their incredible loans to government: and there is no place in the world where the shops of tradesmen make such a nothe snow of tradesmen make such a no-ble and elegant appearance, or are bet-ter stocked. The Thames, on the banks of which London is situated, is a river which, though not the largest, is the richest and most commodious for commerce of any in the world It is continually filled with fleets, sailing to or from the most distant climates: and its banks, from London bridge to Black-wall, form almost one continued great wan, form affirms time continued great magazine of naval stores; containing three large wet-docks, 32 dry-docks, and 33 yards for the building of ships for the use of the merchants; besides the places allotted for the building of boats and lighters, and the king's yards lower down the river for the building of men-of-war. As the city is about 60 miles distant from the sea, it enjoys, by means of this beaufful river, all the be-nefits of navigation, without the danger of being surprised by foreign fleets, or of being annoyed by the moist vapours of the sea. It rises regularly, from the water-side, and, extending itself on both sides along its banks, reaches a prodigious length from E to W, in a kind of amplitheatre towards the N, and is continued for near 20 miles on and is continued for hear 20 miles on all sides, in a succession of magnificent villas and populous villages, the coun-try-scats of gentlemen and tradesmen; whither the latter retire for the benefit of fresh air, and to relax their minds of fresh air, and to relax their minds from the hurry of business. The re-gard paid by the legislature to the pro-perty of the subject, has hitherto pre-vented any bounds being fixed for its extension. The irregular form of Lon-don makes it difficult to ascertain its extent. Of these, there are 305 in the compass of this vast pile of buildings, without reckoning the 21 out-parishes usually included in the bills of inortality, and a great number of ine-thodist tabernacles. There are also in and near this city 100 alms-houses, about 20 hospitals and infirmaries, three colleges, 10 public prisons, 15 flesh-markets; one market for live cattle; two other markets more particularly for herbs; and 23 other markets for corn, coals, hay; &c. 15 inns of court, 27 public squares, besides those within single buildings, as the Temple, &c. three bridges, 55 halls for companies, eight public schools, called free-schools; and 131 charity schools, which provide education for 5034 poor children; 207 inus, 447 taverus, 551 cof-fee houses, 5975 alchouses; 1000 hack-ney-coaches; 400 ditto chairs; 7000 streets, lanes, courts and alleys, and 150,000 dwelling-houses, containing, as has been already observed, above 1,000,000 inhabitants; who, according 1,000,000 mhabitants; who, according to a moderate estimate, are supposed to consume weekly provisions, clothing, &c. to the amount of £ 500,000. London is the seat of many considerable manufactures; some almost peculiar to itself, others in which it participates with the manufacturing towns in general. ral. The most important of its peculiar manufactures is the silk-weaving, established in Spitalfields by refugees from France. A variety of works in gold, silver, and jewellery; the engraving of prints; the making of optical and mathematical instruments, are likewise principally or solely executed here, and some of them in greater per-fection than in any other country. To its port are likewise confined some branches of foreign commerce, as the vast East India trade, and those to Turkey and Hudson's Bay. The common firing is pit-coal, commonly called sea-coal, cf which there are consumed upwards of 766,830 chaldrons every year. The annual consumption of oil in London and Westmirth Called States. don and Westminster for lamps amounts to 400,000%. In 1787, the quantity of porter brewed in London for home-consumption and foreign exportation, amounted to 1,176,856 barrels. Thus London has risen to its present rank of the first city in Europe, both with respect to opulence and to number of inhabitants. London is a bishop's see, and

The town house is a superb structure, and has several towers. On the ground hoor is the half of audience, which is well furnished, and where the senate assembles regularly three times a week. Above is another large hall, where the deputies of the Hanseatic League formerly held their assemblies. Here is also a fine exchange, which was built in 1683 The senute is composed of 20 persons, four of which are borgo-masters, the others consist of the nobility, men of letters, and merchants. Add to these a syndic, a prothonotary, and four se-cretaries. The inhabitants are all Lutherans; and there are 21 preachers, whose chief has the title of Superintendant. There are five large churches and palaces, one of which is the eathedral, whose body is of an exthe catherine, whose rare traordinary length, containing several curiosities: such as, an handsome atutue of the Virgin Mary, a curious clock, and a prodigious large organ. Luconia, or Manilla, the chief of the Philippine Islands, in the N Pacific Ocean, 400 miles in length and 100 in breadth. It is not so hot as may be expected, because it is well watered by large lakes and rivers, and the periodical rains which inundate all the plains. There are several volcanos in the mountains, which occasion earthquakes; and a variety of hot paths. The produce of this island is wax, cotton, wild cinnamon, sulphur, cocon-nuts, rice, gold, horses, buffaloes, and game. Philip II. of Spain, formed a scheme of planting a colony in the Phi-lippine Islands, which had been neglected since the discovery of them by Magellan, in 1521. Manilla, in this island, was the station chosen for the capital of the new establishments. Hence an active commercial intercourse began with the Chinese, a considerable num-ber of whom settled in the Philippine Islands, under the Spanish protection. These supplied the colony so amply with all the valuable productions and manufactures of Asia, as enabled it to open a trade with America, by a lirect course of navigation, the longes from land to land on our globe. This trade, at first, was carried on with Canao, on the coast of Peru; but it was afterward removed to Acapulco on the coast of New Spain. From this port annually sail one or two ships, which are permitted to carry out silver to the amount of 500,000 crowns, in return for which they bring back from Manilla, spices, drugs, China and Japan warrs, calicoes, chintz, muslius, silks, &c. The inhabitants are a mixture of several nations, besides Spaniards; and they all produce a mixed breed, distinct from any of the rest. Lutschinen, a river of the canton of Bern, in Swisserland, formed by the junction of two streams; the one cal-led the Weiss Lutschinen, flowing through the valley of Lauterhrunen; and the other called the Schwartz Lutschinen, which comes from the valley of Grindelwalde. In a rainy season, the river forms a torrent, which rushes im-petuously through the great masses of rock that obstruct its course, and, with inconceivable, violence, forces from their beds the most enormous frag-ments. The road to Zwey Lutschinen and Lauterbrunen is over this roaring torrent, by a kind of bridge, which is fixed against the sides of rocks, that are almost in a leaning position. A huge vertical stone, raised in the middle of the river, supports some thick planks, so badly joined, as to be nei-ther steady nor solid, and these form the wretched bridge, over which the inhabitants daily pass, with a firm step and undainted eye; a passage, which the traveller, unaccustomed to such strange communications, would tremble to attempt. Hence the Lutschinen flows till it falls into the lake of Brientz.

