister knows what my interest is—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: —that from a humanitarian point of view I want to see to it that these people are properly treated.

Mr. Gibson: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Before I call it six o'clock, may I refer to a ruling I made earlier during the course of the discussion on item 1. Looking at today's Hansard typescript, I see that when the hon. member for Brant-Wentworth asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture the Minister of Agriculture said "ask it". I did not hear that. If I had I would not have made the ruling which followed. I should like to correct that.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

JOHN ATHERTON CRITCHLEY

Mr. Matthew MacLean (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 232, for the relief of John Atherton Critchley.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the order for second reading of this bill was called the last time private bills were being considered, I asked that this one be allowed to stand. I did so because I had made a study of the case, and I have studied it further since Tuesday evening. In fact, I feel that it is a bill which this house should not pass without further consideration. The evidence which we have received concerning this case is a bulky volume of eighty-six pages. As one who has read every page of it, I can say that it is not recommended reading. Indeed, I shall give the undertaking that I will not quote from this evidence in speaking to the bill now before the house.

I do want to say a few things about the case, and I want to offer a suggestion which I shall put in the form of an amendment to the motion for second reading. These two people were married quite some time ago, and lived together for a number of years, but in due course drifted apart. In the early years of their married life the husband appears to have left the wife on a number of occasions, particularly when she was ill. As a matter of fact, that statement is authenticated in a judgment of one of the courts of the province of Quebec, in connection with a separation granted to these two people in 1947. In his judgment the judge said:

> . . . considering, moreover, that the proof establishes the defendant inexcusably neglected his wife during her frequent periods of illness . . .

I suggest that that fact be borne in mind, that a judge of one of the courts of the province of Quebec recognized that this man had inexcusably neglected his wife. I point out also that at one stage of the game this man sought to get an annulment of his marriage. I am not sure whether it was a civil court or a church court to which he applied for the annulment. I may say that the evidence seems to indicate this was a mixed marriage. But at any rate the request of the husband for an annulment of the marriage was declined.

I ask the house to note that, after that bit of background, it is the husband who is applying to the parliament of Canada for a divorce from his wife. He is charging her with adultery. Indeed, in his petition to the Senate of Canada he names two other men as co-respondents. There are matters of detail in connection with that charge that have a bearing on the case, but I do not wish to go into any great detail because it makes a lurid story, the kind which I do not think should be recited in this House of Commons. Indeed, cases of this kind convince me more than ever that we should not be dealing with these matters at all. They should be before an appropriate court of justice.

There is one other important element in this case, and that is that at the time that the separation was granted by a Quebec court the husband was ordered to pay the wife the sum of $25 per week for her maintenance and support. The evidence seems to indicate that that order had been carried out, and is still being carried out, by the husband. However, it also seems clear that if this divorce is granted he will no longer be under a legal obligation to pay that money. The woman will no longer be his wife, so he will no longer be liable for her support and maintenance. I understand there is that difference between a court order for money to be paid to a wife and a court order for money to be paid to the children. In the latter case, the order still holds even after a divorce. In this case, I understand that if the husband gets the divorce he is free of the legal obligation to continue to pay the $25 per week to his wife.

It may be said that that is the reason the woman is contesting the case. I want to say that when one reads the evidence, he does not feel that the misconduct is all on one side. In my opinion, there is misconduct on both sides. At any rate, the position of the woman is quite clear, that if this divorce is granted she will be without any guaranteed means of support. The evidence seems to indicate that she is in poor health—indeed, she had been for a number of years prior to the separation which was granted by a Quebec court. As I have already said, the Quebec judge drew particular attention to that fact. I may say that I have had some correspondence about this case. I understand it is the intention of the woman to continue contesting it as long as it is possible to do so. I understand from the correspondence I have had concerning this case that the lawyer for the man made a promise, if I might call it that, to the members of the Senate committee to the effect that after the divorce went through his client would continue to provide for the support and maintenance of the wife. I am told, however, that the lawyer for the woman has tried to get the man to sign a document to that effect and that he has refused to do so. Maybe there are good reasons why he should make that refusal. Nevertheless, it leaves the woman in the position that, if the divorce is granted, she will have no guarantee that her former husband will be required to support her. He may continue to do so, in keeping with the promise that his lawyer appears to have made to members of the Senate committee. But of course the Senate committee could not hold him to that commitment and he will be under no legal obligation.

In view of all the circumstances, and in view of the fact that the case exercised the Senate committee to the extent of eighty-six pages of printed evidence, I certainly feel that we must give the case fairly close consideration in this house. As to the evidence of adultery itself, I think that anyone who would take the time to read this volume would admit that it is inconclusive and contradictory. I for one cannot say whether or not the alleged adultery took place; and on the basis of the evidence, I would not be prepared to take a position one way or the other. In the light of all that, I feel that further consideration must be given to this case.

It might be pointed out to me that that is what happens when the House of Commons gives second reading to a bill of this kind and subsequently refers it to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, namely that that committee does the job of so-called careful consideration. We know that that committee passes in batches bills that are uncontested. It so happens, of course, that this case is likely to be contested before that committee. I understand that the practice of that committee is that, when a case is contested, it is singled out and those who wish to appear are permitted to do so. I believe that the respondent and her lawyer intend to appear before that committee.

Some hon. members might say to me: Well, since that is the practice of the committee, what are you worrying about? Why do you not just let this bill have second reading, let it go to that committee and let them consider it? I wish to answer that argument by reminding hon. members that the practice is almost invariable that a bill that gets second reading from the house is passed by the committee to which it is referred. It goes to the committee with the approval of the principle of the bill, and that fact is brought to the attention of the committee by those who want to see it get through. In other words, the chances of such a bill being defeated in a committee—as will be seen if one looks at the practices of this committee and the house—are indeed extremely slender. I therefore feel that instead of sending this bill to the committee, with the approval that it would have if we gave it second reading, we should not now give this bill its second reading but that we should rather send the subject matter of the bill to the committee. If we do that, we will be giving the man, the petitioner, his right to appear before that committee along with his lawyer, and to try to persuade that committee to recommend that the bill be reintroduced.

I suggest that that procedure is fairer to the man himself than it would be if we were simply to vote against second reading and kill the bill. If, without any intermediate opportunity for further inquiry, I had to make the choice between passing or opposing this bill, I would oppose it. Hon. members know that I have said that despite my dislike for the way in which we deal with divorce in this house—it is my feeling that we should not be dealing with it here at all—I have taken the position that in the absence of any clear case against a bill, we should vote for it; and every time there has been a vote on a divorce bill I have voted for it.

But as I say, I have made a careful study of this case; and although I do not see tremendous virtue on either side, I for one feel that we would not be properly exercising our function as a judicial body if we were to pass this bill as it now stands. But as I said, although I would take that stand, I feel that we must be fair to both sides. We would be doing what the wife wants if we defeated the bill. But the man might say: Well, not many members of the House of Commons studied this case; only two or three of them did so; and no one there stated my side of it. All right. We will give the man his chance to state his side of the case if we send to the committee the subject matter of the bill.

The difference between sending the bill itself and the subject matter, as I have already pointed out, is well known to hon. members. If we send the bill, it already has House of Commons approval and the chances are a thousand to one that the committee will pass it. But if we send not the bill but the subject matter, the committee must start from scratch. The bill itself is dead at that point. It can come back into the house, but only on the basis of the committee's recommending that the bill be reintroduced. That can be done. If the man and his lawyer can persuade the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills that that should be done, when it comes back to the house I will accept their judgment.

Someone may say: Why do you not accept the judgment of the members of the committee of the other place? I have respect for what they have done. From my study of this case I feel that they have gone into it carefully. I sense a deep concern on their part for the livelihood of this woman. That aspect comes out several times in questions that hon. senators asked. But even so, even though I respect the thorough and judicial job that was done by the committee of the other place, as a member of the House of Commons I feel that I have a right to ask that the committee of this house go into this bill. After all we are, in a sense, a court of two hundred and sixty-two judges being called upon to pass upon this matter. Surely the least we should do is to have our own committee which deals with these matters go into this case thoroughly.

At the risk of repeating myself, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make the point that it is not satisfactory to me to give this bill second reading and to send it to the committee. That procedure makes its approval by the committee almost a foregone conclusion. Under that circumstance the woman and her lawyer could appear before that committee, but their chances of getting the committee to upset the bill would be extremely slim. If, however, we send to the committee the subject matter of the bill rather than the bill itself, the man and his lawyer can appear, as well as the woman and her lawyer, and they are on a more equal footing. The man has the chance, if he can prove to that committee that he has a case, to persuade them to recommend the reintroduction of the bill. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we must look at this thing in a judicial capacity as best we can. We must assess the evidence that is given to us and try to decide who is right and who is wrong. That is extremely difficult to do on the basis of contradictory and inconclusive evidence.

One feels doubt about several of the witnesses that appeared, as to their credibility, but despite that, I look at these two parties, neither of whom I know or have ever met, and I say to myself: If we approve the divorce, that is the end of the marriage, and that may be the end of $25 a week that the woman gets to live on. She is in her fifties; she is in poor health. Therefore if we take that course we may be making a mistake that we cannot repair. Do we do a wrong to the man if we deny the divorce, or if we require him to appear before a committee of this house to prove his case? I think not. He has a separation now. He is not being forced to live with this woman whom he no longer loves. The most that we do by way of penalizing him is to prevent him from having the opportunity to remarry. There is no indication in the evidence, at any rate, that that is the purpose of this petition.

Someone might say: we do him the wrong of forcing him to continue to pay that $25 a week. He has said to the Senate committee that he is prepared to support his wife. If he feels he should not be so obligated all he has to do is to apply again to the courts of Quebec for a reconsideration of the court order that was made in 1947. So, all things considered, I think the fair, most objective, most judicial thing that this house can do is to deny this bill its second reading at this time—I emphasize the words "at this time"—and instead to refer its subject matter to our committee so that it can be discussed there.

There are few cases that I have read this session, and I have read a good many of them, that are as replete as this one is with the sort of evidence that one does not want to quote; so I have kept strictly away from that and I have tried to discuss this case in as dignified a way as I could in view of its nature. I have tried to be fair with it in my own mind and in my presentation of it, and I say to the house quite sincerely that I think my suggestion is the one that the house should follow.

If I were asking the house to vote against this bill and kill it, someone might say: You are unfair to the man. All right; I am asking the house to ask our committee to give it further consideration, but to give it consideration in such a manner that the man and woman will both appear before that committee on an equal footing, and have a chance to start from scratch before a committee of this house. Therefore, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Carroll: May I ask the hon. gentleman one or two questions?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Carroll: The first question is: Does he feel that there is not that abundance of evidence in favour of the petitioner that is required in order to over-balance her evidence; that is, if the hon. gentleman were trying this case himself would he feel convinced that the petitioner had proved his case? The next question is this—he made some suggestion as to both parties being guilty: Is there evidence indicating that the husband himself in this case was guilty of adultery? The third question is: Is there evidence there which would indicate that there was connivance by the husband in this case? The reason I am asking these questions is that I know the hon. gentleman has given the matter serious consideration. In any matter to which he does give consideration he has a full and perfect grasp of the situation. If these questions were to be answered by the hon. gentleman in the affirmative then I would think that his proper motion would be to give this bill the six months hoist.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond for the honour he has done me in putting these questions to me. In answer to his first question I may say that I am not satisfied there is abundance of evidence in favour of the petitioner. If the hon. member had asked me the opposite question, is there abundance of evidence in favour of the wife's innocence of misconduct I would have to give the same answer. When I was speaking I used the words: "Inconclusive and contradictory." That is my summing up of the evidence on the matter.

The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond asked me whether there was anything in the evidence to indicate that the husband had also been guilty of adultery. I do not know whether it is proper to put the answer as yes and no, but I am not a lawyer, so perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to put it that way—

An hon. Member: What does it matter?

Mr. Knowles: The evidence records an attempt on the part of counsel for the respondent to indicate that there had been adultery or misconduct on the part of the husband, but because of the way in which the pleading had been drafted, or whatever the legal phrase is, the lawyers in charge of the Senate committee felt that they could not admit that evidence. That is the reason I say yes and no. From the few sentences that appear here and there, and from the objection taken by counsel for the petitioner to these questions and to that evidence, it looks to me as though there is something there. I have in mind also the fact that a judge of a Quebec court ruled that he inexcusably neglected his wife. The evidence does not prove categorically that he was guilty of misconduct, but the evidence does suggest it.

As to the third question, does the evidence suggest to me that there was connivance between husband and wife, I think my answer to that would be that the evidence does not suggest it.

Mr. Carroll: Was there connivance by the husband, any evidence to indicate connivance by the husband; that is, that he was giving this woman an opportunity, or not doing the proper thing to avoid giving her an opportunity of the offence for which she is charged?

Mr. Knowles: No; I am sorry. These words are such that even lawyers get mixed up in them, and I misinterpreted the use of the word "connivance". I would not say there was any evidence of connivance on the husband's part. If the woman is guilty of the misconduct of which she is charged she is guilty of it on her own initiative, but she denies it categorically under oath. One of the men with whom she is charged as having committed adultery also denies it under oath. He is a man much younger than she is. The other man is now dead, so he was not here to give any evidence.

I thank the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond for putting the questions to me that he did. His experience in these matters because of his former position as a judge, and as one who has had to try divorce cases, and the questions that he has put to me have helped to clear up these matters. On the basis of all this, Mr. Speaker, I feel, as I have already said, that we should not now give this bill second reading. On the other hand, despite the suggestion of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, I think that both parties should have a chance to appear before our committee. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That Bill No. 232 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to add much to what has been said already by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He has made the reason for the amendment quite clear. Some years ago I instructed the post office to put neither these bills nor the evidence connected with them in my drawer, with the result that ever since I have been reading neither the bills nor the evidence.

I do not claim any virtue for that, because these bills, coming before the house, make the demand upon me that I shall either support or oppose them. In such circumstances the evidence should have been read, but in view of the way in which they were dealt with in this house, it was quite useless for me or any other member to waste time reading the evidence.

However, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me to read the evidence in this case, not with a view to speaking to the bill in the house, but so that after I had read it he might have my opinion as to whether the petitioner had made out his case. I have read the evidence, and I must say I have come to the same conclusion as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would say that in my opinion the petitioner has not made out his case to my satisfaction; and if I have to vote tonight either for the bill or against it, I shall vote against it. I shall do so despite the fact that a few evenings ago I said that I would support any divorce bill which came properly to this house from the other place. I believe in this case however that the evidence is not conclusive.

May I also stress the fact that when the petitioner, the husband, tried to get an annulment of his marriage, his petition at that time was refused. When the separation took place, it was as a result of application made by the wife.

In my opinion the husband is a pretty despicable character, and this fact is borne out by the castigation given him by the judge at the time the separation was made. It was said at that time that he neglected his wife, even on occasions when she was ill. I would urge hon. members therefore to support the amendment. The only harm that can be done to the petitioner is that his bill for divorce, if it finally carries, may be delayed for a short time. Otherwise he has all the rights he had previously. As a matter of fact, if the amendment carries the case will be in the same position as when a decision in a lower court is appealed to a higher court for consideration.

For these reasons I would urge hon. members on this occasion to vote in favour of sending the subject matter of this bill to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question? Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria), for Mr. Winkler, has moved the second reading of divorce bill 232, for the relief of John Atherton Critchley. To this Mr. Knowles has moved an amendment, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, that the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed?

An hon. Member: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Amendment agreed to.

Champion Pipe Line Corporation

CHAMPION PIPE LINE CORPORATION LIMITED

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal) moved the second reading of Bill No. 321, to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited. He said:

Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 321 is to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited, under the general terms of the pipe lines legislation enacted by the house.

The object of the bill is to construct a pipe line to carry gas from the Alberta fields to Vancouver, British Columbia. The incorporators are set out in the bill, and they will be the first directors. I should point out that they are all prominent Canadians, and are well known probably to most of us.

The powers are set out in particular in section 6 of the bill, and with permission of the house I should like to read only lines 32, 33 and 34, which state:

—provided that the main pipe line or lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil shall be located entirely within Canada.

I am sure the proposed route will be of interest to hon. members from the west. It runs from Edmonton to Calgary, Pincher Creek, Crowsnest, Michel, Natal, McGillivray, Fernie, Cranbrook, with a spur to Kimberley, Creston, Sirdar, Kootenay lake, Salmo, Ymir, Cascade, Grand Forks, Similkameen, Cawston, Princeton and Hope, where the line will join the Fraser valley and proceed by the Fraser valley to Vancouver.

The safeguards surrounding this legislation are, of course, well known to the house; so that at this late stage I do not think I need go into them. Suffice it to say that if this bill is referred to the committee which will examine it in detail, we will have our experts there, the engineers and others, and be in a position to give the committee full details on any questions that may be raised. In seeking this incorporation we are merely acting under the legislation provided by this parliament; and if it is your pleasure we hope eventually to have the right to compete with the other companies which have obtained similar bills, under similar provisions and conditions.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to say a very few words in support of this bill. I do so because the applicants for this charter propose to follow what we may call a Canada-first route from the province of Alberta to Vancouver on the Pacific coast. I believe those of us who opposed applications for other charters where the route was to go at least in part through the United States will support an application such as that now before us.

[Mr. Speaker.]

As the sponsor has pointed out, several groups have now obtained charters who propose to build a pipe line to the west coast by an all-Canadian route, so the fear expressed during the debates last year that there might be a monopoly no longer exists. There are now several companies from which to choose, and most of them propose to build through Canada. It is agreed, I think, that at least in the near future there will be only one oil line and one gas line to the west coast.

I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that there has been a great change this year in the attitude adopted toward these applications for a pipe line charter. The standing committee of this house on railways, canals and telegraph lines has written into three charters amendments similar to the wording read by the sponsor a few moments ago, providing that the main pipe line must be located entirely within Canada. Then one group applying for incorporation under the name Independent Pipe Line Company actually brought their bill to the other place with those words written in. Tonight we are considering a charter which was similarly amended in the other place. For the first time the Senate has written into one of these bills words which provide that the main pipe line must be located entirely within Canada. As a matter of fact there is only one pipe line bill before the house at the present time which does not meet that requirement. The bill to which I refer is—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might leave that until a later time.

Mr. Green: Well, I think I am entitled to mention that the name of the company concerned is the Border Pipeline Corporation. This change in attitude is very significant, and I believe it is in line with the beliefs and interests of the Canadian people.

Pipe line bills passed in earlier sessions did not contain this Canada-first provision, though in some cases the sponsors pledged themselves to follow an all-Canadian route. There were sponsors of other bills, of course, who did not do so, notably the Alberta Natural Gas Company and Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

I trust that when the board of transport commissioners come to deal with an application for the right to lay a pipe line they will take notice of this changed attitude which certainly exists in this house and I believe also in the other place, and will grant a permit only for a Canada-first route.

Certainly there is no excuse for the board of transport commissioners to follow any other course.

The same is true of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), to whom a company must apply for permission to export oil or gas to the United States. I hope he too will take note of the changed attitude this year and will refuse to grant any company permission to export oil or gas from Canada unless the main pipe line of that company is laid in Canadian soil.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I should like to say a few words on this bill to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited. I believe the sponsor is to be congratulated on bringing this bill before the house. I wish also to express my appreciation to the men who are behind the application to incorporate this company, namely Lloyd Rogers Champion, financier, of the city of Montreal; Leslie Mendelssohn Cuthbert St. Bendick Collins, executive, of Toronto; Daniel Roland Michener, barrister and king's counsel, of the city of Toronto; Alfred Theodore Hurter, engineer, of the city of Montreal; and Joseph Theophile Wilfrid Gagnon, industrialist, of the city of Montreal. These men are showing that they have faith in an all-Canadian line. They are willing to provide financial backing for this project, which shows that they believe in developing Canada for Canadians first.

On Tuesday, March 20, I took part in a pipe line debate in this house. Since then I have spoken to many Canadians, who I found had the idea that if these various pipe lines went from Canada to the United States and then back to Vancouver, then Vancouver would not be a very thriving city in the years to come. Once more I wish to express my appreciation of the action of these people who have the interests of Canada at heart and the ability to go ahead with a matter of this kind.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I very seldom say anything in connection with pipe lines, but I drove 125 miles from Chalk River in order to be here this evening to congratulate the sponsor of this bill. Those of us who have taken some slight interest in the all-Canadian route over the last two or three years are very proud of the fact that we have been able to convince not only this sponsor but one other sponsor that we should in fact build Canada first. We now have the financial giants of Montreal appreciating the fact that Canada alone should be built before we help develop any other country, no matter how friendly that country may be. I only hope when the Border Pipeline bill comes up—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to discuss this bill and no other.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am glad you corrected me in that, Mr. Speaker.

I hope that in the future some of my colleagues from western Canada particularly will appreciate the fact that a few of us at least are trying to develop Canada and especially our own province of British Columbia. We want to develop northern Alberta. I am sure they will agree with us eventually and see the light. I am certainly not going to delay this bill. I am watching the clock. I was talking the last time with one of my colleagues from my own province, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) about public ownership. I drove 125 miles today and back again to see an example of what public ownership can and cannot do. We have an example of public ownership right in our own building. I refer to our restaurant cafeteria. If they are not an example of why we should have private enterprise I do not know what is. At Chalk River we saw a most excellent cafeteria run economically and efficiently. I cannot say the same for all public ownership cafeterias.

Mr. Sinclair: How were the prices?

Mr. Cruickshank: The prices were a lot lower than we pay in this building. I will have something more to say about that later at the proper time, but I wanted to prepare the way just as a few of us prepared the way before today in the matter of transportation.

Mr. Sinclair: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Cruickshank: My colleague, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), says "nine o'clock". It takes only a minute to say "nine o'clock". At a later date I will be delighted if the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, who comes from the same province as I do, will take forty minutes to explain that it is not yet nine o'clock, but if he, with us, wants to develop our own province and the prosperity of Canada as a whole, we will give him every opportunity to do so.

Mr. Cardiff: Where is British Columbia?

Mr. Hodgson: You are talking it out.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am definitely not talking it out, but I would just as soon that no more divorces came up this evening, and it is not yet nine o'clock.

Mr. Cardiff: Tell us where British Columbia is.

Mr. Cruickshank: You know, Mr. Speaker, I am getting advice from all around here.

Mr. Sinclair: You need it.

Mr. Cruickshank: My friend, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, says that I need it. Again I repeat to him what a golden opportunity he has to make a name for himself and develop his own country in the same way that his colleagues from the ridings surrounding his own are trying to develop our own ridings, our own province and to raise his riding up to the same level of prosperity in spite of him.

Mr. Laing: Great corn.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) interjects "great corn". He too will be given a golden opportunity in the future to tell why these other lines are going to be all-Canadian just as we gave the company he sponsored the opportunity of doing the same thing. Since then I have yet to hear him raise his voice above a whisper, or even to a whisper, in support of an all-Canadian route. He has a golden opportunity to do so. For three years some of us have been trying to build Canada and our own province by conserving the great gas and oil resources of our sister province of Alberta, and to develop oil and gas in northern British Columbia so that the finances of our province may be in the same splendid condition as those of Alberta. We have told Alberta that we have a great outlet in the Pacific coast market. This is of particular importance because in spite of objection we will develop the city of north Vancouver without any assistance if necessary in order that it may compete with its great neighbour on the other side of Burrard inlet. I congratulate the sponsor once more and I hope the bill has speedy passage through the committee and through the house.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to express my support of this bill. We have opposed other bills and will continue to oppose those that do not accept an all-Canadian route. I might say that the hon. member for Fraser Valley did not leave me any time to answer his argument with respect to public ownership. I want him to understand, however, that not only this group supports the principle of public ownership, but in this matter we have the gallant support of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). We are very pleased that the bill includes an all-Canadian route and that it will pass through the southern part of British Columbia. It has our hearty support.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish to call it nine o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 323, for the relief of Jane Stirling Stephens.—Mr. Winkler.

MAVIS ELIZABETH THOMAS WRATHALL

Mr. Matthew MacLean (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 324, for the relief of Mavis Elizabeth Thomas Wrathall.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the evidence with respect to Bill No. 324 has not yet reached our desks. At least it has not reached mine. I would submit that this case should stand. That will apply also to Bill No. 325.

Mr. Speaker: Bill No. 324 will stand and also Bill No. 325.

It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Central experimental farm—

21. Operation and maintenance, $1,686,674.

Mr. McLure: Before this item passes I wish to get back in the good graces of some of those about whom I made a few remarks that they may not have liked. I was speaking as the result of a visit I had made to the farm. That is the reason I spoke as I did, and not to be detrimental to the people at the farm. I want to say that the experimental farm is one of the finest beauty spots in this beautiful city of Ottawa. It is a place where visitors and tourists should be taken because nowhere in America will you find another spot as beautiful as the central experimental farm at Ottawa. It is doubtful whether you could find another in America to surpass it. I want to say that in favour of our experimental farm.

Item agreed to.

Branch farms and stations and illustration stations—

23. Operation and maintenance, $4,682,078.

Mr. Catherwood: Were any new illustration stations set up during the past year?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, there were some set up this year. I am sorry that the list which is here does not give the dates when they were set up. There was one in British Columbia, and there are some others that were set up. I do not know that I can get the information within a short time.

Mr. Catherwood: Could the minister get that information later?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three questions to ask on this item. Last year a small illustration station was established at Terrace, B.C. How much money was expended last year, and how much is it estimated will be spent on it this year? Before the minister answers, I may explain that, owing to some circumstances which were largely beyond the control of the department or its officials, the residents in that area, who had hoped for quite a little as a result of the establishment of the station, were to some extent disappointed. This was partly due to the fact that this was the first year of operation, and to other circumstances that the department could not control. I hope that we may have some reason to believe there will be a more satisfactory record established at that little illustration station this year. It is for that reason that I ask that these figures be given.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to ask the minister about the Lacombe, Alberta, experimental farm. Could the minister tell me the cost of operation for the past year, and the revenue derived from it, as well as the number of employees and the total payroll for that particular farm?

Mr. Gardiner: I shall answer the question about the Terrace illustration station. It was established in the spring of 1950. The operator is Mr. Peter van Stolk. The agreement is to end with the 1953 crop year. It is renewable. One of the first undertakings will be to investigate the possibilities of tree fruit production, including the adoption of hardy fruits and improvements in spraying, and so on. The fruit industry has not done well in this district in the past, and we have been asked to explore the problems associated with horticulture, fruit and vegetable growing; soil building will be featured. Approximately $400 was spent on this station in 1950, mostly in connection with organization of work and supervision.

Since this station was only established in the spring of 1950, the planting of tree fruits and the establishment of the vegetable experimental products will be undertaken in the season of 1951. It is expected approximately $1,000 will be spent on the work planned for this station for this year. There are approximately twelve acres of land. This is $5 per acre, including the use of land and services. The department supplies seed and trees on this property. In other words, the property is operated under practices recommended by this department.

At the Lacombe, Alberta, station, the staff is 48 and the earnings amount to $25,000.

Mr. Thomas: What were the expenditures?

Mr. Gardiner: The appropriation is $169,000 for this year, and that will be somewhere approaching the expenditure.

Mr. Brooks: Is the cost of these experimental farms borne entirely by the federal government? If so, what co-operation is there between the federal government and the local government in connection with these farms? We know that each province has different problems, and I was wondering just what liaison there was between the federal government and the provincial governments concerning the work at these experimental farms?

Mr. Gardiner: The costs are borne by the federal government, but we do co-operate with the provinces in connection with soil surveys and many other activities. The results of any experimental work which is done are made available to the provincial authorities if they desire to have them. We do co-operate with them, and they co-operate with us in every possible way in making the results of the work at these farms available to farmers in general.

Mr. Brooks: I know that, but there are schools conducted at the different experimental farms. I believe the provincial governments select the candidates, and I am asking the minister what connection there is there?

Mr. Gardiner: It is not customary to conduct what are generally known as schools at the dominion farms. The farm at Guelph, for example, is known as an experimental farm, but that is run entirely by the province. The province does run an agricultural college along with it. The same thing is true of Saskatchewan, and I think most of the provinces. They have a farm, and there is an agricultural college in connection with it. The farm is operated in much the same manner as our experimental farms, and for very much the same purpose.

We do have what we might call extension classes that are held in connection with these illustration stations that we have. Our cereals man goes out and holds classes. The people around that community gather in and follow him about from plot to plot, while he gives them lectures on the results of the work that has been carried on.

Mr. Brooks: There was a school conducted by the provincial government in my town of Sussex. Last season it was moved to the experimental farm in Fredericton. I was wondering what the connection was, and why it was moved from Sussex to Fredericton?

Mr. Gardiner: The school at Fredericton—I have forgotten some of the details concerning how it was established in the first place, but there were peculiarities about the establishment of it. While that school is operated on the experimental farm, it is operated by the province. If any students were transferred from another school to that one, it would be a provincial school. We do not operate that school. The building was burned down in which it was operating, and we are being asked to build another one so that the school can be continued. That matter is under consideration.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word or two on behalf of some members of the departmental staff whose excellent work goes unsung to a great extent because it is not spectacular. I refer particularly to the work of the officials at the Summerland experimental station. It is greatly appreciated by the fruit growers of the interior of British Columbia and by the farmers in general. I am not going to take time to detail the many experiments that have been carried on successfully. I am sure that the minister and his officials know about them. But we greatly appreciate the close attention being given to the problems of the fruit industry and to those of the farmers generally throughout the interior.

I want to make one suggestion, namely, that the department every year make provision for some of the officials at these stations to visit particularly some of the isolated communities whose people are not as well informed of their work as are those in the larger centres, or those growing fruit in the larger fruit-growing areas. These officials are welcome at all times at meetings of the farmers organizations. I have been particularly asked to say that by the West Kootenay and Boundary Farmers Institutes central organization and also fruit organizations. I hope that financial provision will be made for occasional visits of these officials to farmers meetings and to individual farmers and fruit growers throughout the district, wherever possible.

Mr. Gardiner: I am highly pleased to have the hon. member make that statement, more particular because it is a fact that it was the officials at the Summerland farm who taught me the value of apple juice.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Thomas: The minister says that the contemplated expenditure—that is, the estimate—for this year at Lacombe experimental farm is $169,000. Is that for operation and maintenance, or are they contemplating some extension of service or extension of buildings on that farm?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is not for any extension of the buildings. It is for operational costs; and it is a little bit larger than previously.

Mr. McLure: At Charlottetown, is the science service department under the control of that station, or is it under the control of the experimental farm in Ottawa or of the Department of Agriculture itself?

Mr. Gardiner: They are science service and experimental farms service, and they are both under our control.

Mr. McLure: They are not under the control of the station?

Mr. Gardiner: They are located at the experimental farm.

Item agreed to.

Production service—

25. Production service administration, $58,154.

Mr. Blackmore: I believe item 25 was the one under which the minister suggested it would be appropriate for him to give an account of the prices received by wheat growers for their production in 1942, 1943 and 1944 and of the costs of production which prevailed during those three years. I found the discussion interesting a while ago, because the minister indicated to the committee that those three years were taken as a sort of base period by which to judge the prosperity of the wheat farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: The price of wheat for the year 1942-43 averaged 94·7 cents; the price for 1943-44 averaged $1·233; and the price for 1944-45 averaged $1.25. Those are the average prices for the twelve-month period for those three years. As I said, that is the basis from which we would start to estimate what the returns should be now.

Under the document which is published from year to year by the statistics department, the net returns for wheat are given. I do not know whether I can locate the item. I have it here somewhere. I am afraid that I have not here the figures for the various farm items set out in the form and which would make it possible to make a calculation as between the two. The figures are, however, available in the larger publication that we get out, indicating what the net return for each farm product is. Those are the figures which we use in establishing our relationship between the two when we are considering what the return ought to be. It was on that basis that we figured that what is generally called the parity price as based upon the 1926-29 period was $1.40 at one particular time. Now it would be considerably higher than that.

Mr. Quelch: Has the minister the figures with regard to the cost of living during those three years? They were down fairly low.

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry to say that I have not the cost of living figures for that period.

Mr. Blackmore: Has the minister the cost of production during those three years? While the cost of production and the cost of living more or less merge, nevertheless they are different. As the minister knows, the cost of production depends to a large extent on the cost of the machinery that is to be used, twine, oil, gasoline and all that kind of thing. In addition to that, of course the cost of living as such—the cost of clothing, food and the like—enters into the cost of production. But it would seem to me that some formula must be devised whereby allowance would be made for the cost of all three factors—the amount that is received, the actual cost of production and the cost of living—before you can use the three-year period as a criterion. It seems to me that the freight rates ought to be counted in also as well as the structure of taxation which is being levied against the farmers. Has the minister anything concrete to give the committee in respect to this?

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry again to have to suggest to the hon. member that he delay the discussion, but the detail that he is asking for can be obtained only through the board that is set up under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and that is item 51. I have just made inquiries and I find that our officials who would have any information that is available on that are not here at the moment, and if we could leave the discussion of that detail until we get down to that item it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. Blackmore: Does the minister desire to let this item stand?

Mr. Gardiner: No; really what the hon. member is asking me for comes under item 51. He is asking me what the results of the activities of the prices board are. If that is the information that is wanted I can get it more readily under item 51.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister very well knows that some members, such as some of our admirable friends from the maritimes, and some from Ontario, fail to understand the problems with which the western wheat growers are confronted unless they do have some information pertaining to all such matters as these. There have been so many misconceptions in the country by reason of pictures of the wheat farmers rolling in wealth and going to California, Florida and elsewhere, that a great many people have an idea that the western wheat grower must be living at least on the standard of a king. The only way we can get to understand the real facts is through arriving at some basis of computation. We listened to individual after individual—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood what the minister said. The minister said that the information that the hon. member asked for could be supplied on item 51. I understood that the discussion should take place then and not now.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I am suggesting too much when I say that the information he has asked for can be obtained then. Wheat does not come under this board. At that time at least we can give him the methods by which we do deal with the products that do come under the board, and the method will be the same in connection with wheat. Whether I can give him all the detail he is asking for I am not sure.

Mr. Blackmore: The only reason I was continuing was that I wanted to give the minister some idea as to what I should like to have.

Mr. Wright: Is the department taking any special steps to encourage the increased production of dairy products or meat products? It would look as though our dairy farmers are not producing enough of them, or at least of some of them to meet our own requirements. Certainly the price of meat to the consumer at the present time is high, and our production is not increasing. Is the department taking any special steps to increase production? If so, what are these steps?

Mr. Gardiner: The activities of the department up to very recently have been activities with regard to the disposal of the product. We have had production which has been very far beyond the consumption within this country with regard to most dairy products, and also with regard to most meat products. But during the last three or four years that picture has changed considerably, and it is scarcely correct even now to say that we have not sufficient of these products to supply our own needs. Last year we had about 40 million pounds more cheese than our own needs, and we had sufficient of all of the other dairy products to supply our own needs. The only product that we are not desirous of having produced in greater quantity than we could dispose of if we were trying to sell it outside is butter, and the chief reason why we do not suggest that our people should produce more butter than they can consume is that there is no place that we could sell it at cost of production. We must sell our butter in Canada if we are going to sell it at cost of production, the reason being that it costs more to produce butter in this country than it does anywhere else in the world where it is produced in great quantities, and if anybody is going to eat it, then our Canadian people must eat it. Therefore we have been attempting over the years to keep our production of butter just at the consumption point, and we have been fairly successful in that. We have not imported much butter and we have not exported much over the years. When we are just on balance with our production so that production meets the demand in the country, that is just where we want to be; so that we do not ask them to produce any more.

When it comes to fluid milk, of course it is much the same position; that is, the fluid milk is consumed in Canada. Butter accounts for almost 50 per cent of all the milk that is produced in Canada. The next greatest amount that has to be accounted for is the fluid milk. Between the two of them they take up the greater part of the milk production. After that we put the surplus which is left over into cheese, ice cream and canned milk of one kind and another, and into powdered milk. So far as all these commodities are concerned, we have sufficient for our own needs, and fortunately for us at the present time we are able to consume the greater part of them in this country.

When it comes to meat products, which were mentioned as well, we eat all the pork that we produce at present. We do not eat anything like all the beef that we produce. A very considerable part of our beef goes to the United States, but the other products are being largely consumed in this country, and the price which is being obtained for them does not suggest to our people that they could gain very much by producing say 5 per cent or 10 per cent more and shipping it out. There is not much inclination on the part of our producers to want to get into that position. They are producing what can be marketed in this country and what can be marketed in the United States at a better price in some cases than can be obtained here, and I do not know of any way in which you could encourage them to do differently. I do not know that we want to encourage them to do differently from what they are doing.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister consider it appropriate to discuss the question of fertilizers on this item? It looks to me as though fertilization would enter into it. Particularly I should like to know whether or not Canada is producing enough nitrates to enable our farmers to maintain the fertility of their soil against the depletion that normally takes place through raising the large crops that we are raising. If we are not producing enough nitrates, then obviously we are running down our soil. Has the minister any information on the point?

Mr. Gardiner: We have scarcely enough of potash and phosphates. We could make use of more. We have a surplus of nitrogen. We are producing all the nitrogen necessary for the production of fertilizers. As regards other ingredients, apart from phosphates and potash, we have no difficulty in obtaining a supply sufficient to take care of our needs.

Mr. Blackmore: Has the minister's department any information as to the general use of these fertilizers? For instance, are the people in Alberta restoring to the soil, in a general way, enough nutrients to prevent a wasting away of the fertility of the soil? Has the minister collected that information, or is that turned over to the provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: We have here the tonnage of distribution, but I do not know that that answers the question asked. We carry on experimental work at all our experimental farms in connection with the effect of the use of fertilizers. Last year for example I travelled all the way from Ottawa to Fairbanks, Alaska, by motorcar, and I stopped off at most of the illustration stations throughout Alberta, up to British Columbia and right on up into the Yukon. I found that at every one of those illustration stations they were carrying on experiments in connection with the utilization of fertilizers.

One thing they told me at every place I stopped was that their experiments indicated that the best fertilizer is barnyard manure, and that all these other things that are talked about, and for which people are paying big prices, were not as useful as barnyard manure—or, at least, if you did not have barnyard manure, other things did not produce as good results.

Other fertilizers are well advertised by the people who sell them. I think there may be some reason why we do not make as much use of barnyard manure as we did at one time. But that is what our experimental farms and illustration stations are doing—they are determining these things. When I have driven along the highways in Ontario and in the maritime provinces I have seen plots on which cages have been placed in order to check carefully the growth of grasses, as a result of the utilization of different kinds of fertilizers.

That practice is carried on continuously and, while some of this work may be done by the provinces, it is a work we are doing through our experimental farm service right across the country.

Mr. Blackmore: I have raised the question for the reason the minister has given. Everyone knows that in the last fifty years we have stopped using horses. As a result, the fertility which is restored to the farm through having horses is lost. Then, we are apparently going out of the production of cattle—that is, if we increase the use of margarine in place of butter.

So far as I can see, all these matters militate against the maintenance of fertility of the land. I cannot think of any other item under which this matter might more properly be discussed. I am alarmed lest we are running our soil down at a far more rapid rate than we can afford. That is why I am asking the minister if some other discoveries have been made in connection with fertilizers, as a result of which we could maintain the fertility of our land, notwithstanding that we are producing fewer livestock as the years go by.

Mr. Gardiner: I think the answer to the point the hon. member has in mind is to be found in a statement I have here, which points out that the use of fertilizer in Canada has more than doubled since 1940, having increased from 300,000 tons in that year to 765,000 tons in 1950. It is estimated, according to this statement, that the demand for fertilizer in 1951 may be still higher than it was in 1950. That figure is two and a half times higher than it was ten years ago.

Mr. Blackmore: I had the matter impressed on my mind particularly in connection with the production of beets in the Lethbridge area. Farms that a few years ago produced 23 or 24 tons to the acre, for some reason or other have fallen away in their potential production. The people find it difficult to know why this is happening, because they are putting a good deal of artificial fertilizer on the soil to raise their beets. There must be some definite depreciation in the quality of the soil taking place.

If this is so, then it seems to me a matter of major importance, and all the departments of agriculture across the nation should give the closest attention to it.

I should like to know whether, with all this additional use of fertilizer, we are maintaining the fertility of our soil. I do not suppose the minister has information from which he could answer my question. It is a matter that should be looked into by his department.

Are we adopting measures which will keep fertilizer costs down to the point at which encouragement will be given the average farmer to use it extensively? I am referring particularly to nitrates, potash and phosphates.

Mr. Gardiner: The claim is made in Ontario—and we think with some truth—that they are maintaining the fertility of the soil in a major part of that province. That, of course, is a general statement. There may be areas in which it is not being done, and there may be other areas in which it is being built up to the point where it is pretty good soil. I think the same would be true across Canada. I happen to farm in an area where most people think fertilizer is not required at all. Some others are making use of fertilizer. However, most people argue that there is not enough difference in what they produce as a result of using fertilizer to pay them for doing so. The result is that they do not use it. That is in a part of the prairie section where the fertility of the soil is high, and where in some areas that soil is very deep. Even if two or three inches were to blow off the top, it would not do much more than improve the farm. The fertility of the soil is the same in some areas, even if one went down one hundred feet. In those districts one does not talk a great deal about fertilizers.

But we know that where there is erosion, and where there is a top soil of only three or four inches, if that top soil is carried away in any way, whether it be by wind, water or some other means, there is a reduction in the productivity, and ways must be found of putting something back.

On the other hand, if you grow the same crop over and over again without putting anything back, the land will cease to produce that kind of crop to advantage. There are all kinds of ways in which productivity can be kept up; but in most areas the productivity of the soil is maintained at about what it has been on the average over the years.

Mr. Fair: The fact that more and more tractors are being used on the farms today, and also that we are raising fewer horses and cattle, accounts for the lack of barnyard manure. Since it is not manufactured, naturally it cannot be put on the land, and for that reason some other method must be adopted to maintain the soil. I know that in my own district we have used quite a lot of fertilizer during the last ten or twelve years. Last fall we had what I consider a very important meeting at the agricultural school at Vermilion, attended by the councils of three large municipal districts as well as the service boards of those districts and many others interested in agriculture. We also had the superintendent of the Lethbridge experimental station and the publisher of the Lethbridge Herald, who took a leading part in that meeting. That evening quite a dinner was put on, attended by a couple of hundred farmers, townspeople and others vitally interested in agriculture. Those two gentlemen from Lethbridge gave a very interesting description of soil conservation in their district. I believe that is being followed up this month with another meeting, and many people are hoping something worth while will be done in connection with soil conservation. If we can develop something in our district, of course, it will be circulated to other districts in that area. I feel that the fertility of the soil must be maintained, and that many people who today are mining the soil must get busy and learn to conserve instead. If they do not, I am afraid the future of agriculture will not be very bright. We have to do everything possible to conserve the soil and improve marketing conditions so agriculture may retain its rightful place in our economy.

Health of animals—

26. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $4,346,187.

Mr. Beyerstein: Will the minister say what is being done to control and eventually eliminate Bang's disease?

Mr. Gardiner: The plan being carried on has not been changed in the last year. The department is promoting the use of calf vaccine as a preventive and of course insisting that a farmer should eliminate any breeding stock that may be afflicted with the disease, since it is to his advantage that it should not continue in the herd. We have not undertaken what has been sometimes suggested here as necessary; that is, having the government make payments for animals destroyed. We have done that in connection with the efforts made to wipe out other kinds of disease, but we have not undertaken that policy in connection with Bang's disease. We are still following much the same practice that we had a year ago.

Mr. Johnston: Before this question is dropped I should like to ask the minister what progress has been made in the investigation of the Koch treatment which I believe was brought to the attention of the department by Dr. Arnott of London, Ontario. I believe there has been quite a bit of experimentation with the Koch treatment not only in Ottawa under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture but also by the government of Ontario and the governments of some other provinces, particularly British Columbia. A year or two ago there seemed to be a good deal of hope that the Koch treatment might cure Bang's disease. I well recall Dr. Arnott visiting the hon. member for Battle River and me in our offices here in Ottawa some years ago, and I wondered if the minister could tell us the result of that investigation. Has this treatment been entirely discarded? Do they think it is no good at all? Is there any hope in it, or just what is the position?

Mr. Gardiner: The department have carried on a rather careful investigation, and they are not inclined to promote the idea that it is a cure for Bang's disease. It is a little difficult for anyone to say definitely that this or that does not do any good, of course.

Mr. Johnston: What success if any was encountered in your experiments?

Mr. Gardiner: Our people do not think it is a success at all. I have visits from Dr. Arnott occasionally, as others do. He himself is very much convinced; he has convinced others, and perhaps the treatment does some good. As far as the department is concerned, however, we would not promote the idea that it is a cure for Bang's disease.

Mr. Argue: Along the same line may I ask the minister whether the Koch treatment has not been successful in some instances at least in the treatment of mastitis? I understood that was a field in which the treatment did have some success. I remember getting some literature in my mail box to that effect, and I would appreciate it if the minister would comment on that aspect.

Mr. Gardiner: I never like to discuss on the floor of the house these ideas individuals have that they can cure this, that or the other, whether it be in humans or in livestock. I am not an expert in matters of that kind, but my officials tell me that the investigations they have made, which have been fairly extensive, do not indicate that any great good has resulted from the use of the Koch system in either mastitis or Bang's disease.

Mr. Wright: What success has been achieved in the use of penicillin in connection with mastitis?

Mr. Gardiner: It can be used to very good advantage. I believe the usual advice in connection with the use of penicillin is that it be administered under the direction of someone competent to do that work.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask a question concerning a matter which came to my notice just the other day. The county of Huron is an accredited area where they have had two tests, and in the case of some herds three tests. One chap lost quite a few cattle, and as the minister knows the owner is paid for anything that goes to the tank. The other day this chap informed me that he had four cattle condemned and slaughtered, and that a quarter from each went to the tank, for which he was not paid. Is there any reason why he should not have been paid for those quarters that went to the tank? There was a quarter from each of the four, so in all he lost a whole beef. It is a new one to me and I should like the minister to make some comment on it.

Mr. Gardiner: The general practice in connection with the wiping out of t.b. in areas that are covered is to pay $40 on the grade animal that is destroyed. Of course that $40 is paid, as I understand it, irrespective of whether or not any portion of the animal is destroyed. If the quarter was found to go into the tank and therefore there was no considerable payment for it, the $40 would be paid and the other three-quarters could be sold. That would be the entire amount that the farmer would receive. I think that is the general practice.

Mr. Cardiff: Apparently this gentleman was not paid anything on these four quarters that went to the tank.

Mr. Gardiner: It was four different animals, a quarter each?

Mr. Cardiff: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: He would be paid for three-quarters, and as to the one-quarter there would be a very small payment if he got anything for it.

Mr. Wright: I notice under this item there is an increase of $572,000 in the administration of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act while in the following item, compensation for animals, there is a decrease of $711,000. That looks as if there are more herds being inspected but less being estimated for compensation. Is there some explanation for this?

Mr. Gardiner: The explanation for that of course is that the heavy loss is in the first test, as everyone understands, and a very considerable part of the area that is being dealt with has had its first test. We are on the second or third test and the cost is not so great.

Mr. Wright: Are there not new areas being tested?

Mr. Gardiner: There will be, but when it is necessary to cover a second time areas that have had one inspection in order to keep the plan in operation, then the cost would be less than if we were working all through the season in new areas.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to ask the minister if all of Nova Scotia is now in the accredited area. I understood that the mainland was and that tests were being made on Cape Breton Island. I should like to know from the minister if the entire province is now a t.b. accredited area.

Mr. Gardiner: My understanding is that the maritime provinces as a whole, and certainly Nova Scotia, were an accredited anti-t.b. area when I came to the department almost sixteen years ago. There may be some question as to whether in certain areas the tests have been kept right up to date, but my understanding is that it is still looked upon as an area that has been accredited throughout. If any herds are not fully accredited because of the fact that there have not been inspections recently, that is simply a matter of the task not being overtaken. I do not think the position of the province has changed at all in that regard.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think there were sections on the mainland where tests were delayed, for instance, Lunenburg county. There was a lot of opposition to it in that area, but there was a subsequent request that it be included in the accredited area. I was not sure whether that testing had been completed, and also on Cape Breton Island.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand it has been cleaned up.

Mr. Lennard: Where are the quarantine stations located on the Atlantic seaboard?

Mr. Gardiner: Saint John, Levis and Halifax.

Mr. Lennard: I have heard of some complaints about the one at Levis in particular. It has been said that the sheds are inadequate, the treatment is not all that is to be desired, and the feeding arrangements also are not all that are to be desired. I was wondering if that had been drawn to the attention of the officials, and if any improvements are being instituted at these stations.

Mr. Gardiner: We are constructing new buildings at Levis. We started them last year, and they are about halfway through the construction now. I think it is generally agreed that the buildings have not been in too good shape.

Mr. Lennard: Is there any regulation preventing the owner of animals in quarantine from going on the premises?

Mr. Gardiner: The law does not permit the individual to go on the premises unless he has a special permit.

Mr. Lennard: From whom does he get the permit?

Mr. Gardiner: From the health of animals division of this department.

Mr. Lennard: Are they usually given?

Mr. Gardiner: In most cases they are given when they are applied for but there may be exceptions.

Mr. Lennard: When would there be exceptions?

Mr. Gardiner: Where in the opinion of the officials applied to there is some danger of carrying disease by persons.

Mr. Lennard: That would be the only reason?

Mr. Gardiner: That is the reason that is given, yes.

Item agreed to.

27. Compensation for animals slaughtered, $929,434.

Mr. McLure: In Summerside you have a station for studying the diseases of fur-bearing animals. Have you any report with respect to the success they have had in the study of distemper in fur-bearing animals and the cure thereof?

Mr. Gardiner: A survey has been made there just recently, but we have not the report on it yet. We are not in a position to be able to say just what the result is, but there has been a survey. We will have the information shortly, and I will see that the hon. member is supplied with it as soon as we get it.

Mr. Jones: Would the minister make a statement as to how much was paid last year to the poultry producers of British Columbia by way of compensation for the loss of poultry afflicted with Newcastle disease? I should also like to know how much is in the estimates for the current year for the same purpose.

Mr. Gardiner: The compensation in Ontario was $16,434.52, and premises quarantined on suspicion numbered 69. The amount paid in Manitoba was $566.75, and premises quarantined on suspicion numbered 7. In Alberta the amount paid was $5,792.10 and premises quarantined on suspicion numbered 15. In British Columbia the amount paid was $842,-846.63, and the premises quarantined on suspicion, 75. This makes a total expenditure of $865,640, and premises quarantined on suspicion, 166.

Mr. Jones: What is the estimate for British Columbia for this year?

Mr. Gardiner: The estimate for this year is $250,000, and the figure for British Columbia last year was $842,846.

Mr. Jones: Is the reduction due to the fact you consider the disease has now been arrested, or are the poultry disappearing?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we consider that the disease has been arrested. I do not believe we can say that it has been wiped out, but we think it has been arrested.

Item agreed to.

29. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, including grant of $40,000 to Canadian Seed Growers Association, $1,282,268.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): I presume that rust would come under this item 29. In western Canada we have experienced a new rust which I believe is known as B-15. It may not be a new rust, but it is new to us. I believe that possibly in a good many places where frost was blamed for cutting down the yield in Saskatchewan it was not solely due to frost. In my constituency there was grain that was not cut. In the location of my farm, not too far from the Manitoba border, we had no frost and the grain graded between 3 and 4. I know some work has been done in this connection, but could the minister bring us up to date on the plans for handling this B-15?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the lab for the development of methods for combating rust is, as my friend knows, in Winnipeg. We are carrying on there as actively as at any time, and all the facts that are to be known with regard to the development of a new type of rust which attacks the wheat, which up until very recently was considered to be rust-resistant, are known by that lab. They are still conducting experimental work to see if these types of wheat will prove not to be rust-resistant, and to develop types which will take their place. Activities are being carried on there very intensely, and I think it could be said that everything that can be done is being done.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): One further question concerning this rust. I have heard or read that this rust originated in Texas on a barberry bush. I do not know if the minister knows whether or not that is correct; possibly he does. At one time it was said that they could not spray this barberry bush to get rid of the rust, but surely that is not the case. Someone would have done it by this time. Does the minister know if there is anything in that story?

Mr. Gardiner: The barberry bush has alway been a source of rust, a sort of parent plant from which the rust comes. It is a part of the system of combating rust to do away with the barberry plant wherever that can be done. I do not believe it is generally considered that this new rust comes particularly from the barberry bush, although I am not fully informed with regard to that. My officials tell me they do not think it does. It is a new form that is not fully understood at the moment, but every effort is being made to understand it.

Mr. Cardiff: Will the minister explain the $40,000 grant to the Canadian Seed Growers Association?

Mr. Gardiner: The grant in 1950-51 was $40,000. The same grant is required for 1951-52. The Canadian Seed Growers Association originated in 1904, and was a national organization controlled by competent seed growers for use in the production of registered seed recognized by the Seeds Act as seed of a legal grade. The association is responsible for (a) registration of crops of the quantity and quality required to provide the basis seed necessary to maintain a satisfactory standard of crops for commercial use; (b) maintenance of accurate records of crop pedigrees and issuing of crop certificates; (c) directing continuous multiplication of foundation and elite stock seed of old and new varieties to serve as the basis for the production of registered crops; (d) the acceptance of varieties for registration; (e) initiating, approving and maintaining standards of purity; (f) preparation and distribution of all distinctions of varieties acceptable for registration; (g) preparation and distribution of information to grower members; (h) holding of itinerant annual meetings to provide an opportunity to group members to meet and discuss association problems.

Much of the seed improvement in Canadian agriculture in the past forty years can be attributed to the activities of the Canadian Seed Growers Association. The total membership—is my friend interested in this?

Mr. Cardiff: No, that is not necessary. I just wondered what it was used for.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I notice that fertilizers are specifically mentioned in this item. There has been some discussion with respect to fertilizers this evening, but this appears to be the only item in which they are particularly mentioned. I have had some representations from the farmers in my part of Nova Scotia concerning the increased cost of fertilizer. Fertilizer is very important to agricultural production in our part of Canada. We have not the advantage of having the one hundred feet of fertile soil which the minister mentioned there was in his part of Saskatchewan.

Perhaps I had better read what has been placed before me. I was waited upon by the president of the Cumberland county farmers association, Mr. Rae McCunn, the vice-president, Mr. Walton Allan, and the secretary-treasurer, Mr. Carl Embree. After they had had a meeting with the agriculturists in that county, this is what they had to say with respect to fertilizer:

> Fertilizer prices are advancing and we believe that one of the main causes of this increase is due to the increase in the price of nitrate of ammonia. After the last war the government sold plants manufacturing this product to private business firms and the prices immediately jumped from $74 to $91 per ton. Through pressure brought about by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture prices dropped back to $74.50 per ton. During the past two or three years prices have steadily climbed until at present this product is costing $92 per ton.
> We feel that such price increases are not justified and are due to the fertilizer cartel.

I should like the minister to make a statement with respect to the cost of fertilizer, especially in eastern Canada, with special reference to the representation that I have just placed before him.

Mr. Gardiner: As I understand the statement that was read, it is to the effect that nitrates were made at low cost during the war, that they were made in plants that were then owned and controlled by the government, that those plants were later disposed of and that the costs have been higher.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The prices were reduced after the plants were taken over by private interests, and they have since been increased to almost $100 a ton.

Mr. Gardiner: All I can say about the matter at the moment is that it is true that at one time the plants were owned, operated and controlled by the government. As a matter of fact, the one at Calgary was built by the government during the wartime as part of our effort to produce munitions. By some people it was hoped that, when the war was over, the plant would be taken over by the government. This government, however, decided that we did not desire to go into the business of making fertilizer; and the main objective in taking the plant over by anyone would have been at the time to make fertilizer. On behalf of the Department of Agriculture I asked to have the disposal of the plant held up for, I think, six months, in order that I might have an opportunity to interview any parties that might be interested in operating the plant. I took the matter up with the western governments and I took it up with the wheat pools in the west which had ways and means of financing projects of that kind. I was finally told by all of them that they were not interested, and so the plants were sold under an option, held by Trail smelters; and it is operated by them, so far as I know, at the present time.

The other plant, which I think was down near Hamilton, was operated for a time by the government as part of our effort in connection with munitions and supplies. It also has since been disposed of to private interests. I do not know whether or not it is correct to say that those private interests are a cartel. I have not made any examination into that aspect of the matter. I do not know whether or not I would be competent to give an opinion. In any event, they are now operating and the product is being sold. I presume the prices given are correct prices in connection with the sale of the product.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): May I ask the minister if his department, with regard to the prices of fertilizer generally and nitrate of ammonia in particular, is safeguarding the interests of the provinces, especially those of the maritime provinces. As I said earlier, this is an important cost to producers of farm products in eastern Canada. I would presume that the department would be taking some steps to safeguard the farmers and to see that they are protected against exorbitant charges for fertilizer.

Mr. Gardiner: We call attention to complaints that are made with regard to prices. Any complaints that come in are taken up by us with the parties that are responsible for those prices. They generally have the same explanation that we hear from day to day, namely, that costs are up and it is necessary for them to put the price of their product up. That applies pretty well across the board, no matter what product you are dealing with. I must say that there is not any means that I know of whereby I could control the price, and say that they must charge a certain price for fertilizer.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I would think the minister or his department should investigate this charge with regard to cartels and safeguard agriculturists against excessive charges being made for a commodity as important as fertilizer. May I ask the minister if any subsidy is being paid by the federal government with respect to the manufacture or distribution of fertilizer, and if there has been any such subsidy paid in former years?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a subsidy on the distribution of lime. The vote is: Agricultural lime assistance, $435,000 this year; that is the same as last year—freight and production assistance to the provinces on agricultural lime for soil amendment purposes. That is the only assistance we are giving in connection with what is generally considered as fertilizer.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Can the minister make some statement with respect to cartels putting up the price of fertilizer?

Mr. Gardiner: If it is a cartel or a combine, which is the more common term, I am afraid there is a piece of legislation which makes it necessary for anyone who believes that to put it into operation and have them prosecuted. But apart from that, I do not know—

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The minister should protect the farmers.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know that there is any way that I can declare, unless the courts do so, that anyone is operating a combine or a cartel. I may have that opinion and others may have it. But before saying that they are or before saying that we are going to take any action in connection with them because they are, I think the ordinary procedure would have to be taken against them.

Mr. McLure: A few days ago I brought a matter to the attention of the department and of the minister, and asked why the department was opposed to liquid fertilizers. I think the intention of the minister was to give some further information with regard to the matter. Judging by the sale of liquid fertilizers to the farmers, they are becoming more popular, owing to the price being somewhat lower and also probably because it is more easily handled. Last winter, in a farm broadcast from Ottawa, opposition was expressed which materially affected the distribution of liquid fertilizers. I really think it was a mistake on the part of the department to broadcast against liquid fertilizers; or rather, that is the opinion that has been expressed to me by a great many farmers. The broadcast I refer to was on March 5, 1951.

Mr. Gardiner: We do not take a definite position in connection with the fertilizer. To anyone who applies here for information we give whatever information is available from the experiments which we carry on. Our experiments indicate that the treatment of the grain itself does not bring the benefits which are claimed. The utilization of fertilizer of that kind is I suppose found in the experience of some to be beneficial, and we would not of course say that they should not use it or advise them not to use it. We simply give whatever information we have, based upon the experiments we carry on with it.

Mr. McLure: The reason I brought the question up is that I thought it was not in the best interest of all to have this broadcast go out from the Department of Agriculture, condemning liquid fertilizer. The broadcast I referred to was on March 5 last.

Mr. Gardiner: So far as my officials know, we did not put out any statement on it.

Mr. McLure: The broadcast was from the farm forum.

Mr. Gardiner: We can hardly be responsible for what the farm forum broadcasts. They may have gone and asked for some information on it, and then made a broadcast accordingly. The first broadcast that I heard of, or the first that I knew about it, was the announcement we made in the house here by giving publicity to the answer to the question which was asked. I do not know whether there is any reason to complain about it or not, but it was brought up in that way.

Mr. Argue: I should like to say a word about this question. I do not know whether it was on the farm broadcast or not, but in my opinion if the statement was made on a farm broadcast that liquid fertilizers are uneconomical and the use of them was not in the best interests of farmers, that statement was absolutely correct. Certainly any data on experiments that I have seen show that liquid fertilizers are uneconomical. No doubt there is a great deal of profit in promoting the sale of these fertilizers, and consequently one would expect a good deal of high-pressure advertising. I might say that on farm broadcasts by the Saskatchewan department of agriculture they do not hesitate to say and to repeat that a farmer is ill advised to spend his money on liquid fertilizers when he could spend it to far greater advantage on the solid and well-known fertilizer.

I believe that part of the job of the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa and part of the job of the experimental farm is to find out whether or not different materials when used are to the advantage of the farmer. I can say that if such a report appeared on a farm radio forum or farm broadcast it should be commended. I will ask the minister whether he thinks I am right when I say that the use of liquid fertilizer, as far as any experimental data are concerned, has shown that they are uneconomical.

Mr. Wright: Must the various companies in Canada selling chemicals for weed sprays and insecticides and for various other uses that are made of those sprays register their product with the Department of Agriculture before selling it? If so, are inspections carried on to see that the product is maintained and the standard under which it is registered kept up? Has any experimental work been done by the dominion experimental farms to test the product to see whether it has reached the standard that would be necessary or the standards that are claimed for it?

Mr. Gardiner: We do have the sprays registered, and we have an inspection staff which checks in order to see that the qualities are maintained. These inspection staffs work out of district offices which are established, and they make thorough inspections.

In answer to the other question which was asked in regard to liquid fertilizers, I would say that our departmental officials do advise that the utilization of liquid fertilizers by applying them to the grain does not give any particular benefit. That is the opinion of the officials, and I assume it is a correct opinion. But there are some other ways in which it may be used that may give some benefits. In so far as that particular use is concerned, they do say that their experiments show there is no great advantage to it.

Mr. Catherwood: Does the minister think that owing to the necessity for an increase in agricultural production it might be advisable to consider the possibility of the same sort of assistance as is being given under the lime assistance plan at the present time so far as fertilizer is concerned.

Mr. Gardiner: During the war we did give some assistance, mostly on transportation of fertilizer from one place to another. One of the reasons for it at that time was the difficulty of distribution. We discontinued doing that because we did not think we were getting the results for the expenditure of the money that warranted our continuing it. We have continued the subsidy on lime, but we have not gone any further than that. Our reason for it was that we did not think we were getting sufficient return from the expenditure of the amount of money that was required to warrant our continuing with it.

30. Grants to fairs and exhibitions, under such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council and subject to allocation by the treasury board, $614,400.

Mr. McLure: How many class A fairs and how many class B fairs has the minister? Have any been added to the group?

Mr. Gardiner: There is one class A fair in Prince Edward Island at Charlottetown. Is it just the numbers in each province that are desired or the places of them? Class of fair: A's, Prince Edward Island, one; Quebec, four; Ontario, seven; Manitoba, one; Saskatchewan, two; Alberta, two; British Columbia, one; making a total of eighteen. Class B fairs: Nova Scotia, four; Quebec, twelve; Ontario, twenty-one; Manitoba, three; Saskatchewan, eight; Alberta, five; British Columbia, two; total fifty-five.

Mr. Brooks: Are there any class A or class B fairs in New Brunswick?

Mr. Gardiner: We pay on a somewhat different basis in New Brunswick. The New Brunswick people did not desire to go on operating on the same basis as we operate in the other provinces. There were special situations existing there.

Mr. Brooks: Is it commensurate?

Mr. Gardiner: I think so. It works out at just about the same as they would get if they classified their fairs as "A" and "B." But they have a different classification, and we have accepted it as being similar to what is being followed in other provinces. The show mentioned here is the New Brunswick cattle show at Fredericton.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I am pleased that the cattle show at Fredericton has a grant of $10,000. I believe it was increased a year or two ago. It seems to me the subsidy being paid the maritime winter fair at Amherst is entirely inadequate, having regard to present-day costs. The amount is only $5,500. It is probably by far the most important agricultural fair in all the maritime provinces, and the oldest fair of its kind in Canada. It has done more than any other organization to improve the quality of livestock.

Some of the directors have spoken to me with regard to their costs, and the difficulties they are having in operating this fair which serves Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and in an even greater measure serves Prince Edward Island. Each of those provinces draws prizes in almost equal amounts from the maritime winter fair. It seems to me it should be given a much larger grant than is provided in the estimates. People who are interested in agriculture attend this show in large numbers. They come from the three maritime provinces, and they look forward to the minister's making a special visit. However, in recent years they have been disappointed when he has not been able to be present. I presume he has other functions to perform that he considers are more important than his presence at the maritime winter fair. Could not arrangements be made to give a larger grant to that fair than is provided in the estimates?

