TRIBUTES

DEATH OF HONOURABLE EDOUARD J. THÉRIAULT; RETIREMENT OF HONOURABLE SYDNEY J. SMITH, P.C., HONOURABLE NORMAN A. MACKENZIE, AND HONOURABLE CYRILLE VAILLANCOURT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the business of the Senate, I have a difficult task to perform.

Since we adjourned for the Christmas recess, we have lost a friend and a colleague in Senator Edouard Joseph Thériault. He was a man of duty who would sacrifice anything to serve.

Senator Thériault was born on May 10, 1901, in Hartford in the State of Connecticut. Though he was not born in our country, I should mention that his parents were Acadians and came from Nova Scotia.

[English]

Senator Thériault was born in Hartford, Connecticut on May 10, 1901; his parents, however, were Acadians from Nova Scotia. Senator Thériault studied at Ste. Anne's College at Church Point in Nova Scotia. He was a graduate of Dalhousie University, and a distinguished solicitor and barrister who was devoted to his profession. He was appointed prosecuting officer for Digby County in 1933, a position which he held under successive provincial governments. He was appointed a Queen's Counsel in 1948. His interest in political affairs was extensive, and was both provincial and federal in scope. He was Mayor of Digby from 1940 to 1944.

Senator Thériault did not have an opportunity of serving long in the Senate. He was able to attend only one or two sittings of the house before falling victim to a very serious illness which took his life during the recess. He was a distinguished man, an outstanding Nova Scotian and a dedicated Canadian.

I therefore wish to express to his wife and family our deepest sympathy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: As mentioned by the Leader of the Government, Senator Thériault came to this house for only one day, the day he took the oath, and that was the only time I ever met him.

I remember going to shake hands with him after he entered the house.

The Leader of the Government has recalled his distinguished career. He mentioned his birth in Acadia and said that Acadia was proud of her son.

We certainly deplore that he was struck so soon after being appointed to the Senate and that he was unable to bring the contribution he certainly intended to and that we expected of him.

I join the Leader of the Government, and I am sure I express the feeling of all those who sit on this side of the house, in conveying to the family of the late Senator Thériault our deepest sympathy for the grievous loss they have suffered. I would also like to tell them how much we regret that we were unable to further benefit from the services of Senator Thériault.

[English]

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, unfortunately I did not have the pleasure of knowing Senator Thériault in the way that the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and many of my colleagues did. I regret that his period of service here was so short. I express to his family my deepest sympathy on his sudden and unexpected passing.

It has been appropriate, I think, not only to remark upon the passing of our colleagues, as the sad events occur, but also to refer to those colleagues who for one reason or another resign their place in the Senate. This has happened to two senators who were affectionately known to all of us.

I would first speak about our immediate past Speaker, the Honourable Sydney Smith. Frankly, I had hoped that he would occupy the seat adjoining me to the left for a long time and that I would have the pleasure of a close association with him after his distinguished speakership, perhaps even closer than I had before he became Speaker. It does all of our hearts good to think that the last time Senator Smith was here for a special function in the Senate was the unveiling of his portrait in the chambers of the Honourable the Speaker. That was a very pleasant occasion for all of us although, apparently in his condition of health, very trying for him.

Senator Smith had a most outstanding career. I am always happy to point to the fact that he was born in Ottawa. But that did not deter him from becoming a distinguished citizen of the Province of Saskatchewan, where he contested a seat in the Legislature unsuccessfully. He moved on to British Columbia where he had a distinguished career in business and was a member of the British Columbia Legislature, beginning in 1949. He was summoned to the Senate in 1957. It is difficult to visualize the change in his demeanour between the years when he was here as a private member and the latter few times that we saw him. As a private member he was very active in the Senate, and he did a tremendous amount of work in connection with one of the most important of the international organizations to which we give our support, that of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. He was, I think, one of the original persons appointed to represent this Senate at meetings of that extremely important body, and he did a great deal of work there through the years to foster good relations between legislators in the United States Congress and those in the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the crowning achievement of Senator Smith's career in the Senate was his work in occupying the chair which you now occupy, sir.

Mrs. Smith, who died while the Senator was in office, was a great help to him. Her death, I know, was not only a blow to him but to all of us. He remarried; and his second wife endeared herself to us very greatly indeed. We shall miss Syd Smith very much, and we shall miss the kind of contribution he made to the work of this chamber.

Honourable senators, during the Christmas adjournment we had another resignation, that of Senator Vaillancourt. To my mind, Senator Vaillancourt was one of the most distinguished sons who ever came out of the Province of Quebec. He became a senator in 1944. Before he came here he was active in the Caisse Populaire movement and in many other business enterprises. But it is of his charity and of his personality that I would speak, more than of his activities.

I remember the occasion when, on the visit of the Queen to Quebec, some considerable apprehension was expressed about possible demonstrations there, and precautions were taken regarding them. I can remember—and those who were here will never forget—Senator Vaillancourt coming into the Senate and talking about the Queen, about the Royal Family, the significance of that institution for this country, for the Commonwealth, for the world. I remember his saying that if there had been apprehension about the reception the Queen was to have in Quebec, it was caused by people who were there purposely to make trouble, it was not to be attributed to the people of Quebec as a whole. On that occasion, I think Senator Vaillancourt was expressing the true voice of Quebec, and it was to me a most moving and salutary kind of speech to make in the Parliament of Canada.

He was deputy leader of this house all through the period of Senator Ross Macdonald's leadership from 1957. When I had the privilege of leading here he was my deputy until his health failed, and I cannot thank him enough for his help and support.

Senator Vaillancourt is a gentleman of the highest standard, one to whom we would all give our trust. We will all miss him greatly because of his character and the kind of work he did here.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has mentioned the retirement of Senators Sydney J. Smith and Cyrille Vaillancourt. Another senator has also retired, in compliance with the rule which has been in effect since 1965. I speak of Senator MacKenzie. On the day that we adjourned for the Christmas recess we had occasion to express our appreciation to Senator MacKenzie for his contribution, and our regrets at seeing him go.

At this time I merely wish to say that I concur in everything that Senator Connolly has said about our former Speaker, Senator Sydney Smith. On October 10 last we unveiled the portrait of the former Speaker, and on the same day it was announced that, in accordance with custom, he had been appointed a Privy Councillor. On that occasion we expressed to Senator Smith our affection, admiration and thanks.

Regarding Senator Vaillancourt, having known him more closely I would like to say a few words about him, and I think it is appropriate that I should express myself in French.

[Translation]

I became acquainted with Senator Vaillancourt when he was a member of the Quebec Legislative Council. Later on, I also met him in rather peculiar circumstances, while he was a special advisor to the chairman of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, Mr. Donald Gordon. At that time, I was myself regional attorney for the eastern part of the Province of Quebec. Since that time, I often had the opportunity of meeting Senator Vaillancourt, of discussing with him, of learning about his way of thinking, his philosophy, and of appreciating his great and charming personality.

It would be superfluous to recall here his magnificent career, especially his contribution to the co-operative movement in the Province of Quebec. He was, from the outset, one of the main associates of the founder of the Caisses populaires, Mr. Desjardins. He was for a long period of time the leading figure of that movement, which represents nowadays an extraordinary economic power in Quebec. He can be rightly proud of his accomplishments in that field.

Here in Parliament, he was always that distinguished, kind, charming, understanding and loyal man we knew in Lévis and in the whole Province of Quebec and, as assistant leader of the Government, he did an excellent job. It was always easy for him to get the co-operation of all members of this house.

He has to retire on account of his ailing health. He can be sure he deserves many years of rest.

We all wish him an early return to health from a well-deserved rest among his family and numerous friends. He may be sure that here, in the Senate, we will never forget him.

[English]

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with what has been said about our distinguished colleague, Senator Sydney Smith, and particularly with what has been said about Senator Vaillancourt and my lifelong friend Senator Larry MacKenzie.

I shall not say very much about Sydney Smith, because what I would have said has been so well said by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), but I should like to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to Senator Vaillancourt, who, so far as I am concerned, epitomized all of those values that we associate with the finest of French Canada. Senator Vaillancourt was always in the forefront of those who tried to benefit and improve their communities. In this respect he succeeded spectacularly. The Caisse Populaire is a monument to him. It reached its tremendous role of importance and influence in the Province of Quebec largely as a result of his foresight, vision and pertinacity. He was always kindly and courteous and was indeed the type of man we are always proud to be associated with in this chamber.

I first knew Senator MacKenzie when he was professor of International Law at the University of Toronto. Unlike so many of his colleagues here, I did not have the privilege of being one of his students, but I worked with him in many activities in the realm of international affairs, community development, and the universities. He made a tremendous contribution to building the great University of British Columbia which today has 20,000 students. I like to think that had he been president of that university during the last two years—those years of turbulence, unrest, and student revolt—he might, with his wisdom and sense of humour, have been able to quiet the more irresponsible elements among those who have been giving trouble in our universities.

I think of Larry MacKenzie in many ways but always as a great human person. During the drought years in Alberta from 1935 to 1939 I used to take him out to Community Life conferences to lecture on international affairs. He would hold a meeting in a place like Gooseberry Lake, in the heart of the dry belt and the only lake for miles around. Here he would sit around the campground and watch the alkali patch grow wider and wider in the hot sun, and here he would talk on international affairs. He had the great gift of bringing those affairs right down to the grass roots. He talked to farmers, hardware merchants and housewives, and he had the rare gift of making them feel that they were part of what was going on. When his lecture was over he would shove his old and battered canvas cap in his pocket, and go out and play ball with the rest of us. People in those communities still speak with warmth and affection of the contribution he made in those days.

At that particular time he was bothered by an ulcer. I remember one night, on arriving at the Macdonald Hotel in Edmonton after driving 250 miles over hot and dusty roads, I said to him, "Larry, we need a drink," to which he replied, "Yes, and I know exactly what we will get." We walked over to a small corner store and each of us purchased a quart of milk, which each of us carried, swaggering through the lobby of the Macdonald Hotel. That is the sort of informality that I associate with Larry MacKenzie.

He was a man who had a tremendous rapport with his students. He was once photographed in U.B.C. football togs and wearing a mortarboard. Some of his colleagues were very indignant about this, charging him with letting down the dignity of the academic world.

Larry MacKenzie succeeded in large measure because of that huge, warm, human personality, and I was one of those who were very happy on his appointment to the Senate. He made a fine contribution here, and I know he would be the first to admit that he was sorry to leave this place. We have all benefited by his association with us; his membership in this house is one more fine star in his crown. We wish him many years of happiness and usefulness in the kind of active life he has lived in the past.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I do not usually rise on these occasions, but events have happened since the adjournment that prompt me to say a few words now.

I formed a great affection for our former Speaker, Sydney Smith, but I think I should express on behalf of my wife and Parliamentary wives the great admiration that the members of the Parliamentary Wives' Association had for Marion—Mrs. Sydney Smith. I do so despite the fact that my early morning rest often was interrupted by telephone calls that the energetic Mrs. Smith initiated. She was deeply interested in the social life and the happy, helpful life of the ladies who are so important to us on Parliament Hill.

Senator Sydney Smith was a wonderful friend of us all. He loved the Senate and those of us in it; this became most evident. I pay tribute to him. He has chosen to retire, and in his retirement he will have the great comfort of having with him the new Mrs. Sydney Smith, whom we all admire.

Senator MacKenzie would not expect that I could make an adequate tribute to him. He has already received a flood of accolades from all across the country for his manifold and most catholic, widespread achievements. But I should like to mention his wife. Mrs. MacKenzie was one of those great ladies who participated here, as formerly, in everything good, with great vigour and excitement. She went to the ski runs of Ottawa, she attended the French language and the art classes of this community, and she supported our wonderful colleague in everything he did around this city. We all deplore the fact that they are going to their favourite city on the west coast.

I have a very special word for my colleague, Senator Vaillancourt. As a representative from this house, I went on two sad occasions to attend funerals in his beloved City of Quebec. On both of those occasions our colleague looked after his friends of the Senate in a most memorable and hospitable way. Everything that he had in his prestige, affection, and reputation in that city he gave to his visiting colleagues from other parts of Canada who had joined him on those two sad occasions.

Senator Vaillancourt, a deputy leader of the Government in the Senate, showed that he liked his colleagues here, and we certainly liked and admired him.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, first I should like to say a few words about our former Speaker, Senator Sydney Smith. I believe it is enough to say that he was a perfect gentleman and that in this chamber he proved himself to be an outstanding Speaker.

To Senator MacKenzie, who was popularly known as Larry, I wish to pay a very special tribute. I have known him for more than 40 years and was exceedingly sorry when I shook hands with him at the moment of his leaving these Houses of Parliament for good. He was a great authority on international matters, and I believe that it was in this field that I first became acquainted with him. I sat with him on committees of selection for minor officers of the diplomatic service, and I met him again and again at the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Senator MacKenzie is a great Canadian and a great scholar, and to me he will forever remain a great friend.

Senator Vaillancourt extended friendship to me for many years. Of him I would say that he is a man remarkable for his devotion to popular causes.

[Translation]

I think I should go on in French in that particular case.

Senator Vaillancourt has always been exceptionally devoted to the common people. He was deeply bent on the advancement of social and financial conditions of labour classes.

He has been a true champion of co-operation. In that field, he made an indelible mark on the co-operative movement in the province of Quebec; because of that, he has made history in the field of social development in my native province during his very lifetime.

I thank him deeply for the affection he has always showed me. I will never forget the many conversations I had with him about national matters, about patriotism. He is a remarkable man. I have great admiration for him; indeed I hold him in veneration. I hope his health will improve.

NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY

STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, shortly before Parliament recessed last month, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced the intention of the Government to take immediate steps to effect Canadian accession to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Honourable members will be aware that during the recess, on January 8, Canadian representatives in London, Moscow and Washington deposited the instruments of ratification with the three governments which had been designated as depositories for the treaty when it was opened for signature last July 1. Canada thus joined Britain, Denmark, Ireland and Nigeria in this expression of confidence in the treaty, and faith that by providing leadership we might exert a favourable influence on other governments not yet fully committed to the principles of non-proliferation as expressed in the treaty itself.

For years Canadian negotiators have been working with those of other nations attempting to achieve the optimum reconciliation of divergent national interests which would halt the spread, the proliferation, of nuclear weapons and thus reduce the threat of world-wide nuclear catastrophe. Canada welcomed the agreement on a draft treaty which was reached at a special session of the United Nations General Assembly last June. Canada was among the first nations to sign the treaty. Our support for the basic objectives of this treaty has been unwavering, and the leadership we are attempting to give in ratifying this important treaty is fully consistent with our attitude since the beginning of negotiations. We hope that additional countries will recognize the importance of bringing the treaty into effect at the earliest possible date, and that all nations of the world will accept the obligations embodied in the treaty.

We recognize that this treaty is not a panacea for all the problems facing a world that threatens to become a nuclear armed camp, but we expect it to make a significant contribution towards controlling the dissemination of nuclear weapons. Its provisions and prohibitions represent important concessions by all signatories.

Articles I and II are the most significant operative sections of the treaty, which I propose to table. They prohibit nuclear parties—the countries now in possession of nuclear weapons—from transferring these weapons to other nuclear explosive devices, or control over them, to non-nuclear parties. These articles also prohibit the non-nuclear parties from manufacturing or otherwise acquiring such weapons and devices. These articles of the treaty are supplemented by certain security assurances which were approved by the Security Council of the United Nations on June 18, 1968. These assurances recognize aggression with nuclear weapons, or the threat of such aggression, as requiring immediate action by the Council and immediate assistance to the victim of such an act. At that time, Canada supported these assurances as the best that could be obtained and as an adequate basis for promulgation of the Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Article III of the treaty requires the non-nuclear parties to accept international safeguards on their nuclear programs. It binds all parties which export special nuclear materials and equipment to non-nuclear states to require that such materials and those used or produced in such equipment, be placed under international safeguards. This is intended to provide for verification that source and special fissionable materials are not diverted from peaceful purposes to the production of nuclear weapons. In my opinion, one of the principal benefits of this treaty is the world-wide system of safeguards which it portends.

Article IV guarantees and facilitates the right of non-nuclear parties freely to exploit nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. Many developing nations considered this to be their quid quo pro for surrender of their nuclear weapons option, and signatories of the treaty have clearly indicated that they expect assistance on a preferential basis in the application of nuclear technology.

Article V establishes the principle that potential benefits from any peaceful application of nuclear explosions should be made available at the lowest possible cost to non-nuclear parties. The impossibility of distinguishing between nuclear weapons and "other nuclear explosive devices", which are also under prohibition, made it necessary for the nuclear powers to guarantee the availability of the benefits from such techniques.

Article VI confirms that parties to the treaty intend to negotiate in good faith on effective measures towards cessation of the nuclear arms race and towards nuclear disarmament. For reasons which I shall explain in a few minutes, we consider the implications of this article in the context of strategic arms talks to be one of the key considerations in bringing this treaty into force and in further progress of negotiations on arms control when the Eighteen Nation Committees reconvenes in March.

The treaty will enter into force when it has been ratified by the three depositary governments and 40 other signatories. Provision is made for its operation to be reviewed at intervals of five years during its current life of 25 years.

Speaking before a local men's group in mid-October, I expressed concern that the Non-Proliferation Treaty should not become a victim of the recent events in Czechoslovakia. Since that time, several more countries have signed the treaty, bringing the total to 85, and four countries have ratified. There appears to be growing recognition that, unless the non-proliferation treaty is brought into force soon, an increasing number of countries may conclude that it is in their national interest to "go nuclear". It is necessary, but disturbing, to acknowledge that only two of the "near nuclear" powers—Canada and Sweden—have signed the treaty. Such critical countries as West Germany, Israel, India, Japan, Australia and others have not signed because of dissatisfaction with the security assurances associated with the treaty and for a variety of other reasons. The case for Canadian leadership seems to me unmistakably clear. The Canadian Government is doing everything it can to ensure that this new step forward in arms control does not revert to a step backward into distrust and nuclear proliferation. The nuclear club has increased from one to five in less than two decades. There must be no new members.

Not only must the dissemination of nuclear capability be proscribed; we must now undertake the obligation assumed by parties to the treaty to negotiate measures to halt the nuclear arms race. We have argued that a basic requirement in this regard is the initiation of strategic armaments limitations talks between the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. Without progress in this field, there appears to be little prospect of an effective NPT, a halt to nuclear testing or agreement on further arms control and disarmament measures. The NPT is but one step in the right direction. We must now bend our efforts to the limitation and eventual reduction of nuclear delivery vehicles, and the destruction of existing stockpiles of nuclear weapons. One of the most important arms control resolutions adopted by the session of the United Nations General Assembly, which concluded in December, called for talks on strategic arms limitations to commence at an early date. Within the Eighteen National Disarmament Committee and the UNGA, Canadian representatives must continue to build on the base formed by the Partial Test Ban, the Treaty on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space and the NPT. These important accomplishments encourage us to hope that the security of nations can be assured, and that the objective of the United Nations in maintaining peace is possible of attainment.

I felt that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not call to the attention of the Senate the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the dying days of the session before the Christmas recess, and if I did not indicate the interest and the concern of this house in so vital a matter as this one.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to consider the statement just given to us by the Leader of the Government, and of course I have not seen the treaty itself. As the leader said towards the close of his statement, this of course is a step in the right direction, but I think it would be a tragic mistake if any of us in this house or in this nation or any other nation were induced into a state of euphoria by what has been accomplished, as given to us by the leader.

What we are doing here is giving our opinion that it would be a good thing to discontinue the spread of nuclear weapons, and that is a right opinion. However, honourable senators, if tomorrow we stop the spread of nuclear weapons, there will still be enough nuclear weapons on this earth, many of them in the hands of hostile enemies, to turn this earth into a nuclear grave. Unless and until something is done to prohibit and to ban the production of nuclear weapons, wherever they are being produced, then we have very little to go on and little to hope for.

I am not clear from the statement of the Leader of the Government how many nations actually have signed this proliferation treaty, but I do notice—and this, as the Leader said, is very disturbing—that such critical countries as West Germany, Italy, Israel—

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, I left Italy out. I think I did inform the Leader of the Opposition about this, but I was wrong.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Such countries as Australia and others were mentioned—the leader did not say who the others were. When we consider non-proliferation treaties or bans on the production of nuclear weapons by those nations which have them, leaving out China, then surely you destroy a great deal of the hope we might have of a treaty among the other nations. Their being left out of all these treaties means that nothing effective is being done for the purpose of safety, towards the banning of nuclear weapons. As recent as during the past two or three weeks, France and China both produced nuclear explosions.

I know nothing about the provisions taken to ensure that this non-proliferation treaty should be carried out even though all those nations have not signed it. We know why they have not signed it. This matter was discussed in a very intelligent way last year at the meeting of the Canadian-United States Parliamentary Group. It was shown there, that a lot of those smaller nations objected, and objected rightly, certainly with reason, to the building up of a "nuclear club" in the world, to putting into the hands of a few nations all the power, all the prestige, all the opportunities that might exist to destroy the world, and leaving the others out.

Honourable senators, I also noticed by the leader's statement that he has not said what are these precautions against the spread of nuclear weapons. I do not know how many honourable senators have read the recent study of the Krupp family, but in that book, Mr. Manchester, in a very ably documented chapter, shows that in West Germany today the Krupp family are engaged in nuclear testing and within two or three years West Germany will be able to prepare and use nuclear weapons. I have no doubt at all that this is much in the minds and hearts of the people of Russia.

This is the difficulty: I am afraid that statements such as this—none of us would oppose such a statement, and no one in this house or in any country, surely no civilized human being would want to opose a treaty such as this—and a treaty such as this raises false hopes.

I notice one paragraph in the leader's speech, which filled me with alarm. He said that if it is found that any nation is abusing this treaty, misusing it or abusing it, the Security Council will take appropriate action. When you look back at Czechoslovakia, when you look back to Hungary, when you look back to what happened the other day between the Arab Arabia and Palestine, does any reasonable person in the world think that the Security Council is going to act effectively in a case like that? The guarantees of the Security Council, as we know and as we have seen them over recent years, are not worth a tinker's curse. They, too, have lulled people into a false sense of security.

Let us support this treaty, of course, as we would support a proposition that the sun should rise tomorrow but for heaven's sake let us not come along and say that we have signed here a treaty, that we have given an example to the rest of the world, that this is a great thing for Canada and for civilization, a great thing for those who long for peace. What I object to is that this kind of statement does lull people into a false sense of security. We support them, but let us support them for what they are, a very small step towards the abolition of our destruction by nuclear weapons.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I would simply wish to say to Senator O'Leary (Carleton)—I know that under this arrangement it is not possible to debate this question—that his statement may provoke a very considerable discussion and that we could deal with the matters which he has raised. I noted all of his arguments.

I am sure he will not think that I am disrespectful of him when I say that it can be shown clearly that they do not have the validity which his strong eloquence for the moment suggests.

Honourable senators, this treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons was tabled early in the session. I now table certain other documents representing the publications of the Government of Canada since the adjournment.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Paul Martin presented Bill S-25, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Paul Martin presented Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION—CORRECTION

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the report of the Committee of Selection presented to the Senate on December 19, 1968, be corrected by adding the names of the Honourable Senators O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), O'Leary (Carleton) and Quart to the list of senators nominated to serve on the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a motion for correction, not amendment, of the report. When the report of the committee left the committee room it did include the names of those three senators that have just been read—Senators O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), O'Leary (Carleton) and Quart. However between the time the report left the committee room and was presented to the Senate on December 19 last, due to a clerical error those three names did not appear. I am sure honourable senators will agree that it is quite a serious mistake to leave off the names of those three senators, and I hasten to have that error corrected.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Missing persons!

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Committee of Selection which was presented on December 19, 1968.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Fergusson, that the report of the Committee of Selection, as corrected by the motion of today, be now adopted.

Report adopted.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 19, 1968, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Langlois, for the second reading of Bill S-23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this is a thick bill, consisting of 18 pages, and the sponsor Senator Langlois, when introducing it, indicated that it contained only urgent amendments to the Canada Shipping Act that could not await the further revision of the act, which he told us was presently in process.

I have gone through the bill several times and have discovered that it deals with some eleven different subjects that are really not correlated. Therefore, it occurs to me that this is a sort of omnibus bill in the field of shipping. Of course, it will not stir the interest of the Omnibus bill—with a capital "O"!

This is properly a bill for committee consideration, because all the matters dealt with are really technicalities. For instance, it has been mentioned that the new feature that is introduced in the Shipping Act is the application of some part of the act to air cushion vehicles. This matter is dealt with in clause 1(1), which amends section 2 by the addition of paragraph (2a), and in clause 27. The sponsor has indicated that regulations were required for these new vehicles, that this application of the Shipping Act to air cushion vehicles, as long as they travel over the waters, is really only an interim measure, and that perhaps eventually we will have to enact special legislation for this new transportation system. In any event, as a result of this bill there will be some provisions of the Canada Shipping Act dealing with the operation of these vehicles. This is the first topic of the bill.

The second deals with the International Convention on Load Lines, 1966. This is an international agreement with respect to the loading of vessels, and under it the countries subscribing to the agreement have agreed to enact legislation to implement the provisions of the treaty. The provisions of this bill dealing with this matter are to be found in clause 1(2) and (3), and in clauses 8, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 22. These are really more in the nature of technicalities than those dealing with air cushion vehicles, and we can discuss them more efficiently in committee.

The third group of amendments is designed to enable landed immigrants to obtain certificates of competency as masters, mates or engineers, on the same footing as is presently the case for any British subject, and I think this is reasonable. These provisions are found in clauses 3 and 4 of the bill.

Fourthly, clauses 5 and 6 abrogate dispositions which are archaic and deal with the responsibility of those hiding seamen. This makes very interesting reading, opposite page 2, and following, sections 238 to 243, and sections 270 to 275 of the present act Those sections provide penalties for hiding seamen, and matters of that kind. I agree with the sponsor that these provisions are archaic and should be repealed.

The fifth subject dealt with by this bill is found in clause 7 which concerns regulations pertaining to pilotage. This clause provides that for greater certainty particular bylaws will be deemed to have been regularly adopted for another year, despite the fact that the Royal Commission on Pilotage indicated that those bylaws and regulations were entirely illegal.

It is interesting to see that the explanatory note reads:

> The Report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage expressed doubt as to the validity of certain bylaws made under the Canada Shipping Act by pilotage authorities.

I think that that is putting it very mildly since, if I am not mistaken, there have been two decisions of the Exchequer Court of Canada and one of the Supreme Court of Canada, that have unanimously said that such bylaws were entirely illegal, and without legal foundation. Of course this is an interim provision for the period enacted by subsection 3 of section 7.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think Senator Langlois must be very familiar with those particular cases.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, he is, but I noticed that he did not speak at length on them when he introduced the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are encouraging him to do so now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: When he closes the debate he may discuss those matters. In any event, it is easily understood that these provisions are needed. Section 7 provides at least that the proceedings before a court will not be affected as far as the rights of the parties are concerned.

The sixth matter covered by this bill concerns the application of certain provisions to vessels other than steamships. These are technical provisions, and they are made to apply to barges and vessels that are towed or that are not self-propelled. The same provisions concerning safety will apply to those vessels as are applicable to steamships.

The seventh matter dealt with in this bill is the enforcement of the installation of radio facilities on board certain vessels. This is a matter of safety and I do not think it raises any difficulties. We may receive further explanations of it in committee, but there is no doubt that it is in the interests of safety that these provisions are enacted.

The eighth matter concerns the prevention of accidents. This is really a simplification of the provisions that now exists, and it is also, I think, in line with the new federal labour code dealing with safety matters.

Of the last two matters dealt with in this bill, the first concerns the pollution of waters. Sections 23 and 24 give power to the minister to take whatever measures are required to deal with the cargo or fuel of a wrecked vessel which may create pollution, constitute a danger to waterfowl or marine life, or cause damage to coastal property. The purpose is obvious, and it is a good purpose.

The last matter covered by this bill is contained in sections 25 and 26, which deal with the investigation of accidents to ships navigating in Canadian waters, or to Canadian ships wherever they may be. These sections will give more power to the investigators, and will oblige the masters or owners of ships to report on certain types of accidents.

Honourable senators, as I have indicated, this bill deals with many subjects, most of which are of a technical nature. It seems to me that the purposes of these amendments are excellent, but the bill covers topics that can be studied with greater facility in committee than in this chamber. It is my understanding that the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Langlois) will move that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, where officials from the department will give us all needed further explanation. It may be that the honourable sponsor wants to deal further with the subject of the Royal Commission on Pilotage, and I have no objection to that. On the other hand, he may well wish to have the departmental officials tell us more about that in committee.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Langlois). Can he give us more information as to air cushion vehicles? There seem to be two classifications, one of which includes vehicles that are air-propelled like airplanes, and another which includes water-propelled vehicles. Perhaps the honourable sponsor could clarify this matter for me, because it does seem to make a difference.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable senator speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Langlois) one question. First, I want to say that I agree with the last speaker (Hon. Mr. Flynn) when he says that this bill should be referred to a committee, because it is a bill that the committee can delve into with profit.

I notice that section 24, which concerns pollution, provides that the minister may cause the vessel, its cargo or fuel to be destroyed or removed to such place, and sold in such manner, as he may direct. Are there not local authorities of the different harbours and rivers who have the power to fine captains who allow oil to be discharged from their vessels?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Flynn for his important remarks on this bill. I apologize if I left the impression that I considered this bill unimportant when I introduced it. What I meant to say was that this bill contained amendments that could not wait for the total revision of the Canada Shipping Act that will be forthcoming. We are dealing here with amendments that are very important, and some of them date back to 1966-67. It was felt that they had been delayed long enough, and could not be further delayed.

Senator Flynn dealt in detail with the various aspects of the bill, and I want to comment briefly on his remarks.

First he referred to air cushion vehicles. This is a new type of craft, and we are not prepared at the present moment to agree that it should be considered a vessel within the meaning of the Canada Shipping Act, or as aircraft. That is why we are introducing this temporary measure to cover the present situation, pending further development of these craft. It is possible that later on it will be decided to have special legislation dealing with air cushion vehicles.

Here I should like to answer the question asked by the honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche). There is no distinction between the various types of air cushion vehicles according to their propulsion, whether they be propelled by jet, propellers or wheels. No distinction is made in this bill between the different types of air cushion craft.

This bill deals with the Load Line Convention of 1966 and amends the present act to bring it in line with the new convention. The present act contains provisions to implement the 1930 Load Line Convention, and the changes are minor and technical in character.

There is a provision in the bill dealing with the right of landed immigrants to take examinations for certificates as masters, mates and engineers. We are amending the law to extend this privilege, which hitherto was restricted to British subjects. Landed immigrants so certified will be allowed to act as mates, masters and engineers as long as they preserve the status of landed immigrants, unless for obvious reasons they lose such status by becoming Canadian citizens.

I now turn to the part of the bill dealing with pilotage regulations. As pointed out by the honourable Senator Flynn, the first report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage raised some doubt on the validity of some of the pilotage bylaws.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the year of that report?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The first volume of the report was tabled last fall. The second volume was tabled only some two or three weeks ago.

As Senator Flynn pointed out, there have been three judgments, one by the Supreme Court and two by the Exchequer Court, along the same lines. As has been mentioned by the honourable Senator Martin, I was no stranger to these cases because my law office acted for the plaintiffs in connection with two of these decisions, one in the Supreme Court and one in the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Successfully?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, of course.

Following the filing of the first volume of the report of the Royal Commission on Pilotage, there were discussions between the Department of Transport and representatives of the pilots' organizations and the users of pilotage services across Canada. It has been determined that the representatives of the pilots' organizations and users of pilotage services across Canada would support remedial action to ensure the continuation of pilotage operations in the manner in which they are now being carried out. They wanted to continue the status quo pending action that could be taken on the implementation of the report of the royal commission, and they agreed to support any legislation to remedy the present situation which would be of a temporary character. It was at one time suggested that such legislation should last no longer than March 31, 1969, but there is no serious objection to extending it to cover the whole of 1969 with the proviso that the Government could further extend it if the situation warranted it. This, therefore, has been done with the agreement of those directly concerned with pilotage in Canada.

Senator Flynn then referred to the part of the bill dealing with the obligation of ships to carry radio telephone equipment and radio operators. As honourable senators no doubt know, Canada has in the last two years instituted a system of marine traffic control, which was first inaugurated on the St. Lawrence River. It is now essential for the operation of the marine traffic control service that all ships plying the waters of the St. Lawrence, or any Canadian waters where such traffic control exists, be equipped with adequate types of radio telephone equipment and carry on board qualified radio operators.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is there any classification of size of ships, how small and how large? What about pleasure craft, for instance?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: We are here dealing with commercial ships, not with pleasure craft.

Senator Flynn then referred to the prevention of accidents aboard ships. The purpose of this amendment is to apply to ships safety regulations comparable to those made under the Labour Safety Code.

I should now like to refer to the provisions concerning water pollution. The amendment in the bill empowers the minister to cause the removal or destruction of a vessel whose cargo or fuel is, or is likely to become, a danger in the sense that it is likely to cause pollution of the water, beach or any other shore property.

Various organizations have expressed a wish to make representations on the proposed amendment before the Senate committee to which the bill is to be referred. These representations came, among others, from the Shipping Federation of Canada, the Canadian Chamber of Shipping and the Chamber of Shipping of British Columbia. We have also been informed that presently there is a meeting taking place in Bermuda, attended by representatives of leading oil companies of the world and also a representative of one of the most important, Protecting and Indemnity Association of Great Britain. It is understood that the representative of this British Protecting and Indemnity Association will come to Canada some time in mid-

February and will be available to make representations before the committee. Also, it is quite possible that out of this meeting in Bermuda a scheme might develop which will provide adequate insurance to tanker operators to cover the risk of liability imposed on owners of vessels under the proposed Canadian legislation and to provide adequate guarantees for payment to interested governments, for the expenses incurred by such governments to prevent pollution or to clean coastal shore property fouled by oil escaping from ships.

The Canadian Maritime Law Association has also expressed a wish to appear before the committee and make representations on the proposed legislation. They have also requested that the hearing of the committee be postponed to some time in mid-February to allow them to prepare their representations. There is also another reason which might be invoked in support of delaying the hearings of the committees. It is understood that some parallel legislation will likely be introduced before the American Congress in the first few days of February. It might be of some importance, therefore, to wait until this legislation is tabled before considering the Canadian legislation, because I am inclined to believe that governments should endeavour to have comparable legislation regarding this world-wide problem of water pollution through disasters which occur to these huge tankers now plying international waters.

I hope I have covered the ground accurately and I have answered the questions which were put by honourable senators who have taken part in this debate. If the bill is given second reading, I will move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, bill referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

[Later:]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I may inadvertently have given an incorrect answer to a question by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche).

Senator Fournier asked me if a distinction was made between air cushion vehicles propelled by reactors and propellers. Since he mentioned air propelled vehicles, I thought the vehicles he had in mind were air cushioned vessels. On second thoughts, and remembering that, to my knowledge, there is no such type of craft propelled by propellers, I came to the conclusion that he might have been referring to the type of craft called a hydrofoil, which is not an air cushion vehicle, but one which is allowed to rise above the water level due to a special understructure, and which is propelled by wheels or propellers.

This type of craft will not be covered in the definition as outlined in the proposed legislation.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Thank you.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith (Queens-Shelburne), for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.—(Honourable Senator McDonald).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as this order stands in the name of the honourable Senator McDonald, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Martin proceed in his stead?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I of course ask for leave. I was hoping that over the recess all of us would have had an opportunity of examining in even more considerable detail than we have thus far the report of the committee, and I had understood that today a number of senators would be prepared to continue the debate. I simply want to say that it is not easy to arrange for the work of the Senate unless each of us takes an initiative in respect of matters about which each feels it is important to express views. Senator Cameron is now here. I would readily accede my place if he wishes to discuss now the report of the committee on our rules. I had understood the senator would be ready to go on. I would give him my place at once if that would be agreeable.

Hon. Donald Cameron: I am sorry, I am not prepared. I would be ready to proceed tomorrow, but not today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I have had the opportunity over the recess to re-read carefully the Fourth Report of the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate, as printed in an appendix to the Debates of the Senate for November 28, 1968, beginning on page 652. It is a formidable document. It is also a most important and forward-looking document, one which contemplates an active, useful Senate.

No aspect of the Senate's work appears to have been overlooked in the report, and if its provisions are generally accepted a great deal of follow-up action will have been made necessary. The report clearly indicates that there has to be follow-up action with regard to the general character of our work, as presently constituted and as it will likely evolve in the future.

The schedule to the report, revising and bringing up to date the Rules of the Senate, which was adopted unanimously by the Senate, was in itself no inconsiderable achievement. I still wonder at the industry with which the committee, under its able chairman, Senator Molson—who, I understand, was an amiable but dedicated taskmaster—conducted its review of our rules.

I have had an opportunity of examining the press comments which have been made editorially about the committee and the content of this report. I have had very considerable correspondence from the Canadian citizens generally across the country about the work of the committee—not always in accord with what I think is a due appreciation of our purpose and our worth. However, this is all to the good, I believe, in enabling the members of this chamber at present, and others, to give consideration as to how to make the Senate an increasingly useful instrument of legislation and a more effective house of Parliament.

I have had a lot of experience with parliamentary committees, and I do not know of any committee which has worked harder or has produced more efficiently than this one. I congratulate all concerned in connection with the work done in the schedule.

We are shortly to have before us, in bilingual and in statutory form, a revised set of Senate Rules, comprehensively indexed. That consequential work is now proceeding by order of the Senate, under the direction of the Clerk of the Senate.

In its Third Report, also adopted by the Senate, the committee made a major contribution by streamlining and restructuring the committees of the Senate realistically and on modern lines. Tomorrow we are to begin the setting up of the necessary organization to make those committees function, when the new officers of the committees will be selected. Personally, I attach the greatest importance to the officers of these committees. On their shoulders will repose the primary responsibility for giving leadership to the work of the committee, taking the necessary initiatives which will be essential to complement our work in this chamber and to demonstrate our capacity in the area of scrutiny and of inquiry, as well as to enable us to discharge our responsibility with respect to legislation which we initiate or which comes from the other place.

With regard to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I know that considerable preparation is under way now on work which will be placed before that committee in order to give it a consistent, continuing prescribed schedule of work.

I would hope, as a member of the Senate, that we could look forward to a similar result on the part of the other committees.

We will have some special committees. The committee proposed by Senator Croll to examine the whole question of poverty will soon be set up. The Special Committee on Science Policy is now deeply engaged in its assignment. These are all important aspects of the work of the Senate.

Standing committees will do important work, and I hope the load will be fairly evenly divided among them. Certainly, we will no longer have any committees in existence that do not meet. The Committee on the Rules of the Senate, headed by Senator Molson, recommended to us the abolition of those committees which have not been sitting over the years. The committees that have been set up will be functional and to them will be given considerable work, I hope, almost immediately.

The new Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has now been established. The decks are cleared for action as new legal and constitutional propositions come up—as they inevitably must—for consideration.

I have high hopes for all of these committees, including the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have high hopes for the work that can be done by the Legal and Constitutional Committee, for the continued important work of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce under Senator Hayden, the Committee on Finance under Senator Leonard, and the Committee on Transportation and Communications under Senator Thorvaldson. The other standing committees will be far from idle.

The Senate, in my view, must maintain the momentum which has been building up gradually over the last ten or twelve years. The machinery of the Senate has been modernized, in spite of what critics sometimes allege: what remains now is to put this program into effective operation.

A busy man is usually a happy and a useful man. The same goes for institutions. We should not merely await initiatives from the Government or from the House of Commons. We ourselves can take initiatives, as a group, as individuals, advancing our views as to what courses should be followed by this body to make it more effective. There is indeed much to do and, if I may put it this way, there is little time in which to do it.

Apart from the rules themselves, I should refer to some features of the Fourth Report which, if acceptable to the Senate, will require follow-up action. The first major recommendation in the committee's report is to the effect that all private bills should originate in the Senate and that discussions "be initiated with the House of Commons to the end that such a provision be made either by a change in the Rules of the House of Commons or by statute." This is a suggestion with which I am in entire agreement. If it is equally acceptable to the Senate, ways and means of communicating the Senate's views to the House of Commons will have to be explored, following the conclusion of this debate. I should think that we would not want to waste much time in doing this.

A second recommendation made by the committee is to the effect that a greater number of non-money bills might usefully be introduced in the Senate. The trend, from the statistical table given in the report, has clearly been in that direction and concerns the statistical studies made by Professor Kunz in his book which appeared in 1963 entitled The Modern Senate of Canada 1925-1963—A Re-appraisal.

The decision as to the house in which a bill will be introduced is of course, under our system, made by the Government. I can only say that, in so far as it lies within my power, I will endeavour to ensure that there is an equitable distribution of the legislative workload as between the two houses, and my colleagues in the Government share this view. In the result, the bills that we have been given the privilege of introducing or initiating here is consistent with the statistics of the last few years, and that will continue.

As to the recommendation of the committee that consideration be given to changing the concept of a money bill, I will have occasion to refer to that matter when I speak on the inquiry initiated by Senator Hayden. The recent instances mentioned by Senator Hayden a few days ago support the view that the practice has been tending—perhaps I should say "trending"—in the direction suggested by the committee. It may not be necessary to contemplate any formal action in this regard. My estimation is that the new concept mentioned by the committee will soon be established by practice—one of the three great streams of constitutional change—if indeed it has not already been so established.

The committee also gave consideration to the long list of statutes set out in Appendix A to its Fourth Report. I entirely agree that these statutes, many of which were enacted piecemeal, should be subjected to intensive scrutiny as a package by the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I would hope that would be one of the first assignments that committee would be disposed to take up.

I agree also that the terms of the Canadian Constitution, including the British North America Act, should be similarly examined. It is true that federal-provincial discussions are now under way with regard to the Constitution; that we in the Government have been giving these matters some consideration over the last few months; that the provinces are likewise engaged in the consideration of these vital matters, as we know; and that the federal and provincial governments will be meeting shortly to discuss matters of constitutional import, as well as other problems which engage the attention of the two senior levels of government.

However, as an individual senator, I certainly cannot and do not take the position that the Senate is in any way inhibited from conducting its own independent survey in this field. The present discussions to which I have alluded are as among governments, but, whatever proposals may ultimately emanate from these discussions, the concurrence of the Senate will be necessary before any constitutional change can finally take place. This is simply stating what is implicit in the British North America Act, what is the law. It is, therefore, both desirable and expedient that the Senate be fully equipped and prepared for considerations and suggestions. It is for this reason particularly that I welcome the establishment of the new Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Whether or not the provinces and the federal Government engage in a discussion of this area does not in any way, in my judgment, affect the right of the Senate at any time to initiate examination and consideration of these matters.

I wish now to mention the several recommendations in the report which refer to joint committees, both standing and special. The committee left untouched the rules of the Senate relating to standing joint committees, which rules indeed could not properly be dealt with by the Senate unilaterally. It nevertheless recommended joint discussions with the House of Commons designed to ensure that requisite improvements are made.

The committee observed at page 656, that > ... there is much doubt existing as to the proper functioning of Special Joint Committees: there is no clear guide, for example, as to the procedure to be followed by such Joint Committees, as to which House should bear the expenses incurred, or as to whether such expenses should be apportioned.

I think that anyone who has served on or appeared before a joint committee will agree with these observations. They reveal inadequacies which should be rectified and which can only be rectified by action taken in concert on behalf of both houses. I personally see no reason why the Senate should not take an initiative itself in arranging for the necessary joint discussions.

Also, the committee recommended quite strongly that from time to time

> ... select committees of the Senate should hold committee meetings in the Senate Chamber itself. In this way the public would have an opportunity to see the Senate performing what is undoubtedly one of its most useful roles—the examination in depth of the legislation submitted to it.

I happen to know this was a view held by the chairman. Long before the committee was set up I had an opportunity of discussing some of these matters with him, and this was a proposal he had in mind, and I strongly support it. I had talked to other senators about this proposal before the committee made its recommendation. There are some senators who understandably and properly are so dedicated to the traditions of this chamber that they find it difficult to accept the suggestion that committees should meet in this chamber. They feel that this chamber should be reserved for the consideration of bills in their first, second and third readings and, on occasion, Committee of the Whole, but that the general legislative character of the chamber should be observed. I can very well understand that viewpoint and dedication to tradition, but I think there is a very strong argument for the suggestion made by the committee that we might use this chamber for the meetings of committees. Of course they could not all sit here simultaneously. There are examples of precedents under the rules. I think that the Committee of Privileges and Elections must sit here. I know that in the United Kingdom, the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords always sits in the legislative chamber, as does one other committee.

I take it that one of the reasons why it is suggested that committees should be given the opportunity of sitting in the chamber is to fill a gap in our public presentation that I regret exists when the Senate is not sitting. When we are not here in general session the public oftentimes have the view, as they have with regard to the other place, that the Senate is not working, that the Senate is not engaged in useful consideration of matters concerning the nation. We know that is not the case. I think the suggestion of using this chamber when the Senate is not sitting is a good one, and as an individual senator I strongly support it. I endorse this proposal completely.

I do not say that the Senate should be a publicity seeker, as was suggested by one very experienced senator. On the other hand, much of the misunderstanding now existing concerning the functioning of the Senate would partially disappear if the public were made aware of how the Senate carries on its essential business. What is hidden under a bushel does not shed sufficient light.

As to the suggestions in the report at page 65 concerning party affiliations and caucuses—I want to congratulate the honourable senator on his now sitting in the front row. I do not know whether I should draw conclusions from the fact that he is sitting in a place normally occupied by the Opposition, or whether I should consider it a further indication of his determination to remain excessively objective in all that he does. However, as to party affiliations and caucuses, I do not consider those observations to be in the nature of positive recommendations. I may be wrong in that, and I certainly do not quarrel with Senator Molson's right, and indeed the right of any member of the committee, to make those observations, but a fair reading of the language of the report impels me to the conclusion that those remarks were more commendatory than specific recommendations.

There may be some differences of view about the suggestions, and I believe that they could be dealt with as matters concerning the individual consciences of honourable senators. Certainly, in the short time I have been a member of this house, I have been impressed by the absence of unnecessary political controversy. I have been impressed by the general desire to be as objective as possible in these matters, but as a member of the Government, I would have to take the position that I have a responsibility of going to the caucus. However this is a matter for each senator to decide and I doubt very much whether it is for the committee to prescribe that no senator shall carry on that kind of avocation.

I agree with the general tenor and intent of the report. Like some other honourable senators, I would not want to be considered absolutely bound by every word or nuance of what is a document chock-full of ideas and views. It would be a counsel of perfection to expect every independent-minded senator to accept such a large package without some reservations.

With the foregoing in mind, I support the report as presented. I think it will enable us to do what Senator Molson said in his opening speech we should seek to do, to bring our machinery into line with modern day practice to the fullest extent possible. As a result of the committee's work we now have a new set of rules, and we have a new group of functioning committees that will begin their organizational work tomorrow. These are achievements in themselves.

During the course of this debate we may hear suggestions as to ways and means of improving upon the recommendations of the committee. In any event, the committee has been able to move with alacrity, and to act constructively and comprehensively. It has demonstrated to Parliament itself, to the Canadian public, and to those who wish to really examine what is proposed, that the members of this house are anxious to serve Canada in the most constructive manner possible. This is what is behind the recommendations of the committee.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cameron, debate adjourned.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT (AGE OF VOTERS)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue moved the second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased at this time to move the second reading of a bill that provides for a reduction from 21 to 18 years in the age of eligible voters in federal general elections. It will be noted that this is a public bill in the name of a private senator. I believe I am correct in saying that this is the first bill of this nature in this session. There have been other public bills in the names of private senators presented on previous occasions, and I think they have made a contribution to the well-being of our country.

It may be that some significance can be read into the fact that this bill follows the excellent statement just made by the honourable Leader of the Government in reference to the new set of rules, and to the Senate itself and the way in which the Senate may be conducting itself in the days ahead. I hope that the Senate will undergo the fundamental changes that have been indicated by the leader, that it will become an action centre, and that we will roll up our sleeves and go to work. The Senate must demonstrate to the people of Canada that it is attending to the business of the country, not only by examining what the House of Commons does and giving consideration as to whether what it does is in the interests of the country—that is, acting as a chamber of sober second thought—but senators should also endeavour to use this chamber and its facilities in showing the Prime Minister, the Government, the House of Commons, and the people of Canada the way in which we, as a nation, should travel on particular issues.

My reading and study of the functions of the Senate leads me to believe that the greatest authorities writing about the Senate of Canada today are more inclined to emphasize that the functions the Senate should be performing by showing leadership and action where required than by displaying the more conservative approach, important as it is, of being almost exclusively the watchdog of the other place. While from time to time the Senate deals with the indiscretions of the other place, it does not do so on many occasions. I hope this bill is an indication, as has already been made clear by the leader, that this will be an action Senate.

I have known the Government Leader and watched him in operation for many years. I am a great admirer of his and am enthusiastic and impressed by his attitude, his statements, and the kind of outstanding vigorous leadership he is giving to all aspects of the Senate at this time.

While honourable senators will have opinions about this measure, for and against, I hope it will serve the purpose of indicating one of the issues with which this nation must deal, and also indicate what the Senate feels should be done on this issue now. There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind, nor do I think there is any doubt in any honourable senator's mind, that the trend in Canada and across the world is to reduce the voting age to as low as 18. It is the trend in the provinces. They are to have an important conference, to which the leader referred. The Province of Saskatchewan has a voting age of 18, Alberta 19, British Columbia 19, Quebec 18, and Prince Edward Island 18. There is pressure on the Legislature of Ontario to reduce its voting age to 18, and it is pressure being exerted by a committee of the legislature itself which made a recommendation to this effect about a year ago. The Tories may be slow at coming round to these kinds of ideas and they may need to be pushed, but unquestionably they are going in this direction.

I do not want in this chamber to say something I should not say and am not privileged to say, but I believe I am privileged to say this. If I am corrected I shall be very happy to change it, but my office contacted the office of the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Stanfield) this morning to discover the official position of the Conservative Party on this important question. The answer received, which I hope I am relating correctly, was that the Leader of the Conservative Party in Canada, the Honourable Mr. Stanfield, thought it was a fine idea, and that a caucus committee of the federal Conservative Party, which has been set up as a committee on election questions, thought it was a fine idea. They explained that no official position had been taken by the Conservative Party, it is not in the official platform, but after having received this information, in my judgment Mr. Stanfield is showing real leadership to the Conservative Party and the people of Canada by the attitude he is taking on this important question.

I am not a recent convert to this idea. I believe that as a former member of the other place I was the first Member of Parliament in those earlier years to present such a private member's bill, as I am now doing in the Senate. This was some 15 years ago. At that time the opposition to it was very strong. When votes were taken the opposition was overwhelming, but that opposition has been falling away. Over the years fewer and fewer votes have been taken on the question, and now they avoid it like the plague. I forecast that if the Government of Canada on its own initiative—which could happen only because the Senate fails to deal with the matter—reintroduced such a bill, it would pass the other place unanimously. I further predict that when it arrived here, not as our bill but second-hand, it would go through all its stages in a day, or at most a couple of days. We have an opportunity to take the initiative ourselves now, to make a decision ourselves, and, when the debate has been concluded, stand up and vote on this measure and be counted.

I am glad that Senator Croll agreed to support this bill by seconding the motion. I hope he will find it possible, busy as he is, to make a contribution to this debate. He too is not a recent convert to this idea. While I am sure my research does not do him justice over the years, because I am convinced he believed in this many years before the reference I have in my hand, when a vote was taken on this question in the other place on March 15, 1955, I see the name Croll among the "yeas" in support of this measure. I might add that it gives me heart and courage, and leads me to think that Senator Croll and I are on the right track, to see on that list the name "Power, Quebec South". I think "Chubby" Power has set an example in political life that we should all study, which many of us would like to emulate as far as we can.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask what year that was?

Hon. Mr. Argue: It was 1955.

Hon. Mr. Martin: In those days Senator Croll was progressive.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Senator Croll is always progressive. Sometimes he is so progressive that it causes me to shiver.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think it was immediately after that vote that Senators Croll and Power were summoned to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Let us hope they carried on their radicalism. Senator Croll is radical. When I heard Senator Croll's speech on the strike at Peterborough I knew he had carried on the radicalism he displayed in the other place, because I thought that was a very advanced statement to make. I do not want to get on to another subject but emotionally I found myself agreeing with Senator Croll.

I do not think this is a party matter. I think the political parties are demonstrating that they are in full support of this kind of measure. As a matter of fact, only a year ago, just before the general election, there appeared on the Order Paper in the other place five bills supporting the reduction of the voting age to 18. Two of those bills were sponsored by Liberals, two by Conservatives and one by an N.D.P. So that the political parties are coming around in a fairly unanimous way, I suggest, to support this proposition. The reasons of course for asking that the voting age be reduced to 18 are many. Those of us who support this proposition feel that the current generation of young Canadians are the best educated and the best informed of any generation of Canadians to date.

We feel that through mass media, improved educational facilities and a greater awareness by young people of political questions, that we can entrust the important decision of casting a ballot to those who are 18 years of age and over. I have talked with those who have supported this kind of measure in the United States. Only a few of the states have the 18-year-old vote, or a vote lower than 21, but for a number of years Presidents of the United States have been endeavouring to get Congress to move on this question and have advocated an 18-year-old vote. President Johnson placed such a recommendation before the last Congress of the United States. Not so many years ago the Senate of the United States, by a majority vote, showed its support for the reduction of the voting age to 18.

Some who oppose this kind of a step may say that people do not reach their majority until they are 21, and that because young people are not legally of age in certain respects until they are 21 we should not be taking this particular step. I would suggest that perhaps we should be taking other additional steps. Perhaps now we should be doing what the United Kingdom is indicating that it will do, and that is to reduce the age of majority from 21 to 18 so that the contracts and the business arrangements entered into by young people 18 years of age and older will be legal and binding contracts of undertakings in every sense. While I am certainly far from being a lawyer, my understanding is that if a person of the age of 18 enters into a contract, then on reaching the age of majority he may repudiate that contract. If that is the case, as I believe it to be, it places young people in a most difficult situation.

I was raised in the country. I do not have to tell people that; they all recognize that I am still very much a country person. In any event, in the farming community young people of 18 want to undertake business arrangements; they have to undertake some. Many of them hold a Canadian Wheat Board permit, which is exceedingly important to the business of farming on the prairies. You have to have one or you cannot farm. Over the years thousands of young people have been making Prairie Farm Assistance payments, and properly so, because they farm on their own. They pay into the fund and have a permit, but when they come to ask for loans from the Farm Credit Corporation or some other body they are not entitled to such loans, not until they become 21. They can go to a bank and try to borrow money, but it is difficult. Their fathers have to try to negotiate a loan for them.

I think it would be a much simpler thing all round if we did a first-class job on this question and reduced the age of majority to 18 and, to this end, passed this particular measure which is designed to reduce the voting age to 18. Some will say, of course, that our young people are immature and irresponsible. They will say that the turmoil, confusion and dissension in our universities today is proof enough that those people are not fit to have the vote at age 18.

I would suggest that if all of us made a study of some of the issues involved in this kind of turmoil within the universities, we would find that the right is not all on one side, that there is a very enlightened effort being made today by students and by members of faculties to see that the universities are, in a real sense, taking into account the wishes and desires and the needs of the students as well as the opinions and the needs of the faculties and the administration.

Nobody wants to see excesses, and I deplore as much as anyone here the kind of excesses that one observes in some places at this time. But the very fact that our young people are active and aggressive and are advancing new ideas—ideas that are going to improve universities in the long run—is not an argument that they are irresponsible. On the contrary, it is an indication that our young people of 18 years of age and over are prepared and are capable of making responsible decisions when it comes to casting a ballot in a federal election.

I would hope that members will support this measure. When a young Canadian joins the armed services of this country, he or she is entitled to vote in federal elections. I can quote from statements made by many distinguished persons over the years in support of lowering the voting age. I quote from the House of Commons Hansard, July 14, 1960:

> There is a great deal to be said in the circumstances of today for the reduction of the voting age from 21 to 18, and most of the major arguments in favour of such a change were given by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The argument which I think must make the greatest appeal is that we do not hesitate as a state to call on young people to fight for our country and, if necessary to die for our country, as thousands under the age of 21 have done. We ask them to accept the supreme obligation of citizenship in this regard, irrespective of whether they are 21 or 20 or 19 or 18, so it seems to me that if we ask Canadians to take on that obligation the time has come when they should have the privilege of voting so they may do their share in determining the policies which might affect the situations in which they would be asked to share in this supreme obligation. I think young people of 18 or 19 or 20, as a result of the training they received in our educational establishments today, are quite qualified to use their judgment wisely and well in respect of the franchise as well as in respect of other matters on which we ask young people today to exercise their judgment.
> We do place obligations on and grant privileges to young people in many fields now, including the privilege of paying taxes. If we are going to ask them to serve in the armed forces and to pay their share of the expenses of government, I think the time has come when we should give them the privilege of playing their part in determining government policy.

The man speaking at that time was the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. This is an indication of the kind of thinking that supports the measure I have the honour to present today. I know that honourable senators will give this measure careful consideration before deciding whether or not to pass this measure. I would ask them to consider this question very sincerely, and to consider the position in which they will place the Senate if they pass it. We will be saying to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada that we are prepared to show some leadership on this question. If we pass this measure, I am 100 per cent convinced that the House of Commons will have to pass it. They would not dare turn it down. Think of the kind of publicity that the Senate would get. The passage of this measure will mean that this generation of senators will have reached over a generation of Canadians and joined hands with the youth of this country in saying that they, the youth, should share in the responsibility of deciding the kind of government we have in the future. If the Senate wants to do something for itself and something for Canada, I believe that this would be a good indication of that kind of desire. I would say to each senator, no matter what he or she may think of the bill, let us take a vote on it before too many sittings have gone by. Let us have enough sittings to have it thoroughly debated and then let us take a vote. Let us not kill it by refusing to vote on it or by adjourning the debate interminably and making a marathon debate which goes on indefinitely. Let us, within a reasonable number of sittings of this chamber, have this measure put to a vote and let the senators, by voting on this measure, demonstrate to the people of Canada whether they wish to show that they are part of a forward-looking Senate in this present century.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Would the honourable Senator Argue permit a question? He referred to President Johnson introducing or suggesting such a measure to the last Congress. Is he aware that this was done only at the stage when it could not possibly pass through the required legislative procedures?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am not at all aware of that. I followed President Johnson over the years and I believe he sincerely was in support of this measure. I followed President Eisenhower on the same question and he supported the vote for 18-year olds. While it may have happened in one instance, I do not accept the inference that President Johnson supported a lower voting age only in such a way that it could not possibly pass, because I know that for many years he sincerely campaigned for a lower voting age.

Hon. Mr. McElman: Honourable senators, I have a second question on that matter. Senator Argue referred to the "last instance". That is why I raised it, because the measure could not possibly have passed.

I have another question. Senator Argue spoke of a concensus and majority view favouring this. Is he aware that as recently as a year ago, in October 1967, there was a referral of this question to the people of the Province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I am aware of that.

Hon. Mr. McElman: And that in 21 out of 22 electoral ridings in that province, the people of New Brunswick voted overwhelmingly against reducing the voting age.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I understand that the voting was something like two to one, opposed to granting the vote at the reduced age of 18. That does not particularly impress me. It does show that people over 21 in the Province of New Brunswick are not in favour of this being done in that province. If one had taken a vote amongst the male residents of Canada 50 years ago, as to whether or not the franchise should have been extended to women, I expect it would have been defeated by 10 to one. The very fact that the people of New Brunswick have had such a vote is an indication to me that support for the 18-year-old vote is gaining ground.

In my native province of Saskatchewan, if anyone dared to have a referral on the question as to whether or not we should take away the vote of those who now have the right to vote at age 18, I am sure that would be defeated almost 100 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McElman: I simply wished to know if the honourable senator was aware of this.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I was aware.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: The honourable member indicated he had contacted the office of the Leader of the Opposition to find his attitude to this matter. Could he tell me if he contacted the office of the Leader of the Government to find out his attitude?

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is interesting. The answer is no. I have been searching public statements. I have searched everything I could get publicly in regard to the view of the Leader of the Government and I could not find anything opposed to this measure. I have been searching the statements of the Leader of the Government and, if I understand them correctly, it is something on which he wants to have advice. I think that is a commendable attitude, although personally I also like the attitude of the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, in the Parliament of that day. He was not able to present such a measure. I am convinced that the way to say to the Government that we want the 18-year-old vote is to vote for this bill.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Would the honourable member be good enough to tell me whether the Right Honourable Mr. Pearson, the former Prime Minister, ever introduced, sponsored, promoted or in any way supported the principle which my friend has enunciated?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I had thought of that. I think the question would be better put to the Leader of the Government. However, there were so many things that Mr. Pearson was able to get through, and so many things he was not able to get through, that I can understand how this particular item—although he supported it himself very firmly—might have gone by the board, in the kind of Parliament he had to deal with.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I have one more question. Would the honourable member perhaps tell us about the views of the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Perhaps the leader would be allowed to make his own speech.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I understood that Senator Argue was assuming that the statement of the former Leader of the Government was in effect until a new statement was made by the present Leader of the Government.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hollett, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 11.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 28, 1968, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, for the second reading of Bill S-17, respecting Investment Companies.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, when I was considering speaking on this bill at this time, and I was talking to the Leader of the Government, he indicated that there might be an area this evening in the sittings when I could speak on it, as against my preference to speak tomorrow afternoon. I said, "That is fine, but remember, as you listen to me, you may be like a friend of mine who wrote a very lengthy letter, and at the end of it he apologized for its great length because, he said, 'I did not have time to write a short letter.' "

I am going to try to avoid that tonight; maybe the condensation will not be as great as it would have been tomorrow afternoon. In any event, I can assure you that it will not be like the telegram which an economy-minded man was preparing to send. He consulted an even more miserly friend who started to eliminate unnecessary words, and finally ended up with the address and signature, nothing else being necessary. I will not go that far.

This bill, having to do with investment companies, in principle and for the purposes for which it is designed, is commendable. I think you would say it is necessary, not in the form in which it has been presented to us, but as a basis upon which we can consider the question. I say that because even if you go back and read the report of the Porter Commission you will see they discussed the areas of investment companies, chartered banks, trust companies, near banks, acceptance corporations, etcetera, and also the regulations, the control, the guidelines or rules for investment in those areas. In their report they stated that there was still a gap in this field of investment companies that should be looked at and dealt with in some way in the matter of supervision, control or direction. This is what this bill proposes but, as I said to a friend of mine the other day, you would not think much of the advice of your dentist if you went to him with a toothache in one tooth and he recommended that all your teeth be extracted.

I feel there is a very necessary, justifiable and good purpose to be served by legislation in relation to investment companies. I also feel this is too complex, that it goes too far, and that in its definitions it goes beyond the ordinary concept of an investment company.

Having said that, let me get down to the meat of the bill. It proposes that Parts I and III shall come into force on proclamation, and Part II, which deals with certificates of registry, et cetera, shall come into force not sooner than a period of two years from the date on which the other parts come into force. I intend to approach this bill on that basis.

The definition of "business of investment" is, I think, far too broad for the ordinary concept of the business of investment. At the risk of repetition I should like to call the attention of honourable senators to the fact that "business of investment" is defined by section 2(1)(b) of the bill in this manner:

> "business of investment" with respect to a company means the borrowing of money by the company on the security of its bonds, debentures, notes or other evidences of indebtedness, and the use of some or all of the assets of the company for
> (i) the making of loans whether secured or unsecured...

That is one purpose. The other is the purchase of bonds, debentures, notes or other evidences of indebtedness of individuals or corporations; the purchase of shares of corporations; the purchase of—and why this one is put in, I do not know—bonds, debentures, notes or other evidences of indebtedness of or guaranteed by a government or a municipality; the purchase of real property other than that needed in connection with the operation; or the purchase of instalment sales contracts. This is the definition of "business of investment".

In paragraph (f), on page 2, honourable senators will find a definition of "investment company" in these words:

> "investment company" means a company
> (i) incorporated after the coming into force of Part I of this Act primarily for the purpose of carrying on the business of investment, or
> (ii) that carries on the business of investment and at least twenty-five per cent of the assets of which are used as described in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of paragraph (b)...

Here I immediately run into a problem in that the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux) in the course of his explanation indicated that to meet the test of being an investment company, and of carrying on the business of investment, the essential thing is for you to borrow money on the security of bonds, debentures, et cetera, and to use that money for the purchase of shares, bonds, et cetera.

As I read this definition I recognize, as a matter of law, that there is a difference between the proceeds of the sale of a bond issue—and in that way borrowing money—and the use of some or all of the assets of the company for certain purposes. The proceeds of the sale of a bond issue by a company may be less than the total of the assets of that company, because that company may also have made one or more issues of its shares, as a result of which it has assets in the form of the proceeds of the sale of the shares. Therefore, the definition in the form in which it is drawn has broader implications than I think have been discussed so far in the course of this debate. Whether or not that is so, the real question in issue and the area of protection sought to be covered by this bill is the use made of the assets of the company in investment rather than protection in relation to the borrowing of money on the security of bonds, debentures and so on.

A company which proposes to go to the public and borrow money on an issue of bonds, debentures or other evidence of indebtedness, must satisfy the requirements of the security laws in the various provinces of Canada. I am talking generally now; there are exceptions. The company must file a prospectus; it must satisfy the requirements of, for instance, in Ontario the new Securities Act, which is rapidly being adopted by other provinces in Canada. Therefore, from the point of view of the public who may be thinking of investing in the bonds of a company offering these bonds for sale, I would say there is a plenitude, and maybe even more, of protection in the information that must be supplied in the prospectus, which must be approved by the securities commission of the province, and which must be published in the sense that it must be provided to every person who is going to invest in and purchase some of these bonds.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I put a question?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Is it not a fact that certain companies that may have been the provocation of this legislation were the subject of examination by the Securities Commission in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: At this stage I would not say I cannot answer, but I would prefer not to answer my friend's question. I would say generally that some of the companies to which I think he is referring were provincially incorporated. The point my friend has missed is this. I am indicating that in my view this bill is designed to deal with the use to which the assets of the company are put after they have gathered in the money, whether it is in the form of the sale of shares or bonds. That investment, in the various forms spelled out here, is what this bill is designed to cover so as to protect the bondholders and the shareholders of the company in the use to which the assets of the company are put after the assets have come in and formed part of the company by the buying of shares.

My friend may have been referring to a number of very substantial failures in Ontario where money was raised from the public on the security of bonds and the proceeds of sale were used in the acquisition, in some cases, of shares, bonds and debentures of other companies, and in other cases of companies, and the money of the main company, which had come from the public, was ultimately dissipated through the use to which it was put.

The aim and design of this bill is to cover that end of the transaction. I think that is a reasonable approach, because under our securities law in the provinces, under the provisions relating to the sale of securities in relation to federal companies under our Canada Corporations Act, there is protection, and I would say ample protection. There may not be protection to the nth degree. Maybe the resourcefulness of individuals will uncover avenues as a result of which you may have to make amendments, but that is something that may take care of itself.

I say the design of this is to cover the use to which the money may be put. When we come to that, my first problem is that I always regard bonds guaranteed by the federal Government or the government of a province as being at least a sufficiently good risk, and that if a company used money which it collected from the shareholders and subscriptions for shares and from the sale of its bonds to buy Government bonds, at least there could not be any charge that they were wasting or dissipating the assets of the company. Why that is included in it, I am at a loss to know. Maybe we will get that explanation when we go to committee.

I am addressing myself now to two parts of this bill. Part I, which runs through to section 8 and which deals with it, starts with section 3 and deals with the supervision of investment companies. Now, it creates certain prohibited transactions where certain relationships exist as between directors of the investment company and the companies whose shares or bonds are going to be purchased by this company. There is nothing new in that. You will find that provision in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. You will find it in the Trust and Loan Companies Acts. So there is nothing new in making this provision, nor can any person quarrel with the provision that if a certain relationships exist as between directors and shareholders of an investment company and companies in which they are going to invest some of their moneys, then those transactions are prohibited. In Part I you have this prohibition of transactions by reason of certain relationships.

Now, the only other thing you have is the requirement that an investment company that meets the definition must file an annual statement with the Superintendent of Insurance. I think in the course of the debate that has gone on so far tonight there was a little confusion as between "annual statement" as used in this bill, and the assumption was that the "annual statement" meant the annual statement of the company which would be filed for income tax purposes and filed for corporate purposes and distributed to the shareholders. The annual statement, as especially defined in this bill, is the annual statement which the company must file with the Superintendent of Insurance each fiscal year in conformity with the requirements of this act and the forms that are prescribed. This is the annual statement. So there is not the problem of confusion as between the income that you state in your annual statement to your shareholders and the income that you state to the income tax people, and the statement of income that you furnish to the Superintendent of Insurance. His position is different. His job as stated in Part I of the bill is to assess whether the company, on the basis of its statement, is in a good financial position in the sense as to whether their operations are such that they can make their instalment payments on their indebtedness, that they can pay their interest charges, or whether they have a deficiency of assets as against liabilities. This is the job that the Superintendent of Insurance has to do. Under this part he is directed to examine these statements. If he needs any further information he has the power of inspection. He can send people in to inspect the books and records, and he can examine the officers of the company to clarify all these points.

Now, there is nothing new in that. These provisions you will find in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. You will find them in the Trust and Loan Companies Acts. So there is nothing novel or new in this procedure; and I would not expect there would be in that requirement of an annual statement or in the power of inspection.

There was some confusion in the debate so far on another point, where authority is given to the Superintendent of Insurance to value and even appraise the shares or the real estate and, if he decides that they have a lesser value than the value as shown in the actual statement, then for the purposes of what he has to do and for the purposes of his report to the minister—that is the Minister of Finance—to reduce the assets that appear in the annual statement by that amount which he thinks is over value. This is for the purposes of the determination he has to make. It has no relationship to the accounting of the company for income tax purposes. This is for the purposes of his report to the minister and, if you will look at section 5(6), you will see that his job is to get such information as he thinks is necessary to enable him to ascertain the financial condition of the company and its ability to meet its obligations. This is all that Part I does; and there you are left in the air.

Remember, as I told you in the beginning, that Part II, which provides for certificates of registry and the machinery for the revocation or for the revocation and re-issue of those certificates with conditions, or for the cancellation of these certificates with certain consequences—that that Part will not come into force for two years. Therefore, in relation to what must be done under Part I, there is no sanction if you do not do it—if you do not have a certificate, and you are not required to have one, there is nothing they can cancel and so stop you from doing business.

Then, we move into Part III, which is the other condition, to come into force by proclamation. Part III is a general part, and of course immediately it becomes concerned with the cost to the Superintendent of Insurance and his department in the administration of the provisions of this act arising by reason of the inspection and other requirements. It provides a basis under which those administration costs will be assessed, and on which they shall be apportioned against all the various investment companies which are subject to this act. Thus, whatever that obligation is, it becomes a debt of the company and it must pay it.

There was some discussion earlier in this debate as to the arbitrary nature of that provision; but again I say there is nothing new in it. If you want to go back and find precedents, you can go to the Insurance Act, under which similar provisions occur for defraying the cost of administration on inspection, etc, in relation, among other companies, to life insurance companies under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and the Trust and Loan Companies Acts. So, in that regard it is not stepping out of line in deciding that the cost of the administration should be borne by the companies that are subject to this measure.

As a matter of fact, I am very happy to see that, because in some cases and in relation to some aspects of fees that are charged for services in Canada, and in some of the provinces, the measure of what you are called on to pay, on the amalgamation of companies or otherwise, in my submission, bears no relationship to the administrative cost of doing the things that you are called upon to do or, in other words, the services you render. They are much more substantial, and when you find them being increased at a time when the department is more than paying its way on the original scale of charges, one is very happy to see them revert to this principle that it is the cost of administering this statute that is to be determined and assessed on this formula basis against the companies subject to the provisions of this act. True, it might work a hardship in some regard, because it might be some smaller companies or one or two instances where time has to be spent and a lot of inspection done, and yet all the other companies who are toeing the line are called on to pay the cost of doing it. However, the answer is that generally it is good for the business of those companies to have an orderly and honest operation. So, this is one of the items covered in Part III.

One of the other things that is covered in Part III is that there are penalties provided if directors or officers make false statements, if they resist the inspectors who come in, and all such things. This is in Part III, and there is no particular objection to that.

As I will develop later, the particular clause in Part III that is objectionable is clause 22. Really, that clause provides for the laying down of guidelines on investment policy and the percentage relationships between outstanding debt and paid up capital. All those things are laid down by regulation and must be followed by all the investment companies subject to the provisions of this act. I will have something further to say about that later.

If we only bring into force Parts I and III, except for educational purposes we have not accomplished much. The reason for not bringing Part II into force until a period not earlier than two years from the date of proclamation, I do not know at the moment, but I expect that will be clarified.

The only other thing I wish to tell you before I state some of my conclusions is that Part II is the part which provides for registration. Every company which is an investment company under this bill must procure a certificate of registry—in other words, a licence to do business. The way in which the minister controls such a company is by the granting or the withholding of, or the suspending of or refusal to renew the certificate of registry. There is nothing new in that. If you read the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act you will see that it has been in force for a long time. If you read the Trust Companies Act or the Loan Companies Act, you will see this provision and this control. So, a certificate of registry is the method used, and I have no objection to that. I think it is a reasonable method of controlling the situation.

However, when you come to the sanctions and penalties, you find them in Part II of the bill. By Part II, if the superintendent reports that an investment company, after a full inspection has a deficiency of assets over liabilities, or is not in a position were it can carry on in the ordinary way and pay its obligations, the repayment of borrowed money, interest, et cetera, and he makes that report to the minister, the minister may act on that report.

First of all, he notifies the company and they have the opportunity to present their side of the case. Then, if the minister is not satisfied with the explanation, he may revoke their certificate of registry or he may revoke and reissue with certain conditions attached, the conditions being, for instance, that they have a period of one year, two years, six months, or whatever it may be, within which to cure these deficiencies that he has found.

Some of the deficiencies may arise because his appraisal of the value of the real estate holdings is less than the company's appraisal; or his appraisal of the value of the securities is less than the company's appraisal. But this is the basis upon which the control is exercised and the sanctions enforced.

At that stage, if the minister is not satisfied with the explanations and with the corrections which may be suggested will be made, then the company is deemed to be insolvent and proceedings may be taken by the minister or, on his application, to wind up the company under the Winding-Up Act; or proceedings may be taken, on the application of the minister, to proceed under the Bankruptcy Act, so as to terminate its existence and to liquidate the company.

This is where I begin to have difficulties in Part II, because, remember, that where a company borrows money on the security of its bonds, debentures, et cetera, there is a document called a deed of trust which spells out the terms and conditions upon which the borrowing is made and upon which security is provided, and it provides for events of default. If a default occurs under that trust instrument, then the trustee for the bondholders is entitled to go in and put in a receiver and take charge and manage the assets for the interest of those secured creditors.

In this bill it is provided in clause 26 that:

> Nothing in this Act affects any right or remedy of a person who lends money to a company to which this Act applies on the security of bonds, debentures, notes or other evidences of indebtedness of the company.

When you put those things together, certainly there is a line of rationalization required in order to get something practicable in the light of that situation. This is a matter of contract between borrower and lender, between a company and the people who underwrite and the people who purchase bonds; it is a matter of property and civil rights in the provinces, and I have my rights there, and this bill recognizes those rights by saying there is nothing in this bill which interferes with the rights of a person who lends money on the security of bonds, debentures, et cetera. I point out to you that the moment it is determined that the company is insolvent because there is a deficiency of assets, or it cannot pay its current obligations, then in other trust deeds that I have seen, and certainly in any application I have been a party to drawing, approving or amending—and I can tell you it has been more than two or three in the course of my lifetime in practice—this is one of the events of default. The moment there is that event of default, the superior right is in the trustee who puts a receiver in. That goes ahead of any interim receiver whom the minister may attempt to put in under the provisions of the Winding-Up Act.

When you are talking about the Bankruptcy Act, and when you are a secured creditor, you stand apart; and if any person in an inferior position wants to come in and take over the working out of this business, then he has to take care of you and your full obligation in order to do so.

In addition to that, why should this authority to invoke winding-up or bankruptcy be given without reservation to the minister? It may be that the creditors at that time feel that they would like the company to carry on and work out its problems under its directors. That is why I say I think an effort has been made to create a club that is so big that it would be like using an elephant to swat a fly. It seems to me that instead of all these provisions invoking the Winding-Up Act and the Bankruptcy Act, it would be better, when it is disclosed that this company is not solvent, to have provision similar to those in the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act under which the minister may in effect say: You cease to carry on business, and I may issue to you a certificate or a licence that is conditional, and for a period which may enable you to work out your problems, or which may enable you to make a sale of you assets at a better advantage to the creditors and shareholders.

After all, it is one thing to devise legislation to protect the public who put money into investment companies, against the squandering of that money, but we must also keep in mind that if you have reached the position where it would appear that some squandering has taken place, it is much better to try to work out a solution that will leave the most dollars to the creditors and shareholder, than to take a step that immediately and substantially depreciates the assets and any market for those assets.

So I say that the methods that are proposed in Part II are not in keeping with the disease that you have to deal with. I think it is possible to devise a simpler, less complex, and more direct method of dealing with the situation when you are faced with the fact that the investment company is in trouble. Obviously, the people who have put their money there need protection, and they should be alerted at the earliest possible moment. My own view is that instead of waiting for an annual statement—which means delivery within two months after the end of the fiscal year, at which time the Superintendent of Insurance and then the minister may get an assessment of what is the financial position of the company concerned—possibly in the month following the month in which transactions which involve sale and subsequent investment occur, a return can be made to the Superintendent so that he can then assess the thing as it goes along.

Under the Securities Act of Ontario, and similar acts elsewhere, people who are classified as insiders are required to report in the month following the month in which they buy or sell shares of the company in respect of which they are in the position of being an insider. This enables you to keep your knowledge of the events and their results closer in time to their occurrence, and perhaps you can thereby recognize these things and stop them sooner.

These are just ideas that I am throwing out at this time, because I think that in principle the bill has a place in our financial structure. I think it can do a job, but that definition of "business of investment" is certainly not my concept of the business of investment, and I do not think it is the concept of most other people.

In the United States they have had for years a statute called the Investment Company Act, which is administered in conjunction with the SEC, and which defines "investment company" as any issuer which is, or holds itself out as being engaged primarily, or proposes to engage primarily, in the business of investing, reinvesting or trading in securities. That is the kind of definition I can understand.

Let us take, for instance, the position of a mortgage company. I think right away of RoyNat which was incorporated by special act some years ago, and which borrows money from the public and uses that money to lend on building operations and residential developments, and projects of that kind. I think that RoyNat—or any one of a number of other companies—will advance more money than the customary 75 per cent, but it has a basis of insurance for the excess, and a liquidation of that excess down to 75 per cent first, and then your costs come down as a result. A company of that kind would be an investment company under the definition here. In other words, it would be borrowing money from the public on the security of its assets, et cetera, and it would be lending on the security of property by way of mortgage. Yet, this in no sense would appear to be the kind of operation against which protection is needed at this time. The sort of thing we need to be protected against is that which involves what I call the mining of the public—the borrowing of money from the public and then using that money for various enterprises that are so uncertain and speculative that the only way in which they are able to carry on for any length of time is by subsequent borrowings, because the moment the momentum stops the whole thing falls to pieces. This is the sort of thing that can be seen from a study of the history of Atlantic Acceptance Corporation. One can see the difference between a mortgage company that borrows from the public and then lends out on various bases, and a company that borrows from the public and keeps on putting that money into enterprises that are only able to carry on in times that are exceptionally good, and only by the constant infusion of money.

So, the definition is, in my opinion, too broad. It even covers a company that follows the practice of liquidating its inventory in the eleventh or twelfth month of its fiscal year so that it is then in a position of having substantial cash which it invests perhaps in notes and short-term securities of some kind, and then goes back to building up its inventory for the next year. Companies of that kind are covered by this definition. Holding companies are covered by this definition. Industrial companies that maintain a portfolio of investments representing 25 per cent or more of their assets are subject to the provisions of this statute.

It is true that there is provision in this bill that you must register and get your certificate, but if you show that while you do this you are not primarily engaged in investment, and that the investment that you do is incidental to the main purpose of your business, then you may get an exemption. Even with that exemption the minister can withdraw at any time; it can be changed. Why in those circumstances attempt to cover a broader area than that in which the problem exists? In the last few years we have had enough experience to know where the problem is in investment companies.

In my suggestion, the very simple way of dealing with it would be to have a proper definition, along the lines I have indicated, of an investment company with your exemptions. For instance, you may have an investment trust under a corporate name investing in shares and so on; they may borrow money or may use 25 per cent of their assets for this or the other investment purpose. Then there is the serious question whether they are not required to get a certificate of registry. It may be argued that it does not take too much effort to make the application in those circumstances, but that will contribute to the cost of administration, a cost which in the circumstances may not be warranted by the calibre, integrity and nature of the operations of these companies.

So, I think the definition has to be revised. I think exceptions have to be added to the even broad definition which I gave of an investment company as found in the Investment Companies Act in the United States. They have many exceptions, which seem normal and reasonable as I read them.

Let us get down to the real business of the meeting. What really bothers me is the power in section 22, which says:

> The Governor in Council may make such regulations as he considers appropriate to secure the establishment and maintenance of a sound financial structure for investment companies and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations pertaining to levels of paid-up capital and surplus, ratios of outstanding debt to paid-up capital and surplus, liquidity of assets and maximum permissible single investments or loans of investment companies and prescribing rules for valuation of assets and liabilities and relating to audit procedures to be followed in respect of such companies.

In my submission, this trenches on a concept I have had of the purpose of regulations and the limitation of regulations, which I have asserted many times in this house. I say you should not legislatively give authority to legislate by regulation. Over the years all governments in office have recognized this problem. For instance, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act outlines guidelines for investment by statute. These guidelines relate to the investment of the assets of the life insurance company or other classifications of insurance, in bonds, debentures guaranteed by governments, corporate bonds, the percentage of assets that may be invested in preferred shares meeting certain conditions, the percentage of assets that may be invested in common shares meeting certain dividend requirements, the percentage that may be invested in real estate, the amount of or limitation on the overall amount that may be invested in relation to any particular property.

Then there is the basket clause: if investments have been made and assets do not fit into one of those requirements they may still fit into the basket clause. This may reduce some of the rights under other parts, but here you have spelled out a whole dictionary of guidelines for these insurance companies. It is reasonable that that should be so because their income represents the premiums of the people who take out policies, and the purpose of taking out those policies is to assure themselves that on a given date when a certain event occurs that money represented by the principal of that policy is there unimpaired, unencumbered, available to be paid up.

Therefore, in the interests of the policyholders this spelling out of the kind of investment, the extent of the investment, by statute, is a good thing. It is Parliament which does this. This is not the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Superintendent of Insurance, no matter how well informed he may be. It can operate like a yo-yo or an escalator—it can go up and down. The regulations are guidelines which will change with the change in economic level, or will throw up some solid basic character to the rules for interpreting whether there has been a good or a bad investment.

The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act does not say, you may not invest in XYZ Companies but you can invest in the ABC Company. It gives the classification and condition attaching to the bonds. There are various classifications, such as preferred shares, common shares, real estate, and they must fall in that category. If that provision is violated all that happens is that the Superintendent of Insurance makes a report to the minister that the assets are reduced by this amount, or if the assets are over-valued in the opinion of the superintendent he may call for an appraisal; he may make an appraisal himself, and if he finds that the appraised value is less for the purposes of that report to, I think, the Treasury Board, they are reduced.

If you are treading on the dangerous ground where you find, on the basis of the report of the superintendent, that the assets are less than the liabilities, then the minister can call a halt; he can refuse to renew the licence; he can put you on terms of renewal, that this situation must be cured within a period of one, two or three years. This is the way it works under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Under the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act, while you have a similar provision, there is a limitation on the kind of investment which a loan company may make. For those who are curious it can be found in section 60. Roughly speaking, the character of the investment is similar to that in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. There is an asset limitation of 25 per cent of the assets that may be invested in stocks et cetera. There is also a 5 per cent limitation that may be invested in income-producing real property. Other investments and loans are limited to 15 per cent of the unimpaired paid-up capital and reserves. Loan companies are authorized to receive deposits. One can understand the meticulous care taken in connection with the areas in which investments may be made. There are limitations to assure some satisfactory quality to the investments. In the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act there is a limitation on the borrowing that loan companies may make, limited to four times its paid-up unimpaired capital stock and reserves.

You can see that behind this the trust and loan companies are handling deposits, and they must carry on their business in such a way that they do not imperil or impair it.

Now, in the Small Loans Act you have provisions as to limitations on investments that a small loan company may make, and they are very brief. You are prohibited from investing or loaning money on real estate, and you are prohibited from taking deposits. You are permitted to loan or invest in notes or bills of exchange, and in all these cases you have the power of inspection. You do have the requirement of registration, a certificate of registry which gives the minister the control.

I indicated to you that I like the provisions under the Trust and Loan Companies Acts because it seems a more rational way of dealing with this matter rather than swinging a big stick, by proceeding with winding-up and/or with bankruptcy and immediately facing the conflict as you would have between federal and provincial jurisdiction, with the rights of secured creditors and their instruments of deeds of trust, which would entitle them to go into a superior position in control of these assets.

Section 72 of the Loan Companies Act says, if as a result of the inspection which the superintendent has made, and in his report to the minister he believes that the assets of the company are insufficient to justify its continuance in business, he shall make a special report to the minister on the condition of such company. Then it says:

> (2) Where the minister, after a reasonable time has been given to the company to be heard by him, and upon such further inquiry and investigation as he sees fit to make, reports to the Governor in Council that he agrees with the opinion of the Superintendent, the Governor in Council may, if he also concurs in such opinion, suspend or cancel the licence of the company, and the company shall thereupon cease to transact further business.

It continues:

> (3) The Minister may, during such suspension or cancellation, issue such conditional licence as he may deem to be necessary for the protection of the public.

The public have a large stake in it, when they have put their money into a company which has invested in various types of assets, and steps are being taken which will immediately and substantially depress their value; whereas, if you have a more orderly and rational method of approach, it may well work to the greater advantage of those who have money at stake.

Subsection 4 says:

> (4) Where the Minister deems it advisable, the said conditional licence may provide that the company shall, during the continuance of such conditional licence, arrange for the sale of its assets and for the transfer of its liabilities to some other company under the provisions of sections 86 to 89 inclusive.

When all those things have failed, then the last subsection of 72 states:

> (5) Whereupon the expiration of the conditional licence no arrangement satisfactory to the Minister has been made for such sale and transfer, and the company's condition has not been such as to warrant the restoration of the company's licence, the company shall be deemed to be insolvent.

This is more orderly and it seems to be a more rational way. I do not want to be taken as being totally critical of the method proposed in Part II. I think once it had been settled as to that gap which was indicated in the report of the Porter Commission that existed in the investment area and investment companies not covered by the Bank Act and not covered by all these other statutes I have referred to, once it was decided that that gap had to be closed somehow, then I think they went all out to provide the most drastic and arbitrary procedures that would bring to an immediate end those operations. But it has to be remembered that there are constitutional questions. It has to be remembered there are secured creditors that may have preferred rights and who cannot be stepped on regardless of their rights by invoking the Winding-Up Act or the Bankruptcy Act.

I am sure there is a more orderly way. I am not wedded to the suggestions I have made, but I think that somewhere in that area, when the minister, on the report of the superintendent, and after he has heard the company, has finally decided that this company is not in a position where it should be permitted to carry on, in the interests of protecting those who have their money in there, must decide the best way of going about the situation. I think this is the preferred approach; it would be a simple and a more reasonable approach, in my mind.

Honourable senators, I diverted. I come back to the regulations.

In the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act we have provided by statute as to the area of investments and the limitations. In the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act we have provided a similar way; in the Small Loans Act we have provided the same way. If you would look at the Bank Act, you will see that we have put a limitation and a restriction on the nature and kind of investment that may be made by banks.

The question is, whether this is the approach, in relation to investment companies, that you should specifically in the legislation outline the areas as between bonds and preferred shares and real estate, or whether there is a better way of doing it.

Honourable senators, I do not want to appear vain; therefore, I will say that I can think of another way that should be considered. I am not saying that it is a better way—although in my view, it is.

Under the Canada Corporations Act, a company, once it is incorporated, is given broad powers of investment. If you look at section 14 of the Canada Corporations Act, you will see that the incidental and ancillary powers are very substantial. The most general one of all is found in section 14(1)(k), which gives power to invest and deal with the moneys of the company not immediately required, in such manner as may from time to time be determined. Then, they will have power to lend money in certain circumstances, to sell and dispose of assets, and take shares as a consideration.

This bill does not curtail or restrict any of those investment rights that they have under the incidental and ancillary powers. It does provide for certain prohibited transactions, which is not by reason of the nature of the transaction but by reason of the person with whom the transaction takes place. Therefore, we still have, under this bill, the power of investment. The way the power of investment is controlled under the Canada Corporations Act, and the way it must be proposed to put the limitations on this, is general regulations by the Governor in Council, which he may consider appropriate; and, therefore, what he regulates he can unregulate, and he can regulate again in a different fashion.

Where does this put the position of directors of the company? They become supernumeraries, if we have this. If there is to be any restriction on investment, in my submission it should be done by legislation and not by regulation, because it is substantive law and over the years it has been so recognized.

If the definition of investment company is going to continue as broadly as it is in this bill at the present time, and without any exceptions, then we do need some classifications as to investment.

Then what happens in the area of more speculative investment, where directors are knowledgeable and understand market conditions, or in the mining area, where they are able to appraise and value situations and prospects, where they are able to look at business operations and make projections and assessments in the normal course of events, and now, with the aid of computers, where they may go ahead a few years, and may buy accordingly? If the general economics level changes and lowers, by reason of a lot of extraneous circumstances which have no relationship to this particular investment company and its holding, the minister or the Governor in Council by regulation, can issue revised regulations and perhaps shut down the future for this company, by some requirement that their licence be withdrawn or by conditions being attached to it which rob the company of that speculative value or increment that may come in the future.

This is all legitimate operation, as anybody who has experience in the business and financial and industrial world knows. This is the way great companies develop; this is the way small companies become great companies, by their appraisal and their betting on their judgment—and I think this, in some measure, is what some of the public want. They want that opportunity. But if we take every class of investment company that is not covered by these particular statutes to which I have referred, and put them all into a mould where there are general rules, we will have to become very inventive and find some way of dealing with this area of investment companies, to cover that particular company, because the field would not exist if there were not a demand for it.

We are doing more and more each day in the way of full disclosure, both when companies are offering securities for sale and when we are dealing with listed shares, so far as exchanges are concerned. More and more the disclosure is becoming increasingly great, as it should, in the interest of the people who are putting up their money.

But one comes to a stage where the effect of restriction in investment, such as is encompassed by this bill, and by this clause 22, may be such that you shut off that area and that kind of transaction. It may have to find its level somewhere else, but I think we are trying to go too far to cover the ill that we know of. Certainly there have been bad operations, certainly there have been operations which have mushroomed, and have been able to mushroom only so long as they were able to bring money in and so long as they were able to tie that money up in various other enterprises; and the moment, at any level, that the due date was earlier than the date on which they had some more money coming in, then the whole thing collapsed, and in those cases the whole foundation of the investment collapsed.

That is the sort of thing against which the public should be protected. The ideal protection, once you settle on the formula, would be protection where we have the provinces as well as the federal authority in the field, because now, I suppose within limits, one can transfer ones operations from a federal corporation to which this bill applies to a provincial corporation, and it may be in some areas that this would permit a continuance of some operations of this kind.

Honourable senators, I may have spoken for too long, but I said when I started that it would be a long letter tonight and it might be a short letter tomorrow afternoon.

There is more that could be said in relation to this scheme or plan, but the purpose to be served by this bill, in line with certain statements made in the Porter Commission report, is a good one and is in some form designed to provide additional protection for the people who have invested money and whose money is being used for the purposes set out in this bill. But in all sincerity, I say, let us be realistic, let us use the normal methods and rationalization in dealing with this, and deal with a bill that is readily capable of being administered so that we protect where protection is needed, that is, on the use side of the money.

We recognize the ability and the quality of directors—we do not have to assume they are supernumeraries—and of the Superintendent of Insurance. I have the highest regard for him, but I have no assurance that he will remain forever the Superintendent of Insurance, in charge of the administration of this legislation, and we have to look at it objectively. Let us work out the kind of legislation that will give that protection as surely as we can provide it, which will be capable of easy administration and will not further intensify the possibility of loss to those who have money at stake, as against a simpler and maybe more direct method, in the interests of creditors and shareholders of companies—they are the ones whom this legislation is seeking to protect.

It is not just the Government stepping in, as such, because we do have criminal law which at some stage would protect creditors and shareholders, but by the time you know enough so that you can invoke the criminal law, a great loss may have occurred and you are trying to pick up the pieces. But if you have a better and more regular method, one which occurs at stated periods during the year, whereby these transactions are assembled during the year so that the Superintendent of Insurance and the minister can keep them in perspective at any time during the year, then you have much more assurance that the bill is going to do the job it is intended to do, that is, protect the use of the money put in by the people.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that January 22 is a very special day for all freedom-loving Ukrainians throughout the world, and particularly for over half a million Canadians of Ukrainian descent who have made notable contributions to the political, economic, social and cultural progress of our country, as well as to Canada's war effort, with leave of the Senate I rise to mark the occasion in this august chamber.

Today the blue and yellow flag of Ukraine is flying on the flagstaffs of the city halls of Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and other Canadian cities to commemorate the independence of the Ukrainian state, which was re-established by the will of the Ukrainian nation on January 22, 1918.

Last year the flag of free Ukraine fluttered in the breeze over the city hall of Ottawa, but this year it was forbidden, for Canadian protocol recognized officially the flag of Soviet Ukraine, which has the hammer and sickle on it to identify it with the Soviet Union. Soviet Ukraine is not a free and sovereign state.

The celebration of Ukrainian Independence Day should inspire not only Canadians of Ukrainian origin, but all Canadians of all origins to reflect upon our political and cultural heritage. It would doubtlessly give us a better appreciation of Canadian sovereignty if a comparison would be made with Ukrainian sovereignty.

It was the British North America Act of 1867, which had been drawn up voluntarily by delegates of several colonies, that established the Dominion of Canada. By this act Canada achieved a responsible and representative government based on democratic freedom for her citizens. In the subsequent years the Canadian Government gradually gained control over all external relations, achieving complete independence in foreign policy at the end of the First World War.

Canadian sovereignty was given final recognition by the Statute of Westminster in 1931. In 1947 the Canadian Citizenship Act made Canadian citizenship distinct from British citizenship. In 1952 a Canadian was appointed Governor General for the first time. This practice has become a permanent feature of that high office.

With respect to the Constitution we have only one sore problem, to find a method of cutting the apron-string which still ties it to the British Parliament. Thus Canada has evolved constitutionally from colonial status to independence, from an unknown entity to a leader among the middle nations of the world. From her early history she had been under the domination of British Imperialism. Today she is a free and voluntary member of the Commonwealth, NATO and the United Nations.

Having been part of the British oceanic empire, Canada won her independence through evolution, not through revolution, therefore without the shedding of blood in the struggle. In the meantime, she has assisted other British colonies to attain their independence, and speaks out in world forums for the cause of freedom and independence of peoples in various regions of the world.

Canada was able to gain her freedom and gradually her independence because she had been part of an oceanic empire. Although Britain had exploited her colonies economically, she brought to them civilization and the democratic forms of government as these were developing in the British Isles. When these colonies matured they gained control over their own affairs and proclaimed independence, mostly without bloodshed and with Britain's approval.

Ukraine's situation was different. She had the misfortune of becoming part of a land or continental empire. Tsarist Russia, unlike Britain which gradually developed a democratic constitution, was an autocracy with a totalitarian political system, employing terror as an instrument of policy to carry out the economic exploitation of subjugated peoples and their national territories. Ukraine, with her higher culture, civilization and democratic government, fell victim in the seventeenth century to a backward, tyrannical and ruthless Muscovite Russia. Under Russian tsarist domination, Ukraine's democratic freedom was crushed and she became a mere Russian province, deprived of her rights and even of her name. Ukrainians were forcibly subjected to Russification and the Ukrainian language was forbidden by the decrees, ukazy, of 1863 and 1876.

The soul of the Ukrainian nation, however, could not be destroyed. From the exploited mass of peasants there emerged a great spiritual leader, the greatest poet of Ukraine, the immortal Taras Shevchenko, who advocated the dignity of the human being, freedom, truth, equality, justice and the brotherhood of man. His poetry spread like a prairie fire and was memorized by all Ukrainians. The spirit of Ukraine was revived.

When the Tsarist empire came crumbling down under its own overburdensome weight of tyranny, despotism, bureaucracy and inefficiency, the Ukrainians were the first to break out of the "prison of nations." Ukraine followed the course of self-determination. At first, the Central Rada of Kiev the Ukrainian Parliament, in September 1917, demanded a reconstruction of the empire into a free federation of autonomous republics. The so-called democratic Russian Provisional Government of Kerensky outrightly rejected this demand and upheld an indivisible, monolithic Russia. When the Bolsheviks seized power under Lenin they recognized the Ukrainian National Republic in December 1917 and declared, "Everything that touches national rights and the national independence of the Ukrainian people, we, the Soviet of People's Commissars, accept clearly without limitations and unreservedly." This evidently was duplicity, for when the Bolsheviks failed to take control of the Ukrainian Parliament, they set up what they called a "Ukrainian government" in Kharkiv and called upon the Russian Red Army to help conquer Ukraine.

It was under these difficult circumstances that the Ukrainian Parliament, in the name of the people, proclaimed the Fourth Universal in Kiev, the capital, on January 22, 1918. This act established an independent national democratic republic of the Ukrainian nation. A year later on January 22, 1919 the Ukrainian Parliament proclaimed the union of all Ukrainian territories, as sections had previously been under Austria-Hungary and other countries. Thus was established a united Ukrainian National Republic, which in reality restored the Ukrainian State of the Cossacks and the original state of Prince Volodimir the Great of medieval times. This year free Ukrainians are celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the reunification of all Ukrainian lands within their own sovereign state.

The Ukrainian National Republic was a modern state modelled upon those of the western world. It recognized the highest principles of democracy—freedom of speech, press, religion, assembly, association and personal freedom. All minorities, including the Jews, were granted "national-personal" autonomy and representation in the government. The Ukrainian National Republic was the very antithesis of totalitarianism, despotism, colonialism and imperialism, and therefore has much in common with Canada.

The Ukrainian state should have received the recognition of the Western Allies, who unfortunately applied the Wilsonian principle of the self-determination of nations only to central Europe—Germany, Austria and Turkey. The principle of self-determination was not applied to the Russian empire. The communist regime continued the policy of an indivisible monolithic Russia under the name of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and crushed by force the many independent states that had emerged after the fall of tsardom, including Ukraine. By failing to support the new national states, the western powers allowed communism to win in the Russian empire, and the principles of Russian imperialism, colonialism and totalitarianism to continue on a larger scale. Thus, the U.S.S.R. emerged as the largest colonial power in the world and the greatest threat to western life, democracy and freedom. The western world could have prevented the restoration of Russian colonialism at the end of the First World War, by having recognized the freedom of the captive nations. Today we are facing the grim consequences: constant warfare of the cold war and the non-achievement of peace.

The acts of January 22, 1918 and January 22, 1919 are celebrated annually by the free Ukrainians throughout the world, including our Ukrainian citizens of Canada. These acts marked the victory of principles now written in the charter of the United Nations, of which Canada is a signatory. Free Ukrainians and the free people of all the subjugated nations of the Soviet Russian empire and its satellites will continue to celebrate their independence days and impress upon the western world that freedom is indivisible. The principles of the United Nations must be applied by all the other members, to the Soviet Union, which is a member, and self-determination, complete freedom, sovereignty, and integrity of national territory must be also granted to the non-Russian captive and satellite nations.

The Canadian Government, legislators, and people must constantly re-assert their faith in the principles of democracy, justice, freedom, and independence, and at the same time proclaim sympathy for and a readiness to give feasible aid to all those nations which are still struggling for the realization of these, the highest principles of humanity.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I say on behalf of the Government that it recognizes that this is an anniversary which means a great deal to many Canadians of Ukrainian descent who compose this federation. Canada is rich because of its Ukrainian population. We acknowledge the great contributions Ukrainians have made to national development and cultural achievement. We are the heirs of a rich heritage of a great people.

In all our cities and on our farms are to be found Canadians of Ukrainian descent, with their folklore, their political orientations, their great appreciation of music and of poetry, and who remind us of men like Taras Shevchenko. We are indeed happy to have in the Canadian family people whose origins are those of the honourable senator who has just spoken.

The first Ukrainian came to Canada around 1880. His name was John Ilyniak. He was the first of some 700,000 Canadians of Ukrainian descent to come to Canada. I had the pleasure of participating in a ceremony in the Supreme Court of Canada when he was one of the first of nine persons to be given the first certificates of Canadian citizenship. He was the representative of a strong band of people who have come from the Ukraine. They have enriched our lives in every way.

Canada, as a member of the United Nations, has repeatedly re-affirmed its belief in the principle of self-determination. Whatever application this cardinal postulate of the United Nations implies has, of course, the wide support of the Canadian people.

This is a proud day for the honourable senator. I assure him that it is a proud day for all of us to be able to pay our tribute to a great people who are contributing to the Canadian mosaic.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, it is indeed most appropriate that Senator Yuzyk should draw our attention to the fact that today is an important anniversary for the sons of the Ukraine. It is the anniversary of two memorable occasions. The independence of the Ukrainian State was re-established on January 22, 1918, and exactly one year later, on January 22, 1919, the Ukrainian Parliament proclaimed the union of all Ukrainian territories.

We know that since then the fate of the Ukrainian nation has been one of domination by the U.S.S.R. Because of that, Ukrainians throughout the world who have found a new home wish to recall these events. In Canada a very large number of sons of this proud nation have found here the freedom that is denied their brothers in their homeland. We understand and share their feelings, and with them we hope, despite the events in Czechoslovakia which may dim this hope, that democracy, justice, freedom and independence will triumph in a not-too-distant future, not only in the Ukraine but in all those countries beyond the Iron Curtain where the populations await only favourable circumstances to achieve their liberation.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, may I remind this chamber that one of the first Ukrainian privy councillors and ministers of the Crown was the Honourable Michael Starr, who was one of the best ministers of labour Canada ever had.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. David A. Croll for Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports 558 to 590, inclusive, and moved that the said reports be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

SECOND READING AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE RESCINDED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved:

That the order of the Senate of 21st January, 1969, for the second reading of the Bill S-17, intituled: "An act respecting Investment Companies", be rescinded;

That the order of the Senate of 21st January, 1969, referring the said bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce also be rescinded: and

That the debate on the motion of the honourable Senator Desruisseaux, seconded by the honourable Senator Sparrow, for the second reading of the said bill be resumed forthwith.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING

Pursuant to the above motion, the Senate resumed debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-17, respecting Investment Companies.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first let me express my very deep personal appreciation to all of you for agreeing to this unusual procedure. Normally when a bill is read a second time it is not appropriate to reopen the debate. The fact that the events occurred last evening in the way they did and that I am in this position today, is my own fault. I did not realize that the honourable Senator Hayden was going to speak last evening. In any event, I thought the debate would have been adjourned to a future date. Had I felt that the bill might pass second reading, I certainly would have asked that the debate be adjourned on my behalf. I therefore appreciate the indulgence you have afforded to take part in the debate on this bill, which I consider to be of great importance to the Senate and indeed to the country at large.

Honourable senators, I do not think anyone would question the basic ideas behind Bill S-17. Investors in Canadian financial institutions, regardless of where they live, are entitled to assume that the companies in which they invest do not fall into the hands of persons or corporations who are incompetent or practice in a fraudulent manner.

In recent years there have been regrettable examples of this. Even if the organizations in question be subject to provincial jurisdiction, it matters little. Uneasiness in respect of such organizations develops among investors, and Canadian financial institutions as a whole suffer.

If there is a deficiency in the regulation of federal companies it should be remedied. Regulations applicable to federal companies when appropriate will be reassuring. Provinciallly incorporated companies, if they so desire, can subject themselves to federal regulations. This has been done in several instances. I cite, for example, what we did in the last session in connection with the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, and what can be done under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, which allows for provincially incorporated insurance companies to be supervised by federal authorities.

The clauses in the bill designed to establish confidence include the requirement for disclosure and supervision, the provision of adequate reserves and appropriate sanctions in the event of violation. In this respect I would agree heartily with what Senator Hayden said last evening in his very remarkable address on this bill. Bill S-17 is an attempt to reach this goal. It is not perfect. It can be improved. Since it has originated as a Government measure here, I believe that the Senate should do all it can to make it the most effective instrument possible. It must take into account financial practices and the requirements of the modern Canadian corporate structure. This structure is by no means uniform, nor can all segments of the industry be poured into the same mould.

With these preliminary remarks as background, the first criticism I make relates to the definitions of "Business of investment" in clause 2(1) (b) and "Investment company" in clause 2(1) (f). For reasons which I propose to outline, in my view these sections are too broad. They are too big a basket—they gather oranges and apples and onions and tomatoes. They seek to treat in the same manner financial institutions which are designed for completely different purposes, institutions whose markets vary widely and whose uses are divergent.

The chartered banks have the powers set out in the Bank Act. Trust companies have other powers specified by various statutes. Acceptance corporations are of another order. Personal loan corporations are designed for a special type of service. Some of these are regulated by federal statutes, some by provincial statutes. In my view the definition section in this bill should be more precise. If it is, the various types of companies to be covered can be controlled more effectively in the interest of the public, of the Canadian economy, individual industries, and indeed in the interest of investors. On page 379 of the Porter Report it is suggested that the legislation stimulate diversity in an area where diversity is the order of the day among financial institutions. Presumably, the commission thereby recognized not only the value of competition, but the importance to the economy of specialized corporate practices to meet the needs of modern financing.

I noticed in that impeccable source of information, the Ottawa Journal, last evening, a report of a speech made this week by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky. Speaking at a dinner held by the Montreal Regional Council of the Institute of Canadian Bankers, Mr. Rasminsky said:

> The degree of isolation which used to exist between channels for particular types of finance is rapidly breaking down.

The article goes on to state:

> Mr. Rasminsky said the current environment of the banking and financial system is one of increasing freedom from traditional inhibitions and legal restrictions.

The article further states:

> Mr. Rasminsky said the public stands to gain substantial economic benefits from a more efficient and competitive financial system—'provided what we are seeking is in fact more efficiency and competition'.
> But much will depend on the way institutions like the banks use their new freedom and powers.

Honourable senators, I should like to deal first with finance companies, acceptance companies, and "near banks", as the report of the Porter commission describes them. In searching for an appropriate name, the European term "merchant bank" seems to be more meaningful than any other for this particular type of institution. These institutions are well known in our credit-oriented society. Indeed, without them, enterprise and economic growth would suffer very considerably. Their principal business is the purchasing or discounting of commercial paper representing sales or leases, and the lending of money. Its assets are highly liquid, the average maturity of its receivables comparatively short. Substantial parts of its financing operations are carried through by the issue of short-term paper. By that I mean notes for a maturity of less than one year. The industry is a significant element in our economy. It can be compared to the place occupied by the chartered banks as the following figures disclose.

I have before me a table from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, entitled "Business Financial Statistics", as at June 30, 1968, which I would, with leave, place on the record.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

*Merchant Banks

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa-West): Perhaps the best definition of a "merchant bank" that I have been able to find is in Regulation 101-67 of the Ontario Securities Commission. Following this format, a merchant bank is:

> A company, its subsidiaries or affiliates for which a material activity includes, > a) purchasing, discounting or otherwise acquiring promissory notes, acceptances, accounts receivable, bills of sale, chattel mortgages, conditioned sales contracts, drafts and other obligations representing part or all of the sales price of merchandise, and services,
> b) factoring, or purchasing and leasing personal property as part of a line purchase or similar business; or
> c) making secured or unsecured loans.

To make these general proposals as practical as I can, I would suggest that the committee consider the following steps:

1. Enact a Part IV, or otherwise, of this bill to apply only to merchant banks as defined in the regulations of the Ontario Securities Commission, which I have just cited.

2. Exclude merchant banks from the present definition section of Bill S-17.

3. Vest in the Inspector General of Banks the powers he now holds in respect of chartered banks, with appropriate applications to merchant banks.

4. Provide that the requirements in respect of capital investments applicable to chartered banks apply also to merchant banks.

5. Require that all loans and investments in excess of 5 per cent of capital and reserves be reported forthwith to the Inspector General of Banks, as recommended by the Porter Commission at page 385 of its report, and adopt the other recommendations in respect of credits or loans to directors, subsidiaries and affiliates which that Commission sets out.

6. Prescribe that merchant banks maintain reserves of, say 12½ per cent of their short term liabilities, i.e., those maturing within one year.

7. Direct that the credit of last resort for merchant banks be provided by the Bank of Canada or some other appropriate governmental agency, and that the amount of such credit of last resort be equivalent to the reserves each merchant bank must maintain.

8. Permit provincially incorporated companies to register as merchant banks provided they comply with rules governing those of federal incorporation.

9. Until enough experience is accumulated to enact a separate act, legislate here by reference to the Bank Act; i.e., set out the sections of the Bank Act which would be applicable to merchant banks. For the record, I would mention the following sections of the Bank Act: section 29, which deals with non-current loans; sections 60-62, respecting annual statements; section 63, as to shareholders audits; sections 64-68, concerning the powers of the Inspector General of Banks; sections 103-7, 152, 153, on returns; sections 139-140, dealing with inspection. It may be that minor changes would be required to apply these to merchant banks.

10. Amend any other sections of the bill which conflict with sections applicable to merchant banks.

Honourable senators, these ideas are neither revolutionary nor new, but they do recognize the value of federal safeguards. Merchant banks, as I have suggested defining them, are in fact near banks, though they lack many of the powers of the chartered bank, such as the taking of deposits, but in many areas of lending to commercial interests they are in competition with chartered banks.

The last revision of the Bank Act enlarged the areas of operation for chartered banks and brought them into closer competition with merchant banks. It has even been suggested that the competition by the chartered banks could in time eliminate merchant banks. Some of these new provisions allow unlimited charges on loans, which permit the banks to enter the area of lower grade loans, charging higher interest rates. An example of this is the consumer loans. Banks now can enter the mortgage field too, and can supply large capital for mortgage requirements.

There is another anomaly in the situation. Most merchant banks carry their credit lines in Canada with the chartered banks, and abroad with appropriate banking institutions. Thus the merchant bank is substantially dependant upon its principal competitor, and some of the credit lines they carry abroad are very great indeed.

If the situation were reversed the chartered banks would find it intolerable, yet for the merchant bank there is no feasible commercial alternative. The problems are intensified when Canadian merchant banks, because of lack of adequate facilities in Canada, are required to carry some of their credit lines with foreign banks. This is why I suggest that the credit of last resort for the Canadian merchant banks should be an appropriate governmental agency.

Section 10 of the bill permits the issuance of certificates of registry for a term not exceeding one year. With appropriate reserves comparable to those required by chartered banks, merchant banks should be entitled to a certificate valid for a period of ten years. Problems encountered by merchant banks in terms of long-term financing could be unnecessarily difficult with the requirement of a one-year certificate.

It is understandable that Section 22—to which Senator Hayden and Senator Phillips (Rigaud) referred—as to the powers to make regulations, in the light of the definitions given, should be so wide.

I have indicated that there should be some more precise classification of investment companies, with appropriate definitions and regulations applying to each class, as Senator Hayden also indicated last night. The suggestion I have made in respect of merchant banks would relieve the Governor in Council of some of the onus cast upon it by section 22. One suggested regulation would deal with the appropriate capital requirements for merchant banks. This is a subject of serious debate within the industry. Chartered banks are not subject to a regulation in this respect.

Perhaps if appropriate reserves are required of merchant banks, the same practices should apply to them as apply to chartered banks.

Since, in my view, the near bank industry is a major Canadian industry, I would submit that the Superintendent of Insurance has enough to do without assuming other duties within the banking industry. The Inspector General of Banks has responsibilities and facilities that are more appropriate. This consideration would become increasingly important if provincially incorporated merchant banks and similar institutions should decide to subject themselves to federal regulations.

Clause 5 of the bill requires investment companies to file certain statements and supply information. The Ontario Securities Act, for one, has much more elaborate provisions in this area. Federal requirements should be studied to assure that they are adequate, and if any precedents useful to the federal authorities could be derived from provincial requirements they should be considered. We should, of course, assure ourselves we are not simply adding to the paper work required by investment companies, regardless of how they are defined.

Section 8 deals with loans and investments within and between the subsidiary and related groupings, and with loans to directors, officers and shareholders. Certainly, there are practices in this area which are improper and which should be forbidden. Senator Hayden has shown that the controls available now are rather extensive. But within certain groupings, it may be desirable to have affiliates whose purpose is to provide financing for related organizations. The inspection suggested by the Porter Commission at page 385 in this respect could provide the protection which is required for the public.

I return to section 22. The onus cast upon the Governor in Council by this section could be well nigh intolerable. It could be intolerable for the officials, because of the diversity of financial institutions embraced by the definition section and the appropriate acceptable practices developed within each category of this very important industry. Section 22 could be intolerable to the various industries concerned. The discretion provided in the section is unlimited, and inappropriate regulations could retard legitimate and desirable development. No doubt the residual power of regulation must be vested in the Governor in Council, but too sweeping an authority would not be good. Until the categories of investment companies are clearly demarked, it is impossible to provide proper regulation. What might suit loan companies might not suit mortgage companies, or merchant banks, or trust companies.

At page 357 the Porter Commission report reads this way:

> ...the goal of protecting the public against loss can best be achieved with three basic legislative safeguards—adequate disclosure, competent supervision, and legal powers giving the authorities the right to force the correction of unsound or careless practices and to prosecute those engaged in fraudulent or criminal activities.

I would like to cite another example of a problem that arises as a result of the presentation of this bill in this form. There are many large enterprises in Canada that are prosperous, efficient and competitive. They are run by competent Canadian entrepreneurs. These men and these companies see opportunities for Canadian development in various fields.

Let us say that a parent company is a prosperous mining company, oil company or manufacturing company, if you will. It is well regarded, has access to the money markets and enjoys a high reputation. It is sufficiently endowed with assets to facilitate borrowing and to assure both large and small investors of the security of their investment. It sees opportunities, let us say, in the business of light industry, or in real estate development, or in merchandising. It could help develop an industrial park in an area of potential growth. It could erect a modern office building in a progressive city. It could install a shopping centre in an expanding urban area. There is no limit to the opportunities which it could use to accelerate economic growth in the country.

Normally, how does it proceed? It might well incorporate a real estate company. It might incorporate a manufacturing organization. It could set up a company to service hotels, restaurants, ships, aircraft and the like. Any one of these companies might and probably would be wholly-owned by the Canadian parent in my example.

In the language of the act, the parent would have a "significant interest" in each of its individual subsidiaries. Any one of its subsidiaries would have assets and prospects which would give it thoroughly acceptable entré to the money markets. Any one of its subsidiaries could borrow on bonds, debentures or notes—the traditional ways to which the Governor of the Bank of Canada referred in his speech that I have already mentioned.

But there is a large pool of capital and assets and prospects behind all these subsidiaries that will not require capital at the same time. Some will require additional capital for expansion as circumstances, development and prospects warrant.

Rather than promote each individual subsidiary and have it seek its own capital requirements, the parent can adopt another device; it can incorporate a special subsidiary. The purpose of this subsidiary could be, and would be in this example, to provide the money needed by any of the subsidiaries. The security it offers is well known to the investing public. Usually the capital requirements in this type of case are larger than can be supplied by small individual investors. Institutions usually subscribe to such enterprises, and the amounts are usually beyond the reach of the small investor. Sometimes they reach the level of a half million or a million dollars, or more. Sometimes they are lower, but seldom lower than, say, $100,000.

I shall call this subsidiary the security subsidiary. It is, in fact, a financial intermediary between the operating subsidiary, on the one side, and the market, on the other. It thus becomes a most efficient device for borrowing money, for the marketing of money, for the industrial development to be conducted by any of the operating subsidiaries or, indeed, by the parent company. In fact, in current practice, as this idea has been used in Canada it has attracted and continues to attract more and more Canadian investment in Canadian enterprises.

Who can say this is not a worthy, effective, efficient and economic way of doing business? Is it not clear that time and effort and money are saved, not only for the parent and the subsidiaries, but also the end product of the subsidiary can and should be less costly to the general consuming public.

Under this bill the security subsidiary, in my example, is prohibited from doing for the operating subsidiaries what the operating subsidiary could do for itself, but at greater cost. The section which prohibits this is section 8(1)(c)(iii). And if the parent had recourse to the services of the security subsidiary, as I describe it, the bill would exclude such recourse under section 8(1)(b) of the act.

Honourable senators, I do not pretend that in this discussion I have done more than point to two cases which deserve not only the close attention of this chamber and its committee but also, in my view, amendment. If inflation is our main economic concern; if industry is to be more productive; if we are to promote innovation, invention and adaptation to new conditions in our economy; if our goods and services are to be sold in world markets; if, indeed, the cost of living of our people is to be held in check, then it behooves our parliamentarians and the men in our legislatures not to frustrate the effort of business to become more efficient and economic. Rather, it is our business as legislators to encourage every sound, modern business practice which promotes efficiency and economy. Other countries recognize this philosophy and, indeed, so must we.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as the motion adopted yesterday to refer this bill to a committee has been rescinded, I again put the motion for second reading.

It is moved by honourable Senator Desruisseaux, seconded by honourable Senator Sparrow, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to, and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, this debate stands adjourned in the name of Senator Cameron. With your permission I should like to speak in his place.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, the Fourth Report of the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate was brilliantly presented by the chairman, Senator Molson. It was my privilege to be one of those who served on this committee, and I found the work to be most interesting. The chairman and the staff worked hard, and most intelligently. They have all our respect, and have won our gratitude for what was accomplished in a relatively short time. I offer my congratulations to the chairman and the staff for the excellence of their work. They assured a thorough study of the rules, and the wants and necessities in respect to improving and expanding the work of the Senate in a more demanding Canada. The results are seen in the clear and constructive recommendations that are tabled in the Senate for its consideration.

Being a member of this committee was a most rewarding experience for every senator who had that privilege. The absence of a minority report, and the unanimous approval of this report and its consequential recommendations by the committee members, will, I am sure, be noted with satisfaction by all honourable senators. Having been a member of this house only since 1966, I was impressed by the discussion and the observations made when we sat as a Committee of the Whole.

One hundred and one years ago Canada underwent parliamentary surgery, so to speak, and had its great governmental reforms, which gave birth to our present House of Commons and Senate. At that time it was a most daring step, and approval of it was far from unanimous. We recall here the historical opposition to our Constitution made by over 20 members of Parliament who fought well, and sometimes savagely, and who carried their protests by way of petition to the Queen. The people at that time were indeed restless. I do not want to recount here the happenings of those few years, but it was a most daring step, even though the majority thought it was a most necessary one. The boldness of those who served Canada then has paid handsome dividends. Notwithstanding the extreme departure from its past at that time, the Constitution has served Canada notably, and all Canadians famously.

Historically, regardless of the severe criticism we are inclined to make at the present time, we have never known Canada so united, so progressive, and so ready and willing to improve the future of all its citizens. When we compare Canada with other well-administered and well-governed nations we must take pride in what has been achieved here, and what has so far been the result of the Canadian challenge. As we look into the future we see it becoming more thrilling and challenging.

We must welcome our present opportunities. We have a unique occasion to prepare for the realization of a truly smooth-running and streamlined Senate, which is capable of gathering basic government information and of influencing policies in so many important social, economic, and scientific fields that will short-cut the roads of the future, and secure the rapid advancement of Canada amongst the major nations of the earth. It should be less a matter of acquired prestige and pride amongst nations than the vivid giving of example of what should become common acceptance by all for their betterment.

Following the present trend, our Canada doubles its population every 35 years or so. By its second centennial, 2068, Canada should have a population of some 165 million, computing it on that basis. It is important that each should in his own field prepare what will be the best available system of government to meet the situation realistically. It is my belief that what we have before us is important, but it is in no way sufficient for the government of the future, and surely not for the next century. I am of the opinion that we should review and re-adapt ourselves and our governmental structures and working at least every 15 or 20 years and consider neither specific or necessary amendments in between. I believe this will become even more evident as our population increases and there are advances in social and economic development.

There are some who would fear changes, who believe that traditional and never-changing ways, rules and guidelines would serve us better. On reading history, witnessing so many fundamental changes in our lifetime, and observing the phenomenal advances in education, in all sciences and all fields of endeavour and achievement, I could not in a multiplied Canada within the smaller world support a position of stagnation in the name of stability.

I concede that fundamental changes must be undertaken with care and prudence. Having participated in a small and humble way in the work of the special committee, I believe that the recommendations made pass the test of whether they are an improvement over what we presently have. Furthermore, I am of opinion that an assurance should be given that the suggested amendments would remain subject to review periodically to insure the continued betterment and improvement of the Senate.

The Senate has, of its own choosing, received the recommendations made by the special committee, which considers them to be an improvement over what we had in the past. The recommendations represent a step forward in the right direction so that we may be of greater service to Canadians and provide for their better welfare. Unless we can improve on these conclusions, and possibly be even bolder, the only choice open to me is to support, as I did in the committee, all the recommendations made by Senator Molson on behalf of the committee.

May I be permitted to add a few other observations. It is also my belief that some of the Senate customs based on tradition should be analyzed and possibly streamlined. There could be token traditional gestures, but we should now think of rendering all our sittings highly functional. We have much more to do and we need to find ways of eliminating some of the time-consuming customs based on the esprit de grandeur that do not now have much place in our democracy.

It is my belief that the Royal Assent procedure as it is now known should be discarded. It results in lost time for every member of both houses and for the senior officials involved. Its abolition would make no practical difference to anyone and no one would feel affected after the first emotional involvement based on maintaining forever old and revered customs. To me it would be more like the dropping of some unimportant brainwashing habits that no longer have a place in our thinking. Respect would be commanded by other means and through personal behaviour. For all I care, the custom of bowing from all parts of the chamber could also be dropped or be considerably simplified, without doing damage to our real feelings for the Throne or its representatives.

I would add that the prayer, as now written, is passé and should be revised. It too is time-consuming. We know that it could be revised to conform with the more modern procedures that we wish established everywhere, and that could be done by the religious authorities themselves.

I feel that the attendance of senators at caucuses is not too healthy a custom. To some it may provide a means of understanding direction to follow in appreciating the bills before the Senate, and to others it may be a real form of continued brainwashing. If it were dropped, in my opinion the Senate would feel healthier and more realistic.

It is my belief that senators could be used with great advantage as representatives in discussions with other countries. Senators could be used for the closer control and analysis of foreign aid and the avoidance of waste effort and expenditures in foreign aid. Foreign aid has become one of the principal activities of our government and the Senate should play its part in that field. I may on some other occasion deal with some of the present thinking in this connection.

It has been said that the Senate should consider having more bills originate in this Chamber. I agree with that too. I must here re-state that during the last session of the 27th Parliament, 42 per cent of the bills introduced in both houses originated in the Senate. I must restate here though that during the last session of the 27th Parliament 42 per cent of the bills introduced in both houses originated in the Senate, exclusive of the private bills and divorce bills as we know them. There are 102 members in our house, and 265 members in the other house. The attendance at all Senate sittings stands remarkably high. I believe it compares well with the other place, and very well with senates of other countries.

We have, I believe, fared well, although we have in the Senate less than 40 per cent of the representatives found in the other place. There is great wisdom here, but we find a disappearing quality—prudence. We have a cross-section of successful Canadians in all fields of endeavour. We are paid, as we all know, less than the members of the other place. We can accept it without emotional involvement, and we also qualify well by our attendance at the sittings. We do not speak having in mind the winning of a few regional votes, but for what we believe is in the real interest of a greater and more prosperous Canada. Is that not something for a country like Canada? Is this what some would like to see abolished or destroyed?

I am sorry we had to learn through the press about the progressive reports on the studies by the Continuing Committee of the Federal-Provincial Constitutional Conference, made up of civil servants representing the federal and provincial governments. This committee has prepared a series of reports for use next month when the political leaders of the eleven governments resume the conference. These reports do not appear to have been circulated among the senators, at least I have not received them.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Nor has the Government authorized any publication. The Government will have to deal with that when it meets with the provinces.

Hon Mr. Desruisseaux: I have your point, and if you will allow me to continue I will make a statement in that connection. I have been informed that it is a confidential report, but the press seems to have been well alerted. It would appear from what I have read that the press have had easy access to this information. I need only point to what appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail a few days ago.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What date was that?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: I am sorry, but I failed to note the date. It was four or five days ago.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What is the heading?

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: The heading is: "Senate Changes—One of the Issues for Conference".

Hon. Mr. Croll: The date was January 16.

Hon. Mr. Desruisseaux: There are a number of interesting things said about it. I can only add here, a bit humourously, that we should read the newspapers if we want to know the present thinking of the Continuing Committee of the Federal-Provincial Conference. I am not, mind you, against the diffusion of information, but it seems awkward to have to read the press to obtain partial knowledge of what goes on in such an important constitutional area of our governments.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, in participating in this discussion I first want to compliment Senator Molson and the members of his committee on having performed a most valuable and important task in giving the Senate rules a thorough overhauling. Their study involved a detailed examination of the British North America Act and a long list of statutes recorded in Appendix "A" of the Senate Hansard of November 28, 1968.

Before going into that I want to say to Senator Desruisseaux that I listened to what he had to say with a great deal of interest, and in some respects with a great deal of sympathy. The Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) will recall that I spoke to him yesterday with some concern about not having any consultation about reform of the Senate with members of the Senate. It may be constitutionally correct that this matter should not be discussed with the members of the Senate, but if that is true I suggest that there is something rather wrong. I would like to have felt that the Government, any government, on a matter of such importance as this would have felt it incumbent upon itself to have had a session with the senators in camera if they wished, although I realize that in camera sessions in Ottawa are not what they are in some other places.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is an excellent way to get some publicity.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: I have somewhat mixed feelings with respect to some of the comments he has made about historical procedures. I think tradition has a place, and sometimes our life and our society is enriched and made more colourful by the preservation of these traditions. However, I sometimes feel that we are wasting too much time on some of the trappings of a bygone era, and I hope we will have an opportunity of discussing these matters in further detail at a later time.

In section 3 of the Fourth Report of the special committee reference has been made to widespread public criticism of the whole parliamentary process as it has existed up to the present time. I am one among many who have felt this criticism was justified, not in the sense of a criticism of the Members of Parliament who in the main are a hard-working lot and who put in much longer and more tedious hours in the discharge of their responsibilities than the people who criticize them in the community at large. Rather, the criticism, in my judgment, was justified on the basis that both Houses of Parliament were trying to carry out today's multi-billion dollar complex business under a set of rules designed for a much smaller and much less pervasive government. Fortunately, the House of Commons has agreed to a new set of operating rules which we believe will result in a much more business-like and expeditious dispatch of the public business.

One of the main results of reform of the rules of Parliament is the expanded role of committees in both the Commons and the Senate. These changes are going to require major changes in the physical arrangements on Parliament Hill. Some of these are as follows: First, we are going to require many more and better equipped committee rooms than has been the case in the past. Second, we are going to require a greatly enlarged staff of qualified reporters to handle the proceedings of the committees. Third, we will require the appointment of qualified personnel with special qualifications in the subject matter of committees, such as external affairs, legal affairs, and so on. This will be almost a necessity. Fourth, if the committees are to be effective, senators must have more access to research staff for assistance in doing the quality of background work to make their contributions effective.

Reference has been made to the desirability of either more or possibly all private bills originating in the Senate. This argument has been going on at frequent intervals since 1868. On May 7 of that year, Sir Alexander Campbell presented a report which was unanimously adopted on May 12. This report recommended that more bills originate in the Senate. In 1874 a joint committee of the two houses was constituted to look into and report upon means whereby the two houses might collaborate more effectively in the dispatch of public business.

In 1879 Senator Miller, speaking in the Senate, noted some improvement in this matter and he again referred to the improved relationship in the session of 1880-81. But in the session of 1882 Senator Alexander was extremely critical of the lack of business coming before the Senate and the sending over of a rush of bills for Senate approval in the dying moments of the session. It seems to me I have heard similar complaints in much more recent times.

In 1908 Senator David moved a motion in the Senate to the effect that more work should be assigned to the Senate. In 1917 the Senate appointed a special committee to deal with the same matter.

In 1923 Senator Dandurand brought in a committee report which included this paragraph:

> Your committee further recommend that the distribution of all private bills, exclusive of divorce bills, be regulated by the Speakers of both Houses jointly, with the understanding that they will see as far as practicable that private bills, exclusive of divorce bills, be introduced one half in each House.

And so it went on for years, involving the consideration of such giants of the Senate as Senators Dandurand and Meighen.

I would like to support the idea that, while it may not be desirable to have all private bills originate in the Senate, certainly it is desirable that most of them should. In fairness, however, I should say, as Senator Desruisseaux has pointed out, that there has been a very substantial increase in the number of government bills originating in the Senate in the last three years. From an average of 18 per cent of the private bills originating in the Senate over the 12-year period 1957-58 to 1967-68, the percentage rose to 42 per cent in the latter year.

Reference has rightly been made to the Senate's investigatory role through the machinery of special committees and joint committees with the House of Commons. It is through this means that the Senate has done some of its most useful and interesting work. Senator Martin, in his initial speech in this house on September 18, referred to the important role the Senate has and can play through the work of its special committees. We have only to look at some of these committees which have contributed richly to Canadian thought and Canadian problems over the past 12 or 13 years—the committees on Inflation, Manpower and Employment, Land Use in Canada, Aging, the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit, the Joint Committee on Divorce, the Joint Committee on the Public Service, the current Special Committee on Science Policy and the coming Committee on Poverty; and if Paul Hellyer's "task force on housing" does not come up with some good and practical solution to that critical problem, I shall propose that we constitute or reconstitute the special committee on housing which I proposed in this house last March and which would have been set up had Parliament not prorogued.

I want at this time to give notice of one other committee which I think of vital importance to the welfare of Canada, which this Senate should set up and which this house is admirably qualified to provide. One of the greatest areas of opportunity to this country, of concern to us, among the areas of tremendously rich resources, is that of our northern territories. Therefore, I am serving notice now that I would like to see established a special committee of the Senate to deal with the problems of Northern Affairs and Development. These are all vital and important committees and they represent a mobilization of those talents which the Senate has in abundance.

Before I go on to new ground, I want to refer to one of the Rules of the Senate which so far the Rules Committee has not done anything about. Here I refer to the attendance rule, under which senators are checked into this chamber as so many reluctant schoolboys "who creep unwillingly to school." Do not mistake me. I have no objection to a record of attendance being kept as such, because the attendance record of this Senate has consistently run over 71 per cent at all times; but I do object to the deduction of $120 a day from a senator's indemnity if he misses more than 21 sittings in a year. In a time when the Senate met during a period of three or four months at the outside, this exemption may have been adequate, even generous, but in a time when the Senate has been meeting over 10 months, and in one session over a period of 14 months, this exemption is not enough.

Here I wish to emphasize something else which I consider important. Most members of this chamber had been very active in the public affairs of their home communities before being summoned to the Senate. In fact, one of the compelling reasons why they were appointed to the Senate was the contribution they had been making to the public affairs of their home communities and provinces. I hold the view that these men are better informed and more effective senators if they continue to discharge those public responsibilities after they come to the Senate. Most of these are non-remunerative but time-consuming services, such as participation in municipal councils, school boards, boards of governors of universities, and a whole host of similar public responsibilities. I consider it important that a senator should continue to participate in these activities, providing he does not do so to the neglect of his duties in the Senate, but I think it would be most unfair that in order for him to discharge those responsibilities it should cost him $120 on top of such other expenses as he may be put to when doing that work.

Let me make one other point which the press frequently overlooks when speaking about parliamentary indemnities, as they frequently do. There are very few members of this house who would not be earning twice, three times or more than their current remuneration if they had remained in private life. And just for good measure, it should not go unnoticed that the American Congress has just raised the salaries or indemnities of their members to $42,500. In addition, American Congressmen are provided with staff, research and other services worth 20 times the value of similar services provided to Canadian parliamentarians. As a matter of fact, the quality of resources in the way of office facilities, equipment and staff which is provided by the Parliament of Canada for its members would compare unfavourably with most third-rate offices in the business world.

The Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate stated that their study had established the clear necessity for constitutional and statutory changes beyond the terms of reference of the committee in order to reach the objective of a modern and streamlined parliament. In this emphasis they were quite correct and it is hoped that their representations will fall on receptive ears in the centre of the parliamentary power structure—the Prime Minister's office. As a matter of fact, we have reason to believe that such matters are very much in the minds of those who will engage in the forthcoming Constitutional Conference next month.

You will recall that at the Constitutional Conference last year, Prime Minister Pearson referred to the desirability of reforming the Senate in such a way that it could perform its function more expeditiously and effectively. In the Speech from the Throne, opening this 28th Parliament, reference was made to the matter of Senate reform as one of the issues to be discussed with the provinces.

At this time I would like to emphasize that in the beginning the Senate was constituted and justified as a second arm of Government charged with the special responsibilities of guaranteeing the rights of minorities and giving some protection to regional needs and priorities. The Senate has some things to its credit in these fields, but I think an objective assessment of the Senate's role would indicate that historically we have not lived up to the expectations of the Fathers of Confederation. Not because of a lack of desire on the part of the Senate, but because of the manner of Senate appointments, it could not possibly deal effectively with those minority rights of language and customs and regional economic problems.

For example, since 1935 there has been no appointment to the Senate representing the viewpoint of the Government of the Province of Alberta. From 1943 to 1963 there was no appointment from the Province of Saskatchewan which represented the viewpoint of the provincial government of that period. From 1952 to the present time there has been no appointment from the Province of British Columbia which represented the viewpoint of the government of that province. To say this is not to reflect on the excellent representation that has come from those provinces in those years, but in my judgment the alienation of the western viewpoint, which that situation represents, has weakened Confederation and has contributed in some measure to a feeling of disunity.

One could go on and expand on the feelings of the Province of Quebec, because it too feels that its role as an important minority has not had the consideration it deserves.

These are facts of life as Canada approaches a major constitutional discussion with the provinces, and all Canadians must recognize that we must strengthen all of those factors in our political life which make for unity, equity and understanding. Reform of the Senate will not alone achieve this purpose, but it could be a significant start in giving the provinces a feeling that they have a greater role to play in formulating the programs and policies that affect all Canadians.

In January 1958 I was asked by a well-known Canadian daily newspaper to give my views on Senate reform. I did at that time, and I think those remarks are pertinent to today's discussion, so I am going to give them to you, with some slight modifications made necessary by the lapse of time.

In the beginning of that article I dealt with some of the current myths about the Senate. In view of the fact that those myths are still being perpetuated by people who should know better, I am going to quote some of them.

First, there is the myth to the effect that all a senator has to do is to take his seat in the Senate once during the session, collect his $10,000—and now it is $15,000—and go off to Florida. It is true he may take his seat in the Senate once and go off wherever he likes, even to Toronto, but he does not draw his pay. If he misses more than 21 sittings of the Senate he is quite rightly docked, at that time $60 a day, and now $120 a day. Secondly, if he misses two consecutive sessions of the Senate, even because of illness, he loses his seat.

Then again, it was said by none other than my friend Norman Campbell of the Ottawa Journal on Friday, January 10, 1958, that:

> ...the Senate met for 15 minutes, examined Senator Pouliot's version of a new Canadian flag and then adjourned for the day.

Such things are frequently said. The clear implication there is that the senators then returned to their games of bridge, tiddly-winks or what-have-you. The truth was that that same day a committee of at least 25 senators put in an interesting and useful two hours examining, discussing and amending Bill L, dealing with the problems of the offshore boundaries and who owned the natural resources in the coastal waters of Hudson's Bay, Ungava Bay and a few other places. We could not have done our homework too well, because the proposition is not yet settled. That was the third meeting of that committee on that topic, and there have been others since.

Had he wanted to be fair, he could also have said that another group of senators spent some part of 40 to 50 days every session in some hole and corner basement rooms "enjoying" themselves in the Senate Divorce Committee. Thank goodness we are rid of that. Or he could have described the sessions of the Banking and Commerce Committee, the Committee on Trade Relations, or Transport and Communications, or any one of a number of others where honest, sincere and painstaking work continues to be done every year. But, of course, to admit such things would not be in keeping with the myth that the Senate is an expensive and useless appendage.

Then there is the myth that the Senate is inhabited by a lot of senile and decrepit old men—and women. Any adult person knows that chronological age has little to do with a man's mental age. Some men are old at 40, others are vigorous mentally at 70 or even 80. Two of the best speeches that I had heard in the Senate up to that time had been made by Senators Farris of Vancouver and Crerar of Winnipeg. They were 80. Their speeches were masterpieces of the spoken language; they were not read and they were delivered with style, conviction and vigour. Or, again, the participations of Senator Roebuck given extemporaneously and frequently, always examples of lucid expression and good form, yet at that time he was in his eightieth year. These are examples of exceptional and able men, but there are many such in the Senate.

There were at that time six women in the Senate, all of whom would fall into that comprehensive and gracious age bracket that we chivalrous men call "mature," but I can unhesitatingly say that the women members of the Senate are a credit to the women of Canada and represent them in the red chamber with grace and distinction.

One other point worth repeating, before I discuss reform of the Senate, is that the Senate is one of the few places in an increasingly crude and abrasive world where courtesy and graciousness are the rule rather than the exception.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Now to Senate reform. Yes, I believe that certain reforms would make the Senate a more vigorous, useful and respected place than it is now, and I give this opinion on the basis of limited experience and observation.

First, I believe there should be some other than a party basis for appointment. The former Liberal Government made a move in this direction or I, for one, would not be in the Senate, though I have always claimed to be a small "l" liberal. However, I believe there should be two types of senators—and I am quoting from what I wrote in 1958, and I wish to modify it later—those appointed from the political parties, from all parties in proportion to their voting strength, and those appointed for distinguished service in the arts, humanities, social sciences, science and public service. Being realistic, I think that the political appointments should predominate, because under our present party system the Government in power, which has the responsibility for governing, must have a core of people who share its views to take the responsibility of piloting the Government's legislation through the Senate.

My view at that time was that out of the 102 seats in the Senate, 80 should be divided among the party appointments, and that the remainder should be on a non-political basis. I am not one of those who deplore partisan and political views sincerely held and freely expressed. I think an injection of political partisanship in the Senate, so long as it is not overdone, adds interest to proceedings in the chamber, and I would be sorry to see a sterile neutrality.

That statement was made in January 1958. I would modify it today by saying that I think appointments to the Senate should be of three kinds: First, I would reserve 22 of the 102 places in the Senate for men and women who have distinguished themselves and made a contribution to Canada in the arts, humanities, business or public affairs, these appointments to be made regardless of party affiliation. Second, of the remaining 80 Senate appointments, 40 should be reserved to the federal Government. Third, the remaining 40 seats should be allocated on the basis of a proportionate population division by the provincial governments.

I recognize that the suggestion I am making with respect to the abolition of the time-honoured method of making Senate appointments is political heresy, and as such may lead to my excommunication and burning at the stake. However, I have sat in this chamber under both Liberal and Conservative governments and one of the things that has pleased me most in the Senate's approach to the dispatch of public business is how little part narrow political partisanship has played.

I am confident that a Senate constituted along lines similar to those I have outlined would not only appeal to the provinces, but no government would have undue cause to fear that the Senate would obstruct its program of sound legislation. It might improve it, but it would never obstruct it on a partisan basis.

In that same article I continued by proposing an age limit. We do now have an age limit in the Senate, and I think that this was long overdue. But, there are some aspects of the present regulations which, in my opinion need modification. I believe there should be an age limit for senators after which they retire on pension—and this is now in effect—or, if they die before that time, their widows should receive the pension. I think the widows are very poorly served in the present circumstances because it must be remembered that many senators—in fact, the great majority of them—gave up, either in whole or in part, earnings far in excess of the $10,000 that they were getting at that time, and the $15,000 that they are getting now, when they entered the Senate. Because of the average session of six to seven months then, and the average session of ten to eleven months now, they are not free to continue their regular employment or business, and they accepted the life appointment knowing that they were protected for as long as they lived.

I went on to say that the age limit should be 75 years, and that has come about. There are many senators who do not need that kind of protection, but we must have some arrangement that makes it impossible for this place to become a haven for none but the rich. It should be open to people of competence, regardless of their financial status.

My next point is still valid. I did not have very much support for it at the time I put it forward, and, in fact, some of my colleagues did not like the idea at all. The Special Committee on the Rules has suggested that senators should not attend the caucus. I am inclined to think the committee is right in that suggestion, and my proposal would help make up for that deficiency. I should like to see a sort of pseudo cabinet on the Government side in the Senate. This would be a group of men and/or women, each of whom would be a deputy for two or more departments of government in the other house. They would be men and/or women who worked closely with the cabinet ministers in the other place, and who would speak for them in the Senate. They would pilot through the Senate the bills received from their ministers in the House of Commons, and they would answer questions on those departments in the Senate.

One of the things that has concerned me during the years I have been a member of the Senate is the fact that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has a very heavy responsibility, because he is the man who has the duty of piloting all Government bills through the Senate. It is true that leaders of the government in the Senate—and this has applied to both political parties—have farmed out those bills to some extent, but I do not think such a procedure has achieved the purpose I have in mind.

The members of this pseudo cabinet would pilot through the Senate the bills emanating from their ministers in the other place, and they would answer questions on those departments in the Senate. To make sure there are lots of questions there should be a brief daily question period. Such an arrangement would make for more interesting work, and a better informed Senate.

Next I should like to see the Senate sit as a Committee of the Whole much more frequently, where in an informal atmosphere members could ask questions of ministers of the Crown, their deputies in the Senate, or other qualified people. If my memory serves me correctly, on only three occasions since I came here in 1955 has this house sat as a Committee of the Whole. The most recent occasion was, of course, when it considered the report of the Special Committee on the Rules, and at which time we had excellent discussions. The first of the three occasions I have in mind was when we discussed the famous pipe line bill. I see no denigration of the dignity of the Senate in its sitting much more frequently as a Committee of the Whole.

We achieve some of the benefits of this practice in the present committees of the Senate, such as those on Finance, Banking and Commerce, and others, but I would like to see the same informality and the same interplay of minds in many more areas of the work of the Senate than we are getting at the present time. Such an arrangement would have a tendency to reduce the number of set speeches—in this respect I have been as guilty as anyone—and would make for a more informal and, I think, more effective and interesting type of debate.

I should like to see the procedures of the Senate so modified that it would sit for five days a week when in session rather than the present three or, at the most, four days a week. By sitting five days a week, even though this would necessitate some committees sitting concurrently, it would mean that the Senate could dispose of the business before it, and then adjourn until more legislation was ready. I believe this practice was followed in Senator Dandurand's day, and I think it could be reinstituted to the benefits of all concerned.

There are among the membership of the Senate some of the leading corporation lawyers, financiers, and businessmen of Canada —men who in their private capacities are playing a vital role in Canadian business. It seems to me that here is a source of skill and talent which could be effectively used for many of the investigations that are carried out by royal commissions. On some occasions, senators have been members of inquiries and commissions, and they have discharged their responsibilities with credit to themselves and their country. Much more use could be made of the Senate for such purposes, and the Senate's value to Parliament and the country would be enhanced.

In conclusion I would say that I have long felt that the Canadian Senate could adopt some of the procedures of the Senate of the United States. In this respect I am thinking particularly of the distinguished committees of the United States Senate, such as those on foreign affairs, banking and commerce, and others. Under our new rules our eight main committees can be of the magnitude and importance of their opposite numbers in the American Congress.

We are passing through troublous times, and the elements of dissension within the nation are much more serious than the average citizen is aware. This is a time for all Canadians, regardless of party, religion, ethnic origin, and vast regional disparities in economics and resources, to take the larger view, and to concentrate their minds and energies on working out practical solutions which will contribute to the enrichment of life and the unity of the Canadian people.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, for Hon. Mr. Croll, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, we have been sitting here for a long time listening to wonderful addresses, and it might be wise for me not to speak at this time. However, what I have to say is short because there is very little to be said that has not already been said about this bill to amend the Canada Elections Act.

A majority of Canadian provinces have now lowered the age at which electors may vote in provincial elections, as I think was mentioned yesterday. In Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland it is 19 years of age; in Quebec, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan it is 18 years. Ontario, Nova Scotia, Manitoba and New Brunswick still require voters to be 21 years old by polling day. It was estimated last August that there are about one million persons between the ages of 18 and 21 who would be eligible to vote if the minimum age for voters in federal elections were lowered to 18 years.

During the past several years private members from all parties now represented in the other place have presented bills to provide that the minimum age of voters under the Canada Elections Act be 18 years instead of 21 as at present. These bills have either been talked out or referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, but they have been warmly supported by members from every party.

To give honourable senators an idea of what the people of Canada think, in September 1966 a Gallup Poll reported that of Canadians questioned on the matter 48 per cent favoured lowering the voting age to 18. In April 1967, 64 per cent of adults polled by Gallup in the United States thought that those aged 18 or more should be allowed to vote in national elections. In 1958, in Canada only 33 per cent of the adult population wanted the age lowered, whereas in 1966, as I pointed out, 48 per cent favoured lowering the voting age to 18.

I would also point out that during the lifetime of the 27th Parliament nine public bills were introduced by private members to amend this section of the Canada Elections Act. Six were identical and the others provided that the minimum age for both candidates and electors be 18 years.

I should like to congratulate Senate Argue on the able manner in which he introduced this bill yesterday. I personally—and I speak only for myself—am in favour of this bill to lower the voting age to 18. I could cite many reasons, but I do not want to take up too much of your time. I was born in Newfoundland, the son of a fisherman and a fisherman myself. Long before I was 18 years old I had to work in a fishing boat to help keep the family going. That is also true today of young fishermen and young farmers. They have to work to live. Why should they not be given the right to vote at the age of 18 when they have been working long before that age, and working hard? They have to eat, they have to be clothed, and consequently they have to pay taxes, and I therefore think they should be given the right to vote.

I was overseas during the 1914-18 war and there were with me a good many boys, as I call them, who were 18 and even younger. Some of them got there under age by different ruses. At any rate, there were many who were 18, and many of them stayed over there. I think at this moment of a friend of mine and of yours, a member of this Senate. I refer to the honourable Senator Carter, who was overseas in the trenches with me way back in the 1914-18 war, and he was only 16 years of age. He and many other young fellows were there offering, and in many instances giving, their lives for you and me. Should not these boys have the right to vote? I am sure everyone in this house agrees that if they are expected and ready to fight for their country they should have the right to vote.

Today we have to look at this matter differently from the way in which it was viewed years ago when we were young men. In spite of the things we hear about the youth of today, it has to be admitted that the youth of today is better educated than we were when we were young, not only in mathematics, French and English, but in politics. They are better prepared to examine the problems of governments, both provincial and federal, and for that reason also they should have the right to vote.

I am sure you will all agree with me that if a young man is given a certain responsibility, in 99 cases out of 100 he will measure up to that responsibility. If young fellows of 18 years of age today are asked to consider whether they are in favour of something from a national point of view, or in favour of the government doing this, that, or the other, they will consider it more seriously and more effectively if they know they have the right to cast a vote.

We ought not to hesitate at all on this question. This proposal has been made on many occasions; it has been debated in Parliament and apparently viewed favourably, but for some reason or another it has not come about.

I assert that at the age of 18 every young man and young woman should be given the right to vote, and I hope everybody here will agree with me. In many European countries young people of 18 have the right to vote. Even in the U.S.S.R. they vote at the age of 18. I have here a whole list of countries in which the voting age is 18. If it works satisfactorily in those countries I am sure it would work in our country.

When I began I said that I did not intend to say very much, and I will not. I could speak for a long time on this subject, but what is the point? I agree that we should give our boys and girls the right to vote at the age of 18. There is nothing more to be said about it unless somebody comes up with an argument to show why they should not be given this right. I agree with it and I want everyone here to agree with what Senator Argue said yesterday. I understand he was in communication with the office of the Leader of the Opposition in the other place. I do not want you to forget that. It was the office of the Leader of the Opposition, and not with the Leader of the Opposition. At any rate, he got the impression that the Tories, as he called them, these old Tories, were agreeable. I, as one Tory, am in complete agreement with him. I hope when it gets around to you, that you will vote for this bill.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Willis, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE (HATE PROPAGANDA)

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 17, 1968, the debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck for the second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Criminal Code.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators, by way of a brief explanation, this bill was debated and came up for second reading on December 17 last. Senator Roebuck spoke to it and Senator Flynn made a few remarks. It is commonly known as the "hate bill". It has been before the Senate twice and was referred to committee, but because of prorogation once and because of dissolution the second time the bill was brought in again, and on December 17 last it received second reading.

Senator Roebuck then moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It was then pointed out to him and to the Senate that that committee had not yet been set up under the new rules. Consequently, Senator Roebuck then moved that the order for second reading and the order of reference to the committee be rescinded. The Senate agreed, and now the committee has been set up. I think the proper procedure is for me, on behalf of Senator Roebuck, to move second reading of the bill, and then it can be referred to the committee that has now been set up.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as the debate has been resumed, I will again put the question on the motion originally moved by the honourable Senator Roebuck and seconded by the honourable Senator Croll.

It is moved by the honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the honourable Senator Croll, that this bill be read a second time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, January 23, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILL

THE QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK—FIRST READING

Hon. Maurice Bourget presented Bill S-27, respecting The Quebec Savings Bank.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Bourget moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968, pursuant to section 30 of the Government Organization Act, 1966, chapter 25, Statutes of Canada, 1966-67. (English and French texts).

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, January 28, 1969 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The reason for reassembling at 8 o'clock in the evening rather than at an earlier hour is that our assessment of the requirements of next week indicates this will give us enough time to deal with the business at hand. In accordance with the usual practice, I would like to point out to the house what we conceive to be the business of the house for next week.

When the Senate resumes on Tuesday, we shall continue with the debate on the motion by Senator Molson for adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate. There are still, I believe, a number of senators who wish to speak on this motion.

The debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canadian Elections Act, will be resumed.

We hope to conclude the debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the distribution, sale and importation of hazardous products, and refer that bill to a committee. We shall be debating the second reading today.

I understand there are still some senators who would like to speak on Senator Hayden's inquiry, calling the attention of the Senate to certain sections of the British North America Act and the effect of such sections on the initiation of legislation in the Senate.

A debate on the motion for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Copyright Act, was adjourned in December until January 28. It is hoped that this debate can be concluded next week and the bill referred to committee.

There are two inquiries on the Order Paper for next week, one in the name of Senator Croll and the other in the name of Senator Macnaughton. I understand from Senator Macnaughton that we will proceed with that next week and that he has lined up some senators who wish to take part in the debate. It has been on the Order Paper for some time and we look forward to Senator Macnaughton's contribution.

Also on the Order Paper for Tuesday next is Senator Davey's motion for the appointment of a special committee of the Senate to consider and report upon the ownership and control of major means of public communication in Canada. I hope that it will be possible for Senator Davey to proceed.

The Special Committee on Science Policy will meet on Wednesday and Thursday. Senator Croll advises that he expects that the Special Committee on Poverty will hold its organization meeting next week.

The Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet to consider Bill S-21, an act to amend the Criminal Code. This is the bill dealing with hate propaganda. In addition I expect to have at least two Government bills introduced here.

I feel it would be desirable if the Senate did not sit on Wednesday next in order to give the committees a chance to catch up with their work.

I understand from the house leader in the other place that the house will not be sitting at least one day next week so as to enable its committees to catch up with their work. Therefore, I think it would be useful for us to follow the same course so that our committee work can be pursued without interrupting our proceedings here.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely rise at this time to ask the Leader of the Government what he said concerning Bill S-20, an act to amend the Copyright Act. I think he mentioned that he hoped the debate on this bill could be concluded next week and that the bill would be referred to committee, which suggests to me that the Government is going on with this bill. If so, I suggest that is contrary to what had been indicated by the sponsor of the bill. It appeared to me the last time we discussed this bill that an agreement had been reached between the Government and some of the interested parties that this bill would not be proceeded with. Has there been some new development?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No. I think the Leader of the Opposition has correctly stated the situation. In the light of discussions that were under way, I did not feel that it would be desirable at this time to emphasize that fact. Your interpretation of the situation is correct; I do not believe we will proceed with the bill.

Hon. Mr. Urquhart: Honourable senators, may I add to what the Government Leader has said? It is not the intention of the Government to proceed with the bill, but the bill will stay on the Order Paper until a certain undertaking has been received from the record manufacturers, which they promised to give this week to the Minister of Consumer Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

POVERTY

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave:

That the membership of the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to investigate and report upon all aspects of poverty in Canada be increased to eighteen senators; and

That the committee be composed of the honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Nichol, O'Leary (Antigonish-Guysborough), Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

Motion agreed to.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 558 to 590, inclusive, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, reports adopted.

RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to presentation of petitions:

Hon. Mr. Croll for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the following resolutions:

Resolution 502, for the relief of Donald John Brunet.

Resolution 503, for the relief of Norman Grant.

Resolution 504, for the relief of Harvey Lloyd Raves.

Resolution 505, for the relief of Ray Alexandra Boa Smith.

Resolution 506, for the relief of Daphne June Knapp McCullough.

Resolution 507, for the relief of Claude Lemire Marsolais.

Resolution 508, for the relief of Jules Trempe.

Resolution 509, for the relief of Mariette Smith Laporte.

Resolution 510, for the relief of Francis John Hayes.

Resolution 511, for the relief of Viola Rachelina Princi Campbell.

Resolution 512, for the relief of Jean Dorothy Bell Neilson.

Resolution 513, for the relief of Sheldon Allan Malley.

Resolution 514, for the relief of Marie Carmella Clairette Ratelle Souliere.

Resolution 515, for the relief of Caser Martin Leutschaft.

Resolution 516, for the relief of Colin John McNeill Bowie.

Resolution 517, for the relief of Janice Partington La Vallette.

Resolution 518, for the relief of Elizabeth Anne Ruta Smith.

Resolution 519, for the relief of Jean Guy Ladouceur.

Resolution 520, for the relief of Raymond Alexander Gordon.

Resolution 521, for the relief of Conchetta Maria Catazone Leakey.

Resolution 522, for the relief of Marthe Simard Dontigny.

Resolution 523, for the relief of Judith Anne Theobald Wyles.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I move that these resolutions be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure that the title of this bill will sound familiar to most of you, especially the members of the erstwhile Senate Committee on Banking and Commerce, just as it did to me when first brought to my attention. The reason for that is that Bill S-26 is very similar to another bill, numbered S-22, which was introduced in the Senate on October 31, 1967, and which, after substantial amendment in committee, was passed by the Senate on January 31, 1968, approximately a year ago.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are there any changes?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I am coming to that matter.

Unfortunately, Parliament was dissolved before the previous Bill S-22 was given second reading in the other place. Consequently, it died on the Order Paper. Part of it is now being reintroduced in an expanded form in the bill we now have before us.

The similarity between the present bill and the former one posed a problem for me when preparing my presentation, because the principle and purpose of both bills were similar and had already been approved and passed by the Senate. My problem, therefore, was to decide how far I should go in repeating the arguments I made on presentation of that Bill S-22. I felt that, since this bill had already received a considerable amount of publicty in the press and over the radio and television, I ought not to take up too much time repeating what I had already said on a previous occasion, and which is available for perusal in the records of this chamber.

Although the two bills are similar, there are some very important differences. For example, Bill S-22 of the last session was entitled: "An Act to prohibit the sale and advertising of hazardous substances, to amend the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code". This bill is simply entitled: "An Act to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products".

Honourable senators will recall that the former Bill S-22 was in two parts. Part I banned outright the sale and advertising of hazardous substances, and Part II consisted of amendments to the Food and Drugs Act, the Criminal Code, and the Narcotic Control Act. The most important amendments in Part II of the former Bill S-22 were those which transferred the control of contraceptives from the Criminal Code to the Food and Drugs Act. Honourable senators will note that the present bill contains no reference whatsoever to contraceptive devices. I understand that the amendments contained in Part II of what was Bill S-22 will be contained and presented in a separate bill. The bill that is now before us relates only to Part I of what was Bill S-22, and this is in line with the transfer of administrative responsibilities which has taken place in the interval. The administration of legislation dealing with hazardous products now rests with the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. When Bill S-22 was introduced in 1967 that responsibility rested with the Department of National Health and Welfare. It is felt that control of products like contraceptives, which are related to health and welfare, should remain the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and that is why they are not covered by this bill.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I suppose they are no longer deemed to be hazardous substances.

Hon. Mr. Carter: That is right—they are not hazardous products.

A comparison of the two titles shows that the scope of the present bill has been enlarged to apply to hazardous products, instead of hazardous substances to which the former Bill S-22 applied, and also to prohibit the importation, advertising and sale of those products. Because Part II of Bill S-22 of the last session is not included in the bill now before us, which is a separate act dealing solely with the control of hazardous products, there have been some consequential changes in wording. For example, the words "Part I" in former Bill S-22 have been replaced by the words "this Act" in the present bill. Although it is a separate bill, it will be easier to understand I think, if we regard it as an expanded version of Part I of Bill S-22 of the last session.

Honourable senators will recall that the old bill was given prolonged, detailed and careful consideration by the former Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce at three separate sittings. As a result of all that consideration the bill was greatly improved, and was reported back to the Senate on January 24, 1968, with a number of amendments which were subsequently approved and passed by the Senate. Most but not all of those amendments have been included in the bill now before us. In some cases there have been slight changes in phraseology, but the intent and meaning of the amendments remains unaltered.

With those preliminary remarks, honourable senators, I would now like to deal with the individual clauses. I think these can best be explained by a clause-by-clause comparison with the former bill.

In clause 1 of the present bill, the phrase "hazardous products" has replaced the words "hazardous substances" in the old bill. In addition to chemicals, glues, household cleansers, bleaches and polishes, which are generally classified as substances, the word "products" extends the scope of this bill to include such articles as matches, flammable textiles, mechanical toys, electrical appliances, lawnmowers etc.

It will be appreciated that before regulations can be made with respect to these kinds of articles, satisfactory minimum standards will have to be established. This will require the accumulation of a great deal of technical data and advice, as well as consultation with industry and scientific experts.

When clause 2 of the old bill was being considered in committee, Mr. A. L. Copeland, President of the Canadian Manufacturers of Chemical Specialties Association, presented a brief in which he pointed out that the phrase "or other disposition" in paragraph (a) would prohibit disposition of hazardous substances such as garbage by waste. To overcome this difficulty the committee amended paragraph (a) of that clause by inserting after the word "disposition" the words "to the general public". This amendment was accepted and passed by the Senate. However, this amendment is not included in the bill before us. I made inquiries and was informed that the amendment had been omitted because there was some difficulty in formulating a precise definition of "general public". For example, if a person advertised by certain literature through the mail to a special group such as doctors, there would be some question whether he would in fact be promoting directly or indirectly to the general public.

This problem of disposal is very important. For example, it could very well be that a shopkeeper or salesman could be left with thousands of dollars worth of fabrics which had been purchased for the manufacture of clothing, but because of its flammable characteristics it could no longer be used for that purpose and under Part I of the Schedule would be banned outright, even though it might be useful for another purpose. It may also be possible to solve this problem by means of a special regulation under clause 7. These are points that can be developed further when this bill is being considered with the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as I propose to make such a motion when this debate concludes.

Paragraph (e) of clause 2 is consequent upon the transfer of administrative responsibility to which I have already referred, and the other paragraphs of clause 2 of the present bill are substantially the same as approved and passed in Bill S-22.

Clause 3: When the former bill was before the Committee on Banking and Commerce the committee amended this clause by adding, subclause 4, imposing a time limit. This amendment has been retained. Clause 3 is identical with that of the old bill which was approved.

Clause 4: When the former bill S-22 was being debated in this chamber Senator Hollett and some other senators raised the question that the wording of the clause did not ensure that an inspector would be duly qualified for the duties imposed upon him by the act. This point was supported also by Mr. Copeland in his presentation to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. After a great deal of consideration the committee amended clause 4, as set out on page 749 of Senate Hansard, of January 24, 1968. In fact, all the amendments made in the Banking and Commerce Committee, and the excellent elucidation of them given by the chairman, Senator Hayden, in his usual outstanding manner, can be found in this same volume of Senate Hansard, pages 749 to 753, inclusive.

The amendment made in committee a year ago and passed by the Senate reads as follows:

> 3. Page 2: Strike out clause 4 and substitute therefor the following:
> "4. (1) The Minister may designate as a hazardous substance inspector any person on the staff of the Department of National Health and Welfare who, in his opinion, is qualified to act as an inspector.
> (2) A person designated an inspector pursuant to subsection (1) shall act for such time as he is employed in the Department of National Health and Welfare or for such time during the period of such employment as the Minister may specify."

Honourable senators will note that clause 4 of the bill before us differs considerably from the amendment I have just read. The original clause 4 in Bill S-22 simply followed the standard procedure which is commonly used in drafting legislation of this kind. As pointed out by Senator Hollett and others, the standard procedure in defining inspectors is not altogether satisfactory, and on examination it was found that the amendment proposed by the committee was also not entirely satisfactory, because it was not considered to be sufficiently flexible. It appears that under this legislation an inspector may be required to perform two different kinds of duties, the first one being the ordinary duties of inspection which would require a satisfactory level of technical skill and knowledge, the other being simply to perform the act of seizure of goods that are already known to be hazardous. For example, we know that jequirity beans are poisonous, and we also know that necklaces made of these beans had a fairly wide distribution before people became aware that they were dangerous.

Only a short while ago I read in one of the Ottawa papers that one of these necklaces had recently come to light after being in a family for a great many years. Supposing, for the sake of argument, a package of these necklaces or some other articles or substances of a similar nature came to light in a remote community where the people might not be very well informed about their dangerous nature. It would be necessary to seize these articles as quickly as possible. Since time is of the essence, it is obvious that the quickest way to have them seized would be to appoint a local policeman or the nearest R.C.M.P. officer as an inspector under this clause so that he could carry out the seizure. Perhaps the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will be able to give some better solution to this problem when this bill is before it.

I am told that the problem of devising a suitable legal definition for inspectors is a matter of some concern, and it might be that the best solution to this problem would be to pass a separate bill relating only to inspectors, their qualifications, powers, et cetera, to which reference could be made in legislation such as we now have before us.

Clauses 5, 6 and 7 are practically identical with the same clauses in the former Bill S-22, which were approved by both the committee and the Senate.

Clause 8 gives the Governor in Council authority to add to or delete from either Part I or Part II of the Schedule. This power was included in the old bill S-22, but there seemed to be a difference of opinion in committee as to whether there was also power to transfer a product from Part I of the Schedule to Part II of the Schedule and vice versa. The present wording is intended to clarify this point.

Paragraph (a) of clause 8 of the present bill is practically the same as the old clause 4 in Bill S-22, but paragraph (b) of clause 8 is new. It represents the additional scope contained in this bill by including such categories of goods that may be hazardous but which would not be included in the category commonly known as "substances". Subclause 2 of clause 8 is also new and self-explanatory.

Clause 9 is new, and provides for the setting up of a board of review to which appeals can be made with respect to substances added to either Part I or Part II of the Schedule. The procedure, as I understand it, is that the Governor in Council first makes an order that a substance or product be added to the Schedule. After that is done, the manufacturer, distributor or a person who has the product for sale may request that this board be set up to hear any representations they wish to make as an appeal against the order of the Governor in Council.

When Bill S-22 was under debate Senator Roebuck inquired as to whether there was any provision or procedure whereby a manufacturer or salesman could submit a product to a department and have it certified in advance as to whether that product was or was not a hazardous product within the meaning of this legislation. As I explained to Senator Roebuck when concluding the debate on second reading on November 6, 1967, there is no reason why any manufacturer should not seek an opinion from the department as to whether his product was likely to be placed on Part I or Part II of the Schedule, or whether his method of selling or advertising that product was considered likely to contravene the provisions of this legislation, as such opinions are now given on request in connection with food and drugs and this practice had proved to be a very useful adjunct to the overall administration of that legislation.