Lyons, the second city of France for Lyons, the second city of France for beauty, commerce, and opulence. It is the capital of the department of Rhone and Loire, and is seated at the confluence of the Rhone and Saune. It was founded about the year 42 B. C. by the Romans who made it the centre of the commerce of the Gauls. About the year 145, it was totally destroyed by fire, but was rebuilt by the munificence of Nero. Many antiquities are still observed, that evince its Roman origin. Lyons is the see of an archbishop, and before its recent ca-lamities contained 150,000 inhabitants, upward of 30,000 of whom were employed in various manufactures, particularly of rich stuffs, of the most quisite workmanship, in silk, gold, silver, &c. The quays were adorned with magnificent structures. The Hotel-de-ville vied with that of Amsterdam; and the theatre was not surpassed by any in France: The other principal public buildings were the Hotel de Dieu, the Hospital of Charity, the Ex-change, the Custom-house; the Palace of Justice, the Arsenal, a public libra-ry, and two colleges. The bridge, which unites the city with the auburb of Justice, the Arsenal, a public library, and two colleges. The bridge, which unites the city with the auburb de la Guillotiere, is 1560 feet long; and there are three other principal suburbs, six gates, and several fine churches. Such was Lyons before the fatal year 1793, when the mischieß of the revolution were poured upon this devoted city in all their horrors. In June 1793 it revolted against the national convention, and being obliged to surrender in October following, became a prey to the merciless victors, who satiated their rage by barbarities for which language has no name. It is reckoned that not less than 70,000 in this city alone were cither massacred or forced into exile. It was also decreed by the convention that the walls and public build-sends more of it abroad than any port, lings of Lyons should be destroyed, and except Hull. The foreign trade of the merchants here is very considerable, early the name of the city changed to that of merchants here is very considerable, and the mame of the city changed to that of the destruction of the faction of the Baltic, and also to Spain and Portugal Jacobins, the convention decreed that Jacobins, the convention decreed that the city should resume its ancient . name, and that measures should be taken to restore its manufactures and commerce. Mudeira, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, 120 miles in circumference, and 240 N by E of Teneriff. In 1419, when the Portuguese, under the patronage of prince Henry, had made their second younge to their recently-discovered island of Porto Santo, they observed towards the S, a fixed spot in the horizon, like a small black cloud. By degrees, they were led to conjecture that it might be land, and steering toward it, they arrived at a considerable island, aninhabited, and covered with wood, which on that account, they called Madeira. Prince Henry, the next year, settled a colony here, and not only furnished it with the seeds and plants, and domestic animals common in Europe, but he procured slips of the vine from Cyprus, the rich wines of which were then in great request, and plants of the sugar-cane from Sicily, into which it had been lately introduced. These throve so prosperously, that the sugar and wine of Madeira quickly became articles of some censequence in the commerce of Portugal; but its wine, in particular, is in the highest estimation, especially such as has been a voyage to the East or West Indies, for it matures best in the hottest climate. The scorch ing heat of summer, and the icy chill of winter, are here equally unknown; for spring and Autumn reign continually, and produce flowers, and fruits throughout the year. Many brooks and small rivulets descend from the mountains in deep chasms or glens, which separate beds of the brooks are in some places covered with stones of all sizes, carried down from the higher parts by the vio-lence of winter rains or floods of melted snow. The water is conducted by wears and channels in the vineyards where each proprietor has the use of it for a certain time ; some being allowed to keep a constant supply of it, some to to find any which will resist the rava-ase it thrice, others twice, and others ges of the white ant. These animals

The the vineyards absolutely necessary, it is not without great expence that a new vineyard can be planted: for the maintenance of which, the owners must purchase water at a high price, from those who are constantly supplied, and are thus enabled to spare some of it; The codar tree is found in great abundance, and extremely beautiful: most of the ceilings and furniture at Madeira are made of that wood, which yields a very fragrant smell. The dragon tree very ragrant smett. The dragon tree is a native of this island. Flowers nursed in the English greenhouses grow wild here in the fields; the hedges are mostly formed of the myrtle; rose, jasmine, and honeysuckle; while the lark spur, fleur-de-lis, lupin, &c, springup spontaneously in the meadows. There are very few reptiles to be seen in the island; the lizard is the most common. Canary birds and goldfinches are found in the mountains ; of the former mimbers are sent every year to England. Some time before the ship arrives at her anchoring ground, she is hailed by the boats of the country filled with people of business, who come in crowds on board. This is the moment in which on board. This is the moment in which an European feels the great distinction between Asia and his own country. The rustling of fine linen, and the general hum of unusual conversation, presents to his mind for a moment the idea of an assembly of females. When he ascends upon the deck, he is struck with the long muslin dresses, and black faces adorned with very large gold earnings and white turbans. The first salutation he receives from these strangers is by bending their bodies very low, touching the deck with the back of the hand, and the forehead three times. The natives first seen in India by the European voyager are Hindoos, by the European voysger are Hindoos, the original inhabitants of the penin-sula. In this part of India they are delicately framed; their hands, in par-ticular, are more like those of tender females; and do not appear to be what is considered a proper proportion to the rest of the person, which is usually above the middle size. Correspondent the rest of the person, which is usually pean settlements on this coast, has no above the middle size. Correspondent to this delicacy of appearance, are their manners: mild, tranquil, and sedulous-ly attentive; in this last respect they are indeed remarkable, as they never interrupt any person who is speaking, but wait patiently till he has concluded; 13 5 N.

sity of their numbers, which are such a boat of the country, called a Massoolah boat; a work of curious construc-tion, and well calculated to clude the violent shucks of the surf, that breaks here with great violence: they are formed without a keel, flat bottomed, with the sides raised high, are sewed together with the fibres of the cocoanut tree, and caulked with the same material; they are remarkably light, and are managed with great dexterity by the natives; they are usually attended by two Kattamarans (rafts) paddled ed by two Sattamarans (raits) pindiled by one man each, the intention of which is, that, should the boat be overset by the violence of the surf, the persons in, it may be preserved. The boat is driv-en, as the sailors say, high and dry; and the passengers are landed on a fine, sandy beach, and immediately enter sandy beach; and immediately enter the fort of Madras. The appearance of the natives is exceedingly varied; some are wholly naked, and others so clothed, that nothing but the face and reck is to be discovered; besides this, the European is struck with many other objects, such as women carried on men's shoulders, on palankeens, and men ri-ding on horseback clothed in linen dresses like women; which, with the very the strongest emotions of surprise!"