Mr. McLure: I notice that the provincial cattle show at Fredericton is in receipt of a grant of $10,000. I have no complaint against that; they deserve it. But there is no special grant for Prince Edward Island, because it is in with the other maritime provinces, and is included with the maritime winter fair at Amherst. As the hon. member for Cumberland has said, that winter fair has done a great deal to improve the livestock of this country. From time to time this matter has been discussed by breeders. They have appealed to the hon. member for Cumberland and to me to see if they could get something additional for the maritime winter fair. I hope the minister will give consideration to this suggestion in his supplementary estimates.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to express my appreciation of the maritime winter fair at Amherst. I know our people in New Brunswick look forward to it every year, and it is known as one of the big events in the agricultural world.

The hon. member for Queens seemed to question the $10,000 granted to the provincial cattle show at Fredericton. As I understood from the minister a moment ago, New Brunswick is in a position different from the other provinces. The only grant we receive is this $10,000, whereas the other provinces are receiving grants for "A" and "B" fairs and provincial summer fairs. I think it will be seen that Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick have received grants for fairs in addition to those at Amherst and Charlottetown, or wherever they may be. On the other hand we receive a grant only for the one at Fredericton in compensation for not being allowed grants for other fairs.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right. We were paying on one "A" fair and three "B" fairs to a total amount of $11,000 in New Brunswick. We made an arrangement with them whereby we would pay $10,000 on one fair.

Mr. Brooks: We lost money.

Mr. Gardiner: We saved a thousand dollars on the transaction. But it suited them better in New Brunswick than any other arrangement, and we agreed to the suggestion. We saved around $1,000 in doing it.

Mr. Brooks: And, to complete the picture, would you tell us what they received, in the aggregate?

Mr. Gardiner: I gave the figures a moment ago. For Bridgewater fair in Nova Scotia the amount is $2,500; Oxford fair, $2,187.75; Sydney, $901.12; Truro, $2,500; Amherst winter fair, $5,500. If they are added up it is about $3,000 more.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Why is Oxford fair, which is considered the best county fair in the maritime provinces, if not in the whole of Canada, receiving only $2,187.75, while these other fairs which are not as large or not as important receive $2,500? This would not appear to me to be a large grant for Oxford fair.

Mr. Gardiner: It is on the basis of improvements. We pay 50 per cent of improvements.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Does that mean improvements to quarters?

Mr. Gardiner: Improvements and repairs to buildings, including the putting up of new buildings and the repairing of buildings already in existence.

Mr. Riley: Which fair in New Brunswick had the department been previously subsidizing, or paying a grant to, as a 1-A fair?

Mr. Gardiner: Saint John.

Mr. Riley: As the minister probably realizes, Saint John fair was interrupted by the second world war. Plans are under way to have it resume some time in the future. I am wondering if the present allocation to the provincial exhibition at Fredericton will in any way prejudice the chances of the Saint John fair receiving a further grant in future as a class 1-A fair.

Mr. Gardiner: The arrangement at present is that we accept the approval of the province. I presume that if the province withdraws its approval we might talk about something else.

Marketing service—

33. Agricultural economics, $510,433.

Mr. Wright: I have in my hand a copy of the Country Guide for May, 1951, in which I find this statement:

> The U.S. Department of Agriculture discloses that the cost of bringing a pound of beef from the farm to the retail counter is now nearly four times as high as it was in 1945, the margin having increased from 6 to 22·5 cents per pound in five years . . .
> Secretary Brannan released some figures which may help city people to understand what is happening to price relationships. Milk doubles in price within a few hours after it leaves the farm. For the corn inside a 19-cent can the farmer gets 2¾ cents. His share of a can of 16-cent tomatoes is 3 cents. Onions which cost the consumer 6 cents a pound left the farm at a cent a pound. The same thing applies to clothing. The cotton in a shirt costing from $3.50 to $4 brought the farmer 30 cents. The wheat in a 15-cent loaf has enriched the man who produced it by 2⅝ cents.
> Armed with this information American farm leaders are making some very caustic comments. Statistical analyses of this nature are not available in Canada . . .

That is the point I want to bring to the minister's attention.

> . . . but The Guide would recommend it as a good exercise for the large numbers of technical people, capable of doing this kind of work, now on the payroll at Ottawa.

I imagine that type of work would be done under this vote, and I am wondering how much has been done or is being done at present.

Mr. Gardiner: As I understand what has been stated by the hon. member, it is to the effect that in the United States they have worked out certain relationships between costs and prices.

Mr. Wright: The spread between what the producer gets and what the consumer pays, and the relationship of that spread as it changes from year to year. This indicates that in the United States is has increased, and apparently we have no comparable statistics in Canada.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I do not know that we have no statistics. Any statistics we have would be prepared by the bureau of statistics. We utilize their statistics in our prices support board in working out relationships between costs and prices. The price of milk is referred to in detail in the article just read. The control of milk prices is with the provinces and always has been, with the exception of a short period during the war. While the war was on we did take control of milk prices, but that was the first product to be decontrolled and turned back to the provinces at the end of the war. The reason for that was that the provinces had boards to handle it.

Mr. Wright: That is not the point of the question at all. The point is, does the department keep any records or try to obtain any records as to the spread between what the producer gets for his product and what the consumer pays for it from year to year, so the department would know the trend, whether or not there is a greater spread from year to year? That is the kind of economics on which the department would be well advised to have some information, and I think such information would be valuable.

Mr. Gardiner: There are some eight or nine products on which we are carrying out investigations, but I repeat that the facts on which we base our investigations are obtained from the bureau of statistics. Those facts are utilized in surveys being made by our economics branch. We have figures in that connection.

Mr. Wright: Apparently in the United States they consider these figures important. For a number of years now they have kept track of the relationship between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays. That has always been a matter of controversy in this country, and I am sure such information would be valuable.

Mr. Gardiner: A report on the nine commodities I mentioned has been published and distributed, along the line of what has been suggested. Some people may think it is not as well done as in the United States; some may think it is better done. I am not prepared to say one way or the other. During the war period we did make very careful studies of those questions in connection with price controls. It may be that in the United States their studies are a little more careful at the present time because they have price controls there, and these things are important in that connection.

Mr. Wright: I think this information is important not only when you are enforcing price control, but to indicate to the people who is getting the gravy, to use the language of this article, through the increased prices which consumers are having to pay for many farm products. I am sure farm organizations would find such information very useful in arguing the case for the farmer. Certainly I would compliment the department on having made a start last year on this type of work, and I think it should be extended to more products than are under investigation at the present time.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice in the details at page 100 that 38 economists are employed under this heading, and I am wondering what functions they perform. I am wondering that because in Newfoundland we have a marketing problem that probably does not exist in any other part of Canada. On the west coast we have three of the principal fertile agricultural areas, with one on the east coast. On the west coast we have the Codroy valley, Stephenville and the Humber area; and when the minister visits Newfoundland I hope he will find it convenient to visit those districts. There he will see land equal to any in Ontario or Quebec, where the possibility of increasing production is very great.

I know from experience that the producers are handicapped by the lack of storage facilities, and also by the lack of refrigerator cars to bring their potatoes to St. John's during the winter season. At present when the potatoes are brought during the winter they are frozen in transit, and of course deteriorate in value. Then on the east coast near St. John's we have another area where agriculture is practised intensively. It is an extraordinary thing, however, that produce from the St. John's area will be sent to Grand Falls, Corner Brook or the lumber camps, while produce from the west coast will be brought all the way to St. John's. I believe the economists could usefully investigate the conditions under which agriculture is being practised in Newfoundland. I have spoken on this subject each time the estimates have been before the committee, and on other occasions when I have had the opportunity.

I want to say that agriculture has been neglected in Newfoundland and is still being neglected. It is capable of improving the conditions of Newfoundlanders more than anything else. The minister, the government and members of this house are familiar with the difficulties under which the fishing industry has been labouring for these past two years. In fact the fishing industry has been labouring for a good many years, but agriculture is capable of redressing some of the balance and giving a better balanced economy to Newfoundland.

The Chairman: We are not dealing with fishing.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I am dealing with the question of agricultural economics. That is the heading here, and if what I am saying is not agricultural economics I should like to know what it is. I am only making a comparison. I noticed the parliamentary assistant smiling when I referred to fishing, but after all when we are talking about economics we can afford to make some comparisons. Agriculture was, as I pointed out before, practised to a greater extent thirty or forty years ago than it is today. There were more farms around the city of St. John's, which has a population of 60,000 and is therefore a big market, forty years ago than there are today. We are bringing into Newfoundland from the other provinces far greater quantities of agricultural produce than are necessary.

The provincial government is not in a position to embark upon a policy because it has not got the direction. It has not got the men, the economists, the trained agriculturists. I hope the minister will see that during his visit, and I trust he will come back with the idea of helping Newfoundland. I do not believe there is a minister in the government who can give more assistance to the improvement of the economy of Newfoundland than the Minister of Agriculture. I have urged him now for two years to visit Newfoundland, and I can say there is no member in this house more pleased than I am to know that he is going there. If he will apply his perspicacity and experience to a study of the conditions in Newfoundland I believe it will be for the benefit of Newfoundlanders generally.

Mr. Gardiner: We had three or four economists in Newfoundland, as no doubt my friend knows, during the greater part of last summer, and we are still carrying on investigations there. We did delay some of the work in connection with production until the census is completed this year because much of the information required on which to base studies will be obtained through the census. The economists have been down there carrying on investigations with regard to the food supplies of the island, the sources from which they come and the extent to which they can be produced on the island. All of that has a bearing of course upon agriculture in the province. While I am down there for three or four days at the beginning of next week I shall look into the matter as far as it is possible to do so in that limited period of time. I am quite sure that I shall benefit from the journey there, and I hope the island will benefit by it as well.

Mr. Harkness: I do not know whether or not the question I am going to ask has been brought up before. I am sorry to say that I was not here today, but I was at Chalk River looking over that institution and as a result was not able to be here this afternoon. However, I want to bring up a matter under this item. Looking at the details on page 100, there is an item for printing of departmental reports and other publications. Referring to the summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories, which was furnished with the estimates, I see that under this item the Department of Agriculture has an expenditure for this year of $485,175, which is the largest amount by a considerable extent for any department with the exception of national defence.

I know of course that the Department of Agriculture publishes a considerable number of pamphlets of various sorts, and of those that have come into my hands the majority are useful publications. I should like the minister to tell the committee what the item of $485,175 covers, and without going into too much detail what publications are involved, in addition of course to the general report of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether I misunderstand the statement that has been made. I understood that the hon. member for Calgary East was discussing the item of printing of departmental reports and other publications on page 100. That item amounts to $21,550. What is the explanation of the $485,000? I did not get the connection.

Mr. Harkness: This same item, printing of departmental reports and other publications, occurs under a very large number of other items in the Department of Agriculture. The total shown in this summary to which I have referred is $485,175.

Mr. Gardiner: Of course there are items similar to this one, and they have been covered in all of the votes that we have passed. I assume the total will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of the figure that has been mentioned. I have no reason for saying that is not the correct figure. It will be a considerable amount, and that is natural, as the hon. member has already suggested, in the Department of Agriculture. We have between 700,000 and 800,000 farmers in Canada, and it is our duty to distribute the knowledge we obtain through our experimental farms and otherwise which is going to be helpful to as many of those farmers as are interested. Therefore our printing bill will be considerably higher than that of most other departments. The hon. member has said it is higher than any other department except national defence. That is probably correct, and these are very good reasons why it is correct. There is the matter of distribution to farmers throughout a country as large as ours, and the fact that they are all intimately concerned with what is going on at our experimental farms and elsewhere makes it necessary for our publications to be in very considerable number and to be put out in considerable quantity.

Mr. Harkness: If this information has already been put on the record I do not want it to be put on again, but if it has not I should like to have the minister bring forward, so that it can be put on Hansard as an appendix, the details of the amount of $485,175.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Gardiner: If I undertake to see that it is put on Hansard, if not on today's then on Monday's, will it be all right to carry the item?

Mr. Harkness: I do not think we should carry the item. I should like to ask some questions after the information has been put on Hansard.

Item stands.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

AMENDMENT TO B.N.A. ACT—PASSING OF MEASURE AT WESTMINSTER—CONSEQUENTIAL CANADIAN LEGISLATION—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the house that the government has now been officially informed of the passage by the United Kingdom parliament on May 31 of the amendment to the British North America Act respecting old age security.

I am sure that hon. members in all parts of the house will share in the satisfaction which I feel at this evidence of the spirit of harmony and co-operation which has marked the joint efforts of the federal government and the various provincial governments in reaching agreement in respect of this important matter. I am sure we would all wish likewise to express appreciation on behalf of the people of Canada, and particularly on behalf of the aged citizens of our country, of the prompt way in which the amendment was enacted by the United Kingdom parliament.

The house will naturally be interested to know the steps which the government intends to take, now that we have the constitutional authority to implement the proposals made a year ago this month by the parliamentary committee on old age security and offered by the government to the provinces at our conference with them of last December. On February 5, of this year, in reply to a question put to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I stated as follows, as reported at page 72 of Hansard:

> . . . it is and will be the policy of the government to avoid any possible delay when agreement has been reached to have that agreement implemented.

In conformity with that statement of the government's position, I wish to state at this time that it is proposed to introduce legislation at an early day to enable the government to make agreements with the provinces to provide old age security to persons in need between the ages of sixty-five and seventy, and to provide authority for the registration of persons over the age of seventy for the universal old age pensions. That legislation would probably also at the same time provide for the continuance of federal assistance in the payment of pensions to the blind.

The government wishes to be in a position to commence payment of the universal pension beginning with the month of January, 1952, and we wish also to have our legislation respecting the age group sixty-five to sixty-nine ready for implementation effective in January, 1952, in any of those provinces which will have signed agreement with the federal government for that purpose.

The administrative plans for the application of this new old age security program are already going forward. Registration forms with respect to the universal pensions plan are being prepared, and it is proposed to have the necessary supplies of these forms printed within the next few weeks. A small amount of additional staff will very shortly be recruited to deal with applications for the universal pensions which will be administered by the federal authorities.

Arrangements are now being discussed with the various provincial governments to take from their present old age pensions records the information which will be required to pay the universal pension after January 1, 1952, to the approximately 300,000 persons now receiving old age pensions under the previous legislation. For these persons, no additional applications for the universal pension will be required.

The government wishes to be in a position to commence, as soon as possible after July 1, registration of the others—probably some 400,000 persons—seventy years of age and over who are not at present receiving old age pensions. The Department of National Health and Welfare plans, in the six months between July 1 of this year and January 1, 1952, to deal with these applications through the present family allowance offices with the small additions to staff which are contemplated, and to have their records in shape to enable payments to be made in the first month of the new calendar year.

I am sure that all hon. members who recall the initial registration of a much larger number of cases for family allowances in 1945 will share the government's confidence that the same administrative organization, which is now in the process of being adapted to the requirements of the universal old age pensions plan, will be able to deal with this new problem in an efficient and expeditious manner. These administrative arrangements are, as I say, already being planned with the aim of pressing them forward as rapidly as possible, and they will be pressed forward as soon as the necessary legislative authority is given to the department to carry out the registration for this purpose.

So far as the legislation to provide for the universal contributory old age pension is concerned, the government has come to the conclusion that, in the light of the heavy load of work already before parliament at this present session, it would not be appropriate to ask parliament to deal with this new and important legislation during the next few weeks. Hon. members are fully aware of the heavy load of work which lies ahead of us, and of the necessity we shall shortly face of holding meetings in the mornings, afternoons and evenings in order to deal with the main estimates now before the house and the other items in the government's legislative program already before parliament, as well as old age security assistance and one or two other urgent matters.

If the universal contributory old age pension measure were the only legislative proposal which would remain for consideration, the government would be disposed to ask parliament to continue to sit in July until it had been enacted, in the hope that it would not be necessary for parliament to meet again in the present calendar year. But that is not the situation. In addition to the universal old age pensions legislation, there are a number of important measures under consideration, some of which arise out of the report of the royal commission on transportation. In that regard it is the intention of the government to recommend to parliament the implementation of the recommendations of the royal commission to the fullest practicable extent, and that will require many amendments to the present Railway Act. This amending bill will be a very important legislative proposal, and one which should receive the most careful consideration by parliament because of its long term effect on the Canadian economy. It is intended to recommend that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and that the committee provide an opportunity for representations as to how the proposed amendments might be expected to affect certain interests and localities. We feel that these proposed amendments should be before the public for study and discussion some reasonable time before they are finally dealt with by parliament.

The government in the course of the next few weeks will also have to give consideration to the recommendations of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. This requires some time for careful study by the government, by members of parliament and by the public, though it does not seem unlikely that some legislative provision should be made before the end of this year.

There are a number of other legislative proposals to which the government has been giving thought. Some of these, like the revision of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, have had to be postponed more than once. It is intended to introduce that legislation and to have it referred to the public accounts committee, where it can be fully explained in all its details. That is the act which provides the standard for the control by parliament over the expenditure of public funds, and we think it is one that is deserving of careful consideration.

In view of all these considerations, the government has come to the conclusion that it would be preferable to make an effort to complete the work now before the house, to conclude the present session as soon as is consistent with the proper dispatch of that business and to adjourn until the beginning of October, with the proviso that we can meet earlier if circumstances make an earlier meeting necessary. If an earlier meeting is not required by unforeseen circumstances, the government would recommend the prorogation of the present session when we meet in October and the immediate commencement of the new session. There would be plenty of public business—mainly legislative—to require a full session, and we would propose to have the session devoted exclusively to government measures, in the hope of overtaking all important arrears and starting with a clean slate in the regular session of 1952.

With respect to old age security, the reason for proceeding with the old age assistance measure in the immediate future is, of course, that it is the part of the old age security program which involves joint action with the provincial governments and we feel that the provincial authorities should know as soon as possible the precise legal basis for the proposed agreements in order to make their own legislative and administrative plans in the light of that knowledge. Of course it is intended that the old age assistance legislation will come into effect at the same time as the universal pensions.

So far as the universal pensions are concerned, once authority has been given by parliament for the necessary registration, it will not make the slightest difference to the public whether the main legislation is enacted in July or October. The government believes more careful consideration is likely to be given to this very important measure if it is held over, and holding it over will not make any difference as to the date on which it will come into force. That in either case will be the earliest date which we consider administratively feasible on the advice of our experts in that field, that is to say, January, 1952. That from the very beginning has been the earliest date on which it was considered that it would be feasible to get this new machine rolling, and that information was given to the provincial governments at the dominion-provincial conference of last December.

Moreover, as hon. members know, the universal pensions are to have right from the start a contributory basis. Now, we have not yet completed consideration of the normal budgetary program of the current year, and the government believes it would be an advantage to have a few months to observe the effects of the recent changes in the tax structure before reaching a final decision on all the precise details of the contributory system to be recommended to parliament.

It will be recalled that the joint committee made no precise recommendations on that point, because it was recognized that it was the inescapable responsibility of the government. We want to be as sure as we can that we are making the right proposals for a plan which is going to affect, far into the future, the provision for old age security of the whole Canadian population.

The government intends to place on the order paper with all reasonable dispatch the proposals required to be dealt with by parliament to give effect, if parliament sees fit to do so, to this program I have just announced.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members will join in the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to our appreciation of the speed and courtesy with which the parliament at Westminster has dealt with the request put forward for an appropriate amendment to the British North America Act. Undoubtedly they have co-operated in every way to make it possible to proceed with this extremely important legislation which the people of Canada have been seeking for some time.

The Prime Minister has indicated that it is the hope of the government that this legislation shall become law in time to make it possible to begin these payments by January, 1952. In doing so he has outlined some of the extensive preliminary steps which must be taken to that end. He has indicated the necessity that a period be devoted to registration of those who would be entitled to the universal old age pension to be provided under this new amendment. He has also pointed out that a large number of administrative details must be carefully examined and worked out as between the dominion government and the provincial governments so that this may be done to the satisfaction of the Canadian people generally.

I am not able to agree, however, with the Prime Minister in his statement that it will be just as satisfactory if this bill is dealt with in October. I do not believe that we should leave this house until we have passed the Old Age Pensions Act and made it law. There are very strong reasons why this legislation should be dealt with before we leave this house. The Prime Minister himself suggested a reason why there is a difference between July and October. He pointed out that it was the desire of the dominion government to be ready to make payments in January, 1952, in all those provinces where agreements had already been reached in regard to this measure and the payments under it. I think with that statement all hon. members will be in agreement. But from the very fact that the Prime Minister introduces the qualification that the payment would be made in those provinces where agreements had been reached, it is quite clear that in the mind of the Prime Minister the possibility was contemplated that some of the provinces might not yet have been able to take the necessary preliminary steps to make that practicable and possible.

Mr. St. Laurent: If I gave the impression that I was saying that a universal pension would be paid only in those provinces where agreement had been reached, I did not correctly express myself. What I was referring to was that universal pensions would be paid in all the provinces and that we hoped to have the sixty-five to sixty-nine assistance part ready for implementation in those provinces with which agreements will have been made—

Mr. Drew: If that is—

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. St. Laurent: That is clearly the intention of the government. If I did not make that clear before, I wish to do it now.

Mr. Drew: I paused only because I was going to say that I think the Prime Minister could explain it much better than a number of those who appear to be trying to explain to me what the Prime Minister said.

I was referring to the fact that the Prime Minister had pointed out the necessity for an extensive discussion of the arrangements which it will be necessary to make for the appropriate handling of payments of this kind. For that reason I think there is a strong argument in favour of dealing with this matter now.

The Prime Minister said that if this were the only legislation to be considered, perhaps there would be no thought given to the procedure he has outlined. It is indicated that there is other legislation which it will be necessary to bring before the house. I would point out that it will be very much easier for the provinces to deal with this matter satisfactorily if the House of Commons passes the legislation, and they know it is to become law, so that they then may be able to give adequate notice of the special sessions they must call for the later months of this year, and, in turn, make the necessary arrangements for implementation in those months.

For those reasons, no matter what view may be held in regard to the other legislation contemplated, I think we should proceed to deal with this legislation while we are still here in Ottawa. The Prime Minister has stated, very properly, that all hon. members will hope and wish that the arrangements made for financing this measure should be given that careful consideration which will assure that the legislation itself and the administrative arrangements are the most satisfactory possible, not only for the older people of the country who are directly affected, but for the Canadian taxpayers generally, who are both interested in the legislation and anxious that it shall be worked out in the most satisfactory way. I do not think there will be any disagreement on that score.

On the other hand I find it difficult to think that this proposal cannot be put before the house some time within the next month, with sufficient knowledge of the general course of the financial position of the government, projected with sufficient accuracy to make it possible to deal with this matter properly at the present time. Later today, in fact, the Minister of Finance will be discussing the bills placed before the house to implement the budgetary provisions, and in doing so will be expressing, I am sure with confidence in the accuracy of his statements, what he expects to be the financial position throughout the remainder of the year. Within the next few weeks he will have still more information. I think there would be adequate information at that time to deal with provisions in connection with a contributory plan for financing this measure, along with the legislation itself.

As to the time that would be taken to deal with the legislation, I am sure this bill would take very little time when it comes before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I am perfectly sure this bill would be adopted with the same speed that a number of other bills have been adopted, when they were good bills, clearly explained, and placed before the house properly and in an orderly way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: There is complete agreement as to the introduction of a measure and as to the passing of a measure which has now been approved by all the ten provincial governments. There will be the same measure of unanimity displayed in the house in regard to the bill as was displayed in the house at the time the Prime Minister asked that approval be given to a request to be sent to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act for this purpose. After all, we were dealing with the same subject then, and I am sure the same attitude will be adopted in all parts of the house in regard to a measure which implements the purpose of an amendment we all support.

There is another reason why I think hon. members should consider the wisdom of the course indicated. The Prime Minister has informed us that there is under consideration legislation designed to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation. He has also indicated the possibility that there might be legislation to carry into effect some of the recommendations of the royal commission which is generally referred to as the Massey commission. He has indicated that other important legislation is under consideration.

It is not unusual for the house to deal with important legislation. None of these things, however, comes before us with that measure of surprise and urgency with which members of the house were confronted at the end of August last year, when we met in special session. There is nothing to suggest that there is anything to be brought before the house that is not properly to be regarded as regular business of the house. For that reason I find it difficult to understand what justification there can be for the suggestion that we should adjourn, only to meet again for prorogation, and then to have a second session. If it is really necessary to defer any of the business of this house, then I submit it would be appropriate for the house to adjourn in the usual way and have the session continue in the autumn only for the time necessary to deal with what is left over for further consideration. I am unable to find anything in the explanation given by the Prime Minister that would make it understandable that we should adjourn simply for the purpose of proroguing later, and then have a second session in the same year to deal with the continuing business of this house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Why the glum looks behind you?

Mr. Drew: Possibly because the member behind me is looking in the direction from which that voice came.

The business now before the house, Mr. Speaker, can be dealt with, the old age pensions could be dealt with, and the members of this house could decide what course should then be followed. I hope that the government will reconsider its decision, and I hope it will make plans for the remaining business of this session, recognizing that there has been a considerable delay in dealing with the business of this house by reason of the way in which the different subjects have been brought before the house, postponed and then brought forward again. If this house were permitted to deal with each particular subject until it was disposed of, we would go forward much more rapidly than is possible when a subject is introduced, postponed, and new events arise which project a completely new debate. In this way we have two, three and four major debates on the same subject, simply because of the breaks in the consideration of it. For all practical purposes we are about to have a third budget debate this year. This could have been avoided by carrying the debate forward through the various stages, so that when one stage had been disposed of we would go right into the consideration of the same subject in the next stage.

I again urge the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, to reconsider the statement he has made concerning the business of the house, recognizing that he has simply placed before us a statement as to what he thinks would be the best manner in which to carry it forward. The Prime Minister has referred to legislation that is extremely important. Everyone will agree with him as to its importance. Whatever his decision and the decision of his colleagues may be in regard to the other matters before them, I can only repeat my request that before we leave this house we proceed to deal with the old age pension legislation so that the provinces may have sufficient time to call their legislatures together and pass their laws, and so that all the administrative details may be arranged in plenty of time to carry out the hope of the Prime Minister, and the hope of all of us, that these payments will begin in January of next year.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of the house share the appreciation that was expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to the parliament at Westminster for having so expeditiously dealt with the constitutional amendment required to make old age pensions universally effective in Canada. I am very happy indeed that the Prime Minister and the government are determined that this legislation shall come into effect on January 1, 1952. It is a matter of very great pleasure to the members of this group, because of the interest we have always taken in this question of old age pensions. My predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth, member for Winnipeg North Centre, in 1926 was largely responsible for the introduction of the first old age pension bill. Consequently it is a matter of much satisfaction to us that this legislation has now reached the stage where the senior citizens of this country who have attained the age of seventy may look forward to a pension without a means test as of January 1 of next year. I believe that is in the interests of thrift in this country, because persons who had saved a little something to provide for their old age were penalized because they had made those savings. I am very happy about the changes foreshadowed.

I am glad to note, too, that the Prime Minister and the government are going to introduce the necessary legislation to bring into effect a new allowance for those between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine. I was hopeful that the income test which was recommended by the committee last year would be more generous than the present means test. When the bill is before us, that matter will receive considerable attention. I agree with the Prime Minister that this legislation concerning the sixty-five to sixty-nine age group should be introduced now, so that the provinces may call their legislatures together to make any necessary provisions for carrying out their part of the particular measure.

I cannot say that I agree with the leader of the opposition that there is really any particular reason why the old age pension legislation concerning those of seventy and over should be introduced at this session. The dominion has assumed the over-all responsibility in that regard, and so long as the legislation is passed by this government and all the necessary preparations are made to enable it to come into effect on January 1, 1952, I am not particular whether the legislation is passed in July or some months subsequently.

With regard to the proposed autumn session of parliament, that is a responsibility that the government must assume. Apparently the government has quite a long list of legislation. I discussed it with my colleagues this morning, and they believe that this legislation, which the Prime Minister was good enough to outline to me, warrants the calling of a session in the autumn.

The experience we have had over the last several years, particularly since the beginning of the war, clearly indicates that membership in this House of Commons can no longer be regarded as something in the nature of a sideline to a particular profession or business. Membership in the House of Commons today is a full-time position, and members must devote their entire time, sooner or later, to the business of the country. May I just add the thought that I believe our sessions should be on an annual basis. I do not like this business of having a session in a given year, and then coming back and having another session later in the same year. I believe we should have one session during a period of twelve months. The time of sitting should be more or less determined early in the sessional year. I feel sorry sometimes for the members of the government, who are undergoing a tremendous strain, because in the very nature of things a member must be experienced and therefore not in the prime of youth or early manhood. I think it is in the interests of the country and of the government and the people of the country that there shall be a summer recess. Sitting as we did during the war in July and August taxed the health of the youngest and most robust members of this house. Personally I think the house should consider what other houses of parliament have considered—an annual session with a summer recess, so that we may know exactly how to make our plans, and so that we may understand the responsibilities we are assuming when we accept membership in the House of Commons or seek the support of our constituents to send us to the House of Commons.

We are indeed very happy that the improved old age pension legislation is to be introduced and will come into effect. The government must decide when it is to be introduced, but to know that it is to be introduced and is to come into effect on the first of January, 1952, is a matter of great satisfaction to the members of this group.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is also a matter of great satisfaction to us that the parliament at Westminster dealt so expeditiously with our request for amendment of the constitution to make it possible for the government to pay universal old age pensions. We also want to congratulate the government on the speed with which they have started the wheels in motion to get ready for the payment of such pensions. I think that is a matter of great satisfaction to everyone in this house.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has outlined the program of legislation that is to be dealt with by the house some time this year. I agree that we should not try to push through the summer in an effort to get that legislation completed and made law. I do not see that we could deal properly or carefully with such a program if we were to sit morning, noon and night—as I suppose we shall have to do shortly—through July and August.

My estimate is it would require all the intervening time from now until the end of August to deal with that program as it should be dealt with. For that reason I feel that the government is perfectly justified in asking us to come back this autumn to deal with the program outlined by the Prime Minister. I cannot agree at all with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the old age pension legislation should be passed and made law before the house prorogues. I see no particular reason at all why that is necessary. In fact I see some good reasons, especially concerning the financial aspects of the proposal, why the measure should not be dealt with until we have an ample opportunity to study the taxation measures that may be necessary to raise these funds.

I cannot see a chance of giving careful consideration to the financial aspects of the old age pension legislation if we are to sit morning, noon and night and at the same time try to get committee work finished. It just cannot be done, and it is an impractical suggestion to say that it should be done before we prorogue. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that we can no longer consider membership in this house as a sideline. I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that there are a good many members who have to come from great distances. They cannot get back to their homes to look after their businesses more than once in a session. We must always keep that consideration in our minds. In view of the fact that some members come long distances and have to remain in Ottawa for a long period of time, it seems to me we have to alter our whole attitude towards the sittings of the house.

I cannot quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that we might consider holding one session a year and specify the time. May I make the suggestion to the Prime Minister that he consider the possibility of beginning the session late in the fall, having a Christmas adjournment, and then coming back possibly around the middle of January and continuing until we finish? That might be the best way out of the situation. In the unusual circumstances in which we find ourselves today it is not unreasonable for the government to consider trying to catch up with the backlog of legislation and calling a special session so to do.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, would you permit some discussion on the statement of the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fleming: It seems to me there were things said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Peace River with respect to the position of members of parliament that should call for reply and correction.

An hon. Member: You are not the leader yet.

Mr. Speaker: It is not customary to allow a debate on a statement made at this stage of the proceedings. I have allowed the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other two groups to speak, but it is not customary to permit other hon. members to do so.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that there are reasons why the latitude you have authority to extend should be given in order to permit the discussion of something which in effect changes the whole plan of the business of this house, which introduces an entirely new concept of the extent of the time that members will have to stay in Ottawa, and which generally may change the whole attitude of many prospective candidates for office toward the possibility of having to separate themselves from their families and their other occupations for the best part of a year. This is an announcement that goes far beyond any matter of ordinary procedure, and in view of its importance and its possible effect upon the future membership of this house I earnestly suggest that it would be highly desirable, sir, that you exercise your discretion and permit certain suggestions to be put forward for the consideration of the government.

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty is that I am bound to see that the rules of the house are observed, and there is no motion before the house at the present time. It is probable that an opportunity will be given hon. members to discuss the matters the leader of the opposition has mentioned, which are very important matters; but at the present time that is not permissible. It could only be allowed by unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RACING ASSOCIATIONS CONDUCTING PARI-MUTUEL BETTING

QUESTIONS

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Have any plans been prepared for the construction of the St. Lawrence deep waterway?
2. If so, are such plans preliminary or final?
3. By what company were they prepared?
4. What was the cost of such plans?

Mr. Benidickson: Plans of the St. Lawrence deep waterway have been prepared concurrently with, and as a natural consequence of, the discussions that have taken place over the years between Canada and the United States in regard to the project. Some of these are preliminary and some may be final. All such plans drawn in Canada are the work of government engineers. So far as cost of the plans is concerned, the special projects division of the Department of Transport have different engineering duties to perform and accounting records are not maintained in a way that would show the cost of servicing any one particular project.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES TRANSFERRED TO PERMANENT POSITIONS

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. How many employees of government agencies, crown companies or corporations have, since 1946, been transferred to permanent positions and authorized by the civil service commission to enjoy benefit of the Superannuation Act?
2. How many have been so transferred from each such agency, company or corporation in each of the years from 1946?
3. What has this cost the government, giving amount by years, and stating the agency, company or corporation involved?

Mr. Sinclair: We could answer parts 1 and 2, but in reference to part 3 I have spoken to the hon. member. What he was interested in was the amount of back payments made by the government, not the statutory payments which have been made since the employees in question became permanent. There are no back payments.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

WHEAT—PAYMENTS ON FIVE-YEAR POOL

Mr. Fair:

1. Has the government given any consideration to compensating the prairie wheat growers for losses suffered as a result of subsidizing the Canadian consumers during the crop years 1945-50?
2. If so, what may the wheat growers expect to receive, and when?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government gave prolonged and careful consideration to the representations made by the pool organizations of the prairie provinces and others respecting the five-year wheat pool; subsequently, the sum of $65 million was appropriated by parliament as a final settlement for the pool operations, and it is not the intention of the government to make any further recommendation to parliament in that regard.

PRINTING DONE UNDER AUTHORITY OF KING'S PRINTER

Mr. Knowles:

1. What was the total amount of printing, by dollar value, done under the authority of the king's printer during each of the years 1948, 1949 and 1950?
2. How much of this was done at the government printing bureau?
3. How much was let out to private printing firms?
4. With respect to the amount let out to private printing firms, how much was done in (a) union shops; (b) non-union shops?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Bradley:

1. Fiscal year 1948-49, $7,000,881.85; 1949-50, $8,177,268.79; 1950-51, $9,736,686.44.
2. Fiscal year 1948-49, $3,940,667.11; 1949-50, $4,362,657.75; 1950-51, $5,495,212.43.
3. Fiscal year 1948-49, $3,060,214.74; 1949-50, $3,814,611.04; 1950-51, $4,241,474.01.
4. No information.

2. How many notices, if any, have gone out to each province stating that legal action will be taken against merchants for failure to make such returns for the year 1950?
3. In how many cases in each province has legal action been instituted for failure to submit returns for the year 1950?

2. What companies had these overages, and what was the final disposition made of same?

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—AGASSIZ-HOPE, B.C.

Mr. Goode:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of British Columbia and the federal government, during 1950 and to date in 1951, regarding the cost of opening a road between Agassiz and Hope, British Columbia.

Mr. Winters: I have spoken to the hon. member, and I would be glad if he would agree to permit this motion to stand for the time being.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES ON CROWN PROPERTY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may, out of moneys provided by parliament, make certain grants to municipalities in respect of federal property situated therein.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

HOUSING

EDMONTON AREA—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): I should like to ask the Minister of Resources and Development whether there have been talks between the city of Edmonton, the province of Alberta and the federal government with respect to the pressing need for new housing construction in the Edmonton area to meet urgent military and civilian requirements; or has the minister received any communication from the provincial government? If so, what is the likelihood of a housing project under section 35 of the National Housing Act proceeding in the city of Edmonton?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): We are aware that the government of Alberta is interested in projects under section 35 of the National Housing Act, and we have informed them that we shall be pleased to consider any specific proposals they may submit.

QUESTIONS AS TO PRIORITIES FOR ESSENTIAL MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. In view of reports that housing is being held up in many sections of Canada because of lack of materials, will the minister tell us what recent steps the government has taken to see to it that housing is given adequate priorities to obtain essential building materials?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have had no report that housing is being held up. Perhaps my hon. friend has. I assure him that the priority officer of the department gives assistance to low cost housing projects when the need for that assistance is called to his attention.

Mr. Thatcher: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Defence Production. Does his department give specific priorities to housing projects for the purpose of getting building material?

Mr. Howe: No, Mr. Speaker; there is no specific priority, but certainly there is a working arrangement with my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development for priority assistance in building houses, where that assistance is required.

FIRES

OTTAWA ORDNANCE DEPOT—DAMAGE TO DEFENCE PROPERTIES—QUESTION AS TO INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence or his parliamentary assistant to make a statement regarding the fire at the ordnance depot in Ottawa on Saturday night, which caused damage to the extent of over a million dollars. I should like the minister to state also whether he has asked the Minister of Justice for the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to investigate not only this fire but also previous fires during the last thirty months which have destroyed or damaged defence properties at a cost to the taxpayers of Canada of over $3 million.

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the minister, in answer to the first question asked by the hon. member I may say that the fire which occurred at Plouffe park, Ottawa, at about 10.30 last Saturday evening destroyed one of the ten bays of the building which comprises No. 26 ordnance depot. That bay was filled with paint, oils, cleaning materials and other materials of the kind, all packaged for shipment; consequently it was a very spectacular and stubborn fire. The other nine bays were not damaged, except one adjacent to the one destroyed, where some damage from smoke and water occurred when the roof of the first bay collapsed. Steps are now being taken to ascertain the actual value of the goods destroyed, and a very intensive investigation is being conducted to determine, if possible, the cause of the fire. In that connection the R.C.M.P. are working with the army.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I shall be pleased to bring to the minister's attention the second question raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to address a supplementary question to the parliamentary assistant. In view of this serious fire, will the minister consider altering the plans outlined in the press for the construction of the largest one-storey building in the dominion for ordnance purposes, and having several buildings constructed in various places rather than the one building?

Mr. Campney: I shall bring the hon. gentleman's question to the attention of the minister.

PENSIONS

BLIND PERSONS—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, arising out of the statement made earlier today by the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that pensions for the blind are included in the present Old Age Pensions Act, will these provisions be carried forward in the new old age pensions legislation, or will there be a separate act for the blind?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The intention is to have a separate act. Of course until such time as the universal act has been passed, the present legislation which covers the blind will continue in existence.

Mr. Knowles: We can take it, then, that the separate act for the blind will be brought in when the other legislation is presented to parliament?

Mr. Martin: The present intention is that when we bring in the provision for assistance to the groups between sixty-five and sixty-nine, we will also bring in the other. The general clauses of the act dealing with the sixty-five-sixty-nine group apply, mutatis mutandis, to the assistance to the blind.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PORTUGAL COVE, NFLD., WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. On May 14, as reported at page 2978 of Hansard, an order for return was passed in connection with certain repairs to a wharf at Portugal Cove. The minister at that time stated that there would be no objection to the passing of the motion, provided that the consent of the provincial government was obtained. I wonder if that consent has been obtained.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): We have written to the premier of Newfoundland for his consent, but so far we have not received his answer; at any rate it has not yet come to my desk.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 295, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, when the resolution preliminary to this bill was before the house and, I think, in his budget speech as well, the minister explained that the tariff items dealt with in the bill were not of a very vital nature and that most of the important tariff discussions had taken place at Torquay and would be reported in due course. I therefore have no intention of dwelling on the discussion which took place at the resolution stage when various details were brought to the attention of the minister's representative. Neither have I any intention of going at length into the Torquay discussions because those are still before the banking and commerce committee and no doubt will be debated when the report of the committee comes back to the house. There are just one or two matters closely related to Torquay that I wish to bring to the attention of the house briefly.

I think it is generally conceded that there was a good deal of disappointment at the results at Torquay, perhaps with the one exception of the results achieved between the United States and ourselves. It was natural that there should be some discussion, as there was, with regard to the question of preferences. After all, what is happening now is that our trade with the United States has been increasing and that with the commonwealth has been decreasing. There was discussion, and there will be further discussion as to the basic question of the direction of our trade. In that connection I wish to read a brief extract from what was said by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) on the debate on Torquay on May 21, because I think it is worthy of being put on the record here in this connection. Speaking on our trade position, and particularly our trade position with the United States, he said this, as reported at page 3225 of Hansard:

> We have every reason to welcome the extension and expansion of trade with the United States . . . By all means, let us seek the expansion of our trade with the United States; but let us remember that this country is set up for trading with the United Kingdom and the commonwealth. That was not done with any thought of placing barriers between the United States and Canada. Our ties of blood, our ties of friendship and our ties of history are too close for the effective erection of barriers between the peoples of the United States and Canada, who know each other better than the peoples of any other two nations in the whole world.

Then the leader of the opposition went on to point out the rather striking figures of the increased trade with the United States, and to what a large extent this trade depended on the present emergency and the defence program. He also drew special attention to the decreased trade with the United Kingdom and went on to suggest, pursuant to a suggestion made by a conference of businessmen recently, that there should be a conference of the nations of the commonwealth—

. . . to seek every possible means of extending trade and removing any barriers which still hinder the extension of trade and of contact of every kind within this great fellowship.

I just wish to make one other point, Mr. Speaker. This question of preferences is of course part of the question of trying to have our trade as far spread as possible. At the present time we are enjoying record trade with the United States, but it is not possible to dismiss from our minds entirely such names as Hawley-Smoot and Fordney-McCumber. We cannot forget the fact that to a certain extent we are competitive with the United States. It was, no doubt, partly with that in mind that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) pursued the question of preferences which has such special importance to certain producers both on the Pacific and on the Atlantic coasts. In the course of doing so, he got into a discussion with the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe) who is also the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the minister made one of those remarks of his which enliven, although they do not enlighten, the proceedings of this house. In answer to a complaint by Mr. Green to the following effect, as reported at page 3253 of Hansard:

I am not too sure that this government would not do away with the preferences entirely if they felt they could get away with it as far as the public were concerned, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

Who would stop us? Don't take yourself too seriously. If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?

Mr. Howe: Is my hon. friend quoting from his leader's remarks?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, I am quoting from Hansard; I hope I copied it correctly. I will quote them now from Hansard direct.

Mr. Howe: That was pretty well threshed out at Montreal.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just to make sure as to the correctness—I certainly would not wish to misquote the minister; and I think that he will find that I am quoting correctly—reading from page 3253 of Hansard we find the following:

Mr. Howe: Who would stop us? Don't take yourself too seriously. If we wanted to get away with it who would stop us?

Is that the same as I read before?

Mr. Howe: That is correct, just as your leader was reported in the press this morning.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We are both correct. That is the important thing. We try to be accurate when we are quoting the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) especially.

Mr. Howe: It is a great political issue. I would thresh it as long as I could, if I were you.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The things the minister says are interesting and we like to quote them. Of course, there is no need of going at any length over the other ground which the minister and I have traversed. We are accustomed in this house to the fact that the minister does not take us as seriously as we should like to be taken. We are accustomed to the fact that the minister is an authoritarian and we do not expect very much. I think I cleared that word with him previously. It is not an offensive word, I believe. This time I think the minister has gone a little further. Let me read again what the minister said. Let me be sure I am right. This is what he said:

Who would stop us? If we wanted to get away with it who would stop us?

That reply was made in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) who was saying that the government thought they could get away with it as far as the public was concerned. The only point I wish to make is that it is difficult to discuss these matters, which are of some importance, when we find that the minister makes a retort of that kind, which is not taking the discussion seriously, and which underlines the thing which he seems to be so anxious to say from time to time; not only to say but to repeat and to emphasize, namely, that he thinks this house is not worthy of any great consideration —indeed of very little consideration.

The only thing I want to add to that is that some day, I do not know when, I do not say one year, five years, ten years, but some day, the public is going to wake up to the fact that it is interested in this parliament. After all, it is all they have, as the man said about his wife, "a poor thing, but mine own". This parliament is what the public sent down here, and at the present time some of us say that they have selected a rather queer one. But it is a very satisfactory one to the minister. He can have his supporters say "Good old C.D." to everything that he says, and even say "Good old C.D." to this. It may be that at the moment the public will take very little interest in it but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it would be better if the minister would take us seriously. This parliament is composed of serious people, and naturally we should be taken seriously. I suggest to the minister that while this is great fun, while it is grand as long as it lasts, some day the people may wake up to the fact that when he is disregarding and making little of this house he is in fact making little of the Canadian people. There is no doubt that that inference has been left because in the little exchange that I have just read the minister has made it perfectly clear that along with the members of parliament he classes the people who elect the members of parliament, and they are to be set at nought.

As I said at the outset, I think the details connected with this measure can be discussed in committee. At the moment I have no need to add anything more.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief in my remarks on preferential tariff because I am anxious to get away to the veterans affairs committee. However, I do want to keep the record straight in connection with some statements made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

I am sure he made the statement in good faith, because I know he is sincere in his advocacy of a few packing concerns who manufacture margarine as I am sincere in trying to support the interests of the dairy farmers. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance gave a list of oils that came under preferential tariff, as reported at page 3122 of Hansard of May 17. Actually I am sure it is only a partial list, and I want the hon. member to look it up. I am not disputing the figures that he gave, and I am not disputing that he gave them in all sincerity. But, Mr. Speaker, in order that the record may be clear to the people of Canada, particularly to those whom I am sure the parliamentary assistant is attempting to assist by enabling them to secure a cheap substitute for a pure food such as butter, may I say that he has not taken into account the fact that these oils are imported free of duty. I repeat, they are imported free of duty. The remarks of the parliamentary assistant did not give us that information. They were imported free of duty, held in storage, and some months later, instead of their being beneficial to the consuming public, as he claims, the price of margarine was increased 10 cents a pound, margarine made out of these oils which were imported free of duty. That was not to the benefit of the consuming public but to the benefit of Canada Packers, and some four or five other concerns.

As I stated, I have no quarrel with the figures he gave, but I hope the parliamentary assistant takes into account this fact. No doubt because of the excessive amount of work that he has to do, he has not been able to assimilate the knowledge which would be beneficial to the consuming public, but I admit it has been to the benefit of the packing concerns. The bulk of the coconut oil now being used in increasing quantities in the manufacture of margarine is processed in Canada from copra or coconut meat, and this product is brought into Canada under a tariff item. I want the parliamentary assistant to know this, because apparently his assistants have not brought it to his attention, probably because they are understaffed or overstaffed in the ivory tower. It comes in duty free under item 113a under both the British preferential tariff and the most-favoured-nation tariff. The figures quoted by the parliamentary assistant, as they appear at page 3122 of Hansard, do not show that.

We had a gentleman in the city of Vancouver, which happens to be the largest city in our province, who made an immense fortune. Incidentally, the city of Vancouver is just across Burrard inlet from the city of Vancouver North from which my good colleague comes. As I said, this gentleman made an immense fortune from importing copra or broken coconut meat which was processed to make margarine to sell at an increase in cost of 10 cents a pound after it had been brought in duty free during the period when butter was short.

The parliamentary assistant did not bring that information to the notice of the people of Canada through the medium of Hansard, although he was very careful to note other things. Peanut oil in substantial quantities is now being used in margarine, and that comes in from British preference countries under tariff item—and again I hope some of the assistants to the parliamentary assistant will look up this item in their spare time. I refer to item 276a (i), free of duty. Mark that, Mr. Speaker. This also applies to tariff item No. 276c, which covers coconut oil, crude, but imported to be refined for edible purposes.

I know that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance did not want to mislead the public, but these facts were not put on the record. The figures that he quoted on May 17, and which appear in Hansard, are misleading. They do not state that this preference was used to increase the excess profits of Canada Packers and their few associates to the detriment of the consuming public who buy a cheap substitute for an edible food like butter. They do not tell the story at all. If you remember, Mr. Speaker, much ado was made about whether the oils were edible or not edible. For instance, coconut oil, crude, when imported to be refined for edible purposes comes in duty free under these tariff items. I should like the parliamentary assistant to make that point clear. I am not disputing his figures, but I am definitely stating that his figures were at least misleading when he referred to the duty paid.

I should like to point out that importations of duty-free vegetable oils, including coconut oil and peanut oil used in margarine, increased rapidly during the first quarter of 1951. It increased to the point where—and the parliamentary assistant, through the extra staff he has over there, may check me; I do not want them to find themselves at leisure two-thirds of the year—an average of 1,531,000 pounds of margarine per month were imported in that period, as compared with an average of only 875,000 per month during 1950.

Mr. Sinclair: Public demand.

Mr. Cruickshank: This was, on the average, an increase to the extent of more than 75 per cent. Mr. Speaker, all things come to him who waits: the parliamentary assistant has said, "public demand". That was the very thing I was hoping he would say. Here we have misleading statements issued to the public, that they are going to receive a food—and in this instance I will call it a food—as a substitute for butter, only to find it going to a very high price. "Public demand"—yes, by misleading statements, by bringing in oils duty-free, oils that can be turned in at one end of a machine and come out at the other, as I saw it done at the Canada Packers plant at Toronto. These oils are offered as a substitute for butter, for the production of which the farmer has to work 365 days a year, from twelve to sixteen hours a day. Yes, "public demand", when it is brought about by misleading statements that the consumer will get a cheap substitute. This oil, Mr. Speaker, was brought in and held in storage, duty free. That was not told to the public. It was held over for this period until there was a short supply of butter and in order that five or six processors such as Canada Packers could profit, at the expense of the consumer. He did not get a cheaper substitute for butter. Canada Packers, duty free, got excess profits of ten cents a pound.

That does not appear in the record of May 17, at page 3122 of Hansard. I am willing to admit I may be prejudiced in the matter. I say I have every right to be prejudiced, on behalf of the Fraser valley milk producers association. Perhaps I am not qualified to give an impartial judgment in the matter, any more than the parliamentary assistant is qualified, with his prejudice in favour of Canada Packers or other manufacturers of margarine.

I am willing to admit I am prejudiced. I inferred from his statement that as a result of this freedom from duty the consumer would get the benefit in the price of the margarine which would compete with butter which was at an admittedly high price. He must have known, or his assistant must have known, that Canada Packers brought in this copra, this coconut meat, to manufacture into oils to be used in making margarine, that they held it from one to five months to sell at a rate ten cents greater than when they brought it in. If that is benefiting the consumer, then I would like to know it.

I am all for these preferential agreements and, in order to forestall what might be said, let me say that, with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), I am one of the two free traders left—and I know that will be thrown at me.

Mr. MacDougall: Here is another.

An hon. Member: And here is another.

Mr. Cruickshank: If I get a little more support, I will attend to this coconut oil, this poor substitute for butter. I want to tell you this—and I speak with authority from my own riding—that you can bring in margarine or margarine oil by the boatload, the trainload, by submarine or by aeroplane, duty free, if you will allow in duty free, under the same terms, everything that goes toward the manufacture of butter. When I say that I speak as a representative of all western ridings.

I do not care how much coconut oil you bring in duty free, provided everything we use in the production of butter receives the same treatment. I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill because, as I said earlier, I want to attend the sitting of the committee on veterans affairs. I can assure the house that although I disagree with my colleague, in most instances I have every confidence in his judgment. During the time when he served his country overseas we were assigned the same room, and I had the privilege of looking after his constituency. I trust no one will think there is anything personal in the present instance, because of the different views we hold in this connection. He is sincere in his belief, and I am sincere in mine—the only difference being that I know that, in the long run, for the benefit of Canada, he is wrong and I am right.

If the parliamentary assistant is going to speak I shall stay around and, if necessary, miss the meeting of the veterans affairs committee. Perhaps in doing so I shall keep the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) in his seat, because he and I might disagree in the veterans committee.

An hon. Member: It sits tomorrow.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am a day ahead of myself—but I am so anxious to help the veterans that it is possible I may be two days ahead. However, I shall certainly stay around to hear what the parliamentary assistant has to say.

Let me repeat that I have no objection to coconut oil or any other oil being brought into my riding in any quantity or in any form, provided those of us who produce butter and other dairy products in that riding are permitted to bring in under the same terms anything we require in the production of our dairy products.

I admit that if I represented a one hundred per cent consumer riding, particularly if I were speaking about the end of 1953, I might take a different attitude. But I would urge the consuming public to check the statements I have made today and previously concerning these imported oils. I repeat that the public was not given the benefit of these cheap oils in connection with the manufacture of this imitation of butter. But who got the benefit? Canada Packers and one or two associates got it, through holding those cheap, crude oils until such time as there was a scarcity of butter, arising as a result of the operation of the old law of supply and demand. When that shortage brought the price of butter to an admittedly excessive rate, the margarine was released.

The oil was produced and brought in, and the margarine was produced and held in storage at those ridiculously unfair competitive rates, and sold out at a 10 per cent increase. I have no intention of saying more. I do not believe that the parliamentary assistant, in doing his duty as he saw it in his special capacity, intended to leave the impression that the consuming public of Canada was getting the benefit of these imported oils. In Vancouver raw coconut meats were brought in and processed into coconut oil to manufacture this so-called imitation of butter, presumably for the benefit of the consuming public but actually to make excess profits for a few packing companies.

Mr. Speaker: Order, if the parliamentary assistant speaks for the minister now he will close the debate.

Mr. Sinclair: I did not move the bill, but it is quite true that when the bill goes into the committee stage I shall be speaking for the minister. I should like to speak as the member for Coast-Capilano as well as the parliamentary assistant, and answer some of the charges my friend has made.

Mr. Speaker: It makes it very difficult to follow the usual procedure of the house if a parliamentary assistant is piloting the bill through the house for the minister and speaks for the minister and also in his personal capacity as a member. I believe we have established a practice in the house that when the parliamentary assistant is acting for the minister he cannot act in his private capacity also. He may speak on presenting a bill for second reading.

Mr. Sinclair: I have not.

Mr. Speaker: It is true that the parliamentary assistant did not speak on moving second reading of the bill, but the practice is that if a minister does not speak on introducing a bill he cannot speak until closing the debate. I believe we should abide by our usual practice and allow the parliamentary assistant to speak in reply on closing the debate.

Mr. Cruickshank: That is one of the penalties of fame, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): There is one aspect of this matter that I should like to raise briefly. On a previous occasion we were told that the tariff reductions proposed in this bill have no reference whatever to the tariff concessions made at Torquay; the two are entirely independent. We were told the government was proceeding with these reductions without any regard for the agreements at Torquay or the course of the negotiations there.

Mr. Sinclair: Would the hon. member indicate when that statement was made, because I do not recall such a statement?

Mr. Fleming: When we were debating the resolution, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) intimated, and my friend will find it in Hansard, that the tariff reductions proposed in the present bill have no relation whatever to the Torquay tariff concessions.

At that time it was also intimated, Mr. Speaker, that much of the benefit of these reductions will flow to producers in the United States. My point is this; why were the tariff reductions proposed in the present bill not used in bargaining at Torquay with a view to deriving further concessions, if possible, from the United States? If these were isolated in point of time, that is to say the tariff reductions proposed in the present bill and those proposed in the Torquay agreement which presumably are going into effect by order in council, then there might be some reason for saying that there was no purpose in using them as bargaining factors.

These reductions, however, come forward at the very time when the Torquay negotiations, having been carried through, issue in an agreement which was reported in the house subsequent to the introduction of and the debate upon the resolution which preceded the introduction of this bill. Now, putting those factors together, it seems to me only reasonable business sense that when the government was prepared to recommend the tariff reductions contained in Bill No. 295 it would have been desirable to try to get some balancing advantage for Canadian producers in the markets of the United States.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the general position taken by the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I believe we have made a serious mistake in allowing margarine to replace butter. What the producers of margarine did this spring clearly indicates what those gentlemen would do if there were ever a deficiency of butter, or if they ever got the herds of milk cows completely depleted. They would raise the price of margarine twice as high as butter ever went. These gentlemen who went into the manufacture of margarine did not do so for the benefit of the people, not by any means.

There is another serious aspect to this question, and that is that the dairy cow enriches the farm upon which she lives. She enriches everyone who has anything to do with her. The producer of margarine leaves the country poorer. There is not one single factor entering into the production of margarine that directly or indirectly contributes to the natural wealth of this nation. Let everyone bear that in mind.

I know the reason why a good many of our members were almost bludgeoned into supporting margarine. It was because the price of butter was so high people were groaning for relief. They wanted something cheaper than butter to eat.

The wise procedure for the government at that time would have been to subsidize the price of butter in order to bring it down to a point where it could successfully compete with margarine. To try to talk any member of this government into paying subsidies however is just about as useful as trying to talk the mountain off its pedestal. Those gentlemen have not learned the elements of a sound economy. Until they do there is no use talking subsidies to them. Nevertheless, that would have been a sound policy, and instead of having 500,000 fewer cows in Ontario, we would have had 500,000 more. We would have been in a far better position to support ourselves than we are today.

I shall place myself on record as being in support of the position taken by the member for Fraser Valley in that we are not following a wise course in allowing margarine to displace butter in this country.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the subject to which I wish to refer has no specific connection with margarine. I wish to refer the parliamentary assistant to a discussion which took place in the house on May 17 when we were in committee considering the customs tariff resolution. At that time I indicated a situation which had developed in at least one of our ports, namely, Sarnia. Certain purchasers of vehicles made in the United States had brought those vehicles into Ontario and paid the duty on them. When it became necessary to leave this province to proceed to Alberta by way of the United States, which is practically necessary under existing conditions, the owners of those vehicles were forced by the Canadian customs officers to post bonds to assure that the vehicles would not be sold in the United States.

Now, the assumption that they would be sold in the United States was fantastic, if not ridiculous. In the case of one vehicle, a hearse, a duty of $1,500 had been paid. It is utterly fantastic to believe that the purchaser, who was an Alberta dealer, would take that vehicle back into the United States and sell it at United States prices. On May 17 the matter was referred to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), because he said it was a matter of administration in the Department of National Revenue. The Minister of National Revenue asserted that there must have been some slip-up either in the information I received or on the part of the customs officers.

I have double-checked the information and I find that not only does this apply to the individual I mentioned, but on that very day —it was a Sunday morning—three other vehicles passed through and exactly the same thing applied to them. What I should like to do is to secure some information that can be put on record in order to indicate to these Canadian dealers whether they may or may not drive these American made vehicles, upon which the duty has been paid, back through the United States. It would not have surprised me if the United States customs officials had insisted upon a bond, but they very quickly granted a permit. There was no difficulty whatsoever. The dealer in this particular case and the three individual purchasers were able to proceed through the United States without any difficulty at all. I think this matter should be cleared up because there must be a great many persons in the country who have posted bonds of $5 per vehicle. Actually it is not so much the matter of the $5 as it is the complete nuisance of having to do something which under the law conceivably is not necessary.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes I wish to speak in support of what the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has said this afternoon with particular reference to the practice followed in the months of February, March and April by margarine producers of raising their prices simply because, owing to a shortage of supply, the price of butter had increased. There is quite a large dairy industry in one part of my riding, and I find that the farmers' association has always taken a very reasonable attitude on this question. They have never previously urged me as their member to favour a customs duty on the importation of oils going into margarine until this occasion, when they now say: We think it is time that the public of Canada is placed in possession of all the facts, that it should no longer be represented that margarine is a cheap substitute for butter, one which will be available at a lower price and always at a lower price, and that therefore anyone who suggests that any difficulty be placed in the way of the manufacture of margarine is doing a disservice to the country. They now say: It can be seen quite clearly that these margarine manufacturers are quite prepared, as any other industrial manufacturer, to play the market for whatever it is worth regardless of the best interests and needs of the people of Canada.

I think the situation is now clear that our butter producers are entitled at this time to ask for a reasonable measure of protection and to request their members to ask the government as long as these—I do not know whether "unprincipled" is too strong a word; I do not want to use over-strong words, but I shall call them callously indifferent practices —as long as these practices are carried on by the manufacturers of margarine, raising their prices when they had no increase in cost, then the government should be asked to afford some protection to the dairy industry. The replacement cost of margarine did not go up. The margarine manufacturers did not have to raise the price by reason of an increase in the cost of production.

Mr. Sinclair: Why did butter go up in the same period?

Mr. Fulton: For two reasons which I would have thought the parliamentary assistant would have been aware of. One is the constant increase in the cost of producing butter, which is the thing that affects the farmers.

Mr. Sinclair: Not the manufacturer?

Mr. Fulton: The second was the actual shortage of butter at that period. There was an increase in the cost of production, but it was not the farmer alone who was responsible for the butter price increase. It was the farmer to a very small degree who was responsible. I am not arguing for the big wholesale distributor who increased his price on storage stocks; I am talking about the dairy farmer whose industry has suffered as a result of this competition, competition which has been facilitated on the basis that it will be to the advantage of the people of Canada because they will get a cheap butter substitute. We find that when the margarine manufacturers get in the position they want to be in, and when there is no butter or very small supplies of butter available, then they increase their price although they have had no increase in cost. That is the situation to which I am objecting.

I object to this business for another reason. I am not a tariff expert, and probably never will be, but it has occurred to me that the substantial changes in tariffs which have been made in late years have all been to the prejudice of the farmer. At the moment I do not want to enter into the controversy of high tariff versus low tariff policy. There is something to be said on both sides. Nevertheless it seems to me that, looking at the changes that have been made recently—the moves toward a low tariff policy—the majority of them have not been at the expense of the manufacturing industry but at the expense of the farmer. The small measure of protection which he has struggled for years to have built up—and I am thinking particularly of the dairy industry and the fruit and vegetable growers in our province—is now being whittled away.

As an example, I think particularly of the case of the apple industry where such measure of tariff protection as they had has been largely reduced over the last three or four years. Now we have the same thing with respect to butter. I do not see why when we are moving, if that is what we are doing, in the direction of a low tariff policy, the first move should be made at the expense of the farmer, and that is what is happening at the present time.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the parliamentary assistant speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Sinclair: I will start by answering the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). He said that he understood that the tariff changes indicated in the bill were made without regard to Torquay. It is quite true that they were quite separate from the Torquay agreement but they were not made without regard to Torquay. Most of these items were used by our delegation at Torquay and they found they could get no concession in return for them. To give an example of the concessions we have made in this bill the extended concession on agricultural implements was raised at Torquay, and the United States representatives replied immediately: But it is the policy of your government to reduce and eliminate the tariff on agricultural implements. Why do you ask us to bargain on that?

Another concession is one which I remember very well. I raised the matter myself three years ago as a private member on behalf of the fishermen on the west coast. There was a tariff item that allowed the free entry of lines and nets if made from vegetable fibre. Most of the lines and nets were either linen or cotton. Along came nylon, and the tuna fishermen were the first to use nylon lines. Under our existing tariff the only way that nylon could be brought in was as lingerie. The fishermen and fishing supply houses very rightly objected to paying the tariff that applied to lingerie on lines which they were going to use for tuna fishing. I raised that matter because I represent a fishing riding.

It was one of the items also used at Torquay but used to no avail. We found we could get no concession out of them because it was generally known that the general policy of our government is to keep cutting down tariffs applicable to the fishing industry for the benefit of the industry. We thereupon removed the tariff here in this bill. It is not quite right to say that the amendments in the bill are made without regard to Torquay. They were items which were used without success at Torquay. Probably the major item so far as detail is concerned is the item in the present measure having to do with all these parts of mining machinery. We had admitted mining machinery free. We had admitted integral parts free. We attempted to bargain on unfinished parts. Of course the United States representatives said: Obviously you are going to extend your policy to permit the entry of unfinished parts, parts which you yourself can get manufactured in the same way that we are now doing.

With respect to what the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) said, first of all I must say that the figures I put on Hansard were correct. I was asked for the tariff on the oils generally used in margarine. These oils are usually imported in the refined state. As a matter of fact the total volume of imports of refined oils, edible oils, last year was three times the volume of raw oils. It is quite true that raw oils have lower rates. Raw edible oils from the British preferential countries come in free, and from most-favoured nations the duty is 10 per cent. The interesting fact, however, to show the extent of the division between raw and refined oils is that on all our edible oil imports last year, raw edible oils which come in free from Great Britain and at a rate of 10 per cent from the United States, and the refined oils which have the tariff that I enumerated at page 3122, the average tariff paid on all our refined oil imports last year was 13·3 per cent. The average tariff paid on all our edible oils was 16 per cent, so the tariff on the oils was very substantial.

I had rather expected that since the hon. member for Fraser Valley raised this question at some length during the resolution stage he would again raise it now, and I felt that perhaps the time had come to deal with this matter at perhaps greater length than would be normal. To begin with, both the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Springfield have made the very flattering charge that I am responsible for margarine in Canada. Of course that is not so. Senator Euler very bravely introduced the question in the Senate for two years, and it was not until the third year that he picked me up as a recruit to introduce a bill in this house. As hon. members may recall, at that time my bill was talked out. That publicity may have helped to get results, but it was the Supreme Court of Canada which ruled that the federal ban on the manufacture and sale of margarine was ultra vires.