However, I also pointed out that this would be an opinion only and would in no way be binding on the department, because if circumstances warranted the addition of a substance or product to any part of the Schedule, the administering department should not be inhibited in doing so, by any prior licence, opinion or other assurance that it may have given to the producer or distributor with respect to that substance.

Clause 9 also sets forth the duties and powers of the Board of Review, and requires a report to be made and published unless the public interest is better served by withholding such publication.

Clauses 10, 11 and 12 correspond to clauses 9, 10 and 11 of the former Bill S-22, and the wording is identical with these clauses as passed by the Senate on January 30, 1968.

Clause 13 is also a new clause. It deals with the trial of offences, and is self-explanatory.

Clauses 14, 15 and 16 correspond to and are identical with clauses 12, 13 and 14 of the former Bill S-22, as amended in committee and approved by the Senate. Clause 16 refers to subclause 2 of clause 3, which in turn deals with Part II of the Schedule listing the products subject to control. This clause comes into force on proclamation. I presume this is to provide time for the regulations to be formulated and proclaimed at the same time.

Subclause 1 of clause 3, which deals with Part I of the Schedule, made up of products of which the sale, advertising and importation are prohibited outright, comes into force immediately this bill receives Royal Assent.

The Schedule is divided into two parts. Part I, as I have already pointed out, sets forth the various groups of hazardous products, the importation, advertising and sale of which are completely prohibited under subclause 1 of clause 3. Part II consists of those groups of hazardous products the importation, advertising and sale of which are subject to control by regulation. The Governor in Council has power under clause 8 to add to or delete from either Part of the Schedule or to transfer from one Part to the other. The Banking and Commerce Committee practically rewrote sections 2 and 3 of Part I of the Schedule in the former bill, and these amendments have been retained in the present legislation. Both parts of the Schedule are therefore identical with the Schedule approved and passed by the Senate on January 30, 1968.

Honourable senators, the fact that Bill S-26, which we now have before us, is so similar to and yet in many ways so different from the former Bill S-22, has complicated rather than simplified my task of explaining it to you. To save time and avoid unnecessary repetition, I have refrained from making comments on those clauses and on the Schedule which the Senate approved as part of the previous Bill S-22 and which have been retained in the present legislation either intact or with minor consequential changes in wording. However, if senators wish to have further information on these clauses, I would refer them to the debate which took place on Bill S-22 and which can be found in Senate Hansard of November 1, 1967, pages 341 to 346, inclusive, and in Senate Hansard of November 6, 1967, pages 406 to 412 inclusive.

Senator Hayden's speech, explaining the amendments made in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, can be found in Senate Hansard of January 24, 1968, pages 749 to 753, inclusive; and the Minutes of the Banking and Commerce Committee can be found in Proceedings nos. 13, 15 and 22, dated November 22, 1967, December 6, 1967 and January 24, 1968, respectively.

When the former Bill S-22 was before the Senate a year ago, the question was raised as to whether this type of legislation was really necessary, in view of the fact that when emergencies have arisen in the past through poisonous products getting on the market the problem seems to have been dealt with satisfactorily through publicity and persuasion. In reply to this argument, I would refer honourable senators to the brief presented to the Banking and Commerce Committee on December 6, 1967 in connection with Bill S-22. On this particular point, Mr. Copeland had this to say:

> The association, though preferring a voluntary industry approach to the elimination of deficiencies which the bill is designed to offset, appreciates that it has been unable to obtain the voluntary adherence to the labelling code of all household products manufacturers in Canada who are not members of the association.
> The association, therefore, appreciates the need for legislation which will enable the establishment of regulations covering the proper labelling of hazardous household products; and also the authority to remove from sale those hazardous products which are improperly labelled according to regulations, providing that there be a right of appeal.

He then went on to point out that legislation alone will not be sufficient to solve the problem completely and that a program of consumer education will also be required. Such a program, I understand, is already in the process of being developed by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Honourable senators will appreciate, however, that there is only so much the Government can do in this area because in the final analysis much will depend on the good judgment, carefulness and common sense exercised by each individual.

In his evidence before the Committee on Banking and Commerce on November 22, 1967, Dr. Crawford, Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare, stated that the former Bill S-22 had been discussed with the members of the Dominion Council of Health on November 16 and 17, 1967. He went on to say, and I read:

> I do want to report to you that those members, consisting of the deputy ministers of health of all provinces, were unanimous in their opinion that such legislation was in fact desirable and required.

At that same committee meeting Dr. Crawford was asked how his department had dealt with the emergencies that had resulted from the appearance on the market of necklaces made from the poisonous jequirity beans and the plastic ice balls from Hong Kong which contained contaminated water. In reply to that question Dr. Crawford stated as follows:

> Well, we had to deal with the provincial departments on this. We telephoned and telegraphed and told them of the hazard which was in their shops and they dealt with it provincially. This is how we had to handle that situation. Of course it was a pretty time-consuming process.

Here, honourable senators, it should be stressed that this bill is not limited to hazardous products imported into this country, which are relatively few, but that its main purpose is to safeguard the public from all sorts of hazardous products now on the market, many of which are already manufactured in this country, and also to protect the public from those new hazardous products which will be manufactured in the future. It is therefore necessary for the authorities to be able to act swiftly whenever the necessity arises.

In my presentation of Bill S-22, I pointed out that in 1964 there were 720 cases of poisoning from a common bleaching preparation and 217 more attributable to a household drain and pipe cleaner. The latest grim statistics for accidents in the home in 1966 show that 757 resulted from falls, 561 from fires and explosions, 327 from suffocation, 275 from poisoning and 264 from firearms and other causes.

Honourable senators, the principle of this bill is to extend public safety. This principle is already embodied in the Food and Drugs Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Explosives Act and the Atomic Energy Control Act. The bill before us is an extension of that principle in that it applies to products not yet covered by other legislation.

Since I introduced Bill S-22 a year ago, there have been a number of fatalities among young children due to glue sniffing. Glue is one of the products listed in Part II of the schedule, and will be controlled by this legislation; but this present bill is broad enough to include also such articles as defective electrical appliances, lawn mowers and things of that kind. This legislation is urgently needed and I strongly recommend it to you for your support.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

FIFTY-SIXTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE IN LIMA, PERU

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 17, 1968, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of the Hon. Mr. Dessureault calling the attention of the Senate to the 56th Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, held in Lima, Peru, from 5th to 13th September, 1968, and in particular the discussions and proceedings of the meetings and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, though I was not a member of the Distinguished Canadian delegation to the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference at Lima, Peru, I am taking this opportunity to make a few remarks arising out of the report presented to us by our delegates who were there. I refer particularly to the reports that we had from Senator Dessureault and Senator Thorvaldson. I presume that in due course we will be receiving a report from Senator McDonald, who is temporarily absent from the chamber.

I should say perhaps that both Senators Dessureault and Thorvaldson have very distinguished records in the affairs of this conference. Both have on several occasions been leaders of Canadian delegations. Senator Dessureault has been additionally distinguished, being the first Canadian member of the Executive Committee of that organization.

I thought I would mention these accomplishments of our colleagues because reports I have had on this conference make it very clear that it was a most important conference and that the contribution made by the Canadian delegation, headed in this case by Mr. Grant Deachman, was a very outstanding one. In saying that, I am not just paying the usual compliments. There have been a good many reports indicating that the Canadian delegation made perhaps a greater contribution than any other at this particular time.

I particularly want to compliment the senators on the fact that they have arranged to have the report of the Canadian delegation published as an appendix to our Hansard. I say this because, in order to put the conference into proper context, I found that I had to read publications published in other countries. I am glad to say that the delegates from the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group initiated this very useful way of reporting, giving a full report of their deliberations in our Hansard. I believe that Senator Macnaughton will within a few days add considerably to the report of that particular group.

I think it is important to mention these facts because it seems to me that one of the great deficiencies in the recognition of the work of Canadian parliamentarians in international affairs over the years has been the lack of reporting of what they have accomplished. It is regrettable, to me at least, that such conferences are not the subject of report and debate in the other place. Indeed, in many cases I find that the only report of these important international conferences and of the participation of Canadian delegations is to be found in the reports made by individual senators in this chamber. I deplore the fact that the ministries, the Governments over the years, have not themselves taken the initiative in drawing attention to the participation of Canadian parliamentarians in these conferences.

The report presented by our senators here on the IPU does not of course tell the whole story of the Canadian success at that time—obviously for reasons of modesty. However, I repeat that it is unfortunate that we do have to go to publications in other countries to find out what Canadian parliamentarians are doing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: There is abundant evidence that the participation of Members of Parliament, from both chambers, is becoming an increasingly important and effective instrument in dealing with world problems.

If I may take a moment, I will put that in a broader context by saying that it is obviously a truism to say that to some extent in Canada we are victims of our history in this regard. For most of that history we were colonials. The conduct of our international affairs was, for most of our history, in the hands of European nations, first France and then the United Kingdom. Even our spectacular participation in two world wars was to quite an extent at arm's length from the people. We spoke of our troops going "overseas". The wars were "over there."

I think it is fair to say that in general our Canadian attitude may have been that expressed by Sir Winston Churchill in his famous phrase about "the New World coming in God's good time to the help of the old." There are reasons, of course, for the change—and I would call it a sudden change—in Canadian public opinion about the importance of Canadian involvement in world affairs. We know the reasons. They are easy to trace. In the forties there was that apparently inexorable movement of the Iron Curtain westward across Europe, a movement which I think we should never forget was stopped in its tracks by NATO. Since the formation of NATO not one single foot of new territory of Western Europe has gone behind the Iron Curtain, and I am sure the people of Czechoslovakia today fervently wish that the NATO front line had swung around their country from West Germany prior to some recent events.

It amazes me that we still have isolationists among us who tell us that our membership in NATO is merely a European involvement. They forget that those initials stand for North Atlantic Treaty Organization and that the front line stretches from Turkey to our Canadian shores. Another reason for the increasing Canadian awareness of our involvement in world affairs is Cuba. We woke up one morning to find that hostile nuclear missiles were located in an area close to Canada's own shores, where many Canadians have spent winter holidays and in an area where many Canadians have homes. Above all, there came to Canadians the realization that the cornerstone of our foreign defence policy today is the fact that if a war breaks out between the two most mutually suspicious nations in the world, who happen also to be the two most powerful, the battleground will not be the Low Countries, the Balkans or Belgium, the small countries of Europe, but big Canada.

I suggest that against this background it is worth considering the increasing importance of the role that parliamentarians can play and are playing in helping to solve today's world problems. Sometimes I seem to hear the people of Canada saying to parliamentarians, "Get into this international business; don't leave it all to the government; don't leave it all to professional diplomats." I sincerely believe that recent developments—and I stress the word recent—in the activities of Canadian parliamentarians in world affairs constitutes possibly a third channel of action and communication in this area. The first and second channels are, of course, government-to-government relations, and the professional diplomatic relations.

There are limitations, of course, to what parliamentarians can do, but I would suggest that there is also a very great potential which is only just being realized and which in the future will become increasingly more important and may even in time make a more important contribution to world peace than what is being done in the other channels. This is evident in reports such as we have had on the IPU. In my view that report is worth reading and re-reading because to those who have been at some of these international conferences it is amazing the extent to which the same basic problems are discussed and the same basic solutions arrived at.

As I have said, I regard these as a recent development. It is rather interesting to look at the history of these parliamentary conferences. The IPU itself is 56 years old but the conference on which we had the report and which we are discussing today was only the ninth in which Canada has participated since that long and inexplicable break of 33 years from 1927. I think we ceased to participate in 1927 and did not take up our membership again until 1960.

Hon. Mr. Martin: How old is the organization?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The meeting which we are discussing is the 56th, and I presume these meetings have been held annually since then.

Hon. Mr. Dessureault: It was founded in 1889.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The honourable Senator Dessureault tells us that the organization began in 1889. But to support my suggestion that the present level of Canadian interest is something very recent, I point to that long break. We were affected in those years by continental isolationism which is something to which Canadians living on this great land mass, close to our American neighbours, are always susceptible. We have over the years looked to the Monroe Doctrine as protecting us. We looked to the close territorial and economic connections with the United States as protecting us. Yet, we see the possibility of the next world conflagration if, God forbid, it should happen, being between the United States and the U.S.S.R. and we know that we will have to look to our immediate neighbour for our defence.

A comment that is often made, and I do not think it is always an informed comment, is that no one knows how effective these conferences of parliamentarians are or what they accomplish. Are they just jaunts? Are they just visits? Are they just talk-fests?

Honourable senators, I think anyone who has been at recent conferences will agree with me that the trend is away from that. I do not know what the situation was years ago, but I do know that I have noticed the trend away from the social activity, the talk-fest, towards a determination to reach some conclusions. There is no better example of that than the agenda of this recent Inter-Parliamentary Union meeting.

As Senator Dessureault summarized the agenda in our Hansard of December 10 last, perhaps I might draw attention to the four main points, and on all of these there were very full resolutions passed by the Union.

The first deals with the inadmissibility of intervention in the domestic affairs of other states. We are told that when the IPU endorsed that resolution the parliamentary representatives of the Warsaw Pact countries walked out. I would like to hear more about that. I would like to learn whether they stayed out, and whether in the social contacts afterwards they explained why they had walked out. Was it on instructions from their governments? Had they any regrets?

I hope that every one of such Inter-Parliamentary conferences will pass similar resolutions, and if there happens to be present members of those or other countries who have been guilty of raw aggression, that they will walk out. If enough parliamentarians walk out of these conferences, they will eventually get the message back to their governments that parliamentarians all over the world find this kind of action detestable.

I think the converse of that is that one might hope our own delegations of parliamentarians coming back will be given a much greater opportunity to get the message through to our governments. I am sure the honourable Leader of the Government knows that I am not speaking of any particular government; this is a situation that has gone on for some time. I see no mechanism for parliamentarians reporting back to our governments the views and opinions of other parliamentarians around the world on Canadian policy.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Might I suggest, by way of a question: Does the honourable gentleman not think that the new Committee on Foreign Affairs might be one of the vehicles by which this could be done?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would entirely agree with the Leader of the Government on that. I was very interested to hear him give a broad outline of the program that he has in mind for the Foreign Affairs Committee. I would hope, of course, that the elements of that program would not be a mere extension of what we have been doing in the past. I am one of those who believe that in this area of foreign affairs a second chamber—I prefer that expression to "upper chamber"—has a special adequacy in dealing with foreign affairs. In this second chamber, generally speaking, we have the time, the detachment, and, as I have indicated and it is abundantly clear, the experience and the expertise. We also have that permanence of appointment, which is not necessarily a national asset in itself but which could and, I think, should be made a national asset. We all know the steps we would like to see taken in that regard, and I may have something more to say about that in a moment or two.

To revert to the point I was making, I hope that there will be recognition of the fact that these parliamentarians' conferences are not just some relic of the past. The interesting fact is that in the last year there have been three major expansions of this concept.

The first has been the establishment of—if honourable senators will excuse my French, because there is not an English version of the title—l'association internationale des parlementaires de la langue française. This is the organization of French-speaking parliamentarians which held its first meeting last year. Canada has taken a prominent part in that and will again be represented, I understand, at the next meeting, in the fall, in Tunisia.

Secondly, as honourable senators know, there has now been set up for the first time an Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch, a part of the operation of the Offices of the Speakers. Mr. Ian Imrie is head of the branch, Colonel T. G. Bowie is his deputy, and Miss Jean Macpherson an officer. I believe she was secretary to the Canadian delegation to the IPU and, from what I have heard, a very competent one.

The third development, which I understand His Honour will be greatly involved in, is a conference of Commonwealth Speakers, the first ever to be held. I understand that His Honour has sent out invitations to the Speakers of the various upper chambers to attend. We are all proud to learn that His Honour will be taking a very prominent part in that first conference of Speakers of the Parliaments of the Commonwealth.

I think another indication of the extent of parliamentary concern in international affairs is the fact that very recently, for the first time, we have had backbenchers taking off from Canada and other countries, and flying thousands of miles to show their concern over the problems of a comparatively small tribe on the west coast of Africa. I suggest this is a recent development and is one which is growing in importance. I hope that such action will be given greater encouragement, with more opportunity to report, and that in some way our parliamentarians will be given the ear of the Government.

Reverting to the resolutions I mentioned earlier, the next will interest Senator Lamontagne particularly, because the second of the four important items on the agenda was:

> Parliament's role in the elaboration and control of national science policy.

A very important point made in the resolutions is that individual parliamentarians have a responsibility in respect of the science policy of our governments. The conference was saying: "You cannot just leave science policy to the Government. It must be the concern of all parliamentarians". Parliamentarians must be concerned particularly in such matters as that to which the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) referred the other day, the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. He brought it before us, as one of the Houses of Parliament, but I do not know to what degree it will be debated. Speaking for myself, I am sorry that it was brought before us in this rather perfunctory or casual way. Very often no attempt is made to develop debate on these matters. Perhaps this is our own fault in that we do not take advantage of the opportunity.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty is an indication of the continuing leadership Canada is giving in this broad field, but I have my own reservations about the haste with which Canada signed it. I would have preferred that we waited until all the depository powers had signed it. I have some reservations about the fact that we have tied our hands in respect to other nations in the matter of the civilian development of nuclear explosions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should like to tell the honourable senator that I fully agree with him. We should discuss this matter. I raised it the other day in the hope that we might have a discussion of it. One of the functions of the Senate, in my opinion, is that of discussing such treaties. I do not think the Government of Canada has concluded a more important international engagement in a long time, and there is nothing to prevent our having a full discussion on it.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I agree with the honourable Leader of the Government. I am criticizing myself at this particular moment. I know that I should have risen to speak at that time, but I was not ready. The fault is mine, and I am criticizing nobody but myself. This is a matter I should have raised at that particular time, and I mention it now only in passing.

The honourable Leader of the Government is well aware, I am sure, of the civilian aspect to which I refer, but I repeat that I am convinced that the early Canadian signing, even though it may have a potential of some serious limitations in the future, is in keeping with the image of Canadian foreign policy for which the honourable Leader is entitled to a great deal of credit—the image of Canada taking the lead among the nations on anything that will promote peace.

I have very little more to say on these resolutions, but I should like to draw attention to the third and fourth resolutions which indicate, as I said earlier, that the discussions at these meetings of parliamentarians concern the most vital problems facing the world today.

The third resolution reads:

> Colonialism, neo-colonialism and new forms of racial, religious, political and economic discrimination.

I was interested in the adjective "new". I wondered what are the "new forms of discrimination," but when I looked into the resolutions I understood what was meant. They were referring to the monopoly control of world trade by the developed industrial nations. The manner in which it is being carried out is creating among the new nations a form of economic discrimination which, as Mr. Pearson, the former Prime Minister, said only yesterday, may lead within ten or twelve years to an international catastrophe. That was Mr. Pearson's comment on the conduct of this monopoly control that the Western industrial nations are intent on maintaining in world trade.

Canada has given some leadership in the field, but I regret the stand that Canada has taken in regard to preferences for the products of some of the developing countries. I know why we have taken that stand, but I know also that it has been misunderstood abroad. In spite of the reasons we and others have given, the developing countries continue to insist that in their view some form of trade preference is an essential part of the narrowing of that gap that threatens us with the catastrophe of which Mr. Pearson spoke.

The fourth main point in the resolutions of the IPU concerned the provision of aid to developing nations, and here I am again wondering if the message will be carried back to our own Government. I wonder what mechanism there is, for example, for this very fine delegation that attended this conference to come back and tell our Government once again that a very powerful, influential, effective, and thoughtful international body has said: "You must stop tying your aid." I wonder if the Government has been told that.

I am fully aware that there are two sides to this question. I know it would mean some considerable economic sacrifice to untie our aid, but the fact remains that every detached body that has looked at this problem has said: "The donor nations must untie their aid." I shall not go into further detail as to why we insist on tying our aid. I know that there is an escape clause because of the problem we face in respect of our balance of international settlements, but I would hope that the message from Lima, Peru, will be carried to our Government.

Honourable senators, I have said that I feel a second chamber such as this is in a unique position to make a contribution in this particular area. I mentioned the fact of permanence of appointments, and I conclude by saying that I hope those who have responsibility in this matter will so exercise it that this special feature of our tenure of office here will become a national asset, which it can be, and not a national liability, which it also can be and which some think it is. I see hope for developments—I will not say "constitutional developments"—which will in the very immediate future make the Senate, this House of Parliament, a body which has the respect and esteem of the parliaments of the world.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 17, 1968, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Aird calling the attention of the Senate to the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Brussels, Belgium, 11th November to 15th November, 1968, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I hesitate a little to resume the debate after the speech we have just heard, because my topic is somewhat in the same vein—our external relations—as I intend to deal with our participation to the annual NATO assembly, held in Brussels from November 11 to 15 last.

It was only at the insistent suggestion of several of my colleagues that I agreed to be a member of the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the NATO Assembly held last November in Brussels. Those colleagues assured me that the meeting would have particular importance because of the events in Czechoslovakia and that therefore it could be a most useful experience. I must admit that they were right.

I would keep you a long time if I were to tell you about all the impressions and convictions I brought back from my trip. But, have no fear, I shall limit myself to those points I feel are essential.

As a preliminary remark, I should like to say that I agree with Senator Aird about the role played by the Canadian delegation.

It fulfilled its obligations brilliantly and I believe it created a strong impression on the delegates from the other member countries. This was due, in the main, to the members of the delegation, but also to the drive and the competence of the leader of the delegation, our colleague, Senator John Aird. The delegates were unanimous in praising the way in which he led their work.

I also share the feelings of gratitude expressed by Senator Aird to Mr. Peter Dobell, director of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Trade. The help he gave the delegation contributed greatly to its efficiency.

Before dealing with the main themes of the deliberations of the Assembly, I should like to say a few words about the visit the delegation made to West Berlin where we were the guests of the local German authorities.

This short trip of less than two days nevertheless impressed me greatly.

I wonder how many Canadians know that Berlin remains, constitutionally or legally, in the same situation as it was at the time of the allies' victory in 1945, over 23 years ago. Berlin is still under military occupation by the four allied great powers: the United States, Great Britain, France and Russia. It is still divided in four sections where each of these powers maintain its own occupation troops. East Berlin is, of course, the Russian sector. Do people know generally that this is why only airplanes of the countries which have occupation troops there can go to West Berlin? Do people even know that Lufthansa aircraft, for example, cannot land at the West Berlin airport?

The wall, of course, is the main attraction for casual visitors. What strikes us is not mainly that dull wall but what it means to keep it there. When we remember the prospects for an easing of tension which appeared to be bright in the spring of 1968 and which the occupation of Czechoslovakia has so deeply shattered, the wall of shame should have been a warning to us and it must remain one against the illusion of a forthcoming détente. I am not suggesting that we should give up that objective. The pursuit of an easing of tension and the maintenance of a deterrent force are not conflicting objectives. What I am saying is that the maintenance of the wall is evidence that the authorities of the Warsaw Pact, of East Berlin more perhaps than Russia itself, are not ready to take a chance on an ideological confrontation between the East and the West, the essential requirement for a true easing of tension or at least for peaceful coexistence. This confrontation attempted in Czechoslovakia showed that after 50 years of bolshevism, in spite of scientific and even economic progress, the inborn love of freedom and the desire for liberalization, that broke out in Czechoslovakia and would truly like to reveal themselves in Russia and elsewhere, are the most serious threat to Soviet dictatorship and imperialism.

This brings me naturally to one of the most debated questions in the North Atlantic Assembly, i.e., the invasion or occupation of Czechoslovakia by Soviet military forces.

Was there to be seen in such an event a direct threat to NATO? In the opinion of all, such brutal action should be considered as a defensive reaction rather than as an act of aggression. As I suggested, it could be that East Germany, more than Moscow, wanted to nip in the bud the liberalization program of the Czechoslovak communist party. East Germany is obviously afraid of the comparison that her nationals could establish between their situation and that of their brothers in the Federal Republic. She did not want to be faced with a similar problem along her frontier with Czechoslovakia. Also, as may well be imagined, the Soviets look askance at a similar movement taking form within the party or within the Soviet cultural circles. But the fact remains that the aggression against Czechoslovakia has shown, according to the delegates' views, that Russia will never hesitate to resort to strength to achieve her ends, if she thinks there is no other alternative.

Therefore, those events have drawn closer together the members of the North Atlantic Alliance. Except for Canada who officially refuses to commit herself on account of her re-examination—I was going to say her alleged re-examination—of her defence policy and of her foreign policy, and for France who stays outside the integrated NATO forces, all countries seemed more convinced than ever of the necessity to maintain the alliance, to strengthen and to improve the efficiency of its military strength, by the light of the experience drawn from the events of August 1968.

The second subject of concern for the representatives is the increase of NATO's conventional forces in Europe. It is recognized that the superiority of the NATO forces in relation to the Warsaw Pact is only due to their nuclear striking force, and that the conventional forces of the Warsaw Pact countries are really superior, in number at least, to those of NATO. It is most important to remedy this inferiority which would enable the East to make very important strategic movements that would not justify an immediate nuclear answer from NATO. Moreover, this danger would be increased if other countries were to imitate France and withdraw their troops from the authority of the NATO command. Here, it is nevertheless necessary to stress that the French forces, even if they no longer belong to the integrated NATO forces, are still cooperating with them, in particular in the Mediterranean where, as it is known, the Soviets have introduced a naval strength which represents a very serious threat to the Southern flank of the Alliance.

Incidentally, I would like to quote a NATO Bulletin dated January 16, 1969. This is what it says:

> At the meeting of the Committee of the Defence Plans, today—

—it is about the meeting of the Ministers of Defence of NATO members—

> —the decision has been made to approve the principle of an allied naval force, based in the Mediterranean area and which could be summoned on request. However, before such a force can be established, there are still many practical and political problem to solve. Five countries at least are likely to participate; Greece, Italy, Turkey, Great Britain and the United States.

We should note that France is already in the Mediterranean.

Consequently, the delegates showed concern about the possibility expressed by the Canadian government of simply withdrawing from NATO or, alternatively, of withdrawing its troops presently based in West Germany, under the European high command.

I do not think I am misinterpreting the Canadian delegates by suggesting that none of them seriously believes that Canada might withdraw from NATO. To do so would mean that this country has lost faith in the principle of collective security or—and this seems unbelievable for such an attitude would be totally cowardly and irresponsible—that we are gladly taking for granted that the United States would assume our defence. The idea has already been expressed that such was the reason that might justify our withdrawal from NATO. On the other hand, nobody will suggest that we can genuinely believe that any serious danger of conflict is now over.

Anyhow, if such were the conclusion reached by Canada following its reappraisal of its defence policy, we would certainly not be the only North Atlantic country to hold that belief. On the other hand, can we contemplate withdrawing our troops under the high command in Europe? Such a decision would imply that we cannot do otherwise. Apart from the fact that such a movement might be prejudicial to the other member countries, it would bring comfort only to the countries of the Warsaw Treaty; it is difficult to imagine, if Canada must maintain military forces, that she could thereby make a substantial profit. If we bring back to Canada the troops which are quartered in Europe, they will miss the opportunity to participate in the operations of the integrated force, which seems to me an obvious tactical advantage. On the other hand, Canada would have nothing more to say within the Command in Europe and would simply be militarily in tow of the United States.

The more we consider the statements of the prime minister regarding NATO, the more embarrassed we are, unless we come to the conclusion—and I have done so—that the Government does not consider seriously the possibility of withdrawing from NATO or repatriating its forces quartered in Europe and that it is only aiming at reviving public interest regarding the Alliance. Certainly a very large segment of our people, especially among youth, has very vague ideas about NATO and the meaning of Canada's participation in it. Asking questions may create a sound curiosity which may make it easier for the Government to come to the conclusion that NATO remains an alliance essential to the collective security of North Atlantic countries, and that Canada cannot get away from its responsibility of playing a part commensurate with her importance and her capacity.

If these are really the views or the tactics of the Government—and I think they are—I wish to tell them: For goodness' sake, stop procrastinating. Hurry up in the interest of security and make the decisions expected by the people.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-25, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is twofold, one to add the Canadian Dairy Commission Act to the list of acts to be dealt with under the Export and Import Permits Act. The reason is that the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, already having been passed by the two Houses of Parliament, makes provision for the act now before us to be amended to provide for that addition. The second purpose is that the date of expiry of the present act is July 31, 1969. The term of the act has been extended on a three-year basis each time since 1954. The present amendment provides for the extension on a five-year basis, on the assumption that the necessity for an extension or a reconsideration of the act is unlikely throughout a normal period of a Parliament, and that time should not be taken to deal with the act unnecessarily.

Honourable senators, to go back for a moment to the first purpose of the amendment, the Export and Import Permits Act makes provision for three lists—the export control list, the import control list, and an area list.

The purpose of each of these is fairly straightforward. It gives the Governor in Council an opportunity to place on each of these lists items which are to be the subject of particular controls. Provision for those controls is often contained in other legislation, such as, in this case, the Canadian Dairy Commission Act. This is really an implementation of that act, just as many of the other amendments to this act are implementations of other acts.

Therefore, by this amendment, we are simply adding to the list already in the act—a list which includes the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the Fisheries Prices Supports Act, the Agricultural Products Co-Operative Marketing Act and the Agricultural Products Board Act—the Canadian Dairy Commission Act, giving the opportunity for support to be provided as is already provided for in the Canadian Dairy Commission Act.

That addition is the principal purpose of the bill. The second purpose, as I have said, is the extension of the term of the act for five years rather than the customary three years.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask the sponsor of the bill whether it is his intention to move that this bill be referred to a committee?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: Honourable senators, it was not my intention to ask that the bill be referred to a committee. If it is the desire of honourable senators that it should be so referred, then it would be to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is obviously noncontentious, and I do not think that we on this side would insist on its being sent to a committee.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am satisfied that the sponsor has given us a full explanation of the bill and I do not see any purpose in discussing it further.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, before we carry the motion, I would like to say I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition has been influenced in this view by reason of the persuasive way in which Senator Stanbury has presented his argument.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is what I said, except that I may not have said it in such nice terms. I accept the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 28, 1969, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 28, 1969

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HON. M. WALLACE McCUTCHEON, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, I am quite sure that I express the sentiments of most honourable senators as I rise to speak on the great loss that has befallen this house.

If any man dies, I am the poorer, because I am involved in mankind. When the man was so deeply involved in mankind as was Wallace McCutcheon, the loss to his country is so much the greater for its harsh untimeliness.

As one of his closest friends for many, many years, as his doctor, I can truthfully say—and a doctor knows, because his life is a study of mankind—here was a great man. It was my privilege, as one of his pallbearers, to escort him to his last resting place. His monuments lie all about us. There are some who might not recognize them, because this is the sort of man he was. Most people knew him as the wizard of finance, but I knew him as a man. His death has come as a grievous blow, not only to the philanthropic charities to which he gave his all, but to this country, this Parliament, this Senate, where he inspired both admiration and affection. He was great both as a person, and as a public servant. Many of us will always have a sense of deep personal attachment to him. His time, his energy, his health have been his country's rather than his own.

In brief, Canada was his life and he established a claim to its gratitude beyond the reach of adequate recompense. His decision to enter the cabinet was a patriotic one, made at personal self-sacrifice. No one in the history of this country, in the Parliamentary life of Canada, gave up as much as did Wallace McCutcheon for the good not only of this Senate but for the whole of his country. The imprint of this supremely intelligent man remains upon many aspects of the lives of Canadians.

His sudden death had the drama of a man cut off in the prime of his career. When I was called he had, in fact, been working at his office in his home attempting to solve the medical conflict for the Board of Governors of the University of Toronto in a situation that had nearly become desperate.

A vigorous leader in any enterprise he undertook, Senator McCutcheon was forceful and his influence was widely felt. For all his formidable intellect, he was a warm and amiable man who delighted in pricking the pompous and puncturing the pretentious. His speeches were provocative and witty with a knowledge of economics and finance that far surpassed anyone in this country.

I remember once when I had Senator McCutcheon as a guest before an outstanding medical society he stated, "It would be good for all of us if we could give our ears a rest sometimes and use what lies between the ears." His annual reports in business were admirable essays in logic and rhetoric leavened with his pungent observations. Throughout his long and distinguished business career he insisted on the highest standards of intellectual integrity.

I know it is generally conceded that it is a matter of regret today that he was not given the opportunity to play an important part in the parliamentary life of his country when he was at the peak of his intellectual powers. His contribution could have been invaluable, as indeed it was throughout his life in whatever endeavour he turned to. His ready wit and nimble mind endeared him to his associates and elevated him to a position commanding respect. His capacity for hard work was recognized with admiration as he plunged into the task of mastering the intricate fields of Parliament as well as its procedural complexities. I am quite sure that it cannot be denied that at the time of his death he was the acknowledged master of finance in this country. He, indeed, was a casualty of the hard task of driving oneself beyond his own physical makeup and ability. He was a humble man of faith. His religion was never paraded but was manifested in his quiet faithfulness to his church.

We mourn the death of a great Canadian whose integrity of life, generosity of service and greatness of mind have strengthened and enriched the Canada he loved.

He was a family man. To Eva, his wife, that great and dignified lady, his admirable consort who has supported him in every moment of his life, and to his children, not only as their friend but as their doctor, I express my admiration and my deep and heartfelt sympathy. Dr. Wilder Penfield expressed it so well in his address before the Empire Club of Toronto just recently, when he referred to Mrs. Wallace McCutcheon as a most arduous and formidable worker in the Vanier Institute of the Family in Canada.

We ask Almighty God to bless him and preserve his soul, and may perpetual light ever shine upon him.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I will add very little to what has been so ably said by Senator Sullivan.

Those who were present yesterday in Toronto at the funeral of our former colleague could easily evaluate the place he occupied not only in the community but in the hearts of very many. Represented there were people from all walks of life and all fields of human endeavour. This was as it should be, for Wallace McCutcheon was very active not only in business life and politics but also in education, the arts, social welfare and many other fields.

We know of his successful business career. Here in the Senate we were witnesses to the refreshing vigour he brought to Parliament, his unique forthright expression of his views.

Perhaps we are not as familiar with the man who was chairman of the Ontario Cancer Institute and who also founded The Princess Margaret Hospital; who was a member of the Advisory Board of St. Michael's Hospital, a member of the Board of St. Francis Xavier University and of the University of Toronto also, a member of the Senate of the Stratford Shakespearean Festival Foundation of Canada; Director of the Canadian Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty; Honourary Vice-President of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs; Member of the Board of Management of the Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada; Director of the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair; Past-President of the Canadian Welfare Council, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, and the Community Chest of Greater Toronto; and Honourary Chairman of the United Community Fund of Metropolitan Toronto.

Wallace McCutcheon was strong and powerful, yet kind and gentle. He was brilliant and capable, yet humble and generous. Those of us who could count themselves his friends were indeed privileged. Through the years I sat with him in this chamber as his deskmate, and since that time, he treated me as a friend. He has gone at an age when he could still add to a very distinguished and useful career. He leaves a memory of a truly good and great Canadian.

To his wife and his five children go our deep condolences, and our assurance that we will not forget him.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I should like to add my voice on behalf of those who sit to the right of His Honour the Speaker to those who have paid a deserving tribute to the late Malcolm Wallace McCutcheon.

I was not a member of this house during the time he was a senator, but I knew him since university days. He was active and brilliant as a student. He gave distinguished service to his university, the University of Toronto, as a member of its Board of Governors, as Senator Sullivan has reminded us. Not only did he serve as an active member of the Board of Governors, but he was responsible fairly recently for the collection of funds for the university. He had collected funds for many worthy projects such as St. Michael's Hospital, the Community Chest, the Cancer Society and many others that will be identified with his name. He gained distinction as a master of finance and business, and one who touched the business life of Canada at many points.

I know that he was a diligent, an enterprising and active member of the Senate. He served his political party, in which he had great faith, with energy and loyalty. He sought the leadership of that party, and during the campaign displayed an independence of mind and judgment that brought him great credit and won him wide applause.

He was a Privy Councillor, having served as Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Government of Mr. Diefenbaker. He had hoped to be able to continue in public life. He resigned from this house in order to run for a seat in the House of Commons. That he did not succeed in that endeavour was not because he did not try, nor because he did not put forward vigorously the ideas that he espoused and in which he had a strong faith.

Senator McCutcheon was a distinguished Canadian, and this country will be the poorer for his passing.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, January 22, 1969, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C. 1952. (English and French texts).

Annual Report to the Governments of the United States and Canada by the Columbia River Treaty Permanent Engineering Board for the period October 1, 1967 to September 30, 1968. (English text).

Copies of Order in Council P.C. 1968-2339, dated December 20, 1968, respecting the application of sanctions to Rhodesia. (English and French texts).

Copies of a Press Release, dated January 22, 1969, issued by the Department of External Affairs, announcing details of changes in passport requirements. (English and French texts).

Copies of a contract between the Government of Canada and the municipality of Canmore, Alberta, for the use or employment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, pursuant to section 20(3) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, chapter 54, Statutes of Canada, 1959. (English text).

Copies of correspondence, dated between January 4 and November 7, 1968, received by the Minister of Justice from certain provincial Attorneys-General with respect to the amendment of the Criminal Code. (English and French texts).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as you know, tomorrow will be devoted to the work of the committees. In order to enable them to discharge their operations we agreed last week that the house would not sit tomorrow. I therefore now move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, January 30, 1969, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

In putting that motion, I made the preliminary explanation that I did because I hope it will not be interpreted that the Senate is not working or not functioning. That was the interpretation given last week outside this chamber. The Senate will be working through its committees tomorrow.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MINISTERS' STATEMENTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I suggest that this is perhaps the time to put a question to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin). In view of the polemic going on between the Postmaster General and the Minister of National Defence, and the comment made by the Prime Minister about it, will the honourable leader tell us whether he supports the thesis or the anti-thesis?

Hon. Paul Martin: The honourable senator knows that I am not going to give him the reply that he wants.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN PUBLICATIONS FROM SENATE READING ROOM—PRIVILEGE

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, there is a matter I should like to bring before the house, perhaps as a question of privilege. It concerns what has been happening to the Reading Room of this Senate. I am aware of the decision reached by the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts to make certain changes which would involve a place of, let us say, rest or recreation, and I am in favour of that decision, but I am not in favour of what has been done to the Reading Room itself.

Since coming to this house I have had occasion to use that Reading Room nearly every day. I have used it even on occasions when this house was not in session. During the past week or two there has been committed upon that Reading Room what I can only characterize as an outrageous piece of vandalism.

Someone acting on somebody's orders went in there and removed a number of invaluable magazines and reviews. I will go over briefly some of the reviews, magazines and newspapers which were removed, by whose authority I do not know.

For example, one of the newspapers removed was the Washington Post, considered the second-best newspaper in the United States or in North America. The Atlantic Monthly has been taken from the racks, as well. The Atlantic Monthly, one of the magazines we have had for many decades, with a cultural distinction which honoured the American people, has been removed. The Economist has been removed, and I venture to say, honourable senators that any man in public life in this country, any man sitting in this house, should have some acquaintance with that publication, perhaps the most authoritative financial journal published in the English-speaking world or any other part of the world.

There is Foreign Affairs. We have been asked by the Leader of the Government, and quite properly so, to give more attention to foreign affairs, and yet from the shelves of our Reading Room there has been removed in the past two weeks Foreign Affairs. Who are its editors? Mr. McGeorge Bundy, one of the advisers of President Truman, and Mr. Kissinger, who has just been drafted by President Nixon to assist him in foreign affairs. Foreign Affairs is perhaps the most authoritative journal in the world or in North America regarding foreign matters and which in fact, gives a great deal of attention to the external policies of Canada. In fact, in its last edition there was a most enlightening article on Canada by a very distinguished Canadian. That is not all. Harper's magazine, one of the oldest and most respected journals in North America has been removed. The Guardian of Manchester, the bible of liberalism all over the world has been taken, and The Nation, founded by the famous E. L. Godkin, one of the great American editors. The New Republic has been removed. Can you imagine intelligent people engaged in public affairs, regardless of the political philosophies they may have, not studying The Nation or the New Republic?

The New Statesman, that brilliant organ of leftwing liberalism, and leftwing Fabianism, if you like, in Britain—it has been removed.

The New York Sunday Times, which somebody said last year, and I think with great truth, is perhaps the greatest university in the United States when it comes to educating the American people on the realities of life—and political life, too—has been removed.

We are all admonished often in this Chamber to think more of the Commonwealth, and rightly—and here is the Round Table, established more than a half century ago by Mr. Lionel Curtis—the bible of all those in the English-speaking world who really believed in the Commonwealth, containing informative articles month after month. It too has been taken down from the shelves of the Senate and has vanished.

The Spectator, one of the most respectable of English intellectual journals, has been taken down and cast away. The Wall Street Journal—not merely a financial newspaper but a great newspaper, with its editorials, I think the best published in the English speaking world—it has been thrown aside.

And what has been left? We have the Chatelaine, for the senators, and Time magazine of course, and Mr. Luce's Life. They are all there.

Six American magazines have been left, and they the least important, and five Canadian magazines, not too important, in my judgment.

I say, sir, that this is a piece of outrageous vandalism, that persons should go to the Reading Room of a house such as this and cast out the papers and the magazines I have mentioned here.

But more than that. Where is the Queen's Journal? Where is the Canadian Historical Review? Where is the Dalhousie Review? These—the few papers that remain in Canada giving intelligent discussion of public affairs—are all taken away and have vanished. And we are left with what—the Reader's Digest and Chatelaine!

This, sir, I say is an outrage against the members of the Senate. I do not know who authorized this, but I do suggest—and I will make a motion on it if it is necessary—that the committee which authorized this outrage should be called back and made to reconsider their decision. This is the least that should be done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): Honourable senators, I mentioned this to certain senators, when I found out about it, and they said, "Well, we have access to the Reading Room of the House of Commons."

Actually, I know the Reading Room of the House of Commons, I have known it for fifty years, and it never at any time compared with the Reading Room of the Senate. The Reading Room of the Senate was a reflection of the intelligence and public interest of this house.

To think that this should happen today, and that the happening should be at the whim, if you like, of a senator or two senators or three senators, is not good enough.

Respectively, I demand that you, sir, take occasion to see just what happened there, and why it happened, and who made it happen. I am in favour of a place of rest and refreshment. But, sir, I am in favour of intellectual sustenance and refreshment, too. For myself I could be much happier with a glass of Black Label in my hand, if I had a good magazine as well.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I shall direct the remarks of the honourable senator at once to the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, who is absent this evening because he is ill.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I am sorry to hear that. I am not attacking him.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will draw the honourable senator's remarks to the chairman's attention at once.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: May I ask the honourable senator if they removed the Ottawa Journal?

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): No, sir. The Ottawa Journal is still there. I made occasion to find that out. That would be a complete disaster.

DELIVERY OF NEWSPAPERS—PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, on a similar question of privilege, I do not think this occasion should pass without referring to what I deem to be another outrage that has been committed upon honourable senators, and that is the discontinuance of the delivery of newspapers in the rooms of senators.

It seems to me that if there is one thing that parliamentarians need, it is to keep up with the news. I do not know the reason for this, whether it is an economy drive or something else. If it is an economy measure, it is certainly misplaced. There is no doubt that every one of us has the financial means to make private arrangements to have newspapers delivered to our rooms, such as the Gazette, the Globe and Mail, the Journal and the Citizen. But it simply means that each of us has to go to this tremendous trouble—at infinitesimal expense, I must say—of ordering our own newspapers for our rooms. Surely things have not come to such a pass with the finances of this country or the financial allowances to this body, that it is necessary to discontinue the delivery of newspapers to the offices of senators.

STATIONERY SUPPLIES—PRIVILEGE

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, while we are on housekeeping matters, may I draw attention to a very minor matter. Having listened to the impassioned plea of Senator O'Leary (Carleton), with which I thoroughly agree, my complaint may seem ridiculous. I would like to know who is responsible for ordering the supplies which senators are given by way of letterheads, envelopes, scotch tape, carbon for typewriters, etc.

On the average, four out of five rolls of scotch tape have had to be thrown away after taking off one or two strips. The quality is so poor that it should not be placed in any office. Something should be done about this. Furthermore, the envelopes supplied to senators are so flimsy and thin that one can see through them and read the contents. Most of the time the gum does not stick and this is the reason for the demand for scotch tape. Much of the time the carbons for typewriters are so bad that they are not usable.

Whoever is responsible for ordering supplies should take a look at these matters.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I am not chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy, but I am a member of it. Since the chairman of the committee is not here, I might say a word or two.

I listened with great interest to Senator Grattan O'Leary on what is happening in the Reading Room. With all due respect, I think I was in that Reading Room as much as he or any other senator. I may say to honourable senators that three-quarters of those newspapers or magazines were never opened from one month to the next. If anyone were to read them all, he would do nothing else throughout the day or the week.

As far as newspapers are concerned, certainly we all want to read them, but I think it is no heavy burden on senators to arrange for their own newspapers. Furthermore, if any senator feels that he cannot go over to the House of Commons Reading Room and read a magazine there, then let him buy one at any retail outlet, or subscribe to them himself.

I see no reason why the Senate should be under the obligation of providing him with his reading matter. As for the honourable Senator Cameron, scotch tape and envelopes are too trivial to be bothered with!

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

THIRD READING

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill S-25, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 23, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Carter, for the second reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, tonight seems to be the night for disillusionment and confusion. I must say that I, too, am confused at the moment. However, I was pleased that this bill, an act to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products, was sponsored by a senator from the Maritimes.

We in the Atlantic provinces have very much in common. We start to work very young. Education for us is a ticket to expatriation. Deception is part of our life. Poverty is our standard of living, the sea and forest our paradise. We sell our best food—salmon, lobsters and oysters—to central Canada. We are satisfied by eating cod fish and sardines. We are understanding and easy to please. We respect our opponents' opinions. We are the jacks-of-all-trades, masters of none. We can "bug" anything—and Senator Carter has shown that ability by "bugging" Bill S-26 on Bill S-22!

The honourable senator did a very fine job of explaining the former Bill S-22, and I might say that Bill S-26 is quite similar. In his remarks he mentioned confusion, and at one point admitted that he himself was also confused. I can understand that very well, because Bill S-26 is complex and needs a great deal of explanation as it now stands. At least, it does to me.

Apparently there is some problem or confusion with respect to the differences of meaning between the words "hazardous substance" and "hazardous products". I cannot see any difference there myself. To me it could be anything from a rotten egg to a contaminated Christmas turkey. Therefore, I say that these things should be clearly defined.

There is also the problem of defining the duties of an inspector, a problem which this bill seems to have inherited from Bill S-22. With that bill there were long definitions, there was lots of talk, and a lot of water went over the dam in an attempt to define the duties of an inspector. The inspector probably should be a scientist in order to understand these hazardous products and be able to define their contents, and so on. This question is still not settled with Bill S-26.

At one point it was mentioned that there was need of a great deal of consultation with and advice from scientific experts before regulations could be established to govern these hazardous products. Here again we have the situation in which we are going to vote for a bill, the regulations of which will not be known until some indefinite time in the future. I certainly do not agree with that idea. When we pass a bill it should have the regulations in it. We should be able to see them when we have the bill before us, because, not knowing what the regulations will be, we do not have the whole picture. The regulations could quite easily change the whole picture, the whole face of the bill. When we have a bill like this in the future, let us have the regulations with it. I make that very strong recommendation.

There is not much that I can add to what I have said, but I say again that I praise the honourable Senator Carter for the fine job he has done in explaining the bill. I say that sincerely.

One point which interests me more than all the others is the question of glue as a hazardous product. We often hear about school children sniffing glue. This bill apparently will do something about that situation—at least, we think it will do something about it. However, I am quite sure that it will not be effective. We have already had LSD and marijuana; we have had alcoholism—and you remember the days of prohibition. We have had all kinds of rules and regulations to control these things, LSD, marijuana and alcohol, and yet where do we stand today? The only thing we have done in this country is to have jacked up the price of these drugs to a level which makes them virtually unobtainable, and the dope addicts who need them will do anything to obtain them, no matter what the cost. So that is all the regulations have accomplished. They have not solved the problem.

I understand that in Canada today there are between 65,000 and 70,000 people, most of them young but some older people as well, building airplane models using model aircraft glue. It is quite a hobby and has become more so recently. You can multiply those figures by ten to get the numbers in the United States. Now why should we punish all these young people just for the benefit of a few who will get the glue anyway, because it will have to be on the market somewhere. So here we are going to punish 65,000 or 70,000 young boys in our clubs in our society by depriving them of this glue or by making it so hard to get or so expensive that it will be almost impossible for them to get it, and all this for the sake of trying to save three of four young people, or a dozen, a hundred or even a thousand if you like, by preventing them from sniffing glue. We should be correcting this situation by education, not by legislation.

Now, here is the famous little tube of glue that the kids use. These can be bought in Canada for 15 cents. This is aircraft glue. This is the one they open and pour into plastic bags which they put over their faces. In order to build a small airplane you may need as many as 25 of these small tubes. That runs to about $3.75. In the United States that small tube is worth 10 cents. There are larger tubes. One sells for 65 cents and one for $1.20. You might need as many as three of the 65-cent tubes to build a model airplane. These are the tubes we want to take off the Canadian market or make virtually unobtainable. And I ask, "Why?" I do not see the need.

Then there is another problem which I will leave with you. Think of this seriously before passing the bill. I hope that the people making the regulations do not make it necessary for us to pay something like $1.50 in order to get a certificate, or necessitate the druggists keeping records of the purchases of tubes of glue. Those are considerations which concern me. And it is not only the question of how children will get the glue, but of what the glue will cost. In Canada the price of a small tube is 15 cents compared to 10 cents in the United States. The price of the next size is 65 cents in Canada compared with 35 cents in the United States, and the price of the largest of the three tubes is $1.20 compared with the American price of 70 cents. They all come from the same factories and they are all made in the United States. Now the customs duty is certainly not 100 per cent or even 50 per cent. The customs on that is not over 30 per cent.

Honourable senators, if the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs wants to do some investigation let me point out a suitable area. While I was obtaining this material last Saturday in the State of Maine—and where I live in New Brunswick it is just across the way—I found that a piece of plywood made in Sherbrooke and sold on the American market cost $1.50 less than what we would pay for it in Canada. This is something for the department to look into. I would suggest that they do that instead of looking around for a tube of glue, and that they leave these kids alone.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I will be very brief in my remarks in regard to this bill. I speak on it now because I spoke on the previous bill, S-22, about a year-and-a-half ago which referred to what was then called hazardous substances. I have no serious objection to this bill, although I was somewhat critical of its predecessor, which was somewhat similar. However, I must say that the original bill was a good example of what a Senate Committee, the then Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, could do in the improvement of a bill which came into this place in a very, very haphazard form. I am sure Senator Carter will admit that the difference in detail between this bill and the former bill is the difference between day and night. It is true that in the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce we had three sessions to deal with the former bill and we heard many witnesses, practically all of them from the Department of National Health and Welfare. In fact I think they were from the Food and Drug Directorate, and they acquitted themselves extremely well. I recall that among others Senator Molson took a most prominent part in suggesting improvements to that former bill.

Having said that, honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks on this bill. Bill S-26 is typical of bills which come into Parliament as a result of pressure from pressure groups, and the group which is responsible for this bill is, of course, the Consumers Association of Canada and the various provincial consumers associations. To me these organizations are headed mainly by women who have difficulty in controlling their husbands or managing their own households, and consequently they get into the business of leading the consumers of Canada into the Promised Land.

These remarks are occasioned by one of the interesting visits we had in various parts of Canada with the Committee on Consumer Affairs which left Ottawa about a year ago and travelled west, stopping at Winnipeg, Regina, Calgary and Vancouver. Senator Croll was not travelling with that section of the committee. We had hearings in all those places. Then later another group left Ottawa and went east as far as Newfoundland. However, I want to tell you about the visit west made by the section of which I was a member.

I had always been interested in the tremendous amount of noise and commotion that has been made by the Consumers Association of Canada. Then I found out that not only was there a Consumers Association of Canada but there was also a consumers association of each province. During the visits of this committee the main witnesses in each case were members of these provincial associations.

We started in Winnipeg and the president of the Consumers Association of Manitoba appeared before us with a very high-sounding brief which promised to cure all the ills of this country from A to Z. But then some of the members of the committee, including myself, began to question this lady as to who constituted the Consumers Association of Manitoba. She told us their membership was, I think, one or two thousand members and the membership fee was $1 or $2. Then I started to question whether this was an association of people who really wanted to do a job to help the consumers of Canada. I do not know what other members of the committee thought, but certainly my view was that these were some busybodies, maybe two or three busybodies, who could not control their husbands, as I said before, and who got together and canvassed every household in Manitoba and finally succeeded in getting a membership of a thousand persons or so in a province which contains nearly one million people.

Hon. Mr. Molson: It would seem that my honourable friend believes in living dangerously.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Then we stopped at Regina and found an identical situation there. The Consumers Association of Saskatchewan was made up of a group of people of whom someone became president, and others occupied themselves as officers. I think I recall that the total membership was less than 2,000 persons for the whole province of Saskatchewan.

This, honourable senators, is the background to one thing I want to say about this legislation. This bill is here simply because the Consumers Association of Canada, and the provincial associations, wanted the Government to do something about a certain problem. Now what is the problem? The problem is, of course, entirely one for the provinces within the Constitution of Canada, and the only way in which this Parliament can legislate with regard to the problem is on the basis of this old fiction of which we are all aware where we bring in the criminal law under which the federal Government is enabled to legislate in these matters. It is quite appropriate, quite proper. Canada has jurisdiction to make this legislation part of the criminal law and, as a result, we have this Act. However, all it does is cost this country a great deal of money.

Dr. Crawford, the Deputy Minister (National Health), testified at one of our committee meetings when we were talking about ice balls that had been imported from China two or three years ago.

Hon. Mr. Carter: From Hong Kong.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. It was discovered that they contained a very harmful substance. The fact of the matter was, of course, that the federal Government was not able to deal with the problem, but, as Dr. Crawford said, the federal department simply got in touch with the provincial departments of health, by telephone and telegram, and the problem became solved. How was it solved? Simply by the provincial departments of health telling the individuals handling these Hong Kong ice balls that they were dangerous to health, and appealing to them to take them off their shelves and destroy them. That was done, and done quite easily. Dr. Crawford did say that it took a little time to put the message across to these provincial departments of health, but here was a situation which was rectified quite properly and easily, simply because people are decent, and because merchants and druggists throughout Canada, the moment they learn they have something on their shelves which is either poisonous or deleterious to the health of the public of Canada, do not need inspectors to go in and arrest them or charge them with offences for which they are liable to a fine of a thousand dollars or six months in jail. That is not necessary in regard to these matters. The remedy was a voluntary act of responsible people.

That is why I say that this bill is simply an invention of the Consumers Association of Canada, which is so powerful with certain bodies in this Government that they get whatever they want—and they got this bill. I hope they are happy with it.

However, let me pose this question: What will the administration of this act cost Canada? I do not know, but I would say perhaps $1 million a year, maybe $3 million in a couple of years' time when they get these inspectors going all over the country, entering drug stores and manufacturing establishments, Eaton's, Simpsons-Sears, everywhere, to dig out these products which are included in the schedule to this bill, and others to be added.

Honourable senators, I have nothing against this bill. You can have all the inspectors in the world, as far as I am concerned, but they will be doing a job which every merchant, every druggist, every manufacturer is happy to do himself. That is, the moment these individuals throughout the country are warned by the Food and Drug Directorate in Ottawa, or by the health departments of the provinces, that they have a product on their shelves which will have a deleterious effect on the health of people or which might contain a poisonous substance or something like that, you can be sure that product will be taken off the shelves and counters of such establishments. Personally, I am 100 per cent sure that the merchants and manufacturers of this country would comply with such a request. So, I just say that this was the objection I took to a similar bill in a previous session, and I take the same practical objection to the present bill.

There is the second objection, that I do not like the federal Government to legislate under the criminal law on every opportunity they have to do so or, where they cannot legislate under the criminal law, under some other provision of the Constitution, except in case of reasonable necessity. Anyway I do not like inspectors to be prying into legitimate business except in case of dire need, and I do not believe the need exists here.

That is about all I have to say on this matter. I will not vote against the bill. Sure, let us pass it. Let us spend the $1 million or $5 million a year that will be required to cover the cost of the administration of the act. Let us get 100 or 1,000 additional inspectors to snoop into every grocery and drug store. Sure, let us do all those things, but I suggest that the time has come when we should look at these pressure groups, such as the Consumers Association of Canada, and stop them from leading us into spending millions of dollars which really need not be squandered in this manner.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to make a speech on this bill, but I have been extensively engaged in the pharmaceutical business for many years and, I must say, I was interested in the discussion.

Any antagonistic views I had towards the bill were calmed when I read clause 15 which says specifically that drugs, cosmetics and explosives are not included in the provisions of the bill. When I read that I realized there are some things that are harmful in the kitchen to women's hands, and that there are substances which have specific properties that will cause trouble if one does not know how to use them.

I think there is some merit in the bill. However, I do not think the situation is as bad as we have been led to believe, but this is an attempt to protect people. I do not know what the administration cost will be. The bill will go to committee, where we can discuss it, and I am sure that the committee will be wise enough to give it the sort of consideration which will be of benefit to the public.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Could I ask the honourable senator a question? After having made these remarks, are you aware of the fact—and this is a statement I made a year and a half ago which went unchallenged—that no country except Canada has found it necessary to legislate in regard to—

Hon. Mr. Croll: Establishing a department of consumer affairs. It could be they are a little backward, could it not?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It could be, but that is not my question. I just made the statement.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Canada might be in the forefront. I attended the hearings of the committee on narcotics at the United Nations, and I was sitting beside Canada's representative. After he had spoken, the Russian representative sent him a note in which he said, "You have made the best presentation of anyone here. You are a credit to the profession." I believe that our representative was a pharmacist.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You have not answered the question that was asked.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Might I suggest, for the assistance of the honourable Senator Thorvaldson, that he might get some comfort from the fact that probably the majority of the people in the world live in countries where they are not subject to any narcotic control? As a matter of fact, the majority of the people in the world can neither read nor write.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: What about the United States?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The majority of the people in the world go to bed hungry every night. So, I doubt very much whether an argument that we are ahead or behind someone else has anything to do with it.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: What about the United States?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: If my honourable friend is suggesting that this is entirely the product of a consumers' lobby, then I would say that he is missing some very important facts. There is one person sitting right behind him who can assure him that the editors of newspapers right across this country have had a field-day writing editorials every time somebody was burned because she was wearing a dress made of nylon or some other material that she did not know was flammable, or because somebody gave a child a toy at Christmas time that turned out to be suddenly flammable, or when people who took LSD jumped off bridges—although LSD is not included in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It certainly is not.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: The same applies when kids have sniffed glue because they did not know the danger of what they were doing.

This bill is the result of a public outcry and not just that of a single group. It is the result of a public outcry that people ought to be protected from such things.

Honourable senators, if you have listened to the speeches that have been made you have all the figures. You will know that in this country, for example, in 1964 there were 720 reported cases of poisoning attributable to a common household bleaching preparation, and an additional 217 reported cases attributable to a common household drain and pipe cleaner. One is ordinary bleach that is used in laundries, and one is lye. I presume these are cases of where children have drunk the liquids that were left nearby by ignorant parents.

Honourable senators will find, upon reading the bill, that clause 3, which designates the offences, divides them into two types. Subclause 1 provides:

> No person shall advertise, sell or import into Canada a hazardous product included in Part I of the Schedule.

I doubt if anyone would defend the right of a person to bring into the country some of the things set out in Part I of the Schedule, and here I am referring to jequirity beans or any substance or article made from or including jequirity beans in whole or in part.

These beans have poisoned children when they have come into the country in toys. Such toys have been withdrawn, because if anyone who is aware that they are dangerous sells them, he leaves himself open to a charge of criminal negligence, I would think, under the Code. Also, if a person sells something, knowing that it is dangerous, to somebody who is not aware of the danger, he then leaves himself wide open to a civil action. I think that this would be a classical case of where liability would be established.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is exactly my point. Why do you then need this army of inspectors?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Because there are some things in the world that are more important than giving the dog one more bite, and they become more important when the life of one Canadian child is endangered. It is as simple as that. That is what we are talking about. When it comes to the life and health of one Canadian child, then we are doing something far more important than discussing the old principle of a dog being entitled to one bite. Incidentally, that refers only to bad-tempered young dogs which have not yet grown their teeth, or to bad-tempered old dogs which have lost their teeth.

Part I of the Schedule sets out other articles that contain lead paints and poisons. In other words, Part I of the Schedule deals with things that everybody knows by now have resulted in most unhappy experiences, and they are included here because at the present time there is no provision for controlling or checking them. These things do slip in, and I can hardly remember a Christmas period going by when I did not hear stories about dangerous toys, in respect of which the danger was not discovered before somebody had been hurt and suffered damage. Surely, there can be no objection to the inclusion of these articles.

Part II of the Schedule includes bleaches, cleansers, household polishers, and glues—such things concern my friend because he can buy them cheaper in the United States, but that is another matter.

The second offence in clause 3 is in the advertising, selling, or importation of the products included in Part II of the Schedule except as authorized by the regulations. The circumstances under which they are to be handled will be set out in the regulations made pursuant to clause 7. The regulations will set out the circumstances under which my good friend can buy the glue necessary to build his model railroads, which is what I think he is primarily interested in.

Honourable senators, it is all very well to say in this house or elsewhere that once people have been warned they should take action. As to glue sniffing. I remember after there had been a fatality or two right here in the Ottawa area, that both the newspapers sent out reporters to investigate. We all recall the story. We read of how reporters went into stores, and were able to buy the glue without any trouble, and that the young fellows they sent in to buy it were also able to obtain it. In fact, when one reporter purchased half a dozen tubes of glue, the sales clerk put them in a bag, saying, "Have a good trip." This was all reported by newspaper reporters, and not by the Consumers' Association which has taken such a roasting here.

I have no doubt that we are going to be able to get all the household bleaches, and pipe and drain cleaners that we need. I have no doubt that the bona fide model builder is going to be able to get his glue. But, I hope that the regulations will provide some protection, and will ensure that these articles are not put holus bolus into the hands of ignorant or innocent people.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: There is nothing at all concerning that in this bill.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: If my honourable friend would read the bill, and keep an open mind on it, and ask himself what it is supposed to do, he will discover that it is in the bill. I cannot think of anything else that is meant by clause 7. I cannot think of anything that could possibly be intended other than that the Governor in Council may make regulations authorizing the advertising, sale or importation into Canada of any hazardous product included in Part II of the Schedule, and prescribing the circumstances and conditions under which, and the persons by whom, such hazardous product may be sold, advertised or imported into Canada, and respecting the powers and duties of inspectors and analysts, and so on. I do not want to bore the house by reading all the details, because honourable senators can read for themselves. I do say that the bill sets out a procedure that will give us some protection.

If honourable senators read the section that provides for inspectors they will see that the words are not "may appoint as a hazardous products inspector", but "may designate as a hazardous products inspector". I take the use of the word "designate" instead of the word "appoint" to mean that the minister will merely designate members of provincial boards of health, members of city boards of health, R.C.M.P. officers, food and drug inspectors, or people who are already on some payroll, to carry out these duties in addition to the duties they now perform. This would be the natural and normal way of doing it. If my honourable friend were correct, and we were going to set up a whole body of inspectors to do nothing else but shop around looking for these products, then we would need a great many to cover the whole of Canada, and they would have nothing to do for 364 out of the 365 days of the year.

I suggest that this bill provides a reasonable way of giving some protection. Surely when we are doing something that may do that, if we save one life, nobody can say we have been wasting our time or that we have done something we have no right to do.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

Resolutions adopted, on division.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, January 22, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, first let me say that the Third Report of this special committee was an excellent contribution. It was long overdue and was most welcome. It is an administrative reform which will bring about greater efficiency in the Senate, and is both meaningful and functional. Yet I think the Senate should be reminded that under the committees as formerly constituted the work of the Senate was never neglected. Changing the rules does not change the Senate. It is not Senate reform as the public understands it.

It is true that in the past some of our committees had bills sent to them which scarcely belonged to those committees, but we wanted them to be dealt with expeditiously, carefully and in a measured way, and they were well handled. This Senate from its very inception, for as long as I can remember, took great pride in its committees, and there was even participation in them by persons who were not members of the committees. In the course of the years the Senate has changed. We want more change in the Senate, and we can survive only if we change.

Coming to the Fourth Report, which has the observations and the recommendations, I find the report is scratchy. It rubs me the wrong way and makes me quite uncomfortable.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Is the report you are referring to now not obiter dicta?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is absolutely outside the powers that were given to them to investigate.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The honourable senator took the words out of my mouth, but I thought I would not use that legal term because it might not be understood by everybody. Nevertheless, the report is now before us and I am using it. Despite the fact that it is obiter dicta, I am using it as a vehicle for saying what I want to say.

The first subject the special committee dealt with was the question of more power. They spoke of money bills and asked for wider powers. We have discussed the question of money bills here for a long time. No matter how a bill is defined, if it involves money that is it, and in my opinion the government of the day would not and could not grant to a non-elected body any such powers as were suggested, and if I were sitting over there I certainly would not vote in favour of it. The times and trends are against us; the winds of change are not favourable. In this day of participatory democracy, in the day of revolt of the young, we are reaching for the wrong kind of power. At the present time we have a constitutional responsibility, which may be enlarged administratively and functionally, as I will indicate. Certainly the suggestion made in the report is on the wrong wavelength.

What the public usually forgets, and what a number of those in this chamber sometimes forget, is that we do not appoint senators. The Prime Minister does that; it is his responsibility. When we are appointed we carry out the duties, but he can appoint anybody he pleases for whatever reason, and he sometimes does that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is only by custom that it is an appointment of the Prime Minister. There is nothing in the Constitution about that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Customs become pretty well entrenched.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Not in law under the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We have young men appointed to the Senate. When we talk—and I object to it and hear it much too often—as is done in the report of the ablest talent which can be attracted to the Senate, in my opinion that is a delusion, it is a myth, too often expressed without meaning.

I have lived and been around for some time and have had some experience; I have been in politics for a lifetime. I can take a cross-section of 102 people, whether they are in the House of Commons, in business, in finance, in education, in arts, or in labour, and collectively they are not more able than the people who are sitting in this house, because within this house now are the very kind of people you sometimes hear outsiders say should be here. There are in this house successful businessmen, former members of the House of Commons, financial people, educational people, and so on. As far as I am concerned, that sort of talk is just nonsense; I am not prepared to sell the Senate short.

Hon. Mr. Molson: What sort of talk does my honourable friend refer to in his last sentence?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The kind of talk that you had in your committee, and to which you gave some comfort. That is what I am objecting to.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is exactly what you are saying now, that this house has had the best talents in Canada, especially the well-known and much used Banking and Commerce Committee. If I understand my friend correctly, he is saying exactly what the chairman of this committee has reported.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You don't understand me correctly; that is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. Choqueett: But I do.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Let me explain myself. When the committee report talks about attracting the ablest talents, the assumption is that the ablest talent is not here. What I am saying is that when you take honourable senators as a collective body, they are as good as any you will find elsewhere in the country under any circumstances, no matter where you look.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I suggest there is always room for improvement.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Of course, but it hardly applies to you.

When speaking of able talent, I must say that I hope it is taken in good grace. Some of the senators in this place are what we call "dogging" it. They are not carrying their weight. I shall have a little more to say about this later on. I think it is every senator's duty to make a contribution by discussing this report at the present time. They should be here.

This Senate is a political body dealing with political problems. Business of Government is politics in its purest sense. If it is not a political body then what is it? It was intended to be a political body when it was created—it was created to be a political body. Its functions are those of a political body. We are here as politicians, not as philosophers and not as presidents of universities—who are in a much worse position these days than even we are. I must say that if we do not carry out our constitutional functions, up-dated as they may be, then what reason is there for our existence? I am sure that I can find ample reason for that—and let me remind you these things happen. Take one quick look at the Legislative Council of Quebec, when it lost its political purpose, unused, unremembered, unregretted and gone, and I remind you, not a tear was shed, no rights were lost, not even an au revoir; they just said, "Good riddance."

An hon. Senator: They got a good pension.

Hon Mr. Croll: In so far as I am concerned, I am not a political neuter, nor am I a political eunuch. I am an unrepentant Liberal. I do not think a lifetime of political experience has to be left on the outside door when we enter the Senate. Our best and only opportunity for service is in conjunction and co-operation with members of the House of Commons, and not as suggested in the report. We should be as close to them as butter is to bread, or perhaps you would like to put it, as icing on the cake.

Speaking of caucuses, I attend caucuses, as do many other members here. Last Wednesday, a typical day, I attended the Ontario caucus from 10 until 11 o'clock; I attended the national caucus from 11 until one o'clock, and from time to time I attend caucus committees dealing with various subjects in which I am interested. At these caucus meetings we discussed the omnibus bill, conservation, immigration, estate tax, agriculture and the Commonwealth Conference. There was a great deal of valuable information there and a great deal of knowledge. There were personal contacts, and I took an opportunity, as others did, to make some contribution.

I cannot tell you what took place there because these are caucus secrets, but I can let you in on two of them if you promise not to tell.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: You do not make public your discussions on the main issues of external affairs?

Hon. Mr. Croll: From time to time we do discuss those issues just as you do in the Tory party.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You cannot tell us what happened about the estate tax?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, we discussed the estate tax. One of our men, who discussed it with the minister, came into the caucus and gave a long, involved discussion on it, and somebody stood up and said, "Look, I do not understand what you are saying. Can you not make it any more simple?" He replied, "Yes—don't die." And that was it. We also had a discussion on agriculture, and the suggestion was made that the conservatives in the agricultural committee were holding up the proceedings because it had taken them 40 minutes to decide what was a farmer. In my ignorance, I finally said to the man, "Can you give me the definition of a farmer?" And he said, "Yes, he is a man outstanding in his field." That was the end of that. Those are all the caucus secrets I am entitled to give you at the moment.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh,

Hon. Mr. Croll: The greatest strength that we have in the Senate and have had for a long time is our committees. Our committees gave us a character, a solidarity and we were blessed with chairmen of unusual ability, such as Senator Hayden. He speaks for himself and you have heard him before. As chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee he has given it a tone that is known across the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We had a man named Senator Hugessen—we called him "Hugie". He was born a gentleman, but he improved on that—he looked after the Transport and Communications Committee. Whenever we were in any difficulty at all we tossed our problem to one or other of the committees and it was always attended to. Senator Leonard who is the salt of the earth, took responsibility when no one else would and did the donkey work. When Senator Thorvaldson was chairman of a committee he was not quite as biased or as much of a Tory as he usually is, and he discharged his responsibility exceedingly well.

Senator Roebuck did a grand job on the committee which he handled for many years—and I will have something to say about that committee later.

We were all so very fortunate. Senator Ross Macdonald and Senator John Connolly gave us an unusual kind of leadership, the kind that traded loyalty for loyalty, with the result that we were able to accomplish a great deal. I say this, Mr. Leader, I am sure that you have the qualifications, and I am sure that you will, in time, be able to fit in; but it is a different kind of leadership from that of the House of Commons. In the House of Commons a man is appointed Prime Minister and at the same time he is almost anointed; in this house you are only appointed. We have to do the anointing—it takes a little time, and you have to earn it.

Honourable senators, let me continue and let me speak of the men of another day, when we are discussing the Senate. We have Senator Gouin and Senator Aseltine and Senator Isnor, Senator Kinley and Senator Burchill—these are men of another day, who gave this Senate tone and character, confidence and guidance—and yet even in this day they adorn the chamber and they make their contribution. That ought to be a lesson to the younger people, that they should participate more than they do in matters affecting the chamber.

Honourable senators, I spoke about the strength of this chamber, which is the committee aspect. We hear witnesses, we question them, we do not wait for the minister to obtain his answer from someone who sits in front of him. We questioned the people who had the information and who carried the responsibility. We made amendments to bills as we saw fit. Some amendments stood up and some did not—and we stood up to the Government when we thought it was necessary. We did so on the Coyne affair, and we did so on the "class or kind" matter.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Did you ever stand up to the Liberal Government?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Yes, we did.

Hon. Mr. Walker: When?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I will take a minute or two to tell you.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It was in caucus!

Hon. Mr. Croll: No, no. It was in the house. We had a bill dealing with the railroad strike, and in the course of that discussion I spoke against it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What about the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I do not think there was any occasion in the Senate—

Hon. Mr. Walker: Not while you were in it.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I have told you quite frankly, I am a Liberal and still am.

An Hon. Senator: Converted?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Sometimes we made our views stick. I never looked upon this Senate as being a carbon smudge of the House of Commons. In this Senate we have face and character, we have a life of our own and we have a responsibility of our own; we have pride and accomplishment and a desire to serve; and we think we are something in our own right.

In this particular recommendation, we make a leap into yesterday, when the House of Commons is making a leap into tomorrow. The House of Commons is moving into the procedure of the committee stage, where we have operated so successfully for such a long long time. They consider this to be a long step forward, yet they had much argument and sweat and toil before they were able to reach that decision—while we are asked to consider a backward step.

The committees of the Senate have an unusual reputation. People did not come before the committees unprepared. There was no pulling the wool over our eyes. If you tried it before any of these committees, you were usually left bleeding a little. You had to know your stuff and you came prepared, or else. The great strength displayed by the committees was the collective knowledge and responsibility. When a man appeared before a committee of the Senate and had a good day, he went home and told his friends about it, and he boasted to his children that he was among men for a day and survived.

This Senate has always been a workshop, not a theatre—those are not my original words; everyone knows where that statement comes from.

The Committee of the Whole in this day is an outworn concept. It has been so in the House of Commons and I think the Senate should agree.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The reason why the House of Commons has reached its conclusion is that it was taking too much time. On the contrary here, we are always criticized for not taking more time.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Actually, it was not a question of taking too much time. They had time, and as a matter of fact it is taking them more time now. It was a more expeditious means. It was a matter in which a member could get involved; he was king, he was there and he voted there, and if he wanted to let the Government down, that was his responsibility. It was he who sat in judgment. That is a different thing entirely. This is the most progressive thing that has happened in Parliament in a quarter of a century. The Committee of the Whole is an outworn concept. We do not have to play to the gallery or attract attention. Our work can speak for us. We can live without this sort of publicity.

Honourable senators, in talking about publicity, I am still sizzling over that television exposure we had. What a colossal and miserable failure it was! One more like it, and we are done in! Here was a hurried undertaking. The television crew had to leave for Cuba. They had to get this work done. If I had anything to do with it, that crew would never have been brought back into the country. The photography was bad, the direction was worse.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And the acting?

Hon. Mr. Croll: The commentary on it, as I am sure will be agreed, was amateurish.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): And some of the actors?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Senator O'Leary was good—but they had to finish it by saying that Senator O'Leary was 82 years of age. I thought he was 28, to be honest about it, but they had to get the cut in somewhere.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The newspapermen got the front page.

Hon. Mr. Croll: What is most important is that we are living in a world of bilingualism and biculturalism. We have spent millions of dollars on the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, in a desire to keep the country united—and yet it seems this linguistic duality has not reached the Senate. Listen to this—the Senate, being presented on television, and not one word of French. This is the kind of presentation some people are looking for to belittle the Senate. I am not much sold on these things, as you can gather from what I have already said.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: In all fairness, Senator Croll, there had been some French. Senator Desruisseaux spoke in French, and some of the French had been given on that program. The Leader of this party had been shown here as the Leader, French-speaking, and he was not even seen on the program. That was a première to Senator Davey and others who hand-picked the people who were going to be shown and seen on that program. It is as plain as that.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Your apologies are very nice in this chamber, but thousands of people saw the program and did not get your explanation. I did not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Well, I am giving it to you now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not interested in that. I saw what I saw.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: You ought to be interested in it. The fact of the matter is that there was ample French on that program, but it was cut. It was not cut here. We saw to it that there was plenty of French in that program, but it was cut by the television people or by Senator Davey.

Hon. Mr. Croll: That is so much nonsense. You know that when it came up here, I was not in favour of it to begin with. I did not raise any objection, but I said then that you would have no control over it. You remember that—and you did not have any control over it. But you were so anxious to get publicity any way at all that it was a miserable catastrophe.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Don't refer to me as "you".

Hon. Mr. Croll: You take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Don't say "you" to me, my friend. All I am saying is that there was ample French and that it was cut by the television people.

Hon. Mr. Croll: And all I am saying is that when it was shown to the public it had no French in it, and that is a true statement.

Now, I was saying that the Senate changes from time to time. I think it all began about ten years ago when we started into our investigatory functions. I am going to take a few minutes to go through some of them.

One of the first undertakings that we took by way of special committee was Manpower and Employment in 1960. That was a most thorough study, the first of its kind. We had as our director Dr. John J. Deutsch. Subsequently he became head of the Economic Council and then President of Queen's University. At that time we heard the ablest people in the whole of Canada. This inquiry continued for weeks and months. It was really hard work. We sat from November 1960 until June 1961. Subsequently, there was formed the Department of Manpower. My authority for saying that the basis of that department was this report is that both Jean Marchand, the Minister of the department, and the Leader of the Senate, Senator Martin, have said so. Senator Martin said so here just a few days ago.

The Senate Committee on Land Use in Canada started in 1957 and lasted through about four Parliaments, its report coming in 1963. It, too, made a very thorough study, coming out with a complete report. The Minister of Agriculture in the Conservative Government, Mr. Alvin Hamilton, and Mr. Maurice Sauve, the Minister in the following Government, are my authorities for saying that that was the basis upon which ARDA was finally established.

We then began in 1963 a report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging. That sat through three Parliaments and gave birth to a new concept. There had not been any new social aspects for some years. Mr. Beveridge was the last man to come forth with a new idea in social security. This committee reported then on the guaranteed income, which was accepted by the Senate and by the House.

It is very interesting to note that 735,965 people draw a guaranteed income in this country—some in part, some in whole.

This report on aging, which is easy to read, has become the economic bill of rights of the aged. Yet, what troubles me is, and I keep asking myself this, why some senator has not taken the time to take a look at the 94 recommendations, and make a survey to find out how many have been accepted by how many Governments, and how many have been rejected, or what finally happened to them.

Why should I have to do this? I have had this inquiry on the Order Paper now for almost two months and no one, except the people involved, to whom I spoke, has come forward to say, "Can we get in on this?", or "What is this all about?"

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Are you not bringing it in now under the rules? I was about to ask my friend if he is going to mix his inquiry under Routine Proceedings, and the debate on the rules. Which one is he dealing with now?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am dealing with the Senate as I see it, and if I want to go back to that I will go back to it when the time comes.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Let us hear it twice, then.

Hon. Mr. Croll: You will hear it twice. Let me tell you one thing that you should remember: In politics you repeat and repeat and repeat. That is the only way you will get your message across. And we are not doing enough of that here.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Like the cheap ads on television.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We are not doing enough repeating here.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You want to repeat like the cheap ads on television, but not here.

Hon. Mr. Croll: All I am doing now is asking the question why no one has come forward. We have made examinations from time to time in our committees. For instance, we came out with what we call the Glassco Report. Now, Glassco made a good report some years ago recommending various changes. It was a very useful report. Year after year, as I remember it, in the House of Commons the question arose as to how many of those recommendations had been implemented.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Most of them have been implemented now.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As the Leader of the Government says, most of them have been implemented now. They may have implemented ten one year, twelve the next and fifteen the next, but all have been followed up. However, there has been no follow-up in the Senate on any of these recommendations.

Hon. Mr. Molson: If my honourable friend will permit me to say so, the Committee on Finance has asked those very questions in each of the last years since that report was issued? How many of these have been implemented? How many are being implemented? How many are left to be implemented?

Hon. Mr. Croll: What are you referring to?

Hon. Mr. Molson: The Glassco Report.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Of course. That is what I have been saying. They have been following-up on the Glassco recommendations. But what I am also saying is that on these Senate reports that we have been making here from time to time, where everybody else finds that they are good, nevertheless, not a word is said at all about them in the Senate. No one has examined them constructively or criticised them or done anything about them. They are just put on the shelf and forgotten. Yet other people see a great deal of virtue in them.

My friend Senator Thorvaldson did not see much virtue in the report on Consumer Credit. I hate to do this to you, but I must remind you that when we made the actual report on it you were one of the people who agreed to it.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I say that I was only referring to one very small phase of the report.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not going to argue with you about it.

Anyway, we got to the Report on Consumer Credit. That arose in the Senate as a result, as you recall, of the matter of truth-in-lending and a committee which Joe Green and I established, he representing the House of Commons. We continued with that study until we had a report just about ready. That committee involved every province in Canada. There was a question of jurisdiction, but they came and sat with us and we did not bother about jurisdiction; we dealt with principles and allowed them to handle it in their own way. As a result, a Consumer Affairs Department was established in practically every province. Moreover, there came the day when the question of prices arose—Martin was there, Carter was there, and some others, including "Hammy" McDonald—and the suggestion came forward from the Senate that we might enlarge the scope of the committee and deal with food prices. This suggestion was accepted. The committee was enlarged, but we did not start out on the odyssey my friend Thorvaldson speaks about.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Senator, please.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We studied it for a long time, and from that came the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the first of its kind, as he points out. It is strange the effect that that department had; it changed almost completely the buying habits of many thousands of consumers. You can see today what is happening in these various stores, in Loblaws and Steinberg's and others, where they are now trying to lure the consumer in. It is interesting to note that the Globe and Mail of November 8, in dealing with the cost of living, points out that food prices, accounting for 27 per cent of the total, were down more than half an index point. Everything else went up. There has been a downward trend in food prices reflected right along, and this is clear to anyone who wants to examine the situation. But here was a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to indicate concern for the consumer that has never been indicated before. This resulted from the work of this chamber. They joined us; we did not join them.

Of course these consumer groups must receive attention; they had a real cause and unless we did something about it, we would wind up in about the same way as the universities are today with their students. If you do not listen to their complaints, you do not leave them any alternative and then they go much too far. I think we have done a great thing in bringing about the establishment of this Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Honourable senators, let us look at some of the other work that has been done. Let us take the Report on Divorce. It is interesting to note that in February 1966 a bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator Roebuck; in March the necessary resolution was passed, moved by the then leader John Connolly, and on March 29 the members were appointed. Then the House of Commons decided on a resolution put by the Honourable George McIlraith that they would join with us in forming a committee, and the joint committee was established on June 28, 1966. From that committee came this report, and our contribution to that was second to none.

Getting back to the Senate again, I suppose I am a lifer in the Senate. I may or may not receive time off for good behaviour, but I did not come into the Senate to earn a pension; I had one in the House of Commons for which I paid. I have not been able to draw a nickel out of it for 15 years. For me it is "Goodbye, Mr. Chips," but I am prepared to live with it. I am not prepared to go hat in hand at this stage, for if we do that we lose both our hats and our heads also.

A few days ago a senator was heard to ask, What is this Senate reform talk all about? Who is giving consideration to it? How is it that I have not been consulted, or no one has discussed it with me? Where can I get information about what is projected? Of course, honourable senators, the short answer to all that is that we need a Senate ombudsman, but that may not be available just at this particular moment. Here we are so barren of communications with the powers of government. Civil servants, provincial governments and others are being consulted, and yet there has not been a formal or informal discussion with us, to my knowledge. But I think I can help the Senate. There has been no Senate Liberal caucus on this problem to date, so I am not talking out of caucus; I am free to speak. I think I know the tenor and substance of the discussion, and I break no security and give away no caucus secrets. All I can give is corridor gossip, but selective corridors, if you don't mind, newspaper reports that were obviously leaked and some added knowledge from people and friends I have known in the House of Commons on all sides of the house for many years.

I think what is being considered are these matters: First, should there be a time limit? Should a time limit be fixed for service in the Senate—say, about 20 years? Then, what should the term of new appointments be, three years, six years or 10 years? Should an appointee be eligible for reappointment? Should there be provincial appointments, and how many? Should provincial appointments be made by the premier of the province or from a panel presented by the premier of the province to the Prime Minister who makes the appointment? What new special powers could the Senate be given to deal with the official languages bill, human rights, and treaty obligations? Should the Senate be given powers to approve new appointments such as Supreme Court judges, ambassadors, heads of agencies, cultural and otherwise—a sort of advise and consent as modified under the American system. Should the veto be removed and a delaying power only given to the Senate, and how should that be limited, and should we preserve a built-in majority in the Senate for the government of the day? I, of course, feel that the Government owed us a White Paper on this. We have muted our voices long enough, and I think it is time we began to talk so that we can be heard.

I said earlier that some of the senators in this chamber were "dogging" it, that they were not making the contribution they could be making, that they were not carrying their share of the burden. We have some difficult problems before us in the immediate future. I am prepared to help preserve a meaningful Senate, one serving Canada, but I think it is only fair that we should ask the others to join in, with a missionary zeal, to concern themselves with the work of the Senate and to help us hurdle the generation gap and to enter into the spirit of the times.

Speaking yesterday, the Prime Minister was quoted as saying in the controversy my learned friend the Leader raised, "If you do not agree, provoke a debate." That is what I am doing to the best of my ability.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure that you are going to succeed too.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Am I? I hope so. That is exactly what I have been trying to do. I tried to provoke a debate on the Ombudsman. My friend tried to provoke a debate on voting for 18-year-olds. I know I have been skated into a corner on the Ombudsman for the time being. That is my best position. Those of you who were in the chamber at an earlier date will testify that on another occasion I was skated into a corner and that in the end I came out very well indeed. So, there is no purpose in putting these things aside. We might as well discuss them and come to some conclusion. If the Government lacks confidence in us or in our ability to handle some problems, I think it is time they said so.

Let me just give you this thought. If you do not carry out your share of responsibility and burden, some senator some day soon will take pen in hand and do a Judy LaMarsh on some of you, and you will not like it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Some of us?

Hon. Mr. Croll: I am not a captive of the past in misapplying these lessons. I think that up to date we have lost the first round, but it is not too late. From all indications, at the moment it would seem the Senate is up for grabs. We know that we can no longer afford to put our worst foot forward. We should be able to convince the Government that our role can be made vital in a participatory democracy; and we have been discharging an active function which they have overlooked, if they have ever taken the time to make an examination. I do not think they should obtain their information about the Senate in the same way as I got mine as to what was being discussed about the Senate, from gossip and newspaper reports.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We can do for the Government all the investigatory work that needs to be done. There is no need for royal commissions, except in the most exceptional cases—and the B. and B. Commission would be one of those exceptional cases. We can do the work and we can save this country millions of dollars. Further, we have the advantage of being a continuing body, one not affected by parliamentary mortality. We can follow up the recommendations for action.

We had a compliment paid to us, the like of which I have not heard in a very long time. The Economic Council, the chosen brains of this country—and I do not demean them at all, because I think they are that—recommended us as the body that should make a study of the most vital problem that affects this country, poverty. And we took up the challenge. However, the thing that bothers me is that we are constantly ignored and passed over. Both Senator MacKenzie and Senator Flynn had an idea. Why do senators not go to the United Nations and spend a couple of weeks there, to see how it is operated, to become better acquainted with government and to improve their knowledge and education? We should draw up a roster and allocate these visits to senators, substituting where necessary. The world travels to the United Nations to see how they operate. We are a stone's throw away and have not the time. We do not take the opportunity. There is much to learn at the United Nations. We often accuse people in politics of speaking out of both sides of their mouth. If you go down to the United Nations you will find that they speak out of three sides of their mouth. After he has voted, they permit a delegate to explain why he voted the way he did, when he should not have. That opportunity is not often available in this house.

Let me bring another matter to your attention. Recently we sent a trade mission to South America consisting of cabinet ministers, 32 senior officials and many civil servants, but not a member of the Senate. The cost was negligible; they were flying in Government planes and being entertained at the other end. Yet we have a committee of this house concerned with trade. Every year groups visit the United States. As far as I know, they have a very good time down there; they must know something about trade. Yet not one of us was asked to go along to see if he could help in any way.

Recently a governmental party visited India, parliament to parliament. Civil servants went along, but no one from the Senate was invited. Thirty-two people went to the Commonwealth Conference from Canada, but not a member of the Senate was invited. Yet the staunchest supporters of the Commonwealth sit here in the Senate, and the Commonwealth needs friends.

On three occasions I have attended functions at the home of one of the senators in Toronto when he was host to Commonwealth delegates. Not too many of the senators or members of the other place who were invited attended, but the host constantly devoted himself to this task.

There are many parliamentary delegations, and it is becoming a little repetitious to see the same people go along as delegates from time to time. If a man is an officer of one of these parliamentary groups then, of course, he must go. If he is likely to be an officer, then he should go. But the opportunity ought to be passed around. There is no difficulty in taking a new man and giving him a course lasting a week or two in order that he may grasp the fine points. When he goes he acquires a certain amount of knowledge. I think if he is able to get into the Senate, then he is able to go as a member of these parliamentary delegations.

Honourable senators, I am not asking for the opportunity. The former Senator Ross Macdonald offered me any number of opportunities of going with these delegations, as did Senator John Connolly. I did go to the United Nations as a delegate during the Suez crisis, and two or three years ago I went with Senator Macnaughton to Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Since I have been in the Senate my luck has been such that I cannot go on these journeys because I have always been pregnant with committee. I suggest, first of all, that we create a committee, and then I stand around while we nourish it on its way. Then it is born and carries on its work which it completes with a report, and I present the report to the house. I give it its baptism. Then the whole process repeats itself and, believe me, this has been a very confining business. Now I am at it again. In a few days we in the Poverty Committee will be tying ourselves up for a year or so on a matter of vital importance.

When we discuss these matters in the Senate we must not be timid and we must not go on our knees. We are either doing our task or we are not. The ability of a nation to meet the challenges of these troubled days depends upon the leadership of those who place their talents and energies at the service of their country. When we in the Senate are entrusted with high responsibility and authority we should expect compensation comparable to that which we would receive in private life. We, with the members of the House of Commons, are grossly underpaid. The increase that we received in 1963 has long been exhausted and wiped out. I am not speaking from self pity. It is time that the Canadian people faced all the facts.

I object to the report because it speaks on matters of importance in muted tones. It is almost a whispering-willie when, at this time, we need to talk in a loud voice so that we can be heard. We need to discuss our problems among ourselves, and we should not lose any time in doing so. It is time that others said what they have in mind. As I said to my honourable friend, we have to say it, and repeat it over and over again, for repetition is the conveyor belt of politics. If we cannot arrange a meaningful dialogue with the Government of the day, then it is curtains. We shall have no one to blame but ourselves.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McGrand, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, January 30, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

DISSOLUTION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGES

TERMINATION OF DUTIES OF HON. MR. JUSTICE ALLISON A. M. WALSH AS OFFICER OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to inform the Senate that I have received the following communication from the Hon. Mr. Justice Allison A. M. Walsh:

The Honourable
Jean-Paul Deschatelets, P.C.,
The Speaker of the Senate,
The Senate,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Speaker:

On the 19th of November, 1963, I was designated by the then Speaker of the Senate, pursuant to section 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, to be an Officer of the Senate, to hear evidence on petitions for dissolution or annulment of marriages and to report thereon.

Subsequently, following an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act, assented to on June 18, 1964, section 6A was added reading as follows:

"A judge of the Court designated by the Speaker of the Senate for the purpose of this section after consultation with the President of the Court, if he is granted leave of absence for such purpose by the Governor in Council from his duties as a judge of the Court, has and may exercise and perform all of the powers, duties and functions of the officer of the Senate referred to in section 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act."

I was duly appointed to the Exchequer Court and granted leave of absence under the provisions of this section and have ever since continued to act as Commissioner of the Senate, the name given by the Rules to the officer designated for this purpose.

This work has now been substantially concluded since no new petitions can be filed to proceed by way of Resolution of the Senate since July 2, 1968, the date of proclamation of the Divorce Act assented to February 1, 1968. The petitions which remain to be heard can be dealt with by Judge Cameron, the other Commissioner and there is insufficient work remaining to justify my continuing to act as Commissioner.

I attended a meeting of the Senate Standing Committee on Divorce on January 22 at which meeting I explained the situation to them and a resolution was passed approving my proposed release.

I therefore hereby request that I be relieved of my duties as an Officer of the Senate.

Yours sincerely,
Allison A. M. Walsh

Honourable senators, pursuant to the authority conferred upon me by Section 3 of the Dissolution and Annulment of Marriages Act, I hereby terminate the designation of the Honourable Mr. Justice Allison Arthur Mariotti Walsh, as an Officer of the Senate to hear evidence on petitions for dissolution or annulment of marriages and to report thereon, and he is, as of this day, relieved, at his request, of his duties as an Officer of the Senate.

Honourable senators, the letter and announcement which I have just read will, of course, appear verbatim in Senate Hansard. Since the duties performed by the Honourable Justice Walsh were so satisfactory, and since we were so happy in our association with him, I did not want this announcement to appear without adding to the record a personal letter which I wrote to him on your behalf.

I wrote to the Honourable Mr. Justice Walsh on January 30 in these terms:

Dear Sir:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 29th to which was attached a personal note in which you expressed the great satisfaction you had enjoyed in working as the Senate Commissioner, and on behalf of myself and all the Senators may I also express to you our appreciation for the faithful and painstaking duties you have performed as Divorce Commissioner of the Senate.

At the next sitting of the Senate, I intend to inform the honourable senators that your designation as an Officer of the Senate is now terminated and that you have been relieved of your duties.

You will permit me to wish you well in your new endeavour.

Yours sincerely,
Jean-Paul Deschatelets

I hope that in doing so I was expressing the views of all honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, His Honour the Speaker has expressed our gratitude to Mr. Justice Walsh.

I was speaking a few moments ago, on the telephone, with Senator Roebuck. He has been confined to his bedroom because of a cold, from which he is recovering. I know that if he were here today he would want to join with His Honour the Speaker and honourable senators in his expression of thanks to the Divorce Commissioner, who has so ably discharged his duties over a period of time and has been of the greatest assistance. Senator Roebuck has spoken of Mr. Justice Walsh's contributions in most appreciative terms.

The President of the Exchequer Court will be advised that leave of absence has now terminated, as will my colleague the Minister of Justice.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, as a member of the Divorce Committee since my appointment to this place, I wish to reiterate what has been said by His Honour the Speaker and the Leader of the Government.

At the last meeting of the Divorce Committee in January, Mr. Justice Walsh explained the situation with regard to his work, saying that because of limited accommodation there was sufficient room for only one commissioner to carry out his responsibilities, so it had been decided that Mr. Justice Cameron, who had previously retired from the Exchequer Court, would continue to hear the contested and uncontested cases, which are now few in number.

Also at that meeting expression was given to the gratitude and respect the committee had for Commissioner Walsh's work. There were never any difficulties or conflicts. Our discussions were free and open. He came to us if he had any problems, and members of the committee on occasion returned to him his precis of an individual case for further clarification. Ever since he was appointed Commissioner, the relationship has been one of great co-operation and respect on both sides.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of the Preliminary Report of the Ministerial Mission to Latin America, October 27—November 27, 1968, together with copies of a Press Release, issued January 24, 1969, relating thereto. (English and French texts).

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before moving the date and time to which the house will adjourn this week, I should like to outline the business, as I see it, that will be before us next week.

If we do not complete today the debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products, then that debate will continue next week, and I expect the bill will be dealt with by committee.

A number of senators have indicated their intention to speak in the debate on the motion of Senator Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate. We shall resume next week the debate on the inquiry of Senator Aird calling the attention of the Senate to the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the North Atlantic Assembly held in Brussels in November of last year. We shall also have before us for consideration Bill S-24, introduced by Senator Argue, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

We have not yet concluded the debate on Senator Hayden's inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the effect of certain sections of the British North America Act on the initiation of legislation in the Senate, or that on the inquiry of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) calling the attention of the Senate to the 14th General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held last fall at Nassau.

On Tuesday next Senator Croll will call the attention of the Senate to the consequences, legislative and otherwise, flowing from the adoption of reports of certain special committees of the Senate and the special joint committees of both houses. Also, I believe on Tuesday next Senator Davey will proceed with his motion for the appointment of a special committee to consider and report upon the ownership and control of mass public communications in Canada.

On Wednesday the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will resume consideration of Bill S-17, an Act respecting Investment Companies, and also Bill S-27, an Act respecting the Quebec Savings Bank. I believe that there are a number of witnesses to be heard on both these bills.

Also on Wednesday Senator Macnaughton intends to call the attention of the Senate to the 11th annual meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group held in Washington and New Orleans last month. The Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will meet to consider Bill S-21, an Act to amend the Criminal Code. The Committee on Foreign Affairs will hold its first meeting on Thursday next, I am advised by Senator Aird. It is expected that there will be meetings of the Special Committees on Science Policy and Poverty. I will also have two new Government bills to introduce on Tuesday next.

Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 4, 1969, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. David Walker: Just listening to the honourable leader, was there anything in what he said that is not set out in the Orders of the Day and Meetings of Committees? Perhaps I missed something.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I do not think there was.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

Hon. Paul Martin moved, with leave:

> That the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts have power without special reference by the Senate to consider any matter affecting the internal economy of the Senate and such committee shall report the result of such consideration to the Senate for action.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, over a year ago, when I was making my maiden speech in the Senate, I made reference to the equipment provided to the secretaries of senators as compared with that provided to secretaries of members of the Commons. I was referring particularly to dictating machines, electric typewriters, and so forth. Some senators have found it necessary to purchase this equipment at their own expense.

I want to thank the committee for providing a number of dictating machines, but I notice that we still need some electric typewriters. I would like to renew my plea to upgrade the equipment available to our secretaries in order to bring it in line with that provided in the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the views just expressed by the honourable Senator Carter are on the record, and I imagine that the committee will deal with this matter when it next meets. There is a motion before the house. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AID

CANADA'S CONTRIBUTION IN FIGHT AGAINST LEPROSY—INQUIRY

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to put a question to the honourable Leader of the Government. My question is related to a speech which he gave on Sunday past, preliminary to a concert sponsored jointly by the National Gallery Association and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The purpose of the concert was to raise funds for the fight against leprosy.

I have received some letters about this matter and invariably they are loud in their praise for the assistance Senator Martin has given in the past and is continuing to give to this great cause. Before coming to my question, on their behalf as well as my own, I should like to voice my sincere appreciation for the leadership which Senator Martin is giving in attempting to alert Canadians to this terrible problem which affects ten million people in 57 developing countries.

My question is as follows: Can the honourable leader inform the Senate what contributions to this problem are being given to these countries in the form of external aid? Secondly, in view of the special interest which Canadians should have in this problem due to the outstanding sacrifice and example of that eminent Canadian, Cardinal Leger, would the honourable leader consider (a) requesting the Government to make this a special project for Canada, and (b) would he also explore the possibility of having the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science consider this problem with a view to making recommendations as to the best way in which Canada can become more closely identified with and improve the effectiveness of Canada's contribution to this problem?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with the preface that Senator Carter has given to his question, I could not very well ignore it at this time. I cannot give a precise reply to the first part of the question, but I can say that the Government, through the Department of External Aid, has undertaken to give assistance to the special hospital project under the auspices of Cardinal Leger. I believe that answers the second part of the question. I will direct Senator Carter's inquiry to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Chairman of our Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. Moreover, I will give more precise information on the first part of the question later.

On the order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Carter, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand, for the second reading of the Bill S-26, intituled: "An Act to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products".—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, may I have leave to resume this debate?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that the honourable Senator Carter introduced this bill on second reading. Is unanimous consent given to him to speak now? If so, I must inform honourable senators that if he speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Is it necessary to ask leave for this purpose? As I understand it, Senator Carter introduced the debate and he has a right to close it, and I take it that that is what he is doing.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, but the adjournment was in the name of Senator Langlois.

The Hon. the Speaker: The order stands in the name of Senator Langlois. If an order is not proceeded with by the honourable senator in whose name it stands, then another honourable senator must have unanimous consent to proceed. This has been the practice that we have followed.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I do not want Senator Carter to close the debate at this time. I had assumed there would be another speaker, and I too would like to speak on this bill. I think I have something to draw to the attention of the chamber that may be of some importance. However, it is absolutely necessary for me to keep another commitment this afternoon. I have to attend a meeting of the Science Policy Committee. If Senator Langlois is not proceeding, I would like to adjourn the debate rather than have it terminated by the sponsor now. Therefore, if it is in order, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, January 28, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Fred A. McGrand: Honourable senators, I wish to call the attention of this chamber to a luncheon lecture organized by the Voluntary Committee on Health of the Senate and House of Commons, to be held in room 112 on Wednesday, February 5, at 12.30. These lectures are nothing new. They have been going on since 1925. It is not the importance of this particular lecture, but the importance of the Voluntary Committee on Health of the Senate and the House of Commons to which I wish to refer.

If we go back to 1919 at the time the Department of National Health was established, we can realize the problems of that period and the methods taken to deal with them. Previous to that there was no Department of Health in Canada, or in any of the provinces, or for that matter in the British Empire. There were poorly organized boards of health in many municipalities that dealt with emergencies when they arose.

The federal Department of National Health was established to meet the emergency of that day. It was the end of a severe epidemic known as the Spanish influenza. Venereal disease was rampant; there were repeated outbreaks of smallpox, diphtheria and typhoid fever; tuberculosis was uncontrolled. The time had come to regard these conditions as national problems—hence a national Department of Health was necessary. But this new department was born handicapped. There was little or no enthusiasm on the part of the provinces or municipalities to co-operate. And the public in general was poorly informed.

New Brunswick was the first province to set up a Department of Health, the first in the British Empire, and it came about this way: The influenza epidemic of 1918 caught the province with no organization to combat it. Certain municipalities, previously confronted with epidemics of smallpox and diphtheria, had set up boards of health which functioned for the duration of the epidemic. Dr. W. F. Roberts, Minister without Portfolio in the Foster Government, was given the task of bringing order out of chaos. It was not an easy task. Municipalities refused to co-operate and in many counties, which had boards of health, it was found that the person who was recognized as the chairman or secretary of the board had been dead, in some instances, for a period of from 15 to 20 years.

If the national Department of Health was to be of service there had to be an organization to do the educational work. The Health League of Canada, as a public relations arm of the national Department of Health, came into being under the leadership of Dr. Gordon Bates. It carried on a campaign to establish venereal disease clinics, clinics for the detection of early tuberculosis, compulsory vaccination of school children against smallpox, pasteurization of milk to control the spread of dysentery and other communicable diseases, and clinics for immunization against diphtheria.

I now come to the organization of the Voluntary Committee on Health. In 1925 Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, suggested that this committee be set up in order that members of the House of Commons and the Senate could be kept aware of health problems by bringing speakers to address groups of parliamentarians—the luncheon lectures followed.

What purpose have they served? I, like some of you, listen to a good many of these lectures, and sometimes they do not carry a "message," as they should. This may be the reason why attendance has been poor.

Senator Croll, when he introduced his motion on poverty, said something to the effect that the old Senate had passed away and a new one has taken its place. If so, let us have a reorientation of the Voluntary Committee on Health. There is good work to be done, which only a well-informed parliamentary body can perform.

Members of the House of Commons are busy with their committees, and they have their constituents to look after. Perhaps they do not have the time to attend and analyse the message brought to them by these lectures.

Here is where this chamber can play an important role, by doing the basic investigation of health and welfare problems.

Much legislation which comes before Parliament originates from behind the desk of high-ranking civil servants. Senator O'Leary has warned us of this danger.

Dr. John Hanlon, President of the United States Public Health Association, has called attention to many of their health problems, and he states definitely that public health needs are more important than spending money on organ transplants.

There is air pollution and water pollution. In much of the land surrounding the great cities of North America, the bacteria necessary for healthy soil have been destroyed by detergents. Dr. Lewis Herber, in his book Crisis in Our Cities, writes that from Minneapolis to the mouth of the Mississippi people are drinking detergent cocktails—a glass of tap water with a detergent foam on top. The necessary bacterial action in the soil has been destroyed.

Many of our health problems are man-made. There seems to be a continuing demand for antibiotics to destroy bacteria by massive retaliation against bacterial disease but, in spite of this all-out war, there is evidence of failure. Bacteria practises the law of the survival of the fittest, and those who survive come swarming back at us in increasing numbers, while millions of innocent and friendly bacteria are killed and their places taken by vicious and angry ones.

Many of the friendly germs undergo change, and are less friendly than their ancestors. But bacteria, for the most part, have been friendly to man. Without them there would be no soil; without fermentation there would be neither bread nor beer. They are essential to the existence of man. They were here on earth long before mankind. The question is, how to live in coexistence.

Dr. Frapper will speak to us on the subject, "The Worth of Prevention." Perhaps in the future this Voluntary Committee on Health should be part of the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. This is the time to take a second look at the work of this committee, and to take a first look at the problems of health and welfare which grow bigger, not smaller—the problem of the high cost of medical care, the high cost of hospitalization. On that point, in one of our best known hospitals in Canada the per diem cost has risen to over $70 a day.

The members of the other place are so absorbed in the legislation before them and constituency problems that they do not have the time to investigate these problems at the grass roots level, or to explore the frontiers of tomorrow's problems.

Last December our Voluntary Committee on Health heard a lecture delivered by Dr. Unwin, of Montreal, on the hippie problem. That was one man's opinion. There are many different views on this problem, and we should hear them all.

Does anyone seriously believe that student unrest or revolution will go away by itself?—not until the universities train people to develop the humanities and not train them to be mere robots to join the technical machine built by science, the military and big business.

Remember that Dwight Eisenhower's last words as President were:

> In the councils of government we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether it is sought or not sought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for this disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will presist.

Today it is the science-military-industrial complex, and its shadow grows longer. Some of the mandarins of science who appeared as witnesses before the Science Committee, which now meets, certainly did not get Eisenhower's message, but the students at Columbia did.

There is the whole field of crime and delinquency to be explored by some responsible body. Crime increases 10 to 15 per cent a year, and there is hardly a dollar available in Canada for research on that important problem.

This is the first luncheon lecture meeting for 1969. Tickets can be bought from Senator Fergusson, Senator Haig or myself. In the past, while attendance was generally poor, some senators were always present—Senators Croll, Roebuck, Inman, Fergusson, Carter, Burchill, Kinley, and Senator Paterson, who not only came but brought a number of people with him.

The meeting is on Wednesday, February 5 at 12.30 p.m. in room 112. Come one—come all!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, may I join other honourable senators in congratulating Senator Molson and the active members of his committee on an excellent effort. If anyone needs a demonstration of the abitlity of honourable senators to act quickly and wisely, or of their capacity and willingness to work hard, then I think the report which is now before us, and those which preceded it, should provide a remarkably adequate demonstration.

I can speak in this complimentary vein without being immodest because it was not possible for me to take an active part in the deliberations of this committee. My delinquency was partly caused by the necessity for me to concentrate my efforts for several months on a related and, to my mind, equally constructive facet of the affairs of the nation, and the necessity for me to make an effort to rectify the neglect of the Ontario schools system in failing to train me equally well in both of the languages to which I, as a Canadian, am entitled to refer as my mother tongues.

In spite of the pleasure and satisfaction with which I read the Fourth Report of the Committee, there were two areas in which I felt I might make a constructive contribution.

The first is in disagreement with some of the conclusions the committee reached and expressed in paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of the report. These paragraphs deal with the question of impartiality of honourable senators and the desirability of removing themselves from what the report calls the "crisis atmosphere of the daily political scene," the practical application of which is that they should not attend their party caucuses.

The other area of my concern might be regarded as an expansion of the recommendations of the committee in this fourth report concerning reform of the Senate. Perhaps you will be more tolerant of the vehemence of some of my later remarks if I first lay bare some of the biases which underlie them.

First, I regard the political party as the basic unit of democracy, the element without which democracy cannot exist. Second, I regard the political party in contemporary times as one of the major vehicles of democracy, or, to put it another way, one of the major links between the people and their government. Third, I regard public service through support of, and participation in, a political party as being more useful than any other kind of public service, because the very freedom of charities, service clubs, universities, and other public and quasi-public institutions to exist and operate, and the quality of their operation, are dependent upon the democratic system to which the political party is basic. And I must say that I cannot share the judgment of those who fail to acknowledge the centrality of the political party in our democratic system, and who somehow feel that they serve democracy by holding themselves aloof from the very basis of it.

Democracy is politics in its highest form—that is, the comprehension of the needs and aspirations of the people, the seeking of the legislative means to fulfill those needs and advance those aspirations, the administering of that legislation to the greatest benefit of the people and the nation, and doing all of this with the closest possible involvement and participation of the individual citizen.

To accomplish this vast responsibility there must be an inflow of information, ideas, and value judgments from all parts of the community. The work of Parliament is to test, by debate, representations from the bureaucracy, from special interest groups, and from the general public whose chief vehicles of expression are their elected representatives, the political parties, and the communication media. Parliament must distill from them that which appears to its members to be most wise.

But honourable senators will see that one of the most important inputs into the parliamentary system is that from the parliamentary and organizational wings of the political party. In Canada, Parliament is a bi-cameral unit. The Senate is one portion of that unit and it has a certain share of the responsibility for the testing process I have mentioned. If this particular chamber of Parliament is not to cripple itself in dealing with the legislative matters which come before it, it must have access to all of the sources of information and judgment which are available in the other place, and which are available to government in making its selection of legislative objectives.

There has been a suggestion that honourable senators are brainwashed in caucus. No one would suggest that we should remove ourselves from the brainwashing of the communication media, or the bureaucracy, or the special interests. Then why should we remove ourselves from the brainwashing, if such it be, of the agencies of democracy in the country, the elected representatives of the people and the political parties.

There are those who say that this house is irrelevant in a modern democracy. If it is irrelevant now, when it has access to the considerations of the democratic elements in our political system, then how much less relevant would it be if we abdicated that access. I could understand it if the party caucuses withdrew the privilege of attendance from us, but for us to propose giving up this link with reality ourselves is unthinkable.

I believe that every honourable senator has accepted appointment to this chamber in the belief that he can make a constructive and effective contribution to the welfare of Canada. I further believe that there is no more effective way of making that contribution than by speaking in the party caucus at a formative stage of legislation. Another part of our public image is that this chamber is a rubber stamp. While that picture is untrue technically and highly exaggerated from a practical point of view, it is true that by the time legislation originating in the other place reaches us it would be highly awkward for the Government and the affected citizens if we insisted upon substantial amendment, delay, or rejection. One of our real opportunities to make an effective contribution is at the party caucus, and I personally would urge each honourable senator to make a contribution there.

I said that I would also propose some expansion of the committee's recommendations. The fourth report of the committee does not acknowledge one of the two original purposes of the Senate—that of representing provincial or regional interests. As between the two original purposes of the Senate, I would regard this as the more important. The "sober, second thought" role, regardless of its utility, is a non-democratic function and, in the hands of an appointive body, must necessarily be curtailed. The protection of minority interests, however, is a thoroughgoing democratic role for the Senate.

No true democracy would leave complete control of legislation in the hands of a single chamber controlled by two populous provinces without making some provision for the protection of the constitutional and civil rights of the inhabitants of the smaller provinces. No federated system created by two founding peoples should leave the complete control of legislation in the hands of a single chamber which might be, and has been on occasion, controlled by one of those peoples without making provision for the protection of the constitutional and civil rights of the minority people. These are the roles we have failed to perform, and these are the roles about which the report of the committee is silent.

Senator Cameron has made some suggestions as to how the manner of appointment might be adjusted to assist in the filling of these roles. I am sure that other honourable senators will have other ideas, and I gather that the Government is looking at some possibilities. I say only, as simply and sincerely as I can, that if we are able to find the means of equipping the Senate with the kind of members and procedures necessary to fill these roles, we will have made a giant contribution toward the unity and longevity of Canada.

The most serious flaw in western democracies today is the rule of the majority and the consequent alienation of minorities. In Canada we have immediately available a parliamentary body, one of whose originally stated aims was to overcome this flaw. All we need do is make it work.

Honourable senators, may I end as I began? For the sake of brevity I have not commented on the other and excellent recommendations in the report because I agree with them fully. Like other honourable senators, I am not interested in being here unless I can satisfy myself that I am effectively serving the people of Canada. The efforts of the Special Committee on the Rules have certainly increased that effectiveness. However, we must remember that we are a part of a democratic political system, and only in so far as we remain attuned to that system, and equip ourselves to solve its injustices, can we lay claim to a justification of our existence.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sparrow, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 23, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Aird calling the attention of the Senate to the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Brussels, Belgium, 11th November to 15th November, 1968, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the honourable Senator Lang should speak in place of the honourable Senator Martin?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Thank you very much, honourable senators. I was one of the delegates at the annual conference of the North Atlantic Assembly last November, and I wish to report to the Senate some of my observations and reactions at that gathering. Last December 17 Senator Aird presented a very complete report of this conference. His views as to the important issues and the nature and extent of the deliberations there coincide very much with my own reactions. I have very little to amplify those remarks, particularly as they deal with specific items. Generally speaking, however, I would like to report to the Senate that so far as our Canadian delegation was concerned, this conference proved to be a very satisfying experience, and surprisingly so because it met in the wake of the fears and anxieties and the general depression that fell upon European countries and their representatives following the events in Czechoslovakia last August.

The fact that this meeting did prove to be a satisfying experience for the Canadian delegation arises, I think, from two main facts. First, I should say that the initiative of Senator Aird as a chairman of the delegation and the co-operation that he received from the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the officials of these departments, made it possible for our delegation to have an in-depth briefing prior to departure, which familiarized us with the current issues and the positions of the various member countries on those issues. Also, there were in the delegation itself Members of Parliament who had attended previous meetings of this assembly and who carried with them the experience and knowledge of those previous occasions, which continuity is so essential to maintaining the high calibre of a delegation on functions of this nature.

Because of this fact, the delegates were able to participate fully in the various sessions of the committees and in the plenary session itself. They were not diffident about putting forth their views, and there was no hesitancy in doing so, notwithstanding the equivocating posture of the Canadian Government at the time, the so-called review of foreign policy being in progress.

I think I can also say that whatever reservations, if any, may have been held by members of the delegation with regard to the validity and worth of Canada's role in NATO, they were dissipated during the briefing sessions held prior to departure and during the sessions in Brussels and through the contacts made with counterpart delegates from other countries.

I wish that every member of Parliament, indeed, every member of Government, could have had the benefit of our briefing sessions and of our experiences at the conference itself.

The other factor contributing to the feeling of the delegates about this conference can be attributed to the new-found sense of international common purpose that prevaded. There was a sense of renewed mutual reliance, and noticeably absent were the half-muted whines of national self-interest, the chauvinistic posturings that sometimes characterized deliberations at previous meetings. These had dissipated in the wake of the events in Czechoslovakia. Certainly, nothing could have cleared the fog of doubt and all the uncertainties hanging over the alliance and its future as did that catastrophe.

There was apparent among all delegations a new sense of dedication and commitment, and a sense of direction. The Parliamentary delegates themselves felt this renewal and were satisfied to find that in the reports that came from the ministerial meeting held towards the end of the assembly these same attitudes were reflected in the official government communiques of all the countries. As you know, these communiques in general renewed our commitment to the principles of the alliance and to an increased contribution to the military strength of the alliance.

Because it bears so closely on present events in Europe, I should mention that at the close of the conference the Canadian and the United States delegations were invited by the Government of West Germany to visit West Berlin. Many of the delegates did so, and on a dark, cold, dismal, November day we viewed the ultimate manifest of sadistic hatred: that awful wall. The symbolism of that wall is beyond over-expression. As it divides a city so it divides Europe and, indeed, the world.

Some of us went on through that infamous gate known as "Check Point Charlie" and into East Berlin, looking forever like a city of the dead. I think everyone should have the experience of passing through those barricades and be subjected to the scrutiny of East German military police and their Russian overseers. The atmosphere is tense. Their hatred for us is self-evident. This is the atmosphere that pervades the areas of Russian militaristic influence. It is as real as the wall on the side of this chamber.

When you come back to the gate you again experience this horror in the concentration camp-like atmosphere of the police office. Your first reaction, I think, is to run, to escape; and then when you do pass through, that unfamiliar city of West Berlin looks about as familiar and pleasing to see as your own home-town. I think everyone involved in foreign policy in our country should be made to go through that gate.

In retrospect, I feel that one of the most significant phenomena of the assembly meeting was the fact that all the Parliamentary groups found their views basically consistent. And, as I mentioned before, these views were consistent with those contained in the communiques issued by the ministers at the end of the week. In other words, the reaction of the Western world to the Czechoslovakian invasion was unanimous and nonpartisan, for in these delegations there were Labour members, Liberals, Conservatives and every shade of political opinion. These views were held notwithstanding very real recognition of what additional financial sacrifices might be involved in maintaining them.

I might summarize the conclusions of the conference basically as follows: First, events in Czechoslovakia called for an improvement in the quality, effectiveness and deployment of NATO forces. Those forces will be improved in terms of both manpower and equipment in order to provide a better capability for defence as far forward as possible, and therein to match the forward positions now assumed by the Russian military since the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

Second, the quality of reserve forces will be increased. Third, renewed attention will be directed to the provision of reinforcement for the flanks and the strengthening of local forces, and here I would like to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that on January 16 last a decision was taken by the D.P.C., that is the Defence Planning Committee, at NATO headquarters in Brussels, approving the concept of an allied naval force for duty in the Mediterranean area capable of being assembled on call. At least five countries are prepared to participate in that force: Greece, Italy, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States. This is in keeping with recognition of the necessity of reinforcing the NATO flanks, and particularly in the Mediterranean where probably the greatest threat to world peace is now situated. Fourth, the conventional capability of NATO's air force will be increased and certain additional units will be committed to the major NATO commands, and I underline "conventional capability". I do this because as all honourable senators are aware it is in conventional rather than nuclear capability that the Western powers are less than a match for the Warsaw Pact countries.

Finally, the assembly concluded that while hopes for mutual balanced force reductions as between Warsaw Pact countries and NATO countries have suffered a severe setback, nevertheless, the allies in close consultation are continuing their studies and preparations for a time when the atmosphere for fruitful discussion is more favourable. The search for peace requires progress consistent with Western security in the vital fields of disarmament and arms control and continuing efforts to resolve the fundamental issues which divide East and West. In other words, the necessity and desirability in striving for mutual force reduction and an easing of tension between East and West remains the cardinal principle behind the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

It might be interesting if I just mentioned the actual commitments made by a few of these countries in this area, because it is by contrast with them that I think we can often best gauge our own performance. For instance, Belgium in this communiqué stated that the recruitment of "career volunteers" which had been interrupted for a considerabl time, would be reopened. It was proposed to recruit 4,000 volunteers a year in this way.

In Germany some units that were to have been turned into training formations are now going to be retained as combat units. The capability in reconnaissance aircraft is to be improved, and it is planned to purchase 88 Phantom aircraft to this end. The German Government's 1969 defence budget includes an increase of 740 million D.M. In Italy the defence budget for 1969 is to be increased by as much as 7 per cent over last year. In the Netherlands, strengthened anti-tank capability is to be attained in some army units, an improvement in electronic warfare and anti-submarine equipment for the navy, and, in the air force, an increased number of planes. In Norway, the manning level of forces in northern Norway is to be increased by sending soldiers from training units to northern Norway at an earlier stage and after more intensive initial training. In financial terms this will amount to something like 100 million kroner over the five-year period. The United Kingdom will be ordering an additional squadron of 20 Harrier vertical take-off aircraft. The United States is going to both increase and accelerate the program of exercises for ground and air forces committed to NATO, including particularly exercises involving the units that have been re-deployed to the United States. They will also enhance the United States tactical air power in Europe both in quantity and quality.

In this atmosphere of renewed dedication to the principles of collective security and our role in it, we have at home recently heard some discordant notes and I feel compelled to comment on them in this chamber. Of course, honourable senators will realize that I am referring to press reports which concern Canada's policy in NATO and members of the cabinet. I should say that, if the press is to be believed, the Prime Minister has encouraged the Postmaster General to publicize his views on Canada's continued participation in NATO. I suggest that this makes a mockery of the notion of cabinet solidarity when the Postmaster General's views apparently are totally at variance with those held by the ministers responsible in this area, namely, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the press, this exercise was in the interest of promoting a "national debate", and I put those words in quotes because I do not know what exactly is meant by a national debate. I am not sure whether it means a series of television interviews conducted on the program 5W with some of our TV personalities acting as moderators; I am not sure whether it means letters to editors of newpapers, or speakers at service clubs, articles by columnists, et cetera. I suppose that may be the idea of a national debate.

Well, honourable senators, as informative or useful, or as misinformative and useless, as such a debate might be, I would like to suggest that anything as serious as this matter—which requires, above all, cool, level-headed and unemotional deliberations—cannot be resolved by such techniques to which I have referred. As everyone here who has ever been associated with publicity or propaganda knows, such matters can very easily be slanted or biased, according to the predelictions of those who control the media.

I suggest that the forum for such a debate is in the halls of Parliament, for it is in the halls of Parliament that we are to conduct our national debates, and here conduct them according to the rules, regulations and traditions that go with these institutions. These halls of Parliament were particularly designed to carry out such a responsibility, and here is where that responsibility lies.

If I am correct in this regard, then I would be less than honest if I did not say that I am now suspicious that such activity must represent an attempt to rally public support behind someone's preconceived determination to remove Canada from the NATO alliance and, if necessary, to do so by by-passing Parliament in the process. I hope my suspicions are ill-founded.

Unfortunately, I do not have a copy of the Postmaster General's remarks made at Nanaimo last Saturday, but I would like to comment briefly on a few of them as they have been quoted in the press.

Honourable senators, I think that if I were a judge and had a case before me with a jury that was addressed in the manner that the Postmaster General used, I would have to dismiss the jury on the basis of an inflammatory address.

First, the Postmaster General baldly states that membership in NATO is "not worthwhile." Honourable senators, I recognize that at times we have to re-examine our first principles. Of course, the first principle of NATO is collective security. If we in Canada are to adhere to the principle of collective security our logical place to do so is in NATO and in NORAD. Anything else would be a form of gross intellectual dishonesty.

Is collective security worthwhile? Can we discard all the lessons of World Wars I and II? How easily are these forgotten, if they were ever learned? I know that today, more than ever in the past, an outbreak of war in Europe is going to involve us automatically—and perhaps this time result in the extinction of our whole planet. Our stake in world peace is the greatest stake we have, and it will only be by protecting that stake in peace, and through strength, that we will be able to maintain it. Any other road is sheer folly.

I would remind honourable senators that about 18 per cent of our total defence budget is expended on NATO, or roughly $200 million. For that amount of money we can make our voices heard in the highest political and military circles in the world, and we are listened to. We can help fashion the shape of events to come, completely out of proportion to our relative size as a country and our relative contribution to the alliance.

Worthwhile? I know it is the most worthwhile expenditure we make.

I should mention that there are countries which do not subscribe to the idea of collective security, and included among those is Sweden. Their expenditure for non-collective security, on a per capita basis, is about five times the expenditure of Canadians; and the defence system that they have is infinitely inferior and inadequate.

I think to question the worthwhileness of our role in NATO is literally to destroy the lessons of our history.

The Postmaster General goes on to say that NATO is a useless military bureaucracy that has divided Europe instead of unifying it. I will have to admit that in this I agree with the Postmaster General, because without NATO Europe would indeed be united. It would be united as a group of satellites under Russian military domination. If that is the kind of union that we want to see, somebody is not talking the same language as I am.

I think we should all recall, firstly, the rapid disbandment of the allied forces in Europe after the last war, followed by our complete failure to reach any agreement with Russia on a peace treaty, followed immediately thereafter by the military consolidation by Russia of Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Roumania and Austria.

I think we have to remind ourselves who it was who attempted to blockade Berlin; who it was who shot down crowds in the streets of Berlin just about 10 years ago; who it was who savagely suppressed Hungary in one of the most savage outbursts in modern times, and who it was who moved into Czechoslovakia just six months ago.

Yes, I suggest that NATO has divided Europe. It has divided Europe into the slave and the free. There is still a free West Germany, a free Belgium, a free Holland, a free Italy and, under de Gaulle, a relatively free France.

I do not wish to press my point here, but there are two other quotations I think bear examination.

The Postmaster General has gone on to describe NATO as a self-justifying deterrent against a non-military threat. Well, it certainly takes a long stretch of the imagination to believe that the 300 thousand or 400 thousand men who went into Prague and Czechoslovakia last August were tourists. I would like the Postmaster General to make that statement about a non-military threat to the West Germans, the Hungarians and the Czechs, saying that Russia and her Warsaw Pact satellites are non-military. The Warsaw Pact countries and Russia are undoubtedly the most heavily armed agglomeration of states in the world, whether in aircraft, armour, nuclear intermediate range missiles and manpower, and with a non-nuclear capability probably double that of the European NATO forces. If that is a non-military threat, then I have been learning the wrong language.

Finally, honourable senators, the press reports the Postmaster General as saying that the expenditure of $200 million we make on NATO determines the scale of resources and energy we can direct towards the rest of the world. I have read some non sequiturs in my time, but this just about takes the cake. What we expend on foreign aid is no more dependent upon what we expend on NATO than upon what we spend on the Canada Pension Plan or the Health Resources Fund. Let us weigh that $200 million against our total defence budget of $1,600,000,000. Let us put this into its proper perspective. The expenditure of $200 million at least partly assures us that we are going to have countries, underdeveloped or developed, with which we can be concerned. They will at least be there, and presumably we will be here to be concerned about them. Let us put first things first.

Finally, the Postmaster General referred to NATO saying that its existence guarantees one thing, and that is the existence of the Warsaw Pact. Honourable senators, I would like to conclude my remarks by quoting from a publication of the John F. Kennedy Institute Center for Atlantic Studies entitled "Report of the Third International Colloquium: The Future of the Atlantic Alliance," which was published last July. I think the dry, unemotional character of these words must be weighed in indication of the seriousness with which it deals with the subject:

> (a) If NATO were to disappear its members would lose their extensive political organization for consultation and co-operation in all fields and defence links with one another, including the vital one with North America. If the Warsaw Pact were to be abolishd the military hold of the USSR over the other member countries of the Pact would not be weakened because, even after the dissolution of the Pact, the bilateral agreements binding the other member countries to the Soviet Union would remain in force.
> (b) If the two Alliances were to be dismantled, the USSR would be able to maintain the present disposition of her military strength. On the other hand, the United States and Canadian troops stationed in Europe would lack the military and political framework provided by the North Atlantic Alliance. In case they had to leave the European continent, the European member countries of NATO would be separated from their North American Allies by the Atlantic Ocean, and thereby placed in a most unfavourable military position as compared with the East European countries.

I think, honourable senators, that we have in this chamber a realization of the importance of this organization in our general policy, and in our military strategy. I am distressed that responsible people would take to a public platform—and I do not mean they are just responsible private individuals; they are responsible public individuals holding cabinet positions—and attack this institution and our participation in it so unfairly, so untruthfully, and so to the detriment of our country. We live in very difficult times in this world, and I think we will continue to live in them, but no matter how difficult, dangerous, or hopeless these times seem, our little global village has not yet been incinerated.

In this day and age, that in itself is a major achievement.

If I may, I would liken the Postmaster General to the businessman who acquired a factory. One evening after acquiring the factory he visited it, and let himself in by the front door. He met a man walking about inside and he asked him who he was. The man replied that he was the night watchman and that he had been with the Company for twenty years. He was asked what his duties and responsibilities were, and he answered, "I am here to prevent fires breaking out, and to prevent theft." Then he was asked how many fires and how many thefts had occurred during his 20 years' employment, and he was very pleased to report that there had been none. Then the owner said: "That's it. You are of no use. You're fired!"

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

THE QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK—SECOND READING

Hon. Maurice Bourget moved the second reading of Bill S-27, respecting The Quebec Savings Bank.

He said: Honourable senators, the sole purpose of this bill is to change the nature and the operations of The Quebec Savings Bank.

The Quebec Savings Bank has been in existence as an institution for more than 100 years. It was established in Quebec City in 1848 as La Caisse d'Économie de Notre-Dame de Québec and has been incorporated by an act of Parliament of the former province of Canada.

After Confederation, namely in 1872, the federal Parliament granted it a new charter for a term of ten years. That charter has been renewed since, and the last time was in 1967 under the provisions of the Quebec Savings Banks Act, 16 Elizabeth II, Chapter 93.

The Quebec Savings Bank is subject at the present time, as is the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, to the Quebec Savings Banks Act. As I have said, the Quebec Savings Bank was founded in 1848. The founders' intention was to provide the working class with a savings and credit institution. Bank credit was then quite limited and was not available in any case to the workers. They were preyed upon by loan sharks. Furthermore, since there was no savings and credit institution at their disposal, they could not obtain any sound financial guarantee.

As a matter of fact, the Quebec Savings Bank was created under the auspices of the Saint Vincent de Paul Society of Quebec, a body aimed at giving assistance to those in need and want.

The Quebec Savings Bank has served its purpose well throughout the years and its depositors have always come from low-income groups.

For a number of years, the directors of the Quebec Savings Bank have been aware that the objectives they had set for themselves are now achieved by other institutions of equal value. In addition, it cannot under its charter make any commercial operations or loans. From a practical viewpoint, those operations are limited to collecting savings and granting personal loans and also, since 1954, mortgage loans for private housing.

It has been realized that, on account of the current state of the economy, it was almost impossible for the Savings Bank to keep on progressing.

It now has 27 branches in the district, or rather, in greater Quebec City and it keeps in deposit savings amounting to $60 million, its assets running up to about $68 million.

The Quebec Savings Bank has made very little headway in recent years and does not reflect the economic growth and developments being noticed in Canada and in particular, under the circumstances, in the district of Quebec.

Considering the competition it has to face from banks, trust companies and caisses populaires (credit unions) and considering the limited services it can offer to its customers, the Quebec Savings Bank realizes that it does not play, in the district of Quebec, the economic role it should play because of its seniority and its record of service.

On the other hand, the ever-increasing operational costs are bound to jeopardize even its financial balance, should the present trend be allowed to continue.

After much thought and study, the directors of the Bank came to the conclusion that the main stumbling block to its progress was the restricted nature of its powers and operations. It would therefore be necessary for the Bank to go ahead to enter the commercial and industrial fields.

The Bank Act, passed by the Canadian Parliament in 1967, extended and made more flexible the powers of the banks. The Quebec Savings Bank is of the opinion that, in order to maintain its progress, it must be granted the powers attributed to the banks.

It realizes the fact that on becoming a chartered bank it will naturally have to incur some heavy responsibilities, but its administrators are convinced that increased advantages and benefits will quickly compensate for and overcome the increased responsibilities.

Even though a goodly number of bank branches are found in the district of Quebec, this bank anticipates development and a gradual increase in its operations in other parts of the province and ultimately across Canada. Due to the services it has rendered to date and considering the fact that, for more than a century, it has been closely associated with the financial and economic activities of the Quebec area, it should be capable of quickly obtaining commercial and industrial customers. In the past, Quebec City was the head office of two chartered banks, the Banque de Québec and the Banque Nationale. On realizing the development and the progress achieved by Quebec City and its surrounding region over the past few years, surely there is room for another banking institution. A chartered bank is in a better position to transact more profitable operations than a savings bank. The present economic situation facilitates the progress and the profits of a chartered bank.

The bill now presented by the Savings Bank has been submitted to a special general meeting of its shareholders who were duly notified and it was attended by several small shareholders. At this meeting, held on December 2, 1968, there was unanimous approval of the presentation of the present bill.

The Quebec Savings Bank has always been mindful of laws, especially of the Act governing it. There is every reason for supposing that it will continue along the same lines. Besides, it will be submitted to the statutory control of the Inspector General of Banks.

The Quebec Savings Bank complies, as far as its capital and surplus are concerned, with all prescriptions of the Bank Act. As mentioned, it has at present 27 branches and employs a qualified and devoted personnel.

It seems to me that the Quebec Savings Bank, which is an institution the history and the development of which reflect the history and the development of the metropolitan district of Quebec, with its records of services, its 27 branches, its qualified staff and the $60 million it has in deposit, offers more guarantees of success than a newly-incorporated bank, just starting in business.

We may wonder if it is wise to increase the number of chartered banks.

In this respect, may I remind the honourable members of this house what the then minister of Finance, the honourable Mitchell Sharp, said on the 5th of July, 1966, when he proposed, in the other place, the creation of a committee to study the decennial revision of the Bank Act. You can read it at page 7237 of the Hansard, and I quote:

> Under either provision, we would favour the establishment of more banks as a means of increasing competition.

A little further, on the same page, the Minister of Finance developed his idea as follows:

> We are determined, in particular, that the interests of the small borrower and the small businessman shall be protected and furthered. We believe that the most effective way to achieve these ends is to encourage and to enforce competition. In this view, the government is supported by the Royal Commission on Banking and Finance and by the Economic Council of Canada. If there are many competing sources of loan funds and many institutions freely competing for the custom of the consumer, we are convinced that he cannot help but benefit.

Therefore, the establishment of a new bank is consistent with the policy of the Canadian Government.

It seems to me that Bill No. S-27 contains no contentious section.

Section 4 of the bill contains a provision which was already in the Quebec Savings Banks Act. Similarly, a time limit was granted by the Bank Act for the coming into force of such a provision.

Section 5 of the bill is necessary because the Quebec Savings Bank could, under its charter, grant residential mortgage loans to a much greater degree than a chartered bank. If I am not mistaken, according to the Bank Act, a chartered bank is limited to 4 per cent of its assets as far as mortgage loans are concerned. If the provisions of the Bank Act were fully applicable, the Bank could not grant further loans for several years and would have to liquidate many; that would result in losses and breakdowns.

Section 6 provides that, if this bill is passed, the Bank will henceforth be called "La Banque Populaire" and in English, "The People's Bank".

As I said, the Bank's operations have always been directed to serve especially the working class; the Bank intends to pursue the objects which it had laid down at the time of its establishment. It has thought that the name The People's Bank or Banque Populaire would identify its traditions and its future concerns in that connection. It wants to remain available to the people, while increasing the services it could render.

Honourable senators, if this bill is read a second time, it will necessarily have to be referred to the committee on banking, trade and commerce where the directors, officers and the legal advisers of the Bank will be present to answer your questions.

Honourable senators, this is all that I had to say in connection with that bill. I think that it is quite simple and that it deserves the kind attention of all honourable members of this house.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable Senators, I wish to say briefly that I support the principle of this bill. Of course, it is in a personal capacity that I do this. I would add that I agree generally with the facts and the objectives outlined by the sponsor of the bill when he invited this house to support the bill on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Martin: People from the Quebec area always agree.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Solidarity is a very good thing. As a matter of fact, we people from the Quebec area have always allowed this principle to guide us because, of course, of the economic power of the Montreal area. This is a perfectly normal reaction.

However, as the sponsor of the bill said, the Quebec Savings Bank, together with the Bank of the City and District of Montreal, is one of two institutions governed by the Quebec Savings Bank Act. These are the two original near-banks, the two oldest ones. What we call near-banks to-day are institutions which have changed, but these have been near-banks from the beginning.

As far as I am concerned, I have known this institution for a long time. As the sponsor of the bill said, it was founded in 1848; I opened my first bank account—I think I was 16 at the time—at a branch of the Caisse d'Économie, that was its name then, on the corner of Ste-Julie and St-Augustin streets, in Quebec; the building is not there any more.

Needless to say again, it is a very serious institution because it stood the test of time. Its board of directors always recruited its members among leaders in the field of economy and industry in the metropolitan area of Quebec.

I really think that, in the present circumstances, this institution, in order to go on fulfilling its role, needs more powers, and that it should become a bank, under the provisions of the Bank Act.

In short, if this proposed legislation is passed, it will not, strictly speaking, create a new bank, because the institution already exists. The question is simply to extend its powers, and the reasons given in that regard seem quite obvious to me. Therefore, I agree with the principle of the bill. I am sure that in committee we shall be able to ask for all the necessary information to ensure that the public and the shareholders of the bank will be protected, and I think we shall obtain all the answers that will enable the committee to make a favorable report.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, January 22, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand if there is nobody else who wishes to speak on it.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that Senator Prowse is prepared to speak on this now. Is it agreed, honourable senators, that honourable Senator Prowse should speak instead of honourable Senator Willis at this time?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to delay you for any length of time, but there are one or two things about this bill which I think commend themselves to our attention. It seems to me that this is a bill which should be supported and passed in this house and sent to the other place. You have been told by those who have already taken part in this debate why certain of our provinces permit in provincial elections voting by persons under the age of 21. If I am correctly informed, they are allowed to vote at the age of 18 in Saskatchewan, Quebec, and Prince Edward Island, and at 19 in Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland.

Now, without going over all the questions about what is being done, what has been done, and what the attitudes are elsewhere, the point I think important is that in those places where the vote has been given to people under the age of 21—and I am speaking now with some particular knowledge of the situation in my own Province of Alberta—there has been no disruption caused or any discernibly great change in voting patterns. This is so in spite of the fears expressed by many people that by lowering the voting age we would enfranchise a great number of people who perhaps were not mature enough to exercise their franchise intelligently and responsibly, and that this could upset the whole process of our Government.

I submit to you that all the evidence is that those fears were completely unfounded. There is not a whit of evidence available anywhere in those provinces where they have reduced the voting age that the pattern shows anything that could be described as irresponsibility in voting, other than has always existed. As a matter of fact, the young people have managed better than the older people to avoid identification with what is sometimes referred to as the lunatic fringe. In other words, they are generally more responsible than we might give them credit for.

I think there are two or three reasons for this, that some of us who are older perhaps have lost track of. One is the fact that in the high schools, and even at the lower school level, under the present educational system the children are discussing current events, current affairs, political affairs and matters of public importance, subjects that found no place at all in the school curriculum of our generation. It is only when you come into contact with that and you see what they are doing, that you begin to realize it is possible. I know that within Alberta, for example, at certain stages they regularly have elections in the schools as part of their current affairs program. They put up leaders and candidates for different parties, and they run elections. Then they run a mock parliament. I would say that school children today have a much better idea of how democracy works, and how it should work, than a great many people of our generation. We never had the chance to learn, except as distant observers. These children are learning with what you might call a working model.

As a result of some experiences I have had, being in contact with these young people, my sincere belief is that they will exercise a degree of responsibility which will be a model to us of the older generation.

A second point is that they are becoming involved in the world around them today to an extent that the older generation never believed possible or had an opportunity to. We were involved in our own little personal problems. They are involved in wider problems. The young people in our high schools and universities today feel that if their life is to be full and useful at all they must do something more than merely provide for themselves, that they have to give something to the community in which they live and to the country which has given them opportunities. I think this is the greatest safeguard we have. Where those young people are now exhibiting, as they are, a sense of social responsibility, of which we as their elders should be extremely proud, then we should indicate to them that, while there may be a generation gap, we have complete sympathy for what they are trying to do.

I know that those who catch the headlines are such as the hippies who went in and disturbed the Chicago convention, those who participate in sit-ins at universities, or who are causing trouble. As I recall, last fall there were sit-ins in the schools here and, if I read the newspapers reports correctly, here were the young people who were saying: Look, we are in a school system now, and when we get finished we will neither be prepared to go to university nor to get a job. In other words, you are just wasting our time. We want you to provide us with a system of education that will either enable us to go on to university or to make a living, but don't just make us sit here when it is not doing us any good and all it is doing is wasting your money.

To me, that is a long way from doing something that could properly be categorized as "irresponsible." This is real responsibility. While there are certain irresponsible elements among the young people today, these constitute a very small and unimportant fraction of them. At least, they are unimportant when you look at their numbers, and they will only be important if we exaggerate their role and make them so.

Where you have these young people who are prepared to accept responsibility—and by "prepared" I mean they have the education, the ideas, the outlook, a fine outlook, and are ready to accept responsibility—I think we would be doing the future of this country and those young people a great disservice if we said, "We will not let you accept responsibility."

The criticism that is always made of the young is that they are irresponsible. I may be wrong, but it is my opinion that the one way a person learns to be responsible is by being allowed to assume responsibility. If we were doing this as a wild gamble that had never before been tried, then perhaps we ought to go at it cautiously, but we have had experience in five provinces, from one end of the country right to the other. There is nothing in that experience in any way to justify any suggestion that there is anything that can be hurt by doing this; and there are all the plus factors that we will give to these fine and able young people who are looking for responsibility, a chance to become involved, if they want to become involved, in our political institutions, our political parties and the Government of this country.

If we do this then I have no fear for the future of democracy or the future of Canada, but if we frustrate them now they are going to look for other less useful outlets for their time, energy and ability. This is a challenge to this house and to our ability to face up to the needs of today in deciding how we handle this matter. Will we be able to bridge that generation gap, which is not really as wide as some people would make it seem, and say to these young people: "You are ready. Here are the keys to the car. You can now start to help drive."

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, I should like to speak in support of this bill to amend the Canada Elections Act. I am surprised that no government in the past has ever proposed this amendment to the act, and I congratulate Senator Argue on his foresight in bringing this bill before the Senate.

Senator Prowse has mentioned the generation gap. In my opinion there are gaps between many facets of society, and one of the greatest perhaps at this time is that between the young people of Canada and the Senate. This bill may help us to associate ourselves with the younger people of this nation.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You yourself help to narrow that gap.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The honourable senator has to be 35 years of age, in any event, in order to sit as a member of this house.

Hon. Mr. Sparrow: Senator Argue gave us some of the history of the principle of this bill, and I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with discussions on similar bills in the other place. I mention the fact only to say that bills to provide for the reduction in the voting age have been brought forward many times by private members, but no government has seen fit to act in a similar fashion.

Many arguments have been put forward in the past for a reduction of the voting age in federal elections, one of them being that if a man is able to fight for his country at the age of 18 in time of war, then he should be able to vote in a federal election. I agree that this is a valid reason. Another reason that has been put forward is that many provinces have seen fit to give the right to vote to people of 18 or 19 years of age.

I would point out that we give far greater powers to people under the age of 21 than this bill would give them. In each province of Canada we permit people as young as 14 to handle lethal weapons, and to hunt. At the age of 16 in some provinces we give them the power of life and death in placing in their hands such a formidable weapon as an automobile. In some provinces of Canada persons are allowed to marry at the age of 14, although there is a tendency at the present time towards increasing the age of marriage to 16 for girls, and to 18 for boys. If we permit young people to participate in the most sacred institution of Canada, the family, then we should be prepared to let them participate in the democratic process.

It seems to me that there are three relevant questions that have to be answered. Do Canadians at the age of 18 have sufficient knowledge to cast a ballot? Are they interested enough to cast a ballot in federal elections? Do they have the desire to cast a ballot in federal elections? I believe that each of these questions has to be answered in the affirmative.

Senator Prowse covered the knowledge aspect rather well, and mentioned the opportunities of education, communication, and involvement that young people enjoy today, and which he did not enjoy when he was 18 years of age or younger. I might add that when I was that age I did not have the advantage of the education and communication facilities that are available today. I feel that the young people of 18 today are every bit as capable to casting an intelligent vote as I was at the age of 21.

Honourable senators, I believe the young people today have a great interest in the way they are governed. That is demonstrated in many areas, and particularly in the organization of the local political parties of Canada. All honourable senators have participated in election campaigns, and they know that the backbone of many organizations in the constituencies is the young people. They work effectively in the campaigns at all levels. They are active in public discussion, and they participate in many fields of endeavour in Canada. The members of the Junior Chamber of Commerce take an active part in the education of young people, and I use that organization as only one example. If these young people can take this interest in community affairs and political matters on a local basis, then surely we can trust them to cast a ballot in a federal election.

The third reason why I feel they should have the right to vote is their desire to have that right. Almost all youth organizations—particularly political youth organizations, university organizations, student organizations and, again, community organizations of young people—almost all have appealed to the political parties and to the governments in power to have the voting age lowered to 18 so that they can participate in the same way as the older citizens of Canada have participated. They want to serve their country. We want to see them serve their country and, if, in fact, they could serve their country at a lower age, then I would be prepared to ask for a lower age. However, at this point at least, I think that those aged 18 are ready, they are willing, and the Parliament of Canada should permit them to vote.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. Willis, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 4, 1969, at 8 p.m.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION AUTHORIZING COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hon. Paul Martin, with leave of the Senate, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report to the Senate from time to time on any matter relating to foreign and Commonwealth affairs generally, on any matter assigned to the said committee by the Rules of the Senate, and, in particular, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, on any matter concerning the Caribbean area; and
> That the said committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the foregoing purposes, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amounts as the committee may determine.

Hon. John B. Aird: Honourable senators, I would like to outline briefly the intent and purpose of the motion that has just now been put to the house in the hope of obtaining its approval. As you know, I have been appointed chairman of the new Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Aird: —and over the past week I, together with others, have been giving concentrated consideration to the best way in which this committee can operate effectively and productively.

Obviously, under the rules pertaining thereto, the committee has the widest terms of reference, and in putting this specific motion before the house there is no intention of inhibiting or in any way restricting the broad terms of reference that are available to it.

I have had lengthy discussions with the Leader of the Government in the Senate (Hon. Mr. Martin), and I have discussed the matter with the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn). I have also done my best to contact each and every member of this committee over the past ten days. To those that I have been unable to contact I convey my apologies. To those persons I have contacted I have outlined in general terms the proposal that I am submitting tonight, and I must say I am extremely gratified by their reaction. In particular, I was personally pleased by the enthusiastic endorsement given to my proposal by Senator Thorvaldson, the distinguished former chairman of this committee, who now of course is chairman of the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Honourable senators, there seems to be a general concensus that rather than attack problems relating to the field of foreign affairs in a wide and perhaps diffused fashion, it would be in the interests of this committee and assist in obtaining an effective result if it were to focus its attention on a specific area, so that Canada's relationship thereto could be examined with particularity. In other words, this committee should address itself to areas of study that are of prime importance to Canada, but on an overall and on a long-term scale.

After much consideration and discussion with as many interested people as possible, the Caribbean area has been selected as our first target. If I may say so, a good deal of preliminary organization has already taken place, and arrangements have now been made to call our first expert witness on Thursday, February 13.

I believe that the Caribbean area presents to Canada a particular challenge, inasmuch there are present there most of the problems plaguing the peace of the world—problems of size, race, economic need and of differing political and social goals. Inasmuch as Canada cares about these issues, the Caribbean allows a unique opportunity for Canadian involvement. Not only is the region of a size to attempt a considerable and perhaps decisive impact by a Canadian program, but there is already a predisposition in the area for a Canadian presence. Furthermore, Britain's withdrawal and the apparent disinclination of the United States to increase its commitment in the area, leave a neat geographical sphere of influence where Canadian effort will not be overshadowed.

Honourable senators, the type of program that we have in mind for the committee envisages the calling of about twelve expert witnesses on a weekly basis. Naturally, the program will be subject to change as it unfolds, but preliminary planning is that prior to the Easter recess we will call about six highly qualified and expert witnesses who will set the background of the Caribbean scene in a general sense. Following the Easter recess, we will call witnesses who, in turn, will describe Canada's position in the area in as many phases as possible, and we trust that some responsible conclusions will be drawn that could result in a productive Canadian strategy.

In order to assist the committee in its deliberations, I have had extensive conversations with Mr. Peter Dobell, Director of the Canadian Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade. He has indicated his full support, and it is through this office that the program of witnesses will be arranged and organized.

It is felt that very little additional staff will be required. At the moment it is the intention that one additional person should be retained in order to assist the committee in this specific study. As you have been advised, the first organizational meeting of the Committee on Foreign Affairs will be held this Thursday and at that time the details of the program will be fully discussed.

Honourable senators, I am sure that it is realized by all of you—it certainly is by me—that this is a project that cannot be undertaken lightly. It will require a good deal of organization and effort on the part of the committee, and I trust that it will receive the support and the interest of all honourable senators. I believe that the subject is of prime importance to Canadians and must be dealt with properly and in depth.

It seems to me that this forum is particularly adapted to this type of endeavour and, if this project is successful, it would be the intention of the committee to proceed with studies of other areas that have particular interest to Canadians.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: NATO.

Hon. Mr. Aird: Yes, sir. For example, it seems self-evident that we should have a greater intensive knowledge of those countries on the Pacific rim and, in particular, Canada's relationship with Japan.

Without going into extensive details concerning the Caribbean, it will be appreciated that we will be considering problems of trade and aid, agriculture, tourism, finance, industry and resources, transportation and communications, independence and nationalism, Black Power education and even Communism. These are some of the problems that face the Caribbean area and towards which Canada should have a strategy.

Honourable senators, I therefore commend this motion for your consideration in the hope that this committee will be given an opportunity to render this important service to the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

SPECIAL CTV NETWORK PROGRAM—REPLY TO CRITICISM—PRIVILEGE

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege. This is the first opportunity I have had to draw the Senate's attention to two inaccuracies which appear on page 917 in the Senate Hansard, referring to the special CTV television network program of the Senate. The honourable Senator Choquette, at page 917, said, in part:

> That was a première to Senator Davey and others who hand-picked the people who were going to be shown and seen on that program.

I want to assure Senator Choquette and all honourable senators that I did not pick the people who appeared on the program, nor did I select those who were interviewed in connection with the program.

On the same page, honourable Senator Thorvaldson is reported as saying, in part:

We saw to it that there was plenty of French in that program, but it was cut by the television people or by Senator Davey.

I want to assure the Senate and Senator Thorvaldson that that was not my function, nor did I cut anything out of the program—of course I would not have removed the French portion of it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question. Who was responsible for the cutting, who reviewed the film, and who decided what was to be shown?

Hon. Mr. Davey: The honourable senator may recall the discussion we had at the time. I said that the Senate would retain the opportunity of examining the finished product. We had absolutely no choice as to what was deleted from the program. In fact, I had no idea of all the film that was taken for the program: I do not know if anyone knows, except the producers.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did you view the whole film?

Hon. Mr. Davey: I viewed the film which we saw on the network later. I did not review the whole film.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Did you make any suggestions—

Hon. Mr. Davey: No, I did not.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: —as to cutting or adding?

Hon. Mr. Davey: I did not.

I think the Senate will take my point of personal privilege.

SPECIAL JOINT AND SENATE COMMITTEES

REPORTS AND CONSEQUENCES THEREOF INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Croll:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the consequences, legislative and otherwise, flowing from the adoption by the Senate of the following Reports of Committees:

1. The Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Manpower and Employment (1961).

2. The Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Land Use in Canada (1963).

3. The Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging (1966).

4. The Report of the Special Joint Committee on Consumer Credit (1967).

5. The Report of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce (1967).

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I rise merely to ask that this inquiry be placed on the Orders of the Day. On Thursday last Senator Hastings gave notice that he would ask a series of questions in connection with this inquiry. As soon as the answers to those questions are available, he will then proceed with the inquiry. For the present, the adjournment of the debate on this inquiry will stand in his name.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, for Hon. Mr. Hastings, debated adjourned.

MASS MEDIA

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Keith Davey moved, pursuant to notice:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, and in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee.

He said: Honourable senators, for purposes of the discussion this evening, I should like to take for granted the virtue and value of special Senate Committees which, as honourable senators know, have given the Senate some of its finest hours.

For me, certainly, this is an unusual speech and an unusual presentation because it is my function to persuade honourable senators of the need and value of such a committee, and to do so in such a way as not to prejudge an entire series of fascinating problems which relate directly and dramatically to the people of Canada.

For example, the best estimate is that Canadians spend 441 million hours every week watching television, that the average household in Canada—perhaps not yours, certainly not mine—watches television 42 hours a week. If you watched the hockey game last Saturday on television you were likely one of some three and three quarter million viewers. There are 107 daily newspapers in Canada, down from a peak of 138 in 1913. Every day these 107 newspapers sell 4,560,825 newspapers.

Essentially, I am proposing an objective, detached, dispassionate study of the relationship between these media and the people of Canada in order to determine the adequacy for Canada of its mass media in these changing times. For purposes of discussion, I will from time to time use the term "the Press" in its broadest sense, referring to all the major media collectively.

Let me make one thing perfectly clear at the outset. Any such study will in no way infringe upon, tamper with or otherwise concern itself with freedom of the press—one of our most cherished freedoms; indeed, one of our most sacred freedoms. A free press is the very cornerstone of democracy. It carries with it, however, a sacred public trust bestowed upon those who seek to inform and entertain at least in part for their own profit. It seems to me that we in Canada have been blessed with a press that seldom abuses that trust and is usually able to distinguish between liberty and licence.

There is, of course, one other fact about a free press in a free society: Whenever people complain to me about this newspaper or that television program, I am inclined to point out to them that no one makes them buy a particular newspaper or makes them watch a particular television program. But, honourable senators, it really is not that simple, because the press directly and indirectly touches and, indeed, influences all of our lives all of the time.

In essence, I would like to discover whether Canadians get the press they need or simply the press they deserve. Such a national accounting for the media, and especially for newspapers, I suggest is long overdue. I am convinced it would be of great benefit to the people of Canada and to the press itself. Many controversial aspects will have to be examined in detail and, therefore, it is terribly important that we do not determine our positions on these various issues in advance. As with most controversial matters, there are two sides to this question. I would hope that we could examine each side calmly, carefully, critically and in depth.

My own limited credentials may, at least, indicate a token understanding of these problems. Last Saturday my father was honoured by the Toronto Star Quarter Century Club. He completed 50 years of service, not as a journalist but rather on the production side. Even now he is the Assistant Production Manager of the biggest daily newspaper in Canada. Doubtless he is the last non-university graduate to hold such a post. He is proud of that record, and of course I am proud of him. Little wonder, honourable senators, that as a boy I collected newspaper editorial page mastheads from all over the world; little wonder I once aspired to a career in journalism. It has been said a thousand times that Members of Parliament aspire to sit in the Press Gallery and members of the Press gallery aspire to sit on the floor of Parliament. Indeed several have made the transition, but usually not of their own choosing.

As I see it, here are some of the things we would have to examine: the area of ownership and control of the media—and let me say at once this is just one phase of the study I am proposing. There are three major areas of interest, perhaps of concern, and I think it fair to say that a fourth area of concern, foreign ownship of the media, finally appears to be well in hand. We now have legislation dealing with foreign ownership of the press and broadcasting. Only one other slight problem remains, that known in the industry as "grandfathering", relating to the fact that the legislation is not retroactive. So we are left with a problem of foreign ownership, but that is something we will have to live with. The three major areas of ownership and control which concern me and which should concern you, honourable senators, are chain ownership, mixed media ownership and monopoly situations.

By way of example only, because this is not intended as an exhaustive list of these various types of ownership, let me set before you one or two examples. There are three major newspaper chains in Canada. There is the Thomson group with 27 dailies and 14 weekly newspapers. There is F. P. Publications with 10 dailies. These combined have the largest circulation of any newspaper group in Canada, with some 950,000 readers every day. Then there is the Southam Press with 11 daily newspapers. There are some smaller chains, and the net result is that 55 of the 107 daily newspapers in Canada—more than half—belong to this chain ownership. Each one of these chains has extensive broadcasting holdings and so do seven of the 52 independent newspapers in Canada.

As far as monopolies are concerned, let me suggest some examples—and I want to stress again that this is not an exhaustive list but a few examples only. First, there are the big one-newspaper cities like Edmonton or Hamilton. There is one entire province, New Brunswick, in which the press is controlled by a single owner. This one person controls all the daily newspapers. Then you have the City of London where one group controls the only newspaper, the only television station and the major radio station. Similarly in Regina, one owner owns the Regina Leader-Post and CKCK radio and CKCK television. I should mention that in the case of both London and Regina there is some minimal radio competition.

I want to make it perfectly clear, honourable senators, that I am not passing judgment on all or any of these situations but am merely setting one or two examples before you.

Now there is one essential question that must be answered as to this concentration of ownership. Let me first make it perfectly clear to honourable senators that this is an outgoing trend and an accelerating process. Even since I gave notice of my motion to the Senate, the Southam Press has acquired the daily newspaper in Owen Sound and control of the Montreal Gazette. Therefore, the essential question is this: Is such a concentration of ownership necessarily a dangerous thing? Personally, I am inclined to think that it is.

Allow me to quote an item from last week's issue of Time magazine referring to a ruling handed down by the United States Communications Commission in a Boston television situation. It says, "the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is in the public interest." This is, of course, no less true in Canada. However, those who own the media quickly raise points in their own defence, and certainly the points they raise have some validity and will have to be examined in considerable detail by any committee. The first point relates to their essential economic facts of communication life, that only through such a concentration of ownership are many areas of Canada served at all by radio stations and/or newspapers, and again, that only by such a concentration of ownership is a degree of competition made possible in radio or in newspapers in many other parts of Canada. As well, the owners of the chain media contend that in their broadcasting and newspaper chains individual members retain the widest possible degree of editorial freedom.

Certainly, honourable senators, it takes a great deal of money to run a modern newspaper or television station. In a single newspaper, costs are staggering when related to profit potential. Hopefully, the Senate committee I am proposing could examine these production costs in some detail as they exist at the present time, along with the likely development of future techniques which may well dramatically cut costs of newspaper production that bring in their wake an entire series of new and different labour problems. As an aside, but not totally unrelated, I would mention that one of Lord Thomson's newspapers, the historic old Peterborough Examiner, is strikebound at the present time. It is continuing to publish and has done so since the strike began on November 2 last. A recent Globe and Mail article, I think, set the issue out rather clearly in these words:

> The 23 strikers are members of the Peterborough unit of the Toronto Newspaper Guild, certified as bargaining agent at The Examiner last May. They seek a one-year contract providing for $150 a week for senior reporters with five years experience.
> The company has offered a three-year contract with a minimum of $125.25 a week for senior reporters in the last year. Senior reporters now are paid $120 a week.

Honourable senators, $120 a week is $6,240 a year. I will not ask honourable senators if they and their families could live on this much money because millions of Canadians are in fact doing so, but are they in highly sensitive positions of influence and can Canadian journalism honestly continue to attract bright young people with this kind of meagre pot at the end of the journalistic rainbow?

Then of course there is another interesting newspaper strike which is still on and which has been on for the past five years and which concerns the three daily newspapers in Toronto. One cannot help wondering how many editorials would have appeared in the Toronto press had any other Toronto industry been similarly strikebound for such a long period of time.

Honourable senators, it was not by accident that my motion stated "ownership and control", because there is no one industry in Canada which has so managed to obscure exactly who owns what, and yet I can think of no other industry in which such knowledge is of more vital consequence to the ultimate consumer. Again I would point to the importance of this by giving one or two examples in passing.

There is a company in and around Toronto called Inland Publications, which, I understand, publishes eight community weekly newspapers in the Toronto area, and then a Sunday newspaper in Toronto called the Sunday Sun. I have made it my business to check, and, as near as I am able to determine, Inland Publications and the Sunday Sun are the products of the Toronto Telegram. Why do they not say so? There is nothing to hide. The Sunday Sun is rather a good newspaper and gives excellent coverage of the Saturday night hockey games.

Then again, in broadcasting, Selkirk Holdings—which is involved in six radio stations, five television stations and five cable systems—is 60 per cent owned by the Pearson group of Calgary, 30 per cent by Southam's, and 10 per cent by other people. I am sure that somewhere someone knows exactly who really owns this Selkirk group. Aside from the inherent danger in monopoly situations, I am not suggesting there is anything intrinsically wrong in this kind of structure, apart from the fact it takes a Philadelphia lawyer to understand it, and there is no way that the viewer or listener knows who is influencing his life so directly every day.

One interesting footnote to my proposal and to this entire area, honourable senators, is that several weeks after I gave my Notice of Motion the following self-explanatory item appeared in newspapers across Canada—again, I read from the Globe and Mail:

> The Quebec Legislative Assembly created a special committee yesterday to study freedom of the press—a move prompted by the growing ownership role of Montreal financier Paul Desmarais in Canada's French-language newspapers.
> The purchases left only six French-language dailies in Canada which were not part of chains:
> —The Desmarais chain, linked to Power Corp. or its subsidiaries, includes La Presse (Montreal), La Tribune (Sherbrooke), Le Nouvelliste (Trois-Rivieres), and the Granby paper. The chain also includes five weeklies, four radio stations and two television stations.

Thus, the problem is a real one in Quebec, and no doubt the Quebec committee, once it is established, and our committee, if we are able to establish it, would be covering much of the same ground. Hopefully, we could cooperate in a way which would make each study more meaningful.

Any discussion of the media inevitably involves a discussion of advertising, and certainly the proposed committee would want to examine the role of advertising, but only as it relates to the economics of the communications industry, other advertising problems, the efficacy of advertising, the role of advertising in the overall economy, the American influence on Canadian advertising—really examine it within the terms of reference of this particular study, but only the economic factor of advertising as it relates to media and whether or not advertisers are able to exert undue influence on the media. While there may be exceptions to the contrary, I am inclined to think they cannot. In any event, honourable senators should know and understand the contribution which advertising makes to the Canadian media.

Perhaps the following statistics will make that relationship more meaningful. This is a report from Marketing, one of the advertising trade papers in Canada:

> Media should gross $978 million in advertising revenue in 1968, up 6 per cent over last year's preliminary total of $923 million, according to the Maclean-Hunter Research Bureau's estimates.
> Assuming this trend continues, the industry should reach $1,042 million in 1969 for an overall increase of 6.5 per cent, the bureau says.

Honourable senators will be interested to note:

> Daily newspapers, still getting a lion's share, are expected to recover from their last year's low of 29.3 per cent to 30 per cent for 1968.

That is to be contrasted with 10 per cent for radio and 12.9 per cent for television.

Earlier press reports on my Notice of Motion tended to ignore the second important aspect of this study, which would be the impact and influence of the mass media, especially newspapers and television. We would want to study what the functions of the media really are; what they are conceived to be by their owners and the people of Canada; and, finally, what their functions should in fact be.

Perhaps this is a useful time to turn to a further discussion of newspapers. What, in fact, are desirable press standards? What are the criteria of great newspapers?

It so happens that an American professor of Journalism, John C. Merrill, of the School of Journalism, University of Missouri, recently published a book called The Elite Press: Great Newspapers of the World. He ventures his opinion of the top 100 newspapers of the world, and gives a detailed profile of his top 40; but he makes it perfectly clear this is his list, that these are his criteria. He points out a degree of subjectivity in drawing up the list would be inevitable and even desirable. So, each honourable senator could, for example, draw up his or her list of the top 10 newspapers in Canada. The lists would vary and so would the criteria.

At page 16 the author offers some pertinent advice on this very point:

> Without a doubt, the ideological position which a press critic sees himself as taking affects his evaluation of a particular newspaper. This is a quite human tendency, although it evidences considerable lack of sophistication. Liberals should read quality newspapers of all ideological persuasions if they are to be truly liberal, and conservatives should do the same thing if they are to be truly conservative. With persons, as with newspapers, the tag that one carries should have little or nothing to do with his quality or with the sincerity with which he seeks the truth.

Thus we should expect Senator Roebuck to pore over the Ottawa Journal each and every day, and I can just see Senator Walker reading the Toronto Star each night in his office. But the lists will vary and so will the criteria.

So, let us examine the author's criteria, of which he lists 10 at page 28 in his book. They are as follows:

1. Completeness of coverage in foreign and international affairs, business, the arts, science, and education.

I should add that earlier on in the book he has this interesting paragraph on this very point:

> Canadian editors of middle-area dailies, on the other hand, although greatly influenced by American journalism, tend to feel that the lack of a national press in Canada imposes a special obligation on them to present to their readers a comprehensive picture of the world. This may result, as some critics of the Canadian press have suggested, in masses of grey and dull type, but at least the Canadian reader of the average daily, in the opinion of the editor of the Montreal Star, gets a more thorough world picture than does his opposite number south of the border.

Returning to the professor's ten criteria:

2. Concern with interpretive pieces, backgrounding articles, and depth news articles.

3. Typographical and general editorial dignity.

4. Lack of sensationalism.

5. Depth and analytical perception of stories.

6. Absence of hysteria and cultural tone.

7. Thorough and impartial news coverage and serious-minded, moral approach to news.

8. Imagination, decency, interest in democratic problems and humanity.

9. Excellent editorial page.

10. Orientation that rises above provincialism and sensationalism.

Then the author actually provides us with something that he calls the "Merrill Elite Press Pyramid" in which he lists what are in his opinion the top 100 newspapers of the world. There are five Canadian papers so listed, but none of them in his "Primary Elite". He considers the 10 finest newspapers in the world to be The New York Times, Neue Zürcher Zeitung (Zurich), Le Monde (Paris), The Guardian (London/Manchester), The Times (London), Pravda (Moscow), Jen-min Jih-pao (Peking), Borba (Belgrade), Osservatore Romano (Vatican City), ABC (Madrid).

In his so-called "Secondary Elite" he includes one Canadian newspaper, the Globe and Mail (Toronto).