and, although near four miles in circuit, fortified in such a manner as to prevent a surprise from the chemy's horse; an a surprise from the enemy's horse; an evil, to which every town in the Carnatic is subject, from the dryness and evenness of the country. It is seated on the Mediterranean, at the uped on the Mediterranean, at the up-per end of a gulf, covered and de-fended by many small islands; and it is partly on the declivity of a hill, and partly in a plain. It is divided into the Old and the New Town. The houses are not so well built in the Old as in the New, the first appears like an amphilipeatre, to the vessels like an amphitheatre to the vessels which enter the port; but the streets are dirty, narrow, and steep In this part is the principal church, built by the Goths, on the ruins of the temple of Diana. The New Town is a per-iect contrast to the Old, with which it communicates by a most beautiful street; and its other streets, the squares, and the public buildings are beautiful. The variety of dresses and languages which are seen and heard here, are surprising, and on that ac-count this city has been called Europe in Miniature. The port is a basin of an oval form, 3480 feet long, by 960 in its widest part, with 18 or 20 feet depth of water; and is defended by a citadel and a fort. In 1649, the plague raged with great violence, and with still greater in 1720, when it carried off 50,000 of the inhabitants. Mecca, an ancient and very famous town of Asia, in Arabia the Happy; seated on a barren spot, in a valley, surrounded with little hills, about a day's journey from the Red Sea. It is a place of no strength, having neither walls nor gates, and the buildings are very mean. That which supports it is the resort of a great many thousand pilgrims annually, for the shops are scarcely open all the year besides. The inhabitants are poor, very thin, lean, and swarthy. The bills about the town are very numerous, and all con-sist of a blackish rock, and some of them are half a mile in circumference. On the top of one of them is a cave, where they pretend Mahomet usually retired to perform his devotions, and hither they affirm the greatest part of the alcoran was brought him by the angel Gabriel. The town has plenty of water, and yet little garden stuff but there are several sorts of good fruits to be had, such as grapes, melons, water-melons, and cucumbers. There are also plenty of sheep brought thither to be sold to the pilgrims. It stands in a very hot climate, and the inhabitants usually sleep on the tops of their houses, for the sake of coolness. The temple of Mecca, has 42 doors, and its form resembles the Royal Exchange in London, but is near ten times as large. The door is covered with silver plates, and there is a curtain before it thick with gold embroidery. This Beat is the priocipal object of the pilgrims devotion, and is open but two days in the space of six weeks, namely, one day for the men, and the next for the women. Within there is only two wooden pillars in the middle to support the roof, with a bar of iron fastened thereto, on which hang three or four silver lamps. The walls on the inside are marble, and covered with ailk, unleas when the pilgrims enter. About 12 paces from the Beat is the sepulchre of Abraham, as they pretend, and they affirm that he erected the Beat-Allah. The tomb is handsome enough, and not unlike those of people of fash-ion in England. Whey they have per-formed their devotions here, they repair to a gibel or hill, which however is not large enough to contain them all at once, for there are no less than 70,000 pilgrims every year. When certain ceremonies are over, they then receive the title of hadgies or saints, and the next morning they move to a place where they say Abraham went to offer up his son Isaac, which is about two or three miles from Mecca; here seven small stones against a little square stone building. From N to S it is 90 miles. Although situate in the heart of Hindoostan, within 25 miles of its former capital, (Delhi) its inhabitants, the Mewatti, have been ever characterised as the most savage and brutal; and their chief employment has been robbery and plunder. In 1265, 100,000 of these wretches were put to the sword; but they are still so famous as thieves and robbers, that parties of them are taken into pay by the chiefs of Upper Hindoostan, in order to distress the countries that are the seat of warfare. Mewat contains some strong fortres-ses on steep or inaccessible hills, and was almost entirely subject to the late Madajee Sindia, a Mahratta chief.

Mexico, a town of North America, capital of New Spain. It was a floucapital of New Spain. It was a flou-rishing place before the Spaniards en-tered the country, seated on an island, in a salt-water lake, to which there was no entrance, but by three cause-ways, two miles in length each. It contained about 80,000 houses, with several large temples, full of rich idols, and three palaces, where the emperor resided. Mexico was taken by Cortez, in 1521. As the Mexicans defended themselves from street to street, it was themselves from street to street, it was almost ruined, but afterward rebuilt by the Spaniards. It is now the ca-pital of the province of Mexico Proper, of the audience of Mexico and of all New Spain. The streets are so straight, and so exactly disposed, that, in point of regularity, it is the finest city in the world; and the great causeways leading to it, with the want of walls, gates, and artillery, render Mexico extremely remarkable. The great square in the centre of the city, great square in the centre of the city, and the public buildings, are magnificent. There are 29 cathedrals and churches, and 22 convents, of the riches of which an idea may be formriches of which an itea may be interested from the revenues of the grand cathedral amounting to 80,0000. a year, of which the archbishop has 15,000t. There is also a tribunal of the inquisition, a mint, and a university. The goldsmiths here are immensely rich, and it carries on a great trade to Eu-rope by St. Juan de Ulhua, and to Asia by Acapulco. This place was overflowed by an inundation, in 1629, in which 40,000 persons were drowned. This obliged the Spaniards to make a great conduit through a mountain, in order to empty the lake: which being done, part of the town became seated on dry land. Moxico is supplied with fresh water by an aqueduct three miles long. It is 200 miles E NE of St. Juan de Ulhua, and 250 N E of Acapulco. Lon. 100 34 W, lat. 20 2 N.

Mexico, or New Spain, an extensive country of North America, bounded on Asia, in Persia, which takes its name from a mosque dedicated to Ocem, SE by the isthmus of Darien, on the the son of Ali. It is scated in a fertile country, on the river Euphrates, by the gulf of Mexico and the Carib-Bean Sea. It lies between 83 and Florida; the entrance lying to the E, 110° W lon, and extends from 7 30 to between the S roast of E Florida, and 30 40 N. lat. heing 2000 miles long, and from 600 to 60 broad. In general, it is a mountainous country, intermixed with many rich vallies; but the highest mountains are near the coast of the Pacific Ocean, many of which are volcanoes. The eastern shore is a flat country, full of bogs and murasses, overhowed in the rainy season, which is at the same time as our summer. Atthough Mexico is within the torrid zone, the climate is temperate and healtny. No country abounds more with grain, fruits, roots, and vegetables ; many of them peculiar to the country, or, at least to America. It is celebrated for its mines of gold and silver, and has quarries of jasper, porphyry, and exquiste narble. Cochineat is almost peculiar to this country; its indigo and cocoa are superior to any in A. merica; and its logwood has long been an important article of commerce. The domestic animals of Europe, particularly, horned cattle, have multiplied here almost with incredible rapidity. Numbers of these having been suffered to run wild, now range over the vast plains, in herds of from 30 to 40,000; they are killed merely for the make of their hides, which are annually exported, in vast quantities, to Europe New Spain is divided into the three an diences of Guadalajara, Mexico, and Guatimala. The whole country is go-verned by a viceroy, the extent of whose jurisdiction, however, has been wisely circumseribed, in the course of this century, by the erection of the four remote provinces of Sonora, Cinaloa, Calcforma, and New Navarre, into a separate government.

Mexico, New, a large country of North America, bounded on the W by the gulf of California, on the S by New Spain, on the E by Louisiana, and on the N by unknown countries, so that its extent cannot be ascertained. Milan, a city of Italy, capital of a dutchy of the same name. It was the ancient capital of Lombardy, and although it is thought rather to exceed Naples in size, it does not contain above half the number of inhabitants. It is seated in a delightful plain, between the rivers Adda and Tesin; is ten miles in circumference, and called by the Italians, Milan the Great. It contains many fine palaces, but that of the governor is the most magnificent; and a great number of churches, convents, hospitals, and schools. The eathedral is in the centre of the city, and though it is not so large as St. Peter's, at Rome, it far excels it in the number and excellence of its sculptures fabric, which the Milanese call the eighth wonder of the world, is entirely built of solid white marble, and the roof which is vastly high is supported by 160 columns of marble so large that three men cannot fathom them. the roof hangs a case of crystal, inclosing a nail, which, they say, is one of those by which our Saviour was fixed to the cross. The treasury belonging to this church is reckoned the richest in Italy, next to that of Loretto. The cullege of St. Ambrose has a library, which, besides a prodigious number of manuscripts, contains, 45,000 printed books; and its superb gallery is adorned with rich paintings. Morlachia, a mountainous country in Hungarian Dalmatia, the inhabitants of which are called Morlacks, or Morlacchi. They inhabit the pleasant vallies of Koter, along the rivers Kerna, Cetina, Narenta, and among the in-land mountains of Dalmatia. They are said by some, to be of Walachian extrac-tion; but others think their origin in volved in the darkness of barbarous ages. The Morlacchi are so different from the inhabitants of the sea-coasts from the inhabitants of the sea-coasts in dialect, dress, disposition and customs, that they seem clearly to be of a different original. With regard to their character, we are informed that they are much injured by their maritime neighbours. The inhabitants of the sea-coast of Dalmatia tell many frightful stories of their avarice and cruelty; but these are all either of an ancient date, or if any have happened in latter times, they ought rather to be ascribed to the corruption of a few individuals, than to the bad disposition of the nation in general; and though thievish tricks are frequent among them, a stranger may travel securely through their country, where he is faithfully escorted, and hospitably treated. Friendship, that among us is so subject to change on the slightest motives, than to the bad disposition of the nais lasting among the Morlacchi. They have even made it a kind of religious point, and tie the sacred bond at the foot of the altar. The Selavonian ri-tual, contains a particular benediction for the solemn union of two male or two female friends in the presence of the congregation. The male friends bus united are called Pobratimi, and the female Posestreme, which mean half-brothers and half-sisters. Friendships between these of different sexes are not at this day bound with so much so-lemnity, though perhaps in more an-cient and innocent ages it was are the ancient inhabitants, and live