The second point raised by both the hon. member for Fraser Valley and his friend from Springfield at every opportunity is that margarine is unfit for human consumption.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will refer to my speech today he will not find that statement. I did not say it was inedible. I said I was not arguing the merits or demerits of the product; the exact words are in Hansard. The rules of this house do not permit me to describe the qualifications or qualities of margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: Of course the hon. member has substantiated my point. It may be quite true that in the present debate he has not made that statement in this house, but all hon. members will recall the statements by the hon. gentleman in recent months and years. Speaking as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, who after all is responsible for the collection of taxes from both industry and individuals in this country, I believe as a measure of fairness to manufacturers who are making a perfectly proper and legal product and paying their ordinary taxes, and also to the consuming public who pay a 10 per cent sales tax on margarine and an average of 13 per cent on import duties on the oils used in its manufacture, I should refute this charge that margarine is not a good food, which is made here in the privilege of the House of Commons. I would like to turn back to the actual margarine debate, during which I put on record the opinion in support of margarine of the British medical association, the Canadian medical association and the Department of National Health and Welfare, which had issued a booklet even before the legalization of margarine in which they said:

> So far as is known at present good margarine is a complete nutritional substitute for butter in an ordinary diet.

More than that, another authority came forward that day in the person of the Minister of Agriculture, whom I managed to involve in the debate and who agreed that he had never opposed margarine on the ground that it was not a good food. I would rather take the word of the British medical association, the Canadian medical association and the dietitians of Canada on this matter than the opinions of the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Springfield. The manufacture of margarine in this country is a factory process, of course. It is an extremely hygienic process, as will be agreed by any M.P. who visited a packing firm on the Toronto visit, as I have not. That cannot be said for the manufacture of all butter in this country, as the hon. member knows very well. Very good creamery butter is made, but hon. members who remember the summer of two years ago will also know that some very bad dairy butter is made in some parts of this country.

Mr. Cruickshank: The same thing applies to margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: There has never been any similar objection to the standard of quality of margarine. However, I think the best evidance is supplied by the Canadian people themselves. The large consumption of margarine about which the hon. member protests is pretty good evidence to me of the quality of the product, and also of the need for the product. I believe that is indicative of Canadian acceptance.

Let us turn now and look at Fraser Valley, because most of us know that the interests of the hon. member for Fraser Valley are pretty well confined by the boundaries of that riding. I recall a debate some three or four years ago on the question of whether seiners or gill netters should be allowed to operate in a certain area of British Columbia waters, during which the hon. member made that very clear. He said that he had no seiners in his riding but that he had two gill netters.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member cannot put words in my mouth. I never said I had two gill netters. Unlike the parliamentary assistant, who is using his position—

Some hon. Members: Now, now.

Mr. Cruickshank: If the hon. member for Halifax wants to make a speech in favour of the farmers, which I doubt, he is perfectly entitled to do so. The parliamentary assistant said I had said there were two gill netters in my riding. There are as many gill netters in my constituency, I think, as there are in his riding, but the pulp mills are not in my riding.

Mr. Sinclair: We are getting pretty far from the subject, I think. At any rate the inference was that whatever he had in his riding, he was for. He has made that abundantly clear since he has been in this house, as hon. members know. Well, I wanted to know whether the feeling in regard to margarine is shared by the people of Fraser Valley; and I go about these things in fairly objective fashion. I have a pretty good knowledge of my hon. friend's riding, since he is careful to invite me there during every campaign to help him get elected, despite the fact that I have championed margarine. I got in touch with the firm he continually denounces in this house and asked about their sales in the Fraser valley. Was this one dry spot, a dead end in which no margarine was consumed at all? I was somewhat surprised to get the reply that sales of margarine in the Fraser valley were quite normal, that they exceeded sales in west Vancouver, my own riding, for example. I suggest that the hon. member need only leave his farm, the ivory tower in which he lives, and walk down to the little store in Clayburn and ask whether margarine is sold there. Or go to Abbotsford or Mission or to the dairy town of Chilliwack, and see whether or not they sell margarine. Then he will know whether when he speaks in this way he speaks on behalf of all those people. The reason, of course, is that not all his constituents are dairy farmers. While he has many dairy farmers he also has a great many berry farmers and transportation workers, since he has the C.P.R., the C.N.R., the Great Northern and the British Columbia Electric. He also has a great number of sawmill workers, loggers—

Mr. Cruickshank: Brick workers.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, and a great number of old age pensioners and burnt-out veterans whom he defends so well in this house and who are very grateful for the opportunity to buy this lower priced substitute for butter.

Mr. Cruickshank: At an increase of ten cents a pound.

Mr. Sinclair: I am being helped by the hon. member, though I restrained myself from interrupting while he was talking. This increase was to match the increase in the price of butter. The hon. member apparently thought it was unfair for the law of supply and demand, which affected the price of butter, to also affect the price of margarine, though the manufacturer of margarine had the same increase in the cost of labour as did the farmer. In the case of the manufacturer this increase is supposed to be a heinous thing. Suppose we look at the dairy farmers themselves, and this is a very interesting thing about the Fraser valley. I have done a little research there. In Canada as a whole for every pound of butterfat sold in the fluid market two and a half pounds are sold for processing. In the Fraser valley that position is completely reversed. Two pounds are sold in the fluid market for every pound sold for processing; and the great bulk of the butterfat processed there does not go into butter but into condensed milk. I have the figures here for the first four months of this year. The fluid market took 2,700,000 pounds; for evaporated milk, 847,000 pounds; for butter, 390,000 pounds, or less than 10 per cent. Actually in British Columbia today we do not manufacture even 10 per cent of our butter needs. Most of the dairy farmers even in my hon. friend's riding sell to the fluid market, or for processing into evaporated milk.

Mr. Martin: And some of them buy margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the next point I was coming to. I was particularly reminded of it when I was in Denmark a year ago on this military relief debt collection. At a dinner given by the minister to Denmark I sat next to a Danish cabinet minister. I had been driving around all afternoon seeing the lovely farms, and I was talking to the minister about butter and bacon, and we finally got around to margarine. He was surprised to find that we had had a ban on margarine in Canada. He said: Of course in Denmark even our dairy farmers eat margarine for two reasons. I thought I knew the first reason why any dairy farmer, especially a Scotch dairy farmer with a name like Sinclair or Cruickshank, would be eating margarine, and he agreed. The farmers took their butter to market, sold it at a high price and bought margarine at a lower price. But the second reason he gave was a most interesting one. He said: We Danes are a neat, clean, tidy, orderly people. If you saw their farms, you would certainly agree with that statement. I said, yes. He said: You know, some of our Danish dairy farmers always associate the taste of butter with the smell of the cow barn.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Sinclair: If it is pertinent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is it true that Denmark has the greatest percentage of defective eyesight among the children of any country in the world?

Mr. Sinclair: Knowing nothing more than the hon. member's negative assertion, I would say that it is completely wrong. In any case, I want to close these remarks by reading some really good evidence of whether or not margarine is a palatable substitute for butter. We have had medical evidence that it is the nutritional equivalent. I have heard of this Toronto trip and of how members of parliament saw one of the larger packing plants in operation. They gave them a luncheon, and at that luncheon, I understand, margarine was served to certain members; and to confirm that, since the hon. member was attacking this company at every opportunity in the House of Commons, alleging that I was prejudiced in their favour, I wrote to them and on May 31 received this letter from the secretary of Canada Packers:

I have inquired into the Cruickshank affair and I find that he was served margarine at a luncheon given in our dining room. I believe he was under the impression that he was eating butter, but such was not the case.

Mr. Cruickshank: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this, and I think I have the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) with me. There are certain privileged affairs, and I will bring as my witness the vice-president of the B. A. Oil Company, Mr. Godsoe, to confirm that I will go along with a gag. I will take anything at all, and I will pass it out too. I do not know whether the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) and other Ontario members there did it as a gag. But this is appearing in Hansard and is going among the dairy farmers, and I do not think that even the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) wants to create a false impression. I was not served margarine; but as a gag a sign was brought in and placed at my seat at the table, owing to the fact that Canada Packers, in my opinion, showed poor taste, headed "serves farm members margarine." It was pointed out that it was set at my place after the dinner started. I say it is poor taste on the hon. member's part. I would not make this correction except for the fact that this is going out among the dairy farmers. It is said that this sign had been put at my seat at the table and that I did not know the difference. The members who sat around me know that I refrained from eating the margarine. I have a bet, any time that my junior colleague wants to take me up, that I know the difference between margarine and butter; but I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the hon. member for Coast-Capilano, that when I am a guest at any function, I will go along with a gag, and I will not take advantage of any gag that is played. I think the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) will bear me out that I am correct in that statement, and I was a guest of the Toronto board of trade.

Mr. Croll: Speaking to the question of privilege, along with some of the other members I had something to do with bringing the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) down to Toronto. It would appear to me that in writing this letter the company showed ill taste and bad manners. I think it was bad manners on the part of the company to discuss one of their guests privately. It is unforgivable to do it publicly.

Mr. Sinclair: I may have made an error of judgment myself in this. I should not like it to be thought that the company had. I made the inquiry but the secretary did not know I would use the information in the house. If it is distasteful to the hon. member, I withdraw my remark.

I hope however that this will put this debate on its proper footing. I must say the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) did try to argue whether or not admitting margarine as a reasonable substitute for butter had such an effect on the dairy industry as to seriously cripple it. That is the serious argument which should be advanced in this house on that matter. I would point out of course that margarine is the only major foodstuff which is subject to a sales tax of 10 per cent. Also, as I pointed out, the edible oils produced, both raw and refined, have an average tax of 13 per cent in point of duty. That is a substantial protection, I would think, for the dairy industry.

When he said that most of these changes in the tariff seem to be against the farmer, I do not think the record quite bears out that statement. Over the years we have consistently removed the tariffs from agricultural implements at the request of farm members generally, and recently at his request and the request of the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). They raised the question of the duty on portable sprinkling systems, for example, which we are now removing. As to the apple industry, and what they suffered last year, our exports to the United States were ten times our imports from the United States so the tariffs there cannot be said to be unduly severe in effect on the Canadian farmer. The general question of tariffs, of course, is a large one.

Mr. Fulton: They took the market away from our potatoes.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member mentions potatoes. The great value of our exports to the United States is in seed potatoes. We cannot allow our large and profitable business in seed potatoes to be jeopardized by adjustments of other tariffs on potatoes generally. I think that situation itself has been up before the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on several occasions, and I think they are fairly content to have both arrangements working together—the concessions on seed potatoes to the United States, and the fact that Americans can send potatoes into this country. However, that is a fairly broad field and perhaps it could be dealt with better on the agriculture estimates rather than here.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the parliamentary assistant if he can give the ratio of edible oils imported to those produced in Canada? I refer to those which go into margarine. Is there an increase in domestic production?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Sinclair: I will answer in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think questions should be asked in committee.

Mr. Tustin: I wanted to ask one question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate is now closed.

Mr. Sinclair: We are going into committee right now.

Mr. Shaw: Mr. Speaker, may I just ask one question of the parliamentary assistant?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Do it in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think it would be much better if we were to carry the motion, go into committee, and then have questions asked.

Mr. Shaw: The only difficulty is that I greatly doubt whether there is a place there where this matter can be dealt with.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The rules should be observed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Tustin: I just wanted to ask the parliamentary assistant one question. He referred to the increase in the price of margarine and rather brushed it off by saying that butter went up considerably and that margarine also went up because of the supply and demand. A few weeks ago butter went up about twenty cents a pound. It was followed right along by margarine to the extent of ten or twelve cents a pound. The question I want to ask the parliamentary assistant is this. Butter has gone back down again by about twenty cents a pound. Has he any information to give the committee as to why the full increase in margarine has still been maintained?

Mr. Sinclair: Knowing nothing at all about the cost of the manufacture of margarine, I would suggest it is probably along the line indicated by the hon. member for Kamloops, namely increased costs; because certainly wages and material costs have steadily gone up. If that gap is closed, then the argument of those in the dairy industry that butter should now be in a better competitive position would have some force, because it was the width of the gap which made margarine so attractive, especially to those of low incomes.

Mr. Fulton: On a question of privilege, I am quite sure the parliamentary assistant did not intend to indicate, although his words, if they stand in their present form, would leave that impression, that I had said the price of margarine went up owing to an increase in manufacturing costs.

Mr. Sinclair: No, I said butter.

Mr. Fulton: That applied to the manufacturing price of butter. I said that in my view there was no increase in the cost of manufacturing margarine that justified the increase that took place recently.

Mr. Cruickshank: I would like to say a word in this connection. I am not going to answer the parliamentary assistant in detail. I also could make some remarks about attending a banquet as a guest, but I am not sure whether it would have any effect on oils or not. I do not intend to go into that. I think that point was made perfectly clear by the hon. member from Spadina, so we may consider that a closed issue, which I think might be advantageous to all concerned.

Mention has been made of the fact that margarine has been sold in my riding. I enjoy these interjections, Mr. Chairman, from some of the smaller railway divisions such as Kenora. I happen to have two divisions within my riding, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. Benidickson: I have six.

Mr. Cruickshank: Quite true, you have six railway divisions, and that is all you have in your riding.

Mr. Martin: A very good member.

Mr. Cruickshank: I did not say that they did not have a good member. They have an excellent member. As a matter of fact I will compare him with the hon. member for Essex East who always tries to emulate the example set by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and to get the utmost for his riding.

Mention has been made of the fact that I concentrated a bit on my own riding. You know, when I was elected first in 1940 it was primarily to get the most I could for the dairy farmers and others within my riding; second, to work to the best of my ability on behalf of the province in which I reside and the surrounding ridings; and third, to work on behalf of the economy of Canada as a whole. For three or four years, particularly on Tuesdays and Fridays, I have endeavoured to do that, with very little support from some other areas.

It has been mentioned that margarine was sold in my riding, and I frankly admit it. It has been sold in my own little village of Clayburn; it has been sold in all parts of the riding, because unlike Coast-Capilano, where they depend to a great extent on the pulp mills and a few fishermen, we have loggers in the riding, the largest brick plant in western Canada and many other small industries. Certainly, margarine has been sold. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that farmers in my own district have bought margarine, I think to their own detriment. Certainly they have bought it. That is not the point, as I see it, and the point that has been overlooked by the parliamentary assistant in his exuberance to record on Hansard something about the hon. member for Fraser Valley who very seldom secures any publicity. He has overlooked and failed to answer the important point which was repeated by the hon. member for Kamloops, I believe, namely, that most of these oils that went into the manufacture of margarine had been imported duty free.

The parliamentary assistant made some reference to the fact that I had disputed his figures. I never disputed the accuracy of the figures as quoted by the parliamentary assistant. I think they are accurate. What I did say was that these oils came in duty free and were refined in Canada to go into the manufacture of margarine, and that immediately the price of butter went up the price of margarine went up by about 10 cents a pound, I believe, in spite of the fact that the oils used in the manufacture were to a large extent brought in duty free. I repeat, they were brought in at that time, held in storage, and then the margarine was manufactured. What the parliamentary assistant did not say was that when the price of butter went up—I believe it was in November—to the exceptionally high figure, two or three packing companies held the butter in storage and put the price up in the same way as they put up the price of margarine. The farmer did not benefit one cent from that increase. Make no mistake about that. I hope the people of Canada know that. That exceedingly high price of butter was of no benefit, but rather a detriment to the dairy farmer.

The dairy farmers in my own riding produce very little butter on the farms. We buy our butter. In other words we are consumers as well as producers. We produce milk for sale as butterfat, and we buy butter for our own consumption. We in the Fraser valley paid 81 cents a pound, or whatever the price was, for butter. And any farmer who was not in the fortunate position to be able to pay 80 cents or 81 cents a pound for butter bought margarine, and he paid this extra 10 cents a pound to this delightful colossus of Toronto, Canada Packers, over what they had produced margarine for. They themselves put the price of butter up because they and a few of their competitors were the only people who had butter in storage, and they and a few of their competitors were the only people producing margarine.

I want to make it very clear that the consumers did not get the benefit, and the farmers who produced the milk for sale as butterfat did not get the benefit of the high price of butter. The dairy farmer as a producer bought butter in exactly the same way as the sawmill worker or the brick workers or anybody else, in most instances, at least so far as British Columbia is concerned.

The point I am particularly interested in is the importation of these oils in their raw state. It has been suggested, again I am sorry to say, by one member from my own province—I do not think he will make the statement in the province of British Columbia, even in a consumer district with the slightest hope of being re-elected—that this oil should be permitted in here to be refined. I well remember, Mr. Chairman—and it is exactly the same with butter as it is with fisheries—that two years ago I was lobbied in this house by a representative asking that we do not permit the fishermen in my riding, in Coast-Capilano, in Westminster and in two adjacent ridings, who produce fish, the primary producer, to send them eighteen miles to Bellingham where the fishermen would get from 5 cents to 14 cents a pound more, the argument being the same as that being used by these proponents of margarine, that if the fish were kept to the detriment of the primary producers, the fishermen in Canada, and manufactured into canned fish, or whatever goes with the by-products within Canada, it would be to the ultimate good of the fishermen and the people of Canada. I was lobbied to that extent. When I am accused of primarily—perhaps wrongly—fighting for the interests of my riding, I have nothing to be ashamed of. I am not protecting the interests of the great giants in the canning industry or the fishing industry who want their extra bit of profit, rather than let the fisherman sell his produce eighteen miles away in Bellingham.

I do not know what can be done about it; perhaps nothing. I make no excuse for my stand, or for any farmer in my riding who, to his own detriment in the long run, buys margarine. I say that so long as protection is to be afforded to any line of industry the farmer should get his fair share of it. I say it is unfair competition to have oil shipped in here from a source of supply where labour and other conditions are as they have been described by the hon. member for Danforth, who has visited the area in question. I say these coconut meats and other oils should not be permitted to come in here duty free so that they compete with the product of the farmer who must work long hours every day of the year. To my mind that is unfair competition.

So long as we operate under the present system of tariffs, then I say that the dairy farmer is entitled to his share of protection, and should not be put out of action, not only to his own disadvantage but that of the whole country.

Mr. McLure: What is the cost of producing a pound of margarine for the market as compared with the cost of producing a pound of butter? It would be a fine thing to know what it costs to produce a pound of margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: I have not the least idea of either of those costs. I know the tariff on the inedible oils coming within the scope of the bill, but I have no knowledge of the cost of production of either margarine or butter. There are other departments from which the hon. member could get that information.

Mr. McLure: Does not the parliamentary assistant think that when these tariffs are being prepared inquiries should be made of the manufacturers as to how much of each of the oils goes into a pound of margarine?

Mr. Coldwell: Has the parliamentary assistant the ratio of domestically-produced oils as compared with imported oils? Has the production of edible oils increased in Canada as a result of the manufacture of margarine?

Mr. Sinclair: I have not that information here at this time. I have only the information respecting customs tariffs on oils coming into the country. I believe the hon. member should have his questions answered by the bureau of statistics.

Mr. Coldwell: I suppose the increased importation is due to the manufacture of margarine?

Mr. Sinclair: Mind you, edible oils are not only used for margarine; there are other uses, such as that connected with shortening and for packing fish which was mentioned by the hon. member for Charlotte. There are many other uses with which the Department of Agriculture will be familiar.

Mr. Coldwell: I shall ask them.

Mr. Fulton: A few moments ago the parliamentary assistant mentioned rates of 13·3 per cent and 16 per cent on different types of oils. What would be the equivalent rate in cents per pound.

Mr. Sinclair: That can be provided, because we know the total duty and the total amount imported. I can find that out, and give the hon. member the information.

Mr. Gibson: About four cents a pound.

Mr. Shaw: Now that the parliamentary assistant has one of his officials before him and the Minister of National Revenue behind him can he give an answer concerning the bonds which it is insisted the owners of American vehicles must post before crossing back into the United States?

Mr. Sinclair: That is really a matter of administration in the Department of National Revenue. I shall have an official from that department before me in a moment. It is not a matter of tariff policy.

Mr. Shaw: I would not press it if it did not affect a good many people. A number of additional cases have been brought to my attention.

Mr. Cruickshank: I do not expect the parliamentary assistant to be able to answer right away but, for the record, I should like to know how much coconut oil has been brought into Canada duty free under tariff item 113a, how much peanut oil has been brought into Canada under tariff item 276d(1), free of duty, and also under 276c(1), which covers coconut oil.

Mr. Sinclair: Did the hon. member refer to 113a?

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, that is copra, the raw product.

Mr. Sinclair: I have the figures for the various oils, both raw and refined, but I have not the exact information the hon. member wants. Last year of copra, not prepared, there were 48,325,430 pounds to a value of $4,815,415.

Mr. Cruickshank: May I have the same information on peanut oil, under tariff item 276d(1)?

Mr. Sinclair: Edible peanut oil to an extent of 2,877 hundredweight was brought in in 1950.

Mr. Cruickshank: Is that free of duty?

Mr. Sinclair: Edible peanut oil pays 15 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, what I want to get is the amount of peanut oil that entered under tariff item 276d(1), peanut oil, crude, when imported to be refined for edible purposes.

Mr. Sinclair: The peanut oil brought into Canada in the raw state from British preferential countries amounted to 77,631 hundredweight.

Mr. Cruickshank: Could I have the same information for tariff item 276c(1), covering coconut oil?

Mr. Sinclair: The non-edible coconut oil brought in for paints and other purposes like that amounted in value to $3,411,247.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, possibly I have not made my question clear. The information I want is under tariff item 276c(1), coconut oil, crude, when imported to be refined for edible purposes; that is quite a different thing from paint. In other words, it is to be refined to put into margarine.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the object here is to search out details on general trade and tariffs which are in public documents. It is rather to give general information on the items covered in the tariff schedule before us. These items mentioned by the hon. member are not in the tariff schedule being considered. The only items which are covered are oils, hydrogenated, blown, dehydrated or sulphonated and other oils in tariff item 277. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, rather than have me look through the trade statistics of Canada to find the individual items in the general tariff, the questioning now should be strictly in accordance with the actual items in tariff schedule A.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I have obtained two of the figures, and it is quite all right with me. What I am trying to arrive at, and I am quite in order, is information upon which to base my argument that these oils should not be permitted duty-free entry into this country. The two figures which the parliamentary assistant has given have verified the very argument I am trying to advance. Unfortunately, I did not have an opportunity of advancing this argument prior to the introduction of the budget or I am sure I would have convinced his officials to follow the course of action I am suggesting.

How am I to find these items when apparently the parliamentary assistant, with all his staff, cannot find them? How are the farmers of Canada to know how much crude oil is brought into this country? Forget the paints, because the paint companies will look after that. I want to know how much crude oil is brought in, duty free, to be refined for the manufacture of margarine. If the parliamentary assistant has not got that information I suggest, Mr. Chairman, through you that he has dozens of officials there who can find an excuse for not putting on a duty to protect the dairymen, so they can find out how many pounds or tons of this oil have been brought in duty free, to be refined in Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: I repeat my point of order, Mr. Chairman. We have had the general budget debate and we have had a general debate on the resolution concerning customs tariff; we have had second reading of the bill, and now at last we are down to considering the individual items. The only item in this schedule concerning oils is item No. 277, which covers inedible oils processed in various ways. I try to come here prepared with the facts and figures concerning the items in this schedule. I regret that I am not able, nor are my officials, to quickly dig out these items from the trade of Canada. I also regret that other members of parliament should have their time wasted while we are searching through for these various items outside the bill.

The Chairman: This is an amending bill to amend the Customs Tariff, and on an amending bill questions must relate to particular items mentioned in the bill. I would, therefore, request hon. members to ask questions relating to the particular clauses or items mentioned in the bill.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the last question as it is quite apparent that neither the parliamentary assistant nor his officials know the answer.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, there has been some discussion concerning these edible oils. I believe the parliamentary assistant should put on Hansard just what the duty is, general tariff, most favoured nation and British preferential, on these edible oils.

Mr. Sinclair: I did that on the budget resolutions. I gave the tariff on refined edible oils. The hon. member for Fraser Valley asked me to repeat it this afternoon, and also to put on the tariff concerning raw edible oils.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The parliamentary assistant has given that information three times.

Mr. Stanfield: This afternoon the parliamentary assistant said that peanut oil and coconut oil were admitted free.

Mr. Sinclair: The raw oils are admitted free, peanut oil, cottonseed and so on, from British preferential countries. There is a ten per cent duty imposed from most-favoured-nation countries. On the refined oils there are varying rates of duty that have been put on Hansard.

Mr. Jones: I should like to place on the record the point of view of the farmers in my riding. We have a large co-operative, composed of 1,250 members, that is producing butter. They are quite worried about the state of the market today, and they naturally want to bring stability to that market. They passed a resolution unanimously which I should like—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Would the hon. member tell me under what item this would come?

Mr. Jones: The same item as these essential oils, item 277.

Mr. Sinclair: Those oils are inedible oils used in the manufacture of paint, tanning, the textile industry and so on, as explained by the minister.

The Chairman: Item No. 277 does not cover edible oils.

Mr. Jones: I shall be very brief, and in view of the discussion—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We have been brief all afternoon. If there is no item covering edible oils I am going to object to the continuance of this debate. We should stick to the items in the schedule.

The Chairman: The point of order is well taken.

Mr. Shaw: I wonder if the parliamentary assistant is in a position now to give me the information I requested earlier.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed—of course it is not my department—that this provision does not apply to the ordinary tourist's car. This refers to commercial vehicles in transit. The point is to ensure that there is going to be no alteration, improvement or adaptation while the vehicle is in transit, and that the same vehicle as left the country at Sarnia is going to re-enter the country in Alberta or British Columbia. The purpose of the bond is to make sure that is going to happen.

Mr. Shaw: The thought that interests me most is why you should require a greater assurance in that case than you require from me if I proceed to drive through the United States. I now have to declare every accessory on that car, and that is checked when I leave the United States.

The second point is that the individual in question is a dealer in buses and hearses who has brought in many vehicles and the last month was the first time he has been faced with this situation. He made approximately ten trips through prior to that and the question never came up. But all of a sudden, and even on a Sunday morning, he was faced with this situation. If there is a regulation which states clearly and specifically that on such vehicles in all cases, whether it involves a dealer, owner or agent, a bond must be posted, I have no complaint so far as the treatment he received is concerned, but even he has not been subjected to the same treatment at all times. This was the first time it had occurred. Since he proposes moving other vehicles through both from east to west and west to east he would like to know exactly what he can expect when he arrives at a customs office.

Mr. Sinclair: All I can tell the hon. member is that the officials of the department will certainly look into the case and give him an answer.

Mr. Shaw: That is all I am asking for, that they should look into it and give a specific and definite answer which can be looked upon as a rule, and that this dealer can be so advised.

Mr. Fleming: Would the parliamentary assistant tell us for our information what was the total duty collected in the last fiscal year on the items enumerated in the schedule to the bill and the estimated loss of revenue in consequence of the tariff reductions proposed in the bill?

Mr. Sinclair: This matter has come up in the house before, and also has been raised before the banking and commerce committee in its attempt to assess the value of the Torquay agreement. It is physically impossible to determine these actual values. To use the example that I used on the resolution stage, there is the fact that we are now going to exempt from tariff rough parts for mining machinery. They had been brought in before under any one of three or four different tariff items depending on whether they were forgings, castings, and so on. Unless we go back into every customs item and pick out these things all the way through, we have no estimate at all of the amount involved.

The same thing is true of the fishing item with reference to synthetic fibres such as nylon now being used instead of cotton and linen. Unless we went back through all the nylon and rayon importations and took out those which were specified as being lines—and we had no category for them—we could not do it. The amount of work in order to get very little information is not commensurate at all with the cost involved. The same answer was pretty well given by the chairman of the tariff board at the meeting of the banking and commerce committee on the Torquay agreement.

Mr. Fleming: I can appreciate that in part what the chairman of the tariff board said before the banking and commerce committee last week may have application here. I can also recognize that it may be difficult to estimate the exact loss in customs revenue in consequence of the reductions because one does not always know in advance what effect the reduction is going to have on the volume of imports. However, I preface my question by asking the parliamentary assistant what was the value of the imports of these commodities last year and the duty collected on them. I think that information should be available. When similar information was asked of the chairman of the tariff board in the banking and commerce committee last week, he was able to give that information with respect to the items under the Torquay agreement. I refer to the volume in dollars of the imports affected by the Torquay agreement.

Mr. Sinclair: It is quite true that with respect to major commodities, such as Douglas fir plywood and canned salmon which were discussed in the banking and commerce committee, it can be done, but if you look at these items in the schedule you will see that most of them are for little things. The items numbering from 400 on are for the most part little parts of mining machinery, and they have never been separated from their present categories. The same thing is true of synthetic fishing lines which did not come in as fishing goods but came in under other items as general importations of synthetic fibres. It is just as difficult to go through all the records and pick them out as to pick the amount of them out. There are no really major items here other than the reclassification of the plastics under 238. I think all that the chairman of the tariff board tried to do was to deal with a few major items. With a great number of very small items it is practically impossible.

Mr. Fleming: Certainly I will not pursue the matter further if the parliamentary assistant indicates to the house that no estimate of the loss of revenue was made when the bill was drawn and the schedule prepared. I note that the Minister of Finance in the budget speech on April 10, as found at page 1814 of Hansard, estimated the revenue from customs duties in the present fiscal year at exactly the same amount as last year, $315 million. Apparently he did not contemplate any loss of revenue. I wondered if that estimate was based on the pre-Torquay or post-Torquay and post-Bill No. 295 situation.

Mr. Sinclair: It was certainly pre-Torquay but it was not pre the bill because the bill is part of the budget discussion and the basis of the budget figures.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on a motion to go into supply on May 23, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) raised the question of the statement made by me on the budget in 1949 with regard to the excise tax on watches. I promised at that time I would make a statement when we came to the second reading of the excise tax bill. Hon. members will recall that in the spring budget of 1949 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in his budget speech said we were going to remove the 25 per cent retail tax on watches and jewelry and replace it by a 10 per cent excise tax on the manufacturers' level, and that the loss of revenue would be about $8 million.

The 25 per cent tax had been imposed during the war for two reasons, first as a revenue tax, and second to discourage the sale of these items during the war. That was followed by a resolution in the house which read in part as follows:

> Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Tax Act and to provide, effective on and after March 23, 1949: . . .
> 2. That the retail purchase tax be repealed and replaced by an excise tax of 10 per cent, payable by the manufacturer or importer, on all articles now subject to the retail purchase tax.

Watches for personal use, other than watches for the blind and watches for railwaymen, had been subject to this 25 per cent tax. Therefore the question then came up of putting the tax back on the manufacturers' level. A problem immediately arose because of a practice by ten companies in Canada of importing not watches but watch works, watch cases and the actual final display cases separately. They said they were not importing watches, and I think most of us would agree. They then put the case and the works together, put it in the display case and sold it to the retailer, and their allegation was that this was not the manufacture of a watch.

Well, to get away from all the legal technicalities, I think most hon. members would agree that no watch came into the country, if the case and the works and the display case came separately. Hon. members would also agree that certainly a watch was delivered to the retailer by the people who brought in the parts; and the act of putting the watch together, if not manufacture undoubtedly was the production of a watch. With that in mind the Department of National Revenue, to carry out the terms of the budget resolution, sent a circular to the collectors of customs and excise, dated April 19, in the following terms:

> The honourable the Minister of National Revenue has been pleased to establish the following regulations under authority of section 99, subsection 1, of the Excise Tax Act:
> Regulations
> On and after May 2, 1949, any person who assembles clock or watch movements into cases therefor, and who adds any attachment, of metal, leather, plastic or any other material or combination thereof to a new watch, will be regarded as the manufacturer or producer of the clock or watch, as the case may be.

In other words the intent was in that order. Of course the fault in the order was that the resolution still had not been translated into an act and there was no authority to issue regulations, so these regulations could be more or less classed as a directive to the collectors of customs and to the watch manufacturing industries of Canada. They immediately protested, saying they were not manufacturers or producers of watches. They also said, of course, that they were not importing watches; and they urged that they should be freed from this 10 per cent excise tax. Ten of those manufacturers took this exception and held several meetings with the officers of the department. Those representations failed, as I think most of us would say they must fail. The parts came into the country; a watch was sold to the retailer. In the interval someone must have manufactured or produced a watch. The department said the person who put the case and works together had manufactured the watch, and it was at that stage that this 10 per cent excise tax was to be levied.

When these representations failed an appeal was made to the Supreme Court of Ontario on May 7. It asked two or three things. The key point, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Eglinton at page 3320 of Hansard, was the request for a declaration that they were not manufacturers or importers within the terms of the resolution; that the excise tax was not applicable at the time of import, and that they were entitled to import without the manufacturer's or sales license.

The house prorogued without passing the budget resolutions, and the matter was then left in the position that the repeal of the retail purchase tax had been announced, and of course the jewelers of the country had stopped collecting that. The imposition of a 10 per cent excise tax had been announced on the goods formerly subject to the retail purchase tax, which of course included clocks and watches; but there was no law to enforce compliance by manufacturers or producers of those goods. The situation in this country has been mentioned many times in this house. The night the Minister of Finance makes his budget address he announces certain tax changes. Most of them come into effect at midnight that night. It is quite true that often weeks, and in this case from seven to eight months, elapse between the introduction of the budget by the minister, the introduction of the resolutions, the introduction of the bills founded upon them, the adoption of the bills by the House of Commons and Senate and royal assent; but it has been the custom in this country since confederation that when these tax changes are announced by the minister they are regarded as being in effect from the time the minister indicated they would be. If subsequently, though this has never happened, the house should not approve the tax changes contained in those resolutions, of course the manufacturers and others who had paid those taxes would be entitled to refunds. Actually, of course, the practice is that the house has always endorsed the principle of those resolutions as contained in the bills, and the tax collection has been proceeded with.

We came back, then, in the fall; the budget was re-introduced, and the resolutions were re-introduced. Because of this question whether we had the right to regard the assembly of the case and the works as the production of a watch, and to make it quite clear that we were going to regard that as the manufacture or production of a watch, the new resolution specifically mentioned that fact. The hon. member for Eglinton called my attention to it when I was putting the resolutions through, and I said we thought we had that right anyway, as was shown by the regulations which were sent out in the form of a circular, but that to make it quite clear we were spelling it out in the bill. But in order not to prejudice the case then before the courts we agreed to have this specific wording apply only from November 10, when the matter came to the public notice with the first reading of the bill.

I want to recapitulate the position of the government up to that time. The minister brought in the budget and announced that the retail sales tax of 25 per cent was to be dropped and an excise tax of 10 per cent was to be put back at the level of manufacture on those items. We had sent out a directive to the customs collectors and the industry and had actually started to collect the tax from nine of the ten watch manufacturers. This was appealed to the courts, and the case was before the courts when we re-assembled in the fall. To make it quite clear that henceforth we intended to regard that as manufacture we spelled it out in the bill. But we said we would not prejudice the case then before the courts, that the courts should decide whether or not we had the right to levy the tax at that level on the strength of the budget resolution of March.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITION TO EXISTING PROGRAM FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), Mr. Speaker, on his behalf and on behalf of the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Howe), I ask leave to revert to motions to enable me to make a short statement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Campney: I wish to announce a substantial addition to the existing program for the construction in Canada of ships for the Royal Canadian Navy.

Orders have heretofore been placed for the construction of twenty-seven vessels for the Canadian navy on which work is now proceeding. The estimated cost of these orders already placed is ninety-six million dollars.

The additional orders now being placed total approximately sixty million dollars, and provide for the construction of twelve more ships. Included in these orders now being placed are seven destroyer escorts in addition to seven already contracted for; one loop layer; two steel crane lighters and two modified Norton class tugs. Of these new vessels one additional escort vessel will be constructed by Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, P.Q., where one escort vessel has already been ordered. Canadian Vickers Limited, Montreal, Halifax Shipyards Limited, Halifax, and the Burrard Drydock Company Limited, North Vancouver, will each build one of the escort vessels now being authorized, bringing to a total of three the number of ships of this type being built by each of these firms.

Three shipyards which have not previously received orders for escort vessels are each undertaking one of the remaining three. These are Yarrows Limited, Victoria, B.C.; Victoria Machinery Depot Company, Limited, Victoria, B.C.; Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Company Limited, Lauzon, P.Q.

The loop layer will be built by George T. Davie and Sons Limited, Lauzon, P.Q.

One steel crane lighter will be built at the Pacific Drydock Company Limited, North Vancouver; the other at Saint John Drydock Company, Limited, East Saint John, N.B.

The Saint John Drydock Company will also build two Norton class tugs.

The placing of the orders above mentioned brings the construction program for the Royal Canadian Navy to date to a total of one hundred and fifty-six million dollars covering the construction of thirty-nine ships.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for the second reading of Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had been discussing the case which was referred to in Hansard as the Gruen watch case and which was raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on May 23 when he alleged bad faith on the part of the government with regard to the undertaking given by myself as parliamentary assistant in the budget debate in the fall of 1949. I had reached the point where the ten watch companies had met with the government and then decided to file suit. Before suit was filed, however, five of the companies withdrew. They had been paying the taxes. One of the companies which withdrew was the Gruen watch company, and I believe they feel it is rather unfair that the case that went to the supreme court and to the court of appeal should be referred to as the Gruen watch case, because they accepted the ruling and had paid their taxes.

Chief Justice McRuer gave a lengthy judgment, of which I shall quote only two little parts that to me as a layman seem to be the pertinent ones:

> The effect of the provision that sections 5 and 6 should come into effect as of the tenth of November, 1949—

That was the undertaking I gave in the house so as not to prejudice the case which was then before the courts.

> —for the purpose of this case is to leave it open to the court to decide whether the other retroactive aspects of the suit in fact apply to the plaintiff.

When he talks about "other retroactive aspects", he is talking only as far as the court of law is concerned; because when the minister on budget night in the spring had announced the changes, as far as the country was concerned the changes were in effect that night. It has been the custom since confederation to accept those changes as of that night, although the actual legal royal assent did not come until the bills had gone through both houses of parliament some time later.

Then Chief Justice McRuer goes on to say this:

I cannot find that the simple operation of putting a watch movement into a watch case is manufacturing a watch in the ordinary popular and natural sense of the word, but I feel clear that the plaintiff produced watches adapted to household or personal use.

I now come to the key part of the judgment:

I therefore find that for the purposes of the Excise Tax Act the watch movements as imported were not watches.

And we agree with that.

That being so, the inescapable conclusion is that the plaintiffs by importing movements and placing those in watch cases so that they might be convenient and useful for personal use as watches are producers of watches adapted to household or personal use and therefore are now liable to pay excise tax and sales tax pursuant to the retroactive provision of the amendment of 10th December, 1949, on deliveries made to purchasers on and after the 23rd May.

And then the last part of his judgment which appeals to me:

Having found that the plaintiffs were producers of watches adapted to household or personal use since 22nd March, 1949, under the state of the law as it now is they have been liable to pay the excise tax according to the terms of the statute since that time. No useful purpose could be served by making a declaration that they were not liable to pay the tax until the statute of 1949 with its retroactive effect had received the royal assent.

Mr. Fleming: Note the words "that its retroactive effect".

Mr. Sinclair: But again the retroactive effect is not the effect of the amendment I moved in November, 1949. The retroactive effect he is talking about is the effect resulting from the fact that the act did not receive the royal assent until December, although the intent of the budget and of the resolution had been stated here by the minister on March 23, that spring; and the custom of Canada since confederation has been to put these taxes in effect immediately until such time as the act is passed. That is the retroactive effect to which Mr. Justice McRuer refers. He makes it clear that he is separating the amendment which was proposed by me from the other inevitable retroactive effects from our way of implementing the budget resolutions.

The case went on, of course, to the appeal court; but it is significant, as I said, that although ten started out, four of them dropped out before the case went even to the supreme court; and after the supreme court hearing five others dropped out, leaving just the one company, the Bulova watch company, which had voluminous correspondence with the Department of National Revenue and with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) in which these facts had been repeated. They went to the court of appeal, of course, and the judgment of the supreme court was sustained in those parts that they were asked to adjudicate on and the other parts were not mentioned.

Mr. Fleming: The court of appeal—

Mr. Sinclair: The court of appeal was not asked to discuss the fact of whether or not they were producers of watches. To the other members of the house who are not lawyers let me in a summary say a word—

Mr. Fleming: That is not quite right.

Mr. Sinclair: In March, 1949, the Minister of Finance stood up and mentioned many tax reductions. One of them was the removal of the 25 per cent retail tax on watches back to 10 per cent excise tax at the manufacturers' or producers' level. That reduction was a saving of $8 million to the taxpayers of Canada and it was certainly welcomed by the watchmakers of this country because the 25 per cent retail tax was a nuisance tax which interfered with sales. As is the practice under our way of bringing in budgets since confederation, those tax changes went into effect that night. It is quite true that as far as the law is concerned, they did not become law until royal assent had been given to the excise tax bill which in this case did not happen until December 10 of that year.

Nine of the companies paid their taxes. A case went to the supreme court on the claim of the Bulova watch company, first of all, that they should not have that excise tax levied on the works, case and the display case which they imported separately. But that was not a watch. We all agree that that was not a watch, we who are not lawyers. However, when the case, watch and works were put together and sold to the retailer, it certainly was a watch; and the Department of National Revenue, in their directive to the trade in April, said that that process was going to be regarded as the production of a watch and that 10 per cent excise tax was to be levied there.

The companies protested. Naturally they would like to avoid taxes—not evade taxes but avoid taxes. After discussion with the department six of them went to the supreme court and the chief justice ruled in effect that we did not need that fall amendment spelling out precisely that the assembly of the case and the watch was the production of a watch, but that the spring resolution had covered this point. He ruled that the intent of the change in March placed that tax at that production level. The case was appealed to the court of appeal by just one of the ten companies. I may say that nine of the ten companies have paid the tax without question. To the ordinary person not versed in law it would be inconceivable that there should be any place where a tax could not be placed on that watch; if we did not tax the separate parts coming in and did not tax them as they come together, then that watch could be placed in the hands of retailers without that excise tax which is levied on other producers and manufacturers.

There was no bad faith on the part of the government; there was no tearing into shreds and tatters the good faith of parliament. The provision which I made at the direction of my minister was that since there was this case before the courts we would spell out this expanded resolution to make it clear that we did so regard the assembly of the works and the case as the production. If then the courts, on the basis of the spring resolutions, should say that this was not the production of a watch, then from November 10 on we would collect because of the amended resolution. As it turned out, the chief justice ruled that that was the production of a watch, and so the excise tax was properly levied at that level.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill to amend the Excise Tax Act. This bill of course includes a section increasing the sales tax. When on April 16 I replied to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) I moved at the end of my remarks an amendment, from which I quote the following, as reported at page 2053 of Hansard:

> The proposals of the Minister of Finance are unsatisfactory because they will inevitably increase the cost of living for all and especially for those least able to bear it.
> This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.

I wish to pursue that argument tonight because I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that everything that has happened since that time has endorsed the arguments which were made then, and I am not going to give up hope, particularly as we now have a minister who has become since then a doctor of laws honoris causa, and therefore we may have a more ready reception of the arguments which at that time did not succeed. I should like to bring briefly to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that at that time among other things we were warranted by a great deal of expression of opinion in the press in believing that the increase in the sales tax was repugnant to the people of Canada. I should like to read briefly from some of the newspapers that I quoted at that time. First of all, the Ottawa Journal of April 11 said:

> It would be wrong to say that what Mr. Abbott brought us yesterday was an anti-inflationary budget. All Mr. Abbott seems to have done is to impose levies sufficiently heavy to bring the sums required for the defence effort, with no theory or nonsense about stopping inflation.

The Windsor Star said:

> To think the increased taxes will appreciably reduce the demand for a diminishing flow of goods is to be naive. The higher taxes are more apt to encourage demands for higher wages so the higher cost goods can be purchased.

L'Action Catholique mentioned a special aspect which would be of interest to the province of Quebec. It said:

> The increase in the sales tax will automatically increase the provincial sales tax, since the latter is based on the price of the merchandise including the federal sales tax.

The Ottawa Citizen said:

> The real shocker of the 1951 budget is the increase in the general sales tax to 10 per cent.

The Montreal Star, speaking of the general sales tax, said:

> It will inevitably bring in its train demands for higher wages.

Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member for a minute? I do not know how far I should allow the debate to continue. The hon. member has recalled the fact that this question was discussed when the budget was before the house. There was a vote taken, and a decision was arrived at which negatived the views which are now being expressed by the hon. member. I do not like to be too strict in this regard, but I should remind him that I feel the question has been decided this year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Your Honour will remember that when the excise resolution was before us we sought to have it broken up into the different items. If I remember correctly at that time the Minister of Finance pointed out to us that although we were not getting the chance then to vote on the question of the sales tax, we would get a chance when we came to the excise bill itself. Your Honour may say, well, you will get that chance when you come to the sales tax section of the excise tax bill; but it did seem to me that in view of the fact that that matter is one that may be voted on, it was proper, with Your Honour still in the chair, to raise the question which will be specifically raised when we come to that section.

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. member permits me, he has quite a false impression if he thinks that any hon. member has forgotten what he said about it.

Mr. Fleming: On the point of order, may I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that all that the house did on a previous occasion was to approve the introduction of a bill. It adopted the resolution looking to the introduction of a bill. It did that, and it did nothing more. When the bill was introduced the resolution adopted by the house was completely functus. Now we have a bill. Surely the mere approval by the house of the introduction of a bill is not to compass or narrow the normal scope of debate on second reading of a bill.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members realize that it is a rule of the house that when a question is put and decided it cannot be brought forward again during the same session. May I call the attention of hon. members to paragraph 332 of Beauchesne, third edition:

> It is a rule in both houses, which is essential to the due performance of their duties that no question or bill shall be offered that is substantially the same as one on which their judgment has already been expressed in the current session.
> An old rule of parliament reads: "That a question being once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again but must stand as the judgment of the house." Unless such a rule were in existence, the time of the house might be used in the discussion of motions of the same nature and contradictory decisions would be sometimes arrived at in the course of the same session.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I suggest, Your Honour, that, as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has already suggested, what was done before was to pass a resolution preparing the way for a bill. That was some weeks ago. We now surely have a decisive action to take. May I reassure Your Honour by saying that I do not propose to go over all the ground of weeks ago, but what I chiefly wish to do is to suggest that there are certain things which have happened in the last six weeks. Surely, the decision that we are making when we pass this bill is a decision that we must make as of the present time. I suggest to Your Honour that we have a decision to make now in the light of the facts at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: It was not my intention to stop the hon. member, but I thought I should bring to his attention and to the attention of the house what is the practice in this connection. The hon. member says that he is not going to discuss the point at great length. In view of that I think I should allow him to continue.

Mr. St. Laurent: Just before the matter is finally settled, it would be desirable to point out that in fact the argument suggested by the hon. member for Eglinton, and repeated by the hon. member for Greenwood, is not accurate. It was not merely a resolution that a bill be introduced. The question that was raised was on an amendment to that resolution submitted by the hon. member for Greenwood himself, specifically challenging the increase of 25 per cent in the sales tax as being inadvisable and unnecessary; and the decision of the house negativing that assertion made in the amendment is found at page 302 of Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Drew: But in that respect the amendment on which the vote was taken must be regarded in relation to the subject matter before the house at the time the amendment was moved. It should be recalled that there was before the house at that time a motion to the effect that it was expedient that a certain bill be introduced. An amendment which raises other issues is simply for the purpose of showing reason why it is not expedient that the bill be introduced in the form in which it is.

It was upon that amendment that the vote was taken. I submit that on a number of occasions during the discussion it was pointed out that at a later time a bill would be coming before the house, and that on that occasion it would be possible to deal with this in relation to the specific sections of the bill which would then be under discussion.

Mr. Knowles: May I say a word on the point of order? It seems to me that Your Honour should take into consideration the view which is expressed I am sure in two or three places in May and Bourinot. Thus far I have been able to find it in only one place, namely at page 317 of May, thirteenth edition, and it is contained in a sentence after the paragraph we all know so well which begins in this way:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded.

A little further along May says:

> This rule, however, does not apply to debates upon different stages of a bill.

The other references, which I know are there, and I can turn them up if necessary, are to the effect that the different stages of a bill are considered all part of the same debate. It is permitted to refer back to the previous stages of the debate on the same proposition, so long as it has not been finally decided.

I would submit that if the amendment to the motion for Your Honour to leave the chair to go into the committee of ways and means dealt with a matter which had been finally disposed of by that amendment, we would have to consider whether that matter could again be discussed. But the matter has not been finally disposed of. The matter is in the bill, second reading of which is now before the house. I refer to the matter of raising the sales tax. That is one of the questions we are called upon to approve or disapprove in deciding upon a second reading of the bill. I agree that there is merit in the point Your Honour has raised, and that the Prime Minister has drawn to your attention; but I do offer for your consideration these two other thoughts, first, that the question of the sales tax is still before us, since it is one of the questions of substance before us in the bill and, secondly, I call Your Honour's attention to the citation I have read from May, like unto which there are others, to the effect that the rule against repetition does not apply to debate at the different stages of the same bill.

Mr. Speaker: As I said a moment ago, I do not propose to prevent discussion of the matter, if it is not too extended. Hon. members will recall that the hon. member for Greenwood read an amendment upon which the house had come to a decision during the present session. He is proposing to discuss the amendment again. I do not think we should agree that that is in order. I have stated however that I am not stopping the hon. member at this time, but I would ask hon. members not to extend their remarks unduly in respect of a matter which has already been decided.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I follow your argument concerning the discussion with respect to the increase in the sales tax. However, I would not agree with the hon. member if he proposed to move an amendment at this stage to that effect. It would be a substantive motion, and I do not think he would be in order in moving the same motion he offered on April 16, part of which was in these words:

> This house condemns in particular, as inflationary, the increase by 25 per cent of the general sales tax and is of the opinion that the increase is unnecessary and unwise.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said this was a substantive motion, and that it was decided during this session. The house did decide against the amendment, and I suggest it would be neither proper nor legal if moved a second time on the bill stage, when a decision has already been given by the house. I understand the rule to be that one cannot repeat the same motion at the same session on the same subject or in the same terms.

As to the discussion of the sales tax, I think it is perfectly correct to say that members of the opposition or any other members are free to discuss the bill before the house. But to move the same motion is not only a waste of time but, if I may say so, somewhat ridiculous, because there has not been any change since the vote was taken, and I can see no reason why an attempt should be made to change at this time the decision of the house. I think we might delay the decision on the point of order until the hon. member tells us whether he is moving the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: There is no amendment before the house at the moment, and thus far I have heard no intimation that any amendment would be moved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I shall relieve the mind of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) by saying that I do not propose to move the same amendment I moved last time.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Or any amendment of the same kind?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That may be a matter of opinion. I shall stick to my statement, that I do not intend to move the same amendment. and I doubt whether the Minister of Public Works will later on think that I am trying to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you have warned me to be brief, and I must be brief. I should like to go back and, if I may, recall to the house the points I made on the former occasion. I drew attention to the fact, in which the public is becoming interested, of the astonishingly erratic budgeting we have had for several years. I pointed out in particular that in 1950, after an estimated surplus of $20 million we had virtually $343 million, or 22 times as much as had been estimated. I stated my belief that there was no doubt that an increase in the sales tax would immediately increase prices, and I was bold enough to suggest that in all probability the $20 million surplus which the minister estimated would probably reach somewhere near $105 million, the estimated return from the sales tax; and I did suggest that that might be forgone.

That was on April 16. It is not often predictions are proved true so quickly as these predictions have been. In the first place I think no one now doubts that what we said about the addition to prices as a result of the sales tax has in fact happened. And we have had an interesting comment on my prediction with regard to revenue, because in the month of April we have had a surplus of $121 million as against an estimate of $30 million for the whole year.

Now, not overlooking what the minister said about these figures not being indicative, on the other hand the minister has not tried to show nor do I think he could succeed in showing that there is any great reason to believe that that month of April was so untypical as he would like to suggest. If, in fact, a mistake has been made the minister could easily tell us so. I would think more highly of this government if they ever admitted that they had been wrong. One of the things that worry me about them is that they always say they are right. However, the minister has not said they were wrong, and my feeling is that the real reason for this bad budgeting is contained, very briefly put, in the Ottawa Journal of May 29. I shall read briefly from it. The Ottawa Journal says:

Why is Mr. Abbott so wrong?

Then it gives what I think is a very interesting and significant answer which I believe goes to the very root of the whole matter.

Because apparently he takes no account of inflation. In April, 1950, personal income—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe this time the hon. member is really out of order. He is reading from a newspaper clipping a criticism of something that took place in this house during this session. If you look up the citations in Beauchesne you will find that a member cannot quote from a newspaper any criticism of legislation going through this house in this session.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I quoted a whole list of papers as long as your arm.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member was wrong then, and he is still wrong.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not hear what the minister said. In the meanwhile I shall continue with what I was reading.

Mr. Speaker: The point, as I understood it—oh, I am sorry.

Mr. Pouliot: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, before you give your ruling I should like to say that a distinction should be made between newspaper clippings reporting speeches made outside the house by members of parliament, and comments made by the press about anything that happens in parliament. In the first place, any hon. member would be in order in quoting a newspaper report of a speech made by any hon. member outside the house. But when it comes to comments made by any newspaper concerning legislation brought before the house, then that is not in order. I submit, sir, that distinction should be made. The hon. gentleman cannot be in order if he quotes an article published in any newspaper containing a comment about legislation before the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I point out that this article says nothing about legislation at all. This has to do with the April revenue return. As a matter of fact, I do not think there is any reference to legislation. I am amazed that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) could be so misled.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): For the information of the hon. member I shall read citation 306 in the second edition of Beauchesne:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Now, if the article contains any reflection on this budget bill or the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), I believe the hon. member is out of order. It is all right to quote newspapers and make a speech out of what is written in some of them, but we have to follow the rules once in a while.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I must point out again, Mr. Speaker, that I think the Minister of Public Works is being misled. I cannot understand him at all. He is usually so reasonable, but tonight he seems to have got completely off the track. This article does not criticize anyone in this house. It is a comment on a statement made outside this house to the effect that there was a surplus of $121 million for the month of April.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On another point, Mr. Speaker, I have to follow this up. If the hon. member is trying to urge upon the house something that does not relate to this debate, he is still out of order. He has to debate this bill, and nothing else.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I can certainly see that the minister wants to prove I am out of order. He has given four different reasons now, and on which of them does he want to hook me?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On two of them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As soon as I point out that one is wrong, he brings in another.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am trying to follow you, but you are jumping all over the place.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably I should reread the citation which the Minister of Public Works has read. I have Beauchesne, third edition, and in that edition it is paragraph No. 265:

It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I submit with deference that nothing I have read reflects on any proceedings in the house, nor does it comment on any statement made by a member. It comments on a statement made by the Department of Finance.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Not relating to this bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister will let me finish it, I shall be through in a moment. I could have been finished by now.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member may just as well omit the whole speech. We would not miss it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The trouble is now that I do not know where I was. I shall have to go back and reread it. I hope all this is not taken off my time.

Mr. Speaker: Probably I should remind the hon. member about a rule of the house to the effect that a member replying to a government motion is not limited as to time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the Minister of Public Works want to raise any other point?

Mr. Abbott: Let us have Mr. O'Leary's views again.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I said, I shall have to begin over again to get the hang of this thing so that we shall get it right. It reads:

Why is Mr. Abbott so wrong?

That does seem a little like criticism, but that is all there is.

Because he apparently takes no account of inflation. In April, 1950, personal income tax collections totalled $49 million; in April, 1951, they were $70 million. This with the same tax rate. Clearly personal income tax collections were up because salaries and wages and net earnings generally were up, and because more wage earners had moved into higher income brackets.

And, of course, what is true of the income tax is true of other taxes, notably excise and sales taxes.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

There was more that I wanted to read, but perhaps it would be better not to do it or I might start up the Minister of Public Works again. What bothers me about the surpluses is that they are always given to us with a sense of pride. The minister really seems to regard them as a very clever performance. I have several times given this short quotation, Mr. Speaker, and I do not believe it is out of order. More than once I have quoted this short statement attributed to Philip Snowden, that any chancellor of the exchequer who takes even a half crown more than he needs is guilty of getting money under false pretences. Those are strong words, much stronger than the Ottawa Journal uses.

As I say, we are left with the impression that these surpluses are really rather clever. It is true the minister does remind us from time to time that rising costs have something to do with it, but nevertheless we are left with the impression that somehow these additional collections indicate health and well-being in the community. As the Montreal Gazette ironically says, we are really being asked to believe that the minister is budgeting "better than he knew." But what is actually happening is that these excessive collections are an indication of distortion in the economy. They are an indication of excessive taxes on high-priced goods. They are, as we pointed out before, a spur to wage and salary demands. They add to the increase of money in circulation because, after all, the government does not hide this in a napkin but spends it. Perhaps worst of all, it is just not possible to believe that you can have any sort of effort at government economy when all these hundreds of millions are floating about. The sad thing naturally that one always has in mind is that these increases of surplus never come from less spending; they always come from taking more of our money. Of course these sales and excise taxes put up prices. Then the increased prices put up taxes, and so on and so on, and we have this terrible spiral.

I just want to make the point that everything we predicted on the 16th of April has happened. Prices have increased just as we said would happen. The surplus is here just as we predicted would happen. Wage demands are here just as we predicted would happen. I suggest that the happenings of the last six weeks have greatly strengthened what we said at that time. For that reason, and in order that we may express our continuing disapproval of the sales tax, I am going to move:

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" be added to the end of the question.

I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) will agree that is very different from what he thought it was going to be.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is in order. Let us have the question right now.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we had a long discussion of the sales tax in the debate earlier, but nevertheless I believe the protest that has been made tonight is worth making again because in my opinion the sales tax is probably the most oppressive tax that we have, and to raise it from 8 to 10 per cent at this stage is bound to increase the cost of living further. The cost of living index has reached the unprecedented figure of 182 points on the 1935-39 basis. That in itself is something that should cause us to stop and think when we are imposing a tax which is bound to increase the price of many commodities. It will not increase all commodities, and indeed not some of the basic commodities, but still it will increase the cost of many of the commodities that enter into the cost of living for a good many families in this country.

I think it is true to say that, no matter who suggests it, the sales tax is a tax which is unfair. It taxes those with families who have responsibilities that are escaped by those who have no families. It seems to me that the sales tax is a thoroughly bad tax. Tonight the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has raised the question of the surplus that the government was able to show in April. Since that large surplus was shown at that time, it seems to me to indicate that the country can do without the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax suggested in the budget. Consequently, without prolonging the debate, because I think most of us said all that it was necessary to say at an earlier stage, I am merely going to say that we shall support the amendment moved because we believe that the recent receipts of the government indicate that we can dispense with this tax, and whether it is a good or bad tax we should dispense with it on that account. Secondly, because this is a tax which is liable to increase the cost of living in so many respects of those who are least able to afford it, I think the house is justified in asking that the imposition of this tax be deferred.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I said at one time that I was so much opposed to this tax that I felt I should talk against it until next Christmas if necessary to have it held up or to oppose it so successfully in that way that the government might decide not to pass it. The government has very obligingly suggested today giving me a couple of months to get my breath so that I can go on talking about it this fall and probably right up until Christmas. I will continue to do so on every occasion that I have the opportunity. I am opposed to the imposition of the increase in the sales tax, and I have not found anything yet in reason, logic or argument to make me change my mind. When it comes to voting on the bill I shall know what to do about that section particularly, but as to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), since it appears to cover the whole bill it might make it very difficult for some hon. members to support it because there are things in the bill that are good, and I should like to see them passed. Therefore I shall have to think much more carefully than I have thus far as to whether I can support the amendment.

I rose tonight to speak briefly about another provision in the bill, and I can make a much more informed appeal than I was able to do on May 1 on behalf of many thousands of suffering Canadians. On May 1, as hon. members may recall, I raised a question, as recorded at page 2599 of Hansard, as to whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would consider adding the substance known as vitamin E to the list of tax exempt substances now taken care of in section 12 of the bill. At that time the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) said:

> Wheat germ is the cheapest one there is.

I said:

> Yes, it may be the cheapest, but this particular one is subject to sales tax, and the tax increases the price to a considerable extent. It puts it outside the reach of many patients.
> Mr. McCann: Not at all. You can get all the vitamin E you want in wheat kernels.

We continued with an exchange of views, and it appears that neither of us knew very much about it at that time.

Mr. McCann: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Low: Well, I shall give evidence to show that the doctor did not know what he was talking about. Mind you, I want to say to begin with that I am not blaming the Minister of National Revenue for not being able to keep up with the latest discoveries in medicine because—

Mr. McCann: Much less yourself.

Mr. Low: —he is so completely occupied with finding ways and means of exacting taxes and finding the best means of collecting them that he cannot possibly keep up with these things, and I would not expect him to. However, the question I must ask first is: What is the material about which I was asking on May 1? I was referring at that time to high potency vitamin E concentrate which goes under the scientific name of di-alpha tocopherol. Wheat germ oil contains minute fractions only of vitamin E. If a patient has to take 300 international units of vitamin E daily, which would be about the equivalent of 300 milligrams, and that by the way is an average dose—

Mr. Pouliot: If the hon. member will permit, he did not mean 300 kilograms.

Mr. Low: No, I said milligrams. Certainly I would not say kilograms. I say if a patient is to take a prescribed dose of about 300 international units or the equivalent of about 300 milligrams of vitamin E, and has to resort to wheat germ oil to fulfil this dosage, he will have to consume in one day more than a quart of wheat germ oil. I am sure the Minister of National Revenue knows the ill effects that would follow; neither his stomach nor mine could stand it. I would go further and say that this quantity of wheat germ oil simply could not be tolerated by any person. This patient would require at least 150 capsules of ordinary vitamin E such as you buy in the drug store today to make up this dosage; and the cost of those 150 capsules would probably be as much as $7 a day, which would be simply prohibitive.

High potency vitamin E is a concentrate that is obtained through a process of molecular distillation of the oils of cottonseed, peanuts and green vegetables. It appears to be manufactured by only one firm; that is Distillation Products Incorporated, a subsidiary of the Eastman Kodak Company of Rochester, New York. It is therefore imported into Canada in large drums and then encapsulated into 75 milligram capsules. The population of Canada is not sufficient to warrant the huge expenditure required for the manufacture of alpha tocopherol.

The second important question we have to ask ourselves is, what is the product used for? Well, Dr. Evan V. Shute and his brother, Wilfrid E. Shute, discovered after years of research and clinical work that vitamin E in heroic doses, that is in huge doses, was very valuable in the treatment of heart and circulatory diseases. These doctors then founded the Shute institute for clinical and laboratory medicine in London, Ontario, and have been carrying on successfully since. These doctors prescribed a dosage of from 300 to 400 international units daily for victims of cardiovascular ailments, which of course would include thrombosis, Buerger's disease, thrombophlebitis, indolent ulcers, angina and hypertension. These are the diseases which, if the present trend continues, will take off every other person in Canada who is now over 40 years of age. That is the record to date; that seems to be the trend.

Since the Shute brothers discovered the value of alpha tocopherol in the treatment of cardiovascular ailments, many doctors of this country and the United States and other countries have taken up the research. In many countries they have issued their bibliographies, and their findings have been almost identical with those of the Shute brothers.

The next question is how widely is alpha tocopherol distributed. This substance, as I said, is high potency vitamin E. How widespread is its use today? Well, one pharmaceutical house I asked told me they did not know exactly but their records alone indicated that many thousands of cardiac and vascular victims are resorting to high potency vitamin E with success. They know from their records that several thousand doctors in Canada are prescribing alpha tocopherol, after the Shute therapy, to their patients. To their personal knowledge over 1,500 doctors and most of the major hospitals are prescribing vitamin E; and remember, this pharmaceutical house is only one of thirty Canadian pharmaceutical firms distributing vitamin E products in Canada. I am convinced that more than one-third of Canada's nine thousand doctors prescribe it today for therapeutic and for what may be called prophylactic treatments. What is more, of the more than six thousand patients on the files of the Shute institute at London, more than 160 are medical doctors and members of the immediate families of doctors. Just here I should like to put on record a telegram I received from Dr. Nelson George, because it indicates what doctors themselves think of this thing:

As a physician practising in London for thirty years would like to record my experience with vitamin E. Have been a diabetic for twenty years. As a result five years had a hemiplegia with residual weakness left leg and arm. One year ago for diabetic gangrene had right leg amputated above knee. Last fall when amputation of left leg imminent for diabetic gangrene I began vitamin E treatment under Dr. Shute's care. Left leg healed rapidly and has regained function so that I can now stand on it unassisted. I am no longer a diabetic, no longer a hypertensive. Want to stress that as physician had best care available in London yet continued to be a diabetic and hypertensive and eventually developed gangrene with their care; lost the first leg above the knee. On vitamin E gangrenous area healed and filled in; had partial restoration of function absent for five years. Am no longer a diabetic and no longer a hypertensive. The necessary dosage of alpha tocopherol (vitamin E) was 450 international units, about 150 times that available in one capsule of wheat germ oil with latter cost $7.25 daily, with imported concentrated brand retail cost 54 cents a day. No human stomach can tolerate that much vitamin E in form of wheat kernels, wheat germ or wheat germ oil capsules, 150 capsules daily. My wife has been my nurse since my amputation. She is willing to appear before you or Dr. McCann or the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am willing to be interviewed by any member of dominion house.