In his "Tertiary Elite" he includes 30 newspapers, among them the Winnipeg Free Press. In his final 40 newspapers he includes La Presse, the Montreal Star and the Toronto Daily Star.

It is interesting to note that following this press pyramid he goes into a detailed profile analysis of all the papers, including the five Canadian papers. I think that this is extremely interesting reading. In fact, it is even entertaining when one reads this of the Globe and Mail:

> The paper considers itself today as independent politically, but it is by no means neutral. Ideologically the paper is to the Right, but certainly to the thoughtful and calm Right.

By "the thoughtful and calm Right" I suppose he means Richard Needham or even Scott Young.

Implicit in the very mention of criteria is some form of press abuse. This takes many forms, honourable senators, and most stem from the twin economic dilemmas of newspapers, namely, the spiralling costs of production that I have already referred to, and the resultant need to acquire mass circulation. Sadly, the need to compete often means the need to entertain rather than to inform and so, for example, the New York Daily News outsells the New York Times by more than two to one every day. This is a worldwide problem, and of course press standards vary greatly throughout the world.

I should add at once that we are fortunate in Canada because certainly there is no gutter press of consequence, and there is very little yellow journalism. Of course there is some sensation, some shock, some accent on the negative, but more often than not these are swallowed up in a sea of solid grey journalism.

As I have mentioned, there are many forms of press abuse. I have been able to compile quite a long list since I gave notice of my motion, and perhaps the committee will examine these and others that the people of Canada will bring forward. As examples, I mention misrepresentation, inaccuracy, distortion, suppression, intrusion, and bad taste. I should say again that frequently these slips from grace by Canadian newspapers can very often be explained away, or sometimes dealt with legally. The press of Canada is inclined to police itself, and it seems to me it does so with reasonable effectiveness.

Of far greater concern, when we are thinking of Canadian newspapers, is the fact that they are at times dull, and are often provincial and even parochial in their outlook. There is, let it be noted, a tremendous and at times dramatic discrepancy in Canadian journalistic standards from coast to coast. Hopefully, there can be an examination at some length of certain objectives in respect of economic and journalistic criteria. For example, is news coverage everywhere in Canada full, fair, and factual? So, with all the media, we would hope to examine circulation patterns and trends, and so on.

I fear that I have discussed newspapers at too great a length, and yet there remain many critical areas which conceivably will be raised and which should be examined. These include postal rates, wire services, and perhaps even the so-called new journalism—the writing of people in the United States like Norman Mailer, Gay Talese and Tom Wolf, and perhaps Peter Newman here in Canada, and even the instant folklore of Judy LaMarsh. We might also want to have some discussion of press freedom as it relates to good taste. We might be able to determine the fine line between censorship and what Dennis Braithwaite has described in the Telegram as erotic over-kill.

Television and radio are subject to Government control because the airwaves of course belong to the people of Canada. Newspapers, on the other hand, operate substantially in the realm of free, private enterprise, but this is only because some kind of public trust is involved—a public trust which, for example, guarantees a free press. I would not argue, honourable senators, for any form of Government press control. There are, however, at least two broadcasting criteria which might usefully and unofficially be applied to Canadian newspaper publishers. The new broadcasting act calls upon every broadcaster in the country to contribute towards national unity. Whether or not they do this is another question, and one for the C.R.T.C. I can certainly think of some broadcasters who do not. But what about the press? Does it—all of it, everywhere in Canada—contribute to national unity? What about the 55 per cent Canadian content rule which television must live with? What if it was applied to print? Perhaps it should be applied only to newspaper features like comic strips, astrology columns, and advice to the lovelorn.

As originally conceived, I wanted to propose a study of print only. However, newspapers do not exist in a vacuum, not even in a communications vacuum. Indeed, the constant interrelation and interconnection between print and television is virtually a study in itself. Here I digress only slightly to take issue—perhaps "quibble" is a better word—with two significant communications authorities, one of whom is Marshall McLuhan, and the other is Senator Grattan O'Leary. McLuhan has built a stunning reputation as a communications expert, beginning perhaps with his contention that the medium is the message. Perhaps you will allow me to quote from the preview page of the second paperback edition of Marshall McLuhan's book, Understanding Media:

> Marshall McLuhan sees modern man as the relic of the logical, linear, "hot" culture of movable type. Stunned by his encounter with the "cool" world of mass communication, man has struggled for equilibrium—and the result has been apathy, anxiety and alienation.
> The road to recovery, McLuhan suggests, is to recognize that electronic media are subtly and constantly altering our perceptual senses. The serial logic of print is fading out before the intuitive "mosaic" of instantaneous communication. Books "contain," TV "involves". The new vision is mythic, tribal, decentralized. Man now lives in a global-sized village, and is returning to the values and perceptions of a pre-literate culture.

I am concerned by the heading or the lead on that page which is "Good-bye to Gutenberg".

It seems to me, honourable senators, that this outstanding Canadian scholar is prematurely discounting the printed word as a dramatic fact in all of our lives, especially when in terms of pure public relations Mr. McLuhan has built almost his entire reputation on the printed word.

It is reported that Marshall McLuhan from time to time counsels Prime Minister Trudeau. It is in no critical sense that I hope there is no co-relation between that counselling and Christina Newman's contention in Saturday Night last September that > Trudeau can afford to be cool to the press so long as he has the public's adoration and the ability to maintain it through TV.

It is not often that I disagree with the distinguished senator from Carleton, but honourable senators will perhaps recall the debate on the Post Office bill in the committee stage, featuring as it did the brilliant exchange between the Postmaster General and the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). In that debate Senator O'Leary contended, as I recall, that there is no such thing as electronic journalism. Short of some semantic differential, surely electronic journalism exists. I certainly think so, and so does Professor William Wood of the Graduate School of Journalism at Columbia, who contends in his book Electronic Journalism that the most important single news source for the general public is in fact television. I would therefore hope that my distinguished colleague might agree with me that people like Douglas Leiterman and Patrick Watson, and, yes, Norman DePoe, are in fact electronic journalists.

The nub of the television newspaper confrontation, like so much else, relates directly to revenue, to circulation and to advertising. Toronto offers an interesting case in point, where there are three daily newspapers still in competition—perhaps a unique situation in all of North America. The year 1945 was truly the last pre-television year. Since 1945 the population of Metropolitan Toronto has literally doubled. In 1945 the total daily circulation of the three Toronto papers was 660,000. Today it is 843,000, with two-thirds of that circulation being in the metropolitan city area. Thus, honourable senators, the population of the metropolitan area has doubled but the circulation of the Toronto newspapers has increased by only 25 per cent.

Some may say, "Oh yes, the papers cost three cents then and they cost 10 cents now, and really it is an increase in the cost of advertising lineage." These, of course, are valid contentions.

Let us look at Detroit. I should like to quote from an article written by Stanley Brown, which appeared in the November 1968 issue of Fortune, entitled, "267 Days Without a Newspaper". Here is a summary of that article.

> Interunion rivalry among fourteen locals idled the presses of the Detroit News and Free Press for nearly nine months, but the city's economy remained buoyant and its people generally well informed. No longer the unquestioned voice of the community, the big-city newspaper must now vie with—and its void can be filled by—other media. The circulation of TV Guide multiplied tenfold during the strike, identifying one major function of home-town papers: to get people to the TV set on time. Merchants found many alternative ways to advertise: radio and TV stations had hardly an unsold minute. Neighbourhood and suburban weeklies and throwaways were crammed with ads, and circulation zoomed both for them and for the metropolitan editions of national magazines. Now Detroit's two dailies are fighting to recapture their readers, whose indifference suggests they might have been willing to go on without the metros indefinitely.

Newspapers are virtually free from both government regulation and any continuing regular criticism. For example, in the 1968 election the CRTC ordered Liberal candidate Philip Givens in York West to cease and desist his regular daily broadcast on CHUM, while Douglas Fisher, the NDP candidate in the York Centre Riding continued his daily column in The Telegram. I do not put either of these points forward as a criticism but to illustrate in a rather concise way the effect of government regulations. For example, the press criticizes everyone everywhere every day—television, books, movies, and even politicians—but no one finds time to really criticize the press or newspapers on a regular basis.

Press coverage of broadcasting news is an especially interesting case in point. I quote an article in the Toronto Telegram of December 14 by the columnist Ron Haggart:

> Newspaper owners are by definition powerful men. The owners of radio and television stations are also powerful men. When the owners of both turn out to be the same people, the total of their power is greater than the sum of its parts.
> Newspaper owners who also own broadcasting outlets, or who hope to own them in the future, therefore have a special responsibility to keep balance and fairness in their coverage of broadcasting news.
> The newspaper most open to public scrutiny because of its broadcasting interests is, of course, The Telegram, which owns Channel 9.
> When a provincial commission reported this week on fluoridation poisoning in the Dunville area, the Star and the Globe both thought the most important point was the claim that human life had not been endangered by the fluorides from a fertilizer plant.
> But The Telegram, strangely enough, thought otherwise, and its main headline of the day, and all of the story on Page One, was devoted to the commission's complaints that a CBC program on the subject had been untruthful and irresponsible.
> The Commission also complained that news reports on Channel 9 were distorted and exaggerated—but you had to wait until the 17th paragraph (on Page 4) before finding that piece of information.
> If newspapers are to maintain their deserved reputation as the information source least susceptible to petty pressures, they must take pains to see that reports and comments on their broadcasting rivals are scrupulously fair and accurate. As recent events show, they do not always succeed.

It should be noted in passing that the column did appear in The Telegram.

So, honourable senators, I would hope television could be included in the study I am proposing—included in spite of the fact that it is the most examined, the most cross-examined and the most self-examined medium in the history of communication, up to and including the CRTC. Such a vital factor of our national life surely should not be ignored in the important study I am proposing.

There is nothing I can usefully add at this point on the control and ownership of television. Instead, let me direct your attention to one or two unique and significant television problems. Television news coverage is a case in point, both newscasts and live coverage.

The nub of the issue is: does the television camera change the very nature of the event simply by covering it? Does the camera report events or does it shape them? There are many intriguing and interesting examples. With your forbearance, honourable senators, I should like to quote from a now defunct magazine called New York. In a recent issue, in an article by Sophy Burnham entitled "Telling it Like it Isn't", one reads, in a reference to the Democratic Convention:

> Even Mayor Daley, a dinosaur from the political past, was aware of the impact the television would give to events, and he did his best to block the coverage. Later on the last night of the convention, he would attack television for causing violence: "I think having a TV camera on a block is like having a fire alarm or a snorkel," he said in an angry television interview.

David Brinkley acidly retorted that if the coverage was lop-sided, it was partly due to the Mayor's own restrictions.

If the hippies, born to TV, were manipulating the medium to their own uses, television was influencing the convention. Even in its absence it was an integral part of the political events, shaping the chaos and confusion into meaningful order, selecting, highlighting, shifting events to eliminate the boredom. It cut away to interviews. It showed the riots outside the Convention Hall. Everyone was watching. The press were watching TV news in the Press Room behind the podium, and the delegates were watching it on portable sets on the floor.

Whenever anything of interest happened, a stream of newsmen converged on the event—and immediately the nature of the happening changed.

Leslie Millin, an excellent television writer in the Globe and Mail reported in the November 30 issue of The Globe Magazine as follows:

If you believe what you see on television newscasts, you are right in there with the comfortable majority of the North American population that regards television as the primary, and most believable, source of news.

The figures on that score were ferreted out by Roper Research Associates in the United States. Sixty-four per cent said they relied on TV as their principal source of news while 55 per cent picked newspapers (some insisted on both media). Even among the college-educated, asked what news medium they would choose above others, 39 per cent wanted television, 38 per cent newspapers, 13 per cent radio and 8 per cent magazines.

Yet for all the sway it holds among the populace—and because of it—television news has increasingly come in for criticism by politicians, policemen and the press, as well as many concerned members of the general public. This mirror of the world's issues is now itself an issue.

Television newscast of necessity can skim only the very surface of an event they are covering. Television newscasts of necessity are subject to the dictates of show business economics. Indeed in television newscasts we even have a star system. In 1964, David Brinkley, covering the Rockefeller rally in California, was actually able to outdraw the candidates. I do not think Norman DePoe has quite reached that proportion, but it is interesting to observe his activity within the Liberal or Conservative conventions when he was often a greater focal point of interest than many of the key delegates. Of course, the television journalists, as you know, face a special set of problems. The first is that the picture becomes virtually an end unto itself and yet the viewer will say, "I saw it with my own eyes." It is as if the camera virtually became an extension of oneself. Momentarily we tend to forget that someone has pre-selected what it is we are going to see and indeed has pre-selected what aspect of the event it is that we are going to see.

Yet, honourable senators, how can we be too critical of news coverage, which would take us virtually to the edge of the moon? This was an incredible journey, witnessed by millions and probably by more people than ever saw any single event in the history of man. We were there, we saw it in our own homes, with our families on the eve of Christmas. Yes, indeed, joy to the world! But, then there is the sad but equally and critical spectacle of the Vietnam war alive and in colour.

It is with some hesitation that I quote Marshall McLuhan. My hesitation relates to the fact that perhaps this is the first time Playboy magazine has ever been quoted in the august Senate chamber. I do so, however, because I want to make a reference to this magazine in a moment or two when I discuss the Canadian magazine industry. Marshall McLuhan on this particular point in the December Playboy says as follows:

The decentralization of war came with radio in World War Two. Churchill and Roosevelt were big tribal chieftains who used the fireside as the firing line. World War Two decentralized via radio into guerrilla tactics. As for World War Three, a student of mine wrote: "The Vietnam war is the first world war ever fought on American soil." Thanks to TV, parents have seen their sons killed on the seven-o'clock news. In a word, a hot war cannot be endured on a cool medium.

What, in fact, has the coverage of the Vietnam war done for the war itself, to our attitude to the war or to the peace movement? The relevancy to Canada should be obvious, honourable senators, both because of the overflow coverage of American television in Canada and because of our own national newscasts.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would like to make sure that the honourable Senator Davey is not insisting that this edition of Playboy be tabled.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Davey: No, Mr. Speaker.

Honourable senators, one of the most troublesome dilemma of television news coverage is the violence on newscasts and in entertainment.

Perhaps I should establish the extent of violence on television. I would submit for your consideration just three pieces of evidence. The first appeared in the special August edition of McCall's magazine:

> For those who are unaware of the extent of violence on television, our researchers analyzed the television listings, including televised movies, in the New York Times and TV Guide for the weeks of June 2 (the week Senator Kennedy was assassinated) as well as the week immediately following his death (June 9).

There was a detailed analysis which I will not repeat, but the summary is that in the week of June 2 there were 110 hours of violent television—46 per cent; in the week of June 9, 144 hours of violent television—59 per cent.

A United States Senate Subcommittee, examining violence on television, reported that in one week on the seven television stations in Los Angeles, and this was in 1960, there were 114 murders, 128 attempted murders, 49 justifiable homicides, nine kidnappings, two suicides, three attempted rapes and six examples of physical torture.

Only last week the Christian Science Monitor reported that the 20 most violent shows on television are seen in the 7.30 to 9 o'clock period when 27 million American children are viewing television. Proportional figures are not available for Canada, but likely would be in the proportionate range, especially given the extent of overflow programming. This is vital and of dramatic concern. The effects of this violence on television is especially on children, who may seek to imitate and may be inspired, motivated or even be frightened.

This came from the recent issue of The Christian Science Monitor on this very point. Ben H. Bagdikian, the former Saturday Evening Post editor, testifying before the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, with reference to violence on television said:

> It is as though we delivered our children to someone who took them away for four or five hours of every day in their formative years to watch police interrogations, gangsters beating enemies, spies performing fatal brain surgery, and assorted daily demonstrations in how to kill and maim, interrupted from time to time by a group of actors doing caricatures of the silliest kind of adult behavior.
> Does anyone seriously contend that after 5 or 10 years of this the child's view of life is not influenced?

Well, yes, some people do in fact contend that. They are not all members of the broadcasting industry, but some are psychologists as well. There is, of course, a mass of conflicting evidence to the contrary. To my knowledge, few, if any, studies have been done in this area here in Canada.

For example, do children and adults watching the same program on television in fact see the same things? What is the correlation between violence on television and violence on the streets of America? As Harry Bruce asked, in his October 10 column in the Toronto Daily Star:

> Does a bloody riot get bloodier when TV's there?

Is there some terrible correlation between television violence and the assassinations of Martin Luther King and Robert Francis Kennedy? Is there some terrible correlation between television and, for example, the two mass slayings in Northern Saskatchewan?

To be sure, there is an industry position on this matter; surely they will say the "Wild, Wild West" and "The Avengers" and "Bonanza" are violent programs, but what about "Hamlet"; and, when you stop to think about it, what about "Little Red Riding Hood"?

Secondly, they say that surely in a free society parents are able to control what their children watch on television. I had an interesting experience myself about a year ago. My daughter, who was four at the time, was in the car when I picked up the baby sitter. They began to talk. The baby sitter, a widow of about 60 years of age, was telling my daughter that her "daddy" as my daughter called him, was dead. Immediately my daughter shot back, "Who killed him?" "Who killed him?"—such is the power of television, honourable senators, even in a home which has at least some degree of discipline.

It seems to me likely that television contributes to violence in other ways as well. One way relates not to the children but to the adults who watch television, and the kind of adults who watch television. An interesting study was published in the American magazine Media/scope, and appeared in the August 1968 edition:

> The data indicate that men and women who are heavy viewers of "violent" shows have unique demographic profiles and viewing habits that differentiate them from the rest of the adult population. They tend to be over 35, lower scaled, have less education, live in households with children, and live in smaller counties. They are very heavy viewers of TV in general, with preferences for Action shows, Mysteries and Westerns.

You can draw your own conclusions.

Honourable senators, finally, what about television coming into the poverty-ridden homes of the United States and Canada, television which portrays as the accepted norm false standards of affluence? Discontent so inspired surely could and surely does breed violence. So here is yet another dimension, not violence on television, but violence because of television.

In some ways, it seems to me that we require in Canada some determination of the extent and influence of the violence on television. Then we must ask ourselves a series of difficult questions. Can the television industry police itself? It has honestly tried in the United States, but without marked success.

Can some code be determined and, if so, should it be applied to American programs coming into Canada? Indeed, if we were able to develop such a code, I suggest that the American authorities would adopt it almost immediately.

Honourable senators, I hope that I am not prejudging this matter of violence on television. I think there is a clear need for the activity and the judgment of a Senate committee.

Of the myriad of other television problems perhaps the central unresolved problem is that of the community antenna, more popularly known as cable television. Some weeks ago, the weekend supplement of the Toronto Star contained a concise definition of what exactly cablevision is. In case any honourable senator may have some doubt about it, I quote it the words:

> Cable TV, known as CATV (community antenna television), is the piping in of TV signals to your set by a private company using special coaxial cable installed by Bell Canada. The cable company uses a precision antenna to pick up signals, strengthens them electronically and feeds them into a coaxial cable which goes to subscribers' houses and apartments.
> Private CATV operator Bell Telephone and subscriber; put them together and you get the service. First, the operator must have a licence from the Canadian Radio Television Commission. Then, he places his order for lines with Bell Canada. He sets up one "super" antenna to serve his area. TV signals from it are fed into electronic equipment, strengthened and clarified. Then, the signals are piped to Bell lines and carried to the subscriber's home where the operator has installed an outlet to pick up the signals.
> A CATV master antenna costs from $12,000 to $35,000.

To the subscriber, the cost is the same—about $4.50 a month, or about $50 a year. In return, the subscriber receives more channels and better reception.

Last April 1, CRTC took over the licensing of cablevision and immediately instituted a freeze. Even now, they are facing and presently dealing with a tremendous backlog of applications in every section of country. Prior to that time, April 1, there had been indiscriminate licensing by the Department of Transport without any apparent ground rules. The net result has been that cable television is now available over more than 300 systems in Canada and is reaching 400,000 cable homes.

Perhaps one problem is the fact that the Americans are able to dominate the cablevision market, particularly in Canada, particularly by Famous Players and CBS, but there can be no turning back. Cablevision is a fact of life. It is in fact a big and growing jungle, whose potential no one really understands and whose regulation no one has really yet determined.

Honourable senators, there are half a dozen attendant problems. There is the problem of copyright. There is the fact that there is no program content control. There is the problem of additional American competition for Canadian television. There is the decision that has to be made, whether to police 300 networks across Canada or police several big networks. There is the problem for advertisers in the diminished commercial impact. There is, of course, the inevitability of shifting existing arrangements which may have been made in the old days.

Professional football offers an interesting case in point, as cablevision frustrates the Canadian Football League's blackout arrangements. It seems to me that the solution is relatively simple. I put it forward with some reluctance, because when I left football in 1967 I took a self-imposed vow of silence. In what I am about to say I am perhaps breaking the letter of that self-imposed vow, but I want to assure you, and to assure myself, that I intend to maintain the spirit of it—once I have made this particular observation. It seems to me that all the owners of the Canadian Football League teams have to do in order to frustrate cablevision is to end their ludicrous and antiquated system of blackouts.

It will be said that this is not economically feasible. I think it is, and certainly it could be tried for at least one season. Any decrease in attendance which is not in itself an established fact would be more than offset by greater advantages because of the increased television exposure. Any loss of gate revenue—and again certainly not an established fact—would be more than offset by expanded television sponsors' revenue. Indeed, football blackouts now occur most frequently in those major eastern markets which attract the advertisers in the first place. Indeed, I am satisfied that there are sponsors who could be persuaded to purchase all of the empty seats which might be created by the removal of the blackout. It will be said these empty seats are bad public relations, but they are there anyway—they were there in droves two years ago in Montreal and last year in Winnipeg as well.

There are two sides to every story, and many football people will question my analysis. The chairman of the CRTC has stated that the matter will be resolved, not in the best interests of the cable operators nor in the best interests of the football owners but in the best interests of the people of Canada. That will be a difficult determination, less because of the football treasury than because of the problem of copyright. The FCC in the United States has already begun to grapple with the problems of regulating cablevision. No doubt the CRTC will be watching their activity with keen interest. Some of the proposals might call on cable operators to obtain permission from local broadcasters before airing particular programs. Again, cable operators could be called upon to originate broadcasts of their own. In any event, it is an intriguing area and one we should examine particularly as it relates to the entire communications industry.

There are, as I have said, a myriad of other television problems and opportunities—everything from educational television to broadcast ratings which hold the entire industry in their grip. It is not my intention to discuss these here tonight, nor will time permit discussion of satellite potential or even such a vibrant entity as radio. These things are all part of the complicated picture, which also includes CBC, CTV and CRTV. If a committee is set up it will have to examine the role and function of the CRTC, which, after all, is a Government agency and not a power unto itself.

It must be noted that CRTC is a new agency with new people who appear to be launched upon specific and positive courses of action. So, hopefully, we could concentrate the television aspect of our study on television's relationship with other media and with the people it purports to serve.

Perhaps before I conclude my remarks I could return to print for just a moment or two, to the Canadian periodical publishing industry in general and to the magazine industry in particular. I could almost subtitle this portion of my remarks, The O'Leary Report Revisited, because that excellent document certainly stands up today.

Not even Canada's self-proclaimed national newspaper, the Globe and Mail, is really a national newspaper in the classic sense, but it comes close and deserves our respect because of it. However, the absence of any national press underscores the importance of the Canadian magazine industry, an industry which is in trouble. Perhaps the basic problem again is inextricably linked up with problems of available advertising revenue. Each medium competes frantically with every other for every advertising dollar, but Canadian magazines have two special problems. One is the overflow of advertising and circulation from American magazines in Canada; the other is the uneven competition from the so-called Canadian editions of American magazines.

The pros and cons in this particular discussion are well and thoughtfully set forth in the report itself, which I have been re-examining. It is certainly no ultra-nationalistic document, as is made clear in the preface, from which I would like to quote in part:

> The view of the Commission is that in an area as vital and sensitive as that of the press, whatever is done should be positive rather than negative, with the goal the promotion of the Canadian periodical, not the suppression of the foreign.

Its most basic recommendation was that Canadian corporations continue to deduct as business expenses the cost of advertising in non-Canadian publications where such advertising was directed at the Canadian market. That was in 1960, but, incredibly, nothing was done until the 1965 budget. Then, again incredibly, Time and Reader's Digest were exempted. That, doubtless, is a story in itself.

It is a little like arranging for the Detroit Red Wings to play the Russian National Hockey Team and then instructing the Red Wings to leave Gordie Howe at home. And yet, to be fair to Time and Reader's Digest, they are printed in Canada on Canadian paper by Canadians using Canadian machinery. However, the problem is their edge in know-how and production techniques as well as their ability to gather otherwise costly material at no great expense because of its use in the vast American market.

So Maclean's magazine, despite its large circulation, which at 700,000 is roughly twice that of Time magazine, continues to protest its solvency while shifting about for a winning format in a struggle to survive. Not long ago Maclean's was published on the basis of 24 issues annually. Now there are only 12 issues annually. Just today we learned that Charles Templeton is leaving CTV in order to become editor of Maclean's.

After 58 years of serving the public, the Star Weekly has disappeared. So have 20 other Canadian magazines since Senator O'Leary's report was published. It may be unfair, honourable senators, to place all these evils at the doorstep of Time and Reader's Digest. Magazines compete in the broadest sense for our time and disposable income.

I would like to comment on the passing of the Saturday Evening Post. After 147 years it is publishing its final edition this coming Saturday. As a one-time Saturday Evening Post carrier boy, I am doubtless especially nostalgic about this loss. Here is a magazine selling three and a half million copies every week, and yet it is unable to meet skyrocketing costs in the face of competition from picture magazines like Life and Look, and, latterly, television.

Someone said that very recently the Saturday Evening Post looked like a grandmother in a mini-skirt. Perhaps the end comes mercifully.

Arnold Gingrich, the publisher of Esquire, made an interesting comment on the magazine industry in a recent edition of Advertising Age, dated November 4, 1968:

> But if you don't think things have changed, just compare copies of Life and Look this year with those of ten years ago.

That was when the O'Leary report came out. The article continues:

> Contrast the amount of space they now devote to the eternal verities, to arts and letters and religion and education, to the tabloid type of picture-mongering they did a decade back, and you will find it hard to believe they're the same magazines.
> For that matter, do the same with Harper's and the Atlantic. They are the sole survivors of what used to be the backbone of magazinedom, the Quality Group. Those are the magazines that used to be considered Ivory Tower. Westbrook Pegler used to characterize them in his column as Doubledome and Deepthink, and he always got a laugh by quoting some abstruse passage from one or the other and appending the tagline, 'Boy, that's thinking!' He had another gambit, of maintaining that they had one standing article, used every other month, called 'Whither France?'
> Just look at Harper's and Atlantic today, and you will see a lively topicality, and a preoccupation with current concerns, that make the Nation and New Republic of other days seem downright apathetic.

Well, with the possible exception of Maclean-Hunter's big money-winner, Chatelaine—and possibly that is the exception which proves the rule—the economic facts of life loom large in the Canadian magazine industry. Let us take a look for a moment at the magazine industry net advertising percentage of shares which has continued to decline. In 1954 it was only 4.2 per cent; in 1962 it was 3 per cent and last year it was 2.4 per cent. That is contrasted, as honourable senators will recall, with newspapers at 30 per cent and television at 12.9 per cent. So, less revenue, less circulation and bigger costs—a vicious circle. Senator O'Leary's predictions have certainly been borne out.

I wonder if even Senator O'Leary expected a magazine like Playboy, with writers like Marshall McLuhan, Arthur C. Clarke, John Updike, Henry Miller and Theodore Sorensen, selling at a dollar a copy, would outsell Saturday Night by virtually three to one here in Canada.

Reverting to the theme of violence, I do not think that even Senator O'Leary could have foreseen the annual flood into Canada of 25 million American comic books. The situation is bad and getting worse.

Time magazine now offers its advertisers split runs and coverage of the metropolitan Toronto area only. Well, time—and no pun intended—does not permit discussion of other aspects, for example, the new trend to controlled circulation publications of even Canada's 898 weekly newspapers.

Obviously, honourable senators, I have said enough to suggest that a Senate committee could usefully re-examine this entire area.

Honourable senators, this has been a long and full speech for which I apologize. I have appreciated your attention. I would like to draw that attention, if I could, to a quotation in the current issue of Stimulus, which is an advertising agency trade paper here in Canada. The writer, Mr. Jon Hill, said:

> It is too early to discuss in detail the changes that may be necessary in the corporate structure of the media in their entirety. This can't be done until such a study... by the Senate is completed. But it is obvious that such a study is vitally necessary to understanding the impact of ownership on the mass media and, for that matter, in determining how satisfactory a job the media are doing insofar as their public trust is concerned.

The question, honourable senators, is not whether Canadians are getting the mass media they deserve, because of course they probably are. It is rather, do we get the mass media we require? Is the media contemporary? Is it relevant? These are some of the questions a special committee of the Senate could study. We have the time; we have the expertise.

Hon. Mr. McLean: Honourable senators, I have a question to put to the honourable senator. First, I congratulate him on his very outstanding discourse on the news media across Canada, the newspapers, news magazines, radio and television. He made one passing remark about my own province, New Brunswick, to the effect that the news media there were controlled by one man. I wonder if the honourable Senator Davey would be kind enough to tell us what news media are controlled by this man and what is his name.

Hon. Mr. Davey: I do not have the list in front of me. I think most honourable senators are aware of the fact that I was referring to Mr. K. C. Irving. I do not have the list in front of me now, but I will be happy to supply it to the honourable senator.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 30, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Carter for the second reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I am not in any way opposed to the good intentions of this bill. However, I am not one of those who believes that the end necessarily justifies the means, and on reading this bill I find that the means are in my judgment highly objectionable and create a very dangerous precedent.

I think there is probably general agreement that the Parliament of Canada has a responsibility in any matter coming within its jurisdiction that concerns the health of the Canadian people. I think there would be general agreement that the Parliament of Canada has a responsibility to control, again within its jurisdiction, any products that fall within that category. Nevertheless, I am going to suggest tonight that the Parliament of Canada also has a responsibility to control those to whom it gives the power to control any products such as those mentioned in the Schedule to this bill. In general I shall confine my remarks to clause 8 and the Schedule, and to one or two clauses which are affected by clause 8.

On other occasions in this chamber I have objected to the apparently growing tendency to increase the power of the executive at the expense of the legislative authority of Parliament. I am referring particularly to the powers, the sweeping powers, given in this bill to the Governor in Council. It is my view that no bill that I have ever seen in this house makes such a complete delegation of the legislative power of Parliament to the Governor in Council as does this bill in clause 8. That is a sweeping statement, honourable senators, but I think I can justify it as I go along.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Is there not a corresponding provision in the Food and Drugs Act and other related acts?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The honourable Leader of the Government asks if there are not corresponding provisions in the Food and Drugs Act and other acts. My answer is that they are not exactly corresponding provisions, and I stand by my statement that I have never seen a bill which goes as far as this one. I say that because if my reading of clause 8 is correct, this bill would give to the Governor in Council the power to extend almost indefinitely the list of products that come under the bill; it would give complete power to the Governor in Council to amend the act almost at will, and it would most certainly give to the Governor in Council the power to repeal the act and I suggest that these are legislative powers that the Parliament of Canada should not in the circumstances give to the Governor in Council. The Governor in Council is in effect the cabinet and in practical terms the public service, sometimes called the bureaucracy.

I agree that there are areas in which the granting of powers to the Governor in Council under an act of Parliament is necessary and desirable. But I suggest that they are only so when there are written into the grant of those powers certain necessary limitations. The first limitation I would suggest, of course, is that the power given to the Governor in Council should be only the power to implement the provisions of the act. He should not be given under any circumstances the power to extend or to amend and certainly not the power to repeal the Act. I think I will indicate as I go along to the satisfaction of honourable senators that these powers are actually granted under clause 8 of this bill.

The second limitation of course is that the actual exercise of the power given to the Governor in Council should in fact be within the grant of that power by Parliament. It is to me an extraordinary thing that over the years we have not in this Parliament developed any practical kind of check on the use of the powers granted to the Governor in Council. At the present time there is no body checking to see if the exercise of those powers is intra vires of the power granted. I am glad to see that the House of Commons has recently taken a step in the direction of looking into the use, and if they so find, the abuse of the powers granted to the Governor in Council.

Perhaps I should briefly outline those portions of this bill which support the contention I have made. In general the operative sections of the bill and the products that are brought under the bill are listed in the Schedule which is divided into two parts. Part I lists a number of products which under the provisions of the bill come under a general prohibition by the Parliament of Canada as to their advertising, sale and import.

Part II lists other products in a rather general way, and says these may be controlled by regulation.

The first point I would like to make is the effect of clause 8 on the expressed will of Parliament in Part I, and the regulatory power that is given to the Governor under the products in Part II.

Perhaps I should read clause 8:

> (1) The Governor in Council may by order amend Part I or Part II of the Schedule by adding thereto

I underline the word "adding".

> (a) any product or substance that is or contains a poisonous, toxic, inflammable, explosive or corrosive product or substance or other product or substance of a similar nature that he is satisfied is or is likely to be a danger to the health or safety of the public, or
> (b) any product designed for household, garden or personal use, for use in sports or recreational activities, as life-saving equipment or as a toy, plaything or equipment for use by children that he is satisfied is or is likely to be a danger to the health or safety of the public because of its design, construction or contents,

Secondly, in the same clause the Governor in Council may amend Part I or Part II at will and whim. This is not written into the act; it is my comment.

or by deleting therefrom any product or substance the inclusion of which therein he is satisfied is no longer necessary.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It surely does not say "at will"? In both paragraphs (a) and (b) there are guidelines. He must be satisfied that the product "is or is likely to be a danger to the health or safety of the public," in both paragraphs (a) and (b).

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I do not know whether the honourable Leader of the Government was listening, but I read those specific words he has just quoted to me. I also said it might be "at will and whim"; and I added that they were my remarks and were not included in the bill. As I go along, perhaps if he listens to me, he will become convinced there is some substance in the point I am making.

The interpretation, given by the sponsor in introducing the bill, of the effect of clause 8 is this—and I am quoting from our own Hansard of January 23, page 892:

The Governor in Council has power under clause 8 to add to or delete from either Part of the Schedule, or to transfer from one Part to the other.

Now, what does this mean? If you look at the two parts of the Schedule you will find there is a limitation. The honourable Leader of the Government may wish later to draw my attention to it. I admit immediately there is a limitation in certain generic terms of the products which may be brought under this act by Order in Council. But the limitation is not very substantial. It includes all bleaches that contain chlorine:

Bleaches, cleansers and sanitizers for household use containing chlorine or compounds thereof.

It includes cleansers for household use, and so on; household polishes and cleaning agents, and so on; glues for household or hobbycraft use, and so on.

What the bill really says, honourable senators, if I can read English, is this, that in future the Governor in Council, by regulation and by regulation only, may say what products, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, on the advice of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, are hazardous. That is the effect of the bill.

He may take anything out of Part I or II. He may take everything out of Part I and II, and so repeal the act. He may say that notwithstanding that, the will of Parliament is that products listed in Part I are under absolute prohibition—which is what Part 1 says—"This is not the will of Parliament any more. I am sorry, but that was the will of Parliament a month ago. I have decided these are not to be prohibited any more, in spite of the fact that Parliament said, in a serious enactment, that they are to be prohibited." He might then say, "Parliament has gone too far. I am going to move some of these out of Part I into Part II. If that was the will of Parliament that these be prohibited absolutely, I do not agree. I am going to bring them under the control of regulations as long as the manufacturers do what I ask,"—whether it is the Governor in Council, or the minister, or a senior public servant—"as long as they do what I ask, I am satisfied I do not have to go as far as Parliament did." In other words, this makes possible a complete amendment of an Act of Parliament by Order in Council because, clearly, the Governor has absolute and complete authority to decide that products whose manufacture, import into and sale in Canada would be prohibited under the Act are not to be prohibited.

There is the power to delete clearly stated in this act, which can result in the complete repeal of this act of Parliament by the Governor in Council, without any recourse whatsoever to the power of Parliament to legislate.

I should say that perhaps there is some degree of amelioration, as the Leader of the Government suggests. The minister must be satisfied that if he does any of these things—if he decides that Parliament was wrong in making these prohibitions, that Parliament was wrong in putting things in Part I that he thinks should be in Part II—he must be satisfied that he is doing this for the public good.

I have great confidence in the present minister; he is a good minister and a very intelligent man. Some of my friends in the advertising business are a little concerned about him; I am not. If I had only to consider what the Honourable Mr. Basford might be doing with this power, I do not think I would be greatly concerned. However, we have new ministers from time to time, and if the evidence of current or old times means anything, one cannot be sure that every minister will have exactly the same quality of judgment or exactly the same concern for the public interest, even as the Parliament of Canada sees it.

There is, of course, the amelioration of a review board. If the minister transfers or adds a product to the prohibited or regulated areas of the schedule, then a manufacturer who is concerned may ask for a review board; and, of course, that review board would not be set up by Parliament, but by the minister and the officials. Our experience with review boards so set up is not that they are overly likely to criticize or over-rule the minister.

It is rather interesting also to note that the Board of Review has no power whatsoever if the minister deletes a product. The manufacturer has recourse to the Board of Review, but Parliament has no recourse to it. If the minister says: "I am taking this out. Parliament is wrong, in my view. I do not agree with what Parliament did", there is no recourse. All we can say is that sooner or later the order in council will be published, and perhaps after a few years somebody in Parliament will get around to saying: "This order in council should not have been passed, and I demand it be rescinded." I ask honourable senators to search their memories and ask themselves how often they have heard of an order in council being rescinded because of a protest in Parliament.

I suggest, honourable senators, that this is a matter that should concern the Senate. I think I might, within the rules, refer to some support I find for this in the fourth report of Senator Molson's committee on the Rules of the Senate. At page 439 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of this session—I know the report is not before us, but the part I wish to read is in the preamble, and not in the proposed schedule of changes in the rules—I find these words:

> The era we now live in reveals a great deal of public discussion and considerable evidence of the danger of parliamentary democracy deteriorating into an authoritarian executive supported by a strong and experienced bureaucracy—

I suggest, honourable senators, if ever there was a case in point which bears out that timely warning by our own committee, then clause 8 of this bill is it. It should be examined. Surely, it must be examined. I do not know what is the intention of Senator Carter, who introduced this bill, but I give notice that if he, in his wisdom, does not refer this bill to an appropriate committee of the Senate, then I shall, in due course, so move in order that the Senate may have an opportunity of examining what to me are the frightful implications of this delegation of the legislative power of the whole Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Carter speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to commence by thanking all honourable senators who have spoken on this bill, and expressing my appreciation for the very useful contributions they have made to this debate.

After listening to this debate I realized that there were two points, at least, that I did not explain sufficiently when I made my presentation, and I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the situation, and to correct any wrong impressions or misconceptions that I may have created.

The first question raised by a number of honourable senators was as to the length of time required for this legislation to have any significant effect. Some honourable senators appear to have the impression that this legislation will be of little use until after the regulations have been formulated, and that this will take a long time. In reply to that argument I should like to refer honourable senators again to the fact that clause 3(1) of the bill comes into effect immediately upon royal assent, and this means that the importation, advertisement, and sale of all articles covered by Part I of the Schedule will be prohibited immediately. Clause 3(2) will come into effect on proclamation. Clause 3(2) refers to products of which the importation, advertisement and sale are to be regulated and controlled. These products, as Senator Grosart has just said, are set forth in Part II of the Schedule.

When I introduced this bill I presumed that the reason why clause 3(2) did not come into effect on royal assent was to allow time for the necessary regulations to be formulated. I am very sorry, however, if I created the impression that the drafting of regulations necessarily would take a very long time.

In actual fact, regulations respecting the first four items in Part II are already drafted, but consultations are being carried on by other Government departments with the industries affected before they are put in their final form. These consultations are not yet completed.

With respect to those articles that are for household, garden, or personal use, which are now embraced in the wider scope of this bill as compared with the scope of Bill S-22 of the last session of the last Parliament, there are already safety standards in existence for a great number of these products that have been drawn up by the Canadian Government Specifications Board.

For example, specifications for life jackets have already been drawn up by the Canadian Government Specifications Board, and are already embodied in a regulation of the Department of Transport concerning life saving equipment for power boats. A great many other standards have already been set by the Canadian Standards Association. These standards are already in existence, and in cases where the safety features are adequately taken care of in the standards already drawn up by the Canadian Standards Association it will not be necessary to draw up new standards, but only to ban the products that are substandard.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator a question about the standards of which he speaks?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is the honourable senator aware that the Canadian Standards Association is not an official body, that its standards have absolutely no standing in any act of Parliament whatsoever, and that we have not yet a Canadian Standards Council? It is true that the Canadian Standards Association is the subject of subsidy, but why does the honourable senator say that the standards of Canadian Standards Association have anything to do with articles under this bill?

Hon. Mr. Carter: If the standards are sufficient it does not matter who draws them up. The important fact is that they are adequate for the safety of the public; once that has been determined they can be made official under this bill by regulation, so they can be official whenever the Governor in Council decides under this bill to use them as the standard requirement for those articles under section 2.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I agree they can use the dream the minister had last night under this bill.

Hon. Mr. Carter: The important fact is that these standards that have been drawn up by the specifications board are serving a useful purpose; many industries have adopted them and are manufacturing their products in accordance with these specifications. As long as the safety feature is considered adequate, this legislation will not affect them at all. It is only where the safety factor is not adequately taken care of that the products will be subject to this legislation.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Will that be in the regulations? It is not in the bill. Will the statement be in the regulations, that as long as some other group has standards that seem to be adequate there will be no regulations under the department?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I cannot tell my honourable friend what the Governor in Council will put in his regulations, but I can tell him that all they have to do is find adequate standards, standards they consider adequate, and then they can adopt them, from any source whatever; they might even adopt them from legislation in other countries.

The second matter referred to by some honourable senators was that the cost of administering this legislation would likely be excessive and might constitute a heavy burden on the public treasury. The question of cost is related mainly to staff requirements. Some honourable senators seemed to envisage a large army of inspectors travelling across Canada in order to implement the provisions of this bill. I am informed that very few new staff will be required to implement the provisions of the bill. In the first place, an agreement has been made with the Department of National Health and Welfare that their scientific experts will undertake to provide advice on the medical and toxicological aspects of hazardous products. A few technically trained people will be required in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in order to prepare and administer the regulations. Plans are now being made to employ one person in the immediate future, but there will probably be some further increase in personnel when the work load justifies it.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has the responsibility for all retail inspection within the federal Government. It has a field staff engaged in the inspection of weights and measures, electricity and gas meters and food, and it is expected that the existing staff of inspectors will be designated as hazardous products inspectors.

Here I would draw attention to clause 4, which says that a minister can designate an inspector instead of appointing an inspector. It may sometimes be necessary to designate others, such as law enforcement officers, public health officials or other federal experts as inspectors, but it is not anticipated that any new staff will be added to the payroll to carry out the inspection function. At some time in the future a few technical specialists might be required as inspectors, but this number will be small. Therefore, the additional cost of implementing this legislation will be very limited.

A few minutes ago Senator Grosart referred to the sweeping powers given to the Governor in Council under section 8. He envisages an extreme case where the Governor in Council, by whom he means the minister of a department, could actually repeal the whole bill. I think honourable senators must keep in mind that the purpose of this is to enhance public safety. That is the principle of the bill, to extend public safety. In my presentation I pointed out that in 1964 a large number of people were poisoned from using bleaches, and another large number were poisoned by using a common drainpipe cleaner, which is in widespread household use. Honourable senators will also recall that within the past year there has been almost an epidemic of deaths of young people from sniffing glue. These are serious problems which this bill is intended to cope with.

I would remind honourable senators that every day thousands of new products come on the market. Some products have been found to be very dangerous after being in use for some time. Other products come on the market and are immediately found to be dangerous, and it is essential that the Governor in Council be empowered to act quickly. Unless the Governor in Council has the power to act, the only other solution would be to enact a bill every time a hazardous substance comes on the market, to say that it is a hazardous substance and to add it to Part I or Part II of the Schedule. That is the only alternative I know of. If the honourable senator knows of a better one I should like to hear it. When we have to choose between two alternatives, we have the lesser of the two evils before us in this bill.

I do not appreciate legislating by regulation any more than he does, but we are trying to solve a problem and this is the best solution that anybody has been able to advance to date.

As I have already said, this bill is almost identical to Bill S-22 which the Senate passed a year ago. The only new features in this bill are its extended scope, arising from suggestions made in the then Senate Committee on Banking and Commerce. I feel that this bill will be another step forward in providing an extension of public safety and I hope it will receive the support of all honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask Senator Carter one question. Senator Carter, during the course of your remarks you spoke briefly about the subject of costs. Do you consider that this bill, in the light of all the discussions we have been having in this chamber, would be classed as a money bill?

Hon. Mr. Carter: I suppose any bill that incurs an expenditure of public funds is a money bill. This bill incurs some expenditure, although a limited amount, so I would say that it is a money bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Why create problems?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I would like to ask Senator Carter one further question arising out of Senator Molson's, as to the category in which we should place this bill, in view of the fact that in his final reply he spoke of section 3. Is he aware that clause 8 gives the minister the power to create new summary and indictable offences.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Well, we are going around in a circle because section 3 refers to offences, and the offence is importing a hazardous product, or advertising it or selling it. Every product imported, advertised or sold contrary to section 3 involves an offence, so that whenever the Governor in Council adds a new product to one schedule or the other he creates the possibility of another offence.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Thank you. That was my question.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carter, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 5, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Department of Manpower and Immigration for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968, pursuant to section 14 of the Government Organization Act, 1966, chapter 25, Statutes of Canada, 1966-67. (English and French texts).

PRIVATE BILL

THE QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-27, respecting The Quebec Savings Bank, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

SCIENCE POLICY

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—ADDITION TO MEMBERSHIP

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the names of the Honourable senators Blois, Carter, Giguère, Haig, McGrand and Nichol be added to the list of senators serving on the Special Committee on Science Policy.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 30, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Aird, calling the attention of the Senate to the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Brussels, Belgium, 11th November to 15th November, 1968, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this order stands in my name. I moved the adjournment because I understood there was at least one honourable senator who wished to speak on this item. I do not know if Senator Carter proposes to speak. If so, he might wish to move the adjournment of the debate; if not, the matter might be disposed of now.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: I have not had the time I would have liked to prepare my speech because I have been occupied with the Hazardous Products bill and I am preparing to speak on another bill on Thursday. If you wish to dispose of this item today, I have no objection. However, I am quite willing to move the adjournment of the debate if it is understood that I shall require some time to prepare my remarks.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carter, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 30, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as Senator Willis is unable to be present this week on account of illness, I wonder if I may have permission of the house to speak on this bill at this time?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) speak in place of Honourable Harry A. Willis on this bill?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, it is with some hesitation that I take part in this debate, as I must confess I have no strong views as to whether or not the voting age should be lowered. However, after listening to the debate so far and upon some reflection, I have come to the conclusion that this bill deserves support.

Various reasons have been advanced as to why the voting age should be lowered, some I find convincing and some I find not convincing. In any event, I think that the lowering of the voting age is but a logical development of a process which has been going on for a long time, and that process is the progressive extension of the franchise.

Originally, the right to vote was greatly restricted by one means or another, but over the years that right has been extended from being the privilege of the few to being the right of the many and, indeed, the qualifications for voting are now very few. In fact, only three things are necessary: one is, a person must be a Canadian citizen or other British subject. If he is a non-Canadian British subject he must have resided in Canada for at least a year and he must be not less than 21 years of age. Of course, there are certain persons who, for various reasons, are not permitted to vote, but this does not affect the general principle. The age of 21 was selected, I believe, because that was the time a person legally became of age. He was then regarded as an adult person able to enter into contracts on his own behalf, a person who could sue and be sued, and the like.

However, honourable senators, I do not know why the age of 21 was originally selected and established as the time when a person became of age. Undoubtedly, it is very old law, and as conditions have greatly changed over the years I agree with the sponsor that this law also should be re-examined, although not much can be done about it by the federal Parliament.

Honourable senators, while I do not know why 21 was originally selected as the time a person became of age, I am not sure either why 18 has been selected for the proposal in this bill. I expect it is because that is the age when normally a person has completed his high school education and, if he is not going on for further education, he would enter the labour force. This is, I think, a valid reason why the voting age should be lowered to 18. However, I do believe we should go further, and that some consideration could usefully be given to lowering the voting age to 17. This would give those in their final year of high school a powerful incentive to study political science and the political questions of the day.

Honourable senators, I have been impressed by the argument for this bill, that with present-day education 18-years-olds on the average are better educated and better informed than a person of 21 years of age was but a few years ago. As I think the extension of the franchise has in the past depended upon the extension of education, I believe it would have to be conceded that 18-year-olds have the necessary education to make an informed decision. Some people may argue that they would not make that informed decision. Perhaps they would not, but at least they have the ability to do so and, if they did not make an informed decision, then the same can be said of a great many who are over 21 years of age.

Honourable senators, the additional argument might be advanced, that those of 18 years are too immature and irresponsible to be allowed to vote. I do not see how this criterion of maturity or responsibility can be used to determine who should vote. Being over 21 years of age is no guarantee that a person is either mature or responsible.

However, there is one argument which I have not heard advanced against this proposal but which I think may have some merit, that is, by making those between 18 and 21 eligible to vote, we would not only extend to them the right to vote but would be placing on them a new responsibility. Perhaps it is not fair to do so. After all, one may ask, is it reasonable to ask those young people to assume such a responsibility at this early age? Should they not be allowed a few more carefree years before having to assume the duties and responsibilities of adult citizenship. However, since there is no compulsion involved, I suppose it cannot be said that a responsibility has been enforced on anyone who is not willing and prepared to accept it.

Honourable senators, if we are prepared to support this bill, I think it is but logical to go a little further and deal with the qualifications of candidates in a federal election. At the present time, a candidate must be a Canadian citizen or other British subject, he must be a qualified elector, and he must be 21 years of age. I suggest that, if the voting age is lowered to 18, then the qualifying age of a candidate should also be lowered to 18. I think all the arguments which are used to show why the voting age should be lowered would apply with equal force to show that the qualifying age of the candidate should also be lowered. I bring this to your attention in case the sponsor would be prepared to add another clause to this bill when it goes to committee, to deal with the age of candidates.

In any event, honourable senators, for the reasons I have given I support the bill.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Honourable senators—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Argue speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate; therefore, I would like to move that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I hope the honourable leader will be able to tell us what the attitude of the Government is towards this bill. It is an important bill and it originates in the Senate. Therefore, I hope he is adjourning the debate for the purpose of telling us a little more about this bill and the attitude of the Government towards it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We can be sure of that.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is why he is adjourning the debate.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, debate adjourned.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

INITIATION OF LEGISLATION IN THE SENATE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 12, 1968, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Hayden, calling the attention of the Senate to section 53 and section 91 (as amended in 1949) of the British North America Act, 1867, and the effect of such sections on the initiation of legislation in the Senate.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this motion stands in the name of Senator Langlois and if he would yield I would be prepared to say something on the measure now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since all senators are equal in this chamber and since this order stands in the name of Senator Langlois, I think I should follow the usual procedure and ask if there is unanimous consent to the Government Leader's speaking instead of Senator Langlois.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is implicit.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, we were all impressed by the quality of the debate generated by the inquiry of Senator Hayden on which he spoke in this house on November 16th last. Senator Hayden's notice reads as follows:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to section 53 and section 91 (as amended in 1949) of the British North America Act, 1867, and the effect of such sections on the initiation of legislation in the Senate.

As some time has elapsed since the debate began on this inquiry, perhaps I should read again the relevant sections of the B.N.A. Act which are germane to this discussion and to which Senator Hayden directed our attention. Section 53 of the act reads:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Section 91 reads as follows:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 1. The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other Constitutional Act granted or secured to the Legislature or the Government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or French language or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the Writs for choosing the House: provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such House.

I have read Senator Hayden's address carefully. I have reached the conclusion that his primary purpose in initiating this discussion was to propound a hypothetical legal argument concerning the possible initiation of money bills in this house rather than to recommend to the Senate a positive course of action in this regard. If, as I surmise, his main intent was to occasion a high-level debate in both houses on this subject, I think we will agree that in the prosecution of that purpose he has been eminently successful.

Speeches made by others in this particular discussion have been valuable. There are, in my view, no sacred cows, no untouchable subjects in this Senate. The present subject is certainly a proper one for discussion in this forum, and I think it is only right that as a member of the Government I should express the Government's views on this question.

If I understood Senator Hayden correctly, his argument was to the effect that, since the enactment in 1949, which I have just recited, of what is now the first head of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, it is within the competence of the Senate to initiate a money bill, which would become law on being passed by both houses and assented to on behalf of Her Majesty. Such a piece of legislation, Senator Hayden argued, would constitute a piecemeal or indirect amendment of section 53, made permissible by the very broad language of section 91(1) read in conjunction with the opening words of that section.

There is no doubt that the argument of Senator Hayden is a plausible one. I would like to compliment him by saying that his argument was an ingenious one, and that it was a proposition with which I personally was unfamiliar until he propounded it.

I do not wish to seem dogmatic about this but, like others who took part in this debate, I am inclined to question whether the Supreme Court of Canada would, even in the light of the broad language of section 91(1), uphold the validity of a money bill introduced in the Senate in apparent contravention of section 53 of the B.N.A. Act. This was the point made by Senator Thorvaldson, who did not think this was the way to amend the Constitution, that an amendment of the Constitution was an act itself of such great importance that it could not and should not be achieved in this way.

I concede at once that a bill simply to repeal section 53, without more, could properly be introduced in the Senate. Indeed, we know as a matter of historical record that the B.N.A. Act itself was first introduced in the Upper House in England. There is nothing strange or startling about such a procedure. Since 1949 a bill simply to amend the Canadian Constitution, except in the areas expressly reserved in section 91(1), could clearly be introduced in the Senate.

The constitutional difficulty arises when a bill by its terms is not in essence—that is to say, in the terms of the lawyer, in its "pith and substance"—an amending bill, but a money bill. This might take care of the question raised last night by Senator Molson when we were discussing the Hazardous Products Bill, as to what constituted a money bill. So long as section 53 remains in the B.N.A. Act, a money bill cannot be introduced in the Senate.

As Senator Thorvaldson has properly pointed out, all of the sections of an act, including those in an organic constitutional document such as the B.N.A. Act, must be read together and each of them assigned a real meaning. This is true of section 53, notwithstanding the broad language of section 91(1) and the opening words of that section, "notwithstanding anything in this Act". The last mentioned phrase—notwithstanding anything in this Act—must be reasonably construed in the light of the act as a whole. I am inclined to think that the final court of appeal in Canada would probably hold that a purely amending act would over-ride section 53, but that a money bill, however it might be prefaced, would contravene that section, and for the reason that Senator Thorvaldson gave.

Senator Hayden remarked—as reported at page 609 of Senate Debates for November 26, last—that until 1949 the prohibition of section 53 was absolute. I would add that since 1949 the prohibition has been relative; that is to say, that the section itself could clearly be removed by an act of Parliament but, so long as it remains as a special section, its meaning and its intent must remain intact, despite any broad language contained in a more general section. Section 53 is special in that it concerns itself only with the question as to the house in which certain types of legislation may be introduced. In my view, the original defect would not be cured by the fact that it was subsequently passed by the Commons, and assented to on behalf of Her Majesty.

The bill or statute would, on the contrary, be unconstitutional from the beginning.

The foregoing concludes my technical argument and I do not propose to carry it further. I say this because in any grey area—and I think this is one which is grey enough—the formulation of a constitutional opinion is an exercise, perhaps not in futility, but in studied speculation, as to what the Supreme Court of Canada, now our judicial sovereign, would conclude in the premises. My conclusion is, despite what I have said, that it is conceivable that the Supreme Court of Canada would agree with the argument of the honourable senator, but I doubt it very much.

It is less conceivable that the Senate could or should avail itself of what would be at best a technicality to change unilaterally the historic and traditional role in which it has been cast since Confederation. I do not believe Senator Hayden was suggesting that we should do so, because at page 611 of the Debates of the Senate he said:

> I still subscribe to the principle which I think is basic in any democratic country: No taxation without representation. Therefore, I think that basically a large measure of control in connection with the levying of taxes should exist in the Government; and that, the procedure for bringing such things into force, so far as any steps that the Commons can take are concerned, might be justified more by that elective body, in the first instance, that by an appointed body, when you are dealing with this democratic principle of "No taxation without representation."

And then Senator Hayden concluded:

> But it still leaves a large and increasing volume of so-called Government business which can just as readily be introduced in the Senate as in the Commons.

I agree with what Senator Hayden said in this part of his speech. I think he has correctly interpreted what has been the situation in this house in regard to what are called money bills since the day this house came into being. I agree also that the concept of what is a money bill has undergone, by usage, certain changes whereby the Senate, in practice, is less inhibited than it was formerly in respect of the initiation of financial measures. Unless and until there have been final changes in the Canadian Constitution, brought about following the forthcoming conferences with the provinces—and in any such changes the concurrence of the Senate is essential constitutionally—I would hesitate to suggest that the Senate act unilaterally in respect of financial measures. We will have a lot to do in other areas in which our jurisdiction is unquestioned, and in my opinion it would be better if we confined ourselves for the present to our accustomed role.

For the moment, honourable senators, I would say that impressed as I was with the ingeniousness of Senator Hayden's remarks, I was equally impressed by the statement by Senator Roebuck, that in his time there has been no confrontation between the two houses of Parliament on financial matters. I might add that in my own experience, mostly in the Commons, there has been no such confrontation. I think it is wise and well that we keep it so.

I congratulate those honourable senators who have taken part in this debate. I commend to all honourable senators the wise injunction of a former Canadian Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, who argued that no constitution based on the British tradition could long survive if each of the components of Parliament was constantly to exercise its powers to the legal limit. I believe that what Sir Robert Borden said was wise. It is advice that we would want to observe at this time.

We are anxious to see that this house plays its part in the legislative program of Parliament. There has been a constant flow of measures from the other house to this house, and from this house to the other house, as a result of concurrence on the part of the administration to see that we are given as great an opportunity as possible to deal with bills in the first instance, so that our schedule can be met and the heavy workload of the other place can be carried.

Some bills have been placed before this house in the past, and even during the course of the present session, that involve the imposition of pecuniary obligations by the executive by way of recommendation, but we have learned a way of dealing with those through the process of bracketing the pertinent money aspects of the bills. In this way we have been able to meet our own schedule as well as the preoccupations of the other place. But, this does not in any way involve an acceptance of the argument put forward for hypothetical purposes, if for no other reason, by Senator Hayden. I felt that the matter he has projected is of such importance that I, as spokesman for the Government, should express these views.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McDonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Davey, that a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Davey for bringing forward this motion and thus giving us an opportunity of looking into and examining the very important and most complex communication media. By means of this committee we should be able to study at some length the operations of the C.B.C. and their many ramifications. My chief concern is the C.B.C.'s cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

Honourable senators, what is the financial climate in which we find ourselves at the moment? Before I embark on this subject I want to make a most sincere statement. I am not preaching doom or ruin—far from it. I have a tremendous faith in our country; I am sure that it will march forward united and prosperous, a model to mankind and the envy of the world.

The federal Government is proposing to spend $13,600,000,000 this coming year. Divide that by 21 million souls and the answer is $650 a head, or well over $200 a month for every family of a mother, father and two children. Add to that the provincial and municipal taxes—and remember that they pay the big bulk of the cost of education—and you will see that the per capita tax burden becomes, I think, the highest in the world.

Honourable senators, I am not trying to make a case for saving money so that we could reduce taxes on big incomes. What galls me is that after we have worked hard enough to produce an enormous tax revenue—an achievement for which every Canadian should be justly proud—the Economic Council tells us that four million people in Canada are living in a state of poverty, and we can find no money to help them. Many of the aged cannot live on the Old Age Security payments, even though this year we propose to spend $1.7 billion on Old Age Security, an increase of $400 million in two years.

Why cannot we do more for them? Well, you all know why. It is because of this extraordinary theory that we cannot tell the rich from the poor so we must give everybody the Old Age Security pension. For the same reason, everybody's hospital bill must be paid. To my mind, simply amending the Old Age Security Pension Act so that a person having an income over $500 or $600 a month would not be eligible to receive the pension should not be difficult. Surely something of the same kind could be done for hospitalization.

Honourable senators, we find that we need between half a million and a million new family dwellings, but the mortgage money is not forthcoming, even though the interest rate is 9½ per cent. To anybody who has been in the financial business all their lives, that figure is unbelievable. An interest rate of 9½ per cent and we cannot get the mortgage money! The reason is very simple. It is because the three levels of government have been making such excessive demands on the market.

What is really the matter? I can tell you in just one word—waste. It is because of this waste that I think we should do something about the C.B.C. Just what is it costing us today? I have been looking at the figures. I did not have much time for research, so I started in the year 1954-55, when the figure was $23,600,000. By 1958-59 it was $61 million. In 1964-65 it was $88 million. In 1966-67 it was $113 million; then it goes up to $143 million, $154 million to $166 million for 1969-70. I have worked the figure out roughly, and over the years the Canadian people have put a minimum of $1.5 billion into the C.B.C. Six per cent interest on that $1.5 billion is another $90 million. By the end of this year, when we have spent another $166 million on the C.B.C., our bill for interest alone will be $100 million. That means that our children, our grandchildren and their children after them for ever and ever, will have to put up $100 million a year just to pay the interest for the money we have wasted on the C.B.C.

Honourable senators, I should like to add that in private hands the C.B.C. would pay handsomely and therefore would pay taxes which would benefit all of Canada. We have every power, and therefore grave responsibilities. Are we going to try to carve up and sell off this corporation, or are we going to sit back and deserve the rather unflattering remarks of our worst critics? I feel we should act as un bon père de famille, a good head of the family and, knowing that this situation is wrong, we should try hard to correct it.

Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to second the motion of the honourable Senator Davey. I am a little apologetic for not finding the exact words to pay him the compliments I think his excellent presentation deserves.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow moved the second reading of Bill S-28, to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to summarize for you the various clauses of Bill S-28, which is an act to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act. The present act was enacted in 1953 and is administered by the Department of Insurance. The act applies to certain parts of the co-operative credit movement in Canada. The credit union, as most of you are probably aware, is organized on three levels in Canada. One is the local credit unions, which are organized on a community basis, as community groups, employment groups and in some cases parish groups. These primarily serve individuals, and in some cases other co-operative associations. These are incorporated pursuant to provincial law and are supervised by provincial authority. At the second level are the provincial central credit unions. These act as central credit unions to support local credit unions to receive funds from them for investment purposes and to issue loans to the local credit unions.

The central credit unions do not make loans to individuals, but only to their member associations. The local credit unions rely on their deposits with the centrals as the main part of their liquidity reserves.

On the third level is the Canadian Co-Operative Credit Society, of which bill we are referring to today. This is a society organized under the powers of a special act of Parliament, which powers include borrowing and lending to its members. Its members are the central credit unions from the provinces and, of course, some other co-operative enterprises carrying on business in two or more provinces in Canada.

The Canadian Co-Operative Credit Society—and from here on in I will refer to it as the C.C.C.S.—therefore acts as the central credit union for the provincial central credit unions. This, in effect, opens the way for the exchange of funds from the co-operative movement in one region of Canada to that of another. The C.C.C.S. applies, therefore, to the federally-operated society and to those provincial centrals who voluntarily join in.

A provincial central is eligible to become a member only after declared by Parliament to be eligible. The act grants the organization the power to accept deposits from its members and loans from chartered banks and to make loans to its members. In addition, it is granted the right to invest in government and municipal securities within certain limits. Presently, there are credit unions from four provinces, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario, which are affiliated with the C.C.C.S.

At the present time it is felt that some other credit unions from other provinces might join if there are changes in the present act. Changes in this act are proposed at the request of the co-operative credit movement. The changes include the provisions: one, to make it easier for provincial central units to join the federal society; two, to ease the provisions for the borrowing and loaning of funds.

The proposed amendments are as follows: first, a provincial central will be eligible to join by order in council rather than by an act of Parliament, as is stated in the act at present; second, to make certain changes in its charter in the same manner as provincial units presently can. This means that they perhaps can have a name change, or a capital stock change without necessity of an act of Parliament. Third, the new changes will permit the federal society to raise funds from sources other than chartered banks and its members, as is the case at present. Fourth, provision is made to permit the society to extend its investment field into corporate stock and securities. At present, they are only permitted to invest in Government and municipal securities and loans to the members. Fifth, the changes will permit the society to pay interest on paid-up share capital at such rate as may be determined by its board of directors. The present regulations state that it may pay only 5 per cent. Sixth, at present the volume of money that may be accepted on deposit is limited to 10 times the capital, surplus and reserves. It is proposed to raise this limit to 20 times, subject to the approval of the minister, by specific application. Seventh, a new subsection will provide that a provincial society that is subject to this act may invest in a mortgage loan company, but the total amount so invested will be limited to 20 per cent of its paid-up capital. Eighth, in addition, the federal society would be empowered to lend more than 10 per cent of its capital and deposits to any one member by approval of two-thirds of the directors and certain other qualifications as outlined in the bill.

There are, as well, in this bill certain consequential changes, such as the appointment of auditors to conform with changes in the Bank Act; an amendment that would remove municipal and school securities as part of the liquidity reserve, as it is considered that they are not up to the marketability standard desirable for liquidity purposes; and such other items as detailed reports to the Superintendent of Insurance, details of assets and liabilities and the changes made necessary to conform with changes in the Bank Act. I will recommend at the appropriate time that this bill be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for detailed examination.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY

PRODUCTION OF CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS—STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER—AGREEMENT TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

On the Motion of Hon. Mr. Argue:

That there be laid before this House

1. Copies of all construction contracts entered into between Canadian National Railway Company and other parties under authority of section 2 of An Act respecting the Construction of a Line of Railway in the Province of Alberta and in the Northwest Territories by Canadian National Railway Company from a point at or near Grimshaw, in the Province of Alberta, in a northerly direction to Great Slave Lake, in the Northwest Territories, being chapter 56 of the Statutes of 1960-61; and

2. Copy of the agreement entered into between Her Majesty, the Canadian National Railway Company, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, and Pine Point Mines Limited, as required under section 6 of the said statute.

Hon. Paul Martin: I spoke to Senator Argue during the course of the afternoon and indicated to him that I propose to deal with his motion requesting the production of copies of all construction contracts entered into between the Canadian National Railways and the various contractors employed with the construction of the Great Slave Lake railway, and the agreement between Her Majesty, the C.N.R., the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company Limited and Pine Point Mines Limited.

I have to indicate that the first part of the motion, calling for a production of all construction contracts between private individuals and the railways, is regarded as a privileged document and has been treated so by Parliament for many years. Contracts and correspondence between the railway and those having business dealings with it have always been considered privileged. However, as to the second part of the motion, the agreement in question was approved by Order in Council No. 1961-1748 on November 30, 1961, and there is no objection to tabling a copy of that agreement.

Hon. Mr. Everett: May I ask a question of the Government Leader? Could he tell me whether that privilege would stand against an order of the Senate to produce the document?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think the Government would take the position that this was a privileged document. This was the position taken from an instance that I recall—I read it just before I entered the chamber—by the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen in 1921. The opinion he gave on that occasion was used I think in 1956 by the then Minister of Transport, Mr. Chevrier, in answer to a motion by Mr. Diefenbaker for production of certain documents.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask the honourable Leader a question? Why have we to take the opinion of any one man as to the privilege spoken of by the honourable Leader? Surely, if there is no act of Parliament or no law governing it, we have the right to ask for the production of documents between two parties.

Hon. Mr. Martin: There is no doubt that my honourable friend and the members of the Senate have a right to ask, but I think the Government in the circumstances has the right to refuse. Anyone who would examine the nature and the consequences of the request would see why. This is a request for the tabling of correspondence between the railway and private individuals, in respect of the internal operation of the railway company.

This would be a very satisfactory and effective way of revealing circumstances to a competitor—in this instance, the other railway. Governments rightly have taken the position at all times that such documents are privileged, just as the governments take the position, and rightly so, that exchanges between Government servants and ministers of the Crown in respect of the formulation and development of policy are privileged. I do not believe that one could conduct government on any other basis.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: But surely this is a company and not the Government?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is a government agency; it has all the perquisites.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Why do we not run the whole concern of Government on the basis of a Crown corporation? There would be no need of Government then.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I am sure that the honourable senator would not want exchanges between private individuals and the railways to be exposed to public scrutiny.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I intervene at this time on this matter? First I note that the honourable Senator Argue is not in his seat at the moment. I understand his motion covers two specific questions. As to the first question the Leader of the Government has stated his position with respect to it. As to the second question, the leader has said there is no objection to the production of the agreement.

Therefore, it is ordered that a return do issue for a copy of an agreement entered into by Her Majesty, the Canadian National Railway Company, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited, and Pine Point Mines Limited, as required by section 6 of chapter 56 of the Statutes of 1960-61.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I had hoped that we would proceed today with the debate on the inquiry by Senator Macnaughton with regard to United States-Canada meetings between parliamentarians and members of the United States Congress. However, the necessary preparations for that debate are not completed and therefore this item of business which we had counted on to take more than the balance of this day, will not be proceeded with.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

OFFICIAL REPORT—CORRECTION

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I rise on a question of privilege. At page 906 of Hansard of January 28, I am reported as asking the honourable senator from Carleton "if they removed the Ottawa Journal"? That question was not asked by me but by my colleague the honourable Senator Denis. Therefore, I ask that the correction be made in Hansard.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, may I add a word. Not only do I agree that the question should be attributed to me but it was not the exact question I put to honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). I asked if they had "...forgotten to remove the Ottawa Journal." The word "forgotten" appears in the French translation.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is the translation of a missing word.

Hon. Mr. Denis: The translation of the missing word was there; the word itself was missing in the English version.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-162, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1970. (English and French texts).

Booklet entitled "The Constitution and the People of Canada", published on the occasion of the Second Meeting of the Constitutional Conference, Ottawa, February 10, 11, 12, 1969. (English and French texts).

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, to which was referred the Estimates and the Revised Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, presented the following report:

By order of the Senate made on October 1, 1968 . . .

Some hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Leonard moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO DEBATES OF THE SENATE AND MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Mr. Leonard: I move that the Report presented today of the Standing Committee on Finance, to which was referred the Estimates, Revised Estimates and Supplementary Estimates "A" laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, be printed as an Appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Motion agreed to.

(For text of report see Appendix, pp. 987-8.)

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 11, 1969, at eight o'clock in the evening.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 12:

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill S-29, respecting the Production and Conservation of Oil and Gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like first to thank the Senate for granting leave to proceed with this order ahead of other orders of business.

Bill S-29 concerns the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. It is a long bill, comprising some 33 pages, and it is complicated, dealing for the most part with technical information, and, as I am the complete neophyte when it comes to the oil and gas business, we are, therefore, fortunate in the Senate to have a man, in the person of Senator Hastings, who is an expert in that business.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I hope he will not hesitate to correct any errors that I might make.

Honourable senators, in discussing this bill I think it would be helpful to examine it in three parts: First, we should examine the activity in exploration for and development of oil and gas that has taken place in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Second, we should examine the reasons for the legislation. Third, we should briefly examine the act itself.

Dealing with the activity in the area, I might mention that because of its geological structure it has been known for some time that the Yukon and Northwest Territories would likely contain oil and gas, but because of transportation, exploration and development difficulties, it was also realized that it would be very, very high cost oil and gas. But demand in the world for petroleum products has been increasing, and it has increased especially in this continent; and, as we are in danger of running out of our reserves elsewhere in this continent, the area in question has become a great deal more attractive to the oil companies.

The Government of Canada has been assisting in this development. It owns virtually 100 per cent of all the mineral, oil and gas rights in the Territories. For some time now the Government has been issuing permits for exploration of this area on a very generous basis, all the time, of course, holding a royalty interest. Along with 20 other oil and mineral companies, it has developed the Panarctic Oil Company, in which the Government holds a 45 per cent interest for the purpose of exploration and development for oil in the Arctic Islands in the most northerly part of Canada. This is a part that would involve private companies in such expenditures that they might not be able to undertake it themselves.

Some discoveries have been made in the territory. As yet, no oil has been discovered other than at Norman Wells, and this discovery was made many years ago. Some small gas pools have been discovered, but the major pool was discovered at Pointed Mountain on the Territories-British Columbia border.

The most exciting discovery has been the discovery of oil at Prudhoe Bay in Alaska. To understand the excitement that surrounds this discovery, one must realize that the size of the pool at Prudhoe Bay indicates reserves in excess of all the reserves that have been discovered in Canada since the beginning of time. This pool is just 200 miles away from the Yukon-Alaska border. Considering the fact that the pool is so close, and considering the geological structure of the territory, this has caused great activity. At the present time permits for exploration are being granted for some 150 million acres, and $30 million in exploration money was spent in 1968. It is expected that this will double in the very near future. That is why this legislation is being introduced now to provide for the orderly development of the oil resources of the territory and to ensure that it is developed to obtain the lowest possible cost per barrel for oil.

Honourable senators, if I may I would like to examine with you briefly and in more detail the reasons for this legislation. In order to do so we have to understand certain facts about the oil business. Oil which usually has a gas in solution is found in pools, but they are not pools as we understand the definition of the word. The oil pool is a porous rock which contains oil within the pores themselves, and the oil does not flow out automatically from that porous rock; it must actually be squeezed out by the pressure of gas or water which surrounds the pool. This pressure is known as "reservoir energy," without which you could not get the oil to flow from the pool into a well. The objectives of efficient oil producers are to drain the pool of oil as completely as possible, and to do it at the lowest possible cost per barrel but at a rate which does not cause over-production.

How are these objectives accomplished? First, you must maintain reservoir energy. If the pool of oil is surrounded by gas, it is perfectly clear that you do not drill to remove the gas before you remove the oil. When you remove the oil you must remove it at the maximum efficient rate. If you remove it too quickly, you achieve a lower cost per barrel but you deplete the reservoir energy so quickly that you get a lower total recovery of oil in the pool. To give you an example, if you take the oil out of a well at the maximum or flush rate, you will so deplete the reservoir energy that it is likely you will recover only 15 to 20 per cent of the oil in the pool and the rest will be lost. If you take the oil out of the pool too slowly, you slow down the decline in reservoir energy, and you obtain a greater total recovery from the pool, but you increase your costs of getting the oil out. The whole objective in obtaining the maximum efficient rate of production of an oil well is to achieve a balance between costs and total recovery.

Another method of accomplishing these objectives of the oil industry is called secondary recovery. In secondary recovery, gas or water is introduced from above the ground into the area surrounding the pool to renew the reservoir energy. It obviously results in a greater recovery but of course it results also in increased costs.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Unless there are some leaks.

Hon. Mr. Everett: Well, the oil industry attempts to guard against them.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Water infusion does not work all the time.

Hon. Mr. Everett: That is right. This is one of the methods.

The third method of accomplishing these objectives is to have the correct number of wells, for if you do you achieve a lower cost per barrel and you tend to prevent overproduction.

The fourth method is not to produce in excess of your storage facilities, transportation facilities, or the market for your product.

I would like to examine briefly the methods used by the oil industry to achieve these objectives. The first method, called spacing, is designating the acreage area upon which a single well can be drilled. That area is known as a spacing unit, and obviously the larger you make your spacing unit the more you tend to control the amount of drilling that goes on in the field. So, I think it is true to say that by spacing you can tend to control over-drilling. A concomitant of spacing is pooling, because pooling brings the various owners in a spacing unit together to drill one well.

Another method used by the industry to achieve these objectives is unitization. Unitization is the sharing of the production of a pool of gas or oil. To achieve unitization the owners of a field or pool of oil come together and decide that one of their number shall be the operator of the field and shall make all the decisions on behalf of the others in reference to that field. The operator then manages the field and divides the income between the various interested owners. Unitization tends to ensure fewer wells, less overproduction, and better final recovery.

Another method used by the industry to achieve its objects is early secondary recovery. It used to be that the process of secondary recovery was introduced at the time the well ran out of reservoir energy, so that no more oil was being recovered from it. It was very costly to introduce secondary recovery at that point. It has since been discovered that it is more efficient and less costly to introduce secondary recovery while the reservoir energy is still reasonably high.

The last method used by the industry is proration. This is used where there is overproduction. In proration the Government, in conversation with the refineries, estimates the total market for crude oil production. It divides that market among the various wells, so that each well is allowed a monthly quota. It is very clear that proration results in overdrilling, high costs, high prices, and should be avoided wherever possible.

Honourable senators, I would now like to examine very briefly with you the bill itself. Part I deals with production and conservation. It permits the Governor in Council to make regulations regarding the exploration, drilling, production, and conservation of oil in the Territories. It defines "waste" and makes it an offence. "Waste" is defined as the dissipation of reservoir energy, inefficient spacing, inefficient production, inefficient storage, excessive production, allowing gas to escape unnecessarily, and failure to employ secondary recovery.

This part of the act appoints a Chief Conservation Officer, who, incidentally, is the chief of the Oil and Mineral Division of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to police waste. This officer can make orders preventing waste, but his orders can be appealed to an oil and gas committee.

Part II of the act concerns itself with production arrangements. The first production arrangement is that of pooling. There are two types of pooling. There is voluntary pooling, in which the owners of a spacing unit come together and agree on a pooling arrangement which must then be filed with the Chief Conservation Officer. The second type is a pooling order in which one working interest owner in a spacing unit may apply to the oil and gas committee which, after a hearing, may order pooling. There is no production allowed on any spacing unit in the Territories under this bill unless there is a pooling agreement or pooling order. Incidentally, the size of a spacing unit will be defined by regulation under this bill.

The second type of production arrangement allowed under this bill is unitization. There are three types of unitization. There is voluntary unitization, in which the working interest and royalty owners in an area may come together and agree on unitization. All they have to do is file that agreement with the Chief Conservation Officer. There is another type in which the minister, if he believes that an area is subject to waste, may order the closing down of the field unless the various working interests in the field agree to unitization. The third type is compulsory unitization in which 65 per cent of the working interest owners can apply to the committee for a unitization order, which can be given after a hearing.

The intent of this legislation is to encourage early unitization. It is felt that by doing this we will achieve in the Yukon and Northwest Territories the minimum number of wells for efficient production, the best location for those wells, early secondary recovery, and the prevention of overproduction.

Part III of the act, honourable senators, deals with appeals and administration. This bill sets up an oil and gas committee which has five members, all of whom must be knowledgeable in the industry itself. Three of them may be from the Public Service of Canada, but none may be employed by the Oil and Mineral Division of the Department. Orders given by this committee may be filed in such a way that they become orders of the Exchequer Court of Canada. Appeals from the orders of this committee lie in some cases to the Exchequer Court, and in some cases to the Supreme Court of Canada. An appeal also lies to the Governor in Council who may vary or rescind orders of the committee. This part also deals with the powers and duties of conservation engineers who are charged with certain responsibilities under the legislation, and it also delineates the offences and penalties.

In concluding my remarks, honourable senators, I would point out one interesting omission from this bill, that is, the provision for proration. When the cost of development and transportation in the north is considered, it will be realized that it is likely that the cost of oil and gas production in that area will be high. But, when that product is transported to the south where it will be used it has to be sold at competitive prices. We have seen in our examination that proration is a price maintenance device, and it is hoped that with no proration and early unitization the result will be very high and efficient production with a minimum of waste which will result in a lower cost per barrel.

This, honourable senators, is the intention of this measure. It is a complicated bill. At the conclusion of the debate on second reading in this chamber I hope that the bill will be referred to a committee where it can be examined in detail. I also hope we can invite representatives of the industry to give the committee their views.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable sponsor of this bill (Hon. Mr. Everett) a question? I was most interested in his explanation, which was clear and very informative, but I do not see in the bill, nor did I hear in what he told us, anything as to the conservation of the right of the public in this natural resource. What do we get out of it, as a dominion Government? What does the public reserve for itself in the development of this wonderful natural resource?

Hon. Mr. Everett: As I understand it, honourable senators, the mineral resources of the Territories are owned virtually 100 per cent by the federal Government. The federal Government, in permitting exploration and development under permit, is retaining a 10 per cent royalty, so that 10 per cent of any income derived from the production of oil or gas from the territories will come to the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Is there anything in this bill to indicate that steps would be taken to prevent an event such as recently took place in the ocean of San Francisco, where the oil escaped and killed fish? I must say that I am thinking mostly of the Grand Banks off Newfoundland. That has nothing to do with this bill, of course, but it is the breeding ground of codfish and all sorts of fish, and if on the Grand Banks there were a similar happening to that which occurred recently off the United States coast it would destroy all the fish in the area. I suppose some of these holes will be drilled in the Arctic Ocean. If so, can any steps be taken to prevent the escape of the oil into the ocean thus destroying fish life?

Hon. Mr. Everett: That probably comes under two headings in the bill. One is that of waste itself, which is the escape of oil from a well. I would refer the honourable senator to section 13, subsection (2)(c), which says that it is an offence to permit:

> the drilling, equipping, completing, operating or producing of any well in a manner that causes or is likely to cause the unnecessary or excessive loss or destruction of oil or gas after removal from the reservoir.

The other aspect of this, of course, is pollution, which is what is going on at this moment in California. I can refer the honourable senator to section 12, paragraph (q), which permits the Governor in Council to make regulations:

> prescribing the measures necessary to prevent pollution of air, land or water as a result of the exploration and drilling for or the production, storage, transportation, distribution, measurement, processing or handling of any oil or gas or any substance obtained from or associated with oil or gas.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Paragraph (m) deals specifically with this.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I thank the honourable senator. Under paragraph (m), which deals specifically with drilling in water, the Governor in Council may make regulations:

prescribing the conditions under which drilling operations may be carried out in water-covered areas and any special measures to be taken for such operations.

I therefore think this bill has taken that into consideration, without having foreknowledge of the sort of thing that has happened in California.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Apart from this particular bill, could the honourable senator tell me if the Governor in Council has so far made any such regulations which would lessen the chance of such a tragedy occurring in connection with wells which might be drilled under the sea?

Hon. Mr. Everett: I am sorry, I have no knowledge of that. I know that the Governor in Council has made no regulations concerning the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. It is possible that there are regulations concerning Maritime drilling in other parts of Canada, although I understand that the jurisdiction is the subject of argument between the provinces and the federal authority. I am sorry but I cannot answer that question.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Would the honourable senator make inquiries whether or not any such regulations have been made? I think any Newfoundlander should be greatly concerned about what is taking place off the Newfoundland coast at the present time. I do not think any of us realized the danger until we heard of these events the other day.

Hon. Mr. Everett: I will undertake to make the inquiries and report to the honourable senator personally.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

THE QUEBEC SAVINGS BANK—THIRD READING

Hon. Maurice Bourget, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, moved the third reading of Bill S-27, respecting the Quebec Savings Bank.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: A bill intituled "An act respecting the Quebec Savings Bank", has been read a third time and is now ready to pass. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to pass this bill?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Mr. Speaker, may I ask on a point of order whether it is necessary to put that motion? I thought the new rules had dispensed with the motion to pass a bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not think the new rules are yet in effect. I was given to understand that the house must pass a resolution before they become effective. At the present time I believe that we are proceeding under the old rules.

Bill passed.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Sparrow, for the second reading of Bill S-28, to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have read and re-read Bill S-28, an act to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act. I have also read and re-read the excellent speech made yesterday by the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Sparrow). I have also read the act, which is Chapter 28 of the Statutes of Canada 1952-53, entitled an act Respecting Co-operative Credit Associations.

On conclusion of this reading, I find that this bill is merely a housekeeping bill. The sponsor has indicated also that these amendments were requested by the co-operative credit movement. Therefore, it does not appear that there is anything contentious in the bill as it is; and, with the assurance that in committee we will have all the answers to the specific questions that any member of this house may wish to put, I do not see that we should delay further giving second reading to this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Sparrow, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR SECOND READING DISCHARGED AND BILL WITHDRAWN

Leave having been given to revert to motions:

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by honourable Senator Langlois, that the order for second reading of Bill S-20, to amend the Copyright Act, be discharged and the bill withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, may I say that, as far as we are concerned on this side of the house, we are very happy not to have to deal with this bill.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: So are we.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I ask now if all honourable senators are in favour of adopting this motion?

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved second reading of Bill C-152, to amend the Veterans' Land Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in one sense this is a very simple bill in that it deals with but one subject, the subject of interest rates.

Despite that simplicity, however, the explanation of the details of this bill and its effects is not altogether an easy matter. An ordinary pocket watch, taken as a whole, may be regarded as a relatively simple object; but if one starts to explain all the different parts and how they work, then it becomes rather complicated. That is the case in connection with this bill. Therefore, I think it will be easier to understand if I start by giving a thumbnail historical sketch of the Veterans' Land Act itself and its evolution down through the years.

The Veterans' Land Act was enacted in 1942, its primary purpose being to assist veterans who wished to settle on the land and become full-time or part-time farmers. For that reason there has always been a very close historical association between the Veterans' Land Act and farm credit legislation.

In the early days, farm credit was granted under the Farm Loans Act. When the Veterans' Land Act was being drafted, the best features of the Farm Loans Act and the experiences of the Farm Loans Board were incorporated in it in such a way as to place veterans in a somewhat preferred position.

In 1960 the Farm Loans Act was replaced by the Farm Credit Act, and when this new legislation was drafted many of the experiences under the Veterans' Land Act found their way into it. Therefore, much of our farm credit legislation today is now patterned after the Veterans' Land Act.

You will see, therefore, that there is a very close association between these two acts, the Veterans' Land Act and the Farm Credit Act; and this close association has been preserved down through the years and in the bill which we have before us.

Even as late as 1960, the bulk of the workload under the Veterans' Land Act was with the farm population. I have stressed the importance of this close historic association between the two acts because it is an important key to the understanding of the bill we have before us. I think this will become very clear when I deal with the individual clauses.

Down through the years, due to representations made by veterans' organizations, particularly the Royal Canadian Legion, and due also to the broad experience and the very able and wise administration of the act by the present director, Mr. Robert W. Pawley, the Veterans' Land Act has been improved and expanded, until today it is a comprehensive piece of legislation, consisting of three separate parts with a total of 76 sections.

Part I of the act enables financial assistance to be provided to qualified veterans who wish to settle on land as full- or part-time farmers. Veterans who are commercial fishermen may also receive assistance under Part I of the act.

Part II provides that any qualified veteran who is approved for a loan under the National Housing Act may receive financial and other assistance to build his home on any lot acceptable for a single family dwelling, provided he assumes his own construction contract.

Part III of the act provides for additional—and I stress this word "additional"—fully repayable loans to full- or part-time farmers at the time they are established under the act, and also to those who are already settled. Here perhaps I should point out that to provide for repayment of all or part of a veteran's indebtedness, low-cost group life insurance is available. You will see, therefore, that the main purpose of the Veterans' Land Act is to grant loans—and loans imply interest rates.

I said earlier that the Veterans' Land Act has 76 different sections. Of these, sections 15, 16, 16A, 17, 21, 25B and 68 have to do with interest rates. To put it simply, the purpose of Bill C-152 is to amend all the sections I have just mentioned, except section 15 with respect to interest rates.

Section 15 is a special case. It stipulates that the rate of interest on the first $6,000 of a loan under the Veterans' Land Act shall be 3½ per cent. This rate of interest remains the same; it is not amended by the bill before us.

Section 15, however, is amended in other respects which I shall explain in a moment.

Honourable senators, I come now to an explanation of the individual clauses. I think the best way to proceed is to start with clause 7 on page 5. Clause 7 amends subsection (1) of section 68 in Part III of the Veterans' Land Act, which is the part that relates to additional loans. Paragraph (a), subsection (1) of section 68 states that the interest of that portion of a loan between $6,000 and $20,000 shall be 5 per cent. Paragraph (b), subsection (1) of section 68, was added to the bill in 1965 and refers to that portion of a loan which is in excess of $20,000. It states that the rate on this portion of the loan, that is, the portion in excess of $20,000, may be prescribed by the Governor in Council. This is where the long association between the Veterans' Land Act and the Farm Credit Act, which I mentioned earlier, comes into play.

When the 1965 amendments became law, the Governor in Council made the rate on that part of the loan, the part in excess of $20,000, the same as the rate under the Farm Credit Act. The rate under the Farm Credit Act is determined by a formula which states that the rate will be 1 per cent above the weekly average of Dominion of Canada bonds maturing within the next five to ten years, rounded to the nearest one quarter per cent. This rate is adjusted semi-annually on October 1 and April 1. The rates referred to in clause 7, therefore, are really the Farm Credit Act rates which are established by the formula which I have just quoted.

The current Farm Credit Act rate is 7¾ per cent, and this is the rate on V.L.A. Part III loans until March 31, 1969, when it may or may not be adjusted, depending on what results are obtained from the Farm Credit Act formula. The effect of clause 7 on section 68 of the Veterans' Land Act is to eliminate paragraph (a) which states that the rate on that part of the loan over $6,000 and under $20,000 shall be 5 per cent.

When Bill C-152 comes into force there will be only two interest rates in the Veterans' Land Act instead of three, as at the present time. These two rates will be the 3½ per cent rate in section 15 for the first $6,000 of the loan, and the second rate will be the Farm Credit Act rate in section 68 for the remainder of the loan.

We can now return to clause 1 of the bill. the rate of 3½ per cent over a period of 30 years is contained in subsection (1), paragraph (d) of section 15 of the Veterans' Land Act. This part of section 15, as I have just mentioned, is not amended. The 3½ per cent on the first $6,000 of the loan which was established in 1942 still remains unaltered. This is the part of the act which placed the veteran in a preferred position, and that preferred position is still maintained because the subsidy of the interest rate in section 15 today is much greater than it was in 1942.

Now, clause 1 of Bill C-152 has the effect of amending subsection (2) of section 15 of the Veterans' Land Act, which relates to cases where a veteran has land which he has acquired under the Veterans' Land Act and on which there is a mortgage in favour of the director. Should that veteran wish to assign that mortgage to a non-veteran, clause 1 of Bill C-152 states that the mortgage must be assigned at the highest rate written into the agreement.

For example, let us take the case of a veteran who had a mortgage of over $6,000 prior to 1965 and who, after 1965, acquired a V.L.A. Part III loan as the result of which his total indebtedness exceeded $20,000. Under the act as it now stands, his agreement with the director would have three different interest rates written into it; (1) the 3½ per cent rate for the first $6,000; (2), the 5 per cent rate for that portion between $6,000 and $20,000; and (3), the farm credit rate for the portion in excess of $20,000. Let us say that the third rate written into the agreement is 7¾ per cent, the current rate under the Farm Credit Act. Clause 1 of the bill before us states that if the veteran assigns that mortgage to a non-veteran, the mortgage can be assigned only at the highest rate written into the agreement, namely, 7¾ per cent for the total amount of the loan.

Clause 2 amends section 16 of the Veterans' Land Act. Section 16 empowers the director to require the veteran to insure the property in favour of the director to the full extent of its insurable value. If the veteran fails or neglects to keep his property fully insured in favour of the director, clause 16 empowers the director to insure it and the interest rate charged on any money spent by the director in insuring the property will be the same as that in section 68.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is that not the usual mortgage clause? Does not that clause appear in all mortgages?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Yes, but the section we are dealing with here affects only the interest rate on the money that the director has to spend in insuring the property because the veteran himself has neglected to do so. As I said, that rate will be the same as in section 68, the rate prescribed by the Farm Credit formula; and also, this particular rate will be written into the agreement.

Clause 3 amends subsection 2 of section 16A of the Veterans' Land Act. The provisions of clause 3 are exactly the same as those of clause 2 except that they relate to expenditures for group life insurance instead of for property insurance. Incidentally, honourable senators may be interested to know that there are 15,000 veterans covered by group life insurance under the Veterans' Insurance Plan and the total costs amount to $125 million.

Clause 4 amends subsection 2 of section 17 of the Veterans' Land Act. Its provisions are exactly the same as those of clauses 2 and 3, the only difference being that it applies to expenditures incurred for taxes or assessments that may be due in respect of the property, whereas clauses 2 and 3 relate to expenses for insurance premiums.

Clause 4 stipulates that the rate of interest on expenditures incurred by the director for taxes or assessments shall be the same as in clause 7, namely, the rate specified in section 68 as determined by the Farm Credit formula.

Clause 5 is similar to clauses 2, 3 and 4. It amends paragraphs (e) and (f) of subsection (2) of section 21 of the Veterans' Land Act. Section 21 refers to cases where agreements between a veteran and the director are rescinded and there are charges against the property. These charges may arise out of expenditures made by the director for taxes, maintenance, advertising and other similar costs. Clause 5 states in effect that the interest rates on money the director may have to spend on properties that revert to him when agreements are rescinded shall be at the current rate established under section 68 as amended by clause 7 of the bill before us. In other words, the rate will be the current rate established by the Farm Credit formula.

Two things must be borne in mind with respect to clause 5: one is that its provisions do not apply to the interest rate on the principal debt which remains the same as written into the agreement, and the second is that the provisions of clause 5 are not written into the agreement beween the veteran and the director as is the case with the provisions of clauses 2, 3 and 4.

Clause 6 amends subsection (3) of section 25B of the Veterans' Land Act. Section 25B was added to the act in 1965. Prior to 1965 any veteran who had used up his benefits under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act or the War Service Grants Act was automatically disqualified for benefit under the Veterans' Land Act unless he repaid those grants in cash. The purpose of section 25B was to enable veterans to requalify under the Veterans' Land Act by repaying in full or in part the amounts they had received by way of rehabilitation grants and war service grants. As these amounts were often too much for most veterans to pay back in a lump sum, section 25B made provision for these grants to be added to the V.L.A. loan and to be paid off in regular V.L.A. instalments. In effect, the director paid back the rehabilitation and war service grants on behalf of the veteran, and clause 6 stipulates that the interest rate for such expenditures shall be the current rate under section 68 as amended by clause 7. This again is the rate determined by the Farm Credit formula.

The same interest rate applies also to repayable grants made under sections 38 and 39 of the Veterans' Land Act. These grants were made to veterans settling on lands owned by the federal and provincial governments and to Indians who were veterans.

Clause 8 amends section 75 of the Veterans' Land Act. This is merely a legislative drafting procedure, tying together the different parts of the act that are being amended by this bill and providing the authority to do so.

Clause 9 is important because it protects the veteran who had filed an application for financial assistance under the Veterans' Land Act prior to September 13, 1968. It also protects similar applications from veterans received by the director between September 13, 1968, and the date on which this bill becomes law, provided these applications are approved by the director. The veterans I have just referred to will receive the benefit of the 5 per cent rate in the act as it now stands.

Honourable senators, it is evident that the Veterans' Land Act has been good for Canada and a great blessing for many veterans. Some 117,000 veterans have taken advantage of the financial benefits which it makes available, and the total expenditure made under this act for all purposes amounts to $911 million. At the present time there are approximately 56,000 active accounts, representing an investment of $438 million.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is there any time limit up until which an application for an advance or loan under this act may be made by a veteran? A veteran who asked me this question told me that his time was running out.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Yes. Honourable senators may be aware that the Veterans' Land Act is in the process of being phased out. I do not have a copy of the act with me, but the present act specifies the date March 31, 1974, after which no new applications from veterans who have not been established will be received. The corresponding date for veterans already established is, I think, March 31, 1977. You may also remember that before a veteran could secure a loan he had to qualify, and the cut-off date for qualification was October 31, 1968.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I think that is probably what he was referring to, that his time had or was about to run out.

Hon. Mr. Carter: After October 31, 1968, it became impossible for a veteran to qualify.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is no extension of that time limit in this bill?

Hon. Mr. Carter: No, there is no extension. I may say that notice of this cut-off date was given several years ago, and at the present time there are 158,000 veterans who have qualified. It is estimated that about 30 per cent of these applications will be approved and the veterans established.

Honourable senators, I think I have said enough to show that this is important legislation. I might add that it is proposed to refer this bill to the appropriate committee, which, I understand, is the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, Therefore, I hope that this bill will commend itself to you and that you will give it speedy approval.

Hon. John M. MacDonald: Honourable senators, I would just like to add a few words in regard to this bill.

First of all, I am sure we are all indebted to Senator Carter for the detailed and splendid explanation he has given of the bill. After listening to him, I do not think there is much that needs to be added. In fact, after listening to his explanation, I do not think it should be necessary to refer it to committee—unless he so desires.

I certainly agree with him when he says that this act has been good for Canada and a blessing for the veterans. It certainly has been. To show this I will quote a few short paragraphs from the statement made by Mr. R. W. Pawley—the Director General of the Soldiers Settlement and Veterans' Land Act Branch, Department of Veterans Affairs—when he appeared before the Veterans Affairs Committee of the House of Commons on November 28 last. He said:

> After 25 years' experience, there is every indication that the V.L.A. scheme will be judged an individual economic success as well as being instrumental in enriching the human resources of Canada.
> In broad terms, it will have touched the lives of over one-half million people represented by veterans and their immediate families, which was about the size of the rural population of Alberta in 1961. The director has bought 9 million acres of farm land and over 536,000 acres for small holdings,...

Further on he said:

> The director has taken title to around 100,000 properties. Of these, he has deeded back to veterans, at their request, or because the conditions of the contract were fulfilled, about 53,500 titles. In addition, to permit the owner veteran to sell off land nearly 17,600 conveyances have been prepared. Since inception the director has granted 9,400 easements for the purpose of bringing new services to the area or improving these existing, and entered into 5,300 surface, oil and gas leases.

Honourable senators, this gives you some idea of the magnitude of the work that has been done under this act.

Senator Carter has said something about how the provisions of the act have been phased out, and perhaps I could put on the record the remarks of the director concerning this. He said as follows:

> In order to terminate the lending operations under the act in an orderly manner and to permit forward planning as it relates to manpower and financial resources, while, at the same time, giving veterans a reasonable period in which to take advantage of its provisions, three terminable dates have been established. The first is now past, October 31, 1968, beyond which no further applications to qualify for the provisions of the act have been accepted. The second date is March 31, 1974, after which no loan applications from veterans not already established will be accepted. The third date is March 31, 1977, after which no loans of any nature will be made.

Senator Carter has referred to that, and he mentioned the fact that 158,000 certificates of eligibility have been issued by the department, and it was felt that perhaps 30 per cent of those would go through and loans would be approved. I think the director figured they would go anywhere from 30,000 to 50,000, but I would not be surprised if the number was higher than that because, as honourable senators may remember, prior to October 31, 1968, it was estimated that the number of applications for certificates of eligibility would amount to 100,000, and yet 158,000 have been received. It would not surprise me in the least to discover that there are more applications for loans than the number anticipated at the present time.

As the honourable sponsor of this bill has pointed out, this act deals with interest rates. It should be remembered that up to 1965 there was no subsidy by the federal Government of the interest rates on loans made under the Veterans' Land Act, because the interest rate at that time was somewhat below the rate which the federal Government paid for money, so it was sufficient to cover the cost of administration.

Perhaps I may be allowed to give an example of the comparison between the old and the new rates. A small holder who had a maximum repayable debt of $14,000 paid, under the old system, $11,506. Under the proposed rates he will pay $17,554. I point out that this is in interest only, and the principal amount of $14,000 has to be added to those figures in order to obtain the total the veteran would repay. From this it can be seen that the increase in interest is going to be substantial so far as small holders are concerned. It will be, in fact, something over $6,000

There is one thing that I should like to ask Senator Carter to explain. I understand that after October 31, 1968, which was the cut-off date after which no applications for eligibility would be accepted, 600 applications were received. I should like to know whether those have been rejected out of hand, or if there has been an endeavour to bring them under the eligibility regulations.

Honourable senators, I do not think it is necessary to say anything more. Personally, I am disappointed that the period of eligibility was not extended. Perhaps it would not be asking too much for the Government to assume some of the higher interest costs. After all is said and done, and while the war has been over for a long time and the memories of people are short, we should not forget that we still owe something to these veterans who participated in the wars in which Canada was engaged.

The Royal Canadian Legion is the organized voice of the veterans of Canada. When this matter was discussed before the Veterans Affairs Committee of the House of Commons, one of the vice-presidents of the Royal Canadian Legion, Mr. Justice Redmond Roche, presented a brief on behalf of the Legion, in which four points were made.

First of all, the Legion commended the Government for maintaining the 3½ per cent interest on loans under $6,000. Secondly, it recommended that the new rate of interest on loans over $6,000 be the same as that paid by the Government for borrowed money, and that the Government itself should bear the administrative costs. Thirdly, the Legion asked that consideration be given to reducing the size of the lot.

I should like to say at this point that while that does not come under these amendments to the act, the size of the small-holding lot has been reduced over the years until it is now half an acre, or roughly 21,780 square feet. The Department of Veterans Affairs has discretion by which it can accept a reduction of 20 per cent in the area, so that a veteran can be eligible if he has a lot of 17,424 square feet. It has been suggested that this be reduced to 10,000 square feet. We must recognize that no veteran with half an acre of land or less is going to do much spare-time farming. We should forget about that, and allow these loans to be made just for the purpose of building a home.

The fourth recommendation made by the Legion was the removal of the income ceiling that was imposed for 1968 and 1969. When it became difficult for the department to find the money to make these loans, it was decided that loans would first be made to those whose income was under $7,000 a year. That amount was chosen, because on an average over the past five or more years about 60 per cent of the loans were made to veterans whose annual income was under $7,000. This was a scheme whereby it was hoped to take care of the more pressing needs of those in the lower income groups.

The Legion asked that this ceiling be removed, and I have no doubt it will be as soon as funds are available to make these loans. The general tone of the Legion's brief was that, while they did not like the legislation, they accepted it as inevitable and were resigned to it, and consequently hope to make the best of it.

Honourable senators, to those remarks I can only add that I support the amendment contained in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carter, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

SENATE REFORM

TABLING OF DOCUMENT—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege, and I am sorry that the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) is not in his place when I do so.

It has come to my attention that among the documents tabled this afternoon, which he did not mention specifically in the tabling, is a document called "The Constitution and the People of Canada". This document is a White Paper prepared, and presumably circulated, by the Government in connection with the federal-provincial conference which is to start on Monday next. Some half hour ago I tried to get a copy of this document and was informed by the Distribution Office that they were no longer available. Somehow or other a copy has now appeared on my desk.

Certainly I express my own feeling of outrage that a document like this, which vitally concerns the constitution of this house, should be brought to us here on the eve of an adjournment which will last until Tuesday night, when the constitutional conference will virtually be finished.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think that in common decency and courtesy to the Senate, at least the attention of senators should have been drawn to this document when it was tabled. There was no opportunity for any of us to see it, and there will be no opportunity for any of us to discuss it until Tuesday night. By that time, of course, any provisions affecting the Senate will probably have been dealt with, if they are reached at that meeting. I simply object to the method of tabling these documents without our knowing what is in them, without our knowing at least what the title of the document is.

I think that if the privileges of the Senate have not been violated, certainly the courtesies of the Senate, courtesies that are due to all honourable senators, have been outraged.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I share the sentiments—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Indignation.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: —The indignation of Senator Connolly concerning the tabling of this document. To show how much it affects the members of the Senate, I think I should quote for the record from page 30.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I have not received a copy of it yet.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Nobody has.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the reason why I think I should quote from it. It is an exerpt from the chapter entitled "The Senate". It deals generally with the role of the Senate, and then says:

> The Government of Canada would therefore propose a new approach to the organization of the Senate to achieve this end.

I think nobody would quarrel with the end that is outlined, but here is the substance of what I want to put on the record:

> The Senate could be partly selected by the federal government and partly selected by provincial governments. The method of selection of Senators by the provinces could be by nomination of the provincial governments, acting with or without the approval of their legislatures, depending on the provisions of each provincial constitution. The term of office for Senators could be limited to a specific number of years—perhaps six.

Equitable transitional arrangements would of course be required in respect of those holding Senate appointments at the time these changes come into effect. These arrangements would have to be considered with care, ensuring that no injustice is done while at the same time permitting those changes required in the interests of the Canada of the future.

I merely want to say that these words that I have just quoted do not suggest the abolition of the Senate, but they certainly suggest the dismissal of the present membership.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Do I understand that copies are not available?

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): That I cannot answer. Half an hour ago I tried to get copies and was told there would be no more available until tomorrow. Now, miraculously, a copy has appeared on my desk. I should add that I do not say what I do to provoke a debate on the substance of the document. That is impossible at a time like this; nobody is prepared for it. But I do object strenuously to the method in which the document was produced, so that we had to go through the back door to find out where and what it was.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: We agree.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I think this action as reported by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) confirms the worst fears of the committee you selected to deal with the rules. A great deal of the pressure on that committee, and a great deal of the haste it felt called upon to make and for which to some degree it was criticized, was just in case something like this happened, where the Senate would finally discover that there had been plans made for its future but that those plans had in no way been discussed, either with the Senate or, as far as I know or assume, with any of its members. I think that to all of us this must be rather disappointing news. It is confirmation once again that the Senate is not held in very high regard.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: By the Government.

Hon. Mr. Molson: By the Government, or by the other place, one or both. Certainly, I do not think this action indicates that the Senate is held in very great respect.

As Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has said, there is no opportunity to debate this, there is no opportunity, as far as I can see, to read it; but it obviously suggests, from the quotations given to us by Senator Flynn, that not only the future form of the Senate is being discussed but the future disposition of our existence is being discussed, our own future occupation. I think there might have been the courtesy to make this known to us a little bit ahead of the day of settlement, which presumably will be Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, I have not seen a copy of the document, except that I see it now before me on the desk of the honourable senator in front of me. I notice it is headed: "The Constitution and the People of Canada". Then it says, "The Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada".

We, the Senate, we are part of the Government, and I thought one of the first things which should be done, if the Prime Minister is going to publish a document like that, is at least to let us know something about it. We are part of the Government. He is the Prime Minister. I hope it is not a secret document and, if it is, I do not see why some honourable senators have got copies. I would like to get a copy.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I understand that copies of the document are in the mailboxes of honourable senators now. I have just received that information.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I was about to announce this fact which has just been stated, in answer to a question asked by the honourable Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche). A copy of this report will be in the mail of each honourable senator tomorrow. Having said that, I make no further comment.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I would like to make one or two remarks in regard to the matter we are discussing, and I will not repeat anything which has been said.

The first point is that it is most extraordinary that a document such as the one just referred to should appear here, which suggests changing radically the operations of the Senate, whose constitution is embedded in the B.N.A. Act, without at least consultation with the members of the Senate or indeed the Senate as a body.

My second point is one of which the public of Canada may not be aware as fully as they should, and consequently I make it here. The fact is that no one—the other house, the Prime Minister, no one—can lay hands on the Senate as presently provided for in the Constitution of this country, without the concurrence of the Senate itself. I say this for this reason: It seems to be common gossip, or the thinking of many people, that the Prime Minister or the other place acting alone can at any time do anything they wish with the Senate, even to the extent of emasculating it or even abolishing it. That thought should be dispelled from the minds of people in the other place who believe this fiction and also of the public of Canada.

Honourable senators, I conclude by emphasizing that it should be known and well known that no one can lay hands on this body, as it is provided for in the Constitution of Canda, without its own consent.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I would like to agree with the honourable senator who has just sat down, but unfortunately I am afraid that he has not considered one feature of our present situation, that is, that the appointment of new senators is not in our hands but rather in the hands of the Prime Minister by practice and in the hands of the Governor in Council as a matter of law. Therefore, the threat in the paragraph which was read, which I have not seen—I have no copy of it yet before me—would seem to indicate that the Prime Minister is in a position, with the support of his executive, to make arrangements with regard to the appointment of new senators which will totally change the character of this chamber.

I have already drawn attention to it and I do so again, that for as long as I remember there has been no quarrel or confrontation between ourselves and the Commons or the Government, that we have had the fullest co-operation between these bodies. We have gone along like gentlemen, in the interests of the nation that we serve. For as long as I can remember, we have co-operated in every possible way and always with the future welfare of Canada as a whole in our minds.

The reason we have been able to do that—although we sit as Liberals on one side of the chamber and Conservatives on the other—is the fact that we are all federal men. We are not representatives of provincial politicians as such, although we do represent provinces; we are not the hired men of anybody in a province. We are all representatives of Canada as a whole. While we may differ in some details and perhaps in some principles, as Liberals versus Conservatives, what has always been in our minds, on both sides of the house, is the welfare of Canada at large.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, the result of that has been that we have been able to co-operate with the Administration; we have never blocked the policy of the Government of the day and certainly not the will of the public of Canada.

Honourable senators, supposing they make the change that is suggested, that the Prime Minister appoint representatives of the provinces, or rather representatives of the politicians of the provinces—which is quite a different matter—and supposing it were the minimum, that it were just one from each province, that would be ten senators, in due course, representing the provincial politicians. These might join with some opposition—never mind which side, because I am speaking of the future—join with the opposition to block the legislation proposed by the Government of the day. Is it not easy to imagine such a situation?

We have seen blockades of legislation in the past. We have had some rather vivid experiences in that regard. Cannot we easily imagine this, that the representatives of the provinces, with some of the opposition to the Government of the day, may join hands and blockade the operations of Parliament? What is suggested is much more important than the welfare of just one chamber. It may be the destruction of Parliament itself. This is the most serious suggestion affecting the democracy of our nation that has come to my attention in a long lifetime. I am thoroughly concerned.

I have told this once or twice privately of dear old Senator Howden. He was a doctor. He had been a cowpuncher in his earlier days and the was a man very well informed as to people and affairs. I remember him as a member of my committee on divorce voicing the proposition that any man who loved his wife would never allow another man in his household. Dr. Howden knew pretty well what he was talking about. Now I say to the people of Canada that anybody who loves Canada and the Parliament of Canada will not allow non-federal forces into the inner circles of our legislative systems so that they may take part in the destruction of our household. A house divided against itself cannot stand.

This is very serious, honourable senators. The Government of this country should remember that we have got along very harmoniously in the past and we should now avoid laying the foundation, not of the unity of Canada, but rather for the destruction of unity right in their own household.

I regret this suggestion, but it is only a suggestion. It will provoke a great deal of discussion, not only here in Parliament, but as well in the press and among people everywhere in Canada. I hope that that discussion will take place at once, as soon as this document becomes public, and that we will hear many expressions of opinion such as I am now voicing. Discussion may induce the Government to hold its hand in this dangerous proposal.

Some hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At least they should consult us as to what the results might be of the drastic action this document suggests.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I do not want to keep you longer or try to say any more than I think is necessary at this time.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has brought to our attention the fact that this matter has been put before us without any prior knowledge on our part. Fine. There must be knowledge of something that is going to be provided to the Federal-Provincial Conference for discussion. How much public discussion can there be before it is given to the Conference without criticism resulting? In other words, somebody has had to walk a tightrope. One thing to keep in mind, in order to keep a balance, is that this matter will not be decided by Tuesday. This Federal-Provincial Conference will have a great many things to do, and I would be surprised if they get very much decided over a great many months or even years.

Now, people have a right to know what is being proposed and what has been proposed, but we will have a chance to read this, after which we will know what we are debating. I suggest that the most useful thing we can do for Canada and for this Senate, having made a reasonable and proper protest in good faith, is to keep quiet until we have read this, until we know what it is all about, and until we have heard what the other fellow has to say. As somebody said once to me, if you let the other fellow say his piece first, you have an advantage because you know not only what he knows but what you know too. I suggest we do that. Let us wait and see what people are actually saying and what they are planning, and then we can decide what action we should take.

Let us not run around like hurt children and say things which add nothing to the discussion, take away from our dignity, and certainly add not one iota to our security or any contribution we can make to our country.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a matter of clarification only, Senator Roebuck disagreed with Senator Thorvaldson when the latter said that the Senate would have to agree. I suggest to Senator Roebuck that the extract which I quoted would support the contention of Senator Thorvaldson, because to have the province appoint the senators—and it is mentioned "a nomination by the provincial Governments acting with or without the approval of their legislatures", and they speak of a term of six years—would require an amendment to the B.N.A. Act and, therefore, the approval of the Senate. That is the only point that I want to make at this time.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: And that is the point I was making.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am quite sure that we all agree with Senator Prowse. Nobody was drawing any final conclusions at this time. We were just saying that this is coming to us and it is about time that we know what the Government is thinking, if not of the Senate, at least of the senators.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The only point I would add to what Senator Flynn has said is that we are very fortunate indeed that we even know about it, because we might have found out about it only in the press or through the mails. That is the only point that I object to.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I agree with the honourable Leader of the Opposition in his statement with regard to the suggestion that he read. They would have to be approved in this house. But it does not answer my suggestion that appointments may be made by the executive without any change in the present Constitution and without our consent. Appointments are not even our businesss.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It would be a slow process, then.

The Hon. the Speaker: As many honourable senators have taken part in this discussion on a question of privilege, and as the next sitting will be on Tuesday evening, which will give us ample time for honourable senators to take full knowledge of the document involved, may I suggest that we proceed now with whatever business is ready on the Order Paper.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, 1969, at 8 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE PRESENTED BY HON. MR. LEONARD

Thursday, February 6, 1969

By Order of the Senate made on October 1st, 1968, the Standing Committee on Finance was authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates and the Revised Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st of March, 1969, and by a further Order made on November 19th, 1968, the said Committee was authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in Supplementary Estimates "A" for the said fiscal year.

Your Committee has examined the said Estimates, the Revised Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates and reports as follows:

1. The effect of the said Revised Estimates upon the original estimates was an increase in expenditures of a net aggregate amount of $386,198,566. This increase was due in largest measure to the escalation in costs of open-end cost-sharing Federal-Provincial arrangements. In addition certain items that in the past have been omitted in the main Estimates and included in Supplementary Estimates have been placed in the Revised Estimates.

2. In the result, the total Revised main Estimates provide for expenditures of $10,670,930,598.

3. The Revised Estimates also provided for loans of $684,526,812, an increase over the original Estimates of $200,026,812, due largely to advances made or to be made by Canada to the International Development Association and to the Bank for International Settlements.

4. To past Reports your Committee has attached a table showing a year by year comparison of Federal Government budgetary expenditure, plus Old Age Security Fund payments, both as shown by the Auditor-General's Reports. This table is brought up to March 31st, 1968 as Appendix "A" to this Report. This table shows that for the fiscal year ending on that date, the increase in such spending over the previous year was $1,407,600,000. Such amount and the percentage increase were the largest in over 16 years. The figures for the current fiscal year are not yet available although it is clear that there will be another substantial increase even though the dollar amount and the percentage rate may not be as large as for the year ending March 31st, 1968.

5. From time to time your Committee in its reports has made a comparison between the growth of Federal Government expenditures and the growth of the country's Gross National Production. On a national accounts basis in the calendar year 1965 federal expenditures were 16.2 per cent of the country's Gross National Production. This increased to 16.7 per cent in 1966, and to 17.5 per cent in 1967. The figures are not yet available for 1968, but it is reasonable to estimate that the percentage will be slightly higher than 17.5 per cent. This comparison shows that our federal Government expenditures have been rising at a faster rate than the country's production. The provincial and municipal expenditures have been growing at an even faster rate and now take a larger percentage of the Gross National Production than does the federal sector. These factors, when coupled with a federal budgetary deficit have put pressures on costs and prices so that inflation is now one of our serious problems in Canada today. If we are to exercise control over the unacceptable rate of inflation that has been going on, we should at least keep the growth of governmental expenditures within the rate of growth of our economy and bring the federal budget into balance.

6. The fastest growing item in the federal budget is the amount contributed to the provincial governments. An example is the case of provincial post-secondary education programs. In the year 1965-66 the federal contribution for such programs was $40,000,000. In the current fiscal year, the fiscal transfers and cash payments to the provinces for the same purposes are estimated at about $500 million—twelve times what they were three years ago.

7. This brings us to consider the method of Federal-Provincial cost sharing agreements. Where there is an open-end cost sharing program, the result is that the more that the province spends, then the more is the share of the federal government, and yet the federal Government has too little control over the cost. A province may be able to finance in whole or in substantial part from its own tax resources an expanding program of activity within its own jurisdiction, and in such case an open-end cost sharing agreement may set up an arithmetical progression of expenditures beyond those originally contemplated. This state of affairs was largely responsible for the discrepancy in the figures between the original Estimates and the Revised Estimates. It would seem to be more reasonable from the federal Government standpoint that its contribution should be of a fixed character for a clearly defined program, so that it can set a limit on its liability. This it has done in the program of the Health Resources Fund, where its annual contribution has been fixed at $37,500,000.

8. Your Committee continued its consideration of the recommendations of the Glassco Commission with respect to the form and text of the Estimates. The President of the Treasury Board appeared before the Committee and submitted examples of proposed forms of estimates. It is the view of your Committee that these new forms will provide more information than in the past as to the expenditures and their relation to programs of action by the various departments. The number of votes will be substantially reduced. The Committee also continued its consideration of the unimplemented recommendations of the Glassco Report.

9. In the course of our examination of the Estimates and Supplementary Estimates we have noted a number of items that contain the phrase "notwithstanding the provisions of..." and then refer to certain statutes, particularly the Financial Administration Act. Each such item should be carefully scrutinized. In some cases, it is found that the effect is simply to exclude one particular item of expenditure from the general provisions of the quoted Act. It has happened, however, on some occasions that the item is sufficiently general in character to be in effect an amendment to the Act, and this type of amendment should not be in the Appropriation Act but by a separate amending statute.

10. Your Committee again expresses its thanks to the witnesses who have appeared before it, particularly the Honourable the President of the Treasury Board, his Officers and the Auditor-General of Canada.

All which is respectfully submitted.

SENATE REFORM

TABLING OF DOCUMENT—FURTHER QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege. On February 6 last I raised a question of privilege, not personal privilege, as this is. In the course of my earlier remarks, I referred to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and the tabling of a certain document. In part, I said:

> ...which he did not mention specifically in the tabling, is a document called "The Constitution and the People of Canada".

Later on I referred to the tabling in these words:

> ...without our knowing at least what the title of the document is.

I was not in the chamber at the time of the tabling, and I have since learned that when the document was tabled the Leader of the Government did quote the title of it, "The Constitution and the People of Canada". To that extent my statement was incorrect. I apologize to the Senate for misleading it on that point, and I apologize to the Leader of the Government in that respect. The rest of the remarks I made, I think are valid.

HON. ARTHUR L. BEAUBIEN

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, since we last met Senator Arthur Lucien Beaubien has resigned as a senator of this house.

[Translation]

The honourable Senator Beaubien, who was born in the province of Quebec, made a career in public life which could not be better described than by saying that he has served his country well.

The hon. Senator Beaubien was elected to the House of Commons in 1921 and served there as a member until January 1940, when he became a member of this house.

He has served his country well and we hope his health will enable him to fully enjoy life.

[English]

We have learned with great regret of the decision of Senator Beaubien to resign from the Senate. It is well that we should recall his distinguished contributions to the public life of Canada.

Senator Beaubien was born in Athabaska, in the Province of Quebec. Both his parents were of French descent. He went west with his parents as a young boy and was educated and grew up in the Province of Manitoba.

Senator Beaubien was a farmer, but I believe he was first and foremost a parliamentarian. First elected to the House of Commons in 1921, he served as a member of that house until his appointment to the Senate in January 1940. He was a member of the Senate for 29 years and for many of those years he served as Whip of the Liberal group in this house. He served Parliament, in the House of Commons and in the Senate, for a period of more than 47 years. We all knew him as a kind, understanding and loyal friend. He was a very hard worker, and his manner was such that he easily obtained the co-operation of others. I well remember when I first came to the House of Commons in 1935 his kindness to me and the contributions he made in that chamber.

Senator Beaubien has retired because of failing health. He deserves a well-earned rest. He will be sadly missed in this house where he was a valuable member and served faithfully for so long.

I am grateful to Senator Croll for reminding me just now that today Senator Beaubien celebrates his ninetieth birthday. It is appropriate that I should, even in this very inadequate way, pay a deserving tribute to a man who has served this country so well.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am one of those who has been acquainted with Senator Arthur L. Beaubien for very many years, perhaps longer than anyone present in the chamber, with the possible exceptions of Senator Haig and Senator Thorvaldson, who lived in Winnipeg very close to Provencher where Senator Beaubien lived for many years.

I consider Senator Beaubien one of my closest friends. I knew him long before he came to the Senate. He and I and Senator Aimé Bénard used to go fishing together at a place called Val du Bois, north of Buckingham, in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There are no fish left there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We caught them all.

Senator Beaubien had his car here and he used to take Senator Aimé Bénard and I with him. He was a wonderful man to go places with; he was always the life of the party.

After he became a member of the Senate in 1940, I was very closely associated with him, right up to the time of his retirement. In fact, before we adjourned for the Christmas holidays he said that he would be back in Ottawa shortly after the New Year and would like me to help him make out his income tax return. I had been doing that for quite a number of years and he appreciated any help that I could give him.

As the Leader of the Government has said, Senator Beaubien was a Member of the House of Commons and the Senate for a total of 47 consecutive years, which is a real record, I would think. Before he resigned he was No. 3 in the seniority list in this house. I happen to be No. 1 and Senator Farris is No. 2. Senator Hayden will replace Senator Beaubien as No. 3 and Senator Paterson will now be No. 4.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I thought Senator Roebuck was No. 1.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Not in seniority in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): I am becoming slightly frightened—this means that I will now be No. 13.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I know that Senator Farris, Senator Hayden and Senator Paterson join with me in saying we are sorry that Senator Arthur Beaubien will not be with us any more. I was saddened to hear that his wife died suddenly about a month and a half ago. This I did not know until I arrived in Ottawa. I am sure that that bereavement had some effect upon his health, and it is one of the reasons he does not feel able to come back to this house again. However, he has a son and three daughters living near him, and I am sure they will help him in the difficult days that lie ahead.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I should not like to detain the house for any length of time, but in view of the fact that Arthur Beaubien was the Whip during the period of my leadership, and more especially because he was a very dear and cherished friend of mine, I should like to say something about him here this evening.

Authur Beaubien represented the riding of Provencher in the House of Commons, and his designation in the Senate was also Provencher. That is a very historic riding, which had elected and been represented by Louis Riel. Arthur used to talk a great deal about the history of those times. He had studied them very thoroughly, indeed.

I do not know of any man who enjoyed greater respect in this chamber than did Senator Beaubien. When he came to Parliament he was a Progressive; it was in his later years that he saw the light and joined the Liberal party. But as Senator Aseltine has said, he spent 47 years in Parliament, more than half a lifetime. And as Senator Croll and the leader have pointed out, today is his 90th birthday. I am sure if he were here we would be having a party to celebrate the occasion.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We wish him many happy returns of the day.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, indeed!

What Senator Aseltine said about the loss of his wife was most fitting, and our sympathy goes out to him. Her health was very bad for many years; it was a source of worry to him, and I am sure it contributed to the decline in his own health.

Arthur Beaubien enjoyed the confidence of everybody in this house, regardless of political affiliation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I know that when I as leader had problems I would turn to Arthur. He would immediately go to Senator Macdonald, the Whip opposite, and the two of them would leave the chamber. By the time they came back all the problems were solved and we went on our way, we did our work and got on with the war. I say this because I believe that not enough attention is given to the effective work of the Whips on both sides of this house. But I am sure that our present Whips would agree that it will be a long time before we have a Whip who is as effective and who commands the respect and affection of so many as did Arthur Beaubien. The Whips are really our unsung heroes, and nobody knows this better than Senator Aseltine, Senator Martin, Senator Flynn and myself, for we have had to depend upon them for the great work they do.

I remember going to St. Jean Baptiste to speak during the election campaign of 1965. I might as well have been talking to the moon or the stars because the Tories were much too strong for us there. But Arthur drove 25 miles to be there. He was one of the very few who bothered to come to the meeting to hear me speak. After it was over he got up and introduced me! We really had a wonderful time. He had a great sense of humour. Frankly, all of us envy Senator Aseltine the fishing trips he had with Arthur.

I remember the other Senator Connolly, Arthur Beaubien and myself going up to the country on a summer afternoon. The Senate, I hope, was adjourned—I do not think we were playing hookey. We got out in the boat and ran out of gas, and we would still be there if someone had not come with a couple of gallons of gas and rescued us. However, we had much fun with Arthur Beaubien that afternoon. He was afraid every minute we were out there that he might be drowned or stranded overnight.

Arthur was a great person and character. He gave much time to the Parliament that he loved, and the people of Parliament whom he admired so much.

We shall miss him greatly, and we all wish him happiness in his well-deserved retirement after his ninetieth birthday.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, as one of the senators from Manitoba I would like to add briefly to the tributes paid to our retired colleague Arthur Beaubien.

He and I travelled from Ottawa to Winnipeg on the same aircraft many times. I met his daughters and his grandson. Frequently they assisted him when he left the aircraft. He is still a respected farmer in Manitoba. He has been flooded out at least once every three years, but he says, "The water is there, and what can I do about it?"

He is a kindly, courteous gentleman at all times. In private conversation he is outspoken. On the numerous occasions I have talked to him at the airport terminal, he has told me things that would not be well repeated in this chamber or in the caucus of the Liberal party.

Senator Beaubien has always been most helpful to freshmen senators. Before I was appointed to the Senate, I knew him through my father, who was a personal friend of his. Arthur Beaubien is also a great friend of mine, and I will miss him in this chamber. I echo the remarks made by earlier speakers who wish him well in his remaining years.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few words to the tribute paid to our very dear senator, Arthur Beaubien on his retirement. His office in the Senate was close to mine and, on many occasions, I had the honour of consulting him; I have always noted the interest he took in the important questions discussed in this house.

I could not help but note his devotion, as Whip of the Liberal party and his determination in keeping touch with the various members of our party.

I also know that everyone held him in high esteem, both in the Senate and in the other place and, particularly, in the Winnipeg area, especially in St. Jean-Baptiste, that village located on the banks of the Red River, where Senator Beaubien has his farm.

I myself enjoyed his hospitality in the fall of 1941, I think, and I have a very pleasant and very tender recollection of my stay, when I greatly appreciated the cordiality shown to me by him and by his wife whom we are now mourning.

I saw myself that the population over there, particularly Canadians of French origin, Franco-Manitobans, held Senator Beaubien in great affection. I took part with him in the celebration of the 25th anniversary of ordination of his parish priest, Rev. Caron. The whole population was there and showed at every occasion its profound esteem and cordial friendship for Senator Beaubien.

I will never forget his enlightened patriotism. He was a great Canadian in every sense of the word. I had many opportunities to appreciate his lofty feelings and his devotion to his countrymen.

I offer him my heartfelt sympathy on the death of his wife and I am sorry that he is leaving us. I assure him of my very deep friendship.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I add but a few words to say that I feel regret, like all my colleagues, at seeing our friend, Senator Arthur Beaubien, leaving us today. As it has already been said, this is his 90th birthday.

He was the dean of Parliament, having been elected in 1921 and having sat without interruption in the other place and here since then—47 years without interruption, that is almost unique. Senator Power sat here for 50 years; therefore, Senator Beaubien's career comes close to the record set by Senator Power.

Senator Beaubien was a dedicated and shrewd man. He was a perfect gentleman. My relations with him since my coming to the Senate have always been excellent.

I wish him a very happy retirement.

Before resuming my seat, may I point out now that our dean, Senator Beaubien, is leaving us, that it is Senator Aseltine, appointed here in 1933, who becomes dean of Parliament; immediately after come the Government leader, Senators Denis, Fournier (de Lanaudière) and Kinley, all elected in 1935.

[English]

Hon. Norman McL. Paterson: Honourable senators, I cannot let pass this opportunity of saying a word or two about my friend Arthur Beaubien. He came from St. Jean-Baptiste, Manitoba, where he had a farm. The only thing I ever had against him was the fact that he never sent a bushel of barley to me. He sent all his crop to a competitor.

I remember in 1940, when I was asked whom I would like to sponsor me, I realized that the only person I knew in the Senate at that time was Arthur Meighen, who was born at Portage La Prairie, as I was. Arthur Beaubien upbraided me for suggesting such an awful thing as having the Conservative Leader in the Senate introduce me, and so I was introduced by Senator Honey.

Senator Beaubien, Senator Hayden and I roomed together for several years. I have a very happy recollection of those days, but in conclusion, I should like to refer to something that does not add up. I am a non-smoker. Arthur was and still is almost a chain-smoker, and he is 90. It does not add up, because cigarette smoking killed Chubby Power. I wish Arthur Beaubien many more years of happy life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING BILLS

COMMONS AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-4, respecting the marking of articles containing precious metals, and acquainting the Senate that they have passed this bill with the following amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

> "(4) No person shall knowingly make a false or"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved, with leave of the Senate, that the amendment be concurred in now.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that after full debate, both in this chamber and in the former Committee on Banking and Commerce, Bill S-4 was readily passed without any amendments. The bill has now also passed third reading in the other place, with one very minor amendment. During committee deliberations in the other place an objection was raised to the wording of subsection 4 of clause 8 of the bill.

After seeking the advice of the Department of Justice, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs agreed that the addition of one word to the clause was desirable, and therefore the bill was amended accordingly. The word "knowingly" is added to subsection 4 of clause 8 so that the bill conforms to the wording of similar provisions in other legislations.

In view of the fact that only a legal technicality is involved, I would recommend that honourable senators now concur in the amendment.

Amendment concurred in.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-148, to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Consolidated Index and Table of Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, for the period January 1, 1955 to December 31, 1968. (English and French texts).

SPECIAL JOINT AND SENATE COMMITTEES

APPOINTMENT, TERMINATION, AND COST—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. The Special Committee of the Senate on Manpower and Employment,

2. The Special Committee of the Senate on Land Use in Canada,

3. The Special Committee of the Senate on Aging,

4. The Special Joint Committee on Consumer Credit,

5. The Special Joint Committee on Divorce,

(a) The date of appointment of each committee,
(b) The date of termination of each committee, and
(c) The total cost of each committee.

Hon. Paul Martin: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

1. (a) May 18, 1960; (b) Report adopted by the Senate; September 26, 1961; (c) $43,912.00.

2. (a) January 30, 1957; (b) Report adopted by the Senate; December 16, 1963; (c) $32,749.00.

3. (a) July 29, 1963; (b) Report tabled February 2, 1966; debated on February 24, 1966; (c) $144,334.00.

4. (a) November 21, 1963; (b) Report tabled May 8, 1967; (c) $244,400.00.

5. (a) March 23, 1966; (b) Report adopted by the Senate; February 13, 1968; (c) $75,151.00.

THE VATICAN

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR—INQUIRY

Hon. David Walker: Before the Orders of the Day, may I ask the Leader of the Senate (Hon. Mr. Martin), whether it is true that our first ambassador to the Vatican is to be the present Leader of Senate?

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 6, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Everett, for the second reading of Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, after the very complete statement by our colleague Senator Everett on this bill there is very little more that need be said about the bill itself. As was said by Senator Everett, the purpose of the bill is to regulate and control the oil resources of that part of Canada, namely, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, which is under the jurisdiction of the Parliament and Government of Canada and not under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

As all of you realize the provinces—particularly the western provinces, and perhaps every province of Canada—have dealt with the conservation and production of oil within the provincial boundaries. Although I have not compared the sections of this bill with the provincial acts, I take it for granted from glancing through it that this bill is almost on all fours with the various provincial enactments that have been passed throughout the years to deal with their own oil resources. However, I do want to say a few words to the house on this occasion in respect to some of the amazing things that are happening in the oil world of the northwest part of this continent. I assure you I will be very brief.

I speak not as an expert in regard to these matters, but rather as a western Canadian who has watched the development of oil and petroleum resources, particularly of western Canada, throughout my lifetime, and consequently I speak merely as an observer. I would like to say a few words, perhaps to keep us up to date in the Senate, regarding some of the great happenings that are occurring at the present time.

As you are all aware, of course Alberta is the great oil producing province of Canada. Oil was first discovered in Alberta in about the year 1914. I recall as a young boy reading about the then fabulous Royalite No. 4. It did not pump or flow oil but was a wet gas well. From that date on in Alberta and some of the other parts of western Canada, but largely in Alberta, there was continuous exploration for oil, but it was not until February 1947 that the Leduc discovery was made by Imperial Oil Limited. It has been often stated that up to that time Imperial Oil had drilled no less than 100 wells, all of which were dry holes, and finally in 1947 their efforts resulted in success in the Leduc discovery.

There is an interesting story told about Leduc No. 1. I do not know if it is exactly accurate, but I have seen it in print, indeed in the Imperial Oil Review. It goes like this. Imperial Oil had drilled about 100 wells up to February 1947, and the logs of all these wells would be examined first at the site of the well and then sent to geologists in Calgary, the head office for drilling of that company. They would then be sent for final check to the head office in Toronto. In regard to the Leduc well, the log was sent to Calgary and then it was sent to Toronto for further check. The story goes that the Toronto office telegraphed the manager of the oil rig in Leduc, which is a small town in Alberta, instructing him to abandon the well. When the telegram was received at Leduc station a tremendous blizzard, one of those blizzards for which we are renowned in western Canada, was occurring. It lasted for some days. During the period that the telegram could not be delivered because of the blizzard, the drilling continued and the well blew in. That is the story of Leduc No. 1.

We are all aware of the fantastic development that occurred thereafter in Alberta. As you know, that development then spread into Saskatchewan, and my own Province of Manitoba. There were comparatively small pools, but even now in Manitoba we have 800 producing wells. Senator McDonald would probably know the number of wells in Saskatchewan—I believe there are around 5,000.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: There are about 7,000.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In Alberta, of course, you can probably double that figure. The point I wish to make is that the discovery of oil in western Canada produced a tremendous boost in the economy, not only of western Canada but in all of Canada. I would like to put on the record the figures in regard to the present production and the value of the oil produced in western Canada.

Production in British Columbia in 1967 was 20 million barrels of crude oil, in Alberta 224 million, in Saskatchewan 91 million, Manitoba 5½ million, and the total production of crude oil in the four western provinces in the year mentioned was approximately 400 million barrels. Besides that there was natural gas in liquid form, amounting to approximately 56 million barrels. Consequently, the total production of those four provinces in crude oil and oil resulting from natural gas was about 450 million barrels. At a price of approximately $2.50 a barrel, the well-head value of this oil is approximately $1,100,000,000. Let me just add that this is a value of the crude oil at the well-head. When you add to that the cost of transportation by pipeline and in other ways, plus the cost of refining and distribution, as well as the tremendous taxes that are levied on oil, can you imagine what the price of gasoline comes to per barrel? Well, as a rough calculation, it is between $17 and $18. Therefore, when you buy gasoline for your car you are paying at the rate of about seven times the value of the oil at the well-head. So much for that.

What I have said is background to another subject that I would like to pursue for a moment, namely, the fantastic discovery that has been made in Alaska during the last 14 months. I refer to the discovery in Prudhoe Bay. Senator Everett referred to this in his speech the other day. This area is now frequently referred to as the North Slope, namely, the north slope of Alaska. I believe the dimensions of this area are about 37 miles from north to south and about 80 miles from east to west. It is right on the north coast of Alaska, a few miles east of Point Barrow.

This is now referred to as one of the great oil pools of the world. The companies involved in the discovery are Atlantic Richfield Company, and Humble Oil and Refining Company of the United States and, to a lesser extent, British Petroleum Company of the United Kingdom.

Honourable senators, various words have been used to describe this discovery—"bonanza", "another Kuwait"—but what is stated to be a fact by petroleum engineers is that it is a bigger discovery than the east Texas field of 38 years ago, in 1931, one of the greatest discoveries of pools of oil ever made in the United States.

Only two wells have been drilled so far on the North Slope and there are six presently being drilled. Expert petroleum engineers early started to predict an oil field of a producing capacity of probably 5 billion to 10 billion barrels. This estimate was soon raised to a top of 50 billion barrels, and now more conservative estimates show as a general concensus that the capacity of this field is between 30 billion and 40 billion barrels. If it is a fact that this is a field of 30 to 40 billion barrels, it will double the crude oil resources of the United States.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (De Lanaudière): Can you tell us, senator, how deep they have to drill in Alaska in order to reach that oil resource?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: In various reading I have done in regard to this pool it is not stated how deep they have to drill, but I am told that the strata are of tremendous depth and it is expected that the wells will be similar to those in the Kuwait area, where production is in terms of thousands of barrels per day.

Up to the present time there has been much talk of a pipeline and there has been speculation as to what route will be used to deliver this oil to the markets of the world. Honourable senators who read the Globe and Mail this morning will have seen an announcement made as to that field. I should like to read a part of it. It is contained in the business section of the Globe and Mail and the heading is "Trans-Alaskan route is chosen for oil line from Prudhoe Bay." The decision has been made to build a 48-inch pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to the Gulf of Alaska, a distance of 800 miles. I will make further reference to this in a moment.

Honourable senators, one of the reasons I am referring to the Prudhoe Bay discovery is that, in the opinion of the oil authorities of America and of the world, this discovery and the production from it, when it starts to flow into the markets of the world in perhaps three or four years, may completely alter the pattern of the North American market for oil.

Another reason I refer to it is that this bill, as was stated by the sponsor, is for the purpose of regulating the production of oil in the Mackenzie Delta and in the Canadian Arctic islands of the north.

No great discoveries have been made in Canada yet, either in the delta or in the islands, but petroleum engineers insist that the geological conditions in the Mackenzie Delta and in the Canadian Arctic islands, are practically the same as they are on the North Slope and that there is every possibility, every probability, that we in Canada will discover great resources of oil in those areas. Hence, of course, we have this bill.

Honourable senators, I referred to possible great changes in the marketing patterns of this country and of the United States. I am sure you are aware of the present patterns. Manitoba oil is a light oil from a shallow drilling, and of course there is a market for all of that. Our production is only 5½ million barrels a year and there is no problem in marketing it.

Saskatchewan production is not pro-rated; all of it goes to market. Alberta production, as you know, is pro-rated, that is, curtailed to about 40 per cent of potential production. The reason is that we do not have markets on this continent for the other 60 per cent. It is true that the American markets in the mid-west and on the Pacific coast are growing year by year. We have also realized that the oil resources of the United States are decreasing and our expectation has been that our U.S. markets would be increasing. As a result of the Prudhoe Bay discovery, it is now deemed possible that marketing patterns on this continent may become seriously altered to the possible detriment of Canada.

I do not want to be a pessimist in this regard but, as you know, western Canadian oil flows into the Toronto area and into the U.S. as far as the Chicago area, perhaps a little farther east. It flows into the middle west of the United States and it flows into the Pacific, U.S. areas. On the other hand, in the eastern part of Canada, namely, towards Montreal and in the Maritimes, we get our oil from Venezuela. That is the marketing pattern of this continent.

Honourable senators, I would like to read an excerpt from Business Week, which is published in the United States and which features on the front page of its issue of February 1, "Giant Oil Strike in Arctic Alaska". May I read to you a couple of paragraphs along the lines on which I have been speaking in the last few minutes. This relates to the marketing problem of the future. As I say, I do not want to be a pessimist in regard to these things, nevertheless we should face the facts as given to us by people who ought to know, and who, indeed, I am sure have great knowledge and experience in these matters. I read now from page 52 of Business Week.

> Big as it is, however, the West Coast market couldn't absorb all the oil that even a comparatively moderate Alaskan field can produce. And that's what leads to the big marketing problems that oil analysts foresee....

> The first of these problems is whether the present structure of crude prices can withstand the onslaught of cheap arctic crude.

I want to remind you that when the Texas field came in in 1930-31, oil prices at the well-head went down to ten cents a barrel. It is estimated that the well-head cost of producing oil in Prudhoe Bay will be approximately 40 cents per barrel. I stated to you that the well-head price in Canada was approximately $2.50 a barrel now. I continue:

> No one—certainly not the major oil companies that will determine the pace of Alaskan oil development—wants a repetition of what happened after the East Texas find of the 1930s.

That is, other oil wells simply could not compete.

> But even the major oil companies are not likely to accept a production prorationing plan that would force them to leave some of their known reserves untouched for as long as 40 or 50 years.
> 'No one is going to accept that in Alaska to protect marginal producers in Texas who are running at a 12-year reserve-to-production rate,' says one oilman.

The next paragraph is headed "Canadian Chill":

> Across the border, Canadian oilmen are having even worse jitters at the prospects of a big Alaskan oil flood. For years, they have been adding to oil reserves more quickly and cheaply than U.S. producers. And they have assumed that the big U.S. market would sooner or later fall into their laps.
> Prudhoe Bay, if it proves to be as big as indicated, punctures this hope—even as it reinforces convictions that there is a great pool of oil under the Canadian Arctic.
> The exploration boom in Alaska is being nearly matched in Canada's Mackenzie Delta and the arctic islands, where the geology is similar to the North Slope. Now there's a chance that Canada might not even be able to retain its present share of the U.S. market against a flood of Alaskan oil...
> According to Levy, who is a consultant to the Canadian government as well as to oil companies, even if the Alaskan find is moderate and there is nothing comparable across the border, the U.S. will not be able to accommodate Canada's export potential without seriously cutting back other foreign producers—mainly Venezuela.

Incidentally, Levy is one of the great petroleum consultants on the continent. I continue:

> This, he says, could create serious political problems, when major Venezuelan oil concessions expire in 1983. If Alaska is a really big producer, Canada could only be accommodated by freezing out all other foreign oil.
> The Canadians are well aware of what they are up against and are trying to reach an early agreement with the U.S. on a new continental oil policy that will secure their export market.

Honourable senators, I presented this picture to you simply to indicate, first, the tremendous prospects there are for great discoveries of oil in the Mackenzie Delta and in the Canadian islands of the Arctic, and, secondly, to suggest that it is a prudent policy to indicate some of the problems that this country might be facing in regard to disposing of the huge quantities of oil we now have and which we cannot dispose of and which may be added to greatly if these expected further resources materialize in the northwest part of Canada.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in adjourning the debate, I would simply like to join Senator Thorvaldson in congratulating Senator Everett on the clear and concise way in which he presented to the members of the Senate a very difficult and technical bill. I also would like to congratulate Senator Thorvaldson this evening for his remarks and assertions regarding "Prudhoemania", which has swept the oil industry in the Arctic and Northwest Territories.

I am not as pessimistic as he with respect to the future. The oil industry has had to meet the problem of marketing throughout its history, and I am quite confident that it will continue to do so with Government leadership in the future, and that as we proceed in the exploration of the Arctic, where we have every reason to believe we will exceed the reserves that have allegedly been found in the Alaska North Slope. We will have our pipeline to Edmonton and thence to the United States markets, because it remains a fact that we can put Canadian oil into the American market at 60 cents a barrel cheaper. With that edge and, as I said, with good leadership by the Government and industry, I have every reason to believe that we will continue to expand throughout the north with resulting benefits to the Government and the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, I have other observations and comments to make with respect to the bill and, accordingly, I would at this moment adjourn debate until the next sitting.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hastings, debate adjourned.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-162, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure you will recall that it is only a few short weeks since we had Bill C-113 before us, making certain amendments to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. At that time the sponsor of the bill, and other speakers, outlined to the Senate of Canada the problems that exist in western Canada with respect to cereal grains, lack of markets, tough and damp grains.

I think the result of the amendments we passed to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act at that time indicates that this legislation was certainly needed, because since the legislation came into effect producers in western Canada have borrowed $127 million under the act. That money has gone to 72,000 producers. This is by far the largest amount of money ever advanced under the act, and it compares to a high for the 1960-61 crop year of $64 millions to some 76,000 producers. But it is necessary now to make further amendments to this Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act because of the volume of tough and damp grain which exists in western Canada today, and because there are not sufficient public facilities to dry this grain before the end of the crop year or before the warm weather next summer. So a good deal of the grain will have to be dried on the farms this winter, and provision must therefore be made so that the farmers will have adequate money to pay the grain driers.

You might ask why they would need further help when they have already borrowed $127 million under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. If you stop to consider, you will realize that since the farmers started to deliver this year's crop they have had to pay their harvest expenses and their taxes and have had to maintain themselves throughout the winter as well as having to make payments on land and machinery which in many cases become due in the fall of the year. There are literally many thousands of farmers in western Canada who do not have the resources to dry grain on their farms, and consequently the Government is proposing this legislation to rectify the matter.

The legislation is very simple. It makes provision for the Canadian Wheat Board, upon application, to make further advances to farmers who wish to have grain dried. This is done simply by adding a new clause to the bill we had before us a few weeks ago, Bill C-113. This will be section 7A. If this legislation is passed by this house and given Royal Assent, it will be in effect until the end of June 1969.

Honourable senators, I have just returned from Saskatchewan today and I have first-hand knowledge of some of the problems associated with this tough and damp grain. Many farmers have told me that the grain which was put in bins last fall with a moisture content of 14.3 or 14.5, in other words dry grain, now has 17 or 18 per cent moisture content. In my lifetime and in my own experience I have never seen grain absorb moisture to that extent after it was harvested and placed in a bin. One of my own tenants told me on Saturday that he had placed grain in a three-partition bin in September and at that time it had a moisture content of 14.3. Today in the two outside bins it has a moisture content of 17.6, and in the centre bin it has a moisture content of 19 per cent.

Another factor has added to the problem of drying grain in the west. As honourable senators are aware, they have had five weeks of continuous cold weather with temperatures ranging from 20 to 42 degrees below zero. Consequently it has been virtually impossible to dry grain with portable dryers under such conditions.

It is my hope that this chamber will give immediate consideration to this piece of legislation and, should it receive second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration tomorrow.

The bill contains a provision for advancing further sums of money, with a limit of $600, to farmers to pay for the drying. The definition section defines damp grain, dry grain, grain driers and tough grain. Each clause of the bill is self-explanatory and if any honourable senator has questions to ask in respect of this bill I am sure the officials who will appear before the committee will be able to answer them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is there any explanation for the increase in moisture content? I have never heard anything like it before in my life.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Neither have I. I have not yet met a farmer who can account for it. I have been told, not only by my own tenants but by others, that they can augur the grain around and it handles like dry grain, but when tested in the elevators the tests showed a much higher moisture content than expected. I have also been told by some people that this is because of the extremely cold weather and the high humidity.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is that generally the case?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: It is generally the case throughout northeast Saskatchewan, yes.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the honourable senator a question. One of our superintendents reports that only about 20 per cent of the driers in Manitoba are being used because the owners of the driers are independent and charge the farmers 15 cents a bushel for drying grain. The farmer does not have 15 cents a bushel and he will not go to the bank and borrow it; consequently the driers are idle. Did the honourable senator run across this situation in his trip to Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I did.

Hon. Mr. Paterson: I have never in my lifetime heard of grain taking on moisture to the extent the honourable senator mentions. It is alarming, if it is true.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I have never heard of it before either. It is true that many farmers want to dry grain but they do not have the resources to do so. Furthermore, in the last several weeks it was virtually impossible to dry grain with portable driers. The temperatures were so low that you could not get a truck started, and it was almost impossible to get the grain drier to a sufficiently high temperature to dry the grain. It would appear that the Lord has not been kind to them in the last few weeks.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, Bill C-162, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, is simple and straightforward. I have no complaint to make about it except that it is somewhat late. If the Government had been composed of men like some of our colleagues across the way, I am sure the western wheat fiasco would not have reached the stalemate it has reached today. Ships from the Orient are lying in wait in Vancouver. Damp wheat only has priority in the local elevators at three bushels per seeded acre. Dry wheat is not taken at elevators because of the rush to help farmers with damp grain.

Surely the three wise men knew that wheat sales would continue even at a reduced rate and that we would have to be in a position to deliver when the boats arrived. When they finally got wise that the boats were waiting, very little dry grain was in sight and they started to make excuses. The main excuse was that the winter was very cold and the farmers were not in a position to deliver because of clogged up roads and cold weather. There is no question that they could have delivered dry wheat in November and December if quotas had been granted for dry wheat. An exportable product like wheat is always on the move, and this complete shutdown on the west coast is the most appalling affair that has happened in trade circles in this country for many a day.

So, finally the Government is going to do something to assist farmers to dry their own grain. I might say that in my own district there was not a drier anywhere in the country and many farmers do not know if they have damp grain.

This is what should have been done last October to assist the farmers, and the channels for the flow of commercial wheat kept open at the same time. Efforts should have been made to bring large portable grain driers from the United States and to make the necessary adjustments on them to dry wheat. This could have been done early last fall rather than slowing down the flow of dry wheat.

The $600 advance means the farmers will be just a little further in debt. I have before me the Canada Year Book for 1968. In 1961, 76,000 farmers asked for and received $64 million. In 1962 this dropped to 22,000 farmers who applied for $16½ million. In 1963, 39,000 farmers applied for $29¼ million. But this year, showing the position of the farmers in western Canada, 72,000 farmers have had to borrow $127 million to date. If these 72,000 farmers apply for the advance of $600, it can add another $43 million to their debt.

The wheat crisis of Vancouver, 1968-69! For lack of authority, a crisis gradually built up. The main problem, as I see it, has been the division of authority among three cabinet ministers, none of whom knew too much about the grain business. As a result, being magnanimous, this triumvirate issued an order to save the western crop, to the effect that only damp wheat would be accepted. This holds good today, just as it did in October last, yet the buyers do not want dried wheat; they want No. 2 and No. 4 Northern. Apparently the buyers are a little cautious in buying wheat that has had to be tampered with. Remember, even the Honourable Paul Hellyer did not think that three separate armed forces could run our defences properly, so how could we expect three men to run our wheat business? This situation will remain as it is now until late next spring. How many markets are we going to lose as a result of this loose and careless manner of handling our largest export product? Surely we are not going to revert to the days of the Honourable C. D. Howe and his famous remark, "If they want our wheat, let them come and get it!"

We are faced with a problem here, the exporting of our wheat. That is one of the biggest problems in the whole of Canada at the present time, and yet we have been dallying along for months, getting nowhere. As a matter of fact, honourable senators, I would suggest that in western Canada there is going to be one of the biggest losses that has ever been suffered by the farmers as a result of this damp grain.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, first of all I wish to compliment Senator McDonald on the manner in which he introduced this legislation. He has explained it very well.

I also feel the Government was exceedingly wise to draft this legislation, to introduce it in the other place and to place it before the Senate for consideration. Certainly, there is a great emergency problem on the prairies due to the overwhelming quantities of damp grain, and this legislation is designed to provide interest-free money to farmers to help them bear the expense of drying this damp grain. It is certainly to the economic advantage of the farmer to accept this assistance. If he takes 10 cents a bushel, interest-free, and dries a bushel of wheat, he immediately increases the value of that bushel by 16 cents. So, it is good business on the part of the farmer and it is good business on the part of the country.

It is also fair to say that the legislation might have been introduced earlier. Of course, hindsight is always easier than foresight, but I do know that people in the grain trade in western Canada—the Wheat Board, the elevator companies and the farmers—believe this legislation is urgent, that it requires speedy passage and is in the interests not only of the prairie grain economy but also of the whole Canadian economy to get the grain dried, off to the export position, and then to the export markets of the world.

There is in western Canada at this time a great cloud of pessimism over the prairie grain situation. Pick up any newspaper and there are flaming headlines to demonstrate that we are experiencing a tremendous crisis, perhaps the worst crisis in memory, that all is in a mess, that the Government has fallen down, that the Wheat Board and the grain trade have fallen down—and some are even saying the farmers have failed to deliver their grain to market.

I agree the situation is serious, that steps must be taken to correct it, but I also think it is not accurate to paint this as the worst picture of all time as far as the prairie grain producers are concerned. The Wheat Board is the farmers' instrument for selling wheat. The Wheat Board may not be doing everything everyone would like it to do. The Government feels there is room for another body to assist in the grain situation, to conduct research, to promote export markets, and so on. It has established the Grain Council, and has appointed as Chairman Mr. A. C. Runciman, the President of United Grain Growers. I think the Government could not have selected a more capable and aggressive person, one who has the confidence of the grain trade and the producers.

If I have a criticism or suggestion to make it is that the terms of reference of the Grain Council should be improved upon and added to. Its terms of reference are aimed at increasing the co-ordination of those in the grain business, and at undertaking of research. One of the things that this Grain Council should be asked to do is to study the whole question of policy designed to bring about adequate incomes for the producers on the prairies. This is not spelled out in any way, and is only indicated by inference.

There are other things this Grain Council should be asked to do. What is the export picture at this time? The fact of the matter is—and I have in my hand the Board of Grain Commissioners' latest weekly statistical report, dated January 29—that our exports to date this year are 143.1 million bushels, as compared to 117.5 million bushels a year ago. A bad picture? A terrible picture? But 26 million bushels of exported wheat higher than a year ago, so conditions are improving at least to that extent.

Last year we exported some 335 million bushels of wheat. If the Wheat Board is able to continue exports at the same rate, it will increase exports to over 360 million bushels this year. I, for one, am optimistic that the Wheat Board will do even better than that. If they can get better support from those who must deliver the grain to the export position, then they will do much better than even those statistics would seem to indicate.

The Wheat Board is aiming for a six-bushel quota to be available to all producers in western Canada by July 31, and that is a very high target. I think that honourable senators acquainted with the western grain situation will agree, as the Wheat Board has suggested, that this is a realistic target. I have sufficient confidence in the personnel of the Wheat Board to believe that there is every likelihood they will reach this target.

We need to pass this legislation to enable the farmers to use this money to improve the quality of their damp and tough grain so that it will be more readily saleable. This, I am sure, will be done. But, as I have said, there has been painted a picture of deep, dark gloom as far as the grain trade in the west is concerned, and I do not think it is entirely an accurate picture.

The Wheat Board will be making its final payments on grain within the next couple of months. Senator McDonald will agree with me, I am sure, when I say the wheat producers on the Prairies are most interested in the amount of that final payment. Politicians and others have gone around the country saying that there will be no payment at all or, at most, there will be a payment of five or six cents a bushel, and that is all.

I should like to make my own estimate of the final payment. I enjoy doing this once every year and seeing how nearly correct I can be. I have had a fairly good record over the years in that I have come to within a couple of cents of predicting the final payment almost every time. I will predict that when the Wheat Board makes its final payment the farmers will receive for spring wheat close to 18 cents a bushel. I predict that that will be within one or two cents of the actual payment.

Somebody will say, "But, the payment last year was 49 cents, and so it has gone from 49 cents in one year down to 18 cents this year." I point out, however, that the farmers this year are receiving, because they have asked for it, an additional 20 cents per bushel by way of an increased initial price when they sell their wheat. So, they are getting this year an initial payment of 20 cents of what was last year a final payment. Those two amounts must be added together in order to arrive at a comparable payment this year, and that payment will be 38 cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: When will the final payment be made?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I have heard that it will be in early April.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Did I understand the honourable senator to say a moment ago that it is possible to farm successfully on a six-bushel quota?

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I did not say that. I do not know how much it would take for me to farm successfully, but I know that many years ago everybody agreed that the Wheat Board was doing a wonderful job if it was able to bring about a six-bushel quota. In some years that was not possible. I would say that if in these circumstances, which have been described as being so gloomy, the Wheat Board is able, in fact, to have room for delivery of a six-bushel quota, then that will be an exceedingly good performance—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That will just about pay the tax.

Hon. Mr. Argue: —in relation to another kind of situation that prevails. An eight-bushel quota on everybody's acreage would probably equal all of the wheat that is produced, because there are many farms that have not produced even a six-bushel quota.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Would the honourable senator explain what "a six-bushel quota" means. A six-bushel quota means six bushels on a specified acreage. I do not think the members of this house generally understand what is meant by that term.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not think he understands it.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The six bushels is on a specified acreage, so-called, and the specified acreage in most cases comprises the cultivated acres.

If you want to include not only the initial payment but also the final payment, then it works out to something like $10 per cultivated acre, which is enough to cover all of the costs of farming. But, in addition to that, the farmers have a unit quota, they have supplementary quotas, and very often they produce flax and malting barley. There was an additional quota on Durum wheat. In my district the farmers will have absolutely no problem in finding delivery space for their grain because many will be out of grain long before they have delivered the six-bushel quota.

I wish I was in the enviable position of Senator Aseltine in having large quantities of wheat over and above the six bushels per acre. However, in my country, with moderately good crops and a lot of Durum wheat, which is another variety, our granaries will be empty long before the farmers have delivered the six-bushel quota.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: We need a 20-bushel quota where I live.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is great. I hope that soon you will have an open quota. If the honourable senator has been listening to the speeches that have been made he will know that there were predictions of a three-bushel quota, a four-bushel quota, and a five-bushel quota. I am sure that the farmers, on learning there is to be a six-bushel quota will consider that the Wheat Board, in these difficult circumstances, is doing a very commendable job.

I would think that the final payment for Durum wheat will be approximately ten cents a bushel more than the final payment for spring wheat.

There is a difficult situation on the Prairies. The fact is that money is scarce. The price of land, which is a good indication of the farmer's position, has dropped by $15 or $20 per acre. Over a short period of time there has been an enormous increase in the rate of interest. Some people are taking advantage of the fact that there is a large quantity of grain. One can read in the papers that the feed mills are buying wheat for $1 or 90 cents a bushel, which is about 40 per cent less than the total price they will receive from the Canadian Wheat Board. I think that if the farmers really believe—and they should believe—that the Wheat Board is going to make this kind of a showing, then they will retain some of the wheat that is now being sold for as little as 90 cents a bushel.

In this situation the difficulty in getting grain to Vancouver, where there are a large number of ships waiting to be filled, constitutes an exceedingly important problem. The matter is urgent, and it is costing the western producers a great deal of money in that not only have sales been lost because the wheat was not in position, but demurrage has had to be paid on the boats sitting idle while waiting for wheat. The demurrage does not come out of the pockets of the elevator companies, or out of the pockets of the railroads. It comes out of the pockets of the grain producers.

There is a culprit in this whole picture. I think if you talk to the people in the grain trade, who know what has been going on during the last few weeks and months, you will find that they will agree with what I am about to say, namely, that the railway companies have fallen down on the job of moving the grain to position in Vancouver. They did not fall down in respect of supplying boxcars. The boxcars have been loaded with suitable wheat, and they should have been moved to Vancouver where that wheat could have been loaded onto the ships. The railway companies have been short of the power necessary to move the boxcars, and as far as the farmers are concerned they have done a pretty lousy job. If you speak to the people in the grain trade who know what this whole turmoil is about, I am sure you will be told that the problem has been in getting the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. to put some additional locomotives on the Prairies and in western Canada for the purpose of hauling this wheat to the coast.

As a senator, I can make these statements. I do not expect a minister would be making these kinds of statements, although if we got the railways really stirred up I think they might do something. If we had a C. D. Howe around today to say, "I will appoint a transport controller," and had a Roy Milner to be the transport controller, as he was, the railway companies might start to do something.

I have a press report of a meeting with the Honourable Mr. Pepin, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, when he was in Vancouver. This is a report from the Vancouver Sun dated February 5, 1969. According to this report:

> He said the railways have told him they have enough boxcars to meet the grain shipping demands and are prepared to bring in extra diesel locomotive power to move the grain trains if necessary.

I think that is a fair statement of what the railway companies should be doing, and it is what the railway companies should have done two months ago. If they had had more locomotive power to haul the boxcars that the farmers, the wheat board and the grain elevators had filled with grain suitable for export, we would not have had all the turmoil in Parliament and all the turmoil on the west coast over this situation.

The Senate is being ridiculed today, as it has been for many years, by people in high places. The whole future of the Senate is being called into question. I for one believe that the Senate can play a useful role, and I would like to see the Senate play a role in solving this problem. The Senate has set up many very important committees to inquire into important questions. Some of these committees will take six months, or a year, or perhaps years to complete their important deliberations. I think we need some "quickie" committees in the Senate, committees that will deal with an urgent matter in a short time.

Since committees in the other place have not found it possible to deal with this matter, I personally would like to see a Senate committee bring the officials of the railway companies before it to tell us what kind of a job they have been doing in hauling our grain, because even if they have been doing their best job it has been a relative failure for the farmers. If this were done by the Senate I think it would initiate the kind of action by the railways that is necessary to move the grain from western Canada to export positions.

Just imagine the situation. A few months ago people said there were no markets. Now we have so many markets that they are not able to fill the boats to take the grain to these markets, and the Wheat Board is having to turn down orders. If this were an emergency situation brought about during war we would be doing something about it; we would be making certain that the grain was moved. We should make certain now that the railways do exactly what they have said to the minister they may do, namely, bring sufficient locomotive power right now into western Canada to make sure that this grain is moved to the western ports.

The railways know that when they haul other commodities they probably obtain a much greater revenue, but for the benefit of the national economy I know of no better way in which to employ the railways' locomotives in the next few weeks and months than to make sure that there are enough of them on the Prairies to move the grain necessary to fulfill available orders. We should not infer that the farmer has failed to haul sufficient wheat to market. My understanding is that grain is in the boxcars, the boxcars are at railway sidings in western Canada, and action should be taken immediately to make sure that the grain is delivered into Vancouver so that it may be exported to meet the sales the Canadian Wheat Board is able to make, and perhaps the Wheat Board can recoup some of the sales they have had to refuse.

I say with all sincerity that I personally do not know of anything better the Senate could do for the people on the Prairies than have an inquiry and a look by the Senate, by senators who have no axe to grind, at all the facts to see what can be done to make certain Canada receives the advantages which flow from meeting the export commitments and export sales for wheat that become available from time to time.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Does the honourable senator realize that to do what he wants is within his own power? All he has to do is to ask that this be moved into committee; ask the chairman to call these witnesses, and then the thing is on the rails immediately. There may be a shortage of time, I do not know, but as a Toronto farmer I know we can be very versatile about this sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I have been trying a number of other matters but with limited success.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: There is not time. We want this bill now.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I have two or three things on the Order Paper that I have to deal with from time to time. I am quite prepared personally to go to the committee and make these inquiries. I do not know whether this is the proper place for such an amendment. I know that certainly in the House of Commons it would not be possible to move for this kind of action on second reading.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Senator Aseltine, as you know, is an expert on this.

Hon. Mr. Argue: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He says we have not the time for this sort of thing, so you will have to save it for another occasion.

Hon. Mr. Argue: We can save an inquiry for another occasion, but there is nothing to prevent the Senate, through one vehicle or another, having an inquiry into this very important situation, beginning a day or so after the Senate has passed this legislation, which I agree is of an emergency nature.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I will speak for only a moment or so. I am in favour of this bill and I want to see it passed as quickly as possible. My only complaint is that three months have passed since I first raised this matter in my speech on the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in which I pointed out the danger we were in with water on land and millions of bushels of wheat that had to be dried. I cannot understand why it has taken three months for this bill to reach our house.

The $600 advance provided by the bill will be of great help, but if Senator McDonald is correct, then I am very disturbed to know that so much grain threshed with a moisture content of 14.5 per cent has now deteriorated to the extent that it has a moisture content of 17 per cent. I was able to get nearly all my own wheat off with a moisture content of 14 to 15 per cent. I am glad Senator McDonald mentioned that tonight, because I do not think the farmers realize it is taking place. Surely it must have been a faulty granary and water got in through the roof, or something of that sort happened.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Not my granary.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If the situation is as he described, then it is very serious and will have to be examined. I am in favour of this bill and want to see it passed and become law tomorrow if possible.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable senator speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: There are only one or two matters that I want to refer to in closing the debate. It has been said, we should have been doing this three months ago. Three months ago we were doubling the amount of money that a farmer could take under a cash advance. As a matter of fact, three months ago we did not know—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Sure we did.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: You might have thought you knew. I have taken dry grain off in November, as you probably have too. Then other people have said the Canadian Wheat Board should not have made the move to fill public storage full of damp grain. If they had not done this every farmer in this country would have gone through the roof. The Canadian Wheat Board undoubtedly made a mistake.

Most of us can accept our mistakes after we have made them, but who was to know that Canada would make an additional sale to Japan of No. 2 wheat. How were we to know that there was to be difficulty on the west ports of America and some grain ships would be moved from there to Canada? How were we to know that we were going to have five solid weeks of sub-zero temperatures when you could not only not dry the grain, but when the Canadian National Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway found that because of weather conditions they could only pull 20 boxcars at a time through the mountains instead of 80? Sure, we are short of power and I am in full agreement that some effort should be made to have the railways put more power into the west to move boxcars out to Vancouver, but to be perfectly fair, who would have predicted that we would have had five weeks of weather in which the railways were only able to "tootle" through the mountains with 20 boxcars at about 20 miles an hour instead of 80 boxcars at 35 or 40 miles an hour.