Wine and strong liquors, of which the nation is beginning to make daily abuse, will of course pro-duce the same bad effects as among others. But as the friendships of the Morlacchi are strong and sacred, so their quarrels are commonly unextin-guishable. They pass from the father to the son; and so deeply is revenge rooted in the minds of this nation, that all the missionaries in the world would not be able to eradicate it.

Morocco, an empire of Africa, comprehending a considerable part of the ancient Mauritania, lying between 28 and 36° N lat. It is bounded on the W by the Atlantic; on the E by the river Mulvia, which separates it from Algiers; on the N by the Mediterra-nean; and on the S by mount Atlas. Its greatest length, from NE to S W, is above 590 miles, and, where widest, not more than 260 broad. This empire contains the kingdoms of Sus, Taradan, Morocco Proper, Tasilet, Sugelmessa, Fez, and Mequinez. The air of this country is pretty pure and temperate, especially near mount Atlas. The soil though sandy and dry in some places, is so fertile in others; and the fruits, as well as the pastures, so good, that it would be a delightful country if it was well cultivated. The inhabitants are Mahometans, of a tawney complexion, robust, and very skillul in managing a horse, and wielding a lance; but they are jealous, deceiful, superstitious, and cruel. There are two sorts of inhabitants; the Arabs, who dwell in in cities and towns. There are a great number of Christian slaves, and some increhants, upon the coast, besides a multitude of Jews, who carry on almost all the trade; especially by land with the Negroes, to whom they send large caravans, which travel over vast deserts, almost destitute of water. They carry with them woollen goods, filk, sult, &c. and in return, have slaves, gold, and elephants teeth, and out of them the emperor recruits his cavalry. They also send large caravans to M ca every year partly out of devotion, and partly for trade, consisting of seve-Their commodities are Morocco leather, indigo, cochineal, and ostrich feathers; in return for which they have silks, muslins, calicoes, collee, and drugs. It has nothing to recommend it but its great extent, and the royal palace, which takes up so much ground that it resembles a small city. It is inclosed by strong walls, the circumference of which is eight miles; they are flanked by square towers, and surrounded by a wide and deep ditch. The mosques are more numerous than magnificent. The best houses are enclosed in gardens; but the generality of them serve only to impress the traveller with the idea of a miserable and deserted city. This division is not deformed by wooden houses. It contains the an-cient palace of the czars, now only re-markable for being the birthplace of Peter the Great; also several churches, two convents, the patriarchil palace, and the arsenal now in ruins. 2. The second division, called Khitaigo-rod, which is much larger than the Kremlin; it contains the university, the printing house, and many other public buildings, with all the tradesmen's shops. are still to be seen. 4. Semlainogorod, which environs all the other three quarters, is so denominated from a circular rampart of earth by which it is encompassed. The last two divisions exhibit a grotesque group of churches, convents, palaces, brick and wooden houses, and mean hovels. 5. The Sloboda, or suburbs, which form a wast exterior circle round all the parts already described, and are invested by a low rampart and ditch. These suburbs conbesides buildings of all kinds, corn-fields, much open pasture, and some small lakes, which give rise to the Neglina. The Moskva, from which the city takes its name, flows through it in a winding channel; but, except ing in spring, is only navigable for rafts. It receives the Yausa in the Semlainogorod, and the Neglina at the western extremity of the Kremlin; but the beds hibits an astonishing degree of extent and variety, irregularity and contrast. Numerous churches appear in every quarter, built in a peculiar style of architecture: some with domes of copper, others of tin, gilt or painted green; and many are roofed with wood. In a word, some parts of this vast city have the appearance of a sequestered descrt; other quarters, of a populous town; some, of a contemptible village; others, of a great capital. Moscov is certainly the largest city in Europe; its circumference within the rampart, which incloses the suburbs, being 26 miles; but it is built in so disjointed and straggling a manner that its population corresponds, in no degree, with its extent. It contains within the ramparts, and in the adja-cent villages, 300,000 souls, and is the most populous city in the empire. The places of divine worship, at Moscow, are extremely numerous; including the rain. It takes its name from a river chapels, they amount to above 1000; which rises in the Vosges, waters Epithere are 484 public churches; 199 of nal, receives the Meurthe below Nan-

Some of their bells form no inconsiderable part of divine worship, are of a stupendous size; they are hung in belfries detached from the church, are fixed immoveably to the beams, and rung by a rope tied to the clapper. It has always been esteemed a meritorious act of religion to present a church with bells; and the picty of the donor has been measured by their magnitude. Accordingly, Boris Godunuf, who gave a bell of 288,000 pounds to the cathedral of Moscow, was the most pious sovereign of Russia, till he was surpassed by the empress Anne, at whose expence a bell was cast, weighing 432,000 pounds, and is the largest in the known world. Moscow is the centre of the inland commerce of Russia, particularly connecting the trade between Europe and Siberia. The na-vigntion to this city is formed solely by the Moskva, which falling into the Occa, near Colonina, communicates, by that river, with the Volga. But as the Moskva is navigable in the spring only, upon the melting of the snows, the principal merchandise is conveyed upon sledges in winter. The extent of his territory, from has the extent of the territory, from the widest place (the N part of the peningula) 330 miles, but, proceeding to the S, it diminishes till it ends in a that of Great Britain. By the peace of 1782, Hyder Ally was to relinquish all but his ancient possessions. How his successor fulfilled the terms of that' treaty, cannot easily be ascertained; but, on the termination of the war in 1792, that prince agreed, over and above a large payment in money, to cede one half of his dominions to the the Deccan. A new war broke out in 1799; when Seringapatam, Tippoo's capital was taken by the English troops, and he himself killed in the assault; in consequence of which his dominions have been divided between the East India company and their allies. Nan-king, or Kiang-ning-fou, a city of China, and capital of the province of Kiang-nan, and said to have been one of the most beautiful cities in the world. It is still the largest in China, being 17 miles in circumference, and three distant from the river Yang-tisekiang, from which canals are cut, so large, that vessels may enter the town. Nan-king has lost much of its ancient splendour; it had formerly a magnificent palace, no vestige of which is now to be seen; an observatory at present neglected, temples, tombs of the emperors, and other superb monuments, of which nothing remains but the re-membrance. A third of the city is descreed, but the rest is well inhabited. Some quarters of it are extremely populous, and full of business. The streets are not so broad as those of Peking; they are, however, very beautiful, well paved, and bordered with rich shops. The public buildings are mean snops. It formerly had a university, and a bishop's see, and was the residence of the dukes of Bretagne, who built a strong castle on the side of the river which still exists. The cathedral contains the tombs of the ancient dukes. The bridges over the Loire, in which are some islands, are admost a league in length. The suburbs are so large that they exceed the city. The inhabitants are computed at 60,000. Since the peace in 1783, Nantes has had a considerable share in the commerce with the United States. A great quantity of salt is made in the territory of Nantes, both at the bay of Bourgneuf, and in the salt marshes of Geurande and Croisis. Large vessels can come no higher than port Lunnai, where they are unloaded into smaller vessels which go up to Nantes, be .g a distance of 12 miles. It was in this place that Henry IV. promulgated the famous edict, in 1598, in favour of the Protestants, which was revoked in 1685, by Lewis XIV. In 1796, the theatre here took fire, during a time of performance, and several persons lost their lives. Nantes is 58 miles S by E of Rennes, and 217 S of Paris. Lon. 145 W, lat. 47 13 N.