That is from a doctor who himself has had the treatment for some time, and who cites the results. Just here I might comment briefly that heart ailments are the greatest killer of all. One-half of the adult population of this country will meet untimely death as the result of one form or other of vascular trouble. Doctors especially find themselves susceptible to these diseases because of the very high tension under which they have to work.

The next question is whether there is scientific backing for the claims made for this product. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not claimed that high potency vitamin E is a perfect answer to the problem of heart disease. It is not, and that is frankly admitted. But it is therapeutic; that is, it has curative value. That has been amply demonstrated in extensive research using nine different species of animals, as well as in the treatment of thousands of cases among human beings.

There is another side to this question. If alpha tocopherol is used prophylactically, that is for preventive purposes, it should achieve considerably more than it has been able to achieve in the treatment of advanced cases of heart disease. It appears that the real future value of the vitamin E product will be in the preventive field. The preventive use of alpha tocopherol might well begin in childhood, and the Canadian public should be educated to this kind of medical insurance, which to my mind it certainly is. At the same time Canadian millers might be induced to make available to the public a cereal flour rich in germinal vitamins.

There is a mass of pertinent evidence to support the assertion that the appalling mortality among men resulting from heart diseases has arisen from a deficiency of alpha tocopherol in the diet. In other words Canadians have been slowly starving themselves into sudden death from thrombosis or a more lingering and painful demise from angina or hypertension. The greatest single factor contributing to this slow starvation and early death is a deficiency of vitamin E. Many thousands of Canadians suffer from chronic deficiency of the alpha tocopherol type of vitamins in their diet. The substance is found widespread in certain natural foods but its principal sources are in the cereal grains. Modern milling, in the effort to achieve a stable, exportable flour that will not turn rancid, and which will have a fine, white appearance, has taken out all of the germ of the cereal grains. Consequently there is a vitamin E deficiency in the diet of the people.

Chronic shortage of vitamin E of the alpha tocopherol type damages the heart muscles and the walls of the arteries of the circulatory system. If our Canadian people, from their childhood, would use whole wheat bread made from freshly-milled whole grain flour and plenty of fresh vegetable oils, it is practically certain that untimely deaths from heart disease would be many times reduced from the number that are experienced amongst our population today.

It is not surprising that so many of our people are having to resort to a therapeutic treatment based on the use of the vitamin in which their diet for many years has been tragically deficient. I might say here Mr. Speaker, that there are analogies in medical science to the use of heavy doses of vitamin E in the treatment of heart disease. In particular I would remind the house that, for instance, in cases where insulin shock results, physicians prescribe high and heavy doses of insulin to cure it. There are other analogies that I could cite.

I do not want to take too much time, Mr. Speaker, but what about the price to the people who use this product? I was able to obtain this product that I hold in my hand for the purpose of showing it to the house. I have no particular reason for naming this particular one other than that I could get it quite easily. What about the price to the people using what is known as Webber Vita E capsules, as an example? And by the way, hon. members can see the size of the capsule I hold in my hand. The capsules are a fairly good size; and they contain 75 milligrams or 75 international units. Using that one as an example, the retail price per 100 of these 75 international unit size capsules is $9. The retail price per 1,000 of the same size is $80. The return to the manufacturer is $4.50 per 100 or $40 per $1,000. The sales tax is paid by the manufacturer and is absorbed into the general price structure. The sales tax in this instance is based on the lowest discount price. It is not based on some of these other prices I quoted, but on the lowest discount price and therefore amounts to 10 per cent of $4 when one is buying a bottle of 1,000. But if the sales tax were removed from this product, there would be a saving of $4 per 1,000 to the wholesaler, which would mean a saving of $8 to the consumer, on 1,000.

Here is a right good example of the way in which a sales tax at the manufacturer's level pyramids prices. To be able to secure "gelucaps", as these things are called, the government causes the heart or vascular patient to have to pay $8 in increased prices. That is a terrible thing.

In addition to the sales tax, this product, and all others of the same class, are subject to customs duties of 15 per cent, because there seems to be only one source, namely, Distillation Products Inc. of Rochester, N.Y., It is imported into Canada as a concentrated oil in large drums and then is made into capsules for distribution to patients. Duty involves another 60 cents at wholesale level, or $1.20 at retail level per 1,000.

I have been puzzled a great many times as to why the government should require customs duty to be paid on a product of this kind; I refer to vitamin E concentrates. It has never been manufactured in Canada. That being so, the product is not competitive from the tariff point of view. I was always under the impression that tariffs were designed mainly to protect our basic manufacturers. In this particular instance, no Canadian manufacturer is protected and for that reason, it seems to me, the consumer, the heart patient, carries an additional burden for no good reason at all. The reason for removing the tariff as well as the sales tax from vitamin E concentrates would appear to be quite obvious to even the most casual thinker. All in all, the patient-consumer can save $10 per 1,000 by the removal of the sales tax and customs duties on this particular product.

Let us now take a look for just one moment, in conclusion, at the daily cost of this material to the patient. The prescribed dose may run from 300 international units to 450 international units a day, or 4 to 6 of these gelucaps of the size of the one I have in my hand. On that basis the present cost to the patient would be 36 cents to 54 cents a day when buying them by the hundred, or 32 cents to 48 cents a day when buying them by the thousand. It is clear that the present cost to any patient is a very heavy burden for him to bear. It must be remembered that cardio-vascular patients must continue to use the product every day of their lives, just as is the case with insulin and diabetics. It is a pitiful thing, to me at least, to learn of patient after patient who has been unable to earn money for months or years, has a family to support, and yet feels that somehow or other he must get together enough money to buy his vitamin E at the rate of 32 cents to 54 cents a day. Persons in that situation either go without the necessaries to do this or find they must discontinue treatment and lapse into illness as a consequence.

Today I am making an appeal to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) on behalf of the thousands of Canadians who are suffering from cardio-vascular ailments. I ask the minister to add vitamin E—that is high potency vitamin E; the type known as alpha tocopherol—to the list of drugs to be made sales tax free. I appeal to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and ask him to remove the customs duty on this item which must be imported from the United States. I want to thank the two ministers and their colleagues—and I do so sincerely—for what they have done for arthritics and other sufferers by removing the sales tax from such things as ACTH and cortisone.

I think that is a step in the right direction. But at the same time I urge them to learn about vitamin E and the beneficial results it brings to heart patients. Here is a chance, it seems to me, to help thousands of worthy Canadians at very small cost to the government by way of lost revenues.

Just in conclusion let me say this. There is in Canada today an association known as the Vitamin E Association. It so happens that one of the members of this house is one of the high officials in that association. They call it the Vitamin E Society of Canada. Its headquarters is in Toronto. If that gentleman who is one of the high officials—in fact, he is the president—cares to speak, he could tell you tonight that his wife, who was for many months on her back, helpless, with heart disease, and given only 3 months to live in the opinion of heart specialists, was taken to the Shute institute and after a few months of treatment with alpha tocopherol was able to get up and be around, and is now holidaying, or was a short time ago, in California and was getting along fine. There are others in the house who have had experience with the product, and who could speak of the benefits from its use. Certainly it would seem to me to be a case worthy of most real and earnest consideration, and I ask that of the ministers tonight.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the house will support the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). Any doubt that hon. members opposite may have had a month ago in regard to the imposition of the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax must surely have been removed in the light of the statements issued since then from the treasury.

In his budget address the Minister of Finance proposed such taxes should be levied as, according to his figures, would produce at the end of the fiscal year a surplus of $30 million. The figures that were released for the month of April have shown an astounding result. After paying all expenditures for that month, the first month of the fiscal year, the minister has reported a surplus of $121,520,000, just four times the surplus in one month that he budgeted for for the entire twelve-month period. It is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Finance to say: Oh, well, this picture may change before the end of the year. I submit that we have here already a very fair test of the kind of budgeting that has entered into the calculations of the Minister of Finance in the course of which he has asked this house to authorize the imposition of greatly increased taxes, particularly of the most objectionable of all varieties, at a time like this, which will increase the cost of living of those least able to bear it, taxes also which are subject to the vice of taking far more out of the pockets of the consumers, the ultimate consumers, than are yielded to the treasury in tax revenue.

Let us compare these figures with those of the first month a year ago and, sir, in approaching those figures let us have this in mind: most of the increases in taxes which are contemplated in the budget resolutions, and part of which are provided for in the bill now under debate, had not come into effect in the month of April, so that what we are dealing with in these figures for the month of April are taxes levied chiefly at the rates prevailing in the fiscal year which closed on March 31 last. There is very little of the increases in taxes, even in those indirect taxes, that find their way into the figures to which I am now about to refer, and none of the increases in the corporation taxes and in the personal income taxes of course become effective until July 1.

I think the dating of some of these taxes is worthy of note. People, of course, are not going to be too conscious of these indirect taxes because they are going to be covered up. That is one reason the government likes taxes like the sales tax and the excise tax, which they have increased so substantially. They are covered up, and the people who pay them are not conscious of the fact that they are paying them. The people are conscious of paying taxes like the income tax, and so the government has provided that these increases in the direct taxes, of which people will be very conscious, will not take effect until July 1. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is a mere coincidence that four by-elections take place in this country on June 25, just six days before these increases in the direct taxes come into effect.

Sir, the figures for the month of April, to which I am about to refer, are to be found in the issue of the Canada Gazette of May 26, 1951, at pages 1502 and 1503. There we shall see that on the revenue side the minister's receipts in April, 1951, as compared with April, 1950, are increased on every item except two. I will just give the nearest figure in millions. First, the customs import duties show an increase. They are doubled from $14 million to $28 million. The excise duties are increased from $14 million to $17 million. The excise taxes are increased from $13 million to $24 million. The income taxes on individuals show large increases. Deductions at the source are increased from $12 million to $26 million. Other collections, that is, of income tax against individuals, are increased from $37 million to $44 million. Corporation taxes are increased from $38 million to $60 million. Succession duties show a slight decrease from $5 million in April, 1950, to $3,500,000 in April, 1951. Miscellaneous tax revenue has increased from $10,000 to $21,000. Postal revenue has increased from $6,500,000 to $7 million. Return on investments shows a slight decrease from $3,600,000 to $3,500,000. Miscellaneous non-tax revenue has increased from $320,000 to $601,000. The total receipts of ordinary revenue are increased from $147 million to $217 million. There is a decrease in special receipts, and the total revenue figures show April, 1950, $166 million; April, 1951, $218 million.

What is going to happen, Mr. Speaker, to these swollen figures when the full effect of the proposed increase in taxes of the Minister of Finance reflects itself in the figures for succeeding months? These figures are going to engage in a runaway race from last year's figures, and next year we shall inevitably again face the picture with which we have grown altogether too familiar: the Minister of Finance coming in with his budget and claiming great credit to himself for showing a surplus far in advance of that pictured to the house when the house approved his tax proposals the previous year. That is not sound budgeting. If the Minister of Finance will include in his budget proper provision for debt reduction, I am sure the house will be glad to consider any such proposals on their merits, but this indirect way of doing outlandish budgeting, which builds up surpluses far in advance of those offered to the house by the Minister of Finance in inviting the house to approve his budget proposals, is completely unsound. I submit, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when the house must say, this must stop. When we see figures like these for the month of April indicating how far the Minister of Finance has erred in the figures that he put before the house in his budget speech six weeks ago, then I think the house will start right now on this bill and say, we are not going to impose these heavy tax increases on people who are having really a desperate time to meet the soaring costs of living. We are not going to do it when the Minister of Finance cannot prove need.

Sir, the figures that were announced for the month of April also reflect increases in expenditure for the month of April over those of a year ago, $88 million in April, 1950; $97 million in expenditures in April, 1951. So, let it not be said that the weight of increased government expenditure has not been reflected in the April figures. The $121,500,000 surplus of revenue over expenditure in April last as compared with April, 1950, takes into account increased expenditures, and reflects in only a very minor degree the increase in taxes, the full weight of which will be felt by the people of Canada on and after July 1.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if there was abundant reason before for rejecting this increase in taxes, particularly this sales tax, this most inflationary of all the budgetary weapons being wielded by the Minister of Finance on the people of Canada today, there is infinitely stronger reason for rejecting this increase in taxes today.

It is well to bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the statistics just released by the dominion bureau of statistics show another increase in the cost of living for the month of April. It is true it is a much more modest increase than those we have been accustomed to in recent months, but the fact of the matter is that even though the cost of living index has shown a slight decrease in the figures of the cost of food, the total cost of living for the month of April has shown another fractional increase, and we are now faced with a situation where the cost of living is higher today than it was when the budget resolutions were adopted. In the face of all these facts surely the house will not be party to imposing these cruel increases in taxation when there is no need of them.

Having appealed to the house to support the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), which is intended to defeat these proposed increases in the sales tax, and which is intended to offer to the people of Canada such protection as parliament can offer them against an increase in this inflationary sales tax, I turn now to the subject discussed by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Let me say in the first place that I do not think it was altogether fair of the minister to leave these matters to his parliamentary assistant because there are errors I think that the—

Mr. Abbott: He handled it very well.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: There are errors the parliamentary assistant has made unintentionally in connection with the interpretation of the judgment to which he referred.

I do say, however, in regard to the case put forward by the parliamentary assistant tonight on behalf of the government that it is a most disappointing answer, and shows that apparently the government is entirely unrepentant in its denial of justice. It is entirely unrepentant in its breach of faith with the house. And mere sophistry of the kind we listened to this afternoon and evening, however plausible it may sound, is no answer to the indisputable fact that the government, in permitting the parliamentary assistant to say what he said to the house on November 30, 1949, and taking the stand it has taken today, and which it has consistently taken throughout the litigation in the courts, is breaking faith with the House of Commons.

The parliamentary assistant did not say very much in his speech today about the undertaking he gave the house on November 30, 1949. He did not read the text of it to the house. He rather put a gloss on his remarks containing that clear and unequivocal undertaking which was accepted by the house at face value. And so we have a sort of paraphrase on the part of the parliamentary assistant tonight of what he said on that occasion in clear and unambiguous words.

The parliamentary assistant has sought to argue the government's case against the watch companies. The only thing wrong with the way he argued it tonight is that it is entirely contrary to the way the courts decided it. The courts had before them the legislation and the facts to which the parliamentary assistant has made reference. They had all those before them; and having heard them all, and having duly heard the extended arguments of very eminent counsel on both sides as to the proper interpretation of the relevant portions of the Excise Tax Act, especially the 1949 amendments, reached a decision quite at variance with that offered to the house tonight by the parliamentary assistant.

The net result of the litigation is that the courts have held that these plaintiffs were entitled to everything they asked for in the action which they brought in May of 1949 for a declaratory judgment. They were entitled to everything. And now, in the net result, the courts have felt obliged to deny to these litigants the fruits of their action, the rights to which they were entitled, simply because this house enacted an amendment on November 30, 1949, which it not only did not understand it was enacting, but which is just the very opposite of what it was told was the effect of the amendment being introduced by the parliamentary assistant at that time on behalf of the government.

The parliamentary assistant has said this afternoon—and he is referring here to the statement he gave to the house as to the effect of the amendment which he was undertaking, in the discussion of section 5 of the 1949 amendment, to introduce at a later stage of the bill—

> But we said we would not prejudice the case then before the courts.

The government has said through its spokesman today, referring to what was said in the house on November 30, 1949:

> But we said we would not prejudice the case then before the courts.

Sir, that is precisely what the government did. That is precisely what the government did in misleading the House of Commons as to the effect of the amendments which the house was being called upon at that time to enact, and which the government then put into operation in this legislation with the avowed purpose—there could be no other—of repudiating its own undertaking.

They have said here, as they said in the house, that those amendments would not be made retroactive to have a bearing upon the litigation then before the courts. All that is asked, all that is required in the name of simple justice and decency and good faith is that the government should make good what it said, namely that it should not by the amendment of November, 1949, or the use it instructed its counsel in this litigation to make of the amendment, prejudice the case then before the courts.

But that is precisely what the courts have found that the government has done. The parliamentary assistant has undertaken to interpret the judgment of Chief Justice McRuer. Let me stop to put him right upon that by referring to two brief passages in the judgment where the learned chief justice said:

> I place my judgment on the claim set out in paragraph (a) of the prayer on the footing that the retroactive provisions of the act of 1949 apply to the plaintiffs . . .

The whole point which the parliamentary assistant has missed is that as the resolution stood when introduced on the eve of an election in March, 1949, and left suspended in mid air during the election campaign and until November, it could have no bearing to create a tax liability on the part of persons engaged in the kind of business that these plaintiffs were engaged in. Then when parliament is invited to enact an amendment to the act on November 30, 1949, this question is raised: Will the amendments which are being put before the house now have any retroactive bearing on the case then before the courts? Let me read what was said in the house at that time. I said this, as reported at page 2503 of Hansard for November 30, 1949:

> Sections 5 and 7 are related for the purposes of the matter I should like to raise, which has to do with the imposition of an excise tax on the assembly of watches, clocks and certain kinds of jewelry. If I am correctly informed, this has become the subject of litigation as well as having been agitated by correspondence with and representations to the government. I understand that this litigation is pending and I am concerned as to whether this legislation will not cut right across the issues involved in the pending litigation which directly concerns the government.

The answer of the parliamentary assistant, as I have said, was clear and unequivocal in these words:

> The hon. member has put his finger on an amendment which I propose to move a little later. It is quite true that a case involving sections 5 and 7 is now before the courts, but I would direct his attention to the fact that section 14 provides for the coming into force of sections 5 and 7. When that section is reached I propose to have a minister move an amendment which would change the present date of March 23, 1949, to November 10, the date when first reading was given to this bill. There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

And, sir, the courts have held that that is precisely the effect of the amendment, that it does apply to the cases in court, that it has a retroactive effect, and that it defeats the claims that the plaintiffs in the litigation would have been entitled to recover but for the imposition or enactment of this retroactive legislation in breach of the undertaking given to the House of Commons by the government.

The parliamentary assistant has apparently overlooked the fact that, as to those matters in which Chief Justice McRuer held the plaintiffs not completely entitled to the remedy they sought in their action, the Court of Appeal supplied what was lacking, because the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal of the same litigants as against the crown, and held that the plaintiffs were completely entitled to all aspects of the declaratory judgment which they sought. The only thing that defeated these litigants was this retroactive legislation enacted by parliament in the very teeth of the representations made to the house at that time in the clearest possible language. The Court of Appeal went so far as to award the costs of the action against the crown. Let me read these excerpts from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario to put right the statement made to the house this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant, who trespassed too deeply into interpretation of the decision of the court. This is the decision of the Court of Appeal, and it was a very strong five-judge court. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, a panel of five judges is assigned in the Court of Appeal of Ontario only to cases of leading importance. This is a unanimous decision of the five learned justices of appeal, and these are excerpts taken from the judgment of the court as read by Mr. Justice Aylesworth. He says:

> I think that the case is clearly one in which the appellant is entitled to the formal declaration of the court as to its rights. So far as now relevant the declarations sought for, in essence, would assert that the appellant is entitled to secure entry through customs of certain component parts for watches without payment of excise tax upon such entry and without the issue of a manufacturer's and an excise licence for that purpose.

Then he makes reference to the pleadings, and in speaking of the rights of the plaintiffs he says:

> Those rights, in my opinion, should have been and ought now to be stated by way of formal declaration in the judgment itself.

Then he proceeds to indicate in detail the various provisions in the declaratory judgment to which those litigants are entitled. What has happened, Mr. Speaker, is that a strong court in the Court of Appeal of Ontario, with a full panel of five judges, has said that these plaintiffs are entitled to everything that they sought in their action, and they would have had everything, had it not been that those rights were handicapped by retroactive legislation passed by this parliament. Now, that fact is crystal clear, and it will not admit of any attempt at being denied by the kind of sophistry offered to the house this afternoon and this evening by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Sir, the only reason that this result has occurred, that this blemish has been cast upon the honour and good faith of the crown, is that the amendment introduced in the house on November 30, 1949, by the parliamentary assistant was not as he represented it to the house. I do not say that he intentionally misrepresented it to the house. I do not suggest that. But the fact of the matter is that the house was completely misled. The effect of the amendment, as the courts have found, so far as its retroactive application to litigation then pending in the courts was concerned, was directly opposite to what was represented to the house by the parliamentary assistant. Nothing could be plainer than this very contradiction between what the courts have found to be the effect of this amendment, and the effect of it as represented to the house by the parliamentary assistant.

When this matter was under discussion a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann), whose department is responsible for applying these amendments to defeat the effect of them as stated in good faith to the house by a spokesman for the government, on that occasion said, "Well, why did you not check on that amendment to see that it went as far as represented?" Mr. Speaker, when a plain statement of fact is made to the house by a spokesman for the government, in words as unequivocal as those appearing at page 2503 of Hansard of November 30, 1949:

> There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts, the house should be entitled to rely on it. This discussion was in committee, and that assurance was followed two pages later by a statement on section 14 of the bill by the parliamentary assistant. I raised my point on section 5, and it applied as well to section 7. The parliamentary assistant suggested we wait until we come to section 14, at which time he had an amendment he was going to introduce which would meet all the objections. He then said:

> There would then be no retroactive effect which would have a bearing on the cases before the courts.

The committee then reached section 14, and the parliamentary assistant rose in his place and said:

> This is the section on which the minister will move the amendment about which I spoke in answering the hon. member for Eglinton. The amendment is as follows:
> "That subclause (2) of clause 14 of bill 175 be amended by striking out the words 'second day of May' and substituting therefor the words 'tenth day of November'."
> That is the date when this change first became public knowledge by reason of the first reading of the bill.

Then Mr. Howe says, "I so move." The amendment was agreed to, and the section as amended was agreed to. Sir, no member of the opposition saw that amendment. You know what happens in committee on matters of plain amendments where the effect of the amendment as stated by a government spokesman meets the wishes of the house. An amendment is introduced in due course, and time does not permit copies to be circulated to all members so that they may study the terms of the amendment. It was an amendment that sounded plain enough to carry out the intent as declared by the parliamentary assistant, and with that unequivocal statement by the parliamentary assistant that this legislation would not have any retroactive effect, surely the house was entitled to rely upon it. But what was overlooked, Mr. Speaker, was a very tiny amendment that should have been made in the schedule of the bill. This tiny amendment was overlooked. I am sure it was not overlooked deliberately by the parliamentary assistant, but the government has since completely ignored the unequivocal terms he used in referring to the amendment. Notwithstanding that, this government has completely broken faith with the house; it has tarnished the good faith of the crown by the course it has followed by trying to wrench these 1949 amendments to defeat the claims of persons who were told by the language used in the debate in the house that there would be no retroactive application to their cases.

I was not the only one, sir, who made representations to the government against making these 1949 amendments applicable so that they could have any bearing on the litigation before the courts. When I spoke on this subject recently I said an hon. member who was then a private member of the house on the other side, and who is now a member of the cabinet, also made representations, because he sent a note over to me on the occasion when the parliamentary assistant made his statement in the house intimating to me that he got word a few minutes before that this amendment was being introduced, and that it was in fact a triumph for justice.

There were other private members who were consulted about this, who made representations to the government to the same effect, and who understood, as every member of the house understood, that the parliamentary assistant was stating the fact when he made the representations to the house to which I have referred. I should like the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) to say something in this debate about what he thinks of the way in which the government has wrenched and distorted these amendments enacted in November, 1949, in the very teeth of the statement made on behalf of the government as to their effect. I should like to hear what the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Rooney) has to say about it, and there are other members of the house who interested themselves in trying to see justice done so that legislation would not be enacted so as to have a retroactive bearing.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has said with a measure of glee that to begin with there were ten of these companies who were plaintiffs in the action, that four of them withdrew before the case came to trial before Chief Justice McRuer, and that only one of them carried the case to the Court of Appeal. He puts that forward as a reason, if you will, why parliament should acquiesce in this breach of faith. Because one out of ten had the courage to carry his case to the Ontario Court of Appeal the parliamentary assistant says that the course of the four who did not go as far as trial is the best indication of what was fair or unfair in this situation.

I think it is to the highest credit of that one litigant who, not daunted by the dangers of standing up to the government in litigation, had the courage to take his case to the courts until he got as much justice as the courts were in a position to give him. I think it is a matter worthy of the highest commendation on the part of this house that any litigant, that any subject of the king, be he person or be he corporation, is not daunted by the totalitarian juggernaut of government, but is prepared to take his case to His Majesty's courts looking for justice, and justice would have been done in this case if the courts had been free to apply the law as parliament understood it and as the government represented it to be. Nothing could be clearer.

Sir, the story does not end there because, you see, the government disapproves of the action of this one litigant in carrying his case to the Court of Appeal. They disapprove, perhaps to a lesser degree, of the action of the other five who went as far as trial but did not join in the appeal. You see when governments—this government at any rate—disapprove of the action of a subject they can if they are vindictive enough make life pretty miserable for him because every individual in this country has to have relations with the Department of National Revenue. I find that a known subsidiary of the litigant that was successful in the Court of Appeal is already having its problems trying to obtain an appointment with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) to discuss its legitimate tax problems on which they require an interpretation, but the Minister of National Revenue says that he sees nothing to be gained by discussing this question with them. The door of the Minister of National Revenue is apparently now closed to this litigant and its subsidiary corporation.

Sir, the story does not end there. This trail of vindictiveness is pursued. It happens that the very distinguished and eminent counsel who appeared for this plaintiff in this case—and I may say he is a very well known Liberal—was at the same time and has for many years been counsel to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and, if you please, recently he has been notified by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they will not have occasion to require his services in the future. Is it mere coincidence that it is through the Minister of National Revenue that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is supposed to be responsible to parliament? It is this same minister who has been responsible for the position taken by the crown in this litigation in breach of faith with this house.

Sir, there is a tarnished record. There was a time when the honour of the crown was regarded as something unimpeachable and without blemish, but in the hands of this government the honour of the crown has been tarnished and has been blemished. Nothing will remove that tarnish on the honour of the crown except to do justice to these litigants. Even then this government will have fallen far short of repairing the breach of faith with this house. What ought to happen is that the government, speaking through the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), should offer an apology to this house for a palpable breach of faith with the house. Those who are responsible from the minister down should be brought to book for being parties to a breach of faith practised upon the house.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it must be a source of regret to many hon. members of this house, and I hope not entirely on this side of the house, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should not have seen fit to deal with the statement that has been made.

An hon. Member: A reflection on the government.

Mr. Drew: I hope he will still come in before the debate ends on this stage of the bill because, as one of the members just opposite has said, it is a reflection on the government. It is a reflection on the government that a lawyer of the standing of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) should place before the house clear and unchallengeable statements as to undertakings that were given, and that the minister responsible should not see fit to answer those very serious charges, dispose of them, and not leave it to his assistant who, whatever his qualifications may be, is not competent to interpret the legal aspects of this question.

The statement has been made, and made with clear reference to the Hansard record, that assurance was given that the legislation then before the house would not have the effect of depriving litigants, whose cases were then under consideration, of the rights they possessed. Nevertheless in the manner that has been described the result of amendments introduced at that time was to deprive these litigants of their rights. I wish to reemphasize what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton. Far from being any answer to the clearly described impropriety of the government's action in this case, the argument put forward by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance this afternoon only aggravates the situation. He tells us that of ten companies who were seeking to be relieved of the effect of that legislation, only one carried the case to appeal. Far from being a source of satisfaction to the government, that should be recognized as a reflection upon the whole attitude that is developing and the fear that is being aroused in the minds of corporations that if they do assert their rights they will suffer in some other way at the hands of this government. Let no one be under any illusions that all that took place in connection with those cases was what was discussed openly in the courts of this land. One company did have the courage to carry the case forward, and the judgment in that case made it perfectly clear that no matter what the original intention actually was on the part of those who presented the amendment, the effect was directly contrary to the undertaking that was given.

The case has been clearly stated by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) with the legal ability he is known to possess; but apart from the legal considerations there is the fact that unless this is to be more satisfactorily dealt with than it has been, unless it is to be dealt with by the minister who is competent to do so from the legal point of view as well as from the standpoint of governmental responsibility, which is also something the assistant cannot do, then we are left in the position that members of this house are unable to accept any assurance given by the assistant to the Minister of Finance. That carries us right to the present position. Either the minister backs up the statements of his assistant or he does not. If he does not we are no longer in a position to rely upon the assurances given in that way. So we have the two aspects, one the wrong that was done at the time this amendment produced a result entirely contrary to what was stated, and the second the fact that unless this is dealt with in some way we shall be unable to rely on further assurances that may be given.

We are now dealing with legislation that will have far-reaching consequences, legislation which calls for assurances of various kinds, particularly when we are in committee. The effect of this statement is all too much like the statement already referred to: "If we wanted to get away with it, who would stop us?" The government feel they can get away with it, and challenge anyone to stop them. That attitude apparently is not confined to one minister or one department, if this matter is allowed to stand as it is now.

To come to the question of the bill now before the house, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has introduced an amendment asking that this bill be not proceeded with. One hon. member who indicated his objection to certain of the contents of this measure also indicated that he had some reluctance in supporting this motion because there were things in the bill of which he approved as well as those of which he disapproved, and evidently for that reason he felt that it was not appropriate to support a motion which obviously would have the result of deferring consideration of the bill in its present form. On the second reading of a bill it is not possible to rewrite the legislation, nor is it possible to change the detail. I submit to all hon. members, however, that if there is in the bill something manifestly unsatisfactory, it is perfectly proper that a vote should be cast against the bill containing those unsatisfactory features. I would point out that in addition to the increase in sales tax there are reasons which suggest the advisability of deferring consideration of this measure. As has been pointed out already by the hon. member for Greenwood, the surplus already disclosed by the Department of Finance indicates that the increase in the sales tax as well as other provisions are not necessary to raise the money required to meet the budget that has been placed before the house. Therefore the government would be in a position to concur in a motion of this kind and re-introduce a bill deleting those provisions. By doing so it would impose only those taxes which it is now clear will be adequate for the purposes of this budget, and that is all the government should seek to raise.

I would point out that in addition to the sales tax other matters have been mentioned which are included in this bill. No satisfactory explanation has yet been given of the prejudicial attitude taken toward electrical appliances, as indicated by the fact that cooking stoves which do not use electricity do not pay the extra tax, while cooking stoves using electricity have to pay this special tax of 25 per cent. In this country we have every reason to encourage the use of electricity, particularly in the rural areas, because of its economy and simplicity. Far from discouraging the use of electricity, the taxation policy of this government should recognize the extent to which electricity is bringing better living conditions in many parts of Canada.

Going beyond that, however, it is difficult to see how the distinction was drawn between those things regarded as luxuries and those things not so regarded. In the first schedule of the act, for instance, we find that electrical appliances of various kinds carry this special 25 per cent tax. There may be those who will agree that curling irons or tongs may be in the nature of a luxury. There may be those who will agree that food or drink mixers are in the category of luxuries. But surely irons and ironers, kettles, toasters, washing machines and things of that kind are no longer luxuries in this modern age. To go further into the provisions of schedule I, we find that such things as stoves, hotplates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels, are included. They must be designed for cooking. Is the government trying to stop people cooking in their own homes? There seems no other reason for the special provision that they must be designed for cooking if they are to carry this tax. If they are not so designed the tax does not apply. This whole thing seems to be approaching the requirements of our people in these days from the wrong direction.

I want to refer further to some of the provisions in schedule III. We find that where a stove has two kinds of cooking facilities the part using electricity is taxed while the part using solid or other fuel is not. In other words if we import coal or oil, as we still do in substantial quantities in this part of the country, stoves using those fuels are not taxed. But if we use our own electricity for cooking, those stoves are taxed. There has never been a more unreasonable, impractical application of taxes in this house than this provision with respect to cooking equipment.

Of course, if the answer is that it is intended to cut down on the use of steel, then perhaps it might be interesting if the minister or someone competent to speak on behalf of the department would tell us why it is that, as an example, there is no tax of this kind on filing cabinets which use more steel than any of these cabinet arrangements of this kind which will be taxed in this way but are used in the home. While we have wood that we grow, and while as yet there appears to be no critical shortage of wood, I suggest that we should be discouraging the use of steel in filing cabinets and boxes of that kind more than its use in refrigerators, washing machines and things that people use in their homes in these days.

These provisions are covered in this bill. They are bad, and for that reason a blanket opposition to this bill is sound, although there may be some features in the bill which are perfectly good. But then we come back to this sales tax. The minister himself made it perfectly clear that even though a tax can be justified up to some point, there comes a point beyond which it is no longer sound to keep extending that tax. When it was suggested by some members of this house that possibly the tax on alcoholic beverages might have been increased, the minister explained that there is a point beyond which taxation of that kind cannot go and still be sound. In saying that he recognized the fact that a tax may be justified, in the opinion of the government, up to a certain point, but that at some point it ceases to be a sound tax.

I am not prepared to concede the soundness of the sales tax at any point, no matter how much it may have become embedded in our system. We all recognize that some of these things that are carried on for years are difficult to dislodge. But if the government has passed the point where it is sound to increase taxes on alcoholic beverages, certainly it has also come to a point where that principle should apply with equal force to the things that people are buying for their daily needs in these days of increasing inflationary pressure.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the only way that the members of this house can register their objection to this further increase by 25 per cent in the sales tax at this time is to vote on an amendment which indicates that the bill should not be proceeded with at this time. That is the amendment before the house, and it is one which I would hope we would see supported by some of the hon. members in this house who do not sit on this side of it. By the announcement that has been made as to the surplus for the first month, the government have demonstrated that they do not need this inflationary tax—this tax which bears most heavily on the people least able to afford it, this tax which mainly soaks the poor—when they already have for one month a surplus that would nearly equal the total amount they are going to raise in this way. On further consideration I hope that other members of this house, besides those who have already indicated their support of this amendment, will speak on behalf of their people who should not be called upon to pay this tax.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I should like just about two minutes. I think the house should realize that during the period of a little over four months during which we have been here for this session the cost of living index has risen by 9·5 points. I ask the house to compare that rise in four months with the fact that during four years, from 1941 to 1945, the rise was only 7·8 points. In four months this year we have had a greater rise than we had during the whole four years under price control.

That fact supports the argument that we in this group have been making, namely, that price controls and subsidies are necessary. We still call for their introduction. The government has the power to take action, and we contend that it should be taken. But at the moment what we have before us is this bill which, amongst other things, imposes this drastic increase in the sales tax. It seems to us that the least that parliament should do at this time, in order to try to check this rising cost of living, is to reject this proposal for increasing the sales tax. It is because the amendment now before the house is intended to express the opposition of members of the house to that increase in the sales tax that I for one feel that the amendment should be supported.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I supported the budget when it was passed here; but after listening to some of the arguments advanced tonight, I think there is a good deal of merit in what the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) said. I have been here since 1945. I know that is a short period, but in that period it seems to me that we have collected from the Canadian taxpayers about one and a half billion dollars more than we as a parliament have sanctioned.

I admit that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) should probably be congratulated on having achieved these surpluses. I will admit that he is probably being honest when he tells us that he did not expect them and that he gave us an honest guess. But to be quite frank, it is almost impossible for me to realize that the minister and the high-class talent that he has around him in preparing these budgets could be so far wrong, particularly last year with the $343 million surplus, I think it was, that we had. It seems to me that it is more than was justified under the circumstances.

Actually he comes out finally with a surplus of $203 million. But he could give away $65 million to the wheat farmers. That was a good garbage can in which to hide some of his surpluses. He found he could spare another $75 million to put into the civil service superannuation fund. I wish he had told me he was getting rid of some of these surpluses, because I had several suggestions as to where he could put some of them; there were things in which I am interested, including the pilotage fund as to which I heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) say that he felt that the government could not afford any assistance at this time.

I think at times we are probably a little bit unfair to the minister. He is a modest chap. He always tries to make being Minister of Finance seem the simplest thing in the world. I often think that it would be better if he were like our former ministers of finance and had a long beard or something. Maybe he would look more profound. But I think that we have for too long taken the easy assurances of the minister. He says: We are going to have a $20 million or a $30 million surplus this year. It seems to me that may be true if he is able to hold the cost of living and the present purchasing power of the dollar, something which I do not think he or the government is at all certain of.

I am a great believer in balanced budgets. But it seems to me that this one and a half billion which we have collected—which the minister has not anticipated—since the war, could probably have been used by Canadian investors in this time in acquiring interests in our Labrador iron, for instance, or probably in our Alberta oil fields.

Mr. Sinclair: For debt reduction.

Mr. Gibson: Debt reduction in itself is a fine thing. But I would point this out to the parliamentary assistant. He is a young man. He may have read at some time what was said by Henry Ford, a very wise old man. Henry Ford said that he would advise every young man to go into debt when he was young and then to get himself out of it in due course when he was able to do so. I feel that in Canada today we have a young country. I should like to see the capital that is put into Canada put in by Canadians. Certainly we are not going to do it if we take one and a half billion dollars more than we need out of the Canadian public. Actually, I think the cabinet should be very much concerned. They know very well that the $2 billion surplus that they have collected from the Canadian people has been collected since the war as the result of inflation. We can say that in some measure they are responsible for it. I realize it is a world-wide condition, and I would expect that prices would go up to some degree; but when the government sits back and very complacently says, we have $2 billion surplus, and are very proud of it, I say that the only reason that they have got the surplus is not through extra good management of Canadian affairs. I can tell you that. I do not think anyone in the government would be complacent enough to say that. The reason you have it is that there has been a drastic reduction in the purchasing value of the Canadian dollar, and as a consequence there has been a greater dollar volume of business going through.

Mr. Stick: Have we not prosperity?

Mr. Gibson: We certainly have prosperity. I am very glad to say that we have that factor in our economy, but a little criticism of this government will not hurt it. They are safe in their position, and there should be a little sound criticism of the government.

What I would like to point out to the government is that since they have this money I wish they would use it with as much of their infinite skill as they display in collecting taxes, and try to get some of the money that they have collected fortuitously from the Canadian people by reason of inflation back to the people who are suffering the most in this country from the effects of inflation.

When the late prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, introduced his first proposal in regard to pensions in this house, which was sanctioned by the cabinet—I imagine it must have been—he suggested that we were just going to raise the veterans pensions by 11 per cent. Everybody on the government side thumped his desk and said that that was fine. It did not seem quite as much as it was expected. After a while quite a lot of criticism developed in this country and then they put the ante up to 17 per cent. Finally we came down here and we put these pensions up to 25 per cent where they should have been in the first place. We find now that the same thing is taking place in the veterans affairs committee. There is to be a means test. I would think the government would be wise to take this $2 billion which they have accumulated since the war and see if they can get some portion of it back into the hands of the people who have suffered the most from inflation.

Mr. Croll: Was the hon. member in the house at three o'clock?

Mr. Gibson: I have no illusions as to where the money is coming from for old age pensions. I certainly hope the government has enough common sense now to realize that the $350 million for old age pensions has to be collected out of the people who are going to receive them. Do I understand from the hon. member from Spadina (Mr. Croll) that we are not going to finance this currently as we go, or are going to dip into our past surplus? I do not think so. I just feel the government should be very careful now. We have this surplus of $2 billion now, and it looks as if we are going to have a very substantial surplus again this year, judging by the way the figures are going. Quite frankly, I am not sure that the minister himself needs this extra 2 per cent sales tax to get the surplus that he expects to have. For the salutary effect it might have on the government I am going to support the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): The principle of this bill is that certain forms of excise tax ought to be levied on Canadian commodities in order to raise certain sums of money from Canadian consumers for the defraying of divers governmental expenses. The stated or implied reasons for such procedure are: First, that the withdrawal of active purchasing power from circulation to the extent of the sums involved will constitute anti-inflationary measures. Second, that the acquisition by the government of the sums of money involved is unsound unless such money is obtained either through taxation or borrowing. I personally challenge the validity of each of these two reasons.

I personally contend that the cause of the high prices presently prevailing in Canada is not scarcity of goods in relation to the money in active working circulation, but that the cause of our so-called inflation has been deliberate profiteering forcing up costs of production. As I have pointed out, the first step in this spiral of inflation was the deliberate advance of $5 a ton in the price of steel, permitted by this government in 1946, and it had nothing on earth to do with the money in circulation, or the scarcity of steel or the inability of Canadians to produce more steel; and the increase in wages by reason of the strike in the steel works in 1946 again forced up the prices, and had nothing on earth to do with the surplus of purchasing power in relation to the goods.

That same principle followed all the way through will explain the rise in prices right up to the present time. And why it is that it takes so long for so many people in Canada to see that is beyond my comprehension. To imagine that we can force back the price of steel for instance by any degree of taxation in this country is simply fantastic.

I personally maintain that the sums of money proposed to be raised by the imposts contemplated through these taxes in this bill can be safely taken from the Bank of Canada, and spent into circulation by the government without inflationary effects through monetary influences. I do not say that doing that will keep people from stealing from each other if you permit them to increase their prices beyond what they have a right to increase them by; but I will say that if suitable control measures are adopted there will be no inflation by taking that money from the Bank of Canada.

My reason for this assurance is that the supply position in Canada at present is such that the said sums would be absorbed by surplus goods existing in Canadian inventories in May, 1951, and coming into existence through Canadian productive facilities now in operation. I therefore personally oppose the principle of this bill.

I maintain personally that Canadian supplies are as adequate as I have indicated. Some of the reasons why I believe this I propose to give. I may be wrong. It is difficult for us to be sure about the supply position in the country. I can go only by the evidence we are able to obtain. Of course, if there is not enough supply in Canada to support the money I propose, then something would have to be done in the way of controls and even rationing in order to prevent a rise of prices because of too great demand for the supply.

I have already referred to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on April 9 as reported at page 1762 of Hansard. May I read it once more:

> I am sure that we can get along quite comfortably as consumers and still engage in a substantial defence effort. A few things may in the course of time become unavailable or relatively scarce, but standards of living will remain high. Unless all-out war comes, Canadians can continue to live well.

These words have only one possible meaning, coming from a man as cautious about his wording as is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They must mean that the supplies are adequate in Canada. If they are, I maintain the money can be created by the Bank of Canada, can be borrowed from the Bank of Canada by the dominion government and spent, without any such iniquitous taxes as are proposed in the present bill.

Let us look at some of the details in respect to supply. How are we off for food in Canada? I am getting my information from an authentic letter of May 16, 1951. Production and supply of most foods is well ahead of a year ago. What about flour? Well, it is reported to me that our flour supply was up about one-third in January. What about other cereal products? They are in good supply. What about our fluid milk? Temporarily down, because of foolish governmental mismanagement, but I am told there is a long-run increase. What about butter? No real scarcity. We have made a mistake. In connection with margarine we have made a serious blunder in respect of our dairy industry, but we can easily retrace our steps and undo the blunder. What about beef? There has been a governmental mistake again in connection with beef. But it certainly is possible in Canada to produce enough beef, and if we cannot now produce enough beef we can ration it until such time as we do, in the future, have enough beef.

What about pork? I understand our pork supply was ten per cent higher this year in January than it was last year. There was almost a one-third increase in stocks in Canada. What about fish? I understand that landings were 12 per cent higher and that storage was 15 per cent higher than in 1950. What about eggs? I am told that the shortage of eggs at the present time is largely in reference to the export of eggs, but that we have plenty of eggs for the home market.

What about sugar? Production and supply are ahead of what they were. Stocks in January were over 30 per cent higher than they were before. What about potatoes? Everyone knows what happened to potatoes. The supply is far in excess of what we are able to use. What about fruits and vegetables, canned and fresh? We have a larger supply than we had last year and it is ample.

What about prepared foods and beverages? The same applies to them. Our supplies are ample for our requirements. What about clothing? In connection with cotton yarn, I am told that we had 20 per cent more bales of cotton opened in 1950 than in 1949. That does not indicate a shortage of supply. We may be selling a good deal of it abroad, or using it in other ways. But, so far as the supply is concerned, we are in a sound position. We had a ten per cent higher opening of bales in January 1951 than in the preceding January. We have increased our yarn and our cloth supply.

What about our woollen supply? I understand that woollen cloth shipments were up about one-third in December of 1950 over the previous year, and our inventories were up a quarter. That does not indicate a shortage of supply.

What about hosiery? Shipments had increased by one-quarter, and stocks also were higher. What about knit goods? The same is true as in the case of hosiery. What about boots and shoes of all kinds? They were higher in the last quarter of 1950 than in the year earlier.

Then, what about housing? Here is a general comment on housing—and let it be understood that I am not defending the housing situation, because I think the government has made one of the most serious blunders in respect of housing; I would say more about it if this were the appropriate time to do so. This is the note I find in the document before me:

> A total of 89,015 new housing units were completed in 1950, approximating the record of 1949. Since the number of starts was 92,531 (a little greater than 1949) the number under construction at the year end also showed an increase, and amounted to 60,538. This would suggest a continuing high level of completion in the first part of 1951.

I believe this could be maintained, by the exercise of a little bit of care. Certainly there is no reason why we cannot produce a great number of houses of a lower value for those in lower income brackets. The fact we do not do it is the result purely of government mismanagement.

Then, what about furnishings? Furniture is in good supply. I am told, too, that there is a good supply of floor coverings. The supply of electrical apparatus was up by 25 per cent at the end of December, 1950. What about sheet metal products? Shipments increased by 90 per cent over the previous year. Stocks, at the same time, were at the same high level.

Then, what about hardware? The situation is substantially the same as in the case of sheet metal products. What about soaps? The supply has increased markedly over the year, and inventories are again higher. What about paints? The same observation applies as in connection with soaps.

Then, what about fuel and lighting? I find there was 40 per cent more coal available for consumption in the latter part of 1950 than there was in 1949. Our oil supply seems to be adequate; we have no difficulty obtaining it. What about gasoline and gas? We seem to have plenty of it. What about manufactured gas? The supply has increased. What about natural gas? The sales increased by almost 40 per cent late in 1950.

Here is an example of the kind of thing that is happening in respect of fuels. Let us take coal. I read now from a document which came from the Canada Information Agency, of which Mr. John S. Connolley is director. This article is dated May 31, 1951, and says:

> Lately the mechanical efficiencies of the oil and gas industry have been very much in the news, especially in North America. But the changes planned in the coal mining industry are just as spectacular and worthy of attention.
> One of the latest mechanical devices being introduced into the soft coal industry of the United States is the continuous mining machine. It provides the nearest approach yet made to continuity of production at the coal face. The machine promises to telescope the four conventional steps of modern mining—cutting, drilling, blasting and loading—into one operation. Usually these steps have needed separate machines and separate crews.

The new "do-all" machine cuts and loads at the coal face in one operation and does away with the need for drilling and blasting. Demonstrations have shown that the coal industry must develop faster methods of transporting coal away from the new high-speed machines in order to allow them to operate without a pause. Where they have been tried, they have, under certain conditions, tripled the output of miners at the coal face and lowered the costs of production.

Several types of these machines have already been developed in the United States. One is a chain-cutter which rips the coal out, another chips it away, a third is a burster-type machine and others wedge out the coal or break it loose with vibrators.

Several types of conveyor systems have been evolved to work with the cutting machines. One which has been in use in West Virginia for almost a year is reported to have moved coal from the face at the rate of 45 tons per man-shift. The usual average with other methods was about ten tons per man-shift. Another new conveyor type is the "piggy-back" machine. It literally rides piggy-back on the loading machine at one end and on the first unit of the transportation system at the other, making possible a continuous movement of coal to the surface. It can be used with the conventional loading machines or with the new continuous mining machines.

I see no indication there of any possible shortage of coal, if we chose to introduce this machinery. Then, our gasoline supply is more than five per cent higher than at the year's end.

Then, what are some of the general facts? Were retail sales during January and February, 1951, greater or less than in the same two months of 1950? They were almost 19 per cent greater. Again, were sales in grocery stores up or down? They were up by 13 per cent. Were sales in country general stores up or down? They were up by 15 per cent. In department stores they were up 16 per cent. Sales of family clothing were up 13 per cent, and sales in shoe stores were up 19 per cent. Then, motor vehicle outlets indicate that sales were up 47 per cent. What about lumber and building materials? They were up 20 per cent. What about household appliances? They were up 23 per cent.

This all indicates there is an adequate supply. True, people are buying freely, but the supply must be coming along. What other general facts can we state? Inventories on hand available for shipment—what about them? Were total inventories of goods in December of 1950 higher or lower than in December of 1949? They were 10 per cent higher. How did this apply to non-durables? It applies only slightly. How did it apply to semi-durables? It applied only to the extent of 20 per cent. How about durables? It applied to the extent of 30 per cent.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Does a general survey of major commodity groups important to the welfare of the Canadian economy indicate any serious shortage of consumer goods? The answer is No.

What about steel? Well, the steel situation seems to be somewhat beclouded. The report seems to be different, depending upon the person one talks with. However here is a press clipping which I think is worthy of note. It is dated at Ottawa, May 8, a Canadian Press dispatch and states:

Trade officials said yesterday that the steel situation in Canada is gradually moving towards stabilization.

Though the need still is for more steel, boosted production and increased supplies from the United States had lifted some of the pressure from a critical situation that existed earlier this year, the officials said.

"At least, we can see where we are going," one authority said. "With the supplies we've got, and those we hope to get, no emergency program in Canada should suffer."

The trend towards stabilization will mean no immediate easing of current steel controls, levied mostly against the construction industry. However, as long as it continues, it would mean that further controls planned would not be enforced.

That indicates that our steel production is coming into good shape. Since all these things are true, and if I correctly interpret them, I think there can be no reason under the sun why we should make any further reduction in the purchasing power in the hands of the people. We are able to produce enough goods, just as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, unless we get into all-out war. We are able to produce enough goods to supply comforts to the people of Canada. I maintain that all these imposts we are contemplating in this bill, virtually every one of them and particularly the increase in the sales tax, will decrease the comfort of the people. We have already cut down the practical purchasing power of a large percentage of the Canadian people to a point where it is painfully lower than it was ten years ago.

I believe this situation is very serious, Mr. Speaker. I suggest it is easy enough for a country like Canada to begin looking down, to begin to think we cannot do big things. This country of Canada is capable of tremendous achievements. All we need to do is to manage it right, have faith in ourselves and adopt sound financial and economic measures. Then, we shall not have to bring into existence such taxes as these, which we have now, in order to raise money. We can create money through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into detail, but I am going to draw the attention of those who desire to read something about this matter of creating money to Hansard of April 19, 1951, pages 2195 to 2202; April 30, 1951, pages 2519 to 2526; May 1, 1951, pages 2558 to 2563; May 22, pages 3303 to 3305, where I discussed the Guernsey island situation; May 23, pages 3314 to 3318, where I discussed the greenback situation.

I maintain that if the principles that are laid down in those pages are adopted by the government in power it is ridiculous for us to talk about having to adopt imposts such as these to raise money on which to run the country, raising the price of goods at the same time. We can only make one disastrous mistake, and in my judgment we are on the verge of making that disastrous mistake. If we go too far and break things in this country and bring on a depression while a war is in progress we shall have real trouble. That is an extremely easy thing to do. There have been three or four danger signals hung out by men who are particularly qualified to speak about these matters. There was an announcement over the air today by one eminent man to the effect that if the government went on with the control of credit there would be widespread unemployment. Let widespread unemployment appear in this country and I shall defy this government, or any three governments with no more intelligence than this one, to tell us how to get out of it. It is easy enough to break down the confidence of the people so they will go out of production and go into ruin, but it is a difficult thing to build up their confidence. The men who were in power in this country during 1931, 1932 and 1933 found that out. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that we do not adopt any more injurious methods of this kind, but that we begin to canvass the possibility of financing our needs by sound economic methods.

I am therefore, Mr. Speaker, personally unalterably opposed to the principle of this bill. I am going to oppose it with all the energy I have, and I am going to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was paired with the hon. member for Yukon-Mackenzie River (Mr. Simmons). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Catherwood: I was paired with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Huffman). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Quelch: I was paired with the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Duty paid value.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to ask a question with respect to section 2(b)(ii). I find difficulty in constructing that provision particularly by reason of the inclusion of the words "advertising, financing, servicing". I am wondering exactly how those fit into the definition of "sale price". My question has regard particularly to the wording of section 2, which amends section 79 of the act. Paragraph (b) provides:

"Sale price," for the purpose of determining the excise tax payable under this part, means the aggregate of

(ii) any amount that the purchaser is liable to pay to the vendor by reason of or in respect of the sale in addition to the amount charged as price (whether payable at the same time or some other time) including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any amount charged for, or to make provision for, advertising, financing, servicing, warranty—

My question first of all has to do with the word "servicing". If your original charge includes something for servicing I think I can understand the significance and perhaps the reasonableness of the definition, but suppose servicing is something paid for from time to time by the purchaser later, which I take it is quite possible. Will that then be included in the amount taxed?

Mr. Sinclair: Servicing which is part of the condition of sale is included in the sale price. Later servicing, if it is a separate item, is not included. If the hon. member will turn to the next page and the explanation for section 5 he will see that section 2 and section 5 actually define the same thing, sale price. Section 2 has relation to the excise tax and section 5 to the sales tax. Actually the wording is the same. The cost of servicing, of warranties, of advertising if need be, if included in the cost of the sale is part of the sale price. This is the present practice and has been continued in exactly the same form for the establishment of sale price for the purpose of levying excise tax as for the purpose of levying sales tax. The note on the right hand side of the second page under section 5 is perhaps better than the note on the first page.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): In paragraph (iii) apparently the sale price includes the amount of excise duty paid also.

Mr. Sinclair: That is excise duty, not excise tax. Sale price includes customs or excise duties, that is duties on liquor, for example, in a warehouse, or a distillery. When that moves out it has paid its excise duty, and it then becomes subject to sales and excise taxes. Those latter taxes are levied on the same price; they do not pyramid, but the sales tax is levied on the cost including the customs or excise duty.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): You mean the sales tax is levied on the price of the goods plus the customs or excise duty?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the excise duty apply to other articles than tobacco and liquor?

Mr. Sinclair: Just those two.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I come back to the word servicing. The parliamentary assistant has told us what it means, and that it would cover a servicing charge paid subsequently from time to time. However, I do not see that this is clear from the wording; and from what has occurred already in this house tonight we want to be very clear as to the meaning of things.

Mr. Sinclair: As an example, most refrigerators carry one year's free servicing. That is a condition of sale, and of course that cost to the company giving the guarantee is embedded in the cost of the refrigerator. At the end of that year the owner can enter into other servicing arrangements for the next three or four years, if need be, either with the company from which he bought the refrigerator or with another company. That is a separate thing having no relation to the sale price. The actual service given for the first year is a cost to the company providing that service and selling the refrigerator, and under this definition that cost is embedded in the sale price.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That seems very reasonable, and I do not doubt that it is so, but it does not seem to me that this wording makes clear that it is so, and I am wondering whether there should not be something to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. Sinclair: All I can say is that this is the exact wording in the present act, and that is the policy that has been followed. There is no change in this wording, as the hon. member will see if he looks over the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is not quite as clear as that. In the explanatory note I read that hitherto the absence of a definition of sales price to cover the excise tax has left the basis of application of the tax uncertain. Am I not right in thinking this is supposed to introduce a clarity that has not been there previously?

Mr. Sinclair: This is here to make it abundantly clear that the same basis is used to ascertain the sale price for both the excise tax and the sales tax. Previously, as far as the levying of the excise tax was concerned, there was no specific definition of sales price. The sale price definition used was that spelled out under the sales tax. Now under both the excise tax section and the sales tax section we are having exactly the same definition we now have in the act for sale price with regard to sales tax.

Mrs. Fairclough: The word "financing" I presume applies to finance charges which may be collected on deferred payments. Are they added to the cost of the article before the imposition of sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: All this, of course, is not at the consumer level; this is the manufacturer selling. If the manufacturer is selling these articles on time, then the cost of his financing is included in the cost price of the refrigerator, for example. After all, that is the only place he can put it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Supposing the financing is done by an outside corporation. Do you charge sales tax on the finance charges in that case?

Mr. Sinclair: If it is done by an outside corporation, no; only if it is done by the company selling the article.

Mrs. Fairclough: Some of these people add their finance charges and then turn around and refinance with finance companies. What happens in that case?

Mr. Sinclair: Once again, the purpose of this is to see that the sales price by the manufacturer to his customer is the actual selling price including the cost of the goods and the cost of financing and servicing. The actual object here is to prevent a manufacturer breaking up his selling price into a variety of items and saying there was so much for the actual material, so much for the cost of servicing for the next year, so much for the cost of carrying the retailer's finance charges for a year and so on, and then saying the sales tax should be levied only on the actual cost of the material. We regard the sale price as the cost at which the manufacturer sells to the retailer, including all these costs he has incurred.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then if a manufacturer allows a discount for cash do you permit him to apply the sales tax to the net amount after the discount has been deducted?

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, Mr. Chairman, it is eleven o'clock.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will give third reading to Bill No. 295, to amend the Customs Tariff. Then we will proceed with the two budget bills, Nos. 294 and 296, the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. Then we will take up Bill No. 322, respecting the Canada post office; Bill No. 194, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; and for good measure Bills Nos. 344 and 355.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 5, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLES IN "MACLEAN'S" MAGAZINE AND REGINA "LEADER-POST"

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that in the March 15, 1951, issue of Maclean's magazine, which has only now come to my attention, in an article written by Mr. George Hillyard Robertson, he said the following:

> Political arguments are one thing in which Reginans still maintain their old-time spirit. Once, James Gardiner, then leader of the Saskatchewan Liberal opposition, peeled off his coat and charged across the legislative chamber toward Carl Stewart, a Conservative M.L.A. The two were separated before any blows were exchanged but it took the house a day to get back to normal.

The hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did not at any time peel off his coat, nor charge across the legislative chamber towards me, nor was I—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gibson: It is a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): —nor was I a Conservative M.L.A. in such legislature. I was the leader of an independent group, chosen as such leader by them, and served as minister of highways in a government known as the Co-operative government. Nor were the two of us separated at any time before any blows were exchanged, nor did it take the house a day to get back to normal. Such foolish articles as this one written by Mr. G. H. Robertson are not calculated to improve the knowledge of the Canadian public with regard to political affairs. The incident that did occur thirty years ago, of which this is an exaggerated report, was amicably settled by the participants in my room two days later.

The statement is further incorrect in that I never at any time ran as a Conservative candidate, as the election records in the archives of the governments, both provincial and federal, will show; and I was opposed in three federal elections by Conservative candidates who incidentally all lost their deposits.

I also wish to speak on a matter of privilege concerning an article appearing in the Leader-Post of May 31. Premier T. C. Douglas, the C.C.F. leader in the Saskatchewan government, makes a personal attack on me; he says that I have belonged to almost every political party in existence, and therefore no one was likely to give the statement I made in this house relating to the Saskatchewan civil service much credit.

The statements of Mr. Douglas, both as to patronage as practised by his government and as to myself personally, are absolutely untrue. I have never been a member of any political party except the original Progressive party, and in the last federal election the Liberal party.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING REGULATIONS RESPECTING GREAT LAKES SEAMEN'S SECURITY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table copies, in English and in French, of an order in council of June 4 amending the regulations respecting great lakes seamen's security. Those regulations are now in force. It has been found that with respect to the men on some small craft, such as small fishing vessels, or barges used as auxiliaries in dredging operations in the lakes, no useful purpose would be served by applying these regulations. The order in council authorizes the Minister of Labour to make orders exempting them from the application of the general regulations.

PRINTING BUREAU—REQUEST OF ONTARIO PRINTING TRADES UNIONS FOR RIGHT OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he is now in a position to answer a question I asked on the orders of the day on May 15 with regard to the request of the Ontario federation of printing trades unions that the employees of the federal printing bureau be accorded the right of collective bargaining.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiries and find that the Times-Gazette, published in Oshawa, reported that the federation of printing trades unions had passed a resolution demanding that the federal government accord to the civil servants the right to belong to a union of their choice and to bargain collectively.

I have no knowledge of any regulation or order of any kind which prevents any civil servant from joining the union of his choice.

The matter of collective bargaining raises a question of principle. Employees of the public service are recruited by the civil service commission, through competitive examinations advertised across the country, and a choice is made on the basis of merit, irrespective of union affiliations. The same principle of technical qualification is applied in connection with promotions, and there is no discrimination between employees, whether they belong to unions or not.

It is not considered that it would be in the interests of the service to exclude non-union citizens from free access to government employment.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the order for motions:

Mr. L. D. Tremblay (Dorchester) moved:

That the name of Mr. George be substituted for that of Mr. McLean (Huron-Perth) on the special committee on veterans affairs.

Motion agreed to.

POULTRY

SPREAD OF NEWCASTLE DISEASE—QUESTION AS TO CONTROL MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, or, in his absence, to the parliamentary assistant. Is the government giving consideration to a thorough investigation into the alarming spread of Newcastle disease in poultry, which until recently was confined principally to one section of the country but is now being reported in many other parts of Canada?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): I should like to thank the hon. member for Haldimand for giving notice of his question. I can assure him that this disease, which is spreading among poultry flocks, is well in hand. We hope to bring it under control and, if at all possible, to eradicate it.

[Mr. Bradley.]

DECENNIAL CENSUS

QUESTION AS TO MEMBERS IN ATTENDANCE AT PARLIAMENTARY SESSION DURING ENUMERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Because we are members of parliament, some of us will not be home during the month of June. As June is the month in which the census will be taken, can the parliamentary assistant tell us whether the department or the bureau of statistics has any plans under which members will be included in the census?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Members of parliament who are now in Ottawa will be enumerated where living in Ottawa. The enumeration is made on transient card form 2-A. That card is referred back to the electoral district of the member, and is included in the return for that electoral district.

Mr. Fulford: Does one have to answer the questions in Ottawa if one has already answered them?

Mr. McIlraith: If there is a duplication of enumeration cards, such duplication is picked up and the duplicate card eliminated before the returns are tabulated in the local constituency.

FIRES

OTTAWA ORDNANCE DEPOT—MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT AT LONDON, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. My question arises out of the recent disastrous fire in Ottawa. What increased security precautions are being taken in respect to the military establishment at London, Ontario? Are negotiations proceeding for the purchase of the property known as the Ontario hospital, situated at Dundas street and Higbury avenue at London, Ontario, for military purposes?

Mr. R. O. Campney (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the hon. member's questions as notice.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 295, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Jean Francois Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the debate on this bill, and to that on another bill amending the Excise Tax Act. There will be a third bill concerning the income tax.

I noticed that during the debate some members said that there are some good features in the bill. This puzzled me, because taxation is always unpleasant. I cannot see why or how anyone could rejoice about new taxes. On the other hand, I admire once again the wisdom of the government. I did not favour the $65 million gift to the western farmers, but as I listened to numerous requests for a gift amounting to nearly five times more, I wondered what other good features those hon. members who are satisfied with taxation would have suggested to the government in order to pay for that surplus gift.

They like taxation; they want more gifts. How would they pay for them? This has puzzled me greatly. I now speak as the man in the street who has read in the press numerous requests for more gifts, and who is puzzled to see that those who make the requests complain about taxation. Besides that, those who continuously ask for more money for defence cannot complain about taxation, especially taxation of this kind. They agree that they want more expenditures, yet they combat taxation and offer no substitute or alternative. If the government had considered favourably the numerous requests for more gifts to the western farmers, and more expenditures for national defence, I wonder what the suggestion of those hon. members would have been, in the way of new taxation.

It is easy to complain about taxation. But one of the foremost principles of democracy is the rule of the majority. Minorities may express their dissent or disagreement, but after a decision is reached by the majority we must stand by that decision, especially if the majority is composed of gentlemen who agree as to the necessity for an expenditure.

To summarize what I have said, I do not consider that there are any good features in the three bills, the one before the house at this time and the two others, but I consider that they are necessary. As the expenditures have been agreed to, the taxpayer must foot the bill. I realize that if any other party or group had been in power, things would have been much worse than they are now.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. gentleman has been allowed to state that the western farmers have been receiving gifts, may I say that the $65 million which was appropriated was merely compensation for the prices that were accepted during the war years. During the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 the western farmers also subsidized the bread and flour which was used by the domestic consumers of Canada, to the extent of 160 million bushels at thirty cents a bushel; hence the request that is made now for additional compensation to the extent of $48 million for those 160 million bushels. I just want to draw that to your attention.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Coldwell: The hon. member for Temiscouata was allowed to make a statement, and I notice that neither the Minister of Finance nor other members of the government interrupted him, called him to order or contradicted him.

Mr. Abbott: I only interrupted the hon. member when he referred to the $48 million on top of the $65 million, which certainly has nothing at all to do with this bill.

Mr. Coldwell: Why did not the minister interrupt the hon. member for Temiscouata when he was making his statement? I am just trying to put the matter in the proper light before the house.