You know, when the Wheat Board does well by the farmers, some people say that the politicians want to take the credit, but I have never found a politician yet who wants to take the blame when they do not do so well. As far as I am concerned, the politician is not entitled to any credit when they do well or when they are in trouble. The Canadian Wheat Board is a board operating for the western farmers of Canada, and as far as I am concerned the further the politicians keep their noses out of the business of the Canadian Wheat Board, the better off the farmers of western Canada would be.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Why did you bring in this bill?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I do not think this has anything to do with the Canadian Wheat Board, other than making a provision whereby they could advance more money to the farmers of western Canada, and this is what the governments today ought to be doing. They should provide the legislation so that our Canadian Wheat Board can do the best job possible. I am not one of those who believes that the legislation under which the board acts today is broad enough to meet all the problems that we are faced with in the markets of the world. I would like to see the Government of the day take a look at the legislation under which the boards are operating, but I am not going to hold up debate on the bill.

I hope this bill will be given second reading, and if there is a desire for it to go to committee I will move that it go to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Is it necessary?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Not as far as I am concerned. If there is no desire for that, we will pass it now.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: What would be the purpose of sending the bill to the committee?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Personally, I do not think there is any purpose. We were given all the information that the honourable senators would want when Bill C-113 was before the committee. The argument that Senator Argue has put up I do not think is a matter we should deal with at the moment. We want to get this bill through as quickly as possible. That does not prohibit him from bringing this matter before the committee on some other occasion.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Might I say that I agree with Senator McDonald, that the question of prairie locomotive power out of the provinces is beyond the scope of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Are you saying you are satisfied with the answer given by Senator McDonald, that the trouble was the fact they could not haul more than 20 cars rather than 80? That would be a sufficient answer.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I would have to check the statistics to see if there was not a measure of exaggeration, not by Senator McDonald, but by those who were informing him. That is not an answer, as far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Because you do not want to know the truth; that is all.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The cold weather was a fact and it made it more difficult. It is also a fact that the railways, especially with the cold weather, should have put additional power on the prairies—this is why the additional power was required. If the weather had been balmy and nice, of course they would not have needed additional power. So, it does not remove my complaint.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please. I would not wish to do anything to prevent an honourable senator answering a question that has been asked of him, but I think the debate on second reading is over and I have to put the question on second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: With leave, I move that the bill be read a third time—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: At the next sitting. Royal Assent has to be given, and it cannot be given tonight, in any event.

Hon. Mr. McDonald moved, with leave of the Senate, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

INITIATION OF LEGISLATION IN THE SENATE

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, 1969, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Hayden, calling the attention of the Senate to section 53 and section 91 (as amended in 1949) of the British North America Act, 1867, and the effect of such sections on the initiation of legislation in the Senate.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Hayden.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before honourable Senator Hayden takes the floor, I must remind you that he has already spoken and I understand there is unanimous consent to give him the floor at this time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I know the hour is moving along, but I will not be very long. I had intended, in speaking, to deal with the points which were raised by the various senators who took part in this debate, and in the course of what I have to say, I will touch upon some of the things they said. Shall we call them some points of disagreement? But having regard to the fact that the Government Leader, in speaking, announced that he thought it only right that, as a member of the Government, he should express the Government's views on this question, it is in the light of that statement and his comment that I am going to address my remarks.

First of all, I should tell him that very often in the course of facing debate and answers to points of argument which I may have made, more ordinary language has been used by those who have been replying to what I have said than the high-sounding words which I did not regard as being ordinary at all, which the Government Leader used in describing the argument which I made on the effect of the 1949 amendment to the B.N.A. Act. No ordinary words had sufficient decoration or ornamentation in them, so my argument at the same time was "hypothetical", it was "plausible", and it was "ingenious".

At first, I wondered whether I should permit my chest to swell a little more, from his use of those words; but then I looked them up in the dictionary. I just wonder whether he had consulted the dictionary before he used them. I found, according to the dictionary, that a "hypothesis" is a "supposition made as basis for reasoning, without reference to its truth." It is a "starting point for investigation", or it may be a "groundless assumption."

When we come to the word "plausible", I found that the dictionary meaning first is "specious". The second meaning is "seeming reasonable or probable"; and the third meaning is "fair spoken, usually implying deceit." As for "ingenious", the meaning is "cleverly contrived."

Honourable senators, I am wondering how, in one and the same argument, I could possibly work into it all those different features which would include the meaning of all those adjectives that the Government Leader has used.

It may well be, as I hope to point out very shortly, that he was hard put in answering effectively what I said, so he used these large words which do not convey any particular meaning as to the argument itself, but the words were addressed to the argument and not to the merit or substance of the argument.

Honourable senators, one of two things must happen. Before he made his remarks, my friend should have gone back to 1965, when he was a member of the Government and therefore concurred in certain legislation which was introduced in the Commons and subsequently was passed by this house. In the course of the debate in the Commons, the question was raised as to whether or not, in the consideration of that particular bill at that time, reliance was being placed upon the 1949 amendment of the B.N.A. Act, and section 91 thereof.

That bill, every senator knows, is entitled "An Act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate."

Hon. Mr. Flynn: A very bad bill.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It was assented to in June 1965. It deals mainly with the set purpose in its title, that is, it deals with the retirement and the pension allowance and the different rights and classes to which senators belonged, whether of the pre-seventy-five year old group or those who would be appointed and who would be subject to the 75 years of age tenure.

When I look at the bill, I find Part I, section 1 reads as follows:

> Section 29 of the British North America Act, 1867, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
> "29. (1) Subject to subsection (2), a Senator shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, hold his place in the Senate for life.
> (2) A Senator who is summoned to the Senate after the coming into force of this subsection shall, subject to this Act, hold his place in the Senate until he attains the age of seventy-five years."

The next section describes the new title of the British North America Act. Then, Part II and Part III deal, in a matter of about four or five pages, with the retirement of senators and the remuneration of senators on retirement.

In two things that my friend said, this bill furnishes an answer which Parliament has made to his contention. I am wondering, in those circumstances, if Government policy has changed between 1965 and now. And that answers another argument that was made.

Honourable senators, let me go along in the series. First, my friend said that the only kind of amendment to the Constitution under the 1949 amendment, that should be made or could be made, would be a specific repeal of some item in the act over which, by virtue of this 1949 amendment, and section 91, the Parliament of Canada had exclusive jurisdiction. I point out at once that this act of 1965, Chapter 4 of that year, provides for the repeal and the re-enactment of section 29 of the B.N.A. Act, with certain additions and substantial changes, and then deals very substantially with the matter of retirement and of remuneration of senators.

So the 1965 bill, at the time it was introduced, flies in the face of one of the rules which my friend laid down as part of Government policy, in his speech recently, in which he said: "I concede at once that a bill simply to repeal section 53, without more, could properly be introduced in the Senate." It is very nice for my friend to concede that, but since he is speaking and reflecting Government policy, we have to look at what Government policy has been in performance.

My friend has said that a statute which incorporated more than a simple repeal, even though it passed both the House of Commons and the Senate, in relation to money matters, would be unconstitutional. The 1965 bill repeals and also deals with other subject matters and is a money bill. When it was introduced in the Commons it was preceded by a resolution. I ask my friend seriously whether this is an affirmation of Government policy that this particular legislation is unconstitutional, in the light of the fact that it passed both houses of Parliament and has been an effective instrument in operation since 1965.

Honourable senators, the third thing which my friend has said is that, as far as a money bill is concerned, so long as section 53 remains in the British North America Act, a money bill cannot be introduced in the Senate. I thought the whole purpose of the discussion which I made, and which other senators were dealing with in relation to the same subject matter, was that I had pointed out that the 1949 amendment to section 91 of the B.N.A. Act permitted the Senate, as one of the houses of the Parliament of Canada, to introduce in the Senate any bit of legislation over which the Parliament of Canada had exclusive jurisdiction—which would include also section 53—and the whole discussion centered on the way in which I suggested it could be done.

My friend concedes that it could be done by a simple repeal of a particular section—and I would take that to include a repeal of section 53.

It could also be done, as I suggested, by passing a bill through both houses of Parliament, on a money matter or otherwise, which contained no reference to section 53; and, since it would be in contradiction of section 53, it would be an amendment under the 1949 amendment to the B.N.A. Act.

Then I suggested the third way, that is, by saying in the amending bill: "Notwithstanding the provisions of section 53 of the B.N.A. Act", and then going on to provide for the legislation. I said that would be an amendment of the B.N.A. Act solely for the purpose of the particular legislation, but not repealing it.

In listening to what Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, had to say and in reading what he said, I do not think that he was prepared to say that the method which I had suggested was one which could not be done under the 1949 amendment. But he was disturbed to think that a bill which, for instance, contained no reference to section 53, but which in its substance would be in contradiction or in conflict with section 53, could be introduced and passed through both houses and become the law of the land without any notice or disclosure to the people of Canada that this in fact was amending that section of the B.N.A. Act.

I described to him afterwards what I considered to be the difference between his viewpoint and my viewpoint. I suggested to him that there was one way of doing it by short division, that is, simply by introducing a bill that is in conflict and passing it, which would effect the amendment; and that there was another way of doing it by long division, which would be by disclosing in the amending bill the effect of the bill on section 53, and that this was a suspension of the effect of that bill for purposes of this particular statute.

Now, there is nothing new in that so far as the ordinary statutes of the Parliament of Canada are concerned. I think I told you before that from 1918 until 1924 the Parliament of Canada passed each year a bill in which they suspended the operation of the Oleo Margarine Act of 1885. They annually, for those six years, passed a statute suspending its operation for that year. The statute still remained, however. So that this method is not foreign to those who are knowledgeable on constitutional law or on the constitution of Canada or on the history of the Parliament of Canada. In fact, we have done that more recently in relation to tariff items. We have had bills here that suspended a tariff item and provided that for a limited period of time, notwithstanding the tariff section, the rate of duty "shall be free".

In the methods or course of action, therefore, there is nothing unusual, nothing shocking, nothing out of the ordinary in such a method of procedure.

In addition, it was, I think, suggested that the Constitution, the B.N.A. Act, was something different and apart from all the other statute law of Canada. Well, that may be said, but as far back as 1886 the Privy Council, in a case which they had before them at that time, and which is well known to students of constitutional laws as the Bank of Toronto vs. Lambe, dealt with the B.N.A. Act in the same fashion as other statutes. The point in issue there was whether a province imposing provincial taxes on the branches of the bank in the province was taxing directly within the province or was taxing indirectly. The Privy Council as the final court decided that it was direct taxation in the province. But in the course of the judgment in the Privy Council it was stated:

> It is undoubtedly a case of great constitutional importance, as the appellants' counsel have earnestly impressed upon their Lordships. But questions of this class have been left for the decision of the ordinary Courts of law, which must treat the provisions of the Act in question by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes.

So, the very statutory rules of construction do not vary just because this happens to be the B.N.A. Act instead of being a statute providing for the retirement of members of the Senate.

Maybe I have said enough at this time of night, but, in case the Government Leader might like to look up the course of treatment of this bill, I should mention both Chapter 4 of the statutes of 1965 and what was said in the Commons when the bill was going through. I would refer him to the Commons Hansard of May 17, 1965. Mr. McIlraith was sponsoring the bill at that time; it was in the course of committee discussion, and Mr. Knowles, a great constitutional authority—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: And a friend of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Oh, yes—and when you read Hansard of May 17, 1965, you will realize how much a friend he was of the Senate. Mr. Knowles put this question:

> MR. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, there is one aspect of what we are doing with which I do not disagree but in respect of which I think we should at least take note, and I refer to the fact that we are, by passing clause 1, amending the constitution. We are doing this, of course, under the provisions of section 91(1) of the British North America Act, as adopted in 1949 through the process of sending a resolution to Westminister, and so on.

Then, in view of the importance of that occasion, Mr. Knowles pressed Mr. McIlraith as to whether there had been any other instances of the kind since the 1949 amendment, and Mr. McIlraith answered in this way:

> MR. MCILRAITH: Just as an example, let me refer to the fiscal arrangements legislation which was done in this way. That is one example of the constitution being amended in a way other than by a separate constitutional amendment bill.

And then at the end, when Mr. McIlraith was asked a question as to whether they were going to have recourse to the provinces for consultation or anything of that kind, Mr. McIlraith answered as follows:

MR. MCILRAITH: No, Mr. Chairman, the position is very clear under section 91(1) of the British North America Act that this Parliament has the authority to do this.

Now, I am a little concerned with the suggestion the Government Leader made—not with the statement he made. I am not concerned about his statement of what the Government view of this proposition was, but I am concerned to think that, in the circumstances of how legislation has been dealt with since the 1949 amendment was made to section 91 of the British North America Act, that at this date it would be suggested that the Government might have as a matter of policy in relation to the functioning of this 1949 amendment, a view that differed from the manner or the way in which they dealt with and made use of this amendment in earlier years. I think we should have some comment, because, very specifically in the speech of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, he took the position that you could not couple with an amendment to the constitution any other substantive piece of legislation. He also took the position that so long as section 53 existed, a money bill could not be introduced in the Senate.

I have dealt with the second part of that and I do not want to repeat myself. Of course we know that section 53 is there; we know the provisions of section 53 and we know that, if section 53 remains in the B.N.A. Act and there is not some way in which it can be amended, then money bills—let us not say money bills, but bills imposing rates and taxes and bills for aids and supplies, cannot be introduced in the Senate. But one of the rights which the Parliament of Canada has as a result of that amendment in 1949 to the British North America Act is to bring any amendment which Parliament will approve in relation to any subject over which the Parliament of Canada has exclusive jurisdiction, even including money bills, and amend such legislation by repeal, or by repeal and re-enactment, by suspension, by the use of the word "notwithstanding", or by the short division method which I have suggested.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On the subject of short division, may I point out that the honourable senator suggests that possibly a bill could be passed by the other place without their realizing that it was contrary to the procedure established by section 53. I am wondering whether Parliament can amend the Constitution without knowing it is doing so.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, I appreciate the point my friend is making, but I always have difficulty when in the courts or in reasons for judgment it is stated that, it was the clear intention of Parliament to do thus-and-so. I would like to presume or to assume, but I am not sure that I can, or give any illustration, that in all cases where legislation is passed in the Commons and in the Senate that there is a clear understanding of the possible scope and effect of that legislation. If that were the case there would not be amendments in succeeding years and there would not be references to the courts. If the intention of Parliament was so clearly stated, then we could assume that they knew what they intended to do and that what they did was in fact what they intended to do. All we can conclude is the scope and effect of the legislation and what the bill in fact and in law does, and not determine the goodness or badness of the bill in terms of its constitutionality by saying that Parliament did not know what it was doing.

I would hesitate to use specific language saying that Parliament did not know what it was doing. I think there was inherent in the suggestion which the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) made some such possibility. I have tried to indicate what I think about Senator Flynn's suggestion and what my random thoughts are thereon, but I say that when Parliament passes legislation it becomes the law and if it passes legislation which is within its exclusive jurisdiction and with the benefit and aid of the 1949 amendment, that is the law of the land and there is no court in the land which can say that that bill is ultra vires of Parliament or that it is unconstitutional.

I hope I have made my points clear, but I qualified them by saying that I did not expect nor would I subscribe to the introduction in the Senate first of all of bills establishing rates and taxes and for aids and supply. This is a function which I regard, on the principle of no taxation without representation, to be the proper function of the Government. It is their function to lay down policies, financial policies, in those fields, but there are many so-called money bills that do not come within that prescription. While we are moving along in the direction of recognizing that and presenting more of those bills for initiation in the Senate, I think there is still a long way to go, and I sounded the alarm by drawing the attention of the Senate to this 1949 amendment to the B.N.A. Act solely to indicate as strongly as I could that there was an area that still existed within which more legislation could be initiated here which would not offend against either practice or principle in relation to where certain bills providing for rates and taxes, aids and supply should originate.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION AT GENERAL CONFERENCE IN NASSAU—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, December 12, 1968, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West), calling the attention of the Senate to the 14th General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at Nassau, Bahamas, from 26th October to 8th November, 1968, and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the purpose of the inquiry before us, as proposed by the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), is to call the attention of members of the Senate to the 14th General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held in Nassau, Bahamas, from October 26 to November 8, 1968.

The Government of the Bahamas acted as host to the conference and the Prime Minister of the Bahamas acted as chairman. One hundred and forty-five delegates, representing 28 Commonwealth countries and 64 branches of the association, attended. In addition, there were observer delegates from the United States led by five senators, and one from the Republic of Ireland in the person of Dr. Sean F. Lemass.

The Canadian delegation was led by Mr. James Walker, York Centre, Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, and in addition there were four other members of the House of Commons: Mr. Les Benjamin, Regina-Lake Centre, Mr. Adrien Lambert, Bellechasse, Mr. Heath Macquarrie, Hillsborough, and Mr. Aurélien Noel, Outremont.

The delegation from this chamber consisted of my colleague Senator Blois and myself. Senator John J. Connolly attended as C.P.A. councillor. In addition, there were representatives of 10 provincial branches who completed the delegation. I can report to honourable senators that all delegates delivered addresses and participated in conference deliberations, discussions and debates.

The agenda was discussed in five sessions, covering

1. World Security.

2. Parliamentary Government—Where is it Heading?

3. Aid—How Effective?

4. Problems of Economic Growth.

5. Racial Harmony or Conflict: Which way for Mankind?

With respect to the session on world security, I might report that in the Bahamas they have self-government except in the fields of foreign affairs, trade and security. There has been a tradition at these conferences that the host nation makes the opening statement of the conference. On this occasion the host nation, having no Minister of Foreign Affairs, called upon a distinguished colleague of ours in this chamber, honourable Senator John J. Connolly, to make the opening statement on world security.

Much has transpired or exists in the Commonwealth and world that has caused grievous pain and concern. The conference sessions on world security permitted a full and frank discussion of the burning topics of the day, with all delegates contributing exciting thoughts—though divergent at times—and ideas with respect to the principal threats to world peace. All of these threats involve the Commonwealth, directly or indirectly. The delegates considered the Commonwealth against the background of the threats to world security today. The Commonwealth is not the United Nations, but we sought to make and succeeded in making an impact upon each other and attempted to make an impact on world conscience and opinion.

The first and foremost area of concern with respect to world security is Vietnam. Of course we all welcomed the decision to halt the bombing of North Vietnam. This decision was made at the time of the conference. It was our hope it would lead to an early resumption of negotiations which, in fact, has been the case. However, which nation was causing the real threat to world peace was left unresolved. Many delegates considered the United States policy of containment to be mistaken, ill-conceived and unrealistic, as it caused only destruction and anarchy in Vietnam. They felt that the United States must consider and pursue a new strategy as communism had not been halted by arms and would only be halted by social and economic development. These same delegates maintained that the right to self-determination must be acknowledged, and that this right included the freedom to choose communism if a country so decided.

As many other delegates expressed the contrary view, and forcibly explained that the right of self-determination gave to a nation an undeniable right not to be communistic if it so desired. These delegates—among whom, as I remember, were the Canadians—stressed that militant communism was the real danger in the world today, and that the United States policy in Vietnam was correct, and gave assurance to new nations who were interested in assistance and maintaining their integrity.

The Rhodesian problem, with the illegal government and the principle of majority rule, were subjects of intensive and at times bitter debate. The British policy, of not using force to suppress the rebel regime in Rhodesia and a readiness to negotiate with the rebel government, received bitter criticism. The contrary view, however, expressed by Great Britain was that the use of force was totally impracticable and would lead to a flaming racist struggle in Africa or, indeed, to a third world war.

All delegates were unanimous in condemning the intolerable system of apartheid, and reaffirmed the belief in and support of the basic principles of majority rule.

The Nigerian situation was brought to the attention of the conference as an area having an effect on world security. The Nigerian civil war and resultant appalling suffering received urgent consideration and, again, Britain came in for scathing criticism for supplying arms to the Nigerian government. However, Britain maintained the basic principle of international behaviour in that when an independent member of the Commonwealth deemed its territorial integrity was threatened, it had the right to turn to friendly nations—and, indeed, much more than right to turn to other members of the Commonwealth for assistance in maintaining its integrity and independence.

Other areas of world security covered included Czechoslovakia, concerning which we found the members of the Commonwealth finally in common and unanimous agreement in condemning the Soviet Union for its intervention in Czechoslovakia. They were shocked at the flagrant violation of principles of freedom and self-determination long proclaimed by the Soviet Union.

Sabah, British North Borneo, and the paper annexation of Sabah by the Philippino Congress, was brought to the attention of the conference, as was Gibraltar. I will not discuss this, as it has been covered by Senator Blois in his report.

With respect to parliamentary government, we found that throughout the Commonwealth the same conditions exist as exist in Canada, in that the feeling in nearly all parts of the Commonwealth is that parliament is becoming less efficient and more remote from the people. The need for change and reform was recognized, as we in this chamber have recognized it and as, indeed, have the members of the other place. It was agreed that parliamentarians have the duty of removing weaknesses that may occur and of strengthening the system to assure the effectiveness of parliament.

Racial harmony generated by far the most explosive and, at times, bitter debate. I think it is fair to say that this problem of racism and racial harmony is the most volatile and fundamental issue confronting parliamentarians in the world today. It matters not whether it manifests itself in an emerging country of Africa, in the ghetto of an American or Canadian city, or on an Indian reservation in southern Alberta. We learned at the conference that man was created in the image of a Supreme Being and is biologically the same the world over. We must effectively learn to live together in harmony with other men, for there is no difference under the skin. If we fail as parliamentarians and as members of the Commonwealth to solve this simple yet seemingly insoluble problem, we will have little success in finding solutions to the many other far more pressing problems facing mankind. Surely, our journey through history, if we fail to solve this problem, will have been deemed a failure.

As I have indicated, the conference covered these issues. As can be imagined, when 145 parliamentarians gathered there were differences of opinion and at times debate was certainly divergent and inflamed, but when honourable men can honourably disagree, and honourably agree to meet again, I submit this is the real value and, surely, the real use of the Commonwealth, in providing the vehicle for these meetings to maintain the discussions, for as long as there are discussions and debates, there is hope of finding solutions.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-28, to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Sparrow moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

1. Page 1, lines 12, 13 and 14: Delete subclause (b) of clause 2 and substitute therefor the following:

"(b) 'analyst' means a person designated as an analyst under the Food and Drugs Act or by the Minister pursuant to section 4;".

2. Page 2, next following line 20: Strike out the word "Inspectors" immediately preceding clause 4 and substitute therefor the words "Inspectors and Analysts".

3. Page 2, next following line 30: Add the following subclause to clause 4:

"(3) The Minister may designate as an analyst for the purposes of this Act any person employed in the public service of Canada who, in his opinion, is qualified to be so designated."

4. Page 7, next following line 5: Add the following subclause to clause 8:

"(3) Any order made under subsection (1) or (2) adding to Part I or Part II of the Schedule any product or substance not contained in either Part on the coming into force of this Act, unless within a period of two years from the day on which such order was made this Act has been amended by Parliament so as to incorporate the provisions of such order therein, shall, on the expiration of such period, be deemed to have been repealed and shall cease to have any force or effect; and the power of the Governor in Council to make an order similar in substance to any order so repealed shall also terminate on the expiration of such period.".

5. Page 7, lines 6 to 31 inclusive: Delete subclauses (1), (2) and (3) of clause 9 and substitute therefor the following:

"(1) Where a product or substance is added to Part I or Part II of the Schedule by order of the Governor in Council, any manufacturer or distributor of that product or substance or any person having that product or substance in his possession for sale may, within sixty days from the date of the making of the order, request the Minister that the order be referred to a Hazardous Products Board of Review.

(2) Upon receipt of a request described in subsection (1), the Minister shall establish a Hazardous Products Board of Review (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"), consisting of not more than three persons and shall refer the order in respect of which the request was made to the Board.

(3) The Board shall inquire into the nature and characteristics of any product or substance to which an order referred to it under subsection (2) applies and shall give the person making the request and any other person affected by the order a reasonable opportunity of appearing before the Board, presenting evidence and making representations to it.".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now, at least in order to give the explanation in connection with the amendments.

Honourable senators, four amendments were made to this bill in committee. I may say that the committee sat last Wednesday for a considerable period of time, and then adjourned for the purpose of giving the minister and his officials the opportunity to consider several of the points which had been raised. We met again this morning for about an hour and a half, and the report you have is the result of that meeting.

All these amendments, with the exception of one—which is the amendment to section 8, which I will explain shortly—were agreed to by the minister and his officials and, in fact, the form in which they appear is the form in which they drafted them and submitted them to our committee.

The first two amendments, dealing with the definition of an analyst and also the matter of a power given to the minister under this act to designate as analysts certain people in the Public Service, were requested by the department so as to give more flexibility in dealing with the selection of an analyst, and the power which, in this bill as it was originally before us, limited the analyst, for instance, to a person so designated under the Food and Drugs Act. I understand there is one such person. At the request of the department there was added the words, "or by the minister pursuant to section 4", so as to provide for more flexibility.

The next amendment is one that will give the minister more flexibility, and I might add that the draftsmanship is his. Clause 4 under the heading "Inspectors" is amended by adding subclause 3 as follows:

> The minister may designate as an analyst for the purposes of this Act any person employed in the public service of Canada who, in his opinion, is qualified to be so designated.

Clause 9 of the bill provided for the establishment of a Hazardous Products Board of Review, and in the bill as it came before us, any person who was aggrieved as a result of an order made under clause 8 adding a new hazardous product to Part I or Part II of the Schedule might appeal that order. The language used was that he "may", as can be seen from the clause, within 30 days request that the order be referred to the Board of Review. As a result of discussions in relation to subclause 1 of clause 9, the period of 30 days was changed to 60 days, and the "may" remained, because it is a choice of the person who is aggrieved as to whether he wants the matter referred to the Board of Review. Then, in subclause 2, under the bill as it came to us, upon receipt of this request that the order be referred to the Board of Review, the bill provided that the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, may establish a Hazardous Products Board of Review. There was considerable discussion because there was that element of discretion in the Governor in Council as to whether an order would be referred to the board. In view of the discussion we had on the first day of hearing the department came back with a provision altering subclause 2 by changing "may" to "shall", so no longer is there a discretion.

As the bill came before us it outlined the duties of the Board of Review, and defined the right of the person who is aggrieved to be heard, and to submit evidence, and to make representations. That part remains as is. So, the real effect of these changes is to assure that if an aggrieved person desires to have the order considered by a board of review, and to have such a board established, he has that now, as a result of the amendment, as a matter of right and not as a matter of discretion in the hands of the minister or the Governor in Council.

I come now to the amendment to clause 8 of the bill which was finally settled by a vote in the committee. Under clause 8 it is provided that:

> The Governor in Council may by order amend Part I or Part II of the Schedule.

Part I deals with a list of prohibited hazardous products, that is, products that may not be imported, marketed or sold in Canada. Part II deals with a given list of hazardous products which may only be marketed, sold or imported into Canada under regulations which would govern and control their marketing and distribution. In clause 8 the Governor in Council was given authority by order to make additions to that list in Part I and Part II, and also to delete any product which may appear in either one of those lists.

The view of the committee in the discussions was that one should not as a matter of general principle amend legislation by order in council, which I think is a sound principle of law, and yet this authority to the Governor in Council was an authority permitting just such a thing to be done. The committee recognized that in dealing with hazardous products you are dealing with things that are dangerous to life, and that people may be exposed to them without knowing the danger inherent in their use, or even in their handling, and as and when these conditions are determined to exist the department concerned should have some authority that can quickly be marshalled to control or to prohibit the marketing, sale and exportation of such products.

Finally, the amendment which was read to you today and which was passed in committee, provided for both situations; that is, it retained the feature that the Governor in Council by order could add to the prohibited list or to the Part II list where such products could only be dealt with by regulation. We did not include in the amendment any change concerning the deletion by the Governor in Council of any hazardous products presently appearing in the legislation, because we felt that a deletion would indicate that the public interest was being served and the protection of the public was assured by such deletion. Therefore, the amendment to clause 8, by adding clause 3, simply provided that when such an order is made adding to this prohibited list or to the regulated list, then within a period of two years from that date there must be presented to Parliament and approved by Parliament an amending bill incorporating this order so that then Parliament has legislated and confirmed the action. We felt the two things fitted together. We also provided that if that is not done, then the order ceases to have any force and effect from that moment.

That is the substance of the amendment.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1970, in advance of bills based upon the said Estimates reaching the Senate; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

USE OF BROADCAST FACILITIES BY RENE LEVESQUE—INQUIRY STANDS

Hon. L. P. Beaubien rose pursuant to notice that he will inquire of the Government:

1. How many hours did Mr. Rene Levesque speak on the C.B.C. Radio during calendar year 1968?

2. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these talks, and if so, how much?

3. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for the time he was on the air on C.B.C. Radio, and if so, how much?

4. During calendar year 1968 for how many hours did Mr. Levesque appear on the C.B.C. Television?

5. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these appearances, and if so, how much?

6. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for his television appearances, and if so, how much?

7. How much would the C.B.C. have charged in the ordinary course of business:

(a) for the time Mr. Levesque spoke on C.B.C. Radio,

(b) for the time Mr. Levesque appeared on C.B.C. Television?

He said: Honourable senators, I made this inquiry three weeks ago. Can the Leader of the Government give me any idea when I shall get an answer?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have made inquiries and the department has not yet supplied the information requested.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

ELEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING

On the inquiry of Hon. Mr. MacNaughton:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Eleventh Annual Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group held at Washington, D.C., and New Orleans, Louisiana, 20th March to 24th March, 1968, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Meeting and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Alan Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I want to thank you for the opportunity of drawing to your attention the activities set out in the report of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group. For the record, honourable Senator Paul Martin, the Leader in the Senate, tabled the report of the Eleventh Meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group held in Washington and New Orleans, March 20th to March 24th, 1968 in English and in French. This report is set out at length in the appendix to the Debates of the Senate of November 12, 1968 at page 514. I think you might find it interesting reading.

The Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group is a gathering together of Canadian senators and members of Parliament and American senators and members of the United States House of Representatives for the purpose of discussing matters of mutual interest on a completely informal basis. In that respect, it is a unique group of parliamentarians and congressmen of two neighbouring countries on the North American continent.

It is not my purpose today to detail the activities of the group. The report does that in a rather interesting way. I would like to refer, however, to the two committees to show how timely and useful the discussions were.

Committee No. 1 on Trade and Economic Matters considered the following items on its agenda, and the items themselves show how lively the discussions were:

1. Canada-United States balance of payments;

2. Post Kennedy Round Developments;

3. Foreign Investment and Related Government Policies;

4. Resource Development Matters, with particular reference to oil and gas;

5. Automotive Agreement;

6. Aid to Developing Countries;

7. Trade and Economic Relations with Communist Countries;

8. International Grains Agreement.

Committee No. 2, which was called Defence and Security, considered the following items on its agenda:

1. State of the NATO alliance with particular reference to the Harmel study;

2. Co-operation for continental defence;

3. Policies towards Communist China;

4. Vietnam;

5. The non-proliferation treaty.

Rather than deal at this time with the excellent program of this last meeting or the useful and stimulating discussions, I thought it would be more appropriate to mark the passage of this first ten years in the history of the Canadian-United States Interparliamentary Group with a few more general remarks, and with an attempt to assess, in a personal way, its achievements over the past decade, its value, and perhaps also with the next meeting of the group only a few months away, probably to be held in Ottawa, offer a few remarks and suggestions on possible new directions in the coming second decade.

I am sure there are other honourable senators far better qualified than I—and I have in mind particularly one of our former colleagues, our former Speaker, the Honourable Sydney Smith, who missed only two meetings since the inception of the Canada-United States group, and who has done so much from our side to shape the course of its development in its first decade. His predecessor as Speaker, the honourable Senator Bourget, has also been an important guiding influence, and I look back with great pleasure on our association as joint Canadian Co-Chairmen of the group when I was Speaker in the other place. Perhaps the honourable Senator Bourget and the members of our last delegation, which included the honourable Senators Cameron, Gelinas, Lang, Grattan O'Leary and Harry Willis, or members of previous delegations might like to add their remarks to my own.

Ten years ago, friction between Canada and our American neighbour had reached a high point that had become dangerous to the traditionally excellent relations that have existed between our two countries in this century. Canadians felt that there was really very little comprehension south of the border, of our problems of nationhood, nor of our increasingly individual character among the nations of the World. They were more and more troubled—and irritated—by what they believed was a very one-sided appreciation of the problems, caused by the presence on one side of a long common border of one of the world's greatest powers and, on the other, of a much smaller nation. In this situation of one-sided awareness, it seemed on our side of the border legitimate Canadian interests tended to suffer.

While our own character was becoming more individual, the world was growing increasingly complex. The United States had emerged from World War II not merely as a major power but, in one urgent step, had become one of two super-powers in dangerous conflict with each other. For the first time, it was playing an exceedingly active international role on a global scale. It was deeply concerned with the international tensions and conflicts that endangered the future of mankind. Conscious that failure would be catastrophic, the Americans were inevitably preoccupied with these global issues. There was a quite natural tendency to take for granted a relationship with a neighbour that for many years—always, so far as living memory was concerned—had been easy and comfortable and which, in an alarmingly different world, contained no possibility of danger on a major scale. It is not unfriendly to the Americans, I think, to add that the new role of super-power is one which must be learned. The skills which it demands are not automatic.

The fact that we are so close to the Americans, and in some ways so similar, can be extremely helpful when it is a question of jointly tackling some common problem. It has made the Canadian-American relationship unique. But it has some unexpected consequences. While we were becoming increasingly aware of our own identity, Americans often did not even look upon us as foreigners in their eyes.

They tended occasionally, and at times still do, to regard this as a mark of special favour on their part towards us or, much more generously and far more commonly, to view it as a sign of special virtue on our side. We can recognize the generosity and still demand: but what does this mean? It means that Americans assume that we see the world as they do, that they do not see that we are in many ways very different people. Then, when our own interests or perhaps only our different approaches to problems, lead us to do something with which they disagree or that merely surprises them, they tend to be hurt and to feel let down.

An important reason for regular, planned contact is to make sure that responsible and representative Americans, especially those involved in the political process, understand that we are indeed different.

The American difficulty in appreciating this arises in part from the fact that relations between our two countries have been good to a point that is almost without precedent, and in part from the fact that we do have much more in common than a joint border. Many of us spring from the same national stock and so there exist backgrounds that are shared. In large part we use a common language, a convenience that sometimes exacerbates difficulties by obscuring them. We have many institutions derived from the same sources. Our people come and go in great numbers each day without hindrance and with little formality. There are no other two nations in the world whose volume of bilateral trade approaches the level that exists between Canada and the United States. We are not only each other's best customer—we are without rivals in this sphere.

For example, in 1968 Canadian exports reached a record level of $13,576 million, which is 19 per cent over those of 1967. The United States took 67 per cent of our total exports, and sales to the U.S. increased by 25 per cent, whereas for all other countries the increase was only 7.5 per cent. No day goes by, not even holidays, without a vast exchange of goods, services or ideas. We are linked by our trade unions, our service clubs, our professional societies.

The United States has invested very heavily in Canada. Much is heard in Canada of the alleged dangers of foreign investment to Canadian sovereignty. But in my way of thinking the many studies that have been made of this allegation show it to be sheer nonsense. We are extremely conscious of this investment, less so of the substantial Canadian investment in the American economy. In defence our inter-dependence is embodied in a complex pattern of continental arrangements.

We have worked together, in so many ways, to improve our continental neighbourhood and with great effectiveness.

The United States is one of the world's super-powers. Virtually all of its actions affect other people, in other lands. The effect even of its internal conflicts is exported. It is not surprising that Canadians tend to be well informed on American affairs, that our newspapers and radio and television networks devote a great deal of space and time to reporting and explaining American events. We could not afford a different approach. Our intense interest in the United States is not the product of some special virtue of curiosity or intellectual alertness on our part. It is dictated to us by force of reality and necessity, and I think it would be petty and surly of us to refuse to acknowledge that this national relationship is somewhat different when it is viewed through American eyes. We are of great importance to the United States, as a partner in defence, in trade and in investment, but no action by Canada can alter the fundamental strategic balance in the world as action by the United States so easily can. We can play a useful role in peace-keeping, but nothing we might do would exert any decisive influence on global war or peace.

A depression in Canada would affect certain American industries and regions, but our economy does not have that overwhelming size that produced the truism that when Wall Street sneezes the world trembles. Many of our actions can be felt in specific areas or specific interests in the United States, but we do not have that instant impact upon the Americans that their country, whether they wish it or not, must have not only upon ourselves but upon many other countries as well.

The difference is a function of size. We are, in people, one-tenth the size of the United States. In these circumstances it was not surprising that a decade ago Canadians had cause for concern over a one-sided awareness of the differences that separate our two countries. I think it is fair to say that our concern in those days was, in fact, justified. Fortunately, it was shared by a substantial number of Americans, including some of the more influential members of the United States Congress. Two members of the House of Representatives in particular, Congressmen Brooks-Hays and Frank Coffin, undertook a special study mission in Canada to examine the nature and causes of the growing friction. Their report, known as the Hays-Coffin Report, was submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in May 1958.

I think that this report is one of the important milestones in the history of Canada-United States relations, and that its statement of the "Purpose and Scope of the Study" is still valid and meaningful enough to be read into our record:

> The primary purpose of this mission was to gather the principal facts concerning Canadian-United States relationships in the various areas where the policies, programs, and attitudes of the two nations clash rather than mesh; to set forth these facts; and by so doing to broaden the understanding of Congress and the American people. The basic assumption of this study is that understanding is the essential prerequisite to better relationship.
> Recognizing that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has as its first field of interest "Relations of the United States with Foreign Nations Generally," this broad survey has been carried out. Also recognizing that primary jurisdiction in specific economic areas is that of other committees—

Obviously, in Congress

> —the committee has cataloged various suggestions for the improvement of United States-Canadian relationships both to spotlight problem areas and to stimulate thought.
> This is done on the basis of the study mission's conviction that lack of awareness is the chief spawning ground of the irritations that do exist and that with greater awareness of common problems our North American solidarity can be vastly strengthened.
> It must be recognized that this report is directed primarily toward frictions resulting from action initiated by the United States and towards possible remedial actions which could be initiated on this side of the border. United States-Canadian relations, however, are not a one-way street. If the United States has at times acted arbitrarily and unilaterally, so has Canada. If the United States has taken economic action which infringes on Canadian interests, so has Canada infringed on United States interests. If the United States has initiated tariff and tax actions which are unfair, so has Canada. The argument of this report is that there should be understanding on both sides of the border. Only through mutual efforts to solve our problems will we achieve the desired understanding.

Further, the report found "ample evidence of an erosion in the traditionally excellent relationships between the United States and Canada." It noted that the "vital role which Congress plays in determining United States-Canada relationships, for better or worse, must no longer be ignored." It stressed that liaison between the two governments, important as this was, did not in itself develop the high degree of understanding essential to good relations, because under the American system of separation of powers it was important that the Congress recognize the special Canada-United States relationship as a matter of continuing interest by a committee or subcommittee, and also that it should develop its own direct liaison with Canadian parliamentarians through periodic exchange of visits and consultations.

I am merely stressing there that it is one thing to have our very capable ambassadors located in different foreign countries, but it is a much closer relationship for members of the other house and senators to associate with their opposite numbers south of the border. It is something that our ambassadors cannot do for us, and it is something we should do for ourselves.

This was an American report written from the American point of view. There has been no comparable Canadian study. But, viewed from the Canadian side, the appeal of the argument was at least as strong as it was in the United States. The American Congress has independent legislative power. Although the administration formulates policy, the Congress can greatly influence the form that policy takes. But, inevitably, Canada's official representation in Washington is largely concerned with its contacts with the American Government, the administration, and the legislative branches of Government tend to be ignored. In Canada, the Hays-Coffin report was recognized as an important opportunity to establish direct and organized contact with influential Senators, Members of Parliament and Congressmen.

Not surprisingly, then, these recommendations were endorsed with great enthusiasm by Congress. Similarly, within our own Parliament, they were received with the fullest support from Government and Opposition alike, and particularly by the two Speakers at that time, the late and well-remembered honourable Senator Mark Drouin, and the then honourable Roland Michener, now elevated to the highest office in the land, and in which capacity he is not less deeply interested in the progress of our Canada-United States interparliamentary meetings. Under the leadership of these two great Canadian parliamentarians, negotiations were soon concluded for holding the first formal meeting which was held in Washington on January 9 and 10, 1959. This was the birth of a unique interparliamentary link.

It was at that meeting that the present framework of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary group took shape, and there has really been little change in its form since then. It was agreed that the meetings should be informal. Discussions were to be in camera and off the record, except for a communique at the close of the meetings which would outline in a general way the course of the discussions. No statements were to be attributed to any delegate. Each delegation would be free to report to its legislature. Neither would have the authority to bind its legislature or its government. The function of the interparliamentary group was to be purely consultative.

The original aim was to hold two meetings a year, one in each country, and not always in Washington or Ottawa. It was agreed that on occasion meetings might be held in other areas of special interest.

Only two changes of any substance have been made in these ground rules since that first meeting. One was to reduce the number of meetings from two to one each year. In my view this was a realistic and necessary change, because of the increasingly crowded legislative timetable in both countries.

A second, and I think less constructive, change has been the addition of a formal press conference during our visits to Washington. Our Canadian co-chairmen are normally the Speakers of the two houses. Their role in Parliament handicaps them severely in the arena of a press conference. Moreover, when one of the distinguishing features of a meeting, vital to its nature, is the off-the-record character of the discussions, a press conference must be either uninformative or in conflict with one of the basic rules. It is my feeling that it could profitably be avoided at future meetings.

What do ten years of these meetings, aimed at increased understanding of differences, suggest for the future? I think we can dispense easily with the obvious question: Is there still a need for this interparliamentary link? There is no question in my mind of the importance and value of this unique institution—unique in that it is the only one of the many Canadian-American contacts that regularly brings together legislators of all parties and of both houses in each country. Their aim is to increase their understanding of differing attitudes, disagreements and points of friction. To suggest that there is no longer need for contact between legislators is as unreasonable as to suggest that there is no need for contact between administrations.

The meetings provide an opportunity for members of the legislatures of both countries to get to know personally their fellow-legislators on the opposite side of the border. The case scarcely needs to be argued. For Canada, there is no more effective way of demonstrating to some of the most influential men in the United States the ways in which we are distinct from other countries and the ways in which our attitudes differ.

If we accept the value of the meetings, it becomes worthwhile to see whether there are ways in which they could be improved. I feel that there are ways in which the role of the interparliamentary group can be made more constructive. I am convinced that Canadian parliamentarians can and should prepare themselves to play a much stronger role.

I believe there is a need for some continuing group to keep Canadian-American relations and problems under regular and systematic study. It could be organized in various ways—through the secretariat of the parliamentary associations, as a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament or, perhaps most usefully and readily, by our Committee on Foreign Affairs. However it was formed, it could provide the nucleus of annual interparliamentary delegations. By starting their study sessions in the autumn of each year, the members could prepare themselves for full and more effective participation in the discussions with their American colleagues. As a frequent participant in these meetings and as a former co-chairman, I urge this suggestion most strongly.

Because of the wide scope of our relations with the United States, there are many places within the two governments where various aspects of them come under regular study and are the subject of consultations but, again because of this very scope, there is no one place or body where the full range of relationships comes under scrutiny. There would, I believe, be real value in establishing a sub-committee such as I suggested of foreign affairs which could look at this whole wide range of relationships and then select specific areas for more intensive examination.

It is equally important, I think, to secure much greater continuity in our own delegations to the meetings. The United States obviously attaches much more importance to this consideration than we have in the past. In looking over the records of the last five meetings, I see that on the American side 17 American delegates have attended more than three sessions. On our side, there are only eight. Of our people, 73 have participated only once or twice. That is almost twice as many as in the American delegations.

There is some truth in Judy LaMarsh's complaint, set out in her recent book, that membership on parliamentary delegations of one sort or another are used as minor political rewards. So far as this is the case, I suggest that it is a mistake. I think honourable senators who have taken part in these Canada-United States interparliamentary meetings will agree that it is really very difficult to make a useful and positive contribution to the discussions the first time around. This is especially so because the American delegations are seasoned and well briefed. The first time is mainly an educational experience, and as a rule a member's effective contributions are made on the basis of the self-confidence and familiarity which come from attendance at more than one of these sessions. I hope that those participating in the process of selection of our next delegation will give sympathetic thought to this vital aspect of the important job of representing Canada.

I have a further suggestion which affects the substance of the committee's work. Discussion has often been concentrated on world problems, either political or military. I think the first emphasis should be on bilateral Canadian-American interest and problems. There are enough of these pressing issues.

I put most of these proposals forward somewhat cautiously. They are ideas which I would like to see explored and experimented with. It seems to me that they are ideas of the sort which a committee or working group such as I have suggested might explore.

I have a couple of other suggestions that such a committee might take up. Many of the issues between Canada and the United States involve jurisdictions in which the provinces and states have either complete or partial responsibility. Could we not examine the possibility of including representation from the provinces?

If such a committee were formed, it could perhaps study the work of the Nordic Council in Scandinavia. This council appears to fulfill an important role in preparing a basis for common understanding of problems that extend through all the Scandinavian countries. When legislation which affects Scandinavia as a whole is brought forward in the separate Parliaments, there already exists a basis of understanding of common responsibilities that has been developed through joint study. This seems to me to be one of those reasonable Scandinavian approaches to problems which we and the Americans might find useful to look at.

These are suggestions for improvements in the good work that is already under way and has been under way for ten long years. I am sure it is no exaggeration to say that these bilateral Canada-United States interparliamentary meetings represent our most important link of this sort. Surely never before in the troubled history of mankind have two neighbouring countries—one a great superpower, the other very much smaller—shared a continent and a long common border and succeeded in living alongside each other not only in peace but as very good neighbours. We are far from identical and, at least in Canada, we take some pride in that fact. But we are very good friends with a growing understanding of each other's problems and an increasing respect for each other's individuality.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I think the house is greatly indebted to Senator Macnaughton for his clear, lucid and comprehensive review of the last meeting of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, and for some words of wisdom he uttered about its future. One of his words of wisdom—and I may say that he explored so many inlets that it will only be necessary for me to sail from headland to headland—which I thought should be noted by the powers that be inside and outside this house, was in urging that in selecting the Canadian delegation to go to Washington for these meetings, or to meet our American friends in Canada, we should use more caution, more responsibility and a better understanding of the importance of these meetings by appointing people of the best possible experience and wisdom that this house and the other place can summon.

The Congress of the United States has clearly been conscious of this from the beginning, and as proof of this I am going to mention but a few of the names of the U.S. delegates who over the years have been attending these meetings. To begin with, there is Senator Mike Mansfield, the Majority Leader in the Senate, a man who for years has been a decisive influence in American government and politics. There is Senator George Aiken of Vermont, one so widely respected and trusted by the American people that in last November's election both major parties, the Republican and the Democratic, wanted him on their ticket.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): There is Senator Muskie of Maine, who has lived near us through the years, a man who last November was a vice-presidential candidate for the United States and who by his campaign won the admiration and respect of all American people.

There is Senator Eugene McCarthy, the philosopher-politician, his fame now worldwide, a man who dared last November, against massive odds, to challenge the power of his party's Establishment. There is Representative Cornelius Gallagher, an engaging figure of intelligence and charm, and very high in the councils of his party. There is Senator Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, the last of the illustrious and tragic Kennedy line and a man who, according to some of the most knowledgeable prophets, is destined to be a future President of the United States.

When the United States sends delegates of that quality, when they attach so much importance to these meetings as indicated by the calibre of their delegates, it does seem to me that a heavy responsibility rests upon the shoulders of those in this house and in the other place who select the Canadian delegates to the same meetings.

Now I wish to say just a few words about the origin of this organization. Senator Macnaughton mentioned the Hays-Coffin Report, and of course that was a tremendous influence in bringing about this organization. But more than that—and I am sure honourable senators will be interested in this—before that, a famous American Senator, Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, took an active interest in bringing about this organization, and a long-beloved figure in this chamber, the late Senator Norman Lambert, went to Washington on two or three occasions to discuss this matter with Senator Vandenberg and others of influence in the American Congress. I knew at that time, because I was constantly in touch with Senator Lambert, that the Canadian Government of that day, under Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. St. Laurent, gave this proposal their most active and enthusiastic support. And so it was that by 1958 Mr. Diefenbaker, who was Prime Minister at that time, was able to rise in the other place and say this:

> My proposal is that I should request the Speaker of this Honourable House, in consultation with his colleagues in the other place, to establish a committee of the members of both houses and of all parties for the purpose of exploring jointly with appropriate representatives of the executive legislative branches of the Government of the United States, the means whereby increased systematic discussions between legislators of the two countries on problems of common concern may be provided.

What was stressed here, right from the beginning, is that when we go to Washington with these delegations we do not go there as Conservatives or Liberals or as New Democrats, but we go there solely as Canadians—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): —speaking to the best of our ability for the things which concern Canada and the relations of Canada with the other country.

Similar authorizations were given in the Congress of the United States, and in 1959, as Senator Macnaughton has said, the first meeting was held in Washington, and there have been meetings once a year, alternatively in both capitals, ever since.

A thing that must be stressed is that this Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group differs from all other interparliamentary groups to which we belong. It has no constitution, no president, no council, and it makes no attempt to solve problems which concern the two countries. There are no pacts, no agreements, no resolutions, and no issuing of pompous policy statements. The sole aim is frank, forthright, manly discussion of mutual problems, with the hope of narrowing the issues that might divide us and building on the broad common ground we share in so many areas of human relationships.

There is not always agreement about everything, and certainly there is a broad hospitality for divergent views; there is a complete respect for the glory of dissent. But what is felt, and rightly, is that these meetings do give each of the delegations new insights on common problems, insights that will be used and be useful in the solutions that we finally must come to.

To sum it all up, what is aimed for is a better understanding in the Parliament of Canada of the problems and difficulties in the United States, and a better understanding in the Congress of the United States of the problems and difficulties which beset us; in short, more respect and less suspicion; more trust and more understanding. And these, God knows, are things our tormented world needs tragically at this time.

I am well aware, because I have heard it often, that there are some among us who still ask what is the good of all this talk with our American neighbours? You will hear those views expressed in academic circles; you will hear them among our intellectuals. You will hear such voices among some who are still fighting the war of 1812. There are people who see us overwhelmed by some monolithic American culture, so overwhelmed by this vicious culture they picture that they see us ending up grinding corn in the camp of the Philistines. They want us to be wary of the United States. They want Canada to be a counterweight for Europe against the United States. They want us to turn more and more to Europe.

Honourable senators, this is a counsel of madness. This is sheer fantasy, and is dangerous, irresponsible talk. I wonder whether those who indulge in it ever stop to reflect on what our trade with the United States means to Canada. Do they ever consider the figures given us here today showing what our trade with the United States means? How many of them know that in a single month near the end of last year one province of Canada alone exported $75 million worth of goods to the United States? I even wonder whether the people who talk that way realize that if it had not been for the Marshall Plan after World War II—call it enlightened self-interest, if you will—I wonder if they consider when they speak of turning to Europe that if it had not been for that plan there might today be no Europe to which to turn.

We here in Canada are the inheritors of the thought and traditions of Europe, and often our long, long thoughts go back to the land of our ancestors. But, honourable senators, we are still North Americans, the creatures and children of geography, the products of the environment, the emotions, the driving forces, the faith, the dreams and the forms of expression of this North American continent. These inescapably must influence our voyage through history in the years to come.

Yet, honourable senators, there is another fact, a fact pointed out by Senator Macnaughton and which we must ever keep in mind in dealing with our neighbours, that despite what has been said there still does exist a difference between our two countries, a difference we must always remember and never fail to impress upon our neighbours, the fact that while Canada and the United States may have the same basic culture they each, at the same time, have domestic and other tasks and problems, political, social, and economic, which differ, and differ widely. Canada's particular responsibilities, her government, her constitutional structure, her ideals and aspirations, her memories and milestones, even her discords, are things in her life which give her a special identity, which compel us to resolve that there is one part of this North American continent which from earth to sky we must insist on calling our own. These truths will be best understood by our neighbours for our common good if we meet with them in frank, forthright, and honest discussion.

The American people have risen to a pinnacle of power with an awesome accountability to history. In their just use of that power, in their just use of that accountability, Canada will walk with them not as a satellite but as an ally and friend; will walk with them justly, love mercy, and seek peace with all the world. That, honourable senators, is the true purpose and the true justification of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

Hon. Maurice Bourget: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to associate myself with the comments of my two colleagues, Senators MacNaughton and O'Leary (Carleton), as I share unreservedly their views on the importance they attach to the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group.

I was happy to hear Senator MacNaughton recall the days when he and I assumed the co-chairmanship of that group. I remember with pleasure the numerous and enthralling discussions we had with our colleagues of the United States Congress and the enriching and pleasant visits the latter organized in our honour, each time we had the opportunity to go to Washington.

I think it is useless to add that each time the Canadian delegation went to the United States for the meetings, we received the most cordial and kindest welcome which could be extended to parliamentary colleagues.

Last week, I had the opportunity to speak of those meetings to my colleague, Senator Gélinas, unfortunately absent this afternoon, but who himself wanted to say a few words on this occasion; he told me how he had been struck by the warmth, the friendship that is extended to us Canadian parliamentarians when we have the opportunity to go and meet our American colleagues.

I do not forget the pride with which, in 1965, we welcomed here the American delegates, at our eighth meeting, on which occasion they visited the initial phase of the construction work of Expo, pride which, on their own admission, has been fully justified by the brilliant success achieved by Expo in 1967, as they saw for themselves two years later.

I do not forget either the numerous personal meetings we had with our American counterparts of both Houses which, in many cases, were for me and for many other Canadian delegates the beginning of a close and long friendship. May I mention particularly two persons who, in their capacity as co-chairmen of the American delegation, have contributed to lighten the work load of Canadian delegates.

The first one—mentioned earlier by Senator O'Leary (Carleton)—is the senior senator for Vermont, Senator George Aiken, one of the outstanding figures in the American Senate, one of the founders of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, and one of the most loyal supporters Canada has ever had in Congress. We are very indebted to him, one of the most brilliant and most sincere parliamentarians ever produced by the United States. That is the reason why, at one of the meetings held in the United States, we were not surprised to hear the former president of the United States, Mr. Johnson, say that we had in the person of Senator Aiken of Vermont, a Canadian ambassador at large.

From among the members of the House of Representatives, I would like to mention, secondly, our loyal friend, Mr. Neil Gallagher of New Jersey, who, since the group was founded, has been its vice-chairman almost all that time. Congressman Gallagher has also greatly contributed to the Canadian and American interparliamentary rapprochement, and his charm, as that of his distinguished wife, Mrs. Gallagher, gained him the affection of many Canadian delegates.

[English]

Senator Macnaughton mentioned the importance of continuity in our Canadian delegation to Canada-United States meetings. I heartily support him in this. As co-chairmen we were frequently in the position of being the only link on the delegation with previous meetings, while the majority—although this has been said I think it is worth repeating it—of our United States colleagues had taken part in not just one previous session, but in three or four. Our own previous participation perhaps enabled us to derive just a bit more benefit and enjoyment out of these meetings than did a good many of our Canadian colleagues on the delegation who, as first timers, necessarily spent most of their time in trying to get the measure of this group.

In the rather large delegation, compared with those to other associations, that we send to these Canada-United States meetings there is obviously room for new blood each year. There is without any question a need for new blood and new ideas in this as in any other of our interparliamentary activities. But surely this is, above all, an activity in which the majority of our Canadian delegation should be specialists.

In contrast to the United States, where only about a quarter of the more than 500 legislators in both Houses of Congress could be expected by reason of proximity to the Canadian border to be directly aware of our country and of the interdependence between our two countries, virtually all of us in this Parliament are vitally aware of our vast neighbour to the south. So many of us represent areas and constituencies that are adjacent to or close to the border. Even those somewhat more distant from the border can never realistically ignore the inevitable pull of economics and geography, and also culture, that emanates from that active giant power to the south. We are all therefore vitally concerned on a day-to-day basis with one aspect or another of Canada-United States relations.

Each Canadian, whatever his language, is conscious of that vicinity. We, from the province of Quebec, are particularly concerned about the permanent influence of the United States on our culture, first, and also on our economy. However, there is a fact which strikes us as being particularly important: we are both North Americans and Canadians. We cannot and we do not forget our strong historic links with our southern neighbours, with neighbouring states and with those of the Atlantic Coast where our people have mingled, as well as our links with the Western states, especially those of the central western United States which were explored and partly cleared by our fathers, nor our links with Louisiana, the adopted land of so many uprooted Acadians.

We certainly want to remind our southern neighbours and friends that we are interdependent, that we need one another, that our interests in the world are similar; but we want to say that above all, Canadians are not and will never be the exact replicas of Americans; history has given us a quite different personality from that of the American people—a distinct personality due to our French and English origin—and owing to circumstances, we each have our own views, although finally we are searching for a free society and a common ideal.

[English]

What better way can we Canadian parliamentarians attempt to get this message across to our neighbours than through this interparliamentary link with the United States Congress? If we can impart to our United States colleagues at these meetings an understanding of our essential differences, and bring them to an awareness of the problems as well as the benefits that spring from the intimacy of our mutual relationship, then I would say that this interparliamentary group will have become one of the most important forces in the maintenance of good relations between our two countries.

I suspect that, like all institutions devised by men, there must be many ways in which the Interparliamentary Group can be made to function more effectively. A few minutes ago Senator Macnaughton proposed the appointment of a subcommittee consisting of members drawn from both the United States and Canadian sides to study this question, and he has also made a number of useful suggestions that such a subcommittee might look into, and with which I am in entire agreement, except the one that has to do with the inclusion on delegations from time to time of provincial or state legislators. I do not think I have to explain that. I think the reasons are well known by honourable senators, and I feel that our delegations should be restricted to federal members.

Having now completed ten useful years in the life of this interparliamentary link, perhaps this is the time to have another close look at the framework of this organization and to see if improvements are needed.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker—and I am not the only one to do this because my predecessor mentioned this also—that this might be one of the suggestions from our side for the agenda of the next meeting, which I understand may be held in May or June of this year. But whether or not the organizational framework is improved, it seems to me that if improvements are needed they are in the attitude with which our own delegations take on the responsible task of representing both Canada and the Canadian Parliament at these important meetings. It is at the meetings of this unique institution that we should have our most articulate parliamentary spokesmen and our most closely briefed and effective delegates.

The aim of this association of parliamentarians—which is "the advancement of mutual understanding, harmony and goodwill between Canada and the United States"—has been most assiduously promoted and cultivated since the first meeting of the group.

These meetings afford an opportunity for two good neighbours to sit down and study the various problems they have in common. It is true that such discussions have not always produced definite and immediate decisions, but they have started the groundwork for the final solutions. They have contributed to create a friendly atmosphere which has eliminated many misunderstandings. They have paved the way to eventual decisions beneficial to both sides. They have established a sound basis for closer partnership in every respect, and have helped to further international cooperation for the good of all mankind.

The communications between Canada and the United States have generally been friendly and frank in every sphere. But, unfortunately, too often our differences have been exaggerated and given too much publicity, while many points on which we agree have been passed over in silence. As someone has said, harmony seldom makes headlines.

[Translation]

That is why, honourable senators, in concluding, I can say that this parliamentary association has an important part to play in the future to maintain and improve relations between our two countries. Personally,—and I know that everyone feels the same way—I hope it will last a long time and that its achievements will be numerous and fruitful.

[English]

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, my contribution to this discussion will be brief. As a freshman member of the Canadian parliamentary delegation last year, I am deeply indebted to those who appointed me to the delegation and I want to take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation to those who conceived this important interchange 11 years ago.

I am one of those people who have always believed in the face-to-face exchange of views, the face-to-face confrontation if it is a question of disagreement between peoples, because out of the situation where you come together in a quiet and informal atmosphere, where you can size up the personality of the individual and feel the nuances of change as discussions proceed, you get a feeling that cannot be measured in terms of international understanding. So, I feel that those who conceived this Canadian-American parliamentary interchange have performed a most useful service and one that I hope will continue for years to come.

Senator Macnaughton has given a good review of what happened and the issues at stake. May I say that the two co-chairmen of the Canadian delegation on this last occasion were appearing in the role of pinch-hitters, because they were pinch-hitting, respectively, for the Speaker of the Senate, who was ill, and the Speaker of the Commons, who was otherwise engaged. On this occasion, in contrast to what often happens in a ball game, they both made home runs. It was a useful experience. As a freshman member and one who has had the opportunity—because I live in a place many of these men visit, Banff—of visiting with them, sometimes on the golf course, sometimes in even more congenial surroundings, it was interesting to try to get the feel of the Americans on this particular occasion.

I could be wrong in this respect, but I had the feeling of great preoccupation on the part of the Americans with things other than the immediate cause of our being together and, goodness knows, they had many reasons for this preoccupation. They were certainly preoccupied with the question of the agreement with respect to the extension of NORAD, which came up on May 12. They were concerned too with Canada's position with respect to the recognition of mainland China. I think most of them felt they would rather not see it happen, but some were quite antagonistic to any move in this direction, and I believe we were able to make some progress in explaining the Canadian point of view in this respect. They were certainly concerned about the way they were bogged down in Vietnam, and I am sure that Senator O'Leary will remember that I had the last word in the Defence Committee. The Canadians had been probing to try to find out what could be done to assist in getting out of the morass, and that is the last question I asked in that discussion before we adjourned in Washington. I can still see Cornelius Gallagher, George Aiken and Governor Stafford shrugging their shoulders. I had the feeling they were almost despairing of there being a way to do it.

There was a certain feeling of hopelessness about the situation in which they found themselves. I think we were able to give them some encouragement in that while we sometimes disagreed with the position they took, and sometimes disagreed with the attitude they expressed so far as certain Canadian actions were concerned, there was an appreciation that a group of Canadians would sit down with them without fanfare and publicity and give a frank expression of Canadian views and opinions.

All of this has been well said by other speakers this afternoon, and I should like to say that for me it was a pleasure and privilege to meet some men whose names have become household names over the years. I start with George Aiken from Vermont. If we ever create such a thing as an honorary citizenship of Canada I would think that George Aiken should be the first to receive it. There is Senator Mike Mansfield, the distinguished Majority Leader of the Senate, who is a neighbour of mine in Montana. He is a man certainly worth cultivating because in his quiet way he has exercised a major influence on American foreign policy, and it has been an influence which I think has had the sympathy of most Canadians.

Then there is a man whose name I have known for some time but whom I had never met, the charming Senator John Cooper of Kentucky. He is the kind of man who makes it so easy to forget political divisions.

The mention of political divisions reminds me that I want to second what Senator O'Leary (Carleton) said so well. At the briefing sessions held before we went to Washington there were members of the New Democratic party, the Progressive Conservative party, and the Liberal party. Divisions were so sharp that I wondered what would happen in Washington but, as Senator O'Leary (Carleton) said, we were there as Canadians and there was a unanimity in the expression of the Canadian point of view, and the same was true of the Americans. I was on the Defence Committee—not by choice but because more people preferred to be on the Trade and Commerce Committee—and I had the feeling that the division between the "Doves" and the "Hawks" on that committee was quite marked. In this respect I think of people like Senator Hiram Fong of Hawaii who, I would say, took a hawkish position, but one has to make allowances for the proximity of where he lives to the area of conflict. I think of Senator John Stennis of Mississippi, and Representative William Murphy of Chicago, who could be put in the same camp, and of Representative Bloomfield of Michigan with whom I had disagreed quite seriously when I was at the United Nations in November. This division was there, but in spite of that there was a united concern as to how to find a way out of the situation.

One of the things that interested me as a new man was the fact that Canadians seemed to take more initiative in the discussions than I expected. It seemed to me that the Americans, whether out of courtesy or preoccupation, left the initiative much more to the Canadians than I would have expected.

In the Defence Committee the discussion had to do with NATO and its future, NORAD and its future, the Harmel Report and what might come out of it, the recognition of China, the situation in Vietnam, and the Russian occupation of the Mediterranean, which was a matter of real concern to them. It is a matter of concern to us as well because the Russians are doing in the Mediterranean just what they have been doing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and what they can do in Hudson Bay. This matter of undersea fleets with nuclear weapons is one of real concern.

I am one of those who believe that for many years there has been a tendency to take Canadian-America relations for granted. I am sure that this is wrong, and that we probably have more need to cultivate relationships and understandings with the United States than with almost any other country. The two countries are so indivisibly wrapped up in each other's welfare that we must have the maximum understanding and appreciation of each other's problems, and the maximum capacity to understand how we can arrive at compromises in those areas in which we cannot agree.

I am not proposing to say anything more than this. Senator Macnaughton has reviewed the meeting very well. Senator O'Leary (Carleton) has discussed it with his usual eloquence, and it remains only for me to comment on two recommendations made by Senator Macnaughton.

The first recommendation was that there be a certain measure of continuity in the membership. All honourable senators are aware of the fact, because they have attended conferences of one kind and another, that the first time one attends he is a freshman who has much to learn. There is much to be done in the way of getting to know the feel of the individuals who make up the group, and one's contribution is minimal. The Americans have demonstrated by the kind of men they have sent as members of their delegations that they view these meetings as very important. They have appointed their most experienced men. I agree that there should be a substantial degree of continuity with a constant inflow of new members each year.

Senator Macnaughton's second suggestion was that the provinces be represented. I am sorry that I have to disagree with him at this time, and I would like to go along with what Senator Bourget has said. There may come a time when the provinces should join us, but I think there is so much pioneering work to be done in exploring how this organization can be made most effective that for the time being—for possibly another five years—we should continue to have federal representation only.

Honourable senators, it is not my purpose to say anything more. It was a rich and rewarding experience, and I look forward to many more of them, and particularly to welcoming the Americans to Canada at the end of May or the beginning of June of this year.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to take up the time of the house unnecessarily, but I would like to say that I wish the members of the American Senate and House of Representatives who attend these meetings of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group could have been here this afternoon to listen to what has been said, and more particularly to appreciate the warmth of that which was so eloquently and sincerely said by the four previous speakers. This is no less than all of us would want, because the members of the American Congress who have participated in these meetings have given of their best, and we can do no less than what the speakers this afternoon have already emphasized.

This does not mean that we have always to pick our best orators. We have in this chamber people who have great experience in dealing with Americans in many fields. These men, even though their voices are not heard too often in this chamber, can be very effective as members of these delegations.

One of the proudest days we have had in the Senate was May 20, 1965, when one of the most distinguished American delegations ever to visit this country was present. Senator Aiken, Mr. Gallagher, and Senator Mansfield sat beside our Speaker and addressed the house. This was a very unusual privilege, but it was one that we gave with our whole heart. I want the American legislators to understand that is the way we feel about the work they are contributing, and that we too want to contribute to this very worthy international committee.

There is only one other thing I should like to say. In this house, and perhaps in this Parliament, we owe the American legislators a debt of gratitude on another count. They are not members of the Commonwealth, but to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting at Wellington, New Zealand, in 1965, they sent Senator William Fulbright, Senator John Sparkman, Senator Bourke B. Hickenlooper, Senator Thruston B. Morton and Congressman Wayne L. Hays. They did not have to do this, but it was a gesture of good will to the family of nations to which we belong within the Commonwealth.

When the Commonwealth meeting was held here in Ottawa the following year, Senator Fulbright and Senator Muskie came. I remember particularly, with some gratification, the fact that while theretofore the American representatives were only allowed to participate in the debate on foreign affairs, on that occasion Senator Fulbright and Senator Muskie came to me as chairman of the congress and said, "Could we not get into the discussion at the committee stage?" On my own authority, without any hesitation, I said, "By all means", and they did. They made great contributions. It was the kind of thing that I think we were all glad to see done at that time. Unfortunately they could not attend the meeting at Uganda in 1967. However, on the eve of their national election, when the C.P.A. meeting was held in Nassau, in 1968, they sent Senator McIntyre, Senator Randolph, Senator Jordan and Senator Young for as many days as they could be there and still allow them to get back to vote.

These people are full of good will. They want to help create a climate in which not only public affairs but the affairs of the private sector of the society of both countries can be run in a way that will be conducive to the welfare of both countries. We for our part should do all we can to co-operate with them in this respect.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, I promise you that I will not detain you for long. As a member of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group, I spoke about its eleventh annual meeting when I addressed the Senate on September 25, 1968, as reported at page 128 of Hansard. At that time I expressed the feelings of my predecessors in this debate today, who have put more eloquently what I said at that time. I said then, and I still say, that much of the success was due to Senator Macnaughton and elder statesmen like Senator O'Leary (Carleton) and others who were on that delegation. They made a magnificent job of it. They have presented their case eloquently today in arguing what they feel about matters of this kind.

I would like the Senate to remember what I think they have forgotten, namely, that the full report of this committee was tabled by the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and is reported in Senate Hansard of November 12, 1968, and in the appendix thereto at page 514. I would hope that every member of this chamber would refer back to that and read it in full, in spite of the eloquence with which the matter was introduced today by Senator Macnaughton and those other honourable senators who followed him.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is suggested to me that I might make a comment on this matter at this time. I do so because I made a comment on the very excellent report we had from our representatives at the International Parliamentary Union. I feel I should extend the same kind of compliment to our representatives on the Canada-United States Parliamentary Group.

I have not been a member of the delegation to either Washington or the International Parliamentary Union. However, I have been on NATO delegations and on Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegations. I was pleased that Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) made the remarks he did, because we are all aware of the very important position he occupies, representing Canada in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. He happens to be not merely the representative of this Parliament, but the representative of all Canadian parliamentarians on the executive of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. He has also, of course, had considerable experience in the other associations.

I mention this because the impression I get is that over the years a degree of isolationism has developed between the activities of each of these groups. People tend to say that they are on the NATO group or the C.P.A. group, or that they are I.P.U. men or Canada-United States men. I agree entirely with the suggestion made by Senator O'Leary (Carleton), Senator Bourget and Senator Macnaughton that there is a place for some degree of continuity in the selection of personnel on these delegations. I have spoken to that before. I might say that I am on the executive of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, and there are definite arrangements by which this will be accomplished in the future, also of course by which there will be a continual input of new people and new ideas into those delegations. I would respectfully suggest to those who are interested in these other groups that the recently adopted constitution of the C.P.A. might be worth studying, because it deals specifically with the matter of selection.

We have, of course, now for the first time the Interparliamentary Relations Committee. I am told we may be the only parliament that has such an organization. It has a very important function in the operational management of delegations going from Canada and coming to Canada. However, it has occurred to me that it might be wise if those who are interested in these various important parliamentary groups got together and discussed whether there might not be some value in having a committee of parliamentarians set up to assist Mr. Imrie and his group. He works, of course, as a public servant, and his activities are therefore limited to matters that are referred to him from the various associations. I think that if a committee were made up of those who are particularly interested in the C.P.A., NATO, the Canada-United States Parliamentary Group and the I.P.U., the new union of French-speaking parliaments and others that are apparently coming along, there would be some value in their getting together and co-ordinating to some extent the activities of all these groups.

It is rather remarkable that in the capital of Canada we do not have a well-established foreign affairs club. In the United Kingdom

Parliament, as honourable senators know, each of the major parties has its own foreign affairs club, and there is also a parliamentary foreign affairs club and a foreign affairs club not directly attached to any one party.

Speaking on the IPU, I mentioned the fact of the comparative newness of most of these organizations in their present method of operation. We have heard today that the Canada-United States group dates back only 11 years. Again, it is an amazing thing that we have not had such a group earlier than this. However, the fact is that we have this group and these other groups functioning, and I am suggesting that some degree of co-ordination would be a logical next step for the development of the definitely growing interest in foreign affairs in Parliament and among Canadians generally.

I would like to pay a particular compliment to the Canada-U.S. group for their report, to which Senator Willis has just referred. I have read it carefully, and more than once. The format is almost ideal. The anonymity that is granted to speakers is obviously very useful. As one reads it one finds that "a member of the Canadian delegation suggested this", or a "member of the United States delegation took this view". Personally, I found it rather an intriguing game to try to put names to those mentioned throughout the report. I do not know how close I came to being accurate, but it was fun while it lasted. As I say, the format is an excellent one, because you get a report of views expressed, sometimes views in agreement, sometimes contrary, sometimes some statement of opinion on an important matter of Canada-U.S. relations. Then, quite often, there is a statement of a consensus, not on all matters, but quite often as I read the report a consensus appears to have been reached.

Again I make the point I made in connection with the IPU, that I wonder to what extent the message is being carried back to our governments. As far as I know, there is no mechanism. The report is here in the Senate proceedings, but as far as I know it has not in any way been formally called to the attention of those who have the ultimate responsibility for the conduct of our foreign affairs. This is something the Leader of the Government might care to give consideration to, that there might be a mechanism set up not only by which these formal reports, but also the informal reports, are carried back in a definitely arranged way to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister and perhaps others. It is obvious, if you read this report, that there were many things said that go beyond the report as we have it. From my own experience in other delegations it is those things that I have always felt would be most useful if they were carried back in definitive terms to those who have the ultimate responsibility in our foreign affairs.

It might also be helpful if we had some mechanism by which members of these delegations, when they come to Canada, could be given an opportunity to sit down with our ministers and some senior officials. This has been done in the C.P.A. It was done with our Caribbean parliamentarians, who met in closed session with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs—that is, closed to the press but not to Members of Parliament. There was an interesting exchange of views.

When the Australian parliamentarians were here the Leader of the Government, Senator Martin, met them in a similar closed session, and I have had interesting letters commenting most favourably on the frankness and thoroughness with which Senator Martin explained to them our views on some of the problems we have in common.

These are suggestions I throw out because I believe that in the short history of most of these associations we have come to a point where we should get together and plan more definitely for a more productive use of what goes on at these conferences.

Again, my compliments to Senator Macnaughton, as leader of the delegation, on his report and the skill with which he organized not merely the presentation of the report but the discussion of it that has taken place here today.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Mr. Martin moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

COMMITTEE MEETINGS—INQUIRY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, may I call the attention of the Leader of the Government to the fact that I have in my hand three notices of sittings of three different committees—each of which I am a member—for 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. They are the committees on Foreign Affairs, Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and Science Policy.

I ask the leader if it is not possible for us to make some kind of sensible arrangement for the sittings of our committees.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Grosart's point is well taken. As a matter of fact, at 5.30 this afternoon we are meeting with the chairmen of all standing committees and special committees to work out a rational schedule to avoid what Senator Grosart has just brought to our attention.

The fact is that we will now have a number of committees meeting in addition to the standing committees. If we are going to discharge our legislative responsibility and perform our committee work then I am sure we shall have to find some way of extending our sittings. In any event, we are going to meet at 5.30 this afternoon to deal with this problem.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, moved the third reading of Bill C-162, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the Estimates and the Revised Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, which was presented on Thursday, February 6, 1969.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the hour is late, but I think I can say in five minutes what I have to say in order to start the ball rolling on the debate on the report of the Finance Committee. The report was printed as an appendix to Senate Hansard on Thursday last. It speaks for itself as it is largely factual, and therefore my remarks can be brief.

In the first place, the report gives the record of the rapid increase that has taken place, and continues to take place, in Government expenditures. It can be seen from the table attached to the report that for some years the annual increase from one year to another did not exceed 8.3 per cent, and that the average annual increase over a period was less than 6 per cent.

In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1967, there was a jump of 13.7 per cent over the preceding year. In the next year the increase was 14.2 per cent, and for this current fiscal year and the one to follow I think we can anticipate annual increases approximating 10 per cent. So, we have had four successive years that, compared with previous years, have shown very decided increases in expenditures. It took us 90 years from the time of Confederation to reach the point where the federal Government's expenditures were running to over $6 billion a year. In ten years we have more than doubled that figure. No one can help but be deeply concerned by this great increase in Government spending.

In saying this, in fairness, it must be pointed out that there are some explanations and justifications for a good deal of the increase. In the first place, one must concede that a substantial portion of the increase is due to the contributions the federal Government is making to the provincial and municipal governments to help them discharge their constitutional responsibilities. The report points out, for example, that the federal contribution for post-secondary education has risen from $40 million in 1965-66 to $500 million in the current fiscal year.

In the second place, one must concede that a proportion of the increase is inevitable because of increasing population, and because of the inflation in prices which Canada, along with other countries, has been experiencing.

In the third place, one must concede that to a large extent the increased expenditures are justified on social grounds as being money spent for objectives which make for a better standard of living, particularly for those in Canada who need it, for improved education, for health, and for other praiseworthy and desirable objectives, which we in this chamber have supported and, indeed, for which we have voted.

But, having conceded these desirable objectives, this rationalization, if you will call it such, of the increased expenditures, it is still my opinion that we are paying too high a price for what we are getting.

I am not thinking purely in terms of the price in taxes, although that is pertinent, but also of the economic price we are paying. The economic price we are paying is that of inflation, the deteriorating value of the dollar through steady increases in costs and prices—and Government spending is a very potent factor in the upward pressure on costs and prices. Inflation is, of course, an indirect form of sales tax. We get less and less for the dollars we spend, and it is not a fair kind of tax. It weighs more heavily on those less able to bear it, those people with fixed incomes, pensioners, and those in lower level of earnings.

As our costs and prices go up we place ourselves in a less competitive position in the all-important market places of the world, when we are so dependent upon export trade for the maintenance of employment and stability in Canada.

It is no answer to say that provincial and municipal expenditures are increasing at an even faster rate than those of the federal Government. The prime responsibility for the economic health of the country rests on the shoulders of the federal Government, and it is to that Government we must look for the measures to reduce the pressures on costs and prices.

I conclude my remarks on this part of the report by quoting the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Louis Rasminsky who, as reported by the Globe and Mail of February 4, in an address to bankers in London, England, last week said:

> The most important immediate objective of economic policy in many countries, from both the domestic and the external point of view, is to break the inflationary expectations that exist and to restore respect for the value of money.

The report of the Finance Committee goes on to deal with the method of contributions by the federal Government to provincial governments for shared-cost programs, and points out that the open-end sharing of costs puts the federal Government in the position that the amount of its contribution is in effect determined by the province. This kind of program was largely responsible for the increase in expenditures between the original estimates of 1968-69 and the revised Estimates. It seems to me to be a partial abdication of the federal Government's financial responsibility, and that in lieu of this type of cost-sharing program it would be preferable that the federal contribution should have some limit to it, as for example was done in the case of the Health Resources Fund where there is a total fund of $500 million but an annual limit of approximately $37 million.

I do not propose at this time to speak on other aspects of the report. I know there are other honourable senators who would like to speak on it. I simply commend it for your usual earnest consideration and attention.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 13, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

13 February 1969

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 13th February, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your Obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, as I indicated earlier to the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn), I think I should say something about the Constitutional Conference which concluded yesterday.

The Constitutional Conference held on February 5, 1968, began a task of historic importance. At that time the federal and provincial governments agreed to undertake a review of the Constitution of Canada. This was the purpose of the Conference which concluded yesterday.

The areas requiring careful consideration established by the two Conferences were official languages, fundamental rights, the distribution of powers, which includes the spending power, the reform of institutions linked with federalism, including the Supreme Court of Canada and the Senate, regional disparities, the amending procedure and provisional arrangements, and the mechanism of federal-provincial relations.

The federal Government has taken the position that a sound constitution is a finely balanced instrument whose parts must be carefully interrelated. It takes the position that to change one part or a few parts without regard to the rest could do irreparable harm. That is why the Prime Minister said yesterday that any changes, including any changes in the Supreme Court or in the Senate, or in any other feature of the Constitution, must be part of a package deal involving a global review of the Constitution. There must be a comprehensive review before any final decisions are taken.

The position papers before the Conference were intended, as most of them indicated, as suggestions for discussion purposes and not as draft articles of a constitution. Undoubtedly, many proposals put forward will require modification. It is for this reason that the federal Government has noted that its tentative proposals, while careful and serious, are not to be regarded as final. In the position paper the federal Government has stated that it may, indeed, wish to modify many of them as discussions with the provincial governments continue and as understanding deepens of the problems for which the Constitution must make provision.

The major objective that has been agreed on is a comprehensive review of the Constitution of Canada. This is a very comprehensive document. Obviously, in any comprehensive review an institution as important as the Senate must come under the most careful consideration.

In the consensus of the second session of the Constitutional Conference, it is made quite clear that any reform of the Senate must be considered in the context of other matters related to the basic principles, structure and powers of Government in Canada. In other words, nothing is committed in relation to it except as a "package" in which the federal Government is satisfied that the total constitutional arrangement is satisfactory.

No principles or proposals have been decided upon. All that has been agreed is that a committee of ministers should study possible constitutional provisions relating to the reform of the Senate. Obviously, such study must take place.

The considerations listed did not commit the federal Government or direct the commitee. It is told to take account in particular of certain considerations, namely, the briefs that have been presented by the various governments. These are to serve as a basis for discussion of matters to be taken into account.

The suggested considerations are all the kinds of factors that might be expected, if one is of the view, as I am and as the Government is, that the Senate is an important institution of Parliament and must continue to be important in the Canada of tomorrow.

I simply would like to say that there should be no hesitation on the part of this house to address itself to these problems. I think it was Senator Thorvaldson who said the other day that this was implicit; and, of course, it is, not only before any decisions are taken but as part of the Senate's right to discuss matters of concern to the institutions of Government of this country—a right that, in the same context, belongs, of course, to the other House of Parliament. Certainly, as the Prime Minister has indicated, there would be no desire to proceed with any reform, if such should ensue, without ample consultation with the Senate and without giving the Senate a chance to express its views.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand there is in fact nothing formal before the house for debate. However, the Government Leader has considered that he should make a statement as to the Federal-Provincial Conference that has taken place recently. Therefore, although there is nothing before the house at the moment, I think honourable senators, should be allowed to ask questions, if they wish to do so. I am sure honourable senators will agree to that course of action.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, in the absence of our Leader I wish to express my agreement with what has been said by the Leader of the Government.

It was thought at one time when we heard rumours about proposed reforms of the Senate that we should get together and call a caucus of all senators independently of their political affiliations. I think that such action would have been a little too hasty. I have no doubt, as explained by the leader, that if and when reforms are suggested for this chamber we will be consulted and we will be made fully aware of those proposed reforms. The time will come when we will get together and discuss those proposed reforms. Any other action that we might have been tempted to take would have been premature. I think we should not be too hasty; we should wait until we are told—and it may take years—what reforms are being proposed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Will there be a printed report of the proceedings prepared and distributed?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, I will table the report.

While I am on my feet in response to the question, may I say that we marked last evening the 35th year of membership in this house of Senator Aseltine. I would like this record to note the fact that the senators took occasion to honour him for his distinguished service in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, first, I wish to thank the Government Leader for the assurance he has given us that the suggestions that have been made in the White Paper are only suggestions and not declarations of Government policy. They are simply suggestions that we and others may discuss very fully. My friend across the aisle, Senator Choquette, has suggested that we can wait until the actual proposals are before us. Well, honourable senators, I am a little more concerned about what is in the air, and I do not propose to wait to express my views with regard to some of them until certain minds are made up and programs arranged and perhaps deals made that involve the Senate before we know anything about it, and we find ourselves in a box and in a mess.

Now there are two proposals in that White Paper which concern me greatly, as they do all my fellow members of this chamber. I have already expressed my opinion with regard to the first one, and that is the allowing of someone who is not federal to nominate or actually make appointments to this house. In the very short statement that I made not very long since I expressed my concern about that and pointed out that the harmony and co-operation that have existed between this chamber and the Commons have been due to the fact that we are all federal in this house and are all concerned with the welfare of Canada as a whole. None of us are representative of some politician somewhere about the country, but all of us are working together, irrespective of party, in the interests of Canada as a whole. I made that as clear as I could just a few days ago, and I need not repeat it.

The other proposal in the White Paper is that the term of senators who will be appointed in the future shall be six years or some other such term, with the possibility of reappointment.

Honourable senators, the usefulness of this body, its strength, its self-respect and usefulness has depended upon our independence. I have sometimes thought that one of the reasons for the seeming unpopularity of the Senate in some quarters was due to the fact that we cannot be reached. There are only two or perhaps three in this whole chamber who hold their position by virtue of the favour of the Government of the day. The rest of us have nothing to hope for and nothing to fear. That has been the strength of the Senate. Lose that independence, gentlemen, and the Senate is not worth a five-cent piece.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It would not be worth a five-cent piece. Just suppose each one of us sitting here has a term of five or six years, or some other term, and then we are out, but with the possibility of re-appointment, providing we are good boys—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Or girls.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, if we are good boys and good girls, we might effect reappointment. Do not forget that the senator who devotes his energies, time and thoughts to the work of the Senate, say, for a five-year period will probably have lost most or all of the business that he had developed in his earlier days. If he is a lawyer, he has lost his clients; if he is a doctor, he has lost his patients—or most of them; if he is in business, he has probably changed the order of the day with him. So he must have some concern as to his future, after spending five years here in the service of his country, when he knows that that service is to be cut off and he will be left adrift to find some other occupation. It may not be a financial problem with him: men do not live by bread alone. Frequently they live by activities which are almost as important as bread itself. He must concern himself with the problem of the course into which he will direct his talents, thoughts, energies, time and enterprise in the years that follow the five-year term. Of course, one of the nicest solutions would be to have another term.

So, for the first time in a hundred years the senators can be reached from abroad, from outside this house, and what I have said about the independence of the Senate applies in a very practical way. Hold that herring before our noses during those five years and, my friends, the one great virtue of this chamber will be destroyed. It will be no longer the Senate. The ordinary senator in those circumstances would be no different from a civil servant with a five-year contract, with a hope that at the close of those five years his employment will be renewed. It would be deadly so far as we are concerned as legislators, as representatives of Canada as a whole, to find ourselves in the power of other people, whether they be the Government or anybody else, and to find our term of office and our status in the community in the hands of someone who could not have an outlook and purpose such as ours.

I want it understood that I have objected to this proposal, not because it concerns me so very much. I was fortunate enough to be appointed before the age limit was put into effect. The powers-that-be were considerate in not applying the age limitation to those who had been appointed for the period of their natural lives. So far as I am personally concerned, I have nothing to fear. I have had a long, long period in public life—

Hon. Mr. Martin: And a distinguished one.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Thank you. It has been a long period, and a very happy one.

I am not talking for myself at all. But, honourable senators, I am concerned that anyone would even suggest such things as are to be found in the White Paper, such as the bringing in of representatives of the provincial politicians and seating them here amongst ourselves, and perhaps giving them a majority in this house and the power to say to the Government: "Unless you give us some money we will not pass your legislation", or something of that kind. It could be disastrous. Just fancy, what might be done by a filibuster. Not only would there be a possibility of destroying the Senate, but there would be a possibility of destroying Parliament itself.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Then, picture again a roomful of senators such as you and me subject to some person who will tell us whether we continue as senators or whether we do not, and holding us by the scruff of the neck. That will not do. That is not the Senate that the Fathers of Confederation envisioned one hundred years ago, and to which they gave an independence that prevented the Government of the day from swamping the Senate, as the House of Lords could be swamped by the appointment of new Lords in order to ensure the passage through that house of some bill. That occurred before the time of the Fathers of Confederation. They were aware of it and they provided that there should be so many senators and no more, with a provision for an added six. The putting of ourselves in the embarrassing position suggested would be sufficient to destroy us.

Those are my two contributions, and I hope that others will follow me at once. Let us make it thoroughly known how we feel about suggestions of that kind, and let us not wait until it is too late.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I am delighted to hear the dean of the Senate speak in the way he has. He has no axe to grind and nothing to gain. He is speaking from conscience and a sense of duty.

I am very happy to learn from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he too understands the problems of the Senate. It is a great pity to me that he did not say so on Thursday last before these recommendations went before the conference of federal and provincial ministers. It is shocking to think that without any consultation with us, without any consultation with his own caucus, without letting anybody talk to him or getting the views of the Senate, this matter should have gone into a White Paper, as it did, before this conference.

The most important point of all is that we are not going to be lackeys of the Prime Minister, whoever he might be, Conservative or Liberal! The proposal that any senator from now on will have a six-year term, with, to use the words of the White Paper, the possibility of renewal, will make lackeys of us all. Imagine that, if you will! We would sit here and have our terms renewed only if we are satisfactory to the government of the day. In other words, if we are good boys, if we do what is wanted, if we vote right, then there is a possibility of getting six more years of office. This is a shocking proposal. A review of the dictatorships that have grown up around the world will reveal that such stipulations as those have brought about the downfall of the peoples' parliaments, the peoples' upper and lower houses, and made them absolutely futile so that in time the dictators took over. That is the first point.

To give us as an alternative, to hold out to us as a carrot, from which we can find some consolation, the proposal that we will be the great body, not to appoint the judges of the Supreme Court, but to approve the nominations of the judges of the Supreme Court, is ridiculous. How ridiculous it would be to keep a body of a hundred men and women so that when the government of the day nominates a judge of the Supreme Court—something that might happen once every five, seven or ten years, because there are only nine and it is not contemplated to increase the number—we would sit here in our wisdom, and have this great honour bestowed on us! This is the extra power we are getting because of the emasculation contemplated for us—that we should have the opportunity to approve the nomination of the government of the day of a judge of the Supreme Court. How happy we should be! What a wonderful, wonderful opportunity!

Hon. Mr. Choquette: And ambassadors too.

Hon. Mr. Walker: And the ambassadors. What an important thing that is! We are not to have anything to do with the nominations. We can only give approval; I suppose if we disapproved, they might be able to bring forward somebody else. They might appoint my friend the honourable Senator Beaubien as an ambassador. What a great honour it would be to have this extra power bestowed upon us! It is futile.

These are meandering, futile powers, silly things. How simple do they think the people of Canada are? How ridiculous it is for them to produce these offers of special powers which in themselves are no powers at all.

Then they go on to say that we too can have a very important role in any linguistic bills which come before the house. How silly! How many linguistic bills are to come before the house? I hope there will be only one, the one that was before the conference and is before Parliament at the present time, and to me that will be the end of it. What good does that do us? What good does that do the people of Canada? Why do they hold out these carrots, which are really not carrots at all but just frustrating enterprises to amuse us?

What was the other thing? We would have something to say about cultural matters. Why, we will be the laughing stock of the people of Canada if we submit to such ridiculous new powers as are contemplated for us.

I come to a very important question, namely, the power of the Senate, which has been used for the last hundred years as no other power has been used before, regardless of the feelings for power or for opposition. When it has come to a matter of deciding on bills from the House of Commons, we have acted in fairness and in equity. Now, to cut off that power, to emasculate this house, and to make us a worthless body by taking away the power which would enable us to stop some of the intransigent, wild and futile efforts of the House of Commons, as it may be in the future, to bring about the passing of some piece of legislation, is a very dangerous thing.

We are proud to be, in spite of Senator Stanbury, a house of sober second thought. To say that the Senate is not a democratic house is ridiculous. We are appointed by the government of the day just as the Supreme Court and the head of the C.B.C. is appointed by the government of the day. All the great powers of this country are headed by men who have been appointed by the government of the day, just as we are. To cut off that power and say, "Oh, no, that is not democratic," as Senator Stanbury, the great oracle for the Prime Minister, said to us two weeks ago, is a shocking thing to contemplate. If we had been wrong, or if we had been living in the nineteenth century or had done anything in the legislation of this country which could be criticized, then I could understand this, but to say that some theory has to be carried out, based on the idea that this house is not democratic because we are not elected by the people, and that our powers should be completely thwarted, is a shocking thing.

I ask you to go over the past 100 years, to contemplate the work of the Senate and what we have accomplished, the amendments we have made to the House of Commons bills and the very few times when we have refused a bill. I was a member of the Cabinet of the Diefenbaker Government when this Senate did refuse one of the Government bills. We did not bring it up again. That is where it lay. They used what was sober second thought. Whether it was right or wrong, it was accepted by us. When you think of the amendments that this house has made over the years and how they have been greeted with enthusiasm by the other house, you can understand why still we meet the members and hear them say that they know that a bill emanating in the Senate has had a thorough review. If the Senate has approved of it and has passed it, they say it must be all right. When a government bill comes to us from the House of Commons and we amend it once, twice or three times—usually under the very capable and brilliant leadership of Senator Hayden, because all bills seem to go to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—it goes back to the House of Commons, and they say that the Senate has amended it after looking at it seriously, and usually they find it is all right.

Then I ask why, in the name of heaven, should they now emasculate the Senate and stop our veto which has always been in the interests of the people and of the House of Commons? Instead of having that veto they would simply give us a power of postponement and add to us these phony powers of approving of the Prime Minister's choice for members of the Supreme Court and members of the diplomatic corps.

Honourable senators, it was a pleasure to hear my friend, with whom I very seldom agree, but in the wisdom of his age, and as the dean of the Senate, he has served us today, as my friend Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, did a week ago, in upholding the rights of this body. I suggest to the Government of the day that this mad farce with which the honourable Leader of the Senate appeared to be in agreement is wrong. May we have an end to all this nonsense and return to the strict course of propriety and what is right in the interests of the Canadian people.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to say that I find myself in complete agreement with what Senator Roebuck said a few minutes ago. I think that a six-year term could only be accepted by people approaching retirement age. If you want younger appointees, they would have to be found among that section of the population rich enough to have a private income and independent means of support. I do not think that would be a representative cross-section of the Canadian people, and I doubt very much if the people of Canada would like it.

My purpose in rising is merely to ask a question of the Government Leader. Would the leader consider sending the White Paper to the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs so that we could have hearings on it and go into the proposals more thoroughly than we can do by just debating it in this chamber.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Before the leader answers, I wonder if I may intervene. First of all, a week ago I was rather concerned about a certain tabling that took place in the Senate. I do not know whether it is attributable to my Irish background, but in any event I was disturbed by the occurrence at that time.

Now, in fairness, I think I should say that what the leader has done today has gone a great distance along the way to correct the situation about which I was complaining and about which other senators complained. We are not concerned really about ourselves, but we are concerned about our institution—I shall only paraphrase Senator Roebuck when I describe it—an essential to the proper functioning of Parliament.

Senator Carter has asked a question of the leader. I would like to suggest that on Tuesday, February 25, there be an item on our Order Paper dealing with the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate. If honourable senators will look at that report they will see therein a reference to a proposed inquiry on this very point. I am sure that I would have the endorsement of all honourable senators in what I now suggest.

I think that to attempt to debate a subject of such wide ramifications as this one, off the cuff at this time, would not be in the best interests of the Senate or of Parliament and I would prefer that the debate go on the basis of the opportunity presented by the report of the Committee on Rules. In that way mature consideration can be given by many senators to this very problem.

I think it would help not only the Government of the day and the ministers concerned, but it would help the committees of ministers which the leader has said will be dealing with this problem in the course of time, as the result of the Constitutional conference.

Hon. Paul Martin: In answer to the question of Senator Carter, I certainly think that that would be a normal thing to do. In fact, two weeks ago in this house I indicated very clearly—and Senator Connolly has just repeated it—that when debating the report of the Rules Committee, members should not hesitate to express any views they might have about these propositions which have been put forward by various governments as a basis for discussion. There is no reason why the Senate should not discuss them. As Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has said, that would be a good occasion. It certainly would not be outside our powers—no more than it would be outside the powers of the other house to have this matter considered—say, before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as Senator Carter proposed. I am sure that there is going to be a dialogue in both houses of Parliament and in the country before these matters are finally decided on.

When the Committee of Ministers deals with this matter, whenever that will be, their examination will take place in the light of a complete revision of the Constitution, not one part of it. Then it would have to come back here, if there were such a proposal, for approval by Parliament. I certainly do not take issue with the suggestion that in this free deliberative body, there should be an opportunity to discuss these matters, now, later, in committee, or in full session—that is the nature of this Senate.

Honourable senators, I want to deal with one other aspect. The Prime Minister has also dealt with it. It was mentioned by Senator Walker. I can only reply in the position of a member of the Government in this house, by saying what the Prime Minister said. He said:

> I was not in a position, of course, to spell out in detail what propositions we were making, because they were considered confidential.

If it was not possible for the Prime Minister, it certainly was not possible for any member of his Government. This is the case because of the responsibility of a Privy Councillor in the matter of cabinet responsibility.

I would also add what I said a moment ago in my statement in chief, that the Prime Minister likewise said:

> I see no desirability in proceeding with such a reform without ample consultation with the Senate and without giving the Senate ample opportunities to express its views on the subject.

That is the situation. There is no finality in this matter. The Committee of Ministers will consider it in the light of the global review, and in the meantime there is nothing to prevent a free parliament from discussing it. No one has suggested anything different.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, might I make a request to the Leader of the Government? In his opening statement today, discussing what might happen to us, he spoke of the Senate being included in a package deal with the Supreme Court of Canada, and he used the words, "We are an important institution."

Honourable senators, surely that description is a down-grading of the Senate's position. We are not only an important institution: we are Parliament, we are an integral part of Parliament. When you start discussing reform of the Senate, you are actually discussing reform of the structure of Parliament itself.

The Supreme Court of Canada certainly is an important institution, but the Supreme Court of Canada is a creature of this Parliament. To put the Senate in the same package deal, merely as an important institution, is I think a bit of unfortunate terminology. I suggest to you, sir, that this should not be permitted to go out to the public tomorrow in that form, nor should it appear in Hansard in that form.

We were here—some people forget this—the Senate of Canada was appointed and its members named before the House of Commons was even elected. We are Parliament.

I am under no illusions as to what some of the public think. What they were hoping for was not reform of the Senate but castration of the Senate, and castration of the Senate will come if there is followed things pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Toronto.

Senate reform! They are changing the structure of Parliament itself, and to say that this is part of a package deal, that we are in the position of the Supreme Court of Canada, is to put the position falsely.

Honourable senators, I am astonished often to see the press and to see even official documents in this house speak of "members of Parliament and senators". Honourable senators, there is no such thing as "members of Parliament and senators"—we are all members of Parliament, because this is Parliament.

I myself object to the Leader of this house, who is usually very careful in his use of words, and who certainly knows their meaning, downgrading this Senate by merely calling it an important institution, one which is to be put in a package of reform with the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think my honourable friend—who, I know, is a fairminded individual—misunderstood what I said. I did not say that the Supreme Court of Canada had a priority in importance—

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I did not say that, either. No, no, excuse me.

Hon. Mr. Martin: —over one of the Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): No, no. You said this was an important institution.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, I did; and it is an important institution. What I said was this, that the Government of Canada had agreed with the provinces at the conference to refer to ministers for consideration this whole matter, but that the Government of Canada took the position that it was not going to deal with one aspect only in a total revision of the Constitution of Canada. If there were to be any finality in respect of any one of the matters involved in the Constitution of Canada, it would have to be as part of a package which touched the bill of rights, the spending power, the division of powers between federal and provincial governments, all involved in the total revision of the Constitution—that we were not going to deal separately with one subject matter. For instance, we were not going to let this Senate be dealt with alone. We would deal with it only if there was agreement within the terms of a global revision of the Constitution. In the Government White Paper, let me repeat what the Government said:

> This decision of the Conference made possible two approaches to the review of the Constitution. One would involve separate consideration of particular areas of the Constitution where urgent problems have appeared. The other approach would involve a general and comprehensive review, commencing with the objectives and principles of the Constitution and proceeding systematically through all its other aspects. The Government of Canada has favoured the latter approach because it appeared to offer the best opportunity for success.
> A sound Constitution is a finely balanced instrument—

And this is part of my statement of today.

> —whose parts must be carefully interrelated. To change one part or a few parts without regard to the rest could do irreparable harm. While it may be necessary to consider, provisionally, some parts of the Constitution before others, a comprehensive review should be effected before any final decisions are taken.

That is what I was referring to when I mentioned the Supreme Court of Canada.

> The Government of Canada has therefore endeavoured to develop a provisional position on certain areas of the Constitution within the framework of a total review. We have submitted proposals on those areas which we think require discussion first.

That is the stage we are now in.

> ...and these have been placed before the Continuing Committee... These proposals...are intended as suggestions for discussion purposes and not as draft articles of a constitution... While the proposals are therefore careful and serious, they are not to be regarded as final.
> The Government may indeed wish to modify many of them as discussions with the provincial governments continue and as understanding deepens of the problems for which the Constitution must make provision.

Are we to take the position that in a review of the Constitution we should not discuss powers of one house, the powers of another, the powers of the Supreme Court? Of course we are free to debate these matters. That is all we were suggesting. There is no question of belittling one institution as against another.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): With great respect, I was not objecting to anything in the White Paper. I read it and tried to digest it. I do not agree with all of it, but that is not what I was discussing. I was merely objecting to or questioning the use by the leader of the words, "this is an important institution".

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): And I do suggest that if you are going to discuss the Senate you should discuss Parliament. I say this with all sincerity. If you let it go out to the country or put it on Hansard that we merely regard ourselves as an important institution, then to my mind that is the wrong terminology and it creates confusion in the minds of the public.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Of course I agree that it is an important institution of Parliament.

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, may I say that, following an Order of the house yesterday, the fourth report of the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate will come before us for discussion on February 25. I understand that nearly 15 honourable senators have already spoken on the rules. However, in view of possible developments following the Federal-Provincial Conference, I am sure that some of those honourable senators who have already spoken may wish to speak again. With leave of the house, any honourable senator who wishes to speak again will have the opportunity to do so. If this is agreeable, we will proceed now with the Orders of the Day.

THE SENATE

RADIO BROADCAST—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

On Tuesday morning last I turned on my car radio at the CBL Toronto station and tuned into an interview being conducted by a man by the name of Gerussi, who I gather carries a regular morning program on the CBLT radio station. The interview was being conducted with a woman by the name of Worth, who I understand is a reporter here in Ottawa. The subject of the interview was the Senate, and if I call this woman's remarks slanderous in name, untruthful and contemptuous, I underestimate them. They exhibited a profound ignorance of the institution; but, more than that, the purpose of her remarks was to downgrade the institution to an extent that it would be vulnerable and be held up to hatred, contempt and ridicule in the minds of the public. If such remarks were made about a member of the public, that woman would be before the court within 24 hours.

I wonder, honourable senators, if we should not consider our question of privilege with regard to matters like this in respect of the press, radio and television. We have a bar down at the end of our house, too. If these people are to make allegations untruthfully via the news media, let them repeat their remarks inside this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he will please procure from the C.B.C. the text of this interview conducted last Tuesday morning on CBL Toronto, between a man called Gerussi and a Mrs. Worth, and table the text of that interview here so that we may examine it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will be glad to do that.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Copies of correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and provincial Premiers, dated between November 15, 1968 and February 5, 1969, and copies of correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and the Premiers of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, dated between February 1 and February 6, 1969, with respect to the Federal-Provincial Constitutional Conference.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: May I ask if this will be part of Hansard?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It has just been tabled.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: How do we get at it?

Hon. Mr. Martin: All one has to do is go to the Table. These documents are available to all of us.

Hon. Mr. Hollett: We will have to queue up to get it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I will see that my friend gets copies of the documents in question.

(Also tabled were:)

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, February 12, 1969, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, Chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move, seconded by honourable Senator McDonald, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until February 25, 1969, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The purpose of meeting in the evening rather than the afternoon is to permit the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to have its meeting on Tuesday. Possibly it will meet in the morning and continue later in the day. There is also the possibility of another committee meeting that day. I may say that we met with the chairmen of the various committees yesterday, including the standing committees and special committees. The purpose of the meeting was to try to ration the work of the committees. Those who criticize the Senate will perhaps be interested to find out that we have not only standing committees but special committees sitting to the point where it is difficult for all of these committees to discharge their work. Therefore, an effort has been made, as a result of the meeting yesterday, to try to rationalize the schedule. Senator Thorvaldson, who was there yesterday, will, I am sure, agree with me that we did make some progress in this matter, and I hope that we will be able to regularize the work as a result of our meeting.

Senator Lamontagne has asked me to say that it will not be possible for his Science Policy committee to hold sessions next week, one of the reasons being the very problem of trying to get enough time for all the committees to meet in order to discharge their respective duties. I hope that no one will say that because we are not meeting in this house on Tuesday afternoon the Senate is not working. The Senate will be working in important committees.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING ADJOURNMENTS

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, with leave, I move, seconded by Senator Langlois, that the Standing Senate Committees on Foreign Affairs and Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

The reason this motion is presented today is, as the Leader of the Government has outlined, that when the Senate is in recess, the two committees which propose to sit on Tuesdays, one in the morning and one in the afternoon, would have no power to sit. Therefore, we are giving them the right to sit during adjournments. This will mean that they can sit on Tuesday morning and afternoon, February 25.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON APPROPRIATE MATTERS

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report to the Senate from time to time on any matter relating to Legal and Constitutional Affairs generally, and on any matter assigned to the said Committee by the Rules of the Senate, and

That the said Committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the foregoing purposes, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the Committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, in such amounts as the Committee may determine.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO INQUIRE INTO TRANSPORTATION AND HANDLING OF PRAIRIE GRAIN

Hon. Hazen Argue, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to consider the causes of the recent grain transportation and grain handling difficulties on the Prairies and on the West Coast, particularly the causes of the deficiency in suitable grades of wheat in export position, the remedies that may be implemented which insofar as possible will prevent the recurrence of such difficulties in the future, to consider any other problems associated with production, grading, storage, transportation and sale of Western Canadian grain to which the committee may wish to direct its attention, and with power to make such recommendations with regard to any of these questions that, in the opinion of the committee, may be of assistance to the grain industry.

He said: I have been encouraged to put this motion before the Senate because of the comments of a number of honourable senators the other evening when we were discussing the bill dealing with cash advances for the purpose of drying damp grain. At that time it was suggested that such an inquiry might serve a useful purpose. Consequently, I checked with a number of senators, including the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn), and all have supported the idea that this work should be done.

When it came to consideration of the question as to which committee could best handle this work, I considered that the Committee on Transport and Communications would be the appropriate one. I have had discussions with the distinguished chairman of the committee, honourable Senator Thorvaldson, who is willing to have this placed before the committee for study. It seemed to me that it would be preferable to have this work done by a standing committee rather than by a special committee because I think we can get far too many committees, and if we were to get too many, we would not be able to function. It has been suggested that this matter should be discussed at the regular meeting on February 27.

I have endeavoured in my own way as a farmer to draw up a motion to cover the subjects outlined, the question of transportation difficulties, the question of having suitable grades of grain available for export sales at any given time, and I have also included a general section wherein the committee itself, if it seems desirable, might undertake further inquiries dealing with the grain situation as suggested by Senator McDonald, such as licensing production of new varieties, appropriate standards of grading and so on. The committee will govern its own affairs and range as far as it may wish in the conduct of this inquiry.

I am fully convinced that the people on the Prairies and all those associated with the grain industry, and particularly the farmers, would welcome an indication that the Senate is concerned with and is looking into their problems and may perhaps come forward with some proposals which will help solve some of these very difficult problems. I think this kind of inquiry being undertaken by one of the standing committees of the Senate of Canada can perform a very useful function and will be very much welcomed by the agricultural producers of Canada.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow moved the third reading of Bill S-28, to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, moved the third reading of Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hedard Robichaud moved the second reading of Bill C-148, to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-148, which is now before us for second reading, is intituled "An Act to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation." Its short title is cited as the "Freshwater Fish Marketing Act." The purpose of this bill is to establish a board which would take the form of a crown corporation for the purpose of marketing freshwater fish produced in the Prairie provinces, the Northwest Territories and northwestern Ontario. The board will have the responsibility of buying the catch direct from the fishermen and selling the processed fish and fish products for export and to domestic processors and distributors.

Following an agreement with the provinces involved, this corporation would therefore be given powers and responsibilities in interprovincial and export trade, while it will receive, under provincial legislation, parallel powers and responsibilities to trade within the participating provinces and the Northwest Territories.

While this corporation will conduct its operations on a self-sustaining financial basis, it will be financed by bank loans with Government guarantee or by direct loans made to the corporation. It will receive a grant of $100,000 for initial operating and establishment expenses but, as I have just stated, the bill clearly specifies that the corporation shall conduct its operations on a self-sustaining financial basis, without appropriations by Parliament. This is specified in clause 17 of the bill.

In summary, the purpose and objectives of this bill are to establish more orderly marketing for the benefit of the whole freshwater fishery, thus achieving higher and more stable prices for the catch. It is hoped to provide the fisherman with a better share of the market value of his fish while, at the same time, expanding total sales and overall production in the fishery.

This legislation is being brought forward by the Government in response to requests on the part of the provinces concerned for assistance in dealing with the serious problems confronting this large sector of the inland freshwater fishery. In the past there have been introduced within the provinces and at the federal level a number of programs such as price support, grants and others, directed to improving existing conditions within the industry. Notwithstanding the application or implementation of such programs, it was felt in the provinces and the Territories concerned that the results were not satisfactory, mainly due to the lack of orderly marketing.

Following agreement reached in the Federal-Provincial Conference on Fisheries Development held in Ottawa in January 1964—which was the first such conference in Canadian history, and which I had the pleasure to convene as Minister of Fisheries at the time—the state of the Canadian inland fishery became the subject of continuing attention on the part of the federal-provincial committee of officials. Such studies led to the appointment, in 1965, of the McIvor Commission of Inquiry into Freshwater Fish Marketing, to investigate and report on the marketing problems of the freshwater fish industry.

The governments of the provinces involved had been pressing for some time for the establishment of a freshwater fish marketing board. The province mainly involved, that of Manitoba—where some 40 per cent of the production at present originates—was among those strongly insisting on the establishment of such a board or corporation.

The commission in its report, while agreeing to establish an export monopoly, also strongly emphasized the need for buying fish directly from the fishermen and for direct transfer to the fishermen of any increased export earnings in order to increase their incomes and stabilize their economic condition. It was already too evident that Canadian exporters were receiving too small a share of the price paid by the consumer, even though they were bearing the cost of trading risks.

The commission, while recommending some concentration of processing operations and the streamlining of the flow of products to market, strongly urged that in addition special attention be given to improving the quality of the product in order to increase its value, reduce risks of loss and gain wider consumer acceptance.

This Canadian inland fishery is located in the geographic centre of a crescent-shaped region extending from Lake Ontario to Great Bear Lake, containing some 20 per cent or more of the world's fresh water. While this industry is in urgent need of improving facilities or providing new capacities, it is so located that the harvesting of fish can be more adequately susceptible to scientific management than in the ocean fishery. It consists of an average yearly landing of approximately 75 million pounds, with an approximate annual value to the fishermen of $8.5 million. The main species are: whitefish, lake trout, pickerel, pike and sauger. Approximately 70 per cent of the total catch is exported, particularly to the United States, for an annual marketed value of $13 million. It affects the livelihood of some 6,000 to 7,000 fishermen, a large proportion of these being Indians and Metis. There seems to be no doubt that the resource possibilities of these freshwater fish areas, on a sustained and controlled yield basis, are far greater than present exploitation.

The main objective of the proposed legislation is to create a new environment for this fishery, making it more attractive to capital investment while, at the same time, raising the income levels of fishermen concerned. While providing, in its initial stage, a self-sustaining economic base for growth, this industry will undoubtedly require the support of related provincial and federal programs in the fields of education, manpower training, research, re-equipment and financing.

Provisions are made in this bill to meet the need for collaboration between provinces and for use of federal powers, particularly in the regulation of interprovincial and export trade. The agency created under this legislation will be in the form of a corporate organization with necessary federal powers to undertake functions and responsibilities on behalf of interested provinces under related provincial legislation.

May I point out in passing that the responsibility for the administration of fisheries in these provinces is delegated, under the Fisheries Act, to provincial ministers. This is a situation altogether different from that existing in British Columbia and in the Atlantic provinces. These provincial governments have the responsibility for the licensing of fishermen, for recommending and enforcing regulations for conservation purposes, and, having a general economic interest in their fisheries, have agreed to participate in the direction of the agency.

It is not intended that this corporation should duplicate existing facilities of the industry. It should provide orderly marketing which will be planned in consultation with the trade acting as agents of the corporation. The corporation should assist the industry in planning new investment in the processing, refrigerated storage, packaging, and transportation fields. It will be asked to expand markets abroad, in European countries as well as in the United States, and particularly to increase consumption in Canada. It will follow the proposal of the McIvor Commission in establishing initial prices for each species by grade at the opening of each season, thus making payment for the catch on the basis of these initial prices throughout the season. At the conclusion of each season, the fishermen will be distributed a final payment consisting of any additional earnings obtained through the marketing of the catch. The corporation will be in a position to extend short-term credit to fishermen to finance the purchasing of food and fishing supplies.

This whole project, which has been under continual study over a number of years, is a very complex undertaking. A number of meetings have been held between the responsible federal and provincial ministers, proposals have been considered, ideas have been exchanged, and the legislation now before you, honourable senators, has received careful study and consideration in its drafting. It has been agreed that there should be no interruption with the existing trade and industry arrangements before May 1969. If necessary, federal and provincial legislation will have received approval by that time, the processes for changeover will be set in motion after full consultation with interested parties.

This bill has been the subject of lively discussion in the other place, both in the house and in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. Before receiving third reading and being passed, two amendments were made to the bill. I should mention that while clause 13 originally specified that the head office of the corporation shall be at the City of Winnipeg, an amendment was introduced and accepted adding the words "or in the immediate vicinity thereof", thus giving wider flexibility in the selection of suitable office accommodation.

Clause 18, having to do with the appointment of an advisory committee, was also amended by striking out the word "may" in the first line thereof and substituting therefor the word "shall", and by adding after the word "committee" in the last line thereof the following:

> ... and at least one-third of whom shall be persons or representatives of persons actively engaged in the freshwater fishing industry as fishermen.

In other words, the bill makes it not only permissible, but compulsory, to include representatives of the fishermen's interest on the advisory committee.

Honourable senators, as I have said, this bill was introduced by the Government following a lengthy and most careful study of the McIvor Commission's report and its recommendations. The co-operation of four provinces, one territorial government and two federal departments, has made possible the formulation of the plan which I have outlined, and which you will find in Bill C-148, the Freshwater Fish Marketing bill, now before us for second reading.

While examining the problems of the freshwater fisheries, one cannot help but be impressed by some of the similarities existing between this industry and certain inshore fisheries of the Atlantic coast. However, one cannot help but realize at once that ocean fish stocks are so much more numerous, so widely dispersed, and consist of so many entirely different species that the Atlantic and Pacific fisheries, as such, are widely dissimilar and present altogether different problems.

Before closing, may I be permitted to refer briefly to some of the problems facing our Canadian commercial fisheries at this time. It is a well known fact that particularly since the period following the Second World War, our commercial fisheries on both coats have been subject to substantial financial assistance by way of grants or otherwise from the Government of the country. This was no different from Government participation in the fisheries of competing major fish-producing nations of the world, many of which are selling their finished products on the United States market, the main outlet for Canadian fisheries.

On the Pacific coast, the herring fishery, once an important factor in the economy of the area, has, for the time being at least, almost disappeared. Some blame over-fishing; others give as reason the lack of proper controls on the part of the federal Government. It is true that every means available has been used to maximize the catch. It is true that there was no limitation of entry, no limitation to the fishing capacity, and everyone knows what happened when the maximum sustainable yield of this particular fishery was exceeded. Our responsible governments, whether at federal or at provincial level, wherever the responsibility lies, must not allow a recurrence of such a catastrophe. In other words, our governments must recognize in similar circumstances the economic as well as biological facts of life.

One must recognize, however, that our west coast fishery is in a unique position. The main fishery, consisting mainly of salmon and halibut, is a high-priced fishery. The federal Government has been investing many millions of dollars in new artificial spawning grounds, in the clearing of streams, and in pollution abatement, thus assuring British Columbia fishermen of adequate supplies and providing increased incomes.

In the last two or three years the fishing industry on the east coast, and particularly the Atlantic groundfish industry, has been plagued with declining revenue and increasing costs. The earnings of the fishermen have been adversely affected, and a number of processors and dealers are heading to imminent insolvency. Such a unfortunate situation can be attributed to developments abroad such as:

1. Tariff protection among members of the European Market countries;

2. Similar protection in the European Free Trade area;

3. Effect of currency devaluation;

4. Effect of civil war in African countries disrupting fish outlets for production from Iceland and Norway, thus seriously affecting mainly our Atlantic codfish fishery, our most important species in terms of volume.

In the last 12 to 18 months the diversion of the cod production from the salt trade to frozen product has resulted in an overproduction of this species, thus affecting the United States market for fillets and blocks made from flounders, ocean perch, and haddock.

The deficiency payment program in effect from May to September of last year, involving payments of $4 million to the Atlantic frozen groundfish industry, resulted in increased production of approximately 25 million pounds at a time when market conditions were under serious pressure from heavy imports from competing fishing nations. In addition, a large portion of the salt fish production for 1968, and the surplus from the previous year, was purchased for relief shipments under Canada's foreign aid program, thus relieving normal or customary markets for this particular commodity.

In the years 1964-65 a very careful study was made on the feasibility of establishing a marketing board to control and market the salt fish production of the Atlantic coast, involving mainly the provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, the two main production areas for this commodity. It was made quite evident at the time that no concensus could be reached in this regard and the matter could not be proceeded with. It could be that the situation has changed since then, and the present Minister of Fisheries made it quite clear in answering questions in the other place on Tuesday of this week that the establishing of a salt fish marketing board was under very active consideration and that there were possibilities that such a board could be in operation in time to handle the 1970 production.

I regret that time will not allow me to pursue further on this occasion the problems facing the fishing industry today. In closing, I would like to state my personal opinion that government assistance alone, such as government grants, subsidies or loans, is not the only or even the main solution to our problems. The Freshwater Fish Marketing Act or a Salt Fish Marketing Act will not by themselves solve the problems of the freshwater fisheries or of the Newfoundland salt fish fishermen.

Among the chronic problems confronting our fishing industry today are quality and productivity. Until all our fishermen, without exception, whether in the Prairie provinces or on the Atlantic coast, realize that they have to co-operate to produce a high quality product, our fishing industry will be confronted with a most serious situation. Our processors and dealers in some areas must realize that they are part of a highly competitive industry, and that if they want to remain in business they have to gear their production to compete favourably with competing fish-production nations or even with other segments of the industry in our country. How can a producer expect to stay in business when it is quite evident that his productivity range is from 20 per cent to 30 per cent below that of processing plants operating within the same area and selling on the same market? Government grants or subsidies will be useless unless such processors make up their minds that they must modernize their operation and gear it to compete in a more orderly way.

The fisherman as a primary producer, the processor, the dealer and the government agency involved in the inspection of the product, must all co-operate and work together to improve the efficiency of the structure of our processing and marketing system. I am absolutely confident that with such co-operation and understanding the Canadian fishing industry from the West Coast, the Prairies and the Atlantic seaboard, is ready to accept the challenges presented by increasing foreign competition and to initiate policies which will place the industry on a much firmer base to meet problems as they arise.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-151 is a short bill, containing only three sections. Its purpose is to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

First, the bill provides that such insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies as are designated by the Minister of Finance may make loans under the provisions of the act in addition to the chartered banks and those now authorized. Secondly, the bill revokes the present maximum interest rate of 5 per cent and provides that in future the rates of interest will be those prescribed by regulation. Finally, in order to encourage lending by more lenders, the present limit of liability of the Minister of Finance is increased.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act came into force in 1955 for a period of three years. It has been amended from time to time, and the current lending period extends from July 1, 1965, to June 30, 1970. The purpose of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act is to make it easier for fishermen to obtain credit to build new boats and to obtain new equipment so as to prosecute the fisheries in a more efficient manner. At present the maximum amount of each loan is $10,000, which does not seem to be a large sum in these days. It is, I understand, the intention that the rate of interest shall be the same as that paid under the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Regulations will provide that the rate must not exceed the long-term borrowing rate of the Government of Canada by more than one per cent.

Only individual fishermen may qualify for loans. There are, of course, limits on the amount of the cost of any item which may be borrowed. For example, a fisherman may borrow up to 75 per cent of the cost of any equipment but only two-thirds the cost of a vehicle. The period for repayment also varies from three to ten years, depending on the purpose of the loan. As a rule the lender will take a lien or some form of security in respect of each advance.

The Minister of Finance is liable to pay all losses up to 90 per cent where the total loan made by any one lender does not exceed $125,000, and 50 per cent of the total loans over $125,000 but not exceeding $250,000, and only 10 per cent of loans exceeding in total $250,000.

Since 1955 a total of 2,586 loans have been made, adding up to $6,168,800. Out of this total of 2,586 loans, the Minister of Finance has had to pay nine claims. Out of the $6,168,-800 advances, a total sum of $3,543 has had to be paid back by the Minister of Finance.

I understand, honourable senators, that the minister has under consideration increasing the amount which may be loaned to $25,000, but if this is so it would have to be the subject of further amendment.

Honourable senators, if this bill should receive second reading I would move that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. John J. Kinley: Honourable senators, first let me congratulate the honourable Senator Robichaud of New Brunswick on his optimistic report and speech on fisheries. He started with the freshwater fisheries and extended his remarks to cover saltwater fisheries. He presented a comprehensive idea of what the future of these industries might be. As a former federal Minister of Fisheries he is amply qualified to give advice, and I am sure he was listened to with interest.

I was also glad to hear my friend Senator Cook introduce Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Loans Act, which is now before the house. In reading Hansard of the House of Commons this morning I noticed that Members of Parliament from Newfoundland especially were very much concerned about this legislation and wondered how it would affect them. They did not condemn the bill for what it contains, but rather for what it leaves out. It seems that a desirable provision was left out as a result of the new rules that were adopted in the House of Commons. The minister had hoped to move an amendment after the bill came out of committee, but the Speaker ruled that the bill could not be amended at that stage. Therefore, consideration was given as to whether the bill should be proceeded with or a new bill introduced. After the minister completed his discussion it was decided to go ahead with the bill in its present form, but he promised that within a week or so he would introduce a new bill which would contain the appropriate amendment.

Senator Cook explained how loans are made under the Fisheries Improvements Loans Act. I think it is a very good way. The banks are the auditors of who may acquire loans, and they are going to manage the affairs. They will get adequate security from the Government to enable them to make these loans to the fishermen. I think this is a very sensible way to do business, because they will not be risking a loss. In the past the banks have been very fair in making loans of this kind, and I feel confident they will continue to be.

Senator Cook discussed interest rates. Well, the interest rate may go higher, but no government can loan money at 5 per cent these days. As he said, the rate will not exceed the long-term borrowing rate of the Government by more than one per cent. I think there is an item of insurance to be added, but the borrowers will get the money at a fair rate under present conditions. The sponsor of the bill also dealt with the amount of aggregate loans and the percentage of security with respect to them, and so on.

Honourable senators, I think the bill is opportune and salutary. Scientific progress is being made in respect to the fishing industry; for one thing, increased electrical power is an important factor, especially in the matter of safety at sea. Fishermen need these loans to enable them to make replacements, to refit and improve their fishing vessels. It is not for the building of ships; I do not think there is any provision in the act authorizing a loan for this purpose.

A commitment by the minister to increase the amount of a loan to $25,000 was necessary before the bill could get through the House of Commons, and I think it can safely be said that when we get a new bill within a week or two it will contain this provision. The question was whether it was too much or too little. I think that $25,000 for refitting and for putting in new equipment is a very good estimate. I have been connected with this kind of business for a long time, and an expenditure of $25,000 for the purpose of refitting is in line. I am not bringing this up just because of this bill, but because of the following statement which appeared in the Halifax Herald yesterday:

> Forced to Defer Construction on 22 Vessels—Harding
> Nova Scotia Fishermen's Loan Board has been forced to defer action on construction of 22 vessels in the province, according to provincial Fisheries Minister Harding.
> Mr. Harding, in a prepared statement released last night, said the halt was the result of federal decisions to reduce assistance for construction of wooden fishing vessels.

He says "assistance." I would be a little more definite and say subsidy. I think subsidy conveys to the people of the country something a little more generous than just assistance.

Honourable senators, for years now the building and equipping of fishing vessels has been subsidized by the federal Government so that the industry became very active in Nova Scotia. But now a situation has developed where it is difficult to get fishing crews. Wooden vessels are laid up at the port of Lunenburg, my home town, because they cannot get good crews. They cannot make a profit without a good crew, and therefore these vessels have become liabilities rather than assets to their owners.

Many vessels have been sold to foreign countries at low prices because they were small, and steel vessels, which are more attractive and have better accommodation and facilities, have taken their place. It is more difficult for the smaller vessels to succeed, and the crews prefer the larger and more comfortable vessels, which are owned by the larger companies and can give them perhaps a better chance. The builders of wooden ships have suffered. Our companies have suffered because shipbuilding has stopped, and we were largely engaged in the building and repairing of ships.

While my personal wishes are that the shipbuilding industry would be a booming one, I am also a legislator and I must tell you what knowledge I have about the situation. I think that is salutary.

It is bad to have vessels idle, and for that reason you do not want to build more vessels. Again, with the men who are fishing and the vessels that are operating now it is much better to have a good atmosphere, and a place where a man can work with efficiency instead of having competition which would bring in more vessels which cannot pay and which would not improve the situation at all. We have unemployment in our industries because we refit vessels and build smaller vessels, as well as operating a marine railway.

Honourable senators, I think the Government came to the conclusion that it has because of economic conditions. I was in this from the start when the subject of this vessel subsidy began. I conferred with the government officials here and with the men in the industry, and the conclusion was reached that a subsidy should be granted for the building of sea-going ships. It is worthwhile doing this. Many countries subsidize their marine fleets, including the United States and Britain.

We lost our merchant marine during the depression. I do not know whether it was the general depression, but it was a depression of the railways. They could not sell the railroads, but they sold the vessels and they sold them at a low price. The Greeks bought them and exploited their own country's economy, but it was advantageous to the new owners.

We have very few vessels in the merchant marine, except on the lakes, but there is competition on the lakes now whereas there was none before. The sills in the canal locks determined the depth of the vessels which could come up into the lakes, and so the sea-going vessels were not able to come up through the locks.

We have closed our coastline down to Anticosti, but the Maritimes is open to the world. I am still not sure whether this is good or bad. We were told it might be an idea to attract the business of the world to Nova Scotia and then transship to central Canada. British ships are still allowed to go up the lakes freely, but ships from other countries are not allowed to do that.

The marine business in this country needs to be inspected and appraised. A country like Canada should have a merchant marine, and I think we are getting to the point where this is going to be considered.

Honourable senators, the point is that the Fisheries Loan Board in Nova Scotia will not lend money for vessels unless Ottawa pays a subsidy. When a shipbuilder gets a subsidy he usually assigns it to the loan board as first payment. Then they give a long-term lease or mortgage in order to build the vessel and equip it for sea.

I know there is an election coming on in Nova Scotia and political feelings are getting a little high, but I think the loan board in Nova Scotia will agree that Mr. Harding's statement hardly expresses what the board feels.

They are experienced men and know what they are doing, and I think they also, in a nautical term, feel that it is time to "hold a turn" and stop to review this situation before it gets too overloaded.

The markets are low today. When our Catholic friends in Canada and the United States stopped eating fish on Fridays and throughout Lent, it was a serious blow to the fishing industry. It was the backbone of the industry, because the dealers always stocked up with fish for Fridays.

The production of fish is high today and prices are low. The deep-sea fishermen in my county are doing well, especially in the luxury line of scallops, lobsters and shrimp, but the market is becoming very competitive in the production of ground fish. Russians and other foreign fishermen come and catch more fish in our coastal waters than we do. Our fishermen say that as long as this is happening why should they practice conservation, and why should they not go out and catch all they can. Well, there is no use doing that unless you can make a profit. The situation is, however optimistic one may be, that they are having a tough time. Expenses are high.

The shipbuilding industry in this country cannot compete with countries like Denmark, Holland, Norway, and Sweden, because they have a very low wage-scale and can hire men for half what is paid in this high-economy country of Canada.

We find that the Canadian shipbuilder cannot do much without a subsidy. The Americans have a higher economy than we have, but they subsidize the fishing industry and the vessels, and they keep the trade. Much of our export trade is carried in American ships. I know that a few years ago we were told that if we let foreign countries carry our cargo in their ships we would be able to sell and export more goods. That was all very well, but we lost something very valuable to the Maritime Provinces.

We feel that if Nova Scotians are going to have an opportunity at all, it must be on the sea. It is the only real advantage we have—the sea at tidewater. But this has been taken away from us for the most part by the St. Lawrence Seaway. We have a certain advantage now because modern ships are able to put into the great ports of the world.

So far as the fishing industry is concerned, what we need now are skilled men. We have not enough of them to man our ships. The Newfoundlanders are wonderful fishermen. I know that at one time 800 strong came to Lunenburg every year, but I am afraid we did not look after them. They had no place to go, so they stood around the streets and went home in the wintertime. They have been doing better in Newfoundland since Confederation.

I find that English companies are interested in the fishing industry in Newfoundland. But they have closed up in some districts, and men are out of work. We tried to get some of them, but I think the authorities there have said they are going to continue to run it themselves. We may get some men from there. We got some Poles who were stranded in this country. They were good fishermen. I assisted in their being left in the country and not being shipped back to Poland. Some of them are taking vessels out of Lunenburg now and we are glad to give them a chance.

Honourable senators, I come from a part of Nova Scotia that has always been very prosperous and independent. Our people were Germans. They were brought to Canada by Louis, Prince of Lunenburg, who became George of England. He wanted to have a better common denominator in Nova Scotia between the French and the English and he brought our people to Nova Scotia. My father was Scotch but my mother was German. They could not get along in Halifax so they were sent down to Lunenburg, and they are still there.

Lunenburg is described now as one of the most interesting and prosperous towns. One friend of mine who visited Nova Scotia said that Lunenburg is the richest county in Nova Scotia. I do not know about that. What about Halifax county?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: What is the population?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: I would not think we were the richest county in Nova Scotia. However, we do not like the word "poverty". We have no poverty. We have poor people, but the people will work. If we can get more people in, it will be better. I think we will get a few to come in with us from the western counties and the French shore, and we may get some Newfoundlanders.

Now, the case of the shore fishermen is different. He goes out in the morning and comes in at night, and his fishing methods are improving. His lobster fishing is a good business. I think this bill will help the shore fisherman, and he needs it the most.

Honourable senators, I wanted to correct the idea that some people in Nova Scotia have about Government loans. It is said, for instance, that the provincial Government is doing much and the federal Government is doing little. Well, we are passing out the money that they administer. We are told they will not give a loan unless a subsidy is given for security. I think they know the conditions.

I am sure that if the loan board told what they believed they would say that we are on the right track and that they are acting accordingly.

Honourable senators, I hope that this bill will help conditions there, especially among the shore fishermen. I hope that we will get a bill here in a week that will satisfy the Newfoundlander and the British Columbia fishermen, one that will permit a loan of $25,000 for one individual.

The Newfoundland fisherman thinks the British Columbia chaps get the most out of this. They do, of course, by the very nature of their fishing. The Newfoundlanders have smaller boats, more boats and more repairs; and they blame the minister for everything and say that there is too much out on the Pacific coast. Well, the fishermen on the Pacific coast get twice as much money; they get as much as the whole of the Maritimes put together, but I do not see anything wrong in that. The salmon fishing is very important. The fact of the matter is that if the people in this part of the country ate more fish, the fishermen in the maritimes would be more prosperous. But people in this part of the country do not eat fish as they should. You hear every day of people dying from different afflictions like heart disease and other diseases which are caused by over-eating of certain foods. But if they would eat fish they would find that it is the finest food they could eat. It is never tough and is full of protein and other beneficial things. Fish never leaves a person feeling uncomfortable. Fish comes from a place that is clean—the salt water—and is not full of bugs and all that sort of thing. I say that if the people of Canada ate as much fish as the people of Europe and Japan, the fishermen in Nova Scotia, and the maritimes generally, would be prosperous and would not be asking for so much help from the federal Government, although we deserve all the help we get. Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Can the honourable senator tell me what the population of Lunenburg is?

Hon. Mr. Kinley: You know, in the old days they put a stockade around the town. In the town itself there is only a population of 3,000, but the population of Lunenburg includes more than just that. It would be about 5,000 or 6,000 within a mile or so outside the town. In fact, I have a home outside the town limits. Lunenburg county has a population of 45,000 people.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Rosetown has a population of 5,000.

Hon. Mr. Kinley: Well, they should eat a lot of fish.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, February 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Everett, for the second reading of Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate on Bill S-29, which, in essence, has been designed by the department for the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Northwest Territories and, in effect, creates a board to enforce conservation methods, I simply record my support of the bill as I know it will be supported by industry, because conservation is one of the main directions in which industry has from time to time directed its efforts, and industry does know the real value of conservation.

I would like to commend the Minister and the department for the timely introduction of this bill. As we proceed with the exploration of the Arctic, it is imperative that the ground rules be laid. I believe it is just a matter of time now, in view of the advanced progress in the north, before a discovery will be made. With the introduction of these rules, the Government and various departments will be prepared for that eventuality.

I do hope also that the Government is giving consideration to the revision of other regulations and acts affecting the oil industry's operations so that all statutes and regulations, from time to time, will be up-to-date and ready in the eventuality of that first discovery in the Northwest Territories or the Arctic.

Having recorded my support of the bill, honourable senators, I simply wish on this occasion to address myself to the petroleum industry's operations in western Canada, review the past, and have a look at the present and future of that industry and its contribution not only to western Canada but to Canada as a whole. As Senator Thorvaldson indicated when he spoke on this bill, it all began with the discovery of Imperial Oil Leduc No. 1, and it is significant that I should be speaking on this date, because Leduc No. 1 blew in February 13, 1947, 22 years ago today.

The discovery of Imperial Oil Leduc No. 1 signalled the intense exploration that took place across the prairies, and all subsequent events with respect to oil industry activity in Alberta have been related to Imperial Oil Leduc No. 1.

In the 21 years since the discovery of Leduc No. 1, $11.5 billion has been expended by the oil industry on exploration of the Prairies up to December 31, 1967; and $9.8 billion has been received by the industry in revenue to the same date. In the 21 years, the industry, as it broadened its activity from Alberta into Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba, has created proven reserves of 8.2 billion barrels of oil, and today we have a production capacity of 2.6 million barrels per day. Our actual production, however, runs at 959,000 barrels per day. We are producing oil at only 37 per cent of our potential.

What has all this meant to Canada? What contribution has the industry made? There are 25,000 people employed in the industry in Canada directly. Indirectly, the employment is estimated at over 120,000 people. The industry has expanded the population of the prairies by over one and a half million since that first discovery. It is estimated that the petroleum industry is directly responsible for the industrial revolution in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and is responsible for changing these provinces' economies from "one-crop" to diversified economies.

The total personal income generated in Alberta has undergone a significant change from 1947 to 1964. In 1947 total personal income in the field of the petroleum industry was 5 per cent as against 47 per cent in 1964. In the field of agriculture it was 75 per cent in 1947 as compared to 35 per cent in 1964, and in other fields it was 20 per cent in 1947 as compared to 18 per cent in 1964. While the petroleum industry went up, there was a proportionate and significant drop in the amount of personal income generated in the other industries.

The primary oil exploration industries of the prairies gave rise to many secondary recoveries and resultant industries. For example, there are 110 million tons of sulphur; 2 billion cubic feet of helium and nitrogen; and 55 billion tons of potash. The direct revenue to the province of Alberta between the years 1947 and 1968 has amounted to $2,589,241,-836.00. And in the 1967-68 fiscal year the oil revenue to the province of Alberta was $217.6 million, which represented 31.8 per cent of their budget revenue of that year, namely, $684.2 million.

In these remarks I may create the erroneous impression that it is only in western Canada that the benefits of this industry are enjoyed. However, I would quote a noted economist, who recently said:

> From the point of view of total income and employment, it is undoubtedly the case that the absolute benefits of the oil industry are actually greater in the rest of Canada than in the Prairies, though of course the per capita benefits would be greater in the Prairie Provinces.

An economic survey conducted for the industry indicated, honourable senators, that about $300 million per year is spent in eastern Canada on direct purchases from manufacturers. Out of every dollar spent on exploration in western Canada 35 cents is spent purchasing goods from eastern Canadian manufacturers. Of the balance of 65 cents the major portion is spent indirectly on commodities produced in eastern Canada. So, honourable senators, the impact of the petroleum industry and its activity is not confined solely to western Canada; the whole of Canada has throughout the past 22 years enjoyed the benefits of this growing, active industry.

Now, honourable senators, I would like to turn to the Arctic. As I indicated earlier, the Leduc discovery triggered the western Canadian industry and there is little doubt that future exploration and future activities in the north and in the Arctic will relate directly to June 24, 1968, when Prudhoe Bay No. 1 came in from a depth below 12,000 feet. The discovery well of Prudhoe Bay with its subsequent Bag River No. 1 follow-up indicates the location and discovery of a field as large as anything that has ever been discovered in the Middle East and certainly larger than anything ever discovered in North America to date.

As a result of the two wells there is now one billion barrels of proven reserves on the Alaska north slope and five to 10 billion of estimated recoverable reserves. As a result of this discovery, the two sedimentary basins in Canada's Arctic, the Mackenzie delta and the Arctic islands have now become the area of the north where industry is directing its activities. We know that the geological and stratigraphic conditions found on the north slope of Alaska exist throughout these two sedimentary basins.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Might I ask the honourable senator a question just for clarification and to ascertain how far apart we are in our figures? In my speech the other evening I referred to the first estimates of the capacity as being between five and 10 billion barrels, and then I said that other petroleum engineers had in more recent estimates put it as high as 30 to 40 billion barrels. Is it not correct that these estimates have been made?

Hon. Mr. Hastings: Your figures are correct, senator. There are three types of figures given for any discovery; one is the proven figure that you know you have in the ground as a result of your proven reserves and your geological information. The second figure is your estimate of recoverable reserves, which is 45 billion barrels. Then you have the final figure, the ultimate recoverable reserves, based on the geological information you have available, which is usually a higher figure.

In discussing the Arctic, honourable senators, and in making this presentation I have had a map and, with leave, I would ask that it be distributed now and that it be attached as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Because we know the geological conditions of the major oil-producing zone at Prudhoe Bay exist throughout the Canadian Arctic and because we have all the attributes with which a major producing field is associated, we have every reason to believe that if we turn our efforts northward across Canada's Arctic we will have more oil there than in the area of the north slope of Alaska.

Now if honourable senators will follow me through the map they will see they are marked as No. 1, the top left-hand corner, which is the Alaska North Slope. There there is an estimated ultimate recoverable reserve of 45 billion barrels of oil and 279 trillion cubic feet of gas.

Now we move into the Canadian area and in area No. 2, which is the Mackenzie delta, it is estimated that we have 35 billion barrels of oil and 210 trillion cubic feet of gas. In the Arctic islands, which is area No. 3 on the map, it is estimated that we have 50 billion barrels of oil and 300 trillion cubic feet of gas. Then taking area No. 4, which is the upper Mackenzie and Peel plateau, it is estimated that we have 20 billion barrels of oil and 120 trillion cubic feet of gas. According to these figures which are based on the best geological information available, Canada has an estimated 105 billion barrels of oil compared with the United States total of 45 billion barrels on the Alaska north slope. In other words, honourable senators, Canada has 70 per cent of the oil in that area. By that area I mean the Arctic, including Alaska.

As I said a while ago, Leduc triggered exploration across the Prairies, the discovery of Prudhoe Bay triggered exploration across the north, and this may answer the question raised by Senator Roebuck when I tell you that there are 360 million acres under exploration permits at the moment in the Northwest Territories and Arctic. Senator Roebuck asked what benefit we have as Canadians. This has resulted in a revenue to the federal Government of $8.9 million in the first 10 months of the present fiscal year compared with a previous five-year average of $2.4 million. As the result of exploration activity it is expected that industry will spend $32 million in the coming year and $50 million in 1970 in the active search for oil.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I take it that that is from the sale of leases. That is not for production.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: It is from rents and sale of permits. We have no revenue from royalties.

We have two rigs presently drilling in the Arctic coastal plain and it is anticipated that there will be at least six more in the Yukon and Northwest Territories during this coming year. We have a 12,000-foot well scheduled to commence drilling in the Beaufort Sea this year.

Now Senator Roebuck asked what interest we have in the north. Well, senator, the people of Canada have a 45 per cent interest in Pan Arctic Oils, and Pan Arctic have 50 million acres and will spend $20 million in the coming year. Furthermore the first of 17 wells will be spudded in March on Melville Island. There will be two more rigs later this year to carry out the program. A well will be spudded in Hudson Bay when ice conditions permit.

Continued tanker and icebreaker trials will be carried out to conquer the problem of transportation and experiments will be carried out with the new Alexbow method of plowing ice which is called after its inventor, an Ottawa man named Scott Alexander. It will be used in a new attempt to break the ice and to conquer the Northwest Passage this coming year so that tankers may move freely through the Northwest Passage to California.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I wonder if I might ask the senator a further question, the answer to which I think is rather important. I do not have the answer but I think he may have it. In regard to Pan Arctic Oils in which Canada has a 45 per cent interest, and as you know the Canadian Government will be charging a 10 per cent royalty, does Canada also get the 10 per cent royalty in the case of Pan Arctic production? This is a matter of great importance to Canada.

Hon. Mr. Hastings: I think Canada gets the 10 per cent royalty, and in addition, as I said, we have a 45 per cent working interest in Pan Arctic.

Now as we enter this exploration program across the Arctic, I would not want to leave you with the impression that the first well to be drilled is going to be another Prudhoe Bay. That is not the case. There will be many disappointments; there will be progress, but it will take two or three years. However, I am confident of the ability of the industry to complete its mission in that area and to achieve production throughout the area. I do not want to leave the impression that all one has to do is to sink a well in the area and you will have a repeat of the Prudhoe Bay discovery.

As we review the oil industry we do so with a spirit of satisfaction, optimism and, perhaps, uncertainty. I say satisfaction because as we look back across 22 years of progress, we have, I believe, contributed a fair share to the economic development of Canada. I say with optimism because if we look northward to the Arctic and the substantial efforts that will be made there we see the rewards that will come to the people of Canada.

However, everything is not certain; there is some uncertainty. I say that because we look at the large shut-in capacity and continued reserve growth which is growing at a faster rate than demand. At the moment we are producing at only 31 per cent of our capability. Looking at this discovery in the north we find that it may aggravate this ratio and will aggravate the markets we have established in industry. We must view with concern the possible added restrictions to our export markets in the United States which may result from the review of import regulations the new administration in the United States has under consideration.

We must view with concern the possibility of low-cost off-shore foreign crude penetrating United States and Canadian markets. Certainly, with the additional refining capabilities that are being installed at Quebec, Come-By-Chance and, possibly, in Maine, which will have refining capacity far greater than the present demand or the projection of that demand, we wonder where this oil will be marketed. Is it going to replace our present domestic market west of the Ottawa Valley?

There is the impact of future discoveries in the north and the Alaska Pipeline which is going to have an immediate effect on our Pudget Sound and northwest market. There is the prospect of increased synthetic oil production from the bituminous sands of northern Alberta. All these are matters of great concern in the marketing of our petroleum.

It is against this background of uncertain factors that the Government recently announced the appointment of a task force, with a view to reviewing industry developments and the effect on the Canadian economy of the Prudhoe Bay discovery and subsequent events. I think it is a great challenge to this task force, composed of deputy ministers within the various departments, to develop these policies in an attempt to maintain the growth of the industry in light of current problems. It is even greater when you consider the sweeping changes that can be expected in the oil industry in the next five years, changes which at the moment cannot be determined or assessed until we have drilled the wells and have found the discoveries, or until the American government has announced its final policy with respect to imports.

Because of the magnitude of the task and the importance of the industry to the economic growth of Canada, I am wondering whether it would not be worthwhile for a Senate committee to make a continuing study of this important industry and what the Government should be doing to assist this industry. I say that because I do not believe any short-term task force can fulfil that role. It is a continuing effort and an exhaustive study that is required.

I do not wish to question the competence of those presently undertaking the job. Indeed, I would be the first to testify as to their ability. I believe the job is larger than four men can undertake, and I believe it cannot be a short-term task. It must be a long-term one capable of working in co-operation with the Government departments concerned in Ottawa, the provincial governments, the Government of the Northwest Territories, the industry and the ministry, making a careful in-depth review and study and, from time to time, making recommendations in the light of developments which would be anticipated in the future and quickly assessed as the result of such a continuing review.

To meet the future challenge of the industry it is imperative that the Government, Parliament and those in public life in Canada, are well informed on the industry problems and developments in Canada, and I envisage the work of such a committee fulfilling that purpose.

In any event, as we look to the future in the petroleum industry, I do not think we are pessimistic. This is not the first time, and it certainly will not be the last time, that a wildcat discovery has had, or will have, a traumatic effect on industry plans.

As has been the case in the past, I am confident that the industry and Government, working in close co-operation, will continue to meet and solve the challenges of finding, producing and marketing petroleum, natural gas and related minerals, and that this industry, with that co-operation maintained and the interest of the Government in maintaining it, will continue to make a dynamic and worthwhile contribution to the growth and development of Canada.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I know that the hour is getting very close to the time appointed for Royal Assent, but there is a question that arises in my mind out of the remarks made by the honourable Senator Hastings that I would like to place before him for consideration.

Let me first of all compliment him on a fine presentation on a very important subject to the Senate. What I say of him applies also to the contributions of Senator Thorvaldson and Senator Everett, both of whom did a masterful job on a bill that could have been full of difficulties in a legislative chamber.

The Borden Commission, of approximately ten years ago, laid down some guidelines for this very important industry, and that commission, headed by a distinguished citizen of Toronto, Mr. Henry Borden, did something that was most valuable. One of the first achievements or results of its deliberations was the establishment of the National Energy Board, and that has been very helpful. Then came the establishment of the national oil policy.

It seems to me, from what I read and hear, that this is an industry that is constantly changing in character. As Senators Hastings and Thorvaldson have pointed out, new discoveries are constantly changing the requirements. After all, the industry is going to survive only if markets are available and if the price is right.

Senator Hastings has referred to the appointment of a task force. That is an interdepartmental committee, a private investigation conducted for the information, I suppose, of the executive, primarily, to advise them upon the direction in which they should go in formulating future policy.

However, it seems to me that perhaps without establishing a royal commission—which might be cumbersome and slow in developing proposals—a committee of inquiry, with knowledgeable people from Government, industry, the scientific sector and particularly geologists, which would have a continuing concern about new developments as quickly as they occur, might be a more effective instrument than a formal royal commission or even a committee of the Senate.

A committee of the Senate, in a case like this and for this bill, will unquestionably provide a forum. I do not think it could work as quickly and as effectively as a committee of experts from the industry and people connected with the industry. It is abundantly apparent from what Senator Hastings has said that the opportunities in this country for this industry are tremendous. Canada can become a new Middle East. The possibilities are as great as that.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: In some respects.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Yes, in many respects. I know that there are all kinds of problems ahead to be dealt with, especially when these discoveries occur in the Arctic islands and the Mackenzie Delta, because people do not live in those areas. That is the frontier. It is beyond the frontier, where ice and weather present terrible hazards and obstacles.

I suggest to Senator Hastings and Senator Thorvaldson that some consideration might be given to the desirability of having people with a great deal more knowledge of this industry than I possess speak as to the need for the type of continued review which I suggested earlier in the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to clear up one point. In the course of his remarks Senator Hastings expressed a desire to have a map appear as an appendix to Hansard of today. I have inquired, and am now told that that is possible. I understand that honourable senators are agreed that this map should appear as an appendix to the proceedings of today?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

An Act to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

An Act respecting the marking of articles containing precious metals.

An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

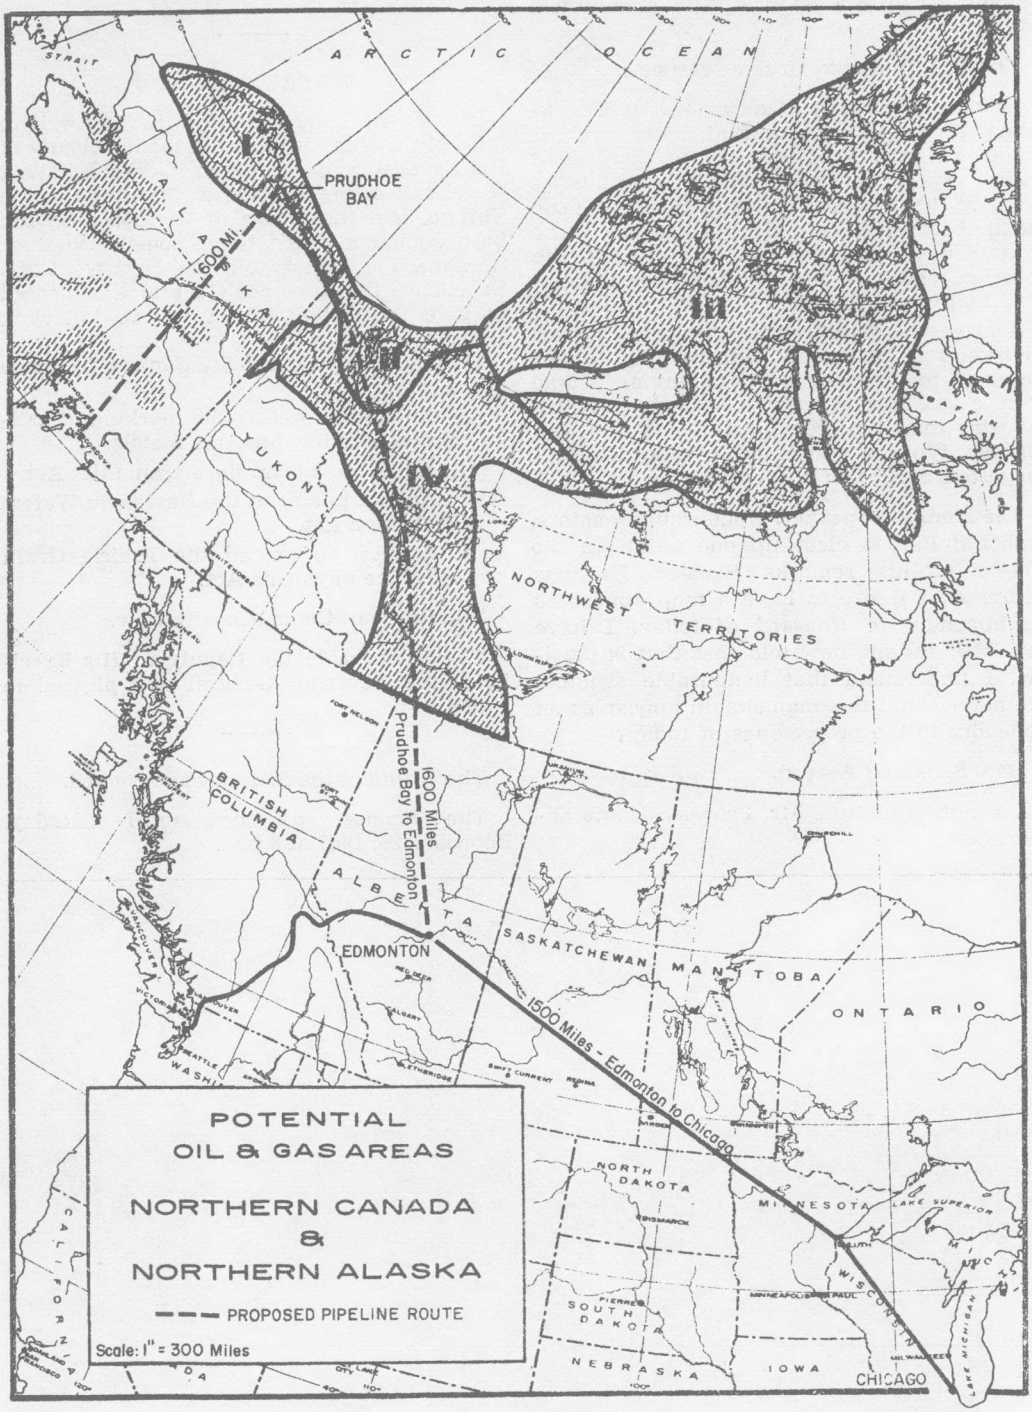
An Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

An Act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.



The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 25, 1969 at 8 p.m.

Hon. Paul Martin, with leave of the Senate, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1969.

Motion agreed to.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Cook, for the second reading of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, not much needs to be said about this bill at this time. As its sponsor (Hon. Mr. Cook) stated, the bill effects three changes in the present legislation. Clause 1 of the bill permits an insurance company, a trust company, or a loan company, designated by the minister, to be a lender under the act. This will increase the number of companies that are permitted to make these loans, but I wonder whether there is any increased demand for such loans because when I look at the statistics, in particular those for the past year, I find that the provisions of this act have not been used to a great extent.

The sponsor mentioned that since 1955, when the scheme first came into effect, 2,586 loans had been made, to a total of $6,168,200. That is a relatively small amount for that number of loans made over that period. Up to 1965 the maximum loan could be only $4,000, but since that time it has been $10,000. Over that period of time the average loan would be less than $2,400. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968 there were 280 loans, to a total of $1,273,924.

From this it would appear there has been no great demand for loans under this act, and perhaps there is good reason for this. The statistics show that in British Columbia 147 loans have been made, to a total of under $1 million; in Nova Scotia there were 46 loans totalling $159,889; in Prince Edward Island, 80 loans, totalling $113,945. The average loan must have been somewhat smaller.

One notices that apparently there were no loans in the Province of Newfoundland, a great fishing centre, and only 46 loans in Nova Scotia, another great fishing centre. I understand the explanation is that those two provinces have their own provincial loan boards which make loans to fishermen. For example, in Nova Scotia during this period there were 46 loans totalling $159,889, yet according to a press report the Nova Scotia Fishermen's Loan Board gave $9,056,878 in loans for the provincial fishermen during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968. According to the annual report tabled in the legislature, $17,398,315 was outstanding on all board loans made up to the end of the year. Thus, while less than $160,000 had been loaned in Nova Scotia under the federal legislation, over $9 million had been loaned under the provincial legislation.

The second change concerns the interest rates. Formerly the interest rate was set by statute. The interest rate will now be set by the Governor in Council, because the interest rate on all these guaranteed loans has been changed to bring it into conformity with the interest rate actually charged. It occurs to me that if no great use was made of the act when the interest rate was 5 per cent, perhaps there will be still fewer applications for loans when the interest rate goes up, as it will do, because I understand the minister has said elsewhere that the interest rate will be 1 per cent above what it costs the Government to borrow the money.

A third change is the total amount by which the Government guarantees these loans, with the hope that there will be more smaller loans made to individual fishermen. These lending institutions are guaranteeing loans up to 90 per cent of the first $125,000.

Now, there are just three changes in the act. They are very plain and practically self-explanatory. I do not propose to go into the reasons for the difficulties in the fishing industry which Senator Kinley mentioned in his speech, except to say that I think he was not quite correct in his statement that one of the reasons, or perhaps the main reason, was the difficulty in getting crews to man the fishing boats.

I think that Senator Robichaud outlined in his speech the reasons why the fishing industry in the Atlantic area is in difficulty at the present time. In my opinion, this bill will not help much; on the other hand, it will not do any harm—so we will take it. We are resigned to the fact that the interest rates must go up.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But you give it the benefit of the doubt.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: That is right. We hope there will be some benefit, but that remains to be seen.

The sponsor mentioned that he would refer this bill to a committee. Actually, unless he so desires I do not see any reason for it. I do not think there can be any further information given to us than has already been given by him and by the others who spoke on the bill.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Would the honourable senator indicate why the borrowings were heavier in the provincial loans of Nova Scotia rather than the federal loans?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: I could not tell you the reason. I expect the terms were better under the provincial legislation, and that they would probably get a better deal.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is a presumption.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Cook moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, January 30, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, there are only a few comments I would like to make on this report. Previous speakers have covered in a most effective manner most areas of the report. I do not want to presume that I am an expert in this chamber on this matter, having been with you for such a relatively short time. There are, however, some points I would like to refer to.

May I first say that I believe the rule changes will assist the Senate to operate more efficiently and more effectively in its important work. May I say as well how impressed I am with the high calibre of men and women in this chamber, with whom I have the privilege of associating. I am impressed by the dedication, the ambition and the sense of duty all of you have in serving the people of Canada. I am certain that no other group of individuals, within or without Government service anywhere, can match this dedication. I say this particularly because of the attendance at committee meetings, where the important work is done, unknown in most instances to the people of Canada.

In the chairman's report to this chamber, there appeared to be veiled suggestions that too many appointments are made to the Senate because of political affiliation. I reject this suggestion as totally out of the realm of progressive thinking.

In this very house at this very time, by far the greatest number of members have had wide political experience, and because of this experience they have been able to serve better. Almost without exception, those who have political experience have it because they recognized the needs of society and were prepared to offer their services to the people. They saw the challenge, that it is possible to have a better society, and accepted that challenge; and while doing so they became top men and women in the many other facets of society. So today in this chamber we have many of the best informed people of the country, who have brought with them the political knowledge required in a legislative chamber. They have brought a wealth of economic, legal, social and professional knowledge that is without precedence.

Surely politicians should not be classified as second-class citizens, as is the tendency at times. Surely politicians, by hard practical experience, have learned, more than any others, how to recognize the hopes and aspirations of the Canadian people on all levels of society.

If this chamber, therefore, can continue to attract people with, first and foremost, a political background, with the added benefit of extensive knowledge in other fields, as has been the case in the past, then the people of Canada will continue to be served well.

In the report there is also a suggestion that senators should not participate in the national caucus of their party. I reject this suggestion. What better way is there to increase our knowledge and our understanding of the purpose of legislation?

Close association with those who have been chosen by popular vote keeps us close to the people, and gives us greater opportunity to recognize the needs and wishes of Canadians. The greater the understanding and the knowledge we have, the more effective the role we can play in giving sober second thoughts to legislation. Surely at all times we can come to our own chamber with our independent ideas on solutions to the nation's problems. We are a political body, and if we endeavour to ignore this fact we cannot effectively serve. If I, for one, were summoned as an independent member of this chamber, I would find it difficult to remain an independent, for most certainly I would want to align myself with a political party, to have access to this wide field of knowledge and participation.

For a hundred years there have been discussions and recommendations for changes in the Senate. In that period there have been changes, and there will be changes in the future. This body is no different than any other organization in society, because all have changed and all will change.

If this chamber is to be a viable instrument of democracy, then it must be prepared to change; and change it will when the opportunity arises where it can serve more effectively. It will not change, in my opinion, however, and be less effective, by the whim of a few individuals who may endeavour to bargain away its powers and duties.

I am prepared, as I feel each one of you would be, to accept the recommendations for change from within or from without, but only if in our collective opinion those changes are in the best interests of the people of Canada.

I came to this house, as I know each of you did, with the sincere desire to serve. If ever a time comes when this chamber no longer performs a required service, then I will be happy to leave and find an area where my services are required.

This chamber is serving Canada in a very important manner and those who speak of abolishment or emasculation are either endeavouring to serve their own selfish interests or are totally ignorant of the repercussions of such abolishment. I agree, of course, that before an undemocratic, socialist, communist or dictatorship style of government could function in Canada, a method would have to be found to abolish or restrict the powers of the Senate. Therefore, most of the talk of abolishment appears to be to prepare in advance the people of Canada for such a takeover.

On the recent television documentary on the Senate the member from Winnipeg North Centre made many derogatory remarks about the Senate and on more than one occasion throughout the program advocated its abolishment, as others of his party have done from time to time.

I cannot help but believe that these statements are made for the selfish interests of the party to which they belong, rather than for the benefit of the Canadian people. He and they will have to do a lot more knitting if they expect to pull the wool over the eyes of the Canadian people in this respect. He, of course, is not the first cowboy from the west to shoot from the lip and he probably will not be the last.

And now, as they welcome back their leader, "The Wizard of Ooze", to their den of antiquity, they will continue as before to endeavour to portray that they and they alone ride herd on the conscience of the Canadian people. They have led their people on other issues into the fog and missed, and they will do so on this one.

There has been some criticism of the television documentary in this chamber. Some of that criticism is no doubt justified but, as an overall assessment of the program, I believe it was informative. I believe those Canadians who viewed it learned a great deal about the workings of the Senate and, judging from the comments I have heard from some of them, the program did far more good than harm.

I would hope that in future when such an opportunity for a wide public scrutiny of the Senate is made available, the utmost in cooperation will be given by the Senate. There are people in Canada who do not understand the functions and responsibilities of an Upper House of Parliament. If this is the case, then we have a responsibility to help them to be better informed. It is their House of Parliament, and by being better informed they may make better use of our services.

People are normally down on the things they are not up on and this may be so with the Senate. I have a distinct feeling that were the people better informed on the functions of the Senate, the voices of destruction would fall on deaf ears. Part of the onus is on ourselves; and additional ways of getting information to the public must emanate from within our own ranks.

To close in a somewhat lighter vein, if we could arrange to have Quentin Durgens, M.P. summoned to the Senate, we might very well be able to have our own weekly program of information to the people.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, first I should like to say that it was a privilege to serve on the committee which dealt with the revision of the rules of this house. I think it was one of the very good committees of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It had an efficient, energetic chairman in Senator Molson. Unfortunately, I had to be absent from many of its meetings because of a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association meeting. I will say this of the chairman, that he set an example to all of us. His work was objective and he kept the proceedings in a completely non-partisan atmosphere. Some of us called him a benevolent Simon Legree; nonetheless, we were very impressed with the way he performed.

While I speak as highly as I do of the Chairman, I should also like to commend very highly indeed the officials who helped that committee—Mr. Hopkins, our Law Clerk; Mr. Batt, the Chief in the Committees Branch; Mr. Dehler, the special counsel who served us; Mr. Jackson of the Committees Branch; and finally, because the revision of the work had to be undertaken by somebody with the ultimate sense of responsibility, the Clerk of the Senate himself.

Honourable senators, I wish to address myself this evening primarily to paragraphs 20 and 21 of the Report of the Committee. This deals with the matter of setting the course for the Senate's second century. Since those words were written, the Government has produced a White Paper, on the occasion of the Constitutional Conference recently concluded. Some of its proposals affect the Senate, and they should be discussed here and have been, but there is more than that in the White Paper.

The White Paper outlines a broad area of constitutional change. It would not be enough, if the provincial ministers and the federal ministers and their staffs alone should pass on these important matters. The subject calls, in my view, for a great national debate. Both Houses of Parliament should be involved in this debate. The work of remaking the Constitution is not easy. The piecemeal approach which heretofore prevailed has now been discarded. The question is not, "How to patriate the Constitution?" The question is, "What are we to have in the Constitution of Canada?" A wide area is open for discussion: not just the Senate; not just the Supreme Court; not just a Bill of Rights; not just the official languages problem.

I pay tribute in the first place to the Prime Minister for emphasizing the enormous onus cast upon all of us who are concerned with this gigantic task. I commend him for making it crystal clear that the Federal-Provincial Conference for some time to come, indeed for our time at least, I believe, will have a greater impact upon our national institutions than perhaps any other forum, including Parliament.

It is a new forum—the Federal-Provincial meeting. It was not contemplated by the British North America Act. But, as the Constitution is revised, it will profoundly affect the constitutional structure of this country.

Our perspective, honourable senators, in this honourable house should be just as wide. We would do a disservice to ourselves, and indeed to the Senate, if we were to restrict our concern to the Senate alone. We must decide in debate, in committee, and in our own individual public postures, how we can make this contribution. But we should observe one word of caution: We are only 102 people here. We have important committees at work. They consume time and they engage our personnel. Too much cannot be going on at one time. Likewise, with the Constitution, some areas will take longer to revise than others. Haste in this matter must indeed be tempered with prudence.

These remarks, honourable senators, are made by way of preface. To restore myself to order, I revert to the report. I propose to speak about the Senate in the context of paragraphs 20 and 21 of the report. I believe on the general subject matter of the Senate my personal views are well known. When I was here but a very short time I was presumptuous enough to write a pamphlet about it, which I entitled "Custodian of our Basic Freedoms". Sometimes, when I look at it again, I think that was a more appropriate title than might otherwise have been my choice. If we do think of the Senate and what it can be, it may very well turn out to be the "custodian of the basic freedoms of Canadians."

I have spoken, as so many of you have, before service clubs, before other groups and in universities. I have participated, as you have, on radio and television panels, and, like Senator Sparrow, I have been amazed how the work of the Senate has been so little appreciated by many of the people to whom I have spoken, and how glad they have been to know the kind of people who are here and the kind of work that is being done.

In the Senate itself, when I first became leader, I made a general survey of my concept of the Senate, as indeed our present leader did when he assumed the leadership. That survey of my own views of the Senate can be found in Hansard on page 30 of the session of 1964-65. At that time I expressed the view that I believed strongly in the principle of bicameralism. I paid my debt particularly to what I considered then, and still consider, to be the classic document on second chambers, the Bryce Report, made in England in 1917, outlining the functions of second chambers.