Napul, a province of Hindooston Proper, bounded on the S by Bahar, on the W by Oude and Rohilcund, on the N W by Sirinagur, and on the N E and E by the ridge of Mountains called Himmalch, by which it is separated from Thibet. Catmandu is the capital.

Naples, a kingdom of Italy, comprehending the ancient countries of Samnium, Campania, Apulia, and Magna Gracia. It is bounded on the N W the Ecclesiastical State, on the S and W by the Mediterranean, and on the E by the gulf of Venice. Its extent from N W to S E is 280 miles, and from N E to S W from 96 to 100. It is divided into 12 provinces; namely, Terra di Lavora, (the ancient Campania Felix) Principato Citeriore and Ulicriore, Molise, Basilicata, Calabria Ci-teriore and Ulteriore, Abruzzo Cite-riore and Ulteriore, Capitanata, Ter-ra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto; the last three forming the ancient Apulia, now called Puglia, on the E side of the kingdom. After many revolutions, the Normans became masters of this country, in the eleventh century; and the sovereigns were called counts, then dukes, and afterwards kings of Puglia: but in 1282, Peter III, king of Arragon, caused all the Normans in the island of Sicily to be massacred; and this massacre was called the Sicilian Vespers. After this, Puglia was joined to Sicily; and hence the sovereigns took the title of King of the Two Sicilies. It has also been called the kingdom of Naples, from the city of that name which is its capital. France and Spain contended for the sovereignty in the sequel, and bloody wars and revolutions ensued. The country was then torn by the contentions of France and Spain for its sovereignty. The French being defeated by the Spaniards in 1504, Lewis XII. was obliged formally to give up all pretensions to the crown, and the country was governed by Span-ish viceroys. In 1647, happened the dreadful insurrection of Massauiello in giance, on the assassination of Massa-niello, the Spaniards continued in peaceniello, the Spaniards continued in peace-able possession of the kingdom till 1707, when it was conquered by prince Eugene, and ceded to the Emperor by the treaty of Rastadt, in 1714. The climate of Naples is extremely hot, especially in July, August, and September; and is said to be one of the most inconstant and unfavourable to valetudinarians. In some seasons it rains every day for six or seven weeks together. In winter there is seldom any ice or snow except on the mountains. But the most disagreeable part of the climate is the siprecade part of the cimate is the sproce, or S E wind, which is very common in May, and is infinitely more relaxing, and gives rise to vapours in a much higher degree, than the worst of the rainy month of November, in Great Britain. In winter there is seldom any ice or snow, except on the mountains. The country, on account of its fertility, is justly termed a terrestrial paradise for it abounds with a" some of grain, the finest fruits and ric, flax, oil, and wine, saffron, garden productions of every kind, with manna, allum, vitriol, sulphur, rock-crystal, marble in the greatest plenty and perfection. It af-fords also wool and silk, and several sorts of minerals. Besides the manu-factures noticed in the account of the city of Naples, waistcoats, caps, stockings, and gloves are also made of the hair or filaments of a shell-fish, which are warmer than those of wool, and of a beautiful glossy green. The principal mountains are the Appennines, which traverse this from S to N, and the celebrated volcano, Mount Vesuvius, five Italian miles from Naples. One of the greatest inconveniences to which this kingdom is exposed is earthquakes (see Galabria) which the erupsome measure, to prevent. Another inconveniency is the great number of reptiles and insects engendered by the heat, some of which are very poisonous. The established religion is the Roman catholic; and the clergy and convents were said to possess formerly two thirds of the whole kingdom. The in-habitants of this country have, at all the city of Naples, by which the Span-tiards were nearly expelled. In the female sex, the passion for finery is al-most superior to all others, and, not-withstanding any effect the genial warmth of the climate may have on the constitution of a Neapolitan woman, Mr. Swinburne doubts whether she would not nine times out of ten prefer present to a lover; yet I apprehend chastity is not the characteristic virtue of this place more than it is of any other conulous metropolis; that furious jeaonsy for which the nation was so remarkable some generations ago, is almost eradicated; the breach of the conjugal vow sometimes occasions quarrels and assassinations among people of an inferior station, but the case is rare, and rivalry between lovers is more frequently productive of such scenes. Of these vices, many are doubtless owing to the slavery and oppression under which they groun, and to a radical de-fect in the administration of justice.

Naples, an ancient and large com-mercial city of Italy, capital of a kingdom of the same name, with an archbi-shop's see, and an university, lying in the province called Terra di Lavora. It is seated at the bottom of the bay of Naples, which is one of the finest in the world, being almost of a round figure, of about 30 miles diameter, and three parts of it sheltered with a noble circuit of woods and mountains. It is built in the form of a vast amphitheatre, sloping from the hills to the sea. Although the style of architecture is inferior to what prevails at Rome, and it cannot vie with that city in the number of palaces, or in the magnificence of the churches, the private houses, in general, are better built. The circum-ference, including the suburbs, is said not to be less than 18 Italian miles, and the number of the inhabitants therein little less than 400,000. The houses are of stone, flat-roofed, and generally and uniform; but many of them have balconies, with lattice-windows. The streets are well paved; but they are not lighted at night, and in the day-time are disfigured, in many places, by stalls, on which provisions are exposed to sale. Here are a great number of fee-houses, and places of public resort; fine churches, convents, fountains, and palaces of the nobility, many of whom constantly reside here. It is usual to walk on the tops of the houses in the evenings, to breathe the sweet cool air, after a hot sultry day. The cli-mate here is so mild and warm, even in the winter, that plenty of green pease, artichokes, asparagus, and other vegetables, may be had so early as the beginning of the new year, and even all the winter. The fortress of St. Elmo is built on a mountain of the same name. and has the entire command of the town. Lower down on the same mountain, in a delightful situation, is a convent of Carthusians, on which much expense has been lavished, to render the building and the gardens equal to the situation. Naples is admirably situate for commerce, and has all the necessaries and luxuries of life in great profusion; but trade is in a languishing condition. Pictures, statues, and antiquities, are not so common in Naples as might be expected in so great and ancient a city, many of the most valuable pieces having been sent to Spain by the viceroys. Owing to the populousness of the place, many of its streets are more crowded than those of London, and a great proportion of the poorest sort are obliged to spend the night in them for want of habitations. There is not a city in the world, perhaps, with the same number of inhabitants, in which so few contribute to the wealth of the community, by useful and productive labour, as Naples; for the number of priests, monks, fiddlers, lawyers, nobility, footnen, and lazzaroni, or vagabonds, surpasses all reasonable proportion; and the last alone are computed at above 30,000. The greater part of these wretches have no dwelling-houses, but sleep every night under porticos, piazzas, or any kind of shelter they can find. Those of them who have wives and children, live in the suburbs of Naples near Pensilippo, in huts, or in caverns or chambers dug out of that mountain. They are generally represented as a lazy, licentious, lava of Mount Vesuvius, tables, and or excellent wine called Malmsey; and namental furniture of marble. The city is supplied with a vast quantity of Æsculapius. It is 42 miles S E of National S E of Nationa water, by means of a very costly aquewater, by means of a very costly aqueduct, from the foot of Mount Vesuvius. 56 57 N.

