Herrings do not spawn on ground, which trawhers can occupy much. The Fluke Hole has for many years been a herring spawning ground, and the fishermen believe that trawhing does injury there; and I believe that a certain amount of damage is done, but I would only especial case, It would cause considerable hardship to do so. A fortnight ago, off Helmsdale, I fell in with a shoal of herrings in 18 to 22 fathoms water, extending over 4 miles in length along the coast, and 2 miles in breadth. It was a solid mass of herrings. The fishermen the end of whose drift struck the shoal filled their boats.

There were more herrings in that shoal drift struck the shoal filled their boats. There were more herrings in that shoal than are caught off the Scotch coast. Some of the finest herrings in Scotland were formerly got between Cape Wrath and the Pentland Firth. The fishermen got in debt to the curer, and laoking energy, the fishcurers refused to supply them with boats and nets, and the fishing fell off. Gloucester County, Oct. 28th '77 To the Editor of the Miramichi Advance. MR. EDITOR :- We remember having ead some time ago the speech of a French Bishop in favor of a measure then before the Senate of the Empire for the further prevention of the premature burial of the dead. The aim of the measure he so ably advocated was to prolong the time allowed by former laws as the minimum within which a corpse could be interred. In the course of his speech he told the story of a voung man, a student, who, tho', to all appearance, dead, was yet perfectly conscious of all that passed around him.