Mr. Pouliot: I rise on a question of privilege. In my humble opinion the hon. gentleman cannot deny to any one of his colleagues the right to speak on the third reading of any bill when he has not spoken before. We live in a free country. The Minister of Finance has shown his appreciation of human rights and fundamental freedoms. I remember years ago that when I sponsored a bill to abolish Bennett's economic council, the predecessors of the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: —interrupted me in the same fashion to denounce the rights of private members of the house.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: Has the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I understood that the hon. member for Temiscouata was rising on a question of privilege. I suggest to him that he state his question of privilege as briefly as possible.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, sir. My question of privilege is that no hon. member or no leader of any group can deny to any hon. member the right to express his feelings with sincerity and conviction. To satisfy the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: —I will substitute the word "compensation" for the word "gift". What I said about the gifts applies to compensation.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything more on this bill, but the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) does have a way of provoking remarks. I should like to draw to his attention the fact that the Social Credit group have offered an alternative for raising revenue, and I defy him to prove that there is no other way to get money than by taxing or borrowing. I want to make that clear to the hon. member.

I have just one thing more to say. There was no "gift" of $65 million to western wheat growers; the $65 million was merely a payment on account.

Mr. Pouliot: I thank the hon. gentleman for his kind support.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, June 4, consideration in committee of Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 2—Duty paid value.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When the committee rose last night we were considering section 2. As I understand it, the parliamentary assistant had asked us to accept this section, partly on the ground that it agreed with the wording of section 5, which I understood him to say was of long standing and contained a wording which had been worked on and therefore we should accept it. I note that the explanatory note opposite section 5 reads:

> The purpose of this amendment is to provide clearer definitions of "duty paid value" and "sale price," for purposes of part XIII of the act under which the consumption or sales tax is imposed.

Therefore I do not think the parliamentary assistant can ask us to accept the wording of section 2 as being sacrosanct merely because it is the same as section 5. That reminds me of a situation which existed years ago in Kingston. A gun was fired at twelve o'clock every day at the fort. Someone was out at the fort and asked how they got the time for the gun, and was told that they got it electrically from a jeweler in Kingston. Next day he happened to be in the jewelry store at twelve o'clock and heard the gun fired. At that moment the jeweler said, "We must set our clock; there goes the gun." I suggest that the parliamentary assistant is not helping us by this reference to section 5, and perhaps he might explain it further.

While I am on my feet I should like to refer to an answer which was made to a question asked by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I quote from page 3715 of Hansard where the hon. member is quoted as follows:

> Then if a manufacturer allows a discount for cash do you permit him to apply the sales tax to the net amount after the discount has been deducted?
> Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right.

Is the parliamentary assistant sure of that?

Mr. Sinclair: When this question was raised last night I was perhaps not as well briefed as I should be, mainly because we were then dealing with the existing act whereas I had got prepared on the details of the amending bill. It is generally in connection with the changes that the department and I do our homework. First of all let me say that the details of section 79 (b) (ii) are not the result of circumstances similar to those affecting the jeweler in Kingston. The question goes back to the time of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who was minister of finance as well as prime minister in 1934. In order to avoid the full effect of the sales tax, certain manufacturers, notably automobile manufacturers, sought to break up what was regarded as their sale price into items such as manufacture, advertising, servicing. The dealer or the retailer paid the full price, but then it was claimed by the manufacturers that the sales tax applied only to the cost of the manufacture of the car. It was because of that that this section was first spelled out so far as sales tax is concerned. Then I have found that in the schedule of the present act it is spelled out with respect to automobiles so far as the excise tax is concerned.

Let me go through each of these items and give examples. First of all there is advertising. Every national manufacturer advertises his product nationally, whether it be a car, a radio or a television set. Undoubtedly that is reflected in the actual sale price to the wholesaler or jobber of that item. I am informed that some manufacturers, such as radio manufacturers, actually specify it as being two and one-half per cent of the selling price of their goods to the wholesaler or jobber to whom they sell.

The next one is financing. This brings in the matter of cash discounts, referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton West. If the manufacturer in selling his product to the jobber or wholesaler has to finance that sale, that again is a cost to him of selling the article, a cost which is properly included in his selling price. If the buyer, however, finances it through a finance company, that is different; it is not a cost to the manufacturer. If the manufacturer, as suggested last night by the hon. member for Hamilton West, has to turn to a finance company to finance it, then that is an operation of the manufacturer which is reflected in the selling price. So far as cash discount is concerned, I must confess that after giving that answer last night I thought it over and wondered how allowance would be made for a cash discount, since most manufacturers of course sell with the thought that purchases will be paid for in thirty, sixty or ninety days.

The customs and excise branch of the Department of National Revenue does not demand payment for sales and excise taxes collected in this month until the end of the next month. Therefore purchases made at the first of the month have sixty days to run, and those at the end of the month have thirty days to run, the average being forty-five days. Most cash sales are for ten days. You pay in ten days, or at the outside thirty days, and you get the benefit of the cash discount. Therefore the manufacturer still has in his possession the invoice of sale, and if there has been a cash discount he takes that off his selling price and the sales tax is levied on the remainder. That is an accepted practice of the trade.

The next matter is servicing.

Mr. Thatcher: Before the parliamentary assistant leaves that point, I do not wish to contradict him, but I can tell him that the practice of the trade is not as he says. Manufacturers always charge sales tax on the invoice price. Then if you take your cash discount afterward you save that amount; but certainly at no time do you get a rebate on the sales or excise tax that has been paid.

Mr. Sinclair: I am again informed—and I went over this point very carefully with the officials of the department—that credit is given in the cash discount for the amount of sales tax which might have been paid on the total price, including servicing.

Mr. Thatcher: It is given to the manufacturer or to the person who buys the article?

Mr. Sinclair: The point made is again the point I made before, that the manufacturer does not remit his sales tax until thirty to sixty days, an average of forty-five days, afterwards. If the sale to the customer has been on the basis of a cash discount, then that is the actual invoice of the selling price by him to his customer. The fact that there was a discount is shown, and he pays eight per cent—now ten per cent—sales tax on that item.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry, but I must tell the parliamentary assistant again that is not the general practice.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member of course is at the receiving end of having a price and getting a cash discount. I am now talking about the practice of the Department of National Revenue in accepting these invoices from the manufacturer. If the individual can get a discount, the manufacturer shows it on the invoice and pays his sales tax on the net selling price to the jobber or wholesaler, or, if he should sell directly, to the retailer.

The next point was servicing, and the difference between servicing and a warranty. Taking again the example of an automobile, because it is the easiest one to use, the warranty is that for the first six months or first year they will not only service the article but will replace defective parts, and, if need be, replace the whole article if it should prove to be defective. That is a warranty. Aside from that there are, as all hon. members know, servicing guarantees given on cars and other such items. An automobile manufacturer will service your car for the first 10,000 miles. It may take some people a year, some two years, and some even three years to use up the 10,000 mile service guarantee given by the automobile manufacturer, which servicing is still one of the costs included in the selling price of the manufacturer to the dealer.

Mr. Fraser: I do not think there are any manufacturers who give 10,000 mile service. I think it is 4,000 miles or ninety days, whichever comes first.

Mr. Sinclair: The actual details are a matter of indifference. I know that on my car I have a 10,000 mile service guarantee. In a year I have only travelled 6,000 miles, and I still have coupons and cards from the car company from which I bought it—not the dealer—assuring me of this service up to 10,000 miles. But whether it is 10,000 or 1,000, ten days or five years, it is still servicing.

The last matter is commission. Some manufacturers sell their goods through their own salesmen who are on salary, some through salesmen on commission, and some through salesmen on a joint salary and commission basis. It has been argued that where manufacturers pay outright commission it is not a cost of manufacture. There is no doubt that it is a cost to the man who buys the car, because the manufacturer's cost and the commission have been added before the person purchases the car. Again so far as the interpretation of sales price in the present act is concerned, and in the schedule so far as excise tax on cars is concerned, that has been interpreted as a part of the selling price.

I think I have answered the points the hon. member raised.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There are one or two points about which I am not clear. We are talking about a tax at the manufacturer's level.

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How could commission, which presumably is paid to an intermediary, come into the manufacturer's cost?

Mr. Sinclair: Because the manufacturer himself has salesmen. The manufacturer does not merely sell by catalogue. It may not be so in the automobile industry, but in other industries many manufacturers have their own salesmen who go to jobbers, wholesalers, department stores and chain stores to push their products. In the actual net cost to the purchaser of those goods there is included the cost of manufacture and these other things, plus the commission paid the salesmen of the manufacturer who in the end might sell to a jobber, wholesaler, or department store, or, in the case of direct sale, to a retailer.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How do you assess the value of the warranty for taxation purposes?

Mr. Sinclair: We do not have to assess that. When I bought my car, from a company which I shall not mention, as I recall it I paid $2,038.

Mr. Fleming: That must have been before there was any increase in tax.

Mr. Sinclair: It was over a year ago, so it was long before there was any increase in tax. It is a very modest car, and has only gone 6,000 miles.

Mr. Graydon: Did you get it from war assets?

Mr. Sinclair: In that cost—and I bought through a local dealer—was included the cost of the manufacture of the car; the cost of the advertising which the company did in a national magazine and which drew their car to my attention; the cost of the warranty that if the car was defective in the first year or three months or six months—whatever it is—they would replace the parts; and the cost of servicing for the first 10,000 miles. I don't know what the division of costs was. All I paid was that final price, but in the price the dealer paid the manufacturer the same things were included.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): When you say that, do you mean that they were specifically included or that they are deemed to be included?

Mr. Sinclair: When they were trying to get around this they were specifically mentioned. Because of this interpretation they are no longer specifically mentioned. That is the price of the car and all these other things connected with the car which the manufacturer sells to the dealer and the dealer sells to the consumer.

Mr. Knowles: Would it not be fair for the parliamentary assistant to tell us what kind of car has a servicing contract for ten thousand miles?

Mr. Sinclair: It is certainly not the job of the parliamentary assistant to mention any trade names, but the car is parked right out in front of this building on the right hand side, with plenty of dust on it.

Mr. Knight: I should like to get some clarification of a ruling concerning the importation of certain diamonds, in connection with which I have had several communications. This is a case in which diamonds were sent out of the country for reconditioning, I think to Antwerp. When such diamonds are sent there they are checked by the customs at that port and certified as to identification. Then the necessary repairs are made, which I presume is simply a matter of cutting down the diamond. You cannot make a diamond larger; it has to be made smaller. This work is done and the diamond is returned through the customs at Antwerp, where it is again checked for identity. But when it comes to the Canadian side an excise tax is charged just as though it were a new stone. The original stone paid an excise tax when it was admitted to the country in the first place, and these people are greatly concerned. They say they cannot have that work done with advantage to themselves in this country, and it is therefore necessary to return such stones to the point of origin in a foreign country. When it comes back, however, they find the same tax collected as though it were a new stone, and they say they cannot charge their customers enough to carry on this sort of work economically.

After these people wrote to the department they were informed that the ruling that the second charge was correct was based upon the fact that these stones are not easily identifiable. In the letter to which I am referring at the moment the writer says "identical" but I think he must mean identifiable. I would like some comment on that. Does not the parliamentary assistant think that tax is unjust under those circumstances? It is an easy way out to say, "Well, how can we tell it is the same stone? Let us collect the second tax," but I think this should be looked into, and if the regulation is not justified by the facts it should be changed.

One of the letters I have had from the retail merchants' association, backing up this claim, asks that the case be reconsidered. They suggest that the ruling in this instance be clarified, since this firm definitely cannot continue to pay the customs duty on diamonds which are forwarded for reconditioning. As I say, there is no place in this country where the work can be done. This looks to me like an unjust tax, like an easy way out. If there is a process of identification, as I submit there is, then the diamonds should be identified and the tax paid only once. If the stone has been improved in value I suppose there could be a tax on the improvement, but I do not think it has. It has been made smaller, and has decreased in value.

Mr. Sinclair: This, of course, would be primarily matter of customs administration that would come under the Customs Act which was under consideration last week. So far as I know, the only reconditioning that could be done to diamonds, to use that word loosely, would be regrinding to make a diamond smaller and with different facets. No one would have that done unless it was going to improve the value of the diamond. One would not deliberately take a diamond and have it cut down to reduce its value.

The other point is that if a manufacturing process is involved in connection with any article, whether that article be raw or semi-finished, and the article is brought back into the country, naturally its value has been increased, so there are sales and excise taxes, in the case of luxury goods, on the processing which has changed that article from a semi-finished nature to a finished nature.

However, getting back to my first point, this is primarily a matter for the administration of the Department of National Revenue, so it does not quite come within the Excise Tax Act. I am quite sure, however, that the Minister of National Revenue will take note of the hon member's plea in this regard and give him an answer.

Mr. Knight: If there were an increase in value, as the parliamentary assistant suggested, I could see the justice of charging a tax on that increased value, but not on the total value of the stone. I do not think his argument is well founded when he says the value has been increased, because I am comparing two values. I am comparing the value of the stone upon which the excise tax was originally paid with the value of the stone on the second occasion. A stone would be sent out to be reconditioned because it had deteriorated or been damaged so it was not worth the original cost. The comparison I am making is between the value of the diamond in the first instance, which was certainly higher, and the value in the second case; but it was upon that original value that these people had to pay their excise tax. Now, after the diamond has deteriorated and they have gone to the expense of having it made of some value, you are taxing them on the full value of the stone, which you have done already on the greater value in the first place. I do not think the first argument advanced by the parliamentary assistant holds water. I cannot see it. He gives the assurance that the Minister of National Revenue will look into the matter. Of course we have had that assurance at least once before. The matter was looked into, and I was taking this opportunity to suggest that the decision in that case was wrong. However, again I ask that the matter be looked into.

Mr. Gibson: Can the parliamentary assistant tell me the mechanics of the change in the application of the sales tax to logging truck tires? There has been a change recently, and I would like the parliamentary assistant to explain it to me.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that this problem has two sides. First there is the increase from eight per cent to ten per cent in general sales tax. Then there is the question whether or not a contract trucker, a man who contracts with a logging company to move their logs from stump to dump, is entitled to the exemption provided for the primary logger who cuts his own logs and moves them down to the sea, at least in British Columbia.

Mr. Gibson: Then do I understand that the tires used by the primary logger are exempt from sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Once again this is a technical question which has been under review by the department for some time. I am not competent to give an answer at the moment, but the hon. member will certainly have an answer promptly from the Department of National Revenue, which administers the act.

Mr. Gibson: That is what I am rather curious about. Logging truck tires have been exempt from sales tax over the years. I am just wondering by whose authority—it certainly was not done by parliament—this exemption has been taken away. I hear they have a new gimmick in this thing now. They have arranged it so that they say that tires that are designed, manufactured for and used exclusively on logging trucks are exempt from sales tax. Now, there is no possibility of acquiring that kind of tire. It is just like having a slot machine. If you get three cherries, you get some money out of it. In this case the national revenue department has removed two of the cherries. You could not buy a tire of that kind any place in the world. A tire is a tire. There are certainly no tires that are designed for, manufactured for and used exclusively on logging trucks. Where did the authority come from to change that original regulation and make it so that the sales tax is applicable to these tires?

Mr. Sinclair: This is quite a technical matter on which the member for Comox-Alberni is apparently much better informed than I am or the officials with me at the moment. I recall two or three weeks ago the member was advocating the broadening of the sales tax to make it applicable to farming and the mining and logging industries. It is for that reason the question is bewildering. He rather advocated that the sales tax be put on these tires, and when this sales tax has been applied again—

Mr. Gibson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I asked the parliamentary assistant originally if consideration had been given to broadening the base of the sales tax. I think it was a fair question. I eventually got an answer from the minister concerning the particular case about which I was asking. I was referring to the use of radios on logging trucks. The department had ruled, as I presume they have authority to rule, that a radio was not necessary on a logging truck, and was therefore subject to sales tax. However, I must be very careful, I can see that, about suggesting a source of revenue for the department, because it will be held against me for years.

On section 3—Furs.

Mr. Coldwell: This section has to do with furs. First of all, I support the idea that luxury furs should bear a tax under present circumstances. What I have in mind is that the cheaper furs should not be subject to the tax. Coming as many of us do from the prairie provinces, we know that in the wintertime furs are very necessary if one is going to drive across the prairies. There are types of furs which are used extensively, not because they are luxuries but because they are necessities. I have in mind a fur that is known as mouton or beaver lamb, for example. I do not know whether it is included in this group, because, after all, mouton or beaver lamb is really a sheepskin died to look like beaver. It is perhaps one of the cheapest and warmest furs that can be worn.

I suggest to the minister that if it is intended that this tax should apply to furs of that kind, which are necessities rather than luxuries, an exemption could be made. Are these so-called beaver lambskins classified as furs, and if so, are they subject to this twenty-five per cent tax? I have in mind other cheap furs, such as the wolfskin which is sometimes used for parkas and so forth. I believe they should be relieved of this tax. I have no objection to taxing luxury furs.

Mr. Sinclair: This is an item, of course, which is discussed in a similar fashion every year. It is quite true that it would be desirable if we could segregate the furs generally used on the lower levels from the expensive furs. During the first war they tried to segregate clothing in that way, but the tax schedules did not work out very well. We levy these excise taxes on all furs, other than the straight sheepskin shearlings, not the ones which are dyed to resemble beaver or the ones to which other trade names are applied but the sheepskin shearlings which are used for the linings of coats worn by workmen, drivers, and so forth. They are not taxed. If the sheepskin is processed to look like a more expensive fur, it actually becomes a more expensive fur and then it becomes subject to this tax.

Mr. Coldwell: Then the ordinary sheepskin, undyed, would not be subject to that tax? It is not classified as a fur?

Mr. Sinclair: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: How is it possible to classify a sheepskin, once it has been dyed, as a fur?

Mr. Sinclair: Because it has been processed. The reason for processing it and giving it this fancy name is to lift it to a better price in the market than that which would be given for a straight sheepskin. Where sheepskin is worn for its warmth, as by farmers out of doors and drivers of cars—that is, a coat with a sheepskin turned inside—it is not subject to this tax.

Mr. Wright: What is the extent of the processing that has to take place before a sheepskin becomes a fur? There is a certain amount of processing of any sheepskin.

Mr. Sinclair: I am informed that the department says that a sheepskin which has been combed, electrified and then dyed is regarded as a processed sheepskin.

Mr. Argue: I agree with the point made by the leader of this group that cheaper furs are certainly not a luxury. The parliamentary assistant has said that unprocessed sheepskins are not subject to this tax. If I am on a farm in the wintertime, and I buy a sheepskin coat with a canvas outer covering, there is no tax. But if I do not have a combination cloth and fur coat, which that actually is, but buy a processed sheepskin such as mouton—which is still a cheap coat—that coat is subject to the tax. As I understand it, the parliamentary assistant says it is only a utilitarian garment. Surely it is a utilitarian garment if a working girl in the city or a schoolteacher in the country who is walking to school has a cheaper fur coat.

Mr. Abbott: The member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Argue: I doubt that the member for Winnipeg North Centre has a fur coat; it is probably a camel pile.

Mr. Knowles: And I have had it for sixteen years.

Mr. Abbott: It looks like it.

Mr. Argue: I do not think the amount of money involved in exempting the cheaper line of fur coats would be very great. I noticed that while the tax on furs brought in some $3 million for the fiscal year 1950, the total revenue from excise tax amounted to $571 million. I wonder if the parliamentary assistant could give some reason why a segregation cannot be made allowing the mouton coats, processed lamb, rabbit fur, South American rodent and the opossum—those are the furs that come to mind at the moment—to be exempt from the tax. A lady can buy one of those coats for around $100. She can, of course, buy a cloth coat for that amount too, but why should she be forced to wear a cloth coat of similar value because there is an increase of twenty-five per cent in the excise tax? Is there not some way in which the cheaper fur could be exempt from this tax?

Mr. Sinclair: There is nothing more I can add to what I have just said. The hon. member mentioned the schoolteacher and the farmer's wife. If you go to the next level, the school principal or the wife of the chairman of the school board, where are you going to draw the line between the type of processed sheepskin, and the cheap fur and the more expensive furs? We have drawn the line at the lowest level of sheepskin, which is not called mouton or Belgian rabbit.

Mr. Argue: That is not a fur coat at all. That is a cloth coat with a skin lining.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member is much more of an expert in these things than I am. We are not changing the classification; all we are doing is changing the rate from 15 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. Coldwell: I would not object if the sheepskin were classified properly as sheepskin treated, not as fur. Probably that is the most satisfactory and the cheapest form of coat that can be bought, to resist the severe weather on the prairies. They are used by farm wives and by teachers and others who have long drives to make. The hon. gentleman mentioned a moment ago a fur coat of another kind. I have had a beaver lamb coat that I have worn for a good many years driving on the prairies. You simply cannot compare it with a cloth coat for warmth. Farmers and others who have to drive in the cold weather do not want to wear the short canvas coat with the sheepskin lining. Surely they are entitled to have a sheepskin coat, whether it is dyed or undyed. Women of course do not wear canvas covered sheepskin coats.

Mr. Graydon: The hon. member is not an expert on what they wear.

Mr. Coldwell: As the hon. member for Peel says, I may not be an expert, but I have a wife and daughter and I know something about clothes.

Mr. Fleming: About footing the bill, anyway.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes. If these sheepskins were classified, processed or unprocessed, dyed or undyed, as sheepskin, I do not think there would be as much objection to this particular tax as we have now.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In the Peace river country, where it is very cold, the school teachers wear muskrat coats and nylon stockings when it is 55 degrees below zero. Very rarely do you see a school teacher wear a coat that costs less than $400 or $500.

Mr. Coldwell: That may be true in British Columbia, but in many parts of Canada there were times when the teacher did not get $400 or $500 for a year's work.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The hon. member should return and become familiar with his people out there.

Excise Tax Act

On section 6—Consumption or sales tax of ten per cent.

Mr. Fleming: This clause, while it is brief, certainly outdoes any other provision in this bill in sheer iniquity at a time like this. This subject of the increase in the sales tax has been discussed on several occasions and I do not pretend that at this stage anything new is likely to be offered in opposition to it; nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I do not feel disposed to let this occasion pass without again offering the strongest possible objection to this increase in the sales tax.

The minister has not made out a case for a sufficient increase in general taxation to cover the amount of money that he estimates he will derive from this increase in the sales tax; nor has he, apart from that first point, made any case for raising money by this iniquitous method.

Now, sir, we have already had no little discussion about the minister's budgeting in general; but surely, Mr. Chairman, what the minister had to say in pleading for increases in taxes to meet estimated increases in expenditure, and to balance his budget, and provide a surplus of $30 million, has been swept aside by the revenue and expenditure figures that have been disclosed for the first month of this present fiscal year. When we see, as we have seen, that the minister has a surplus for the month of April of $121,500,000, which is something vastly greater than the surplus for the month of April, 1950, the minister has no shred of excuse for seeking this increase in the sales tax.

The minister cannot deny that this is the most inflationary of all his budget proposals.

Mr. Abbott: He certainly does deny it.

Mr. Fleming: Then I wish the minister would give some reasons for his assertion, because there is nothing but his plain ungarnished assertion to back up the point that he is seeking to make.

This increase in the sales tax is going to go on snowballing as the things to which it applies pass from hand to hand, from the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler, to the jobber, to the retailer, to the consumer; and it is not going to produce an amount of revenue commensurate with what it is going to cost the consumer. Figures have already been put on Hansard—I think I know them off by heart now—which establish conclusively that even in the simplest cases this tax costs the consumer just about twice what it yields to the government in revenue. You can find other cases in which the goods are passing through more than the hands of the producer, the wholesaler, the retailer and consumer, and also with respect to particular classes of goods, the amount that the tax in that snowballing or pyramiding process costs the consumer in mark-ups is far in excess of the amount that the government receives by way of revenue. In some of these cases it is more than double the amount of the tax. The government does not receive any more tax, but the consumer is going to be paying in these cases just about double what the government is going to collect out of it in taxes. The remainder goes to inflate the cost of living, and it will take more than assertion and mere denial, as the case may be, on the part of the minister to escape that fact.

Here we are with a cost of living reaching 182 points at the end of April, the highest in our history, and the minister persists in demanding from the house a twenty-five per cent increase in the sales tax. It will not be forgotten, I hope, that in addition to this increase in sales tax a whacking increase in the excise tax on many goods is being imposed as well. These taxes are cumulative. In fact, when you add the tax increase in section 6 of this bill to the tax increases imposed in some of the later sections, you have amazing increases which inevitably will have the effect of increasing very substantially the cost of many of the necessities of life.

Let no one go away with the impression that these taxes have not already had the effect of increasing the cost of many of the commodities to which they apply, and commodities which cannot be said, in a country like ours, measuring the standards of life by established and accepted Canadian standards, to be luxuries. I have before me some figures which I think may be of interest. Electric washers which cost $209 before the minister's budget now sell at $249. An electric iron which cost $14.50 before the budget now sells at $16.50. An electric toaster which cost $9.95 before the budget now costs $11.95. Is that a contribution on the part of the minister to beating down inflation in this country, to making it easier for people to meet the soaring cost of living? You see, the minister can only urge or contend that his increases in these taxes on these commodities, or on the other broad range of commodities to which the sales tax applies, make any contribution toward meeting the problem of inflation, if he goes so far as to say, "I do not want people to buy any of these things. I am going to make it so hard for them to buy these things that they will save their money." And he must go beyond that, and say that it is undesirable that people should have these things.

If the minister says that—and I would like to hear him say it openly and boldly, and not resort to mere general statements which have no evidence to support them—then I think the Canadian public will wish to examine the standard of life the Minister of Finance is proposing to prescribe for them. Have we reached the point where electric toasters are so beyond that scale of living which is regarded as justifiable in Canada that the minister is justified in making this whacking increase in the excise tax, and then this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax as well?

Already the increase in the sales tax has made itself felt. It has already contributed to the increase in the cost of living of the Canadian family. It has already increased to a marked degree the prices of many commodities that are, by all accepted standards, necessities of life. And I am told by people who are in business that this increase in the sales tax has also had a very disturbing effect on methods of doing business, and on the classification of goods in regard to various types of quality and price range. Because this 8 per cent sales tax has been in effect for a long time, it has become a normal even though a very heavy part of the normal cost process, in the production, marketing and sale of goods and commodities.

But the effect of this increase of 25 per cent, from 8 per cent to 10 per cent, added to the mark-ups, and the mark-ups on the mark-ups, and the mark-ups on the mark-ups on the mark-ups, has the effect in a great many cases of pushing goods of a well established classification as to quality and price into an entirely different price range, with the inevitable result that the advance in price to the consumer is going to outrun even the yield in revenue to the government, and the mark-ups in the various hands before they reach the hands of the retailer. That disturbing effect has already made itself felt in marketing with regard to a great many of the basic necessities of life to which this sales tax applies.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, how in 1935 the late Mr. Mackenzie King, in the election campaign of that year, made the welkin ring with his denunciations of the sales tax, when from coast to coast he denounced it as "that iniquitous tax". You will remember his words, I am sure. It was only 6 per cent then. But in due course he increased it to 8 per cent—and that took place in the first session of parliament after that vitriolic denunciation.

But what is to be said today when, faced with a critical situation in Canada created by inflation, we see the Minister of Finance proposing another increase in the tax which, at its 6 per cent level, was regarded by the then leader of the Liberal party as an iniquitous tax. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that there is iniquity written all over this provision in the bill for the increase in the sales tax.

I will go further and say that, in the face of the way in which business conditions and the cost of living have responded to this increased sales tax, and having regard to the way the cost of living has increased in the interval, and having regard to the sense of public outrage which has attended this proposal and, above all, having regard to the fact that the figures for one month—the month of April—concerning the revenue and expenditure of this country, these have knocked the props completely from under the estimate put before the house by the Minister of Finance as to estimated expenditures and receipts for the whole year. I say that there is no justification remaining now for the Minister of Finance to press this increase in the sales tax upon the people of Canada. And I say that if the government were not so arrogant, if the government were not so everlastingly touchy about any measure of losing face we would see the Minister of of Finance, if he had some realistic appreciation of the burdens of the people of Canada arising from inflation and the soaring cost of living, coming before the House of Commons—and I think the house would applaud him for what would be considered a commendable act upon his part—he would confess, "I think I made some errors. I think I underestimated the extent to which inflation in this country is increasing tax revenue; I think I underestimated the revenues which are going to be yielded by the existing tax. I know that this particular tax, above all others, is inflationary, and that it will abet inflationary forces, and that it will give them increased momentum; and therefore I ask leave of the house to withdraw this section of the bill."

Mr. Graydon: Repentance from the minister.

Mr. Fleming: I am convinced that it is nothing but that everlasting unwillingness on the part of the government to do anything which looks like a loss of political face which restrains the Minister of Finance today from rising in his place and withdrawing this iniquitous increase in the sales tax.

Mr. Shaw: If it is the desire of the Minister of Finance to withdraw this section of the bill I shall gladly refrain from speaking. Obviously however he has no such intention.

From budget day, April 10, to the present time, my colleagues and I have taken advantage of every opportunity to assail this proposed 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. Sometimes I think that had the government deliberately sought some method by which they could aggravate, annoy and anger the Canadian people, they could not have found a better method by which to accomplish that purpose.

During the debate on the budget members of the opposition advanced numerous arguments which, in my opinion, should convince anyone that the government should withdraw this recommendation. Is it not highly significant that no arguments have been advanced in defence of the proposition? In fact, in my opinion it is highly significant that such arguments have been made conspicuous by their absence.

Moreover I might assert that in the course of personal conversations with members from all sides of the house I have noted a good deal of agreement with respect to the principal characteristics of the tax. I indicated during an earlier speech that some rather strong words had been used when referring to the proposed increase. I said that the words vicious, iniquitous, infamous, insidious and pernicious had been used. As a consequence of developments since the budget date, as a consequence of the increased cost of living since our previous debate, I think those words apply with greater significance today than they did when uttered by hon. members. We have had no cause to change our position since we expressed that opinion on the excise tax resolution. We cannot for one moment feel that there is any justification for the government insisting upon applying this increase in tax. Certainly the revenue position as indicated by the hon. member for Eglinton and others would suggest that there is no good reason for the imposition of the tax.

We cannot for one moment believe that the government is justified in the light of the fact that the low income groups in the country are finding it increasingly more difficult to purchase the necessities of life. We see no justification for the government pursuing their policy of increasing the sales tax by 25 per cent. We are convinced that there are alternatives. The hon. member for Peace River has asserted that the corporation tax field offers a source of revenue which the government would be justified in using rather than to impose this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax.

After I spoke on May 1, issue was taken with my reference to the fact that the sales tax was in effect a poor man's income tax. The Regina Leader-Post referred to this matter editorially. The essence of their editorial seemed to be that a person who was receiving today an income up to the allowance exemption under the Income Tax Act certainly could not be considered as being a poor man. I sometimes think that it would be a good thing if certain persons who have incomes considerably in excess of the $2,000, which is the allowance for a married man without children, would try to get along for a while on an income near to or lower than the allowable exemptions under the Income Tax Act. It would be a very good experience for some people if they would get out and live with those people who are trying to get by on such incomes.

It is true that today $2,000 sounds like a good deal of money, or even the $2,400 which is the exemption for a married man with three children if he is in receipt of family allowances. I should like to point out something I have mentioned before, but I am bringing my figures up to date. I should like to give the committee the purchasing power today as compared with 1935-39, which is taken as 100, based on the present cost of living index. These comparisons are as follows:

Present income	Present purchasing power
$2,400	$1,318.68
2,000	1,098.90
1,500	824.17
1,200	661.38
1,000	549.45

No one, whether he happens to be an editor of the Regina Leader-Post or of any other newspaper, can conceivably argue that a person with a purchasing power within those brackets is not a poor man. Surely it cannot be argued with any effectiveness that such a person is not a poor man when it comes to meeting the present-day cost of living.

Let us consider the position of our pensioners, because it must be remembered that they cannot escape the effect of this sales tax increase since it applies to what clothing they must buy as well as to certain other commodities they need. Pensioners in Alberta receive a maximum pension of $50 per month. Two married people who are able to qualify for the maximum pension would receive a total of $1,200 per year. Taking the present cost of living index, that gives them an effective purchasing power of $661.38. But if they are receiving only the basic maximum pension of $40 per month, without the $10 per month bonus such as is paid in Alberta, those two persons would receive $960. Taking the present cost of living, that would represent an effective purchasing power of $526.21 as compared with 1935-39.

Mr. Sinclair: What did they get in 1935 in the way of old age pensions?

Mr. Shaw: I am going to deal with that in a moment.

Mr. Knowles: They got $20 and the $40 they now get is worth only $22.

Mr. Shaw: It is quite conceivable that a man living in Alberta who is eligible for the maximum of $50 per month would have a wife who was under 70 years of age. All that couple would receive would be $50 per month or $600 per year, which would represent an effective purchasing power of $307.69 as compared with 1935-39, or $25.64 per month. Remember I am referring to Alberta where the maximum pension is $50 per month. If that same couple happened to live in a province where the man received only the basic pension of $40 per month, it would mean they would have only $480 per year which would represent an effective purchasing power of $263.73, or $21.97 per month.

When I came into the house in 1940 the basic pension was $20. We often speak in glowing terms of what we have done for our pensioners, but when you consider that in a period of 11 years they are getting only $1.97 more per month on the basis of a pension of $40, instead of speaking about what we have done for them I think we should speak about what we have done to them.

Let us not forget that under our pension act as it stands today all recipients must be 70 years of age. A basic pension of $40 per month represents an effective purchasing power of $263.73 per year or $21.97 per month. As I said before, it may well be that a pensioner has a wife to support. Let us consider this 25 per cent increase in the sales tax as applied to those persons.

Let us not forget at the same time that there are thousands and thousands of persons in this country who are working but who are not receiving very much more than old age pensioners.

When the resolution was before the house we took strong exception to the fact that the government was putting us in the position where we either had to accept the eight propositions contained in the resolution or reject them all. I took the position at that time that I was prepared to reject them all, and that accounts in part for my vote yesterday in connection with the six months hoist. I do recall that the Minister of Finance at that time laid great stress upon the fact that we would have the opportunity to vote upon each section of the bill. I assume that that is exactly what we are going to do.

I propose asking you to put the question to the committee in connection with each section so that we may have the opportunity of recording in unmistakable fashion our attitude toward the proposed 25 per cent increase in the sales tax. Because of the fact that on at least two previous occasions I have expressed my views with respect to this matter, I do not intend to take any further time now repeating my former arguments.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is quite right. I think this is the time when it would be appropriate to have a vote on this particular section after the discussion is completed.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think there is anything one could add to all the arguments against this tax that have been made in the house lately. I know of no new argument. I am merely going to say once again that I think this is an oppressive tax which affects those who can least bear it as well as those who can. During the budget debate I made the suggestion that if we were going to have taxes of this description, both excise taxes, as I pointed out a few moments ago, on what I believe to be necessities under certain conditions, and sales taxes, certain utility goods at least should be exempted from both the excise and the sales tax. I still think that something of that sort should be done. That is the reason why I suggested a few minutes ago that the classification should be sheepskin under all circumstances.

With respect to clothing a case might be made out for taxing expensive and luxurious clothing, but the clothing worn by the ordinary working people and children of this country, utility wear, should certainly be exempt from these taxes. While arguments have been made by many members on this side of the house against these taxes, I would also have liked to see some members supporting the government, who in many respects feel the same as we do about this matter, rise and express their views. I do not think it is a healthy condition in this country to have a government in office with such a large majority, and yet its supporters generally do not rise and express the opinions that I believe their constituents expect them to express, and indeed the opinions that I have heard some of them express outside the house from time to time. I think it would be a good thing if hon. members on the government side of the house would rise in their places and support the opposition on some of these measures that I am certain are as obnoxious to them as they are to us. As I said, I think all the arguments have been made. I wish the minister would rise and say that, in view of the large surplus he obtained in April, he is prepared to withdraw this particular clause. I think we could then proceed with our business more expeditiously than we have been.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend has rightly pointed out, there can be endless argument as to the particular type and weight of taxes. I think the pros and cons of the sales tax have been pretty thoroughly and effectively discussed in the course of debate at the resolution stage and at this time. There is certainly nothing I can add to what I said in my budget speech and in the course of the discussion on the resolutions as to why I consider that this tax is both necessary and desirable at this time, and there is nothing that I propose to add. I think it is quite appropriate that there should be a vote on this section which is the one that increases the so-called general sales tax from 8 to 10 per cent. When hon. members have completed the discussion, which I hope is nearing an end now, I shall be quite happy to have such a vote taken. I think it has been made quite clear by all members of all opposition parties that they are opposed to the increase.

Mr. Coldwell: The unfortunate thing is that in a situation of this sort so many members are absent attending committees.

Mr. Abbott: I appreciate that.

Mr. Coldwell: The veterans affairs committee, with its very large membership, is sitting, and also the elections act committee. That means of course that a vote in the house at the present time would not reflect the opinion of the house.

Mr. Abbott: I think my hon. friend is quite right that a vote in committee at a time like this, when a great many members are absent attending other committees, does not really indicate the total voting strength of the house or the total views with respect to the particular section, but that is the method we have of doing it. One can always pass the section on division. To make it quite clear, so far as I have been able to sense the feeling, every member of all three opposition parties is opposed to this increase. Certainly all those who have spoken have indicated that they are opposed. If it is the desire to take a formal vote in committee now I shall be very happy to have that done, or if the committee feels the sense of all parties has been pretty clearly indicated we can call the section and it can certainly be carried on division, whichever the committee prefers.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. Knowles: What is the feeling on your side?

Mr. Hees: The government has made it quite clear that it is going to put through this increase in the sales tax because it believes it has to have the extra money that this device will raise. To me the sales tax, as has often been said on this side of the house, is a bad tax, and I think all of us are most sincere in the reasons we put forward. We feel it is a bad tax because it imposes an equal burden on the poor man and the wealthy man in exactly the same measure.

I feel that the income tax and the corporation tax are eminently fair methods of raising money. The Minister of Finance believes he has to have the money which the increase in the sales tax will provide. My suggestion is that, instead of raising it by a method which I think the majority of people in the country feel is unfair, and which members of the opposition have argued many times is unfair, the minister should be willing to raise the money by a method which I think all members of the house and most people throughout the country would agree is fair, by an increase in the income tax or in the corporation tax, or both.

I do not think we have had a satisfactory explanation from the minister as to why increasing those taxes and not imposing the 25 per cent increase in the sales tax would not be a preferable method. Would the minister give us a short explanation of why it would not be preferable to raise this money, which he seems to feel—and perhaps rightly—that the country needs to raise at this time, by increasing the other two taxes?

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry, but I really cannot add anything to what I said in my budget speech on this matter. So far as the corporation tax is concerned, we had a very interesting, and I think very illuminating, discussion thereon following the speech made in committee by the hon. member for Peace River. So far as the choice between the personal income tax and the sales tax is concerned, I indicated in my budget speech that I felt under existing conditions an increase in the personal income tax would be inflationary whereas a tax on spending, which does not affect incentives, would not be inflationary. I do not want to traverse all that ground again. If my hon. friend will do me the honour of reading carefully what I said in my budget speech on this subject, and if he will review what I said in the course of the debate on the resolution, I think he will see that I outlined as clearly as I was capable of doing why I felt that it was desirable to spread the load in this way. The Minister of Finance has the unfortunate responsibility—but it is his responsibility—of deciding what recommendations he will make as to how the total burden must be shared. I have indicated that. I sincerely believe that the way in which I have endeavoured to apportion the load this year is the fairest and best under the existing circumstances. If I did not think so, I would not have put it forward. I am under no illusion that imposing a sales tax or any tax is a popular thing to do, but I have the responsibility of trying to determine the best type of tax under existing circumstances, and that is what I have done. I have given the reasons for it to the best of my ability, and there is nothing I can add now to what I have said already.

Mr. Knowles: I find it difficult to follow the minister's line of reasoning when he suggests that an increase in the income tax would be inflationary but that an increase in the sales tax does not have that effect. As I see it this increase in the sales tax increases the cost of living. It increases it for the people in lower brackets where immediately there is felt the need for larger wages and salaries to meet that increased cost of living. It seems to me that anything that increases the cost of living runs the risk of helping along the spiral of inflation. On the other hand the income tax, particularly if it is applied on a graduated basis with the result that to some degree it is taken from those in the upper brackets, to a large extent cuts down luxury spending and does not have the direct effect in increasing the cost of living that the sales tax certainly has. I am unable to follow the minister in the reasoning that produced the sort of statement he made a moment ago.

I have one other thought to express, and I might as well do it while I am on my feet now. When we have urged as an alternative to the increased sales tax some other taxes such as an increase in the tax on spirituous liquors, for which the hon. member for Springfield voted when I moved an amendment some time ago, or when we have urged that there be increases in the corporation tax, the minister has taken the position that there are times when the point is reached beyond which taxes cannot be increased. His point is that the people concerned just cannot take any further increase in taxation. Well, if he is going to apply that argument to taxes on spirituous liquors and corporations, I would ask him if he does not think the point beyond which further taxation cannot be applied is already reached when the sales tax is at 8 per cent. From the fact that he is raising it to 10 per cent I take it he does not think so, but I believe it would mean something to the house and the country if we could have an assurance from the minister that it will not go any higher.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to reopen the debate on the point my hon. friend has raised as to why in the circumstances I think an increase in personal income tax would be more inflationary than a tax on spending. My experience has been that under existing conditions an increase in the income tax means that those paying the increase—and I am referring particularly to the larger groups of organized labour—are not prepared to accept less take-home pay. In other words they feel that they should get a wage increase which would offset any additional tax. I am not going into any elaborate economic argument here, but I make the assertion that unless the over-all production of this country is increased taxes must and should decrease the standard of living in order that a place may be made for the additional defence effort. I have reiterated that time and again. The committee stage is not the time for me to repeat it, but I will say that this is the view of every responsible, competent economist or student of these matters, though I do not offer that as a justification. The tax program I have produced here is the one I believe is best designed, as far as that phase of a fiscal program can do it, to damp down these inflationary forces. I do not claim to be omniscient, as I said before; I may be mistaken, but that does represent my best judgment.

I have answered my hon. friend as to why we think a tax on spending, such as the sales tax, is less inflationary than an increase in the personal income tax or a lowering of the exemptions; because I believe the imposition of such an additional tax would at once result in fairly widespread demands for wage and salary increases to offset it. Under existing conditions a very substantial portion of any such wage increases would be made without any corresponding increase in production, and that is inevitably inflationary. I do not think I have anything else to add; I believe my views are pretty well known. No doubt my hon. friend and others differ with them, but there is really nothing I can add to what I have already said a dozen times.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister not recognize that an increase in the cost of living makes workers feel that they need higher wages, and rightly so, just as readily as does a loss in take-home pay due to an increase in the income tax?

Mr. Hees: I think that is a very important point. The minister has put forward two reasons which I do not think hold water. One is that wage earners are going to demand more money if there is an increase in the income tax. They are going to demand higher wages in exactly the same proportion if the cost of the goods they have to buy is increased by increasing the sales tax. So I do not think that argument holds water. Then the minister said we must decrease the standard of living by increasing the sales tax.

Mr. Abbott: No, I did not. I said if we did not increase production to make up for that $1,700 million defence effort, we must reduce our standard of living. I have said that a dozen times, both in this house and elsewhere.

Mr. Hees: You do exactly the same thing if you increase the income tax, because in just the same way a man simply does not have the money to spend; it is taken from his income, so what is the difference? My argument and that of other opposition speakers has been that it is much fairer to impose an income tax because the people in the lower income brackets do not pay as much, while those in the higher income brackets pay more because they are better able to pay. Is that not a fair statement?

Mr. Abbott: That is a matter of opinion. Perhaps it is unfortunate for the country, but at the moment my hon. friend has not the responsibility of being Minister of Finance. I can only repeat what I said a few moments ago, that I have put forward a program which I honestly believe is the best I have been able to devise. My hon. friend may be right; I do not know. I do not think he is, but I do not suppose either of us will ever convince the other.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not think anyone will disagree with the statement that if we are going to increase our expenditures in all kinds of ways, both for social security and for defence, we shall have to increase our production. We all agree with that. Our quarrel is with the form of taxation the minister has adopted.

Mr. Abbott: We are quarrelling about methods.

Mr. Sinnott: I have been waiting for some time to get in a few words. While I have been as opposed to this tax as any man in this house, we all know that in a very short time the government will have to dig up an additional $350 million to provide for the old age pensioners and so on. I am not a member of the government, but I suppose if they did not have a few backbenchers like me around the government would not be here very long. I have had several telephone calls from various quarters suggesting methods of raising money rather than through the sales tax. As I intimated before, in order to give people an incentive to work we should give them some income tax relief if they produce more than they produced in the previous year. However, the minister and his parliamentary assistant have not seen fit to adopt these suggestions.

Mr. Gibson: That is a pretty good idea, too.

Mr. Sinnott: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a large income tax payer, and when he approves the suggestion I do not think the idea can be too bad. However, in the past this government has made mistakes and has always been big enough to come back to parliament and admit them. If the Minister of Finance finds that the increase in the sales tax is not the proper thing to do, then I hope next session he will cancel that increase.

Mr. Shaw: Just so the record will be kept straight, may I remind the hon. member for Springfield that before the new old age pension scheme comes into force he will probably realize that there is to be a new tax imposed for the purpose of financing such a scheme. This increase is not designed for the purpose of financing any new old age pension scheme.

Mr. Sinnott: That is only your idea.

Mr. Shaw: You wait and see. I was on the committee.

Mr. McLure: Are all duties on imported goods subject to the ten per cent sales tax? This is one of the greatest injustices of the tax, and there are many injustices. The other day I happened to be getting some goods out of customs for an importer. The duty on the goods brought in from Great Britain amounted to fifty cents per pound. Then on top of that, as the man at the wicket said, you have to pay Abbott's tax of ten per cent. I rather objected to it, and I said I did not think they meant to go into all the crevices for this ten per cent. He said that was the way they interpreted the act, and I would have to pay it. I said that we would have to pass it on to the next fellow who handled these goods. I found that all duties were subject to this ten per cent sales tax.

Mr. Abbott: The general rule is that sales tax is on the duty-paid value of the goods, but, of course, there are some exemptions. Therefore, it would not apply to all goods, although they may be subject to duty.

Mr. Knowles: We disagree, the minister and I, as to this rise from eight to ten per cent. But there is one question that I asked which the minister has not yet answered.

Will the minister not agree that at ten per cent he has reached the maximum to which this sales tax should ever go?

Mr. Abbott: I have always refused to answer hypothetical questions about a rise in taxes. I think it would be most improper for any Minister of Finance to express an opinion in advance that any tax had reached the limit. I do not know what charges this country may face; I do not know what burdens may be put upon us. Whatever burdens they are, they have to be paid for. So long as I have the responsibility, or future ministers of finance have the responsibility, that duty is to try to apportion the burden as fairly as possible. I shall venture no comment as to the maximum level of any tax.

On section 7—Hearing by tariff board.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, coming as it does after section 6 it is well that we should have in section 7 a provision that is bound in principle to receive the support of the house. I believe members will be glad to see the procedure provided in this proposed amendment in section 7 relating to the hearings before the tariff board. But I draw attention, Mr. Chairman, to the provision in the proposed new subsection 4 of section 115, which has the effect of limiting to six months the period within which applications for refund may be made. This smacks of the same kind of draftsmanship as we had the other day in a similar provision in the Customs Act dealing with an application for refund where a customs duty had been charged an importer at a higher rate than was proper. In that amending bill it was proposed that the period during which an application for a refund might be made should be reduced from three years to six months. As you will recall, there was a good deal of discussion and an amendment was introduced—in fact, two amendments before the house disposed of the bill.

Now, in this section 7 we have the same kind of proposal that no refund or deduction shall be made under section 105 as the result of any declaration of the tariff board under this section or an order or judgment under section 116 in respect of taxes paid more than six months before the date of the application to the tariff board for a declaration under this section. Mr. Chairman, while feeling that the section, apart from this provision, is improved by the amendment, I urge that the period of six months is unduly restrictive, and that the period within which an application for a refund may be made should be enlarged. I should like to see it enlarged to a year and a half, or certainly not less than twelve months.

Mr. Sinclair: In the present act, according to section 105 (5), a period of two years is provided in which to make application. This particular section only applies to appeals to the tariff board. The whole section, as the member has said, is one extending the rights of the individual. In the main act itself there is a continuing provision under section 105 (5) that there is a period of two years in which to claim other refunds.

The other point which the member raises is similar to the point raised on the Customs Act when it was before the house. An amendment was adopted giving the intention of the house that there should be a delay of six months before the provision became effective. The same provisions apply in this excise tax bill. I cannot move it under this section 7, but at the end of the bill I shall move an amendment similar to the one contained in the Customs Act, that this section shall not come into effect for six months. So that the member will have no illusions about this amendment, perhaps I should read it:

That subsection 4 of section 7 of this act shall be deemed to have come into force on December 1, 1951.

Mr. Fleming: This is not subsection 4 of section 7. It is subsection 4 of section 115 as amended by section 7 of the bill.

Mr. Sinclair: Of this bill; subsection 4 of section 7 of this bill.

Mr. Fleming: No. The subsection beginning at line 28 is not a subsection of section 7 of the bill. It is the proposed clause 4 of section 115, as amended by section 7 of this bill.

Mr. Sinclair: I agree; the reference to the main bill is the reference that the hon. member has just mentioned.

Mr. Fleming: Is the government not prepared to enlarge this period of six months? I think you will agree, Mr. Chairman, that six months is a very narrow and brief period of limitation. The decision of the tariff board may be given at a time when the individual concerned is incapacitated for some reason or other. He may be out of the country temporarily. I would urge that a period of six months is an unjustifiably short period of limitation to put upon an application for a refund, where in fact the tariff board has said that an excessively high rate of taxes has been applied or a tax has been applied to an article that is exempt. Under these conditions, it seems to me that the whole attitude of a government which has collected more taxes than it was entitled to, or has collected taxes where it was not entitled to them, should be one of anxiety to put things right. While the committee I am sure is commending the general purpose of the amendment, it will want to see this narrow limitation on the period given to that praiseworthy purpose removed or relaxed, so that the period may be a more ample one within which to bring application for a refund.

I would urge that this period of six months be lengthened to not less than twelve months. There is no administrative burden cast upon the Department of National Revenue, surely, by lengthening this period from six months to twelve months. In a case like this surely we all wish to see right and justice done to a taxpayer who has been required to pay more than he should have, or to make a payment that he should never have been called upon to make, simply because the taxing officer who has had to deal with him has misread the law.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I am asking for no great concession on the part of the government in enlarging this undoubtedly short period from six months to twelve months. The Minister of Finance is in the chamber. I urge upon him that the period of six months is altogether too short a period of limitation in a case of this kind. The taxpayer, in the situation I have described, should have no less than twelve months to bring application for a refund.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I address a word to the committee before the parliamentary assistant answers? Surely this is a reasonable request, and surely we need not be met with a blanket negation. After all, we got to the stony heart of the Minister of National Revenue the other day and we should not despair here. Surely what the hon. member for Eglinton has said is true. There is no earthly reason to be harsh in this matter. Six months is little enough, surely, unless there is some real administrative difficulty which, so far as I know, has not been disclosed yet. This is an eminently reasonable request and should be granted.

Mr. Sinclair: The Excise Tax Act and of course the Customs Act are quite closely related. Application for refunds would probably apply to both customs duties and excise tax paid on the same goods. The amending bill of the Customs Act which was passed here a little more than a week ago had this provision for six months. After all, it is not six months after the decision; it is six months before the time the application was made to the tariff board.

The hon. member for Eglinton suggests that perhaps the man who made the application and who paid the duty may be out of the country at the time. Surely the thing is of such importance to him that he is not out of the country neglecting his business completely. The period is much more than six months when you consider the application to the tariff board and the period after the ruling. Six months was approved in this house ten days ago in so far as the Customs Act is concerned. Applications very often are for both customs duties and excise taxes which are paid on the same article, and therefore there is an advantage in the period being exactly the same as in the bill which passed through the house ten days ago. It is the opinion of the department that six months is ample for anybody, six months not from the judgment but six months back before the time the application was made to the tariff board. That is an adequate time to file for refunds.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Inquiries.

Mr. Fleming: I am interested in the amendment of section 117, particularly the first subsection. It is to be observed that the limitations in the section as it now stands are eliminated in favour of a provision as broad as this: The minister may designate any person to conduct an inquiry or investigation in matters relating to the act, and any person so appointed has all the power and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act. I ask what has given rise to the proposed amendments, and, in the light of its experience in these matters, in what way the department has found the present section unsatisfactory.

Mr. Sinclair: The effect of this amendment is to limit the carrying out of investigations to persons authorized by the minister, thus removing classes of persons or officers who were formerly empowered to carry out this inquiry by virtue of their office as specified in the act.

The other thing was that no authority was given, similar to part II of the Inquiries Act and the practice on inquiries varied from province to province. It was possible in one province for a person in contempt of inquiry to be sent to prison, and it is to make sure that there is a uniform practice in all ten provinces that this clause, which is again exactly similar to the clause in the customs bill amending the Customs Act passed here ten days ago, was incorporated.

Mr. Fleming: The parliamentary assistant has not grasped the point that I was raising about this. The terms of the present section 116 are, in many respects, narrower than the provisions of the new proposed section 117, subsection 1. The persons who may be designated as a commissioner under the present legislation are limited to the deputy minister of the department, the assistant deputy minister, the legal officer or any other officer authorized by the minister from time to time. The effect of the substituted provision, the new section 117, subsection 1, is to enlarge that clause without limit. The minister may appoint any person. I am asking, what has given rise to the apparent feeling that the present class, as drawn from within the ranks of the department, is too narrow and that the minister should have power to appoint any person as a commissioner to carry out the functions which may be assigned to such a person under the act with the powers and authority of a commissioner appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act.

Mr. Sinclair: I think the hon. member has been reading old section 116, which specified the specific officers of the Department of National Revenue, but then there is this other phrase: "or any other officer".

Mr. Fleming: Officer.

Mr. Sinclair: A Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer, for example. Normally, such inquiries would not be conducted by the deputy minister. In the old days when the business of the department was comparatively small that might be so, but today these specific inquiries on various technical matters connected with the taxes on new products, for example, are going to be assigned to people who are qualified to conduct these investigations. The authority actually was there in section 116, but it is much easier to spell it out as it is now in section 117. Again this is exactly the same authority as was included in the customs bill of ten days ago. The two bills are pretty well parallel.

Mr. Fleming: The fact that it is in the customs bill is no reason why the point should not be raised here, or why we should be satisfied with anything less than a clear and ample explanation. The parliamentary assistant has indicated that there may be cases where, because of technical considerations, if I understood him correctly, there may not be an officer of the department with the technical knowledge which would qualify him to sit as commissioner in a particular inquiry or investigation. I suggest the committee will wish to be sure that this power of appointing persons without limitation is one which will be exercised with some degree of good sense. We do not wish provisions of this kind to be made occasions for the distribution of patronage favours hither and yon. I think hon. members would like to feel that, with the experience people in the department have in dealing with such matters, there are people in the department competent to act as commissioners in such situations.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to raise a question in connection with that. I was somewhat taken aback by what seemed to be the implications in what was said a moment ago by the parliamentary assistant. He spoke about people technically qualified, and by that I thought he implied that it would be natural, in these wide-open powers, let us say in connection with a technical matter, to appoint some entirely technical person.

I suggest that would be open to very serious question, because an inquiry is a matter which affects the rights of various people. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Eglinton that it may very well require a rather wide experience such as we are entitled to assume will have been had by senior members of the civil service. I suggest the parliamentary assistant might give us at least some indication of the kind of persons who are to be used for these purposes, because certainly I would deprecate the idea that someone who happened to have a considerable amount of technical knowledge on some subject should be designated for this duty, and also charged with the civil rights, let me say, of the person concerned.

Mr. Sinclair: In the past certainly no one but a legal officer of the Department of National Revenue or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been entrusted with such an inquiry. But I have also heard the charge made in the house—certainly in Ottawa—that the national revenue people are living in ivory towers, remote from business, and do not know the practical problems of the businesses they are taxing.

Mr. Fleming: That is the government.

Mr. Sinclair: No, it is not the government. The government certainly is in touch with the people every four years. The fact that we are in touch with them is amply shown.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is a serious discussion.

Mr. Sinclair: The suggestion is that these people in the national revenue organization are bureaucrats in ivory towers, remote from business.

Mr. Ferguson: You are not in touch with the people; you touch the people.

Mr. Sinclair: Touch their hearts.

An hon. Member: Their pocketbooks.

Mr. Sinclair: But in the House of Commons the charge with respect to bureaucracy and ivory towers has never been levelled against members of parliament. It has been levelled against people in departments, who are charged by some businessmen with being remote from business and with living in ivory towers, so that they are remote from practical business developments.

There is no doubt that under this section most of the inquiries again will be conducted by legal officers of the department. But this does give the minister authority, if need arises, to designate other persons who are qualified to conduct an inquiry. I would repeat that we have similar legislation in connection with the customs tariff.

On section 10—Schedule I repealed and re-enacted.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, in what way do you wish us to deal with section 10 and with schedule I, which is referred to in section 10? My reason for asking is that I do not want to let the section pass, only to find that I am denied the right to discuss schedule I. What I would like would be the opportunity to deal with some of the paragraphs in schedule I. Perhaps you could tell us the manner in which you would like the discussion to be conducted.

Mr. Fleming: The point raised by the hon. member is one which has been giving me some difficulty. If we dispose of section 10 before taking the schedule, our rights in respect of the schedule may be severely curtailed by reason of the fact that an acceptance of section 10 would have the effect of enacting the schedule.

Schedule I is four pages in length. I would ask that you call this schedule along with section 10, and call the schedule paragraph by paragraph. I believe this would contribute to an orderly discussion, because there are sixteen paragraphs in the schedule. The discussion would be confused if we did not take them in order.

Mr. Abbott: I believe it would be appropriate to discuss section 10 and schedule I at the same time. It is understood of course that, while the schedule is long, it simply substitutes "twenty-five" for "fifteen". That is the only change it makes. There are no new articles.

Mr. Fleming: Yes, there are three other amendments.

Mr. Abbott: It adds electrical appliances.

Mr. Knowles: That is the whole point.

Mr. Abbott: Beyond that, however, the effect of the schedule is to increase the amount from 15 to 25 per cent.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Fleming: And there is another amendment in paragraph 3 as well.

Mr. Abbott: That is a minor amendment, adding the words "or apartment" in the general definition of electrical appliances. However, that is not a substantial amendment.

Mr. Fleming: We had experiences on the resolution stage, which should make us seek to arrange orderly procedure and to take provisions or resolutions seriatim. I suggest there would be considerable confusion if the whole of schedule I were taken as one matter. I do urge that we would have a more logical, a clearer and, in the end, a briefer discussion if the paragraphs in schedule I were called seriatim.

Mr. Abbott: It is not as complicated as that. There are two issues involved, the first of which is the increase in rate from 15 to 25 per cent, and then the inclusion of the group of household appliances. It should not be difficult, when discussing the section, to refer to those two points. However, whatever the committee decides is the more orderly way of proceeding would be satisfactory.

Mr. Knowles: I think the minister is oversimplifying what schedule I does. He has said it does only two things, the first of which is to change 15 per cent to 25 per cent in some cases, and—

Mr. Abbott: And a reduction of candy to 15 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: The second one to which he referred was the 15 per cent on refrigerators, stoves and washing machines; and he now adds a third one. I would point out that the increase from 15 to 25 per cent refers to a number of different classes of goods. While it might be acceptable to increase from 15 to 25 per cent in some cases, it might not be in others. I do suggest that we should consider that we are on section 10 and schedule I conjointly, and that we should take up schedule I paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Abbott: I suggest that we can only vote on section 10 as a single section. That is consistent with the stand I took when we were in the resolution stage. I am quite ready to agree to have the discussion take any form that is most convenient to the committee, but if we are going to stick to the rules we should vote on section 10 as section 10.

Mr. Knowles: We are not in committee of the whole on the resolution, we are in committee on the bill. When we are in committee on the bill we have the right to take the clauses one by one, to take up the schedule by itself, and then consider the preamble and the title. When you get to the schedule you find that it is not just one long sentence strung together by commas and semicolons. This schedule is a series of separate paragraphs that are numbered separately and that end with periods. I submit that in discussing the schedule it is our right to discuss it section by section, although it is immaterial to me when we discuss it.

Mr. Abbott: Let us not get into another of these long procedural arguments that take so much time. Would it not be better to take the schedule first and discuss it and then come back to the section?

Mr. Knowles: That is all right if we take it section by section.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is saying that the committee has the right to take it section by section and I have not quarrelled with his statement.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps we should allow section 10 to stand and then take up the schedule.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Section stands.

On schedule I.

On paragraph 1.

Mr. Fleming: I assume that apart from revenue one purpose of the minister is to channel the productive capacity of the automotive industry into war production. Can he tell the committee whether there has been any result created in that direction since he announced this particular tax in his budget?

Mr. Abbott: I am not too familiar with that. I know that in March sales of new motor vehicle units were by all standards at an all-time high, being somewhere around 49,000 units. In April the sales were slightly lower at 46,300 units. I have not the figures for May. I would not put the purpose of the tax in exactly the same terms used by my hon. friend, but it is a tax on an article which does compete with war industry, not only for labour but for steel and so on. The combined revenue and other effects made it seem desirable that this additional tax should be imposed. As I say, I have not the May figures to indicate what the result of the additional tax has been.

Mr. Fleming: Am I wrong in thinking that one purpose of this increase in the tax of 25 per cent was to reduce the manufacture and sale of motor cars?

Mr. Abbott: It was hoped that it might have some such effect because the consumption and production were quite high.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph 2 agreed to.

On paragraph 3.

Mr. Fleming: Referring specifically to subparagraph (a) of this paragraph, can the minister tell the committee what is the content of the proposed amendment? It is now proposed that the definition of electrical appliances shall be broadened. Previously the definition adopted was in terms of those adapted to household use, but it is now to be household or apartment use. What are the particular electrical appliances which were not previously taxed under the general description of those adapted to household use which are now going to be taxed under the description of electrical appliances adapted to household or apartment use?

I am not going to embark upon a repetition of the whole discussion we have had on the subject of the application of the excise tax to these commodities. Those covered by paragraph (a) were previously subject to a 15 per cent tax, while those covered by paragraph (b) were hitherto not taxed. The general effect of the two paragraphs has been to single out the industry engaged in the manufacture of certain named electrical appliances for a special kind of tax. I think that is discriminatory.

I should like the minister to state why the electrical appliance industry has been singled out for this discriminatory tax. The proviso at the top of page seven indicates another discriminatory feature of the tax. It states that the tax shall apply only to that portion of the appliance designed for other than solid fuels. Certain appliances will be subject to the tax while other appliances, such as stoves using a different type of fuel, will not be subject to the tax. That is necessarily discriminatory. It brings us back to this question: If the minister does need revenue, why should a particular industry like this be singled out for a tax which is not general in application but which in its result is highly discriminatory?

Mr. Sinclair: As far as the first point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton is concerned, the addition of the words "or apartment" in paragraph (a) is made necessary because of the new paragraph (b). In paragraph (b) the words "appliances adapted to household or apartment use" are used. The easy phrase would be "domestic use". However, in many apartments the refrigerator system is made up of one compressor in the basement with a refrigerator unit in each apartment. Obviously such an appliance would not be covered by the word "household". It would not be covered by the words "domestic use." The expression was expanded to "household or apartment use" in paragraph (b), and for the sake of uniformity the same expression was used in paragraph (a).

Then as to why this special tax should be imposed. There are two reasons for this. The minister gave the first reason when delivering his budget speech, and I also emphasized that when I spoke. The primary purpose is to raise revenue, to make possible our defence preparations and to provide the domestic services of the federal government.

There was a second purpose, as the minister indicated. These taxes were intended to have a counter-inflationary effect where there was an element of competition with defence industry. The hon. member for Eglinton mentioned the automobile industry, but if there is one industry where there is a high element of competition with our defence industry, it is the electrical industry. This is true not only with regard to the use of materials such as iron and steel, but particularly so in the case of copper. I used a striking illustration of the Anaconda Copper Company and the amount of copper necessary to construct a tank or a bomber as compared to the amount used in an ordinary kitchen. In this particular instance we have real competition both in materials and in the type of labour necessary to produce the many electronic devices used in war.

Then with regard to the exemption of appliances designed to use solid fuels, may I say that these were exempted during the last war. Coal or wood stoves are used generally in farming and outlying areas. We followed the same taxation policy in the last war, although with higher rates of taxation. In connection with these combination stoves we determine the electrical content of the stove as distinguished from what you would call the ordinary coal or wood part. We are now carrying out exactly the same provision today as we did when a similar tax was applied during the war. This action was explained at some considerable length during the resolution stage.

Mr. Fleming: There is one special point. In raising it I do not wish to distract attention from the main feature here which is the question whether there should be a tax on these articles at all. In both 3(a) and 3(b) we have a provision which opens in general terms and then follows with a detailed enumeration preceded by the abbreviation "viz.". I notice that section 3(a) reads:

Electrical appliances adapted to household or apartment use, viz. . . .