The nobility are excessively fond of splendour and show; as appears by the brilliancy of their equipages, the num
the Morea, seated at the bottom of a ber of their attendants, the richness of their dress, and the grandeur of their titles. The king, it is said, counts a hundred persons with the title of prince, and still a greater number with that of duke, among his subjects. A few of these have estates, from 10 to 13,000/. a year; a considerable number have fortunes of about half that amount; and the annual revenue of many is under 2000/. The inferior orders of nobility 2000. The inferior orders of nobility are much poorer; many counts and marquises not having 400t. a year paternal estate; many still less; and not a few enjoy the title without any estate whatever. Although the churches and convents of Naples are not to be compared with those at Rome in point of architecture, they appear a how in visib. architecture, they surpusa them in rich jewels, and in the quantity of silver and golden crucifixes, vessels and other or-naments. Of all the palaces, that of the king is not only the most magnifi-cent, but also in the best style of architecture. The cathedral though Gothic is a very splendid edilice. Here are kept the head and blood of St. Januarius, the tutelary saint of Naples ; the latter in two glass or crystal vials. The pretended liquefaction of the dry blood, as soon as brought near the head of the saint, is well known; and Mr. Addison says, it is one of the most bungling tricks he agen and The head bungling tricks he ever saw. Netherlands, or Low Countries, a large country of Europe, anciently called Gallia Belgica. In the ninth century, the sons of the emperor Lewia the Pious having divided the dominions of Pious having divided the dominions of their father, who possessed Germany, France, and Italy, a new kingdom was formed, comprehending Germany and France, and a part of the Netherlands. It was called Lotharia, but did not long subsist; for it was soon divided into two; and that seated near the Mediterranean was called the kingdom of Burgundy , while the other, to the N, had the name of Austrasia. Nei-ther did this last continue long, it being divided into 17 provinces, under differ-ent names, which still depended on the empire of Germany, and were called Lower Germany. In process of time, the house of Burgundy purchased many of them, and was about to form them, forms the boundary between Hindoos- with Burgundy, into a kingdom; but

Charles the Buld, the last duke of Bur-gundy, being killed by the Swiss, in an universal spirit of revolt broke out; 1477, his part of the Netherlands de-an army of 40,000 men rose, as if by volved on Mary his only child; who, marrying the emperor Maximilian, the Netherlands fell to the house of Austria. The emperor Charles V. king of Spain, in 1555, abdicated the sovereignty of the Netherlands, and soon after, the Spanish crown, in favour of his son Philip. The tyranny of this cruel bigot, Philip II. who endervoured to introduce the inquisition into the Low Countries, with the barbarities of the duke of Alan, exasperated the people to such a degree, that they, under the conduct of William I. prince of Orange, formed the famous league of Utrecht, in 1579, which proved the foundation of the republic of the Seven United Provinces. After a long and bloody wur, the Spaniards agreed to a truce with the United Provinces, the very first article of which acknowledged them to be free and independent states. The war was renewed in 1621; but, at lest, by the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, Philip IV, of Spain expressly re-nounced all claim to sovereignty over the United Provinces. The other ten provinces, however, returned under the dominion of Spain, but with very favourable stipulations with respect to their ancient laws and liberties. On the death of Charles II. king of Spain, and the subsequent accession of a branch of the house of Bourbon to that monarchy, it was stipulated, by the treaty of Baden in 1714, that the Spanish Netherlands should return to the German branch of the house of Aus-tria. Some considerable parts, however, fell by conquest, or cession, to the French and Dutch; the province of Artois, the Cambresis, and part of Luxemburg, Flanders, and Hainault, were in the hands of the French, and called the French Netherlands; while the Dutch possessed the N part of Bra-bant and Flanders, from them denominated Dutch Brahant and Flanders. The emperor Charles VI. left the Austrian Netherlands to his daughter Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary and Bohemis, who married Francis, grand duke of Tuscany, afterwards emperor. During her reign, no sovereign could be more beloved; no people more content and happy. But her son, Joseph 11. having projected many innovations, in the constitutions, both in church and circle of Upper Saxony, in the territo-

an array or 30,000 files rose, as it by magic, to support the renunciation of all allegiance, which several of the provinces now openly made; a congress was formed from the different states, in whom the supreme governstates, in whom the supreme govern-ment was vested; and by the end of December 1790, the Austrian forces were entirely expelled from the Netherlands. The new government, however, was not of long duration; for which, indeed, the manner in which the congress exercised its powers was far from being calculated. Leopold II. (the successor of the capricious and unfortunate Joseph, who died in the early part of 1790) was enabled, part-ly by force of arms, partly by conciliatery measures, and partly by the mediaand Hague, to recover the entire pos-session of his authority in these provinces, and that, in a great measure to the satisfaction of the people; the ministers of the mediating courts having guaranteed the restoration of the ancient Belgic constitution, as enjoyed under the happy reign of the empress queen Maria Theresa. In 1792, the French overrun the Netherlands, and endeavoured to effect another revolution, but were driven out of the country in 1793. In 1794 they again recovered possession; and in 1795 the Netherlands were decreed to form a part of the territory of the French republic. The Netherlands, in general, arc 360 miles long, and 260 broad; lying b en 2 and 7° E lon. and 49 and 54° N lat. Its form is triangular; the N point is separated from Labrador by the strait of Belleisle, and from this apex it is 350 miles in length to the base which is 200 in breadth. It is a base, which is 200 in breadth. It is a mountainous country, and the climates rather severe, the ground being covered with snow five months in the year. The coasts are high and the shores most remarkably wooded, and the hills are clothed with birch, hazel, spruce, fir, and pine. In some parts of it there are trees sufficiently large for the building of merchautmen, the hull is made of juniper, and the pine furnishes masts and yards, but no masts have yet been found for a large cutter. It seems to have no inhabitants of its own, but in mountainous country, and the climates to have no inhabitants of its own, but in the summer time is visited by the Esquimaux Indians. It has several bays and harbours, and there are about 500 English families who continue here all the year, besides the garrison of St. John's Placentia, and other forts. The great importance of this island arises from its fishery, which begins in May and ends in September; the great fishing-banks the SE of this island, are resorted to by at least 10,000 people, and 8 or 900 sail of ships, and the fish when cured are exported to Spain, Portugal, Italy, and the West Indies. ascertain the rise, course, and termina-tion of the Niger, Mr. Parke was sent out by the African association in 1795. The course of this river which was for-springs, a little to the west of south, is acrly supposed to be from E to W, is the sacred forntain, about eleven inches