I have tried, honourable senators, in the years that I was in the leadership to apply the principles that are set out in that report. If I were to pick from among all other purposes for which a second chamber was designed, one outstanding purpose, I would say that the primary function of the second chamber is the legislative function. The Senate is not a debating society; it is not an ombudsman; it is not a policeman; it is not part of the executive of this country. It has been relieving the legislative load of the House of Commons by initiating legislation in it. In the last session 13 of the 14 private bills that were passed by Parliament were introduced here. As for public bills, in the last four sessions the percentages of public bills introduced here were respectively 42 per cent, 21 per cent, 28 per cent and 30 per cent.

I see that the House Leader in the other place, on February 20, indicated that before the end of this session there would be 21 more additional pieces of public legislation placed before Parliament. I am sure that the Leader in the Senate will see that every possible bill that can be started here will be started here. If so, a lot of parliamentary time will be saved.

But what about the future of the saving of parliamentary time? What about the future as a result of the change in the rules in the other place? Is the house going to run out of business for open debate, either with the Speaker in the Chair or in committee? Will the work that is being done in the standing committees under the new rules now cut down on the amount of debate that takes place in the full house? If this should happen, I see no harm. We have done this in the Senate with useful results for a good many years. But we should continue, in my humble opinion, to initiate as much public legislation in this house as we can.

As for the quality of the work, perhaps it does not lie in our mouths to say that it has been responsible. At times it has perhaps irked ministers because they do not like to see their legislation amended. But, on the whole, the ministers of the Crown, regardless who was in office, would agree that generally amendments made by the Senate to public bills were prudent amendments.

May I stress one other point, that nowhere in the great democracies of the world is the legislative function of the second chamber downgraded, frustrated or denied. It is generally acknowledged that a second chamber is a legislative chamber, that it is a deliberative chamber. As Senator Lambert used to say, "It is a legislative court of appeal." As Senator Meighen once said, "It is a workshop, not a theatre"—and Senator Roebuck has reminded us of this many times.

The recent White Paper in the United Kingdom on the reform of the House of Lords acknowledges the paramount importance of the legislative function of that body, even when it is proposing a radical reform of it. The Parliament Acts of the United Kingdom of 1910 and 1948, which restricted the power of the Lords in respect of public legislation, acknowledged the primacy of the legislative function. The Fathers of Confederation of this country acknowledged its primary importance. The Maritimes and Quebec would not have joined Confederation unless they had equal representation with Ontario in this honourable house, simply for the purpose of offsetting the power that was given to Ontario as a result of the larger representation, that arose from their larger population, in the Lower House. The French-Canadians in Quebec, both for linguistic and religious reasons, wanted the same kind of reassurance, and that is why they had 24 members in this house, to equal the 24 that were allotted to Ontario. Both of these groups, the Maritimes and Quebec, at the time of Confederation, wanted some assurances as to the trend the legislative process would take, and they got them. The legislative function is paramount to this house.

What, then, about the veto powers? True, when we defeat a public bill here we do not defeat the Government. But not once in the history of the Senate has the overriding veto power that we possess ever been a lasting challenge. The Senate has acted responsibly when there has been a mandate given to the Government in the other place. Those of us who were here will, I think, at least give those who sit on the Government benches at this time this accolade, that in the period from 1957 to 1963 we who were then of the Opposition recognized the mandate that the Government had, though its supporters could be counted on the fingers of very few hands on this side. There was only one occasion upon which a bill was not passed, and that bill was not brought back.

Having said all this, honourable senators, I sometimes wonder: Can there be any objection to curtailing this veto, say, on the second defeat here of a measure proposed in the other place by the Government? Perhaps this should be considered. Certainly, in 1910 and 1948 this loomed large in the United Kingdom, when the Parliament Acts were adopted. But the reasons there were different. There was in their Upper House at that time, as indeed there still is, a built-in Tory majority arising from the hereditary principle. This frustrated the Labour Party's objectives in 1948, just as it frustrated the Liberal Party's social security program and educational program in 1910. However, that situation is not ours, and I ask all honourable senators present: "Can today's Executive foresee the need to curtail the veto, that we now possess, in the next 25, 50 or 100 years?" Can the provinces foresee any need to do this? Can the people, indeed, foresee the need to do this, particularly viewing it in the background of the way the Senate has performed?

Suppose, though, the veto is curtailed, and suppose some extreme group acquires power through some mischance in the other house. In that extremity, would the curtailed veto provide apprehension or assurance? This is the practical question. Does the democratic process dictate that the veto be curtailed? If so, is this the right conclusion? The great Churchill reminded us, and let us not forget it, that good and all as the democratic process may be, it may not be the best process for the governance of people; it is only the best that man has been able to devise.

Let me speak for a moment about the method of appointment to this house. Much is said of this, and many answers are given. Election at large is one of them; nomination to a large extent by the provinces; and then abolition. Honourable senators, being an unrepentent believer in the bicameral system, I utterly reject, and with contempt, the N.D.P. proposal concerning the abolition of this house.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): All the experience of the great democracies of the world is against it. The N.D.P. have nothing to lose and everything to gain by advocating this proposal. If by some unfortunate mischance they should assume office in this country, without a Senate of their own making, they would have complete freedom to change the very character of Canadian institutions as we know them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think that election at large would never be countenanced by an elected House of Commons. An elected second chamber, without defined constitutional restrictions, would compete with the Lower House. It would not supplement its work; it would supersede it, in prestige and in power, and for obvious reasons.

We should face the possibility of an elected Senate, and if this should happen, then I think the powers would have to be restricted, if they were ever to be accepted by an elected House of Commons.

What about provincial nomination for the membership of part of the Senate? The reason assigned for doing this is to give more effective provincial or regional voice to the various parts of this country. Is this so effective an argument now when you contemplate, in the first place, the multiplicity of parties in the other place? Are we to admit that the federal authority is too incompetent to assure adequate provincial or regional voices in Parliament? Frankly, I doubt it.

Actually, provincial and regional representation is not a problem. We have provincial and regional representation now. The problem is a political problem. It is a problem of a demand for a voice in the Senate by the political party in office in a particular province. It is a demand from a province where the government is of a different political persuasion from that of the federal Government. Alberta has had a Social Credit government in office for 34 years, British Columbia for 17 years. Saskatchewan had a CCF government for 17 years. But, never in all those years has there been a representative of those political parties in this honourable house. I think few people, deep down, would deny that the Honourable E. C. Manning would have been an adornment to this house.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: He would be now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I think very few people would deny that M. J. Coldwell would have been an ornament here. But, would the provinces nominate men of this standing if they had the power to do so?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not much.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the federal and provincial authorities, as the White Paper suggests, "vie with each other for excellence of appointments?" I cannot, honourable senators, bring myself to think in terms of simplicity as naïve as this. Rather, I think that the political pressures at both the federal and provincial levels would result in more purely partisan appointments than we have seen in the last one hundred years of the history of this house. If it is desired to make of the Senate a chamber of more highly partisan debate, in my humble opinion that would be the way to begin.

I suggest that in the federal Parliament, the introduction of the expressly provincial element, even in a federal state like Canada, may add more complications to the already complicated parliamentary process. In the House of Commons now there are four political parties. For the most part they deal with national problems from the national point of view. Let us give them that tribute. Although their political motives do vary, their arguments seldom coincide with the approach made by the other parties with which they sit. The Government of the day must take these various factors into account.

Within the provinces, however, the political parties, with the same names, are often found to be advocating positions different from those of their federal counterparts.

In this house alone would this new political atmosphere prevail? Parliament in this way could easily be built into a Tower of Babel. How useful would this be to either the advancement of national unity or the promotion of regional and provincial welfare? There could easily develop in this house a political free-for-all.

The pressures for provincial nomination, however, may in fact become irresistible, and at the bargaining table they may become a trump card. If this happens I would hope that good sense will prevail. I should think that no more than 20 per cent of the senators should be of provincial nomination. Moreover, I strongly suggest that their term be no longer than the life of the provincial government which nominated them, even if there is a power to renominate.

What about term appointments? The British are about to endorse this view for voting peers, but it should be remembered that their house is not restricted to 102 members as is ours. Would it work in Canada to have term appointments?

Honourable senators, look around you. Consider the chairmen of our standing committees. They are among our most valuable members. All have had, and some continue to have, careers of distinction outside this house. Would men of this stature be persuaded to come here, almost full time, during six, or perhaps ten, of their best years? Would they want to enter a house more politically oriented than this house is now?

What about our many backbenchers of distinction? What about our promising younger men who have recently been appointed to this chamber? What about the Leaders on both sides, the Deputy Leaders, and indeed the Whips? Would they take 6- or 10-year appointments?

Look back for a moment to the men who have given national service here. I mention no names of present senators, but I will mention names like Dandurand, Meighen, Hugessen, Robertson, Lambert, Crerar, Power, Campbell and McCutcheon. Would a shorter term appointment have induced these gentlemen to assume the burden of work here? I doubt it.

The answer is to be found perhaps in a lowering of the retirement age, but if you look at the distinguished senators who carry the load of work here you wonder whether the retirement age of 75 is too high.

This proposal of a six-year term intrigues me. Is it mainly an idea borrowed from the United States practice by a very knowledgeable political economist? If it is, then it should be examined. Who are the most eminent and respected members of the United States Senate? Surely, the answer is that they are the most experienced and more capable people in the present Senate—men like Mansfield, Fullbright, Eugene McCarthy, Muskie, Javits, and Aiken, to mention a few. Review of the history of the United States Senate and you will confirm this view. If these men have served long and well it has been because they could be re-elected every six years. Either they performed, or they answered to their people. Obviously, these men have performed. Their names are household in the United States, and indeed in this country. But here, senators appointed for a six-year term would be answerable to but one of eleven men. Reappointment? Perhaps.

But what of their independence of thought and action, as Senator Roebuck reminded us the other day? Can this be preserved in these circumstances? Frankly, I doubt it.

We face another problem here. The academics do not see it, but those who want the Senate to function effectively, those who sit inside the Senate and try to make it function effectively, know it. I refer to the size of the Opposition. Honourable senators, in my own considered opinion when the number on the Opposition benches falls below 35 per cent of our membership the result is not good for this house or for the work it does.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Too few people are then overloaded with the critical work. When a party is out of office it is not as easy to examine bills, either for the house or for committees. The onus upon the leader opposite is oppressive when he has too few people around him. Perhaps the leader of the opposition party in the country should have the power to nominate a panel in such circumstances—unless, of course, by provincial nominees the opposition benches are going to be filled up. But is that an assured possibility? I pay my tribute to the work that is done by the Opposition here. If we ignore their problems—however misguided their political philosophy may be—I say we ignore their problems at our peril.

Frankly, I cannot get too excited over some of the proposed new powers for the Senate. We could with advantage criticize the work of cultural agencies sponsored by the federal authority. This would parallel in a sense work that is now being done by the Special Committee on Science Policy. Such work could be performed by select committees of the Senate, and at regular intervals. Without embarking upon details, I think I do the Executive, and perhaps the country, a service if I question the wisdom of nominees for the Supreme Court of Canada, of ambassadors and of heads of Crown corporations being approved by a committee or by the whole of this honourable house. I wonder what the other place would say if this proposal were finally adopted. Such a proposal may be appropriate in the United States where executive action is not subject to congressional approval or otherwise. That is not so under the parliamentary system.

I understand the Federal-Provincial Conference approved the establishment of five committees of ministers. Each is to have supporting staff. All of the committees will have a heavy work load, as all of us realize. I ask honourable senators, will any of these committees have any regard to the views of ordinary legislators, either federal or provincial? I acknowledge the need for the committees and for the serious consideration of the questions which will agitate them. But are they to report simply to the next federal-provincial meeting from behind closed doors? Are they to consult with anyone but the staff supplied to them? Does Parliament now wait for a consensus to emerge from the federal-provincial meeting as a result of the reports of these committees? Is Parliament then to be confronted with a consensus served up in legislative form? Or will there be a White Paper, and will the White Paper be debated? There is a heavy onus indeed cast upon the Government for getting solutions to these wide-ranging problems. I sympathize with the Government over the problems that confronts it in this respect. All I would say is, I believe that in this house we want to help.

There is a heavy onus, too, cast upon the Leader of the Government in this house, especially in respect of reform and change in the Senate. We want to help him too.

But, I repeat, let us not think for a moment that the problems affecting the Senate are either the most important or the only problems emerging from the federal-provincial meeting. If we do we shall be charged with promoting self-preservation and the maintenance of the status quo, and we shall be called reactionaries. If that happens, regardless of the merits of our views we shall not be heard in the court of public opinion.

Hon. L. M. Gouin: Honourable senators, it is very difficult for me to speak immediately following the eloquent address just delivered by Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). I wish to discuss only a few points which were not raised by him, and which are of a quite different order.

First of all it is my duty to congratulate Senator Molson, who I regret is not here tonight, on the excellent teamwork shown by him and the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate. Those rules, which I have examined carefully, impressed me most favourably. Tonight I want to discuss a few of the principles stated at the beginning of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee on the rules of the Senate. Paragraph 4 states that there is a > clear necessity for constitutional and statutory changes... in order to reach the objective of a modern and streamlined Parliament.

It is argued that such changes are required, in particular to allow the Senate > to make its maximum contribution to the welfare of the Canadian People.

Personally, I believe that much has been done by the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate without amending the Constitution. Constitutional amendments present very many difficulties, which are of a more than purely legal character, and Senator Connolly made some very wise remarks on that subject. We have to be prudent in dealing with such a vital matter. It is very often said that constitutional reform is long overdue, that after more than a century our Constitution should be overhauled. The public clamour for such alteration is especially strong in Quebec. But these changes must not be made merely for the sake of renovation. A clear majority of the voters must make up their minds what they want. The general public in my native province are interested mainly in matters having little or nothing to do with the Senate.

There is an extraordinary variety of changes which are now advocated without being clearly defined. Slogans are placed before the general public much more than definite programs.

Honourable senators, I am a federalist; I have always been and will always remain a federalist. I believe in a just and fair form of federalism, fully respecting provincial autonomy. This is the very best system which can possibly be devised for Canada as a whole, and for Quebec particularly. But sooner or later the electors will have to make a choice. They will have to choose between a renovated form of federalism on the one hand, and on the other hand, such unknown quantities as Quebec becoming an associated state, or Quebec obtaining its independence or securing a special status or obtaining merely additional powers.

I respect all those who want to reconstruct by constitutional means, though I differ in opinion from them. But there are others who do not want to reconstruct; they want to destroy. There are groups of terrorists in the Province of Quebec, particularly in Montreal. The situation has become very critical. We must have no illusion about that. There are groups at work who are purely and simply anarchists. They want conditions to become such that the economy of the Province of Quebec will be so deeply impaired that unemployment will become general. Then there will be riots, following which they hope to take power. That is the situation. They have clearly declared they want to destroy, to kill all federalists. Let us have no illusions about this; anything may happen any time under present circumstances.

I make these remarks to emphasize the seriousness of our constitutional problems. I wish to add that in subject matters other than Senate reform, there is an urgent need for us to offer to the Canadian people a program of wise and sound constitutional changes.

Now, I agree fully with the report under discussion when it recommends that more Government bills be introduced in the Senate. I wish to sincerely congratulate our distinguished Leader, the Honourable Paul Martin, for having secured for introduction in the Senate, during the present session, a record number of Government bills. This recognition of our usefulness in this sphere of action is for all of us a great encouragement to dedicate ourselves more than ever to the scrutiny of such public bills, to make a depth study of all their provisions and to assure ourselves that when those bills are passed here they are in a shape and form which will contribute to the welfare of the Canadian people.

A last remark, honourable senators. Should senators abstain from attending any party caucus? Personally, I am convinced that it is my duty to meet with the Liberal members of the House of Commons every week. In particular I attend regularly the Quebec caucus of the Liberal Party, and there I am in a position to know what the ideas are which inspire those members, who represent the City of Montreal and the province at large. In this way I am able to try to find the road where lies my duty as a good Canadian. If I abstain from attending the party caucus and isolate myself, then I cannot possibly exercise any influence or find any guidance for the attitudes which should be taken. At the present time those attitudes for every one of us are of capital importance.

In our national caucus I come into contact with the reactions of the representatives of the country at large, and thus I am able to realize what is possible in the way of reform, what are the practical aims which are desirable for preserving and strengthening our Canadian unity, a unity founded on diversity, on the respect of all creeds, all cultures, all races, all colours and all classes.

Politics, indeed, is the art of governing people, and our party system is the very basis of our Canadian democracy. It is only through a political party that we can have any positive action. My allegiance to the Liberal party seems to me the best way to serve Canada. It does not prevent me in any way from discharging impartially my duties as a senator. To date there has been no conflict of loyalties in my conscience between my devotion to my party and my constant intention to be a good Canadian, to do my utmost to preserve in Canada unity in diversity.

I try also—and I say this with all sincerity—to be a good Canadian of French expression, and in serving Canada I am not called upon to sacrifice my French Canadian people, their rights and their interests. French Canadians form part of Canada. Our patriotism must have a continental dimension. It must extend like our national territory from one ocean to the other and from our southern boundary to our Arctic frontier. Our country has the size of an empire, and everywhere within its gigantic magnitude I have the right to feel at home. I am nowhere a stranger in this great land of ours. "Au Canada mon pays mes amours," to quote one of our great patriots, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, Oh Canada, my beloved country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 12 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Leonard for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the Estimates and the Revised Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, which was presented on Thursday, February 6, 1969.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, I want to say that I concur fully with the remarks made by the honourable Senator Leonard when he opened the debate on the expenditures as proposed by the Estimates. I want especially to emphasize two points. The first is the federal expenditures for 1969-70. The expenditures for 1969-70 are over double the expenditures for 1959-60. They went from $6.2 billion to something over $12 billion. Also, provincial and municipal expenditures have grown even faster than federal expenditures. The sum total of the provincial and municipal expenditures now exceeds the spendings of the federal Government.

There is no doubt in my mind, from studying these figures, that one can come to but one conclusion, that we will have still higher taxes on all three levels.

Honourable senators, we are part of North America, and tax-wise we must be competitive. To be competitive, our taxes should be lower than Uncle Sam's. This is how I see it, and to explain it in a few words I must over-simplify. If Mr. "A" is a teacher, an accountant, a mechanic or an electrician, for every Mr. "A" employed in Canada there must be at least 30 or 40 employed in the United States. As a rule, wages are higher there, and therefore I say employment opportunities are greater below the border.

Honourable senators, if opportunities are less here, taxes should be less. Maintaining a high level of employment is our chief concern. We must keep our qualified people and we must attract others. If our economy slows down, we will not have work for the great numbers of the young people on whom we are spending so much money for education in high school and college every year.

Where do we stand? I think the ordinary man on the street here is taxed more heavily than his opposite number in the United States. This is a matter of vital importance, which we should know. At the next meeting of the Senate Committee on National Finance, I will move that the committee, in the course of its study of the Estimates, make a thorough study of the levels of taxation in the States of New York, Massachusetts, Illinois and California, and compare the findings with our own tax burden. There are many relevant statistics which are readily available, and the committee might also wish to study the very complete comparative figures published by the Organization for European Co-operation and Development.

Honourable senators, if I am wrong, if we find that our American cousins are taxed more heavily than we, let us publish it and broadcast it below the border; at least it will do us good. But if I am right, and if our taxes are higher here, the Senate should do something to halt this spiralling splurge of spending which is a serious threat to our prosperity.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

FOURTEENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE AT BRUSSELS, BELGIUM

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. Aird, calling the attention of the Senate to the Fourteenth Annual Conference of the North Atlantic Assembly held at Brussels, Belgium, 11th November to 15th November, 1968, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with all those who have commended Senator Aird for introducing the motion before us, permitting us to debate not only the subject of NATO but the basis of our foreign policy as well.

This motion is all the more timely because our whole foreign policy has been under review by the Government for nearly a year, and the Prime Minister himself has invited a wide public debate on this subject and has encouraged all interested citizens to take part in it.

I think that is a good thing. I presume that our foreign policy, insofar as our relationships with other countries are concerned, is under continuous review; but, it appears that what the Prime Minister has in mind is that we should examine more closely the basic principles on which our foreign policy rests, in the light of changes that have occurred since World War II and particularly during the past decade.

A clear statement of foreign policy made by the present Prime Minister is contained in a press release dated May 29, 1968.

He started out by calling attention to the significant changes—political, economical and technological—in our own country and in the world around us of which centennial year had made Canadians more aware. Then he went on to say, and I quote:

> We found ourselves questioning long standing institutions and values, attitudes and activities, methods and precedents that have shaped our international outlook for many years. We found ourselves wondering whether in the world of tomorrow, Canada can afford to cling to the concepts and the role casting which served us in our international endeavours of three decades or more.

He then summarized Canada's foreign policy objectives during that period, and I quote:

> "This country" played a leading part in shaping the multi-racial commonwealth, in promoting and supporting a universal united nations and in trying to keep NATO attuned to changing strategic and political requirements. We made a significant contribution to international aid.

And so the great debate was launched, and in the main it has revolved around Canada's future relationship with NORAD, NATO and Red China.

As I intend to keep myself strictly within the confines of the motion before us, my remarks will be limited to NATO. But with regard to recognition of Red China, I should like to make one observation.

When France withdrew from NATO and began to seek friendly relations with the U.S.S.R. and Red China—

Hon. Mr. Flynn: They have not withdrawn from NATO. They have just withdrawn from the integrated forces.

Hon. Mr. Carter: That is merely a technicality.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I doubt that.

Hon. Mr. Carter: A French writer posed this question to the French Government: "Is it a good bargain", he asked, "to exchange the friendship of the NATO Alliance, particularly that of the U.S.A., for the friendship of Russia and Red China?" Is it a good bargain? I think Canada should ask herself that question, too.

Now, to return to the great public debate on foreign policy. Apart from the participation of the Postmaster General, who wants "out" of NATO and the Minister of Defence, who wants Canada to stay in NATO, together with a few editorials based largely on their utterances, public participation has been disappointingly small. I do not think this is due to apathy or indifference on the part of the public. I think it is because the ordinary citizen feels that he does not have sufficient information on which to base any worthwhile opinion, let alone to make a decision.

The two ministers who have taken opposite sides publicly on this question have not been very helpful. In fact, the statement made by the Postmaster General in which he equates NATO with the Warsaw Pact as though they were similar organizations is misleading and harmful. To enlighten the public, the Postmaster General should have pointed out that the Warsaw Pact is not a voluntary free alliance of nations, as NATO is. The nations of the Warsaw Pact came together because Russia ordered them to do so, in fact, compelled them to do so, and recent events in Czechoslovakia make it quite clear that no member nation can withdraw from the Warsaw Pact without Russia's permission. As a matter of fact, if the Warsaw Pact were disbanded tomorrow, it would not make one iota of difference so far as the military situation is concerned. Yet the Postmaster General would have us believe that, if the Warsaw Pact were dissolved, it would have the same significance as the dissolution of NATO.

The two ministers may have been experimenting in ways to stir up a public debate; if so, the experiment failed because it did not inform the public and it created the impression of a divided cabinet.

On the other hand, a public debate on a matter so important as foreign policy is highly desirable, and this is a function that the Senate is well qualified to perform. Personally, I would like to see this debate continued in this chamber on an organized basis, with a whole day or even two days devoted to it, not one speech every two or three weeks as we have been doing.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is long enough.

Hon. Mr. Carter: With respect to NATO, there are three main questions to be considered: (1) Is NATO any longer necessary? (2) Should Canada remain in NATO? (3) If so, what should Canada's role be?

Let us take the first question, is NATO necessary? In his policy statement of May 29, 1968, to which I have already referred, the Prime Minister drew attention to the changes that had taken place in Canada and in Europe since World War II, and I quote:

> Canada's position in the world is now very different from that of the post-war years. Then we were probably the largest of the small powers. Our currency was one of the strongest. We were the fourth or fifth trading nation and our economy was much stronger than the European economies. We had one of the very strongest navy and air forces. But now Europe has regained its strength. The third world has emerged.

He then went on to give his Government's appraisal of the political situation in eastern Europe, and this is what he said:

> It is no longer realistic to think in terms of a single model of organization and development in eastern Europe; or of a monolithic communist unity such as Stalin could impose. There has been a perceptible detente in East-West relations. There has been a growing recognition in Eastern European countries of the need to adapt their economies to national needs, rather than adhere in a doctrinaire way to an economic model inspired largely by 19th century concepts. Although it remains true that there are some fundamental and far-reaching differences between us and the communist countries, it is no longer true to say that the communist world is monolithicly and implacably hostile to us.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: He said that before Czechoslovakia.

Hon. Mr. Carter: That statement, of course, was made prior to the rape of Czechoslovakia, which proved the assessment completely wrong. If the invasion of that country proved anything, it proved that European socialist countries, particularly members of the Warsaw Pact, are not going to be permitted to adapt their economies to national needs. That is exactly what Czechoslovakia was trying to do, in fact, was being forced to do, because the archaic concepts of the 19th century plus Russian imperialism was causing the Czechoslovakian economy to collapse.

The controls which the Russians are now exercising over the Czechoslovakian economy make it quite clear that no deviation is going to be permitted from the doctrinaire communist concept of the 19th century. At the same time, the curtailment of the rights and freedoms of the people of Czechoslovakia makes it equally clear that the monolithic communist unity, as imposed by Stalin, is still very much in existence.

I do not know how implacably hostile the Iron Curtain countries are towards the free world but, despite their professed desire for "peaceful co-existence" which the wishful thinkers among us mistakenly interpret as a desire for peace, I doubt very much that they have abandoned their goal of world conquest which was so aptly expressed by Khrushchev when he told the West, "We will bury you."

The cold brutal fact is that the threat from monolithic communist eastern Europe is every bit as great today as it was when NATO was created and that fact alone should be sufficient to justify its continuation.

But from the strategic point of view the situation now is even worse than it was in the post-war years. While the free nations of the world have been concentrating on butter, the U.S.S.R. has been concentrating on guns. The Russian army is tremendous, formidable both in terms of manpower and fire power. It is equipped with the most sophisticated weapons and armour that modern technology can provide. The Soviets have also realized that in many areas the strategic balance of power is today shifting to the sea. Consequently, for years the Soviet Union has been vigorously building up its strength in sea power and missiles. These two areas are currently receiving both funds and priority equalling and surpassing those of its outer space program which also is geared more to military use rather than to space exploration. It is estimated that Russia is spending some $37.5 billion on its naval and missile programs this year—far more than it ever has spent on its army budget. Why? Because a modern, highly mobile, missile-equipped navy roaming about in the 70 per cent of the earth's surface that is water is one of the most effective ways to gain control of the 30 per cent that is land.

Russia has recently made the momentous decision to start building aircraft carriers—what Khrushchev once called "the floating coffins of capitalism". She is making her debut in this field with huge 30,000 to 40,000 ton ships which will surpass in size similar United States vessels, and already the Soviet submarine fleet outnumbers that of the United States 375 to 200.

The Red Navy now possesses a submarine fleet which can bring Europe and the United States under fire with 130 to 200 nuclear warheaded ballistic missiles. An increase to 300 by 1972 is planned. They are no less dangerous to the ocean-bordered United States than America's approximately 450 polaris and poseidon missiles are to the USSR.

With the increase in naval power, Russia is developing a new forward naval strategy, and as the first area of operation for this strategy, they have chosen the Mediterranean.

In early 1967 scarcely a dozen Soviet warships were plowing through Mediterranean waters. Today more than fifty Soviet units—including the most advanced missile cruisers and submarines—are plying the waves from Gibraltar to Bosporus. The USSR has quadrupled her naval forces in the Mediterranean in little more than one year and no end of the build-up is in sight. In other words, Russia is busily establishing a firm foothold all along NATO's southern flank.

Turkey, a NATO member who is not at all sure that she should be, allows the Soviet Union free passage into the Mediterranean through the Bosporus and Dardanelles. All Turkey requires is advance notice.

Egypt and Syria have opened, for Soviet use, their vital naval ports at Alexandria and Latakia respectively. In return, the USSR has placed in the hands of these unstable countries some 70 naval units consisting of torpedo boats, missile launches, gun boats, minesweepers, submarines and destroyers.

In Algeria the Soviets are making a bid for full use of the strategic naval built base at Mers-El-Kebir. Incidentally, Algeria has already been the recipient of six Soviet missile-carrying gun boats and eight P-6 torpedo boats.

Over on Malta the Russians are offering to fill the economic vacuum left by the withdrawal of British forces. Malta, situated between Italy on the north and pro-western Libya and Tunisia on the south, would make an important base because it would enable the Soviets to interfere with the passage of oil to Europe from these oil-rich regions. The Russians are interested in opening the Suez Canal and are already negotiating for a base at Aden which would give them control of the Suez Canal route.

Incidentally, while Russia is gaining Mediterranean bases, Britain and the U.S. are being threatened with further losses. The pact granting the U.S. use of the vital Mediterranean Polaris base at Rota has just expired and Spain is asking an extremely high price to renew the agreement, while at the same time she is putting mounting pressure on Britain to give up Gibraltar.

Now let us look at the Baltic. There the Soviet Union maintains 140,000 naval personnel aboard about five cruisers, 24 destroyers, 20 frigates, 100 submarine chasers, 130 minesweepers, 70 submarines and 180 torpedo boats. In addition there is naval air force with 250 planes and another 1,000 aircraft divided into three air forces stationed near the coast and 100 amphibious vehicles for a first landing wave of four to five Soviet divisions. This is roughly four times the combined potential West German and Danish strength in this area.

In the face of these facts it should be clear that if the West intends to protect its freedoms, the only way it can be done is through collective security organized along the lines of the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance.

Having said that, however, I do not mean to imply that NATO's performance has been satisfactory or that as it exists today it can be considered adequate to the task before it.

True, as Senator Lang pointed out, World War III has not yet become a hot war, but I, for one, believe that is due as much to circumstance as to the existence of NATO. Up to the time of the missile crisis in Cuba the real deterrent to war was the U.S. policy of massive nuclear retaliation. When Khrushchev tested the U.S. on this policy and found that they really meant business, not only Khrushchev, but the NATO allies too, got scared. It was only after the great confrontation over Cuba that NATO members began to appreciate the need for conventional forces on the theory that to avoid nuclear retaliation, Russia, in any attack on the West, would use conventional forces, at least in the early stages.

Prior to that, NATO members had provided only token forces to NATO. When I was a delegate to NATO—in 1961, I think, the year of the Berlin Wall—I was astonished to find that only two or three members had actually kept their full commitment to NATO. Canada was one, I am happy to say. The U.S.A., I believe, was another, and one or two smaller nations like Denmark or Belgium. The majority of European nations had provided only skeleton forces. True, they had their quota of divisions there but only in skeleton form. They were mostly paper divisions, not fully operational.

We can hardly blame General DeGaulle for withdrawing from that kind of setup. Why should he continue to perpetuate something that was more shadow than substance?

Since 1961 the situation has probably worsened. NATO members have given even greater priority to butter than to guns. All sorts of welfare programs have been initiated, and the extra cost has exceeded increases in production and external trade to the extent that deficits have occurred in their international balance of payments which, in turn, along with inflation, has undermined the value of the pound sterling and the American dollar as reserve currencies. This has created recurring financial crises in countries tied to these currencies. Consequently, Britain and possibly other countries too have been pressing for a reduction of their commitments to NATO.

The attention of the U.S.A. has been focussed on South East Asia to such an extent that NATO has been relegated to secondary importance while the cost of the Vietnam war, together with an unfavourable balance of payments, have resulted in great pressure on the U.S. government to recall a considerable portion of their troops under NATO command.

To rationalize this, they propounded the theory of massive air lift from the U.S.A. to Europe. This was tried out recently and found impractical. The transatlantic airlift of 12,000 U.S. troops to NATO manoeuvres within 30 miles of the Czech border was so upset by bad weather that the Bild Zeitung commented sarcastically, "U.S. soldiers presumably are now manoeuvring in defence of the Federal Republic in England, Spain, the Azores..." Even with good weather, the scheme is impractical because Soviet planes could bomb the airfields out of existence before the airlift was half way across the Atlantic. The fact that such a gamble could be given serious consideration by military minds indicates the declining importance they attach to NATO.

That the situation with respect to conventional forces in NATO has not improved is indicated by the fact that the Warsaw Pact forces outnumber NATO forces two to one in aircraft, more than two to one in manpower and three to one in armoured units. This fact was underscored a few days ago by the Defence Minister of the United Kingdom who said that NATO forces could not hold out more than two or three days against a Warsaw Pact force attack. The only alternatives for NATO would be to use nuclear weapons or surrender.

NATO was created to serve two purposes. One is to provide a temporary shield to absorb an initial thrust so as to allow adequate time for the West to mobilize defences. This function, NATO can no longer perform. The other purpose is to provide a military system which would guarantee the legitimate defence needs of West Germany but in which West Germans themselves would not have a dominant role.

As NATO allies have reduced or reneged on their commitment of conventional forces to NATO, West Germany has been encouraged, I think one might say even compelled, to fill the vacuum, with the result that West German ground forces now play a dominant role. In fact, NATO is dependent upon them.

NATO has many other weaknesses, which I pointed out in a speech in this chamber on March 31, 1968. Events that have transpired since that date have rendered my comments even more valid than they were then.

Since NATO is no longer capable of performing the functions for which it was created, obviously there are only two sensible things to do. One is to restore its capability, and the other is abolish it altogether, and go back to relying on the old deterrent of massive nuclear retaliation advocated by late John Foster Dulles.

I do not see how anyone who has had any war experience at all can honestly believe that a conventional war involving the great powers will not eventually escalate into a nuclear war. War is like that. National survival is at stake, and, once engaged in a life and death combat, the great opposing powers will use every means at their disposal to win, even nuclear weapons. Flexible response through use of conventional forces is a plausible theory but it can lead to a false sense of security and, to that extent, it can be dangerous. It is essential therefore that NATO be strong enough to prevent an attack even being considered.

Of the two courses, collective security through an organization like NATO is obviously to be preferred. It has many more advantages and provides many more opportunities than the term implies, provided, of course, it is not a sham, but real collective security in the fullest sense.

However, if NATO members really want that kind of NATO organization, they will have to tighten their belts and rearrange their spending priorities, and that applies to Canada too. If NATO members prefer to live in a fool's paradise, I see no point in continuing the present alliance merely as a disguise for it. Freedom has a price and no nation should expect to enjoy it at another nation's expense. It is a matter of national honour. It would be shameful for Canada to say: "The U.S.A. has to defend us anyhow. We don't need to spend money on defence." To me that course is unthinkable. Despite Soviet smiles, despite their talk of peaceful co-existence and their attempts to cast themselves in peacemaker roles, the threat to freedom has increased rather than diminished in recent years.

That threat can be met in part by a revamped and revitalized NATO; a NATO in which all members make and honour fully the necessary commitments to ensure adequate capability not only to resist attack but to make attack unthinkable; a NATO whose members are prepared to co-ordinate their trade policies, their scientific research programs, their production capabilities, and their foreign aid; a NATO whose members are prepared to give these matters priority over domestic affairs, and who are determined to achieve unity among themselves by frequent consultation and every other means; a NATO which will take cognizance of the fact that Communist influence and Communism itself has greatly expanded in the post war years, and that 90 per cent of Soviet gains in that period has been achieved not by force of arms but by political and ideological warfare. In short, a NATO capable not only of military defence but capable also of taking the offensive in ideological, economic and political warfare. Anything short of that will not be adequate. If the Free World decides to set up such an organization, should Canada be a member of it? Here we come to the fundamentals of Canadian foreign policy. This will include not only our appraisal and assessments of the world situation, our immediate goals and long term objectives, but also of the motives that lie behind our objectives.

I have been in Parliament long enough to be convinced that what is not morally right cannot be right politically, economically or socially. True, some short term advantage may accrue, but in the long run it fails because it leads to situations and creates other problems that are worse than the old ones. If the motive is not morally right the objective is certain to prove wrong.

I sometimes feel that we tend to deceive ourselves as to the true motives which lie behind our policy moves. What, for example, is the true motive behind the policy of recognizing the government of Red China—not so much the people of Red China, but the government. I know there is plenty of rationalization for it, such as de facto government, one-quarter of the world's population, and all that. But let us put aside rationalization and be absolutely honest about the true motive. What is it? Is it that we honestly believe that by so doing we can advance the cause of freedom and of world peace? If so, how? Is it to demonstrate our independence of U.S. influence, or is it because we expect to obtain some material benefits by way of expanded trade, more wheat sales, et cetera? Until we know what the true motives are, we have no way of judging whether our foreign policy is right or wrong, good or bad.

Before we can decide about NATO, we must examine the true motives that are activating those who want Canada to stay in NATO, and those who want her to get out. The Minister of Defence and the Minister of External Affairs, as I understand them, say they want Canada to stay in because it is a cheap way of giving us a voice in the councils of the nations of the world. The Postmaster General says he wants out because we are not getting value for our money in terms of collective security, and he thinks Canada would get better value if we used the money for foreign aid, or for domestic programs to expand welfare or to fight regional disparity. But are these the real motives, and, if so, are they adequate? I must confess I do not find them too overpowering.

Of course, the breakup of NATO is one of the prime objectives of Soviet policy, and this in itself would be the true motive of Canadian communists, their sympathizers and fellow travellers, who urge Canada to withdraw from NATO. These are the people who, in the face of events in Czechoslovakia and the Middle East, would have us believe that members of the ruling apparatus of the Soviet Union are really lovers of peace.

The fact that the breakup of NATO is a Soviet policy objective is one of the best reasons we could have for retaining it. But, there are many Canadians who hate Communism, and still advocate Canada's withdrawal from NATO. The Postmaster General is one. When it comes to members of the government, rightly or wrongly, one gets the impression that the motive is somewhat tainted with economic and possibly political implications. Our present budget situation is such that any means of decreasing federal expenditures is most welcome, and withdrawal from NATO would help considerably to relieve the financial burden. But, should this be the over-riding consideration?

If we believe that the threat to freedom remains undiminished, that one of Canada's front lines of defence against that threat runs through Europe, that a system of collective security, uniting the free nations of the world in a common defence structure, is the best safeguard against that threat, then surely Canada should be a member of that organization.

If we are not prepared to face these facts, or if it can be shown there is a better way of protecting our freedom, then Canada should remain outside the alliance, but in either case there should be only one motive, namely, to enable Canada, within her limitations of manpower, money and materials, to make the maximum contribution to her own defence and to that of the free world. This is the motive that should over-ride all other considerations whether they be economic, political or financial.

Canada's decision to remain in NATO will be closely related to the role that she is best equipped to play. Military strength depends on economic strength. I think it is quite clear that, having regard to our state of finances, the strike-reconnaissance role is too heavy a burden for our economy to support at the present time unless we are prepared to make a drastic rearrangement of our priorities. Our present military budget is not sufficient for all our defence needs. Any savings resulting from integration have been swallowed up in salary increases and rising costs of materials and equipment. As a result, our worn out and obsolete equipment is not being replaced as quickly as was hoped.

The strike-reconnaissance role requires aircraft with very sophisticated electronic equipment and missiles with nuclear warheads. These are very costly to provide and become costlier as new generations of equipment replace the old. Canada has never been happy about this role because of its association with nuclear warheads. We do not mind supplying the nuclear ingredients out of which they are made. We do not mind taking advantage of the protection afforded when they are used by others, but we do not want to stain our own hands by using them ourselves.

Perhaps Canada should retain this role if it is still necessary. Somebody has to do it. Perhaps we should make the necessary sacrifices to enable our economy to support it. Perhaps we can exchange it for a ground support role or for more armoured units. These are decisions that can be made only in the light of all the factors prevailing at that time.

But whatever military role Canada might assume, there are many other valuable contributions Canada can make whose financial costs will be negligible. For example, I would like to see Canada pioneer the use of ideological warfare, and work to have the NATO allies place it on the same footing as military warfare, as Red China and the Soviet Union have done. Above all, I would like to see Canada take the initiative in fostering mutual respect, trust and confidence among NATO members, and in creating unity among them—a unity which can only be founded on the bedrock of absolute honesty and integrity, without which no alliance can be effective or can long hold together.

The overriding aim of foreign policy is to bring about a peaceful world. That has to be created. There is no magic formula for it, but if Canada, honestly admitting past mistakes, started out in faith—and I stress these two words, "in faith"—to build a new society, strictly adhering to the principles and values in which we profess to believe, I think the results at home and abroad would be so startling that the communists would want to join in and help us instead of trying to bury us. That, honourable senators, in my opinion, is the only way a lasting peace can be achieved.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, February 26, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

HON. ARTHUR W. ROEBUCK

FELICITATIONS ON APPROACHING NINETY-FIRST BIRTHDAY

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I have to be away tomorrow, and as we do not expect to be sitting on Friday I thought without establishing, for myself at any rate, a precedent I would anticipate the anniversary on Friday of one of our members, Senator Roebuck, who on that day will be 91 years of age. I need not say to honourable members what a unique figure in the public life of Canada he is. I think it well that a man who has made such a rich contribution to Canadian political and national life should be honoured for what he is and for what he has done. All his colleagues in the Senate are very proud of him as a man and as a senator.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We all recognize his contributions to our deliberations over a long period. We recognize the contribution he has made in this house, as a Member of Parliament in the other place, and as a member of the legislature in the Province of Ontario; a distinguished public man and an outstanding individual on all counts. The best tribute I can pay to Senator Roebuck, as he sits in good health, full of vigour and continuously interested in our deliberations, is to say that the Senate hangs on his tongue.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, last year on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday Senator Roebuck invited us to celebrate his one hundredth anniversary. I am quite sure that he will be here at that time. I do not see that the talks about Senate reform will change anything about that.

I am particularly pleased to say that every compliment we paid Senator Roebuck last year is as valid a year later. He is still in the perfect health and control of all his faculties as he was then, and I am convinced that he will be in the same state of mind and health when he reaches his one hundredth anniversary. We only wish that we will all be here to join with him.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: May I join with the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government in the hope that you will all be at my hundredth birthday, to which I now invite you. I think I will hire the armouries for that occasion.

Thank you, Senator Martin, for the very lovely statement you made. I do not know how one can reply properly to such compliments.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Tell us the story.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Well, all right, I will. I am not supposed to tell what happens in the caucus, but I would not be giving away serious secrets if I tell you that the caucus gave me a wonderful reception this morning, one that warmed my heart, just as the occasion which you are giving me now.

It is quite marvelous. I plead guilty to the one charge that was made by the Government Leader, that is, of the long time that I have been in public life. It has now been nearly sixty years since I entered public life in Timiskaming. I have been in public office for thirty-five years. The best part of all this experience has been the twenty-four years I have been in the Senate. They have been wonderful years. What has been most happy about these years has been the warm friendships that exist among us all, not just between one and another of similar parties, but among us all. I refer to that good fellowship, that sincere wish so often expressed for the health and the welfare of each other.

I see my friend Senator Sullivan, the doctor, nodding his head. He is interested, as doctors always are, in the welfare of us all.

What Senator Smith suggests I shall carry out, notwithstanding the objection to twice-told tales. I told in the caucus this morning of my recipe for longevity. I read in a newspaper recently an explanation given by an old fellow in the same position as myself, of how you do it. He said that during his long life he had never wasted his time or vitality in resisting temptations.

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: As a matter of fact, most temptations are not temptations to any of us in this chamber.

May I join most heartily in the good wishes that my two leader friends have expressed by extending them to all of you. I hope all of you will be in the very best of good health to accept my invitation to the celebration of my hundredth birthday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne, chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science reported that the committee had considered Bill C-152, to amend the Veterans' Land Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to, on division.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

USE OF BROADCAST FACILITIES BY RENE LEVESQUE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the inquiry of Hon. L. P. Beaubien:

1. How many hours did Mr. Rene Levesque speak on the C.B.C. Radio during calendar year 1968?

2. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these talks, and if so, how much?

3. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for the time he was on the air on C.B.C. Radio, and if so, how much?

4. During calendar year 1968 for how many hours did Mr. Levesque appear on the C.B.C. Television?

5. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these appearances, and if so, how much?

6. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for his television appearances, and if so, how much?

7. How much would the C.B.C. have charged in the ordinary course of business:
(a) for the time Mr. Levesque spoke on C.B.C. Radio,
(b) for the time Mr. Levesque appeared on C.B.C. Television?

Hon. Paul Martin: I had hoped that we would have a reply yesterday. I inquired of the minister this morning, and the answer is not ready yet. There is a lot of detail involved. They are trying to make haste—I hope they will make haste quickly.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Do you suppose we will have the information for the hundredth anniversary of Senator Roebuck?

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I note that this inquiry by the honourable Senator Beaubien was tabled on January 22. It seems to me that the questions put to the departments concerned are very simple. The information requested should have been kept on record from day to day, in the log or in the accounting department, as to what had to be paid to Mr. Levesque for these broadcasts, if anything.

It seems to me that somewhere along the line there is some negligence, if we have to wait from January 22 to beyond this day for an answer to such simple questions as these. It is not complicated. The books are either kept or they are not; if they are not kept, someone should place some blame for it; if they are kept, we should know the answers.

It seems to me that this delay is being used as a cooling-off period, and I do not think we should wait much longer for a reply.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I can only repeat that I have made the same arguments, although not as ably, and, I hope, with good results.

Inquiry stands.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Eric Cook moved the third reading of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in speaking on this very able Fourth Report on the Rules, my first comment is to congratulate Senator Molson and his colleagues on that committee for a thoroughgoing job.

Of course, in this report we are dealing only with that part of the continuing report of the committee which some honourable senators have referred to as the obiter dicta, and I hope that if and when we pass the motion that has been moved by Senator Molson, there will not be any suggestion that every recommendation made by the committee is necessarily binding on those who, in due course, vote for the report.

On the whole I found myself in general agreement with the recommendations that the committee has put before us, but there are one or two with which I would disagree. In running my eye down the numbered paragraphs seriatim I think it should be pointed out immediately that the committee was well aware that to some extent it was going beyond its terms of reference. The committee tells us in paragraph 4:

> In the course of study, however, it became apparent that amendments to the Rules would not be sufficient to enable the Senate to carry out effectively its role as one of the three vital parts of the Parliament of Canada...

Further on in the paragraph the committee said:

> —your Committee soon realized that revision of Rules only could not accomplish this purpose. There emerged the clear necessity for constitutional and statutory changes beyond the terms of reference of the Committee in order to reach the objective of a modern and streamlined Parliament.

In Paragraph 20 the committee made this recommendation:

> —your Committee in making its report therefore recommends that the Senate instigate an examination of the constitution of the Senate with a view to recommending changes which would enable it to carry out more fully the purpose which was intended in making it one of the three essential parts of parliament.

I find myself in the fullest agreement with the committee on that, and I would hope that it will not be regarded as just a pious hope, or something to be pigeon-holed. The committee definitely recommends that this Senate investigate itself.

I think we are all agreed that we seem to have developed some skill over the years in examining and investigating others. The mood of some in the country at the moment may well be: "Physician, heal thyself." My suggestion, particularly to the honourable Leader of the Government, is that we should lose no time in embarking upon this very important and critical self-examination.

My own impression, honourable senators—and I am not being critical when I say this—is that over the last few months anyway we have tended too much to rely on self-praise as a kind of self-defence. I think most of us know that self-praise is very seldom good self-defence. Perhaps we protest too much. Too often, I think, we give the impression that we do not want any change. It is true that almost every speaker in debate on this motion has agreed that we must have change, but over and over again I read in the speeches the implication that not too great a change is necessary.

Honourable senators, the fact of the matter is that the press of Canada, particularly the political press, and the public generally, feels that this Senate is not as useful a body, as important a body, or as essential a body as the Fathers of Confederation considered it to be, or as I am sure all honourable senators consider it to be. Surely we should not merely say that everybody else is wrong. There must be a reason, although not necessarily a well-founded reason, why we are continually under this kind of criticism. Surely, when you are under criticism, it is good to say: "What is wrong with me?" I think there are things wrong with the Senate, but I shall not go into them in great detail today.

The committee has made some specific recommendations. By and large they tend to be superficial, although necessary. From my reading of the report it has not gone to the root of whatever problem there may be in regard to the future usefulness of this chamber.

As to these recommendations, I speak first to those with which I find myself in agreement. In paragraph 7, the suggestion that the Senate should perhaps be the originating point of all private bills seems to make sense. I feel it would require rather more examination than has been given here, but there is a very important role for the Senate in taking some of the weight of legislation off the other place, and the introduction of all private bills here might very well be a good way to accomplish that result.

In paragraph 9 the suggestion is made that special committees of the Senate could carry some of the work of Royal Commissions at a fraction of the cost that would be incurred. I think the evidence of the work of some of our special committees more than justifies that suggestion. Our new rules contain a recommendation on budgeting for some of our committees. We should pay very careful attention to this, if we are to assume this important role in the future, because one of the criticisms of Royal Commissions in the recent past has been what appears to some to be the excessive expenses incurred by them. I hope we would put all our committees on a basis of budgeting in advance, before money is spent. This has not been the custom in the past.

I will omit reference to some of the paragraphs, either because I am not in agreement with them or because they do not contain definite recommendations.

Paragraph 11 refers to what I consider is a very important role that the Senate could undertake. The committee reports:

> The era we now live in reveals a great deal of public discussion and considerable evidence of the danger of parliamentary democracy deteriorating into an authoritarian executive supported by a strong and experienced bureaucracy, with Parliament itself relegated to the role of a debating society.

Perhaps the most important single function this chamber might perform in the future in the interests of Parliament as a whole would be to stand as a bulwark between the ever-increasing powers assumed by the executive and by the bureaucracy. I am glad to say that in this I believe I have the complete support of the Prime Minister, who has made some very broad far-reaching statements on this subject. Indeed, he has said that the matter I have just referred to is one of the most important facing Parliament today. I said the other day in commenting on another bill that I have always been amazed that Parliament has never set up any mechanism to examine critically regulations made by order in council. It is true that the other place has now set up a mechanism which may do this partially by providing for a committee to at least look at regulations.

As I said the other day, there are two aspects of this. One is the necessity or otherwise of giving extraordinary powers to the Governor in Council. The second is the operation of these regulations, because if anybody, particularly any of my legal friends, will examine some of the regulations passed, I think they will conclude that many of them are clearly ultra vires the authority given to the Governor in Council under the act. I refer particularly to those acts in which authority is given to the Governor in Council "to make regulations necessary for the implementation of the act."

One of many cases in point that comes to mind concerns the Limitation of Hours of Work Act. When the department responsible was before the committee considering that act they told us that in certain cases they had extended the statutory hours to 15 and had decided it was not necessary to carry out the instructions of Parliament that there should be a minimum wage, at that time of $1 an hour. They said, "We will allow certain firms to designate some of their employees as apprentices and pay them 75 cents." I suggest that this is a case in which the authority assumed under the regulations goes far beyond the power given to the Governor in Council. The act sets out what is to be the rule in Canada within the jurisdiction of the federal Government and for contractors dealing with the federal Government, namely, an eight-hour day and, at that time, a $1 an hour minimum wage. Surely any regulation that changes that basic principle is ultra vires the authority given to it. I suggest that there are many such cases in the history of the exercise of this power to make regulations.

I do not intend to suggest today what specific function the Senate could undertake. However, it appears to me that somewhere in the parliamentary process there should be an automatic and immediate scrutiny of all regulations to see that they are at least intra vires the authority given. That might very well be a useful function for a committee of the Senate. Some will say that would involve a tremendous amount of time. I do not think it would. Such a committee, if provided with capable legal assistance would leave most of the work to the assistant, who would bring to the attention of the committee matters that he regarded as worth consideration. The fact is that at the moment there is no statutory parliamentary mechanism for scrutinizing these regulations.

The encroaching power of the executive on Parliament, which is referred to in the report is a problem we will have to live with. In modern times it is not very easy to revert to the old time parliamentary control of government, because government functions have expanded into so many areas in which quick decisions must be made and policies implemented speedily.

However, if our system is to survive, the Senate or some appropriate body must have the responsibility of standing between the executive and Parliament—and I emphasize the word responsibility. It seems to me that this may well be what the committee had in mind in the recommendation it makes.

Paragraph 14 is one with which I find myself in some disagreement. This is the paragraph that suggests that senators should not attend caucuses of their parties. There is room for debate on that, but I cannot find myself in agreement with this particular statement:

> —In order to weigh legislation in the light of only what is best for the country, it is obviously difficult for members of the Senate to be subject to the direction of the same person who leads their party in the House of Commons.

It is beyond me to understand how any committee of members of this chamber could find themselves in agreement with that statement. As far as I am concerned, it certainly is not so, because I attend a caucus of my party, that I am subject to the direction of the same person who leads the party in the House of Commons. I think most honourable senators will agree that this is a statement of non-fact in the report of the committee.

Paragraph 15 speaks of the necessity or the desirability of a change in the concept of a "money bill." I agree in general that that is so, although my own feeling is that today it is largely an academic question. The electoral basis of the Commons is surely sufficient to deal with that situation generally, and we have also the inquiry instigated by Senator Hayden which indicates that the argument may be even more hypothetical than it was regarded in earlier times. There is, of course, the anomaly that if there is this rule about "money bills", as is stated over and over again in the authorities which we heard here quoted, it is obviously honoured more in the breach than in the observance. Over and over again we initiate money bills in the very sense of the authorities, in this house. It might be well to clear this up so that there is a definition of a money bill, and I do not think it will cause any great controversy between the two houses.

Paragraph 16 deals with Royal Assent. Here again I find myself in disagreement with the committee, if the committee is suggesting that the ceremony of Royal Assent in this chamber is to be abolished. I would be inclined to agree that the ceremony might be shortened and some of the symbolism deleted. On the other hand, I think it is of utmost importance that we remember that Royal Assent given in a House of Parliament is in itself a necessary reminder that Parliament is the Senate, the House of Commons, and the Crown. To remove the ceremony of Royal Assent from this chamber would, I think, be a retrograde and a very unfortunate step.

In the same paragraph, I agree fully with the suggestion that property requirements of senators are an anachronism and, also in that paragraph, the suggestion that credit should be given to senators for attendance in committees. However, I think the corollary might be put forward, that non-attendance at committees might be regarded as an absence affecting the sessional indemnity.

Paragraph 18 suggests a clarification of the present rules regarding joint committees and is obviously an overdue reform.

I come again, honourable senators, to paragraph 20 and the recommendation that the Senate instigate an examination of the constitution of the Senate. Although the motion refers to the obiter dicta of the reports of the committee, I think I would be within the rules of relevance if I made a few comments on the rules themselves, under paragraph 3, which recommends that the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders be instructed to keep under constant study the rules and to recommend periodically revisions thereto. There may already be some revisions desirable, if not necessary.

The first important thing I wish to suggest is that if we make new rules, we keep them. We seem to get into a habit of regarding our rules in a very offhand manner. I think some of the consequences do not in the long run do credit to the Senate.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to what I can only call new Rule 2A. I do not know if any honourable senator has a copy of the new rules that we passed some weeks ago. I have not seen one. I call it Rule 2A because that is how it was designated in our Hansard which is, as far as I know, the only reference that I can use. Rule 2A says:

> Any rule, or part thereof, may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended being distinctly stated.

Now, I take it that there is a good purpose in wording that rule that way, and I wonder if this does not mean that we are out of order every time somebody rises here and says, "by leave, I move". The rule states that if any rule or part thereof is to be suspended, the rule or part must be distinctly stated. That is a good rule. We should know the rules that we are setting aside on every specific occasion when we set aside our rules. I rather regret that the committee did not continue a further qualification in the old rules which required that the purpose of the proposed suspension be also distinctly stated. Whether it becomes a new rule or not, it could well be a custom that might be observed here. I personally would like, when the Leader of the Government, for example, suggests that we waive the normal time between the readings of bills, that we be told why it is necessary.

I do not think it makes good sense for any deliberative legislative body to set aside its rules merely because someone asks that they be set aside without saying what rule is to be set aside and without saying why. There is a very easy way in which any senator can intervene, but most of us do not like to do so too often in such matters. We can of course refuse leave until we are told why. The much simpler way would be for those requesting leave to tell us why.

Honourable senators, there are other rules to be considered. One which affects His Honour, is to the effect that when the Speaker rules a senator out of order or calls him to order, he will state the rule under which the senator is called to order. It is not for me to suggest to His Honour how he should conduct the affairs of this chamber—because I am one who has the greatest admiration for the way he does it. However, as I am one who is occasionally called to order—perhaps more often than some others—I merely say that it would be helpful to me if, when His Honour in his wisdom finds me out of order, he tells me the rule under which I am out of order so that I can go home and study it and not offend again.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. I hope the honourable Senator Grosart will remember that when we have a set of rigid rules it is easy for the Chair to state under which written rule a senator is out of order—which, by the way, does not happen very often. As he knows, we have also many unwritten rules, which are more numerous than the written rules. I am preparing a document which will be my bible, which contains a resumé of the written rules found in the red book, and also of the unwritten rules, where the authorities, the experts, have written on these points.

It is not always easy to state specifically under which rule an honourable senator might be out of order. But surely in the case of unwritten rules I must be in a position, at the time, at least to refer to the authority or the author and specify the page where this point is mentioned. I am not yet prepared, but I presume that I will be in a position in a week or two to have my bible up to date. I hope that will satisfy honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that there is an unwritten rule which may be of use to Senator Grosart, that the Honourable the Speaker will not intervene unless some senator objects.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: On that point, Your Honour, I would suggest that the Committee on the Rules be empowered to write the unwritten rules.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Senator Grosart, I am sure you are sorry you ever mentioned it!

Hon. Mr. Grosart: In reply to Senator Croll, may I say that, far from being sorry, I am very glad I did, because I seem to have an indication here that I am not the only one who has been concerned about this situation.

It certainly is not for me to discuss the very wise comments made by His Honour. He has indicated to us that he has the matter under consideration. I am particularly glad that that is so, as we are in a new situation. Under our new rules, we have removed the rule which stated that when a matter was not otherwise covered we should look to the Rules of the House of Lords. I am very happy that that has been taken out. I do not think it is of any particular concern to us what the House of Lords rules are.

Another point is that the authorities who are so often referred to, by and large are not very conversant with the rules or the customs of this chamber. Anyone who consults them will agree with me in that. The rules which apply to the House of Commons cannot automatically be said to apply here.

Honourable senators, I might mention one particular matter which has come up many times in this chamber and which illustrates the point. I refer to the rule regarding references to debates in the other place. I have heard honourable senators make scathing comments on members of the other place within the last year, without any intervention by another senator or by His Honour. On the other hand, there have been occasions when a mere reference to a subject under debate in the other house was challenged.

I remember that, on a recent occasion when a challenge of that kind was made, Senator Roebuck interpreted the rule. He interpreted it in a manner with which I would agree. He said the rule is that it is out of order for a senator here to discuss the debate going on in the other place. Obviously, that means we can discuss the subject but cannot comment directly on the actual discussion.

In view of the recommendation of our Rules Committee that our rules be kept under a continuing survey, I would suggest that we write a workable rule to govern this point. It must be remembered of course, that when a senator rises to speak here he has to refer to whatever current background information there is on that particular bill. Very often the background information is in the minister's statement, in the resolution stage—now to be eliminated—or on second reading, or before a committee. If the rule is that we cannot quote what the minister has said in the other house, then we are forced to the subterfuge of saying "I heard it in another place" or "I read it in the press" or "I heard it in the corridors".

All I am suggesting is that there should be a clear rule recognizing the fact that if we are to discuss a bill introduced in the other house it is necessary that we be permitted to say what the minister said was the intention of the bill, and if the only place the minister's intention is stated clearly, as it often is, is in the proceedings of the other house, surely it makes sense for us to be able to quote the minister in his own words rather than to quote a press report or paraphrase it.

There are many other points in the rules as they stand at which I am sure the committee would wish to take a look in its continuing study. For the moment, I wish to discuss but one other major point raised in this Fourth Report of the Committee of the Rules, that is, the suggestion of broad constitutional changes.

I am not sure that any constitutional changes are required to increase the efficiency and usefulness of this chamber. I think there is fairly general agreement that most of the criticism directed at the Senate in full-length studies, in newspaper articles and on television and elsewhere seem to be directed at the question of appointments.

Now, I believe there is room for improvement here, but I do not think it requires any amendment to the Constitution. My own suggestion, and these will be my concluding remarks, is that it should remain the prerogative of the Prime Minister. It is common knowledge that it is often a very difficult problem for the Prime Minister to exercise that prerogative. What he needs is not more suggestions as to who should be appointed. In fact, there are perhaps more valid reasons for not appointing people whom he does not think he should appoint, but on behalf of whom he is often under very extreme pressures. In other words, I am suggesting that it would be helpful to any prime minister to have some guidelines, and I further suggest that the guidelines might very well come from a resolution of this chamber. I am not at this time going to suggest what those guidelines should be.

The committee has recommended that we examine our whole Constitution. We have had suggestions in the White Paper and elsewhere for provincial nominations and other types of nominations.

If the prerogative remains with the Prime Minister, it merely becomes a question of who has the right to nominate, not all appointments but certain appointments, and what the Prime Minister's responsibility is in responding to those nominations.

Honourable senators, I repeat my opening suggestion, that I hope the Leader of the Government and others who may have responsibility in the matter will see to it that this mechanism for the immediate critical examination of the Senate is proceeded with, because it seems to me incongruous that, in all the discussions that are going on about the future of the Senate, the only voice that is not heard is the collective consensus voice of this chamber. Surely it makes no sense for honourable senators to be left in the position where, if they wish to make suggestions, they must make them individually.

The Senate as a whole should surely make its voice heard and make its contribution to this very important debate about its own future.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lang, debate adjourned.

PLANT QUARANTINE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Hazen Argue moved the second reading of Bill C-154, to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased on behalf of the Government Leader to move the second reading of Bill C-154, an act to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants.

This bill is designed to replace the Destructive Insect and Pest Act of 1910 and to bring about a modernization of procedures. Over the years it has become of great importance to have effective safeguards to prevent the spread of plant diseases and to provide more up-to-date quarantine methods, because of the growth of international trade in agricultural products, the increasing speed of transportation and the greater knowledge of the risks involved.

The plant protection division of the Department of Agriculture last year issued more than 8,200 permits for importation of plants, plant materials and plant products, and it inspected some 282 million plants, 10,800 pounds of tree and shrub seeds and 80,000 tons of plant products from 33 countries. There were more than 1,100 interceptions of plant parasitic insects and disease organisms of which more than 500 were of serious nature.

Last year departmental inspectors certified for export more than six million plants, 20 million board feet of lumber, 1.4 million containers of fruit, two million hundredweight of seed potatoes and about five million tons of cereal grains and cereal products.

The standards imposed on these products by foreign countries have become increasingly stringent in recent years, a situation which makes it imperative that the department have greater authority to carry out inspection and certification programs which will ensure acceptability of Canadian products in international trade.

Although area quarantines are helpful in curbing the spread of insects and diseases, there are occasions when effective control or eradication requires that individual farms be quarantined and restricted as to the kinds of crops that may be grown. Such is the case with potatoes, the prime host of the golden nematode. Eradication of the nematode requires soil sterilization accompanied by a lapse in potato production for several years. But existing legislation does not provide the authority needed to restrict, from general or specific agricultural use, properties or premises which are infested or suspected of being infested.

To provide the highest degree of protection against insects and diseases, it is vital that the authorities have the power to control the movement in Canada and be able to order the destruction, if necessary, of plants which, although they may not be infested themselves, serve as hosts for disease-causing organisms. Such a plant is the common barberry, which is the alternate host of wheat stem rust.

Tighter controls should be accompanied by a broader base for compensation, however. Under the existing act, compensation is only paid in cases where infested plants or crops are destroyed in the interest of pest and disease control. It is now proposed to provide authority to extend the grounds for compensation to cover certain situations where either the sale of plants or the use of infested properties is restricted or prohibited.

Honourable senators, this bill may be summarized briefly in point form as follows:

Firstly, provision is made for the introduction of improved plant quarantine methods and disinfection techniques.

Secondly, authority is provided to regulate the introduction and movement within Canada of plants and other matter which, while not infested in themselves, constitute a biological obstacle to the effective control of plant pests and diseases.

Thirdly, there is the authority to restrict from general or specific agricultural use properties or premises which are infested or suspected to be infested as a measure to prevent or control the dissemination of injurious plant pests and diseases.

Fourthly, provision is made for the establishment of plant health and crop certification standards for plants or other matter that are to be exported or transported from one area to another within Canada.

Fifthly, authority is provided to establish by Order in Council the maximum amounts of compensation to be paid for plants or other matter destroyed or restricted from sale under the regulations, or where the use of property or premises is restricted in the interests of plant pest control.

Sixthly, provision has been made for an appeal procedure whereby individuals may appeal the amount of compensation awarded under the authority of the bill.

Seventhly, there is authority to establish a fee structure for inspection, quarantine or treatment of plants or other matter carried out under the bill.

Eighthly, the name of the bill has been changed from the Destructive Insect and Pest Act to the Plant Quarantine Act, a name considered to be more descriptive of the authority provided.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to commend this bill.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I am in favour of the bill being presented at this time to enact the Plant Quarantine Act. The principle of this act, compared to the original act, the Destructive Insect and Pest Act is the same. There are three main differences in this bill—although two of them are much the same in principle—and these I will enumerate as I go along.

First, in the original act the only definition was as to the "Minister" responsible. This bill spells out a number of definitions. Clause 2 defines "infested", which means "contaminated with a pest or so exposed to a pest that contamination can reasonably be expected to exist". It defines "pest" as follows:

> "Pest" means any insect, plant or animal organism, virus, bacterium, disease or disease inciting agent causing or capable of causing injury or damage to any vegetable, any part, product, or by-product of a vegetable or any plant material.

Then it defines "plant or other matter".

This bill prescribes certain places or stations where plant or other matter may enter into this country, so that it may be treated or inspected. Apparently the points at which the plant or other matter may enter into Canada are quarantine points to check whether or not the plant is infested with some pest.

The Governor in Council may prescribe treatment or the destruction of the plant. If the plant or other matter has to be destroyed, the minister may agree to certain compensation. Under this proposed act there are no conditions prescribed as to the amount of the compensation to be paid by the minister. Under the original act, which this one may replace, the compensation would be no more than two-thirds of the value of the plant. An importer can now hope for payment in full for plant or other matter which he had ordered for import which he believed did not contravene the act.

The second main difference between the provisions of the proposed act and the original one is that if the importer was not satisfied with the compensation allowed by the minister he had the right of appeal.

In the bill presently under consideration, under the heading of "Appeal" it states:

> Where the compensation awarded to a person for any plant or other matter destroyed or prohibited or restricted from sale or for any restriction of the use of any property or premises is less than the maximum compensation prescribed under this Act, or where no compensation is awarded to such a person, an appeal may be brought by that person to the Assessor—

Under the provisions of this bill, the assessor will be the same as the one appointed under Part II of the Pesticide Residue Compensation Act. Such an assessor is a judge of the Exchequer Court or of the Superior court of the provinces. In that capacity he does not act as a judge in a court; he merely acts as another individual, thus on the same basis as the inspector does. The difference I see is that this bill suggests there is an appeal allowed but, as a matter of fact, it does not constitute a genuine appeal. You have no right to appeal to a court of law; you merely appeal to another man, if you are not satisfied with the decision of the minister in the first place.

Clause 10 constitutes another change from the original act. Clause 10 (1) states:

> Every person who, or whose employee or agent, fails to comply with or violates any provision of this Act or the regulations or any order made by the Minister under section 8 is guilty of
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years,—

Under the original act, which this one will replace, if passed, the penalty was less. You will bear in mind that when I refer to "the original act" I mean the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. Clause 9 of that act states:

> Every person who contravenes any provision of this Act or any regulation is liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

We now have an offence that is punishable by imprisonment for two years.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It is an indictable offence.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes, that is right. It seems that we must be hard-hearted about this offence. It must be hard to control these importers, and as a consequence the penalty has to be increased. In respect to penalties of imprisonment we seem to be suffering from inflation.

On the whole, honourable senators, I am in agreement with the principle of this measure, but I do not think that a penalty of imprisonment for two years is necessary, and I do not agree with the right of appeal to a judge as an assessor.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 591 to 626, inclusive, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, reports adopted.

RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to presentations of petitions:

Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the following resolutions:

Resolution 524, for the relief of Edmond Joseph Pierre Beaupré.

Resolution 525, for the relief of Jean-Marie Nault.

Resolution 526, for the relief of Marie Fernande Isola Giroux Hudon.

Resolution 527, for the relief of Marie Cécile Carmen Rioux Pelletier.

Resolution 528, for the relief of Rita Doiron Pasto.

Resolution 529, for the relief of Harold Wallace Pasher.

Resolution 530, for the relief of Gloria Joan Hoddinott Pennell.

Resolution 531, for the relief of Julia Murphy Giroux.

Resolution 532, for the relief of Yves Burelle.

Resolution 537, for the relief of Michele Filippone.

Resolution 538, for the relief of Robert John Alfred Johnson.

Resolution 539, for the relief of Gilbert Tourigny.

Resolution 540, for the relief of Leslie Robert Sumter.

Resolution 541, for the relief of Duncan Cameron Williams.

Resolution 542, for the relief of Madeleine Légaré Plouffe.

Resolution 543, for the relief of Marjorie Elisabeth Smith Palardy.

Resolution 544, for the relief of Serge Henri Deyglun.

Resolution 545, for the relief of André Laplante.

Resolution 546, for the relief of Rella Alter Zinman.

Resolution 547, for the relief of Pierre Boyer.

Resolution 548, for the relief of Yolande Keiflin Chamberland.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I move that these resolutions be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Robichaud, for the second reading of Bill C-148, to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I should like before I commence my remarks to extend my respect to Senator Robichaud, who moved the second reading of this bill and explained it in such a clear and concise way. However, the short title of this bill, "Freshwater Fish Marketing Act", which creates a Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, does very little to describe the result or effect of the bill. Indeed, the bill involves very much more than marketing. I would say also that the formal title, namely "An Act to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation", also gives only part of the story of what this bill is really about. I do not say this by way of criticism, but rather by way of explaining some of the matters that I shall be talking about in my discourse.

Let me say in the beginning that as far as I know no Act of the Parliament of Canada except one, namely, the wartime measure which expropriated to the Crown the Eldorado Mine in the Northwest Territories, and at the same time assumed complete monopoly control over uranium, has gone as far as this bill in creating a complete monopoly in the production, handling, packing, processing, storing, and sale of a commodity. Perhaps there are two other exceptions: the monopoly of the Royal Mint in respect to the issue of coins and paper money, and the monopoly of the Post Office in respect to the issue of postage stamps.

This bill creates a complete Government monopoly over the freshwater fisheries of those parts of Canada comprising the northwestern part of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Northwest Territories. When I say "monopoly" in connection with this bill I mean complete and effective control over the production, transport, handling, packing, processing, storage, and sale of the freshwater fish produced in the areas to which I have just referred, including the direct financing of all those operations. Indeed, compared to the government functions exercisable under this bill, the functions of the Canadian Wheat Board are pale pink.

I know I have used some unusual language in describing the effects of this bill. Consequently, it may come as a surprise to at least some of my colleagues in the Senate to learn that despite what I have said I am constrained to support the bill.

There is a saying in the legal profession that hard cases make bad law. Similarly, hard conditions make for drastic action. I do not know if there is anyone in the present Parliament who has been as closely associated with the freshwater fishing industry of western Canada as I have. I have watched it in all its aspects since I was a young boy. I was born and brought up almost on the shores of Lake Winnipeg, which is known as the most prolific freshwater lake fishery in the world.

Hon. Mr. Martin: More so than Lake Erie?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Oh, yes. That is why the Province of Manitoba accounts for 40 per cent of the freshwater fish production affected by this bill. Of course, there are two other comparatively large lakes in Manitoba which are also prolific in fish. I refer to Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipegosis, as well as a great number of northern lakes, most of which are very small in size, and from which production is scarcely comparable to these other lakes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: How about Great Bear Lake?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Great Bear Lake is not a great producer of fish. That, of course, is in the Northwest Territories.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is it not a very large lake?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It is a very large lake. Great Slave Lake is in the Northwest Territories and, as I understand, is the largest producer of fish in that area of Canada.

My father was, among other endeavours, engaged in the wholesale exporting end of the fishing industry for many years. As a lawyer practising in Winnipeg I became involved in most of the fishery controversies of a certain era, and as a member of the Legislature of Manitoba I was able to look upon these fisheries problems from the point of view of the government of that province, which was mainly charged with the supervision of the industry. As a result of this experience I should like to put my views of the industry in capsule form.

I make the statement that from the point of view of the fisherman, commercial inland fishing is the most difficult, the most hazardous, the most underpaid and the most frustrating industry in our country, or perhaps in any other country for that matter. It would be nearly an endless task to enlarge in detail on the problems of the industry. However, they are set forth with reasonable clarity in the report of Mr. George H. McIvor, C.M.G., who was appointed by the federal Government in 1965 as a commissioner to inquire into and report on the marketing problems of the freshwater fish industry in the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Northwest Territories. Mr. McIvor's report was submitted to the Government about a year ago.

I should say something about Mr. McIvor. As nearly everyone here is no doubt aware, Mr. McIvor was the very distinguished chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board for a period of between 20 and 30 years. Not only was he distinguished but he was also a very capable gentleman, and I think all of us from western Canada recognize that Mr. McIvor gave excellent service to our country in the management of Canada's wheat and other grain problems during the period of his occupancy of the high post of Chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Indeed, I had many talks with Mr. McIvor about his work concerning the fisheries during the time he was engaged in this investigation, and throughout I guessed fairly accurately what he had in mind for the industry.

From my knowledge of the fishery industry as presently constituted, I cannot say that it is really in the category of an industry as we use that term. It is rather a way of life for people in outlying areas, many of whom are now Indians and Métis. Fishing has become a means of earning a meagre livelihood. Also it enables some people to make their homes in certain wilderness areas which would otherwise be vacant. So the problem to be faced in any reorganization of the inland fishery industry is social as well as economic. Perhaps that may account for my willingness to go along with the terms of this bill. Indeed, from that point of view alone I am able to go along with the bill.

Let me give you in more detail some of the problems and hazards that plague this industry, and that take it out of the category of an industry as we use that term in ordinary parlance. The primary producer, namely, the fisherman, must first seek and obtain a government licence to fish. Secondly, he can work at fishing only parts of the year during certain prescribed periods of certain seasons. In the interests of conservation, government regulations forbid otherwise. Thirdly, he is subject to quotas set on his individual production; hence he can never have a bonanza. Fourthly, he is always subject to the possibility of a partial or complete crop failure. Fifthly, he is subject to the vagaries of the weather and the seasons. Sixthly, when the fish is removed from the nets it becomes a perishable commodity subject to a multiplicity of hazards. Seventhly, fish is a commodity subject to wide price fluctuations; hence fishing is more of a gamble than it is a business. Eighthly, he is a poor banking risk and must be financed by a dealer or exporter—the dealer, by the way, taking no end of risk in this operation. Ninthly, in the event of one or more of the above hazards occurring, he is in debt to his dealer from season to season. Tenthly, in that event he becomes tied to one dealer and cannot shop around for another market. Eleventhly, between 70 and 80 per cent of the freshwater fish from the area designated in this bill must be exported to the United States, and hence becomes subject to the multifarious vagaries of an export market for a perishable commodity.

The above are merely a few of the reasons why I say that freshwater fishing is not really an industry, and hence the ordinary rules of business practice are difficult, if not impossible, to apply to it.

One of the terms of reference of the commission which produced the McIvor report was to report upon the possibility and the desirability of establishing an export monopoly to achieve more efficient marketing for freshwater fish, and thus provide better returns to primary producers. I have stated that this bill not only establishes an export monopoly but also presumes to give to the corporation power to control every aspect of the fishery industry down to the financing of the individual fisherman, wherever he may set his nets. That is complete control. Please do not ask me how the federal Government is constitutionally able to do all these things, because in the fishing industry there is divided authority in the B.N.A. Act between the federal and provincial governments, but it appears it is intended that holes in the federal Government's constitutional armour will be plugged up by appropriate provincial legislation.

As I look upon the problem of the inland fisheries, especially in the area affected by this bill, every provincial government has for years been besieged and bombarded by requests from the primary producers of fresh water fish—that is, the fishermen—to come to their rescue in a manner similar to that which every government feels obliged to aid industries who for one reason or another do not seem to be able to stand on their own feet. The solution, or perhaps only a partial one, is thought to lie in this bill. I am willing and indeed happy to give it a chance. My prediction is that if the Government is able to enlist supermen to operate the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation created by this bill, eventually some improvement in the lot of the fisherman may be achieved. I hope we can find these supermen. But supermen or not, I also predict that this experiment in the operation of this most hazardous type of industry will cost the exchequer a great deal of money.

It will mean that fishermen will now be passengers on the Government gravy train, but I hope that I will not be reported as making this statement without adding another one, namely, why should they not? Everyone else is, so why not the fisherman? That is part of today's world, but it seems to work.

Honourable senators, I have touched only briefly on the matter set out in Mr. McIvor's report which resulted in this bill. It is only a reading of the 130-page report itself that can bring a true understanding of the 100-year background of the inland fisheries of Canada and the value of this measure.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The honourable senator is obviously quite knowledgeable about conditions in Lake Winnipeg and Lake Winnipegosis. We have learned that the supply of the goldeye is diminishing and may run out. Can he give us any information about that?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Yes. Lake Winnipeg was a very prolific source of goldeye, and indeed the only source, some 30, 40 or 50 years ago. Then the supply of goldeye from Lake Winnipeg started to diminish. As it did so a substitute fish known as the tullibee was smoked and sold under the trade name of the goldeye. I say it was a substitute fish, but it was indeed an excellent fish and was nearly as succulent as the goldeye itself. The goldeye in western Canada is not extinct. It was discovered in one of the lakes of the Northwest Territories, I think in Great Slave Lake, and from there considerable supplies have entered both the export market and the Canadian market over the last few years under the trade name of Lake Winnipeg Goldeye. However, as far as Lake Winnipeg is concerned, the goldeye is practically extinct.

Hon. Mr. Rattenbury: What is the name of the substitute fish?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Tullibee. It is somewhat similar to the cisko in Lake Erie.

Hon. Hedard Robichaud: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Robichaud speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading?

Hon. Mr. Robichaud: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to add to the remarks which have been made by Senator Thorvaldson. I wish to thank him for his very appropriate remarks and for his support of the bill. If the bill is given second reading I am prepared to move that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, if that is the wish of honourable senators; otherwise I will move that it be presented for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Mr. Robichaud moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 27, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

27 February 1969

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. D. C. Abbott, P.C., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 27th day of February, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the
Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

LEVI ESHKOL

TRIBUTES TO THE LATE PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I desire to inform the Senate that the Government Leader is absent today because he is representing the Government of Canada at the funeral of Levi Eshkol, Prime Minister of Israel, who died suddenly on February 26.

Mr. Eshkol was born in Poland, and went to Palestine as a very young man in 1914. He was active in the establishment of agriculture settlements, in the labour movement and its political arm. When Israel became a State, his party, along with David Ben-Gurion and others, formed the government; and he served as Minister of Defence. Subsequently he served as Minister of Agriculture and later as Minister of Finance. In 1963 Mr. Eshkol became Prime Minister.

I am sure there is no need to elaborate upon the heavy tasks the late Prime Minister assumed throughout his active public life, and the important contribution he made to the establishment of Israel as an independent nation. His last few years have been particularly trying. They involved war, cold war, and acts of terrorism; indeed, problems of this character still confront Israel. The Middle East continues to be a very critical area of concern for the world.

Only a few months ago the Israeli Ambassador to Canada, Arieh Eshel, died suddenly of a heart attack in Ottawa. Mr. Eshel was a highly esteemed member of the diplomatic corps. The Jewish people throughout the world are shocked and saddened again by the sudden death of the Prime Minister of the Jewish homeland.

We recall with pleasure that Mr. Eshkol, as Prime Minister, did Canada the honour of paying us a visit during our Centennial Year.

It is fitting that the Honourable Paul Martin, with his long distinguished career in Foreign Affairs, should be in Jerusalem today representing the Government of Canada at the funeral of Mr. Eshkol. It is an honour for the Senate that he should have been chosen to represent the Government of our country.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to associate myself with the Acting Leader of the Government in paying tribute to the late Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Levi Eshkol. His passing under the difficult circumstances which Israel is undergoing presently is indeed a very cruel blow to the people of Israel and the Jewish people all over the world.

As has been related by the Acting Leader, Mr. Eshkol led a most extraordinary and full life. He was greatly instrumental in the establishment of Israel and has played a most valuable part in the social and economic progress of this young nation.

I join with the Acting Leader in extending our deepest sympathy to the people of Israel and as well conveying to the Jewish people all over the world this expression of our deep condolences.

I agree that it was an appropriate gesture and a good move for the Government to have sent our Leader to represent Canada at the funeral of the late Prime Minister.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULE 110 AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. John J. Connolly, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the committee's first report:

Your Committee recommends:

1. That Rule 110, in so far as it relates to the time-limit for filing petitions for private bills, be suspended; and

2. That the time-limit for filing petitions for private bills, which expired on Friday, 25 October 1968, be extended to Thursday, 27 February 1969.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Connolly: I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

GRAIN MOVEMENT

NUMBER OF REVENUE FREIGHT CAR LOADINGS FOR GRAIN AND OTHER COMMODITIES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have an inquiry to place before the administration, but before doing so, with leave of the Senate I wish to make a brief explanation as to why I am presenting this inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that under the heading Notices of Inquiries honourable senators normally only give notice that they are putting an inquiry on the Order Paper. Is it agreed that in this instance some explanation may be given by honourable Senator Argue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Argue: Some days ago in the Senate I accused the railways of letting down the farmers of western Canada by doing a very bad job of moving grain. My limited research since that time has tended to confirm my original statement.

As a result, I am placing an inquiry before the Ministry to ascertain whether during the last number of months railway car loadings of wheat and other grains were less than car loadings for the same purpose during a comparable period one year earlier and two years earlier, and whether during the same period car loadings of other commodities in western Canada in fact increased. The answers to these questions may go a long way to demonstrate that car loadings of wheat and other grains in this extremely cold period were down, while in the same period car loadings of other commodities had substantially increased.

Honourable senators, I now give notice that I will inquire of the Government on Tuesday next, March 4, 1969:

1. What was the number of revenue freight cars loaded in Canada in each week of November and December in the years 1966, 1967 and 1968, and in each week of January in the years 1967, 1968 and 1969 (a) in the Western Division, and (b) in the Eastern Division.

2. What was the number of carloadings in the Western Division in each week of November and December in the years 1966, 1967 and 1968, and in each week of January in the years 1967, 1968 and 1969 for (a) wheat, and (b) other grains.

I may add that I believe these statistics are readily available, and I am sure that the Acting Leader of the Government will expedite the obtaining of this information for the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I move with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 4, 1969, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald, with leave of the Senate, moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Robichaud be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Davey on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the third reading of Bill C-152, to amend the Veterans' Land Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Hedard Robichaud moved the third reading of Bill C-148, to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PESTICIDE RESIDUE COMPENSATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Harry Hays moved the second reading of Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-155 is a new act to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards. If and when this bill receives second reading I shall move that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, where members of the Department of Agriculture with more expertise than I have will explain the ramifications of the different clauses of the bill.

This bill, as I have said, is to provide the Minister of Agriculture, through the Governor in Council, with authority to pay compensation to farmers for loss resulting from pesticide residue contamination of food products which makes the sale of those products illegal in Canada. Eligibility for compensation is dependent upon the contamination by the residues not having occurred through the fault of the farmer, and notification from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the sale of the contaminated food products would violate the Food and Drugs Act. The use of the pesticide must also have been in accordance with recommendations made, approved, or concurred in, by the Department of Agriculture.

The provisions of the act, and the authority to the Governor in Council to make regulations, are such as to provide for maximum ease in establishing eligibility and the amount of compensation, and yet prevent interference with the normal rights and responsibilities of farmers and manufacturers of pesticides.

Part II also provides for the appointment of assessors to hear and determine appeals from compensation awards made under Part I of this act as well as under any other act to which this provision is made applicable. The powers of the assessor are binding, and provide for confirming or varying the decision of a minister and referring cases back to the minister for such further action as the assessor may direct.

In Part I, under section 2 any producer of primary agricultural products could be eligible for compensation; that is, producers of grain, fruit, vegetables, milk, meat or eggs, for example. Pesticide residue includes the residues of all pest control products; for example, insecticides, fungicides, weed killers and fumigants.

Section 3, subsections 1 and 2, provide for eligibility for compensation where inspection under the Food and Drugs Act discloses the presence of a residue in a product from a pesticide registered under the Pest Control Products Act used in accordance with a method concurred in by the department, and when the Minister of National Health and Welfare has notified the Minister of Agriculture that the sale of the product would be contrary to the Food and Drugs Act. It also provides for the payment to the farmer of compensation for any loss to the farmer by reason of such residue. A farmer is not eligible unless the minister is satisfied that the farmer is blameless. Provision is made for the Governor in Council to make regulations setting maximum and minimum limits on the amount of compensation that may be paid.

Section 4 provides Governor in Council authority for regulations on procedures in claiming compensation, methods in determining eligibility and amount of loss, the limitations on the amount of compensation, exclusions from the act, and the actions the minister may take to limit loss to farmers due to pesticide residues.

Section 5 provides that compensation may not be paid until the farmer has taken steps that the minister deems necessary to reduce the loss to him and to pursue any action the farmer has in law against the manufacturers of the pesticide or other person.

Under section 5, subsections 2 to 5, the minister may require consent to pursue on behalf of the farmer any legal action to recover losses, with the condition that the amount of compensation payable is to reflect any recovery made through such actions.

Under section 5(6) the minister may undertake a course of action requiring an expenditure of funds in order to lessen a loss due to residues. For example, produce may be subjected to processes that remove the residue and render it saleable.

The balance of the provisions in Part I are for standard administrative purposes, offences and penalties necessary for the effective operation of the act.

Section 11 provides that the Governor in Council may appoint assessors from among the judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada and the superior courts of the provinces.

Section 12(1) provides for appeals to be brought to the assessor by the farmer.

Under subsection 1 of section 13 the assessor may confirm, vary or refer back for further action the decision of the minister. Under subsection 2 costs may be awarded to or against the minister. By subsection 3 decisions of assessors are to be final and not subject to appeal.

Section 14(1) provides that appeals are to be heard at any place required.

By section 15 the assessor may make rules respecting the presentation and conduct of appeals.

Section 16 provides for the appointment by the Governor in Council of a Registrar of Appeals and other staff as necessary.

That is a short explanation of a very important bill, honourable senators. We had no provisions for this sort of compensation before. We have had some experiences which would certainly indicate the value, particularly for the farmer, of such an act as this. I highly commend the bill to you, and suggest that at the appropriate stage it should go to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, this Bill C-155 is one of a series of farm legislation and is a new measure in itself.

Yesterday we had Bill C-154, which was the first part of the series. This bill has been divided into two parts. If a product of the farm shows, under an inspection of the Food and Drugs Act, that there is present in or upon this product pesticide residue, and if the pesticide was used properly and the product considered to be unsaleable, then the minister may pay the producer a compensation. This, in itself, is a good feature.

However, clause 3(2) provides:

> No compensation shall be paid to a farmer pursuant to subsection (1) unless the Minister that he is satisfied with the inspection.
> (a) receives from the Minister of National Health and Welfare written confirmation...

Of course, we do not know what the amount of compensation will be. This type of regulation referring the subject matter from one department to another is going to cause a great deal of delay. Further compensation shall not be paid unless the farmer performs certain tasks deemed necessary by the minister to alleviate the cause of the pesticide residue being in or upon the product. This can certainly delay payment of compensation.

The farmer may have to take action against the manufacturer, if he is so advised, which would be a further long delay.

Again the minister, on his own behalf and with the consent of the farmer, may decide to sue the manufacturer. So, honourable senators can see that pesticide once discovered does not mean immediate compensation. It may take as long as a year or more.

If finally the farmer is not satisfied with the results, he may appeal to an assessor. An assessor is a judge of the Exchequer Court—as was indicated yesterday in Bill C-154—or of the Superior Court of the province. The assessor may be the type of man that we have had in hail insurance. All members from western Canada know that if the farmer is not satisfied with the first inspection, the insurance company sends another man out who is the type of person who can cajole and play along with the farmer and finally make a nice settlement, and everybody is happy.

If the judge happens not to like the colour of your shirt, tie or eyes, he may take a scunner against you, and you do not get much satisfaction out of him. I do not know why we should have no right to appeal to a court beyond this assessor.

Part II deals with compensation appeals. The judge may not necessarily be any better than the inspector. Both are appointees of the minister. The assessor's decision shall be final. There will be no appeal allowed to a court. This is a most peculiar condition. The farmer must be some strange kind of citizen when he loses rights to which all others in Canada are entitled.

Another provision which I am not sure that I like is with respect to offences and penalties. Under the heading "Offences and Penalties", section 9(1) reads:

> Every person who, or whose employee or agent, violates any provision of this Act is guilty of > (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or...

Now, I presume the word "person" means a farmer. If the farmer is taken off his land for two years, who is going to run his farm? This makes an awkward situation. The penalty is too severe. The term should have been about six months or a cash fine, instead of imprisonment for two years.

Honourable senators I think that is all I have to say, on this bill. In other respects I think the bill is very good and I support it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: May I ask a question of the sponsor of the bill, if it is not too late?

I fail to understand where the federal Government comes in. Why should not the provincial Government be held responsible for some compensation if everything was done with the consent and under the supervision of the province? Why is the federal Government liable to compensate for such losses?

Hon. Mr. Hays: What section is that?

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Section 3.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Paragraph (1) (b).

Hon. Mr. Hays: Well, in section 3, in determining the amount of compensation settlement to be paid to a farmer, the minister must take certain factors into consideration. During the time I was Minister of Agriculture we probably had more of these problems than we have had before or since. I remember one in particular at Grand Forks. There was a very lengthy period during which it could have been settled, but it did not seem to be clearly a provincial jurisdiction or a federal jurisdiction. Nobody seemed to know just whose responsibility it was. I think the intent of the act is that the minister can go to the provinces and see if this compensation cannot be divided, as was done at Grand Forks. In discussing this with the department officials, I think the intent is that this should be done. This is indeed the way we did it at Grand Forks. This land had been put to potatoes for many years, and the farmers were using a chemical, which has since been abandoned, which built up a residue. Although there was no evidence, it was felt that some might have come through in new forage crops that had been planted and been passed on to the animals. It took a long time to find out or determine whose responsibility it was. We took it upon ourselves to settle it, as we had no such legislation then.

This act will be a much better way of tackling these problems. I think the intent is that it will be possible to make some sort of an arrangement with the province.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Mary E. Kinnear moved the second reading of Bill C-156, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

She said: Honourable senators, the proposed amendments to the Animal Contagious Diseases Act embody two major changes. The first deals with the way in which compensation rates are set for animals ordered slaughtered.

For the past 43 years the federal Government has compensated owners of animals that have been ordered destroyed under an eradication program for Johne's disease, brucellosis and tuberculosis.

Until now, compensation rates have been prescribed in the act. From 1925 to 1949 the compensation rates were a maximum of $60 for grade cattle and $150 for purebred cattle. The basis for this compensation was two-thirds of the value of the animal slaughtered.

In 1949, the compensation rates were revised to provide a maximum of $40 for grade cattle and $100 for purebred cattle. The full value was paid up to the maximum rate.

In the last revision in 1958, rates were established at a maximum of $70 for grades and $140 for purebreds.

All slaughtered animals are examined and if the tests are satisfactory, and the meat passes inspection and is not contaminated, the owner receives the meat salvage value, plus the Government compensation. The combination of the two values almost covers the cost of a comparable animal.

Where the sale of the carcass of the animal is unlawful, an additional amount, equal to the value the carcass would have had if the sale were lawful, is paid by the Government.

The proposed revision retains this provision so that the owner would be able to recover the meat salvage value, either by selling the carcass or, where this is forbidden, by recovering the carcass value from the Government. A condemned slaughtered animal is placed in a tank and heat sterilized and then ground into fertilizer.

The Governor in Council will receive from the Health of Animals Branch proposed rates for compensation which are reasonable and current. Inspectors will have guidelines, as to age, sex, conformity, pedigree if any, and immediate or prospective usefulness, for the assessment of the animals.

The above information would allow a more flexible approach to compensation. The value of purebred livestock and, indeed, of grade dairy cattle, for instance, can change remarkably even within a year's time. Section 1 of this act shall be deemed to come into force on the 26th day of September, 1968.

The second major change provides for an appeal by the owner against a compensation award under the act. At the present time no such appeal is available. The appeal may be brought to the assessor appointed under Part II of the Pesticide Residue Compensation Act by the owner of an animal slaughtered under the provisions of this act. Under this act the assessor is a judge.

An appeal may be made, (a) where no maximum amount has been prescribed pursuant to section 12 for that animal or, (b) where the amount of compensation has been so prescribed but the compensation awarded is less than the maximum amount, or, (c) on the ground that the amount of compensation awarded was unreasonable. Every appeal should be made within three months from the time the owner receives notification of the compensation. For special reasons, a longer period may be allowed. It is usually four to five weeks between the time the animal is slaughtered and the owner is recompensed.

Section 2 of the act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation. It is possible that the date will be retroactive.

In summary, the proposed amendment does two things. It allows the Governor in Council to establish the maximum rates to be paid to an owner whose cattle were ordered to be slaughtered.

It provides for the right of appeal by the owner against the compensation where (a) no maximum has been prescribed or, (b) where the compensation has been prescribed but the compensation is less than the maximum or, (c) where no compensation is awarded. The appeal privilege would not delay the destruction of diseased animals.

Honourable senators, if this bill receives second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, this Bill C-156, dealing with the amendment of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, goes a long way to relieve the situation which has developed over the years. Compensation was a set figure and the inspector had no way of changing it. Now the maximum amount can be prescribed by the Governor in Council for a purebred animal or a grade animal, either in the case of horses or of cattle. This is a good point in the bill.

However, it seems to me that the assessor will be put in a very awkward position. If the inspector is not a qualified—and I mean "qualified"—veterinarian, the amount that such an inspector will set may be very far out. He would not know what he was doing unless he were a qualified man. I have had personal experience with men who claimed to be qualified inspectors or veterinarians, and who never gave anything like the proper consideration. That is why I say the assessor will be placed in a very awkward position, with possible overtones of political patronage. On that account, I feel a farmer should be able to go beyond the assessor and appeal to the appropriate court. This would relieve the assessor of any possible indignity.

Honourable senators, clause 1 of this bill will be deemed to come into force on September 26, 1968, in accordance with clause 3.

Supposing a beast had to be slaughtered in October last year. It would long since have been buried and forgotten. How are you going to arrive at the value of the carcass at this particular date? Consequently, that part referring to the value of the carcass would be of no use whatsoever. The only thing that could be done would be for the inspector to evaluate the carcass at either the maximum or the minimum assessment for compensation.

That is all I have to say with respect to this bill, honourable senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mrs. Kinnear, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Everett, for the second reading of Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, in rising to take part in this debate, I would like to congratulate those who have already preceded me, particularly Senator Everett, for his very able presentation of the bill, and Senators Thorvaldson, Hastings and Connolly (Ottawa West) for their timely remarks. I do not propose to repeat, as far as it is possible for me to avoid doing so, any of the things that they have said, or to plow that ground again. What I want to deal with are some matters which I believe lie within the general area covered by this bill.

As I understand it, the purpose of Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, is to ensure that in the production of these natural resources the interests of the public as well as the long-term interests of the producers are fully protected by insisting that the latest technical know-how is used. As Senator Thorvaldson pointed out, the bill is copied pretty well word for word from the legislation now in force in the western provinces that have had to deal with this question of conservation. The actual application of the rules depends, of course, on the board that is set up or the chief conservation officer, when he assumes that position. Then they will set up a series of regulations that will give effect to this knowledge which we have today, in the hope that thereby we will be able to avoid some of the very disastrous mistakes made in dealing with the development of natural resources in the past.

I think within the memory of most of us, the word that was used when we discussed what today is referred to as the development of natural resources, was "exploit" or "exploitation". At the time that word was first used the general meaning attributed to it was, "to turn to good account or to practical account." However, because of some of the practices that were permitted, the word unfortunately came to connote, and in general usage to mean not "to turn to practical account," but "to use for selfish advantage." The result is that the word is practically never used by publicity-conscious industry today. The words we get are "production," "development," and "conservation".

The reason for this is that the excesses and mistakes in the past, often based, it must be admitted, on ignorance, have been terribly costly ones. These become particularly important when we are dealing, as we are in this matter, with a non-recurring resource. Once the oil is extracted and used it is gone forever. The same thing applies to gas. These are not crops which can be harvested at regular intervals. They can be had and enjoyed just once.

For that reason it is particularly important that we should have governmental policies in the administration of these affairs, which will ensure that we get the maximum benefit as a nation from our resources when we use them the one time that we will be permitted to do so.

As far as the bill is concerned, there are one or two parts of it which cause me some concern. One is that the committee is supposed to be made up entirely of people who are knowledgeable in the industry. My experience in this field has been that when you get somebody knowledgeable in the industry he almost invariably has an axe to grind. It seems to me that the committee, whose job is going to be to act chiefly as court of appeal from the decisions of the chief conservation officer, might perhaps be better able to function if the members of the committee were men of better than average intelligence, with some good understanding and a judicial sense. Such a committee could have experts give evidence before it. And heaven knows, everybody will get his own experts to come before this committee and tell whatever story he wants told. But it is hoped that these members of the committee will have as much common sense as a jury normally does in which case they will be able to make the findings of fact which the circumstances deserve.

This bill deals with only one aspect of the development of these resources. It comes to us before there has been really any development at all of these resources in the Northwest Territories. Up to the present the development of the petroleum resources in the Northwest Territories has been limited to a very small production of oil in the vicinity of Norman Wells, which did, I think, support a four-inch pipe line to Whitehorse. This was called the Canol project during World War II and supplied fuel for the Alaska highway and for the American flights of war aid to Russia. That was later dismantled and the refinery at Whitehorse became the basis for Imperial Oil's first operation in Alberta after the discovery of Leduc in 1947.

The other important factor has to do with the actual disposal of the lands and the rights to operate on them, and that is covered by the Territorial Lands Act. The actual end disposition of the products, once they pass a provincial or national boundary or travel into interprovincial or international trade, comes under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board.

So you have the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, responsible for the administration of this act and for the Territorial Lands Act dealing with the alienation of the resources, and the technical policing of the procedures that are used in the recovering of the resources.

Then you have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who will have jurisdiction over the National Energy Board responsible for any matters pertaining to the building of pipe-lines or the issuing of export permits necessary to send products out of the country. In view of the fact that the development of these resources, particularly as far as the Arctic Island area is concerned, will probably depend on discoveries of a satisfactory means of navigating large tankers through the Polar Sea, it is possible that there may be in due course a necessity for some amendment either to the National Energy Board Act, or some other act, to give the control necessary over tanker shipping which we presently have over pipelines. Whether this is desirable or not I think it is something we do not need to worry about until the tests being carried out this summer have indicated whether it will be possible to develop a route around the northern islands and possibly even around Greenland to Europe or through one of the straits to the Atlantic coast of North America. This remains very much a hypothetical problem.

Last December the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appointed a task force consisting of Claude Isbister, the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Dr. Robert Howlands, Chairman of the National Energy Board, and Mr. J. A. MacDonald, Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to investigate and assess the implications of the Alaskan North slope discoveries for Canadian oil development.

Now the necessity for the appointment of this deputy ministers' task force, while it certainly helps to point out the possible serious implications of this new discovery in Alaska to the Canadian oil and to the whole industry in western Canada, remains a bit of a mystery to me. Part II of the National Energy Board Act sets out the advisory functions of both in Section 22 (1), and it tells the Board to study and keep under review matters over which the Parliament of Canada has jurisdiction relating to all these things and to make recommendations to the Ministry at least in so far as they concern matters affecting energy supplies, and by subsection 2 the Board shall at the request of the minister prepare studies and reports on any matter relating to energy and sources of energy.

The task force presumably is now at work. It has been generally understood that this task force was set up following the representations by Premier Manning of Alberta to the Prime Minister shortly before Mr. Manning resigned the premiership of Alberta. However, it is probable that in the next three years oil from Prudhoe Bay will be transported by the pipeline which has been authorized across the Alaska peninsula to all-weather ports or southern ports in Alaska, and at that time it will be a matter of real concern to the oil producing areas and industry in western Canada because of the very great possibility that when this oil becomes available it will displace the oil presently being supplied from Alberta fields to the Pacific Northwest area around Puget Sound and possibly even in the Vancouver market.

The year-end issue of Oilweek, dated December 23, 1968, shows on page 14 the market demands for western Canadian oil for the month of January, 1969, and there it is indicated that British Columbia would require a total of 103,930 barrels of oil daily, of which 56,300 barrels would come from British Columbia and 47,630 barrels from Alberta wells. During the same month Alberta expected to sell 177,800 barrels daily to the Pacific northwest area which is Area V in the United States. British Columbia hoped to sell an additional 13,600 barrels daily in this area as well. Because of present marketing arrangements in western Canada, any loss of these west coast markets will have to be absorbed by the Alberta producers, and they may have to take a cut-back in the neighbourhood of 225,000 barrels of oil per day, or approximately one-quarter of Alberta's present production.

Now, to get some picture of the importance of this, it is necessary that you keep in mind that Alberta wells under a proration arrangement are already cut back to the point where they are permitted an average of about 37 per cent of what they could safely produce under sound conservation practice; and if this further cut-back takes place it will bring them down into the neighbourhood of something between 25 and 30 per cent of their safe practical capacity.

This situation is further complicated by the fact that in marketing Alberta oil we have to give consideration to the fact that the Great Canadian Oil Sands plant in the tar sands, which has just gone into production after a capital expenditure of $240 million, has started to come on stream. This proceeding was entered into with the undertaking from the Alberta government, that as soon as they were able to produce they would have access to a share of the Canadian export market to the tune of 45,000 barrels daily. Since then a second outfit, that wanted to put in another quarter of a billion dollar plant, using not a mining procedure but an underground burning and recovery procedure, has been denied an opportunity by the Alberta board to get into this field because the Prudhoe Bay situation makes it undesirable for the industry as a whole that any further commitments be made to these new areas in Alberta that could only be enjoyed at the expense of those who are presently producing from the conventional wells.

The fear of the industry is perhaps best shown by the cover of Oilweek of August 5, 1968, which asks, "Will Arctic Oil Kill Tar Sands Development?" The obvious fact is that this is certainly going to put a crimp in any further development of that type for some time.

In addition to that, in the production of natural gas for export and in the refining of the crude oil for local needs in western Canada, there is produced as a by-product a large number of the liquid petroleum gases—butanes, propanes, ethylene and various other combinations of the hydrocarbon series—which also are demanding a share of the energy market presently available; and there is, of course, the fact that they pretty well have to be accommodated if this other production is to continue. We are faced with either accommodating or wasting it. So, rather than waste it, it is probably going to have to be accommodated, and this still further cuts down the opportunities for the conventional well owner.

What happens then is this, that if your conventional well owner gets down to where he is able to produce only about 25 per cent, this will not make too much difference to the big, integrated companies, because they can take a long-term view, meet their requirements from elsewhere, and make adjustments; but it is going to be disastrous for many of the smaller, independent operators, because they are down to the point now where many of them feel that the proration system excludes them from getting the profits to which they think they are entitled.

Saskatchewan produces more than it consumes, but not a large amount, and they take some Alberta oil and ship some of their own east. Manitoba is a net importer; British Columbia is a net importer; and Alberta is the chief supplier of export oil. The pipelines start in Alberta and go through Saskatchewan and Manitoba, one way, and through British Columbia, the other. British Columbia says: All right, you want a pipe line through—you will take our oil. Saskatchewan and Manitoba have taken the same attitude, and Alberta has to be content with the capacity that is left when the others have put theirs in.

The way the proration system works is this, each month all the consumers of Alberta oil make known their estimates to the conservation board, by a certain date, of their oil requirements for the following month. In February they will put in their bids as to what they want to buy in March. This will be the pipeline companies, refineries or anyone else who represents a market for oil. This will be for the whole Canadian market picture, or the whole picture flowing out of Alberta. Then they will get the figures of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba supply, and then the Great Canadian Oil Sands, which they can tell by production because they are not up to the limits yet, and others such as condensate and LPG producers, all of which have to go in. Then they subtract the supply from the demand, and what is left is Alberta's share.

The Conservation Board of Alberta then pro rates that share out on the basis of so much percentage to each one of the fields, and then within the fields it is divided up among the various owners and producers in accordance with the various formulae. That is how in Alberta they have been producing their allocations over the last number of years, which now averages about 37 per cent of what could be normally produced.

This system has given an orderly market to the oil industry in western Canada. It has provided a stable and predictable market. It has prevented waste. Everybody knows where they are; this guarantees a share of the market to the small independent who otherwise might have had some trouble in that regard, and it has generally been well received. There have been some criticisms by people who say it has been nothing more than a price maintenance scheme—and it is certainly that, because you cannot say how much you can sell of a product, at any given time, unless you first of all set your price on it. But, generally speaking, it has been well accepted by the industry and the benefits accruing have outweighed the disadvantages.

However, I become concerned now in this regard: Alberta has been carrying the responsibilities and the costs of maintaining their own producers and maintaining a stable situation in this industry, but I do not know how much longer we will be able to do it, if we lose the Pacific market and if we get the northern production which has to be accommodated in some of the markets we presently have. In other words, it seems to me that there are some real problems here, and these discoveries in the north are going to cause the federal Government administering these discoveries, as they arise, responsibility for concern for Alberta's portion. It has been suggested, and I think correctly, that because of the very low level of production per month it has not been possible for the small producer to expand his operation, and he has very often yielded to the temptation to get out of the business by selling out to one of the bigger companies which is able to take a longer term view of the situation than the small operator. In other words, the small operator would be better off if he could get his profit now.

The National Energy Board, with its control over pipelines, should be asked, under section 22, to study this particular area with a view to seeing what the impact of new oil discoveries is going to be. Will they mean a reduction in the demand for Alberta crude? Will they have an immediate adverse effect on Alberta's revenues from this source, and which currently amount to approximately one third of its total income, as Senator Hastings pointed out in his very able speech the other evening. A reduction in the demand for Saskatchewan oil will hurt that provincial government's pocket book. Some of Saskatchewan's oil does go into export. The diversion of exploratory capital from the western provinces to the north will hurt the revenues of both provincial governments and their economies.

All of this brings me to what is the first and most important point, that we should be thinking of as a Senate charged with the responsibility for the well-being of the nation as a whole. In seeking to serve the nation's best interests, by establishing policies for the development of the resources of our northern territories, fair weight must be given to the established positions of the provinces and the different regions of Canada. There is nothing in the present legislation giving anybody the authority, if indeed authority can be given, to weigh the interests of Alberta, in particular, in this matter. If there are discoveries in the Northwest Territories, markets may be opened up by the advent of the northern ice-breaking tanker, but if we have to have a pipeline coming down through central Canada, then we must obtain some market concessions from the United States. If Alberta has to suffer a loss of governmental revenues of serious proportions, plus severe dislocation in its oil and gas industry, and supporting services, then we are going to have some people in Alberta who will be seriously upset.

I do not think I am overstating the case when I say that the economic well-being of Alberta's chief industry, and the security of the provincial government's chief source of income, will become as important issues in the administration of that province as the French-speaking Canadian's cultural and linguistic rights are to Quebec and the French-speaking communities across Canada. I am just enough of a cynic to go along with the old saying that a man who suffers the death of his son in war will forgive and forget, but a man who suffers the theft of his horse will never forgive and never forget. When you touch provincial pocket books you put as great, if not greater, a strain on Canadian unity as you do when you fail to help people achieve their hopes in other directions. I say that not for the purpose of downgrading in any way the importance of our responsibilities in helping the French-speaking people of Canada to achieve their goal, but to point out the dangers to Canada that are inherent in this other situation.

Senator Hastings has suggested, with this partly in mind, that there should be a continuing study of the industry in all of its aspects. Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) thought that there should be some other body than the Senate to conduct that study. Personally, I think the study should be conducted by people who presently have some responsibility to the industry, and also the ability to look at the technical end of it, and that is the National Energy Board.

Clause 22 (1) of the National Energy Board Act provides that the board shall initiate inquiries on their own responsibility, and clause 22(2) gives the minister the right to ask them for any further information he wants on any subject at any time. I think that is quite proper.

It is my opinion that a special committee of the Senate should be constituted for an additional purpose. The Senate can provide a forum where people who are going to be hurt, people who are afraid they are going to be hurt, representatives of the industry, and anybody who has an interest, can come before such a committee and present their views. That kind of public and open discussion on matters of national importance can do nothing but good. It is something that we can do, and something that I submit we should do.

It is imperative that this should be started immediately. This chamber has full authority to set up its own committee and clothe it with the authority to report and make recommendations with all possible despatch. If it is agreed, we can start next week. It is not necessary that the members of such a committee have a highly technical knowledge of the industry. All they need do is listen to what the competing experts have to say, and to the representations that may be made by the different interests which, although not of a technical character, will be of prime importance. I do not know where we could find a group of men better able to weigh the conflicting claims of various sections of a diverse industry, and the conflicting and competing claims of diversely interested provincial governments and regions, than the members of this chamber. It is my opinion that the need is so obvious that we should do everything to meet the challenge without further delay.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The committee could sit on Mondays and Fridays.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: It could sit on Saturdays, and even Sundays. I think the good Lord would forgive us.

The second point I want to deal with is even more important, in my opinion. In this whole legislative bundle dealing with the Northwest Territories and, in fact, the whole question of the oil resources of Canada, our total view has been limited to a consideration of a source of energy. It is true that that has been, and will remain for some time, the chief function of this industry, but it is not the part of the industry from which we as Canadians are going to reap the greatest benefit.

During the exploratory and development period when looking for oil and gas and drilling wells in order to get production, the oil industry employs a great deal of skilled and expensive labour, machinery and equipment. But once a field is brought into production and the wells are punched down, today there is computerized production and employment immediately falls off. Usually the prices are set by various other factors, so it is not a cost controlled industry but is a price controlled industry. From then on the value added is the cost repaid for the capital invested in the equipment. This is not a criticism of the industry, because it would be wasteful and indefensible if they were to operate in any way but as efficiently as possible, and they have found by experience that this is the way to operate efficiently.

If we pause to consider that there are parts of this resource, particularly in the petrochemicals, which give us an opportunity for greater employment, then we can take greater pleasure than we ever have out of the wealth now being produced. I am referring now to the petrochemical industry and the petroleum industry as a source of raw materials for the petrochemical industry. This covers plastics and a long list of things.

To give honourable senators an idea of what I am saying, I have here several photographs that make up a page of the Financial Post of November 25, 1967. The petrochemical industry is quickly becoming one of the top employers of capital, one of the large and important employers of labour, and one of the most significant producers of new wealth of any industry on both this continent and the continent of Europe and in Japan. Surely when we are developing these things we should be giving a great deal of consideration in our policy to the use of these resources in this way. It seems to me that as a basic part of our national resources development policy we should fully understand the real, lasting value of a natural resource. We get the value of it when we have been able to use it as a means of selling the skills of our people. An easy example is a Swiss wristwatch made of stainless steel, copper and glass, none of which are indigenous to Switzerland, all of which they buy for perhaps a fraction of a cent from somebody who produces them as raw materials. At the most they use a few cents worth of somebody else's raw materials as a medium for selling $15, $20 or $25 worth of the skills of the Swiss watchmaker.

Let there be no misunderstanding that we shall have to be content very largely with selling just the energy source; a lot of it is sold on that basis. However, when the resources go on that basis at the level we have, all we are getting are the wages of the watchman supervising the looting of the vault. That is all it is possible to get. He may be a reasonably well paid watchman, but that is all we get when we sell things in their original basic first-production state. It is only when we start to take cognizance of the value added and are able to use the resource and not just sell it, when we are able to sell the skills of Canadian labour to bring us a return on Canadian investment, that we get any real value.

The present petroleum industry is largely owned by outside capital and, by the very nature of the industry, once the original expenditure is made the only real return is a return of capital. Our return, even as foreign exchange, is illusory because it will to a large extent be offset by the necessity to counterexchange to pay back the capital and to pay for the capital. If foreign capital merely comes in to take something out and then goes home again, there is no real lasting benefit to this country. However, if foreign capital comes in and is permitted to be used to provide job opportunities for Canadians there are advantages to this country, and that is why I say we should make sure we are getting everything to which we are entitled, everything we could possibly get.

Senator Hastings referred to the fact that the day on which he spoke was the 22nd anniversary of the blowing in of Imperial Oil Leduc No. 1. When Senator Thorvaldson talked about Royalite No. 4 he was two years out, but that is all right because he does not live in Alberta. Those were happy stories. Let me tell you one that is not quite so happy. Natural gas was discovered in Southern Alberta around the turn of the century. Oil had already been discovered in Montana and optimists kept drilling wells all over Alberta. The equipment was rather crude in those days and they were not too successful. It was not until 1924 that they drilled a well down into the Mississippi structure on the Turner Valley Gas Cap, which is just a few miles south of Calgary, and they got a tremendous flow of what is known as wet gas—that is natural gas that has raw gasoline, or a very light high gravity oil in solution in it. Then people drilled up that gas cap like crazy until 1936. During that period of time they got up to the point where during 1932 they were taking 3,700 barrels of condensate a day out of the gas cap.

To get that 3,700 barrels of raw gasoline, they wasted 350 million cubic feet of natural gas. In total they flared 1.8 trillion cubic feet which would be worth approximately $270 million at today's well head price for natural gas. Today the Conservation Board procedures in Alberta tell the oil companies we will let you waste a maximum of one m.c.f. of gas for every barrel of oil you produce. At Turner Valley they used it at the rate of 100 m.c.f. of gas. It was perhaps more than that, but we will leave it at 100 m.c.f. gas for every barrel of oil they produced. In other words, they used 100 times what we permit today.

Now, that would not have been too tragic perhaps by itself, but in 1936 the Royalite well went down and they found oil on the edge of the gas cap—the thing is just like a cap. The gas cap is the top part and as you come down off the cap there is an area that runs around it and that is the area that is permeated and that holds the oil. Below that you have salt water. When you get to salt water, you know you have got off the field and when you get to gas you know you are in too far towards the centre.

Somebody went further and suddenly discovered oil, and that led to the discovery of the Turner Valley oil field. By the time they had learned by experience, in the United States and here, that it was not good practice to let the resource run away, they started to cut down on the waste of the gas in Turner Valley.

I remember as a boy—I was born and brought up in Taber, which is in southern Alberta, approximately 120 miles, as the crow flies, from Turner Valley to my home—night after night standing out and looking off to the northwest and I could see the glow of those flares 120 miles away. You know, we used to look at it, but to us it was merely an indication that it was wonderful that we had so much we could burn it. Today we say, was it not criminal that we burned it off, because the sad thing about it is that no one knows how much oil there actually was in the Turner Valley oil field. We will never know.

All we know is that we are never going to be able to get it out, because when they let that cap pressure deteriorate down as low as they did before they stopped it, they lost forever their hope and opportunity of being able to recover the oil. In other words, by the time we found out where the keyhole was to the treasure box we had lost the key, and it was an irreplaceable key.

That was Turner Valley. That is the sad story of Turner Valley. I do not blame anybody for that; it was ignorance. It was because nobody knew any better in those days, but now we know. Mistakes are not important because they happen. They are only important if we can use them as a guide not to make the same kind of mistake again.

Well, there was another one made which, looking back, appears as though it could have been a mistake too. Surely the provincial government treasurer feels from time to time that it was. For eleven years after Turner Valley there were no more substantial oil fields discovered anywhere in Alberta. We knew about the Tar Sands. Then there was a small amount of oil discovered around Wainwright, but nothing that amounted to anything until the Leduc No. 1. During the years between 1936 and 1947, there were a lot of wells drilled over Alberta, and there was a lot of money spent on wildcatting around without results.

The oil companies practically had given up, at least they had said so, and persuaded the provincial government that in order to supply our growing needs for gasoline in western Canada they ought to allow the oil companies to set up plants which would make gasoline by the hydrogenation process from natural gas.

As a matter of interest, in 1945 the Year Book from the Encyclopaedia Britannica carried the information that the average cost for producing gasoline from crude oil sources was approximately 12 cents a gallon and to produce by hydrogenation from natural gas would cost about 14 cents a gallon. In order to produce it from hydrogenation, using coal, which was what Hitler used to keep his war machine going for five years, it would cost about 16 cents. Well, the difference in the two cents between the two procedures was going to be more than offset by the fact that we had gas in Alberta and we did not have the oil, and by the time we brought the crude oil in from somewhere else it was going to be so expensive that the gas method would have still been cheaper. So we alienated to Imperial Oil the Viking Kinsella field which had been used since 1913 to supply gas to the City of Edmonton. We practically gave it to them because they were going to use it for this important provincial purpose of supplying gasoline for our requirements.

At that time we practically gave another gas field away to another company—I forget which one. However, they eventually sold their interest. I think it was to Union Oil. We sold them the Pendent d'Oreille field which is down south just a few miles north of the Alberta-Montana border. They were going to put a synthetic gasoline plant down there.

Then Leduc came in and of course we did not need synthetic plants because we had the crude oil. It was cheaper to use crude and that was obviously the intelligent way to do it. How come we did not get the gas fields back? Because we had sold them. Before that happened we did not pay anything for gas per se in Alberta.

Gas users in the City of Edmonton paid ¾ of one per cent royalty to the provincial government and about another 11 cents per m.c.f. which covered the return of the investment of the utility company which drilled its own wells and provided the pipes in the distribution system. In other words, we paid for service, not for commodity. Practically, the same thing is true in the city of Calgary which got theirs from Bow Island, west of Medicine Hat in the southern part of the province.

Ever since 1947, as Edmonton grew and needed more gas, we have had to buy the gas from Imperial Oil. It was a good deal for them; they were good businessmen and were not in the business for philanthropy. They were in the business to make money. A little bit of money on the gas bill, nobody is worrying about that. No one knew before Leduc that we were going to have it tomorrow but now we see where we went wrong. We were in such a rush to get things going. We were looking at that time for natural gas and our oil just as sources of energy.

Let me give you an example of why I suggest we have to look at them in other ways as well, and we had better be looking at them pretty hard. Natural gas is methane—CH_4, odourless, colourless, a combination of one atom carbon and four atoms hydrogen. Methane is worth $2.56 a ton if you sell it as fuel. If you use it to produce ammonia, the ammonia is worth $22 a ton; and if you further process the ammonia to make fertilizer, the fertilizer sells for $46 a ton. The difference between the $2.56 you get for methane as fuel and the $46 you got for fertilizer is the cost of labour and capital which have been added to it by the chemical processes in between.

In the City of Edmonton we have a chemical plant which was established there in 1953, with a capital investment of $140 million to $150 million. There are 950 people employed there at an annual total wage of about $7½ million a year.

The Alberta Government Department of Statistics tells us that where there are 950 employed in an area they provide employment for an additional 1,425 wage earners in supporting industry—stores, department shops, service stations and so on. That means 2,375 employed directly or indirectly by this plant. They produce a whole host of chemicals. They produce the filters for all the filter cigarettes, with the possible exception of the Strickmans. Certainly, they produce the stuff that is used in the filters of most of our Canadian cigarettes. I think they produce most, if not all—I think they are the sole producer of the orlon fabrics; they produce yarns. All these things that are made give rise to secondary industries.

They use approximately 3,000 barrels of propane daily, which would be worth about 3 to 4 cents a gallon if sold as fuel. When it is sold out of the chemical plant as the finished article, it produces raw material for other industry which starts a chain reaction right across the country, and that propane is worth 32 cents. In other words, we have added 26 cents to the value of the propane, which is what they add to the propane they use.

They do not use all the propane, but I can tell you that they are beginning to become pretty concerned, because we have people who wanted to ship all the propane out, to sell it to people, I suppose, to heat back rooms, garages, trailers and so on. They were not assured that there would be sufficient left and they were always concerned lest, in the hurry to get a market today, they were left in such a position that the people of today would not leave enough for the people of tomorrow and for their operations next year and the year after. When you build a $140 million plant you do not get paid for it in one, three or five years: it takes a little longer than that.

The examples that come are not just the chemicals. I do not think I have to burden honourable senators or put on the record the list of the things which are made by the petrochemical industry. All of the artificial fibres, all the plastics—the American cars are using 50 pounds of plastic to each car now and some German cars are using 100 pounds per vehicle. In England they are building houses of plastics which they can put together more quickly and more cheaply than by the conventional means.

I had a man in my office the other day who was showing me the setup for producing 1200 square foot houses by a special construction method of putting together wall and roof sections of plastic material prefabricated in a plant. This would be done in two days by two men. It would provide something better than the "warm and dry box" the minister speaks about, but for $4,500.

Honourable senators, all we need is someone directing someone's attention to these possibilities. We lost our mineral rights in western Canada to the Americans, for the same reason as the Indians lost them to the Europeans who came here in the first instance—because while we had them we did not know what to do with them. If we ship all this stuff right down into the United States and let them process it, we will be hewers of wood and drawers of water and we are not going to get very rich.

We will always be able to find the path the pipelines follow because our children will beat a path down to the end, looking for work.

Honourable senators, as the Parliament of Canada, we have the responsibility to do something here to protect the interests of the people of Canada. It is not the responsibility of industry to look after the people of Canada: it is the responsibility of Parliament.

It will not be an easy matter for the average ordinary Canadian to get into the plastics or petro-chemical business, as it takes too much money for the individual. However, if we had a Government department which would get all the facts together and go out and talk to the people, there are those here with money who would invest. We all know that Canadians have a tendency to invest in blue chip American stocks.

Honourable senators, let us not bother about trying to buy Canada back, because we would come back with a bad bargain. However, let us make sure we do not let too much more of it get away.

This requires an aggressive Government policy which will do several things. First of all, it will do the research and the studies and the inquiries to get the information about what is going on in the rest of the world, so that we will not have to wait until somebody who has gained experience elsewhere comes in here and does it for us. It is our own fault if we are slow at the switch. Government policy ought to be carrying on the research with regard to product development, market possibilities, finding out where and how necessary financing can be arranged.

We can finance everything else; why cannot we finance the things which will provide opportunities for our people and give us full value out of our natural resources? We could thus provide highly skilled jobs for people with highly skilled labour.

In the past, we have wakened up to our opportunities five years after someone else has gobbled them out from under our nose, and we could not see them because we did not know what they looked like. That is all—it was just because we did not know, we never had a chance of learning.

Now let us get a Government policy which will ensure that the information is available so that the average Canadian gets advice about his opportunities before they are lost.

This area of chemical development is one area. People are saying today what will happen. We are being told the oil companies are about to go into the chemical processes. Now they are talking of billion dollar chemical plants. We immediately run into the problem of size, or "scale", as the industry says. Well, these are things where I think Government policy can provide us with at least part of the answer.

The second and final point I wanted to make was that we need a national resource development policy in Canada that will include provisions for the maximum application of the "value added" feature so far as the realities permit in all matters pertaining to the development and production of natural resources of this country, particularly with respect to these particular types of resources.

You know, we laughed at the Indians who bartered Manhattan Island to the Dutch for a handful of beads. We laughed at the Russians who sold Alaska, with Prudhoe Bay, to the United States for $7 million.

We still laugh about these things. We laugh at the generation that flared the gas cap off Turner Valley. But let me tell you something about the natural gas and petroleum industry today. Do you know what they are doing? Here is the latest development: Food is being produced from petroleum. They now have been able to produce and are producing experimental quantities of a white, bland, tasteless powder which is 80 per cent pure protein and which they feel will enable us to meet the protein gap in the underdeveloped countries as well as in our own country in the nutritional problems in the years ahead. The only thing the petro-chemical industry has not come up with, so far as I know, is an answer to the problem of sex, and it is probably just as well that they leave that one alone. But they have something to do with everything else that you want to talk about. You are probably sitting, standing, putting on or taking off, combing your hair with or doing something else with some by-product of the petro-chemical industry.

I have a sneaking suspicion that, if not our children, then our children's children will think we were as stupid, when we used this valuable base for chemicals to heat houses and offices, as we think the Indians were when they sold Manhattan.

The Indians who got the beads figured that they had made a real tough, good deal. The Russians who got $7 million for Alaska figured they got $7 million for getting rid of nothing but trouble. They figured they put through a real, good, tough deal. And we think we are driving a hard bargain on the oil companies. Let me tell you that in the Northwest Territories all the interesting areas up there have already been alienated, and, if they discover anything—well, the terms of the leases have already been arranged. They will pay 5 to 10 per cent in the area equivalent to Prudhoe Bay on the Canadian side. They will pay 5 to 10 per cent royalty, 5 per cent further out and, if they get proven areas, they will have to pay 10 per cent. I do not know how these figures were arrived at, but I will wager the developers said, "If you don't do this, we won't go." And the Government wants them to go, so that was it. So let us not laugh at the old people; let us not be too proud ourselves.

Let me just finish up with a little illustrative story. I do not suppose your sense of humour is unlike my own. Let me tell you that in some ways I was just a bad luck kid. I remember one of the first tragedies in my life was the fact that when my younger brother got old enough to help carry up the coal and take out the ashes my father put gas in the house. Then, you know what happened? I got elected Leader of the Liberal Party in Alberta in June of 1947. Do you remember what happened in December of 1947? Leduc. From then I was running against not just "God" but "God and Santa Claus". Nobody shoots either one of them.

During that period of time, and from then until 1959, I think I can fairly say that this was just about my whole life.

I do not want to see us do it over again, but I remember I talked to a friend one day about the arrangements made, the good deal we had made for the development of our natural resources. My friend put the following supposition to me: Suppose that the United States got into a war with Russia in which we were not involved. Suppose further that the Russians asked us for oil and we said we would give it to them for $10 a barrel, a proposition to which they agreed and subsequently sent in their air tankers and picked up the oil. And suppose the Americans then told us we should not do that and we told them to mind their own business and they, telling us that they had warned us, sent up a platoon of marines and took over the province.

Incidentally, I think one platoon is just about all it would take; perhaps a little more than that, but not an awful lot more.

So suppose the Americans took our oil away from us but then they came back and said, "Now, look! You are not bad people. You are just badly led." That is what you always say when the war is over. "We want to be fair to you. We know you are going to want some of this oil. We will let you take one-eighth of it for your own use. We will take the rest. Now, we know we have some people here who need to work so we will buy our groceries from you. But when it comes to our special, technical equipment, we will have to bring that in from the people who have the experience of making it just the way we want it. We will use your good-looking girls around the office and your strong boys as workmen, but you will understand that all the technical jobs will have to be filled by the people we bring in."

Honourable senators, would you consider those particularly generous peace terms? And yet that is the hard-boiled deal that the province of Alberta had made with the American oil companies, which they were bragging about and which is a better deal than we have made in the Northwest Territories. We are dealing with a hypothetical situation there. I do not think the royalties we get are important, because the money is going to be spent and all it does is give a false sense of your true income at the time it is coming in, and it won't last forever.

The thing that is important is how we use the resources to make this Canada a better place for Canadians to live in. This act is a step along the way. I wanted to point out to this chamber that there have been errors and omissions about which a Senate inquiry could do a sterling service for the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, for Hon. Mr. Everett, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Douglas Charles Abbott, P.C., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to cause Letters Patent to be issued under his Sign Manual and Signet constituting the Honourable Douglas Charles Abbott, P.C., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, his Deputy, to do in His Excellency's name all acts on his part necessary to be done during His Excellency's pleasure.

The Commission was read by the Clerk Assistant.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Customs Act.

An Act to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

An Act to regulate interprovincial and export trade in freshwater fish and to establish the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

An Act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

An Act to amend the Veterans' Land Act.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 4 at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 4, 1969

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald tabled:

Report of the Water Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission entitled, "The Ownership and Registration of Ships in Canada", dated January 1969. (English and French texts).

Lists of shareholders in the Chartered Banks of Canada, as at the end of the financial years ended in 1968, pursuant to section 119(1) of the Bank Act, chapter 87, Statutes of Canada, 1966-67. (English text).

Lists of shareholders in the banks incorporated under the Quebec Savings Banks Act, as at the end of the financial years ended in 1968, pursuant to section 101(1) of the said Act, chapter 93, Statutes of Canada, 1966-67. (English and French texts).

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, February 26, 1969, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Revised copies of document entitled "Consensus of the Constitutional Conference, February 1969". (English and French texts).

Copies of Notes, dated September 25, 1967, exchanged between the Canadian Ambassador at Washington and the Acting Secretary of State of the Government of the United States, with reference to arrangements for the export of petroleum to the United States. (English and French texts).

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. David A. Croll, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 627 to 651, inclusive, and moved that they be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

USE OF BROADCAST FACILITIES BY RENE LEVESQUE—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. L. P. Beaubien inquired of the Government, pursuant to notice:

1. How many hours did Mr. Rene Levesque speak on the C.B.C. Radio during calendar year 1968?
2. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these talks, and if so, how much?
3. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for the time he was on the air on C.B.C. Radio, and if so, how much?
4. During the calendar year 1968 for how many hours did Mr. Levesque appear on the C.B.C. Television?
5. Was Mr. Levesque paid by the C.B.C. for any of these appearances, and if so, how much?
6. Did Mr. Levesque or his sponsors pay anything to the C.B.C. for his television appearances, and if so, how much?
7. How much would the C.B.C. have charged in the ordinary course of business:

(a) for the time Mr. Levesque spoke on C.B.C. Radio,

(b) for the time Mr. Levesque appeared on C.B.C. Television?

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: The answer to the honourable senator's inquiry is as follows:

1. Alone or in discussion with others, Mr. Levesque's appearances on the C.B.C. Radio Networks totalled approximately three hours during 1968.
2. No.
3. No.
4. Alone or in discussion with others, Mr. Levesque's appearances on the C.B.C. Television Networks totalled approximately four hours during 1968.
5. No.
6. No.
7. Nil. The programs on which Mr. Levesque appeared are not made available to sponsors.

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope when I have finished my explanation tonight I shall find that what I have said about the effect and application of this bill will not have detracted in any measure from the high standard of personal affection that exists between the other members of the Senate and myself. I would ask honourable senators not to attribute to me any faults that may be found in the bill. All I can say is that the need for money makes for strange bedfellows. As we know, there is a tremendous need for money, and, therefore, we find quite an extensive search, even within the scope of this bill, for the necessary money.

Of course, everyone who is seeking to extract money, or to do other unpopular things of that nature, tries to sugar-coat it a bit, and you will find in this bill a little of that sugar-coating, about which I shall tell you later.

The bill is divided into two parts. One deals with gift tax, and proposes to repeal Part IV of the present Income Tax Act which provides for the gift tax, the basis upon which it is applicable and the exemptions as to its application. The second portion of the bill deals with amendments to the Estate Tax Act.

Before getting into particularity about the gift tax portion of Bill C-165—that portion runs from page 1 to page 19, inclusive—I should like to make a general observation in relation to the history of gift tax.

Gift tax in Canada came into force some years ago. The purpose behind its introduction and its incorporation into our income tax law stemmed, I think, from the fact that people were dividing their capital assets or funds in some fashion so that each person would have a lesser amount of income and would be, therefore, exposed to a lesser amount of tax. I think the basic reason for introduction of gift tax in those earlier days stems from an attempt to correct this, or at least to realize some additional revenue in the process.

Then we moved into the second stage in which, by reason of the exemptions in the gift tax provisions, many people during their lifetime were making gifts and paying the gift tax, because as estate tax rates and income tax rates went up it became in some cases advisable to make the gift and to pay the lower rate of tax, hoping to survive for at least three years, in which event the gift would not on death thereafter be incorporated into the estate of the donors. Now, with the need for money and with estate tax rates at a high level, the tendency would be more and more, I would think, to avail oneself of the gift tax provisions if they were permitted to remain where they were.

First there was an integration of gift tax with income tax for the purpose of salvaging something out of the gift process. In the second stage there is an integration of the gift tax with estate tax, and the two of them meet reasonably soon. I think in rates they meet at about $300,000 of taxable value in an estate and about $200,000 in gifts.

Therefore, this has run the full gamut. Where it will go from here, I do not know. If I were asked to advise I might have a suggestion, and I may make it anyway before I sit down. In a book, The Principles of Canadian Income Taxation, written by a Mr. F. E. LaBrie, I did find a development of this thesis, which I have studied and held for some time. At page 667 of his book he says:

> The reason may be purely historical, whereby it was introduced—

That is the gift tax, originally.

> —as a measure of compensation for loss of progressive income tax revenue through the division of ownership of productive property at a time when there were no other Dominion transfer taxes.

Later he goes on to say:

> Since the replacement of Dominion succession duty with an estate tax in 1959, some attention has been paid to coordinating this estate tax with gift tax, which suggests an affinity between these two transfer taxes.

I think openly the minister made the statement that the idea was the integration of gift tax with estate tax.

Now having said that as a general observation, I would like to spend a few moments on the gift tax provisions and just highlight them. Up to the present time certain exemptions have been enjoyed under the gift tax provisions in Part IV of the Income Tax Act. For instance, there is an exemption in the case of an individual of either $4,000 a year or one-half the difference between the taxable income of the donor for the immediately preceding taxation year and the tax that was payable thereon, whichever is greater. So that in this field for quite a number of years there has been a substantial incentive to make gifts that enjoyed the exemption if they did not exceed 50 per cent of the difference between your taxable income and the taxes paid thereon in the previous year. You could even go on from there and make gifts and pay the gift tax in relation thereto, because the rate started at 10 per cent on the first $5,000, and when it reached $1 million and over the rate was 28 per cent. There were inducements leading really to a transfer of assets from one person to another, possibly from one spouse to another or from a spouse to the children.

In regard to the payment of these rates, the only condition that had to be fulfilled after that was, as I mentioned earlier, the donor or the person making the gift had to struggle as best he could to survive for at least three years under the federal tax law, and five years under the provincial tax law in Ontario. This was necessary so that that gift might effectively be taken out of his estate for duty purposes on his death.

Of course, so far as the federal authority was concerned, under the existing law, or before this bill was introduced, if death occurred within three years the tax paid federally was rebated and was added into the estate. There was no such generosity at the provincial level; if one did not survive the three years, that item was part of the estate.

You will find under the new section 112 the main clause in the bill which deals with gift tax. This contains an exemption for gifts to spouses. Newspapers and others describe this provision as a widow's exemption. It is a spouse's exemption, which means that the husband can make the gift to his wife or the wife to the husband. Under this law they can make an assessment of the expectancies and probabilities to decide which way they will do it, and they can even change their minds later while they are still alive in order to recapture a situation if the condition of health changes from the estimate they originally had.

In connection with the exemptions, for instance, there is an exemption if a husband made a gift to his wife, and if he paid gift tax on it and it became part of her estate. Then, of course, there is the problem that, when she passes on, any part of that gift which is in her estate, is part of her estate and subject to tax.

The supposedly attractive feature of this exemption of gifts between spouses in their respective lifetime is that the amount of the gift made by the donor spouse—let us say, the husband—that is given to the donee spouse, no longer will form part of the value of his estate for tax purposes; but when the recipient of that gift dies, it comes into her estate as part of her estate, if of course there is anything left to it at that time. If it is a straight gift of cash, there might or might not be anything left; but if it is income from a trust or something of that kind, the donee spouse, the wife, would be presumed at her death to have made the gift over to whoever takes after she passes on, and therefore it would be part of the value of her estate for estate tax purposes.

This is the chief purpose of the bill, I would say, in so far as gift tax is concerned. But it does repeal both the $4,000 exemption and the exemption of one-half the difference between a person's taxable income and the tax that he paid on it in any one year. That is repealed and gone forever. In its place he gets, first, this exemption of a gift between spouses in the lifetime of both; and he also gets an exemption of $2,000 per person. That is, he could multiply $2,000 by as many persons as he had money to give away in a year, and that $2,000 in the hands of those persons, whoever they may be, would be exempt from gift tax.

The other provision, as continued in the new gift tax provision, is what I call the "$10,000 provision." As the once-in-a-lifetime gift under the act, before this bill came in, the husband, for instance, could convey a residence to his wife, up to $10,000, once in a lifetime, and there would be no tax on that gift.

Since that, there is a change, but the principle is continued. The change is that, since any gift by one spouse to the other is exempt from gift tax, there is no need for that provision so far as the wife is concerned. Therefore, it carries on so far as a child or children are concerned.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: May I ask one question? Under the previous act you could give only $10,000 to one member of the family. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Once.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: And now you can give it to any number of your family—or is it only to one?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: One.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask, in passing, another question? You referred to the gift of $2,000 that may be made to children. Can the same gift be given to anyone you choose?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is $2,000 per person. It does not depend on the bloodstream or anything of that nature.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You do find, in section 112 additional types of payments that heretofore have been made and have not been subject to tax, but are deemed under these amendments to be gifts and therefore to attract tax. Offhand, I can think of one: for instance, under section 16 of the Income Tax Act where a man who is entitled to receive some money decides that it would be better off in the hands of a friend of his, and he sees that it is paid to the friend. Under Section 16, of the Income Tax Act, provides:

> 16. (1) A payment or transfer of money, rights or things made pursuant to the direction of, or with the concurrence of, a taxpayer to some other person for the benefit of the taxpayer or as a benefit that the taxpayer desired to have conferred on the other person shall be included in computing the taxpayer's income to the extent that it would be if the payment or transfer had been made to him.

Under the present section 113 it is not only regarded as the income of the taxpayer—that remains under section 16—but it is also deemed to be a gift in those circumstances by the taxpayer to the person who receives it. So that would then attract a gift tax. There are a number of situations where you have what are deemed to be gifts by reason of the circumstances, and you find all that in section 113 of the bill. For example, it is deemed to be a gift where a person "exercises, whether partially or completely, any general power of which he was the donee or other holder". For instance, there may be a general power under a will, and the exercise would be deemed to be a gift. The conferring of a benefit by disposing of the right to restore to himself or to reclaim any property would be deemed to be a gift; that is, if he foregoes it, then it is a gift to the person who enjoys the benefit of it.

On the question of valuation, you will find all valuations covered in section 113 as well.

Hon. Mr. Lang: May I ask a question before you pass from that, Senator Hayden? Do I understand from what you have said that under section 16 of the Income Tax this is taxable as income in the hands of the taxpayer, but under this act it is also taxed as a gift?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is deemed to be a gift, yes.

Hon. Mr. Lang: And it is taxable as such?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Lang: In other words, it is being taxed twice, once under this amendment and once under the Income Tax Act.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. It is taxed once as income and again as a gift. It is the income of the taxpayer and, when it goes to a third person, it is deemed to be a gift by the taxpayer. In other words, section 16 of the Income Tax Act says that in those circumstances it is the income of the taxpayer. All right, so he pays tax on it. But then, when you make a gift, that is taxable. You may be making the gift out of income that you have already paid tax on. There is nothing unusual in that situation. The only unusual feature here is that you are paying income tax on something that did not come to you, but it is only because of something you did that it did not come to you.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: When you refer to the taxpayer in that particular context, you mean the donor?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is what I thought.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am not going to worry you about the valuation. You can read it or get it in committee. What I am attempting to achieve tonight is a highlighting of the provisions and to tell you where they are.

One unusual provision as to what is deemed to be a gift is where a debt exists between two people who are dealing at non-arm's length, and the situation is permitted to develop to where it becomes a non-collectable debt; in other words, where they do nothing and the statute of limitations applies and it becomes a non-collectable debt, this is now deemed to be a gift. It would appear then that parties who are not dealing at arm's length may have to conduct themselves in quite a different fashion. I suppose they might have an evaluation made of the debt, and in the circumstances it might carry a lower value. On the other hand, they might sell it to someone else. There are many ways in which it can be done, and I am not giving any examples of it this evening. Then, where the debt is owing between the person who would be the creditor and the related person or corporation at the time of making the gift, it would have to be established that the non-collectability or the collection of less than the full amount was a bona fide situation, that the circumstances surrounding it were bona fide. Otherwise, it would be assumed to be a gift by the donor to the related person.

Now, the donor has to pay the tax in the first instance, and if the donor does not pay the tax of course the donee would be called upon to pay it. That, as you can see, may present problems. If a donor makes a number of gifts to different persons in his lifetime and there is tax on the sum total of the gifts, and he pays some of it but does not pay it all, the people receiving the gift are then called upon, but there is a problem in this section 115 as to how to calculate the portion of the tax which the donee is obliged to pay in respect of the particular gift which he got. They have a formula for working that out.

These are really the effective provisions, and I have not bothered either to list or to enumerate all the things that are not gifts under this new Part IV because some of them are a carry over from the earlier legislation. There are as well changes in the enumeration, and you can read and run at the same time and absorb it just as quickly as I can tell you about it. I will just try to touch the essentials of the different provisions that appear in this part of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I ask a question before you move on? You have made a tremendously lucid explanation of these provisions and of the changes in the gift tax section, if I may say so. Would you care to indicate just what is the reasoning behind all this? What is the Minister of Finance trying to achieve by making these changes? Does he himself know or has he given any indication of what he wants to achieve or whom he wants to help or whom he wants to hurt?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Obviously, I could make quite an answer to that. First I should say I am not privileged to share the mind of the Minister of Finance. Maybe it is just as well, for if I could there are certain answers that I would like to find before we get too close to the day of their possible occurrence, judging by what has appeared in the newspapers in reference to capital gains taxes and such matters. I would like to have a preview, but I do not think I will be able to get one. However, I shall try to answer your question.

For some time in our Banking, Trade and Commerce committee meetings every time we deal with an income tax bill some question has been raised about how unfair it is that first of all the wife should be taxed on benefits that go to her from the husband since she is a partner and helping in the earning of the money. Then when it comes to the estate, there has been the same complaint. It would appear from what has been said by the minister that he has finally decided that he should recognize this as a principle. Therefore, he recognizes the principle in the gift tax provisions by saying that property passing between husband and wife or visa versa—in other words from one spouse to another—is exempt from gift tax. He has also, as you will see when we get into the estate tax provisions, provided an exemption in relation to property that is given or passed to one spouse by the other in the lifetime of the donor or that is passed on by will or maybe in the form of a trust or settlement. Now, as I say, he has provided exemption in these cases, but having done that he says "this is costing me a lot of money to do this." How much it is costing, I do not know nor do I know the calculations they made to determine it.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: But it is really only a temporary expense to the exchequer.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, it is a deferral of liability, but it is a little more than that because if a husband makes a gift to his wife, under this bill it is out of his estate and therefore the estate pays less tax, and if any part carries on into the other spouse's estate, then, as things were before it is subject to tax.

Then there are the other risks, which I referred to and which I will have to repeat, but it may be that they fit in here. Let us take, for example, the case where a husband and wife are killed in the same motor vehicle accident, and if the wife is younger than the husband the presumption in law is that the wife survived for a fraction of a second longer than the husband and therefore you would have a double succession under the law as it existed before the introduction of this bill. In other words, the husband's estate would be probated and there would be succession duties, and then the wife's estate would be probated and whatever she got from the husband's estate would be in her estate and since it would add to the value of her estate there would be further taxes.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Completely?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not completely, but enough to hurt.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: That is why we put the thirty-day clause in when we draw wills.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have news for you, Senator. I know some people, including myself, who put in a six months' clause. You will see the sense of that when I come to deal with the next part of the bill.

However, Senator Thorvaldson, to get back to my answer, the other half of it is that the minister said, "Look what I have done; look how my revenues are curtailed; therefore, I have to find somewhere else within the four corners of the gift tax and the Estate Tax Act the money to replace them." The only thing that could be done was to raise the rates, and the rates have gone up, and with the integration of the gift tax with the estate tax—and that appears to be the principle behind this bill—the purpose is to discourage or downgrade the gift method in the lifetime.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Why?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Because there is no advantage as far as taxes are concerned.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is a good reason.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Now while I am talking about the two spouses, you will note everybody is called upon to contribute because of the remissions that are involved in making gifts between one spouse and the other exempt either from gift tax or estate tax. Everybody else, in the raising of the estate tax rates and the gift tax rates, is making his contribution by virtue of this.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I apologize for interjecting again, but while you are on the question of rates and the question of the exchequer and moneys anticipated to be produced under these amendments, I might say that several years ago I had the passage in this chamber of preceding amendments to this act, and I remember that at that time I was quite astounded to realize that the revenue to the exchequer from this act was not very much greater than the cost of administering it.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Lang: I queried this at the time and, if my recollection is correct, it was acknowledged that the income from this act and the cost of administering it were very much equivalent, and the only reason this act remained in existence was that it was a means of catching, upon death, those who had evaded income tax during their lifetime; and, apart from that consideration, the act was in fact valueless as a money raiser.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: What is the question?

Hon. Mr. Lang: My question is: How much money are these amendments going to put into the exchequer?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I thought I had answered that, but I will repeat my answer. I was going to make some comment later as to the revenues derived from this tax. What I said was that it is expected that the revenues derived from the increase in rates will offset revenues lost by providing this exemption.

Hon. Mr. Lang: It is a net zero, I presume.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is hoped that it will at least be a zero, or it should be a plus on the side of more revenue. I do not think it is hoped, expected or wanted that overall it would produce less money than is now derived under what they are changing from.

Hon. Mr. Lang: It is zero.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: You may draw your own conclusions; I am just stating the facts.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What is the object? Is it to get more revenue?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I can only tell you what the stated object is. You start off with the principle that you are going to exempt gifts in the lifetime or, in passing on, between husband and wife. That is the main theme that runs through the gift tax and estate tax amendments. Therefore, if you had to face a situation which involved any shrinkage in your revenue you looked some place else to find it and decided, in this case, to find it right within the four corners of the gift tax provisions, gifts during a lifetime, and under the Estate Tax Act. Therefore, the rates went up. Those subject to tax, in the main, will be called on to pay more tax.

May I come now to the estate tax changes?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Are you not going to deal with the increase in rates, the enormous, fantastic, prohibitive $71,500 plus 75 per cent of the amount by which the sum exceeds $200,000, if it does?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: As I said in talking about the rates, they are enumerated in the bill. You can see what the amount is, and the gift tax rate is 75 per cent above $200,000. That is the point at which a $300,000 estate is subject to a 50 per cent rate, because the rate under the estate tax can never be more than 50 per cent. That is why I said I think it is cogent proof of the plan to encourage the use of the estate tax, with a view to discouraging the large use which I think up to date has been made of the gift tax provisions, particularly the one where you had an exemption of half the amount of the difference between your taxable income and the tax paid in the previous year. You had that exemption and could give it away, as you wished, in the succeeding year.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Following that up, is not the real effect of the high escalation of the gift tax simply to make a fantastic change in the laws of this country with regard to income tax so as to make gifting among wealthy people practically impossible? Is it not simply a levelling out gesture and nothing else? Is it not intended to ruin wealthy families? Is that not the effect of it?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This is my friend's statement, but cost at any level in our economy is a relative thing. In terms of a man who has a smaller income and does not fall within the category of being a wealthy man, the cost of gifting at his level in relation to what he would have to pay in gift tax hurts him just as much as the cost at a higher level would hurt the person with a greater income. You may not agree with that; it may well be your conclusion is correct. I would prefer to generalize and say I think it is to make gifting an unpopular pastime.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: May I follow it up with this question? Is this not the greatest bar that has ever been attempted in this country, to prevent the accumulation of capital? When I refer to the accumulation of capital, I state my conviction that without the accumulation of capital in the hands of people, this country will be at a standstill in a few years time with regard to progress and growth.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I am glad my friend got a question in there with his speech! This is your view, and you are entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: What is your view?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have stated my view, that gifting becomes unpopular under these rates. Certainly, if you look at it in one sense it does not do what my friend has suggested; it does not prevent the accumulation of capital. It may force the person who has the means to accumulate it in his lifetime in his own estate and to face the issue under the Estate Tax Act. Meantime he has the enjoyment of it himself, instead of giving it away and being taxed on it. There is that side of the picture. There is also another side of the picture: tax havens may become much more popular.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: They are pretty popular now.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Now may I move on to the estate tax portion of the bill?

Hon. Mr. Walker: There is a lot of wisdom in the last statement.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I would like to feel that in anything I say here seriously—

Hon. Mr. Walker: —there is wisdom.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: —there is some wisdom behind it. It may not come out, but there is some wisdom behind it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You have been wonderful!

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I was questioning in my own mind how I should approach this part dealing with estate taxes, because it is complicated. I had always been taught, and it is a good practice for a lawyer to observe: Never use three words where one will do. But, on reading some of the sections here I am almost convinced that the motto was: Never use one word where six can be fitted in. However, instead of going through the bill section by section and this tedious performance which we will repeat in committee where we will hear all the experts, I thought I could make a narrative out of it. It certainly is not romantic, but I thought I could make some kind of narrative out of it. I set to work doing that, and whether I have achieved anything or not, you can decide when you hear it.

Having created this thing, I would like to tell you what it is. I think it does give an explanation of the chief provisions relating to estate tax and involving amendments in this bill to the Estate Tax Act. The relevant sections are to be found starting at page 20 and running through to page 43.

While I should like at appropriate points to intersperse it with remarks or comments, my narrative runs something like this: The changes in the Estate Tax Act and Part IV of the Income Tax Act by this bill are mainly by reason of the decision that gifts by one spouse to the other spouse, either in their respective lifetimes or by will, whether by outright gift or by means of the creation of a trust or settlement, shall, if occurring in the lifetime of both parties, be exempt from gift tax, and if made by will, the taxable value of the estate of the donor spouse shall be reduced by the amount or value of such gift and the estate tax on the donor spouse's estate reduced accordingly.

Thus, assets bequeathed to a widow or widower by the other spouse to the extent spent or exhausted in the lifetime of the donee spouse are free of estate tax on the death of such donee spouse. However, the amount or value of gifts to the donee spouse still remaining at death of the donee spouse, more particularly illustrated by the assets of a trust or settlement created by and in the lifetime of the donor spouse or under his will shall be included in the estate of the donee spouse at death, and estate tax shall be levied thereon payable by the estate of such donee spouse.

That is about as concise a statement as I could make of the principal purposes of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask the honourable senator a question? If those gifts to the wife during the lifetime of her husband are invested, would not the income from the investment be the husband's income and be included for purposes of taxation in his income?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This is a point that I think should be brought out. There is a provision in the Income Tax Act under which, if a man makes a contribution to his wife and she derives income from it, he has to include it in his income for purposes of taxation, but it may be that where there is an exemption on the gift, the question of income in those circumstances does not arise. If it is not intended that it should arise, then I think clearly the pertinent sections of the Income Tax Act should be repealed.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I do not want to interrupt the honourable senator. He is doing a splendid job, and I hesitate to divert his train of thought.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: You cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I think that is true. He is an old campaigner and a great counsel.

Suppose I make a gift to my wife today before the Ontario budget comes down, and when I do not know what the Provincial Treasurer is going to do, is it taxable? Suppose I live the three years or the five years, would it be included for purposes of taxation?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, the three years would not have anything to do with it. I shall be dealing with this specific point a little later on. I wonder if the honourable senator would care to wait until that time.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the Estate Tax Act amendments part of Bill C-165 this is provided by amendments to section 7(1)(a) and (b), to be found at the bottom of page 21 and over to page 22, where provision is made for deduction from the aggregate net value of the property passing on the death of the donor spouse of—and this is where the authority to deduct exists—(1) the value of any property passing at the death to the donee spouse and/or (2) the value of any gift made by the deceased (the donor spouse) in his lifetime or by will whether the donee spouse is entitled under the settlement to receive all the income that arises after the death of the deceased and before the death of such donee spouse, or periodic payments in ascertained amounts or limited to ascertained maximum amounts to be made at intervals of not greater than twelve months, out of the income of the settlement arising after the death of the deceased and before the death of the donee spouse or, if the income is completely exhausted by such payments, then out of the income and capital of the settlement—this is what we ordinarily describe as a power under the settlement to encroach on capital of the fund to make up any deficiency in the income payment—or (3) the value of a gift by the transfer of property to a trust which at the time of transfer was a settlement for purposes of this act and where the creation of such trust contituted a gift inter vivos by the donor spouse that was exempt from gift tax.

It is essential, however—and these are the terms under which the gift will qualify for exemption—that (1) such gift be established to be vested indefeasibly in the donee spouse for the benefit of such spouse except for property comprising a gift made by the creation of a settlement or a trust, or in the case of a settlement such gift can be established to be absolute and indefeasible.

Notwithstanding the condition for entitlement to exemption or deduction in the case of a gift from a donor spouse to a donee spouse, namely, that the gift must be indefeasible, provision is made in section 3 of the bill under which there is provided a period of six months after the death of the deceased within which this can be accomplished, or such longer period as may be reasonable in the circumstances within which to establish the vesting indefeasibly in the donee spouse. This applies not only to property passing on the death of the deceased in these circumstances but also to any gift made by the deceased, whether during his lifetime or by his will, that is intended to pass after his death to the donee spouse. This provision is in effect a statutory definition of indefeasibility in relation to the passing of property or gifts to a donee spouse, the terms of which contain a condition such as, for instance, that the donee spouse will only be entitled to receive the property or gift if she survives the donor spouse for a period of six months. This provision is beneficial, and would also cover cases where proceedings have been taken by the donee spouse under the Dependant's Relief Act. Where the donee spouse is not satisfied with what has been given by the will she can apply—I know this is so in Ontario, and I assume it is so in other provinces—under the Dependant's Relief Act, and if the judge is satisfied as to what her standard of living was during the lifetime of the husband, and that she is entitled to be taken care of in that fashion out of the estate, he can make an order, and that is a charge on the estate.

Now, the idea of giving a broader meaning to "indefeasible" is so that the Act will accommodate such an instance as where there is a provision in a will that the gift is in lieu of dower and there may be a contest in the courts in relation to that. So, the provision is quite generous. Originally they had the words "reasonable time", but now they have put in a provision that the indefeasibility will not be destroyed if the spouse does not take for a period of six months after the death of the deceased, or even such longer period thereafter as may be reasonable to accomplish this purpose.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Would that cover a situation in which the two spouses, the husband and wife, were in an accident, and one died four months after the other?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes, it covers a common disaster, because if the wife survived for three or four days you would still have the problem under the present law—not under this bill—of double taxation. So, this means that for any purpose if you have a condition that the wife must survive for six months—or if she does not survive, she does not take—and if she survives for six months and takes, then the gift is an exempt gift, and it is not included in the husband's estate.

There is also a provision in this section that no person other than the donee spouse may receive or obtain after the death of the donor spouse, as long as the donee spouse lives, any of the capital of the settlement or any use thereof—this is with the periodic payments—or any of the income to which the donee spouse is entitled or any use thereof.

I think there is something in the language of this section at which we should look in committee, because in the instalment payments to a wife this envisages a settlement or a fund containing a larger amount of capital than the amount necessary to provide a stipulated payment or a maximum payment of income to the wife. Therefore, there may be others who are entitled to share in the surplus income after the wife has been paid the amount stipulated. However, you must be careful in the drawing of a will to make sure this purpose is accomplished. What I am concerned about is where it says that only the wife may obtain or receive any of the capital or any use of it. It strikes me that in the use of the capital in the settlement, unless it is limited to capital which earns the money she is entitled to, the capital use may be broader in its meaning, which will mean you could not pay any income out of the fund even after the wife's payments had been made as long as the wife was alive and entitled to that money. I think we therefore must have some clarification of this in committee.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: May I ask another question?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In drawing a will it is frequently provided that the income from the capital of the estate or the residue is payable to the wife during her lifetime, but if that is not sufficient to keep her as she should be kept according to her station in life, the trustees or executors have the right to provide for the payment to her of a percentage of the capital in addition to the income. Is there anything to prevent that being done?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is nothing to prevent it and no tax problem if she spends it. By that I mean any part of what she might accumulate from any moneys payable to her in her lifetime is part of her estate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Is exempt?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Including capital?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: There is no distinction.

As to valuation, at page 25 of the bill there are provisions for the valuation of any gift of this kind made by the deceased in his lifetime or by will by the creation of a trust or a settlement. The provisions of the valuation are that the property at the death of the donee which was the subject of a gift by a donor spouse to his donee spouse in the lifetime of the donor, and in respect of which a deduction from the aggregate net value of the donor's estate was allowed on the death of the donor, or the subject of a gift in his lifetime by the creation of a trust or other settlement of a donor spouse in favour of his donee spouse, and in respect of which exemption from gift tax was allowed, shall be deemed to be property passing on the death of the donee, and the value of such property subject to the trust at the death of the donee to be included in the donee's estate shall be deemed to be the lesser of the value at that time—that is at the time when the donee died—or at the time of the death of the donor under the prescribed regulations.

In other words, you have the value, whatever the amount appears to be, but you can make another calculation; that is, you can calculate the amount of money in the fund, and the regulations will provide rules for determining what amount of money it would take in capital to earn the amount of income stipulated for, and it is the lesser of those two amounts. Therefore, the part that is excluded from the donor's estate at that time would be the lesser of these two. In other words, if you put more money in than was necessary to provide for this payment, the deduction in his estate would be only on the value of the amount necessary to produce this income calculated under regulations to be made.

The value of any gift made by a deceased, whether in his lifetime or by will, or by the creation of a trust or settlement passing on his death, for purposes of deduction from the donor's estate, shall be deemed to be the lesser of its value at the time of the death of the donor or the amount determined, as I have stated, by regulation to determine what amount is sufficient to provide for those payments.

Earlier some questions were asked, and here is where I deal with them. It is with respect to trusts existing at October 22, 1968—that is the night of the Budget Speech—under which a donor spouse takes a life interest. If such trusts have existed for at least three years at that date and the donor spouse dies after October 22, 1968, the value thereof is not included in the aggregate net value of the donor spouse's estate, and his estate is not subject to tax, nor is any part of it deemed to be part of the estate of the donee spouse for estate tax purposes at the death of such spouse. This is my translation into ordinary English of what the sections in the bill purport to say. If such a trust exists for less than three years and the donor spouse dies within three years after October 22, 1968, the property in the trust would be part of the aggregate net value of the estate of the donor spouse but not part of the aggregate taxable value. It might be exempt under section 3 of the bill. It is not an exempt gift under this bill and would not be deemed to be part of the estate of the donee spouse. It is not an exempt gift because it would have been made before the effective date of this bill.

Superannuation is dealt with on pages 24 and 25. Superannuation or pension or death benefits payable subject to a remarriage provision to a spouse of a deceased, subject to defeasance if the spouse remarries, shall not by reason of such provision alone be considered not to be indefeasibly vested. In other words, the condition "until marriage" will not destroy the exempt nature of the gift. I can tell you at the same time, and I may as well mention it here, that we were concerned when we studied the estate tax bill originally, and at different times since then have been expressing our concern about provisions under which certain types of pension benefits, et cetera are provided by the husband in his will to his wife. There was some method of providing in the Estate Tax Act for the valuation of some part of that so that the estate might be left with less, and therefore the amount of the pension provided would be less by such a situation.

From the way in which it is looked at under this bill, we could say that if a man is providing a pension for his wife for life and is directing the trustee to take a certain amount of money and invest that money in an annuity, that might come under the general description of a gift from one spouse to the other for the purpose stated, and so would be exempt and there would be no question of tax at that time.

Hon. Mr. Walker: That is on a fixed income, for life income?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. There is another situation that I think I should call to your attention. Suppose a man draws a will and has an estate of $100,000, of which he gives half to his widow and half to an adult individual. Then he makes a provision in his will that the estate is to pay the estate taxes, but he is not very careful in the language he uses. When the estate taxes are determined both gifts would suffer, would be reduced in amount, because the estate taxes would come off the total, and when half and half is divided the widow would get less than half of $100,000, which is $50,000.

If the net estate were then about $80,000 she might get $40,000. In such circumstances realizing your estate is going to pay succession duties or estate taxes, care should be taken to provide that that portion you are giving to your wife is free of all estate taxes, which means the whole burden is saddled on the other person. Maybe I should not have offered that.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is free.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I would like to speak for a moment on the position of the children and the children's exemptions. You will find that on page 23, section 3(1)(c).

There is a deduction from the aggregate net value of the testator's estate—that is, the parents' estate—for the purpose of computing aggregate taxable value thereof of the lesser, in respect of each child who survives, of the value of any property passing on the death of the deceased that can be established to be vested in the child for his benefit indefeasibly or subject to defeasance only in the event of the death of the child before attaining such age not exceeding forty years as is specified in the will or other instrument by virtue of which property passes or $10,000 plus.

It is the lesser of what you give in those circumstances or $10,000, plus added benefits in certain circumstances. Now, one such added benefit would be where the child is wholly dependent upon the deceased or his spouse or both for support by reason of being infirm, an amount equal to the product of $1,000 multiplied by the number of full years in the period commencing on the day of death of the deceased and ending on the day on which, if ever, the child will become 71 years of age.

That is one condition where the $10,000 can become more. In any other case the amount of exemption in respect of a bequest to a child is increased by $1,000 for each full year remaining until the child is 26. This additional exemption is reduced by one-third of the amount of the child's total income for the three taxation years preceding the year in which the parent died—in excess of $15,000. So, it is quite a reasonable provision, and in most of those cases it is more than likely that the child would be entitled to get, under the exemption provision, more than the $10,000. But remember, it is subject to this limitation. The child only gets what he is given; so these are available to him if they are given to him.

Hon. Mr. Walker: You mean except for taxation. Ten thousand dollars plus $1,000 for every year that he is under 26, provided he is given it.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Less one-third of his taxable income in the three taxation years preceding the date of death of the donor—in excess of $15,000.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: This has to be willed. This is not automatic.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I hope I have made that clear now. As to the rates of duty, there is a new schedule, which you will find on pages 27 and 28 of the bill, but before dealing with the rates I have this comment to make. The taxable value of gifts made by the deceased during his lifetime that are not included in the aggregate net value of his estate—this where more than three years have elapsed prior to October 22, 1968 before the death of the testator who dies after said date—as well as the gift tax that would be currently applicable to them, are to be included for purposes of setting the rates on the taxable value of his estate as if he had not depleted his estate by giving gifts. However, because the gift tax has been paid on these gifts, a deduction is allowed in calculating the estate tax. The deduction is the amount of estate tax that would be payable if the amount of the taxable value of the gifts and the gift tax currently payable on them were the taxable value of the estate in excess of the $20,000 exemption included in the rate schedule.

Now, that sounds a bit complicated. Maybe I could give you an example.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Do you have one of those tables you could put on the record?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, I thought I had an example but I do not. In simple ordinary English all it means is that if at the death of the deceased his estate amounts to X dollars, and more than three years before that time he had made some gifts, those gifts at his death would not be part of his estate as long as they were made before October 22; as long as the three years expired before October 22 they would not be part of the estate for the taxable value of the estate.

In order to determine the rate of duty which his estate should pay upon his death, they then assume that his estate is the sum total of what it actually was at his death plus the gift and plus the tax on that amount of gift at current rates. They then deduct from that the $20,000 plus the amount of the gift, plus the tax on the amount of the gift, and the gift tax at the current rates. Then they subtract that so that there is some quantity or amount of money reduced from the tax that would be otherwise payable on the estate by reason of the fact that the gift tax had been paid and that the gift had survived for three years and therefore was not part, as a matter of law of the aggregate taxable value of the estate.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: But the rate has increased due to the fact the tax is added on.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have news for you. The rate has increased in two ways. It has increased because of what you mentioned, and it has increased because the rates are higher.

No estate shall be taxed if its aggregate net value is $50,000 or less. You will find that in section 4(4) of the bill. Now, a similar provision—this is not new—is found in section 8 (2) of the present Estate Tax Act. So, all they have done is carry it over, and in the present Estate Tax Act there is a provision under which the net value of the estate after taxes are levied cannot be decreased below $50,000. This has been publicized as being one of the virtues of Bill C-165. You can search from page 20 to page 43 of the bill and you will not find any provision of that kind, but the provision is in the present law and they have not repealed it. You must therefore remember that if the estate—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In section 8, subsection (2).

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right. That is what I said.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Of the present bill.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In the Estate Tax Act. You must remember that in order to have that $50,000 exemption from any tax the value of the estate must be exactly $50,000. If it is more than $50,000 then your exemption is the standard exemption of $20,000, and the only protection that you have is the assurance in section 8(2) of the present Estate Tax Act that in any event the tax you will pay on the excess over $50,000 will never be more than 50 per cent of that excess.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: That is below $50,000.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It will never get below $50,000.

Honourable senators, I suppose that, as joint authors of the estate tax law back in 1959, and having had a lot to do in the Senate committee where we really did the work on it, we should take a little credit for protecting the $50,000 estates. I should think that, if it were only a dollar or two and if the testator had any opportunity at all, he would go out and spend the dollar or two and bring it down to $50,000.