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Then follows the enumeration, chafing dishes, coffee makers, and so on. In 3(b) we have a similar expression. It reads:

Appliances adapted to household or apartment use, viz., stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances . . .

I think there is a point of interpretation that ought to be cleared up at this stage. Does the Department of National Revenue propose to apply this schedule with this effect, that the enumeration is not necessarily exhaustive, but if they can find anything that falls within the definition of electrical appliances adapted to household or apartment use it becomes taxable even though it is not one of the particular articles singled out in the enumeration that follows? The same question arises in 3(b). If these articles are simply set out here for the purpose of illustration or example one would have expected the abbreviation "e.g.". I have not seen the French version of the bill. It may be that it will throw some light on the question. As I understand it, "viz." is an abbreviation of videlicet, and it has not the same meaning at all as "e.g." or exempli gratia. What is the interpretation that the department is going to place on this expression? In other words, are the governing words going to be the opening and general words or are they going to be the specific enumerations which follow the general words? I can well imagine that no matter how carefully the draftsman may have sought to set out a very detailed enumeration, he may not have covered everything in the way of electrical appliances concerning which an attempt may later be made to apply the tax.

I have now been handed the French version, and see that 3(a) reads as follows:

Appareils et matériel électriques adaptés à l'usage de maisons ou appartements, soit couvertures; chauffe-plat . . .

Similarly in 3(b) it reads, "soit cuisinières". After the general words we have the one word, "soit".

Mr. Sinclair: The intention is to carry on the practice of the department up until now, and that is indicated by the use of the word "soit" with these specific articles mentioned here. If they are not mentioned they are not going to be covered, with one exception. If the hon. member will look at 3(b) there is one fairly general class, "stoves, hot plates, grills and other appliances when adapted wholly or in part for cooking". If some new method of cooking were devised then it could be included under this one omnibus section, but otherwise the items specified are the items on which the tax will be collected, and items not specified will not be taxed.

Mr. Fleming: Is that a solemn assurance from the parliamentary assistant on behalf of the government that this section will not be applied to any electrical appliance adapted to household or apartment use unless that particular article is specified in the detailed enumeration that follows "viz."?

Mr. Sinclair: That has been the practice of the department, and that will continue to be the practice with the one exception of this blanket clause in 3(b) as far as cooking appliances are concerned.

Mr. Fleming: To what other cooking appliances could that particular clause apply other than stoves, hot plates, or grills when adapted wholly or in part for cooking and when designed for using other than solid fuels? What appliances could that refer to?

Mr. Sinclair: As an example of development, you will remember that four or five years ago they brought out these little electric portable roasters which actually they advertised as complete outfits for small apartments. That type of thing is an example of development that may take place. We may well have a similar development so far as cooking stoves are concerned, and it is to cover that. Aside from that, the practice of the department has been that the article must be specified. If it is specified here it is taxed. If it is not specified here, then there is no 25 per cent or 15 per cent excise tax.

Mr. Coldwell: What is the significance of the words "adapted to household or apartment use"? Does that mean that restaurants, hotels and so on will be exempt from this tax?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, the article is part of the cost of production.

Mr. Coldwell: You consider that to be like tools of the industry.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: They would be exempt from taxation.

Mr. Abbott: Correct.

Mr. Knight: The hon. member for Eglinton attacked the tax from the point of view of the manufacturers of electrical appliances. I should like to go to the other end and say a word for the consumer. I am opposed to this tax to the degree that it militates against the introduction of labour-saving devices in the home. I want to say a word particularly about washing machines under 3(b). It refers to "washing machines operated by electric or other power". So far as the words "other power" are concerned, I am thinking about manpower, human power. Unfortunately it is not manpower. It is womanpower in a great many homes, and that is what I am thinking about. I am thinking of the wife in the farm home, or in the city or town home for that matter. It appears to me that this is a drive against the installation of modern labour-saving devices.

In the province of Saskatchewan, with a widely scattered population, we have had considerable success in the matter of electrification. It has been slow but we have made a start. Many women are looking forward to the day when they can have electric lights, and when they will not have to push that handle back and forth for an hour or two every time they wash.

Mr. Gibson: Use that $65 million for that.

Mr. Knight: I think the government should be encouraging rather than discouraging the installation of such devices. I think taxation on such articles will be a bitter disappointment to the people about whom I am most concerned. I can see no single justification for this particular tax unless it is on the ground of the amount of steel that will be saved for the country in what is considered by many to be an emergency. I do not think the amount of steel that will be saved on that one item is going to be very great in relationship to the vast quantity of steel that may be needed. I can see no justification for this tax. As long as a woman will push that handle all day long in the heat of a little kitchen in order to wash her clothes, it is quite all right, but let her go get her husband to hook up her washing machine to a little gasoline engine, or let her use the electrification to which they have been looking forward for years, and the government comes along and says: All right, if you want to instal that particular type of machine you will have to pay for it as if it were a luxury. I think the washing machine item should be deleted from this particular clause.

Mr. Thatcher: Yesterday or the day before the Canadian Manufacturers Association met in Montreal, and the president made a statement that I thought was at least significant. He stated that so far as these appliances were concerned the slack in consumer demand was not being taken up by armament orders from the government. Mr. Holding, who is the president, made this statement:

> Yet except for a few selected industries such as the manufacture of airplanes and railroad equipment, I have seen little evidence that rearmament production will take up the slack in the employment of labour, plant and equipment which will be released by the curtailment in production of consumer goods.

So I am beginning to wonder. Obviously we do not have this tax for revenue; at least that is not its main purpose, in view of the surplus we had in the first month. It cannot be designed to conserve steel and other materials, because we are not using for defence production the steel and other materials we are saving by reducing the manufacture of consumer appliances. In the light of those facts exactly where do we stand? Is it still necessary? I would like the parliamentary assistant or the minister to tell me whether in recent weeks any manufacturers have made representations to the department that they are going to have unemployment in their industries if this provision is continued.

Mr. Sinclair: Getting back once again to the primary purpose, that purpose was to raise revenue. In his budget speech the minister drew attention to the amazing rate of spending which had developed in recent years in connection with these articles. The example which sticks in my mind is refrigerators. The 1950 sales were double those of 1949 and three times those of 1948. I put the figures for automobiles on record previously, and the minister has said that the March sales of new cars amounted to 49,000 units. Everyone forecast that there would be a collapse in sales after the budget. Very early in April the hon. member for Peterborough West predicted a total collapse in automobile sales once these tax changes went through. In spite of the anticipatory buying in March by people who normally would have waited until April or May, the sales in April amounted to 46,300 new cars, so that is not much evidence of a collapse. Exactly the same thing is true as far as these items are concerned. The hon. member asks if these increased taxes, and I suppose he would also include the credit restrictions, have resulted in unemployment. He also asks whether the steel, copper and other materials which have been made available by the reduced sales—though as far as the government can see the sales have not been reduced very much—have been turned to war purposes. Well, war purposes or no, there is no surplus of either steel or copper in this country today.

To reply to the hon. member for Saskatoon, on the budget resolutions, the hon. member for Peace River asked whether this other power meant manpower, and I said it did not. The case brought forward was that of a farmer in Saskatchewan who has been operating a hand washing machine. He has his farm electrified and wants to buy a little motor and hitch it up to the old washing machine. Well, the Department of National Revenue will not go to his farm and say, "Now you have an electric machine." But if he goes to the store and buys a new electric washing machine, of course he comes under this tax.

Mr. Knight: Anyone in his right senses knows that you cannot hitch electricity to an old hand type washing machine. If there is some genius on the farm you might be able to get gasoline power on that washer, but everyone knows that electrification involves the purchase of a new electrical machine. I think the parliamentary assistant is over-simplifying the case.

Mr. Sinclair: I certainly am not over-simplifying that case. I have a very large rural riding, too, to which electrification is coming, and I am always amazed at the ingenuity shown by the farmers and fishermen in adapting things from the old manual processes to electrification. However, that is a minor thing.

Mr. Knight: They could live in sod houses, too.

Mr. Fraser: The parliamentary assistant mentioned that I had spoken about cars and said they would be a drug on the market. I believe he will bear me out when I say that most manufacturers of cars in Canada have those cars out in fields by the hundred, unable to get rid of them, and every car dealer across the country has used cars he cannot sell.

Mr. Abbott: Both manufacturers and dealers have been doing very well for the last four or five years. There was perhaps some anticipation of possible tax increases before the budget was brought down, and there might have been some inclination to stimulate manufacturers to load up the dealers. I would not know too much about that, but I do not think the situation is very serious as yet as far as either the manufacturers or the dealers are concerned.

Mr. Knowles: A few moments ago the parliamentary assistant indicated to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that a distinction is made between those appliances which are used domestically and the same appliances used in restaurants, hotels and so on. I should like to know whether for the distinction to be made it has to be a different type of stove or washing machine, or whether it is the case that a stove purchased for the home is subject to tax whereas the same stove purchased for a restaurant is not.

Mr. Sinclair: The normal practice for a restaurant certainly would not be to buy the ordinary type of stove adapted to household or apartment use. They would buy a stove of a different size, much bigger, and adapted to restaurant or other commercial use. The same would apply to a refrigerator. If the stove is of a type adapted to household use, the ordinary small household electric stove, and it is bought for use in a restaurant the tax would apply, because it would be a stove adapted to household or apartment use. The stoves and refrigerators used by ordinary restaurants and hotels are very different in character from those used in homes.

Mr. Coldwell: In a good many modern apartment blocks they have Bendix washers which are operated by putting a quarter in the slot, or something of that sort. Would they come under this, since they would be adapted to apartment use? On the other hand within perhaps a block or two of the apartment you may have one of these washeterias, with the same type of machine also operated by putting a quarter in the slot. The apartment house owner put in the machines largely as a service to the occupants of the block, while of course the other people are running a business. Would there be a distinction between those identical machines, both operated by money in the slot but one placed in the basement of an apartment and the other in a building next door called a washeteria?

Mr. Sinclair: The tax is levied when the manufacturer sells to the wholesaler. He does not know where the washing machine is going, whether it is going into one of these small washeterias on the main street or into an apartment. In the apartment, of course, it is obviously adapted to apartment use, the same as the refrigerator. In the case of the small washeteria it is a washing machine adapted to household use, and it pays the sales and excise taxes when the manufacturer sells it to the wholesaler. On the other hand some people make much larger washing machines which are not adapted to household use but which are used by commercial laundries, and of course they are exempt from the excise tax.

Mr. Knowles: Then the test is not who finally purchases the article but the way it is constructed, or what it is adapted for?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, what it is commonly used for.

Mr. Knowles: Does the parliamentary assistant not fear that in this tax he is discriminating against those people who like to eat at home?

Mr. Fraser: If a person had something go wrong with his refrigerator and had to buy a new freezing unit, would the 25 per cent tax apply?

Mr. Sinclair: If the hon. member will look at paragraph 3 (b), at the end he will see:

—and complete parts thereof including coils, condensing or compressor units, motors, cabinets, boxes, evaporators and expansion valves.

They are all subject to the tax.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Paragraph agreed to on division.

Paragraphs 4 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph 8.

Mr. Fleming: This is the paragraph under which the excise tax is increased from 15 per cent to 25 per cent on trunks, suitcases, baggage and luggage of all kinds. Mr. Chairman, it is surely a great mistake to base any tax on the assumption that luggage of all kinds is necessarily a luxury. Even if additional revenue is required I believe we must have some regard, especially in times like this, to avoid increasing the cost of things that are necessities of life. In certain cases luggage is undoubtedly a necessity. Now, I would have been quite prepared to accept without question the necessity for a tax on some of the articles enumerated in paragraph 8, if some serious attempt had been made to distinguish between those that are of utility quality and those that are of luxury quality. There is no attempt of that kind made here at all. I wish to record my feeling that there is a grave injustice being done here to a particular industry, the leather goods industry, when there is not the slightest attempt made to distinguish between those forms of goods which are luxuries and those which are necessities.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to support what the member for Eglinton has said. I have always felt that in the case of the tax on leather goods, there is no rhyme or reason whatever. In a good many of the other cases I think I can see some reason, but here it seems to me there is a clear case for making a distinction. Presumably it would have to be made on the basis of cost or something of that kind, but no attempt has ever been made to do it.

Mr. Jones: I agree with the two previous speakers, but I think there is a distinction made here. There is a distinction made in the case of articles specially manufactured for a customer, and in that case it would be the better class of goods. If you are a wealthy individual and can afford to have something specially made, you are exempt from taxation. But if it is a necessity and you have to go to an ordinary store to purchase it, you are subject to the tax. I believe the section is wrong.

Mr. Sinclair: The distinction is so reasonable. If a doctor wants to buy a little black bag for his instruments or a travelling salesman wants a bag specially made to hold his goods, then he comes within this section and the goods are exempt from taxation. The tax is progressive so far as income is concerned, too. For instance, take the old age pensioner who travels to see his daugther. He buys a small cardboard suitcase, for say three dollars, and the excise tax he pays in that cost is less than 75 cents. On the other hand a rich man who goes down to Florida from Toronto to escape Toronto's winter probably has pigskin cases costing $500, so he has to pay a heavy tax under the twenty-five per cent rate. This is a good example. The higher the income group in which you are, the fancier your luggage and the higher tax you pay because of the twenty-five per cent rate.

Mr. Jones: The words "manufactured expressly for" should be removed, because a young man starting in business cannot afford to have luggage specially manufactured. He has to purchase it on the open market. If the exception were for suitcases and briefcases used for business purposes, then I could see the point. When the words "manufactured expressly for" are used, that excludes the man who has to buy the cheaper type of travelling case and briefcase. The man who could well afford to pay the tax in this case is exempted.

Mr. Drew: This item should not pass with the explanation that has been given. It will pass, there is no doubt about that. But this explanation is just as specious as the explanation that was given for the tax on electrical equipment. On the one hand, we are told it is for revenue, and on the other hand we are told it is to cut production. No real facts have been given to demonstrate that either is the case. In this particular case the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance has given one of those wholly specious illustrations about the rich man carrying the big leather case. As a matter of fact, he will probably find that those who are doing the kind of travelling he is talking about have adopted other kinds of cases.

In this particular instance the provision is not fair. Those who are in a position to get any of these things specially made are exempted, and those who are not must go in and buy the ordinary manufactured article on which the tax is imposed. This is certainly going to pass, according to the attitude that is being adopted; there is no doubt about it. We see the same attitude right down the line: Who is going to stop us? But let us not pass this item with the idea that we are accepting the kind of explanation that has been given.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to support the previous speakers. Upon looking over the list it seems to me that purses, wallets, billfolds, key and card cases, dressing and toilet cases, shopping bags, golf and other sport bags, expressly manufactured for a customer, are the height of luxury and should be subject to tax.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph 9 agreed to.

On paragraph 10.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, when the minister seizes upon things like fountain pens to increase a tax that was already discriminatory and high, and to advance that tax from fifteen to twenty-five per cent, I think it is a further example of failing to take account of reality. Fountain pens are capable of being divided into those categories that may be regarded as luxuries and those that are strictly and unquestionably necessities. As for the latter type, surely no one is going to say that they are not a necessity of life. Why should they be singled out for a discriminatory tax? They were singled out previously for a fifteen per cent tax, so why should they be singled out again for another increase to twenty-five per cent when there has not been the slightest attempt to work out any statutory distinction between those that are a luxury on the one hand, and those that are strictly utility and necessary models.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs 11 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph 14.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, upon looking at the clock you will admit that it is six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps with unanimous consent we might complete the bill. There are only three more paragraphs and the other schedule.

Mr. Knowles: There are three other sections, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: But one is schedule II, and the other withdraws a former schedule.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps we might take a few minutes after nine o'clock to consider these sections, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MOTION FOR SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bills Nos. 324 to 332.

Mr. Knowles: One at a time, please.

Mr. Speaker: I will call the bills one at a time.

MAVIS ELIZABETH THOMAS WRATHALL

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 324, for the relief of Mavis Elizabeth Thomas Wrathall.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is just a word or two I want to say on Bill No. 324. The last time these bills were up I asked that this one stand because the evidence had not yet been received. That evidence has now come to our desks, and I have read the evidence in this case. I have not heard that anyone else in the House of Commons has read it, and I draw attention to that. I take it that silence gives consent to the statement I have just made. Here we are, a court of 262 judges to pass upon this case, and it appears that only one of us has read the evidence.

I find that in this case there is one boy of four years of age. I find also that the husband has not been supporting either the wife or boy for some considerable time. That is authenticated by a question and answer on page nine of the evidence which reads as follows:

By Hon. Mr. Golding:
Q. Has he given you anything by way of support?
A. No, not one cent.

Then, another question:

By Hon. Mr. Kinley:
Q. Who supports you now?
A. I do; I am living with my parents, my mother and father, and naturally there is no room and board. I don't need that. I do all sorts of things to raise money. I consider myself a professional baby sitter, for one thing; last year I earned about $300 doing that. And I sell subscriptions to magazines, and I do all kinds of things to earn money.

I quote that bit from the evidence to indicate the position that this woman is left in, having to support herself and her four-year-old boy.

As for granting the divorce itself, the evidence does seem to point to adultery on the part of the husband. This is a case of course where the evidence was obtained by two professional investigators, but it does seem to me to be authentic evidence. As one of the members of this House of Commons called upon to consider this case I feel that we have no option but to grant it, but I feel very very sorry there is nothing that we can do to require this man to assist in the support of his wife and his four-year-old son.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

IDA COURLAND RUBIN FLESCH

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 325, for the relief of Ida Courland Rubin Flesch.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I point out in connection with this case that at least hon. members can have the satisfaction of knowing that no children are involved. The wife, who is the petitioner for this divorce, when questioned as to what led to the situation that in due course brought on the divorce, seemed to have put it down to heavy drinking on the part of the husband.

This is another case where the evidence was obtained and presented to the Senate committee by two professional investigators. As a matter of fact, they were the same two investigators who presented the evidence in the previous case, and there is considerable similarity in the evidence. It does seem to be valid evidence, and yet as one who has now read quite a number of these cases at this session I cannot help but draw attention to the similarity of the evidence case by case.

This is another one where I feel that as a group of 262 judges we have no option but to grant the divorce, but it is an unhappy duty that devolves upon us.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

YVONNE WINIFRED KATHLEEN WALKER ANDREWS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 326, for the relief of Yvonne Winifred Kathleen Walker Andrews.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has been my hope that, since this job of dealing with this case and others devolves upon parliament, and parliament has not yet found it possible to agree to get cases like this out of parliament to a proper court, we in this house should each do his job. I would hope that others besides some of us over in this corner who have been studying these cases might feel it part of their duty to take this evidence and look into these cases and ascertain whether or not some of them should be granted.

Here again there is a child. I find that the woman, who is the petitioner in this case, is in financially difficult circumstances. Indeed, that is the reason for the delay on her part in applying for the divorce. She and her husband have been living apart for a number of years. She first applied to the Senate for divorce back in 1947. It appears that at that time she did not have enough money to pay the necessary fees to proceed with her divorce in the other place, and so the case was laid over.

She and her child stay with her mother. She is making only about $20 a week. I am glad to note that in view of her financial circumstances the Senate reduced by $100 the amount of the fees which they charged her on this occasion. The Senate was also good enough to grant the divorce, at least in so far as the Senate is concerned, in this year of 1951 on the basis of an investigation that took place back in 1946. That is a bit unusual in the other place, but they recognized the poverty of the woman as the reason she had delayed going ahead with her case. Yet, despite the financial difficulties that she faces, despite the fact that she has now to support both herself and her child, here is another case where there is no support for her or her child from the husband and father. The Senate ascertained that information, but of course they were not in a position to do anything about it. Again, I note that the investigation made back in 1946 was by two professional investigators. They are not the same two who acted in the other cases we have considered thus far tonight, but their names do turn up in cases further down on the list.

I regret having to admit that this marriage seems to have been dissolved because of the action of the husband, and we have no option but to agree to the divorce. However, so far as we are concerned I am sorry there is no way in which the husband and father could be made to provide financial support for his wife and child.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

ELIZABETH COCHRANE AITCHISON LALONDE

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 327, for the relief of Elizabeth Cochrane Aitchison Lalonde.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I hope hon. members will note that I have been taking these cases as they come, one by one. I would ask them to note, too, how often I have to comment that there is a child or that there are children for whom no provision has been made by way of support by the father. I forget how many times I have said that in the cases we have dealt with thus far tonight; but it applies again in this case.

This woman has a little girl three years of age. During the hearing in the other place they obtained from the woman the information that there is no support for her or for the child from her husband. At pages 10 and 11 of the evidence I find this:

By the Deputy Chairman:
Q. Did you get support for the child?
A. No.
By Mr. Greenblatt:
Q. He did not give her any money, then?
A. No.

I would point out that this is a case where no detectives or private investigators were called in. It is refreshing to find that, when so many of these cases are handled by private investigators, and there is such a similarity in them. One feels there is a little more authenticity when that is not the case.

In connection with this divorce the woman, the petitioner, obtained the necessary evidence herself on an occasion when she went to the place her husband was staying, in an effort to get some money from him to help her pay the expenses of their child's illness. I cannot help taking a moment to point out to the house what we are called upon to do. We are called upon in this case to decide whether this marriage should be legally dissolved, and we have no power to do anything with respect to this other phase of the matter.

Here is a man who not only provides nothing by way of support for his wife and child when they are well, but who refuses to provide any help when the child is ill. It seems to me this whole business is completely unsatisfactory, and that we should not be dealing with cases of this kind at all. If we are going to deal with them, then I urge we do so with a proper sense of responsibility, that we do it thoroughly, as is done in connection with other bills coming before the house.

It is passing strange that tonight we have thus far called four separate bills dissolving four separate marriages, but thus far it seems that no one else in the house has taken the trouble to read the evidence so as to make up his mind as to whether or not these divorce cases should be accepted. I say in respect of this case that the evidence seems to be conclusive. It was obtained, not by a detective but by the petitioner herself. She got it, not because she was seeking such evidence but because she called on her husband in an attempt to get money to help out during the time of illness of their child.

On the basis of the evidence I feel we have no option but to give this woman freedom from this man. However, it is too bad nothing can be done about the failure of the man to support his wife or their child.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

VIOLET TAYLOR CAREY

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 328, for the relief of Violet Taylor Carey.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Again.

Mr. Knowles: I hear a few comments being made. Perhaps the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) would like to speak to this case.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, as there is other business to come before the house, if I might have unanimous consent I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan):

That the name of Mr. Knowles be substituted for that of Mr. Croll on the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

My reason for offering the motion, Mr. Speaker, is that in these circumstances the committee would then have the benefit of the learning and the undoubted time the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spent on these bills. I feel that it would be much better to have that work done in the standing committee rather than in the House of Commons. I have made my motion, but I realize I must have consent.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, this is not the time to make a motion of that kind. There is a time for such motions when routine business is called. Then, I wonder if the hon. member who offers the motion has ascertained from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) whether he is willing to substitute?

Mr. Robinson: I can assure the hon. member that I have the consent of the other member to retire from the committee, so that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre can take his place.

Mr. MacInnis: The hon. member who has made the motion may think he is very clever, but he is not clever at all. He is dealing with a serious matter; and if he does not know how to deal with a serious matter he had better not try to be either frivolous or facetious about it.

Mr. Robinson: On a question of privilege, I assure the hon. member that I was neither frivolous nor facetious. But I do feel very strongly, as I think most hon. members feel, that we have been spending a great deal of the time of the entire house on matters that might be dealt with more expeditiously elsewhere.

As I said on a previous occasion, there are other matters to come before the house in these short hours between eight and nine o'clock on Tuesdays and Fridays. These matters should have the attention of the house, and I feel sure hon. members would want to give more time to them. I assure you, sir, that my motion was made in no spirit of levity, but merely to expedite the proceedings of the house.

Mr. Ferguson: We have listened to this bickering back and forth. The hon. member for Simcoe East has made a rather good suggestion; but it seems to me that, as a member of the party supporting the government, if he would spend as much time advising the government to stop this repetition and nonsense that goes on here, year in and year out, regarding the heart strings, sorrows and griefs of people in the Dominion of Canada, then we would have a cessation of this nonsense. If the hon. member for Simcoe East would spend some time in trying to get the government to solve this problem and avoid this nonsense that is brought here every year dealing with the sorrows of the people of Canada, he would do a lot to prevent these matters being handled in this manner.

Mr. Speaker: The motion which has been moved by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson) can, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has suggested, be put only with the unanimous consent of the house. As there is not unanimous consent, I cannot put the motion.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I believe we are on Bill No. 328?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, Bill 328.

Mr. Knowles: Although neither the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Robinson) nor I know the two people involved in this case, if they have the right to come to parliament to ask for the passing of this bill then they have the right to expect that their bill will be considered an important piece of legislation. To suggest that we are wasting time on bills because we take two or three or four minutes on one bill is I submit altogether lacking in perspective as to the importance of our duty in connection with private bills.

I have only a word or two to say with respect to this case. There is one adopted child in this family whose care the mother is undertaking. There seems to have been, according to the evidence, about three years of misconduct on the part of the husband and there seems no alternative but to approve the bill. But I question whether we are doing our job as responsibly as we should when so many members are not taking the time to give consideration to cases such as this.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

JULIA SAYKALY HAJALY

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 329, for the relief of Julia Saykaly Hajaly.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was waiting to see if anyone else had read this evidence and cared to speak about this case. I suggest that if hon. members are tired of hearing me speak—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: I notice there is pretty general support of that proposition. If they are tired of hearing me speak to these divorce cases they can avoid that by studying these cases themselves and bringing their observations to the attention of the house. I submit that that is the way for us to deal with matters of this kind, so long as parliament insists on handling divorce cases, which I hope will not be much longer.

The two people involved in Bill No. 329 have one son five years of age. I want to say that it is to the credit of the Senate committee that in almost every instance, as far as I have read these cases, where there are children involved the Senate committee makes inquiry as to what is happening to them even though they may not be able to do anything about it. I have searched this evidence and to my amazement they do not seem to have asked any questions at all as to how this woman is financially situated or as to whether or not she is able to care for this child.

There is one other comment I want to make on the evidence given in this case. On other occasions when we have been discussing these matters some of my colleagues have been criticized, the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) in particular, for intimating that some of this business is done professionally. On one occasion the hon. member for Saskatoon objected that the name of the co-respondent was not given.

[Mr. Knowles.]

What he had in mind was that apparently the co-respondent is the same person in different cases. I am not going to read this evidence but I shall paraphrase it. I gave the undertaking some time ago that I would not put on the pages of Hansard any of the sordid parts of the testimony.

When the investigator in this case was asked whether he had actually seen the woman co-respondent his answer was that he had seen her several times.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member is performing a great service because he is opening up something that is quite important, that is that we have been passing these bills very casually. However, I do not like to see him spending time on matters which perhaps are not within the jurisdiction of this parliament. For instance, it has always been considered that property and civil rights are within the jurisdiction of the provinces and actions for alimony or maintenance and for the custody of children are therefore distinctly within the powers of a province and governed by provincial law.

Similarly, I think it should be pointed out to the hon. member that this parliament has the right to grant a divorce to any person for any cause whatsoever or for no cause. It has been the custom of this parliament to grant divorces only for acts of infidelity, but that does not mean that parliament cannot grant a divorce for any conceivable reason or for no reason whatsoever. When we talk about whether there are children concerned in an action I suggest, and I suggest it very seriously, that that has nothing to do with the matter. That would have nothing to do with this particular divorce bill. If the Senate committee on divorce decides to go into the question of whether there are children or not, that has nothing to do with the bill that comes forward. I suggest that any evidence as to whether there are children concerned is distinctly out of order.

I suggest also that any criticism or implied criticism as to the casualness with which the Senate committee have dealt with this matter is distinctly out of order because the Senate can grant a divorce on any conceivable grounds, just as this honourable house can.

Mr. Knowles: Speaking to the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter), I wish to say that I agree thoroughly with some of the views he has expressed. I think he is stating the position correctly when he points out that, whatever may be the divorce laws of a province, parliament has it within its power to grant a divorce on any ground whatsoever, but the hon. member is also correct when he says that in 999 cases out of 1,000 the divorces granted by parliament are on the ground of infidelity.

The hon. member is also correct when he says that we have no authority over property and civil rights and therefore have no power to obligate people, at least in so far as divorce is concerned, to take steps with respect to children.

The point I wish to make now is the same point that I have made on other occasions and with which, I think, Your Honour has agreed. Since we are being called upon in this House of Commons to decide whether Mr. and Mrs. A. shall be divorced, surely we have the right to get information which I feel, or which the hon. member for Parkdale or anyone else feels, is pertinent to the question and which should be known before any one of us makes up his mind whether to grant a divorce. It is on that basis that I have stuck to the matters referring to the individual cases that come before us.

There was a time when on second reading of divorce bills some hon. members debated the broad principle of divorce but Your Honour has ruled that when we are on these divorce bills we must stick to the particular case before us. I accept your ruling. We are now dealing with the question of whether or not Bill No. 329 should pass. I think before Bill No. 329 passes we have the right to consider anything relating to Bill No. 329 which any one of us feels is pertinent to the question as to whether or not this divorce should be granted.

As I was pointing out when the hon. member for Parkdale intervened, one fact that appears to be evident in this case is that the detective admitted that he had seen the face of the co-respondent on several different occasions. I shall say no more about this case. That carries with it an implication that I think is very clear, and it raises a question as to whether we should not look into the whole business of the way that we grant these divorces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

DORIS AUCLAIR GINGRAS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 330, for the relief of Doris Auclair Gingras.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) raised a point of order, and the point of order is without doubt well taken. It is generally agreed that this house has no control over the question of property and civil rights, and therefore has no power to make any decree as to whether or not children should be supported. I doubt, however, if I can go so far as to prevent an hon. member from referring in the evidence to the fact that there are or are not children. On second reading of a bill I think an hon. member can refer to the circumstances surrounding the case. I do not think an hon. member should argue that because there are or are not children the divorce should or should not be granted, but I could not disallow a reference to the fact as to whether there are children.

May I also point out that in accepting the principle of a private bill the house does not, as in a public bill, accept the principle unconditionally. The principle of a private bill is accepted subject to the facts being proved before the committee to which the bill is referred. In that way there is a distinct difference between the approval of the principle of a private bill and the approval of the principle of a public bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points with respect to Bill No. 330 that I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members. I am prepared to agree to this divorce although I am unhappy about it. I imagine, however, there are some hon. members who, if they had read the evidence in this case, would say that we should not grant this divorce. I point out that the husband and wife involved in Bill No. 330 lived together until as recently as February of this year. I point out also that the two children of the family, boys of fourteen and eight years of age, are in a boarding school, and that the father is supporting them. Therefore there is no problem so far as support of the children is concerned in this case, although it is a case where a home is being broken up, and I for one cannot help but take note of that. Even though adultery may be proved, I cannot help but take note of the fact that not only are we consenting to the breaking up of the married life of two people but we are depriving these two boys of the chance for a normal home. There is one other matter about this case that I should like hon. members to know. At page 12 of the evidence, when one of the detectives is appearing before the Senate committee, he gives his evidence as to how he got into a certain room in order to pick up the necessary evidence. He said that the man in the case got a bit excited and the detective tried to calm him down by using these words:

> Don't get excited, or I will bring your wife, who is downstairs, up.

Then the detective goes on to say: "We were only bluffing; she was not downstairs".

That is not the first time I have run across that kind of evidence in these cases. Not being a lawyer and not knowing precisely how these things are done, it makes me wonder what is the standard for the credibility of a witness when he admits on the witness stand that in order to get his evidence he said things that were not true.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GEORGES PAQUIN

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 331, for the relief of Georges Paquin.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a minute on this case although it is one which I wish the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll), or some other member, had taken the time to read and study. It is a contested case and the man is the petitioner. They have seven children. Counsel for the wife, the respondent, at page 31 of the evidence was asked the following question:

Hon. Mr. Horner: Do you think there is any hope of bringing this couple back together, to live as man and wife in peace?

The answer of counsel was: "I think so." As I say, it is a contested case. I think perhaps I will say no more except to express the hope that when this case is before the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills particular attention will be given to it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MARION AGNES KELSCH CLEGHORN

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 332, for the relief of Marion Agnes Kelsch Cleghorn.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask that Bill No. 332 stand. I do so for two reasons. The first is that I happen to know it is being contested. The second is that the evidence in this case has not yet reached us. Therefore I would ask that it stand.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: If the evidence has not been distributed I do not see how we can proceed with the bill. Bill No. 332 will stand.

BAPTIST UNION OF WESTERN CANADA

Mr. F. E. Lennard (for Mr. Diefenbaker) moved the second reading of Bill No. 336, to incorporate the Baptist Union of Western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 336, an act to incorporate the Baptist Union of Western Canada, is in the same form as other bills of a similar nature that have been presented to this house in the past. So far as the terms are concerned, they are the same as for all incorporations of church organizations, and all of them have been in previous incorporations. The United Church was incorporated, the Pentecostal Evangelical organization was incorporated, and many others are in the same position. The petition was filed because the Baptist Union of Western Canada at present operates under four separate charters in the western provinces. These are referred to in section 1 of the bill, three of them being by special act and one being under a limited licence.

It has been felt for some time by the officials of the union that it would be easier to carry on their business if it could be done under one act applicable to the provinces where the work of the union is being carried on. In addition, the union has now extended its work into the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. It is felt that, by having one incorporation and having the head office in Edmonton, they can carry on their work to far better advantage. I recommend the bill to the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SECOND READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 337, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Saskatchewan.—Mr. Knight.

MARIE LAURE JACQUELINE PATENAUDE RACINE

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 339, for the relief of Marie Laure Jacqueline Patenaude Racine.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was hesitating again for a moment, hoping someone else had decided to read these cases.

An hon. Member: Not a chance.

Mr. Knowles: I hear an hon. member say "not a chance" and a while ago hon. members opposite wanted us to go ahead with a case in which we had not even received the evidence. I submit we are not doing a job when we do it that way. In this case there are two children, aged 15 and 14. They are in the care of the mother, who is the petitioner. There seems to be no option but to agree to the divorce, but it does seem most unfortunate to have to break up a home, particularly with children of that age.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MURIEL EDNA GLASS FRYER

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 340, for the relief of Muriel Edna Glass Fryer.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am able to point out to the house, Mr. Speaker, that this couple had no children. I can also say this is another case in which no detectives were employed; the evidence was obtained by the petitioner and her brother.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

EMMA LARONDE BELL

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 341, for the relief of Emma Laronde Bell, sometimes known as Emma DeLaronde Bell.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This case seems most unfortunate. This couple were married 28 years ago. Their son is now 25 years of age, so we do not have to concern ourselves about children here. However, though they were married 28 years ago, the husband has been living apart from his wife, and indeed living with another woman, for the past 17 years. Again I point out that no detectives were engaged in this case, that the evidence as to the man living with this other woman was supplied by a man and wife who lived near them, more particularly at a summer resort. It is an unhappy situation, but apparently the adultery was established and since it is our practice to grant divorces on that basis there seems nothing to do but to agree to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

BIRUTE ELENA VAITKUNAITE AKSTINAS

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 342, for the relief of Birute Elena Vaitkunaite Akstinas.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I just point out, Mr. Speaker, that we are back again to the same detectives who appeared in two or three of the other cases we have dealt with tonight, and who provided the evidence in this case. I also point out that there is one child.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GEORGE KEITH HENDERSON

Mr. David A. Croll (for Mr. Winkler) moved the second reading of Bill No. 343, for the relief of George Keith Henderson.

Border Pipeline Corporation

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I ask that this motion stand for one of the reasons I gave in the case of Bill No. 332. The evidence in connection with this bill has not yet come to our desks.

Mr. Speaker: Stands.

BORDER PIPELINE CORPORATION

The house resumed from Friday, May 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Robinson, for the second reading of Bill No. 118, to incorporate Border Pipeline Corporation, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): When this bill was under consideration previously I moved the adjournment of the debate. At that time I spoke in favour of the amendment, and I am going to repeat my reason for doing so. We in British Columbia, and by that I mean practically 95 per cent of the people of that province, have taken the stand that these pipe lines should pass through Canada. This particular company has not seen fit to incorporate in the bill a clause to that effect, and through the amendment we are seeking to have that provision inserted. I am sure if the sponsor of the bill would agree to incorporate a clause under which this pipe line would serve Canadian cities first, any objection on my part would be withdrawn immediately.

I pointed out also that we are now faced with a greater need than ever before to consider the conservation of our natural resources. Already in the United States, through lack of any sound conservation policy, they find themselves running out of many raw materials for which they are now looking to Canada. Unless we have a policy, and unless we check what is taking place, we also will find ourselves in the unhappy position the United States is in, having to come to Canada for pulpwood and other raw materials. So I advocate that as part of that conservation policy the government should step in right now and support the conservation of our gas and oil in Alberta. I feel that this would pay dividends, for the amount paid for our raw materials, whether they be ore, timber, oil or gas, by our neighbour to the south is very small compared to the value of those materials if processed in Canada. In addition, this cheap power we are going to provide the United States will assist our greatest competitor to become even more competitive, which naturally will react unfavourably upon our own industry. I strongly feel that we should process our own raw materials instead of exporting them at nominal prices. Already we have a top-heavy balance of trade in favour of the United States, and that balance will be further intensified if we do not follow a policy of conservation.

I am not opposed to the United States obtaining some of our surplus gas, but I am opposed to that country having the first chance to use that gas. If we should run short, or if the expected amount should not be available, then Vancouver and other Canadian points would get none at all. There is no suggestion by those sponsoring this bill that they intend to serve any other Canadian point but Vancouver. As far as British Columbia is concerned Vancouver is just one point. We have a vast interior thirsting for this power and just as anxious to have it as Vancouver. I mention Vancouver because under this charter it is the only point in Canada this company intends to serve. I have already indicated the vast resources of the hinterland, the type of people living there, the climate we enjoy, and the new era that will dawn if we are given this power to develop our resources. I do not intend to stand idly by and watch this particular resource be sabotaged from under our feet. At least we can register our protest.

The main argument advanced by these companies for going through the United States is the lack of markets on the Canadian route. On checking a map of the route proposed in this case I find that in going through the United States it would serve only Spokane before reaching the Pacific coast. Calgary could be served by a short line at any time, and I believe a short pipe line serving Calgary would be a very profitable undertaking.

Mr. Robinson: I must admit that I am not very familiar with the geography of British Columbia, but am I not correct in saying that this pipe line will pass through the Kootenay district, one of the greatest industrial areas of the province?

Mr. Jones: You should know; you are sponsoring the bill. My answer would be no.

Mr. Robinson: Is not the Kootenay district a great industrial area?

Mr. Jones: No, Kingsgate. I am referring to the Okanagan valley, the Fraser valley and Kamloops, all those towns in the interior. This line will not go through the Trail area. It will go close to it, and probably will be piped in; I do not know. It is intended to go through Kingsgate, which takes it directly to Spokane.

The rail transportation costs for oil, for instance, from central Alberta to Calgary, a matter of 200 miles, is 65 to 68 cents per barrel. The Interprovincial Pipe Line carrying oil 1,150 miles to the great lakes carries it for 56 cents per barrel. I claim, therefore, that the loss of the Spokane consumers to the pipe-line company would be recovered by the gross of the British Columbia interior towns, particularly the valleys I mentioned and the communities that occupy those valleys. Furthermore, the towns of Nelson and Trail, and this big consumer to whom I referred, the Consolidated Smelters, could be served if the pipe line followed the route through southern British Columbia instead of going through the United States.

It seems to me we are entirely overlooking the potential value of the pipe line as a developing influence in our country's economy. We have stressed the importance of the money to be made by the sale of gas and oil, and not the wealth that can be made by utilizing that gas and oil in our own country to increase our own production. The government has been asking for more production, but will not channel the power to sources that could provide this extra production. I believe that the pipe line should be built, owned and operated by the government, but unfortunately that point has been settled. I believe it should be run as the Canadian National is run, and by the same company. It could have been added as another form of transportation to the already operating transportation system. Whether it is a railway, the T.C.A. or a pipe line should make no difference.

Since a pipe line is the only feasible means of transporting gas or oil to the Pacific coast, and possibly only one pipe line will be built, it follows that the company building the line will have a complete monopoly. This means that they will control not only the line but also the price to be paid by the consumer for the product. In the United States, where a similar condition existed, they have passed a law to remedy this condition. I should like to quote from the work of Mr. Sharfman, the interstate commerce commission, 1931, part II, at page 59:

"The acquisition of a practical pipe-line monopoly by the Standard Oil Company, together with the unfair methods pursued by that corporation in order to maintain its monopolistic position, led to the inclusion of pipe lines among the carriers subject to the commission's jurisdiction. Although the commission was clothed with authority, in general terms, over any additional transportation agency, the extension of jurisdiction was largely aimed against the abuses of monopolistic power in the petroleum industry rather than against the free operation of pipe lines as such. By 1906 the commission possessed adequate power to remove the flagrant railroad discriminations of which the Standard Oil Company had been one of the most notorious beneficiaries; the added control over pipe lines was designed to eliminate another potent source of abuse which sprang from that company's dominant ownership of essential transportation facilities."

By the Natural Gas Act, 1938, it is provided that all rates and charges made, demanded or received by any natural gas company for the transportation or sale of natural gas, must be just and reasonable, and any rate which is not just and reasonable is declared to be unlawful (section 4 (a)). Discrimination is expressly prohibited, it being provided that no natural gas company may "make or grant any undue preference or advantage to any person or subject any person to any undue prejudice or disadvantage." Unreasonable differences in rates, charges, services, facilities, and in other respects between localities or classes of services are prohibited (section 4 (b)). The act provides for the fixing of rates by the federal power commission according to fair and equitable principles (section 5 (a)). It may act upon its own motion, or upon application of any interested persons, including state commissions which may be of opinion that rates or conditions in particular instances are discriminatory or unfair. By this machinery, gas pipe lines falling within the term "interstate commerce" are controllable.

At present there is no corresponding act in operation in Canada. I would urge that the government, for the protection of consumers, study this act with a view to incorporating it in our own laws. Naturally, I am concerned over the fact one company is going to obtain a charter to build the pipe line, although there are many applicants at present. I would suggest that the government should give consideration now to passing laws to protect the consuming public against any tendency on the part of such a company to exercise the monopoly it would have to the detriment of the people of my province. Naturally, the price would be based on the principle of what the market would bear. I consider this company, like the others who have applied for a charter, has evinced a desire for quick profit, and has put that above the interests of the Canadian people. I make no apology, therefore, when I place the interests of my own riding and my own province before the welfare of any particular company. I not only do so, but I would ask the members on the other side who are shouting, the members from the other provinces, to see the point the members from British Columbia are trying to place before you, that we are trying to build our own province now before it is too late. In a year's time it will be too late. We shall see the state of Washington going ahead and will realize what could have happened in British Columbia.

When I speak on this bill I want you to understand that I have nothing against the company, nothing against the directors, and nothing against the sponsor of the bill. I merely object to a bill being passed by a vast majority of people who do not know the conditions, and which would react to the detriment of the people I am representing.

On motion of Mr. Jones the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

EXCISE TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On paragraph 14.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I asked that we defer discussion of this paragraph 14. My question really relates to the wording of the paragraph. I should like to know whether the word "except" in line two governs all the rest of the paragraph? It reads:

Clocks and watches adapted to household or personal use, except railway men's watches, and those specially designed for the use of the blind, and alarm clocks where the sale price by the Canadian manufacturer or the duty-paid value of those imported does not exceed ten dollars.

Now, are alarm clocks, which after all are no luxury, subject to the 25 per cent tax or are they excepted from it?

Mr. Sinclair: No; if their selling price is less than $10. If it is more than $10 it is subject. The ordinary cheap alarm clock is not subject to this excise tax. "Except" applies to all exceptions. It reads:

Except railway men's watches, and those specially designed for the use of the blind, and alarm clocks where the sale price by the Canadian manufacturer or the duty paid value of those imported does not exceed $10.

Mr. Knowles: That is the clear intention?

Mr. Sinclair: It is not only the intention, it is the practice. The only change here is changing from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. We are not making any change in the body of the description.

Mr. Gibson: Are railwaymen's watches subject to sales tax?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Fleming: This raises precisely the same question we had in respect to earlier paragraphs in the schedule, and the issue arises here all the more clearly because of the exception that is made of alarm clocks costing less than $10 on the theory, presumably, that they are not luxuries, and that they are necessities so long as they do not run over $10. What about the cheaper forms of watches? Surely to goodness the same reasoning should apply to them. If there are grounds for excepting alarm clocks which are priced not over $10, then certainly by the same kind of reasoning there ought to be an exception made of clocks and watches which are not expensive. I am waiting, Mr. Chairman, to hear some explanation of this discriminatory tax provision. We have had numerous examples already today, but it seems to me this one is presented by the language of paragraph 14 (a) in very acute form.

Mr. Sinclair: This exemption goes back actually to war taxation when we put on a 25 per cent retail tax on exactly the same items, and the cry was raised in the house and across the country: You are actually impeding defence in that you tax the cheap alarm clock that has got the workers up at three in the morning or at seven in the morning or at eleven at night, on the graveyard shift, and the women workers too. Quite a plea was made in this house, and quite a plea was made outside that cheap alarm clocks which were so essential to rouse the defence workers were an essential part of our defence industry. Because of that an exception was made, which again brings home to me the difficulty of making any exceptions in these tax rules, because the moment you make an exception, then the opposition beats you over the head and says everything else is discriminatory because you have made this exception. This exception dates back to the day when we had a 25 per cent retail tax, and actually dates back to war itself.

The body of the paragraph has been carried along with first of all the 25 per cent retail tax which then dropped down to the 10 per cent excise tax and now lifted to 25 per cent excise tax.

Mr. Fleming:. As far as I am concerned, the parliamentary assistant does not need to defend the exemption in favour of alarm clocks not over $10 in value. But what we have not heard from the parliamentary assistant is a defence of a tax on clocks and watches of the less expensive variety. What justification can there be for imposing a tax like this on all clocks and watches of lower value, and bringing that tax up from 15 per cent to 25 per cent, to make matters worse?

Mr. Ferguson: The people of the country will be very glad to know that by beating the government on the head the opposition has put some reason in it. On one point at least they are being reasonable on the tax situation after being constantly beaten on the head by the opposition.

Mr. Hodgson: I think the minister should reconsider the imposition of a tax on cheap watches because today many labouring men cannot afford an expensive watch. In addition to that, these cheap watches will stand more rough usage and wear than the expensive watch.

Mr. Fraser: In the part of the paragraph which reads, "or the duty paid value of those imported does not exceed $10", does that duty paid value include the import cost of the watch plus the duty?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Fraser: It would be plus the duty.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: That is only where it would be paid by the Canadian manufacturer?

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The hon. member for Queens points out that what is going to happen is that everybody will be forced to carry an alarm clock. I really feel that the parliamentary assistant must give us some other reason than what was done during the war. After all, are we going to say that everything that was done during the war has to be continued for all eternity? Surely some reasonableness can enter even into questions of taxation. We have not had any yet on this particular item.

Mr. Sinclair: The obvious way to make it reasonable would be to put these alarm clocks back under the same item. Then everybody would be covered.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Sinclair: As I recall it, the hon. member for Peterborough West raised this very question. The moment we give an exception such as this, then everybody else comes screaming that this is unfair to the other groups, which of course shows one reason why perhaps the department should be very reluctant to give these special concessions. But once again the change here is not a change in the body of the description that is here. The only change in this section is to change the tax from 10 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. Ferguson: If this government had done things during the war that it should have done it would not be necessary to do them now. Here it is six years after the war and they are doing things that they should have done during the war.

Mr. Fraser: When we were talking about alarm clocks some few years ago, I pointed out to the government that it was to their advantage, to the government's advantage, to make alarm clocks free of this excise tax because the workingman had to have an alarm clock to wake him up in the morning so that he could earn his wage to pay income tax to the government to make the wheels go round. It was a concession, but it was to the government's advantage to exempt alarm clocks.

Mr. Ferguson: It takes alarm clocks to wake this government up.

Mr. Fraser: It would take a cannon to do that.

Mr. Fleming: I think there is more than passing significance in the last remark made by the parliamentary assistant. He says that "the moment we give an exemption then somebody else wants another exemption", which he concludes is the reason for not giving exemptions. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that these exemptions are not given by the government. Such exemptions as exist in the law of this land are such as are written by parliament. Surely parliament in studying what shall be taxed and what shall be exempt is entitled to proceed reasonably. When a proposal of this kind is made, surely the House of Commons is entitled to have some explanation as to why this particular commodity, namely, clocks and watches—and we are speaking of those of lower value—should be taxed.

All that we have had so far by way of any attempt at justifying the tax of 25 per cent on clocks and watches of lower values, so far as the parliamentary assistant is concerned, is just this, that an exemption was made in favour of alarm clocks during the war, and the general rule should be that all clocks and watches should be taxed. I say, Mr. Chairman, that all clocks and watches should not be taxed.

If the Minister of Finance will make out a case for the need of increased revenue, anything that can be classed as a luxury will, in the view of practically every member in this House of Commons, be a proper subject for the application of an excise tax. But, Mr. Chairman, that is no excuse whatever either for continuing the 15 per cent tax or increasing to 25 per cent an excise tax on clocks and watches when we are having regard to those of an inexpensive nature which are used by people who cannot afford more expensive watches. What the minister in effect is doing at this time, without even attempting to take the trouble to justify it before the house, is to soak those who must purchase these inexpensive watches with a 25 per cent tax. We know that it is a tax at the source, and by the time the article reaches the consumer the tax will be something like 50 per cent that he will be paying.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Mr. Fleming: No; surely we are entitled to a reply.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members in favour of the paragraph will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It does not carry, Mr. Chairman. I am still interested in it, because I say we are entitled to something more by way of explanation. I can understand that railwaymen's watches are excepted because, after all, the watch is a necessary part of a railwayman's equipment, just as alarm clocks are a necessary part of one's equipment to get up in the morning—although I am not so confident about the last item.

There must be other people in large numbers to whom a cheap watch is as important for their own personal use, as is the watch of the railwayman. I think we are left here without a proper explanation, except that it was done in wartime. Well, I could make a list of things which were done in wartime, which I am sure the minister and his assistant would back away from now.

Mr. Abbott: The explanation has been given a great many times, but I suppose there is no harm in my repeating it. In this schedule of the Excise Tax Act which we are now considering are grouped a number of items which are not necessarily luxuries, but which are less essential. The people who purchase those articles are taxed. In the past they have been taxed at 15 per cent, and they will now be taxed at 25 per cent.

As I have said time and again, the problem is to spread this burden among the people of Canada as fairly and equitably as we can, because they are the people who must pay it. One may differ as to whether this accomplishes our purpose. But this particular group of articles has been in the Excise Tax Act for a number of years. This year, as I explained in my budget speech, we decided to increase the rate from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. I can give no other explanation; it has been given time and again.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the paragraph carry?

Mr. Fleming: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Those in favour?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Deputy Chairman: Those opposed?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Deputy Chairman: In my opinion the yeas have it, and I declare the paragraph carried.

Mr. Fleming: On division.

Paragraph agreed to on division.

Paragraph 15 agreed to.

On paragraph 16.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say again on this item that while I am sure hon. members are glad to see this reduction from 30 per cent to 15 per cent, the reduction does not go far enough. The minister gave reasons in his budget speech for reducing from 30 to 15 per cent this tax on candy, chocolate, chewing gum and confectionery. He was obliged to point out at that time that by singling out this particular industry for a 30 per cent tax, which was imposed last September, great harm had been done the industry. The tax had been discriminatory. The reasons which have led the minister to propose a reduction from 30 per cent to 15 per cent in the tax, both in logic and in common sense must carry him inevitably to the conclusion that that tax ought to be done away with altogether.

The experiences in that industry have been dwelt upon in the house. I gave figures in an earlier debate as to the cost of production it was facing, even at the time the minister chose it for that heavy and discriminatory tax last September. The result has been a very serious loss of business in that industry in the interval.

I hope no hon. member will leap to the conclusion that by reducing this tax from 30 per cent to 15 per cent the minister will put the industry in a satisfactory condition, or restore the condition it was in before the 30 per cent tax was imposed last September. The fact of the matter is that production costs have continued to rise in that interval and, with respect to almost all the ingredients of the articles set out in paragraph 16 of schedule I, the cost of production has been rising, and represents a serious problem to those engaged in the industry, whether employer or employee. Production has fallen, and employment has fallen drastically in the industry.

I again urge, as I did at the resolution stage, that, having seen the error he committed in September last when he imposed the tax, the minister should go the full way to repair so far as he can the damage he did at that time to the industry, and eliminate this discriminatory tax entirely.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall paragraph 16 carry?

Mr. Fleming: On division.

Paragraph agreed to on division.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Schedule I agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Schedule II repealed and re-enacted.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we consider schedule II along with section 11?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Schedule II agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Schedule III amended.

Mr. Sinclair: I have a minor amendment to offer to section 12, which varies exemptions so far as the sales tax is concerned.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That schedule III be amended by adding thereto under the heading "Miscellaneous" the following:

"Articles and materials purchased or imported by a government of a country designated by the governor in council under Customs Tariff item 708, or purchased or imported by a Canadian government agency on behalf of such a government, for the construction, maintenance or operation of military or defence establishments in Canada and not intended for resale, gift or other disposition except as may be authorized by the Minister of National Revenue."

Mr. Sinclair: It will be recalled that in the Customs Tariff bill there was provision for British commonwealth and designated countries under the North Atlantic treaty to import goods for their own military uses free from customs tariff, provided of course that the same concession was extended to Canadian goods going to those countries. This is a parallel exemption, in so far as the sales tax is concerned. To use an example, if an American base in Newfoundland were building, we will say, a radar station, then either the material they bring in themselves for that construction or the material brought by a Canadian agency for them would be exempt from sales tax, as it is now exempt from customs tariff.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The controlling words in the amendment are these:

That schedule III be amended by adding thereto under the heading "Miscellaneous" the following—

And section 12 reads:

Schedule III to the said act, as enacted by section 14 of chapter 50 of the statutes of 1947-48—

And so on. We have the first schedule and the second schedule in the copy of the bill I have, but there is no third schedule.

Mr. Abbott: We did not reprint the third schedule. It was not necessary, because the amendments are very simple.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): As I see it, without having before us the reprint of schedule III it is not complete. Will the parliamentary assistant read schedule III as it will be with the amendment, because I have not the third schedule before me.

Mr. Sinclair: It is a very long schedule giving a list of goods exempt from the sales tax. All goods which are not mentioned in schedule III are subject to the sales tax. We have various sections in schedule III. Military equipment comes within this "miscellaneous" category, for instance.

Mr. Knowles: Is not the draft amendment to be looked at more closely? I appreciate what has been done, namely that schedule III has not been reprinted in the bill. But section 12 merely indicates the amendment it was intended originally to make to schedule III. However, the amendment now moved does not say where these words are to be inserted in section 12, which is now before us. It seems to me it has not been hooked up properly.

Mr. Sinclair: It is shown on page 40 of the Excise Tax Act under the heading "Miscellaneous".

Mr. Abbott: It says that in the amendment.

Mr. Sinclair: I have the act here.

Mr. Abbott: I think it will be made clear if the chairman reads the amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Should not there be added to clause 12 which is now before us something to this effect, "and also by adding thereto under the heading of 'miscellaneous' "? The draft as presented to us does not seem clear.

Mr. Abbott: The effect of the amendment will be to include it under the heading "miscellaneous". Perhaps that word should be added.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not want to be too persistent, but I still feel that there is a gap in the wording. Section 10 reads:

> Schedule I to the said act, as enacted by section 4 of chapter 8 of the statutes 1950-51, is repealed and the first schedule to this act is substituted therefor.

When we turn to the first schedule we find there set out intelligently a list of articles. Then section 12 reads:

> Schedule III to the said act, as enacted by section fourteen of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1947-48, is amended by adding thereto, immediately under the heading "Religious, charitable, health, etc.," the following words:
> "Adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH); Cortisone;"

Mr. Sinclair: In the act we have the heading, "Religious, charitable, health, etc.," and then on the next page we have another heading, "Miscellaneous". The exemptions fall into groups and this new group comes under miscellaneous.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I should read the section as it will read if the amendment is carried, which will be as follows:

> Schedule III to the said act, as enacted by section fourteen of chapter fifty of the statutes of 1947-48, is amended by adding thereto, immediately under the heading "Religious, charitable, health, etc.," the following words:
> "Adrenocorticotrophin (ACTH); Cortisone;"
> and by adding under the heading "Miscellaneous" the following:
> "Articles and materials purchased or imported by a government of a country designated by the governor in council under Customs Tariff item 708, etc.—

Mr. Knowles: If the words "and by adding under the heading 'miscellaneous' the following" appear in the section as amended, then I think the job is done.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the amendment moved by the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Let us consider that that is the amendment moved by the Minister of Public Works. It is not on the copies that have been distributed, but I think it is merely a matter of arranging the words. The intention is as I have indicated.

Mr. Knowles: The way you have read it it is all right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief observation in connection with the addition of ACTH and cortisone to the list of drugs exempted from the sales tax under schedule III to the Excise Tax Act. At the present time only one comparable commodity has been exempted, namely, insulin. Radium is also exempted, and it is now proposed to exempt ACTH and cortisone.

Is the minister prepared to give the house some assurance that consideration will be given to extending the list of drugs so that exemptions may apply to other drugs used to relieve chronic sufferers from various diseases? I know the minister has had representations made to him. I and other hon. members made reference during the debate on the budget resolutions to prostigmine which is prescribed for those who have the misfortune to suffer from myasthenia gravis. There are other drugs to which reference could also be made.

The minister has taken a step which I think will commend itself to everyone, but I submit that he should give serious consideration to extending this list of exemptions to include other expensive drugs that are in common use by chronic sufferers from serious diseases.

Mr. Abbott: If my memory serves me rightly, I think I gave that assurance several times. I have no doubt that this list will be added to as circumstances justify.

Mr. Coldwell: I am glad to hear the minister say that again. He is quite right; he did say it the other evening. Radium could hardly be classified as a drug, but the minister is now proposing to add ACTH and cortisone to the drugs being exempted. But there are other drugs that are now well established as being useful to the medical profession in the treatment of chronic diseases. There are certain drugs that are found effective in giving some relief from multiple sclerosis and there are other drugs also effective in the treatment of other chronic diseases, such as the one mentioned by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Last night we heard a plea from the hon. member for Peace River on behalf of vitamin E. I do not profess to know anything about medicine or to be an authority on drugs, but I do hope that both the minister and the Department of National Health and Welfare will look carefully into this matter. Perhaps in another year they will be prepared to give consideration to this drug which many people believe to be most important.

I know of cases where the drug has been prescribed and has seemed to do a great deal of good. Since the hon. member for Peace River spoke yesterday I have looked through some correspondence I had earlier this year and I find that if the statements made by the physicians in London, the Drs. Shute, are anywhere near the facts it would seem that consideration should be given to adding this drug to the list. I have met these doctors myself and I formed a very high opinion of them. I believe that on the basis of the evidence produced the other night by the hon. member for Peace River this drug deserves more than passing consideration.

We know that at times the medical profession has been slow to use new discoveries and we know that at times a discussion of the kind that took place last night in this house has been most useful indeed. Similar discussions have been useful in debunking something that was spurious, and at other times have been useful in bringing certain things to public attention and obtaining recognition therefor.

From personal conversation which I have had with people who have been prescribed this drug it would appear that something like 1,500 doctors in this country who dispense their own medicine, who do not write prescriptions for drug stores, are buying vitamin E and supplying it occasionally. When a high percentage of the dispensing medical men use a drug it would seem to indicate its importance. But I rose primarily to say to the minister that I am glad that the list has been extended to this extent, and I am taking him at his word that in another year he hopes, as we hope, that other drugs will be added to the list to relieve suffering people of this country.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member for Peace River was unavoidably detained tonight. Otherwise he had intended to be here to ask that vitamin E be added to the list of tax exempt commodities. I should like to present that plea in his stead.

Mr. Abbott: I think I mentioned earlier that additional drugs would be given continuing consideration, but we felt this was as far as we could go this year.

Section 12 as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Coming into force.

Mr. Sinclair: Earlier this afternoon when we were discussing section 7 of the bill we indicated that we would move an amendment to section 7 to bring it in line with the amendment made in the house earlier to the Customs Act. Therefore the Minister of Public Works will move that the following words be added to section 13:

Provided that subsection 4 of section 115 as enacted by this act—

If you turn back to page 3 you will find it there.

—shall come into force on December 1, 1951.

That is six months hence.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I so move.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask again whether the wording should not be "section 115 as enacted by section 7 of this act"? I think the phrase "as enacted by section 7 of this act" should be included in that wording.

Mr. Sinclair: That is what we had this afternoon, and the hon. member for Eglinton pointed out that actually the section which we were enacting was a new section. We had section 2 before but now we have 3 and 4, which are new sections. They are being enacted in this act so that the matter of specifying section 7 of this bill would be redundant.

Mr. Fleming: That is not the point raised this afternoon. It would be quite proper to refer in the amendment to section 115, subsection 4, as being enacted by section 7 of this act. The point I raised this afternoon in taking objection to the form of the proposed amendment was that it referred to section 7, subsection 4, of this bill. There is no such thing as section 7, subsection 4, of this bill. Section 7 has no subsections to it at all.

Mr. Abbott: I think that is perfectly all right, Mr. Chairman. The amendment can read:

Provided that subsection 4 of section 115 as enacted by this act shall come into force on December 1, 1951.

Mr. Knowles: As enacted by section 7 of this act.

Mr. Abbott: "As enacted by section 7 of this act". I am sure the Clerk will have it in regular form by the time it appears in Votes and Proceedings.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations at this point. Of course it is obvious that the detailed discussion will be under the sections of the bill, but I should like to say a word or two about a point which arises many times in the bill. I refer to the practice, which seems to me to be growing, of retroactive legislation. I have had an examination made of the bill, and as it stands there are two cases where it is made retroactive to 1948, seven cases where it is made retroactive to 1949 and subsequent years, seven cases where it is made retroactive to 1950 and subsequent years, and twelve cases where it is made retroactive to the beginning of 1951. Let me say quickly that I am not laying great stress on the last twelve cases, and I also want to say that in a considerable number of other cases I think the retroactive feature is in the nature of a relieving provision.

Mr. Abbott: Every case, I think.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Naturally I take no objection to those, but there are some —and I will not attempt to say how many at the moment—which I think are objectionable. I want to say a word or two about the question of retroactive legislation and to quote briefly one authority on it. The authority to whom I wish to refer is Professor C. K. Allen, sometime professor of jurisprudence in the university of Oxford. He says:

No rule of construction is more firmly established than this: that a retrospective operation is not to be given to a statute so as to impair an existing right or obligation, otherwise than as regards matter of procedure, unless that effect cannot be avoided without doing violence to the language of the enactment. If the enactment is expressed in language which is fairly capable of either interpretation, it ought to be construed as prospective only.

Then he goes on, and this is my precise point:

What is true of the construction of statutes is also true of their making. There is in all civilized states the strongest prejudice against retrospective or ex post facto legislation, since it is, in the words of Willes J., "prima facie of questionable policy, and contrary to the general principle that legislation by which the conduct of mankind is to be regulated ought, when introduced for the first time, to deal with future acts, and ought not to change the character of past transactions carried on upon the faith of the then existing law."

I want to point out that I think the evil of this kind of legislation is not merely the great danger there is that it does injustice to existing situations but also that I think it promotes carelessness in the drafting of legislation. If the legislative draftsmen have the feeling that if they overlook anything, or deal in a superficial way with anything, it is all right because they will cure it next year, the year after, or three or four years after, I think that is a very undesirable situation.

There is one other point I wish to make, though I do this with some hesitation and certainly not with the intention of being critical of any of our excellent civil servants. In reading legislation I have often wondered whether we are not slipping into a terribly complicated way of expressing ourselves. I realize that legal draftsmanship is a very difficult thing, that it has to be specific and exact; but with deference I do raise the question whether we are not falling into rather a bad tradition under which things are not said in a direct way but constantly tend to be said in an indirect and rather confusing way so that sometimes one rather feels one has to turn himself inside out two or three times before getting to the real meaning of the statute. That may be very good for the lawyers, but it is not good for the ordinary people who have to try to understand the legislation as they go along.

Those were the observations I wished to make. I understand that when we reach section 1 of the bill in committee we shall be able to raise the question of deferred depreciation which was dealt with by the minister in his budget speech.