now determined by Mr. Parke to be from W to E. In tracing the rise of the Niger Mr. Parke proceeded as far as Silla, the end of his journey East-ward; he was disabled from proceeding farther by sickness, hunger and fatigue; particularly as he must have relied on the charity of the Moors, if he had continued his journey, who seemed to be a set of merciless fanatics. So great is the rapidity with which the Niger traverses the empire of Cashua, that no vessel can ascend the stream; and in the rainy season, it swells above its banks, floods the adja-cent lands, and often sweeps before it the cattle and cottages of the inhabitants.

Nile, a large and celebrated river of Africa, to which the country of Egypt owes its fertility; and the exploring of whose sources has, from the remotest ages, been accounted an impracticable undertaking. This discovery has however, been lately made by Mr. Brues, who spent several years at the chart of Abyssinia, and by the favour of the emperor and great people of the country, was enabled to accomplish this arduous In the middle of a marsh, near the bottom of the mountain of Geesh, arises a hillock of a circular form, about three feet from the surface of the marsh itself, though apparently founded much deeper in it. The diameter of this is something short of twelve feet; it is surrounded by a shallow trench, which collects the water, and voids it eastward; it is firmly built with sod or eastward; it is armly built with sod or earthen turf, brought from the sides, and constantly kept in repair, and this is the altar upon which all their religi-ous ceremonies are performed. This mouth, or opening of the source, is some parts of an inch less than three fort in disperses and also than three feet in diameter, and the water stood about two inches from the lip or brim. This spring is about six inches deep. This is the first fountain of the Nile. Ten feet distant from the first of these in diameter; but this is eight feet three | in diameter; but this is eight feet three inches deep. And about twenty feet data it from the first, is the third source, its mouth being something more than two feet large, and it is five feet eight inches deep. The Nile thus formed by the union of streams from these those foundains some feet about these three fountains, runs E for about 30 yards, with very little increase of water, till it is turned gradually N E and then N by the grassy brink of the land descending from Sacala. Here it receives the addition of several springs, and becomes capable of turning a common mill. From this it turns W about four miles farther, where is a cataract of about six feet, after which it leaves the mountainous country, and takes its course thro' the plains of Goutto. Here it flows so gently, that its motion is scarcely discernible, and its direction is so winding, that it forms more than 20 sharp angular peninsulas, in a course of five miles. Its course then inclines to the NE and E, when it falls down another cataract, and then receives the Jenuma, a stream not inferior in size to itself. Proceeding to the N, it crosses the southern part of the lake Tzana, or Dembea, and issues out at the W side of it in the territory of Dara. After emerging from this lake, it first receives the name of the Nile. The banks in the course of a few miles become very high, and ar covered with the most beautiful and variegated verdure that can be con-ceived. It is now confined by the mountains of Bejemder till it reaches Alata, where is the third cataract, which is represented by Mr. Bruce as the most magnificent sight he ever beincreased by rains, and fell in one sheet of water without any interval, about half an English mile in breadth, with a force and noise that was truly terrible, and which stunned, and made him for a time, perfectly dizzy. A thick fume, or haze, covered the fall all round, and hung over the course of the stream both above and below, marking its track, though the water is not seen. The river, though swelled with rain, served its natural clearness, and fell, as far as he could discern, into a deep pool, or bason, in the solid rock, which was full, and in twenty different eddies to the very foot of the precipice; the stream when it fell, seeming part of it

its course, raising a wave, or violent ebuilition, by chafing against each other. About half a mile below the eataract, the Nile is confined between chamel with impetuous velocity and great noise. Helow this tremendous waterfall the Nile takes a S E direc-tion along the W side of Begemder and Amhara, on the right inclosing the province of Gojam. It receives a great number of streams from both sides, and after several turns taken at last a direction almost due N. and approaches within 62 miles of its source. It now seems to have forced its passage through a gap in some very high mountains, which bound the country of the Ganges, and falls down a cataract 280 feet high, and immediately below this are two others of very considerable height. It now runs close by Sennaar in a direction nearly N and S, and afterwards makes a sharp turn to the E. Leaving Semaar, it passes by many large towns inhabited by Arabs, and turning to the N E it joins the Tecazze, and passes a large and populous town named Chendi, Having at length re-ceived the great river Atbara, it turns directly N for about two degrees; it then turns to W by S for more than two degrees in longitude, and arrives at Korti. From Korti it runs almost S W till it passes Dongola, after which it comes to Moscho. From thence turning to the NE, it meets with a chain of mountains in about 22° 15' of N lat. where is the seventh cataract named Jan Adel. This is likewise very tremendous, though not above half as high as that of Alata. This course is now continued till it falls into the Mediterranean, there being only one other cataract in the whole space which is much inferior to any of those already described. The Nile overflows regularly every year; the causes of its inundations are thus described by Mr. Bruce. The sun being nearly stationary for some days in the tropic of Capricorn, the air there becomes so much rarified, that the heavier winds, charged with watery particles, rush in upon it from the Atlantic on the W, and from the Indian ocean on the E. Having thus gathered such a quantity of vapours as it were to a focus, the sun now puts them in motion, and drawing them after it in its rapid progress northto run back wit! great fury upon the them after it in its rapid progress north-rock, as well as forward in the line of ward, on the 7th of January, for two

Norfolk, a county of England, 77 miles long and 45 broad; bounded on the N and E by the German Ocean, on the W by Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire, and on the S and S E by Suffolk. It contains 31 hundreds, one city, 32 market-towns, and 660 parishes; and sends 12 members to parliament. The air differs in different parts of the county according to the soil, which in some places is marshy, especially on the sea coast, and there the air is foggy and unwholesome; in others it is clayey unwholcsome; in others it is clayey and chally, poor, lean and sandy, and there the air is good. The county is almost all champaign, except in some places where rise gentle hills. The marsh lands yield rich pasture for cattle; the clay grounds, pease, rye and barley; and the sandy heaths feed vast flocks of large sheep, of which some villages are said to keep 4000 or 5000. These heaths also abound in rabbits of a silver grey colour. Great quantities of meckarel and herring are caught upon the coast of this county, the former in the spring, and the latter in September; especially at Yarmouth, where they are cured in a particular manner, and to great perfection. Wood and honey are also very plentiful in this county, and on the coasts jet and ambergrease are sometimes found. Turnips are also more generally grown here than in any other part of the country; likewise buckwheat, which is used for feeding swine and poultry. The ma-nufactures of the county, which is ex-ceedingly populous, are chiefly woollen and worsted stuffs and stockings, for which they are well supplied with wool from the vact flocks of sheep fed on it The county is well watered and supplied with fish by the rivers Yare, Thyrn, Waveney, the Greater and Lesser Ouse, and the Bure, besides rivulets Turkies are reared here to a larger size than elsewhere, and there is a bundance of game especially pheasants. Norwich is the capital.