There are other provisions in the bill which I am not going to weary you with. There is the situs of property. The situs rules are carried on as they are in the Estate Tax Act. They provide a formula for situs of trust property and a formula for abatement of tax, that is, such abatement of the 50 per cent deduction that is given, for instance, to a resident of Ontario on his federal estate tax return. You can find that at pages 31 and 32 of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: That is because he is taxed for that amount in Ontario. He is taxed on the other 50 per cent in Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right, and I will devote some time to that later.

There is another highlight which I think you might wish to know something about. It is the liability of the executors and trustees.

Under section 6 of the bill, at page 33, as to the executors of an estate, from and after the death of the deceased, an executor is liable to pay and shall pay as tax the part of the tax payable in respect of the deceased that is applicable to the property under his control, that is, under the control of the executor, and as well the liability of the executor is extended by this bill to pay tax on property not under his control but where he is directed to do so by the deceased, limited by the extent to which there is property under his control in excess of the amount required to pay the tax due on the property under his control.

There is a limitation on that. The liability of the executor, in his capacity as an executor —that is the liability that he has, and he has only that liability, except if he distributes assets to any successor without paying in full the duty, or if he made an election for instalment payment and not having obtained or retained security for such instalment satisfactory to the minister, then his liability on it becomes a personal liability.

To avoid personal liability, one should look at the top of page 34 of the bill. The executor, in these circumstances, can avoid personal liability if he can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the minister that he has exercised all due diligence and has taken all reasonable precautions to assure payment.

On page 35, the limitation on the liability of a trustee to pay tax is stated. That is, the liability of a trustee; you notice that heretofore I was talking about an executor.

Limitation on the liability of a trustee to pay tax is his liability to pay and the limitation on the liability is stated in the bill at page 35 in the same items for the trustee as for the executor.

Honourable senators, there is another provision, that is, election to defer payment of tax, which is supposed to have great value and attraction. Section 8(1) of the bill, at pages 35, 36 and 37, deals with an election by an executor and by his successor.

The normal time for payment of the tax is within six months of the death of the deceased. This section permits an executor to elect to pay tax in whatever number of instalments he likes, up to six. Interest will be charged on deferred amounts at a rate to be set by the regulations.

Then there is the election by a successor, at pages 36 and 37. This does not deprive successors who now under the existing Estate Tax Act have a right to elect to pay in instalments for six years and to pay any interest or interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. This is a right presently enjoyed by a successor. But the election to defer tax, which I referred to first, is a right in the executor.

No interest is charged to successors who succeed to an income right such as an annuity or similar payment and who elect to pay in instalments as described in section 15(1)(a) as set out in clause 8.

If you want to see what the other limitations are, there is no confusion in the language. You will see them at pages 37 and 38.

On valuation, you will find at page 39 there is a special rule on valuation of property, under section 32A, comprising a gift. In computing the aggregate net value, say where the donor has died within three years of the giving of the gift, it requires that, in determining the value of the gift, as I related earlier, and this is the authority for it, the gift tax paid or payable must be included in the value of the gift.

Under section 33, which deals with quick successions, which is in the present law, where you have several successions very quickly, there are provisions in the present law under which, if you are granted the right to a kind of deferred payment basis, you will avoid some of the penalty or burden which comes with quick successions. You will find that in section 33 in clause 9 of the present bill. There is only one amendment, it is a change from "any property" to the "particular" property, because we will be dealing with classes of property some of which are exempt and some of which are not, from here on.

Honourable senators, this is the sort of thing that occurs on quick successions. Where the second death occurred during the first year after that first death, for the purposes of the second death the value is 50 per cent of what the value of the estate would otherwise be. If it is the second year, then it goes up to 60 per cent. When it is in the fifth year the value for purposes of tax in the second death would be 90 per cent, but that is in the general law. That is carried through, with just a language change to deal with other changes that were made in the law. But there is no change in the meaning or the application of the section.

Then we should look at the definition of a successor. It is broadened as against what it was before this bill became law. It includes a trustee, etc. You will find that at page 41.

Honourable senators, these are the highlights. There are quite a number of other sections which I was prepared to deal with and which I have annotated here. However, the changes as against the existing law are not so great, and we can pick them up very quickly in committee.

Honourable senators, I want to go on to a general observation. First of all, I wanted you to understand that I am explaining the bill, and I hope I have done so fairly. I have some comment to make on whether or not there is a justification for the federal authority being in the estate tax field at all, and whether the benefits that are netted by the federal treasury are such as to warrant continuance in this field or taxation.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Before dealing with that point, would my honourable friend answer this question: Is it one per cent of the total revenue of the Government or less, that this estate tax amounts to?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I will give you that in a moment.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The federal estate tax assessed is currently running at about $200 million, including $187.5 million from estates of Canadian domiciliaries and $12.5 million from the property in Canada of estates of foreign domiciliaries. In regard to the estate tax on domestic estates, the federal Government retains $46.9 million out of $187.5 million, or 25 cents out of every dollar. In regard to the estate tax on foreign estates, the federal Government retains $8.1 million out of $12.5 million, or 65 cents out of the dollar. If you take domestic and foreign estates together, the federal Government retains $55 million out of $200 million, or 27 cents out of the dollar.

Let us see what happens to that money: the federal gross tax is reduced in recognition of provincial succession duties if the property is situated in a taxing province. That will be Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. The reduction is 50 per cent in respect of Ontario and Quebec and 75 per cent in respect of British Columbia, which raised its rate in 1964 to take advantage of the additional room vacated by Ottawa. On an Ontario estate there is a 50 per cent reduction allowed on the federal return from the amount of federal taxes calculated. Ontario at the time that was settled then availed itself of that room so that it is getting the benefit of the 50 per cent that the federal authority gives up. In 1964 the federal authority decided that instead of 50 per cent it would rebate 75 per cent, and for the taxing provinces which did not increase their provincial rate the federal Government agreed to pay them the difference between the 50 per cent and the 75 per cent. British Columbia took advantage of the room and increased its rate so that it gets the 75 per cent by way of its levy on the estates in that province. And there is room for it, because the federal authority has abated to that extent.

Now, the other provinces, the Prairie Provinces and the Maritimes, have in effect abstained from operating in the field of succession duties or estate taxes. In return for that the federal authority pays them 75 per cent of the estate tax revenues that are accumulated or earned in each one of those provinces in the year.

This all arises, I take it, as part of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. Now, the comment I have to make on that is basically one I have made in this chamber over all the years since we have been dealing with this Fiscal Arrangements Act. For most of the time, if you look at Hansard, you will see that I said, "on division", or that I spoke against it or that I did both with respect to any fiscal arrangement under which the taxing authority was not the spending authority. In other words, my view was and is that the people who spend the money should have to raise it.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This occurred to me as my own thinking, but the other day I was in a certain departmental office here in Ottawa, in fact, a Government tax office. On the door I saw a sign comprised of the wise sayings of various people in different generations in relation to tax. Lo and behold! There was one quotation from long ago which was ascribed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have not the exact wording, but it was to the effect that those who spend the money should be saddled with the duty and obligation of raising it.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: This, I think, is still a sound principle. I do not understand the position of the Minister of Finance, because prior to the Interprovincial Conference and when the heads of the financial departments in all the provinces were discussing fiscal arrangements, he is reported to have said, "There is no more money available from Ottawa. If you want money for your purposes, you have to raise it."

Here we are giving something in the case of an exemption to gifts between spouses, and then we are raising rates and thereby imposing more taxes as the federal authority, so that we may maintain these payments to the provincial authorities. And all we get out of raising $200 million or more is that we keep $55 million. I have some ideas as to what I think should be done. I do not think the federal authority should be in the estate tax field, and I know that when succession duties were introduced by Mr. Ilsley during the war, and even at that time I was in the Senate, he said that the Succession Duties Act was introduced and was necessary because of the mounting war costs; but, then, he was very canny and went on in the same sentence to say that he did not want to be taken to mean that when the war was over the act would be repealed, because he could not foresee what the potential was and what the needs would be at that time. Therefore, he was not saying in any sense that it would be repealed afterwards.

Well, I think it was very fortunate that he made that reservation rather than do what we did with the Income Tax Act which was brought in in 1917 to pay for extra costs of the war and for sending troops overseas. It was not until 1947 that we got a little bit ashamed and changed the name, although we still kept the tax.

So here I think it is a sound principle. I also have an idea, which I think would be subscribed to by a lot of people, that if the federal authority would forego this field of taxation, it might not be very long before more and more of the provinces would also forego the field. And you can imagine the attraction that would be for money all over the world which is seeking a haven for investment where the burden of taxation is not too onerous.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Most of the people who have means today started out with their ability, their intuition and maybe their native shrewdness, and they built that up into something—they built up the capital and the standard of living for themselves. I do not wonder that they find it difficult to accept these taxes, and I think it is only the dire need of the Government for revenue that will make them accept them. They would like to feel that they could retain some reasonable part of what they have accumulated for the contribution they have made in the process of development of the country, its natural resources, and industrial resources, et cetera. For that expenditure of energy and for the depreciation of their assets, namely, their brain and their body, they should be able to retain a substantial portion of what they accumulated. This may sound like heresy, but this is what I feel and it is the way I express it.

Hon. Mr. Walker: It is common sense.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I intended to go on with this debate this evening, but in view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that I will not be able to complete my remarks by ten o'clock, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Before the debate is adjourned, may I ask Senator Hayden one more question? We are now considering this bill on second reading, dealing with questions of principle, and there are one or two points I want to get clear in my mind. Does this bill bring into the exchequer any more money than was realized under the Act as it now stands? Are we dealing with nothing more than a philosophical concept, or are we dealing with the matter of raising money for the exchequer?

Depending upon the answer to these questions I shall regard this bill in a certain light. On the other hand, also depending upon the answers, I think it might be somewhat beyond the purview of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I do not have the answer but I can put one and one and one together, and very often get three out of it, and that seems to be the right answer.

If you increase rates on the same basis you should have more revenue at the end of the year. If you increase rates on a lower basis you would have less money at the end of the year. It depends on the design of the rates. If the rates are so designed that the amount of the increase may cover the loss of revenue by lowering the base and by creating exemptions, then what you may do is balance out your income in the next year, or if you do more business, you may have more income. Now that is a rationalization of it. The exact answer to your question I am sure we can get in committee.

Hon. Mr. Walker: I also had a question to address to the honourable senator. If the total estate tax amounts to $200 million and the Dominion gets 27½ per cent or $55 million and the total budget is $11 billion, then all this estate tax adds to the budget is one half of one per cent, less the cost of collection, which might make it a nullity. When one thinks of all the harm and hardship that is being done and the estates and businesses and farms that are being wiped out by reason of this tax, would my honourable and learned friend be willing to express an opinion as to whether this is worthwhile?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have no reason to question the arithmetical calculations which my friend has made, but the only problem that I see at the moment is that the federal authority is committed to these fiscal arrangements with the provinces, and as long as they exist they will have to meet their commitments; and therefore, they would have to assess where they were going to get $200 million minus $55 million, rather than looking at what they will retain, and that may be a much more difficult task. That may be the reason that this method is taken at this time.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I also have a question to ask, but before doing so I will make a statement. At least one of our provinces and possibly two in the very near future will be rebating their 75 per cent within provincial boundaries. Is there anything to prevent the federal authority rebating their 25 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Nothing. They could rebate 100 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: They could rebate 25 per cent and leave the provinces the 75 per cent, and what the provinces did then would be up to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Then it would become with the Dominion an exercise in futility.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Well, you know what happened in British Columbia the moment the federal authority said, "We will rebate 75 per cent instead of 50 per cent and if you as one of the provinces will not increase your rates we will pay the difference between 50 per cent and 75 per cent to you directly." British Columbia increased its rates to get the direct benefit of the abatement, so the federal authority gave up its 75 per cent as far as British Columbia was concerned and British Columbia takes the 75 per cent by increasing its rate.

Hon. Mr. Carter: The federal Government, I presume, bears the full cost of collecting the $200 million?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Carter: Have you any figures at all to show the cost of collection as compared with the $55 million they get out of it?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No, I do not have the figures, but it would not be $55 million.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Aseltine, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of Resolutions numbered 524 to 548, inclusive, which were presented on February 26.

Hon. F. Elsie Inman, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, moved the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolution 524, for the relief of Edmond Joseph Pierre Beaupré.

USE OF BROADCAST FACILITIES BY RENE LEVESQUE—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to read to honourable senators the answers I was given by the Secretary of State to the inquiries I made concerning Mr. Rene Levesque and the C.B.C.

The first question I asked was:

> How many hours did Mr. Rene Levesque speak on the C.B.C. Radio during calendar year 1968?

The answer to that question reads:

> Alone or in discussion with others, Mr. Levesque's appearances on the C.B.C Radio Networks totalled approximately three hours during 1968.

Then I asked if he was paid anything, and the answer is, "No".

I asked if he had paid anything, and the answer is "No". Then I asked how many hours during 1968 Mr. Levesque had appeared on C.B.C. television, and the answer is:

> Alone or in discussion with others, Mr. Levesque's appearances on the C.B.C. Television Networks totalled approximately four hours during 1968.

They said that Mr. Levesque had not been paid anything. When I asked whether he or his sponsors had paid anything to the C.B.C. for his television appearances, I am told that they were charged nothing, and that the programs on which Mr. Levesque appeared are not made available to sponsors.

Honourable senators, I am not satisfied with those answers. I want a detailed account of the times Mr. Levesque was on radio or television, and I want to know on what programs he appeared. I want that information in detail! If in 1968 Mr. Levesque appeared on the C.B.C. radio networks for only three hours and on the television networks for only four hours, then it should not take the C.B.C. a great deal of time to compile the information I want. I want to know what would have been charged to anybody who would have been paying for his time on the air—and there must be some people who pay money to the C.B.C.—unless they happen to be what the C.B.C. consider newsworthy.

Honourable senators, René Levesque was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly as a Liberal. He left that party and became a separatist, and his avowed purpose is to tear our country apart. It is my opinion that the C.B.C., by means of both radio and television, are aiding and abetting him. I am serious in asking these questions, and I would like the support of all honourable members of this house.

I also want to remind Dr. George Davidson that he will be appearing before us when we review the 1969-70 Estimates, and he will ask us for $196 million to run the C.B.C. for the next twelve months—plus, of course, the $100 million that will not show because it is interest on what the C.B.C. has already squandered.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. It is not my intention to ask the honourable senator to stop at this point, because I understand that he is about to complete his remarks. However, I think it is understood that when the Orders of the Day are called, it affords an opportunity to honourable senators to ask any questions they wish of the honourable Leader of the Government.

The honourable Senator Beaubien has made an inquiry, the inquiry has been answered, but the answer is not to his satisfaction. I was waiting to hear whether he has a further question to ask of the Government Leader. As far as I can judge at this moment, there might be need for a further inquiry to be put on the Order Paper by the honourable Senator Beaubien. If he is about to complete his remarks now, I will let him finalize his points.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: Thank you very much.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Apparently the Senate was prepared to listen to Senator Beaubien, and under the circumstances I think he should be allowed to complete his remarks.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I think you are quite right, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize. I simply want to get my inquiry answered in greater detail, that is all.

Hon. Paul Martin: The answer to the inquiry came when I was away. I was happy to learn this morning that it had been given to Senator Beaubien last evening. I have not had an opportunity to examine it. I do not know whether I shall be able to get more precise information before next Thursday when, I understand, the head of the C.B.C. will appear before the Senate committee.

INTERNAL ECONOMY

REMOVAL OF CERTAIN PUBLICATIONS FROM SENATE READING ROOM—FURTHER QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish as a further matter of privilege to direct a question to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin). About two weeks ago I called the attention of the house and the Government leader to what I termed, and still term, the act of vandalism committed on our reading room, apparently by the Internal Economy Committee. Despite the rather majesterial lecture given to me at that time by the honourable Senator Macdonald, I have no intention of letting this matter drop.

You, sir, said at the time that you would take the matter up with the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee (Hon. Mr. Smith) when he returned after his illness. I am delighted to see that he has returned, and I ask now, sir, will you, today, tomorrow or in due course, take the matter up with the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee and tell us what if anything has been done, or if anything can be done? Certainly, something should be done. If you go into that room now what you see is reading matter that you get in any barber shop downtown.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators—

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may have the privilege—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Both honourable senators have risen at the same time, and as the question was put to the honourable Senator Smith I would ask him to reply, and then the honourable Senator Benidickson may have the floor.

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, as a new committee member, I of course do not have the answer, but we are very glad to have the chairman of the committee back with us in good health. I shared with Senator O'Leary (Carleton) a feeling that we were losing something in the reduction of subscriptions for the Reading Room. I spoke to the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) before he went to Israel and I am sure he has taken some action. He was acquainted with the facts.

I have looked at the situation. One of our lady senators, not present with us at the moment, said that our Reading Room now looked naked.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Was that bad?

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: That is my feeling too. I do not think we should give the room up, even to my deskmate, Senator Lamontagne, for his Science Policy Committee. We have another wonderful new room upstairs and other rooms. So I support Senator O'Leary very heartily in his efforts to maintain some of the periodicals, not the ordinary ones perhaps but some of those he outlined which we perhaps privately and personally cannot afford to have in our homes and which we read regularly here.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, I do not intend to take much time. I want to bring to the attention of all honourable senators in the chamber, as well as Senator O'Leary, that the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarded this matter very seriously. The day following the date on which Senator O'Leary raised this question, the Leader telephoned me at my home in Liverpool, where I was recuperating from successive bouts of the flu.

I returned to Ottawa only last Tuesday evening, and I did have a few words with the Leader at that time. I intended to spend some more time discussing with him the whole subject on which the complaint was based but, as we all know, the Leader left in a hurry for an overseas mission. He has just returned, and I saw him again for a minute this morning. We have not had a chance to go fully into this matter.

In the meantime, in the few days I have been in Ottawa I have made some inquiries as to what has been going on, and I am wondering whether or not there is some adjustment that could be made that would satisfy all honourable senators. I want to point out that this decision to do something about providing for honourable senators' comfort and enjoyment a much better lounge facility than that which we have had for the years I have been here was a decision taken by a rather full meeting of the Committee on Internal Economy, of which I happen to be the chairman. It was taken after a subcommittee was appointed and looked into the matter very carefully indeed.

The orders which were issued to reduce the number of magazines were carried out during the recess. My own personal opinion is that the reduction went too far because, for the purposes of setting up a new accommodation lounge and reading room, it was not the intention to reduce them to the very few magazines which were left there.

Honourable senators, back of all this was something which was brought to our attention last fall, and which was brought to my personal attention by the librarian, that the so-called reading room of the House of Commons no longer exists as such. It is now a reading room under the complete authority of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, and it has been for some time an adjunct operated by the Parliamentary Librarian.

There is only one thing wrong with that arrangements up to this time, and I am looking into this too. The sign on the door continues to read "House of Commons Reading Room," and it enumerates in a subsidiary sign those who are allowed to use the newspapers and magazines contained therein. That order is signed by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I think that both those signs should be removed, and it should be made plain that all of those magazines which Senator O'Leary and others of us like to see will be there. For instance, I used to take out Blackwood's magazine and as far as I can tell, Senator Ross Macdonald and I were the only two who did so. I would like to be able to see Blackwood's magazine, but there were lots of others which nobody ever looked at. These are all in the Parliamentary Reading Room. If and when we take over this other room as a combination reading room and lounge, we can add to the number of magazines there.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I like to read Field and Stream.

Hon. Mr. Smith: We can locate there a number of magazines or newspapers, particularly those that members of the Senate bring to our attention.

Honourable senators, I wish to make one more statement which is of interest to everyone here. It looks to me as if we are about to be deprived, not only of a reading room but of a combination lounge-reading room, because of the rapid growth of the work in the committees of this house. As we have noticed, the Senate Committee on Science Policy has been from time to time using the Reading Room. It upsets it for any other purpose since one cannot read there when a committee is meeting in the room.

An Hon. Senator: It upsets everybody.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Honourable senators, in the future we are going to have special committees which will need more space. Last week the Committee on Transport and Communications used the Reading Room. Therefore, if we do not watch out, we will lose that lounge. I am afraid that the Internal Economy Committee is going to have a very serious problem on its hands to take care of some of the facilities which we would like to have and balance that with the facilities we must have, which is adequate committee space in this end of the building.

We are looking into that matter. I have discussed it with the other members of the subcommittee, and if we can be helpful in any way to satisfy any group, or any individuals in the Senate, we will bring another recommendation to the Committee on Internal Economy and see what can be done about satisfying all our requirements and wishes.

Hon. Grattan O'Leary (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I speak for a few moments in reply? I want to thank the honourable senator for his very frank and I think honest explanation of what happened. However, the governing line in his statement was that he thought, and now thinks, that the doing away with magazines went too far. That was my complaint.

An Hon. Senator: That is right.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): I have no use for some fifty or sixty of the magazines which were there, and I do not think they should have been there in the first place. However, there were ten, fifteen or twenty periodicals removed from that reading room which should have been left there.

Senator Macdonald said the other day that we could go downtown and buy these for ourselves. I have news for him. One cannot go downtown and buy at least eight or ten of the more important periodicals which were removed from the Reading Room. Those who say that we should use the House of Commons reading room are again saying that this Senate is not an integral part of Parliament. That is what I have in mind. We have our Reading Room. It has been there for a hundred years, and for people to go in there and tear down magazines and leave Life and Chatelaine and the few things you can get in any beauty parlour downtown, or any barber shop, seems to me to be a piece of unnecessary vandalism and disrespect to this house.

I do hope that when we come to put this matter in proper perspective and remedy what has been done, that the 10 or 20 magazines I mentioned will be put back. That is all I am asking. I am not asking to have a lot of nonsense on the shelves, such as we have had in the Reading Room. Surely, nobody looked at it. My friend said that only a few people read Blackwood's. I have been reading that magazine for 50 years, I read it in that room, and I believe my desk-mate reads it there. There were ten magazines I looked at nearly every week, and I think they should be back there. If they are not put back there, then the Senate is giving itself a black eye.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I did not get the same impression from Senator Smith's speech that the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) did. I thought the emphasis was on a Parliamentary Reading Room—that was the term he used—and that the joint committee had decided that that was the Parliamentary Reading Room. Everything is available there, and it is less than 100 steps away from our present Reading Room.

Within a week or two, no one will be able to get into our Reading Room, morning or afternoon, because committees will be sitting there. Face up to it! You have only two other committee rooms and that is the third. It is hard enough for us to arrange our various committee hearings in these three rooms. In my opinion, whether you put eight, 17 or 20 magazines in there, it does not make any difference when they are all available over at the Parliamentary Reading Room. In that way, Senator O'Leary (Carleton), we can save some money, so they tell us, which is most unusual for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): There would be a total saving of less than $250 for the magazines that I referred to, and after what was done to the committee room on the third floor, which was an outrageous expenditure of money, to suggest that we should save $250 in the Senate Reading Room is utter nonsense.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I saw a memorandum some place, and I could be corrected, to the effect that the saving is in the neighbourhood of $3,500.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): It might be $3,500 if you throw them all in, but for the magazines I have in mind it would be only $250 at the most.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The price of one chair.

Hon. Mr. Croll: Everyone cannot be asking for the things he wants.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): My friend misses the point entirely.

Hon. Mr. Croll: The amount involved is $3,500. We should take cognizance of that, if all it means is that we have to walk another 50 steps.

Hon. Mr. O'Leary (Carleton): That is not the point at all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Honourable senators, since the problem raised by Senator O'Leary (Carleton) is one for the Internal Economy Committee, may I suggest to the Chairman that he could call a meeting next week and that this argument could be continued there. It would probably be a more appropriate place.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: We could supply some boxing gloves.

Hon. Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Grosart on a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Smith: We are all out of order.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: That is why I rose, Mr. Speaker. We have new rules. It was suggested the other day, when I commented on the rules, that there was an unwritten rule that Your Honour would not intervene unless some honourable senator intervened. I do not believe that that is an unwritten rule, and I would suggest that in view of the propriety of this place it is rather important, now that we have new rules, that they be enforced, if only to prevent the kind of discussion that has just gone on.

Because we are on the Orders of the Day, I would like to follow my point of order by asking a question of the Honourable Leader of the Government. Does he not consider that it might be a useful innovation, if it is an innovation, for us in future to have reports of major decisions taken by the Committee on Internal Economy, so that such matters as we are now discussing will not come before us in the way they have on this particular occasion. I ask him to give consideration to having that committee report major decisions in which we are all involved, including decisions on expenditures, because there have at times been suggestions that certain expenditures are excessive. If that is the case, and I am not saying that it is, it involves every one of us as senators, and I would ask the honourable Leader of the Government again if he would consider having the Committee on Internal Economy report to the Senate before making major decisions that affect us all.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not know that it is my particular responsibility, but since the question has been directed to me and the matter was in the first place directed to my attention by honourable Senator O'Leary, I may say I have talked with a number of the members of that committee, including the chairman. I find that the committee is made up of some of the most respected members of this house, and I am sure they are anxious to comply with the rules. The honourable senator has indicated he intends to bring this matter up and to discuss some of its aspects with the committee. I think we have every reason to have the fullest confidence in what that committee is doing and in what it proposes to recommend to the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, may I correct an impression created by Senator Grosart that the new rules are not yet effective, that we are still under the former rules, because no resolution for the adoption of the fourth report on the Rules has been passed by the Senate. May I say that the honourable senator was right in a sense when he said that under the former rules the distinction between the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons is that I am a presiding senator and that technically, according to the authorities, I am supposed to intervene only when I am called upon by a member to maintain proper order in debate. I might be out of order at times, but I think all honourable senators wish the debates to be conducted in the best order possible.

Having said that, may I now call the Orders of the Day.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Walter M. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I am pleased to see the Leader of the Government back in his place today after his very strenuous trip abroad. He looks as though he might be very tired after such a long journey, but I will try not to worry him too much with my remarks this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I assure you they will not worry me at all; I look forward to listening to them.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: Honourable senators, I do not pretend to be an expert on taxation matters whether they involve income taxes, gift taxes or estate taxes, but I have had some experience in these fields. Of course it is nothing like the experience of honourable Senator Hayden, who introduced Bill C-165 yesterday. He has introduced many taxation bills in the Senate and has dealt with them later in what was the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, and is now the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, of which he has been chairman for many years. I am sure we all appreciated the speech he made yesterday on this complicated matter.

Senator Hayden stated that this bill is a very complicated measure of some 43 pages. It repeals all of Part IV of the Income Tax Act, dealing with gift taxes and substitutes a completely new Part IV of some 18 pages. The remainder of the bill, pages 19 to 43 inclusive, deals with the amendments to the Estate Tax Act.

I do not know whether honourable senators have read this bill or not, or whether they have tried to read it. I have read it several times but have found the language used by the draftsmen very difficult to understand clearly. Senator Hayden said yesterday the draftsmen seem to use six words where one word would suffice, and at other times use one word where six words would be better. I do not know how or where the minister or the department has been able to find such efficient help that can do that kind of thing. I must say, however, that I do not appreciate what they have accomplished.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It is to try to scare the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: As I said, I have found the language used by the draftsmen very difficult to understand clearly, and I wonder if other honourable senators encountered the same difficulty.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Indeed.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: If honourable senators will look at Bill C-165, a copy of which I have in my hand, they will see it has 43 blank pages and not one of them has an explanatory note on it. Now I protest very strongly against that kind of thing. Where a complicated measure like this comes before the Senate, one that is difficult indeed, it is usual to have explanatory notes on every page, opposite the paragraph which is being dealt with, and those notes usually tell us what the existing law is, what the change is and why it is necessary. I maintain that that is very important, and I hope that in the future we will not often have to consider bills in this form. I certainly do not know why simple language that everyone can easily understand is not used in drafting a bill of this kind. The subject matter is difficult enough without having to struggle with the context and the meaning of the language.

As I said, I have been dealing with gift tax and estate tax matters for many years, but if it had not been for the help furnished by reading the budget resolutions, the report issued after the minister's London speech, the White Paper distributed by the Department of Finance on January 30 when certain modifications were made to the bill, the numerous newspaper articles—I can show you a whole fist of them here—by reading the Topical Tax reports, certain memoranda issued by chartered accountants and estate planners, the Canadian Tax Foundation and others, and by reading the House of Commons Debates, I would not have gotten very far and would not understand this measure even as well as I do at the present time.

I now have the additional advantage of having heard Senator Hayden's explanation, so I should fully understand the legislative changes that this bill will bring about. Senator Hayden was explaning the bill; he was not expressing his personal views, although just before he sat down yesterday he did perhaps transgress a little in that direction. However, most of us agree with his obiter dicta.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, I have a number of questions to ask because many thousands of wills will have to be re-drawn and many estate plans revised. It is difficult and dangerous, in my opinion, to deal with such matters until lawyers and others who do that kind of work fully understand what this legislation means and what effect it will have. Even after the legislation becomes law, it will be some time before the details are fully understood and I, for one, have not yet decided the best way to go about the preparation of a will when there are a number of infant children involved. Those are my preliminary remarks.

I would like now to deal briefly with the gift tax legislation contained in this bill. As has been explained quite fully by Senator Hayden, there are a number of radical changes with respect to gift taxes. Briefly, they are as follows:

Firstly, property of any value passing to a spouse is now exempt from gift tax. Secondly, the previous $4,000 annual exemption from gift tax has been abolished, also the $1,000 gift to any number of persons, and the alternative formula of one-half of the difference between the taxable income and the federal tax paid in the previous taxation year. Instead, a donor may now make gifts up to $2,000 to any number of persons in any year without them being taxable. The old $4,000 exemption still applies to gifts made prior to October 23, 1968. The exemption of $2,000 applicable to gifts made between October 23, 1968 and December 31, 1968, will be reduced by the value of gifts made to the same person in the first part of that year. That is very important.

Thirdly, the rates of gift tax are still based upon a progressive scale, but will be substantially increased and will now depend on the total amount of all gifts made since October 23, 1968. Under the old system, the tax rate which you paid depended upon the total gifts made in any one year. The rate will now depend upon the total accumulated taxable gifts made from October 23, 1968.

For example, under the old system the rates of tax started at 10 per cent and went up to 28 per cent. Under the proposed legislation the $15,000 which the individual gives in the first year will cost him 12 per cent tax; the $15,000 he gives in the second year will cost him 15 per cent; the $15,000 that he gives in the third year will cost him 18 per cent; and the $15,000 he gives in the fourth year will cost him 22 per cent. As the total amount of gifts accumulates, the rate of tax increases to the point where, after gifts made from October 23, 1968 total more than $200,000, all subsequent gifts are taxed at the rate of 75 per cent. That is one thing that I do not like, the new rates starting at 12 per cent and going up to 75 per cent.

These changes upset most previously made estate plans. The sale and transfer of farms and businesses to sons, the cancelling of the selling price by a once-in-a-lifetime gift of $10,000 of an interest in the farm, and a $4,000 ordinary gift that could be made at the same time, and the future cancelling of the balance of the amount of the purchase price at the rate of $4,000 a year, are now things of the past, except that the once-in-a-lifetime gift is still available; but there is nothing in the new legislation except $2,000 tax-free gifts and the once-in-a-lifetime gift of $10,000 to take the place of the old method. I will deal with this matter at some length a little later on.

Next I wish to deal with the estate tax generally. In my opinion, heavy estate taxes amount to discrimination and confiscation. If a testator in his lifetime has, by thrift, business ability and hard work, built up a substantial estate, he has already paid to the Government heavy income taxes from 30 to 40 to 50 per cent, or even more. Then, when he dies the Department of National Revenue comes along with an estate tax levy and takes another big slice of the capital that the farmer or businessman has built up in acquiring, paying for and operating his farm or business. In many cases this amounts to confiscation. No person should object to paying a substantial income tax during his lifetime, but there is serious objection to the Government coming along after his death and taking another big bite, with the result that the farm or business, or a large part thereof, very likely will have to be sold at a sacrifice price to pay the tax. With this in mind, honourable senators, many taxpayers are selling out and liquidating their assets and looking for tax havens, and then leaving the country and taking their capital with them. We have many, many cases like that in Saskatchewan where I live, and about which I personally know something.

Many people with capital to invest would like to come to Canada and carry on business, but they are afraid to do so. They do not like heavy estate taxes and succession duties. Western Canada particularly needs capital, and cannot afford to lose the capital which has been built up and which is now being exported, as I have just described.

By way of substantiating these remarks I wish to read a Canadian Press article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of November 13, 1968, entitled "Estate Tax opposed by Liberals." It is datelined Regina, and reads:

> The executive of the Saskatchewan Liberal Association says it has asked the federal Government not to implement increases in estates and gift taxes announced in the budget speech.

The 125-member executive Tuesday sent a telegram to Prime Minister Trudeau and Finance Minister Benson saying such increases would cause "undue hardship" particularly to western farmers and owners of small businesses.

Premier Ross Thatcher said in an interview the proposed increases would accelerate the break-up of the family farms, and would result in an exodus of people to places where estates taxes are lower than Canada's or non-existent.

He said that the Saskatchewan government intends to eliminate the province's 75 per cent share of the estates tax at the next session of the Saskatchewan Legislature.

Another article, which appeared in the Globe and Mail at the same time, reads as follows:

Regina Death Tax Plan is Backed By Builders

Regina—The 650-member Saskatchewan Construction Association yesterday urged the provincial government to proceed with its intended abolition of the provincial portion of estate taxes.

The association contends in its annual submission to the Government that estate taxes cause severe hardship in the construction industry because the great majority of companies engaged in this business are family enterprises.

Here is an item which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 15, 1969:

Mr. Thatcher—

He is the Premier of Saskatchewan.

—said Saskatchewan would vigourously oppose changes proposed in the estate tax, calling them "the most outrageous, iniquitous and unfair piece of legislation ever to come before the Commons."

"One would think some socialist had dreamt up this piece of legislation. I would suggest Mr. Benson better get his office cleaned out of socialists, because even a socialist couldn't have thought up something as kooky as this."

He said the proposed legislation was unbelievable, and the Saskatchewan government would never willingly accept them because they would mean the death of the family farm.

It amounted almost to confiscation of estates and was as bad as estate legislation now in use in England, he said.

"In 25 years in politics, I have never seen a bill as unfair, iniquitous and foolish as this one," he said.

He said if Mr. Benson went ahead with bringing in the changes, he was in for some of the most severe criticism, both inside and outside of the House of Commons.

I have only one more item that I would like to read, and this appeared in the Globe and Mail of last Wednesday:

Montreal (CP)—C. F. Harrington, president of the Royal Trust Co., Wednesday criticized the federal government's new estate and gift tax laws because of their tendency to reduce and eliminate capital formation.

He told the trust company's 69th annual meeting that in a new country such as Canada "we still need more capital than we seem to be able to raise."

Ottawa seems to be telling Canadians that the accumulation of capital in private hands, and its transmission to succeeding generations—whether in the form of land, family business or stocks and bonds—is not necessarily an estimable goal, Mr. Harrington said.

I will leave that for the moment, but I should like to come back to certain statements made by Premier Thatcher when he brought down his budget last Friday. When I spoke on one of the farm bills a short time ago I mentioned the fact that in March 1967 a similar bill to the one Premier Thatcher has in mind was passed in Alberta. Here it is. I sent ten cents and received a copy of it.

Hon. Mr. McDonald: Here is a copy of the one from Saskatchewan. It is bigger.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am coming to that. This Alberta bill is entitled: "An Act to provide for partial refund of estate taxes to Alberta estates". This act has been in force for nearly two years, and it seems to be working satisfactorily. It provides for the rebate of the province's 75 per cent share of the estate tax.

Ottawa's share of the death taxes amounts to only $30 to $50 million a year. That is 25 per cent of the total, the other 75 per cent going to the provinces. Without repeating what I have just said, I would agree with the statement made by a Toronto lawyer in a recent address to the Canadian Tax Foundation, which was as follows:

> It has been stated that abolition of death taxes would attract more wealth, industry, revenue and taxes to Canada than all the death taxes raised all across the country.

In my opinion, there is a considerable amount of truth in that remark.

I should like to refer to the fact that two weeks ago I happened to listen in on the C.B.C. news broadcast at 10 o'clock in the evening, on which there was an item to the effect that Premier Thatcher had made his budget speech that afternoon and had brought in a completely balanced budget, with a quarter of a million dollars left over. That is the first provincial budget of that kind in my memory. That news broadcast also went on to report that the Premier was going to bring a bill before the provincial Legislature immediately covering an estate tax rebate plan. I would like to read part of the report of his budget speech, that appeared in the January Leader-Post the next morning, that is, February 22, 1969:

> Premier Thatcher Friday outlined the details of the provincial government's plan to rebate its 75 per cent share of the federal estate tax directly to those who paid it.
> The details were given by the premier during budget speech debate in the legislature. Besides outlining details of the rebate, he renewed his criticism of estate taxes in general and the new rates passed by Parliament in particular.
>
> Mechanics of the plan will be simple, he said. Under federal law, each estate will still be required to pay the full tax to Ottawa and the provincial government will accept the federal figures.
> It will then rebate to the estate 75 per cent of the total tax within 90 days of the time Ottawa has credited the province with its share.

I quote further on in the article:

> Residence requirements to be eligible for the rebate will be virtually the same as in Alberta, Mr. Thatcher said.
>
> The Alberta legislation provides that a rebate can be made to any estate belonging to an owner domiciled in that province for at least 183 days in each of the three years immediately preceding death.

The article goes on to state:

> Mr. Thatcher said the rebate will be a form of tax reduction which will help maintain the family farm and business, stop the flight of capital out of Saskatchewan and alleviate a form of unfair double taxation.
>
> It will remove the worst effects of the 'new discriminatory bill' passed by Ottawa Thursday.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It is not passed yet, though.

Hon. Mr. Croll: We are not worrying on this side.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Do you mean, "on this side"?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It has not been passed yet.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It will pass, though.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: It has not been passed by this house so it has not been passed yet. The provincial government believes:

> —estate taxes are undesirable because they work a hardship on farmers; they amount to double taxation in that income taxes are paid while the estate is being built up; they cause the flight of capital from Saskatchewan and Canada to tax-free havens especially in warmer climates and more recently to Alberta, as well which has already introduced such legislation—

Mr. Thatcher is also quoted as having said that the estate taxes have caused "an economic hemorrhage which capital-short Saskatchewan can ill afford."

> Mr. Thatcher described the new federal estates tax law as iniquitous and heavy-handed a piece of legislation as was ever introduced into the House of Commons'.

Further down in the article Mr. Thatcher says:

> No socialist administration could have been more arbitrary.

I was pleased this morning when I opened my mail to get the Saskatchewan bill.

It is quite similar to the Alberta bill. The number of the Saskatchewan bill is 52 of 1969. It says in paragraph 3:

> 3. An estate tax rebate is payable under this Act only in respect of the estate tax on the estate of a person dying on or after the first day of April, 1969:

The short title is "The Estate Tax Rebate Act, 1969". The long title is "An Act to provide for Partial Refunds of Estate Taxes to Saskatchewan Estates".

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: You will likely have a similar bill from Manitoba in a few days. That will scuttle this business.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I understand, Senator Thorvaldson, that your new premier has suggested that he has this in mind and that you may expect some action a little later on. I hope you do get some action. At any rate, I am very much pleased with this Saskatchewan bill. I think it will have a great influence and will help to a great extent in the saving of and the passing on of the family farms to the sons of the deceased taxpayers and help in the continuation of the small businesses in the same way. I may have something further to say about that a little later on.

Most estates, honourable senators, are in the range of $50,000 to $300,000. There are 82 per cent in that bracket. They are the ones that will suffer. As I read the bill, when an estate is valued at $50,000 or less, there is no estate tax.

In my experience, in dealing with values in estate tax matters, if the aggregate tax value is anywhere near the $50,000 mark, say, $45,000 or $47,000, quite frequently an effort is made by the Government assessors to increase the value so as to bring it over the $50,000 mark, thus making the estate taxable. To my personal knowledge, there are many such cases. Of course values are subject to appeal, but appeals are expensive. For instance, there is no fair method of valuing farm land.

I refer to my speech on the Farm Credit Corporation bill, when I gave an example of a farmer wishing to enlarge his farm and making it into an economic unit. In that example the farmer had bought land from his next-door neighbour for $150 or $200 per acre. When the tax people learn of prices of that kind, they immediately evaluate all the surrounding farm lands at that price, even though those lands could not be sold for anything near that price. The person who bought the land wanted it very badly in order to increase his holdings to make them into an economic unit, but that does not mean that all of the surrounding land is worth that much. And if a person owning some of those adjoining lands passes away suddenly and the Government values them at that high price, the tax is something terrific and the person involved is not able to pay it.

Because the quotas for the sale of wheat are so low, the sale of the farm lands in the district that I live in are almost a thing of the past. In the last issue of the local paper there were several farms for sale, and I noticed in the previous issues of that paper there were several farms for sale, but my information from my office in Rosetown was that there was never a single offer made for those lands due to the very low delivery quotas and the inability of the farmers to sell their wheat.

Honourable senators, the general impression has gone out that the basic exemption is now $50,000. The man on the street thinks so, but the basic exemption is still $20,000 and, as was explained by Senator Hayden yesterday, not $50,000. Newspaper articles have given that impression. Time magazine of February 7 seems to say so. The Globe and Mail of January 31 said: "Benson raises to $50,000 tax-free limit on estates." Now, anybody looking at that would come to the conclusion that the exemption was $50,000, which is absolutely untrue. As I read the bill, estates under $50,000 are not taxable, but estates over $50,000 have a basic exemption of $20,000 plus additional exemptions, depending upon who the beneficiaries are.

I do not know whether honourable senators listened to the program "Front Page Challenge" last week. The panel of four members was trying to guess what the particular story was. The story, which was a national one, dealt with the modification of the Estate Tax Act to make the exemption $50,000. The minister, Mr. Benson, was the person who appeared before the panel after they had failed to guess what the story was, and he was asked a number of questions. However, they did not cover this point very fully, and if I had not known differently I would have come away from the television set thinking that the basic exemption was $50,000. They talked about the Carter Report and taxation on profits made on the grain exchange and all that kind of thing. But they did not get right down to the meat of the problem.

Senator Hayden, in explaining this matter yesterday, referred to subsection 2 of section 8 of the Estate Tax Act. I would like to read that section because there was some difficulty when reading the clause in this new bill to decide whether this was the case or not. Section 8 (2) says as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Act, no tax is payable under this Part upon the aggregate taxable value of the property passing on the death of a person, where the aggregate net value of the property passing on the death of that person, computed in accordance with Division B does not exceed $50,000.

When I was reading the new bill I took it for granted that that section had been repealed, but I find that is not the case, and it is still the law, but if it goes over the $50,000 the basic exemption is $20,000.

The minister has also said that as well as the basic exemption for all estates valued at more than $50,000 there is a new exemption of $10,000 provided for all adult children, and that is given to all children of 26 years of age and over. That is all to the good; that is something new and something acceptable. I presume it means that if a testator wills $10,000 to each of his five children, the exemption would be $20,000 plus five times $10,000, making a total exemption of $70,000 which would be tax free.

Now, honourable senators, I do not intend to go into any intricate explanations as Senator Hayden did yesterday of the other provisions of Bill C-165, but I do want to deal with family farms and small businesses. In my opinion this legislation will spell the end of the family farm and small businesses. As I said a moment ago the Premier of Saskatchewan thinks so. The members of the House of Commons have advised me that they have received thousands of letters and several petitions, mainly from small farmers and owners of small businesses in their ridings, protesting against this legislation. I have myself seen some articles on this.

For example, in the Manitoba Free Press Weekly of January 4, 1969, there is a heading which reads, "New estate tax doom to the family farm", and further, "No hope of sons carrying on farm they helped to build." Then on the same page there is an item which reads—and this appears to be a paid advertisement—"The tax that dooms your family farm", and at the end it says, "Write to your member of parliament, or see him personally. Tell him that the tax will destroy the family farm and, with it, one of the nation's major social assets." That advertisement was put in by Lake Forest Farm, Camp Morton, Manitoba.

There is also a half-page article in the Manitoba Free Press Weekly of January 25. It is headed "What happens when a boy inherits the home farm." It gives an example of the estate tax on a large cattle and wheat farm amounting to $200,000 which when the father died they were unable to pay and had to sacrifice practically all of their thoroughbred cattle and some of the land in order to pay the tax.

What are the farmers saying? The effect of the new estate tax legislation on the family farms will be disastrous. Farms are being valued away above their productive value. In the district which I represent there are hundreds of family farms, which, with farm equipment and machinery, would fall into the $200,000 to $300,000 value class. On passing from father to son, what family farm can survive the estate taxes amounting to ¼ or ⅓ or more of their value? In my opinion, honourable senators, estate taxes should be reduced instead of being increased in order to save the family farms and the small businesses. Leaving everything to the widow will not solve the problem.

Generally speaking, honourable senators, this bill is an invitation to all and sundry to spend, spend and keep on spending. Don't try to save! Don't try to succeed!

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does the honourable senator not believe that the provision for tax-free arrangements for the wife is a fundamental provision of this bill, and is one that deserves more than passing comment?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It seems to me that is one of the fundamental provisions of this bill, and that the distinguished senator, with his rich experience, seems, unless I misunderstand him, to underestimate its significance.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I certainly do underestimate it, because it does not really mean very much. It is true that the property can be left to the widow. She might live four or five years longer than her husband, but the minute she dies it is all taxed under this legislation, and the incidence of tax is probably more than it otherwise would have been, because she has accumulated income and that is also part of her estate. It is not a bad thing, but it is not going to be of any great help and it will not save any of these farms from confiscation when the taxpayer dies.

I was saying this bill is an invitation to all and sundry to spend and keep on spending. Don't try to succeed. Don't try to save. Just relax and have a good time. You cannot take it with you. You will be taken care of in your old age, and your family and children also. Then, after you are gone, it will not make much difference anyway, so why worry?

You will gather from what I have said that, in my opinion, this bill will do more harm than good, and I do not see how I can conscientiously support it.

However, there is something further. What is going to happen next? I refer to the speech on Canadian tax matters made by Mr. Benson on Monday last in Washington. Everyone received a copy of it. I certainly did, and I have read it carefully. Apparently Bill C-165 is just the beginning. This is piece-meal legislation. According to Mr. Benson's speech in Washington, there is going to be a complete revision of the whole tax system. In May or June a White Paper will be distributed to all and sundry for study and comment and will likely contain a few more doses of the Carter Report, such as taxation of family units, excess profits taxes and so on. Then he went on to say that new legislation will be introduced to take effect at the beginning of 1970. No one knows what the taxation laws will be in 1970. In my opinion, we should not pass this bill. We should wait for the complete tax legislation which will follow the issuance of this White Paper in May or June. In the meantime, I suggest that anyone who has any property of considerable value should look around for a new tax haven.

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): Will the honourable senator permit a question? If the 75 per cent credit is given to Saskatchewan in due course, and may be given to Manitoba, and is now being given to Alberta and British Columbia, will not the grim incidence of increased taxation be reduced correspondingly?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In our province, certainly; that is our only hope.

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): So, to the extent that the family units and the farm units approach impending disaster—

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: I am putting a word in for you people in Quebec, Ontario and the Maritimes.

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): You were directing your attention to the farmers generally. However, to the extent that the relief will be granted to the provinces I have mentioned, will not the heavy incidence of taxation be reduced?

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: In Saskatchewan and Alberta, I would think so, yes.

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): And possibly in Manitoba.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I want to congratulate the dean of the house. You can always expect a common-sense, down-to-earth and down-on-the farm speech from him; it was excellent. With all these clever lawyers interspersing questions, it is interesting to see that he does not back down at all.

May I also say how delighted I am to be able to congratulate the distinguished senator who is the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Hon. Mr. Hayden) on what was a very objective speech. I have heard him in court over the last 40 years, and he can be very subjective too, but hearing him introducing a Government bill, as he did yesterday, and being as objective, as analytical and as helpful as he was, pleased us all very much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Honourable senators, in reading over this bill and having heard the question of Senator Phillips (Rigaud) and knowing the feeling of the house, why should not the estate tax be abolished? This bill is inevitably going through this house; we are outgunned three to one, but may this be the last year, for the following reasons. We know that of the $200 million collected by the Dominion through sweat, blood and tears, and at terrific expense, it only retains $55 million, and out of that, of course, must be taken the tremendous sum required to collect this amount. So, we have $55 million left. Before considering that further, let us remember that this was a wartime measure; it was never intended to be here 20 years after the war was over. It was something that was supposed to be temporary but was never done away with. The reason for it, though, has gone. We should leave this field where it was before the war, with the provinces. As I say, the cost of administering it is enormous, and the benefit to the Dominion Government is minimal.

In considering what $55 million will do, let me first draw your attention to the work of the Public Accounts Committee in the other place under its distinguished chairman, Alfred Hales, the Member of Parliament for Wellington. Let us see what $55 million will do. The hydrofoil which is currently being built, half boat and half plane, was to have cost $9 million, but as long as we can keep on collecting taxes from here, there and everywhere, it is now going to cost $53 million. And this is for something that might never even work out and which might be like the Arrow project; it might be a complete fiasco. Now, $53 million is being spent for this, which is the equivalent of all estate taxes retained by the federal Government in a year. It is more than that, because we have to pay to collect that tax.

By the way, that hydrofoil is called the Bras d'Or, which in English is the arm of gold. I asked my leader whether it would be proper to say in French "Fait d'Or", but he said that that is not good French so I will drop it.

There is also the example of the aircraft carrier, the Bonaventure, which was to have been reconditioned at the enormous cost of $8 million, and was eventually reconditioned for $13 million. The painting of that ship was estimated to cost $150,000, and we find now that it has cost $1,020,000. I emphasize the fact that that amount of money was spent to just paint the ship. This is where the money goes when there are so many sources of taxation.

As a third example I would cite the Performing Arts Centre here in Ottawa—a most necessary item, of course, provided it cost the $9 million originally estimated. But, when the federal Government can come in and collect all these taxes from one source and another we find that the Performing Arts Centre is going to cost $50 million. Think of it, honourable senators, $50 million for a performing arts centre in the City of Ottawa. The cost is equivalent to one year's death duties collected by the Dominion Government—or at least that part kept by it.

These are arguments which must be obvious. I ask you: Where in the name of justice or equity is there any reason for levying an estate tax in the Dominion of Canada? I know that it provides the federal Government with this amount of money which, according to the figures given us last night by my learned friend, Senator Hayden net the federal Government about one-half of one per cent of the total budget; that is, $55 million in relation to $11 billion or $12 billion. Think of it, honourable senators, that is all it amounts to.

Yet, all of the estates that are being taxed are estates that have been built up by persons who all their lives have paid real property taxes patiently, regularly, and consistently. Why should the federal Government and the provincial governments then arrive like vultures after the death and confiscate a large part of what is left, leaving the families—and I am going to talk about the spouse relationship in a few moments—to scratch?

The person who has amassed the estate over the years has paid out of his income not only realty tax but income tax, sales tax, municipal tax, provincial tax, excise tax, and all other federal taxes. Why, then, after his death, having run the gamut during his life and having made a supreme effort to save money to leave to his family and children, and enough to keep his business going or to build it up, should there be then another raid made on what he has managed to accumulate?

The estate left by a testator, whether in property, cash, or other assets, means the net amount which is left after his paying through the nose all his life. I can see no reason—and a great many share my view—why a further tax grab should take place simply because that individual, like us all, had to die. His estate owes the country nothing. The deceased has paid local and federal taxes all his life. I ask: What possible justification is there for depriving the heirs?

Not only do I think this, honourable senators, but there are thousands of other Canadians at the present time who are planning among themselves. The wives are saying to the husbands: "If you go first I will move to the Bahamas or the Caribbean," and the husbands are saying to the wives: "If you go first I will do the same thing." They are getting a free ride by leaving the estate to the other spouse. When one spouse dies, the other gets the estate, but the day of reckoning comes in three, four, or five years, and this bill is just giving the surviving spouse time to get out of the country and escape the estate tax and the succession duties of the provinces.

Even before this recent budget the estate tax in Canada, although lower than that in the United Kingdom, was very much higher than that in the United States, and among the very highest in the world. That was before this new tax. If the bill which we are now considering is passed we will have estate taxes and gift taxes which in our just society can only be described as confiscatory.

Under the new act it is true—I concede it, and my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, is quite proper in raising the point which was emphasized by Senator Hayden last night—that if the estate is left directly and totally from the husband to the wife, or from the wife to the husband, it is free from dominion tax, or if a life interest without any complications is left from one to the other it is free from dominion tax. But, as my friend Senator Aseltine pointed out, that is only postponing the evil day, because when the money is finally distributed among the children, and if it is a large estate, the tax becomes almost prohibitive. The benefit to the surviving spouse is not a sop. It is a good thing, and we recognize that. But when the second spouse has died, provided that spouse has remained in Canada, the full impost of taxation falls on the children. The old rates are from 10 per cent to 54 per cent in estate tax, but the 54 per cent is not reached until the taxable estate reaches $1,550,000, whereas the proposed new rates are on a very rapidly accelerating scale starting at 15 per cent on anything over $20,000, when the taxable estate is over $50,000, and reach 50 per cent on amounts over $300,000. That is the new tax. I think it is around $81,000-odd up to $300,000, and it is 50 per cent on everything above that. Previously the tax reached 54 per cent on any amount in excess of $1.5 million but now it is 50 per cent on everything over and above $300,000, subject, of course, to the different allowances to be made for the provincial taxes. It can be seen that the tax has become almost prohibitive.

The provisions of the amended gift tax sections of the Income Tax Act are even more radical. They are shocking. As my learned friend Senator Hayden said, I guess the idea is that one is not to make gifts. I am paraphrasing his good language. These are very far-reaching provisions. Gifts between spouses will be fully exempt from gift tax, of course, and gifts in any one year up to $2,000 will be exempt, and this replaces the former exemption of $1,000. But, gifts to any individual in any one year exceeding $2,000 will be fully taxable, and at a tremendously increased and accelerating rate. The terrible part of it is that the gift tax is not confined to any one year. It is cumulative. If you make a gift of $10,000 this year, $20,000 next year, and $30,000 in the year after, you will find that by the end of the third year you are paying gift tax at an ever accelerating rate. The former gift tax exemptions were a great incentive to saving, as you well know. For instance, on a $100,000 income where the income tax is roughly $48,000 the amount left would be $52,000 and one could give away one-half of that, or $26,000. But not now. Just $2,000 is the extent of any gift that one can give to an individual without having heavy taxation take over on such gifts, particularly now that they are cumulative.

And, also, a gift of $25,000 would be taxed, under this new taxation, $3,300. Then, when you get up to $200,000, the gift tax, believe it or not, is $71,500. Then, if you give another $100,000, the gift tax on that is $75,000. So, as Senator Hayden said—perhaps he did not say this, but I will say it for him—gifts are now made almost prohibitive unless one is foolish enough to indulge in the pastime of making gifts to the Government.

On a gift of one million dollars to one's children, the gift tax alone would be $671,500. Think of it! You give them a million dollars. If you want to do that—and some of the members on the other side are able to afford this, of course—the gift tax is $671,500.

Now, the worst part of all this is that the individual's lifetime gifts, as I said before, are cumulative so that there is no longer any incentive to save, to make gifts. And that is the instinct we all have. We want to save to build up an estate to leave the money first to our wives and then to our children. And we know that the wife's enjoyment of it is to be limited, unless she is a lot younger than we are.

This confiscation of wealth in the greatest period of prosperity in the whole western world, a prosperity which has been built on a system of enlightened capitalism, is a shocking thing. Even in war conditions the Government did not confiscate wealth. It does so now in this "just society" at a time when the Government of Canada should be reducing taxes.

I hear people say—and you hear it every day—"Let's soak the rich". But in soaking the rich to the point of confiscating the wealth you destroy private enterprise, just as it was destroyed in the cradle of private enterprise, England, which is now on the verge of bankruptcy because of the confiscation of wealth by the Government of that country.

In Canada more than 60 per cent of our industry is already owned by the Americans. How much of this is because the owner's estate could not afford to pay the taxes? How much more so will that be when this estate tax becomes the law? When this confiscatory tax on estates and the tax for gifts becomes law, a good part, if not most, of the remaining 40 per cent of our industry will soon be owned by the Americans as well.

In England the prohibitive estate taxes cleaned out the wealth of the British people to the extent that large capital in private hands has almost disappeared. In your own constituencies, you will notice, all of you, from all over Canada as you are, that in nearly every town and village in Canada, and this applies to Quebec particularly, there is a family firm. There is some family in that town or village which provides employment for the employable people in that town or village. It may be a creamery or a factory, a mill, a cannery, an abattoir or a manufacturing plant.

Now, such a family business, I am respectfully suggesting, which cannot find ready capital anyway, but has a lot of capital wrapped up in the plant, such a family business will soon be cleaned out. It will be cleaned out in another generation because where will the sons and daughters get the cash to pay 75 per cent in taxes on gifts in excess of $200,000, or $89,200 for estate taxes up to $300,000, and then 50 per cent on everything above that? How can they afford to do it? Where are they going to get the money? It is prohibitive.

Now, this estate tax is an open invitation to more American take-over. Senator Burchill, you have had a lot of experience down your way with Americans coming up and taking over. This is an open invitation for the Americans to take over the balance of Canadian industry, because despite all the criticism that we hear of the Americans, they have in America no such prohibitive gift tax or estate tax as contemplated in this bill.

And we must not forget that we are not only talking about federal estate taxes. In addition, the beneficiaries of a deceased will have to pay in most of the provinces heavy provincial succession duties as well, with the exception, I am glad to know, of Alberta and soon, we hope, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. But it does not look as if that will be the case in Ontario or Quebec for a long time to come. In Ontario, in fact, they are now considering a capital gains tax and an income tax. So this means the situation is all the more critical.

One hundred years ago Sir John A. Macdonald warned us against becoming hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans. Today, under this proposed legislation, we will be worse off than that, and this is just the beginning. It is just the beginning of the implementation of the Carter Report. Even now in our own country we are no longer captains of our own industries. We are merely Canadian employees of American employers in American-owned industries in 60 per cent of the industries of Canada. When this bill becomes law, the Americans will have a ready-made opportunity and a great incentive to pick up much of the remainder of the industries of Canada at bargain prices because of this bill. And this budget is just a shadow of things to come. Through its conscription of capital, Canada has lost its last chance of holding out its remaining 40 per cent of the industries from the onrushing Americans. And anybody who has done business with Americans knows how pleasant they are but how forceful and persuasive as well.

What the Americans could not capture in the war of 1812—and some of us here had our ancestors come to Canada to fight in the war of 1812—they are taking by default in 1969.

Again, I repeat, what family-owned business across Canada, unless it is a fancy set-up or is incorporated with shares and all that sort of thing in anticipation of this, can survive to the next generation with this confiscatory, crippling taxation imposed by this budget by way of estate tax and gift tax?

Right across Canada we have long been proud of the family businesses which have kept alive our villages and towns for many generations. I suggest that they are now doomed by this legislation because the survivor just will not be able to pay these taxes and will be unable to carry on. So what must the family business do to avoid bankruptcy or to avoid going on the rocks on the death of the owner? What must they do to pay the estate taxes, as they must pay them? There is only one solution, and I think it is an unpatriotic one and it is not one which I suggest to any of my clients in our office, but the only solution seems to be for the owner to sell out to the Americans before the client dies. Clients come into the office and ask "Why shouldn't we move to the West Indies?" They think the only real solution to the problem is to sell out to the Americans and skip to the West Indies before the surviving spouse dies. They say, "Why not move out of Canada to Bermuda or Nassau or to some other Caribbean country where there are no estate taxes?" In this way the surviving spouse can pass on his or her hard-earned estate to the sons and daughters free of estate tax. But that is a big tug on one's patriotism, when you consider the situation of a man worth a million dollars who knows the effect that the estate tax is going to have on his estate and who knows that by selling out and going to Nassau he can pass it on to his children without having to pay tax except for the 15 per cent that we all know about. Think of the position of a surviving wife when she is left an estate by her husband which consists of a family business and which she wants to pass on to her sons and daughters. What alternative does she have? She moves out of Canada and leaves it to the children practically tax free.

Think how the American industrialists interested in obtaining a further foothold in Canada must be chortling today as they contemplate taking over much of the balance of Canadian industry. Is it not ridiculous to talk of a "just society" when a person's life work can be destroyed on his death by government confiscation, particularly when his property and goods are given over to strangers, and particularly if they are American strangers? Of course they cannot be Canadian strangers because Canadians cannot afford it. It really is galling. This is what we are coming to as a result of the determination to destroy incentive to thrift, initiative, and intelligence in this country. And this is a result of the administration of the Minister of Finance who, with the greatest respect, has had no experience in this sort of thing except a few brief years in Ottawa, and who cannot be expected to understand the problems involved. In my view this is the work of some of the back-room boys, the clever economists and the clever civil servants who are getting in the way all the time down here. This bill will accelerate in the wiping out of that class of people who are prepared to accumulate by hard work.

A welfare state is not around the corner; it is here. We honor the bums, the people who will not work. Of course the unemployed who cannot get work, we respect and should help. But even those who refuse to work are paid by us; we pay anyone and everyone; we honour the student who does not know anything but who at 17, 18 or 19 has only an inborn youthful arrogance. We honour him; we respect him; we bow down and do things for him; but at the same time the very people who built up Canada and who have sustained Canada and who have been giving jobs to Canadians are now being wiped out by this confiscatory legislation. I feel this very deeply, but I do not intend to speak at length because I know there is another honourable senator who wishes to speak before he goes to his plane. As I say, those who stand midway between the overprivileged and underprivileged will find their life's savings wiped out and that whole class of people will disappear from the map of Canadian society and from our Canadian economy. This is what happened in Europe over the centuries as a result of confiscatory tax policies, and the result was the creation of a landless proletariat which ended up as a revolutionary mob.

I think the Government of Canada and its advisers in the bureaucracy, and I know a great deal about this as I had a lot to do with it in the years I was a minister, are doing everything in their power to turn Canadians into a faceless proletariat, to drive them from the land, to drive them from their businesses, to drive them out of their towns and villages and put them on the welfare rolls of the metropolitan complexes. This new estate tax and gift tax is yet another step on that very painful way.

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: To the next sitting?

Hon. Mr. Beaubien: If I can get on early to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Is their any rush with regard to this legislation?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, but I think there are some other senators who want to go on.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: If they want to, let them adjourn the debate.

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. The Speaker: I shall put the motion by honourable Senator Beaubien, seconded by honourable Senator Macdonald, that the debate be adjourned. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the honourable Leader of the Government if this bill is going to be rushed through the Senate. I do so because I want to speak on it and I know there are several other members on this side of the house who want to speak on it because they regard it as a matter of the greatest importance. I suggest that there should be no undue haste to rush this through the house and have it passed until we have had sufficient time to allow the matter to be discussed thoroughly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I fully agree with you, Senator. However, there are two senators who have indicated to me that they are ready to speak and I felt that this was the orderly way to carry on the debate. There is only one of them in the house at the moment.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of reports of the Standing Committee on Divorce Nos. 627 to 651, inclusive, which were presented yesterday.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Croll, for Hon. Mr. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, reports adopted.

Resolution 563, for the relief of Noreen Jane Hanorah Myles Liddy.

Resolution 564, for the relief of Elizabeth Ann Westwell Janssens.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these resolutions be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Croll: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that these resolutions be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

OMBUDSMAN COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, December 11, 1968, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Croll that the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate to be known as the Ombudsman Committee.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I apologize for going on with this matter so late in the day, but I did set it down for this date and I think it wise to go ahead.

In discussing the motion to create a Senate Ombudsman Committee, I think it would be wise, first of all, to look precisely at what the resolution proposes. It proposes that we appoint a committee of the Senate that shall investigate and report upon grievances from citizens of Canada which result from administrative action which is within the jurisdiction of Parliament and for which no other remedy is available.

I would now like to examine with you briefly why I think the institution of ombudsman is needed. We are all aware of the tremendous growth in Government activities, and while we may be perturbed about it, nevertheless we must accept it as a fact. All governments seek to do more for their citizens, but the citizens are not entirely blameless, for they themselves demand more of Government. The conditions in which we live today, such as increased urbanization, demand that the Government does a great deal more for its citizens, and the fact we have the technology available permits the Government to do more. The result has been a tremendous growth in the administrative structure. Of course, we have an ever-increasing number of laws, but those laws are now so complex that they have resulted in regulations. But when you examine regulations you find that they are not drawn with the same care as is given to the drawing of laws, and often regulations under laws permit discretion to be exercised by administrative officials. As a result of these two aspects some decisions made by administrative officials in implementing the regulations are bound to be arbitrary. The citizen is affected by these arbitrary decisions, but he has no easy form of redress. If you examine many laws you will find that there is no formal right of appeal to the citizen who suffers a grievance. Of course he always has the right to appeal to the courts, but courts are often slow, cumbersome or expensive and, in any event, some matters that are of extreme importance to the citizen are really too small for appropriate action by the courts.

It is true the citizen has the right to appeal through his Member of Parliament but, as I shall try to demonstrate later, the Member of Parliament cannot always be effective and the result of this is that citizens are often bewildered, for if a grievance has been created as a result of administrative action, the citizen might find difficulty in obtaining a redress. In any event, he feels overwhelmed by the enormous size and complexity of Government, and the result of this can be a dangerous frustration, the sort of frustration that gives rise to the type of thing we are seeing all the time around the world. It seems to me that as far as possible we should attempt to do whatever we can to reduce that sense of frustration in our citizens.

I submit to you, honourable senators, that an ombudsman can be the answer, for an ombudsman provides the citizen with a simple procedure to gain redress of the grievances from which he suffers. All the citizen has to do is raise the matter by letter. The cost of the hearing or investigation is rather low or non-existent. In many cases a simple explanation from the ombudsman will satisfy the citizen. If it does not, then the ombudsman undertakes an investigation of the matter and makes a recommendation for redress to the government concerned. If that recommendation is not dealt with satisfactorily, then the matter is submitted to Parliament. Usually the citizen is satisfied, for he either receives an explanation from the ombudsman or generally his grievance is rectified. In any event, we have the beginning of the overcoming of the citizen's frustration, for at once he realizes that he has a champion within the Government complex who can protect him and can give him access to where he feels the power lies.

Honourable senators, the institution of ombudsman has a long history, and if I may paint for you some of the highlights I think it will be useful in our discussion. It originated in Sweden in 1809, when they established two ombudsman, one for military and one for civil affairs. They are both appointed by Parliament. They can receive complaints from citizens or, uniquely, they have the right to act on their own, and they possess a wide power of rectification. They can direct departments to do certain things; they even have the right to take court action against offending officials.

In 1919 Finland established an ombudsman. Again, he is appointed by Parliament. All fields of public activity come under his purview. Like the ombudsman in Sweden, he has the power to prosecute, discipline or direct the departments to change their policies.

Norway established an ombudsman for military affairs in 1952, and they were so satisfied with the results that in 1963 they appointed a civil ombudsman. Again, he is elected by Parliament and reports to Parliament. He investigates only administrative agencies and, unlike the ombudsmen in Sweden and Finland, he has no power other than that of expressing an opinion.

In 1956 West Germany established an ombudsman for military affairs. There again he is elected by, and reports to, The Bundestag. He cannot instruct or interfere with the executive.

In 1962 New Zealand appointed an ombudsman. He is appointed on the recommendation of Parliament, and he reports to Parliament. He is entitled to investigate any matter of administration, but not a matter in respect of which there lies in the citizen's hands a right of appeal or review. Again, he can only make recommendations.

Great Britain examined the proposition of an ombudsman in great detail, and in 1967 created the office of Parliamentary Commissioner. The Parliamentary Commissioner is slightly different from the ombudsman of other countries, for he is appointed by the Crown and complaints can come to him only through the Members of Parliament. When he has completed his investigation, while he reports to the Member of Parliament concerned and also to the department, he again reports back to Parliament.

In 1967 ombudsmen were established in Alberta and New Brunswick. They are appointed on the recommendation of the Legislative Assembly, and they can investigate the administration of departments or agencies. If they find a grievance is valid they can report to the minister concerned, and if they do not get satisfaction they report to the Executive Council, and if they cannot get satisfaction then they make a report to Parliament.

The Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the other place examined this matter in great detail, and in 1965 recommended the creation of a federal ombudsman for Canada. In fact, in the Throne Speech of 1965 a royal commission was proposed to investigate the procedures of regulatory bodies and the desirability of an ombudsman.

Honourable senators, I apologize for going through all this history, but I think it is necessary to set the tone for some conclusions that might well be drawn, for if you follow that history you will find that certain principles have evolved since the creation of the first office in 1809. The principles are these. For an ombudsman to be successful he must be independent of the executive. He must be a representative of Parliament. Reasonable restrictions can be imposed on the areas of his investigation without impairing his usefulness. It is sufficient if he just makes recommendations. It will be recalled that originally it was felt he had to have power to interfere, and power to prosecute. It has since been found that the only power he needs is the power to recommend.

The studies indicate this, honourable senators, that in the countries throughout the world where this institution has been established there is general happiness with it, because it gives people an outlet for their frustrations against Government, and an opportunity to have their grievances redressed. In fact, it has been found that administrative practices of Government improve where an ombudsman is in operation and, most importantly, it improves the control of Parliament over the executive.

Honourable senators, the idea of an ombudsman is spreading. There is no doubt in my mind that we will have a federal ombudsman in Canada. The question we have to answer is not whether it is going to come, but whether the Senate is the body that should handle it. It seem to me that a Senate committee can fulfill all of the requirements of an ombudsman. A Senate committee, of course, would be representative of Parliament because it is part of Parliament itself. A Senate committee would be independent of the executive. If senators are appointed, either for life or to the age of 75 without the hope of reappointment, then, surely, they are independent of the executive. The procedures of a Senate committee can be simple and inexpensive. There is no doubt that a Senate committee has the full power of Parliament to investigate the grievances of citizens.

If we are going to have an ombudsman—and we are—then by having a Senate committee perform that function we can achieve our objective at minimal cost to the public, instead of incurring the great cost of setting up a separate department.

That is my case, honourable senators, for a Senate Ombudsman Committee, but I think it is only fair, before I conclude, to review the opposing case. There are some arguments against the establishment of a Senate Ombudsman Committee. One is that a Senate committee would have no power to enforce its decisions. Without getting into the rightness or wrongness of that argument, I think it is sufficient to say that our examination has shown that the ombudsman theory has evolved in this way. The ombudsman is successful in countries all over the world with just the power to recommend. If teeth are needed in the ombudsman's function, they are present in the fact that when he reports to Parliament, Parliament can take what action is necessary.

Another argument against the creation of a Senate Ombudsman Committee is that many grievances put forward by citizens will not be heard by such a committee. Honourable senators, grievances do fail, and they fail because they are not within Parliament's jurisdiction, because they are groundless or even vexatious, or because there is another mode of appeal or review open to the citizen. The grievances that fail will constitute a high percentage of the grievances that will come before the committee.

I talked to Mr. McClellan, the Ombudsman in Alberta, this morning, and he told me that the failures run to over 50 per cent of the grievances that come before him. But, he said that if one takes the trouble to explain to the citizen why his grievance fails, then the citizen is satisfied. Even that fact gives the ombudsman an opportunity to help the citizen, and surely that is what this is all about.

Another opposing argument is that it will encroach on ministerial responsibility. As I understand ministerial responsibility, it means that the minister is responsible for the administration of his department; but surely we in Parliament have to weigh that principle against the principle of parliamentary control of the executive. Which is more important? Well, I opt on the side of Parliamentary control of the executive. And the ombudsman complements that parliamentary control of the executive. As a matter of fact, the history of the ombudsman and an examination of what other countries have found show that the ministers of the Crown actually appreciate somebody making a critique of their departments, much in the same way that a successful businessman appreciates the critique of his operations.

Another argument is that it will encroach on the Member of Parliament's representation of his constituents. That may be true. But, if it is true, who is more important, the Member of Parliament or the citizens he represents? And, in any event, it seems to me that Members of Parliament are individuals. Many of them handle the complaints brought to them extremely well; they do a wonderful job. But there are some who do not, or cannot, and why should the citizens be the ones who suffer? Often, too, even the best M.P. lacks the power to make a proper investigation of the situation.

There is no question in my mind that, in the decision of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections of the other place in recommending that an ombudsman be appointed, Members of Parliament were recognizing that they needed help in their function. Indeed, that is exactly what a Senate Ombudsman Committee could do. It could be a help to the Members of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: May I ask a question? Does the honourable member suggest that a Senate Ombudsman Committee would be better than a Commons Ombudsman Committee?

Hon. Mr. Everett: No. As a matter of fact, I do not necessarily suggest that. If the honourable senator would wait a moment, I will come to just that suggestion. But I do appreciate his mentioning it.

Honourable senators, the final argument that is made opposing a Senate Ombudsman Committee is that it is going to encroach on the power of the Commons. If it is true, that is a very telling argument. But it seems to me also, honourable senators, that if it is true, there is an awful dichotomy in Commons' thinking, because what I hear from some members of the Commons who are particularly voluble on the subject of the Senate is that they are concerned that the Senate is not doing enough. If they are concerned that the Senate is not doing enough, it does not sound to me right that they would level a criticism against the Senate for starting to do something, no matter whether it interferes in one way or another with the Commons.

But our rapport, honourable senators, should not be with the Commons; it should be with the public. We are here to serve the public and, if we can do it successfully, then I do not think we should be swayed at all by that sort of argument. But, if the members of the other place are concerned, then a Senate Ombudsman Committee could be the forerunner of a Joint Ombudsman Parliamentary Committee.

Honourable senators, in closing, I would just like to say that what is being presented in Senator Croll's resolution is not new to the Senate. If I may refer to the book called The Modern Senate of Canada, by Professor F. A. Kunz, in which he said as follows:

> —the Senate has acted in the capacity of a sort of institutional Ombudsman in the Canadian parliamentary system...Its efforts to put a brake upon an all-powerful executive, but not to obstruct the 'positive state' which gave rise to the all-powerful executive, may prove to be a quixotic fight. The fact, however, that none of its actions in this regard has been seriously challenged by the Government of the day may indicate that the Senate in its substantive role has acted as the 'subconsciousness' of the House of Commons or for that matter, of the Government.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that there is a need for this institution. It seems to me that it is working well in the other countries and provinces that have established it. It seems to me that it is just a matter of time before there will be a Senate ombudsman or before there will be a federal ombudsman. It seems to me that a separate committee could adequately do the job, and it seems to me that this is a way for the Senate to serve the citizens of Canada. There is no doubt in my mind, honourable senators, that the Senate should do this. Again, if I may quote from Professor Kunz:

> —What second chambers may rightly be called upon to do is to help sustain, together with other institutional and non-institutional elements in the political and social system, the constitutional atmosphere in the body politic—

Of second chambers Professor Kunz says that they:

> —should maintain a suspicious watch over any attempt on the part of the executive to act arbitrarily or to by-pass Parliament by sheer force of administrative habit or bureaucratic usage and thus unduly further to increase its grip over the other branches of Government; for discharging this function second chambers may have various methods of control at their disposal; the effectiveness of which depends on the willingness and the skill to use them.

Honourable senators, I have no doubt about the skill that is in this chamber. If the willingness is there, we can do something for the citizens of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bourque, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 25, the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Leonard, for the adoption of the Report of the Standing Committee on Finance with respect to the Estimates, Revised Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A), which was presented on Thursday, February 6, 1969.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, when I moved the adjournment of this debate it was not actually with the intention of participating in it myself, but was only to prevent the debate being terminated before all those who might wish to speak on it could do so. I had understood there were some senators on this side who wished to speak; indeed, honourable Senator Grosart mentioned to me that he would like to participate in this debate. However, as there is another report coming to us tomorrow and more supplementary estimates, Senator Grosart and any other senator who wishes to take part in the debate will be able to speak at that time. Consequently, I do not propose to speak in this debate.

Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I should inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Leonard speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Leonard: Honourable senators, I shall detain you only for a moment. First, I want to thank Senator Beaubien for his contribution to this debate. The suggestion which he made with respect to the committee's studying the effects of the Estimates on the level of taxation was put in the form of a motion to the committee on Thursday last and was carried. This will now be part of our continuing studies.

I know that Senator Grosart will have a further opportunity to speak because the committee is carrying on with its consideration of the Supplementary Estimates (B) and I expect a report will be placed before the Senate tomorrow. We are also carrying on with the consideration of the Estimates for 1969-70. The committee meets tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock and the witnesses will be from the Treasury Board. The main purpose at that meeting will be to deal with the 1969-70 Estimates, but we will also complete the study of Supplementary Estimates (B) which would have been ready to report today except a revision of one of the votes was put in since our meeting on Thursday last and it will be dealt with tomorrow.

Then, we have the motion of Senator Beaubien concerning the effect of the Estimates on the level of taxation, which will be taken up and our first witness will be Professor Neufeld of the University of Toronto who will be before the committee on March 27. The witness a week from tomorrow will be Dr. George Davidson, no longer in his capacity as an official of the Treasury Board, but now as head of the C.B.C. Our particular discussion with him will concern the items in the 1969-70 Estimates, dealing with the amounts contributed by the Government of Canada for the annual expenses of the C.B.C.

I remind all honourable senators that even if they are not members of the committee, they are welcome to attend the meetings, take part in the discussions, and ask questions of the witnesses, and I am sure they will benefit therefrom.

With these remarks, honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report now.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1969

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-177, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1969.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move with leave of the Senate, that this bill be now read the second time.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Honourable senators, I am sure there is a good reason why we should suspend our rule at this time. I wonder if the mover of the motion would indicate the reason.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I understand that there are items in this bill which must be approved and passed before Tuesday so that the payments can be made on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is it urgent that those payments be made? Are we that close to the deadline?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, I am so informed. Honourable senators will recall that on December 19, 1968, Royal Assent was given to a supply bill for the current fiscal year which released full supply for all of the votes in the revised Estimates for 1968-69 and for Supplementary Estimates (A) of 1968-69. The bill now before us will release Supplementary Estimates (B), 1968-69, and Supplementary Estimates (B) (Revised) 1968-69, which are the final supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year 1968-69.

Of course, as usual, they contain both budgetary items and loans, investments and advances. The former category, which amounts to $152 million, is just under the amount indicated for budgetary items when the main Estimates for 1968-69-70 were tabled a few weeks ago. This brings the total budgetary Estimates for 1968-69 to $10,822 million.

The loans, investments and advances included in this bill total just over $70 million. The difference between this amount and the $36 million indicated for such items in the main Estimates for 1969-70 is accounted for by three items, the need for which was not evident at the time the main Estimates for 1969-70 were printed.

These items are: (a) loans to Eldorado Nuclear Limited in the amount of $22 million. This is a fall-back item as it is likely that the corporation's requirements will be met through direct borrowing from private financial institutions. (b) Loans up to $6 million to assist the ground-fish industry. At an earlier stage it appeared that this would require a budgetary item, but I am pleased to report that the Government's objectives in this respect will be pursued by means of loans rather than grants. (c) An item on page 16 of the bill creating a $7 million revolving fund for the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. This is not a new item, in a sense, as it will merely replace the Bureau's presently existing revolving fund, the authority for which will lapse with the passage of Bill C-173, the Government Organization Bill. The new revolving fund will reflect the need for increased working capital.

I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators a new feature in the supplementary Estimates, namely, the use of funds available from other appropriations previously approved by Parliament to meet other requirements within the same ministry. As honourable senators are aware, the past practice has been to vote additional moneys to meet all requirements that could not be met from the same vote. I draw your attention, for example, to the first item in this bill which is vote 10b which comes under the heading "Agriculture" on page 4 of the bill. You will notice that the gross requirement of $1,216,400 has been offset completely by funds available in another vote of that ministry. The amount of $1, of course, is necessary to bring the item before Parliament and to obtain approval for the transfer. It is believed that this approach reflects more accurately the net additional requirements of the Government than did past supplementary Estimates practice.

As I mentioned earlier, the budgetary requirements in this bill total approximately $152 million. Honourable senators will note that about two-thirds of this total is required for one vote, the Treasury Board contingencies vote to be found on page 13 of the bill. This very large sum represents the assessment of the demand to be made upon the treasury as a result of the completion of the collective bargaining negotiations now under way in the Public Service. As it is not possible to assess this requirement on a vote-by-vote basis, much as we would like to, we propose that the funds be provided centrally in this contingencies vote, and allotments from this vote be made to supplement the votes of individual departments and agencies, as their requirements are determined following the conclusion of individual collective bargaining agreements.

May I point out an unusual feature of this proposed appropriation. The amounts involved, as I have said, are substantial, and collective bargaining is a process in which no employer should allow the particular accounting system under which he operates to put him under undue pressure of time. It is proposed, therefore, that Parliament grant this appropriation worded in such a way as to allow payments owing in respect of 1968-69 or prior years to be made and recorded up to April 30 next in the Public Accounts for 1968-69 under the title of the department requiring the money, and that the unexpended balance on that date remain available for salary adjustment payments which, in view of the need to close the books for the year 1968-69 at the end of April, would not be distributed among the departments.

I should like to emphasize that payments from this bill will be confined to payments owing in respect of services rendered in 1968-69 and prior years exclusively. I should also add that the amounts requested under the contingencies vote will provide only for the cost of salary revisions arising out of collective bargaining. Other additional salary requirements are provided for in separate departmental votes contained in these Estimates.

Finally, I should like to point out that it was necessary with respect to the item Vote 12b in the Department of Labour to introduce a Supplementary Estimates (B) (Revised) in order to authorize compensation to persons who are not now employees of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and who contracted silicosis while working for the mines taken over by the corporation. The wording in Supplementary Estimates (B) referred only to employees of the corporation. The schedule to the supply bill contains the revised wording.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to your favourable consideration.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Langlois upon his full explanation of the items in this appropriation bill, but I am sorry to have to open my remarks with what might appear to be a criticism.

I am most surprised that the second reading of this bill was moved immediately. I have asked why that is so, and I must say I do not regard the answer I received as satisfactory. My view is that this bill should not have been brought before us ahead of other items on the Order Paper, and at a time when we expect to receive a report from the Senate Committee on National Finance in respect of Supplementary Estimates (B). In other words, we have the cart before the horse. Supplementary Estimates (B) were referred to the committee. The committee met last week and again this morning to consider them, and it is prepared, I understand, to report to the house. So, as a result of what I can only call mismanagement of the Order Paper today, we are in the position where we have to consider the bill before we receive the report of the committee.

This is not the way in which I like to see the work of this committee treated by those who are responsible for the Order Paper. It is certainly no compliment to Senator Leonard, who has worked hard to be able to present the views of the Senate Committee on National Finance to this house before it is asked to pass an appropriation bill.

I would hope that when the honourable sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Langlois) speaks in closing the debate he will give us a full explanation of why on a Thursday afternoon we are required to set aside our rules and give second reading to this bill. If I understood him correctly, the reason is that the Government needs the money by Wednesday next.

It would seem to me that this is another instance of what I have to call mismanagement, if the Government finds itself so close to the wall financially that it has to ask us to set aside our rules in this way. I would hope that I would have a full explanation of what moneys we are asked to appropriate in this bill, and which are necessary by next Wednesday, or whenever it is. I also hope we will be told what is the nature of these expenditures that must be made so suddenly. Are they salaries, statutory grants? Are they matters under the control of the Government? I presume they are and, if so, the present procedure is not one that would, in my view, give me very great confidence in the way in which the Government is controlling the public funds of Canada.

I understand that later today we will have a report from the Finance Committee. That being so, I find myself in somewhat of an embarrassing position, because it would have been the natural thing for me to have followed the report by the acting chairman of that committee rather than being in the position of commenting on the appropriation bill prior to the report of the committee, of which I am a member.

Hon. Paul Martin: Will the honourable friend permit me a comment? I do not want to interrupt his speech. I think he knows much better than I do that a message from the other house takes precedence. We are now on second reading. This bill will not be finalized. Before third reading is given there will be the fullest opportunity for discussion of the report of the National Finance Committee, which would be sandwiched in between this particular discussion and any discussion that could take place on third reading. Of course it would always have to be with leave. The reason we proceeded today and not tomorrow, in accordance with the requirement of notice, was to permit the Senate to carry its usual time of adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Well, of course, far be it from me to suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government how he should arrange the Order Paper, but a thought that would occur immediately to me, and I think to all honourable senators, is that it might have been quite possible to ask to have second reading put on the Order Paper so that it could have come after rather than before the report of the committee. No matter what urgency there may be, it was not necessary to proceed immediately to second reading.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, I must accept some responsibility for the preparation of the scroll, and I object to the arguments that are being put forward by the senator at this moment. Neither I nor anyone else has any right to interfere.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, I believe I have the floor. If the honourable senator wishes to ask me a question I will be delighted to do my best to answer, but I would suggest if he wishes to enter the debate I am sure there will be time even in spite of the tremendous urgency. I am also sure there will be time before the debate is over for him to make his comments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order please. May I comment on the remarks of the honourable Senator Grosart? I think in this particular instance he had a perfect right to rise as he did. May I ask the honourable Senator McDonald if he rises now on a point of order, a motion of privilege or on a simple question?

Hon. Mr. McDonald: I rise on a point of order and to make a suggestion to my honourable friend that if he would like to adjourn this debate until later today, then we can have the report of the committee. This of course could have been done before my friend ever entered the debate. He could have asked to have the report of the committee moved to the top of the Order Paper, and we would have proceeded in that fashion. All I want to point out is that we have no prerogative to change the Orders of the Day as the procedure is laid down. We can change them once they are before us in this house, but the persons responsible for making up the scroll cannot change them.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On the point of order, may I say it is not for us on this side to decide the order in which matters will be debated, regardless of what the Order Paper happens to say. It was the sponsor of the bill who, on behalf of the Government, moved second reading and who asked leave of the Senate, and I objected.

Honourable senators, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Until later this day?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I will move the adjournment, and let someone else deal with the time.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We want to hear you.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Very well. I am glad that the Leader of the Government has now decided to be precise about these matters. In deference to what he has just suggested, I move the adjournment of the debate until later this day.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I should indicate that in the suggestion which Senator McDonald has made, it was not that he did not want to hear Senator Grosart; he was very anxious to hear Senator Phillips (Rigaud).

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned until later this day.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) AND REVISED SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

Hon. Lazarus Phillips, for Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, Chairman of the Senate Committee on National Finance, to whom was referred the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1969, presented the following report:

(Read by the Clerk Assistant)

By Orders of the Senate respectively made on Tuesday, February 25, 1969, and Wednesday, March 5, 1969, the Senate Committee on National Finance was directed to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (B) and Revised Supplementary Estimate (B), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1969.

Your committee has examined the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and Revised Supplementary Estimate (B), and heard evidence from the Secretary of the Treasury Board and members of his staff thereon and reports as follows:

1. These are the fiscal Estimates for the fiscal year 1968-69 and bring the total of all Estimates for the year to the sum of $10,822,797,126 and the total of all Loans, Investments and Advances to $754,918,126.

2. Your committee has noted with approval that for the current year the Supplementary Estimates, in number or in total amount, have been less than for many years. This is a step in the right direction which we hope will be maintained in the years to come.

3. The said Supplementary Estimates (B) contained over forty (40) items of one dollar ($1) each, and your committee asked for explanations of these items individually. The explanations have been received from which it appears that these items fall into three categories:

(a) Items authorizing transfers within Votes previously approved by Parliament. (b) Items authorizing transfers from Votes previously approved by Parliament. (c) Items which are legislative in nature.

While the committee has not approved of the general practice involved in these one dollar ($1) items, and particularly of those involving statutory amendments, it accepted the explanations with respect to such individual items contained in the said Supplementary Estimates (B) and Revised Supplementary Estimate (B). These explanations will be appended to the printed proceedings of the committee.

All which is respectfully submitted.

T. D'Arcy Leonard,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud), with leave of the Senate, moved that the report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, first, I should like to subscribe to the observations made by Senator Grosart with respect to the effective way in which Senator Leonard conducts the affairs of this important National Finance Committee. I have been a member of the committee for a short time only, but I can vouch for the tremendous leadership which Senator Leonard gives us in this respect.

This being my first time on the floor in my capacity as a member of this committee, I should like also to pay my respects to Senator Grosart. I have learned a great deal from him in the course of these proceedings. I know that his application to the deliberations of the committee is an encouragement to younger members like myself.

Honourable senators, I have but two observations to make, in view of the fact that the report of the committee has been read by the Clerk Assistant and is obviously self-explanatory as to content.

My first remark would be to explain the reference to the Revised Supplementary Estimates (B) which we have had before us. Reference is made now not only to Supplementary Estimates (B) but also to the phrase "Revised Supplementary Estimates (B)".

In this connection, if honourable senators have before them a copy of Supplementary Estimates (B), I would draw attention to Item 12b which appears on page 12 thereof. In the event of some senators not having this particular booklet before them, I should like to explain the meaning of the reference to "Revised Supplementary Estimates (B)".

Item 12b, as originally included in the Supplementary Estimates, provides for compensation pursuant to the Government Employees Compensation Act to employees of the Cape Breton Development Corporation who incurred silicosis as a result of employment in the coal mines prior to their acquisition by the Corporation, as if the injury were incurred subsequent to their acquisition by the Corporation.

Honourable senators, it has been found that there were a number of persons who have contracted the unfortunate disease of silicosis by working in these mines and who are not now employees of the Crown Corporation, and who therefore would have been excluded from proper compensation and attention were not the revision made. Therefore, although Item 12b will read in the form in which it appears in the original supplementary Estimates, there will be inserted after the word "corporation" the words "and other persons". That will have the effect of dealing with this oversight.

Honourable senators, the only observation I should like to make is with respect to the important reference by way of the penultimate sentence in dealing with the subject matter of the ordinary one dollar items—in respect of which, as a new senator, I am receiving considerable instruction.

For the guidance of the Senate and for our information, I understand that for the first time these explanations will be appended to the printed proceedings of the committee.

In this respect, I must pay my compliments again to our chairman and to Senator Grosart opposite who co-operated with our chairman and with other members of the committee in that respect.

It has been a most useful exercise in the finance committee to study the method whereby the finance committee has dealt with the reallocation of sums heretofore voted by Parliament, and, in view of the desire of Parliament and of this house, notwithstanding it being a money bill, to see that the vested rights of the Parliament be not lost in terms of the control of the expenditures, I think it is a matter of vital importance that this finance committee in its report has received all the explanations with respect to the so-called $1 items and, by way of supplement, not only is it important that we have received the explanation but that they are very detailed in character. The Department of Finance has co-operated with the committee in this respect, and these detailed explanations will be a matter of great interest to honourable senators, if they will take the trouble to read them.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, may I just make the comment that Senator Phillips (Rigaud) was quite immoderate in his reference to me and much too modest in his reference to himself. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that he is the new acting chairman of the committee and will be chairing the committee for our next four or five sessions. I am sure honourable senators would wish to congratulate him on his very rapid rise.

Report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1969

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the adjourned debate on second reading of Bill C-177, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1969.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I think there might be general agreement that the course of the debate will be improved by the fact that we have now had from Senator Phillips (Rigaud) a very excellent report from the committee on the bill that is before us. Senator Phillips (Rigaud) made reference to what is perhaps the outstanding feature of this bill, which is the very large number of $1 items included in it. He said over 40—my own count was 50.

I am sure we have never had supplementary Estimates or a supplementary appropriation bill before us that had this strange new look. Because I am a member of the committee, I am, of course, fully in accord with the recommendation that the committee has made, that every effort should be made to avoid in future the use of $1 items to amend acts of Parliament. I might say that this has been a matter that the committee has engaged itself in for two or three years now. It is naturally a matter of satisfaction to me, and I am sure to other members of the committee, that at least we are getting this kind of action.

Senator Phillips (Rigaud) referred to the fact that probably for the first time in the history of this Parliament, the public servants have now undertaken to explain in writing the reasons for these $1 items. It is true that in the Supplementary Estimates (B) the majority are, as the sponsor of the bill mentioned, vote transfers within a department. I am sure honourable senators are aware of the necessity for that being done by an act of Parliament, because the Financial Administration Act prohibits the transfer of funds beyond a vote.

The bill before us transfers something like $50 million from one vote to another in the Estimates. If honourable senators have wondered why some of us have been regarding this as a very important matter to be discussed and recommended upon by the Finance Committee, perhaps I can give an example that will help to explain. The committee suggested to the Secretary of the Treasury Board that the reason for these large numbers of transfers might be that, when the departments came to the Treasury Board with requests for authorization of additional appropriations amounting to some $50 million, the Treasury Board said to the departments, "We have no more money. Find your $50 million within your present Estimates." That is the suggestion we made to the Secretary of the Treasury Board, and he said, "It is not only a fair question; that is the fact."

This immediately raises the question: Were the Estimates $50 million more than they needed to be? It also raises the point that if there had been financial stringency previously, and if previous Governments had said to departments when they came forward with supplementary Estimates, "Sorry; you go no further. We have no more money", this might have meant savings of millions or hundreds of millions of dollars over the years? I think that is a fair question, because the evidence we have before us is that when the Treasury Board said "No" to the departments, the departments found the money they needed within their present departmental votes. That is in the evidence before the committee which honourable senators can read. It is the main single reason given for this large number of transfers.

I think at this time it would be appropriate for me to add to the tribute that Senator Phillips (Rigaud) has paid to Senator Leonard. We on the committee were somewhat disturbed when we lost by promotion our previous chairman, who was promoted of course to the high position he now holds as Speaker of the house. However, we were happy when we found that Senator Leonard could be drafted back, and, as usual, he did not prove to be a draft dodger. To him must go most of the credit for the fact that our Senate committee has raised this issue and has got action, and that this whole matter is the subject of alarmed and thorough discussion in the other place—or was—on this particular appropriation bill. So, while it is sometimes said that in this place we do not get too much credit for what we do, at least on this occasion we have got action.

I hope I may have the indulgence of the chamber to refer back to the previous report of the committee, because this was to be discussed yesterday, although to accommodate the Order Paper it was left over. But the subject matter of the two reports is almost identical in respect of the major principles that are involved in the recommendations made. The committee in these two reports has made three major recommendations. The first is on these $1 items. We drew to the attention of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Board this morning a rather interesting example of what can happen when appropriation bills are used to legislate. The matter we drew to the attention of the appropriate public servant this morning was that in the current issue of the Canada Gazette, Part 2, there is notice of an intention to make certain dispositions by Order in Council dealing with the matter under the authority of Appropriation Act No. 5, 1955. In other words, in 1955 there was an amendment—in this case it was not a $1 item—in this Appropriation Act to a statute, and that amendment has yet to find its way into the statutes. In other words, as the public official said, "We are waiting for the consolidation of the statutes."

Now I suggest to all honourable senators, particularly to all those who are learned in the law, that this is surely an impossible situation; but it is one that should be remedied, because in this case and in many others a lawyer looking at the Act of Parliament and advising a client as to his eligibility under the act would have to tell him, "You are not eligible under the act"—unless somehow that particular lawyer happened to hear by radar or some other way that the act had been amended in an appropriation act in 1955.

I stress that point because I have been told when I spoke on appropriation bills before that these changes were just temporary matters to deal with emergency situations and they were not really amendments to Acts of Parliament. That is the reason I am most happy that the committeee in such a clear way has recommended that there be an end as soon as possible to the amending of Acts of Parliament by $1 votes. I am not saying there should be an end to all $1 votes. It is obvious that there are times when emergency situations arise and it is necessary to get immediate action in an appropriation bill. I am not objecting to that at all, particularly where the effect of that amendment applies only to a particular case. It is gone; that is the end, and I have no objection. I have no objection to some of the other uses of $1 items. I am speaking entirely of the abuse of this device by amending acts of Parliament in this fashion, and particularly the untidiness on somebody's part in not getting around in 14 years to incorporating that amendment in the act. It maybe laziness, untidiness or a careless disregard for Parliament. Whatever it is, it is something that I would urge requires limitation.

The second major recommendation of the committee deals with a matter that has come out of our discussions of other aspects of the Estimates. In brief, it is that those who have the responsibility for the expenditure of public funds in the federal field as well as at other levels of government should now make it an absolute rule that in future the increases in the percentage of our G.N.P. that is required by governments should remain constant.

If I may give an example, the Minister of Finance speaking in Washington on Monday night, pointed out that the percentage in developed western nations is somewhere between 30 and 40 per cent, that is to say that the level of all government revenues or expenditures, whichever way you like to take it, is between 30 and 40 per cent of the G.N.P. of any given country. The Minister of Finance said we are about half way between that. At the moment, then, we can assume that the requirements of government are 35 per cent of the money our economy earns. The federal share of that is approximately 17.5 per cent, or about half. It depends on the components that any particular economist puts into that figure, and there are considerable variables. The Minister of Finance certainly gave us no hope that this 17.5 per cent out of the total of 35 per cent would decline in the next few years. He said in his speech, "At today's levels there is nothing to indicate that these levels can be dramatically reduced in the near future."

Now it can be argued, and it has been argued, that there should be a reduction both in the percentage of the G.N.P. required by the federal Government and the total percentage by all levels. The committee does not argue with that. The committee, I think, says, "Let us accept the fact that it is going to continue to cost about 35 per cent or 17½ per cent of the G.N.P. to run the country, but let us not go beyond that." This would mean that in the Estimates as we have them from time to time, we would be asking the Government to hold its increase in total expenditures at least to the level of the increase in the G.N.P. This has not been done over the last few years. I think we are all aware that the levels of increase in the G.N.P. in the past eight years have been very large, averaging out at 7 or 8 per cent. The committee report in Appendix A points out that in 1960 the percentage increase in federal Government expenditure, including Old Age Security, was 5.9 per cent and in succeeding years it was 4.3 per cent, 8.3 per cent, 2.2. per cent, 5.4 per cent, 3.9 per cent, 8.2 per cent, and this brings us up to 1966. In 1967 it skyrocketed to 13.7 per cent, and in 1968 to 14.2 per cent. Now, of course it is this huge increase in federal Government spending that many people have said is one of the contributing factors to the scourge of inflation that we have in this country today.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Surely that is true of all levels of government.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I am sorry, but I did not hear the honourable Leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I have been following the honourable senator with great interest. He referred to the Minister of Finance's speech in Washington. There, he was speaking not only on federal expenditures, but on expenditures of all levels of government.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Of course, there is no question about that. Even so, if the federal level had been held down, the total level would have been held down too. I may say there are some who say the federal Government might well set an example to others in this field.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is what we are trying to do now.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: The honourable Leader of the Government says, "That is what we are trying to do now", and I am glad to be able to give him some support for that statement, because I have worked out the figures for the year ending March 31, 1969 and for the year ending March 31, 1970, based on Estimates at the moment, though the 1969 figures are pretty well all in. With regard to the 1970 figures, we can hope that the Minister of Finance will be able to carry out his intention of not exceeding the estimates.

I said the figure for 1968 was 14.2 per cent; that is the increase in total federal Government expenditures. If my arithmetic is correct, the 1969 figure will be almost exactly 10 per cent, and the 1970 figure will be 9.14 per cent. So that while this will still be considerably ahead of anything we can anticipate as the increase in G.N.P., at least I can say here that the honourable Leader of the Government in quite right in saying that the Government is trying, because it is certainly a decrease compared to these extraordinary increases of 1967 and 1968. I am sure all honourable senators wish the Government unqualified success in persuading themselves and others to implement this recommendation of the Senate Committee on National Finance, and that it is of urgent necessity, for the future of this country, and particularly for the control of inflation, that governments do not increase their expenditures above the increase in the G.N.P.

Hon. Mr. Lang: May I ask a question on this point? Does the honourable senator know if at any time in the past—that is, during the last war—the relationship between total government expenditures and G.N.P. ever exceeded the 35 per cent figure to which he has referred?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thank honourable Senator Lang for his question. I asked a similar question of the representative of the Treasury Board this morning, and he said that he would let us have the answer. I was referring only to more or less current Public Accounts. I am not able to say what the percentage was during the war years. It is possible that it exceeded this figure of 35 per cent for all levels, and 17.5 per cent federal, but I am sorry that I did not come prepared to answer that question. I suggest to the honourable senator that he might more appropriately ask the sponsor of the bill, rather than myself, a mere critic—and I recognize the fact it is much easier to be critical than correct.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The G.N.P. in 1945 was only about $5 billion; today it is over $60 billion. So one would have to take into account the rise in the G.N.P. over the years.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I agree, but this does not affect the percentage, and this is why I believe this recommendation of the committee has the value it has. It is simple; it does recognize the fact that the honourable Leader of the Government has just mentioned, that there are increases. We all know that. One simple reason is the increase in population. However, what the Senate committee recommendation urges is that this be tied to the increase in the G.N.P.

Perhaps it is fair to say that the minister gave an explanation of this very matter. He explained why we are not going to be able to reduce this percentage when he said:

> The size of the public sector is a direct reflection of the complexity and interdependent nature of our society, and of the consequent demands by our citizens that governments provide more and better services, and in more areas of life. Governments are building more and improved schools, universities and hospitals. We are extending the highway systems and the welfare programs and we are embarking upon new and expanded programs for the economic development of the have-less regions of our country.

I quote that to show that I am fully aware of the fact that governments need money and will need more money. I am merely emphasizing the fact that the Senate committee has come up with a tool that I believe would solve many of the problems that confront Canada and finance ministers.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Did I understand the honourable senator to say that 14.8 per cent was the federal Government's share of the 35 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: No, Senator; the 14.2 figure I quoted was the percentage increase in federal Government spending in the year ending March 31, 1968 over the year ending March 31, 1967. The 17.5 figure I mentioned was an estimate of the total percentage of G.N.P. being expended by the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Do we have figures as to the breakdown of Government spending as between the federal and provincial governments?

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I thought I had indicated that the breakdown between federal, on the one hand, and provincial and municipal on the other, is about 50-50. I do not have the breakdown between provincial and municipal. It used to be done, but it is not done so much now because of recognition of the fact that the municipalities are creatures of the provinces. So, the tendency is to lump provincial and municipal expenditures together and to come up with this equation that roughly half is now being spent by the federal Government and half by the other two levels of government.

Honourable senators, the time is getting on, and there were some other comments I might have made, but perhaps I should reserve them for some other occasion.

However, I would like to mention briefly the third recommendation of the committee, that we should put an end to these open-ended transfer agreements between the federal Government and the provinces. The Minister of Finance, in explaining the fact that his calculations were out last year, drew attention to this. He said that these open-ended agreements make it almost impossible for the federal Government to forecast accurately its own spending. This is so, of course, because by the nature of these agreements the federal Government offers to match the expenditures of provincial governments in certain areas. A very large amount of money is involved here. Nothing is contemplated in the present Estimates that are before us, nor in the Estimates for next year. However, this is a question that goes beyond mere financial considerations. There are political aspects.

I draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee has made its recommendation, which is one that would certainly make the control of finances by the federal Government much simpler than it is at the present time.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say. Once again, I think the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Langlois) for his explanation, and Senator Phillips (Rigaud) for his presentation of the report of the committee, and the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and his deputy (Hon. Mr. McDonald) for helping me out of the priority problem I had in respect to the Order Paper.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 11, 1969, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

At this time perhaps I should indicate that it is the intention to have Royal Assent given to certain bills before 6 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. As the committees will need some time in which to catch up on their work, it is proposed Wednesday be reserved for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: All day Wednesday?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, all day Wednesday. The Senate will, of course, resume on Thursday.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE PERTH MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang, for Hon. T. D'Arcy Leonard, moved the second reading of Bill S-30, respecting The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a private bill respecting The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company. As the name implies, it is a mutual insurance company. The purpose of this bill is to convert the company to a joint stock company, to change the name of the company to The Perth Insurance Company and, in French, Perth, Compagnie d'Assurance, and to convert all existing policies issued by the company on the mutual system to policies on the cash system, consistent with the proposed framework which is a share capital framework.

The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company has its roots deep in the history of Canada. Its predecessor company was incorporated more than 100 years ago, prior to Confederation, under a statute of the Province of Upper Canada. It derives its name from the County of Perth, where its business was started and where its headquarters have been. Its business grew and flourished, and in 1952 the company decided to acquire a federal charter to facilitate the doing of business throughout Canada. The federally incorporated company acquired the assets and business of the old provincial one, and has continued to grow and expand. However, the company was a mutual company without share capital, and in the course of time it decided that for further adequate expansion it should change from a mutual company to a joint stock company with an authorized capital of $5 million. This is the first purpose of the bill that is before us today.

The name of the company is changed by dropping the word "Mutual", which is no longer appropriate. The name "Perth" is retained and, therefore, the history and traditions of the company, and its association with the County of Perth, are retained. The head office remains in Stratford.

The company has arranged for the Economical Mutual Insurance Company to subscribe for $1 million of the share capital, and therefore it will have control of the company. Section 8 provides that the Economical Mutual Insurance Company cannot reduce its share holdings below two-thirds of the aggregate share capital without the consent of the Superintendent of Insurance.

By section 11, the act will not come into force until the Superintendent of Insurance has been satisfied that at least $1 million of the subscribed capital stock has been paid up.

A special general meeting of the members of The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company was held on November 6, 1968 to approve an agreement with that company for the arrangements set out in the act, and for the subscription by the Economical for 10,000 shares of the par value of $100 each in the new company. This meeting approved of the act and of the agreement with the Economical Mutual.

The Economical Mutual will, at the request of any holder of a mutual policy in the Perth Mutual, exchange its policy on the Mutual system covering the same risk, for the balance of its term with the same rate of premium as was in force immediaely before this act comes into effect.

All the arrangements have been discussed with the Superintendent of Insurance and he has no objection thereto. However, as it is intended to refer the bill, if it receives second reading, to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the superintendent will presumably, as usual, be a witness before the committee. The company will also be represented at such meeting to answer any questions of honourable senators.

Hon. Mr. Burchill: May I ask if this is a mutual company?

Hon. Mr. Lang: That is right. It is taking control of another mutual company, which is referring to a shared capital company. The Economical Mutual Insurance Company, as I understand it, is a wholly-owned Canadian company like Perth.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Lang, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

DIVORCE

COMMISSIONS OF INVESTIGATION

APPOINTMENT, TERMINATION AND COST—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, pursuant to notice of inquiry, requested of the Government the following information in respect to each Royal Commission or Commission of Inquiry appointed by the Governor in Council since June 21, 1957,

(a) The date of appointment of each Commission,
(b) The date of termination of each Commission, and
(c) The cost of each Commission to December 31, 1968

Hon. Paul Martin: Answered.

In so far as the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices are concerned, the answer is:

See attached list of Royal Commissions since June 21, 1957, and the answers to subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c).

For text of answer see Appendix, page 1185.

UNITED STATES ANTI-BALLISTIC MISSILE PROGRAM

QUESTION AS TO CANADA'S PARTICIPATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to direct a question to the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. I believe the subject-matter of this question is of tremendous importance to the people of Canada. It arises out of the consideration which I believe is being given at this time by the administration in the United States to the possible establishment of an anti-ballistic missile system.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Question.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I feel this is of importance because it could well mean a serious escalation of the cold war and the unnecessary use of large resources in the free world for this purpose, and of especially great concern to Canada because Canadian soil will be the "kill" area of any possible system.

My question is: Has the Canadian Government made its position known to the government of the United States, and has concern and opposition to such a possible move been expressed by the Government of Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, last week Senator Argue mentioned that he wished to ask this question, and Senator Prowse also indicated his interest in it.

In replying I have to take into account the terms of the question itself. What the United States government does is, of course, a matter for that government to decide. With regard to the light anti-ballistic missile program, which the former Secretary of Defence Mr. McNamara said was directed against China, the Canadian Government indicated that we did not propose to participate, financially or otherwise, in this program. We made this clear when we renewed the NORAD agreement. Similarly, with regard to the larger program, which would involve an expenditure of several hundred million dollars, we would not be financially or otherwise directly involved.

I would simply express the hope as an individual that it would be possible for the government of the United States and the government of the Soviet Union to reach an agreement in the matter of arms control which would avoid the serious launching in either country of such a program. In my personal judgment, if that were done it would make it very difficult for an arms control program to succeed in the foreseeable future. It is clear that the Canadian Government is not involved in either program. This was made clear with regard to the lighter program when we signed the renewal of the agreement known as NORAD.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1969

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-177, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1969.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

11 March 1969

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate

Chamber today, the 11th March, at 5.45 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the
Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, may I, on a question of privilege, rise to ask why Royal Assent could not be given at 8.45 or 9.30 this evening, without disrupting the normal business? We have often had the representative of the Crown here in the evening for the purpose of giving Royal Assent. Why must we have it at 5.45 today?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, the reason is that we had to pass this measure before 6 o'clock, so that certain accounts might be paid.

Hon. Mr. Croll: I remember one occasion when honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton) held up an appropriation bill dealing with the payment of accounts—and all the bills were paid.

Hon. Mr. Martin: One illegal act does not excuse another.

Hon. Mr. Croll: He never does anything illegally.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that the question of privilege raised by the honourable Senator David Croll has been disposed of—for today, at least?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 26, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Molson for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, at the outset and in connection with the motion we have before us, I would like to add my commendations to those already given before me in this debate for the excellent, efficient and expeditious work done by Senator Molson as Chairman of the Special Committee on the Rules. I was a member of that committee and saw firsthand how well run a committee of the Senate could be. I think all of us on that committee were impressed with the capacity of the chairman. I should add that the handicap under which Senator Molson worked, namely, having a vice-chairman of the committee as an absentee vice-chairman in the person of myself, did not appear to hinder the work of the committee but, I suspect, rather the reverse.

It was for me one of those unfortunate overlaps to which we seem to be so prone nowadays in our time of heightened activity, that I was in Brussels at the NATO assembly meetings during the latter part of the committee hearings and, indeed, at the time the report itself was drafted.

I must say, however, that when I returned and had an opportunity to read the report of this committee, I was very impressed with it in that it did reflect accurately the feelings of the members of the committee on the matters dealt with and did present a very accurate summation of the various statutes and regulations that we must further deal with and to seek amendment thereto if we are to get some effective reforms in this chamber.

Senator Molson brought to this committee his unique talents, and I for one would like to see these talents more broadly and frequently exercised in this house.

Honourable senators, before dealing with the specific items contained in the motion and because this debate does open for us the opportunity to discuss the Constitutional Conference of a few weeks ago and the White Paper there presented by the Government, I would like to first bring certain matters contained in that paper to the attention of this chamber.

As honourable senators know, the document that I am referring to is entitled "The Constitution and the People of Canada". In the introduction to this paper there is a statement which I think is quite significant and indeed sets the tone of all the other matters therein. It reads:

> A task of historic importance to all Canadians was undertaken by the Constitutional Conference when it assembled in early 1968. At its first meeting held in Ottawa February 5, 6 and 7, the heads of > the federal and provincial Governments agreed to undertake a review of the constitution.

There we have the initiation of this study.

> Without limiting the general scope of the review, the conference identified a number of areas which needed careful consideration. These were official languages, fundamental rights, the distribution of powers, the reform of institutions linked with federalism, including the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada, regional disparities, the amending procedure and provisional arrangements and the mechanism of federal-provincial relations.

Honourable senators, I think it is apparent from the enumeration contained in that clause that what is referred to in the paragraph itself, namely, a number of areas that have been identified to be brought under review, is in fact our entire constitutional structure, for contained within those words everything pertaining to our Constitution comes under scrutiny.

Honourable senators, that is indeed a most formidable task and one which today particularly may be fraught with great political danger. The introduction goes on to state:

> The decision of the conference made possible two approaches to the review of the Constitution. One approach would involve separate consideration of particular areas of the Constitution where urgent problems have appeared. The other approach would involve a general and comprehensive review commencing with the objectives and principles of the Constitution and proceeding systematically through all its aspects. The Government has favoured the latter approach because it appeared to offer the best opportunity for success.

Honourable senators, if we assume that there is a real necessity today for change in our Constitution—and I think our present difficulties right across Canada, together with finding ourselves in the midst of emergencies, would lead us to assume that this necessity is real, then I think we would be foolish not to profit by our history over the past 50 years of Canadian attempts to grapple with this problem. From massive royal commissions extending over long periods of time—such as the Rowell-Sirois Commission, the innumerable dominion-provincial conferences and parliamentary studies of the B.N.A. Act, a most exhaustive one being that of the House of Commons in 1935, a transcript of which I would like to have put verbatim in Hansard today and no one would recognize any difference—from these surely we can realize the practical difficulties with which we are faced in this task. The almost insurmountable obstacles, frustration and defeats we have met with in the past, we should profit from now. It is safe to say that all these obstacles, difficulties and dangers are still with us, perhaps many times compounded today.

The pragmatism of my Common Law background would indicate to me that in all these circumstances the approach chosen by the Government, namely, an over-all comprehensive review of the Constitution, is far less likely to succeed than the alternative posed by the Government itself, namely, separate consideration of particular areas of the Constitution where urgent problems have appeared.

Legalistic perfectionism, appealing as it may be to the academic mind, may very well hinder rather than advance the cause of recreating, remoulding and formulating a Canadian Constitution—a Constitution that I suggest must not restrict, ossify, or hem in our law and our institutions, but must rather give them capacity to grow and develop deeper and change with the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people as those needs and aspirations develop.

Be that as it may, I state my fear and suspicion of the codifier, my fear that in enunciating, spelling out and entrenching objectives of Confederation and fundamental rights we will delimit these objectives and restrict those fundamental rights rather than assure them and guarantee them. But if this is to be done, the White Paper under those two heads is a good start.

Honourable senators, the next head in the White Paper is entitled "Constitution of the Government of Canada". With one exception this is merely a codification of the statutory framework found in the B.N.A. Act, together with the constitutional conventions of Government that we now live with and accept. The one exception is that part dealing with the Senate, and in a few moments I would like to deal with that in conjunction with the report of the rules committee itself.

Honourable senators, the balance of this White Paper deals with two more heads, namely, provincial constitutions and the judicature. In the careful wording of the brief page entitled "Provincial Constitution" we come very close to the very heart of what we are concerned about in Canada today, and really the most basic reason for going through this momentous exercise. I say we come very close, for at the last moment the White Paper refuses to touch the very quick of the issue. The page itself starts out with the reassuring words that the Government of Canada recognizes that provincial constitutions are primarily the responsibility of each province, however, with two provisos. The first is that each provincial constitution must provide for the office of a lieutenant-governor, and the other, and by far the more important proviso, is to the effect that each provincial constitution must (a) respect the text and objectives of Canada's Constitution, (b) provide for the fundamental rights of individuals as defined in the Constitution and, (c) provide for election by universal suffrage every five years.

Now, in reverse, honourable senators, I know you will recognize that the provision for universal suffrage is to prevent the unlikely happening of a provincial government by constitutional change turning itself into a dictatorship or an oligarchy. Perhaps such a requirement is necessary today. Honourable senators will also recognize that the proviso as to the observance of the fundamental rights of individuals is designed to protect Canadians against provincial enactments of police state laws.

Finally, as to the requirements for respecting the text and objectives of the Canadian Constitution, what that means is somewhat more obscure, but what I suggest to honourable senators it does mean and what I suggest it should spell out in very clear language is that no province has the right to separate itself from the union. If, however, we believe in Canada, and we know that the vast majority of Canadians believe in our country, I think we should in no way evade this basic, fundamental and immutable tenet. If we do, all the constitutional conferences, all this debate, the work of the committee, of officials, has been for naught. I think we should insist that the tenet should be implemented in our Constitution in unmistakable language as the first and most fundamental proposition of the document.

Honourable senators, I have already dealt too long with this paper, but I have done so because I felt that it is important and because I think it merits a continuing examination by this chamber. I would like to see this paper referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study, not at some later date, or after the Commons Committee on Constitutional Affairs has had a chance to study it, but rather now. This paper, imperfect as it is, is an initiative and it is our duty and opportunity to seize that initiative.

The final heading on the White Paper deals with the judicature, more particularly the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not want to go into this area in detail today because it is not entirely germane at this moment. It is sufficient to say that, like the Senate, the Supreme Court is suspiciously regarded in certain sectors of this country as a centralist institution. I hope it will long be a central institution. That it should be a constitutional rather than a statutory institution as proposed is, I think, most sound. If, however, appeals from the Province of Quebec, unlike those from any other province, should be heard by a court consisting of not less than three judges from that province, so be it. It is not necessary for me to say that the Supreme Court of Canada is a court of which all Canadians can be proud no matter what province they come from, and all the constitutional protection we can give to that court we should certainly give it.

Finally, honourable senators, I would like to return to the report of the Rules Committee and the relevant section of the White Paper dealing with the Senate. As I have said before, whereas basically the White Paper merely proposes the codification of existing constitutional statutes, conventions and laws, it departs from this only where it deals with the Senate. The proposals with regard to the Senate involve a basic change of its role, and I suggest that this came about for three reasons. First, I suspect that there has been a fundamental misunderstanding by the drafters of the White Paper as to the primary purpose of the Senate today as an institution of Parliament. Secondly, I suggest that the recommendations may stem from a desire to placate certain elements, particularly in Quebec, who regard this as a centralist body. And, third, I suspect that it may be an easy means of giving provincial elements, particularly in Quebec, a supposed sense of involvement—and I underline the word "supposed"—in federal affairs.

Before going further into that, it would be useful if we quickly reviewed the evolution of our parliamentary system and the role of an Upper Chamber in it. I will attempt to be brief here. The White Paper itself says, "The basic intent of these propositions is to preserve the system of Parliamentary democracy." If this is so, we must know what the words we are using mean, particularly the words "parliamentary democracy." I wonder whether the drafters of the White Paper are quite clear as to the effect these proposals in regard to the Senate would have on our parliamentary democracy.

The word democracy, of course, as you all know, comes from the Greek word demos meaning "people" and kratos meaning "rule". It is interesting to note that the Greeks developed an intense and concentrated form of political life in their very small and uncomplicated city states. There, everyone except the women and slaves knew every law, voted on every edict and participated directly in every election. Theirs was a direct democracy in the classic sense. Today it would be called rather loosely a participatory democracy.

I cannot help turning aside here to comment that it should be apparent to anyone but the most unsophisticated that with the evolution of society and western democratic institutions over the last two thousand years the last direct or participatory democracy possible vanished from the scene with the disappearance of the civilization of Ancient Greece. I suggest that the words "participatory democracy" in their real sense, applied in the context of a modern, complicated industrial state today, have absolutely no meaning.

However, the Greeks started it, but it was not until 1792 that Rousseau in France gave the philosophical dimensions from which the modern democratic governments in all their forms evolved. The lineage of our responsible, representative democracy in Canada is clearly British, and with it we inherit both the very great strengths and the very great weaknesses of that system. First, I think we should remind ourselves what we are not. We are not a direct democracy like the Greeks; that is, a direct or participatory democracy. We are not a constitutional democracy like the United States. And I trust we are not a totalitarian democracy like Russia—and I do not want you to think there is a contradiction in those two terms. Ours is a representative democracy whose roots lie in the pragmatism of Bentham and the moral concepts of Mill. Deeply embedded in our system is the notion of parliamentary sovereignty conceived in moral rather than legal terms. I contrast that with the legalism of the White Paper. Our tradition recognizes no distinction between ordinary and constitutional law, and insists on complete legislative sovereignty in the Queen and Parliament.

Now, honourable senators, I give to you a summation of the tremendous weakness that is involved in these concepts. The effect of this doctrine under modern conditions is to give practically unlimited powers to the leader of any party able to win an absolute majority in the lower house. The place of the modern Senate of Canada in our constitutional framework, I think, must be viewed today against that background. Because honourable senators are so familiar with the debates about the role of this body at the time of Confederation and subsequently, I do not want to elaborate on that. May I rather quote from F.A. Kunz's recent book The Modern Senate of Canada, in which, in my opinion, he summarizes the political equation of that time entirely correctly. This has to do with the role of the Senate, as emphasized at the time of Confederation. He says:

> The assertion of the federal formation of the Senate at the time of Confederation, therefore, was rather a well calculated political device used as a constitutional tranquilizer to palliate the sectional fears of the weaker partners to federalism from the numerical majority of the House of Commons. In order that such fears might not endanger the ultimate outcome of the bargain—

That is Confederation.

> —the value of the Senate as a reliable safeguard of provincial rights had to be stressed.

Honourable senators we all know the famous words of George Brown when he said: "Without it"—that is without the Senate—"we could not have advanced a step."

The point I wish to make this afternoon is that at the time of Confederation the role of the Senate as a safeguard of provincial rights was deliberately overplayed in order that the bargain might come about, but I similarly suggest that that may never have been the primary role of the Senate. I suggest that the prime imperatives of a modern Senate in Canada are not—and I repeat not—in the words of Sir Alexander Campbell, "to give to each of the provinces adequate security for the protection of its local interest," but rather its role today is to secure a check and balance on the increasing executive power inherent in the parliamentary system of a complicated modern industrial state, when such executive is acting through a conditioned party majority in the Commons.

This is the great danger or weakness in the parliamentary system we have inherited. This is a weakness well guarded against in the United States in their constitutional system. You may very well ask me why we may be more vulnerable to this weakness than the people of the United Kingdom. I would suggest it is because in a very real measure our multicultured society does not carry deeply embedded in it the broad uniform respect for individual liberties and civic morality that is so characteristic of the British people in the tradition of Bentham and Mill—perhaps sometimes very crudely summed up in the phrase "sense of fair play". Weak in this tradition, we must recognize the pre-eminent role that must be played by the Senate as the independent counterpoise to the exercise of power by the executive.

As representative of regional, provincial and minority interests, the Senate plays its part, but today the House of Commons can also play that part. Indeed, provincial governments play it more effectively than any other bodies in Canada. For political reasons these considerations were played dominant to assist the bargain made at Confederation. I suggest that the evolution of our society and institutions of government have for now and for the foreseeable future rendered the Senate's function in this respect secondary.

Conversely, with the intensification of governmental activity in a modern state and the concomitant concentration of more and more power with the executive, the importance of an independent Senate as the only effective counterbalance in our parliamentary system becomes paramount.

Honourable senators, if my thesis has merit, then how do the proposals contained in the White Paper bear on it? In fact, proposal No. 38 to the effect that the term of office of a senator should be limited to a specific number of years, perhaps six, with the possibility of renewal, would effectively destroy the Senate as an independent body, and effectively destroy it in its main and primary role. As I see it, in modern Canada, the only constitutional safeguard in our party parliamentary system against unbridled exercise of executive authority is the Senate. To downgrade this role today would be a mistake of momentous tragedy. Some of the objection to such a proposal would be removed if the term of office were not subject to renewal. At least the subservience implicit in such an appointment—that is, for a term subject to renewal—would be mitigated. Then, however, I ask: How many able, competent men would accept appointment here, accept the abandonment of their private careers, especially during their most productive period in life, to serve for six years in the Senate and then start over again? I leave that for the consideration of honourable senators.

The other proposals contained in the White Paper, particularly the re-organization of the Senate to provide for more direct representation of the provincial and regional interests, and for nomination in part by provincial governments, appear to me to be based on archaic notions of the primary role of the Senate, as that role was stressed, for the reasons I refered to, at the time of Confederation.

Such proposals in themselves are not objectionable to my mind, per se; but in order to give emphasis to the secondary role, that is, as a regional representative body, it is necessary—and for very obvious political reasons—to stipulate, as the White Paper has done, that the Senate's power of rejection be curtailed. This stipulation is very artfully downplayed in the middle of the paragraph of proposal No. 40. It is obvious that a Senate consisting of a large representation of provincial appointees, subservient under six-year terms to those governments, even if they were not in a majority, could frustrate the federal legislative process beyond endurance—and because such a body would, of necessity, take on a very strong political hue, far more so than anything the Senate has ever experienced, such curbs on the legislative power of the Senate would of necessity have to be imposed.

Therefore, the price of direct provincial representation is, of necessity, curtailment of the Senate's legislative power and reduction of its role from that of an equal parliamentary institution with the House of Commons.

Therefore, I consider that these proposals would destroy the basic essential elements of this chamber. Among those elements, it would destroy the high degree of non-partisanship which prevails here now. It would destroy that quasi-judicial attitude and approach which I feel is so essential in this body. It would destroy the equality with and independence from the elected parliamentary body. We would in fact have a Senate subservient to 11 parliamentary executives—10 provincial and one federal—intensely partisan with the result that the Senate would be deprived of its primary constitutional role, namely, that of a counterpoise to parliamentary executive power.

The further suggestion in the White Paper, that the Senate, reduced as I has indicated, be then given additional powers to appoint judges, ambassadors and cultural heads, is a suggestion which I do not think worthy of comment. It seems to me like something borrowed from United States constitutional practice. At best, it would be an odious task, humiliating to anyone who may be considered for appointment to any of those offices, and a task for which this chamber, I feel, is quite unfitted.

Honourable senators, if I may, I will turn now to the Report of the Rules Committee. I should say at the outset that, having been absent from the country, I had no part in its formulation. I think honourable senators will recognize that the point of view I have been expressing this afternoon is to a considerable degree reflected in the report itself.

Paragraph 11 of the report reads:

> The era we now live in reveals a great deal of public discussion and considerable evidence of the danger of parliamentary democracy deteriorating into an authoritarian executive supported by a strong and experienced bureaucracy with Parliament itself relegated to the role of a debating society. When the growing demands, increasing complexity and almost instantaneous communications of problems presented to Government are considered, these fears appear to be not unreasonable.

Thereafter, in the report follow the three sections which have met with the most opposition in this chamber. I feel that the objection taken to those three sections is based on a misconception of the sections themselves and the meaning behind them and lack of understanding of what I consider to be the primary function of the Senate. I refer to sections 12, 13 and 14, those which deal with broadening the base of appointments to this chamber and with the matter of attendance at party caucus by senators.

I think honourable senators would allow me to acknowledge that my own appointment to this chamber was probably as partisan an appointment as has been made, and I think honourable senators will also consider that as far as toiling in the party vineyard is concerned, I have probably done so for as long and as deeply as any other person in this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Do not apologize for that.

Hon. Mr. Lang: With that acknowledgment, and notwithstanding I fully endorse the spirit behind these sections, I think that this afternoon I have developed most of my reasons for doing so, and they are summed up in the first sentence of paragraph 13 of the report, where it says:

> The experience of 100 years now indicates that there is some reason for the Senate to approach its task with full capability and independence.

If I had been writing that sentence I think I would have emphasized more strongly the importance of the word "independence".

Honourable senators, I do not feel that partisan appointments to this chamber are inconsistent with that objective, nor do I feel that attendance at party caucus is inconsistent with that objective. However, I think that every senator here will serve the public interest effectively only if he has a clear understanding of the nature and function of the Senate and if he can place its interests ahead of those of party and of the executive of Government, when it is necessary to do so.

In my opinion, that is the meaning of these paragraphs in this report. If a person cannot place his party loyalties to one side when the paramount legislative function of this chamber is inconsistent with them, then I do not think that person should be here. Such occasions will likely be very few, but they will arise; and ofttimes a person not immediately under the influence of party caucus will perceive the line of demarcation more readily.

The quasi-judicial nature of the Senate requires a degree of detachment not unlike that of a court of law. Attendance at party caucus, particularly by supporters of the Government in the Senate, militates against that sense of detachment. It is not unlike that of a judge who is going to try a case after having sat in beforehand with the plaintiff and the plaintiff's solicitors when the plain-tiff's solicitors are being briefed by the client. That is an exaggerated example, but it is in that sense that this recommendation comes into the report.

I am not one who is prone to believe that there is any magic in elections that endows the elected representatives suddenly with an omniscient and unique capacity to interpret the "will of the people."

If we bear this in mind strongly, those who wish to do so may very well find enjoyment in attending caucus—and, I suspect, probably with very little loss of judgment, if anything else.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps loss of time.

Hon. Mr. Lang: Finally, honourable senators, I would like to deal very briefly with a recommendation that I might have included in this report if charged with its drafting. It is a proposal consistent with the line of reasoning I have endeavoured to develop this afternoon.

I strongly suspect that the root of concern we so often feel here and which leads us to continual self-examination is the dichotomy between a realization of the equal and independent nature of this body made implicit at Confederation by the security of tenure afforded to us and, indeed, by the refusal at that time to permit the executive to swamp by unlimited appointments—a dichotomy between that and our roles, respectively, as supporters of the Government and of the Opposition. However, senators have in the past been able to adapt to that form of schizophrenia and maintain a balance which has been the hallmark of this institution.

However, I have also long thought that the position of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, when he was also a member of the cabinet, imposed upon the incumbent a dual role of a most onerous nature. Let me quote from the words of such a leader, the Honourable Wishart Robertson, given in this chamber in 1951 shortly after he assumed office. I am reading now from Hansard of February 12, 1951, page 53. He said:

> I can particularly recall Mr. King speaking about the growing complexity of modern government, and how difficult it was for Parliament to keep abreast of it all. He said it was a matter of regret that the Senate, which was equal in authority and responsibility with the House of Commons, and which numbered in its membership men of vast experience and wide general knowledge, could not be made more use of in the general business of the country. I returned to the Senate, and in an informal way discussed this conversation with some of my colleagues.

He goes on to say:

> I recall one friend, who is not in the Senate now, but whose judgment I depended upon a great deal, being opposed to it.

This is as to his accepting the leadership.

> He did not argue that sometime, somehow, some changes would not have to be made, but he said to me: 'Your position is that of the Government Leader in the Senate, your responsibility is to the Government, to initiate legislation and get it through, and the better you are able to accomplish that the better you will discharge your responsibility to those who appointed you to office. True, you are also leader of the Senate, but that is only incidental; your primary position is that of government leader'. He went on to say: 'You are relatively new in this position, and my advice to you is to concentrate on the business of doing what you were appointed to do and not worry too much about the Senate. It has withstood a good many attacks and suggested changes of one kind and another. My advice to you is to concentrate on carrying out the duties of government leader.' That advice was very easy to follow then, and is perhaps as easy to follow now. Primarily my position was as outlined in that statement. The government leader comes into this house without having been chosen by his colleagues. I do not know what goes on behind the scenes, but the peculiar fact is that the members of the Senate have nothing whatever to do with the choice of their leader, except to the extent that some of them may be able to influence the government of the day.

Senator Robertson was at that time introducing a motion to study the procedures of the Senate, and one of the recommendations that he himself included in his own motion was that consideration be given to substituting for the position of the Leader of the Government some new machinery that would enable Senate members to be better informed on all aspects of Government policy and which at the same time would provide the Senate with leadership of its own choosing.

Honourable senators, the Senate and the House of Commons Act recognizes that the "approved Leader of the Government" in the Senate may or may not be a member of the Cabinet and provides for payment to him in the event that he is not such a minister. This section, therefore, recognizes the various roles that such a person can play. I think that we must at all times have in this chamber a representative of the Government in the person of a cabinet minister and one charged with the responsibility of getting Government legislation passed here with the responsibility of informing and advising this house on all Government matters and all Government policies.

That man will be chosen by the Prime Minister of our country. His responsibility would be first and foremost to the Government of the day. I think also that in addition we must have another man here, a Leader of the Senate who is not a member of the Government and who is charged with the conduct of the day-to-day business of this body, and he would receive his emolument for so doing under the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act. He would be chosen by the Senate here and his primary responsibility would be first and foremost to the interests of the Senate as such.

Now, most times I know these two responsibilities can be discharged in complete constancy, but there will be other times when this will not be the case, and those are the times when one man cannot serve two masters. Upon those occasions, if we only have one leader in a dual capacity, it will be the interests of the Government that must prevail and not the interests of the Senate that will be served.

I suggest, honourable senators, that if the independence of this body is to prevail—and I think that independence is absolutely paramount to the raison d'être of our being—then such a reform is desirable and essential.

Perhaps I have dwelt too long this afternoon, particularly on the role of the Senate. But I have done so because I am satisfied that this institution, notwithstanding all the things that are said about it, is extremely, extraordinarily and admirably suited to carrying out the role for which it was designed—partisan but not too partisan; political but also judicial; a check but not a block; representative of regions but dedicated to the unity of our country.

I have been overlong, particularly because I want above all to see the independence of this body maintained. There is no place for me, and I am sure many others would feel as I do, in an emasculated, subservient constitutionally meaningless Senate.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Lang: We should remember that the events bringing the greatest credit to this chamber were events when the Senate exerted its independence in the interests of Canada from the days of the Naval Bill, to the class-and-kind legislation, to the Coyne Affair.

Hon. Mr. Aseltine: And the Crowsnest Pass Agreement.

Hon. Mr. Lang: That is right. But there are lesser events that do not catch the headlines that happen here continually, and their accumulative effect over the long run is absolutely tremendous. The Senate's role has changed and will continue to change as our Constitution evolves but, honourable senators, I leave with you finally the proposition that throughout this change the constitutional role of this body, as an independent counterpoise to the executive acting through our Parliamentary democracy, must remain inviolate and immutable.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, Senator Lang has already dealt at some length with the points which caused me to participate in this debate today. I hasten to compliment him on the masterful presentation to which we have just listened. However, I intend to approach this point from a slightly different angle, and while my observations may indicate that great minds think alike, I can assure you that there will be very little repetition.

Before going further I would like to add my voice to those who have already congratulated the Special Committee on Senate Rules and its chairman, on the excellent job they have done, as evidenced in their report which is now before us. The restructured committee system appears to be working well, spreading the work load much more uniformly among the senators and enabling the senators to make a more effective contribution.

I should like also to express my thanks to the Committee on Internal Economy for making electric typewriters available to Senate secretaries. Honourable senators know that as a matter of principle I have been advocating that Senate secretaries and Senate offices be provided with the same type of equipment and facilities as the secretaries of the other house. Otherwise, we are downgrading the Senate to the status of a second-class institution.

Senator Grosart has already suggested that the Internal Economy Committee should report periodically to the Senate. As a matter of principle I suppose every creature of the Senate should be required to report back to the parent body. I realize the Internal Economy Committee often deals with matters that affect individual senators personally, but I presume that what Senator Grosart had in mind was not a detailed report but a general report, and I see no reason why this could not be done.

A few days ago the Senate amended Bill S-26 requiring the Governor in Council to report back to Parliament for ratification of any changes made in the schedules of that bill. For the sake of consistency the Senate can hardly be less democratic in its own procedures than we require others to be.

On coming to the Senate from the other place I could not help being struck by the civilized way in which the rules are respected in this chamber as compared with the practice in the other house. I can only conclude that senators have a much greater sense of propriety. During the seventeen years I spent in the other house, I listened to countless points of order and of privilege although I never found it necessary to raise a single one myself. Many of the points of order I listened to were spurious, raised in order to get the floor by false pretences so as to put something on the record that the rules were designed to prohibit. It is that kind of a dishonest practice that brings Parliament into disrepute.

Even when genuine points of order were raised and challenged, I discovered that the great authorities, May, Bourinot and Beauchesne, very often disagreed on the point in question, and the result was that equally eminent authorities could be quoted to support both sides of the argument.

From the standpoint of expediting the business of the house, very often much more time was used for debating the point of order than would have been required to state the grievance that gave rise to it in the first place and which invariably ended up on the record anyway.

My experience has been that parliamentary rules and procedures are a combination of good manners and common sense, and are designed for people who appreciate those virtues. Rules are useful for the orderly and expeditious conduct of business, but I am personally delighted with the informality with which they are applied in this chamber. I hope this will continue. On the other hand, I think Senator Grosart's point is well taken, that if they are treated too lightly or waived too often unnecessarily, they will lose their effectiveness.

Honourable senators, what I have said so far is by way of leading up to the main reason for my intervention in this debate. Rules and procedures cannot be discussed in a vacuum; they have relevance only in the context of the functions of the institutions to which they apply. In our own case it is the Senate, and I think it is extremely important that we have a clear concept of what the real function of the Senate is or should be, and how that function will be affected if the proposals set forth in the White Paper submitted by the Government to the recent Constitutional Conference are adopted. I do not share the view of honourable senators who regard these proposals as merely a basis for discussion. I think they are much more than that. They are proposals which have emanated from a great deal of discussion already. Moreover, they are proposals on which the provinces have shown a wide measure of agreement and the federal Government a willingness to accept. They should therefore be a matter of great concern to all who are anxious lest our parliamentary democratic system be destroyed. Too many people take our present democratic institutions for granted, but I for one think the danger of losing them is very real, and the White Paper proposals increase rather than alleviate my fears.

We can assess the role of the Senate only in terms of the parliamentary system of which it is an integral part. The parliamentary system itself can be assessed only in terms of our democratic concepts. What is democracy? It is not merely elections and voting; it is the liberty of the individual and his protection by law not just against bureaucracy but against all other individuals, factions, cliques and organizations so that he can have a free choice. In short, democracy is freedom, and the whole purpose of a democratic system of government is to ensure freedom and individual liberty.

The two most common forms of the democratic system are the congressional system as in the United States of America and our parliamentary system here in Canada which is patterned after the Mother of Parliaments in Britain.

In terms of the expeditious transaction of the nation's business, neither the congressional system nor the parliamentary system is a very efficient form of government. They are not meant to be. We accept that because we value freedom more highly than we value efficiency. Since their main function is to preserve freedom, both the congressional and the parliamentary systems are composed of different parts which often impede the transaction of business, but they are necessary because these various parts are designed to act as checks and balances to each other.

Our Canadian parliamentary system is composed of the Crown, a bicameral legislative system and the judiciary. Our bicameral lawmaking system consists of an appointed body, the Senate, and an elected body, the Commons. Very often the relationships between the two houses are not as good as they should be. This is largely because members of the other house are so burdened with work that they have no time even to think about the Senate, much less to find out first hand what the Senate's role is, or to appreciate the very great amount of excellent work done in this chamber. I know that was the case with myself. There are others in the elected house who take an adverse attitude towards the Senate simply because it is an appointed body with powers equal to their own. They reason that the elected body should be superior because it represents "the will of the people."

Let us look at that claim for a moment. When does an elected person represent the so-called "will of the people"? Is it when he gets more than half the total votes cast, or is it when his votes total more than half the eligible voters? If you take the first criterion, only 119 of the 264 members now sitting in the other place received more than half the votes cast. Some received as low as 30 per cent—scarcely a sound basis for claiming to represent the will of the people.

What it amounts to is that the remaining 145 present sitting members were in effect elected, not so much by the people as by the type of electoral system used. In a sense they can be regarded as being appointed by the electoral system itself. Had a different system been used—say a proportional representation system—they would probably have been defeated.

If you take the second criterion, only 11 of the present 264 sitting members received votes totalling more than half the eligible voters. When you consider that a large number of votes are cast not so much for the individual as for the party or the party leader, the claim to represent the will of the people becomes even less valid.

There are some who would do away with the Senate as the first step towards the destruction of the parliamentary system. These are the enemies of democracy whose objective is to replace it with a totalitarian system. There are others who honestly see no need for the Senate as a second legislative chamber. These people see the provinces getting along with a unicameral system without any apparent handicaps. Provincial legislation might not finally be drafted quite as well, but if the laws are really bad, then sooner or later public opinion or difficulty of administration causes them to be changed, and they argue quite logically that the same would apply to federal legislation. These people, of course, regard the Senate merely as a lawmaking body. They overlook the role of the Senate as a guardian of their individual liberty. I believe that we ourselves are largely to blame for that. So much of our time is taken up with legislation that it is natural for us to look upon it as the Senate's main function, and so we foster that concept to the exclusion of the Senate's other role as an essential part of the democratic machinery designed to protect and safeguard our freedom. By so doing we play into the hands of the very people who want the Senate abolished.

Not for one minute would I wish to minimize the importance of the Senate's legislative function, nor the excellent work it does in drafting and in improving legislation that comes to us from the other house, but, on the other hand, it seems to me that the Senate's role in safeguarding the individual liberty is at least equally important and deserves equal emphasis. I believe the Senate has been very remiss in not exercising this function more fully. We should have interested ourselves much more actively in language rights, in the rights of Indians and of other minorities. Perhaps we should have a standing committee on fundamental rights and freedoms.

If the legislative function is, in fact, the chief reason for the Senate's existence, then I doubt very much if that by itself is sufficient to ensure the Senate's survival, because I cannot see the Canadian people getting very excited over a second law-making body.

Personally, I do not regard the legislative function as an end in itself but rather a means to an end, because without it the Senate could not perform its role as a part of the democratic machine designed to preserve individual rights and freedoms, the end for which Parliament itself was created.

As Senator Lang and other honourable senators have pointed out, the White Paper proposals would radically alter the present character of the Senate to the point where it would no longer be capable of performing this second role. When you alter the Senate you are altering the whole parliamentary system. I do not think the Canadian people realize that. The alterations outlined in the White Paper proposals would, if adopted, emasculate the Senate, destroy its independence and make it incapable of acting as a check or balance against the power of the Prime Minister or of the executive, or of the so-called establishment. The elected chamber alone is not capable of doing this. The sitting members in the other place themselves realize this. One of their chief complaints, one of their greatest frustrations, is their helplessness to cope with the power of the establishment and of the executive. They are seldom consulted when decisions are made that affect their ridings. Very often they do not even know about it until an announcement is made in the press or over the radio. Members of the other place have been struggling against this for years, but their efforts to try to exert more influence on government policy through caucus and parliamentary committees have had only limited success. They have had no success at all in checking the growth of power on the part of the executive and the establishment, because in our parliamentary system there is no way of doing it except through a powerful and independent second chamber that is prepared to exercise its powers and independence when necessary. That, in my opinion, should be the chief reason for the existence of the Senate.

Far from diminishing, the power of the Prime Minister, the power of the executive and of the establishment is actually increasing. More and more legislation is being passed conveying powers to the Governor in Council and to the establishment to enable them to legislate by regulation and to govern by regulation.

But to make matters worse, in recent years a new element has been introduced into our parliamentary system which threatens to supersede the elected bodies both federal and provincial. I refer to the Federal-Provincial Prime Ministers' Conference.

The provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada come together behind closed doors. In secret they make commitments and arrive at agreements which they take back to their respective legislative bodies and present as faits accomplis. Thus the elected chambers, both federal and provincial, are by-passed and reduced to the status of rubber stamps for the Federal-Provincial Conference. That is not too much different from the Soviet system. Where does the will of the people come in there? The more the elected chambers are by-passed the more unnecessary they become. The power of the Commons is being steadily eroded in many ways and the only way I see of getting it back is to convert wholly to the congressional system. The more I contemplate the changes which are taking place in our Canadian parliamentary system, the more I am driven to the conclusion that, as a guardian of individual liberties and freedoms, the congressional system is superior because it is less susceptible to alterations brought about by manipulation from within.

Even without those changes which are taking place, it is easy to see that a single elected chamber cannot be an adequate safeguard of freedom. There is nothing to prevent a party with a totalitarian outlook from being elected to office. There is nothing to prevent a party from developing a totalitarian philosophy after having been elected to office. And what about minority governments when splinter parties, holding the balance of power, can dictate the terms on which a government will be permitted to remain in office? A Senate incapable of safeguarding freedom, in my opinion, may as well be abolished; and the White Paper proposals, if adopted, may prove to be the first step in this direction.

With no Senate, or with a Senate emasculated, dependent and powerless, as envisaged in the White Paper, how can our rights and liberties be guaranteed? Someone may say: What about the Constitution? We hear a great deal about the Constitution, in these days. The Government has suggested a brand new shiny one, with a bill of fundamental rights enshrined in it.

I studied the written constitutions of several nations and one impressed me so much I should like to quote a small part of it. This particular Constitution has a whole chapter, Chapter X, entitled "Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens".

Honourable senators, I am quoting only excerpts, for the sake of brevity. I am using only the operative words and I am leaving out those words not necessary to convey the meaning. The relevant parts are:

> Article 123:
> Equality of rights of citizens . . . irrespective of their nationality or race . . .
> is an indefeasible law . . .
> Article 124:
> . . . Freedom of religious worship . . .
> is recognized for all citizens.
> Article 125:
> The citizens are guaranteed by law (a) freedom of speech; (b) freedom of the press; (c) freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings; and (d) freedom of street processions and demonstrations.

Honourable senators, probably you have guessed already the country to which this Constitution belongs. If not, I can tell you that it is the Constitution of the U.S.S.R.—and we all know how much that Constitution is worth in terms of individual rights and freedoms.

The Russian Constitution is worthless because there is no independent machinery to uphold it, and the same will be true of our Canadian Constitution if the Senate is abolished or emasculated. It is ironic that the document setting forth the basis of a bright new shiny Constitution should also contain proposals for rendering impotent an essential part of the machinery required to uphold that Constitution and to make it effective.

Honourable senators, the very existence of a powerful, independent Senate is in itself a deterrent to the abuse of power. Without it, our Canadian Constitution will not be worth the paper it is written on and there will be no means of checking the growing tendency towards totalitarian practices in our Government, even if the outward democratic forms are preserved.

Perhaps I am over-sensitive to the threats to our individual rights and liberties. I am not against change: I realize that change must come and that changes must take place in the Senate. But, someone has said that "Eternal Vigilance is the price of Freedom." So many countries have taken the attitude that "it cannot happen here," only to find later, to their sorrow, that it did happen, that we cannot afford to be complacent.

Honourable senators, the freedom we enjoy today is not free. It was purchased at a terrible price and it is maintained at a frightful cost—111,000 Canadians, along with millions of others, gave their lives in two world wars, and countless millions more shed their blood and gave their limbs and their health that we might be free.

When I think of that price, I feel I would not be keeping faith with them if I did not speak out against any step which would tend to make their sacrifice futile.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, debate adjourned.

OMBUDSMAN COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll that the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate to be known as the Ombudsman Committee.

Hon. Romuald Bourque: Honourable senators, my address at this time is to resume the debate on a motion that the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate to be known as the Ombudsman Committee. I intend to make my address in English, but since the preparation of my address, I discovered an article entitled "When there is an Ombudsman", which appeared in Bien-être Social Canadien, a French publication of the Canadian Welfare Council, the November-December 1968 issue. Before speaking in English, I would like to cite a few paragraphs from this French publication, which was prepared for Workshop No. 3 of the Canadian Conference for Human Rights:

[Translation]

> In the light of recent events which, in Nova Scotia, surrounded the appointment of a provincial ombudsman, a working paper, prepared by Mr. D. C. Rowat, for workshop No. 3 of the Canadian Conference for Human Rights, will certainly be of interest to readers of Bien-être social canadien.

The title of the paper is: The Ombudsman.

Here are a few excerpts.

> The ombudsman is the bridge between individual citizens and officials who perform administrative duties regarding these individuals. On the one hand, where there is an ombudsman, citizens who are victims of administrative abuses can express their grievances to an influential official who has the authority to inquire into the procedures that gave rise to the grievance, and to make recommendations to the department concerned. On the other hand, the ombudsman serves the government by indicating which administrative areas need improvement, which administrative mechanisms do not work properly in their dealings with the people. Besides, his report to the department concerned will be based on a more objective and more logical analysis than the report of the citizen who feels he has been wronged.
> Before a more careful consideration of existing institutions of the ombudsman, it is useful to find out the general characteristics of an ombudsman and some analogies between existing institutions, to obtain a more definite image of the role, the functions and the duties of an ombudsman. In general, the ombudsman is appointed by the legislature, although selection methods differ. Usually, he is independent from the government to ensure that he will be able to judge different cases objectively. This independence is the most vital point. He would not be efficient if ties of a kind could influence his inquiries or recommendations.
>
> Wherever there is an ombudsman, complaints can be made by individuals who have grievances, but sometimes the ombudsman has the authority to inquire on his own initiative. He is allowed to search through office files and correspondence, except when the communication of such information could endanger national security. In many cases, the departments and services that are open or closed to the ombudsman investigations are indicated.
> According to the different institutions, there is a variety of powers of recommendation.
>
> The need of the Ombudsman is directly related to the greater expansion and complexity of government. The need does not point to a particular weakness of the administration, but it rather arises from the fact that the government, with an expanding sphere of action, affects the life of citizens in a thousand different and increasingly complicated ways. Besides the simple errors officials are exposed to, the government machinery might not have foreseen some abnormalities susceptible to impair it, as when new and special cases upset the rules of the game. Complaints made to the Ombudsman can raise problems such as expropriation, definition of security risk, limitation of freedom, abuse of official functions, delay, indifference, unjust action, licence granting, etc.

[English]

Honourable senators, I am pleased to give my complete support to the most interesting proposal made by honourable Senator Croll, that serious consideration be given to the establishment in this country of an office similar to that operated in other countries, and in at least two Canadian provinces, an office of citizen's protector, or as it is now commonly known, an Ombudsman. I understand that the province of Quebec is also in the process of setting up the office of Ombudsman.

I would also like to pay tribute to the honourable proposer of this measure, the distinguished member of this chamber who during a long career has done so much to promote humanitarian interests and to make more effective the principles of democracy in which we all believe but which we so often fail effectively to support. Senator Croll has a deep understanding and affection for the underdog; and it is precisely for the underprivileged citizen, the man, woman or child who does not enjoy under our present system all the real advantages of our democracy, that the office of Ombudsman was first envisioned and then, by other governments, created.

As the complexities of our modern society increase and as the business of Government and law enforcement and public welfare becomes more and more entangled in nets of bureaucratic red tape, the ordinary citizen for whom it was always believed the democratic system was devised, has become, if not the forgotten man, at least a frustrated one. It is a brave Canadian today who ventures to enter the hazy maze which surrounds the day-by-day activities of Government bureaux, overtaxed law courts, expanding and increasingly impersonal big business and an ever-more complex social system.

This is not said in criticism of Canadian Government departments or the civil servants who man them; it is not a critism of the courts of law, federal, provincial or municipal, or the judges or lawyers or officials who attend them; neither it is a criticism of the management of big business or the enormous labour unions or of our social welfare organizations, either public or private.

It is simply recognition of the fact that everything has become too big, too busy and inevitably too impersonal to serve effectively the people these political, economic and social organizations were created to serve. The purpose of Government departments is not, as some people might suppose, to provide employment or increase Government prestige. It is to provide competent, humane and effective services for Canadian taxpayers. The fact that these services are not always available to those who need them most is the fault, not of the individuals concerned, but of the constant proliferation of bureaux, the growth of business "conglomerates" and the overwhelming overlapping of social agencies of all kinds.

Add to all this confusion the problem created by a growing population spread across thousands of miles, with a division into two official language groups and the added difficulty of comprehension among peoples whose mother tongues are neither French nor English.

The institution of Ombudsman, while very new in concept to most Canadians, has ancient roots. The Ombudsman is in essence a "citizens' protector" and in one form or another, not always known as Ombudsman, he exists in nine different countries. He was created in answer to the question, "How best can we inquire fully and quietly into asserted official impropriety or insensitivity," and his manner of procedure is very clearly described in an international survey conducted by Walter Gillhorn, Professor of Law at Columbia University, and published in book form by Harvard University Press.

In ancient days rulers with supreme power, going back to the time of Solomon, listened themselves to their subjects' complaints even, and in fact most often, when these complaints were directed against the king's own servants. The ruler then rendered a judgment dismissing dishonest or incompetent servants, if he considered the complaints justified. There was a certain risk involved in this procedure, however. An unsuccessful complainant might well find himself deprived of his liberty, or even his head.

Today, in our vast and infinitely complicated society, few if any private citizens, however put upon, have real access to the foot of the throne. The rights of the citizen, including his right to protest and to be heard are enshrined in masses of laws, rules, regulations, constitutional amendments and honoured traditions—but a thousand anonymous faces block his progress to the seat of power.

He need not be an advocate, but an understanding and informed listener and guide who will lead him through the corps of King's agents, advisors, judges, tax collectors, policemen, all of whom have now come to speak in the King's name. For these agents may be incompetent instead of wise, they may be ruthless instead of understanding or sympathetic, disloyal instead of dedicated, corrupt instead of upright—he is nevertheless at their mercy. A loyal subject, or an honest citizen in a democracy such as ours sometimes needs a protector not against his ruler but against his ruler's agents. In our case in Canada he needs protection even against the servants of Parliament.

Majority government, Mr. Gillhorn points out in his excellent treatise, can be just as tyrannical, just as misinformed and just as dangerous to individual rights as an absolute monarch. But it lacks one essential power; it cannot long remain a majority in the face of frequent injustices. People will turn against it and throw it out. It is consequently as much in the interest of government to see that the voters are not treated unfairly, by dishonest or incompetent officials or agents, as it is in the interest of the voter to see that his interests are protected. Government, then, as much as the individual citizen has much to gain from the appointment of an Ombudsman who can sift out serious troubles before they become critical.

An Ombudsman may in many respects be compared to the grievance handling machinery in a private enterprise. Business long ago discovered that it was wisdom to have in their organizations individuals or committees before whom employees could air grievances and from whom they could expect to receive intelligent redress. Businessmen realized that the old workman-boss relationship was no longer possible and they had to impose foremen, superintendents, managers and others between themselves and their employees. This was the first step. Later, management realized that it was not infallible, that it and its agents can make mistakes and that when such mistakes do occur it is to the benefit of the employer that a grievance be aired and that, if it is justified, a remedy be found for it.

It is against that background that we should study and make recommendations regarding the form in which we in Canada should make such citizens' protection available. In the Scandinavian countries they have had Ombudsmen for nearly two centuries, beginning in Sweden. New Zealand now has its own Ombudsman, and here in Canada we have such an official in the provinces of Alberta and New Brunswick, and now they are in the process of setting up the office of Ombudsman in the Province of Quebec.

I am sure Senator Croll will agree that the services which a true Ombudsman could and should perform for Canadian taxpayers are too numerous to be outlined here. He would agree, too, I am sure, that while we refer for purposes of discussion to an Ombudsman as if he were a single individual, what we will really need is a corps of Ombudsmen working out not only in the national capital but in all parts of Canada, perhaps in co-operation with each of the provinces.

It is easy to anticipate the objections which will be raised to such a project. This, people will say, is just the creation of more jobs, more official positions which in turn will not help but will stand in the way of the citizen seeking justice or help. Instead of going direct to the department concerned, the harassed citizen will now be compelled to make his complaint first to the Ombudsman, or his assistants, and then proceed from there, after further delays to the departments or offices he should have gone to in the first place. This is a reasonable argument and one which must be carefully considered when action towards the appointment of an Ombudsman is taken, as, I believe, it inevitably will be. Great care must be exercised to see that such does not occur.

Fortunately, we have other examples to go by, and experiences to date have shown that Ombudsmen have very successfully performed the tasks which we envisage for them. The institution is an ancient one in Scandinavia and one that those proudly democratic peoples have never abandoned. At home, in Canada, the Province of Alberta has such a position, and after a short trial period is apparently determined to continue it. The first occupant has publicly described both successes and failures and, after being confronted by personal problems of several thousand Albertans, is only the more impressed by the need for the office.

Canada on all three levels, political, legal and social, is already engaged in projects which are both idealistic and practical. We have in the world a reputation as peacemakers, as helpers of peoples of all races, colour and creeds when they are in distress. We have an international reputation for our standards of justice and our respect for law, and in the fields of social science and social welfare we are among the most enlightened nations.

In short, we give money for foreign aid, not enough some would say, but on a level of generosity higher than that of most other countries. We provide money for legal assistance for individuals charged with criminal offences who cannot afford to hire their own lawyers, even though in many cases those so helped are confirmed criminals. Privately and through numerous government agencies, we provide financial aid to the sick, the blind, the unemployed and the homeless.

We have all the facilities for the Just Society. Where we fail is in providing a clear, traffic-free bridge between the facilities that are available and the plain, ordinary everyday citizen who may find himself in need of them. There are laws on our statute books to protect every citizen against every form of legal chicanery and every kind of violence or threat of violence. There are departments and services in almost endless array sufficient to meet every individual's legitimate needs and help him over almost every emergency.

But when the emergency arises, when the citizen needs help, he is far too often lost in a bewilderment of laws and regulations. He needs a guiding hand, an experienced hand which can tell him what his rights are, what he can do about them and where and to whom he should go. And he needs to be sure that the agents or agencies he approaches are well and honestly run, capably administered and efficiently operated, and judged so by a competent, independent assessor—in short, an Ombudsman.

No citizen today can expect to be an expert on even municipal regulations. If he believes he is unjustly accused of an offence against some local regulation; if he believes he is unjustly assessed for taxes or payments of any kind; if his home is threatened by expropriation, or if his dog is illegally carted off to a pound, there are only two courses open to him: he can make the round of local offices, filling out forms or pouring out his story to unsympathetic departmental clerks' ears, or he can hire a lawyer at his own expense, not to get justice for him but to tell him what to do to get it for himself.

These are some of the kinds of problems with which an Ombudsman will deal. They are not very important problems perhaps in the terms of the national interest, but what, indeed, is the national interest but the combined interests of each of a nation's citizens, rich or poor, sick or well—yes, even good or bad?

People were not made for governments; governments were made for people. We may have lost sight of that fact as we go on erecting magnificent public buildings, hiring more and more public employees, becoming more and more involved in gigantic structures and projects, all of them very far removed from the daily life of the people who create us and whose daily activities and dollars support us. It may seem strange that today, when we talk so much about freedom and democracy and the great advantages of our way of life, the people should need an intermediary between themselves and their own creation—government. But the need is there, and it is nobody's fault; it is just the penalty we pay for our constant human desire for size.

We in this historic chamber are better informed than most Canadians about the complexities of our laws and our social agencies. Many of us have been actively engaged in public life for many years, some as law-makers in our country's various legislatures, others engaged in important undertakings in our own provinces and cities. Yet I venture to say that any one of us, faced by any number of personally important problems affecting our freedoms, our economic security or just some of our daily pleasures, would be hard pressed to decide what we should do without having the advice of someone we know and trust to guide us. We have among our associates that person to go to; he is in a sense our own personal ombudsman, although we would not think of referring to him as such.

But what about the middle-aged man living in a working community in a big Canadian city? He may have come to Canada from another country and have a poor command of either French or English. Over the years he has worked hard and saved enough money to buy a small home. Now, after his payments are almost completed, he is told that he has not bought a house at all; what he has been doing is paying rent, and he is now about to be turned out for another tenant. He is frightened and bewildered. To whom can he turn? He does not have a personal ombudsman to help him solve his problem. He does not have money to pay for a lawyer. When he does appeal to an official agency for help he can never be sure that that agency is not the cause of his catastrophe in the first place. Multiply his case by a few hundred thousand, add a few thousand illustrations of the kinds of things that can happen to any honest, decent Canadian in any walk of life who is just unable to find his way around in government, big business, social and legal circles, and you have a job ahead for an Ombudsman.

Perhaps it is the duty of every citizen to find his own way in our modern society's maze; perhaps a man should look after himself and not expect the state to look after him. But perhaps we should realize that in this modern world, much more than in the past, we must be our brother's keeper, because if we are not we will find more and more social unrest, more and more of the kind of trouble that besets us now. There are many restless people in our world today, and they are not by any means all the sons and daughters of the poor and the downtrodden. Many of them are from well-to-do, middle-class homes, homes whose families have been educated people, sometimes professional men and women, sometimes successful business executives—sometimes, let us face it, successful politicians. Their restlessness, evident in our universities and among what we term the young intellectuals, is a product of an affluent society which boasts of everything man could wish—except humanity.

We have everything money can buy. Our major concern seems to be the ability to consume everything that is spread before us. Once, a few years ago, we charged our young people with being materialistic; all they were interested in was money, the least possible work for the biggest possible return. Today money is not their main interest. They look upon success in business with a certain amount of scorn. They riot and demonstrate, demand a bigger share in shaping their own lives, turn to drugs which were unknown in our youth, and generally appear to be doing everything they can to shock their elders. This is not a disease, honourable senators, it is a symptom. It is a reflection of the one great lack in our society—a lack of the human, understanding touch. The world today is not our world. Out of it has gone, for one thing, the comfort that many people found in religion. Society has become its own god, and society is itself a vain impersonal thing.

Nobody would suggest that the appointment of an ombudsman would end the restlessness, the futility and the desperation which seem to stamp our new society. But if it served to reassure large numbers of people and to restore some of their faith, if not in a god, at least in their fellow human beings, that would be well worthwhile. The principal value of an appointed ombudsman might well be the psychological effect it would have among people. Men and women living under constant stress might be relieved to know that somebody cares, someone is willing to act on their behalf to make a living reality of the "just society."

What will it cost? No one can say. What does it cost to send aid to the starving in Africa or Asia, to help the people of India raise themselves by their own bootstraps, to redevelop a slum area in a Canadian city, or to provide legal aid to a criminal awaiting trial? All these are necessary, and the taxpayer, whether gladly or not, foots the bill. All the works of government are his; all the creations of industry or our private or government agencies in whatever field of endeavour are his. The least we can do, it seems to me, is to give him the help he sometimes requires when he is overcome by the complexity of what he, through his representatives in the board rooms and in government, has built.

The honourable Senator Croll has in his time paved the way for many enlightened acts to become part of the Statutes of Canada. His concern has always been for those who are unable for one reason or another, not necessarily economic, to look after themselves. His proposal to have an Ombudsman for Canada is a logical plank in his personal platform of enlightened liberalism.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

PESTICIDE RESIDUE COMPENSATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, February 27, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hays, for the second reading of Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a few brief remarks I should like to make on second reading of Bill C-155, which was introduced a few days ago by the honourable Senator Hays, when he very capably explained the main features of the bill.

I think it is particularly appropriate to be dealing with this bill at this time, since it follows the outstanding speech just delivered by the honourable Senator Bourque.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: The honourable senator has pointed out, in an exceedingly able manner, how necessary it is for the Parliament of this country to make certain that the ordinary citizens do not become victims of Government action over which they have no control and about which they have no appeal.

This particular measure is rectifying, in its own way, in its own field, that very thing the distinguished senator has been speaking about. This legislation provides that the Government of Canada will make compensation to agricultural producers who are required to destroy their vegetable or animal products because they are found to be contaminated. Until this time, compensation has been difficult to obtain and in many well-known instances was not obtained at all.

A few years ago, a dairy farmer in Grand Forks, British Columbia, was able to procure cull potatoes at a very low price. He fed them to his dairy cattle, and it was found that those potatoes contained DDT and thus had contaminated the farmer's milk. He had to destroy his whole production, and he was forced out of business; but, under the existing law, he did not receive compensation. This is the kind of thing which the honourable Senator Bourque had in mind, I am sure. Producers of agricultural products who may face the necessity of destroying those products because of contamination, who lose incomes because of contamination, through no fault of their own, will be compensated under this legislation.

I feel that the provisions of the act, providing for an assessor to make an appraisal, the assessor being a judge, providing also for an appeal to another assessor, if necessary, who also would be a judge, should go a long way to guarantee fair and reasonable compensation to agricultural producers.

Honourable senators, when I adjourned this debate some days ago, my main purpose at that time was to deal with the great danger which derived from the use of many pesticides in this country. Looking over this bill, and Bill C-157 which was given first reading today, I feel that the main body of my remarks are in fact related to Bill C-157 much more than to Bill C-155.

Therefore, honourable senators, with those few comments, I wish to support this legislation and to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture and the Government on taking this very important step forward.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, bill referred to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

MASS MEDIA

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Davey, that a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I wish to commend Senator Keith Davey for drawing the attention of Parliament to the vitally important subject of ownership and control of mass media in Canada and the influence exercised by such media upon Canada and Canadians.

Let me also extend my compliments to Senator Davey on his outstanding and informative address in introducing this motion.

It is my considered opinion that a Special Committee of the Senate should be constituted to consider and report upon this urgent matter. I use the word "urgent" advisedly. Although we yet have time, in this nation, to protect the public interest by preventing ownership and control of all major elements of mass public communication from falling into the hands of a very few influential people or a very few powerful conglomerate corporations—although we yet have time, that time, I suggest, is becoming limited.

In relative terms, the broadcast media have been with us for only a very short period of time, and television for a much shorter period of years than radio. And yet, already, the ownership and control situation is out of control in the United States.

Multiple ownership, cross ownership of different media—newspapers, magazines, television, radio, cablevision—by conglomerate corporations, cases of almost total ownership of all major media in a given state or region, and other undesirable situations, have been permitted to develop to such a degree in the United States that, at least for the present, the Government agencies established to protect the public interest are virtually hamstrung in their attempts to do so.

These multiple, cross and conglomerate ownership situations have advanced their control of the major means of mass communications in the United States, during the past few years, at such a rapid pace that they now exercise an influence upon legislators, through lobby and intensive public relations campaigns, which prevents legislators and responsible government agencies from reasserting the public interest in licensing of broadcast media.