Income Tax Act

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I only wish two or three minutes of the time of the house to speak on this bill. Perhaps this may be a little personal, but I hope the house will pardon me for just a few minutes. I want to deal, partly at least, with this excess profits provision, which was discussed at the resolution stage and will be further discussed a little later. I explained my position in the house on the excess profits tax amendment which was proposed by my group at the resolution stage, and my position is still precisely the same. I feel that corporation taxes have virtually reached their peacetime peak; but I want to take issue with certain newspaper editorials commenting on this position, particularly in western Canada. I have several in my hand. The first appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of June 1, and is headed "Thatcher kicks over traces". It says:

> It happens, however, that one of the C.C.F. members at Ottawa—Mr. Ross Thatcher of Moose Jaw—is a successful businessman. How he has been able conscientiously to tag along with his visionary socialist running mates has been one of the mysteries of the times. But the expected rift appears to have come at last over this specific matter of C.C.F. corporation taxation policy.

The Winnipeg Free Press of May 22 had an editorial along the same lines headed "Mr. Thatcher's heresy" which said:

> . . . this disagreement is in reality on a fundamental issue, whether or not the fact is yet realized by Mr. Thatcher. He is not quarrelling about some detail in the C.C.F. program. What he is calling into question is a fundamental premise of the C.C.F. party. Mr. Thatcher's heresy is thus a fact of very considerable political significance.

Another editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 30 was headed "The C.C.F. split", and it says:

> Although Mr. Coldwell has attempted to soft-pedal his party's differences with Mr. Ross Thatcher, C.C.F. member for Moose Jaw, perusal of Hansard makes it clear that the rift is serious.

Those editorials, particularly in the Saskatchewan newspapers, go on at some length in a similar vein. I remember on March 15 in this house when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) moved an amendment asking that the payment under the five-year pool be 25 cents a bushel. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Helme) differed with his party, but I did not see any newspaper reports to the effect that he was splitting with the liberal group. As far as the newspapers in Saskatchewan are concerned, at least, when a Liberal member differs it is a show of independence, or it is a show of spirit, or it is a matter of conscience, or it is refusal to be a rubber stamp. But when a C.C.F. party member differs with his colleagues, perhaps once in fifty times, it is a party split or a rift or a disagreement on a fundamental issue; or it is heresy, or kicking over the traces.

I want to say that this party is just as democratic an organization as the Liberal party, indeed much more so. My own leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), rose just after I differed some weeks ago and made this statement:

> One of the greatest strengths of a democratic organization is of course that there can be differences of opinion expressed freely and openly.

My party colleagues do not object if I differ with them once in a while. They may think I am wrong, but they have not tried to suppress me at all. I have heard the hon. Liberal member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) differ with his party on margarine. I have heard the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) differ with his party on numerous occasions. I do not think my constituents expect me to come down here and vote in a way I do not think is correct. For instance, I do not think they would want me to do what the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) did this afternoon; that is, say he was against a tax and then vote for it. That does not make sense to me. As I say, since coming down here I have tried to vote according to the way I saw the issue.

I am very proud of the C.C.F. party. I am proud to be a member, and I intend to continue to be a member. I think they are doing an excellent job in Saskatchewan despite what is being said in the Liberal press. I like their hospitalization plan, their crown corporations, their financial achievements, their labour legislation, and just about everything else they have done. These Sifton papers are so biased that many people are beginning to take what they read in them with a grain of salt. According to the Sifton papers everything the Liberal party does is perfect, but there is something wrong with everything the C.C.F. party does. That does not make sense, and I say editorial comments of that kind are unwarranted, unfair and at times even malicious. As a matter of fact I consider myself a very good C.C.F. member; I think I am a good deal further to the left than many of my colleagues.

Then there is another point. I am getting a little tired of hearing my good friends in the Liberal party claim that in order to be a C.C.F. member you have to be either broke or crazy. As a matter of fact some members of the Labour party in England are among the wealthiest people in that country. I resent some of the innuendos that have been thrown around in this house and in some of the newspapers of western Canada. I apologize for having been personal, Mr. Speaker, and I will not take up more of the time of the house. For the benefit of the Leader-Post, however, I want to repeat that I have no thought of resigning from the C.C.F. and no one in this party has suggested that I should resign.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to comment briefly upon several matters during this debate on second reading. In view of the understanding which I believe has been arrived at that the subject of depreciation will be discussed on the first section in committee, I say nothing on that point.

In introducing his budget on April 10 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) indicated that in devising his tax proposals for this year he had started from this premise, as he stated at page 1807 of Hansard:

> It is generally agreed, I think, that we have an excellent basic tax structure.

While there are limitations upon a discussion of the basic tax structure on a bill of this kind, I do hope an opportunity is going to be provided soon for consideration by the house of what I consider to be the quite inadequate provisions in our income tax laws in relation to exemptions. Certain exemptions there have been won by progressive degrees, but I think the list is quite inadequate. Having regard to the increased expenditure at the present time it may be that the minister will not be very receptive to suggestions for broadening certain exemptions and extending them to categories not now provided in the act, but I do hope an opportunity for considering such questions will be afforded before very long.

I am sorry that when the debate on the budget resolutions concluded the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) did not have something to say on a matter which was touched upon by him in his budget speech, and was referred to by several members during the course of the debate. It is the subject of savings. At page 1803 of Hansard for April 10 the minister stated:

> There is also urgent need for a higher volume of new savings . . .

Further on the same page:

> The important thing is to achieve an increase in aggregate saving up to a level at least equal to the new capital investment which we shall have to make this year.

Now, others commented on this, as I did. I sought to draw the attention of the minister—

Mr. Abbott: Is the hon. member going to start the budget debate all over again on general fiscal policy?

Mr. Fleming: I do not know whether or not the Minister of Finance is looking for co-operation, or whether he is prepared to entertain any observations that may be made from any quarter of the house except his own. I indicated I had several matters which I proposed to bring forward briefly. I mentioned this matter of savings because of its vital importance, and because of the fact that the Minister of Finance, when the debate on the resolutions was closed, did not have anything to say on the subject.

Mr. Abbott: I am not raising a point of order. My only point is that there is not much use changing the rules here if we are to have a general discussion, on a bill which relates to the principle of income tax, on savings, which is an important part of fiscal policy. My only point is that a discussion of that is much more appropriate on the motion that Your Honour leave the chair to go into committee of ways and means. I mention it in the interests of orderly discussion in the house. It seems to me that we should stick to the principle of the bill before us.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Eglinton is making a brief reference to this matter. I believe he does not intend to enter into a lengthy discussion on the question of savings.

Mr. Fleming: Not at all, unless the Minister of Finance proposes to force me into it.

Mr. Abbott: I am not forcing anybody. If I wanted to take a strict view of the rules, I could raise a point of order and request that the hon. member be limited to a discussion of the principle of the bill before us. I do not take that stand. I am asking for the co-operation of the house in trying to have a reasonable observance of the rules.

Mr. Fleming: I am observing the rules. All I ask is that the Minister of Finance do the same.

I referred to his recognition of the importance of savings, Mr. Speaker, and I mentioned, as I did earlier, that the new taxes which the Minister of Finance is asking the house to vote, much of them in the present bill, will amount to $625 million. Last year, the total savings in Canada amounted to $645 million, which represented a decrease of thirty per cent as compared with the year before. Now, if there is not an expansion of national savings effort this year, it means that with these additional taxes the volume of savings in Canada will drop to a mere $20 million, and that would be calamitous.

I commend the statement made on this subject at the annual meeting of the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association in Montreal on May 3, by the president of that association, Mr. H. E. Langford of Toronto, who said:

> As we all know, inflation is the great problem we face. To overcome it, all the weapons available to us must be used. One of the most effective weapons is savings . . .

Then after giving some examples, he adds:

> . . . one of the major battles against inflation will be lost if the rate of savings is not maintained or even increased. The need of individuals for larger savings than ever before is readily apparent. Helping individual Canadians along this road will be profitable not only to them and ourselves, but will assist in the over-all struggle against depreciation of the dollar.

It is considerations of that kind, Mr. Speaker, that have guided some of us in what we have had to say, not only on this present measure but on other budget measures that have lately been before the house.

There is one other matter which I hope there will be an opportunity to discuss adequately on this bill. It does not arise in the bill, but it arises out of orders in council which have accompanied the bill. I refer to the matter of the increase in the percentage of deduction which employers are required to hold back from their employees out of wages or salaries on account of income tax. The attempt to increase these deductions to make them cover one hundred per cent of the tax is going to give rise to a multiplicity of claims for refunds. When people come to make their returns on April 30, and to take account of their charitable donations or their medical expenses, claims for refunds will arise. I believe that is a step too far, and it is going to create inconvenience for many people in having to apply for refunds and await payment of them.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker sat down rather more quickly than I expected. I wish to make a few brief remarks on the second reading of this bill, because it is of great importance to the members of this group and the people of Canada, particularly in connection with certain aspects of the Income Tax Act, as we take a somewhat different view than many other members in this house. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe we can agree with the late Mr. Justice Holmes in respect of the payment of income tax. He is described as having paid his income tax with alacrity instead of anguish because he said, "With this I always buy civilization." We can agree with that outlook in respect to income tax when fairly levied.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, in speaking on the resolution preceding the bill, the C.C.F. group considers that the necessary revenue could be more fairly raised without the imposition of the surtax on the lower income groups. I am particularly speaking now of those married people with incomes of $3,000 a year or less, and single people with incomes of $1,500 a year or less. It is a basic principle with the C.C.F. movement that taxation should be based on the ability to pay. We take objection to certain aspects of this bill because we believe that principle is violated. Therefore, in what I say this evening I am speaking for this group, and expressing the considered opinion of the C.C.F. party to which I belong.

I wish to illustrate briefly our contention—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Probably I should bring to the hon. member's attention the fact that on the motion for the house to go into committee of ways and means, an amendment was voted upon which reads as follows:

> The house further regrets the failure of the government to exempt from the proposed twenty per cent defence surtax, the incomes of single persons up to $1,500 and the incomes of married persons up to $3,000.

That question was decided this year, and I doubt if a debate on that matter should be revived at this time. I would not object to the hon. member making a brief statement, but I would not want him to enter into a long discussion on that.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, you are quite correct. I only mentioned those facts in passing, and was not really discussing that question on this occasion. I wish to briefly illustrate our contention that large corporation profits are, in our opinion, a more just source of revenue than the revenue which is received or will be received from certain groups at this time. Since we last dealt with this question there has been increasing evidence in support of our argument. There is an accumulation of evidence in support of the point of view presented by the members of this group.

I am not going to speak at length, but I do just want to illustrate that point before proceeding to give my conclusions. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Financial Post of May 26. Whether we agree with the financial policies of the Financial Post or not, we do know it is an accurate and reliable report of business development, business profits and all things connected with business activity at this time. I think its records and its statistical information have been unquestioned. Throughout the years this paper has proven to be extremely reliable as a source of information with respect to business developments.

I notice in this paper some reference to the increasingly improved position of large corporations in this country; therefore I intend to quote briefly from it. I am simply using this as a source of information. I am not quoting it editorially but as a source of statistical information because of its validity and soundness in supporting our arguments. This article says:

Canadian business had a good year on the average in 1950. The combined profit of 362 Canadian business firms for 1950 was up 23·8 per cent from their 1949 net. Over 69 per cent of these companies showed a higher net in 1950 than in 1949.

I want hon. members to just think of that when they are thinking of the requests for increasing the basic disability pension for veterans when next those requests come before the house. I am coming back into order, Mr. Speaker. I continue:

Further the combined financial position of these companies was strengthened. Net working capital of the 362 companies increased 18·3 per cent during the year and their net worth (equity of all shareholders) increased 9·1 per cent. Thus they improved their position for meeting the demands of the defence economy and for weathering any adverse economic conditions that may lie ahead.

The article goes on to say:

Some significant facts disclosed by the Post's study are:

(1) Total income taxes paid by 360 of these firms were 34·8 per cent higher in 1950 than in 1949. This reflects both the increased volume of business and resultant higher earnings and the increase of 5 per cent in the rate of tax effective after September 1, 1950.

(2) Shareholders received 22 per cent more in total dollar dividends in 1950 than in 1949. The percentage increase in dividends paid was only slightly less than the percentage increase in net profit.

(3) Despite the increase in cash dividends paid, shareholders of these firms received a smaller proportion of the net profit in 1950 than in 1949 (50·8 per cent vs. 51·6 per cent).

(4) There was a wide variation in results both as between groups and between individual companies within the groups.

(7) The net working capital position of the 362 firms was strengthened by 18·3 per cent in 1950, with every group showing an improvement.

(8) The combined net asset position of the 362 firms was increased by 9·1 per cent with all groups showing a higher net worth.

The article goes on to indicate that there was a great improvement in the percentage of profits and of business activity in 1950 over 1949, and that the prospects for this year are even better. That is our point, Mr. Speaker. We maintain that we can obtain a greater percentage of our revenue from some of these corporations, particularly the larger ones, than provision is made for in this bill. Something is happening at the present time that is quite unusual in Canadian business history, at least unusual until recent years. These unusual profits are being invested in real wealth, in plant, equipment, land, real estate, and assets of that sort. The large corporations of this country are investing their excess profits in a form of wealth that will be largely unaffected by future inflation. They are placing themselves in a very strong position with respect to the increasing inflationary period that may come in the future, while at the same time the general public is asked to curtail expenditure, particularly consumer expenditure, and, as a result of these savings in the purchasing of consumer goods, to invest either by savings in the bank or by the purchase of bonds.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that this process is wrong at the present time; and that it is adding to inflation. We believe that these companies should be seeking new capital investment, and that the state should be getting a larger percentage of these excess profits in order to reduce inflation and decrease the burden on the lower income groups.

This great expansion out of profits in Canada at the present time in a form of wealth which will be largely unaffected by any future inflation is being carried on at the expense generally of the Canadian public. The result of that type of expansion, Mr. Speaker, is that more and more wealth is getting into fewer and fewer hands. If companies were required to carry on their expansion as a result of raising new capital the wealth would at least to some extent be more diversified and in a greater number of hands.

As against that, the worker is asked to save, and his savings are largely in the form of bank savings or in small bonds. He is being asked to save in a form that will be seriously affected by any inflation that occurs in the future.

What is the position of the low income groups at the present time? The people I am speaking of now particularly are married people on incomes of $3,000 or less, and single people on incomes of $1,500 or less. The cost of living is going up monthly. Nobody can deny that. The cost of food, the cost of clothing, the cost of shelter, the cost of living and the cost of the necessities of life to keep the human organism alive and working are going up all the time. In addition to that the cost of housing is going up. That is a very important matter so far as this lower income group is concerned, because it is within this group that we find the greatest need for housing in Canada at the present time. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Financial Post of May 26 which reads:

British Columbia

Building costs: Vancouver building costs have climbed about 25 per cent in the past year and are still moving upward. A survey by a New York firm of consulting engineers places the index at 171·2 in March, 1950, and at 203·8 in March of this year. Calculated on ordinary frame houses, the index takes into consideration costs of lumber, plumbing, wages and other key materials and services.

Before passing on I want to make a point. The cost of housing has gone up 25 per cent in Vancouver. People are often inclined to say that wages have gone up and have increased the cost of building. They have to some extent, but wages have not increased 25 per cent in Vancouver in the building trade in the last twelve months; this increase represents profits. This means that as against the position of the large corporations with excess profits to invest in the expansion of capital, plant and equipment, we have these groups with no reserves, with a greater difficulty to live from day to day, facing an insecure future, with this tax actually to some extent increasing their cost of living and no opportunity for expansion in any direction whatever.

In conclusion, what is the position from our point of view? Against what background do we in this group believe we should plan this Income Tax Act at this time on a fairer basis? Here we have the corporations with expanding profits, and the low income groups that I have mentioned with a lowering standard of living, to be further lowered by increased taxation. With democracy demanding equality of sacrifice, surely at a time like this when Canada is facing a very serious defence problem we should do all we can in the house to promote at least to some extent equality of sacrifice, so far as taxation is concerned. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given by the government to altering the provisions with respect to corporation income tax so as to levy graduated taxation on excess profits.

In conclusion I urge hon. members, when they consider voting on this amendment, which we are very much concerned about, to consider carefully those Canadians who are losing their lives in Korea, Canadians who are being wounded and other Canadians who are having great difficulty at this time to carry on because of the increased cost of living. I am sure if hon. members give consideration to those facts, and face this question fairly, they will realize they will be fully justified in supporting the amendment as an attempt to introduce to some extent into this taxation a measure of equality of sacrifice.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Income from office or employment.

Mr. Abbott: Although this has nothing to do with this particular clause, I want to confirm an understanding, which was arrived at when we were in committee, that by unanimous consent it will be in order to discuss depreciation.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise a question with respect to income tax which is based upon an exemplary case which must have been repeated many times throughout Canada and which no doubt has come to the attention of the minister on previous occasions. I refer to a single lady who has looked after a maiden aunt who was aged and destitute and who would have been homeless if her devoted niece had not provided for her during the year. This single person maintained a home in which she kept her aunt and was able to claim relief under the Income Tax Act because she was maintaining a home in which she supported herself. In other words, she came under that section which provides:

> . . . a person wholly dependent upon him and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption . . .

In 1950 this single lady married. She still has a taxable income and still looks after her aged infirm maiden aunt. However, her claim for an allowance for a dependent has been disallowed. I understand that she could claim for a parent, a grandparent, a brother, a sister, a daughter or a sister training as a nurse, a brother-in-law, a sister-in-law or a child who is not legally adopted. It seems strange that these other claims can be made but a case which apparently is such a strong one must of course be ruled out under the present regulations and the law. Would the minister give some indication whether or not the government can adapt their policy so as to take care of what looks like a very worthy case such as the one I have just described?

Mr. Abbott: I will consider very carefully the facts which my hon. friend has presented. I did not want to interrupt him, but this question of exemptions for other than specified dependents in the act is a very broad one. I do not think it is strictly relevant to discuss it under this section. As I pointed out, it was arranged that we were going to discuss the subject of depreciation. However, I will consider the facts that he has put forward, and perhaps at an appropriate time before we finish consideration of the bill I will try to give him a considered answer on it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to make a few brief observations on the question of depreciation which I think has an importance very great and perhaps different from what some of us thought at the time that it was originally brought forward by the minister. I will read briefly from what the minister said in his budget speech at page 1808 of Hansard. After speaking about the tremendous investment program facing us in the year ahead the minister said:

> What we need is a stiff financial deterrent that will affect particularly the businessman who is considering the kind of investment which is attractive, not because of its long-term soundness, but because it can be written off out of the expected high profits of the next few years at a time when he expects the rate of corporate income tax to be abnormally high.

Then the minister refers in a general way to the nature of the deterrent, and I want to read something that he said later because I think it is very important to have in mind that this is the type of thing the minister was picturing to us. I want to suggest that what this provision may do is to have results that are far enough off from the minister's intention unless it is very broadly interpreted, and indeed I think unless some changes are made in the regulations. The minister went on to say:

> The deterrent will particularly affect the businessman whose decision to make a capital expenditure is strongly influenced by the expectation that he can write off a large fraction of his cost . . . In other words it will compel the businessman to give primary attention to the long-term prospects of proposed capital expenditures and if outside financial participation is required lenders will also take this view.

What I want to draw attention to at the outset is that the whole tenor of this is that it is to affect big business, people who are wanting to go into business in a big way—

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is wrong about that. It is to affect everyone, big and small.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I say the atmosphere that the minister created is rather of the big man. It is because it does affect the big man—

Mr. Abbott: That was completely unintentional, if that is the case.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At any rate I am coming to the other aspect of it because what I want to ask him to consider particularly is that it affects the small as well as the big. It is that point I wish to emphasize particularly. I do not agree by any means with all that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said a little while ago, but I agree very heartily with the fear he expressed that in the circumstances in which we find ourselves at the moment, and with the development of the defence economy, we may find it harder and harder for small men to originate small businesses or, as he put it, we may find more and more wealth passing into fewer and fewer hands. That is something that should not be disregarded.

I want to refer in passing to the regulations which will come up again. I point out also in passing that the purpose is really twofold. First of all it is to act as a bit of a damper on expansion, and second I presume it is to conserve necessary defence materials. That may be ancillary, but I think it is not irrelevant. I want to point out next that there is the greatest danger as the matter stands that it will be almost impossible for new businesses to start up, and I even suggest to the minister that it should be considered whether there may not be an exemption of businesses of a certain size. I am not prepared to dogmatize as to the amount, but I suggest very earnestly that we should try not to allow this to create a situation which will make it difficult, if not impossible, for new businesses to arise, because we are not considering something which is going to last for a month or a year. As now contemplated it will last for four years, and if we create a situation for four years which is going to make it, as I say, difficult if not impossible for small businesses to arise, or at any rate make it very much harder for them, I think that is a very serious thing and should be so considered.

I next want to bring to the attention of the minister certain specific types of cases which it seems to me will arise, and the problems of which I hope can be most seriously considered. I am not overlooking the fact that there is a wide range of exceptions, and that beyond the exception there is a discretion. I am not overlooking that at all, but having said that I wish to bring certain cases to attention which I think are pertinent, and in some cases urgent. I hope they will be considered on their merits, and that we may have an answer with regard to each of them.

[Mr. Abbott.]

First of all I wish to go back and read one operative clause from what the minister said in his budget speech. At page 1808 of Hansard he said:

> To provide this deterrent it is proposed to defer for a period of four years the right to charge depreciation on all capital assets acquired after April 10, 1951, excepting certain classes of assets defined in the regulations and certain additional kinds of assets when certified as eligible by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The types of cases I wish to bring up are these. The first is where a business was committed, at the time the order became effective, to capital expenditure. In other words, it was not a case of making a decision after the minister's speech, after the coming into effect. There was a capital investment commitment made before that. Second, there is the case of businesses which merely change the form of ownership after the order becomes effective. For example you have a single business which is turned into a corporation, or a partnership turned into a limited liability company, or the case of a man dying, leaving his business to his son and creating a situation where the business has to be sold. If the right to depreciation is gone in such a case we shall have a serious lessening of the value of the property. Finally I want to reiterate again what I said, that I hope special consideration will be given to the position of those wishing to start up small businesses, and on these points I should like to hear the minister's comments.

Mr. Abbott: On the points that have been raised by my hon. friend, first I should say that the regulations are being reviewed at the moment. I understand that the Minister of National Revenue, with the concurrence of myself and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, very shortly will be recommending certain amendments to these regulations in the light of the experience we have had in the three or four weeks since the original regulations were put in, in the light of applications which have been made, and so on. Among other things I might say that provision will be made under which the names of those given certificates of eligibility, together with the reasons for which they were given, will be published, probably in the official gazette. In any case that will be provided in the regulations.

Consideration is being given to the problem raised by my hon. friend of a change in the form of ownership, and I think probably the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of National Revenue and myself will be making some announcement about that before very long. On the question of small businesses, it is pretty hard to say what a small business is. As my hon. friend knows, the rate of corporation income tax on the smaller businesses is very much lower than on the large businesses. It was 10 per cent; it is now 15 per cent. I do not think any serious hardship would be suffered by these smaller businesses if depreciation were postponed on the assets they may acquire.

I want to make it clear that this measure is not aimed at large businesses as such or at small businesses as such, but at all businesses. The main purpose of the proposal is to cause businessmen to defer less essential expenditures, and to be perfectly satisfied that the asset they are acquiring is one they are willing to keep for a number of years and which will be profitable for a number of years, so that on the expiration of the period during which depreciation is deferred they will still be in a position to make profits against which the capital cost allowances can be taken.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate what the minister has said, but I would like to ask one or two things. The minister has indicated that changes are in contemplation. May I take it that when these changes are made an opportunity will be provided in the near future to discuss the matter again in the house?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give any positive assurance as to that in the light of the probable sessional program. My hon. friend appreciates that these regulations are made under section 11 of the Income Tax Act, which provides for capital cost allowances. The granting of capital cost allowances is made by regulation, on the recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue. In strict theory he does not have to do so; but of course, as I explained, this is a matter for determination by regulation. Under the old act it was purely a matter of ministerial discretion; under the new act it is provided by regulation. I should hope that the regulations would be completed and perhaps tabled before the estimates of the Department of National Revenue are finished. Unquestionably at that time there would be an opportunity to question the minister about them, though I think perhaps a more satisfactory course would be to have that discussion when the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce were under consideration, because it is by his department that the certificates of eligibility are being issued. The Department of National Revenue will have the responsibility of determining questions of fact such as when particular assets were acquired, and so on. I cannot give a positive assurance that the amendments, which I hope will be available within a few days, will be discussed, but I should think there would be that opportunity and certainly I would do what I could to provide a suitable time at which that discussion could take place.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Purely as a matter of what seems a convenient practice, with these changes likely to be available in a few days, I take it that submissions could be made to the proper authority continuing this discussion, in the hope that some of the things we bring up now may be felt worthy of consideration. These regulations are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I take it they are flexible; that is the reason they are left in regulation form, is it not?

Mr. Abbott: That is it exactly. This is a new move. The government wants to make the regulations as reasonable as possible, to cause as little dislocation as possible and yet achieve the objective in view. The department is always ready to listen, and in fact welcomes representations from businessmen and others who may be affected, in order to ensure that the regulations are drawn as well as possible.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That seems a very sensible way to deal with the situation. While I am on my feet I might as well mention one or two other points so they will be on record and those who are considering the regulations will have them before them. Another question that arises is the depreciation of used equipment and buildings which pass into the hands of new owners. Obviously there is a situation there. Then there is the question of the depreciation where the capital asset acquired has been used by a former owner, though some kind of safeguard would be necessary so it would be clear that the transaction was genuine. Probably it should be in the hands of the former owner for a period of twelve months, say. Finally there is the case where you have a business property on which the purchaser had an option to purchase dated prior to April 10. I am not going to delay the committee by dwelling further on these points. I am glad to know the regulations are flexible, and that these matters can be brought up and discussed further from time to time.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend has indicated, this question involves a number of very complex problems. Those he has raised are being considered. It may be possible to do something about some of them; in others it may not. We are proceeding in this, as in all other things, by a process of trial and error, by elimination, and by seeing what can and cannot be done.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like the minister to explain this deferred depreciation a little more clearly, because I have heard two or three versions. I imagine the correct one is that if you buy a new piece of machinery you lose four years' depreciation. Some people seem to think that when 1956 comes around they will get the four years' depreciation all at once, but I do not think that is right. Would the minister explain it?

Mr. Abbott: To put it shortly, this is pushing the whole period forward. Suppose an article was acquired in June of 1951. If this rule were not in force depreciation would commence in 1951. Instead of that the right to take depreciation or capital cost allowance is deferred for four years. After that four-year period the owner can take the depreciation he could have taken in 1951. In 1955, let us say, he can take the depreciation he could have taken now, in 1956 the depreciation he could have taken in 1952, and so on until the asset is fully depreciated. I want to emphasize that the right to depreciation is simply postponed; it is not taken away. So long as earnings are available after the expiration of the period, then the depreciation can be taken.

Mr. Stanfield: As I said during the budget debate, I think this is a very foolish change for the minister to make. I have a very high regard for him, but I believe he has made a mistake in this case. For many years the depreciation rate was 10 per cent, and everyone knew exactly what to expect and just what to do. Even in times of great crisis, even when our profits' tax had to go to seventy-five per cent, or say it did, as long as you had a steady rate of depreciation and knew what you were doing, business could keep on going along on a sound basis. But now, when you get fooling around with depreciation, and fooling around with everything, you get to a point where nobody knows what he is doing. I believe the minister was ill advised to change these rates of depreciation. He should have left it the way it was.

Mr. Abbott: I suppose we have been discussing depreciation, Mr. Chairman, but the clause itself does not relate to that.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the minister has given some indication to the house that the present order in council, which I believe is P.C. 1778 dated April 10, is now under review, and that certain amendments may be made to that order. I believe that that fact probably makes it all the more desirable, since the minister has not indicated the nature of the probable amendment—perhaps he is not in a position to do so—that any views hon. members may have concerning this measure should be put forward at this point, in the hope that they may receive consideration when the amendments to the order in council are being determined.

There are one or two aspects of the view put forward by the minister in regard to this whole subject that I believe deserve comment. The minister has stated that one of the objectives of the proposals to defer depreciation is to encourage business enterprises, where possible, to defer physical expansion of their plant and equipment. Now, I suppose every one of us will say that, so far as that will make a contribution towards conserving essential defence materials that may be in short supply, the purpose is worthy of support. Again, to the extent to which this measure may be intended to reduce postponeable expenditures and to increase savings, about which we were speaking earlier in the evening, I think the house would wish to approach the proposals favourably. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, we have to assess the professed purpose that the minister has assigned in relation to the facts as we see them developing since April 10.

I am glad the minister has spoken as he has tonight in clarifying the issue, because unquestionably the words he used on pages 1808 and 1809 of Hansard of April 10, have carried the impression abroad that his policy was directed against new and smaller businesses. The minister tonight has sought to correct that impression, and to stress that it is of general application. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, the fact of the matter is that the weight of this new policy is going to be felt particularly by newer businesses, younger businesses and businesses which are in the course of expansion. They are going to be now compelled either to arrest their expansion or forgo what is a very important element in their financial plans, namely, depreciation. So we may say that a young or growing industry is the one that will feel the effects of this new policy most severely at the present time.

To that extent, any measure of this kind is necessarily discriminatory. This is not going to hurt any business that had the good fortune to carry out any needed expansion of physical facilities or physical plant prior to April 10. It is a matter of luck that some industries acquired their physical plant or assets prior to April 10, and will be permitted to depreciate them in the ordinary way, while other businesses, in the midst of expansion and the growing pains of a young business, but which did not acquire the physical plant prior to April 10, are now going to feel the full weight of this new policy. This is a regrettable form of discrimination. It may be inevitable in measures of this kind.

Mr. Abbott: It is true of steel control, too.

Mr. Fleming: I say, it may be inevitable in any measure of this kind, but nevertheless the effect of it is discriminatory.

The hon. member for Greenwood raised the problem of the application of this new policy in circumstances in which it is, in effect, given a retroactive operation. The test which is laid down by the minister, and which found its way into order in council P.C. 1778, is acquisition of the particular assets by the taxpayer up to April 10. Now, sir, that word, itself, as a test presents no little difficulty. I am hopeful that the minister, having had the problem brought before him tonight by the member for Greenwood, is going to endeavour to do something to soften the severity of order in council P.C. 1778 with respect to those taxpayers who had entered into commitments up to April 10, but who had not then acquired the particular physical assets which would otherwise have been subject to depreciation.

Sir, there are not a few cases of that kind, where in the ordinary course the particular taxpayer has made a binding commitment prior to April 10, a commitment which had not been carried to the point where delivery of the physical asset had been made to him prior to that date, but where he is compelled by the nature of his commitment to proceed and to purchase the particular asset which would otherwise be depreciable for tax purposes. I am sure there must have been many cases of that type brought to the attention of the minister. I expect most hon. members in this committee have had some such cases brought to their personal attention. Now, those are cases of real hardship because had those particular taxpayers been aware in time, it is certain that in a great many cases they would not have entered into the commitment to acquire assets of the type upon which they are not now to be entitled to any depreciation allowance.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall give third reading to Bill No. 294, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act. Then we shall take up non-contentious matters for a change, Bill No. 344, an act to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929; Bill No. 355, an act respecting weights and measures; and then three resolutions, one in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, No. 13 on today's order paper, the basis of a measure to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act; the second one will be No. 14 on today's order paper, standing in the name of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, concerning the Canada Lands Surveys Act; then No. 12 on the order paper, standing in the name of the Minister of National Defence, concerning the National Defence Act. I think that will take all afternoon. If we do complete these, I shall have to look further into the order paper.

TRADE WITH CHINA AND RUSSIA

CANADIAN POLICY—UNITED STATES EMBARGO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct one or two questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with the matter he was discussing in his speech yesterday at the Canadian international trade fair in Toronto. Can the minister tell the house whether the United States embargo on trade with China is more restrictive than that which he announced yesterday as Canadian policy, and whether the Americans have imposed a total embargo on trade between the soviets and satellite countries and the United States, or whether the Americans are adopting the same policy as he indicated Canada is now adopting in connection with trade relations with these countries?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I was dealing with Canadian policy alone in that particular statement. In so far as strategic materials are concerned I believe that that policy is the same as the policy adopted by the United States in respect of shipments to soviet communist countries and to the people's republic of China. In so far as the policy of the United States on other than strategic materials is concerned, I am afraid that I am not in position to make a statement, especially without notice. I shall look into the matter and see what difference there is between our policy and that of the United States in that connection, if indeed there is any difference.

FIRES

OTTAWA ORDNANCE DEPOT—DAMAGE TO DEFENCE PROPERTIES—QUESTION AS TO INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence to answer the question I asked on Monday last with regard to fires at the ordnance depot in Ottawa. There are some other questions which I should like to ask along the same lines which I feel are urgent. Why was not the fire that broke out at 5.30 on Saturday morning last at the end of the building opposite from the main fire reported to the press? Was stocktaking being carried on in the ordnance depot in Ottawa last week? Will the minister state whether he will give the Royal Canadian Mounted Police a free hand to investigate these fires, and also whether a public inquiry will be held? I think that is needed; in fact I know it is needed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, since the fire occurred, its causes and the damages therefrom have been the subject of very active investigation by army officials, including the army fire marshal, and the R.C.M.P., which are working in close co-operation. I should say that at a conference this morning the city of Ottawa fire department was good enough to send its chief at my invitation, and he also is co-operating. I have asked the Canadian Underwriters' Association to make available some experts and they are co-operating in that way. In addition to the army court of inquiry, such other inquiries will be held as are deemed necessary to arrive if possible at the origin of this fire.

The hon. member asked why was not the second fire reported to the press. I have no knowledge of the fact that it was or was not reported, or why it was not reported, if it was not.

Mr. Fraser: At the far end of the building.

Mr. Claxton: There was a second fire in area F that occurred at six o'clock in the morning. Before commenting further on this I think we should have the results of the inquiries which are under way and which will be pressed through to as full a conclusion as possible.

Before resuming my seat I should like to pay a tribute to the fire department of the city of Ottawa, and particularly to its chief. This fire began at about 9.40 at night and was reported by automatic signal to the fire department. The Ottawa fire department was on the scene just as soon as it could be, and the courage and skill and hard work of its members was the main reason why more damage was not caused. I should like to pay a warm tribute to the skill and trained experience, courage and hard work of the Ottawa fire department in doing such a superb job on that occasion.

I should like also to pay a tribute to the work of the armed forces, which at very considerable risk removed by hand highly inflammable and even explosive materials from buildings connected with area A where the fire occurred. Had these two agencies not co-operated as they did, had they not done the good work they did, the damage would have been much greater.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister whether any corps of watchmen were on duty at that time, or was the department depending entirely upon automatic controls?

Mr. Claxton: All parts of the building are visited every fifteen minutes by members of the corps of commissionaires or service personnel. The corps of commissionaires provides a service on the hour and on the half hour, visiting twenty-nine stations where they punch their clocks to record the fact that they have been there. That is supplemented by service personnel who visit fifteen different stations, distributed throughout the building, on the quarter and three-quarter hours, so that every part of the building is visited every fifteen minutes.

Mr. Graydon: How many would there be of that type of personnel watching for fires?

Mr. Claxton: There are quite enough to do the job. I have not the number, but it would be of the magnitude of ten or fifteen on duty throughout the night.

Mr. Fraser: How many officers would there be among the fifteen?

Mr. Claxton: One.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am not trying to be controversial, but I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence a question the other day to which I should like an answer. According to the press, an immense building for ordnance purposes, the largest in the British empire, is to be built in the city of Edmonton under one roof. Is the minister's department giving consideration to having it spread among four or five buildings instead of under one roof?

Mr. Claxton: I think the information about the proposed ordnance depot at Edmonton has been exaggerated. A depot is proposed there, but it is not of that magnitude at all. It will be a depot for that command, and will be of the same type as other depots that have been or are being built across the country.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like a direct answer. Rather than having it all under one roof and subject to similar fires, will consideration be given to spreading it throughout the immense west in several buildings?

Mr. Claxton: That of course has been given consideration from the point of view of economy and fire prevention, and consideration will continue to be given to that question.

Mr. Graydon: Too much concentration would be dangerous, would it not?

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT AT LONDON, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Yesterday I directed a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. He took it as notice and was going to reply later. Can the minister answer the question now?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have seen the question, but have not got the answer yet.

DECENNIAL CENSUS

REFERENCE TO QUESTION AS TO ORIGIN ON POPULATION FORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Does the minister think the word "English" includes the word "Scottish"? The reason for my question is that when I came to fill out the census questionnaire I found under question 17 the heading "origin", and the various origins set out are "English, French, Irish, Jewish, etc." I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, particularly, and many others in this house if they do not think that some action should be taken to correct this. I hope the minister will be able to give me a more satisfactory answer than I think he will.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver East wishes to ask a question on the same subject.

Mr. MacInnis: If the Minister of Trade and Commerce will allow me, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood in objecting to being included in the et ceteras.

Mr. Howe: I regret that this strange situation was just called to my attention a few moments ago. I shall be glad to obtain an explanation from my officials. As they are very competent officials, I am sure there is a good explanation, but at the moment I am not aware of what it is.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister tell his officials I put myself down as Scottish?

Mr. Mutch: Some choice between "English" and "et cetera".

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

DISTRIBUTION OF CONTRACTS—SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister noticed the latest release by his department this morning listing defence contracts over $10,000 from May 1 to May 15?

If he has, has he observed that once again there is not five cents for Saskatchewan? Will the minister give some assurance that consideration will be given to diversifying defence contracts so that other provinces will get their fair share?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Yesterday, for want of a better subject, I spoke on the distribution of defence and defence supporting contracts. I have a distinct recollection that according to the break-down prepared by my department, the prairie provinces were getting a very reasonable share of these types of contracts. If I am fortunate enough to reach my estimates this session. I shall be very pleased to put the break-down on Hansard, and I am sure that my hon. friend will be highly gratified at the value of the contracts going to the prairie provinces.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before the bill is finally adopted on third reading I want to make a few comments, particularly with reference to section 6, which increases the sales tax from eight to ten per cent, and which is therefore in effect an increase in the tax of twenty-five per cent.

During the discussion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was good enough to say that he agreed that it would be well for members of the house to have the opportunity of expressing their opinion on this bill, and particularly on section 6. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Finance reiterated that opinion. At page 3730 of Hansard he said:

> When hon. members have completed the discussion, which I hope is nearing an end now, I shall be quite happy to have such a vote taken.

I drew attention to the fact that we were in committee, that a very large number of members of the house were unavoidably absent attending important committees of the house, and that therefore a vote taken under those circumstances would not reflect the opinion of the house. A recorded vote was taken in the committee, and there were forty-two in favour of section 6 and twenty-eight opposed to it, a vote of only seventy members of the house. The minister noted that himself and regretted that more members would not be able to participate in the vote when the house was in committee of the whole. Therefore I propose to move an amendment to the motion for third reading of the bill. I move:

> That Bill No. 294 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole house for the purpose of reconsidering clause 6 of the said bill.

I believe that is in order at this stage. I had thought of moving that the section be deleted, but I thought if I did that there might be some discussion on a point of procedure, and in order to avoid any such discussion the amendment is worded as I have indicated.

I do not want to recapitulate all the arguments that have been advanced during the prolonged debate of this increase in the sales tax. I do want to say, however, that in my opinion it defeats to a degree the objective the minister said he had in mind at the time the budget was introduced—that is, of reducing the danger of inflation. I believe the increase in the sales tax, as in some of the excise taxes already adopted by this house, will mean increased prices for most articles and a renewed demand for wage and salary increases, as well as increases in the prices of certain farm commodities. After all, while some farm equipment is exempt from the sales tax, in many respects this tax does enter into both the cost of production and the cost of living in rural and urban areas alike. Consequently I believe that to a degree it will defeat what the minister said was one of the objectives he had in mind in some of the taxes proposed in his budget.

As I have said on many occasions, and in all parts of Canada where I have had the opportunity of speaking from time to time, in my opinion the sales tax is an oppressive and a discriminatory tax, because it taxes those who are often least able to carry any additional burden. It is true that a sales tax may be instituted for a particular reason, and under some circumstances potent arguments may be advanced to support it. Nevertheless the principle of such a tax is fundamentally unsound and wrong. Therefore we are opposed to that type of taxation, particularly at this time when it should be the care of this government to see that nothing is done to increase further the already high cost of living, which, as has been noted on other occasions by many speakers in this house, has now reached the unprecedented level of 182 as compared with the 1935-39 basic level of 100. Therefore I believe hon. members should have an opportunity to express themselves on this clause of the bill now before us for third reading.

I said I did not wish to go into all the arguments that have been advanced, and I do not propose to do so. By this amendment hon. members have an opportunity to ask the government and the house itself in committee of the whole to reconsider this bill with particular reference to section 6. In the amendment I am not suggesting that such consideration should bring about the desirable result I hope it might have. It might result in quite the opposite, if a majority of this house so decided. But all hon. members should have an opportunity to register their opinions. I would hope that many hon. members supporting the government will take the view we are taking and so express themselves in connection with this sales tax.

I am not going to say more, because in view of the long debate we have had on this bill I think it is unnecessary to do so. I am moving this amendment in the hope that it will receive considerable support, and will bring about an expression of opinion of which the government must take heed.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to add just a word. As has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), this matter has been fully canvassed and there is no need to review it at any great length. This amendment is substantially the same as the amendment I moved on second reading, and it is moved for the same reasons. I would just reiterate what I said on second reading: that the arguments presented during the budget debate, when we also asked that this increase in the sales tax be abandoned, I think have been strengthened by the lapse of time. I understand the reason for this amendment, in that the mover wishes to have a recorded vote on this question, which presumably will be substantially the same as the vote in committee the evening before last.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): While I said yesterday that I disliked the contents of this bill, nevertheless when the vote was taken I was here, unlike one hon. member who mentioned my name yesterday but who dodged out when the final vote was called. However, I am given to understand that this increase will bring into the dominion treasury some $105 million this year and $125 million next year; and while I dislike the tax, governments have to dig up money somewhere.

The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) made a political speech and moved a political amendment. Last evening I was speaking to two people from England who had been sitting in the gallery here. They were amazed to hear us quarrelling about this increase in the tax on alarm clocks and such things. In England the tax on cars is 66⅔ per cent. If they want a waffle iron, an electric stove, a watch or an alarm clock, the excise tax is 100 per cent. They told me that we in Canada were living in clover, and that those who opposed these small increases in taxation which are imposed in order to obtain needed revenue should take a trip to England and see how things are going over there. I make this statement because our socialist friends are always pointing to England and to what they are doing over there. Why do they not point to the taxes over there before moving an amendment such as this?

An hon. Member: How are you going to vote?

Mr. Sinnott: I am going to vote for the bill, much as I dislike its contents, because, as I say, the government must have money. No one likes taxes; but if my socialist friends get any comfort from the way I vote, I am prepared to accept that responsibility.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Yesterday, while dealing with the increase in the sales tax, I suggested that if it was necessary for the government to raise more money, it would be much fairer if they did so by increasing either the income tax or the corporation tax, or both. In reply the minister had this to say, at page 3721 of Hansard:

> My experience has been that under existing conditions an increase in the income tax means that those paying the increase—and I am referring particularly to the larger groups of organized labour—are not prepared to accept less take-home pay. In other words they feel that they should get a wage increase which would offset any additional tax.

According to the minister, if we raise the money by increasing the income tax—a fair tax, based on ability to pay—that would be a bad thing, because the people would know what taxes they are paying, and would object to them. On the other hand, the minister feels that if we raise the money by increasing the sales tax—which is a bad tax, because it is a hidden tax, and bears equally upon the poor and the wealthy—that would be more desirable from the government's point of view, because the public would be unaware of the amount of taxes they would be paying, and would blame the increase in the cost of living on the retailer instead of on the government.

The minister said that if the money is raised by increasing the income tax, the unions would demand higher wages to make up the difference in their take-home pay, and that would be inflationary. Mr. Speaker, when the sales tax goes into effect, the unions are going to demand greater increases than they would if the income tax were increased, because under the sales tax the workingman carries a heavier share of the load than he does under the income tax. Therefore, I think it is obvious that an increase in the sales tax is more inflationary than an increase in the income tax.

From this I believe it is only possible to draw one conclusion, and that is that by raising the money which the government believes it needs, through an increase in the sales tax instead of an increase in the income tax, or the corporation tax, or both, the government is serving political expediency rather than a desire to impose the lightest possible burden on those who are least able to bear an increased burden.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word on this subject, in order to make my position quite clear. I intend to vote against the amendment, but I also believe that, while I am not speaking on behalf of the farm districts in others parts of Canada, the apparent spokesman for the government had no knowledge of the problem of the farmer or thought of the welfare of the people of Canada. I want to refer again, Mr. Speaker, to margarine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cruickshank: It is all very well for my friends from the maritimes to say "oh, oh". I want to make my position very clear.

An hon. Member: You want grease.

Mr. Cruickshank: If some hon. members in the back benches in that corner of the house in which I sat when I first came here have not the courage to get up and make a speech, they should not interrupt their betters. Mr. Speaker, to soften my remarks, may I state that I have had the privilege of being here longer than some members, but not as long as others. I have had the privilege of being here for about eleven years. I like every member in the house, and I hope they all like me. I respect their opinions, and I hope they respect mine. Irrespective of whether or not I agree with them, I realize that they are sincere in their beliefs. Even if a junior colleague from my own province should make irresponsible statements without the slightest foundation, reason, common sense or judgment, I respect his opinion. Incidentally, my province may be one of the junior provinces within confederation, but we do not consider ourselves a junior province in so far as good taste and good judgment are concerned. Mr. Speaker, I want to state to you, and through you to my colleagues, all of whom I respect, that I shall never divulge anything that occurs either within the secrecy of their home or on any other privileged occasion. I do not do business that way, because I do not have to do business that way in order to get a larger majority than I ever secured before. I can do that without the assistance of a member who took thirty days to neglect a promise to speak on my behalf campaigning all the time on his own behalf, while I had six meetings, and both of my opponents lost their deposits.

It has been suggested indirectly that I was disappointed that he did speak on my behalf. I believe, Mr. Speaker, it shows the supreme confidence that I had in the judgment of the people in the riding I represent that I was even willing to permit a member with apparently no idea of the welfare of Canada to speak on my behalf. I am asked by a very junior member from New Brunswick what that has to do with this amendment. I have forgotten what Brutus said or the minister of external affairs, but, come one, come all, if you want to interrupt me, knowing your names will not appear in Hansard, I am willing to take you on one or two at a time.

I want to make it quite clear that, while voting against the amendment I believe my colleagues and those who oppose me are sincere in their beliefs and are entitled to them. But, Mr. Speaker, representing as I do, a dairy district, I am entitled to the same consideration. I am sincere in what I am trying to put forward. I believe that this budget has not done justice to the dairy farmer. I may not be correct in that, but I sincerely believe it. I believe that, in the long run, the proposed excise taxes will not be of benefit to the people of Canada as a whole. I believe that the people of Canada will realize that, in the long run, the proposed legislation is not to their benefit, and it is definitely not to the benefit of the people I have the honour to represent. I have the honour to represent those people, Mr. Speaker, without referring to any conversation that I had with the Shah of Persia at the expense of the government. When I hear any remarks which I consider insulting to the great mass of farmers of our province, particularly the dairy farmers, I hope a correction will be made, from the source from which it should come, to the effect that they were not the expression of the policy of the government. Any man who insults the farmers of Canada and the dairy farmers that I have the privilege of representing should, I think, publicly withdraw any privileged statement made by the Shah of Persia or some deputy representative of Denmark or some other country. Denmark is a great country, I know. But my riding is a great dairying country, and we are proud of that fact. We make no apology to anyone for the way in which we conduct dairying in my riding or in my province.

I hope that I have had the last word in that connection, Mr. Speaker. I hope to say no more with regard to privileged remarks.

I do not think the present form of taxation is necessarily the essential one to cover the matter. But, all things being considered, I believe that the government which I have the honour to support have evolved what is, in their judgment, the best form of taxation to cover all the people of Canada, in the best interests of all. But I take exception to it when any member goes, shall I say, beyond all limits. There has been an interjection here, Mr. Speaker, referring to the member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). But I want to tell the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) that while the hon. member for Springfield was not a Rhodes scholar, he knows what is decency and what is not, and will not betray a confidence given at a private house or a private luncheon.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the fact that on several previous occasions my colleagues and I have given reasons why we consider this increase in the sales tax unsound, unfair and undesirable at this time, it will not be necessary for me to recapitulate the arguments which we have thus far advanced.

Speaking in the House of Commons on April 10, the evening on which he delivered his budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) spoke as follows—I quote a short paragraph with reference to the sales tax, as reported at page 1813 of Hansard:

> I have therefore come to the conclusion that the sound thing to do from the economic point of view, and the fair thing at this time, is to increase the sales tax. I believe also that this is the choice that will be preferred by the great majority of our people.

We take the position, Mr. Speaker, that the twenty-five per cent increase in the sales tax is not sound. We consider it unfair, and we have advanced arguments giving our reasons why we so consider it. We are also thoroughly convinced that the majority of the people of Canada do not favour this tax at this time. We therefore stand together in support of the amendment submitted today by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the hon. members of the opposition seized this opportunity to criticize our tax structure and more especially the new taxes proposed in the present budget. It is natural for them to criticize but they do it all the more willingly when they realize that by so doing they will reap political advantages. However, what never fails to surprise me is to hear these hon. members of the opposition, day after day, call upon us to furnish larger sums of money for various purposes, bonuses according to some, compensation according to others, or plain gifts, according to others.

I know it is their duty to seem like good fellows in the eyes of their constituents. It is all the easier for them, I admit, to ask that millions and billions be given away since they know full well that they are in no way responsible for such donations. Having voiced requests of that kind, they find it easy to criticize the government for suggesting taxes to meet the proposed outlays.

The budget calls for expenditures of more than three billion dollars. There are times when I would be inclined to envy their position. But I still prefer to be on this side of the house, where I can express my opinion sincerely, without attempting to derive any political advantage.

I am astounded to hear those hon. members criticize present taxes, since the official opposition is always demanding the expenditure of additional billions for defence, charging that we have not yet spent enough in this regard and that we should have spent four or five times as much.

The socialists would have us give more than Canada has or can possibly have within the next ten years. They want huge sums of money to be paid into pension funds of all kinds, bonuses, etc.

Our good friends, the Social Crediters, would like the government to build a printing bureau for the sole purpose of printing bank-notes, to be distributed to all citizens. After a quick calculation of the several amounts asked for by the opposition, I have discovered that we would need more than $6 billion to cover these expenditures, whereas the estimates provide for the levying of only $3 billion. In other words, if we were to accede to their requests, we would have to double the taxes the government now requires.

Just a few words about the additional two per cent sales tax. First of all, may I be permitted to remind the hon. members of the opposition that we dislike imposing taxes even more than they do, because we can derive no political advantage thereby. Tax increases go against us. Had it been possible not to increase the tax we would have been doubly happy. Tax increases help the opposition but not those who sit on this side of the house because such increases are not welcomed by the electors.

I know something about the matter as I am among the first to be penalized. As a merchant, I have to keep a heavy stock of goods. Part of these goods were already subject to an eight per cent tax. From now on another part of them will be subject to a ten per cent tax. Therefore my stock will be made up of certain goods subject to an eight per cent tax and other goods on which the tax will be ten per cent. This tax increase means that I have to protect a surplus of money against loss and fire. Five or six years ago, I paid taxes on certain goods I was unable to sell. In fact, the public does not pay more than before, because large quantities of goods are being sold at reduced prices. Then, let us not forget that when certain wares become out of fashion, they have less value. How much of those are sold below cost price? In such a case, the public does not pay the eight or ten per cent. The true businessman knows of no other country he would rather live in. Ask any businessman; he will tell you he prefers Canada to any other country.

I regret the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) is not here. I would have told him he is the best promoter of margarine in Canada. He is a great help to the newspapers and to the producers of margarine. I wonder why he insists on talking about it so often in this house. The Liberal government had prohibited the production and sale of margarine as long as it could and I was always pleased to support our leaders in this regard.

But now, the provinces control the production and sale of margarine, a second rate substitute, the nutritional value of which is not one-quarter that of butter. Those who wish to see the matter definitely settled should turn to their respective provincial governments. I blame the government of my province for not having forbidden the sale of that product.

Unlike some people, I do not claim that this foodstuff is not fit to be eaten. I objected to the sale of margarine because I represent what is almost exclusively a farming constituency.

Farmers do not make a fortune but thanks to the sound administration of this government they live decently. Those who are always clamouring for the removal of taxes should try instead to bring prices down by asking workers, farmers and businessmen to work a few hours longer than at present. On the other hand, we in the House of Commons who spend half our time arguing, at tremendous cost to the taxpayer every day, should avoid useless repetitions and get down to work.

This is only the second time I have spoken in the house this year, and I do so without preparation. If members enacted bills more speedily instead of making so many speeches to please their constituents, it would be less costly to the country and things would go much better.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have already set forth my objections to the sales tax, and I shall not repeat them at length. However I should like to comment upon a statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) as it is reported at page 3731 of Hansard for June 5, where he said:

> I have answered my hon. friend as to why we think a tax on spending, such as the sales tax, is less inflationary than an increase in the personal income tax or a lowering of the exemptions; because I believe the imposition of such an additional tax would at once result in fairly widespread demands for wage and salary increases to offset it.

In the first place, I do not know of any group in the house that asked for an increase in the income tax at the lower levels. A number of alternatives were offered to the minister, such as an increase in corporation taxes, a graduated excess profits tax, and even an increase in income tax in the higher brackets. No group in the house has advocated an increase in income tax across the board as an alternative to the sales tax now under consideration.

Secondly, I challenge the minister or his parliamentary assistant, or any member supporting the government, to show where labour has gone to employers asking for any increase in wages because they felt they were bearing more than their share of income tax, or asked for an increase in wages on the ground that they were paying too much income tax. Ever since the government released its control on the cost of living, industrial workers have sought increases in wages to offset the increased cost of living. The government has been notified time and again by organized labour that, if it was willing to stop inflation and the rising cost of living, labour was willing to sit down and to iron out with the government the whole question of wage increases.

Every demand for wage increases since the war has been made on the basis of the increased cost of living, and I submit to the minister that the imposition of an additional sales tax will be one more incentive to organized labour across the country to ask for increased wages, thus increasing inflation. It is that, and not the fact that industrial wage earners have been called upon to pay taxes, that has been the cause of the demand for increased wages throughout the year.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few brief comments. I intend to support the amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), because I consider the increased tax unjust, inequitable and unnecessary at the present time. If the government intends to pursue the policy that apparently it is now aiming at, a policy of combating inflation by the measures it is taking, by imposing credit restrictions in various forms and by increasing the cost of living, then the only assumption one who is not greatly versed in financial matters can come to is that the government intends to combat inflation by creating depression. And if it is not very careful there will be a depression on the government's doorstep within a very short space of time.

I certainly intend to vote for the amendment.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO DEFINITION OF "CHILD"

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 344, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929.

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister make a statement either at this stage or in committee?

Mr. Garson: I think it would be preferable to make it in committee. It is a very simple bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Child.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister please make a statement now?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Chairman, I think it is almost an act of supererogation on my part to attempt to add anything to the explanatory note in the bill. Under the British North America Act responsibility for the administration of justice is vested in the provincial authorities. Amongst those with whom they deal in that regard are juvenile delinquents, and to the end that they may deal separately with them, in a manner which is familiar to most of us, provision is made in the Juvenile Delinquents Act that children as defined in the act will be dealt with under its terms. The act defines a child as meaning any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of sixteen years with the provision that, in any province or provinces as to which the governor in council by proclamation has directed or may hereafter direct, "child" means any boy or girl apparently or actually under the age of eighteen years. In certain provinces of Canada they have chosen to leave the age at sixteen years. In other provinces they have asked the governor in council to issue a proclamation raising the age from sixteen to eighteen years. In one of those, namely, Alberta, after having had some experience with the treatment of children as juvenile delinquents up to the age of eighteen, the authorities there are of the opinion that it would be in the interests of the better administration of justice to lower the age in that province from eighteen back to sixteen, and the purpose of the present amendment is to make that possible.

Mr. Fulton: Are there any provinces in which the age is not either sixteen or eighteen? Is there any province which has an intermediate age? It seems to me that is the only case which could give rise to any difficulty under this bill.

Mr. Garson: No. According to my information, British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta up until the present time, and Quebec have had the age limit raised to eighteen. Alberta now wants to have it brought back to sixteen. No change has been made in Ontario, Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island where the limit is still sixteen.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if this act applies to Newfoundland. I did not have time to look over the list of statutes that have been made applicable to Newfoundland but in those that I did see there was no mention of this particular act being made applicable.

Mr. Garson: Speaking offhand in reply to my hon. friend's question, I apprehend that, under the terms by which Newfoundland entered the Canadian confederation, after the expiration of a certain time limit following that entry, certain laws of Canada become applicable to Newfoundland. I suppose that might include the Juvenile Delinquents Act, with the age at sixteen. If the province of Newfoundland wanted that age increased to eighteen it would be necessary to make representations to that effect.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister must remember that two or three months after April a proclamation was issued which specified the Canadian statutes which became applicable to Newfoundland at that time, and the same proclamation contained a list of Newfoundland statutes which were abrogated, but I had not understood that this statute had been made applicable. In Newfoundland we had a child welfare act which was administered by the department of public health and welfare, and which I thought was still being administered by that department. Under that act the age limit was seventeen, and I am wondering if the minister has made any inquiries to see whether that is still applicable.

Mr. Garson: A distinction has to be drawn in most provinces, certainly in my own province of Manitoba, between the Juvenile Delinquents Act, which is a federal statute, and a child welfare act, which is a provincial statute. A child welfare act provides certain types of social welfare for the benefit of children. The Juvenile Delinquents Act is applicable to those delinquent children who would be dealt with in the ordinary criminal courts but for the special provisions in the Juvenile Delinquents Act under which they are dealt with by a juvenile court. I shall be glad to look into the matter for my hon. friend and advise him either privately or on the orders of the day. In Newfoundland they may not have wanted the Juvenile Delinquents Act proclaimed until they had set up a juvenile court in that province to administer it. That might be the reason.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The minister is not very familiar with the situation in Newfoundland. While we do not call it a juvenile delinquents act we have the same provisions in the act dealing with public welfare. I have tried to study this bill here this afternoon, and it seems to me the provisions are almost identical. The minister does not seem to be too familiar with the situation, so it would not be fair to ask him questions; but between now and third reading he might make some inquiries to see whether this act has been made applicable to Newfoundland or whether we are still operating under the old act.

Mr. Garson: I shall be glad to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Garson: I would undertake to give my hon. friend the information on the orders of the day if we could get on with this bill now.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Very well.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Mr. Garson moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

GENERAL REVISION—AUTHORITY FOR CLASSIFYING WEIGHING AND MEASURING DEVICES, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 355, respecting weights and measures.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister not going to give an explanation?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Giving an explanation on second reading of this bill presents some difficulty, because no clear question of principle is involved. Rather the necessity for the bill arises out of the fact that there has been no general revision of the present Weights and Measures Act since 1873. There was a revision in 1914 having to do with one or two clauses dealing with the metric system, and a further revision in 1935 dealing with the short weight provisions of the act. These have been the only revisions since the act was passed originally. The result is that we have an act in force containing provisions not in accordance with present trade practices. In addition, the primary standards of length and mass were defined in this act, and we now have a more technically correct method of determining the primary standards of length and weight in the Length and Mass Units Act dealt with by this house a few days ago. Perhaps, however, I should say something about the general matters relating to weights and measures and the activities of the standards division of the Department of Trade and Commerce which administers this act.

The basic responsibility of the inspection service is to inspect and compare with the working standards all trade devices, whether they be scales, weights or other measuring devices, to ensure that they operate within specified tolerances. As part of the duty of ensuring the accuracy of measuring equipment there is a prior requirement on manufacturers to have trade equipment approved as to type before it can be sold for use in retail premises. When any particular piece of equipment has been approved and is manufactured, where practical it is inspected before release from the factory.

In addition to the statutory responsibility of annual inspections the weights and measures service carries out inspections at the request of owners of equipment and does checking for unjust scales and for short weight practices. Hon. members will appreciate the difficulties involved in carrying out these inspectional duties, particularly in the matter of travel. Where there are large concentrations of population the work can be carried out on an economical basis, but beyond these the costs are high in relation to revenue. During the fiscal year 1949-50 an inspection staff of 109 travelled some 737,000 miles, calling at 141,000 places of business, where they inspected some 449,000 pieces of equipment. Spot inspections of 5,500 scales were made, and 55,000 pre-packaged articles were checked. For the fiscal year 1950-51, up to February 28, some 448,000 devices have been inspected, 11,300 scales have been spot checked, and 100,000 pre-packaged articles have been examined. For annual and request inspections fees are charged, and the revenue from these nearly covers the cost of operation of the service. For the fiscal year 1949-50 the revenue stood at $472,452.18 as against an expenditure of $512,539.74. Preliminary estimates for the fiscal year 1950-51 place expenditures at $547,486.41 as against revenues of $495,528.44. Consideration is at present being given to a revision of the fees. I might add that the scale of fees has not been changed since 1920 though the cost of operation, particularly in relation to transportation and salaries, has gone up a great deal since that time.

The service operates under the standards division of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that division also has the responsibility of supervising the inspection of electricity and gas meters. It is rather interesting and rather a pleasure to be able to tell hon. members that the over-all revenue and expenditure from all three services is such that there is no net charge against the federal treasury.

With this background, perhaps I should turn to some of the more detailed reasons for the revision of the legislation. As I said a few minutes ago, the first weights and measures legislation was passed at the session of 1872-73, and with the exception of the 1914 and 1935 amendments to which I have referred, there have been no basic amendments to the original legislation. In view of the length of time that has elapsed, and the fact that there are many advances in manufacturing and merchandising techniques, it has been decided that this is a desirable time to review the legislative authority.

While the proposed changes do not materially alter the principles of the present legislation, the administrative changes which are desirable make it essential that the whole act be substantially revised. It is thought that this would be preferable to amending the individual sections. The act, therefore, has been completely rewritten, and although in many of the sections it is just a carrying forward of the provisions of the old act, some of the sections have been deleted because they were outdated. Many of the sections of the present act were aimed at covering the use of particular types of equipment, which in the normal course of administration or use, are covered by the general rules applying to all types. It is, therefore, felt that the special reference need no longer be continued.

To illustrate, for example, milk cans are singled out for special reference in the present act. The reference was to their capacity, the marking of their capacity and other requirements. The form of the sale of milk has been tremendously improved, and there appears to be no necessity for the special reference because this form would now come under the general requirements for static measures. For instance, a great deal of the milk is now sold by weight, and the can in which it is contained is nothing more than a container. The provisions having to do with weight now largely govern, and that provision as to the can or container is no longer applicable. I use that as an example only.

The act, in its present form, places the responsibility for inspection beyond what was originally intended, in that the responsibility is placed on inspectors to examine and compare all weights, scales and other devices which are presented to them, whether or not those devices are used in trade. Furthermore, it is beyond the capacity of any inspection staff to stamp measures of length and volume. These, as members will appreciate, are mass produced and government inspection is not possible. An alternative method which will provide some safeguards is being proposed. This method will involve a system of approved prototypes which will give the necessary control of the measures sold. It is desirable also that clear authority should be given to ensure the proper marking of trade devices. All trade devices should be marked to indicate that they are legal for trade or not legal for trade.

In the case of measures which are in many cases mass produced, a manufacturer will be able to submit a prototype and if it meets the construction and accuracy requirements it will bear a mark which will indicate it is legal for trade. Those for which no prototype is submitted will, of course, bear no mark and consequently may not be used for trade purposes. It is considered also that the respective duties and responsibilities of manufacturers and importers of weighing and measuring devices, and dealers in those devices as well as traders using those devices, should be clearly defined. In the existing legislation there is a failure to draw the distinction in the duties between these different groups.

Then, there is a wide development in the pre-packaging of goods in the last number of years. It is a common practice now to sell goods, particularly groceries, in pre-packaged form. There is an appropriate provision to provide that where these pre-packaged goods are sold by weight or measure, that weight or measure must be indicated and must be accurate. There is one other difficulty that I might mention. As all hon. members are aware, federal legislation has been proclaimed from time to time as being effective in the province of Newfoundland. The proclamation of the Weights and Measures Act has been published, and the act is now effective in that province. Some of the standards of equipment in common use there do not meet the requirements in effect in other parts of the dominion. It would appear desirable, therefore, that there should be a provision enabling the governor in council to authorize a continuation of the use of certain of those measures and devices that are now commonly used in Newfoundland until such time as the necessary adjustment can be effected.

The matter of the penalties provided by the act caused some concern. They are quite inadequate in some respects. There is a great inequality as between penalties in the different sections, depending upon the time at which the penal provisions were passed. It is desirable that consideration should be given to revising those to the point where successful prosecutions will have the desired results, and not merely result in a very low scale of penalties out of line with the more recent idea of the value of the dollar. In addition to that, whilst relatively easy to uncover the offences, the requirement of proof was quite stringent in some cases and unnecessarily severe in others. The situation was that in the old act the penal provisions were not gathered together, and were not by any means uniform the one with the other.

Then, there is another change of some interest. The present act provides that penalties may be sued for, and one-half of the penalty paid to the person bringing the charge. I believe it will be generally agreed that that practice is no longer looked upon with favour by parliament, and that provision is being dropped. Similarly, there is a provision in the present act for the voluntary surrender of equipment, and the voluntary payment of a fine, with the consent of the minister. That section has not been used for a great many years, and it is intended to drop it as being undesirable. I believe all hon. members will agree that the question of the guilt or innocence of someone is a question to be determined by a court. That provision is quite out of line with modern thinking on the subject.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the new act is, in effect, a modernizing and tightening up of the legislation. It is designed to be of such nature that it will provide a proper administration in the light of current manufacturing and trade practices.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wish to ask the parliamentary assistant if there was any reason for not following the practice followed in other bills of printing an explanation on the opposite page when sections are changed. Can the parliamentary assistant give some reason why that practice was not followed? Is there much difference between the former act and this bill?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, in principle there are no differences, but there are great differences in the language of some parts: For instance, the dropping of the definition of the primary standards of the yard and the pound, which were defined in terms of physical bars brought to this country in 1873. That definition has been dropped from this act altogether and put into the Length and Mass Units Act. Consequent upon that deletion, there are some 19 sections, some of which are dropped and others drastically changed in language, but only consequent upon that point. The changes are of that nature. They do not affect any point of principle.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I notice that two acts are referred to by the parliamentary assistant. He mentioned the revised statutes of 1914. I suppose that was carried on in 1927.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): He mentioned the 1935 amendment. Then there are two others mentioned in the headnote, namely, those of 1937 and 1950. The parliamentary assistant did not mention those.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if the hon. member would mind indicating again the reference about which he was asking?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The head note of the bill gives the original act and the amendments. The parliamentary assistant said there was only one amendment in 1935. I notice that two others are mentioned in the head note. Were they important or were they trivial amendments?

Mr. McIlraith: I am afraid I have not the reference to the 1937 amendment.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): 1937 and 1950.

Mr. McIlraith: I have not the 1937 amendment. I will send out for it. As to 1950, I might say that there was no amendment to this act in 1950. I do not understand the reference.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It is mentioned in the head note; 1950, chapter 50.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sending out for it.

Mr. Knowles: Just as a long shot, I would guess that may be one of those statute law bills that made this act effective in Newfoundland or something like that. There have been bills which did not specifically amend the statutes but which just made all the statutes applicable to Newfoundland or had some general application.

Mr. McIlraith: In any event, I am sending out for them.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): These weights and measures that we have in Newfoundland to which the parliamentary assistant refers are to be continued, are they? I refer to the quintal, the cask and the tun which are not in general use in Canada. I presume they are going to be continued until they are altered by some proclamation.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. That matter is dealt with in section 15 of the bill which provides as follows:

> Such weights and measures as the governor in council may designate may be used in the province of Newfoundland for such period as the governor in council may prescribe.

That section is intended to cover the point raised by the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that I have now looked up chapter 50 of the statutes of 1950 and I find it was the Regulations Act.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes.

Mr. Knowles: While I am on my feet, may I ask a question with respect to this bill? I note that, in the explanatory notes, we are told that one of the purposes of this bill is to provide more practicable means of ensuring against short weight or short measure of pre-packaged goods. In the course of his remarks the parliamentary assistant said that modern developments for the pre-packaging of goods had made it necessary to have provisions that would take note of those practices.

There is a particular type of question about tinned goods that I should like to ask. I fully realize that a statute like this one, so far as its enforcement provisions are concerned, simply provides in the main that a tin must contain the weight or the measure that is stipulated on the outside of it. It has, however, been drawn to my attention a number of times—in fact, on certain occasions in my own home—that a housewife will purchase a tin of some sort of food—be it fruits, sea food or what have you—and that when she gets home and opens the tin, to her amazement she finds that it is only about half full, or even less than half. I have had such examples drawn to my attention.

On one occasion I was able to weigh the tin and point out to the person who drew the matter to my attention that the full weight was there. Is there anything that can be done about a practice of that kind? It is not general. I admit that most tins that one opens are full. But cases occur where the housewife feels she has been deceived. Merely to tell her that the full weight, as indicated on the outside of the tin, is there, does not get away from the fact that to her the tin was only half full. Is there anything in the bill now before us that relates to that sort of situation?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As to that point, may I say that I believe there is a practice in the land—there certainly is in Newfoundland—that a pound tin contains twelve ounces and a half-pound tin contains six ounces. Is the parliamentary assistant aware of that practice? That is with regard to lobster.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, the pound is shrinking like the dollar.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should first of all deal with the question raised by the hon. member on section 1, with regard to the 1937 statute. The reference there is to a provision for the recovery of penalties. It is a short provision to the effect that if the penalty does not exceed $50, it can be recovered on summary conviction. I think that has no bearing on any substantive matter.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): No.

Mr. McIlraith: To deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I presume he has seen section 26.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: That section deals with pre-packaged goods. But I think the example he had in mind perhaps refers to a difficulty under the Meat and Canned Foods Act which is not dealt with under the Weights and Measures Act.

In other words, under the Weights and Measures Act the duty of inspection there is to see that the weight indicated on a pre-packaged article sold is accurate. That is, to see to it that, if the package says it contains twelve ounces, there are twelve ounces there.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And if it says it contains a pound, that there are sixteen ounces.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes; that is quite correct. There is this other legislation dealing with meats and canned foods, and relating to cans specifically, that has to do with the true and correct description of the contents of the can and so on. The difficulty the hon. member has in mind does not, I think, have to do with the true weight or measure. If it does not have to do with that, there is nothing in this bill governing it.

Mr. Knowles: I think I stated my position when I was on my feet before. I indicated that in cases of this kind the actual weight is there but that the housewife feels that she has been deceived. I know that I have been asked the straight question: Is there no protection for the housewife against that kind of deception, even though the practice may be legally correct?

A housewife buys a tin off the shelf. The information on the tin states that it contains a certain weight or a certain number of ounces. It does. However, she thinks from the size of the tin that she is getting that quantity of food. When she gets home and opens the tin, thinking that she will have enough for her family, she finds it has only half that amount. If there is nothing in this act dealing with the matter, is there something in the Meat and Canned Foods Act on that point?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the bill dealing with that point. This bill has to do only with the accuracy of weights and measures, and inspections made for that purpose.

Mr. Knowles: Who administers that act?

Mr. McIlraith: The Meat and Canned Foods Act is administered by the Department of Agriculture and has to do with the quality of content, the size of cans, the mixing of products and things of that kind.

Mr. Knowles: Does it say anything on the point I have raised, namely that a manufacturer should not put out a tin that is only half full?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know.

Mr. Knowles: Does not the parliamentary assistant think that the housewives of this country have a right to protection against that sort of thing. I would repeat that this practice is by no means general. Indeed, the general practice is the other way, and I am not casting any reflection against those who put out products in the proper fashion. However it seems to me that even the odd case of that kind should not be permitted.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I might say that a few years ago we had some difficulty in connection with the Meat and Canned Foods Act so far as canned clams and canned oysters were concerned. These are both shellfish canned in bouillon. For many years there would be three ounces of meat, we will say for the sake of argument, put into the can, and the rest of the space would be filled with bouillon. When anyone bought these products from the grocers' shelves he would not know whether he was getting three ounces or four ounces of meat, the rest being bouillon.

When a revision was made a few years ago of the Meat and Canned Foods Act this situation was remedied. Today the quantity of solid meat in the can, is indicated on the label. There is no connection with the bouillon. In other words, you do not buy a large can filled with bouillon.

The hon. member for St. John's West referred to lobsters, and to cans described as pound cans containing only twelve ounces. I do not know about the condition in Newfoundland, but that could not happen in New Brunswick. Our cans are marked in such a way as to show the exact weight of meat in those cans. Canned lobster, hermetically sealed and otherwise, is marked with the exact weight of the meat. I do not know about the meat packing industry, but that is one regulation followed very closely in the fishing industry. The solid weight of meat must be in the can, regardless of size. This has much to do with giving the consumer full value for his money.

While I am on my feet I should like to mention a problem in connection with the sale of tobacco in Canada. I live on the international boundary and, so far as I can remember, in the United States they have had a few brands of cigarettes and tobacco which have become popular. They were popular fifty years ago and have retained their popularity up to this time. As far back as I can remember there has never been a time when one could buy less than twenty cigarettes in a package. Those who have lived on the international boundary, and perhaps have smuggled a few cigarettes—the same as I have—will recall that one could buy only twenty cigarettes in a package, or a flat fifty, and that all pipe tobaccos were put up in pound, half-pound and two-ounce packages.

In Canada we have had almost every number of cigarettes in packages, ranging from five to twelve, fourteen, eighteen, twenty-two and so on. I have often wondered why there is not some regulation in that respect. Today if anyone buys a package of cigarette or pipe tobacco he will find that it may be one-sixteenth, one-twelfth or one-thirteenth, while another package only half the size will have the same amount of tobacco in it. To my mind that is a form of deception, and a matter which the department should look into with care.

As I have said, in the United States there has been a regulation in effect as long as I can remember, and I believe it existed before that time, whereby they have twenty cigarettes in a package, as well as the flat fifty, but I have no recollection of cigarettes having been put up in packages of tens and fives in the United States. They have the pound, half-pound and two-ounce package of pipe tobacco.

In Canada however there is a great conglomeration of sizes of packages—so much so that I believe the general public is being deceived on many occasions.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know that I should enter into a discussion of the packaging of cigarettes. My understanding however is that the number of cigarettes in a package is always indicated on the excise tax stamp.

To return to the specific point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the regulations under the Meat and Canned Foods Act provide in some detail for the content of certain sizes of cans. That covers however a specified list of products. So that to answer the hon. member's question with absolute accuracy one would have to know the particular product involved.

For instance the weight of apricots in a certain size of tin must be a certain amount. The difficulty he has mentioned could not arise in connection with that product. It may be, however, that there are other products not included in the schedule of the act.

Mr. Wright: Is there any regulation stating the amount of fruit as compared with the amount of juice or water which must be placed in a can?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. That is found in regulation 25. A definition is set out as to the amount of solid fruit, liquid and the like.

Sections 2 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Canadian measures of length; standard yard.

Mr. McIlraith: In the French version I find that some change is required in subsection 3. The first two words in the French version as printed are "la perche". I am informed that a correct translation would be "le rod". A similar change would have to be made in the marginal note.

Mr. Lapointe: I move:

That section 9(3) be amended by striking out the words "la perche" and substituting therefor in the French version the words "le rod."

Mr. McIlraith: It would then read:

Le rod linéaire est de cinq yards et demi.

Mr. Knowles: S'il vous plaît.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, the substitution of the word "rod" for the word "perche," as proposed by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith), is most appropriate and will be well received by members of the corporation of land surveyors of the province of Quebec and all those interested in this matter.

The English word "rod" translated by "perche" has been in the French version of the Weights and Measures Act since 1873. Most English-French dictionaries translate the word "rod" by "perche".

It is therefore easy to understand why the word "perche" was used instead of "rod", although the word "rod" may be found in nearly all French dictionaries.

In order to avoid any confusion, since the word "perche" is used in connection with the French system of measurement still used in Quebec for measuring land in seigneuries, I should think it really logical to replace the word "perche" by the word "rod". Naturally, certain changes will have to be made in the tables which appear on pages 18 and 19.

In the table appearing in schedule III, page 18, the word "rod" must be written in in place of the word "perche" in the lower portion, as well as in the second table appearing on page 19.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the amendment moved by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) carried?

On section 15—Newfoundland.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I wonder if the parliamentary assistant approves of the phrasing, "such weights and measures as the governor in council may designate may be used in the province of Newfoundland"? They are in use now and in order to make them legal should we not say, "such weights and measures as are now in use in Newfoundland"? Would it not be preferable to have it that way?

Mr. McIlraith: I think not, because the legal situation at present is that there is a breach of the law in the use of the tub and certain other measures. Technically it is illegal to use them now and this section would grant authority to make their use legal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the parliamentary assistant give an assurance that the proclamation making their use legal will come at the same time as the proclamation bringing the act into effect?

Mr. McIlraith: The situation is that they are now illegal. When this bill is passed they can be made legal.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Only by proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. McIlraith: Only by designation of the governor in council.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Will the parliamentary assistant give an undertaking that the designation will be made simultaneously?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think I should give it in that form because it might be mechanically impossible to carry it out, but I shall give an undertaking that they will not be withdrawn from use without adequate notice.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There will be no prosecutions?

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, no, there have been no prosecutions.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): And there will be none?

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Sections 16 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

On section 26—Pre-packaged goods.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask about enforcement. I realize that this comes under later sections in the bill, but those later sections refer back to earlier sections. As an example, section 40 provides:

> Every person who violates subsection one, subsection two or subsection three of section twenty-two is guilty of an offence.

I do not find anywhere that the violation of section 26 is an offence. It is true that subsection 3 of section 53 states:

> Every person who violates any provision of this act or any regulation for which no penalty is elsewhere provided in this act, is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars.

The parliamentary assistant may reply that that is the subsection which makes a violation of section 26 an offence.

Mr. McIlraith: Section 43 is the relevant section.

Mr. Knowles: Section 43 is in general terms. I point out again that under "offences and penalties" section 22 has been singled out as a section the violation of which is an offence. Why was section 22 singled out for special mention as a section the violation of which would be an offence, whereas section 26 was not?

Mr. McIlraith: Section 22 deals with the performance of contracts by weight, the rendering of services and that sort of thing, whereas the other section deals with the short weighting of goods, with specific things. I think that answers the hon. member's inquiry.

Mr. Knowles: I shall not labour the point, but, as I say, subsection 3 of section 53 provides that the violation of any provision or regulation of the act shall be an offence, to which I have no objection, but I am wondering why you single out section 22 for special mention and not other sections such as section 26? It may be that the answer is that section 40 is not necessary in view of sections 43 and 53, but I leave it to the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the effective answer is that it is not strictly necessary. The hon. member will note that section 22 contains much wider language than the ordinary provisions in the old act. It is a point over which the legal minds in the department have worked but I am afraid I did not work with them. The hon. member will notice that section 22 deals with something a little out of line with the ordinary provisions of the act, that is, the performing of services and things of that sort.

Mr. Knowles: May we take it that a violation of section 26 is no less an offence than the violation of any other provision of the act?

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Section agreed to.

Sections 27 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35—Powers of governor in council.

Mr. Charlton: I should like the parliamentary assistant to explain subsections 1 (d), (m), (o), and (p).

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member mind repeating the sections?

Mr. Charlton: Subsections 1 (d), (m), (o) and (p) of section 35.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I could deal with them one at a time. Subsection (d) is just a matter of the tolerances to be allowed in weights. It is a necessary thing in trade because you cannot be completely scientifically accurate, and it is a matter of the tolerances to be allowed.

Mr. Charlton: What tolerances would be allowed?

Mr. McIlraith: If you spell it out, it becomes impossible to spell out the same tolerances for a type of scale used for weighing multiples of 100 pounds as you would for something used to sell in ounces. It is purely a matter of covering the mechanical problems to reconcile the accuracy in the ordinary industrial sense with scientific accuracy, and that depends on the size and type of the weighing device in use.

Mr. Charlton: On a 20-ton scale what tolerance would be allowed?

Mr. McIlraith: The tolerance allowed there is one pound in a thousand.

Mr. Charlton: Forty pounds.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection (m) has to do with the weight of wrappers or containers of commodities sold by weight. What is allowed for the wrapper or container?

Mr. McIlraith: That covers the control of things like the sale of groceries where they are sold in a container. The trader is allowed to put a bag on the scale and fill it. For instance, if you are buying ten pounds of sugar bulk it provides that allowance for the paper bag is a certain specified amount. That is specified there, and it is a very fine thing.

Mr. Charlton: He can make no allowance for the paper bag?

Mr. McIlraith: If it is less than—

Mr. Charlton: If it is more than—

Mr. McIlraith: Let us state it the other way. He can make an allowance for the paper bag up to a certain amount specified in the regulations. There are regulations covering that.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection (o) has to do with the amount of error that may be tolerated in pre-packaged goods. There are a great number of pre-packaged goods sold in grocery stores today, cheese and many other commodities.

Mr. McIlraith: The reason for that is the change in weight due to temperature and humidity. Temperature and humidity can cause a slight change in weight. Let us take prunes. On a damp day prunes absorb a great deal of moisture, and on a dry day the moisture content goes down. The purpose of this section is to provide for the tolerances on different products.

Mr. Charlton: That is the very point. Is a grocer allowed to weigh his prunes on a very damp day?

Mr. McIlraith: No, because they would then not be within the tolerance. The whole thing is to set these tolerances so fine that they will not permit a trade practice of that kind. That is the very purpose of it.

Mr. Charlton: Subsection (p) deals with the exemption of pre-packaged goods. What pre-packaged goods would be exempted?

Mr. McIlraith: That is to provide for the situation where tolerances are set, for instance, on a product that comes under the Foods and Drug Act. If tolerances have been set under that act then we have authority to exempt such goods from the regulations under this act.

Mr. Charlton: Take canned goods, for instance.

Mr. McIlraith: If the specifications are set under the Meat and Canned Foods Act then this section gives authority to exempt that particular pre-packaged article from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Knight: Referring to subsection 2, I should like to ask about the inspection staff. How many weights and measures inspectors are scattered across the country? Are they on the basis of population? How does one estimate the number of inspectors assigned to a town or city of a certain population? Is it on the basis of population or is it on the basis of the number of business places? How does it work?

Mr. McIlraith: There are about 109 inspectors on this work in Canada. The areas are defined taking into account population factors, the number of places of business and the geographical difficulties of travel. Where there are great distances to cover you obviously have to have more inspectors per unit of population than you would have in a thickly populated area.

Mr. Knight: Is the work of these inspectors confined to the inspection of the accuracy or lack of accuracy of weights and measures or have they any responsibility with respect to the giving of short weight on the part of stores and other merchandising people? Is it merely a case of establishing the accuracy of the tools, if I may call them that, which the storekeeper uses?

Mr. McIlraith: No, they do both. They not only establish the accuracy of scales used in trade—there are provisions for annual inspection and so on—but the same inspectors also investigate for short weight practices.

Mr. Knight: That is the point I wanted to bring out. It seems to me the inspector must have a pretty difficult job to keep track of all these businesses. There are so many places of business that it seems to be an almost impossible situation. What procedure should be followed by an individual when he finds he is being given short weight? I presume the procedure is that he keeps the particular item he has purchased, and upon which he has been short weighted, and then submits it for inspection. What does anyone do when he finds he has received fourteen ounces of prunes when he was supposed to get sixteen?

Mr. McIlraith: If he has a record and it is short weight, there is evidence right there that would warrant prosecution. If there is any suspicion a store is doing that, these inspectors can go out and do spot checking on their own and catch the practice in that way.

Mr. Knowles: They go out and buy the prunes?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, they buy the prunes, if I may use that expression. Really the successful deterrent in this is that it is not known when the inspectors are likely to come in; and the unfavourable publicity resulting from successful prosecution for short weighting is also a great deterrent and is very effective.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Have there been many prosecutions?

Mr. Knight: I might mention a case within my own experience, where a grocery store put on what they called a sale. The price looked good, but when they got home one or two of the customers were curious enough to weigh the article and found they had been short weighted, so the advantage they thought they had gained had evaporated in that way.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the very thing it is intended the inspectors will be able to catch. That is one of the main purposes of the inspectors. As to the number of prosecutions, in 1950-51 there were ten; in 1949-50 there were four; and in 1948-49 there were sixteen.

Mr. Knight: Covering what territory?

Mr. McIlraith: That is for the whole of Canada except Newfoundland.

Mr. Knowles: Those prosecutions arose out of how many complaints?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can answer that in a little different way. In 1948-49 there were 766 warnings issued. In 1949-50 there were 724 warnings, and in 1950-51 there were 1,605. Those arose out of inspections and pre-packaged goods inspections totalling some 64,000 in 1948-49, 56,000 in 1949-50, and 108,000 in 1950-51. In addition there were 5,409 spot scale inspections in 1948-49, there were 5,498 spot scale inspections in 1949-50 and 11,397 spot scale inspections in 1950-51.

Mr. Knowles: For the purposes of this act what would be the definition of the word "warning"? What do you mean by a warning?

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I can best answer that by giving the practice. If the irregularity discovered appears to be very slight, one warning is issued. If there is a second irregularity there is a prosecution.

Mr. Bryce: Is there always a warning?

Mr. McIlraith: Not if the person concerned has a record, or if it is a flagrant case. If it is a very slight irregularity a warning is always given.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Then is the warning followed up?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, by a spot check, usually within six weeks. That may not be possible in some of the outlying regions where there may be travel problems, but the standard practice is to have the second check within six weeks in areas where access is reasonably easy.

Mr. Knowles: When there are several hundred warnings given in a year and then only a handful of prosecutions, do we understand that all those warned were checked up again?

Mr. McIlraith: That is so; and that relates back to my remark about the fear of adverse publicity being the effective deterrent under this act.

Mr. Knowles: So that even this discussion today may be all to the good.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: I note that section 35 (1) (k) permits the governor in council to make regulations respecting the fees to be paid for these inspections. Are these inspectors not appointed under the civil service commission?

Mr. McIlraith: They are, but the fees go into the consolidated revenue fund. Payment of the fees must be made to the inspector on the job at the time.

Mr. Knowles: Does that go toward his salary, or does he turn in that fee?

Mr. McIlraith: He turns in that fee. He is paid a salary in the ordinary way, like any other civil servant.

On section 50—Using or selling falsified weight, etc., or breaking seal.

Mr. Knowles: Would the parliamentary assistant tell me the meaning of the word "utters" in this section?

Mr. McIlraith: I must admit that though for some two years I did a good deal of prosecuting in my capacity as a practising lawyer, I was never sure of the origin of that word, which is to be found in a great many of the penal provisions of the Criminal Code.

Mr. Knowles: What did you think it meant?

Mr. McIlraith: It means something in the nature of putting forward, anyway. If you utter a forged cheque you put it forward.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): If you put it forward it will not be a forged cheque.

Mr. McIlraith: It has to do with the putting forward of the article. That is not the legal or precise definition, nor do I think it is a very good one, I am quite frank to say. This is a common expression used throughout the Criminal Code. I had not anticipated any question on it or I would have taken the opportunity to inform myself a little better.

Mr. Knowles: I am as satisfied with the parliamentary assistant's explanation as he is himself.

Mr. Ferguson: When a member of the House of Commons puts forward his views, is he not uttering?

Mr. Fraser: Some are muttering.

Mr. Lapointe: Others are stuttering.

On schedule II—Canadian standards.

Mr. Knowles: I have a technical question to ask, or perhaps it is a typographical question. If the parliamentary assistant and his officials will look at page 16 of the bill we are told:

> The standard unit of length for Canada is the yard, which is nine thousand, one hundred and forty-four ten-thousandths $\frac{(9,144)}{(10,000)}$ of the international metre.

It would seem that it was intended to put that numerical fraction within parentheses or within a set of brackets, but actually in the text before us only the numerator of the fraction is within the parenthesis marks. Should not the set of brackets be around the whole of the fraction?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, they should. It is a question of printing, and I do not know that it can be corrected by amendment. Quite frankly I do not know how to get at the correction of it, but the bracket should be around the whole thing.

Mr. Knowles: I suppose if the parliamentary assistant is really stuck, I could telephone my friends over in the printing bureau and ask them to straighten the matter out. I would suggest that, in some way, it should be corrected in paragraph 1 and also in paragraph 2. In both cases, the parliamentary assistant agrees with me that what is intended is to place the entire fraction within the bracket.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall raise the question with the printers and see that it is straightened out.

RETURNED SOLDIERS INSURANCE ACT

PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BENEFICIARY RESTRICTIONS, APPORTIONMENT OF INSURANCE, ETC.

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act for the following purposes:

To strike out from the act certain parts that no longer apply due to the fact that the time of taking out new contracts of insurance has expired;

To increase the amount of insurance moneys payable under the policy at the time of death of the insured;

To reduce to some extent administration difficulties now found in the act and to bring the act more in line with the Veterans Insurance Act in the matter of beneficiary restrictions and particularly in the manner of changing of beneficiaries and altering mode of apportionment of insurance;

To remove certain restrictions respecting the payment of insurance benefits to the estate of the insured; and

To waive premiums on life contracts when the insured reaches his eighty-fifth birthday.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I understand the veterans committee is sitting now. The minister would not like to proceed with that matter now.

Mr. Lapointe: I do not believe there will be any objection. It is proposed that this bill be referred to the veterans affairs committee. If I can get it through the resolution stage and the next two stages, then the committee would be seized with the matter immediately.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): It seems to me to be the sort of thing which the members of the veterans affairs committee should be here to discuss. Every member of the veterans affairs committee is out of the house.

Mr. Lapointe: As I pointed out, the bill which will follow this resolution will be referred to the veterans affairs committee, where it will be dealt with. The bill is rather a technical one, and I think it could be discussed more effectively in the select committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): However convenient and natural it might be to refer it to that committee, surely that does not mean that we practically cease to exist. Might it not be suitable for the minister to make at least a short statement before that action is taken?

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry if I gave my hon. friend the impression that I was trying to do away with the house. Hon. members will recall that this Returned Soldiers Insurance Act was passed in 1920, and authorized the minister to enter into insurance contracts with veterans of world war I, certain widows of such soldiers, under terms and conditions provided in the act. The act was amended in 1930, at which time the date of August 31, 1933, was fixed as the final cut-off date for receiving applications for insurance under that act.

Now, the main purpose of the bill will be to remove certain difficulties in the administration of the act, and furthermore to bring the act more in line with the Veterans Insurance Act which followed world war II, and concerning which a bill was introduced in this house about a week ago. That bill has now been referred to the veterans affairs committee.

For instance, it is proposed to remove certain restrictions now placed on the insured respecting the change of beneficiary and the change of mode of payment of the policy proceeds. Under the present act such a change can only be made by a declaration of the insured endorsed upon or attached to the policy. Hereafter, those changes may be made by the insured in his will or by any other document satisfactory to the minister.

Under the act as it stands at the present time only the reserve in the policy is authorized to be paid where the insurance proceeds pass to the estate of the insured. Hon. members will recall that when I introduced the amendments to the Veterans Insurance Act a few days ago, they contained one section which removes that situation from that other act. We intend to do the same thing here. It is proposed that the face value of the policy will be paid where, under the provisions of the act, the insurance money is payable to the estate of the insured. There is also a disability benefit under the present act consisting in a waiver of premium and the payment to the insured of the insurance in instalments, in certain cases where the insured becomes totally and permanently disabled from a disability that does not entitle him to a pension under the Pension Act or to hospital allowances while receiving treatment from the department on account of a war disability.

In this case, as in the case of the Veterans Insurance Act, it has been found difficult to determine what was a total permanent disability; and it is intended at this time to remedy this situation by mentioning in the act that when a total disability has existed continuously for a period of one year, it shall meet the purpose of this section.

We also intend to place this act more in conformity with the Veterans Insurance Act by authorizing the payment of a sum up to $2,000 at the time of the death of the insured. Under the present act the limit is $1,000; and, as I explained the other day, the balance is paid in the form of annuities over a period of five, ten, fifteen or twenty years.

The same reasons which apply with regard to the other act apply in respect of this change in the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act.

In the amendments there will also be something to clarify the point with regard to qualification of members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to receive benefits under these contracts. The remaining amendments are of a minor and administrative nature and, as I mentioned before, are mostly meant to put it in line with the Veterans Insurance Act. Provision is also made to strike out those parts of the act that no longer apply owing to the fact that no new contracts are being entered into and also for certain amendments in order to make the act conform with the changes proposed in the bill.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I am sure that everyone here is pleased to know that these amendments are to be introduced and that they will mean an improvement to the Veterans Insurance Act. I had no idea, until I heard the minister speak the other day, that this law was in existence at all. I am sure that it will be gratifying, to all those in Newfoundland who are enlisting in the forces going to Korea and in the regular army, to know that it exists, and also that improvements are being made in it.

In reply to a question I asked the other day, the minister said that insurance was on an actuarial basis. I gather that there are some provisions here which are not usually accorded under ordinary insurance contracts. Some of them are of special interest to soldiers, and would not be given by the ordinary insurance company. I am sure we are all pleased to know that the amount which will be payable immediately has been increased from $1,000 to $2,000. Did I understand the minister to make a statement to the effect that the maximum amount allowable under this legislation will be $10,000?

Mr. Lapointe: The maximum amount for which the contract could have been entered into was $5,000. My hon. friend realizes, of course, that there are no new contracts entered into under this act. This legislation was enacted immediately after the first war; and as I mentioned previously, September, 1933, was the date line for new contracts. Now veterans of world war II have the benefit of the new act, namely the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to ask the minister if he will give us some figures showing just what has been the extent of the operations under the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act which, I understand, affected the situation after the first war, and also what has been the extent of the operations of a similar kind since the second war.

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not this information here today. I do not want my hon. friend to misinterpret my remarks, but again I expected that type of information would be asked for and be more easily given and explained in the special committee on veterans affairs, before which it has been the habit to call in officers of the department and those who are directly concerned with the administration of the act. I regret that I have not here today this information asked for by my hon. friend.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not wish to try to make any difficulty, Mr. Chairman; but quite frankly, it seems to me a pity that all those who are familiar with this matter happen to be in various committees at the moment. If the chairman would allow me to call it six o'clock, I should be glad. My feeling is that before the resolution leaves this committee of the whole there should at least be the opportunity for the people who are familiar with it to be here and to agree, as I feel sure they will, in exactly the course proposed by the minister. It is now almost six o'clock. I think I can carry on until six o'clock.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): May I make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Royal generally handles these matters. I understand hon. members want these bills to go to the committee.

Mr. Knowles: The committee have about six bills now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am not insisting. But I would point out that the last time we had a resolution like this before us the hon. member for Royal said, "All right, it is to go to the committee", and it was not postponed. I think it is before the committee. But if the hon. member insists on his rights, he can do so. The minister says he has not these details, and that they can be given by officials before the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I think the word "insists" is a strong word to be used.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Then I will withdraw it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is just about one minute to six. In any event, all I am suggesting is that we should keep this resolution in committee here so that those who are familiar with the matter—including the hon. member for Royal and the others—will be able to have their day in court or their minute in court.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): They will have it, because these bills all come back here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I should prefer that those who are familiar with this matter should be here when it is dealt with.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will be six o'clock before my hon. friend gets through. He will speak longer than that.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It will be six o'clock very soon. Of course, if the minister insists on cross-examining me like this until six o'clock, I suppose I can stand it. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will take up the Senate amendments to the Indian Act. I understand that there are some minor amendments to which the government does not object. Then we will go into committee of supply and consider the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development, the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Labour.

Mr. Green: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The first one will be resources and development.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 7, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT AT LONDON, ONTARIO —SECURITY PRECAUTIONS

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on June 5 the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) asked a question about increased security precautions at London.

At the 27th Canadian ordnance depot, London, the security guard now provided consists of twelve watchmen and four security supervisors. An increase of five watchmen was recently approved, and is being proceeded with.

At the subdepot at Hagersville there is a security guard consisting of ten watchmen and three security supervisors. An increase of eight watchmen was recently approved and proceeded with.

The answer to the second question is that negotiations are taking place with the province of Ontario for the purchase of land adjacent to the Ontario hospital in London.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

STATEMENT AS TO NON-PROCLAMATION IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at the request of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) I undertook to state what the position of Newfoundland was in relation to the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I had suggested yesterday that the government of Newfoundland may not have wanted the Juvenile Delinquents Act proclaimed in force in that province. I find upon inquiry that this is the fact. We therefore have not proclaimed it, and as a result no part of this act is now in force in Newfoundland.

I think it is only fair that I should state what the Newfoundland government's present position is in this regard. I telephoned yesterday to the Hon. Leslie Curtis, attorney general of Newfoundland, who informed me then, and has since confirmed this information by wire, that the Newfoundland department of welfare has not asked the Newfoundland government to have the Juvenile Delinquents Act brought into force in Newfoundland, because the juvenile offenders section, being part II of the Newfoundland Welfare of Children Act, 1944, as amended, is for all practical purposes identical with the federal Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929. Mr. Curtis states, moreover, that at this year's session a family court was constituted patterned after Quebec legislation, which court will shortly assume the functions of a juvenile court.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. How many civilian employees are engaged in the Department of National Defence?

[Mr. Blanchette.]

2. What is the total cost of civilian personnel, including salaries, wages and all other expenses?

Mr. Claxton: Stand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. In how many locations in Canada do civilian employees of the Department of National Defence number more than (a) 10; (b) 50; (c) 100; (d) 500; (e) 1,000?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): With respect to these four questions, all of which stand, I should like to ask the Department of National Defence to hurry along the answers as much as possible. If I remember correctly, the minister told us the other night there was certain information they could get within a minute and a half. I tried to phrase these questions so that it would only mean the obtaining of information readily available.

Mr. Claxton: I have heard the observations of the hon. gentleman. I can assure him that none of these questions can be answered in a minute and a half. I should think the least it would take for any of them would be a good many days, if not weeks; but we will bring them on.

COUNTY COURT FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

What steps are being taken to set up a county court in Newfoundland?

Mr. Garson: If I may answer this question orally, the constitution of provincial courts comes exclusively within provincial jurisdiction; therefore I think this is a question which more properly should be asked in the Newfoundland legislature.

APPOINTMENT OF FOURTH JUDGE TO NEWFOUNDLAND SUPREME COURT

Mr. Higgins:

What is being done with respect to the appointment of a fourth judge to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland?

Mr. Garson: I think this question might also be answered orally. No legislation has been passed by the Newfoundland legislature which would authorize the appointment of a fourth supreme court judge.

HOUSING

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCE OF ONTARIO—UPLANDS AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): I should like to address two questions to the Minister of Resources and Development. The first question is: What recent negotiations have taken place between the federal government and the Ontario provincial government for the erection of 5,000 housing units in Ontario? The second question is: How many of these housing units will be erected in the Toronto area?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): There have been negotiations recently between the government of Ontario and us with respect to housing developments in Ontario under section 35 of the housing act. The most recent discussions were held on Tuesday, June 5, between the minister of planning and development, Mr. Griesinger, and his officials, on the one hand, and myself and the officers of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the other. In reply to the second question, I can only say that so far no specific proposals have been submitted by the government of Ontario, and I am therefore not able to give the hon. member information with respect to numbers of houses involved.

Mr. Coldwell: As a supplementary question, is the minister aware of the situation created by the removal of tenants from Uplands airport? If so, is he co-operating with the city of Ottawa in order to find these people the accommodation that is urgently necessary?

Mr. Winters: I am aware of the situation, and to the best of my knowledge everything possible is being done.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 79, respecting Indians.

Mr. Coldwell: What are the amendments?

Mr. Fulton: Could we be told what the amendments are?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): There are three amendments. The first is the insertion of a comma. The second is the substitution of the word "or" for "and". The third is to strike out an unnecessary "that".

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF RESOURCES AND DEVELOPMENT

383. Departmental administration, $381,223.

Mr. Croll: As this is the item under which we may have a general discussion, I should like to ask the minister to make a statement on housing at this time. There are a few of us in the house who want to discuss housing, and it is a matter of great urgency.

Mr. Winters: I am in the hands of hon. members on that point. I am prepared to make a statement on housing. I would hope that at this stage we would be able to have the full discussion on housing and deal with the items for housing in the estimates.

Mr. Fleming: There is a problem raised there. I think anything that will contribute toward the orderly discussion of this most important question will be desired and welcomed by the committee. There is no one item that presents as good an opportunity for that purpose as this first item. The last item in the estimates of this department relates to emergency housing. Therefore I think the first item is the one that presents the committee with the best opportunity, and the earliest, for the discussion of this important question. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that with your approval the discussion on housing in general should proceed now.

Mr. Winters: I have no objection. I think it might save time in the long run if we could consider that any discussion of housing would dispose of item 427 in the estimates, and a similar item under loans and investments. If that is the understanding, I am quite prepared to proceed.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course that could only be a tentative understanding. I would agree to a tentative understanding, but, between now and the time the last item comes before us, problems may arise that members may wish to present to the committee, and I do not think they should be precluded from so doing.

The Deputy Chairman: If the main interest of hon. members at this point is to discuss housing on the first item, which relates to departmental administration, perhaps the suggestion made by the minister could be dealt with, namely, to consider that the specific item pertaining to housing is also before the committee at the same time. Therefore when the general discussion is over on housing, I might be permitted to call the specific item relating to housing and ask that it carry. Is that agreeable to the committee?

Mr. Fleming: It is understood, then, that you will call those specific items, Mr. Chairman, when it appears that the general discussion on housing has reached its end?

The Deputy Chairman: I am trying to say that when the general discussion on housing is completed I will call the specific item relating to housing and ask if it is carried, so that we will not have a duplication of the discussion.

Mr. Knowles: Since we want to discuss housing I suggest that item 383 be permitted to stand and that item 427 be called. Then we can have our discussion on housing.

Mr. Winters: That is satisfactory.

The Deputy Chairman: If that is agreeable to hon. members I will do so.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Housing—

427. Emergency shelter administration, $250,000.

Mr. Winters: Perhaps I should begin with a statement about the present and future prospects for housing, and should say something about government activities in the housing field.

[Mr. Fleming.]

At the beginning of 1950 there were 59,503 houses under construction. In the course of the year 89,015 new houses were completed. In all, counting conversions, 91,754 were added to our stock of housing. There were 60,538 under construction on January 1 of this year. The total expenditure on these 150,000 houses that were under construction at one time or another during the year was about $836 million. Fifty per cent of the money came from the personal resources of the property owners. This represents cash investment both as equity in properties financed with mortgage assistance and full cash investments in properties purchased without mortgage financing. Institutional lenders furnished 25 per cent of the total, and other lenders 5 per cent; the remaining 20 per cent came from public funds either as loans or as expenditure by government on housing built on government account. There has been an increase in the proportion of new housing starts which contain some element of government assistance in the form of direct loans, joint loans or guarantees. In 1950, 47 per cent of all residential starts had such public assistance, as compared with 38 per cent in 1949 and 31 per cent in 1948. In units the comparison is 44,552 units in 1950, 35,354 in 1949, and 29,035 in 1948.

Canada has completed some 460,000 new units since 1944. This is an outstanding accomplishment which compares favourably with that of any other country in the world. But many more houses are still needed. The ratio of front doors to families has not improved greatly over the last several years. In the years 1939 to 1946, and again in 1948, the net family formation rate exceeded the number of houses built. In 1947 housing completions had a slight margin of about 4,000 units. In the last two years family formation declined and housing completions increased to the extent that we had a net margin of about 40,000 units.

Building costs which tended to level off in 1949 and early 1950 have been climbing steadily since last May. Cost increases, of course, make it more difficult for prospective home owners to meet the current equity requirements.

Last year the material supply situation for the construction industry was better than for many years. It is true that last summer, because of hydro and other construction programs, there were spot shortages of cement. However, almost right up to the end of the year there were no difficulties in supply except for a few spot shortages. Production of nearly all building materials reached an all time high in 1950. We expected that material difficulties which were spotty last winter would rapidly become more general as the defence construction program got under way. There was the danger that houses would be started which could not be completed. I am happy, however, that as yet material shortages have not interfered as greatly with house builders' operations as was expected. Continued high level of production of most materials has maintained supplies to the point where, with a little shopping around and some substitutions, builders are able to meet their requirements. Some builders of larger projects are finding their production schedules hampered by difficulty in maintaining a smooth flow of material. Although the situation on materials is in general fairly satisfactory, there are some real difficulties. Steel sheets and pipe and other metal materials are very scarce. Even if there is an abundance of all other materials, a shortage of sheet metal for furnaces, or pipe for plumbing, can cripple our housing program.

Two other problems relating to housing development are present in most localities. The first is a shortage of serviced land. With today's costs, both in general administration and in land development, many municipalities have difficulty in finding ways and means to finance the servicing of fringe areas to provide land for residential building. In those cities where residential areas are developed there is the second and resulting problem of providing educational facilities. This problem is particularly onerous in the newly expanded suburban municipalities where the assessment roll is largely residential property and where the householders are for the most part young couples bringing up families. With today's costs, building, equipping and maintaining the required additional schools places a serious financial problem before municipal and provincial governments.

Through the first four months of 1951 housing activity has kept up pretty well to the 1950 level. New housing starts in municipalities of 5,000 and over, at 13,847 are only 1½ per cent below last year. Completions at 20,849 are up 18·7 per cent. On April 30 there were 33,943 houses under construction, or 2·7 per cent more than one year ago. Now, starts and completions in the first four months are not necessarily a sound guide to the year's performance, but it seems likely that in 1951 housing completions will come reasonably close to the 1950 mark. If those houses under construction at the beginning of the year, and those started before May 1 are completed, 1951 completions will be 85 per cent of 1950's but if the rate of new starts is maintained at near the 1950 level in May and June, we will come even closer to the 1950 mark.

In the first four months of this year 8,436 joint loans for 10,148 units were approved under the National Housing Act. This compares with 8,916 loans for 10,147 units in the same period in 1950. However, the loan approvals in April were fewer than in April, 1950. In April, 1951, 2,533 joint loans were approved in respect of 3,141 units, as compared with 3,198 loans on 3,639 units in April, 1950.

There are some real obstacles in the way of maintaining this level of housing activity. As well as the difficulties of an insufficient supply of serviced land, increasing building costs and a tightening of mortgage money, there is the possibility that the material supply situation will tighten. I spoke a few minutes ago about the shortage of steel sheets, pipe and other metal house components which is even now causing some difficulty. Even though there is every prospect of increasing the overall capacity of our construction industry, and notwithstanding the curtailment of some commercial construction because of the steel regulations and deferred depreciation, it may well be that house building will feel more general shortages before the end of the year. The defence program includes a substantial amount of new construction, and I think it unreasonable to expect that the construction industry can take the additional very heavy load of defence construction without a cut being made in other types of construction. It is likely that the house builder will be hardest hit when building materials in large quantities are channelled into defence construction. The probable curtailment of commercial construction will tend to reduce the competition to house builders. Perhaps the effect will be sufficient to compensate fully for the diversion of materials into defence construction.

As I said previously, Canada's accomplishments in the field of housing since the war rank us high among all nations in house production per capita. The standard of housing in Canada compares favourably with that of any other country. The housing shortage is general throughout the world, and in fact it is more severe in nearly all other countries than it is here. We sometimes hear it suggested that somewhere there is someone with an almost magic formula of new materials and methods which will produce the low cost house to end all housing problems. Perhaps some day there will be such a development. A method which would produce satisfactory housing under today's conditions at about half present costs, or say $4 or $5 per square foot, would provide a happy solution to many housing problems. Research toward this end is being carried on, not only in Canada, out also in many other countries throughout the world, but as yet only minor advances have been reported. Most of the developments so far have been in the nature of improvement in methods and materials. These improvements have not resulted in lower costs, but rather they have tended to give us a better house at about the same cost. The standard of house demanded by the Canadian housewife—and it is the housewife who in large measure determines our housing standards—continues to show an upward trend. If Canadian householders were willing to accept housing of the standard and pattern of the 1920's, about 15 per cent more houses could be built for the money now being spent.

The degree to which our housing stock can be increased through the next few years will be determined to an important extent by how much we are required to commit to the defence program. Housing as a whole is a part of the civilian economy. There must be general agreement that substantial expenditure on defence preparations must be accompanied by a reduction of spending in other fields. However, we have stated that the government attaches a high order of importance to housing and will emphasize it to a degree second only to the direct defence program itself. We will continue to make every effort to see that housing is built in the areas where it is most needed.

In September, 1949, the National Housing Act was amended by the addition of section 35. This section provided a method by which all levels of government may participate in public housing. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may, pursuant to agreements between the government of Canada and the government of any province, join with a provincial government or its agent in projects for the development of land and housing purposes or for the construction of houses for sale or rent. Capital cost and profits and losses are shared 75 per cent by the corporation and 25 per cent by the provincial authority. It is left to the province to decide whether a part of the province's share is to be borne by the municipal government.

After section 35 was adopted, it was necessary for a provincial government to adopt complementary legislation before any agreements could be concluded. It was well into 1950 before any of the provinces were able to pass such legislation. During that year seven of the provinces—Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland—enacted complementary legislation. Nova Scotia followed suit this year.

[Mr. Winters.]

Although it was well into 1950 before agreements were concluded with any of the provinces, some worth-while progress has been made in one year's operation. Newfoundland was the first province to enter into an agreement with the federal government for housing under this section. A rental housing project of 140 units is now almost complete in St. John's, and a land assembly project to provide some 600 building lots is under way. In Saint John, N.B., tenders have been called on a project of 88 low-rental units and a land assembly project is under discussion. In Ontario activity to date has been limited to land assembly. Projects involving a total of over 600 acres are under way in London, Windsor, Ottawa, St. Thomas, Kingston, and Atikokan. There have been recent discussions between the government of Ontario and the federal government about the possibility of expanding operations under this section, and we expect that before too long we shall receive specific proposals from them.

Several proposals are under active consideration by the province of Saskatchewan. An agreement has been reached with the province of British Columbia in respect of a 200 unit low rental project at Little Mountain in Vancouver now out to bid.

I am not too sure how extensive the dominion-provincial program will be in the immediate future. All the difficulties inherent in the over-all situation are present in public housing projects. In addition to possible difficulties in the supply of labour and materials, there is the very serious question of building costs. I am not at all sure that today's costs will permit the construction of rental housing that is truly low rental in character. This may well have to be found by the partners concerned.

Section 35 has the merit of enabling the various levels of government to act together in a direct way to place housing where it is urgently needed. I believe it will be generally agreed that public housing under this section should normally be contemplated only in the larger centres of population. Although we are not pleased at the prospect of public housing projects competing with private builders and operators for available building materials, we are willing to consider any firm proposals the provinces may advance for housing projects under section 35, especially in areas where the defence program has aggravated the housing shortage. If it appears that a project can be completed in a reasonable time at not too excessive cost, we will be willing to proceed. However, it is not our intention to enter into projects under section 35 where occupancy will be limited to those higher income families whose needs are normally met by private house builders. We wish to avoid entering into competition with the building industry especially in the range of economic housing.

The construction program of Wartime Housing Limited, the veterans rental housing program, and the houses constructed by Housing Enterprises Limited which were later taken over by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, have resulted in some 53,000 rental housing units being owned by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at one time or another. Over 30,600 of these houses have been offered for sale. To date, a total of 20,700 have been sold. Sales are running at a good rate, and I would guess that by the end of the summer at least 4,500 more will be sold. For the most part these houses are sold to veteran tenants. One hundred and sixty-four have been sold for removal from site, and 2,126 have been sold en bloc to municipal governments.

It is to be remembered that these houses are not sold in the open market but that the tenant has first opportunity to purchase. If a tenant is unwilling or unable to buy, normally he may continue to occupy the house as a tenant. There are a few cases from time to time where a tenant who does not intend to purchase is requested to move to another house owned by the corporation in the same area to make his house available to a veteran purchaser. Houses which have been rented and which become vacant are not rented again but are held for sale to a veteran applicant. The sales program is going very well indeed, and the corporation's position as Canada's largest landlord is being steadily reduced. The reduction in the corporation's real estate account is, of course, offset by a corresponding increase in its mortgage and sale agreement portfolio.

There are two items in the estimates dealing with housing. One—an item under loans and investments in the amount of $12,700,000—is to provide funds which may be borrowed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under section 34 of the National Housing Act, 1944. This sum is required to complete housing projects under the 1949 veterans' rental housing program and a project at Deep River, Ontario; for financing permanent improvements to munition workers' houses now under sale, and for the construction of additional houses at Deep River. On April 1 there were 621 houses under construction in the projects still to be completed; permanent improvements were under way on 752 houses. A project which will add 200 houses at Deep River will be started under the 1951 program.

The other, an item in the departmental estimates for emergency shelter administration in the amount of $250,000, is to provide for administration costs and operating deficits in connection with emergency shelter projects operated by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and to meet restoration costs connected with the closing out of emergency shelter projects. Considerable progress has been made in closing out projects operated by the corporation, universities and municipalities. We have every hope that 1951 will see many more of these projects closed or reduced.

It is difficult to forecast the prospects for housing in 1952 and 1953 with much certainty. Conditions have been changing from day to day, and the opinions of today may well be altered by the developments of tomorrow.

However, it is apparent that many of the conditions now present are unfavourable to an increased volume of housing. Indeed, the big problem may be to prevent the present volume from being decreased to the full extent of the unfavourable conditions we are now encountering.

Construction costs have increased about 15 per cent in the last year. This means that the same size house is now available only to individuals whose income is approximately 15 per cent higher than the people who bought or rented this type of house a year ago. I cannot see that increasing the level of National Housing Act loans to meet these higher costs would be a solution. Such higher loans would add to the pressure on housing costs. Furthermore, the higher the mortgage loan, the higher the monthly payment. It is for this reason that we have held firmly to our January 1950 level of lending values. Moreover, even under present conditions houses are being built and occupied to the full extent of available mortgage funds. It would seem prudent, therefore, to aim at spreading available mortgage money over as wide a number of new houses as possible, thereby encouraging maximum production. Although the high down payment is an obstacle and an initial hardship on the home owner who must himself finance the increase in cost, I believe it is better than encouraging him to assume debt service costs beyond his means.

Earlier this year increases in interest rates made lending institutions increasingly unwilling to lend money for mortgage purposes under the National Housing Act. It seemed to be in the interest of housing and the public generally to have the terms of this act remain operative. Accordingly, I announced the government's intention to increase interest rates, and I am hopeful that the increase to be permitted under the National Housing Act, to which I referred earlier in the house, will assist in maintaining the flow of mortgage money at a good level. An amendment to deal with this proposal will be before the house shortly.

As I said earlier, it seems possible that in 1951 we will complete about the same number of houses as we did in 1950. However, current conditions may well reflect themselves most clearly in a reduction in the carry-over of houses under construction into 1952. I would not wish to hazard a forecast from this distance of what our 1951 carry-over will be.

The government recognizes the need for housing, and, as far as present circumstances permit, we are doing everything to keep house building at a high level. We will pay particular attention to the communities where housing is most needed. Because defence production is the main effort of the country today the government is anxious to do everything it can to meet the housing needs in defence production areas.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee will be glad to have this opportunity to debate the whole housing situation in Canada. It is anomalous, it seems to me, that this problem, which is still so serious, has received relatively little attention in the debates in the house at the present session. On two occasions the minister made statements containing announcements of change of policy on the part of the government, but they were made under circumstances which precluded debate. I think you will agree, sir, that this is the first occasion on which the house at the present session—although we have been in session now for something like four and a half months—has had an opportunity of expressing itself with regard to the housing situation in general.

The committee will appreciate the full statement which has been made by the minister this afternoon. The committee is glad to have information which, in the up-to-date form in which it was given to the committee by the minister, had not been previously issued in complete form in any of the publications under government auspices.

There are some features in the situation which are not altogether dark, Mr. Chairman. Nevertheless I think that the general tone and effect of the minister's statement today is such as to leave us with a rather gloomy outlook in regard to the possibility of meeting the serious housing situation that still prevails in Canada. There are several factors that, as I think the committee will recognize at once, inevitably present difficulties. The first of these is the shortage of materials. The minister has indicated that shortage of materials has not as yet been seriously retarding house construction. I do not know how general that experience has been. I think that a good many builders—certainly those in the larger civic areas where housing conditions are so difficult—have been experiencing difficulties on account of shortages of materials. I am disposed to think that the picture in Canada is not nearly as bright in that respect as the minister's statement this afternoon might have been taken by some to indicate. I do not think the minister has adequately recognized the problem that the builders of the country are facing with respect to shortages of needed building materials.

The picture as to building costs is likewise growing more serious. The daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics of May 23 draws attention to the rise in the price index of general and residential building materials. It gives these figures:

> Wholesale prices of both general and residential building materials moved to higher levels in April, according to index numbers compiled by the dominion bureau of statistics. The index for general building materials advanced to 293·9 from 291·5 in March and 234·5 in April last year, and for residential building materials it rose to 287·2 from 282·6 in March and 227 a year earlier.

Just think what that means, Mr. Chairman, in terms of building costs. Since last we had an effective opportunity for debate on this question in the house a year ago, the costs of residential building materials has risen from 227 to 287·2. That is an alarming increase. Moreover that increase in the cost of materials has been paralleled, if indeed not outdistanced, by the rise in building labour costs. The situation with respect to the cost of building therefore presents a serious picture indeed, and it is not one which is likely to warrant any great optimism on the part of the minister or anyone facing this problem in its serious aspects.

Notwithstanding the increase in the cost of building materials and of labour costs, construction in 1950 in Canada—I am speaking now of the total volume of construction of all kinds—reached an all-time high. Figures which I saw this week have indicated that the volume of construction—these figures come from the records of construction associations—so far this year is likely to be above last year. Taking out of that the portion relating to housing, I think it is evident that there is very serious competition in Canada today for a quite inadequate supply of building materials, and in that competition housing construction is beginning to suffer, and will increasingly suffer from this point on in competition with other forms of demand for building materials and building labour. On these various accounts, Mr. Chairman, I think it must be recognized that the housing situation still has to be measured in terms of critical proportions. It is no exaggeration to say that we still have a housing crisis in Canada.

The mayors of this country met in Montreal in February last at the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. At that meeting these municipal officials, the heads of their municipalities from coast to coast, people who are in the closest possible contact with housing problems in all their ramifications in all parts of Canada, said that housing is the No. 1 problem in Canada, still the No. 1 problem. They went on to express views with respect to the housing situation in Canada in which they indicated alarm over the situation as it has been developed.

That is the expression of a representative group than whom I think there is no group in the Dominion of Canada who are closer to this problem. We have similar statements as well following recent announcements on the part of the government as to changes in housing policy, which give expression to alarm as to the effect of these changes in government policy. I hope to have an opportunity of referring to them later in my remarks.

These are serious problems. These developments to which I have referred are developments that underline not only the fact that we have a continuing housing problem, but that that housing problem is likely to be reflected in reduction in the rate of construction, while at the same time the demand for housing increases apace.

It is evident that the government must give some thought to deciding what are the most important demands for available material. It is evident that it will not be enough for the government simply to be content to allow a situation of this kind—I am speaking particularly of building materials—to take care of itself, because in the competition that is going on for that inadequate supply of building materials housing is losing out, and the figures show that to be increasingly the fact.

Against that background what are we to say of government policy as it has been unfolded at this present session? I think it is fair to say there have been three stages of the development of government housing policy in the lifetime of the present parliament. The first, of course, was in the fall of 1949. We all well remember that the government had made unqualified promises in the election campaign about the measures that they were going to take to cure the housing problem. One might have thought that the people of Canada had had sufficient experience by that time of the way in which the government had failed to measure up to promises. Nevertheless, apparently the people of Canada took those lavish election promises at their face value.

In the fall session of 1949 we looked for at least a measure of performance of the promises. Well, you will recall, Mr. Chairman, that early in the fall session the minister made a statement in which great emphasis was put upon the fact that the government was going to increase mortgages by one-sixth, and this was going to be very effective in meeting the problems of those who did not have sufficient funds to make the down payment then required as between the prevailing cost of houses on the one hand and the amount available under National Housing Act mortgages on the other, and so with loud trumpetings this new policy was introduced and found its way into the act. You will recall that at that time some of us pointed out that if the government chose to do so it could largely nullify the effect of the lending provisions of the act by holding down the approved lending value of properties. After all, there is not much sense in talking about increasing the mortgages by one-sixth, if in fact you are working under the same total percentage of lending value and you set about to hold lending values down till they are quite out of keeping with actual increases in property values and prices. And, sir, that is exactly what happened.

It was not very long before the government undertook—and, if you please, deliberately—to reduce the benefits that they had held out to the people of Canada as likely to flow from the 1949 amendments, and by this new housing policy they deliberately held down lending values. You will remember that as of January 1, 1950, in effect the government through its agency froze lending values, and, from that time to this, lending values have, so far as the government is concerned, remained frozen, notwithstanding the continued increase in the prices of residential property and the increases in the costs of construction.

Well, that was the first step on the part of the government—and a very weighty step it was, too—in nullifying the effect of the 1949 amendment of the housing act. That, sir, had some other serious aspects to it, in this respect: that in Ontario the government of that province had previously been in the field of second mortgage loans in order to assist intending house builders in meeting that very serious problem of the spread between the mortgage allowed under the National Housing Act and the prices at which houses were being constructed. As a matter of fact, the Ontario plan was much more favourable to house construction than was the federal plan, because the rate of interest in Ontario on second mortgages was just 3½ per cent, whereas the rate of interest applied by the federal government through its agency to the additional one-sixth loan under the 1949 amendment was 4½ per cent. But the government of Ontario, relying in good faith upon this bland assurance of the federal government, and upon the enactment by parliament in November, 1949, of the amendments to the act, had only one course open to it in this respect, and that was to step out of the field of second mortgages. Accordingly it did so.

Theoretically the dominion stepped in. But, Mr. Chairman, it just got its toe wedged inside the door far enough to oust the government of Ontario and its progressive plan of assistance, and then it proceeded to withdraw that foot by steady degrees. And so we have seen, in effect, a nullification—perhaps not a complete nullification, but at least a substantial measure of nullification—on the part of the government opposite of the intent of parliament as reflected in its enactment of amendments to the housing act in November of 1949.

That was regrettable enough. Surely that was a heavy enough burden to cast upon the people of this country. Particularly is that true when applied to the younger people setting up homes, who just have not had the opportunity in the face of the high cost of living, to set aside enough money to provide for that spread between the cost of house construction on the one hand and National Housing Act mortgages on the other.

The next backward step taken by the federal government, the next step taken by this government to nullify the enactment of parliament, to defeat the wishes of parliament and to break faith with the people of Canada in the light of the promises made to them during the election campaign of two years ago, was taken in February of this year.

Hon. members will recall the statement made by the minister on February 5, when he announced in the house that, effective at once, the federal government was withdrawing the one-sixth additional mortgage provision. Immediately that statement was accompanied by some veiled suggestions that the move was temporary. But if it is temporary, at least it has been in effect now for four months. Although hon. members have tried to drag a statement from the minister as to when this temporary policy will have run its course, they have been met with the stock and stale answer, an answer which has been worn to death in the house by members of the government who say: "That is a matter of government policy upon which announcement will be made in due course."

This announcement of breach of faith the minister made on February 5 has already been in effect for four months, and there has not been the slightest indication from the government opposite of any change of heart or any intention of bringing to an end this measure that they suggested, in a veiled way, was to be only temporary in its effect.

Mark you, that step was taken by the government opposite without the slightest consultation with parliament. They had no authority from parliament to tear up section 35 of the act. That was an enactment of the parliament of Canada. But the government opposite simply says, "We are going to reduce—"

Mr. Winters: I think perhaps I should correct the hon. member. Section 35 is not involved in this one-sixth arrangement at all.

Mr. Fleming: I misquoted the section; I am sorry. I meant section 4, but the number is not the important thing.

Mr. Winters: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: The important thing right now is that the government nullified the section without any consultation with parliament. There was no such thing as coming before parliament and so much as asking "by your leave"; none of that at all. The government simply said, in effect: We are stopping from this time forward the effect of the 1949 amendment of the act; there will be no more one-sixth additions to the loans. Why? It was not because parliament said they should stop; it was because the government said they should stop.

Is anyone going to rise in this chamber and say that was the will of parliament? I do not believe it is the will of Liberal members from Toronto. Nevertheless this government, not caring what had been said in parliament in 1949, and apparently not caring what they said to the people of Canada when they sought their votes two years ago, just decided that, notwithstanding the fact that parliament had enacted these new provisions in 1949, it would have the effrontery to step in and say: That enactment of parliament becomes a dead letter from this date forward, and will remain a dead letter until we, the government, decide that it shall be revived.

Mr. Chairman, is the House of Commons going to accept treatment like that from the government in respect of legislation it enacted in good faith in 1949? If the house is prepared to see its legislation torn up and scattered to the four winds in that way, simply because the government decides to do so, then we are all of us just wasting our time here. It is only a waste of time for us to legislate if our legislation is thus to be nullified by the government opposite.

I said there were three stages to the development of government policy—or perhaps one might more accurately describe it as a retreat from government promises. The third step was taken on May 11 of this year. We know that from the time the National Housing Act was enacted in 1944 that act held out much of its effective promise through the simple fact that the rate of interest on loans was, while I will not say low, still very reasonable. It was a rate somewhat below the normal market rate.

There have been occasions on which the government has been asked, with a measure of justification, to reduce that rate in order to give greater encouragement to house construction. But whether the government was right or wrong in maintaining that rate through those intervening years, is anyone going to justify now the increase in the rate? It is true that the prevailing market rates on mortgage loans have risen; there has been a general increase in interest rates within the last four months. Unquestionably the mortgage market has been affected by that fact. But while this increase in the rate of interest on National Housing Act mortgage loans is not in my opinion going to be as serious in its effect upon house construction as the other step to which I have referred, nevertheless it is likely to have some effect.

It is not going to be, as I have indicated so far as my opinion is concerned, as serious in its effect as the step taken to reduce the lending value, to nullify the provision of the one-sixth additional loan, but nevertheless these are all going to have their cumulative effects.

What has been the effect of these changes in government housing policy, these retreats on the part of the government from its promises and from the intent of parliament? I have a Canadian Press dispatch of February 19 from Montreal, which reads:

> F. A. Mager, president of the National House Builders' Association, said today that Canada's housing shortage will get worse, not better, in the coming year. In his annual report to the association convention, Mr. Mager said curtailment of the National Housing Act by eliminating the "additional one-sixth loan" is an "alarming move." He said this will make down payments $1,000 more than at present on five-room houses, and $1,500 on six-room houses. "I say the greatest bulwark we can erect against the inroads of communism will be to extend the facilities of home ownership to an ever widening segment of our population," he said.

This step naturally was of great concern in the province of Ontario where, as I have already indicated, the government of that province, having been in the field of second mortgage loans, had vacated that field in favour of the dominion when parliament in November, 1949, enacted those loudly trumpeted amendments to the act. The grave concern of the people of Ontario was reflected in a statement made by the premier of the province in the legislature following the announcement of the minister of February 5 when he told this house in effect that the government had repealed an enactment of parliament with respect to the provision of the one-sixth additional loan. Premier Frost in the legislature, and I may say with general approval on the part of all parties represented therein, expressed his entire disagreement with the move which had thus been announced by the federal government. He said: "Of all things to be cut back, housing should be the last."

So far as I am concerned, apart from those things that must be done to meet the immediate and critical demands of the rearmament program—and I am speaking there of only the critical and immediate needs in that respect—certainly there can be no qualification whatever of the view here expressed by Premier Frost, a view that I am sure is shared by the people of Canada—

Mr. Benidickson: Why does he not restore second mortgages?

Mr. Fleming: —that of all things to be cut back housing should be the last. Here we are in June faced, I think, with a situation that is likely to be reflected in a further diminution of the rate of construction of houses, with higher costs of construction, and, so far as one can see in the minister's statement, no effective measures being concerted by the government to meet the situation. It is undeniable that right now there are thousands of families in this country who, if the one-sixth mortgage provision had not been withdrawn in February last, would have been prepared this year to take advantage of it but who, by reason of this backward step on the part of the government, have now been deprived of any opportunity of acquiring homes under present conditions. I think you are going to see, because of the elimination of that large and necessitous group from the effective market for new houses, a curtailment in house construction. You are going to see far more need with respect to housing, far more distress with respect to housing conditions than has been the case for some time.

At a time like this with inflation going on and nothing effective being done by the government to stop it, with a moderate expansion in population, and with obsolescence always a factor in connection with housing, we are not likely, apart from effective and concerted measures, to see anything very significant done under present conditions to alleviate what has again become a growing problem. It seems quite evident to me that the first effective step that the government ought to take is to restore to its full vigor the legislation that parliament enacted in 1949 to meet just such a situation as we are confronted with now.

That is the first step, and it is a step that is long overdue. Let the minister come forward now and say that the policy announced on February 5, which was then said to be temporary, was in fact temporary, that it is at an end now and that parliament's enactments are going to be given their full effect and are going to be restored to full vigour.

Mr. Carroll: Does the hon. member say there is a special section of this act which has been torn to shreds or does he suggest that the whole act has been?

Mr. Fleming: I am referring to the 1949 amendments. The hon. member will recall the amendments parliament enacted in 1949, the most important one of which was to provide for the additional one-sixth on mortgage loans authorized by the act. That is the provision which the government nullified as announced in the house on February 5.

It seems to me, as I have indicated, that the first step the government should take now is to restore the 1949 amendments to their full vigour and effect. If I may say this in all frankness to the minister, I think that we all know that the minister has a co-operative attitude. He is not one of the ministers who are hard to get along with. He is the sort of minister who, we hope, will be able to co-operate fully with the provinces in working out schemes of mutual interest and advantage to meet housing conditions, particularly in areas where they are so acute.