There are a few exceptions to this generalization, the prime one in recent years being the intervention by the United States Justice Department which prevented the ultra-powerful International Telephone and Telegraph from acquiring ownership and control of the influential American Broadcasting Company network.

Let me call upon your patience, honourable senators, while I relate, as briefly as possible, some aspects of this now famous case.

There is little need to explain to this house the almost unbelievable national and international influence of the ITT conglomerate, nor the exceptional influence upon United States public opinion of the ABC network. But, for the record, it should be noted that ITT encompasses 433 separate boards of directors and has significant holdings in at least 40 foreign countries. It is the ninth largest industrial corporation in the world in size of work force. It is also important to remember that approximately half of its domestic income comes from U.S. government defence and space contracts.

The American Broadcasting Company, in 1966, had 399 theatres in 34 states, five VHF television stations, six AM and six FM stations—all in the top 10 broadcasting markets—and one of the three major television networks—and one of the four major radio networks in the world.

At the time of that merger application before the US-FCC (Federal Communications Commission)—the body established to protect the public interest in broadcast media ownership and licensing—the ABC had 137 primary television network affiliates which could reach 93 per cent of the then 50 million television homes in the U.S.A., and its radio network affiliates could reach 97 per cent of the then 55 million homes in the U.S.A. with radio receivers. ABC also had interests in, and affiliation with, stations in 25 other nations, known as the "Worldvision Group." The proposed merger of ITT and ABC would have placed this vast accumulation of mass media, and one of the largest purveyors of news and opinion in America, under the control of one of the largest conglomerate corporations in the world.

The FCC hearings on this application were held in 1967. Testimony then taken revealed that ITT exerted pressure upon representatives of both AP and UPI wire services and reporters of the New York Times to change their stories to favourably reflect ITT interests. A senior vice-president of ITT went so far as to spread false information in defamation of one of the members of the Federal Communications Commission then hearing the application. Despite all of this, the FCC in a 4-to-3 majority decision approved the application.

At this point the U.S. Justice Department stepped in and appealed the decision before the U.S. Court of Appeals.

In the face of this unusual determination to protect the public interest, ITT aborted the merger and thus failed to acquire ABC.

Mr. Nicholas Johnson, one of the three dissenting members of the FCC in this case commented on his reasons for opposing the merger application, in these words:

> To do an honest and impartial job of reporting the news is difficult enough for the most independent and conscientious of newsmen.
>
> ABC newsmen could not help knowing that ITT had sensitive business relations in various foreign countries and at the highest levels of our government, and that reporting of any number of industries and economic developments would touch the interests of ITT.
> The mere awareness of these interests would make it impossible for those news officials, no matter how conscientious, to report news and develop documentaries objectively, in the way that they would do if ABC remained unaffiliated with ITT. They would advance within the news organization, or be fired, or become officers of ABC—perhaps even of ITT—or not, and no newsman would be able to erase from his mind the idea that his chances of doing so might be affected by his treatment of issues on which ITT is sensitive.

Nicholas Johnson, on the basis of evidence and testimony before the FCC, made this further comment on control of media and the power influenced through them in the U.S.A.

> I fear that we have already reached the point in this country where the media, our greatest check on other accumulations of power, may themselves be beyond the reach of any other institution: the Congress, the President, or the Federal Communications Commission, not to mention governors, mayors, state legislators and city councilmen. Congressional hearings are begun and then quietly dropped. Whenever the FCC stirs fitfully, as if in wakefulness, the broadcasting industry scurries up the Hill for a congressional bludgeon.

Honourable senators, I apologize for the length of my remarks concerning this United States case, but it was my thought that we should be aware of how "the power game" is being played in that nation through control of the media. This is one of the few recent cases in which the public interest was fully protected and only then through intervention by the United States Justice Department in appealing the decision of the responsible federal agency which had failed to perform its designated public duty.

I stated at the outset of these remarks that we still have time in Canada to avoid the pitfalls of media ownership and control into which our United States counterparts have stumbled. We must use that time judiciously. The inquiry proposed by Senator Davey, if approved, should provide authentic information and facts upon which proper conclusions may be reached. Out of such a study there could come guidelines which may help to ensure that the "public trust" shared by those who own and control the mass media will be exercised in the "public interest."

Some may suggest that we are meddling in an area where we have no business, or that we may be tampering with freedom of the press. I say: Not at all. There are those in the media field whose greatest delight comes with prying into the private lives of men and women in public life.

Surely, there can be no justifiable objection to shedding public light on the mere facts of ownership and control of media in Canada. Surely the public is entitled to this information. It is my strong opinion that such a study is called for on the basis of the situation in New Brunswick alone.

Some honourable senators may recall that during the debate on the new Broadcasting Act last year I referred to what I considered to be an undesirable concentration of ownership and control of media in New Brunswick.

At that time I referred to the vast holdings and interests in the province of Mr. K. C. Irving and the scores of companies owned or controlled by him.

You were advised that the Irving interests held effective financial control of four out of five English-language daily newspapers in the province, one out of only two English-language television stations, and one out of only two privately-owned radio stations in Saint John, the largest of our cities. You were also informed that these same interests had repeatedly tried to gain control of the only other television station in the province.

I suggested that all of these represented too great a concentration of ownership and control over the principal means of mass communication in New Brunswick. And since we were then considering the new Broadcast Act, which provided for the new CRTC and effective powers to remedy such situations, I urged that the responsible authorities "should carefully consider the advisability of suggesting to the owners of CHSJ-TV and radio stations that they divest themselves of effective financial control of those stations, and that such action should be prerequisite to any favourable consideration of renewals, in due time, of broadcasting licences to those stations." I further stated my belief that the public interest demanded such action.

The following day, the Canadian Press news story of my representations was faithfully reported by the Irving newspapers and broadcasting stations.

On the next day, the Irving-owned Telegraph Journal, with by far the largest daily circulation in the province, published an editorial entitled "A disservice to News Media." The lead paragraph read as follows:

> Senator Charles McElman, whose long-time service to the Liberal Party of New Brunswick was rewarded in 1966 with an appointment to the Senate of Canada, has come forth with a broad, generalized and undocumented case against the news and broadcast media in New Brunswick.

That, honourable senators, was "just for a starter." I have not yet figured out how my "reward" for "long time service to the Liberal Party of New Brunswick" became the prime reference of the lead paragraph of the editorial—although I am grateful for the years that were given me to be of some service to my province, as well as to my party.

The editorial went on in its attempt to show how unfair I had been to the media. It concluded by saying:

> Senator McElman is performing no useful service by crying wolf in Ottawa where other politicians unfamiliar with the daily performance of the press and broadcast media in New Brunswick could attach unrealistic importance to his views.

Needless to say, that put me in my place.

Since the publisher-editor of the paper missed the point that I had endeavoured to make at that time, I may also have misled some honourable senators, as he suggested. Let me try to clear away any misunderstanding.

Not once in that editorial was the name "Irving" mentioned. Not once did that editorial refer to the scores of industrial and commercial interests of the Irving empire, and the fact that ownership and control of news and broadcast media just might, possibly, constitute a "conflict of interest"—something that editors so often attribute to persons in public life. Not once did the editor find any reason to feel uneasy that such a situation might be in conflict with the public interest. Perhaps he was so engrossed with giving due emphasis to my "reward" that those less important matters evaded his attention.

However, the ramifications of this cross, multiple, concentrated, corporate ownership and control of media in New Brunswick did not escape the attention of the newly established Canadian Radio-Television Commission.

The CRTC held public hearings in Moncton, New Brunswick, last September. From testimony taken there, and from information tabled in our Transport Committee last year, it can now be revealed that the radio-television licensee, New Brunswick Broadcasting Company Limited, is owned 99.22 per cent by New Brunswick Publishing Company Limited, which also financially controls the newspaper chain. New Brunswick Publishing, according to testimony of L. F. Daley, President of New Brunswick Broadcasting, is 100 per cent owned by Mr. K. C. Irving and his immediate family. That is a fair degree of ownership. These same Irving interests are a potent force in almost every important sector of the industrial and commercial community of New Brunswick.

In due course, following the Moncton hearings, the CRTC made known its decisions. The Irving-sponsored application to establish cablevision service to Saint John was denied. The CHSJ radio licence was renewed, tentatively, for only one year, rather than the normally longer period of years. The CHSJ-TV licence has not yet come up for renewal. No doubt it will be given close study.

I might add that, in view of the outstanding job being done throughout the country by the CRTC, with its thoroughgoing and capable staff, I no longer have any apprehension that the Irving interests could conceivably acquire the second television station in the province. In fact, because of the multiplicity of their conflicting interests, I should hope that they may yet see the wisdom of divesting themselves of control of the one they now own.

It should be of interest here to note that the CRTC is using the teeth that Parliament put into the new Broadcasting Act. Many in the industry were startled, and made to appreciate the new rules of the business, when the CRTC refused to renew the licence of an offending radio station in Nova Scotia.

Of even greater significance, the CBC is being made to realize that it is not a power unto itself. Honorable senators will recall the infamous and damaging program "Air of Death" that was televised last year by the CBC, and how they took an imperialistic attitude in ignoring the findings of an inquiry into the matter that was conducted on behalf of the Government of Ontario. I am sure that the CBC top management are not ignoring the precedent-setting significance of the inquiry into the same program that now has been ordered by the CRTC.

The interests of New Brunswickers are being well met by a further policy announcement by the CRTC, which, because of its precedent-setting quality, has drawn industry attention from throughout Canada. Through the re-scheduling of affiliation by the existing television stations and their satellites, all New Brunswickers will have channel choice between CBC and CTV programming, and CBC French-language television will become available to all areas of the province. This is a most constructive and imaginative development.

Let me turn now from broadcast media to daily newspapers. We have only one French-language daily, and the ownership and control of it is broadly based. There are five English-language dailies. Two are in Saint John and two in Moncton, and these four are all controlled by the Irving interests. The fifth, the Gleaner, is in Fredericton. I am now informed, through sources that should have authentic information, that this too has passed to the financial control of the Irving group. The deal is reported to have taken place some six months ago, but I have seen no public announcement of any change of ownership or control. Such information should become public immediately a change occurs.

The residents of a one newspaper city—in this case the capital of the province—are fully entitled to know what influence lies behind the powerful editorial and news columns of their daily newspaper. It should not be too much to ask that those who hold or control such a "public trust" trust the public.

At this point, I would refer to an editorial published in the Moncton Daily Times—one of the Irving group—on February 7 last, following Senator Davey's address on this motion. The editor states that, "He (Senator Davey) accused the industry (media) of obscuring ownership". The editor went on to say:

> Senator Davey stated, for example, that the press of New Brunswick is controlled by a single owner. Reading this, we are immediately dubious of the validity of his other remarks, be they favourable or otherwise to the mass media.

Honourable senators, the cardinal sin perpetrated by Senator Davey was that he failed to qualify his remarks by saying that L'Evangeline, the only French-language daily, is not controlled by the Irving group, although reportedly all the English-language dailies are controlled by that group. How far does one split a hair in order to make an editorial attack? The editorial in question did not, even once, mention the name "Irving", nor did it make any reference whatsoever to the many other and conflicting interests of that corporate empire. Yet Senator Davey was accused of misrepresentation.

It is of further interest to note that, while the Moncton and Fredericton dailies faithfully reported the Canadian Press story of Senator Davey's remark that "In New Brunswick the press was controlled by a single owner", the Irving home town paper, the Telegraph-Journal, saw fit to edit or change the Canadian Press story to read: "In New Brunswick much of the press was controlled by a single owner." This is quite an unusual thing but, again, a very delicate hair-splitting operation.

I should add that neither the Saint John nor Fredericton dailies considered Senator Davey's comment upon the New Brunswick media as being worthy of any editorial comment whatsoever. And that is very interesting.

Senator Davey should not feel slighted, however. There have been many situations in New Brunswick that cried out for media coverage because of involvement of public interest, but they received little or no attention from the Irving group because of the danger of involving an Irving interest other than the mass media.

One recent example of this fact relates to the serious pollution of the St. John River watershed, our largest inland waterway, which runs from our northern border with Maine and Quebec all the way down through the province to the Bay of Fundy on the extreme south. This river is international water in the upper reaches of the watershed.

Last year a food-processing firm in the State of Maine was responsible for serious and extended pollution of a tributary that flows into the main stem of the river in New Brunswick. When the offending company failed to co-operate quickly in correcting the source of pollution, a group of hardy New Brunswickers assembled a number of bulldozers, dammed the tributary and backed up the polluted waters into the State of Maine. Action was forthcoming in short order.

The Irving-owned newspapers, radio and television in Saint John covered this story, ad nauseam, for days on end and gave first-rate support to those imaginative New Brunswickers who blocked off the tributary stream. And yet, within the very confines of the City of Saint John—where the St. John River meets the Bay of Fundy, there is a pollution problem of real magnitude about which the Irving-controlled press, radio and television never raises its voice—not even in a whisper.

The pollution is the raw waste of a pulp and paper mill that is dumped daily in hundreds of thousands of gallons, directly into the river, precisely at that world-renowned wonder, the Reversing Falls.

The senior staff of the Irving-controlled media cannot help but see the physical evidence of this pollution many times weekly, or even daily. They pass it by. It whips up a deep froth on the surface of the river and falls that is wondrous to behold. And yet this serious pollution of the mouth of one of the most beautiful rivers in North America entirely escapes their editorial attention. The pulp and paper mill is owned, of course, by the Irving interests.

No doubt the editor of the Telegraph-Journal will feel that I am doing a serious disservice to the media by mentioning this strange anomaly in their treatment of pollution problems.

I must say that generally, with only one or two exceptions, I have known the managerial staff of the Irving-controlled media for years, and I hold them in warm regard. I have shared their very human experience of having to provide the necessities of life to my wife and family. I am totally aware of the "Great White Father" presence that is all-pervasive in their everyday activities.

Sixty miles upstream, at the capital of Fredericton, the mouth of the beautiful Nashwaak River, a tributary of the St. John River, is plugged with the Irving pulp drive for approximately two months of every year. Boat owners are thereby prevented from using the stream in its lower reaches. The mouth and bottom of the river are seriously polluted by the bark which gathers to a depth of many feet. As the water level lowers, the massed pulp comes to rest on the gravel bars and bottom of the river and seriously hampers or even stops the passage of Atlantic salmon to their spawning waters.

In recent years this situation has been the source of much complaint by local residents—but nothing is done. And the Irving-controlled media maintain a strange silence over the whole matter. Their concern over the public interest in pollution matters is most selective.

There are numerous similar examples of that selectivity that I could give today, but I will withhold them, hopefully, for the hearings of the proposed special committee.

Let me mention only one more aspect of this concentration of media ownership and control in New Brunswick.

Along with many others, I have been deeply concerned with the reported total control of the English-language daily newspapers by the Irving group. Some weeks ago, it occurred to me that this must constitute a monopoly situation, in which news, opinion and information would be considered as a product—and in which the existing anti-trust or anti-combines legislation would apply. I have sought competent legal advice and have been given the opinion that such is the case.

In this light, I now call upon the responsible authorities in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to undertake an investigation of the reported ownership-control of all English-language daily newspapers in New Brunswick. And if the evidence shows an improper monopoly, then I should hope that the law will be applied to remedy the situation.

Honourable senators, I apologize for having taken so much of your time in this debate. There is much more to be said and many more questions to be asked concerning ownership and control of media in all parts of Canada. I should hope to have further opportunity to pursue with you this whole broad field of inquiry if we are given that opportunity to question witnesses before the special committee proposed by Senator Davey. I will support the motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker:

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1969.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until the call of the bell at approximately 8.00 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Serré has been substituted for that of Mr. Durante on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the name of Mr. Bell has been substituted for that of Mr. Macquarrie on the list of members appointed to serve on the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament.

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 3:

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, March 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, in resuming the debate on Bill C-165 let me at the outset congratulate the honourable senator who introduced the bill, and also the honourable Senators Aseltine and Walker on their very fine speeches. Following three distinguished members of the Bar is not very easy, but it has one great advantage; it is not necessary for me to work too hard to explain the bill.

Honourable senators, I wish first of all to deal with part 1 of the bill. My first comment is that I think that the gift tax rates are too high. People who put away a little money and want to leave it to their children are going to think the Government is unfair, and if the public thinks a law is unfair, then it is a bad law. It will be interesting to ask the minister when we have him in committee what additional revenue he hopes to get out of this measure. Personally, I do not think he is going to bring in very much, and I think he will incur heavy expense in trying to catch the people who are going to try to dodge this tax.

With reference to part II, I agree with the honourable sponsor. I think the government which spends the money should raise the money. To have the federal Government raising the entire tax and then giving 75 per cent of it to the provinces is a mistake. If the federal Government were to continue taxing foreign estates and gave up taxing domestic estates, it would lose only $47 million a year. When we are planning to spend $1 billion more in this coming year than we have ever spent before, surely we could snip $47 million off something.

Honourable senators, if the Government claims that because of ways and means it needs the $47 million, I suppose there is not very much we can do about it, but I think we could do something about the 75 per cent which is paid to the provinces. Therefore, when the bill goes to committee I intend moving an amendment which would have the effect of allowing an estate to pay 25 per cent of the tax imposed by this bill directly to the federal Government, and to pay the 75 per cent to the province concerned if that province demands it.

Let us to say a man is lucky enough to die in Alberta and leaves an estate of $321,600, the tax thereon would be $100,000. Twenty-five thousand would go to the federal Government and $75,000 to the province. The province's share would be returned to the estate when the estate was settled, but if that took eight months, interest on the $75,000 would cost the estate about $4,000. Furthermore, many estates would find it a great hardship to raise the province's share, which in the case I mentioned would amount to 24 per cent of the estate's value. Does it make any sense to force the estate to go to a lot of trouble and expense when the province has stated that it intends to refund to the estate its share of the tax?

Honourable senators, I welcome the abolition of the tax as between spouses on gifts made during their lifetime or after the death of one of them. It is disappointing that to get this deferment of tax we are asked to accept a higher rate of tax on small- and medium-sized estates. On larger estates the tax is slightly reduced.

In considering the bill in committee I hope we shall have a witness before us who can give us some idea of the estate taxes and the gift taxes below the border. Also it would be helpful if we could have before us some Government official who would know thoroughly the laws of the different provinces which have succession duty and gift taxes.

To sum up, honourable senators, am I not right when I say that a man who is hard working, diligent and careful, who puts away some money and who dies leaving a comfortable estate, is a much better citizen for Canada than someone who might earn as much money but fritter it away and die leaving nothing? If that is the case, why would we make it our policy to discourage the sort of natural desire, which all good men have, to save something to leave to their children? It almost seems as though there were a deep-seated plot to tax and tax so that, finally, people in their old age would be reduced to living on some sort of a government hand-out.

Honourable senators, I wonder if we would not be more concerned with this bill if it affected us more directly. Many of our vintage have already made provision for their children. Not many of us are likely to kick over the traces and to squander our money on slow horses and fast women.

To my mind, the harm that will be done by this bill will be done to the young eager beavers who may be discouraged from doing their best by the never ceasing efforts of the Government to relieve them of a larger and larger slice of the fruits of their labour.

Hon. Lazarus Phillips: Honourable senators, in dealing with the subject matter of Bill C-165, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, we have had the advantage of hearing the brilliant analysis and incisive observations of Senator Hayden, followed by the highly critical but extremely informative reviews by Senator Aseltine and Senator Walker. We have had the further opportunity this evening of listening to some very important ancillary remarks of Senator Beaubien. I am extremely indebted to all these gentlemen, as I am sure is every honourable senator, because this house is now in a position to appraise the merits and demerits of the bill.

Before dealing with some substantive suggestions which I hope will be of some value, I should like to refer to the rather lengthy provisions of the bill. In this connection the attention of honourable senators is drawn to the bottom of page 1109 of the Debates of the Senate of March 4, 1969, where Senator Hayden is reported as saying that he was almost convinced that the motto used in the preparation of this bill was "Never use one word where six can be fitted in." I subscribe to this observation. This bill reminded me of the famous description by Disraeli of Mr. Gladstone—"A sophistical rhetorician inebriated with the exuberance of his own verbosity".

At close quarters the legal officers of the Crown vie with each other in brilliance and ability. This has been my experience. When they come to the drafting of bills, however, they seem to become affected, for some unknown reason, by an illness which I can only describe as legal pluralism. I ask these lawyers in the future to be good enough to consult both the New and the Old Testaments before they proceed to the drafting of legislation. The Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount seem to have had some influence on the history of civilization in spite of their conciseness and majestic simplicity.

The bill itself is guilty of the unpardonable offence of what is known as double taxation. This bill not only taxes your pocketbook, it also taxes your nerves. As we have an escalation in rates in respect of both gift tax and estate tax, we can proceed by way of escalation in the description of this bill by the use of such terms as "grim", "frightening", and "confiscatory".

Why am I justified in using these strong terms? From the Department of Finance itself we have a summary of the main features of the Estate Tax, and I will quote only the highly important and cogent ones.

The gross federal rates under this new act range between 15 and 50 per cent; under the old act the range was between 10 and 54 per cent. Under the new act the top rate begins to apply at taxable value of $300,000. Under the old law the top rate begins to apply at the taxable value of $2 million. Note, from $2 million down to $300,000, then we start to get the application of the top rate! Again from the Department of Finance for our guidance we learn as the main features of the gift tax that the range is between 12 and 75 per cent on the net amount of the gift after tax; under the old law the range was between 10 and 28 per cent on the net amount of the gift after tax. The top rate begins to apply at $200,000 of taxable value. Under the old law the top rate applies at 1 million.

I therefore feel, honourable senators, that I was justified in using the strong term "grim and confiscatory". I imagine that somewhere along the road the Department of Finance accepted the view that gift taxes should be put on the same level as estate taxes. The present schedules reflect the acceptance of this ill-thought out conception. The schedules make no provision for allowance for the well known principle of discount for cash. A thirty-year-old with a forty-year life expectancy is asked to pay in current cash a tax comparable to dispositions to his children that his estate would be obliged to pay forty years hence. No allowance is made for the difference between values today and values forty years hence. This is a classic example, honourable senators, to support the argument which so many of us have strongly pressed for years, that tax legislation should be the subject of intensive committee study in Parliament before we are faced with a fait accompli and a decision ex cathedra.

I appreciate that notwithstanding the attenuated powers that the custom of the Constitution, if not the law thereof, has created in so far as our views in this chamber are concerned, we should nevertheless not abdicate the right to express the opinions we entertain in the hope that sooner if not later some of these views may be reflected in the taxation system of our country. There are some who entertain the view that estate taxes should not be levied at all, at either the national or the provincial level. I refer to estate taxes first because gift taxes usually are consequential in their operation upon the character of the estate taxes.

Provincial estate taxes, in my opinion, should be a thing of the past. I do not entertain the view that federal estate taxes should be completely repealed. In my opinion, no taxpayer in Canada is endowed with that degree of superiority in terms of quality or attainments which entitle him to an excessive accumulation of wealth by way of disparity with his fellow citizens. Therefore, the point should be reached where upon demise a portion of the wealth so accumulated should be returned to the national exchequer for purposes of redistribution or rediffusion. I make this statement because in addition to brains and luck, the national resources of the country, the protection of the laws which we all enjoy, and the consumers of the country all contribute to the accumulation of wealth so that excessive residual privileges should not remain completely with individuals or with corporations which they control.

Having said the immediate foregoing, I entertain the view with profound conviction that in developing a tax structure, incentive in terms of economic activity should not be excessively impaired or entirely eliminated.

The head of the family should be particularly encouraged to accumulate a respectable amount of capital for transmission to his wife and children so as to provide for the continuance of their standard of living, for education and for dignified co-operation in the life of the body politic.

We hear much about the necessity of maintaining the family as a unit. Excessive gift taxes and estate taxes can be more corrosive and more damaging than any other factor in breaking up a family unit. For this reason, in my opinon, the taxation of the estate should not exceed in all, and purely on a national basis, the maximum rate of 25 per cent. The exemptions presently granted under the proposed legislation should be extended for the particular and specific reasons to which I will be referring before the completion of my remarks.

Honourable senators, having been somewhat critical up to this point, I should like to refer to some of the constructive aspects of this legislation. This is done by way of my attempting to be fair, objective and analytical in considering the contents of Bill C-165. With respect to the estate tax, the bequests to the spouse by way of complete exemption for outright gifts and exclusion of life interest, including annuities and pensions is all to the good. This replaces the previous $60,000 exemption if there was a surviving widow. The maximum exemptions now granted to children are as follows: a healthy child over 25 years, $10,000; a healthy child under 25 years, $35,000; an infirm child up to the age of 71, a possible maximum total of $80,000.

The previous exemptions had been limited to children under 21 years or wholly dependent because of infirmity. The amounts were, $10,000 per child under the old law where there was a surviving widow or infirm widower, and $15,000 for each orphaned child. There was no exemption for children where there was a surviving, healthy widower.

By way of summary, therefore, the exemptions to the spouse and to the children are much more liberal than they were under the old law but, of course, the offset is the higher rate of taxation dealt with in the schedules which have already been the subject of lengthy discussions by the previous honourable senators to whom I referred at the outset of my remarks.

In so far as the gift tax is concerned, there is not much I can say even by way of faint praise. Even the assistance of the amplification system which we have here will not enable honourable senators to hear from me anything by way of commendation—other than with respect to the important exemption of gifts between husband and wife.

Under the new law with respect to gifts to a spouse there is complete exemption for outright gifts and exclusive life interest. The exemptions to others have been, unfortunately, seriously and significantly reduced.

Honourable senators, this is by way of a summary of the bitter-sweet characteristics of this bill. I shall not deal with the administrative or more detailed aspects, as these were completely covered by Senator Hayden and, further, because such detailed study will be made in due course in committee. By way of example, he has dealt with the subject matter of valuations, deemed to be gifts, liability of executors and donors and donees, and the intricacies of trusts. These problems constitute the stock-in-trade of tax lawyers and the bane of the long-suffering taxpayers.

Honourable senators, I should like now to deal with what may be regarded as three constructive suggestions, in the hope that in the proper quarters they will receive due consideration, with a further expectation that these suggestions will be implemented by action in the appropriate manner.

The first is that this house and the country at large has been advised by the Minister of Finance that we should expect a White Paper which presumably will reflect the deliberations and wisdom of many competent people who have been considering the revision of our national tax structure.

It is my present view that it would have been highly desirable to postpone the introduction of this Bill C-165 or at least that it should have been restricted in scope, as I will suggest in due course. It should not have been introduced until such time as a White Paper would be available for the study of the entire tax position in our country in so far as our national finances are concerned.

I would hope that the passage of this bill, as is or as amended, should not be considered as constituting the intention of this Parliament to approve this legislation in the sense of deeming it to be part of the permanent tax structure for many years to come.

Put differently, the passage of this bill, as is or as amended, should be conditional upon either an amendment being made to the bill or the receipt of assurances from Government that the White Paper will include appropriate sections which will enable us to consider gift tax and estate tax legislation in its broadest aspects.

We do not wish to be told that because this bill may be passed, as is or as amended, it is not necessary to include in the White Paper any reference to gift taxes or estate taxes. I regard this matter of considerable importance and I ask the sponsor of this bill, who is also the chairman of the committee to which it will be referred, that an appropriate amendment should be made which would be constitutionally sound and which would attach conditions such as I have enunciated.

Alternatively, but only by way of a last resort, we should ask the Leader of the Government in this house to obtain for this house the appropriate assurances with respect to the inclusion of the subject matter in the forthcoming White Paper.

The second suggestion I now come to is the consideration of a matter which affects more particularly my beloved Province of Quebec, where I was born and raised and where I have had the privilege of practising law for well nigh half a century. I believe that the Minister of Finance and his colleagues have overlooked the special position in which we in Quebec find ourselves with regard to the subject matter of the making of gifts between husband and wife. The escalation in the rates of gift taxes is related to the change in the estate tax rates, and so in considering this problem between spouses in Quebec we must consider the estate tax changes which are made in this bill.

On January 30, 1969, the Department of Finance issued a news release which was headed, "Budget Proposals on the Estate and Gift Tax". On page 1 of this release we read:

> The Budget proposed to exempt from tax outright gifts and bequests between husband to wife and wife to husband.

And further, on page 1, we read:

> ...to offset Revenue Losses from these broader exemptions, the estate and gift taxes were to be increased.

On page 3 of this release there is a heading:

> An Explanation of the Main Estate Tax Proposals of the Budget.

Immediately thereafter we read the following:

> Widow's Exemption
> The budget's central proposal on the estate tax was to provide a full exemption for bequests left to a widow by her husband and to a widower by his wife.

Senator Hayden, at the bottom of page 1108 and at the top of page 1109 of Hansard of March 4, 1969, stated the following:

> You start off with the principle that you are going to exempt gifts in the lifetime or, in passing on, it would fall between husband and wife. That is the main theme that runs through the gift tax and estate tax amendments.

Later at the top of page 1109, in the same paragraph, he states:

> Therefore, the rates went up.

In other words, because of the exemptions granted between spouses the gift tax rates and the estate tax rates were escalated. In the process, however, nobody seems to have paid any attention so far as I can see to the law of my province, which prohibits gifts between husband and wife. And, for purposes of the record, I quote article 1265 of our Cipil Code, which reads as follows:

> After marriage, the marriage covenants contained in the contract cannot be altered, (even by the donation of usufruct, which is abolished), nor can the consorts in any other manner confer benefits inter vivos upon each other, except in conformity with the provisions of the law, under which a husband may, subject to certain conditions and restrictions, insure his life for his wife and children.

The basis of this Article was taken directly from Article 282 of the Coutume de Paris, which in turn was taken from Roman law. There are many laymen in this house, and I do not wish to bore them with a legal brief. However, I draw the attention of my legal colleagues specifically to the Commentary on the Coutume de Paris by Ferrière and, with respect to our own Article 1265 of the Civil Code, the summary of the purposes of Article 1265 are found in a book by Louis Marceau at page 129, headed as follows: "De l'Admissibilité des Contrats entre Époux".

I have before me three cases of our courts in the Province of Quebec which confirm the applicability of the provisions of Article 1265, which is firm law in our Province of Quebec sanctioned by judicial decision. I shall not burden the record with reference to these cases, but these are available to any honourable senators who are interested. I, therefore, feel, honourable senators, that having regard to the laws of Quebec and until such time as the same are changed allowing gifts between spouses, the rates of taxation envisaged by this bill should be those that were heretofore in force, or, in any event, the rates should be substantially reduced because of the inability of residents in the Province of Quebec to avail themselves of the exemption in the making of gifts between spouses.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator permit a question at this point?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): Certainly. But you will have to speak loudly, Senator, the amplification system is not working.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): The question I have to ask the honourable senator, whom I know to be an expert on the Civil Code, is this. When people are married in Quebec without a marriage contract, the provisions of the Code prohibiting gifts between husband and wife apply, but in the case of a marriage contract where there is a gift to be made by the husband or wife in the course of time, is the situation at all different?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): In the case of a gift arranged for contractually before marriage, it would be allowed, notwithstanding article 1265. But I draw your attention to the fact that when young people are getting married the amounts provided for contractually by way of gift is limited because usually the young man is starting off in business or a profession and can provide only for a reasonably modest sum. Therefore, although your point is correct in terms of the validity of the amount allowed under the marriage contract, basically it does not affect my line of reasoning.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I realize that. Perhaps the honourable senator would permit me another question on the same point. If a gift is made pursuant to the provisions of the marriage contract, the rate under the Income Tax Act would apply to that gift even though made under a contract?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): I would presume so, because the honouring of the obligation under the marriage contract would be deemed to be a gift.

Generally speaking, honourable senators, it is not desirable to have different rates applicable to residents in different provinces, but because of the dramatic escalation in rates for gift tax purposes and because of the modification or justification for such increase, having regard to the exemption of gifts between spouses, I submit that my request in this instance is justified. I, therefore, ask the Leader of the Government and the sponsor of this bill, within the framework of the law and custom of the Constitution, to see that the necessary amendments are made in committee in order to give effect to what I have been saying under this particular heading.

I now come to my last suggestion which will deal with the subject matter of a particular aspect of estate taxes. We are prone to overlook the fact that the estate tax bite is not restricted to estate taxes. Usually the husband predeceases the wife and, in addition to estate taxes, there is an immediate loss of what can be described in the family revenues as the earning power of the husband earning a salary or wage, or a professional man earning his income. The change in terms of income resulting from these facts are very serious, so that the over-all reduction in family income and the impairment on capital account is greater than the amount merely covered by the rates of estate taxation. When an estate consists entirely of liquid assets such as cash and securities the damage still remains considerable but may not be catastrophic. But where the main or specific asset of an estate consists of an operating commercial or industrial endeavour, the results could be catastrophic. We have listened in this house particularly to Senators Walker and Aseltine dealing with the subject matter of forced sale of businesses. I believe that all industrial and commercial businesses should be exempt from estate taxation, or, at worst, there should be only a flat, modest rate exacted from that portion of an estate which consists of a commercial or industrial business. In that way we could avoid the liquidation of these businesses and, as a rule, their absorption by outsiders. In the taxation laws of our country I can think of a precedent where the rates of taxation and the treatment of a tax is different when applied to an industrial or business establishment as distinguished from interest or dividend income derived from moneys or securities.

May I draw the attention of honourable senators to the Canada-United States Reciprocal Tax Convention where a distinction is drawn between the tax treatment of industrial and commercial profits resulting from operating enterprises as distinguished from that type of income which is described as rentals, royalties, interest, dividends, management charges and capital gains. This distinction is dealt with in Articles 1 and 2 of the Canada-United States Reciprocal Tax Convention—and, incidentally, in a number of other conventions we have with other countries—and I draw the attention of honourable senators and those in interest to these particular articles. It would be a boon to the citizenry of Canada if these commercial enterprises were eliminated entirely from the estate tax structure.

I must now deal with the proper claims of those engaged in farming. I am heartily in favour of the $10,000 once-in-a-lifetime gift of farm property from one parent. Indeed, with our constant and persistent companion, inflation, the amount should be increased above $10,000. In respect of estate taxes, I would assimilate the farming activity to that of a commercial and business enterprise and have it granted complete exemption or reduced rates, as I have just stated. Those engaged in the fishing industry should receive the same treatment.

We have already before us, as a result of the previous speeches and the questions put by other honourable senators, the amounts of money that are left residually in the national exchequer in the application of the laws as contemplated by Bill C-165. We truly have here an instance of a mountain trembling and a mouse coming forth, but in the process the trembling of the mountain shakes the foundations of family life and the survival of commercial, farming, fishing and industrial enterprises.

The foregoing three suggestions, honourable senators, have come to my mind in the reading and study of this bill. There are, of course, minor suggestions that I entertain, not relevant in time to the second reading, but which I hope to deal with in committee. I sincerely trust that the alleged consitutional limitations and the fact that this bill has passed the other house will not prevent this house at least giving serious thought to what I have just said. The only legislation that we should have had at this stage, pending the White Paper, is an act that would have granted exemption to spouses in respect of gift taxes and estate taxes as provided in the bill now before us.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I do not intend to detain the Senate for more than a few moments but I would like to refer to the point raised by the honourable Senator Phillips (Rigaud) about the procedure of the Government producing a White Paper some time in the late spring or early summer.

I think it is a wise move and it is going to be a great deal more salutary for the Government, and certainly for Parliament and the country, that we should be confronted by a White Paper giving a comprehensive review and the Government's position with respect to the recommendations contained in the Carter Report. These recommendations, if implemented as a package, as was suggested by the commission, would indeed put Canada's taxation system completely out of step with those of most of the major developed countries of the world. For that reason, I think we should make haste slowly.

I am delighted that we are not to be confronted with a bill which would propose legislation to Parliament arising out of the recommendations of the Carter Report because a bill, in a sense, commits the Government, even though the Government says to any committee, "Take it, look at it and study it."

Of course, in our consideration of taxation bills we in this chamber are severely circumscribed. Everyone accepts that; no one objects. We may not like the rates of taxation but, like death, taxes are with us and always will be. However, I have one concern—and I hope in this respect we will have an assurance from the leader—that when the White Paper is produced we will have an opportunity here, either in a standing or a select committee, to review the full implications, regardless of what is done in the other place. I say that because the whole theory of taxation which the Carter Commission recommended is something that every parliamentarian should have an interest in. A great deal of help can be given and a great deal of wisdom can emanate from considerations which would result from a study by a Senate Committee of the White Paper with the background of the Carter Report, even though constitutionally our fiscal power is restricted as it is.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, for Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, March 13, at 3 p.m.

LOBBYING

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

On Monday, March 10, the Canadian Press carried a story which appeared in many newspapers throughout eastern Canada. It dealt with the general subject of lobbying. Presumably, by "lobbying" is meant the efforts by friends of people in public life or in the public service to secure favours, possibly at public expense, for friends or customers of the lobbyist. It is a promotional activity.

The example given of the lobbyist, however, was one of our own colleagues, the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator John J. Connolly, P.C., a member of the Bar of Ontario and the Bar of Quebec for over thirty years. Now in the practice of his profession in Ottawa, as may be expected, he has been consulted by corporate and other clients who have problems to be solved within various departments of the federal Government. These include tax problems, customs matters, contract settlements and other matters requiring the services of lawyers. This work, of course, is not confined to lawyers who live in Ottawa; every day the planes are filled with lawyers coming to Ottawa in connection with work such as this. It is work which is performed by lawyers from all parts of Canada. With the growth of administrative tribunals and the increase of problems in relation to Government, this work becomes necessary in the interests of the business of the client. This is not lobbying. To call it such is libellous—and I have some knowledge of the law of libel.

Our colleague Senator Connolly has been a respected member of the Bars of Ontario and Quebec for a long time. He was President of the County of Carleton Law Association, and I recall him as a member of the Council of the Canadian Bar Association. He was a respected and able leader of this honourable house; as a matter of fact, he was one of the ablest since the days of Arthur Meighen—of course, I have to put that in!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Walker: And I am sure that no official in any part of the Canadian Government service would ever feel that, because the honourable gentleman happens to be a senator, when he appears before them as a lawyer with a client, he is doing any more than his professional duty requires him to do for a client.

I resent, and I know from talking with many members on both sides of this house that most senators resent, the insinuation in the article. I resent the malice, the innuendo, the insidious reflection, by which the article attempts to question or smear the reputation which Senator Connolly enjoys in this house and throughout Canada and, I might add, because of his work in the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, throughout the Commonwealth itself.

I am trying to be objective in making these remarks because, after all, I do not live in Ottawa, nor do I work or do business here except the work of the Senate. What does annoy me is the fact that Senator Connolly, a man of high ethical standards, has been singled out for this malignment and what I suggest is a vicious attack.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, needless to say it is rather distasteful to be exhibit A in a matter of this kind. I had intended to ignore the stories which appeared in the press, and to which Senator Walker has referred, in the spirit perhaps of the man who, while being ridden out of town on a rail, said: "Except for the honour of it, I might have objected."

It is heartwarming to me, and I am most grateful, that this matter has been brought to the attention of this house by a fellow-lawyer who is not only a senior counsel in Ontario but a Bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada, and who is himself a member of the Privy Council, and in particular is a member of the Opposition in this house. What he has said means a great deal to me, but I think it has wider implications. The fact is that the tentacles of government in the welfare state reach into almost every area of the national economy. You are bound to have pressure groups seeking to promote certain propositions in any democratic society. They are called "lobbyists". These are not the people Senator Walker is talking about. He objects, as I do and as I think any professional person would, to professional and business men being assimilated to lobbyists. Business firms and business men have problems pertaining to tax, customs, contracts, testing and reporting problems of all kinds. The plain fact which underlines the importance of what Senator Walker has said, is that in the Government service there are hundreds of lawyers, accountants, engineers and other professional people looking after the interests of the Government, as is proper.

When professional people from outside come here to interview such people, they do not come to seek favours; they come to try to find solutions for the problems of their clients, and at times businessmen come alone, without professional help. In my own experience, which has been lengthy, they do not go to ministers; they seek the advice of officials and argue their case before officials.

Who inspired this newspaper article I do not know; who wrote it I do not know, except that it bears the by-line of the Canadian Press. Certainly, I repudiate the implications so far as I or any professional man in Canada is concerned. I am prepared to add that I deplore the fact that the press, certainly of eastern Canada, has seen fit to make such a major issue of this and give it such wide publicity. I am quite confident that, no matter what is said here today by Senator Walker or myself in answer to these insinuations, the kind of coverage given to the original story will not be given to the answers given today.

Senator Walker has protested about unfairness to a colleague. But, if I may say so, he has done a service to people in the professional and business life throughout Canada. For my part, I can only say that I am deeply grateful to him for what he has done.

I am very proud indeed to be a member of the same profession to which he belongs.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Capital Budget of the National Capital Commission for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, pursuant to section 80(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Statutory Orders and Regulations published in the Canada Gazette, Part II, of Wednesday, March 12, 1969, pursuant to section 7 of the Regulations Act, chapter 235, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

PRIVATE BILL

THE PERTH MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lazarus Phillips for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-30, respecting The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lazarus Phillips for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-156, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Paul Martin moved that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PLANT QUARANTINE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lazarus Phillips, for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-154, to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we dispense with the reading of the amendment. I was at the meeting of the committee, and I know the amendments are fairly voluminous; also, I understand it is proposed that consideration be deferred until the next sitting.

(The text of the amendments is as follows:)

(1) Except as provided by this Act and the regulations no person shall knowingly introduce or admit into Canada, spread within Canada or convey within or from Canada any pest or any plant or other matter that is infested or likely to be infested with a pest or that constitutes a biological obstacle to the control of any pest.

(2) The Minister may order compensation to be paid in respect of any plant or other matter destroyed or prohibited or restricted from sale or any restriction of the use of any property or premises pursuant to this Act in the amounts approved by, and subject to the terms and conditions prescribed by, the regulations."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): On behalf of Senator Hayden, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lazarus Phillips for Hon. Mr. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that these amendments will be explained later by the honourable Senator Hayden, when the report is being considered. In the meantime they will appear in Hansard.

(The text of the amendments is as follows:)

1. Page 6: Strike out lines 36 to 41, both inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"12. The Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the exploration and drilling for and the production and conservation, processing and transportation of oil and gas and, in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations".

2. Page 9: Strike out lines 14 to 21, both inclusive, and substitute therefor the following:

"(b) the locating, spacing or drilling of a well within a field or pool or within part of a field or pool or the operating of any well that, having regard to sound engineering and economic principles, results or tends to result in a reduction in the quantity of oil or gas ultimately recoverable from a pool;".

"27. (1) Notwithstanding anything in this Act, where, in the opinion of the Chief Conservation Officer, the unit operation of a pool or part thereof would prevent waste, he may apply to the Committee for an order requiring the working interest owners in the pool or part thereof to enter into a unit agreement and a unit operating agreement in respect of the pool or part thereof, as the case may be.

(2) Where an application is made by the Chief Conservation Officer pursuant to subsection (1), the Committee shall hold a hearing at which all interested persons shall be afforded an opportunity to be heard.

(3) If, after the hearing mentioned in subsection (2), the Committee is of opinion that unit operation of a pool or part thereof would prevent waste, the Committee may by order require the working interest owners in the pool or part thereof to enter into a unit agreement and a unit operating agreement in respect of the pool or part thereof.

(4) If in the time specified in the order referred to in subsection (3), being not less than six months from the date of the making of the order, the working interest owners and royalty owners fail to enter into a unit agreement and a unit operating agreement approved by the Committee, all drilling and producing operations within the pool or part thereof in respect of which the order was given shall cease until such time as a unit agreement and a unit operating agreement have been approved by the committee and filed with the Chief Conservation Officer.

(5) Notwithstanding subsection (4), the Committee may permit the continued operation of the pool or part thereof after the time specified in the order referred to in subsection (3) if it is of opinion that a unit agreement and unit operating agreement are in the course of being entered into, but any such continuation of operations shall be subject to any conditions prescribed by the Committee.".

"(5) Any order made by the Committee pursuant to subsection (4), unless such order has already been dealt with by the Governor in Council pursuant to section 40, shall be subject to that section.".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud): On behalf of Senator Hayden, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet on Tuesday morning next. Senator Roebuck has spoken to me about the desirability of his committee meeting as often as possible to complete an assignment in respect of a bill which has been before this house for some time. He proposes that his committee meet on Tuesday afternoon next. In order to enable the committees to carry the extra burden on Tuesday, the Senate will not convene until that evening.

With leave, I move, seconded by Senator Langlois, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 18, at 8 p.m.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I thank the leader for that announcement.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson: Honourable senators, Bill C-165, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, has had a most unusual career in its course through the Senate so far. The honourable Senator Hayden sponsored the bill in his lucid and thorough manner, but those who heard his speech or have read it in Hansard must acknowledge that he damned it with but faint praise.

All the senators who have entered the debate—Senators Aseltine, Walker, Beaubien and, last but not least, Senator Phillips (Rigaud)—have torn this measure apart limb from limb, and the entrails of this inglorious animal are by now strewn all over the floor of this chamber.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What a mess!

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: It can be said first that the provisions of this bill begin with a carrot dangled before the public, namely, the proposition of tax-free gifting and tax-free bequests between husband and wife. As has been shown so clearly in this debate, this concession is fairly limited and of doubtful value, especially with respect to people who have sought expert advice regarding their estate problems. Moreover, as Senator Phillips (Rigaud) had so clearly shown, it is a completely ineffectual device under the laws of the Province of Quebec, which comprises approximately one-third of the people in Canada.

Secondly, I would say that the price paid by all Canadians for this device of such secondary importance is fantastically high. Not only is the price high for individual Canadians, it is very high for Canada as a nation, a nation that has been built and developed to date by individual savings, by prudence, by the collecting together of pools of capital in families, and in prudent financial institutions such as insurance and other companies whose business it is to pool the savings of the people and use them in the development of this country.

But now this measure strikes not one but several blows at the ability of Canadians to do these things. What are these blows to which I refer? There will first be a deadening of incentive to save and acquire financial independence. The cry will be, "Why should I work hard and accumulate savings? Why not live high on the hog and be merry? In the first place, the Government prevents me from sharing with my family during my lifetime. In the second place, except for rather unimportant concessions as between spouses, this bill also rings the death knell of a family business except in such exceptional circumstances as where the head of the family can outguess the grim reaper as to the point of time of his demise and have sufficent time on earth to satisfy the appetite of Bill C-165 and thereby save his business for his children.

But these things are not serious only for individuals; there is a tragic ring in all this business so far as Canada itself is concerned. What about capital formation and the need for Canadians to own at least a part of their own country? What about the effect of this bill on this aspect of nation building? Surely there is no need to expand on that here. The fact is that there is a hue and cry in many quarters demanding that the ownership of this country shall not reside entirely outside our borders, and with it the demand that everything possible within reason, good faith and business integrity be done to pass laws to facilitate such a result. This bill flies clearly in the face of greater ownership by Canadians of our own country. In fact it would appear the clear intention of the bill is not to add to the revenues of the exchequer, but it's clear intent is to destroy the ability of Canadians to gather pools of capital and thus hinder and prevent investment by Canadians in our own country.

If we are willing to listen we must recognize that the clearest ring in this bill is "destroy the wealthy; let us have in course of time a levelling of all Canadians to a common denominator of, let us say, a middle class." But let me say this, the Minister may be wrong when he thinks of all becoming a middle class. Instead of that, in 50 or 100 years from now we all may have become a poverty-stricken class and may have reached the category of hewers of wood and drawers of water, while our neighbours to the south flourish like a rose.

There is almost no end to the other criticisms of this bill that I personally would like to make, but other senators have dealt fully with the detailed provisions of the bill and there is no purpose in my now doing more than endorsing what they have said.

There are, however, two matters I would like to mention briefly. The first one—and it is a question that must be answered in committee—is: How does the impact of the percentage of tax and duty compare with those of other countries, particularly the United States? Hence, what migrations of people and capital as between our two countries may result from the operation of this bill? Also, what migrations of people and capital may result within our own country because of the estate tax remitting measures already enacted by the Province of Alberta, as well as the legislation now intended to be enacted by the Province of Saskatchewan, and a similar measure hinted at a few days ago in the Speech from the Throne of the Province of Manitoba. I shall read to you the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne of my own province which is as follows:

> My Ministers report that they joined in making representations to the Government of Canada which led to some modifications in the federal estates tax. They find, however, that there is still widespread concern over the probable effects of the tax. Under the circumstances you will be asked to consider legislation to enable my government to make adjustments to ensure better equity for estate taxpayers in Manitoba.

The other matter to which I would like to refer briefly was alluded to by Senator Phillips (Rigaud) in his speech, and also by Senator Lang in his question to Senator Hayden on page 1117 of Senate Hansard when he asked this question:

> ...Does this bill bring into the exchequer any more money than was realized under the Act as it now stands? Are we dealing with nothing more than a philosophical concept, or are we dealing with the matter of raising money for the exchequer?
> Depending upon the answer to these questions I shall regard this bill in a certain light. On the other hand, also depending upon the answers, I think it might be somewhat beyond the purview of this chamber.

Senator Hayden's reply was as follows;

> I do not have the answer but I can put one and one and one together, and very often get three out of it, and that seems to be the right answer.

The point I am making is that it would appear that this bill will not have any appreciable effect upon the exchequer of this country; that is to say, it will not affect ways and means and is therefore subject to any type of amendment or even defeat by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Martin: May I ask my honourable friend where that quotation comes from? I am sorry I just entered the chamber as he was quoting and I did not hear the source of it.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: It is from Senate Hansard and he is quoting the sponsor of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: I am quoting Senator Hayden the sponsor of the bill, but the last words were my own. I said the point I was making was that it would appear that this bill will not have any appreciable effect on the exchequer of this country; that is, it will not affect ways and means and is therefore subject to any type of amendment and even defeat at the hands of the Senate. In other words, I submit there is no constitutional problem involved in senators dealing with this bill as they see fit.

Surely the latter end, namely its amendment or defeat by the Senate, is what this bill deserves, and in my judgment it is high time the Senate should now show that its wisdom is much greater than that of the very immature Minister of Finance who now, unfortunately, is in control of that important ministry.

From time to time lately we have heard two much used phrases, namely "the just society" and "co-operative federalism". I would indeed be shocked if anybody should say to me that there is any justice involved in compelling a father who desires to make gifts to his children, to have to pay the exorbitant and escalating taxes that are provided for in this bill. Apart from the fact of mere injustice, it also appears true that in Canada we have come to the end of building family fortunes.

I have no intention of philosophizing on the importance of the building of family fortunes in any nation. I merely wish to ask this question: What would be the standard of living and wealth in the United States of America today had it not been for the efforts of the giant pioneers of that country, including, first, the railway builders, then the steel makers, such as the Carnegies, the developers of the oil industry, such as the Rockefellers, of the motor car industry, such as the Fords, the Chryslers, and the Kettingers, of the chemical industry, such as the DuPonts? And I could name myriads of other industries which have been developed by such great entrepreneural families.

Lose those, and you will lose your nation. I challenge anyone to suggest for a moment that that great country south of us would have developed as it has and created the highest standard of living, as that nation has, had it started 150 years ago with a system of—shall I say for lack of a better word—"socialism," whatever that means, rather than having that country developed by these great men, their families and descendants and others who followed them. In my judgment the United States would still be a country of poor pioneers were it not for the fact that these families had enough freedom from taxation to thrive and develop, to build huge pools of capital with which to build a nation and at the same time having by far the highest standard of living of any people on earth.

I might say the same of Canada, but I do not wish to mention names. You all know who the great families are. I also invite all honourable senators to envisage a much lower standard of living of everyone in this country if those great men, both of the past and the present, had been prevented by tax laws such as Bill C-165 from developing their empires, which have not only benefited themselves and their descendants but have also been of the most fantastic value in developing a strong Canada as well as a people whose standard of living is second only to the best in the world, namely, that of our neighbours to the south. That is how great nations are made.

I say with firm conviction that the passage of this bill will not only sound the death knell of the family farm, as was so eloquently referred to by Senator Aseltine, and the death knell of the small business, but also the end of the development of the family pools of capital which, at least in my judgment, have been and are of inestimable value in the building of our nation.

And now, what of the phrase "Co-operative Federalism"? As we all know, the federal Government retains only 25 per cent of the gross amount of all taxes levied from gifts and estate taxes under this bill. Nevertheless, from the remarks of Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan, and of other provincial government spokesmen, it is quite clear that the federal Minister of Finance has taken it upon himself, without consultation with the provinces, to enact these tremendous changes in our estate tax. Surely, by no stretch of the imagination can this be called co-operative federalism. Consequently, is it any wonder that at least three provinces have or are taking steps to alter the incidence of tax levied under this bill? Unquestionably, every other province will, in due course, be compelled to do likewise in their own self-defence.

I say with sincere conviction that this bill is an outstanding example of the various methods being adopted by the present Government to hasten the dissolution of this great country. I ask you not only to listen to me in this regard, but let me re-quote the words of Premier Thatcher of Saskatchewan, as cited at page 1128 of Hansard in Senator Aseltine's speech of March 5. Senator Aseltine said:

> Mr. Thatcher is also quoted as having said that the estate taxes have caused "an economic hemorrhage which capital-short Saskatchewan can ill afford."
> Mr. Thatcher described the new federal estates tax law as "as iniquitous and heavy-handed a piece of legislation as was ever introduced into the House of Commons".

Further down in the article Mr. Thatcher says:

> No socialist administration could have been more arbitrary.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say in regard to this measure. You have possibly perceived from these remarks that I am not in favour of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That was fairly clear!

Hon. Mr. Thorvaldson: However, I just want to repeat that this bill creates a most wonderful opportunity for the Senate to display its wisdom and the good works it can do, if it wants to, for the people of this country.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul Martin moved the second reading of Bill C-138, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to provide parliamentary authority for Canada to accept amendments to the Articles of Agreement of the International Monetary Fund which will empower that international agency to create and to allocate to its members what are called special drawing rights.

These special drawing rights provide a supplementary international reserve on which some 111 countries may draw to meet particular economic or financial situations in their own country, although in the terms of the agreement, as honourable senators will find, the purpose of creating these special drawing rights is to create a second international reserve which will enable the fund to meet particular situations.

The bill amends the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act to permit the Exchange Fund Account to receive, hold, and sell this new kind of reserve asset.

I need not tell the Senate that this is a timely and important measure. The Bretton Woods Agreement which came into being in 1944 has been amended on two occasions. It has been debated in this house. If I recall correctly, the last time it was debated was in 1965 when there was a minor amendment made to it. It was debated also in 1963. The International Monetary Fund has served Canada and its members now for 25 years and, while there have been monetary problems in the world, the relative stability provided among the trading nations in this period has more than justified the conception of the International Monetary Fund itself.

The financial difficulties in our own country, and the monetary problems in the world today, are a good indication of how essential this international collective effort in the field of monetary stability is. When we recall the difficulties that attended even the most powerful nations following the collapse of the economic conference in 1931, and how successful since the end of the Second World War this effort in the international monetary field has been, we realize that in discussing today these amendments to the agreement we are discussing an agreement of the most fundamental kind, particularly to a trading country like Canada.

The establishment of a scheme to create special drawing rights in the Fund means that nations will be able to create international monetary reserves by deliberate and joint action, and thereby ensure that the growth of international trade and payments can continue without the handicap which would be imposed by a shortage of liquidity. No country, as I hinted a moment ago, benefits more from international trade than Canada, and no country has benefited more from the opportunity to sell its goods and services to others, and buy their products in return. So, this measure is in our interest as well as in the interest of the international community.

These special drawing rights—and this is the fundamental purpose of the bill—are essentially a new kind of international reserve which can serve the same purpose as gold and reserve currencies, such as U.K. sterling and U.S. dollars, in enabling countries to balance their international accounts and maintain the international value of their own currencies. The special drawing rights, as they are called, will be created by the International Monetary Fund and allocated to the participating members in proportion to their contributions to the International Monetary Fund. Since the objective is to meet the long-run growth in the world's reserve needs—not, as I said a moment ago, within the meaning of the actual wording of the text, to meet the balance of payments needs of individual countries—decisions to create special drawing rights will be taken every five years, and the amount decided will be distributed in equal proportions annually. A provision is made, however, that the annual distributions can be adjusted if there is a considerable change in the situation.

Decisions will be taken by the Board of Governors of the Fund, on which all of its members are represented by an 85 per cent majority of the weighted votes. Canada is represented by the Governor of the Bank of Canada who, incidentally, had a lot to do with the discussions in Rio de Janeiro and later in Stockholm, which led to the agreement in the bill that is now before us. The Board of Governors will act on a proposal made by the Managing Director of the Fund with the concurrence of the executive board, which will reflect the managing director's judgment of the world's needs for reserves.

Canada would receive $35 million of special drawing rights out of every $1 billion of the new asset which is created. I would estimate on the basis of evidence given by the Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada, and on the basis of the present Gross National Product and our priority position with the bank, that our share would likely be about $350 million.

Countries will be able to use their special drawing rights to obtain from other countries the foreign currencies which they need. In our case we would expect to obtain United States dollars, since this is the currency we use in order to maintain the value of the Canadian dollar in the foreign exchange market and, thereby, to balance our books in foreign transactions. So, we would expect to use these special drawing rights in the same way as we use the gold which we hold in our exchange reserves.

Countries under the agreement may use the special drawing rights freely and unconditionally with a minimum of necessary safeguards. At the present time, if a country wants to draw on the international monetary reserves of the bank, it may do so if it gets the necessary consent, but on conditions. With regard to these special drawing rights—this secondary reserve—there are no conditions except the condition implicit in the agreement, that the members live up to the main purpose of the agreement itself.

There is, therefore, a minimum of safeguards, but they include the requirement that the special drawing rights be used only where there is a need to do so, and not simply to obtain more of another reserve asset. Countries will be expected to maintain on an average a minimum holding amounting to 30 per cent of the special drawing rights which have been allocated to them.

The International Monetary Fund will assist members in arranging for transactions wherever countries will use their special drawing rights to acquire foreign currency from other countries with a strong balance of payments and reserve position, and there is an obligation on such countries to accept special drawing rights up to the point where their holdings are three times the cumulative amount of special drawing rights which they have received for allocation.

It is this acceptance obligation that underwrites the value of the new reserve asset. I think honourable senators will see when they come to examine this agreement, I suppose in committee, the obligation put upon nations that have sufficient reserves to meet the international payments obligation of countries who wish to take advantage and cash in on their special drawing rights. These special drawing rights will not be backed by any particular asset but rather by the willingness and obligation of countries to accept them in exchange for convertible currencies. The new asset is thus a fiduciary asset like the domestic currencies of most countries.

In addition, special drawing rights will be gold value guaranteed, which means that their value will be protected against changes in the values of international currencies, and they will earn a moderate rate of interest—initially one and one half per cent—the cost of which will be assessed against members in proportion to the amounts of special drawing rights that have been allocated to them in the past.

I am sure honourable senators will have observed that this important new function of the deliberate creation of a new kind of reserve asset is to be entrusted to the International Monetary Fund, an existing and highly effective international institution with which this country has been closely associated since its inception and the success of which has been an important objective of Canadian foreign and domestic financial policy. As I indicated earlier, its origins are to be found in the Bretton Woods Conference of 1944 as part of the overall plan for post-war reconstruction. It was instituted in order to provide a framework for a more satisfactory international monetary system.

Members of the funds have agreed to avoid imposing destructive restrictions on international trade of the type which had been so common in the 1930s, and to maintain their exchange rates within one per cent of their parities, which may be changed only if the fund agrees that fundamental balance of payments difficulties require it.

This bill has nothing to do with a fixed rate of interest or a floating rate. I say this because in the examination of the evidence of the committee in the other place there was a lot of discussion as to whether there should be a margin in the floating rate, either up or down. This point has nothing to do with this bill. That phase of the evidence I regard as wholly outside the purpose of the bill, although it was fairly widely discussed in committee in the other place.

The members of the Fund have also contributed to a pool of gold and currencies which the Fund can lend to members in temporary balance of payments difficulties, thereby helping them to avoid exchange restrictions or unnecessary devaluations. These loans are not obtainable automatically. As I said, the Fund can, and does, impose conditions designed to make sure that the country will correct its payments situation and thus be able to repay the Fund within a period of five years.

The Fund has been the centrepiece of the post-war international monetary system, which has contributed to the achievement of the objective of Bretton Woods—a free and expanding world economy. World production, trade and real incomes have grown dramatically; depressions have been avoided; convertibility has been re-established and the barriers of trade have been lowered; a considerable degree of exchange rate stability has been maintained. While continued payments difficulties have been experienced by many countries, particularly many developing countries, they have received help from the Fund, both in the form of credits and as advice and technical assistance.

This historical perspective reminds us that the Fund was not established to exercise the central banking function of making permanent additions to the supply of international money, but rather to act like a commercial bank in providing short term repayable accommodation to its members. It is only, however, in the last ten years that what is called the problem of international liquidity, or a sufficient body of reserves, has become a matter of very serious concern. I remember very well when Mr. Pearson made his first visit to the President of the United States at Hyannis Port, one of the major items of discussion was this very problem. The discussion between the two heads of governments, and the discussions between other heads of governments, led to the setting up of the meeting that took place a short time ago in Rio de Janeiro. This led to the establishment of this special drawing rights conception.

It has always been accepted, of course, that international reserves would have to grow if a rising trend of international trade and payments was to be sustained. Yet the need was adequately met in an unplanned way by the supply of gold, dollars and other reserve currencies, particularly sterling and United States dollars. However, the fact is that the supply of these reserve assets has been declining. The inflow of gold from the mines to international reserves has slowed because production itself has been slowing down and because the private demand for gold for industrial and other uses has risen.

These trends have been reflected further in the emergence of the two-tier price system for gold, which was agreed on a few months ago following the threat to the French franc, the urgings for an increase in the level of the German mark, and to invasions made on the currencies of certain countries, including our own. These trends, therefore, have been avoided by this two-tier agreement. Dollars were supplied to international reserves in large quantities as a result of the payments deficits of the United States, which ended the war with such a disproportionate share of international liquidity, but by the mid-1960s it became clear that these deficits could not continue indefinitely without impairing the strength of the dollar.

It was therefore in response to these trends that the new facility for special drawing rights was evolved. It represents, in my judgment and in that of the Government, an important new stage in the development of the international monetary system and a further evolution of the role of the International Monetary Fund, which, as I said a moment ago, has been one of the most successful international organizations set up since the end of the Second World War.

In future, the Fund will operate with two separate and distinct accounts. Through the special drawing account the fund will provide the special drawing rights—a form of unconditional liquidity. Through the general account the Fund will continue to provide its short-term balance of payments assistance of a conditional nature. The amount of this conditional credit which the Fund can extend to its members may be increased from time to time by increases in members' quotas which are normally reviewed every five years.

We need not accept this agreement. No country need accept it, and in refusing to accept this agreement no country will suffer as a result in respect of its existing commitment to the bank, with respect to the existing and primary reserves.

However, the amount of the conditional credit which the Fund can extend to its members may be increased from time to time by increases in members' quotas which are normally reviewed every five years. With these two strings to its bow, the Fund will be able to provide both types of liquidity, conditional and unconditional—conditional under the old reserve arrangement and unconditional under this special drawing rights conception—both of which are needed for the effective functioning of the international monetary system.

The amendments to the articles of agreement, as set forth in Bill C-138, are primarily concerned with establishing the legal framework for this special drawing rights scheme, but they also include a number of amendments to the existing articles in order to modify the rules and practices of the existing machinery of the Fund. These changes are rather technical and many do no more than clarify or codify the practices which have evolved over the past quarter of a century, and are currently followed in the Fund's operations. Others are consequential upon the establishment of the special drawing account and the establishment of the special drawing rights scheme.

One or two of the more important of these are worth mentioning. Certain major types of decisions will in the future require an 85 per cent majority vote of the governors. The consequence of this is to remove the right within the terms of the agreement of the absolute veto of the United States.

One such decision is a general increase in quotas which has been subject to an 80 per cent majority requirement until now, which gave to that powerful country the sole and effective right of veto or power veto. This brings the Fund's practice in this matter in line with that proposed for the special drawing rights and thereby underlines the similarity of decisions to create conditional and unconditional liquidity.

Other changes affect the rate of charges and the rate of interest on general account decisions. Hereafter, countries will receive remuneration at the same rate of 1½ per cent on their creditor positions in the Fund's general account as they will receive on their excess holdings of special drawing rights.

In most years since 1963 Canada has been in a substantial creditor position in the Fund and we may expect to benefit from this amendment in the future.

I believe that this is a historic measure. It has been five years in the making. Intensive discussions have taken place in both the Fund and within the group of 10 major industrial countries of which Canada, represented by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, was a member when the meeting took place in Rio de Janeiro. I believe the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Sharp, along with the Governor, represented Canada, but at the meetings in Stockholm Canada was represented by only the Governor himself.

An outline scheme was prepared jointly at these meetings by the executive directors of the Fund, and the deputies of the group of ten, in time for the 1967 annual meeting of the Board of Governors, which instructed the executive board to formulate detailed proposals for amendments on the basis of this outline. The proposed amendments were carefully considered by the Board of Governors and they were approved by a large majority last year, and 111 member countries, including Canada, are now asked to accept the amendments so that they can come into force.

The amendments constitute a highly negotiated package, and thus are to be accepted or rejected as a whole. It will be seen in the evidence that Mr. Lawson of the Bank of Canada said that there are some features of the agreement with which he was not personally in full concurrence, but it is necessary to accept the agreement as a whole under the terms of the agreement.

Throughout these discussions and negotiations, Canadian representatives played an active part, as they did in the discussions leading up to the creation of the International Monetary Fund itself 25 years ago. For the amendments to come into effect they must be accepted by at least three-fifths of the members, that is 67 countries, holding at least 80 per cent of the total votes. As at March 10, 37 member nations, having 52.85 per cent of the votes, indicated their acceptance.

Our acceptance will add a further 3.2 per cent to the votes. Not only will this bring the scheme nearer to reality, but it will also encourage other countries to indicate their acceptance.

Special drawing rights will not solve all the problems in the international monetary system—monetary creation, I suppose, never does solve anything. Continued difficulties and concerns are presently reflecting the difficulties which countries encounter in keeping their own affairs in order and maintaining their international payments in balance. This measure can make an important contribution to the continued effective functioning to international monetary arrangements and thus to the continued growth of international trade and payments which is so much in the interest of exporting nations like Canada.

I suppose that the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is the committee to which this bill should be sent. I had thought that it might be desirable to establish the precedent of sending international agreements to the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, but this particular bill touches so much the domestic and, admittedly, international life of the country that it seems best, in the circumstances, to have it sent to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I will so move at the appropriate moment.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: I would like to ask a question. Did I understand the leader to say that 37 of 111 countries have accepted and have passed legislation accordingly?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate until Wednesday, March 19.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the honourable senator allow me to ask a question before the motion for the adjournment of the debate is put?

Hon. Mr. Willis: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Perhaps the honourable leader has the information available. As I understand it, arrangements are possible under the new agreement whereby credit would be extended to member countries and easier credit facilities provided.

As I understand it, originally member countries had to deposit with the Fund a certain amount of their own currencies. The leader may not have this figure, but if he has it might be helpful at the moment to know how much in the way of Canadian currency is on deposit with the International Monetary Fund.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I cannot give Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) the exact figure, but there is no doubt that, under the conditional reserve system, Canada and other countries have to make contributions to the Fund and to guarantee that provision was made for this in their exchange accounts. There is likewise an obligation with respect to the special drawing rights currency reserve that is created.

I was seeking to point out that, unlike under the first reserve arrangement, this secondary reserve will enable a country automatically to be the recipient, if it applies. There is an obligation on the part of the board to assign to some country, in possession of sufficient currency reserves, an allocation to the applicant country.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): As to the amount of those reserves, this one and a half per cent interest is provided?

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is right.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Willis, debate adjourned to Wednesday, March 19.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William J. Petten moved the second reading of Bill C-157, to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals.

He said: Honourable senators, this is the first occasion on which I have taken part in debate in this assembly, and I should hope that you will permit me to make a few remarks prior to my comments upon the bill itself.

I have been much impressed with the manner in which the Honourable the Speaker presides over this assembly and I wish to join with those who have preceded me in wishing him well. I would like to thank all honourable senators on both sides of this house for the kindness and courtesy shown to me as a new member.

It will be twenty years this September since my late father made his maiden speech in this house, and I feel I can best express my own feelings as I stand here by quoting from his speech. On that occasion, he said:

> I would like honourable senators to know that I realize that the privilege granted me of speaking on the floor of this house today is an honour to the province I represent rather than a tribute to any merits which I myself may possess ...Honourable senators, I am also fully aware that in this chamber I stand amongst some of the most distinguished of Canada's senior statesmen, men whose voices carry weight in the councils of the world, and whose worth has been proven on a stage of great vastness and scope.

I, too, deem it a great honour to represent my province in this chamber, and my earnest hope is that I will be able to live up to the very high standard set by the honourable members of this assembly.

During my late father's maiden speech he outlined his hopes and aspirations for his Province of Newfoundland. At some later date I would like to acquaint you with mine.

I would like to thank honourable senators for their courtesy in permitting me to make these few observations prior to my remarks on Bill C-157—the Pest Control Products Bill.

Pesticides have a great deal to do with the high standard of living enjoyed by the average Canadian today. Not only do they enable farmers to produce greater quantities of high quality food more economically, but they also make it possible for all of us to live, work, and play in considerably more comfort than did our forefathers.

The list of pests arrayed against us is formidable. There are about 2,500 different kinds of insects and related organisms that from time to time attack Canadian crops and gardens. There are some 2,000 plant diseases. There are approximately 1,000 kinds of weeds. And there are several hundred types of animal diseases and other animal pests.

It is estimated that one-third of all crops is lost to weeds, pests, and disease, despite the current use of pest control products. What would be the toll without pesticides? It is a fact that some crops, including most fruits and vegetables, could not be produced commercially without chemical help. In other crops, yields would also suffer, with many items being infected or damaged by worms, fungi and other pests.

Honourable senators, the agricultural industry is presently the largest consumer of pest control products. They are one of the several major input items to agriculture, responsible for the efficient and increasing production of wholesome food and feed products for Canada and the world. It is because of this that adequate regulation of pesticides and their use is necessary, to assure that Canadian agricultural food and feed products conform to national and international standards relative to pesticide residues.

Pesticides are filling a growing need in the management and use of Canada's forests and fresh water resources. They have played a major role in reducing the effect of spruce budworm attacks on the forest of New Brunswick and elsewhere and are now being used to control the hemlock looper that is threatening the forests of Newfoundland, so necessary to the pulp and paper industry. They also are being used to improve the game and commercial fisheries of our lakes, in the control of "weed fish"; for example, the lamprey eels in the upper Great Lakes.

Pest control products find wide application in the community; for example, fumigants kill bugs in warehouses, growth suppressants control weeds at airports and other industrial sites; pesticides control pests of all kinds in the home garden, rodenticides rid residential areas of rats and mice; pesticides keep our clothing and rugs free from fabric-chewing insects, and fungicides prevent mildew in a host of household articles.

Pesticides are opening up new recreational and work areas. Spray programs have reduced mosquito and biting-fly populations to allow us to enjoy what were previously unusable locations. Public health officials depend heavily upon pesticides to assist them in disease control and the improvement of public health. In fact, these products fill a need in virtually all areas of modern society and human activity. It is true that pesticides now play a very important part in all our lives. We certainly could not live in the manner to which we have become accustomed without them.

Pesticides have dual personalities. Like fire, they bring us untold benefits. They also can get us into trouble if they are not handled properly. Careless use of pesticides can lead to food contamination, damage to crops, domestic animals and wild life, as well as serious injury or even death to people.

Scientists are making steady progress in developing new and alternative and safer methods of controlling pests, such as improved management practices, resistant crops, and biological control. They are also striving for safer control products, but until alternate hazard-free controls are available to protect us against pests, pesticides will be needed and measures will have to be taken to reduce as far as practical any adverse effects caused by them.

Government control of these necessary but potentially harmful products is required if we are to reap the benefits they can provide, yet protect people from the consequence of misuse.

The bill now before us, in general terms, brings the Pest Control Products Act of 1939 up to date. While it is framed in the same general context, there are some significant changes and improvements. The increased use of pesticides and associated products and a greater concern over their potential for harm, as well as for good, necessitate a broader authority for regulation than in the past. This is provided in the proposed legislation by adding the authority to regulate the manufacture, handling, use and advertising of such control products. Authority is also included to regulate manufacturing establishments in regard to certain prescribed control products for export or inter-provincial movement.

The present act provides only for the regulating of the product itself as to composition, packaging and labelling. The authority to regulate manufacturing establishments could only be used for specific products prescribed by the Governor in Council. At the present time there do not appear to be any control products in use in Canada that would call for this measure. It is expected, however, that in the next few years products will be developed, such as biologics or live predator cultures, that, if not properly prepared, could release a plague on desirable plants or animals. The registration and inspection of manufacturing premises could be the best way to ensure that such products will be useful and safe. The contamination of one control product with another does happen now, and if measures short of regulations at the manufacturing level fail to keep the incidence low, then authority could be used to correct the situation. Serious residue and other problems can be caused by such contamination.

The authority for export control is expected to be necessary at some time in the future in order to meet import requirements of other countries calling for certification by the exporting country. Such is now the case with exports of live plant materials and animals.

In addition to true pesticides, the new legislation also applies to other control products and products to be used along with or as a supplement to pesticides and control products. The present act does provide some protection for the public against deception in merchandising pesticides but only indirectly. This bill will permit more direct control over advertising and some aspects of labelling that would be difficult to regulate at present. For example, numbers used in the name of a product could be misleading as to the strength of the product. Advertising could seriously misrepresent a product as to usefulness and safety. A package could be so constructed as to cause accidents in emptying or to leak its contents. The new legislation retains the authority of the present act to regulate products through registration, standards and labelling, but adds authority over packaging.

In my view, this new legislation will provide for a more effective service to the agricultural industry and other users of control products and a greatly improved means of protecting the public interest, while at the same time avoiding an unreasonable regulatory burden on the pesticide industry.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your attention and courtesy during this, my first address to this house. If this bill should receive your approval and be given second reading, it is my intention to propose that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I am sure I express the sentiments of all members when I say to honourable Senator Petten that he has made a most excellent speech as his maiden effort in this chamber. With the standard that he has set for himself and for all of us I am sure that we shall look forward to many more excellent interventions by the honourable senator.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I warmly congratulate him on his fine effort.

Honourable senators, I would not be speaking at this particular stage of this debate, if an honourable senator in the Official Opposition had been ready to make a speech without also moving the adjournment of the debate. I may be away myself next week, and therefore I would like to participate in this debate at this time.

It is a most important bill; it is a most important step forward. It is presented to Parliament by the Government because there is need, great need, for regulation of pesticides and their use. As the honourable senator has said, pesticides have been of value to agriculture and to humanity but, as he also said, pesticides have a dual personality and, while they may be very useful if properly used, they may be very detrimental if improperly used. Moreover, if certain pesticides continue to be used they may constitute an exceedingly grave threat to animal life, bird life and even to human life itself.

One has to say that the Government of Canada, the Department of Agriculture and the Food and Drug organization, are active in the field of endeavouring to protect Canadians and our environment against the improper use of pesticides. However, I think it is reasonable to ask ourselves whether or not additional measures are necessary because of the grave threat of the pesticides if they are misused. Since these are, of course, a part of the general problem of pollution in Canada and in the world, they enter the picture in that respect as well.

I have endeavoured to get whatever information I could on this subject over the last number of weeks. I understand that the Food and Drug Directorate makes a number of food tests across the country, monitoring, as they call it, to see to what extent contamination in fact does take place. They have been testing some 3,000 samples per year of foods to see whether they are contaminated, and they have found contamination of a dangerous level ranging anywhere from 4 per cent to 6 per cent. It would seem to me as a layman that conducting this number of tests is not good enough. It amounts to some 10 per day, and if you think of the size of Canada you can understand that very few tests are made in any given locality in a given year, and in many localities none at all. I think there is room for expansion of this kind of work. There is room also for a more cautious approach to this whole question than has heretofore been the case.

There are many eminent scientists who feel that some of these particular pesticides are not only dangerous but, in fact, should be outlawed. There are a number of quotations I wish to refer to. The first is by Dr. C. W. Wurster, a molecular ecologist from the State University of New York, who is attributed as saying that DDT threatens fish, birds and other wildlife with extinction, that it is impossible to eradicate, that its toxic influence lasts for decades, and that more of it is being pumped each day into the air we breathe and the water we drink. It is a long article and I shall just quote from it one more sentence.

> But it is impossible to use DDT safely. It is uncontrollable. The only answer is to outlaw it.

Another article appeared in the Citizen of July 12th under the heading "Warning given on 'bug killers'."

> A Department of Agriculture horiculturalist has warned against the continued misuse of almost every home garden bug control compound, most of which contain some DDT.

He criticized home gardeners who constantly use these chemicals without regard to the instructions on their labels.

"A lot of these people really think they're good gardeners. They are not good gardeners and they're not even good citizens."

A scientist in Ottawa, Dr. Quentin N. LaHam, is doing research work at the University of Ottawa, and in an article in the Ottawa Citizen of March 2, 1968, I find the following:

An Ottawa scientist, while producing malformed chicks to help find out what causes deformed babies, has grown fearful of how future generations will be harmed by insecticides.

"There are some on the market," said Dr. LaHam, "that are so bloody dangerous we don't even use them in a laboratory."

There is no doubt that birds, domestic and wild animals can sicken and die from accumulated DDT or other insect and weed killers.

There are scientists who believe from their researches that DDT in fact is a cause of cancer. And now our own Food and Drug Organization has done a great deal of work during the last few years into the possible effects of cigarette smoking on lung cancer, and we have all become startled by the kind of statistics and the kind of information that is being produced. I think we all agree that on the basis of the evidence presented to us, cigarette smoking is a dangerous thing and that the government and the public are right in bringing this information to the fore so that people may be able to act accordingly and reduce the incidence of cigarette smoking and the incidence of cancer. I think it follows that if any substance is causing cancer or may cause cancer, then it is something to which our legislators should direct their attention.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: But you would not call cigarette smoking a pesticide?

Hon. Mr. Argue: No, I would not, although I am not sure that nicotine might not be a pesticide in certain circumstances.

I now refer to an article in the Toronto Telegram of January 27, 1969, which is headed "Pesticides Linked with Cancers in Cattle". It goes on to say:

German scientists have discovered a link between cancerous tissues in cattle and chemicals used in pesticides, the annual meeting of the Ontario Veterinary Association was told yesterday.

The discovery was made in preliminary studies involving the exposure of cattle to chlorinated hydro carbons, found in DDT, a common pesticide.

Another statement along the same lines appears in the publication Good Farming of September, 1968. It is as follows:

Dr. John Higginson, director of the International Agency for Cancer Research, announced a few weeks ago that the countries of Western Europe and the Soviet Union have joined forces to conduct elaborate experiments on DDT following preliminary evidence that the chemical caused cancer in laboratory mice.

With this kind of evidence before us, I think the authorities should be considering the outlawing of DDT, particularly when it is being stated by authorities that there are alternative pesticides that can be used to do the same job without the very sad and possible disastrous effects.

In my view the question of DDT pesticides is just part of the question of pollution of our environment. There are more and more people taking an interest in this. I came across an editorial in the Regina Leader Post of March 8 which sets out the dangers of DDT and makes among others three very important points. It is pointed out that in the State of Arizona the Pesticide Control Board has banned the use of DDT in commercial agriculture for one year because of fears of excessive residues in livestock and food crops. It says:

In Pennsylvania, a state Senate investigating committee has recommended, after a seven-month study, that "hard pesticides" like DDT should be banned in the state.

What may be a landmark challenge to DDT and another pesticide, dieldrin, has been launched in Wisconsin. There, a Long Island-based conservation group, the Environmental Defense Fund, is pitting all the scientific evidence it can muster against the equally persuasive arguments the agricultural chemical industry is expected to present.

Canada is certainly aware of the pollution problem of which pesticides form a very important part, so much so that a Member of Parliament, Robert Kaplan, spoke before the United Nations in December on this very grave problem. He made some statements which amounted to an important contribution. In one part of his speech he said;

> If you fall from a boat in Lake Erie you are advised to have a tetanus injection.

The article from which I am reading goes on to say:

> So bad was the pollution of the lake that one proposal is that it be drained entirely.
>
> Water pollution was not the only concern of Canada.
> There is also contamination of the air from such things as industry and auto exhaust, coastal waters from shipping and urban waste disposal and "poisoning of the soil and crops through uncontrolled use of chemicals and the effects which such chemicals have on the balance of nature—"

I suggest that with this kind of evidence—and despite what is being done and the concern already shown for this problem by the federal, provincial, and municipal governments, and many organizations all across the country—it is time the Government of Canada took a real lead in this question. I suggest they set up a body to gather the best possible scientific information on this whole question of pollution. This body should consider this evidence and come forward with recommendations that would be of assistance to the Government of Canada and the people of this nation.

I think this is a question of such far-reaching urgency that a royal commission should be established to look at the whole question of pollution—pollution of our streams, pollution of our atmosphere, pollution by industry and pollution by individuals all across this country. I think it is urgent; I think it is important.

I could have referred to other statements made by eminent scientists, statements far more hair-raising than the ones I have quoted, some of them to the effect that human life itself may not be able to exist on earth for more than 60 years if the trend towards pollution of the atmosphere and the waters of the world is not arrested. I would think that such a royal commission would receive the co-operation of all governments and all bodies in this country that are concerned.

As I say, it is a widespread problem. In Alberta in recent weeks there have been reports of cattle dying because of industrial pollution. The Alberta Farmers' Union have just made a presentation to the Government of Alberta pointing out the dangers from pollution generally and the need for action.

I have had some personal experience with chemicals, treating grain on farms in western Canada. There is one particular seed treatment for smut in which you use chemicals that have a mercury content, and mercury is certainly a very dangerous and highly poisonous substance. There are hundreds of farmers who poison themselves year after year through using mercuric compounds. I have read in many publications about the value of mercury treatment for the control of smut. I am sure that the honourable Senator Pearson has an opinion on this that may be more accurate and more up-to-date than mine, but from the body of evidence I have seen the scientists themselves are not certain that the mercuric dust treatment of seed grain does in fact materially control smut infestation. I would say that when the scientists themselves cannot make up their minds, then there should be some kind of balance provided to the large amount of advertising and the extravagant claims that are made by the industry for the use of mercuric materials for the control of smut in seed grain.

Honourable senators, I have not made this statement to detract in any way from the importance and value of the legislation that is now before us, but merely to point out, as Robert Kaplan said at the United Nations, that this whole question of pollution is a very urgent one. I would ask that the Government of this country consider establishing a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of the use of these materials, the question of whether DDT, in fact, is causing cancer. They may find it is a far worse offender than cigarette smoking, because when cigarette smoking was first accused of being a cause of cancer it was pooh-poohed by everyone. I am sure there are enough scientists who feel this question is urgent, and on all counts the Government would be fully justified in taking the steps I have suggested.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I would like to draw to the attention of the chamber what appears to be an omission in this act.

It will be recalled that when we discussed Bill S-26, which was a bill known as the Hazardous Products bill, the bill's title being, "An Act to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products," we found that there was in that act provision for a Review Board. The purpose of that board was to give a manufacturer whose product was prescribed by regulation an opportunity to appeal the action taken by Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is section 5.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Section 9, I think it was.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, section 5 of this bill.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Section 9 of Bill S-26 reads:

> Where a product or substance is added to Part I or Part II of the Schedule by order of the Governor in Council, any manufacturer or distributor of that product or substance or any person having that product or substance in his possession for sale may, within sixty days from the date of the making of the order, request the Minister that the order be referred to a Hazardous Products Board of Review.

It would seem to me this is a similar case. In Bill S-26 we were dealing with hazardous products, and here we are dealing with another hazardous product referred to in this bill as the "control product"—that is, a product that comes under the control of and regulation by Order in Council.

I point out that in this act the control products are not named; they are left entirely to prescription by Order in Council. I would suggest that if it makes sense in the one bill, the hazardous products bill, to have a board of review, then it would certainly make sense to have a board of review here.

In effect, I am saying that I am again objecting to the extension of the powers of Parliament to those responsible for making regulations by Order in Council. I have said before, and I repeat, that I know there are occasions when the power to make these regulations by Order in Council is necessary, but I am one who believes that that necessity should be subject, as far as possible, to some kind of check; and in the absence at the moment of any mechanism for a parliamentary check of regulations, I would suggest that this bill would be greatly improved if a section similar to section 9 of Bill S-26 were added to provide for a board of review.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Argue a question? In the first instance, let me say that I thoroughly enjoyed and benefited from his vigorous speech and the work he has evidently done in preparing the material he has laid before us on a most important subject.

He spoke about DDT and said that there were several—I think he used that word—alternatives to DDT which might be used and which were not dangerous. Could he give us the names, or some indication of what those alternatives are?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I do not have in my notes the names of such alternatives. I am not sure I have seen any names, but I have seen statements made by scientists in some of the material to which I have referred, wherein they have said that there are alternatives to DDT, and that therefore DDT is not necessary. I would be very happy to do further research to see if I can come up with generic names of the substances referred to.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I too thought the contribution made by Senator Argue was a valuable one. I rise now to answer a suggestion that he made, but in doing so may I say that it seems to me this debate normally would not have taken place after such an able introduction as Senator Petten's; possibly it would have gone to committee. However, as I have said before, it does strike me that there is an advantage in having a debate in the chamber before some of these bills go to committee. I think the intervention of Senator Argue proves the point, as does the intervention now of Senator Grosart. Certainly the suggestion he made is one that we will want to consider in the light of the successful amendment made to another bill as the result of the initiative taken, I think, by Senator Leonard.

I want to say to Senator Petten that I am very grateful for his presentation of the bill. He mentioned his father, who was a good friend of mine. He may be sure that we all regard him as a worthy son of a worthy member of this house.

Senator Argue called upon the Government to establish a royal commission to inquire into the whole question of pollution. There is no doubt that in the country there is great concern about pollution of our provincial and international waters. The late Senator Lambert was greatly interested in this problem, and he spoke often on the pollution of the nearby provincial waters.

I would simply indicate that I doubt very much that a royal commission is the proper means of dealing with this problem. A great deal is known of the extent of pollution in our international and domestic waters. It is not so much a question of knowing more as it is of finding ways of providing the remedies, and this is a costly undertaking.

But, studies are being made of pollution. The International Joint Commission, for instance, has been engaged for a number of years in a study of pollution of the Great Lakes, and it has conducted studies on air pollution in certain cities on the border particularly to indicate the extent of the problem of pollution on land, as well as in the air and in the water.

Under our Constitution, it is the International Joint Commission that makes the study, and it then brings its conclusions to the attention of the governments of both the United States and Canada. The Government of Canada in turn brings those reports to the attention of the provincial governments, in which rest the authority in respect of domestic waters, for action.

What I am seeking to indicate by these comments is that I doubt that a royal commission would yield much more knowledge. I doubt that that is the way to make some progress in the matter. Progress is being made, although certainly not as much as I, as a former Minister of National Health and Welfare, would like to see. However, I recognize the limitations.

Senator Argue said that he would not be here next week. That is most disappointing news to me, because I had hoped he would go before this committee and extend to it the benefit not only of his oratory but his great knowledge of this problem.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 18, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 18, 1969

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HON. JOHN BRACKEN, P.C.

FORMER NATIONAL LEADER OF THE PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY—TRIBUTES

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, may I have your consent to say a few words about the Honourable John Bracken who passed away today.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Honourable senators, the Honourable John Bracken, whom I knew for many years, died this morning at the age of 85. He was born on a farm in Leeds County, Ontario, and after receiving his primary education there he attended the Ontario Agricultural College, which is now known as the University of Guelph, where he obtained his degree. He was named special student of the year and took a very active part in athletics.

He went to western Canada and became president of one of the agricultural universities there. In 1922 he was summoned by a new political party in the west to be its leader, and eventually he became Premier of the Province of Manitoba. He was Premier of that province from August 8, 1922, until January 8, 1943, having in the previous month been elected leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. He retained that post until 1948, when he resigned. Since that time he has lived with his wife on a farm in Manotick, Ontario, some 15 miles from Ottawa. He was a great farmer, very interested in horticulture and agriculture, and a fine breeder of horses and cattle. I was associated with him in Ontario for six years; wherever he went I went in that province. In my opinion he was one of God's gentlemen and a great Canadian.

I pay tribute to his charming wife, who added so much to his leadership of the party. I extend my sincere sympathy to her and to the family, most of whom reside in Winnipeg.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to a man who lived to be 85 years of age, who throughout his lifetime was interested in Canada and was a great Canadian himself.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Willis has spoken not only for his party, but for all of us in the Senate. However, I should like on behalf of those who sit on this side of the chamber to join with him in an expression of regret on the passing today of a distinguished Canadian, a former leader of the Opposition in the other place, the Honourable John Bracken, and who for 20 years was Premier of the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. Bracken served Canada with distinction and great honour. I had the pleasure in September 1946 of serving with him on the Canadian delegation of the United Nations, and as well in the House of Commons. To his widow and family go our sincere sympathy and the gratitude of the people of Canada who will long remember his services to this country.

HON. JAMES DUGGAN

RETURN TO CHAMBER AFTER ILLNESS

Hon. Paul Martin: I wish to take this opportunity to extend a warm welcome to Senator Duggan on his return to this house. We sincerely hope he has now completely recovered from his very serious accident. I know he will warm up our proceedings.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Hedard Robichaud, for Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendments:

1. Page 15: Strike out lines 17 to 41, both inclusive.

2. Page 17: Strike out lines 17 to 21, both inclusive, and substitute therefor:

"(a) providing for the licensing of persons acting as members of the crew or employed in connection with the maintenance and repair of air cushion vehicles used in navigation, and for the suspension and revocation of such licences;"

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Robichaud moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

THE PERTH MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY—THIRD READING

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the third reading of Bill S-30, respecting The Perth Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Mary E. Kinnear moved the third reading of Bill C-156, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Petten for the second reading of Bill C-157, to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, may I yield to Senator Pearson.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Arthur M. Pearson: Honourable senators, I must say at the outset that I am not enamoured of Bill C-157, an act to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals. The most familiar of these chemicals are DDT, 2,4-D, warfarin and the detergents.

Honourable senators, this bill by and large is good in that it is aimed at protecting the public as much as possible from rather dangerous chemicals.

I have taken a clipping from the Free Press Weekly of March 15, 1969, written by Dr. C. S. Cooper, Manager of Technical Services for Cyanamid of Canada, Limited. He goes into considerable detail in his article on how to protect oneself and the public while using or after having finished using these products. I do not intend to read the article; I merely mention it to indicate that the chemical industry is concerned about the need to be careful with these chemicals because they are considered dangerous.

I also have a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of March 14, in which Dr. D. A. Chant is reputed to have said that some day the chemical insecticide DDT could severely reduce North America's oxygen supply because it is being washed into the oceans and is killing small green organisms that replenish this continent's day-to-day oxygen supply. Apparently this is what Dr. Chant told a Conservation Council of Ontario conference. Dr. Chant is Chairman of the University of Toronto's zoology department.

For these reasons, I certainly agree with the intent of this bill, which updates the former act known as the Pest Control Products Act of 1939. Certainly, there is need for this new bill because of the tremendous advances made in the chemical industry.

Having said that, honourable senators, I must add that there are some points I do not agree with and which I feel need some changes. These same points have been strongly criticized by the chemical industry. I agree with the industry.

The points in the bill itself are clause 4(2), clause 5(d) and (k), clause 9(2)(c), and clause 10(2) and (3). I agree that these clauses, which I shall mention later and to which I have just drawn your attention, are necessary in this bill so as to put teeth into the enforcing of a very necessary precaution in the handling of dangerous products. But, honourable senators, why is no appeal allowed from decisions of the minister in these particular items? Clause 4(2) says:

> No person shall export out of Canada, or send or convey from one province to another any prescribed control product unless such product was manufactured in an establishment that
> (a) complied with prescribed conditions; and
> (b) was registered and operated as prescribed.

That is to say, unless the product was manufactured in an establishment that complied with certain regulations. In other words, an inspector has control of the conditions of work and operations in the plant and if he is not satisfied he can close down the plant until the owner has complied with his wishes. There is no appeal from this situation.

As far as paragraph 5 (d) regarding registration is concerned, I find it unusual that it should be necessary to register a plant for the manufacture of products. With the registration of the products I agree, but why should the Governor in Council require a manufacturing plant to be registered? The matter of registration apparently hinges on the judgment of one man, the inspector. If he is not satisfied with the layout of the plant he shall not allow registration. There seems to be no appeal against his decision. The inspector may and probably will be correct in most cases, but at least the operator of the plant who has invested a great deal of money should have a right to appeal the inspector's judgment.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does not an appeal lie to the minister under those circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes, but the inspector is the man who makes the decision, at the plant, and then his report goes to the minister.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: But there would be an appeal to the minister.

Hon. Mr. Pearson: Yes, to the minister, but not to a civil court.

Paragraph (k) of clause 5 provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations, > respecting the packaging, labelling and advertising of control products and packages thereof . . .

Is the Governor in Council and, through him, the inspector to be an expert on modern advertising? Will he be required to tell the experienced businessman or the advertising expert how to do his specialty job and, if he does not agree, close down the plant, with no provision for appeal except to the minister?

The other provision I do not agree with is clause 9 (2) (c), which reads:

> (2) Any control product seized and detained pursuant to subsection (1) shall not be detained after . . .
> (c) the expiration of six months from the day of seizure, or such longer period as may be prescribed with respect to any control product.

My point is, why should it be necessary to hold a control product for six months or more before a decision one way or the other is made by the minister? The seasonal period during which a control product is saleable and/or usable would have passed and a merchant would stand to lose fairly heavily, possibly through no fault of his or of the manufacturer. Again, there is no further appeal than to the minister.

Section 21 of the act of 1939, known as the Pest Control Products Act, contained this provision:

> No proceedings taken under this Act against any person shall in any way interfere with, or lessen the right of, an aggrieved person to any legal remedy to which he may be entitled.

I cannot see why such a provision has been omitted from this bill, honourable senators. It seems to me that we have tight control by all departments of government now, and this is just one more example of the Government taking control and the individual having no right of appeal. I do not agree with this preponderance of government control, and I think we should have the right to appeal to a civil court.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, debate adjourned.

PLANT QUARANTINE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce Bill C-154, to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants, which was presented on Thursday, March 13.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I should tell you, in very few words, the purpose of the amendment made to this bill in committee.

The bill provides for the Governor in Council passing or enacting regulations, one of which deals with the terms and conditions for the awarding of compensation where a plant, for instance, has been destroyed because it is infested. Elsewhere in the bill provision is made for an appeal on the question of compensation, but nowhere in the bill could we find any substantive provision by which any person was given the authority to fix compensation. Therefore, the regulations had no statutory authority upon which to rest.

By a strange coincidence we had before us last Wednesday also a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. In the course of consideration of this bill I looked at the Animal Contagious Diseases Act and discovered that it contained provision for compensation, and also for special authority to a minister to fix compensation. We had, therefore, a basis for regulations and also for appeals.

What the committee did was add to the bill subsection 2 of section 3 which, as honourable senators will see by referring to page 1188 of the Debates of the Senate of last Thursday, reads as follows:

> The Minister may order compensation to be paid in respect of any plant or other matter destroyed or prohibited or restricted from sale or any restriction of the use of any property or premises pursuant to this Act in the amounts approved by, and subject to the terms and conditions prescribed by, the regulations.

Once that is in the bill you then have provision for regulations and also for appeals. The big difficulty here was that there was no basic authority to provide for compensation, and in that respect the only amendment was made.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

REPORT REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, which was presented on Thursday, March 13.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, as you will see from the Debates of the Senate of last Thursday a number of amendments were made to Bill S-29 by the committee, most of which arise out of a brief presented by the Canadian Petroleum Association whose representative appeared before the committee and explained the reasons why they thought these amendments should be made. These representatives had no objection to the scope and purpose of the bill which, in essence, as we were told during the debate on the motion for second reading, is to provide statutory authority in connection with oil and gas production in the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

At the instigation of the chairman of the committee and the Law Clerk of the Senate, these amendments were then discussed with the departmental officers, who were charged with the preparation of this bill and who would be in charge of its administration after it became law, and they accepted the amendments in principle, with the exception of one minor suggestion that was not adopted.

All but the last two of these amendments—that is, the amendments dealing with sections 40 and 41 of the bill—developed as a result of the presentation of the Canadian Petroleum Association. As a matter of fact, in relation to section 27 the departmental officers undertook to take away the material and make their own redraft of the section. You will see that section 27, which is quite lengthy, deals with unitization to prevent waste. I shall no doubt make a bad fist of explaining unitization, but I think it means that you put together a group of producing wells, which may be under different ownership, so as to have a more productive and more economic operation, and in that way you prevent substantial waste. Section 27 lays out the provisions under which unitization might be required in the interests of preventing waste.

The objection of the Canadian Petroleum Association was that there was no provision with respect to hearings, nor with respect to appeals from decisions that might be made by the committee in those circumstances. The objection of the Canadian Petroleum Association was felt to be substantial, which the department recognized, and as a consequence section 27 is re-drafted, to provide in respect of a hearing and an appeal. I see Senator Pearson nodding his head, because this lends substance to the objections he made to a bill we were considering a few moments ago.

These represent most of the amendments to this bill, but there are two that were initiated by the committee itself. May I take just a moment to tell you what they are? In section 40 of the bill there is provision for an appeal from an order of the committee by way of petition to the Governor in Council. This is a general appeal. There are no limitations on it. The reasons could be political or factual, but whatever they are there is a right to appeal to the Governor in Council, and when the Governor in Council makes a decision the Committee must then incorporate it as its decision. But at the end of section 40 you find this language:

> —any order that the Governor in Council makes with respect thereto—

That is, with respect to the subject matter of an order which the committee has made, and which some interested person is challenging.

> —becomes a decision or order of the Committee and is binding upon all parties.

That language would appear to be the end so far as any further rights are concerned, but then section 41 of the bill goes on to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on any question of law or of jurisdiction. When the parties are heard and the Supreme Court announces its decision, the committee must then amend or revise its order so that it reflects the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

We felt there were two things missing in connection with these two procedures. One was that if an appeal was not taken to the Governor in Council in the first instance, but was just an appeal to the Supreme Court on a question of law or jurisdiction, on which the Supreme Court gave its decision, that decision might uphold the committee's decision or might vary it. The question then was: Has the interested person lost his right to go to the Governor in Council where he has a broader appeal? It looked as though the door was being shut on him by that language which I read to you from section 40, which provides that any order that the Governor in Council makes becomes a decision or order of the committee and is binding upon the committee and upon all parties. We thought an interested person should still be able to go to the Supreme Court of Canada even though he had first gone to the Governor in Council. We simply added these words, so that it now reads:

> —a decision or order of the Committee and, subject to section 41—

That is the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

> —is binding upon the Committee and upon all parties.

We have now corrected that.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, which must be incorporated and become the decision of the committee, may differ from the committee's original decision, and we therefore felt that an interested person should have the right, perhaps to raise entirely different issues, to go to the Governor in Council where he has a broader right of appeal. We therefore put a further subsection into section 41. The new subsection 5 reads:

> Any order made by the Committee pursuant to subsection (4), unless such order has already been dealt with by the Governor in Council pursuant to section 40, shall be subject to that section.

By making these two changes we have left the door open for any interested party who is aggrieved, who feels he has rights, where the complexion of a different decision may be changed in the course of one or more of these appeals, to go back and be heard and present his case on the changed conditions.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Which subsection is that?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: It is now subsection 5 of section 41. At present the bill ends at subsection 4.

These are the reasons why the amendments were made, and in the opinion of the committee there were good grounds for making them. Except for the last two, most of them were made with the support of the Canadian Petroleum Association, and with the adoption of the submissions made by the Canadian Petroleum Association by the departmental officers who will be charged with administering this bill. We feel we were united in a common purpose to produce a better bill. The committee took full responsibility for sections 40 and 41, which are changed to make sure there is a full measure of appeal rights in all circumstances.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: What Senator Hayden has told us tonight about this bill is evidence of the necessity, for the benefit of the people of Canada, to bring this kind of bill before the Senate first. This committee, so ably chaired by Senator Hayden, has carefully examined these small items, which apparently have relatively little significance to the public and are little appreciated by the public, yet are of great importance to the rights of individuals. These small changes made by this committee under Senator Hayden illustrate the significant function the Senate is performing.

In summary, I would say that we do have lousy legislation coming to us from the departments, but by having it brought first into this chamber, and particularly into committees such as that chaired by Senator Hayden, we will produce good legislation for Canada.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Honourable senators, I wish to make it quite clear that I agree with everything said by Senator Hayden and Senator Lang. Perhaps I should apologize for introducing this matter now, but not being a member of this committee I probably do not owe them an apology.

Since the report was made I have received a communication from a professor in the Law Department of the University of Alberta, who is not without some knowledge and experience of this type of thing. As a matter of fact, he was co-author of what is considered to be the definitive work on oil and gas law in Canada. I received this communication only today so that it was not possible for me to contact anybody concerned until I met Senator Hayden a few moments ago and explained to him, in the short time available, what I had received.

It would seem that in this bill there is a serious shortcoming that we should take care of by having another committee meeting. As might be expected, the technical people involved in writing this bill have been concerned with problems connected with the production of gas reservoirs or oil reservoirs. In other words, they were examining conservation problems simply from a sub-surface point of view. Since the real development may be a year, two years or three years away, and the oil is generally considered to be frozen anyway, they have no thought in drafting the bill to providing the Governor in Council with authority to have some control over the surface that will inevitably be disturbed as a result of the search for oil. This disturbance can result from people running out lines and deciding that in winter conditions they want to go across a certain area, where they can do permanent damage because of the permafrost. There should be some control. At present there is no authority in the bill for anybody to make regulations to control this type of thing.

I do not propose to waste your time by pretending that I know everything that can happen, but I can say that the effect of oil discovery on surface owners has been a matter of continual and continuing concern to governments in Western Canada. While at the present time most of the surface of these areas in Northern Canada is either not owned by anybody or is owned by the Crown, without perhaps the Crown realizing they own it, there are some areas owned by individuals. The areas owned by individuals will increase, so it is a matter they will have to deal with.

Now that we have been advised of this oversight, I think it would be better to correct the legislation before we let it go, rather than pass it on to somebody else and then receive it back and have to approve the necessary change.

With that in mind, I move that the report be not now received, but that the bill be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved in amendment by the honourable Senator Prowse, seconded by the honourable Senator McElman, that the report be not now adopted, but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, I have one comment. If my friend wants the bill to go back to committee, who am I to interfere with it, but when he said that there was an oversight I do not think in the consideration of the committee there was any oversight. As a matter of fact, my friend spoke to me just before we resumed our sittings this evening, and while he has an opinion from a very authoritative person calling his attention to this, I think it is equally recognized that the Canadian Petroleum Association had an opposite view and did not think that it was necessary to have this provision.

I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is power in the regulations under the bill to pass regulations for the prevention of waste within the meaning of this act. When I pointed this out to my friend he said that this was not the kind of waste he was thinking about, that it was waste apart from the oil and gas operations which might arise in the course of the development of facilities for the production, processing and transportation of gas and oil. But I would like to point out that "waste" is defined in section 13, subsection 2 of the bill, as follows:

> In this Act "waste", in addition to its ordinary meaning, means waste as understood in the oil and gas industry and in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes—

Then there follows a long list of things. I would point out that since the power to regulate is the power to prevent waste within the meaning of the act, and waste is defined, in addition to its ordinary meaning, as including any reference to anything that may relate to the oil and gas industry, the authority to make regulations is broad enough to deal with any kind of waste, whether it is included specifically in relation to the oil and gas industry or to anything that arises from the operation of the oil and gas industry.

Now, how do we resolve whether or not there is enough power? If it goes back to committee, how do we resolve it? It looks to me, from reading it, that there might be some question of interpretation as to whether there is adequate authority. It may well be that when it becomes law the operations under this act will go on for a period of time before you will be confronted with that kind of consideration. It may well be that the Governor in Council, in enacting his regulations will assume for purposes of his regulations that waste is a generic term, that it includes waste in the ordinary sense, which might be the kind of waste my friend thinks there has been an oversight in not providing for.

I wanted to make this explanation. If you think any purpose is going to be served by sending it back to committee, the committee can consider it again tomorrow. It is your judgment as to whether, in the light of what I have told you, there is likely to be any change or addition to the bill.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Was a specific point raised in committee by Senator Prowse or was it discussed?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: No.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It might be useful to put the question to the officers of the department concerned.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I have no objection.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, may I be permitted your indulgence. First, I did not intend to suggest by anything I said that it was anybody's fault there had been an oversight. I had hoped I had made it abundantly clear that this matter had been brought to my attention in the mail only this morning, and so there was no opportunity to present it to the committee.

Secondly, I submit that in section 13 "waste" refers to reservoir waste. What I am talking about is not waste in the sense that it is referred to in this act, but in the protection and preservation of the surface and other things. This is all. There is no reflection on anyone. I think we are fortunate to have this gratuitous bit of information which may enable us to give the people of Canada better legislation more quickly than would otherwise have been possible. That is all.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The committee is sitting tomorrow in any event?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the honourable Senator Langlois, that the report be now adopted. In amendment, it is moved by the honourable Senator Prowse, seconded by the honourable Senator McElman, that the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for further consideration. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion in amendment?

Hon. Mr. Carter: Honourable senators, when a report like this is being referred back to committee for consideration, should not the motion include the exact purpose for which it is being referred back?

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that the answer is "no" to the point raised by the honourable Senator Carter. I now ask honourable senators if they are in favour of the motion in amendment presented by the honourable Senator Prowse?

Motion in amendment agreed to.

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll that the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate to be known as the Ombudsman Committee.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, while listening to the debate on this motion it has occurred to me that perhaps there has been some misunderstanding as to just what the terms are in this motion. For this reason, before making a few observations about it, I would like to read the motion:

> That the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate, to be known as the "Ombudsman Committee", to inquire into and report to the Senate on any matter or thing within the jurisdiction of Parliament relevant to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the prevention of unjust or arbitrary conduct, and in particular to investigate and report upon any grievance complained of as a result of administrative action for which no other remedy is available.

You see, honourable senators, that the terms of the motion are very wide, but when moving the motion the sponsor narrowed it considerably and explained its intent and purpose. I would like to quote what he said at that time:

> ... the sole purpose of this motion, which was first introduced at the last session of the previous Parliament, is to seek your approval of the establishment of a committee of this house which would serve, in effect, as a collective ombudsman to investigate, rectify where possible, and report upon when necessary, any grievance complained of by a Canadian citizen, and allegedly arising from maladministration, error, or carelessness on the part of any department, agency, or service of the federal Government below the ministerial level.

Honourable senators, if I might interject an observation here which may have no bearing on what I intend to say about the motion, I do not think the sponsor could have meant "Canadian citizen" in the technical sense of the term when he mentioned that this would be open to any Canadian citizen. It seems to me that it could very well be that those who are not Canadian citizens, who come to our country and for some reason or another have not yet become citizens, would perhaps more than others wish to avail themselves of the protection such an office would afford.

I would not agree that this principle should apply only in relation to acts below the ministerial level: I would think that some administrative acts of ministers of the Crown could be complained about by people affected.

This debate could be divided into two parts. In the first place, there was a considerable amount of discussion as to the need for an ombudsman or protector, or whatever one may call it. In the second place, there is the idea of a Senate committee to do this work.

As regards the need for such an official, convincing and compelling reasons have been put forward. Government has become so large and so complex, and affects citizens in so many ways, it is obvious there should be some official or office to look after the rights of the citizen.

Apart from that, this would give the ordinary person a feeling of assurance that he did have a friend at court, as it were, if some point arose where he felt he was being subjected to discrimination. It might be said that much of this work has already been done by members of the other house.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: And by this house.

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: And by some by us. However, the members of the House of Commons are in more direct contact with the people they represent than we could be in this chamber. For example, my own Member of Parliament, who represents that fine constituency known as Cape Breton—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Is he a Conservative?

Hon. Mr. Macdonald: Honourable senators, we must remember that these complaints which come in might be in regard to matters under the jurisdiction of municipal or provincial officials instead of federal officials. Some of those examples given during the course of this debate, showing the need for such an official, have been examples of matters under the jurisdiction of municipal or provincial governments.

A member of the House of Commons or of this house might be helpful in this regard, especially in areas not densely populated; but I do not see how such a member could adequately take care of such matters in an area with a high concentration of population.

If such an office were set up, it would assist those people now trying to do this type of work. The case has been well proven for the appointment of an ombudsman. Personally, I do not like that title, but I do not know of a better one. In one or other of our official languages it should be possible to find a term better suited to our purpose.

Honourable senators, as regards the second part of this debate, the suggestion that a committee of the Senate should be set up to act as a collective ombudsman, there I must part company with the sponsor and those advocating such a committee. I do not think such a committee could fulfil the duties in a satisfactory manner. In the first place, no committee would give the type of service which the people would want. A committee would be bound to have discussions, there would be various opinions, and there could be delays which would not be helpful to the matter in hand.

In the second place, if it were a Senate committee, it would be able to sit only during the time the Senate or Parliament were sitting. There would be no meetings during periods of recess, when we are not here, as the committee could not be expected to sit. That would mean those sending in complaints against administrative actions would feel they were not being given the consideration they were led to expect.

Honourable senators, in such a matter as this, I believe there should be one official responsible for the administration. It should be an official set up in a somewhat similar way to the Auditor General of Canada, responsible to the Parliament of Canada and to no one else. Such a person would then be absolutely independent, in a full-time job, and likely to give good service.

Therefore, while I regret I cannot support the motion as it is, I agree with the principle that we should have such an official.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

MASS MEDIA

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 11, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Davey, that a special committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, may I yield to the honourable Senator Grattan O'Leary.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, having the aftermath of Asian flu and it fighting a nasty rearguard action, I shall detain you for only a few minutes. I wish to give conditional support to Senator Davey's motion.

The ownership of the press, of the communications media in Canada, is a subject which should engage the serious attention of all of us. In fact, there are three areas in the structure of a nation which the people of that nation should control. The first is banking, the second is transportation, and the third, but not the least important, is communications.

In one of the last speeches he made, the late John F. Kennedy told the newspaper editors of America that, in his opinion, a nation's communications were of equal importance to a nation's defence forces. I believe this myself.

A few years ago I spent some time as chairman of a royal commission delving into the ownership and control of our periodicals and, to a lesser extent, our newspapers. We made what I thought was a very extensive survey of the situation; we made a report and we put forward certain recommendations. I think Senator Davey would agree with me that the report and the recommendations which we made have stood up well in the light of subsequent events. Well, very unfortunately I thought, neither the Conservative nor the Liberal government of the day saw fit to go along with all of our recommendations. But that does not disturb me too much. Someone once said that if Moses had been a royal commissioner, the Israelites would still be in Eygpt. And of course this is the story of royal commissions and their reports in Canada.

But, personally, I still feel that I would not give a licence, charter or any authority whatsoever to any person to publish a Canadian publication or newspaper or magazine or any other periodical in Canada who did not possess a Canadian passport. I would apply this to citizens of the Commonwealth as much as I would apply it to citizens of a foreign country, including the United States.

When I entered journalism in the City of Saint John, New Brunswick, 60 years ago, there were, in that little city of perhaps 40,000 to 45,000 people, five daily newspapers. One of them, the Saint John Globe was owned by a distinguished member of this Senate, Senator Ellis. There was also the Daily Telegraph, the Evening Times, the Morning Sun and the Evening Star and, last and greatest of all, the Conservative Saint John Standard.

These newspapers were not in the newspaper business as business enterprises. They did not make much money. The Standard was owned by the Conservative Party, actually, and I am sure that the Liberal papers were more or less owned or controlled by the Liberal Party. I do not object to that. I believe in party newspapers. I do not believe in neutral newspapers. I do not believe in so-called independent newspapers: They are not independent—they are neutral.

I must say I was disturbed to learn last week from a distinguished member of this house that the last newspaper in New Brunswick owned by an individual, the Fredericton Gleaner, had been purchased by Mr. K. C. Irving. Mr. K. C. Irving is a distinguished Canadian. I know him well. But I do think it is a serious thing for this nation to have all the newspapers in a province such as New Brunswick owned by a single individual—not only all the newspapers, but the television stations and radio as well.

You may argue, and I would argue it myself, that a lot depends upon the character of the individual who owns these newspapers. This is true of chains as well. People say chain newspapers are a menace. Well, perhaps in principle they are, but again a lot depends on the gentlemen who own the newspapers.

There is no doubt about the ownership of the principal newspapers of Ontario and the western provinces. Mainly, they are owned by the Southam interests or the Sifton interests. If you go to the West Coast you find the Vancouver Sun, the Vancouver Province and the Daily Colonist in Victoria, all owned by F. P. Publications. My newspaper is also owned by F. B. Publications. But these newspapers are owned by newspaper people. They are owned by the Siftons, a great newspaper family who know what newspapers are all about. My objection and my fear would be about newspapers owned by purely business interests, people of no newspaper tradition who run newspapers as they might run sausage factories, their eye mainly on the balance sheet.

Now this is not true of the Southams. This is an old and distinguished newspaper family with a tremendous consciousness of public service, as is true of the Siftons. But families die and pass away and other people take their place, and I think there is no doubt about the possibility of all communications media in Canada, of all the great newspapers, passing into the hands of a few individuals, an event which would not be good for Canada or for that discussion, dialogue and debate which we say are the glory of our Parliamentary and democratic way of life.

I, therefore, do support the principle of Senator Davey's motion, although I have a few reservations about it. In the first place, if we set up in this Senate a committee to deal with newspapers—and I think Senator Davey has gone too far afield—what will be its effect upon the inquiry started in the Province of Quebec into the ownership of newspapers there by a certain gentleman or by, let us say, the Power Corporation?

A one-time great family newspaper La Presse—God forgive them that they did not always agree with my party, but in fact were vicious on the other side—was owned by an old and distinguished French-Canadian family who had some idea of what journalism was about. But what does the Power Corporation want a newspaper for? Why are they buying up all the newspapers in the Province of Quebec? Surely this is a question we have to ask ourselves. To that extent it might be well to start an inquiry here, but I am afraid that if we did start an inquiry in this Senate it might blur or overshadow or interfere with or impede the inquiry that has begun in the Province of Quebec where it is truly desperately necessary.

The motion of Senator Davey goes further than that. He wants to inquire into the cost of newspapers. This will lead nowhere. If you had the experiences I have had in running a newspaper as publisher and having to be responsible for costs, you would know that, if a Senate committee were to bring in a report on costs, within six months of the report it would be absolutely valueless because of the escalation in costs. There are contracts with unions every two or three years; newsprint prices go up; the prices of ink and of metals and of everything are going up. So an inquiry into costs would lead you to almost endless investigation and, finally you would have nothing that would stand up to one year's examination. On the other hand, I must say, and I am speaking on balance, that I do think this inquiry would do good.

By the way, the Toronto Star last week said that if this inquiry were set up in the Senate, "Grattan O'Leary should be its chairman." Whereupon, the next day the Toronto Telegram, a Conservative paper, said that, if Grattan O'Leary were its chairman, it would be a perfect disaster. This shows, honourable senators, the excellence of freedom of expression we have in Canada.

I suggest that the Senate should support this motion.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Davey speaks now it will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Mr. Davey: In rising to close this debate I would of course like to thank all honourable senators for their generous remarks on my initiative in this matter and on the speech I made in the Senate, remarks which have been made to me by honourable senators both inside and outside the chamber. I am no more grateful to any honourable senator than I am to Senator O'Leary, for I think this kind of discussion can only benefit from any contribution he makes, and so I particularly single him out to thank for his very special contribution. I am particularly grateful for his support, even if it is conditional. I have taken careful note of his reservations and will take under advisement with sympathy and concern the position he has taken on these particular points.

I fear my original speech was much too long and so I will detain you only a moment or two now.

The response to my motion was gratifying indeed, and has been more and better than for anything I have done at any time either in or out of public life. I received a particularly heavy flow of mail, especially from media people and the academic community; I received mail from every province, most cities and from persons in every walk of life. I also received a remarkable editorial response in a great many newspapers across Canada, and I would like to quote from three of these editorials. The three newspapers concerned are the three Toronto dailies. I realize in doing this I am being somewhat parochial, but I am also mindful of the fact that these papers in the past have not editorialized too favourably on some of my activities. All three editorials appeared on Thursday, February 6. I want to make it clear that I am quoting them only in part.

The Globe and Mail, in an editorial headed "A helpful investigation", said the following:

> Senator Keith Davey's words in the Red Chamber this week...did in substance form an indictment which the proprietors of newspapers, magazines, radio and television stations would be ill-advised to ignore. The senator's words were softer than those of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau or Metropolitan Chairman William Allen but they reflected a growing measure of public doubt or bewilderment with the purpose and practice of journalism in Canada today.

The editorial also said in part:

He wants to know how well the public is served by chain ownership, mixed media ownership and monopoly situations. He wants to know if advertisers influence editorial policy or news judgment; if editorial salaries are high enough to attract "bright young people to sensitive positions of influence". He wants to know what, if any, standards exist in the business and how these are applied to the need to obtain mass circulation. He wants to know the extent to which the presence of reporters—particularly television reporters—can make or influence news. Senator Davey believes, and we agree, that a Senate study of these and related issues would be useful to the public and the press itself.

On the same day the Toronto Telegram said in part:

The Canadian Senate should agree to the proposal of Senator Keith Davey to set up a special committee to investigate ownership and control of mass media in the country, with particular emphasis on the press...

The Senate, so often regarded as a political anachronism, would serve a useful purpose in setting up such a committee without delay.

Then on the same day the Toronto Star said, and again I am quoting only in part, the following:

Our only regret is that Canadian newspapers didn't beat Senator Davey to the punch by setting up a press council to investigate complaints of press abuses, errors and omissions, and to promote better standards of journalism.

A vital industry which has shown itself so reluctant to engage in public self-examination and self-criticism is in a weak position to object when politicians ask to take a look on the public's behalf.

In any case, Senator Davey's speech to the Senate makes it clear that far from wishing to restrict the press's freedom to seek and publish information, he is concerned about situations—newspaper monopolies, chains and multi-media ownership—which might tend to inhibit this freedom.

As honourable senators will realize, the basic purpose of the study which I have proposed is to determine whether or not we in Canada simply have the mass media we deserve or rather the mass media which we as Canadians require. In other words, is the mass media in Canada of 1969 contemporary and relevant?

I am confident that honourable senators will agree with me that this would be a meaningful study for a special committee of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Mr. Martin tabled:

Report on the Administration of the Canada Student Loans Act for the loan year ended June 30, 1968, pursuant to section 18 of the said Act, chapter 24, Statutes of Canada, 1964-65. (English and French texts).

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had re-examined the report on Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, and had recommended its adoption by the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move, with leave of the Senate, that this report, together with the report the approval of which was moved yesterday, be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate, it has been moved by honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by honourable Senator Langlois, that this report be now adopted.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: The original report was presented earlier and its adoption was moved yesterday evening. Then, by motion in amendment the report was referred back to the committee. Therefore, my motion now is for adoption of the report now being presented, together with the report presented March 13 and moved for adoption yesterday.

Reports adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, may we now proceed to Orders of the Day and call Order No. 1 for third reading of Bill C-154, Order No. 2 for resuming debate on Bill C-157, and Order No. 5 for resuming debate on Bill C-138.

I am informed by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce that if this were done he could hold a meeting of his committee this afternoon at 4.30 for the purpose of dealing with these measures. In view of the work ahead of us next week, and the desirability of meeting the objective of an adjournment, it seems to me that we should take advantage of this suggestion of the chairman of the committee.

PLANT QUARANTINE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the third reading of Bill C-154, to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants.

Motion agreed to, and bill as amended read third time and passed.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the Honourable Senator Eudes, for the second reading of the Bill C-157, intituled: "An Act to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals". —(Honourable Senator Prowse).

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: Stand.

Hon. Paul Martin: My honourable friend asks that Order No. 2 stand. This is one of the bills to which I referred a moment ago. We are hoping to get it before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce later this afternoon. I wonder if Senator Prowse has any special reason for asking that the order stand. If he wishes to speak further on this bill, he could do so on third reading. That might be one way of facilitating our consideration of the bill in committee this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, perhaps I should apologize. I moved the adjournment of the debate as a result of a conversation I had with Senator Argue, who spoke very effectively on the bill the other evening. He told me that he had some witnesses he wished to bring before the committee. He is away this week but will be back next week. He asked me to move the adjournment of the debate so that it would be put over until next week when he will be able to call his witnesses.

The house now knows as much as I do. I have done what I thought was proper in the circumstances, and of course I am in the hands of the house in respect of the matter.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I still think a useful purpose will be served if this bill is referred to the committee this afternoon. When the committee reports to the house on the bill a request can be made to refer the matter back. There would be no objection to that. In fact, this was done yesterday as a result of the initiative taken by Senator Prowse in respect of another bill.

I suggest that in order to rationalize our business we agree to this procedure so that the committee can deal with the matter this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Prowse: Honourable senators, I have explained the position. It may be that the chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Hayden) has made arrangements for witnesses to appear today. I have no objection to that, if the committee will then adjourn in order to hear additional witnesses. I have no intention of delaying the business of the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do I understand correctly that in the circumstances honourable Senator Prowse is withdrawing his request that the order stand?

Hon. Mr. Prowse: I yield.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Petten, seconded by the honourable Senator McGrand, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Petten, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, for the second reading of Bill C-138, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

Hon. Harry A. Willis: Honourable senators, I am not an international financier nor am I a Philadelphia lawyer. As a matter of fact, I am not a financier at all. I congratulate the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) on his lucid explanation on the introduction of this bill, which contains 46 pages. What I object to is that the civil service experts in the Department of Finance should travel from Rio de Janeiro to Stockholm and back again without having any representative from this house or the other place, except perhaps Mr. Sharp, the Minister of Finance at the time, who went to Rio de Janeiro. Apart from that, the only persons who represented Canada at these conferences were civil servants, whom I hasten to add I admire as highly placed officials in the Department of Finance. The Governor of the Bank of Canada was present at some of these conferences.

We have had introduced here a bill containing 46 pages, on which the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee in the other place held five meetings, at which they had experts from every department and discussed the matter thoroughly. It is now presented to us without any explanation other than the bill itself and the remarkable speech of the Leader of the Government when introducing it—and I again congratulate him on the completeness with which he did so. However, I do object that we in this house should have thrust upon us a bill of this magnitude, after it has been the subject of discussion at five sittings of the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee in the other place, at which the best financial experts to be found in Canada gave evidence. Yet, having read the reports of all those meetings I am no further ahead in my understanding of this bill than when I started.

This bill is all about foreign exchange and balance of payments. The Leader of the Government did a remarkable job in explaining that it was just another amendment to the agreement into which Canada entered in 1944, just before the end of the war, in an attempt to stop fluctuations in exchange values. I admit that a pretty good job was done until about two years ago. Since then nobody has known what the exchange is in Paris, nobody knows the value of the franc, or the value of the German mark, or of the English pound. Indeed, nobody really knows the value of the United States dollar, and the Canadian dollar is of course based on the value of the U.S. dollar.

I think that better arrangements could be made by the Government. I ask the Leader of the Government the question, whether they could not have made better arrangements than have all these jaunts by civil servants. I do not wish to detract from their ability and I do not criticize them at all. I think Mr. Handfield-Jones did a magnificent job. The officials were probably escorted by some of their juniors, but why in heaven's name could not a member of this house and a member of the other house have accompanied them on a matter of such grave importance to Canada and to the world, so that at least we would know first hand what we were talking about?

Here I stand today with five reports of the evidence of witnesses called by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of the other place, and I have to try to digest what they said in their answers to members of that committee. Furthermore, it was debated on three occasions in the other place and almost every one who took part in the debate had a different answer. Look at the experience that we have had in the last two years! The franc was almost devalued, and not more than two months ago the German mark was threatened with devaluation. The Canadian dollar was similarly threatened last spring, and the United States dollar is continually being threatened with devaluation because of a number of undertakings by that country, particularly the war in Vietnam and domestic matters about which they have passed legislation.

I make the suggestion that on matters as important as this, we should have one or two representatives from each party in each house accompany our civil servants when they make these journeys. This was started in 1967 at a meeting of the International Monetary Fund held in Rio de Janeiro. As the honourable Leader pointed out at that meeting there were present the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Sharp, and other members of the Department of Finance whom I have mentioned, and the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Honourable senators, we must remember that there are 111 members of the International Monetary Fund, of which we are only one. These officials I mentioned were given instructions, and they in turn instructed their deputies and departmental representatives to try and draw up a satisfactory amendment to the Bretton Woods Agreement, which would have a steadying influence on the various world currencies. At a later meeting in Stockholm, which I believe was held in the spring of 1968, these people met and drew up the proposals which are now presented to us.

Now, in the short space of time that we have to examine this bill, we are expected to understand all the details of it and either to pass or reject it. Let us assume, as the honourable leader stated, that this will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I expect that there we shall have the evidence of these persons who appeared at the five committee meetings of the other place and give the same evidence over again. Now, is that not a waste of time and money?

I think there should be some arrangement whereby representatives of this house could attend the meetings of the appropriate committee of the other place. Perhaps that is unconstitutional—I do not know—but when I see five financial reports and the evidence of a host of witnesses who appeared and testified with regard to the dozens of rates of exchange, I say why do we have to go to the expense of repeating it all over again before our committee? This is what we will have to do.

As the honourable leader pointed out, this amendment to the agreement is to provide for a special drawing power which will enable various countries to draw moneys from this special fund. It will be entirely separate from the International Monetary Fund which we have established, but it will be guarded and watched over by the Chairman of the International Monetary Fund and his executives.

As was pointed out, there are 111 countries involved. This matter would not become law until four-fifths or three-quarters of the voting power approves. In my reckoning, that will mean that at least 80 countries will have to pass legislation in order for this measure to become law.

As the honourable Leader of the Government pointed out in his excellent address, up until March 10, which was a week ago on Monday, 37 countries had passed such legislation. That is a far cry from the required number which will have to pass legislation in order that this may become law.

Honourable senators, what we are asked to do here is to pass legislation in the hope that at least 80 per cent of the other countries will pass similar legislation to make this matter legal.

Furthermore, the moneys which are borrowed from this special drawing fund are not used for anything for which a country may desire money: it must be something useful and something which is not going to disturb the rate of exchange.

We have speculators on the foreign markets of the world and, as has been pointed out by learned men in the evidence before committees in the other place, such speculators are operating all the time. They are after the English pound, the German mark, the French franc and the United States dollar. A member speaking in the other place pointed out that when the German mark was not devalued, within 24 hours a huge sum of money was diverted back to U.S. dollars.

I think what we need is something in addition to what we are asked to pass in this bill, something which will give us a stable currency, which will not make us look at the paper each morning to see whether the currency of some country has been devalued.

Honourable senators, of course we are very close to our neighbours in the south, our greatest export recipient, the United States market, and in my opinion the Canadian dollar is completely tied up with the U.S. dollar. Whatever happens to it will happen to the Canadian dollar. I ask the Government to give this more intensive study and more serious attention. I am not saying that those men who did study it, at the request of our Ministers of Finance, did not do a good job. They did a good job, no doubt at all about that. However, it was a limited job and it went only to a certain point. We all know that something more is required. This S.D.R.—Special Drawing Rights—will be held in a separate account and will be supported by whatever is required of us as a country to place into the reserve.

There is reported in the Hansard of the other place various views expressed by experts. Mr. Herbert E. Gray, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, spoke. Views were also expressed by Mr. Lambert, who is the financial critic of the Progressive Conservative Party, and by Mr. Knowles and Mr. Caouette.

I do not propose to detain the house on this, but I do propose that something further has to be studied in this whole matter. The last witness called was a Mr. Marsh, who is Economic Adviser of the Bank of Canada. To my mind it would be worth the time of every senator to read what Mr. Marsh said before the committee. He is for a different sort of set-up and, according to his words, it might end the whole financial mess in which all these countries find themselves.

Now, I do not know the names of the 37 countries who have passed legislation already, but I do know that there are a lot more countries before whom this legislation has to come.

The Bretton Woods Agreements Act was first passed in 1944 and was amended slightly in 1966 and 1967 by the Government of Canada. What I now say is that if we are going to do this job we should study it thoroughly and take it to heart. Therefore, I hope what when this matter comes before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, we will have Mr. Marsh of the Bank of Canada with us as a witness, because he has an entirely different view of this whole matter than most of the other witnesses.

I repeat, I am not a financial expert, let alone an international financial expert, but I can say, from perusing these documents as assiduously as I have, that the whole thing is like trying to nail jelly to the wall, and, if you can visualize that, you know what I mean. Surely there must be some better method for a bill of this magnitude and nature to come to this place and for us to give it more and better consideration.

I must agree with the Leader of the Government that this is a step in the right direction, but in my opinion it does not go far enough and, in spite of the fact that it has been studied for two or three years by our financial experts, the witnesses called have belied some of the provisions in this bill. The Leader of the Government the other day suggested that what they said had nothing to do with the bill whatsoever. That may be, but as a responsible body I think we should hear them and study the matter further.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, I do not intend to delay matters long. I should point out that the original Bretton Woods Agreements Act which was considered in the Senate, and the creation of the International Monetary Fund, was in or about the year 1944.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It was 1945.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: If my recollection serves me correctly, I was the person charged with the responsibility of giving the explanation at that time. I did not go back and read what I said, because there is nothing in what I said then that I could change now.

Apparently it was not a bad bill and it was not a bad explanation, because somehow or other this Bretton Woods Agreements Act has worked during the intervening period. But, in international exchange and in international trade, situations change very materially over the years. As I see it, the changes that are proposed here are simply an effort to try to find some means of replacing in the agreement some of the conditions that have worked in the past in an effort to stimulate to an even greater extent the promotion of international trade and the provision of the necessary international reserve funds to that end.

So far as the Senate in its consideration of this bill is concerned, this bill is not in a category different from most of the other bills that we consider. We give independent consideration to the bills that come to the Senate. We do pay attention to what has been said in the other place, we do consider the representations that have been made in the other place and the evidence that has been submitted there, but I am not prepared to accept the statement that all the wisdom and all the independence of judgment or of analysis is in the other place. In my view there is opportunity here for analysis and the application of one's knowledge, intelligence, and experience. Therefore, I think we should proceed on our own basis and, if we feel a bill requires evidence to explain some of the purposes and the intent, it should be dealt with in a committee of the Senate.

I will agree at the same time that there may be some bills—I am not sure that this is one of them—where it might be felt that before a bill is advanced to any extent in either house the subject matter of the bill or the bill itself should be referred to a joint committee. That has its limitations in one sense. It may amount to almost a commitment in both houses that what the joint committee does is what the house is going to do.

We could do to some bills what was done in 1940 when the Old Age Pension bill came in and there was a time limit within which the bill was to become operative. That did not permit enough time for full consideration in both houses in succession. In that instance the House of Commons set up a committee and the Senate appointed several observers who had all the status of members of the committee except that they could not vote. Those observers were supposed to become fully informed and then come back to the Senate and give the explanation and the benefit of what went on in the hearings.

It worked very well. I do not know if it could have worked better. I was one of the observers and I did take part in the questioning. In relation to that particular bill it was a satisfactory way of dealing with it, but I think for most of our legislation the practice we have is the practice we should follow in the main. I think it is good practice in the case of this bill, because it is not as though this agreement were to become operative now. You have a solid basis and these are supplements to the bill. Different approaches may be needed to deal with problems that have arisen much later than when the bill was originally designed, and, if the witnesses that we have do not give all the explanations to our satisfaction, we can always reach further afield and find more. However, the proposal is that we should make this examination in committee and get started with it, and see where it leads us.

We should be flexible enough to pursue the matter to the extent that we get full satisfaction in the explanations that are given. I can only say that if you read the bill, and if you have followed all the discussions and debates that have gone on in connection with the exchanges in various countries, the problems of exchange, the flight of money and the need for various countries to have some method or some place where they can be provided with some form of international monetary exchange in the interests of promoting further and greater international trade, then I think that should be the most desirable objective of the Government of the people of Canada. It is in their best interests, and I think, to the extent that this bill will help, we should speed its passage. If we approve it, we are then one more country, and it takes us that much closer to the required number.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. May I add that the committee will convene this afternoon at 4.30.

Hon. Mr. Willis: May I ask the honourable Senator Hayden a question? Is it the intention that this bill should be discussed by the committee this afternoon at 4.30?

Hon. Mr. Hayden. Yes.

Hon. Mr. Willis: Have witnesses been subpoenaed?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Not subpoenaed, but they have been notified and will be in attendance.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

USE OF SENATE CHAMBER BY COMMITTEES

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I have a matter to bring before the Senate and a motion to make. Late last week, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I was asked to call the meeting of that committee in the Senate Chamber. There were no rules particularly to guide me in the matter and at that time it seemed to be rather a good idea.

It had been suggested by the Rules Committee in its fourth report, among other things, as follows:

> Further, from time to time, select committees of the Senate should hold committee meetings in the Senate Chamber itself. In this way the public would have an opportunity to see the Senate performing what is undoubtedly one of its most useful roles—the examination in depth of the legislation submitted to it. This is suggested with the thought of enabling more people to appreciate where and how the Senate makes its vital contribution in Parliament. Public opinion properly informed would soon realize that the debates which are listened to from the Gallery in the normal course of our sittings are those dealing with matters of principle only, and in no way encompass the full consideration and careful treatment given to bills that come before our Chamber.

So with that substance in mind I thought it was a fairly good suggestion. Thousands of visitors pass our door from time to time during the session. They look into the chamber and see a long array of empty benches, and may carry away a very inadequate and erroneous impression.

Only yesterday 300 young people were addressed in this chamber by the Leader of the Government Senator Martin, Senator Connolly and Senator Stanbury. Senator Stanbury is President of the Canadian Liberal Federation. I am sure that group of young people went away with a much better impression of the chamber than they would have had if they had simply looked in and seen an empty room; much better, I suggest, than if they had just seen, to use that classic phrase, a beggarly array of empty benches.

Honourable senators, there are many precedents for the use of the chamber for purposes other than sittings of the Senate itself. For as long as I can remember we have had meetings in this chamber of such bodies as the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Federal-Provincial conferences, and very soon I understand there is to be a meeting of the Speakers of all the legislative bodies of the Commonwealth. They will be accommodated in this chamber and entertained here. I am sure they will go away with a much better impression than if they were received in any other place in Ottawa or, for that matter, in all of Canada.

Further to that, and perhaps even more cogent, is the fact that this chamber should be a useful place. With the exception of one other committee room, it is the only place where we have instantaneous translation. We have only two committee rooms and we have 11 standing committees, not to mention our special committees. So, frequently it is difficult to find rooms for all those Senate committees who wish to meet. Only yesterday the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman heard a most important delegation from the Canadian Labor Congress, representing as many as 1,600,000 working people. Their brief which had been most carefully prepared, and a most important document, was read in French. There were five people in the committee who understood or at least I hope they understood, the presentation. It is true that we had copies of it in English as well, but the other members of the committee did not follow the presentation as read. They would have been able to follow it if we had had instantaneous translation such as we have in this chamber.

I think honourable senators will agree with me that there are real grounds of usefulness, if we deal with the matter intelligently, in allowing our special and standing committees and other similar bodies that are directly connected with this chamber, to sit at times in the chamber and make use of these facilities.

However, that is the way it appeared to me at the time and even though there are no rules governing the matter, I took it upon myself to accept that suggestion. Following that request, a notice was sent out to our members to the effect that we would sit in the Senate chamber, and I wired asking them to attend as it was necessary to have a full attendance.

However, as one senator objected, and even though it was only one, I felt it was not proper to hold the meeting in the Senate chamber, but rather that I should bring the matter before this body itself. After all, the Senate owns its own chamber, and it is the Senate who has the right to determine how we should use it. So, we held the meeting in one of the committee rooms which happened to be free at that time. No harm was done, but on the other hand the incident brings firmly before the house the problem of how we should most effectively use the facilities we have here, the principal of which is this chamber.

I would point out, honourable senators, that there is nothing sacrosanct about this chamber. I admit it is a beautiful room, that it has a wonderful tradition, and that it is a place we should preserve with great care. On the other hand, it is not a temple of the gods; we do not take our shoes off when we step on the red carpet. To use another well-worn phrase, the Senate is a workroom, not a theatre. I think it is our duty to see that our facilities are used to the best advantage in the public interest. I am not an extreme advocate of this idea; it is something we should all consider very carefully.

This is the motion I would lay before you.

It is moved by myself and seconded by Senator Fergusson, with leave of the Senate:

> That the Senate considers it desirable that the Senate Chamber be fully used for meetings of Senate Committees and other bodies;
>
> That rules governing such use be prepared by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for adoption by the Senate; and
> That the Speaker be empowered to grant or withhold permission for such use of the Senate Chamber and to administer the rules relating thereto.

You will observe from the wording of the motion that the first thing we ought to do is to provide some rules governing the use of this chamber—this we have not done today. I thought the proper persons to draw those rules would be the members of our Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. But, more than that, I think it is most important that the administration of the matter be in the hands of someone in whom we have every confidence and who, in his position, carries the right to do that sort of thing. The members of a committee are not always here. Granting permission is one thing; withholding it is another. Watching the chamber and seeing it is not abused is quite a third matter. The Speaker is always here; he has his chambers right beside this chamber and can supervise its use.

It has been suggested that if we allow others than ourselves into this chamber, damage might be done; but it is perfectly obvious that an ordinary delegation or group of visitors would be put in the galleries and would not be allowed to run free in this chamber. On the other hand, if we had a committee sitting in this chamber, as I planned it the chairman would no doubt sit where the Clerk is now sitting, the witnesses to his left, the reporters on the other side of the table, and senators in their seats. If there were others who were in some way officially interested or taking part in the proceedings, we could have chairs placed on the floor of the chamber, as they do in the Commons when we senators go there.

They accommodate us on the floor of the chamber, chairs being brought in for the occasion.

I see no practical difficulties. I am not impressed when I am told that the chamber is in some way sacrosanct, that our respect for it is in any way decreased by the fact we use it to the very maximum of our powers. In view of the number of committees we now have sitting, the important matters before us, and the need for additional accommodation, it is necessary to show the people of Canada that we are active and are not hiding in rooms where no one sees us, but are right here in public view, where visitors can come and look in. These are considerations which are far superior to any idea of making this a sacred place where only members can show their heads.

So, honourable senators, I submit the motion to your wisdom. I think that you, ladies and gentlemen, the members of the Senate, are the ones to decide this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Roebuck, seconded by the honourable Senator Fergusson, with leave of the Senate:

> That the Senate considers it desirable that the Senate Chamber be fully used for meetings of Senate Committees and other bodies—

Shall I dispense with reading the motion in full?

Hon. Senators: Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Hon. Harry A. Willis: I would like to ask the honourable Senator Roebuck a question. I was shocked when he said yesterday that the President of the Liberal Federation received students in this chamber, with the honourable Leader of the Government and the honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). I have no objection to that whatever, but I take objection to this chamber being used as a political forum. What is the senator going to say if the Social Credit Party asks to hold a meeting in this chamber, or the Progressive Conservative Party or the N.D.P.?

I think the honourable senator should amend his motion to exclude political meetings from this chamber, because, apparently, that is what occurred here yesterday.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It was not a political meeting. It so happened that an important person, a man holding a public position, made the address. I have done it myself, and certainly no one would accuse me of being non-political. I certainly made no political speech to a group of children in this chamber, and I did not personally bring them in to the Chamber. However, both the Leader of the Government and I addressed them and sent them away, I think with some information as to the Senate, the public life of Canada and of Canada itself—which is much better than if we had just allowed them to look into an empty chamber and go away.

It was not a political address made by the gentleman to whom I referred. I only mentioned the fact that he was President of an organization to indicate that he was a man of importance, with some knowledge of public life.

Hon. Mr. Willis: What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: There is a whole lot of difference. And not only so, but if any of the leaders of the various parties to whom my friend referred had been here, I would have been very pleased to have heard them address these children as well.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I only raise objection to the fact you referred to him as President of the Liberal Federation.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: He is also a senator.

Hon. Mr. Willis: I realize that, but are you going to bring politics into this place?

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, on a point of privilege, I think I should say something, if the honourable senator would not mind.

Both before and during the time I was leader I was asked, and indeed several times since I have been asked and sometimes have even volunteered, to see a great many students here, to explain, first of all, the physical features of the Senate and some of the functions of the chamber. I hope that when such opportunities arise, all honourable senators will take advantage of the opportunity to do this, and also allow the students to ask questions. I have found too that the questions are never political. Perhaps that is my fault, because I made this a non-political discussion of a second chamber. That is the way in which a senator should discuss this chamber before an audience of this kind.

Sometimes there are so many people that you have to let them in beyond the bar. You tell them that this is a special privilege, but you always have a constable present. The reaction of young people to this kind of treatment from a member of this house is, I think, very good. The more senators can participate in this the better. However, I agree with what Senator Willis has said, that these are not occasions upon which political discussion should take place. You tell them where the parties sit, where the Clerk sits, about the paintings, the ceiling, the functions of the chamber. the committees, the tenure, and the number of senators. They always want to know how many lady senators there are. You express the hope that some of them will come back not as visitors but as members, and you send them away in a very happy frame of mind. The more this kind of thing is done, the better, and I hope the task will not fall upon the shoulders of just a few senators. I have often done it voluntarily when I have seen a large group, because I know that the sometimes perfunctory explanation given when a large number of groups are being conducted through may not be completely adequate.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, Senator Roebuck has asked for leave to make this motion. I object to leave being given because if leave is given a vote may be taken. I think that a matter of this importance should be adjourned so that other members of the house will have an opportunity of discussing it. For instance, when the honourable senator started to speak I was out of the chamber attending a short meeting, and I did not hear his opening remarks.

I object to the motion being debated now.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I object to this departure from our rules at any time. In my opinion, this is a ridiculous suggestion.

This is the Upper Chamber of the Parliament of Canada which has behind it one hundred years of tradition, respect, and achievement, and we should not cheapen it by having a committee meeting here to which will be called all sorts of members of the public to give evidence. To have that happen in the chamber with the Mace under the Table would be to cheapen the function of the Senate. I have yet to learn of any time at which there has not been accommodation for the meetings of the various committees.

With respect to the point about there being here the facilities for instantaneous translation, I should like to mention that we got along for one hundred years without it, and yesterday, at a meeting of this very committee, we had the privilege of reading in English simultaneously exactly what a witness was saying in French. I might say also that was the first time in a long time that we had a witness before one of our committees who wished to speak in the French language.

The whole thing is contrary to the traditions of this house. It is not done in the United States Senate, and the honourable Leader of the Government can tell us whether it has ever been done in the House of Commons. I will ask him directly: Is the House of Commons used for that purpose?

Hon. Mr. Martin: No.

Hon. Mr. Walker: Then why in the name of heaven should it be done here?

Hon. Mr. Haig: Senator White has refused consent allowing this debate to continue. Therefore, it goes over until tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that honourable Senator Roebuck has asked for leave. Is this question being asked of the honourable Senator Roebuck or of the honourable Leader of the Government?

Hon. Mr. Croll: No; an objection has been made.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, Senator White has raised an objection to this proceeding without notice and, as I understand it, Senator Roebuck is about to accede to that suggestion.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Very well, tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Walker: When will this be continued?

Hon. Mr. Hollett: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the mover of this motion a question. If his committee had been sitting in this chamber at a time when a group of visitors arrived, would he have turned out the committee, or would he have told the visitors to go away?

Honourable senators, I do not want to waste any words over this, but I must say that I object very strongly to the use of this chamber as a committee room. I should like to say a few more words, but for the moment I ask only that question.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: If the honourable senator is asking what I would do with the crowd of visitors, I would put them in the gallery, of course.

Hon. Mr. Croll: As I understand it, we are not proceeding—

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I move that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: The six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No, no.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have rules. A special committee of this house was appointed to study the rules. It spent a great deal of time on that task, and presented to this house a new set of rules which are not yet in effect. However, we do have rules that are in effect, and I suggest with respect that they provide that when leave is refused Your Honour should intervene and end the matter right there.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, my understanding is that the honourable Senator Roebuck commenced his remarks with the words "by leave". I had no indication of objection by any honourable senator at that time to the presentation of this motion. If there is any honourable senator who for any reason wishes to object, I am ready to entertain a motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: I am moving that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: I rise again on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When there is no motion before the house, how can the debate on the motion be adjourned?

While I have the floor, I should like, with respect, to point out that Your Honour is quite correct in saying that when Senator Roebuck rose he prefaced his remarks by the words "with leave". I believe we have a rule that requires any honourable senator asking for a suspension of a rule of this house to state what the rule is and why he wishes it suspended. I have spoken to this before, Your Honour, and I suggest that if we observe our present rules the sort of thing that has just happened will not happen. That is the purpose of the rule.

When an honourable senator rises and merely says "by leave", and then carries on, our rules are not operative. There is a good reason why our rules at the present time state that when an honourable senator wishes to suspend one of them he is required to state the rule that he wishes suspended and to give his reasons.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Grosart's concern for the observance of the rules, and in that he is right. Today Senator Roebuck began his remarks by saying "with leave", and at that time no one took exception to the introduction by him of the subject matter of the present discussion. It was when he had finished, after some interval, that Senator White, quite within his right, said that in view of what he thought was the importance of this matter notice of the resolution should be given. As I understood it, Senator Roebuck was ready to accede to that at once. What we now have before us is a resolution in Senator Roebuck's name, which has been presented to us, and we are going to observe the rules by requiring that the prescribed period of notice be given. That is the situation, and Senator Roebuck has acceded.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: But you do not adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Senator Roebuck has acceded to that, even though he had obtained the right by consensus to make the statement he did make. Senator Hayden is quite right; I do not think we will correct our procedure by a motion that we adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Give notice.

Hon. Mr. Martin: He simply acknowledged the request made by Senator White that the required notice should be given. Senator Roebuck has acceded to that. To me, that is the situation, and I feel there is nothing further for us to do.

Hon. Mr. White: What the honourable Leader of the Government has said is quite correct. If you are going to have the rule on a hairline, that is all right. If an honourable senator rises to move a motion and says "By leave", how can any honourable senator object before he knows what the motion is?

Hon. Mr. Walker: Exactly.

Hon. Mr. White: I am glad to know that we will have the rule on a hairline from now on, and I for one will observe it.

Hon. Donald Smith: Honourable senators, it seems to me that there is a difference of opinion here that is not altogether important. We are going to adjourn this debate or cancel it and start all over again, so perhaps what I am about to say is not important either.

I do not blame Senator Grosart for his attitude—he is a stickler for the rules—but I would remind him and Senator White, who has had experience in the chair, that Senator Roebuck had no other alternative but to say, "By leave". When he had finished his statement, Mr. Speaker immediately rose to his feet to keep others in their places until he had formally put the motion. He said, "By leave", and started to read the motion. At that time no senator made objection and the debate went on. It would have been very simple for Senator White, or me, or anyone, to have given reasons and said quite simply, "I move that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow," and that would have ended the whole thing. I want to see my interpretation on the record alongside the experts on the other side.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You break even that way.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Smith, seconded by the honourable Senator White, that this debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: On a point of order, may I ask Your Honour, with respect, how the debate can be adjourned when the debate has not taken place?

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is not being adjourned.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It is a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It is a notice of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would remind honourable senators that a regular motion was made by the honourable Senator Roebuck and was duly seconded. He began by saying, as I remember, "By leave". At the time I heard no objection; I put that motion and the debate was on. I do not have to give advice to honourable senators, but we now have a regular motion to adjourn this debate, and if honourable senators agree to adopt the motion the debate will be postponed until the next sitting.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that after you put the motion the honourable Senator White was the first to rise, and if he took objection to granting leave he was in time because you had just put the motion. Therefore, I think the simplest way of settling this problem is to take the motion presented by Senator Roebuck as a notice of motion. It will be on the Order Paper tomorrow, and we do not then need a motion to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. Martin: That is the way Senator Roebuck has taken.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is the way Senator Roebuck takes it and that is the end of the matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the motion stand until tomorrow as a notice of motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and invoking the suspension of Rule 24, I move:

> That the name of the honourable Senator Phillips (Rigaud) be substituted for that of the honourable Senator Inman on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on Bill S-23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Hédard Robichaud, for Hon. Gunnar S. Thorvaldson, moved that the report be adopted.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honorable senators, I should like to explain the amendments.

The first amendment strikes out lines 17 to 41, both inclusive, at page 15, clause 24 of the bill. The effect of this amendment is to defer the proposed new section 495D, which places an absolute and unlimited liability upon the shoulders of the owner, the charterer and the master of the vessel for all expenses incurred by the minister in removing, destroying or selling a vessel and its cargo or fuel pursuant to section 295C, and by Her Majesty in preventing the spreading of any cargo or fuel, and in cleaning any property fouled by any cargo or fuel, that has escaped or been discharged from a vessel.

Under this proposed new section, Her Majesty could alternatively claim such expenses from the person whose fault or act, or whose servant's act or fault, caused the distress, stranding, wrecking, sinking or abandoning of the vessel, or the escape or discharge of the cargo or fuel from that vessel.

This amendment was moved following various representations made before the committee by witnesses appearing on behalf of the International Chamber of Shipping, the Canadian Chamber of Shipping, the Chamber of Shipping of British Columbia, the Shipping Federation of Canada, the Canadian Shipowner's Association, the Canadian Merchant Service Guild, the Canadian Maritime Law Association, the Dominion Marine Association, the Protection and Indemnity Associations, and their re-insurance group from London, England.

The second amendment strikes out paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of the proposed new section 712A on page 17 of the bill and substitutes the following:

> (a) providing for the licensing of persons acting as members of the crew or employed in connection with the maintenance and repair of air cushion vehicles used in navigation, and for the suspension and revocation of such licences;

The original wording of subsection 2 provided for regulations by the Governor in Council prescribing the qualifications required of persons acting as members of the crew or employed in connection with the maintenance and repair of air cushion vehicles used in navigation.

The effect of this amendment is to provide for regulations for the licensing of such persons and for suspension and revocation of such licences.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I attended the committee when it examined this very important piece of legislation and I want to thank Senator Langlois for explaining the amendments which were made in committee.

In particular, I want to put on the record that the committee has done an excellent job in studying all of these amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, mainly those concerning the application of the part of the act in regard to the air cushion vehicles and also those concerning the powers of the minister to deal with wrecks, fuel or cargo which is likely to cause pollution.

The amendment which was made by the committee deleting the section 495D as included in section 24 of this bill is merely to give the occasion to the department to reflect over the consequences of this very important provision.

Again, I want to say that the committee did an excellent job and served the public very well on this occasion.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—ORDER FOR RESUMING DEBATE STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the honourable Senator Hayden, seconded by the honourable Senator Langlois, for the second reading of the Bill C-165, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act".—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I was ready to proceed on this bill this afternoon, but it is unlikely we can complete the debate on second reading this week, certainly not today. In order to facilitate the work of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I ask that this item stand.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I do not want to say I cannot agree to this, but I might point out to Senator Flynn that if he is ready to speak now and if there is no one else to follow, this could mean that we could get the bill to the committee a little ahead of time.

I cannot guarantee what our period of adjournment next week will be. But in making plans for next week it looks as though we will have a fairly heavy load. It may be possible that we can complete our work in time to begin the Easter adjournment at the end of next week. That would presuppose that we will have dealt with some of the matters now before us. If we could proceed today with this measure, it would certainly meet my program of arrangements. If the senator does not feel he can proceed, I am in his hands.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I am willing to dispose of as many items as possible before the adjournment, but what I am suggesting to the leader is that it is unlikely that we will be able to dispose of this bill this week. There are others who want to speak on it and, therefore, it will go into next week. It is unlikely, I think, that we would be able to have the committee consider this bill before the adjournment. That is the reason I suggest it may be more useful for me to stand this item now, and give the committee a chance to deal with the other matters that have been referred to it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I hope it would not mean that we would not be able to deal with the bill before adjournment.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: There is no urgency about this bill because it is retroactive in any event. Even if we pass it when we come back after the Easter recess, it will be enforceable from the date of the budget speech.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: All right.

Hon. Mr. Croll: It does not make any difference in April?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, it makes no difference.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that item No. 6 stands?

Hon. Senators: Stand.

Order stands.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT (AGE OF VOTERS)

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 5, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Argue, for the second reading of Bill S-24, to amend the Canada Elections Act (Age of Voters).

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I yield to the Senator from Madawaska-Restigouche, who wishes to speak.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I know that time is late to go to committee, but I have only a few remarks to make on this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Mr. Speaker, when the mover of this resolution, honourable Senator Argue, introduced this bill he first accused the Conservatives of always being against lowering the age of voters.

I believe that Senator Argue must have been surprised when the first senator to support the bill was Senator Hollett. Moreover, I believe that the latter still sits on this side of the house and that he does not intend to move.

I must add that the remarks of the honourable Senators Argue, Hollett and Macdonald (Cape Breton) are generally quite relevant, but I think we must look further than that. I do not believe that the majority of our young people are ready to vote at the age of 18, because I consider voting as the key to democracy, or a passport into society, and to belong to democracy, as has often been said in this house, entails obligations on our part, obligations of a civic nature—

[English]

Hon. Fred M. Blois: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Can we not have translation while this speech is being given? Some of us are unable to follow what is being said, I am sorry to say.

The Hon. the Speaker: I hope that this trouble is only temporary, but I shall inquire right away.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: I do not think it is a defect in the system; I think there is no interpreter on hand.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): In a few minutes I will be changing lines.

[Translation]

We have often mentioned that there were sometimes disappointments in this Chamber; this is a good example of what I had in mind.

Hon. Mr. Martin: We certainly should have simultaneous interpretation. Does it work now?

[English]

I think the objection that has been taken is right, and I am sure, in fairness to both the speaker and to all senators, we want to make sure that the simultaneous translation is operating. This is the second time within a short period that this has happened. We ought to know why. I am sure it is not because of any inefficiency. It is working now.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Thank you. I was saying that democracy brings obligations: civic, religious and even moral obligations which are the structure of society itself. When the structure crumbles, society crumbles too.

However, before obtaining a passport or a key to enter society, we must have given evidence of ability, and established a sense of responsibility. Today, young people are disturbed by a development so rapid it has become dangerous for society; and that too often leads to retaliation, disorder and rebellion.

I understand that respect for the authority and fulfillment of obligations are sometimes not easily accepted. But it is the price a well-balanced society must pay; unfortunately, a great number of our young people find this funny. The free society many of them are dreaming of is heading straight ahead for a worldwide fiasco with disastrous results.

Let us not forget that it is easy to lose our freedom but, on the other hand, it would be extremely difficult to get it back if we ever lost it, as some European countries have found out. There are two roads: the road of freedom and the road of control. The road of freedom is democracy, and the other, the road of communism and socialism. Need I say more?

[English]

Honourable senators, Senator Hollett has mentioned the young people in the army, the young fishermen and the young lumbermen and the young members of our labour force. Senator Macdonald mentioned that he would be satisfied by a lowering of the age to 17 years.

I would say that young people today at the age of 12 know more about politics than I knew at my voting age. It is true that we have the tradition to vote from our heritage. In my early days there was very little interest in politics on the part of young people: we followed what our grandfather or father had decided was the way to vote. That is the way we did it, and I believe it was very good. Through better education, our young people are getting away from this habit.

Honourable senators, I am not worried about that group which has already accepted that sense of responsibility which is the key to our society. But when we read about these disorders in the universities, the lack of respect for authority, the disregard for the obligations which are part of a sound education, I wonder and I am troubled. I wonder more so, because these are the cream of our young generation.

This is the privileged group who will take over in the very near future. I am worried and I am asking myself, are they ready to accept the responsibility. This bill does not convince me that they are ready at the moment. I find it quite disturbing. I agree that some reforms are in order and I am quite confident that before very long the voting age will be lowered to 18. But where do we go from here? Should we deprive the good and responsible young people of the right to vote at 18, as mentioned by Senator Hollett? To that I say "no". On the other hand, I cannot support this bill in its original form. One reason is that I am not entirely sure whether this bill was not ill-conceived. I am not sure whether the Leader of the Government and those on the other side support it. I believe that if this bill were submitted through proper channels, I might have a different opinion. At the moment it is difficult for me to give it support, although I see something in it. I hope more senators will speak before this debate is closed.

Honourable senators, I am not suggesting any amendment. What I would suggest very strongly is that any of our boys who have joined the armed forces, and are at the age of 18, 19 or 20, who have been men enough to join up and to sign their names on the list, should have the right to vote. I believe there is a bill in the other place now to that effect. I think this should be considered by the people that those who are in the armed forces and wear the uniform should have the privilege of voting at the age of 18.

Furthermore, any young people who are taxpayers, who pay municipal taxes or income tax, who are part of our working force, who have left school and who are Canadian citizens and are part of our society, who work for a living and who pay into the provincial or federal treasuries some of that money which they have earned by their sweat, should be allowed to vote.

As regards our students in universities, I believe that some exceptions could be made, that the good students should be given the right to vote. It should be easy to keep records in the universities. On the other hand, the trouble makers, the people who cause disorders, those who do not want our society, who want a world of their own, they should not be given the right to vote. I know it would cause some problem as to how these persons would be sorted out. I am not dealing with that question. I can see some of the difficulties, but I think the aim should be to give the right to vote to those people I mentioned, when it is possible.

Honourable senators, in the Province of Quebec some two or three years ago—I do not have the specific date—the voting age was lowered to 18. It was thought that there would be great support for the party responsible, but we know what happened. Most of the young people, having got the right to vote, did not vote Conservative, they did not vote Liberal, they voted Independent, RIN, and for anything they could find in the Province of Quebec which was not for democracy. This is something we must keep in mind and be careful about.

In the Province of New Brunswick, at the last provincial election there was a referendum on the question of whether the young people should be allowed to vote, and the answer was three to one against giving them the right. On the other hand, it was not the young people there who were asked whether they should have the vote or not: it was the older people who were asked whether the young people should be allowed to vote.

If we look at the other side, we find that most young people are not asking for this right. It is the older people, some of us, who are trying to pick up a group of young people, for many reasons which you know as well as I do, trying to get them to themselves, by opening the doors to the vote, when the young people themselves are not asking for this right.

It is the irresponsible people who are asking for the right to vote, the hippies, the good-for-nothings, who will not accept or contribute to our society; it is the free lovers, the rebels, sponsored by the communist parties. Those are the people who seek it. Let us be careful and take conscience of what we are doing. Are we going to walk hand in hand with the communists? Let us take our time. It is better to be sure today than be sorry tomorrow.

On the first occasion, perhaps at the next election, it would be easy to add another line on the voting paper, as they did in the Province of Quebec, for a referendum on this matter, asking the Canadian people if they want the young people to have an earlier right to vote. If the Canadian people agree to this, I will go along with it. If the Canadian people do not agree, then we could let it stand for some time. It is a matter which should not be decided by the Senate, but should be decided by the elected representatives in the other house or by the Canadian people at large.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 20, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-157, to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 9: Insert the following next after clause 12 and renumber clauses 13 and 14 as clauses 14 and 15 respectively:

"Appeal Procedure

13. The provisions of section 9 of the Hazardous Products Act apply mutatis mutandis in respect of any order made under this Act that directly affects the rights or interests of any person, as if that section were incorporated in this Act and as if the words "Control Products Board of Review" were substituted for the words "Hazardous Products Board of Review" in subsections (1) and (2) of that section."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden, with leave of the Senate, moved that the report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, the amendment made by the committee to this bill is simple in its terms. The bill provides for the regulation and registration of what are called control products, and it also provides authority under which the product might be de-registered at any time. This could be a matter of substantial concern to those manufacturers, for instance, who may have been manufacturing their product in conformity with a formulation which carried the approval of the department. The committee felt that if there existed such an arbitary power to de-register, which really means that the product becomes a prohibited product, there should then be some provision for review of that decision and, therefore, it incorporated such a provision in the bill.

In the interest of simplicity and speed, the committee incorporated that provision by means of a mutatis mutandis section, by which the provision for a Board of Review under the Hazardous Products Act will apply in connection with any review under this bill. That is what the language of the amendment means. It simply provides a right to review a decision, for instance, to de-register products, or other decisions made under this bill.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PESTICIDE RESIDUE COMPENSATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Clause 5: Strike out subclauses (1), (2) and (3) thereof and substitute therefor:

"(1) Where he deems it necessary the Minister may require as a condition for the payment of any compensation to a farmer under this Act, the consent of the farmer for the Minister to pursue any action that the farmer may have in law against any person whose act or omission resulted in or contributed to the presence of the pesticide residue in or upon an agricultural product.

(2) Where the Minister receives, as the result of any action taken by him pursuant to subsection (1), an amount of any judgment for damages in excess of the amount paid or to be paid to the farmer in compensation, he shall reimburse the farmer to the extent of such excess.

(3) The Minister shall in paying compensation take into account any amounts realized by the farmer in any action in law the farmer may have pursued against any person whose act or omission resulted in or contributed to the presence of the pesticide residue in or upon the agricultural product.".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden, with leave of the Senate, moved that the report be taken into consideration now.

He said: Honourable senators, as you know, Bill C-155 deals with the provision of compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by what is called pesticide residue. It also provides for appeals from compensation awards.

The substance of the amendment is this. A farmer might put forward a claim for compensation because a degree of pesticide residue has been detected in his product, such as carrots, tomatoes or cabbages. Under the Food and Drugs Act such a product would be classified as adulterated and could not be sold. In those circumstances this bill is to provide compensation within certain limits, and the conditions to be satisfied under the bill are these. There must be a ruling or decision by the Food and Drugs Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare that the product is in that sense an adulterated product; then the further condition must be satisfied that the pesticide residue which occurs in this agricultural product has not been caused by any fault or negligence on the part of the farmer or producer.

In a later section of the bill provision was made that in order to be entitled to compensation the minister might require, as a condition of getting such compensation, that the farmer take proceedings against the manufacturer of the product in a case where the infestation, or whatever you wish to call it, might be traced to something in connection with the formulation of the pesticide used.

In another subsection provision was made for what we as lawyers recognize as the doctrine of subrogation. That is, there was a provision under which the minister himself might require, as a basis before paying compensation, the farmer's consent to the taking of an action in his name against the person who may be responsible for producing the pesticide residue.

In the opinion of the committee it was too onerous an obligation to impose on the farmer—who may be located in the country far away from the courts—as a condition of getting compensation, that he must in his own name start and put forward such an action.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: At his own cost?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Yes. Therefore, we amended the bill by striking out that provision and leaving in the provision for subrogation. In other words, if the minister feels that there is a manufacturer who is blameworthy in connection with the contamination of the article and therefore its prohibition for sale, he may, as a condition of payment of compensation to the farmer, demand a consent from the farmer, so that the minister may, in the name of the farmer, prosecute an action against the negligent person and secure a judgment, if he can make out that kind of a case. The minister, in such an action, might obtain a judgment for a greater amount in damages than the amount of the compensation which the minister would pay or agree to pay to the farmer. That could arise because, under this bill, there is a minimum amount of compensation below which the minister has no obligation to pay any amount; and there is also a maximum. Operating in that area, the minister may arrive at an amount of compensation which, we were told in committee, could be of the order of, say, 80 per cent of the retail or sale value. So, it is quite conceivable that in an action for damages a larger judgment might be obtained than the amount of compensation to which the farmer was entitled.

In those circumstances, since it was the farmer who had suffered, we felt that when the Government was reimbursed for what it had agreed to pay or had paid to the farmer, the excess in the judgment should be paid to the farmer, and we have so provided in this amendment.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I believe the amendment suggested by the committee is indeed a good one. It occurred to me, however, that the problem might arise as to whether the minister, when he collects in excess of the amount of the award he has paid, would be entitled to deduct his costs for exercising the action for which he has been subrogated. However, I do not think we need provide anything in the bill in that respect. It could be included in the form of subrogation. It would be only fair that, if the farmer does not take the risk of taking an action, the minister should not be penalized for doing so in his place; and the minister should be entitled to take from the excess the amount of his own costs in recovering from the third party.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: In answer to my friend's suggestion, this matter was discussed in committee. In framing the second subsection in the amendment of section 5, we did provide that where the minister receives, as the result of any action taken by him pursuant to subsection 1, an amount of any judgment for damages—and you notice it is "judgment for damages"—in excess of the amount paid or to be paid to the farmer in compensation, he would reimburse the farmer to the extent of such excess.

As lawyers know, a judgment for damages is one thing. You may get X dollars for damages, but then it carries with it the right to be paid your costs on a party and party basis, but that is an additional amount and those costs can be taxed. When they are taxed and the person against whom they are taxed is obligated to pay them, that is not part of the amount of the judgment for damages.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was thinking of the fees in respect of solicitor and client.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: We discussed that too. Our thought was that if an action were being taken by the minister, he has a staff of lawyers, and the tariff of costs on a solicitor and client basis are greater than on a party and party basis. However, this is a matter that is peculiarly within the hands of the minister.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It could probably be taken care of in the form of subrogation. That is why I suggested there was no necessity to mention them in the amendment. It is just for the information of the other place, when they consider the amendment.

Hon. Mr. Hayden: That is right, yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Does the Leader of the Opposition agree that it is wise to have the wording the way it is suggested by the Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes; that is what I say.

Report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Hayden moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT CURRENCY, MINT AND EXCHANGE FUND ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Salter A. Hayden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-138, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, before making the motion for the date of reconvening, I would like to indicate, because our objective is to adjourn for the Easter recess on Friday next, that it appears that the program next week will be fairly heavy. I anticipate that a number of bills now in the other place will be before us by then—the Superannuation Bill, the Financial Administration Bill, and the Government Organization Bill, and possibly others. We will also have to deal with an interim supply bill. Nevertheless, I think we can accomplish this program, or least as much of it as the Government is desirous of having dealt with before the Easter recess. I am not at the moment in a position to say how long the Easter recess will be. I hope to be able to give you more information on that Wednesday next when we will have an opportunity to judge the progress made.

Therefore, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I move, seconded by Senator Langlois that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 25th, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

I should also indicate that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, dealing with hate propaganda, intends to sit that day during the sitting of the house, and will be asking special leave of the Senate for that purpose. I also understand that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will not be meeting on Tuesday morning. Nevertheless, as I have said, I think we can anticipate that it will be a fairly heavy week.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I can inform the Leader of the Government that as far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we will do our best to accommodate ourselves to the program which has been outlined. I think it should not pose too great a problem to dispose of the legislation that needs to be passed before the adjournment. I suggest that the main thing will be to have the other place send us the interim supply bill so that it can be passed by this place next Thursday or Friday. If this were done we would be in a position to adjourn on either Thursday or Friday for the Easter recess. Some of the other bills the leader has mentioned can be dealt with rather speedily, I think.

As I have mentioned before, I doubt that it will be possible to deal with the Estates Tax Bill before Easter. Furthermore, several amendments have been suggested by members on the other side of the house and it will be useful to give time to the Department of Finance to consider them so that they can be dealt with adequately when the bill is referred to committee, if it is so referred.

Hon. Mr. Cameron: Is it the intention of the house to sit Tuesday evening as well?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Grosart: Is it the intention to refer the interim supply bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I think so, yes.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate, that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be empowered to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, 25 March, 1969.

Motion agreed to.

TASK FORCES AND COMMITTEES OF INQUIRY

APPOINTMENT, PERSONNEL, REPORTS AND COST—INQUIRY ANSWERED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, pursuant to notice of inquiry, requested the following information in respect to:

1. Committee on Election Expenses.
2. Agriculture Task Force.
3. Task Force on Housing and Urban Development.
4. Task Force on Sport for Canadians.
5. Labour Relations Task Force.
6. Committee of Inquiry into the Unemployment Insurance Act:
(a) Date of Appointment.
(b) Name and Occupation of each Committee or Task Force Member.
(c) Date of Interim or Final Reports, and
(d) Cost of each Committee or Task Force to December 31, 1968.

Hon. Paul Martin: Answered.

THE SENATE

USE OF SENATE CHAMBER BY COMMITTEES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck moved, pursuant to notice:

That the Senate considers it desirable that the Senate Chamber be fully used for meetings of Senate Committees and other bodies;

That rules governing such use be prepared by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for adoption by the Senate; and

That the Speaker be empowered to grant or withhold permission for such use of the Senate Chamber and to administer the rules relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I have already spoken on this question and I have no desire to say anything further. I have said all I require to say, and I hope that what I said previously, whether in order or out of order, may be considered as part of the present debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, because of what happened yesterday, and in order that we may proceed in an orderly fashion, I must say that although the honourable Senator Roebuck spoke on this motion yesterday and has again spoken on it now, this does not conclude the debate.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, my remarks will be brief.

I am opposed to the motion by the honourable senator which, if passed, would mean that this chamber would be used for committee work. I have carefully read the honourable senator's remarks in Hansard, and I am unable to find even one reason for the use of this chamber as a committee room.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. White: I fear that its use as a committee room might result in this chamber being turned into a theatre.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, this debate affords me the opportunity of raising the whole question of the use of the Senate committee rooms. I am opposed to this motion to use this chamber as a committee room.

The other day I was in attendance at a meeting in Room 256-S when nearby a very noisy party was in progress. Room 356-S was not being used at that time.

In this building we have four rooms which are used for committee meetings: Room 256-S, Room 356-S, the Smoking Room and the Reading Room, only one of which has simultaneous interpretation facilities. Room 256-S is a very inadequately equipped room for committee work, the acoustics are poor and the chairs uncomfortable. Room 356-S has air conditioning, is well lighted, has simultaneous interpretation facilities and comfortable chairs.

The Smoking Room is used for committees consisting of a small number of members in which we do not hear witnesses, and is suitable for that purpose. In fact, the Rules Committee met there many times.

The Reading Room, immediately behind this chamber, is a make-shift committee room and does not serve that purpose efficiently; it is very run down.

Honourable senators, my suggestion is that the committee chairmen and the Whips should arrange some orderly method by which the committee rooms can best be used. Why should Room 356-S stand idle while we are sitting in make-shift accommodation such as the reading Room or the poorly equipped Room 256-S?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Haig: There should be some coordination so that committee work can be arranged in an orderly fashion. We have the Foreign Affairs Committee meeting on Tuesday, and Banking, Trade and Commerce on Wednesday—there being other committees to be fitted in. Why should we have placed on our desks every day two or three yellow slips informing us of meetings of committees? This affects me personally because Senator Macdonald, who sits directly beside me, gets annoyed when I receive two notices and he receives only one. I do not think that is fair to Senator Macdonald!

The leaders or their representatives, or the Whips, should get together to organize the proper use of our committee rooms. I repeat that I am against using this chamber as a committee room.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I have great respect for the sponsor of this motion, but I must say to him that I oppose it. Where tradition is concerned I am not usually too conservative in my views.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Small "c"!

Hon. Mr. Benidickson: Yes, small "c". However, I do not think the time has yet arrived when we need to use this chamber for committee meetings. Of course, reference is made in the motion to "other bodies". If we were hosting an international conference, or a body of that nature, I think the prestige of this chamber should be afforded them.

After reading the newspaper report on it, I did make it my business to inspect the splendid, modern committee room we have on the third floor. As it happens, of the committees that I belong to, only one, Banking, Trade and Commerce, meets almost invariably in the room on the second floor, of which we have heard some earlier complaints. Until today, I have not been obliged to attend a committee meeting in this splendidly equipped new committee room on the third floor. Together with two other honourable senators who are fellow members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, I went up to Room 356-S after a meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee on the second floor, for the express purpose of seeing the new facilities in use, but unfortunately the Banking and Commerce Committee had adjourned.

I cannot believe that our accommodation is so inadequate that we need to encroach upon the facilities of this chamber, except, as I say, perhaps for certain international functions when the Senate is in adjournment. I notice that Senator Roebuck's motion includes a provision that the Speaker has control, and has a reference to "other bodies" under the jurisdiction of the Speaker. However, honourable senators, I do not think I can support this motion at the present time because we have other rooms that can be used, and this renders unnecessary the use of this chamber in a routine way by a body that is something less than prestigous.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that this debate be adjourned until April 22 next.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is very indicative.

Hon. Mr. Martin: No conclusions should be drawn from the motion.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, will you permit me to make a few remarks about this matter, even though it has been disposed of?

There were some questions asked as to the past practice with respect to the use of this chamber. I have had some research done, and can now inform the Senate that when Parliament is not in session—and that includes, of course, both houses of Parliament—it has been left to the best judgment of the Speaker to decide whether the chamber should be used for meetings of an international character. In this respect I refer to the meeting that will be held in September, when Canada will be the host to a meeting of the Speakers of the Commonwealth Parliaments. Because of the prestige of this house, I have been asked if these meetings can take place in this chamber and, using my best judgment, I have agreed to this on the condition that we are not in session at the time.

When Parliament is sitting—and all honourable senators may not be aware of this—any honourable senator can use the desk which bears his name at any time of the day. So, when Parliament is sitting this chamber belongs to all honourable senators, and only the Senate itself can give permission for another use to be made of it.

I am putting these remarks on the record, the debate having been adjourned until April 22, so that all honourable senators will be able to take these facts into consideration during the interval.

NEWSPAPER REPORT

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Malcolm Hollett: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I rise, with great regret, on a question of privilege. I hold in my hand yesterday's issue of a newspaper published in Ottawa, and a clipping from another newspaper published in Ottawa, which contain an article that upset me very much. I am sure it will upset you. It is by the Canadian Press, and it reads:

> Senate Heats Up Over Hate.
> An angry bout of name-calling erupted in a Senate committee Tuesday during discussion of draft legislation designed to outlaw hate propaganda.
> Senator Malcolm Hollett (PC-Newfoundland)...

And that is me, as I think you all understand.

> ...turned on Senator David Croll (Liberal-Ontario) after a buildup of antagonism that upset the customary pattern of senatorial politeness.
> Senator Hollett called Senator Croll, Canada's first Jewish Senator, a "hypocrite" and "the phoniest person in the Senate."
>
> Senator Arthur Roebuck (Liberal-Ontario), at 91 dean of the upper chamber and chairman of the committee on justice and legal affairs, appeared stunned as Senators Hollett, Croll and Lionel Choquette (Liberal-Ontario) argued.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Liberal?

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Hon. Mr. Hollett: The article continues:

> Finally, Senator Roebuck stood up and said, "Gentlemen, stop it."
>
> The argument ceased.
> The outburst came when Senator Croll tried to check Senator Choquette who, with Senator Hollett, had been sharply criticizing the draft bill and closely questioning special witnesses, including executives of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege to tell you that I did not make any reference whatsoever to Senator Croll. I did not fall out with him. I did not say he was a hypocrite, or the phoniest person in the Senate. I made no remark relative to him whatsoever.

I spent most of last evening in the House of Commons listening to the excellent debate there, and I might tell the honourable senators on the other side of this house that I was greatly pleased by the speech made by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister in respect of the American anti-ballistic missile defence system. When I arrived home my wife gave me this newspaper, and I was not very pleased to read the article to which I have drawn your attention. I telephoned the offices of this newspapers, and also the Canadian Press, who apologized very sincerely. I told them that I had said nothing about Senator Croll, and that in any event I would not say anything like that because I have great respect for Senator Croll. Even if I did not have respect for him, I would not get up in a public committee and say these things—not unless I was inspired by something which inspires people.

I want honourable senators to know that I said no such thing, and I will not stand for the Canadian Press attributing these things to me. As I have said, I called the Canadian Press about this matter and they apologized, and said they would call me back. They did call me back, at which time they were pleased to tell me what the trouble was, namely, that they had had an inexperienced reporter in the committee room at the time. I cannot tell you what I said to them about their having an inexperienced man attending the meeting of the committee but I was very indignant, and at this moment I feel badly about it.

I feel like resigning from the six or seven committees of which I am a member. If a senator cannot attend a committee meeting without fear of being blasted out of existence by some reporter who is inexperienced, then it is better not to attend.

I must say that I do not see much reason for having reporters, particularly those of the Canadian Press—and I am not criticizing them, because they are a great institution—present at meetings of the Senate committees. I see no reason why there should be various reporters present at these committee meetings.

On Tuesday we sat in that committee for about two hours, during which we had before us three representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress, who told us they represented about one and three-quarter million workers. They did a wonderful job in presenting their brief to the committee, yet that reporter who was there wrote nothing whatsoever about the brief. All he wrote about was what Senator Hollett was supposed to have called Senator Croll. I deny that I ever said it, and I want Canada and the world to know it.

I must say that the Canadian Press were very good when they discovered I had not made these remarks. They assured me they would wire every newspaper across Canada to deny that I had said such a thing.

Honourable senators, that is the question of privilege on which I rise. I think some steps should be taken to regulate the reporting of committees. Why did the reporter not confirm with me whether I used these nasty words about another senator instead of just making his report and getting the newspapers across Canada into trouble? Some steps must be taken. I must say, I agree entirely with Senator Davey's motion on mass public communication. This whole subject should be examined. If a man cannot attend committee meetings without getting into difficulties we should do without committees altogether. We are now considering having more committees, and even having committee meetings in this chamber.

I would ask the honourable chairman of that committee, Senator Roebuck, if he will kindly tell the Senate that what I have now said is correct and that I used no such words as are attributed to me.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: Honourable senators, I am very glad indeed to be able to support the honourable senator in his denial of having made use of these words. He said nothing of the kind, nor, so far as I know, did he join in the little hassle that took place on that occasion. He is perfectly justified in his protest.

On the other hand, I think it only fair to the newspaper to say that the words of which he complains were used. The mistake made by the newspaper was in attributing those words to the wrong person, which of course should not have happened.

I would like to add that I have glanced through the official report of the committee meeting, which is quite voluminous and has not yet been printed, which completely supports what Senator Hollett has been saying. It not only supports him but gives the full account of what took place on that occasion.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois, for Hon. Salter A. Hayden, moved the third reading of Bill S-29, respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-23, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I hope not to detain the house very long. Because I share the views already expressed, I do not intend to re-hash the objections and criticisms made by previous speakers to this bill, except in one respect. I refer to the criticism made by Senator Phillips (Rigaud) on the granting of exemption from gift tax to gifts between spouses without attention being paid to section 1265 of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec, which prohibits gifts between spouses after marriage unless in accordance with the marriage contract entered into before marriage.

If and when this bill goes to committee, I would like the most serious consideration to be given to the suggestion made by Senator Phillips to maintain the present rate or grant a reduction in the proposed rates to Quebeckers as long as the prohibition of Article 1265 of the Civil Code is there.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Is that the section which deals with community property?

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Article 1265 prohibits gifts between spouses married under the separation of property unless in the marriage contract such a gift has been provided. Usually young people who get married cannot provide very large gifts in a marriage contract. Now, the present provision would exempt up to $60,000, I understand. The remainder, only in the survivor's estate, would be taxable eventually. Therefore, there is no possibility for Quebeckers who are married under the system of the separation of property, to take advantage of the exemption which is provided in this bill, and which I think is the only good thing in the bill. They cannot take advantage of it.

I am merely suggesting that if we go to committee with this bill, consideration should be given to trying to equalize opportunities so that those who are prohibited by Article 1265 of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec may take advantage of what was intended in this bill.

Before I touch on my main point about this bill I want to say that I am rather surprised no one yet has spoken in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The debate is not over, of course.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: No, but I hope that those who support the bill and who think this legislation is good will reply to the criticism and objections which have been made. It has been a one-sided debate. Even the sponsor of the bill has not done more than give a very clear explanation—the usual explanation that Senator Hayden gives of any bill—for which we are indebted to him. His speech does not indicate any commendation of the bill. On the contrary, I suggest that there are strong reservations in the mind of Senator Hayden. No one has yet told us that this bill is a good bill and should be adopted. I hope that some of those who intend to support the bill will stand up and say so, otherwise the normal decision of the Senate should be to vote it down. That is what I would expect if the debate continues in the same vein as it has been going.

Hon. Mr. Martin: I would expect that my speech would change all of that.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I would expect that. I am sure that the one speech, if it is given by the Leader of the Government, would change the whole climate—I will not insist on this—because of the particular influence that the leader has on this chamber.

There is one main point that I want to make against this bill. It has been touched on only indirectly by I think one who has taken part in the debate, and this would lead me to the conclusion that this bill is inopportune, ill-timed and should not have been introduced under the present circumstances. The reason is that it touches on a matter affecting the federal-provincial relations at a time when the Constitution is under review. As you know, honourable senators, the estate tax is one which has been initiated by the provinces. It has always been considered in practice as being the exclusive field of the legislatures. Of course, it is a direct tax but it is also one which affects directly property and civil rights.

The federal Government never entered this field until the last World War. At that time, because of the heavy financial requirements of the war, it asked the provinces to give up their rights in this taxation field for the duration of the war, in lieu of certain compensation. All the provinces agreed, but then the war ended and history repeated itself in the way that we had witnessed after the first World War with regard to income tax. One remembers that when income tax was introduced during that war the then Minister of Finance was very apologetic. He said that it was only on a temporary basis that the federal Government was taxing income, and that as soon as the war was over it would get out of this tax field because it considered it to be one belonging to the provinces. Whether he was right or wrong is not important for the conclusion to which I will come later. In any event, after World War II the federal Government did not vacate the field of estate tax any more than it vacated the income tax field after World War I. It made arrangements with some of the provinces, and the majority of them agreed to continue to give complete authority to the federal Government in lieu of some compensation. As honourable senators know, many provinces objected, especially Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia, and I am not sure about Alberta.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes, Alberta too.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: These provinces objected strongly to the federal Government remaining in this traditionally provincial field of taxation. For several years now we have been making a review of our Constitution and, other than the sharing of legislative authority, the big problem is the division of taxation fields as between the provinces and the dominion.

Hon. Mr. Martin: The spending power.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: The spending power. When discussing these problems, the provinces I mentioned indicated strongly that they hoped the federal Government would get out of the estate tax field.

I am not rejecting at this time the proposition made by Senator Phillips that estate tax should be a federal tax in a new Constitution. He may be right in this respect, but a new Constitution will be the result of negotiations. It will be a package deal. If the federal Government keeps the estate tax it will have to give to the provinces compensation in other fields. I am not saying at this time that definitely under the new Constitution the estate tax should be a provincial tax. What I am saying is that the federal Government, after many people in many provinces were convinced that it was going to get out of the estate tax, has now reversed its stand and is only occupying the field for merely strategic purposes—and this is my conviction—at a time when we are reviewing the Constitution and discussing the sharing of taxation powers. I think the Government or its advisors are not acting in good faith. They are not helping to create a favourable climate in the negotiations that are going on.

Another argument has been put, that we should have waited for the report of the White Paper on taxation. The Government is not really occupying this field because it needs money. It has been proven, and I think it would be proven in committee, that the Government will draw very little from this source, after returning to the provinces their share, and after paying for the cost of administration. It could certainly have found other sources from which to balance the budget than the amount it will draw from the increase in the estates tax.

It is a very substantial increase in so far as the taxpayer is concerned, but it is not a very substantial increase in so far as the federal treasury is concerned. I think this bill was only to put before the provinces a fait accompli. It was put forward merely to prevent some demands from the provinces, or in order to be in a better bargaining position.

Honourable senators, I regret very much that this bill will not assist the negotiations. The Government would have done much better to wait for the progress in the constitutional talks, to wait for the review of the discussion on sharing in the taxation field, before it started on this very delicate matter. This has always been a sore point with many provinces.

This is a bad bill, as the reasons given by the previous speakers indicate—except, again, for the exemption. It would have been better not to have had the act at all, even losing the benefit of the exemption granted to spouses for gifts between them. I say the Government would have been wiser, it would have acted in better faith, and it would have helped to improve the position between the provinces in the present constitutional talks, if it had waited.

For those reasons and for others which have been given, I have to oppose this bill. If it passes, I hope that the improvements which have been suggested will be made in committee. On a matter of principle, I think the Senate would render great service to this country—perhaps not to the federal Government as such, but to this country—in voting the bill down.

On motion of Hon. Mr. White, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 25, at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 25, 1969

The Senate met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS

SUPPLEMENTARY RETURN PRESENTED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in accordance with the motion adopted by the Senate on October 29, 1968, I have the honour to table herewith a supplementary list of names of members of the Senate who have renewed their declaration of property qualification.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-172, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1969

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-173, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Leopold Langlois, with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1969

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-178, to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Azellus Denis, with leave of the Senate, moved the second reading of the bill.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, the present bill which I have the honour to introduce with a view to having it passed, could rightly be called an omnibus bill, since it amends five existing pension acts, thus reducing the number of bills which otherwise would have had to be introduced in this house.

On reading this bill, you must have noticed that amendments to the various acts are similar in nature and deal especially with administrative questions, correction of anomalies, definitions of terms. At the same time they aim to adjust those acts to others passed in recent years, such as the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act and the Canada Pension Plan, and aim to standardize the various retirement plans, to clarify and simplify them and to provide some supplementary benefits to the contributors.

At this stage, I do not intend to dwell on each class of this bill. Experts will do it better than I when the bill is considered by the committee. However, let it suffice to point out some of the advantages that are to be found either for the contributor or for the administration in implementing the amended laws.

We find that the male contributor in the Canadian Forces as well as the one in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will pay 6½ per cent of his pay instead of 6 per cent, less an amount equal to the amount he would be required to contribute under the Canada Pension Plan. This rate is also required from the contributors in the Public Service.

[English]

The reason for the changes in the rate of these contributions is based on a recent actuarial report indicating a need for such changes. The changes are also required partly because of the cost of the benefit improvements which are proposed in a number of clauses of this bill.

[Translation]

The contribution rate for the female members of the Canadian Forces is reduced to 5 per cent and this is the rate now required by the public service.

This bill provides an allowance for the children at the death of a contributor until the child has reached 25 years of age, if he is attending school, while formerly the statute restricted those allowances to children up to 18 years.

The widow, who lost that allowance when she remarried and got it back after the death of her new spouse may, under that bill, obtain the allowance in the case of a dissolution or an annulment of the marriage.

This bill strikes out the clause providing a reduction of the amount of the annuity to which a contributor is entitled under the legislation when he is entitled to a disability pension under the Canada Pension Plan, upon application.

The bill also contains a clause enabling to assume death in cases of disappearance of persons to whom a benefit was payable. That provision which can be found in the Public Service Superannuation Act will also be applied to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act.

Another clause provides that when the monthly pension is less than $10, the delay to exercise an option in favour of a capitalized amount instead of a monthly pension will begin following the notice of the minister advising the recipient about the pension, while formerly that delay began on the very day he acquired that right.

Another provision of the present bill authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations outlining the circumstances under which service during the war by a civilian contributor must be considered continued service.

Those are the comments I wish to make on second reading of this bill.

There are also other interesting provisions concerning the administration and application of the statutes amended by Bill C-178, or for the benefit of a contributor, and honourable senators will certainly have the opportunity in committee to get the information they wish, at the time of the clause by clause study, with the help of Government officials.

Upon reading the legislation, honourable senators will see that it refers to half a dozen existing statutes, notably the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, the Canadian Forces Reorganization Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the National Defence Act, and the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. So I ask honourable senators to be indulgent, because within a few days I would have had to study and know by heart all those statutes to answer every question that could be asked of me and which arise from them. However, with the help of our able officials in Ottawa and higher authorities, I am sure we shall satisfy the curiosity of all because, in committee, you will have the opportunity of consulting experts in this field.

[English]

Honourable senators, we hope that in the near future means will be found to improve the situation of all pensioners covered by the social security measures.

The Prime Minister stated that he had arranged a thorough review of the cost and benefits involved in our social security system. He said that this report will take into account the question of difficulties now being experienced by those living on pension; and the question of increasing the pension of retired public servants was included in this general review to which the Prime Minister referred. That report has been received and is being studied by the Government at present.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have the honour to move the second reading of the bill, so that it may then be referred to a committee for consideration.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Could the honourable senator tell us when we will receive a copy of this bill?

Hon. Mr. Denis: If I am not mistaken, honorable senators, the bill was passed on third reading last night in the other place and I am sure that we shall receive it shortly. At any rate, I believe that copies of the first draft of this bill are available, but the new version should include the amendments moved and passed in committee of the whole at the other place, and which have now been tabled.

[English]

On motion of Hon. Mr. Macdonald, for Hon. Mr. Choquette, debate adjourned until later this day.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Leopold Langlois tabled:

Report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967. (English and French texts).

Order in Council P.C. 1969-389, dated February 27, 1969, authorizing, under section 21A of the Export Credits Insurance Act, long-term financing by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation to the President of Pakistan for the purchase of diesel-electric locomotives, spare parts and services from MLW-Wortington, Limited, Montreal, Quebec, pursuant to section 21B of the said Act, chapter 105, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1960-61. (English and French texts).

Report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, together with a Statement of its Accounts certified by the Auditors, for the year ended December 31, 1968, pursuant to section 33 of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, chapter 46, and sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Report of Operations under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968, pursuant to section 6 of the said Act, chapter 25, Statutes of Canada, 1957-58. (English and French texts).

GRAIN MOVEMENT

NUMBER OF REVENUE FREIGHT CAR LOADINGS FOR GRAIN AND OTHER COMMODITIES—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Hon. Hazen Argue:

1. What was the number of revenue freight cars loaded in Canada in each week of November and December in the years 1966, 1967 and 1968, and in each week of January in the years 1967, 1968 and 1969,

(a) in the Western Division, and

(b) in the Eastern Division?

2. What was the number of carloadings in the Western Division in each week of November and December in the years 1966, 1967 and 1968, and in each week of January in the years 1967, 1968 and 1969,

(a) for wheat, and

(b) for other grains?

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask when I might expect an answer to this inquiry, which has been on the Order Paper since February 27. In my view this is an important question because it seeks to bring forward information that I feel will show that the railways, in fact, fell down on the job of hauling grain within the last few months.

Honourable senators, I have made it my business to find out whether these statistics are published and are available. They are available from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I believe that the last figure asked for should have been available as public information about three weeks ago.

It makes a mockery of the Senate itself to have a question that is simple to answer on the Order Paper for such a long time, when the information is readily available. This inquiry should have been answered forthwith.

I know that the honourable Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) and the acting Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Langlois) do everything they can to have inquiries answered. I would ask the acting Leader to inquire when I might expect an answer.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I shall be pleased to look into the matter, and to expedite the supplying of the information sought.

Inquiry stands.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REVENUE FROM FILMS "THE ERNIE GAME" AND "WAITING FOR CAROLINE"—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Hon. Edgar Fournier:

1. What was the revenue to March 1, 1969, from the film entitled "The Ernie Game" shown on television November 8, 1967, on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation program "Festival"?

2. What was the revenue to March 1, 1969, from the film entitled "Waiting for Caroline" shown on television November 29, 1967, on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation program "Festival"?

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, my feelings are the same as those of Senator Argue. This inquiry has been on the Order Paper since March 4, and I cannot believe that the revenue in respect of these films is so great that this inquiry presents a problem to the C.B.C. I have asked a simple question, and surely the answer to it involves simply looking at the books or records of the C.B.C. This long delay gives the administrators of the Corporation a very poor image.

I do not blame the honourable Leader of the Government, because I know he has done his work. He has made his request, but the answer has not been forthcoming.

[Translation]

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Honourable senators, I am happy to repeat the commitment I made to Senator Argue, that I shall make every effort to secure the reports requested by him.

Inquiry stands.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William J. Petten moved the third reading of Bill C-157, to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals, as amended.

Motion agreed to and bill as amended read third time and passed.

PESTICIDE RESIDUE COMPENSATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards, as amended.

Motion agreed to and bill as amended read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 13, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. George S. White: Honourable senators, it is with some hesitation that I rise to take part in this debate because all the previous speakers are corporation lawyers who deal with estates amounting to millions or hundreds of thousands of dollars, whereas I am just a country lawyer with some slight experience of gifts and estates of a few thousands of dollars. I have always lived in the country, and have had the usual practice of a country lawyer.

I admit that I am very old-fashioned in my thinking, because I have always been opposed to the imposition of succession duties, inheritance taxes and estate taxes of any nature by any government. Succession duty and estate tax have been described as a tax that robs the dead; it involves the tax collector hounding the grave. Another definition describes succession duty and estate tax as legalized robbery. I agree entirely with both definitions.

Previous speakers have covered in a most complete and capable manner the effect of this bill on the future of family farms, ranches and small businesses. They have given many examples of the effect of the new gift taxes and have dealt with the timing of this bill. I will not repeat their remarks, but simply state that I agree entirely with their views.

I was a member of the House of Commons in 1941 when the Dominion Succession Duty Act was passed. While it was not definitely stated, it was more or less understood that it was a war measure and would disappear at the end of the war. Of course, I was younger in those days and more of an optimist. I should have remembered what happened to the temporary war measure passed in 1917, known as the Income Tax Act. I was opposed in 1941 to the Dominion Succession Duty Act. I opposed the Estates Tax Act when it was introduced in 1959. I feel that all succession duty, inheritance and estate taxes should be left to the provincial governments.

Honourable senators of the legal profession have had much experience in the administration of estates. They know only too well just how heavily provincial succession duty, estate tax and income tax bear on an estate. They know only too well that in many estates no funds are available to pay these taxes. Estate tax and succession duties have an adverse effect on the volume of saving and re-investment. The abolition of these taxes would encourage the ownership of Canadian industry by Canadians.

Death duties imposed by any government penalize those who rightly think it is their responsibility and duty to provide for their own kith and kin. Most taxes are levied on what is earned and consumed. Estate taxes are levied simply because a person, having made his contribution in these and other respects, dies. The federal Government and three of the provincial governments tax estates. Aside from the consideration of principle, there is the real question whether, in the long run, more is being lost than is being gained.

Much capital was driven out of the country before this bill was introduced. This bill with higher taxes will tend to drive many more persons and much more capital out of this country to tax havens in less grasping countries. When individuals leave this country and take their capital with them, they also take with them initiative and a measure of prosperity.

Hounding the grave is not taxation—it is simply grasping at fruits of individual enterprise and thrift for the benefit of governing bodies who save nothing. Whether succession duties and estate taxes are collected to provide spending money or to reduce the finances of citizens nearer to a common level, they tend to destroy individual initiative and responsibility. It is doubtful if such taxes have produced revenue nearly sufficient to compensate for the initiative and resulting other revenues they have destroyed. Succession duties and estate taxes were never a soundly based tax. These taxes may have satisfied the politicians' desire to show that they were not afraid to soak the rich—now other taxes are preventing people from becoming rich. When death comes, it is often necessary to sell the business the deceased has built up in order to pay taxes on his estate. The desirability of encouraging small businesses and family-owned businesses is a favourite topic of all politicians. Yet small businesses are frequently forced by succession duty and estate taxes on to the auction block. Who buys them? They are usually scooped up by big business—often foreign controlled—because no one else can afford to buy them.

The inequity of these taxes is nationwide, although the degree varies. Three provinces have succession duty acts, but the federal Government allows only partial credit on moneys paid to the province when it collects under the Estate Tax Act. The result is that it is cheaper to die, say, in Manitoba than in Ontario or Quebec, provided that the estate is owned in the province of residence at the time of death.

These taxes diminish the fund of capital needed by Canada to finance the industrial expansion that alone can provide the increasing number of jobs that must be created now and in the future to care for the yearly increase in the labour force. In a country always short of capital, it is folly to dissipate accumulated wealth by taxation.

This act imposes taxes that amount to confiscation. In many estates the testator, by his own initiative and hard work, built up a substantial estate. In building up that estate he already has paid heavy income taxes on every dollar forming part of his estate. In payment of income taxes he has made his contribution to the federal exchequer, but on his death the federal Government, under this act, by means of legalized robbery makes another raid on the estate.

I would like to ask Senator Hayden, the sponsor of the bill, when he closes the debate, to answer some questions. Perhaps it is my fault that I have not got it clear, but there may be some other senators also in doubt.

Under this act, in an estate of $250,000, where one-half the estate goes to the widow and the other half to the children, there is no tax on the one-half to the widow. My question is, do the children who receive $125,000 pay on that amount the rate of estate tax that applies to an estate of $250,000, or do they pay at the rate of estate tax that applies to an estate of $125,000?

My second question is this: if a testator at the date of his death was receiving a pension which, at his death, provided a pension of $5,000 to his widow, the widow would also receive a pension of $1,000, under the Canada Pensions Act. Therefore, on the death of the testator, the widow would have a pension amounting to $6,000 a year. This would be capitalized, say, at $100,000. Is the sum of $100,000 added to the total value of the estate for tax purposes? The same question applies to various gifts which are made to the wife during the lifetime of the husband and to other people. Are those gifts all brought back into the estate for estate tax purposes?

Senator Hayden in several instances described the gift to the wife as an outright gift or a straight gift, yet in answer to a question by Senator Aseltine he expressed the opinion that in the case of any moneys given to the wife by means of an outright gift, the income on that money would be added to the husband's income. If it was an outright gift or a straight gift it would seem to me there should be no strings attached, if I am correct that the husband is still liable to the payment of income tax. Secondly, if the value of that gift on the death of the husband is brought back into the estate in order to calculate the amount of the estate tax, I for one would not regard it as an outright gift or a straight gift. Under the old Dominion Succession Duty Act and under the Ontario Succession Duty Act the degree of relationship between the deceased and the beneficiary was recognized in the rate of duty applied to the legacy. In Ontario there are three categories—preferred beneficiaries, collateral beneficiaries, and strangers. Under the Estate Tax Act a child, father or mother, pays the same rate of duty as a total stranger would pay.

I cannot understand or appreciate the reasoning whereby under the Estate Tax Act the same rate of tax is applied to every degree of relationship as to strangers. Surely no one will argue that a son or a daughter has not the right to expect more from their parents than a total stranger. Yet a total stranger, a nephew or niece, is taxed on a legacy at the same rate as a son, daughter, father or mother of the deceased.

In many estates there is an overpayment of duty, but where a refund is made by the department they allow a rate of interest which is about half the amount they charge when a penalty is imposed for late payment of duty. In my view, honourable senators, the same rate of interest should apply in both cases.

We also find that the department makes no allowance for executors' fees and legal fees which should be allowed as a debt against the estate and deducted as such. Certainly the beneficiaries do not receive the moneys paid to executors and solicitors, but they pay estate tax on these two amounts, in addition to which both the executors and solicitors pay income tax on their fees. As a result we find ourselves in the situation where both estate tax and income tax is being paid on the same moneys. It would be a very simple matter to work out a flat rate on a percentage basis to cover executors' and legal fees. In many cases the allowance for these amounts against the estate would reduce the value of the estate to less than $50,000, in which case it would cease to be subject to the estate tax. I realize, of course, the folly of expecting that this allowance would make the estate free of tax.

In arriving at the value of an estate for estate tax purposes, no deduction is made from the taxable value of the estate or the amount of succession duty paid to a provincial government. Thus in Ontario on an estate of, say, $250,000, succession duty of $40,000 is paid to the province, and no allowance is made by the federal Government in allowing this as a debt against the estate. In other words, the federal Government will tax this estate at the full value of $250,000, which means that the estate is paying tax on the sum of $40,000 succession duty already paid to the province.

Because of the manner in which the government introduced this bill and then announced the changes—one to the effect that an estate valued at less than $50,000 is not taxable—a large number of people are confused. They have the idea that all estates are exempted up to $50,000. They will simply tell you that they read in the press a statement by the minister that an estate valued up to $50,000 was exempt. I would point out here, honourable senators, that there is an element of unfairness involved where an estate of $50,000 is exempt from taxation while an estate of $60,000 is allowed only the basic exemption of $20,000 and is therefore taxed on the remaining $40,000.

My suggestion is that the basic exemption on all estates should be an even $50,000. If you examine the assets of any estate you will agree that this sum of $50,000 is a reasonable exemption. Take the realty, the home of the deceased. Consider the enormous increase in the value of property. A good building lot is priced today at from $5,000 to $15,000. The dwelling house of the deceased and the contents together with a motor car can easily amount to $50,000. The same rate of increase applies in the value of summer cottage property. But we must keep in mind that the dwelling house is certainly a necessity for the widow and family of the deceased. That is why I say an exemption of $50,000 is no more than reasonable in view of the present value of realty.

However, the Government is always slow in making any adjustment in basic exemptions. Let us take the income tax as an example. The exemption there for a wife is $1,000, a figure which was arrived at many years ago and has not been changed. Yet the Government has changed and increased the amount of income tax many times, without paying any attention to the small basic exemption for the wife, without paying any attention to the huge increase in the cost of living, and without paying any attention to the value of our dollar due to inflation. Such an attitude is not realistic.

Under the former act there was a basic exemption of $40,000, which was more or less fair and reasonable, but to reduce the basic exemption under this Act to $20,000 is being most unjust to the beneficiaries.

Honourable senators have received a brief from the Trust Association of Canada, and everyone will agree that trust companies have a wealth of experience in the administration of estates, and have had much experience regarding gift taxes and estate taxes. On pages 4 and 5 of the brief I read a quote from a report of the Ontario Economic Council, as follows:

> Death taxation fails, therefore, in one extremely important aspect: it fails to provide incentive toward keeping private capital employed at the highest possible rate of return. A less productive allocation of resources ensues. Those responsible for guiding the course of our nation's development need only to look to history to find proof that nearly every past civilization has hastened its ruin through its dissipation of capital by taxation.

On page 5 of the brief it is stated that the Ontario Economic Council has demonstrated, with considerable success:

> ...that transfer taxes, particularly when imposed on the death of a Canadian investor, influence the sale of many Canadian-owned businesses to foreign investors. The foreign investor possesses a distinct advantage over a Canadian would-be investor since acquisitions by a privately owned Canadian company serve only eventually to compound the death tax payments of the new owners.

This comment is from the trust companies:

> The experience of trust compagnies in handling estates suggests that it is frequently the expectation of heavy death taxation that is a dominant factor leading to sales of privately owned businesses.

Further on in the brief:

> The total impact of taxation on capital, that is to say on investment, in Canada by all governments has now reached a level which is, in our opinion, extremely unhealthy. That this dissipation of capital should be increased by the current taxation proposals causes us great uneasiness.
> Such a situation leads inevitably to flights of capital—then to action to restrain such flights and so on, inevitably, to all the sorry list of restrictions on individual economic liberty.

There are included in the brief comments of the presidents of various trust companies that they made at their annual meeting. The first one is by Mr. F. E. Case, President of Montreal Trust Company:

> On the surface, levying high estate and gift taxes against the owners of capital gives the impression of helping the wage earner. With due respect, I disagree. High tax rates on capital transfers, in my view, work against labour by reducing the amount of capital available for investment in the development of our resources or in the machinery of production. In fact, the appropriation by the state for its own current operating expenses of a large part of the capital which an individual has been able to save after payment of income and other taxes seems to me to be akin to what the pioneers of this continent regarded as one of the ultimate follies, or disasters —the eating by a settler of his seed corn.

Mr. J. G. Hungerford, Q.C., Chairman of National Trust Company, Limited in his remarks stated:

> No one is going to argue with the proposal to exempt benefits to widows. This, however, is just the sugar coating. The cruncher comes when gifts are made to the next generation either by will or during lifetime.
>
> The need for private pools of capital for investment by Canadians in their own country requires no emphasis. The need today is greater than ever before. While we are being urged to invest in Canada, the Government is doing its best to drain off the means to make it possible.

Honourable senators, if this bill is an example of paving the way for a just society in Canada, the taxpayer will be much dismayed.

Let me state just a few of the many injustices in this bill: tax on gifts increased; estate taxes increased to unreasonable rates; taxable gifts in donor's lifetime with gift tax paid included in donor's estate for estate tax purposes; savings made difficult and almost impossible; the gift tax and estate tax discourage accumulation of wealth by savings; the future difficulty of the family farm, ranch and business and other small businesses being passed on to the next generation and kept in the family.

This bill encourages the flight of capital and, with it, a measure of initiative and prosperity. The bill prevents Canadians investing in Canadian corporation, as their savings are being reduced. This bill legislates out of existence the desire and ambition of parents to create and save wealth, and to pass it on to their children. This bill scatters existing pools of capital, which is economically regressive and disrupting to economic development. This bill will tend to increase the percentage of our economy owned by foreigners. And there are many other injustices in this bill.

During this session there have been several speeches on the reform of the Senate. I suggest that this bill presents an opportunity and a challenge to all senators. The Senate has been presented with a glorious opportunity to do a great job for the taxpayers of Canada, and to answer in a fine, credible manner much of the press criticism of the Senate. This can be done by the Senate taking a long, hard, sober second look at this legislation and refusing to pass Bill C-165.

In these few remarks I hope I have made it clear that I am opposed to this bill.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, we have listened to many able speeches in this debate. The bill was introduced by Senator Hayden in his usual clear and eloquent style, and those who have followed him have furnished us with a mass of information in their excellent and able speeches. However, if I am correct, those who have participated in the debate thus far have all been lawyers—every one of them.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That is bad!

Hon. Mr. Burchill: Perhaps it would be useful, and not out of place, if a businessman—for I am not a legal man in any sense of the word—with a lifetime of experience in business, made a few statements as to how this bill will affect the small business, the family business.

We have just listened to an able speech, which I thoroughly enjoyed. Although all these speeches were excellent, they were delivered from the standpoint of a lawyer, how they personally regard the bill and how they would advise their clients. Now, I am going to put on record a few statements regarding my feelings as to how this bill will affect the common chap who is trying to make his living in a small business. In fairness, however, I must add that some of the earlier speakers dealt with the phase of the bill as it affects small business; and Senator Aseltine particularly drew our attention to what, in his view, it will do to the small farmer.

Before I go further, I want to point out that in the area in which I live small businesses have, to a great extent, been built up over the years and by many generations through savings, through putting back into the business everything it has earned. That is the way the business has been built.

Since the last war and particularly during the last few years, these small businesses have had a rough time. Their working capital has become depleted on account of the fact that they have been obliged to invest in new manufacturing techniques, and to replace obsolete equipment with a more modern type in order to maintain productivity, to compete with larger corporations, and to stay in business. The result of all this is the fact that annual statements show an increase in fixed assets but a very serious decrease in working capital. Bank borrowings have supplied the needed cash.

A large area of the economy is, as we all know, occupied now by governments, and that is one of the factors that has pushed the cost of money up to its present height. The Dominion of Canada, our own great country, is obliged to pay interest at the rate of 7½ per cent in order to sell its bonds. Honourable senators, in view of that fact, I ask you, what chance has a small company of producing any money through the sale of bonds? Even if it could find a broker willing to buy its bonds, what prohibitive rates of interest would it have to pay? When I consider the economy of Canada today, indeed, the economy of the whole North American continent—because I understand conditions in the United States are as bad as, if not worse than, they are in Canada—that is one of the sobering facts in the outlook at the present time. The huge corporate giants can take care of themselves, but the small companies today are faced with the fact that money for expansion or operation is just not procurable.

Honourable senators, as I speak this afternoon I am thinking particularly about small manufacturing companies which, in addition to the competition they face from the large corporations, are caught in the financial squeeze. The estate of the proprietor of a family business, or the estate of the principal stockholder in a small business, upon which the business is dependent, will be called upon to seriously deplete its financial resources to save the business or wind it up.

I should like to put on the record two examples showing a comparison of the tax payable under the present legislation and this bill. As I figure it, on an estate of $500,000 the tax is $116,300. Under the bill that is before us that amount will be $184,200. That is the measure of the increase.

In the case of a small estate of $350,000, the present tax is $69,500, while under this bill it will be $109,240, an increase of $40,000.00.

I should like to quote from the document from which Senator White read. In this document which the trust companies sent to all members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, there is this statement:

> There seems to be little doubt that the existence of many successful family businesses, including farms and ranches, would be seriously endangered by higher taxes to the detriment of private business in this country.

Honourable senators, there is a bill before this house that was read the first time this afternoon, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada, including the establishment of a Department of Regional Economic Expansion, by which the minister, the Hon. Mr. Marchand, seeks to rely on a better climate to stimulate private investment and encourage the establishment of industries in those regions of Canada which require assistance. At the same time we have this bill which I am discussing, the effects of which will be the very opposite. It will make things more difficult for businesses that are established in those regions at the present time, and will encourage them either to wind up or to find some large corporation to take them over. I can only assume that the gentlemen who framed this bill are not aware of the conditions that small business faces today in this country.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I join with my colleagues who have addressed you today, and congratulate all honourable senators who have spoken on this bill. I thank them for their enlightening presentations and their frank discussion. It is quite remarkable to find that no honourable senator who has spoken in this debate supports this bill. Even the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Hayden) had reservations about it.

I was impressed by Senator Hayden's lucid and objective study of the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act. I shall not endeavour to comment further on sections of this bill, because this was ably done by a few of my predecessors. However, I do feel that I should make known to you my thoughts on what appears to me to be a sophistical reasoning for justifying the proposed amendment affecting those who would be taxed in the upper brackets. I believe also it would be useful to discuss some of the social and economic effects of this bill.

In its application this proposed act will not, in my opinion, do what it claims to do, since it generally retakes eventually more than it appears to give to Canadian taxpayers.

The minister in his budget address stated that the bill was a recognition of the role played by the wives to conserve and augment the family wealth, and that the bill would eliminate some grievances. Widows receiving $50,000 in gifts would be tax exempt, to be sure, but the proposed sharp increase of the tax rates is out of reasonable proportion as the gift increases from $80,000 to $1,500,000. I will later point out at what odds and disadvantages this may place widows living in the Province of Quebec.

There will now be the integration of gifts and estate taxes, the unreasonable high rate of gift tax and the inclusion of the amount of taxable gifts made in the donor's lifetime with the gift taxes paid in the donor's estate for estate tax purposes.

Honourable senators, it is my opinion that the existence of many successful family concerns, including farms and ranches, will be seriously affected. Socially, philosophically and economically, the heavy taxations provided for, on the death of the donor of property, will have important consequences which may be far-reaching.

Our Canadians, for their continued economic prosperity must, on their own, accumulate and preserve as much capital as possible for Canadian economic developments and investment. This, according to sound economists, is of great importance for our future prosperity.

Enterprising Canadians also need to rely somewhat on the sometimes not too easy importation of capital from other willing countries. There is not presently a satisfactory accumulation of savings in Canada. Even now we sometimes feel drawbacks caused by the scarcity of capital investment from within or from without.

As is so often proven, high rates of taxation make accumulation of savings both too difficult and too slow to fill the increasing gap caused by the Canadian economic rate of growth. Economic growth, of course, assures higher and better employment, but it depends directly on investment.

The proposed act goes a long way to make the accumulation of private capital harder than ever before to realize. This will create discouragement, and I doubt if many will want to make use of the bill in the levels of taxation on gifts above $80,000.

There is a great hunger for capital to meet the commitments made by our governments, past and present. I believe we now have passed all reasonable bounds for taxation and we no longer can help the country by continuing, as presently, the support of odd gimmicks to collect more taxes to meet more demands, because after all it is apparent that the aim of the bill is less a concession than an approval of a way, now or eventually, to collect more taxes.

I believe we cannot avoid facing again the consideration of the true solution: an important cut-back in government expenditures, a re-assessment of some of the more costly governmental projects, and, until our economic situation permits, the consideration of a planned progressive withdrawal from any expensive economic commitment here and, yes, even abroad. Otherwise, we will be taking away from individuals and from corporations too many of the necessary means to build and maintain an adequate economic structure for a growing Canada.

I believe that if an individual or a corporation has shown business acumen and ability and has succeeded in establishing capital through savings, there should not be a penalty for such good behavior but there should be a reward and a recognition, "for they are the greats of Canada." With all the added social services now being provided to Canadians, in my opinion, we have become the most socialized country in the Americas and, outside the Iron Curtain, I believe that, on a per capita basis, we now have one of the most expensive socialized countries in the world. In my view, socialization is the principal reason for the great need in Canada for more government funds.

The answer to the question: "Should we continue along the path toward even more socialization by seizing or confiscating through tax gimmicks important accumulations of savings for state expenses regardless of consequences and by penalizing the frugal, the intelligent savers and the investment planners?" is becoming crystal clear in the minds of many.

The end results of some fifty years of socialization in certain countries, the failure of these countries as good producers and manufacturers, is to me a net indication of what we may expect here with the continuation of costly socializing government programs. For us it is a rationale for carrying on an aggressive battle against a philosophy that could only downgrade Canada as a good country in which to live.

How about this bill? A brief on this proposed legislation gave the following pertinent quotation, which I repeat here for the record. It is from a recent report of the Ontario Economic Council:

> The pressure of death taxation toward maintaining in each potential estate an adequate pool of liquid funds subtracts from the national pool of risk capital at risk. Failure to maintain such funds contributes to the absorption of increasing numbers of private businesses by large corporations with the attendant displacement of private risk capital. Such pressure toward maintenance of liquidity detracts from expanding economy dependent upon the need for incentives to substain adequate supplies of risk capital.

Substitute reduce-risk marketable securities for the risk capital of private enterprise, and the substitution is investment for earned income. Substitute investment income for earned income, and the substitution can be a reduced level of productivity.

The national economic effects of death taxation, at this stage of our nation's development, are reflected in a dissipation of estates through a tendency toward increased consumption by predecessors. For example, a measurement of this is the lower retirement age of businessmen who must thereafter live upon capital or investment income; absorption of private businesses into increasingly large corporate concentrations, and significantly increased economic importance of charitable organizations fostered by their tax-exempt receipt of gifts and bequests.

The national economic effects are potentially measurable in reduced productivity both from labour and from capital. Absorption of the private business by corporate giants frequently assures the first; substitution of ready-marketable public securities for private capital can produce the second. Death taxation fails, therefore, in one extremely important aspect; it fails to provide incentive toward keeping private capital employed at the highest possible rate of return. A less productive allocation of resources ensues.

The overall impact of taxation by all governments on investment is already regarded as very high. That it should again be increased in the case of a great many is a damaging proposal which will again drain heavily on savings in the upper level and is of grave concern to many in this house.

Taxation is essential to balance the needs and the commitments of the Government, but it must not be obtained at the expense of possible eventual economic reverses. It is important that some rule of containment be now applied.

In regard to the transfer tax, the Ontario Economic Council says:

> Transfer taxes, particularly when imposed on the death of a Canadian investor, influence the sale of many Canadian-owned businesses to foreign investors. The foreign investor possesses a distinct advantage over a Canadian would-be investor since acquisitions by a privately-owned Canadian company serve only eventually to compound the death tax payments of the new owners.

One of the briefs submitted records that:

> Canada, as a large importer of capital, has a total transfer taxation income as a percentage of total tax revenue, higher than that of many Western nations who are exporters of Capital.
> Tax aspects of Canada's International Competitive Position by the Private Planning Association of Canada (1963) indicates that among thirteen Western nations plus Japan, Canada has the highest percentage of tax on capital in the group. Admittedly the data is such that the conclusions should not be overemphasized but its significance is very real.

Bill C-165 proposes drastic changes in the gift tax legislation. Indeed, taxpayers will pay, at the top level, almost three times more than presently. The new concept of a cumulative gift sum makes taxable gifts more expensive to the donor as the cumulative gift sum increases. Here are some resulting objections expressed by some important administrators of estates about the integration of the cumulative gift and estate taxes and its paying back into the estate because, of course, it is all for estate tax purposes.

Senator White quoted from Mr. Case's statement. I will not repeat it here since it has already been mentioned. He also mentioned a statement by Mr. Hungerford, Chairman of the National Trust Company, when he said:

> No one is going to argue with the proposal to exempt benefits to widows; this, however, is just the sugar coating. The cruncher comes when gifts are made to the next generation either by will or during a lifetime.

Taxation policies such as those reflected in the proposed bill would contribute in the upper level in having the state replace the individual as a source of savings and investment. I can hardly see the state, from past history, able to achieve the ability for saving and investing its savings.

Honourable Senator Phillips (Rigaud) made a reference in his address to article 1265 of the Civil Code of the Province of Quebec, prohibiting contracts, donations, and gifts between husbands and wives. I would also like to say that because of this article, to which there is no exception that I know of, husbands and wives cannot give one another gifts, donations or money advantages except those that have been established by a premarital contract entered into before marriage. No other alternative is permitted in the Province of Quebec. I believe we must look for any position of inequality that could be created by this bill for Canadians living in Quebec. I believe that equal benefits should be assured to Quebeckers.

One or two historical economic facts on taxation are worth repeating here. Between 1914 and 1968 the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar decreased gradually from a $1 value in 1914 to about 33 or 34 cents value in 1968. During the same time income and estate taxes appeared and have increased steadily from nothing to what they are now. We have been taking an added percentage of taxes on a progressively diminishing value, and progressively we have been drawing more of the savings, stating quite openly in some quarters as a justification that fortunes should be slashed and equalized as a normal economic objective for the betterment of this country's affairs. It is a false philosophy and an obvious sophism which, like the tragic Keynesonian theories, saps and destroys the nation's strength, instills unstableness and will surely lead the nation to general poverty if maintained.

Economists, like philosophers, disagree in almost any area of thinking or theories, but nearly all agree readily that, in fact, unless there are means for the individual as well as for the corporation to accumulate savings for expansion, for growth and for investment, there is a resultant stage set for economic retraction with causative withdrawals of investment, for serious unemployment and for national stagnancy. The economic history of the Spanish Latin-American countries, of the poor African countries and of the Roman Empire at the beginning of Christianity should provide us with the true guidelines when we consider these kinds of extractive tax legislation.

It is my understanding that this bill will be referred to committee. I trust it will receive there what I have come to call a good "Haydenization".

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hedard Robichaud moved, with leave of the Senate, the second reading of Bill C-172, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that at various times since the publication of the report of the Royal Commission on Organization, better known as the Glassco Report, the Government has announced measures which have been taken to implement the recommendations contained in that report. Only earlier today two of the bills reported from the House of Commons, Bill C-173 on government organization, and Bill C-172, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act, which we now have before us for second reading, indicate the Government's decision and intention to proceed with the implementation of the Glassco Report.

Honourable senators are doubtless aware of conditions which existed in the days preceding the commission's inquiry. The situation was, of course, well documented in the report. The commissioners referred to numerous deficiencies. They attributed the most significant weaknesses of the machinery of government to a failure to adjust the concepts and processes of public administration to a dynamic society, with the result that departments of government had become severely limited in their capacity to manage effectively their large and complex operations.

The commissioners noted the formidable structure of central controls, which they considered both costly and unnecessary; they noted that these controls seriously weakened the sense of responsibility of departmental management.

In short, techniques of modern management were almost totally lacking. Organizations were not sufficiently responsive to changing conditions and priorities, and aimed at a proliferation of controls that tended to fragment responsibility and accountability and tended to stifle initiative.

It was against this background that Glassco set out a clear, modern concept of management that would revolutionize the machinery of government itself. This proposal, as I stated earlier, did not lie fallow. The challenge of the Glassco Report was quickly taken up, and a vast program of administrative reform was undertaken. Central agencies were reorganized to provide the necessary leadership for implementation of the report. Extensive training programs were developed to prepare departmental staffs for changed responsibilities, and, where resources were inadequate, highly qualified personnel were recruited. Management consultants were employed to speed the process of reform, and we developed our own specialized consultant capacity to ensure that the momentum of management improvement would be maintained.

It is a source of great satisfaction to all, and a tribute to the prodigious efforts of the late Grant Glassco and his eminent colleagues, that departments of government have reached a level of managerial competence where it is now possible to implement the remainder of the most fundamental proposals respecting financial administration and organization in the report. The effect of the proposals will be to greatly improve the efficiency and effectiveness of administration in government. Responsibility will be clearly and rationally assigned, as Glassco urged, and considerable economies will be achieved.

Honourable senators, this bill is closely related to the Government organization bill which, as I said earlier, is also designed to implement major recommendations of the Glassco Commission. Where, in this bill, the control functions of the Comptroller of the Treasury would be transferred to departments, in the Government organization bill the office of the Comptroller would be the base on which would be built the services side of the Department of Supply and Services. This organization would have a new and vital role to perform in Government operations, and in the pursuit of efficiency and effectiveness in support services. All of this was visualized by Glassco when he discussed a new approach to the tasks of management, and the concept of common supporting services.

The Financial Administration Act and the proposed amendments are quite voluminous and rather technical. However, I believe that if I highlight the significant proposals in the bill I will convey the important changes that the bill is designed to accomplish.

I spoke a moment ago of the proposed transfer of financial control functions to departments. This change would involve the offices of the Minister of Finance, the Receiver General, and the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the functions of pre-audit, commitment control, allotment control, the keeping of the Accounts of Canada, and the preparation of the Public Accounts.

The proposal would end the duplication of work and divided responsibility in the area of financial control, and it would permit—indeed, it would require—departmental managers to assume full responsibility for their own financial management. Thus, it would be possible for managers to be held accountable for their performance in managing their operations. In addition, as I said earlier, considerable economies may be expected from implementation of this proposal.

Honourable senators will know it is proposed that the office of Receiver General would assume the statutory responsibilities of the Comptroller of the Treasury, other than those which will be transferred to respective departments. In addition to current Receiver General responsibilities, the office of the Receiver General would be assigned responsibility for such major functions as cheque issue, keeping the Accounts of Canada, and preparing the Public Accounts.

Among other proposed amendments is one respecting fees and charges for services. This amendment would permit the introduction of a more efficient and rational system for setting fees and charges. Glassco dealt at some length with the question of non-tax revenue and the need for improved management in this area.

Part V of the act, Public Stores, is now considered inadequate to meet the needs of modern property and materiel management and should therefore be amended. It is proposed, first, to rename the part "Public Property," so that the amended part would cover both real property and materiel; and second, to empower the Treasury Board to regulate the custody and control of public property.

The section which refers to revolving funds would be deleted. Very extensive and complex directions are needed today in respect of revolving funds, since these funds now cover a wide variety of activities which were not contemplated in the existing sections which concern only stores activity. Therefore, it would be more effective and realistic to control this aspect of administration by regulations. Naturally, it is understood that these regulations will be controlled through Treasury Board.

A proposed new Part VIIIB, which is entitled "Assignment of Debts Due to the Crown under Payment Bonds," is the last major proposed amendment I wish to mention. This proposed part concerns the assignment of debts due the Crown under labour and material payment bonds. These bonds are purchased by contractors who enter into government contracts, and are designed to protect subcontractors and suppliers in the event of the bankruptcy of a prime contractor. Such protection does not exist under the present regulations.

The purpose of this new part is to give subcontractors and suppliers working on federal Government contracts the right of action before the courts by making them assignees of the right of the Crown to sue under payments bonds. Subcontractors and suppliers working on federal Government contracts will then have protection similar to that afforded by provincial mechanics' lien legislation.

Honourable senators, I have discussed very briefly only some aspects of this bill. However, I believe the significant provisions have been described in such a way as to demonstrate the true import of the bill's intent.

When this bill receives second reading, it is my intention to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1969

SECOND READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave of the Senate, the second reading of Bill C-173, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-173 which we have before us for consideration today is the most important piece of legislation of its kind, concerning the organization of government, that has been presented to this chamber in some time. Development and change in our society demand continual adjustment in the government apparatus. A willingness to adjust government organization to the needs and realities of the day should be a recurring and frequent requirement in modern government, if government programs are not to suffer from the limitations of outmoded institutions. This is the spirit which inspired this legislation.

Two key principles are embodied in the changes being introduced in Bill C-173. These are: (a) to structure government organization so that government goals and objectives are effectively achieved, and (b) to enable programs to be carried out with the most efficient use of available resources. The Glassco Commission emphasized the extreme importance of both effectiveness and efficiency in government operations, and accelerated a pattern of thought and interest in altering the structure of government to better meet the needs of the federal Government and the nation. It is the expectation of the government that all the measures embodied in the 15 parts of Bill C-173 will greatly enhance both the effectiveness and efficiency of government operations.

This bill establishes five new departments of government, although in the process it also eliminates five existing departments. All five of the new departments consolidate existing and major components of the Public Service in such a way that ministerial authority and responsibilities are more clearly defined.

The new Department of Fisheries and Forestry brings together two major components of government, both of which are concerned with renewable resources. The complementary relationship between the fishing and forestry industries, in terms of renewable resource policies, makes this newly proposed alliance one of great promise for the future.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce brings together the complementary program areas of industrial and trade development. Six years ago the Government brought together scattered industrial development staffs from different departments and agencies to form a Department of Industry. Around this nucleus a minister was able to concentrate his attention in forging a modern industrial development capability. Our prosperous and rapidly growing automotive and machinery industries are a testimony to the wisdom of creating this new organization. Times have now started to change. It is anticipated that in the future further growth of our manufacturing industry will require a better response to foreign market conditions. The time has now come, therefore, to integrate with the Department of Industry, the Department of Trade and Commerce.

The Department of Communications provides the Government with a focal point for communications policy and Government communication services. This naturally includes the Post Office Department which historically has been one of the main communications elements in the nation. At the same time it provides a better base for the Government to support and guide the telecommunications revolution which is introducing new and challenging developments such as chequeless accounting, national information utilities and satellite communications systems. Increasingly into the future the interchangeability of the modes of communication will demand that the new department develop an integrated national policy designed to provide these essential services in the most effective combination to serve the nation.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion brings together several small components of government deeply involved in complementary programs designed to cope with problems of regional economic disparity. It is this portion of the bill which to my mind holds out the greatest expectation for the future. Indeed, by providing a clear focus on the serious problems of regional disparity through one minister and one department, greater effectiveness will result. The existence of the new ministry will undoubtedly permit more effective collaboration with the provinces in the setting of goals and objectives and in achieving them.

The Department of Supply and Services, in line with well-known Glassco Commission recommendations, continues the consolidation of common services in Government in the interest of better service and lower cost. The proposed new mandate assigned to the Minister of Supply and Services will greatly accelerate the opportunities to secure administrative savings throughout the Public Service.

In addition to the first five parts of this bill, which deal with substantive new agencies, there are nine other parts which make provision for changes and modifications to other agencies of government.

One of the most significant changes concerns the Medical Research Council. This council is being closely aligned with the Minister of National Health and Welfare because of its close relationship to the other programs of that ministry. At the same time it retains all the corporate advantages which it previously possessed.

Another important provision of Bill C-173 places the Science Council on the same footing as the Economic Council. It will become a separate employer and will have the right to publish its own reports. In view of the detailed interest which many honourable senators have recently had in science policy, I am sure the changes proposed in respect to the Science Council of Canada will be recognized as a further positive step towards the better direction of science policy in this country.

As already suggested, the main purpose of most of the other parts of the bill has been to increase governmental efficiency. This is true of the changes proposed concerning the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the National Council of Welfare, and the Royal Canadian Mint. The goal has been to provide a more effective governmental apparatus for Canadians.

In conclusion, I would like to support the changes proposed in the bill with confidence because they were conceived by looking intelligently at the whole apparatus of government. It is not a patchwork exercise. Indeed, careful consideration of the many interrelated facets of government agencies were studied in broad perspective before Bill C-173 was drafted in its present form. The changes embodied in the bill will better enable the present Government to cope with the problems of today. However, as noted early in my remarks, we live in a dynamic world in which change and development are increasing in tempo. Undoubtedly further changes in government organization will be required to meet the needs of tomorrow.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Langlois) has indicated, this is of course a very important bill since it reorganizes to a very large extent the Government set-up, and in fact redistributes the responsibilities of the administration. We are indebted to the sponsor for his very clear explanation.

The most significant changes are those that were announced last year by the Prime Minister after he formed the Government following the election of June 1968. I wish to mention especially the new Department of Communications, which replaces the Postmaster General's department by adding to the responsibilities of that minister those concerning telecommunications, the development and organization generally of communication undertakings, facilities, systems and services for Canada.

Secondly, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce merges the former Department of Industry with the traditional Department of Trade and Commerce. This is, I think, a logical move.

The newest concept is the one embodied in the organization of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This is something entirely new, and the bill provides for the minister in charge very wide powers and heavy responsibilities. It will be interesting to see how this department will serve in the future.

The Department of Supply and Services does away with the former Department of Defence Production and, I would say, will streamline the problem of supply and of purchasing for the Government. This is an area where there need be only one policy and it should not be left to each department, as was the case in the past.

Finally, the last department which I wish to mention, and which is somewhat new, is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Corporate affairs, of course, we always knew about: consumer affairs is a new concept and we are still at the experimental stage. It will be interesting to see what can be produced by this department.

Honourable senators, most of these changes follow the recommendations of the Glassco Commission, which have been under consideration and study for years. These are logical conclusions from that report.

In practice, this bill is very technical, and whether the line has been drawn in exactly the right spot is a matter which may provoke discussions and differences of opinion.

The bill was examined thoroughly by the other place, both in the house and in committee. It certainly is that kind of bill which is better examined in committee. I presume that the sponsor will move that it be referred to a committee here, so that honourable senators may obtain information as to the way these new departments will operate.

Honourable senators, it is interesting to note that there are now 26 members of the cabinet with portfolio or the equivalent. That is a substantial increase from the situation only a few years ago.

I also draw your attention to the fact that section 97, Part XIII, now classifies the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, as a full-fledged minister with portfolio, putting him on the same standing as a minister with portfolio. That recognizes the responsibility of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I am somewhat surprised to see that the salary of the minister is being left at $15,000. With the last increase granted to deputy ministers, most of them now earn more, or will earn more, than the minister, if my memory serves me aright. I think it has been indicated that deputy ministers of the senior departments will receive now a salary of $40,000, whereas a minister will receive only $35,000, that is, including the expense allowance of $6,000 as a member of Parliament, and $2,000 as a member of the Government, in lieu of an automobile.

Possibly the Government has in mind to do something about this. It is a very unusual situation when the minister is paid less than the deputy minister.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: This is a very considerable bill, having 106 sections, without counting the schedule referring to the numerous acts which have to be amended to give effect to the legislation. On account of the numerous provisions in the bill, it does not appear to be one for global discussion in the chamber. I think the best way to deal with the bill at this stage is to refer it as soon as possible to a committee where we can make the kind of examination which is really useful and practical.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1969

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Denis for the second reading of Bill C-178, to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, may I first congratulate the sponsor of this bill and my good friend, the honourable Senator Azellus Denis, on his clear and comprehensive explanation of its contents. This was no easy task. In the first place, this is an omnibus bill which amends seven existing acts. I have an instinctive aversion to such bills, which I have expressed before and which I will no doubt have occasion to express again later this session.

We have had so many omnibus bills in recent years that I can hardly wait for the revised statutes to appear in order that not only myself but thousands of other people may find out what the federal law really is! I only hope that when they do appear we will thereafter follow more intelligible practices as we amend them. Canadian statute law is now a "dog's breakfast".

Secondly, this is a highly technical bill, as are all pension bills. As a lawyer I am not sure whether they could be drafted more simply, but, as they stand, they are difficult both to explain and to understand. There being no single principle involved, we must abandon the usual basis for debate on second reading. This is a housekeeping bill of a generally beneficial kind and I do not oppose its second reading. I do think, however, that it should be referred to committee where we may have the benefit of expert advice on the several clauses.

This is a highly technical bill which comes to us at the last moment, and we are asked to pass it in a hurry. It would, therefore, be futile for me to try to analyse it clause by clause and criticize it. I think that the best course to follow is the one advocated by my desk mate, the Leader of the Opposition, with respect to the previous bill with which he just dealt, namely, that the committee is probably the best place at this stage to discuss that type of bill.

Only this afternoon a sheet was placed on my desk here because I was interested in this bill and it was known that I was to speak on it this afternoon or this evening. It reads, "Amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill C-178, intituled An Act to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act." It then enumerates on this single sheet the seven amendments made by the House of Commons to this act, in clauses 7, 18, 19 (1), 33 (1), 34 (1) and 47.

Now, honourable senators, we know that when a report is made after a committee has studied an omnibus bill, or a bill of any sort, the sponsor or the chairman of that committee usually rises and explains the amendments that were made, tells us the meaning of those amendments and why they were made and how the bill shall read as amended. Now, we do not have time to do that today, nor do I have the time to go behind the deliberations of the other place and explain or criticize all the amendments contained on this sheet that was placed on my desk this afternoon while I was busy in committee, as honourable Senator Roebuck knows. Therefore, the only alternative for me this evening is to say that those of us who are interested in this bill should be at the meeting tomorrow morning to ask questions, seek explanations and find out why all these amendments were made and what they mean.

I like the provisions extending the pension rights of widows and children of retired civil servants. Perhaps our discussions in committee could shed some light on the adequacy, or perhaps I should say inadequacy, of the pension rights of the widows of retired senators. It might be a good idea to raise that question because we all know how inadequate the pensions of senators' widows are. In the event of the death of a retired senator, the widow would get not one half of $8,000 to which the retired senator is entitled, but one-third, and I am wondering how a widow could live on $266.00 a month. I throw this suggestion into the discussion just to make it a little more interesting.

Finally, I consider that it would be no more than simple justice to adjust the pensions of retired civil servants and other pensioners in accordance with the changes in the cost of living. I know of a widow, for example, whose husband had a small salary. As his widow she obtained probably one-half of his pension, which I think was the equivalent of two-thirds of his ordinary salary. That was a pittance, and yet that widow and others like her have been living without an increase in their pensions, notwithstanding the high cost of living and the rising costs that are occurring every day. I sometimes wonder how these people have been able to subsist on such small pensions.

These are all questions, honourable senators, that may be discussed in committee and may be advocated, if not now, at a later date. Of course, the present bill does not purport to do that, so I will not belabour the point. However, it is my opinion that these pensions should be adjusted as I have suggested, and, further, that the legislation making the adjustments should provide for further pension adjustment in the future, corresponding to changes in the cost of living, so that our past errors will not be repeated. It should not be beyond the capacity of the computers to work out appropriate escalator provisions.

In concurring in the second reading of this bill, I must not be taken as approving of all of its clauses. On the other hand, I think that it should be subjected to careful examination in committee.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, during his speech I noticed that Senator Choquette mentioned the pensions that senators' widows are now receiving, being one-half or one-third of the senator's pension. We must not overlook the fact that many senators' widows receive nothing.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Yes, it is only the widows of former senators who receive a pension.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS

SUSPENSION OF RULE 110 AND EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Leopold Langlois, Acting Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the committee's second report:

Your committee recommends:

1. That Rule 110, in so far as it relates to the time-limit for filing petitions for private bills, be suspended; and

2. That the time-limit for filing petitions for private bills, which expired on Friday, 25th October, 1968, and extended to Thursday, 27th February, 1969, be further extended to Tuesday, 15 April, 1969.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: I move that the report be adopted now.

Report adopted.

DIVORCE

CERTIFICATE OF DEATH OF RESPONDENT TABLED

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Divorce I have a statement to make in the matter of the petition of Marie Rita Therese Deschamps Paré Briscoe, of Montreal, Quebec, praying for a Resolution of the Senate to dissolve her marriage to Fred Richard Briscoe.

A resolution dissolving the marriage between Marie Rita Therese Deschamps Paré Briscoe and Fred Richard Briscoe was adopted by the Senate on December 19th, 1968.

I have now received from the attorney for Marie Rita Therese Deschamps Paré Briscoe, the petitioner, a certificate issued by the Demography Branch of the Department of Health of the Province of Quebec, attesting to the death of Fred Richard Briscoe in Montreal, Quebec, on January 12, 1969, and on his authority lay the same on the Table.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Could the honourable senator say what the purpose of the statement is and what effect, if any, it has on the action taken by the Senate?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes. A comparison of the dates I have just mentioned will show that the death of the party, according to the document I have just laid on the Table, took place within thirty days following the resolution. The effect of that, everyone can judge for himself. The resolution ordinarily does not become effective until thirty days after the resolution has been passed by this body.

As you will observe, the statement is short, and designedly so, to state only that we have received a document purporting to show the death of the party, and that is as far as I wish to go.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): I suppose the purpose that the petitioner has in filing notice of this kind and arranging to have it tabled by the chairman of the Divorce Committee would probably have some bearing on the estate of the deceased husband and perhaps her rights in it.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: It has two effects: firstly, we will not issue a certificate that there was a divorce; and, secondly, without any authority on my part or that of anyone else, the document may be produced and proven, if they can prove it—and I am not interfering in any way with the action which may follow—

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No, quite properly.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: —either by the executors or administrators of the deceased's estate or by any court which is asked to take action in this matter.

INQUIRIES OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, Inquiry No. 1 is a matter for Senator Argue to deal with.

I ask leave of the house to mention Inquiries Nos. 2 and 3. Yesterday Senator Langlois said that he would make inquiries. This has been done. The information sought by Senator Argue in Inquiry No. 2 is quite extensive. It entails responses from many sources outside the Government service, none of which have yet been received.

The reply to Inquiry No. 3 is ready except for the portion that comes from the National Film Board, and that, in turn, depends upon responses from parties outside the Government service.

I am satisfied that every endeavour is being made to compile these replies as quickly as possible. As soon as the information is complete, they will be tabled.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C-172, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this bill to amend the Financial Administration Act results in large measure, as was explained by the honourable sponsor (Hon. Mr. Robichaud), from the recommendations of the Glassco Commission. Senator Robichaud gave us an excellent explanation of the purposes of the bill, which is designed to modernize the methods of control of governmental expenditures. It is a technical bill which deals only with methods of operation and, therefore, it is not, in my thinking, a bill that should be discussed in detail in this chamber. It might be described also as a housekeeping bill that can be adequately dealt with in committee. It is a preoccupation more of the House of Commons than it is of this house, in that it concerns the control of the purse, which is one of the main responsibilities of the elected Members of Parliament.

Senator Robichaud has summarized the amendments this bill will make to the Financial Administration Act, the most important of which, to my mind, is that which abolishes the functions of the Comptroller of the Treasury and transfers this responsibility to the deputy minister or the administrative head of each department, with the idea of decentralizing and placing more responsibility at the departmental level. The departments, of course, will be responsible to the Treasury Board and to the Cabinet, but this amendment will mean that all the controlling powers will not be concentrated in the hands of the Comptroller of the Treasury, as is the case at the present. I think it is a sensible change. I doubt that the Comptroller of the Treasury, even if assisted by competent officials, would be able to assess all the problems of all the departments and decide in each case whether the department was correct or not in initiating certain decisions or suggesting certain expenditures. Each department should be able, in a general way, to assume its responsibilities in the field assigned to it.

It is interesting to note that the Receiver General will no longer be the Minister of Finance. Why this change is made I am not too sure. This is one question that can be asked in committee, and I am quite certain we will be given an adequate answer.

The whole bill is almost exclusively within the field of the techniques of modern administration, and therefore a sensible discussion of it can take place only in committee. That is why we on this side of the house do not intend to prolong the debate at this stage.

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck: May I ask a question? Section 1(2)(h) says:

> "fiscal year" means the period beginning on the first day of April in one year and ending on the thirty-first day of March in the next year.

At what time of the day? I know there is general law on this matter. The interpretation of the judicial day, for instance, is well settled. This may be found in the Interpretation Act. However, if it stands as it reads it will certainly give rise to argument as to whether, if it terminates on the 31st day of March, it terminates at 12 o'clock midday or 12 o'clock midnight, or when it terminates. There will also be argument over when it begins. I think we should have some information now or when we reach the committee stage on the law in this regard so that we may determine whether it needs some attention.

The Hon. the Speaker: The honourable senator has asked a question of the sponsor of the bill (Hon. Mr. Robichaud). Does he wish a reply now?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, if he is able to answer.

Hon. Mr. Robichaud: This amendment, which reads,

> "fiscal year" means the period beginning on the first day of April in one year and ending on the thirty-first day of March in the next year...

is in line with the Interpretation Act. The amendment was made so that when "fiscal year" was mentioned it would refer to the definition in the Interpretation Act.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Do I understand the honourable senator to say that the problem is cleared up by the Interpretation Act? Is that what you are saying?

Hon. Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I think it is less rigid than before.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Robichaud: I move that Bill C-172 be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance.

Hon. Lazarus Phillips: Honourable senators, I have the honour to be Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and I would like to advise the honourable senators that the committee will be meeting this afternoon, as soon as the house rises, for consideration of this bill.

May I further advise honourable senators that the regular meeting of the committee will be held tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock to which we have invited an outside witness from one of the universities. May I ask for as full attendance as possible.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1969

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-185, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1970.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate, that this bill be now read the second time.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we have no objections, but before we grant leave perhaps the Government Leader will indicate what the situation is as to the adjournment. As I understand that this is the last piece of legislation to need the approval of the Senate before we adjourn for the Easter recess, perhaps the Leader of the Government could give some information for the benefit of honourable senators who wish to make travel plans.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, it is intended to have Royal Assent tomorrow afternoon. We hope to adjourn until April 22, with the understanding that in all probability we will have to return a week before that date. While I cannot say that definitely, it would appear at this stage that we may have to come back on April 14 or thereabouts. We are moving for an adjournment until April 22, with the possibility of being recalled at an earlier date, if such is necessary. I hope it will not be necessary, but that is the situation at the moment.

In brief, honourable senators, we hope to adjourn tomorrow until April 22 subject to recall.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: When will Royal Assent be given?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Tomorrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: That means that the Senate will meet tomorrow afternoon?

Hon. Mr. Martin: Yes. Tomorrow afternoon the honourable the Speaker has made arrangements to have all the Speakers and their Clerks of the legislative assemblies in Canada who are in Ottawa at this time attend the ceremony. I might add that this suits the schedule of the other place.

Hon. Leopold Langlois: Honourable senators, as you will recall, the Estimates for 1969-70, on which this bill is based, were tabled in the Senate on February 6, 1969 and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance on February 12. These Estimates were discussed in committee with Treasury Board officers on March 6 last.

The 1969-70 Estimates total $12,472,309,561, consisting of budgetary expenditures of $11,857,651,503, and of Loans, Investments and Advances of $614,658,058.

The bill now before us is the first interim supply bill for the 1969-70 fiscal year and will release a general proportion of three-twelfths of all votes in those Estimates, except Loans, Investments and Advances, Vote L10, for which no proportion is granted, plus additional proportions for 22 special items.

Vote L10 is a $5 million loan to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation which, I understand, will probably be withdrawn from the Estimates because other arrangements can be made for the money. I probably should add that this item will likely be withdrawn as a result of the corporation's retained earnings being higher than originally expected.

This bill provides for expenditures totalling $1,770,365,753.42. The balance of the Estimates to be voted in later supply bills totals $6,800,443,829. The proportions being asked for in this bill are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the Public Service to June 30, 1969. This bill is in the usual form for an interim supply bill and in no instance does it request release of the total amount of any item.

In addition to the general proportion to be released of three-twelfths, some 22 votes require additional proportions. In general these requirements can be grouped as follows. The first group comprises votes in which it is customary to pay grants, scholarships and fellowships early in each fiscal year. These are four in number, and are as follows: Energy, Mines and Resources, Vote 60; Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Vote 1; National Health and Welfare, Vote 55; Treasury Board, Vote 25.

The second group comprises votes which provide for seasonal requirements or programs. They are two in number, and are as follows: Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Vote 25; Public Works, Vote 25.

The third group comprises votes which provide additional proportions required to cover a backlog of accounts on hand, due to the annual Estimates providing for calendar year requirements rather than fiscal year requirements. These are Votes 15, 25 and 65 of the Department of Transport.

I should perhaps explain that these votes cover payment of deficits and subsidies to railway companies, including the C.N.R., which operate, as honourable senators know, on a calendar year basis rather than on a fiscal year basis, as does the Government of Canada. Consequently, payments to be made before June 30 of this year are for the first six months of the year—that is, starting in January down to June—with the consequence that the department is three months behind in its payments at the start of the fiscal year. It has been the custom in the past to provide in the Estimates for the requirements of the fiscal year only. For these subsidies which should be paid on a calendar year basis, it means that the Estimates provide only for the nine months comprised within the fiscal year for which these Estimates are tabled. For this reason at the beginning of the new fiscal year we have to provide for six months instead of three. The fourth group comprises votes for which additional proportions are required for specific purposes. They are thirteen in number and are as follows:

> External Affairs, Vote 35; Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Vote 34; Labour, Vote 5; National Defence, Vote 20; Parliament, Vote 20; Supply and Services, Vote 15; Transport, Vote 30; Loans, Investments and Advances, Votes L50, L55, L80, L150, L155 and L160.

If honourable senators wish any further information on certain votes, I shall be glad to provide it.

A borrowing authority of $2 billion has been included in this bill, as is usual, to provide for authorized payments out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund through the issue of treasury bills, Canada Savings Bonds and non-marketable securities, for the financing of the ordinary operations of the Government, non-budgetary cash requirements such as loans and advances to Crown corporations, and to meet the requirements of the Exchange Fund Account.

The passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable senators to criticize any item in the Estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of the present measure.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the sponsor of the bill has explained thoroughly the reasons why the Government at this time require interim supply. Generally, if my understanding is correct, this bill will provide supply for only one month, or one-twelfth of the current expenditures of the Government.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Three months.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: I was referring to paragraph (d) of section 2 where it says one-twelfth of the total of the amounts of the several items in the said Estimates in Schedule D, $30 million. Is it three months generally up until the end of June?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Then it is 25 per cent of the budget as a whole, is that right?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: So, no further interim supply bill will be required before the end of June? As the sponsor has indicated, all the Estimates for the current fiscal year have been referred to our Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, where examination can be made and all questions asked. Therefore, generally speaking, when we are dealing with an interim supply bill, discussion in this house need not be extensive.

However, I suggest that under special circumstances, for instance, if any honourable senator would wish one particular item to be dealt with in committee, the request should be met. I do not see the need at this time but I merely want to put it on the record that as a general rule we do not need to refer an interim supply bill to a committee, but occasionally this might be good if we have a problem, or one specific item, or a series of specific items that we would wish to discuss or to question in committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend permit me to say a few words? Last week Senator Grosart, asked me whether it was our intention to send the supply bill to the committee. Frankly, at the time I thought he had in mind the Financial Administration Bill. That was in my mind at the very time, and I replied, "Yes, I think we will send it to the committee."

It was only after I had left the chamber that afternoon that I realized we were talking about two different things. He was talking about the supply bill. It has not been the practice in this house to send the supply bill to the committee.

In fairness I thought I should advise Senator Grosart at once what has been on my mind. I telephoned him at his home in Toronto—I regret that he is ill now—to explain to him that when I said it might be referred I was not speaking of the supply bill but of the Financial Administration Bill

In fairness to Senator Grosart and in fairness to what I said in reply to his question, I make this observation. I thank the honourable senator for allowing me to make it in the midst of his statement.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: Perhaps my remarks were intended to provoke the Leader into making that statement. Again, I agree with him, that as a general rule an interim supply bill need not be referred to a committee. I was pointing out to the leader that occasionally when there are some special reasons or some special items which we want to question or discuss, we should ask that, for the specific purpose, an interim supply be referred to committee.

It is all very well that the rights of the senators be reserved to discuss any item when we are dealing with Estimates generally in the Finance committee. It is not the same as objecting, let us say, to certain items at the time we are called upon to approve them and sanction them in a bill. It would be useless to say that we could criticize any item afterwards: if we have already voted that item, the money will have been spent and to criticize it would be an exercise in futility. That is why I want to have this reservation.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): No item has ever been completely spent.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: In any event, once we have started, it may still be an exercise in futility to try to stop the current.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): It may be, anyway.

Hon. Mr. Flynn: It may be, anyway; but at least in principle, if we have an objection to one item, it is better to object before we vote any part of it. That is why I say I agree with the general rule, but I reserve the right on a given occasion or in special circumstances to request that a bill of that kind be referred to a committee—not as a general rule, but occasionally. In the present instance I am satisfied to wait for the Finance Committee to deal with the Estimates generally and, as the Government needs the money now for the reasons indicated by the sponsor of the bill, we are ready to give second reading to this bill.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Honourable senators, I wonder if the sponsor of the bill can elaborate on Vote 20 and Vote 25? I have a question on Vote 25. What type of research is involved in the Royal Society? I see that they have a grant of $17,000.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: To which department does Vote 20 apply?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Vote No. 20, National Defence, as in Schedule A to the bill, and Vote No. 25, the Treasury Board, as in Schedule B to the bill, page 5.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Vote 20, National Defence, is for $700,000. This vote provides for payment of transitional grants to the Province of New Brunswick in respect of financial assistance to the Town of Oromocto, the military base of Gagetown. These grants were previously paid directly to the town. Additional provisions were requested since, under the terms of the Federal-Provincial Agreement with the Province of New Brunswick, the full amount of the grant is available in April of each year commencing with the calendar year of 1969.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Does the honourable senator know the total amount of the grants?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: The total is $700,000.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is it a continuous grant?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is granted each year, yes.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Is it $700,000 each year?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Yes, and it has to be voted each year.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): For how many years?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: There is no period of years. I do not have the agreement before me and I regret I cannot give the period covered by it.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Will it last forever?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: No. I am sorry I do not have the information with me now.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): At any rate, the Province of New Brunswick is desperate for money and the grant will be welcome at this time. That is all I wish to say.

Hon. Mr. Langlois: What was the question on Vote 25?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): What type of research is involved in the Royal Society, that they would receive a grant of $17,000?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Vote 25, Treasury Board, National Research Council, is a total vote of $64,760,000. This provides for the payment of grants, scholarships and fellowships based on the merit of the individual, and the payment of grants towards capital and operational costs of large research facilities at universities. The object of this vote is the promotion, encouragement and stimulation of science and engineering research at Canadian universities.

This vote also provides support to other scientific organizations by grants, payment of fees to international scientific organizations on behalf of Canada, and grants for conferences and for the universities' share in international research programs. This program is administered centrally at Ottawa. The additional provisions are requested at this time to enable the Council to pay, the customary 50 per cent of the grants awarded during the first three months of the year. The grants committee has already met and designated the grants to be paid.

Is that satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): It is satisfactory up to a point, but my question really concerned the research that is being done by the Royal Society to justify their receiving a grant of $17,000. Is it atomic research, medical research, or what? May we have a word on that?

Hon. Mr. Langlois: It is quite broad. It covers, as I said in my statement, science and engineering research.

Hon. Mr. Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): I will accept that, but it is not very satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. Choquette: You will have to accept it. It is all you can get.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of the Task Force on Labour Relations entitled "Canadian Industrial Relations", dated December 1968, together with a summary thereof. (English and French texts).

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lazarus Phillips, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-172, to amend the Financial Administration Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud) moved that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

MASS MEDIA

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved, with leave:

That the Special Committee of the Senate appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, and in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Desruisseaux, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Laird, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, Welch, Willis and White.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY

GREAT SLAVE LAKE RAILWAY—LOSSES TO CONTRACTORS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the large losses suffered by contractors in construction of the Great Slave Lake Railway and to the extreme hardship and financial burden placed on the contractors due to the unnecessary and oppressive use by the Canadian National Railway of clause 16 of the construction contract;

To the completion of the Great Slave Lake Railway ahead of schedule and at less than the estimated cost which was accomplished in substantial measure by the exploitation of the contractors and resulted in the loss to the contractors of many millions of dollars, such loss in certain instances having resulted in the bankruptcy and the financial destitution of contractors who at the commencement of the building of the Great Slave Lake Railway were solvent progressive companies with proven records of efficiency in the construction business; and

To the responsibility for these losses which is that of the Government of Canada inasmuch as the Canadian National Railway (an agent of Her Majesty) and those engaged in the construction of the Great Slave Lake Railway were carrying out the expressed wishes of Parliament as set forth in chapter 56 of the Statutes of Canada, 1961.

He said: Honourable senators, I feel that this motion sets forth in a very brief form the grievance I wish to bring before the Senate this afternoon, as it affects the contractors who took part in the construction of the Great Slave Lake Railway.

This railway was built in northern Alberta and into the Peace River with a termination at Pine Point, its principal object, among others, being to help develop that area and to provide facilities for the moving of the products of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company's operation at the end of the railway line.

I feel that this grievance is something to which the Senate and, indeed, Parliament may well address itself because in the building of this railway line the Canadian National Railway was not operating as a Crown corporation, as it does in the ordinary conduct of its business. Rather, it was operating as an agent of Parliament as specified in Bill C-126 passed in 1961.

Hon. Mr. Martin: For what did that bill provide?

Hon. Mr. Argue: It received first reading on September 15, 1961, and was passed subsequently in that session. It provided for the construction of the Great Slave Lake Railway with a termination date of December 31, 1966.

The complaint of the contractors is that in building this railway they really did not have a chance to perform and to use their judgment in an efficient way because standing over them all the time were the C.N.R. engineers who, in their opinion and based on their experience, they believe acted from time to time in an arbitrary, high-handed and unfair manner, and at times in a most incompetent way.

There is in the contract clause 16 which, in my opinion, is a most onerous one, and a blot on the kind of contracts that the C.N.R. has been drawing up and indeed a blot on the Parliament of Canada. In my opinion it is archaic and outdated. It is something, I understand, the provincial governments do not use. When a contractor undertakes a contract for the department of highways, it does not contain this type of clause.

I wish to put this offending clause 16 on the record. I do not wish to quote the entire clause, although I can if honourable senators wish me to do so. It is quite long and I think it sufficient to read the major part of it, which is as follows:

> If the Engineer shall at any time consider the number of workmen, quantity of machinery, tools, plant, equipment, or of proper materials or things, respectively employed or provided by the Contractor on or for the said works, to be insufficient for the advancement of such works, or any part thereof, towards the completion within the time limited in respect thereof, or that the works are, or some part thereof is, not being carried on with due diligence, the Engineer may, in writing, order the Contractor to employ or provide such additional workmen, machinery, tools, plant, materials or things as he may think necessary, and in case the Contractor shall not, within three days, or such other longer period as may be fixed by any such order, in all respects comply therewith, the Engineer may provide and employ such additional workmen, machinery, tools, plant, material, equipment and things respectively or employ a Sub-Contractor, or Sub-Contractors as he may think proper, and may pay such additional workmen such wages, and for such additional machinery, tools, plant, materials, equipment and things respectively and to such Sub-Contractor or Sub-Contractors such prices as he may think proper; and all such amounts so paid shall be repaid on demand by the Contractor, or the same may be retained and deducted out of any sum that may then or thereafter be due from the Company to the Contractor.

It was the indiscriminate and unfair use of this all-powerful clause in the hands of the C.N.R. through its engineers that forced the bankruptcy or near bankruptcy of many of the contractors who took part in the construction of this railway.

Further complicating the whole construction of the railway was the fact that in the summer of 1962, 52 inches of rain fell on most of this area, an all-time record, making construction conditions almost impossible. The use of clause 16 in an arbitrary fashion, complicated by the tremendous amount of rainfall—which incidentally up until September had delayed 75 per cent of the highway construction in that area—brought about very disastrous results.

Honourable senators, I have studied a considerable quantity of material in this matter and I certainly have no axe to grind in any way, but I have a very strong feeling that the contractors involved should have a right to be heard. I do not believe they have asked anybody in Parliament to seek any money for them. All they have said is that they believe they have a grievance, that they would like an independent body of some kind set up to hear that grievance, and that they will abide by whatever recommendations may be forthcoming. It is my hope that honourable senators taking part in this debate will help bring this about.

One of the specific complaints of a number of the contractors was that there was an undue delay from the time the contract bids were opened until the contracts were available for signature and the equipment could be brought in and put to work. J. J. Lucas Construction Company stated that they had to wait 38 days from the time of the opening of the bids until the contract was in operation. Hatch Construction Company had to wait 53 days. They pointed out that the practice in the case of provincial governments is that about one week elapses from the time the bids are opened—and they are opened in public—which gives the provincial officials time to ascertain to their satisfaction that the contractor can perform the contract for which he has bid. That takes the provincial administration one week, In one case it took C.N.R. 38 days, and in the other 53 days.

Another general complaint made by the contractors is that in order to build the railroad and to begin construction of this section in northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories, they felt it was necessary, based on the time limit they had, to begin some construction in the early spring of the year, and they pointed out that this would entail the removal of some frozen material. The C.N.R. engineers took the position they would have to wait until there was no frozen material; that they would have to wait until midsummer. The contractors pointed out that in that case it would be absolutely impossible for them to meet the deadlines in their contracts. Then, when they were able—some of them in 1962 and some in 1963—to commence operations, at a time when they had to remove a few feet of frozen material, initially, in order to reach the unfrozen material, the C.N.R. engineers were determined they should be paid only the lower price for unfrozen material for all the material removed. When they went down 50 feet, and the first six feet was frozen, the C.N.R. said, "Your excavation is not frozen, and we will pay you only at the cheaper non-frozen rate." The contractors felt, in order to do the job, they should have been allowed, and encouraged, to make an earlier start in those construction years.

As a matter of fact, the C.N.R. changed their tactics, and in the spring of 1963 they so badly wanted frozen material removed immediately that they said unless the contractors hurried up and moved the material they were going to invoke clause 16. So the C.N.R., through their engineers, completely changed their mistaken policy the next year.

One of the contractors, J. J. Lucas Construction, undertook to build a certain section of the railway. The highway in that area intersects this railroad at Mile 110. It so happened that at Mile 110 there was a huge fill to be made which would take about 42 per cent of the yardage in that company's entire contract. The contractor proposed that he be allowed to set his own schedule. He asked that he be allowed to begin this large fill at Mile 110 in the spring because, he said, due to wet weather he could use a borrow-pit and so, by using some wet material from the excavation and some dry material from the borrow-pit, he could make a mix that would be firm and would do the job. The C.N.R. engineers said, "No, we do not want you to start at Mile 110. We want you to go down to the extremities of the line you are to build and do the small grading initially."

It was pointed out that the ground in that area had a very high moisture content and that it would be much better, from every standpoint, to use the earlier part of the construction period to put in the big fill, and then to use the warmer summer period to put in the regular, ordinary right-of-way fill, because the ground would be in a drier state at that time.

It was further pointed out that if this construction firm could start its construction at Mile 110, the intersection with the highway, its big Euclid earth-moving equipment—and we have all seen this type—could build a serviceable road which would be the right-of-way when it was constructed, and once they came to Mile 110 it would take only a few minutes to move their equipment to the particular section they were constructing.

The C.N.R. engineer said, "No, you go out to the extremities of this section and begin construction there." It was wet, and the equipment bogged down. It has been stated in this material that it took two hours on many days to move the crew from Mile 110, at the highway junction, out to where the construction should take place, and to move the crews out to that equipment, whereas it should have been taking only a few minutes. All the time the railway engineers were threatening to invoke clause 16 if the construction, in spite of the worst summer in history, did not fit in with the C.N.R.'s timetable.

With regard to the building of this fill at Mile 110 following the orders of the engineers, the material was wet and after a good deal of work had been done the material itself slid, and they had then to start over again and put in the proper kind of material. So, the construction firm, with its own engineers, appeared to have a much better understanding of how grading and construction should take place than the C.N.R. engineers who were complete dictators and had absolute authority under clause 16 in the contract.

The shallow grade was finally completed, in spite of the very difficult circumstances, and in spite of the fact that the rubber-tired equipment would bog down and the wheels would spin in the mud. The C.N.R. engineers came out and looked over the right-of-way that had been constructed and said, "It is too wide; you have put too much material in," and they ordered it trimmed and narrowed.

The next year it was falling away. The C.N.R. engineers brought in additional equipment to extend the right-of-way, to put it back where it should have been and had been, and all at additional cost, much turmoil, and headache.

It is stated that during this rainy period, when construction could not take place—and obviously it could not take place for some days—the contractors were required to keep all crews on hand at all times ready to proceed in case the weather cleared up. These crews had to be paid, and that entailed another huge and unnecessary additional expense to the contractor.

Many of the contractors who have made separate statements on their own behalf have said that the general C.N.R. engineering of this project was haphazard, inaccurate and not up-to-date. That is indicated by the fact that as the work proceeded the C.N.R., piece by piece and step by step, decided their original estimates calling for the removal of 1.3 million yards were seriously in error, and that they would have to be increased by 50 per cent. So, instead of having to move 1.3 million yards, they would have to move two million yards. This is a huge error, and the contractors said this made it impossible for them to perform on the basis of their original estimates of cost.

Clause 16 was invoked from time to time, and when the C.N.R. engineers, in their position of virtual dictators on this construction project, decided that additional equipment should be brought in, they hired additional equipment. They paid on an hourly rate, and charged the amount of work done and the cost of the additional equipment to the original contract. It has been stated that on the basis of the equipment brought in it cost the C.N.R.—and this was charged to the contractors—$1 per cubic yard to move much of this material, whereas in the original contract it was 29 cents a cubic yard. The C.N.R. could not lose. They had a time-table. They were in a hurry, and decided they needed additional equipment. The worse the weather became, the more additional equipment the C.N.R. called on to the job, charging the whole cost to the contractors who were doing the work, and the faster the contractors went broke.

Surprising as it may seem, the railway was completed 18 months ahead of schedule. The C.N.R. engineers were exceedingly successful; they beat Parliament by 18 months. How many contracts have been performed on time? Very often they are late. Another absolutely astounding thing is that the construction was completed at a cost considerably lower than that estimated. It was originally estimated that it would cost $99 million to complete this railroad. I have seen a variety of figures, but $88 million is the highest I have seen for the final cost. Using the highest figure, therefore, the C.N.R. was able to construct this railroad 18 months ahead of schedule for $11 million less than the estimated cost. Unless somebody can show me that I am in error, this saving was achieved at the expense of the contractor. The federal Government has entered into other contracts that have not been fulfilled at the original contract price. For example, Habitat at Expo—

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would the honourable senator permit me to interrupt? He has mentioned that there are other contracts the Government has entered into, and he went on to say something that, in my opinion, is not consequential to the argument. Surely this is a contract, not with the Government, but between the C.N.R. and the contractors. I think this distinction is very important to bear in mind in this discussion.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I think it is important but it does not entirely remove responsibility for Parliament. For instance, if, after discussion of the whole question, we were to agree to the motion to have an ombudsman, there would be some recourse for the citizens of this country who feel they have been treated unfairly. Even though perhaps this damnable contract is a legal contract in every way, there should be some kind of appeal. I know that the honourable Leader of the Government, who is a distinguished lawyer, knows much more about these legal questions than I, who only took a couple of classes in law.

Hon. Mr. Martin: You are doing very well.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I have heard of ex gratia payments; I have heard of governments who, when everything was finalized, have said that a contractor should be paid a fair and reasonable price based on the work he accomplished. I suggest that these contractors were not paid a fair and reasonable price based on the work they did. I submit this is not fair or just. It is not in keeping with the "just society" to say that a vicious provision like clause 16 should be used indiscriminately in a year when 52 inches of rain fell—a record in that area. There is not an "act of God" provision in that contract to protect the contractor from something unforeseen happening.

I am informed that had these conditions existed in a province there might well have been an adjustment, as there often is, in the basis of the contract. There would also always be a determination by the provincial authorities that the contractors would be given an opportunity in other ways, at later dates, to perform other contracts that would help to some extent make up for the losses involved.

This railway has been good for Canada. This has been a good project. The C.N.R. should be happy. They built it 18 months ahead of schedule. They saved the taxpayers at least $11 million, but they took it out of the hides of the contractors.

I am not really versed in the contracting business. I have merely done what I could to learn what I might from the information given me. I am told of one relatively small contractor who, after a life's work, was worth something in excess of $1 million. He had a contract on this railway. He performed well. He must have done so, because they built the railway 18 months ahead of schedule, and at a saving of $11 million. He has lost his equipment. He is not in bankruptcy, but he is near bankruptcy. He has lost his life's savings. He has lost the garages he had constructed. He has lost his life insurance, which he turned in some years ago. He is now in the process, he feels, of being turned out of his home in the City of Regina; he is in danger of being put out on the street.

I do not think the public of Canada, or any politician in Canada, wants this sort of thing to happen—if what I have said is correct, and I stand to be corrected if there should be an answer to these facts. That is why I think there should be a public inquiry by a fair tribunal. If this information is correct—and I have no reason to believe it is not—I say that there is not one honourable senator or member of the other House who would want this sort of thing to happen.

If this is brought to the attention of the Senate and the other place, as these matters are from time to time, and if, despite the busy life of senators and members of Parliament, it can be given an airing, I believe that justice will be done. These people are not asking for anything that is unfair. They are merely asking for a hearing. They started by asking the then Prime Minister of this country, the Right Honourable Lester Pearson, in 1965, and they have been to cabinet ministers since. They have been to senators. His Honour the Speaker gave them a very fair hearing, as did the honourable Senator Leonard, and the honourable Senator John J. Connolly. In any conversation in which I was a participant I heard no one challenge the statements that have been put forward by these contractors.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Would my honourable friend permit another question? We have listened to him with great interest, and he is certainly making a strong case. As he sees it, what was the reply of the Prime Minister in 1965? What was the reply given by any minister of the Crown? Were any judicial proceedings taken with the railway?

Hon. Mr. Argue: I do not have the reply from the Prime Minister on my desk. I do not know that I have ever seen it, but I do know that a submission was made to the Prime Minister and to ministers of the Crown. I do not know what was said, or whether or not they closed the door entirely, but I do happen to have in my hand a copy of the letter written by the present Minister of Transport to Mr. Lucas of Lucas Construction Company. I do not know if the Senate is interested in the whole of this letter—

Hon. Mr. Martin: What is the date of the letter?

Hon. Mr. Argue: The letter is dated January 20, 1969. The most pertinent paragraph reads:

> Nevertheless, I must admit, reluctantly, I cannot find grounds for direct intervention by me in a matter which relates to a dispute between your company and the C.N.R. Neither do I feel justified in making a reference of the question to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Why should there not be a reference made? If I read the record of Hansard correctly, there was to be a reference made. It went before the Commons, but someone had made a typographical error in submitting the recommendations, and the thing that was passed made no sense. It meant nothing, and on this technicality the Government said there was no authority for the Transport Committee to look into it. They were not looking into the claims of the contractors, but into the Great Slave Lake railway.

I can understand that some secretary in typing this up thought the inquiry was only as to the Great Slave Lake railway and not as to the loss to the contractors. In any event, it was not proceeded with. It may be that I am not able to read the minds of members in the other house. Possibly the Transport Committee will look into this question in an incidental way when they are dealing with the Estimates. I do not know. I know there are members of Parliament in every political party, including the party to which the Leader of the Government and I have the honour to belong, who are very disturbed, and who sincerely believe an inquiry should take place. They are not out to hold up the Government for millions of dollars.

I know these M.P.s, and I have copies of some of their correspondence here. They are private members, and when some of these submissions were made they were parliamentary secretaries. As far as I know, they all suggested that there should be an inquiry.

I think with a new Prime Minister who believes that in this day and age grievances should be aired and that justice should be done, the contractors may have a chance. From the floor of the Senate I make an appeal to the Prime Minister to have an appropriate inquiry by a committee of the Commons, a committee of the Senate, a task force, or a royal commission—whatever form he might consider appropriate. I would ask the Prime Minister of this country, who I know has the interests of the ordinary people at heart, and particularly, those who are unable in a real sense to fight their own battles, to see that some action be taken.

I think the C.N.R. has been coddled too much and that it can be overprotected. When I had a motion on the Order Paper asking for the production of the contract, from which I read clause 16, the Government Leader—and I am not criticizing him at all—in carrying out his full responsibility in relating to this chamber the opinion of the Minister of Transport, said that this would interfere with the competitive position of the C.N.R. Competitive in what way? The contract was ended years ago. I had it in my office. I could have tabled it, but I thought I should get it into the regular channels. I then asked for the up-to-date contracts and the more recent ones to see whether the C.N.R. had removed some of these onerous clauses. The Minister of Transport said that you have got to protect the C.N.R., this small, weak, ineffective Crown corporation, against some great, big contractors who want to have their contract forms produced in public. After his refusal, my office phoned the C.N.R., and I am very happy to report to the Senate that within a few days the proper official of the railway, at the headquarters in Montreal, sent to my office the pertinent contract. Therefore, the Minister of Transport is trying to protect the C.N.R. in a way and manner that the C.N.R. does not care to be protected.

I think if we are to have an open society we should forget about trying to cover up for the Crown corporations. I said there are many contracts that go over the original estimates, such as that for the National Arts Centre, which will no doubt be a great credit to Canada. I think Canadians generally supported the original estimate of $18 million for the National Arts Centre. Now they are saying the cost will be $46 million. Yet the Great Slave Lake Railway was built at $11 million less than the estimate because they took the savings from the contractors by the unwarranted use of clause 16. In effect, the C.N.R. has confiscated the equipment of these contractors, has confiscated their life insurance—has even placed their very homes in jeopardy. I would think that when the country saved $11 million we all should be pleased to ask why this extraordinary thing happened.

The President of the Exchequer Court has from time to time made speeches about the difficulties in which contractors find themselves, and he is on record time and time again as saying that these contracts should be overhauled and that they should not be weighted against the small contractor, but slanted in his favour. He has said that there should be a fair return to the contractors for a fair job done. We operate in what we call a free enterprise system and under a democracy. I think if that system is to function, as I hope it will, that the very basis of competitive enterprise is that individuals and small companies should be given a fair return, and neither a huge Crown corporation like the Canadian National Railways nor the Parliament of Canada itself, either directly or indirectly, should take advantage of good work performed by competent contractors carrying out their work in a sincere and energetic manner. I would ask that, as this debate proceeds, the members of this chamber address themselves to what I believe to be a great injustice, just as the Senate has addressed itself to other injustices in the past. I would hope that some appropriate action will take place.

Honourable senators, as far as my personal opinion is concerned, I believe the case is so good and so strong that, whether this month or next month, this year or next year, some day, some government, some party of Parliament—and I would expect it to be this Government and this Prime Minister—will see, not that the contractors are handed $11 million or any other sum, but that some independent authority will look at the evidence and hear the complaints. If such an authority should recommend ex gratia payments it would mean that the contractors carrying out this important project for the welfare of our nation have received a fair hearing, and justice has been served.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, this seems to me to be an amazing statement and one which I never expected to hear in the Senate. I am sure I speak for all my colleagues when I say no one here wants to see injustice done. But I am also sure that we are likely to ask some questions.

When the contractor signed the contract, he did so voluntarily. We can only assume that he studied the terrain, that he had engineers make the assessment, and that he entered into an agreement on which he expected to make a profit. In the circumstances, it did not turn out that way, but there are a few interesting facts. It is true that there was 52 inches of rain that year, which would make it very difficult to carry out the contract on schedule. The senator has indicated that the road was completed 18 months ahead of schedule. Therefore the question arises, was it necessary to do all the work in this period of very inclement weather?

Furthermore, if they had estimated the cost of $90 million or $100 million, and if they did it for $88 million, again the facts do not add up.

I do not want to prejudge the case, but it does not seem to me to make sense to plead a cause of this kind in this house. Even on nearby Wellington Street, a contractor went broke building, I think it was, the Department of Veterans' Affairs headquarters, but he did not come to Parliament crying for a readjustment.

If we look back at the history of railway building, at Sir Donald Smith, the Van Hornes, and the shades of Mackenzie and Mann, we recognize the unfortunate way the people of Canada had to get into the railway business, because contractors went bankrupt. I hope we will never hear of such cases again. It is unfortunate that the circumstances so turned out and that the people concerned lost money. But this is happening every day, under the so-called free enterprise society. Surely we are not going to be asked to re-open every contract where the contractor lost money.

Frankly, I never expected to hear a plea of this kind put in the Senate. When a contractor enters into a contract voluntarily and with his eyes wide open, and does not make a profit, I cannot see how, on the basis of either justice or equity, he can come to us expecting the case to be re-opened.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Prowse, debate adjourned.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION BILL, 1969

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-173, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT BILL, 1969

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois, for Hon. Mr. Denis, moved the third reading, of Bill C-178, to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 25, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Muriel McQ. Fergusson: Honourable senators, I regret that today I am unable to address you in my normal tone of voice. However, as I am leaving Canada tomorrow and may not be back in Ottawa when the debate on Bill C-165 is continued in this chamber, I wish to express today my support for it and for the principles on which I believe it is based. I ask your indulgence.

Honourable senators, although I disagree with practically all the speeches that have been made on this bill in this chamber to date, I fully appreciate that excellent speeches have been made by some of my most brilliant colleagues. I compliment all the speakers, even though they have not been able to persuade me to agree with their reasoning. Because for many years I have been concerned over what I consider a very inequitable situation in regard to widows under the Estate Tax Act, I welcomed with delight the announcement made by the Minister of National Revenue on October 22 of last year that thereafter gifts and property passing from one spouse to another would be free of tax. Even though this change in the act necessarily involved a transfer of some estate taxes to other persons liable under the act so that the amount of money raised through the Estate Tax Act would not be diminished, nevertheless, I felt that this legislation, which recognizes human rights in that it recognizes equality between the spouses, would be so universally acclaimed that it would pass quickly through this chamber. I thought everyone would approve, and so I did not plan to express my ideas about it. However, this has not been the case and I wish to give some of my reasons for supporting the legislation.

Prior to the announcement by the Minister of National Revenue to which I referred, a wife who had contributed equally with her husband to the building-up of his estate, on the death of her husband was required after certain limited exemptions to pay estate tax when the family property passed to her. The situation was aggravated when the property she inherited on the death of her husband was an annuity or a pension, for in such a case she was required to pay estate tax on the commuted value of her future pension or annuity. That is, she paid estate tax on the amount it was calculated she would receive over the period she would probably live. If she died very soon thereafter, or at any time before the end of the period used in the calculation, she would have paid estate tax on money she never received. The estate tax, particularly that levied in relation to annuities or pensions, often left such widows in very straitened circumstances. Some widows even found it necessary to go into the labour market to provide for the current expenses of themselves and their children, and in some cases even to raise the money to pay the taxes. This, even though the husband, in contemplation of death, had considered that he was leaving his wife well provided for.

Another result of the provisions of the former act was that the widow was not only required to pay the estate tax on the property she might never receive, but, if she did live and did receive the annuity, she was required, when she received it, to pay income tax on it also. In this way she was taxed twice on the same money.

Over a number of years these inequities have again and again been brought to the attention of the Government and of the Prime Minister of the day by various groups, especially the National Council of Women, the Canadian Federation of Business and Professional Women and other similar groups, who have asked that this situation be rectified. These people must be very gratified, as I am, that relief from this inequitable taxation is being provided now under Bill C-165.

Some of the strong objections made to this bill, both in this chamber and in the press and in propaganda concerning it, which has been widely circulated throughout Canada, are, I believe, unjustified. It has been claimed that the changes brought about by this bill will affect very many Canadians; but, when we realize that only 5 per cent of all the estates of Canada pay any estate tax at all, we realize that it will not affect a very great many Canadians.

Some of the arguments used would lead one to think that this legislation is something new, that it is a tax that we have not had before. But we have had estate taxes for years, and succession duty taxes before that. Whether we believe in this kind of tax or not—and I do not want to enter into an argument on that—they are not new, but have been accepted by the people of Canada who know that money has to be raised in some manner to pay for the many things that Canadians demand of their Government.

We know that the estate tax is going to continue to be levied, and really the only question is, what is the most equitable way to levy it. I believe that to relieve the widow of paying tax on what she through the years has already earned is only fair, just and equitable, even if it does involve somewhat higher rates for other persons who are taxed under the act.

Some people claim that the period of time the widow will have to enjoy the use of the money that has come to her through not having to pay tax will probably be negligible. It may not be very long, but on the average wives survive their husbands by at least seven years, and seven years is a long time in anyone's life.

If the widow, during the period of her widowhood, should invest the money saved for her through exemption from paying estate tax, by the time she dies and the estate is ready to pass on she may well have accumulated through her investment a much larger amount than the child or children inheriting will be called on to pay in estate tax, and, therefore, this will be all to the good. They will get just that much more. But even if no such saving occurs through investment of the widow, many people—and I am one of them—would consider that many of the fears which have been expressed are exaggerated and unfounded.

It has been stated that small businesses will be bought up by foreigners. Why is it more likely that small businesses will be bought up and absorbed by foreign buyers than large businesses?

Fear has been expressed that by reason of these taxes the sons of farmers will be driven from their farms. The truth is that sons of farmers, and daughters too, are leaving farms every day for urban living, which is what attracts them. The fear of paying estate tax has nothing to do with it. A son who inherits a farm, even though he is required to pay estate tax, is an extremely fortunate person. Many other people would be only too happy if they could acquire the same property, even if it were encumbered by a debt the size of the estate tax.

It is also claimed that this bill bears heavily on the sons of those who own small businesses and whose sons are associated with them in business. I cannot see why the sons of men owning small businesses, or of farmers, should be relieved of this kind of taxation any more than the sons of business managers, or teachers, or public servants, who may have contributed more to Canada and Canada's growth and development than either farmers or the owners of small businesses.

I certainly do not feel it is incumbent on me to reply to the various criticisms made in this chamber about this bill. This will be done adequately by the sponsor of the bill on closing the debate and by the officials of the department, if the bill goes to committee. However, I would like to point out some additional provisions of the bill which I think are especially good.

Besides the exemption of spouses from paying gift tax and estate tax, I also support as humanitarian legislation the provision that gives an exemption of $10,000 to all adult children over 26 years of age. For healthy children there is an added exemption of $1,000 for each year the child is under the age of 26. If the surviving child is incapacitated and unable to support itself, it is allowed an additional exemption of $1,000 for each year of its life after the parents' death until he reaches the age of 71. The maximum exemption such child could get under this provision is $30,000.

It seems to me these are provisions to which we must all give our approval. Who could oppose them? They, with the exemption from taxation of gifts between spouses, and the exemption of spouses from estate tax, are the reasons for the increases in rates to other persons covered by the bill. But surely able-bodied adult young people in Canada are willing and able to assume these added burdens to make life easier for those not so fortunate.

On introducing and explaining this bill in his usual clear and concise manner, Senator Hayden said on page 1108 of Hansard:

> ... everybody is called on to contribute because of the remissions that are involved in making gifts between one spouse and the other exempt either from gift tax or estate tax.

I think everyone is also called to contribute so as to give these added exemptions to children, whether healthy or incapacitated.

To me this legislation is thoroughly modern and takes Canadian law on this matter out of the thinking of the 19th century and into the more modern thinking of the 20th century which recognizes the contributions made by wives to the accumulated wealth of a family and also recognizes, as frequently was not done by earlier generations, that all people should follow the precept that we should "bear one another's burdens".

In any case the real issue is whether the tax will or will not be more equitably distributed, and not whether the transfers of taxes are good or bad for the economy of the country.

From the speeches made in this chamber on this bill, it would appear there is considerable misunderstanding of the technicalities involved. I, too, would like to have some matters clarified, and I expect they will be clarified if the bill goes to committee.

Hon. Mr. Martin: It will.

Hon. Mrs. Fergusson: However, because we must surely agree with the principle underlying these changes, the bill should receive second reading and go to committee where the minister and his officials will undoubtedly explain to our satisfaction any technicalities which are causing criticisms. Surely in Canada we believe that the good of human beings, which is the basic reason for the changes in this bill, should receive priority in our legislation over more mundane and selfish considerations.

It is scarcely necessary that I tell you I support this bill and trust it will receive second reading.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Martin, debate adjourned.

OMBUDSMAN COMMITTEE

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, March 18, the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Croll that the Senate considers it desirable to establish at an early date a committee of the Senate to be known as the Ombudsman Committee.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, in speaking briefly on this matter I would first of all like to congratulate in his absence Senator Croll for having brought the matter of an ombudsman to the fore. I agree with what all the former speakers have said concerning the need for the function of an ombudsman, and, as others have said, we are not alone in expressing this concern. There have been a number of references to this matter before, and most of them have been mentioned by other speakers in this house.

First of all the House of Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1965 recommended that the Government consider the establishment of an office like that of an ombudsman for the purpose of investigating and reporting on administrative acts of the Government of Canada complained of by members of the public. In the Speech from the Throne of April 5, 1965 we find the following:

> My Government will appoint a royal commission to study the status, form and procedures of adjudicative and regulatory bodies and to investigate the desirability of instituting a parliamentary commissioner or Ombudsman for Canada.

Hon. Mr. Martin: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: April 5, 1965.

The Liberal Party of Canada in convention in 1966 adopted the following resolution:

> That a Royal Commission be appointed to study and to make recommendations on:
>
> 1. The redrafting of the Canadian Bill of Rights.
> 2. The entrenchment of the Canadian Bill of Rights in the Constitution.
>
> 3. The establishment of an Ombudsman for the Federal Government.
> 4. The adoption of any other techniques or institutions for the promotion of civil liberty.

The Government has in the meantime responded by taking a serious look at the problems of exercising ministerial discretion and some remedies which might be provided. It has also set up special proceedings for grievances under the proceedings and adjournment motion.

While these steps are moving in the right direction, the Government has not yet moved to the point of accomplishing what I sense most of us feel is necessary, the establishment and definition of the post of Ombudsman and the development of guidelines for that office. It is highly desirable that we, in the ways open to us, remind the Government of the urgency of proceeding with such legislation and its responsibility for doing so.

However, the establishment of the role of Ombudsman, whether that role be played by an individual or a committee, it is a matter of basic and substantive importance and is a decision which should be taken by the elected representatives of the people. As Senator Croll himself points out, the role was established in the constitution of Greece, Rome, Sweden, Finland, Denmark and Norway. It was established by act of Parliament or of the legislature in New Zealand, Alberta, New Brunswick and other parliamentary democracies patterned on the British system.

The decision to establish the role of Ombudsman has nowhere been taken by simple motion of an appointive body to appropriate to a committee of its own the role of protector of the individual. For the Senate to take such an important step, without the concurrence of the elected representatives of the people, would mean that Canada would be sliding into the Ombudsman function without having done its homework, without having defined the role and without having developed an effective Bill of Rights for guidance, without having had a debate in the House of Commons on the question, without having stimulated a public debate, and without any real opportunity to make the public aware of the existence of the committee or their right to appeal to it.

Honourable senators, I want a real Ombudsman system; one which is available to the people in their own communities; one which is available to them all year around; one which brings pressure to bear through its recommendations, not only on the administrative bureaus of government, but on both Houses of Parliament as well. I want an Ombudsman role, whether it is performed by an individual or by a committee, to be established by act of Parliament.

I so badly want the Ombudsman role to be effective and highly respected that I cannot support Senator Croll's motion, much as I admire him for having moved it. The result of the passage of the motion would be the creation of a pale reflection indeed of what we must have. All we would be doing would be to supply the Government with an excuse for not proceeding with effective legislation on the subject, even though it has clear recommendations from the Liberal Party and a parliamentary committee, and a commitment of its predecessor expressed in the 1965 Speech from the Throne to proceed with such legislation.

Hon. Mr. Argue: A major split in the party!

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: If the motion were to set up a committee to study the methods whereby such a function should be established and defined, a committee which would do the kind of work in this area which has come to be expected of honourable senators in such areas as divorce reform, science policy, the problems of aging and so on, then I would support it, because it would take the place of the commission proposed in the 1965 Speech from the Throne and in the Liberal Party resolution of 1966. But doing the spade work for Government and providing guidance and assistance is quite a different thing from removing from Government its own responsibility for action. I will vote against the motion.

Hon. Mr. Argue: I hope it carries.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I had the honour to second this motion, and I ask if it would not be possible for a conference to take place between the honourable senator and Senator Croll by means of which a resolution satisfactory to all of us could be achieved. I think there is a great deal in what the senator has said—make this a study instead of an assertion, as it now is.

Hon. Mr. Stanbury: I would be very pleased to meet with Senator Croll on this matter.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 3 p.m.

THE SENATE

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that he had received the following communication:

GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Ottawa

28 March, 1969

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 28th March, at 4.30 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Louis-Frémont Trudeau
Brigadier General
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

OFFICIALS OF LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLIES

VISIT TO PARLIAMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I take pleasure in calling your attention to the visit today to Parliament by the Speakers and the Clerks of the Legislative Assemblies of Canada. We welcome them to Ottawa, and we will have an opportunity to meet them in my chambers later.

THE LATE GENERAL DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER

FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—TRIBUTES

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister of Canada, in the name of the Government and the people of this country, has expressed to the Government of the United States and its people our deep regret on the passing of a former President, General Eisenhower. It seems to me appropriate that it should be known that the members of the Senate, as one of the Houses of Parliament, share the deep regret on the passing of so distinguished a citizen of the United States and so distinguished a man in the history of our times.

General Eisenhower served as President of his country for two terms. The occupant of the office of President becomes a household word in Canada. In this case, it was not only well known, it was highly respected.

General Eisenhower was Supreme Allied Commander of the United Nations forces in the Second World War. With his capacity for leadership, he welded together the armies, navies and air strength of the Allies, the forces which brought about the defeat of Hitler and the preservation of freedom and peace in the world. It is appropriate that we should remember the late General in this capacity; it is also appropriate that we should remember him as the President of a friendly country, our closest neighbour.

We received General Eisenhower during the latter period of the Mackenzie King administration. There are members of this house who remember that occasion and the great impression that General Eisenhower made, which confirmed the judgment Canadians had made of him based on his great military leadership, and the fine qualities of humanity and manhood that he displayed during those very difficult days.

Canadians served under him. Canadians will respect his memory.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, on behalf of those who sit on this side of the house I should like to join with the honourable Leader of the Government in the moving tribute he has paid to a great American, a citizen of the world.

We shall have to await what history will say of Dwight D. Eisenhower as a soldier. I think history will say of him what Winston Churchill once said so movingly, that his great contribution to victory in World War II was not so much in his capacity as a soldier, great as that was, but in his genius—and it did amount to genius—for maintaining that vital thing in the achievement of victory, namely, unity among the Allies.

All of us knew—and we know it even better now when we can read the memoirs of the soldiers of that period—how vitally important it was to keep the Allies working together. This was the great and memorable achievement of Eisenhower in World War II.

I wish I had brought with me the tribute paid to him by Churchill when the war was over, but I did not in fact know of General Eisenhower's death until a few moments ago. I wish I had also brought with me the words spoken by President Eisenhower himself in London when a great meeting was held to pay tribute to him.

The solemn beauty of his language then, the modesty and the humility of it, was something that should be read, treasured and remembered.

General Eisenhower was, as the Leader of the Government said, the President of the United States for two terms. During those terms he paid two visits to Canada. In those years he also showed an understanding of, or at least a desire to understand, the problems and aspirations of the Canadian people.

The whole free world will mourn him today and remember him as a great champion of freedom in an hour when freedom was under siege. All we can say in this chamber is that a great American is dead. May God rest his soul.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, I will delay the Senate only a moment.

This is an occasion upon which honourable senators would want to emphasize the feelings expressed so movingly by both the Leader of the Government and the honourable Senator O'Leary (Carleton). One of the great days of our time was D-Day in Europe, when the conglomeration of those tremendous forces that had been moulded together as a single force, as the honourable Senator O'Leary pointed out, successfully attacked fortress Europe. Perhaps it was one of the great days in the history of mankind. What Senator O'Leary said of Churchill's tribute to General Eisenhower perhaps pointed that out more emphatically than anything else. But he was not only a great military leader during wartime, he was also the first commander of the NATO forces. He was the first Supreme Allied Commander at SHAPE. He realized the importance of preserving the peace which his forces had won at such a great cost.

I particularly wish to recall the late general's two visits to Ottawa, the first when he came here after the allied victory and before he went to SHAPE. On that occasion I can imagine what went on in the minds of the Government and of the Prime Minister of the day as to what could be done for a man like this. What this country did—I think it did with a whole heart—was to name one of the majestic mountains of the West, Castle Mountain, Mount Eisenhower. As one looks down the valley where that majestic mountain stands, it looks like the Valhalla where, according to the Indian legend, the nations of the world may some day be gathered for judgment. If so, Mount Eisenhower will be there to survey the scene.

General Eisenhower came later when he was President. Then he personally not only made a profound impression upon the Canadian people, but from my own recollection and memory a tremendous impression was made by his very lovable, most charming and able wife, Mrs. Eisenhower. To her and her family our hearts certainly go out. And to the American people I say that I think we feel as they do. They have produced a great man, and they can thank God that in their country's time of need there was a man as great as Dwight D. Eisenhower to perform, not only on their behalf, but on behalf of the entire world.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Paul Martin tabled:

Report of Polymer Corporation Limited. Including its Accounts and Financial Statements certified by the Auditor General, for the year ended December 31, 1968, pursuant to sections 85(3) and 87(3) of the Financial Administration Act, chapter 116, R.S.C., 1952. (English and French texts).

Copies of correspondence, dated January 24, 1969, exchanged between the Vice-President of the Council of Ministers of the Province of Quebec and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Government of France. (French text).

Copies of Ordinances, chapters 1 to 19 inclusive, passed by the Council of the Northwest Territories at its 38th Session, held in Yellowknife, Northwest Territories, January 13 to February 1, 1969, pursuant to section 15 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 331, R.S.C., 1952, as amended 1953-54, together with a copy of Order in Council 1969-506, dated March 11, 1969, approving same. (English text).

DIVORCE

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Arthur W. Roebuck, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Divorce, presented the committee's reports Nos. 652 to 698, inclusive.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these reports be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Honourable senators, as we are about to rise for some time, I would suggest that we pass these reports now. All 47 of them are dismissals for want of prosecution. There are a few, about a half dozen, in which the fee of $110 has been paid, and in all of which the Commissioner makes no recommendation for repayment. Of the balance, the parties have not only paid fees but some of them go back as far as 1946, and all are vastly in arrears and their petitions should beyond question be dismissed. They have been given every opportunity to comply with the rules, to come forward and justify the prayer of petition, and they have failed to do so.

I personally have read every one of these petitions and I agree thoroughly that it is time to dismiss them. Therefore, with leave, I would suggest the reports be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the chairman of the committee permit a question at this stage?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Connolly (Ottawa West): Would the disposition of these reports in this manner in any way preclude the taking of action in the courts?

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: As a lawyer, I think I can say very definitely that it does not preclude their taking further action in the courts. I have no doubt that a number of them have allowed this dismissal to take place—they have had every warning—because they intend to take action in the courts.

There are several reasons why the parties might take other action. I think the main one is that when action is taken in the courts the petitioner may also ask for alimony. There are many provisions in the new Act which do not appear in the former law. So, certain advantages, to some at least, are now obtainable in the courts but were not available under our former rules. There is no possibility of a plea being entered of—

Hon. Mr. Langlois: Autrefois acquit.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Not exactly.

Hon. Mr. Martin: Sub judice.

Hon. Mr. White: Res judicata.

Hon. Mr. Roebuck: Yes, res judicata. Thank you for giving me the word.

Reports adopted.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move, seconded by Senator Langlois, that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 22, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

It may be that we will have to return earlier, though I have no reason for believing so at the present time. It is not proposed that we sit on Tuesday evening, because on that evening the Speaker of the Senate will be receiving the Prime Minister, as he does annually. However, we will meet in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

AUTHORITY TO SIT DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Paul Martin moved, with leave of the Senate, that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be empowered to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday, April 22.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 2, 1969

THIRD READING

Hon. Leopold Langlois moved the third reading of Bill C-185, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1970.

He said: Honourable senators, before we proceed with this motion, I would like to elaborate on the answers I gave yesterday to questions by Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche). The first question had to do with Vote 20, the Department of National Defence, payment of transitional grant of $700,000.

Up to this year a grant from the Department of National Defence has been paid to the town of Oromocto to assist in meeting the operating costs of municipal services provided by the town. Changes in the grants structure are proposed with a view to giving Oromocto the status of a normal municipality in the Province of New Brunswick, instead of receiving special assistance from the federal Government.

A transitional grant of $700,000 is to be paid to the Province of New Brunswick in 1969-70 in accordance with an agreement signed in late 1968. This agreement covers a period of five years during which a total sum of $2,600,000 will be paid by the Department of National Defence, as follows: April 1969, $700,000; April 1970, $700,000; April 1971, $600,000; April 1972, $400,000 and April 1973, $200,000. This agreement is to be terminated in 1973.

In addition to this transitional grant, the Province of New Brunswick will receive for the first time the usual grants, in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act, in respect of military property in the town of Oromocto.

The second question, which had to do with Vote 25, Treasury Board, was:

> What type of research is involved in the Royal Society, that they would receive a grant of $17,000?

The Royal Society of Canada receives an annual grant from the National Research Council. This grant is paid by the Government of Canada in recognition of the role of the Society in the encouragement and support of scholarly endeavour in Canada. One of the many sectors of this Society is devoted to the natural sciences. This sector provides for the publication of various scientific articles and arranges for meetings to discuss research and the exchange of results of scientific research. The Society does not do research itself, but takes a leading role in establishing communication between the various learned societies.

Hon. Edgar Fournier: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Langlois for answering those questions today to my satisfaction. I must say that I realize my questions yesterday were somewhat embarrassing to my honourable friends, although that was not my intention. The detailed answer given today is quite satisfactory, and for that reason there will be no need for me to place a notice of inquiry with respect to those questions.

At a later date, however, it is likely that I may place a notice of inquiry to cover the much larger field of all grants paid across Canada by the National Research Council.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Hédard Robichaud, for Hon. Mr. Phillips (Rigaud), moved the third reading of Bill C-172 to amend the Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Mr. Hayden, for the second reading of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act.

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, I think it is desirable at this time that I on behalf of the Government should say something about this bill. I had intended to do so at a later stage, but I think it is appropriate that I should do so now so that it may be on record for those honourable senators who find it necessary to be absent on public business. In this way they may know the Government's views on this matter.

We have had honourable senators speaking here who on perusing this bill have questioned the validity of death duties in general and death duty levied by the federal Government in particular. They have also questioned the general weight of estate and gift taxes proposed in the measure now before us. Therefore I wish to comment on some of the questions they have raised.

The main reason for gift and estate taxes is simply the need for government revenue. This is true in the sense that if governments did not have spending programs, it is unlikely they would levy taxes of any kind. Beyond this the general level of the Government's spending programs has an obvious and direct effect on the level of taxes levied.

I am sure there are few Canadians who suggest that government should cease activities altogether. It is clear that there will be government spending and there will be need for a tax system. Honourable senators may take the position that there has been too much spending; that is an arguable point, but the point I am making is that as long as there is spending the Government must raise the necessary revenues to meet that spending, and I would be prepared to argue substantially that government spending is related to the public will.

The question then becomes: what taxes should be levied and what should the relative weight of those taxes be? The Government believes it is important to raise some portion of its revenue requirements through death taxes. There are only two progressive taxes in Canada, and by progressive I mean the tax that bears more heavily on the rich than it does on the poor; in short, a tax which is levied on the basis of ability to pay.

The other progressive tax is, of course, the individual income tax. If the basis for income tax were a perfect measure of ability to pay, there would be much less of a case for the estate tax. However, many assets held by Canadians do not produce income that is taken into account in determining taxable income. Automobiles, cottages, boats, homes, furniture, paintings and even cash stuffed in a mattress—none of these assets produces money income, though they all increase the standard of living of the taxpayer and are a measure of his ability to pay. Since the Income Tax Act ignores this part of the taxpayer's ability to pay, the estate tax is a necessary adjunct if we are to have a fair and equitable tax system.

There is another facet to the ability-to-pay argument. The Government is committed to the principle that we should strive in Canada to provide for Canadians a more nearly equal opportunity to obtain the good things of life. In keeping with this philosophy it seems fitting that these young people in the community who would inherit substantial wealth, and so have a running start at life, should help to contribute, for instance, to the cost of government services such as secondary and post-secondary education, which are designed to give a better start to the far greater number of young Canadians who do not inherit substantial wealth. This seems even more important when one realizes that the young people who will inherit wealth will, in almost every case, also be able to obtain a higher education.

The purpose of the federal estate tax is not to confiscate inherited wealth. If it were, the exemptions would not be so large and the top rate of taxation would not stop at 50 per cent. The purpose is to enhance the fairness of the revenue-raising system in so far as that can be done.

In particular, the purpose of this bill is not to raise more money from these sources, but to shift the present burden of the tax so that widows and dependent children will bear less and other successors will bear more. More specifically, the main shift in burden is to eliminate the tax on property passing to widows or, on occasion, to widowers, to reduce the estate tax on the portion passing to dependent children and, with some exemptions, to increase the tax on the portion of an estate that passes to others. Although there are likely to be minor revenue effects, the new proposals are not designed and are not expected to result in much change in revenue.

Once it is agreed that a death duty is a proper way for a government to raise revenue, the question arises whether it is the federal authority or the provincial authorities, or both, that should impose the duty. As I said, I am aware of the argument made by the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) a week ago. The Government believes there are compelling reasons for Parliament to exercise its constitutional power in this field.

A national tax is appropriate for an accumulation of wealth that is usually derived, particularly in the case of larger estates, from all of Canada, even though at death only one or two of the provinces are constitutionally able to tax it.

Moreover, a national tax is appropriate in cases where provinces do not or cannot tax. They do not tax property situated outside Canada unless both the decedent and the beneficiary are within the province. In addition they do not tax foreign real estate at all.

Then too the provincial legislatures do not have the capability that Parliament has to tax the assets situated in Canada of persons domiciled outside the country. For example, Parliament can by statute deem the shares of companies incorporated in Canada to be situated in Canada for estate tax purposes, and hence taxable in such cases, whereas the provinces can tax only if the shares are effectively dealt with—that is, transferred—in the province.

It has become increasingly obvious that the taxation of estates must be related to the taxation of gifts, and as far as possible be integrated with them, as this bill proposes to do. Otherwise taxes on property will fall unfairly on the unsophisticated, and tax evasion will be practised by the unscrupulous. In a country whose citizens change their domicile or residence from province to province with increasing frequency, such an integration can be achieved only by the federal authority, which is the only authority that can tax without regard to the province of domicile or residence, or to the provincial situs of the property itself. If Parliament did not continue to impose transfer taxes, such as estate and gift taxes, the use of the death duty field by provincial governments would be jeopardized.

The taxation of estates and gifts is also related to the taxation of personal income. The capability not only of the federal Government but also of the provincial authorities to levy personal income taxes in a fair and efficient way is strengthened by having the federal authority take a last look at the taxpayer's affairs at the time of his death. This also works in reverse. Information from income tax returns across the country is available to disclose assets and gifts sometimes not declared for death duty purposes, or to provide information for the valuation of private companies that a province may not be able to obtain.

Similarly, the annual income tax return can be used to help collect the gift tax, which in turn protects both the income tax and the estate tax. The presence of Parliament in the death duties field helps the provincial governments in two ways. First, for those provinces which wish to cultivate part of the field, it helps prevent the provincial tax base from being eroded. In the absence of a federal estate tax it would be easy for well-informed taxpayers to avoid death duties on most of their estate by making use of either a province or a foreign country in which there were no death duties. The presence of the federal authority in the estate tax field, and its ability to obtain co-operation from foreign governments, prevents or restricts such use of tax havens.

The second way in which Parliament helps the provinces by imposing an estate tax is that it can, in effect, collect a death duty for those provinces which need the revenue, but which do not wish to levy their own duty because it is more expensive and less efficient for them to do so.

In this connection, I remember what the Leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Flynn) said about what he called the untimeliness of this measure at this time. But I can assure him that in bringing this measure forward the Government was not trying in any way to gain a march in respect of the discussions it is having with the provinces over the general field of taxation or the spending power, as I hope later to show.

In this connection I should like to make it clear, in answer to questions from several honourable senators, that the cost of collection of the federal estate tax and gift tax is small, at present less than one per cent of the revenue collected. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for any province to collect such a tax without incurring a larger proportion of collection costs than does the federal tax administration, because of the greater ability of the federal administration to spread its overhead costs.

Finally, it is only the federal authority that can enter into internationally recognized agreements with authorities of other countries, for such purposes as avoiding double taxation of its domiciliaries or residents who own property situated outside of Canada, aiding in the enforcement of Canada's estate and gift tax laws and encouraging investment in Canada by means of reciprocal tax credits. So the participation of Canada, of Parliament, in the estate and gift tax fields rounds off and reinforces the whole Canadian tax system.

I trust that honourable senators will agree that there are good reasons for Parliament to impose an estate tax and a gift tax integrated with it, and that one of the most important of these reasons is that it strengthens the revenue raising capacity of the provinces. Indeed, this aspect of federal estate and gift taxes has always been important, and in recent years has been close to paramount. Perhaps I could make this point clearer if I describe, as briefly as I can, the origin and the development of federal-provincial tax sharing in this field.

The federal gift tax was imposed in 1935 and the federal estate tax in 1941. However, before this time—indeed, before Confederation—there had been a great deal of discussion about a principle mentioned several times during the debate on this bill by honourable senators who made an able contribution, namely, that those who are responsible for spending public money should also be responsible for raising it. The enunciation of this principle has been ascribed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Like other honourable senators, I can agree that this is a sound principle, but like Sir Wilfrid I can also agree that there can be compelling reasons for departing from it to some extent in appropriate circumstances.

Let me quote from Sir Wilfrid's speech of February 21, 1905, on a motion to introduce a bill to establish and provide for the Government of the Province of Alberta. I do so because so much has been made of this principle that those who spend money should also be responsible for receiving it. Sir Wilfrid said, speaking in the other place:

> Now I come to the financial terms which should be given to the new provinces. Our Constitution, which is to be found in the British North America Act, contains a very remarkable provision. It contains the provision that out of the Federal treasury there shall be paid to the provinces a large amount of money in the shape of subsidies to assist them in carrying on their business.
> This, I say, is a very extraordinary provision. It is, I believe, unique. At all events, so far as my information goes, I do not know that any similar provision is to be found in the constitution of any other federal government. It is a sound principle of finance, and a still sounder principle of government, that those who have the duty of expending the revenue of a country should also be saddled with the responsibility of levying and providing it. That principle has been departed from in our case, and no doubt was departed from with some object. What can have been the reasons which induced the fathers of confederation in 1867 to depart from so obvious a principle of finance and government.
> The reasons are simply these. Confederation was the result of several compromises. It would have been impossible to establish it if there had not been a policy of give and take adopted among all the constituent bodies. And I am quite sure, I am speaking absolute historical truth when I say that neither Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario nor Quebec would ever have consented to part with their revenues, to give up their powers of taxation in customs and excise, if they had not been promised that out of the federal revenues they would be allowed a certain sum every year to defray the expenses of their own local governments and administrations. This is the reason why this provision is to be found in the British North America Act. It is there. I do not think it is sound, but though in my judgment unsound, it is the duty of everybody in this House and in this country to take confederation as we find it, with its good points and its blemishes, and carry it to the end on the principle upon which it was established. Therefore upon this point I believe it is the duty of the Canadian parliament to continue that policy in this instance and make a liberal provision for these two new provinces which we are about to admit into the Canadian family.

Two years later, on March 25, 1907, after a dominion-provincial conference and on the occasion of moving an address to His Majesty for the purpose of amending the British North America Act to change the scale of the statutory subsidies to the provinces, Sir Wilfrid reiterated this principle. This is to be found in the Hansard for that day. I will not read it, but it has a very great relevance to some of the arguments that were made by at least two senators who emphasized the importance of the principle to which an exception is now made. The federal gift tax was introduced in the last budget brought down by the Government of the late Right Honourable Mr. Bennett in the spring of 1935.

In introducing that measure the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Rhodes, said:

> This form of tax, adopted by many countries, is being imposed primarily to operate as a deterrent to transfers of property by gift, chiefly within family groups which would have the effect of reducing personal income to lower brackets and thus securing income tax assessment at rates lower than would otherwise be applicable. It is particularly expedient to introduce this measure at this time in view of the higher rates of taxation provided for in the new surtax on investment income. Not only should this tax put our income tax structure on a more secure foundation but also it should operate in a like manner with regard to succession and inheritance taxes levied by the provinces.

Honourable senators will observe that the purposes of the tax have not changed over the years, except that it is now intended to protect also the federal estate tax.

The federal succession duty was first imposed in 1941. In introducing it, Mr. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, said:

> This field of taxation has previously been used by the provinces and not by the dominion, though neither has any exclusive legal rights in it. Some of the provincial legislatures have exploited this field to a greater degree than others, but on the whole I believe they have not fully occupied it and that there is room for an additional and independent dominion tax at moderate rates, made up in the light of the existing provincial rates. The compelling need for revenue which induces us to enter this new field arises from the war, but I would not suggest that this new dominion tax is a temporary war-time tax only. It would be manifestly unfair to pick out for special heavy taxation that minority of the population whose parents or husbands happened to die during the war rather than after it. Consequently, one should regard this measure as something of more permanence than, say, our proposed increases in income taxes or indirect taxes. The rates of tax proposed must also be judged in this light.

Death duties, in general, are a very good type of tax, second only to income tax in their essential fairness and the possibilities of adjusting them progressively to ability to pay. They are even better than income tax in so far as they do not have as much tendency to reduce an individual's incentive to hard work and initiative. It is reasonable and just that one should be able to provide something for his wife and children, and others, after his death. It is also reasonable and just, however, that the state should share in what one leaves, at a rate dependent upon the amount of wealth being transferred. Indeed, I find this view so generally held in this country that it is not necessary to do more than call it to mind.

The general level of the rates I am proposing is roughly comparable with the level of the provincial taxes, but probably somewhat lighter on the average than the rates in most provinces.

Honourable senators, this quotation is taken from Hansard, April 29, 1941, at pages 2349 and 2350.

Honourable senators will have observed that the purposes of the original federal succession duty were much the same as those that I have suggested are applicable to the present and proposed estate tax. Honourable senators will also have observed that the federal Government proposed to stay in the death duty field indefinitely and to share it with the provinces on a fifty-fifty basis. This policy of sharing the field with the provinces has continued since that time by various arrangements for co-operation and sharing so that the provinces have always participated to the extent of at least one-half, and in recent years to the extent of at least three-quarters. At the same time, the provinces have always been free to levy their own duty or to have Parliament, in effect, levy and collect it for them. Because the federal estate tax in its present form is an indirect tax, the provinces cannot levy a tax in this form as a certain percentage of the federal tax, as they are able to do for personal income tax, and have the federal Government collect this tax for them. Consequently for those provincial governments that do not wish to levy a death duty, it is necessary for Parliament to impose the full tax, unabated, and pay the appropriate part of the proceeds to the provincial governments concerned. My honourable colleague, Senator Hayden, has explained most lucidly the various ways in which provinces are now participating in these tax-sharing arrangements.

I said earlier that the Government believes that it is important to raise some portion of its revenue requirements through death taxes. Obviously, most provincial governments share this belief. This is in spite of the fact that death duties admittedly, are not, great revenue producers.

There has been criticism in the debate in this chamber, and elsewhere, that death duties do not in fact raise enough revenue to be worth the trouble they cause. I did not get the impression, however, that the honourable senators who advanced this argument were advocating that the rates should be increased to make the tax worth the trouble.

I think it can be admitted that in comparative terms it is clearly true that death duties are not major revenue producers. Death duties in Canada raise less than 2 per cent of the combined revenues of the federal and provincial governments. In the United States and in the United Kingdom the percentages, while higher, are still only in the order of two and a half. Nevertheless, the $200 million raised by death duties in this country by the two senior levels of Government is not an insignificant sum.

As the Minister of Finance has indicated in several speeches, it would require a surtax of 15 per cent on the incomes of taxpayers with incomes over $10,000 to raise the same amount; or, alternatively, a doubling of the tax on those with incomes over $50,000; or, again alternatively, an addition to the social development tax of approximately one percentage point. Obviously, if death duties were abolished in Canada, the federal Government and the provincial governments, which occupy three-quarters of the field, would be faced with the prospect of some rather unpleasant alternative methods of raising the same amount.

I have mentioned the $200 million—and this sum is growing at the rate of about 10 per cent a year—that is currently being collected by the federal Government and the three taxing provinces. I should refer also to the $110 million or so that is being collected by the federal Government alone and then shared with most provinces in the form of what could be called tax abstention payments.

It is true to say that after this sharing the federal Government would have only $50 million left, on the assumption that these payments are charged against the estate tax collections, and it would be true to say also that the federal Government retains only 25 cents out of the estate tax dollar that would have been levied, if no abatements in respect of provincial duties had been made. But it must always be borne in mind that, if the federal Government did not levy an estate tax and make tax abstention payments, all the provinces would have to levy equivalent taxes or secure equivalent amounts from other federal sources in order to be in the same financial position as at present.

The federal Government raises its share, but, to the extent that I have indicated, this money goes to help the provinces to meet, partially, their responsibilities under the constitution.

I have suggested that there should be a system of death duties, and that these duties should not be considered, as indeed they are not, insignificant. I recognize that what I have said does not necessarily argue directly for the particular weight of tax proposed in this bill. Let me repeat that the total revenue expected to be realized under this bill will be about the same as at present, subject of course to normal growth. The distribution of this burden, however, will be different. In particular, it will be different where there is a surviving spouse, as Senator Fergusson pointed out in her very thorough speech yesterday.

The elimination of death duties on estates passing to widows has long been one of the objectives of the women's organizations in Canada, and their complaint has, in my view, been justifiable. The estate tax will also be eliminated or substantially reduced where there are young or infirm children. The provision of greater exemptions in respect of property passing to dependent children will recognize the responsibility of a parent to provide for the education of his young children, and to provide for the care of children of whatever age who are unfortunately by reason of infirmity dependent upon the parent for support.

Apart from cases where the beneficiaries of the estate are a surviving spouse and dependent children, the proposed estate tax will be less in certain other cases as well. Where there is no surviving spouse but three adult children benefit to the extent of at least $10,000, the tax will not be heavier until the estate exceeds $160,000; where four children benefit to this extent, the tax will not be heavier until the estate exceeds $210,000; and where five children benefit to this extent the tax will not be heavier until the estate exceeds $250,000. But where there is no surviving spouse and fewer than three adult children who benefit, the tax under this bill will always be more. It is these cases, and cases of estates valued at more than a quarter of a million dollars, that have attracted criticism.

Whether the rates in these cases are too heavy or not is, of course, a matter of opinion. One way to judge is to look at the weight of tax in other countries and in our own provinces. The proportion of taxes raised by death duties is higher in the United States and in the United Kingdom than it is presently in Canada, and higher than would be the case under the proposed system. It is true that in the United States they raise this amount of revenue with rates that are generally lower than those which the government of Canada has proposed.

However, in that respect two things must be borne in mind. First, we do more through the public sector than the Americans and it is the electors who have determined what government programs they want.

The second point to keep in mind is that the United States finances its programs on a higher tax base per capita than we have here in Canada. Obviously every government program has its cost, and this must be met through the tax system. Just as obviously if we in Canada need to get the same amount of revenue per capita on a smaller tax base, then our rates must be higher than theirs.

While I am discussing rates I should like to point out that the proposed total weight of tax, after abatement in recognition of provincial succession duties, will generally be less than the total weight of the existing provincial succession duties. For example, under the present tax sharing arrangements we abate our tax by 50 per cent for Ontario estates, and if the weight of the Ontario duty were equal to ours, their revenue from the same estates would be the same. But an examination of the figures in the 1969 Ontario budget papers indicates that the Ontario government's revenue from its succession duty is, in fact, about one-third greater than the federal estate tax obtained from the same sources in Ontario. Since our proposed tax will yield about the same as our present one, this differential will continue to exist in the absence of some change.

Surely, this should provide an answer to those who have suggested that the proposed system would mean the end of family businesses and family farms in Canada. Ontario businesses and Ontario farms have, for many years, been subjected to higher death duties than those now proposed, and it is surely agreed that Ontario is the most prosperous part of this country.

In this connection, I am pleased to see that in his White Paper on tax reform the Provincial Treasurer of Ontario has indicated that he is willing to repeal his succession duty act, and to accept instead a share of the federal estate tax. In effect, he is agreeing to the form of the proposals contained in the present bill, and seems to be prepared to reduce the weight of the Ontario death duties to bring it into the appropriate relationship with what will be the weight of the federal tax.

I should like to comment briefly on some specific comments and suggestions made by honourable senators in the course of this important debate. Several senators have suggested that the timing of the bill is inopportune, and that it should have waited for the White Paper on tax reform. There were good reasons for bringing in the reforms proposed in this bill without further delay. In any case, the die has been cast and at this stage it would be difficult, if not impossible, to go back to the situation as it existed before the budget of October 22, 1968. The increased exemptions have been widely acclaimed and accepted. Testators have changed their wills and gifts have been made.

As far as the White Paper on tax reform is concerned, I would expect that honourable senators would not be inhibited in any way by the passage of this bill from discussing all the aspects of the tax system dealt with in the White Paper and, for that matter, any aspect of the tax system that is not dealt with.

It has been suggested by Senator Phillips (Rigaud), in his able speech, that there should be lower rates of estate tax in Quebec, in recognition of the fact that husbands are limited in the gifts they can make to their wives in virtue of the Civil Code. I presume the honourable senator is not considering this matter as a simple problem of transferring property from a husband to his wife, or vice versa. The new tax provisions will allow a completely tax-free transfer on the death of the husband as well as a completely tax-free transfer during his lifetime. Therefore, if the Civil Code forces a husband to wait until death to transfer property to his wife, he nevertheless gets the same benefit from the greater exemptions.

It is virtually impossible for a tax system to grant a greater favour than complete exemption.

It may be that Senator Phillips (Rigaud) was concerned that residents of Quebec will be unable to make the same use of the exemption of $2,000 on transfers to other individuals. One normally thinks of this in connection with children. In the other provinces it will be possible for the father to give $2,000 to each of the children, and for the mother also to give $2,000 to each of the children. Further, she might well get the funds with which to make her gifts from the father. In this way, the exemption per person could effectively be increased from $2,000 to $4,000.

If this is what is troubling Senator Phillips (Rigaud), as I believe it is, then some Quebec residents may indeed be at a disadvantage, but those who are in community of property will not be at a disadvantage. This is the brunt of the question that I put to him when he was speaking. Since the Tax Appeal Board's decision in 1967, the Department of National Revenue has, I am advised, treated a gift made out of community of property and having been made in part by the wife and in part by the husband in accordance with their shares in the community. Consequently, a Quebec couple in community of property would be able to make use of an exemption of $4,000 per donee since half of the gift will be considered to have been made by the wife, and half by the husband.

For those people who are separate as to property the situation is admittedly very different. They will still be entitled to transfer property to their wives tax free, but, of course, they will be limited by the Civil Code in the amount that they can transfer to the amount set out in their marriage contract. Senator Phillips (Rigaud) indicated that this could cause a problem, especially where the amount is small.

There are, however, two considerations which weigh on the other side. For some considerable time we have had federal death duties, and those persons in Quebec in community of property have had an advantage in that only half the community property was taken into account when a husband died, and the death duty rates applied to the estates of those persons were not increased to offset this disadvantage. The second point is that this is an impediment arising from the provincial law, and the province has 75 per cent of the death duty field. Surely, if some accommodation should be made it is possible for the Province of Quebec to make it within its share of this tax field.

Perhaps Senator Phillips (Rigaud) will wish to comment on this when the bill is before the committee, but I understand that the Civil Code may be amended in the near future to permit gifts between husband and wife. I understand also that there have been many instances of such gifts in contravention of the Code, and no doubt there is considerable pressure to remove the restriction.

A good many honourable senators who have taken part in this debate have expressed concern about the effects of the proposed gift and estate taxes on families which have accumulated substantial savings, especially where these are in the form of family businesses, family farms, or family fishing enterprises. The particular objections cited are the increased rates and lowered exemptions of the gift tax, the generally increased rates of estate tax, and the liquidity problem for family businesses, including farming and fishing businesses.

It is true that in some cases gift tax exemptions have been reduced but it is also true that they will be increased in other cases. Under the existing law a person could make any number of gifts to any number of people so long as the total given in any year to the same person did not exceed $1,000. The aggregate amounts given to donees who received more than $1,000 was then taken into account for gift tax, and from this sum was deducted the greater of $4,000 or half of the person's previous year's taxable income minus tax. Under the new system a person can give each of an unlimited number of donees $2,000 each year, and in the case of a married couple this can effectively become $4,000 by reason of the tax-free transfers from husband to wife, as I have just stated.

It seems likely, therefore, that the exemptions have effectively been increased in most cases in which there are two or more people to whom the taxpayer wishes to make substantial donations. There has been some reduction in those cases in which there is some prospective beneficiary of a taxpayer's bounty.

Even if, in the case of, say, a family business, shares in the business have not been given away in this manner over a period of years before the death of the chief shareholder, the complete exemption of amounts left to a wife should be of considerable assistance in meeting any liquidity problem posed by the estate tax. If the husband predeceases the wife, then there will be a period of time before the estate tax is due. During that time either the family can plan for meeting the ultimate estate tax under a regime where likely the sons of the family are managing the business, or the family has time, without the pressure of estate tax falling due, in which to negotiate a sale of the business if it is decided that the sons are not interested in carrying it on. I would point out that this deferral of tax, for an average period of, say, five years, until the death of the spouse second to die, particularly at current rates of interest, can be of very great value to the family.

Now, the Government and the other place have recognized this liquidity problem in another way by providing for a payment of estate tax in annual instalments, as many as six, as a matter of right. It has been proposed that special consideration by way of exemption or lower rates should be given to the part of an estate that consists of a family business. It would be difficult to provide a specific exemption or a reduction of taxes by reference to a family business. The difficulties which occur to one immediately are in the technical field, having to do with definition and in describing the circumstances in which a family business would qualify for the reduced rate. For example, would it be necessary for a member of the family to continue to run the business? If so, for how long? How long would the business or the farm have to be under the control of the deceased? Would a death-bed purchase qualify, particularly of farm property? Would it be necessary that the deceased have taken an active interest in the business, or would the shares of any private corporation qualify? These are some of the questions that have been asked in this debate.

Apart from these technical control problems, there is the question of equity to taxpayers whose assets are not in the form of a business. Canadians who inherit stocks, bonds or the proceeds of life insurance policies would likely feel discriminated against if others who were inheriting something, perhaps of far greater value, were to be charged with a lower tax.

Senator Phillips (Rigaud) made the observation that the proposed gift tax schedule does not make any allowance for discount for early payment. The existing gift tax schedule does not, of course, make any such allowance either. The rates in the new schedule do contain some provision for discount, although it does not vary with the age of the donor, or with the time before his death that he makes the gift. Honourable senators will recall that the principle on which the proposed rates are founded is that the amount of gift tax should be related to the amount by which a person's estate is depleted, and this depletion is not only the gift but the tax on the gift that the donor pays. With a top rate of estate tax of 50 per cent for example, this would call for a matching gift tax rate of 100 per cent. The gift tax rates have not been set at this level but at 75 per cent of the estate tax rates, and so, in effect, there is some discount for early payment.

Then, too, the matter of a discount seems of doubtful validity when the property is transferred earlier, because the donee has the enjoyment of it earlier, and the donor's estate is depleted not only by the gift and the gift tax on it, but also by any growth in the asset transferred or the income from it.

Senator Phillips (Rigaud) agrees with me that it is right and proper that the federal Government should be in the estate tax field. He suggests, however, that the maximum rate of tax should be 25 per cent, because, and I quote from him:

> The head of the family should be particularly encouraged to accumulate a respectable amount of capital for transmission to his wife and children so as to provide for the continuance of their standard of living, for education and for dignified cooperation in the life of the body politic.

The complete exemption of amounts transferred to wives, the increase in the exemptions with respect to dependent children, and the provision for the first time of an exemption with respect to adult children, all seem to me to be directly responsive to this point.

Honourable senators, it is not feasible in the time available—too much of which I have taken up already—for me to deal with all of the interesting and useful comments that honourable senators have made, but I trust that these will be fully explored when we are in committee. What I have sought to do today is to put on the record the reasons the Government feels makes it desirable for the Senate to give its approval to the bill now before us, and to reply to some of the various comments and suggestions by members of this chamber who have, once again, made a notable contribution to the public debate on this important matter.

The Government has given this bill a great deal of thought. It has been carefully considered in the other place. When it was introduced some objections were taken to some of its provisions. Amendments were made that I think generally satisfy most of the complaints that have been registered. In any event, I speak to this bill with the full conviction that it warrants the support of the house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Langlois, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.30 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Right Honourable J. R. Cartwright, P.C., M.C., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

An Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the Currency, Mint and Exchange Fund Act.

An Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

An Act to amend the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Defence Services Pension Continuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act.

The Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March 1970.

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 22, 1969 at 3 p.m.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

CONGRATULATIONS ON FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators, this is the fiftieth year of the foundation of the International Labour Organization. The Prime Minister has called the attention of the other place and of the country to this fact, and today I should like to express congratulations to the organization on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary. The ILO was set up in 1919 under the Peace Treaty following the First World War, and later this year it will complete half a century of useful activity.

The ILO was established as part of the structure of the League of Nations and it thus formed part of mankind's first organized effort to establish a rule of law on a world-wide basis as a means of achieving world peace. The role of the ILO was to do something about the extremes of poverty that affected working people, even in the most advanced countries in those days. The concept was that in order to work for peace one had to work also for social justice.

A most unusual decision was that ILO meetings would be attended not only by delegates representing governments from member countries, but also by delegates representing workers and employers. This tripartite participation in all important decisions remains a unique characteristic of the organization.

Over the years, the ILO has adopted 128 draft treaties, known as International Labour Conventions, and there have been more than 3,000 ratifications of these Conventions by member countries.

In recent years, the ILO has become heavily involved in operational programs of technical assistance to the developing countries. It currently has a budget of over $26 million with an extra $17 million being provided under the United National Development Program and in other ways.

Canada has been a member of the ILO since its inception. During the war years, when the ILO abandoned its neutrality in the face of the Nazi invasion of Western Europe and decided to seek a base overseas, the Canadian Government invited the ILO to come to Montreal, and accordingly the organization established its headquarters on the campus of McGill University. Several sessions of the Governing Body and one session of the ILO General Conference were held in Canada during the war and early post-war years.

I would be remiss if I did not mention the fact that Mr. David Morse, the Director-General of the organization, chose a Canadian, Kalmen Kaplansky, to be world-wide organizer for the fiftieth anniversary celebrations. Mr. Kaplansky will be known to many as a distinguished member of the Canadian labour movement who served for many years on the Governing Body of the ILO as Canadian Worker-member and is now Director of the organization's Ottawa Bureau and Special Representative of the Director-General.

During its stay in Montreal, the ILO worked hard on programs designed to achieve a better world in the post-war years. I well remember my own participation in the ILO Philadelphia Conference in 1944 when I had the honour to be chairman of a committee which drew up an important recommendation concerning employment organization in the transition from war to peace. The recommendation contained principles designed to ensure the maximum fairness to individuals during the demobilization of the armed forces, the reconversion of war industry, and the repatriation of prisoners-of-war, persons who had been deported and others.

It was at this conference that the Declaration of Philadelphia clarified, with remarkable foresight and vision, the aims and purposes of the ILO and the principles which should inspire the policy of its members. The declaration stated that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. It set forth the principle that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity.

The Declaration of Philadelphia set forth the solemn obligation of the ILO and its members to achieve full employment—a revolutionary goal for nations which had known the misery of the depression years of the 1930's.

It asserted the need for policies in regard to wages and earnings, hours and other conditions of work, calculated to ensure a just share of the fruits of progress to all. It called for the effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, and the co-operation of management and labour in the improvement of productive efficiency. Principles such as these have guided the work of the ILO during these past fifty years.

When I read the statement made in this house by Senator Dandurand at the end of the war, I could not but feel how fitting it was to recall Canadian participation in this organization.

The work of the ILO has had an interesting bearing on our federal-provincial relationships. We have always had a problem in dealing with conventions whose subject matter is partly within provincial jurisdiction. Consultations with the provinces and co-operative participation in ILO meetings have enabled us to ratify three such conventions. I had the honour of personally signing Canada's instruments of ratification of two of these conventions on the occasion of the ILO American Regional Conference to which Canada played host in this capital city in September 1966.

Federal-provincial consultation is continuing, and there is interest throughout the country in our objective of further ratifications of conventions.

The federal Government, the provincial governments, and labour and employer organizations are joining in a number of activities this year in celebration of the ILO fiftieth anniversary to help make the organization better known in Canada and to move towards the achievement of some of its objectives. In May Canada will issue an ILO commemorative stamp. The Public Archives is planning an exhibition of documents relating to Canada's ILO history. Later this year we will be convening in Ottawa a tripartite conference which will bring together representatives of the principal employer and employee organizations, and the federal and provincial governments. Other nations are planning similar activities.

Honourable senators, I think we are entitled to some measure of pride that this international organization, whose headquarters was in this country during the war, and to which we have given support over the years and which commands the loyalties of workers and employers in Canada, should continue to provide leadership in the world-wide struggle against poverty and for social justice. We welcome this anniversary, and we extend our greetings to the ILO, its Director-General, David Morse, and to the Chairman and Vice-Chairmen of the Governing Body.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, any intergovernmental body achieving half a century of active and useful life is worthy of the highest praise, and it was quite proper for the Leader of the Government (Hon. Mr. Martin) to refer to the celebration of this anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

Like the International Court of Justice at the Hague, ILO is the natural child of the League of Nations and an adopted child of the United Nations Organization. After the Versailles Peace Treaty, the Conference of Paris in 1919 set up a commission for international labour legislation, headed by Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labour. The commission put aside the first idea of a body with legislative authority for one with power to make recommendations only to national governments by the composition of a tripartite body in which half of the representation would be by governments and one-fourth each by labour and by employers. Subsequently the peace conference adopted these proposals and inserted them in the treaty, thereby setting up the ILO.

As has been mentioned, during the Second World War the ILO moved from Geneva to Montreal. Then, following the war, the San Francisco founding conference snubbed the ILO at the beginning and the United Nations Charter made no mention of it. It was only in 1946 that the ILO became one of the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

The initial role of the ILO was to improve the conditions of the working people, which in those days, even in the most advanced countries, left much to de desired. Even if the ILO cannot take credit for all the progress in working conditions in the last fifty years, it had nevertheless a decisive influence.

Since the end of World War II, although conferences and recommendations concerning proper minimum standards of labour conditions have been a major preoccupation of the ILO, the emphasis was shifted somewhat to the problems of the underdeveloped countries of Asia, Latin America and Africa. No doubt the ILO has done a lot in this new area where, however, much remains to be accomplished.

Honourable senators, for all those reasons, it is appropriate to celebrate the jubilee of the International Labour Organization and to take this opportunity to acquaint the general public with the very useful work accomplished by that Organization during its first fifty years of existence. Canada has a right to be proud of having given its continuing support to the Organization, and all those who have worked for the Organization deserve the gratitude of all mankind.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS BILL

COMMONS AMENDMENT—REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-26, to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill with one amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

1. Page 7, Line 6: Delete subclause (3) of clause 8 and substitute the following:

"(3) Every order adding a product or substance to Part I or Part II of the Schedule shall be laid before the Senate and the House of Commons not later than fifteen days after it is made or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting.

(4) If both Houses of Parliament resolve that an order or any part thereof should be revoked, that order or that part thereof is thereupon revoked."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this amendment be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.

Motion agreed to.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—COMMONS AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-28, to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill with one amendment to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate:

1. Page 10, line 19: Add new clause 18, as follows:

"18. (1) Where, in the opinion of the Minister, an association would, at the coming into force of this Act, suffer undue financial loss by complying with section 45 of the Co-operative Credit Associations Act as amended by section 6 of this Act, the Minister, on the application of that association, may, by order, defer the operation of section 6 of this Act in respect of that association for such period not exceeding five years from the date of commencement of this Act as may be fixed in the order.

(2) An order made under subsection (1) may set out such conditions as the Minister deems appropriate in the case of the association in respect of which the order is made and, subject to any such conditions, for the period fixed in the order section 45 of the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, as it read before the coming into force of section 6 of this Act, applies to that association."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this amendment be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Martin: I move that this amendment be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

PESTICIDE RESIDUE COMPENSATION BILL

COMMONS DISAGREEMENT WITH SENATE AMENDMENT—MESSAGE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill C-155 to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards:

Ordered: That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House disagrees with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-155, An Act to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards, for the following reasons:

The amendment changes the principle of the bill so that compensation is payable even if the pesticide residue resulted through the fault of a pesticide manufacturer or another person. It makes it a responsibility of the Minister to pay and carry out court action against a third party. It would also remove the precise requirement that the Minister may require a farmer to take action to reduce losses before paying compensation, such as washing, trimming, changes in storage, etc. If this requirement is removed, it would substantially increase the costs involved in applying the provisions of the legislation. The amendment would also increase the possibility of marginal or frivolous claims.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: With leave of the Senate, I move that this message be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.

Motion agreed to.

PEST CONTROL PRODUCTS BILL

COMMONS DISAGREEMENT WITH SENATE AMENDMENT—MESSAGE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill C-157, an act to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals:

Ordered: That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House disagrees with the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-157, An Act to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals, for the following reasons:

It is difficult to foresee all the ramifications of an appeal procedure provided by cross reference to another proposed statute that was substantially amended by the House after the amendment to this bill was made by the Senate;

The amendment provides for a review procedure that was considered by the House of Commons and rejected; and

Any manufacturer, under the proposed statute without this amendment, would have not only an opportunity, but an obligation to present in detail all required technical information, and, in addition, a review procedure already is provided for all cases where goods are detained.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Mr. Hayden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that this message be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration and report.

Motion agreed to.