This is a very thriving town, being finely situated for foreign trade, and possessing more of it than any other in the State of Virginia. The exports of one year have amounted to 2,000,000 of dollars, and those principally of domestic produce. It is a borough town, and governed by a Mayor and Aldermen. It is very hilly, but some of the vallies are tolerably large. Mount Pitt, the only remarkable hill, is 12,000 feet high. The island is well watered; at or near Mount Pitt, rises a copious stream which, flowing through a very fine valley, divides itself into several branches, each of which retains sufficient force to be used in turning mills.
The whole island is covered by a very thick forest, choaked with underwood, and the principal timber tree is the pine, which is very useful in building, and seems to be durable. The woods are inhabited by innumerable tribes of birds, many of them, very gay in plumage. The soil, when cleared, may be rendered very productive; and the air is very wholesome. The spring is perceptible in August; but the trees are in a constant succession of flowering and fruiting the year round. In summer, the heat is excessive; from February to August may be called the rainy season; and the winter, from April to July, is very pleasant. They maintain their own army, which consists of 24,000 foot, and 6000 cavalry. Their troops are much esteemed for their bravery, and, like the Swiss mountaincers, are and, like the Swiss mountaineers, are exceedingly attached to their country. Norway is blessed with a particular code, called the Norway Law, compiled by Grieffelfeld, at the command of Christian V. the great legislator of his country. Those who dwell in the maritime parts of Norway exercise the employment of Norway exercise the employment of navigation, and become very Norway exercise the employment of fishing and navigation, and become very expert mariners. The peasants never employ any handicraftsmen for necessaries to themselves and families; they are their own hatters, shoemakers, taylors, tanners, weavers, carpenters, smiths, and joiners; they are even exsmiths, and joiners; they are even expert in ship-building; and some of them make excellent violins. Great part of Norway is covered with forests of wood, which constitute the principal article of commerce in this country. They chiefly consist of fir and pine, for which great sums are received from foreigners, who export an immense number of masts, beams, planks, and boards. The climate of Norway is very different in different parts of the kingdom. At Bergen the winter is so moderate, that the seas are always open and practicable, except in crecks and bays. On the E side of Norway, from the frontiers of Sweden to Filefield, the cold generally sets in about the middle of October with great severity, and lasts till the middle of April. The soil of Norway varies in different places, according to the situation of rock or valley. mountains are bare and barren; but the earth washed down from them, enriches and fertilizes the vallies. In these the soil generally consists of black mould, sand, loam, chalk and gravel, Jying over one another in unequal strata. The face of the country is in many places deformed by large swamps and marshes, very dangerous to the traveller. The ploughed lands in respect to mountains, woods, meadows and wastes do not exceed the proportion of 1 to 80, so that the whole country does not produce corn to maintain above half the number of its inhabitants. The nefits of this code are visible in the principal trees, as naticed above, are great difference, in their appearance, the fir and pine; it produces likewise between the free peasants in Norway oak, plenty of elm trees, ash, hazel, and

On the demise of Hagen V. in 1319, without male issue, his grandson in the female line, Magnus Smek, united in his person the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway. Magnus was succeeded in the kingdom of Norway by his son Hagen VI. l:usband of the celebrated Margaret; and at his decease, in 1380, Norway was united to Denmark by their son Olof V. who dying without issue, Margaret herself was raised to the throne by the unanimous voice of the nation. On her death, it descend-ed with Denmark and Sweden, to her nephew Eric. Sweden was afterward separated from Denmark by the valour and address of Gustavus Vasa; but Norway continues united to Denmark. The capital is Christiania.

Omalaska, one of the islands of the Northern Archipelago, visited by captain Cook in his last voyage. The native inhabitants of this island are to all appearance a very peaceable pen-ple, having been much polished by the Russians, who now keep them in a state of subjection. As the island furnishes them with subsistence, so it does, in some measure with clothing, which is chiefly composed of skins. The upper chiefly composed of skins. The upper garment, which is made like a wag-goner's frock, reaches down to the knees. Besides this, they wear a waistcoat or two, a pair of breeches, a fur cap, and a pair of boots, the legs of which are formed of some kind of strong gut; but the soles and upper part are of Russia leather. Fish and other sea animals, birds, roots, herries, and even sea-weed, compose their food. They dry quantities of fish during the summer, which they lay up in small huts for their use in winter. They did not appear to very be desirous of iron, nor to want any other instrument ex-Ownst, a small island, at the mouth cept sewing needles, their own being

The people have mild fea-tures, and a pleasing countenance. They are about the ordinary size of Europeans, of a pale maliogany brown, with fine black hair and eyes, and wear a piece of cloth round their midwear a piece of cloth round their mid-dle of their own manufacture, and an-other wrapped about the head, in va-rious picturesque shapes, like a turban. The women who are far from being ugly and unhandsome, wear a piece of cloth, with a hole in the middle, through which they pass their heads, so that one part of the garment hangs down behind, and the other hefore, to the knees; a fine white cloth, like musthe knees; a fine white cloth, like muslin, passes over this in various elegant turns round the body, a little below the breasts forming a kind of tunic, of which one turn sometimes falls gracewhich one turn sometimes hais grace-fully across the shoulder Both sexes are adorned, or rather disfigured, by those black stains, occasioned by punc-turing the skin, and rubbing a black colour into the wounds. The birds colour into the wounds. The birds most common are two sorts of parroquets, one of a beautiful sapphirine blue, another of a greenish colour, with a few red spots; a king's fisher, of a dark green, with a collar of the same hue round his white throat; a large cuckoo; several sorts of pigeons or doves; and a bluish heron. The only quadrupeds found on the island are hors, dors, and rats, which are sufhogs, dogs, and rats, which are suf-fered to run about at pleasure. Their houses consist only of a roof, thatched with the long pricky leaves of the palm-nut tree, and supported by a few pil-lars made of the bread-fruit tree. As a roof is sufficient to shelter the natives from rains and nightly dews, and as the climate is one of the happiest in the world, the houses have seldom any walls, but are open on all sides. Their cloth is made of the fibrous bark of the mulberry tree, which is beaten with a kind of mallet; and a glue, made of the hibiscus esculentus, is employed to mong them, as among the Chinese; for they imply that such persons only as have no occasion to work, could suf fer them to grow to that length. Th. two sexes here eat separately, as in many other countries. Their provisions are chiefly fish, pork, cocoa-nuts, bread fruit and bananas; and they employ sea-water as a sauce both to fish and pork. Nothing can exceed their agility in swimming, diving, and climbing trees. Mr. Foster is lavish in his praitrees. Mr. roster is tavish in his praises of the gentleness, goodnature, and hospitality of this people; and also of the beauty, elegance, and gracefulness of the air, features and persons of many of them, especially of the better sort, to whose voyage, and Captain Cook's, in the Endeavour, compiled by Cook's, in the Endeavour, compiled by Dr. Hawkesworth, we must refer the reader, as well as to the account of Captain Cook's last voyage, published in 1785, for a more particular account of their dress, dwellings, food, domestic amusements, navigation, diseases, religion, funeral rites, wars, weapons, and government.

Oxfordaire, a county of England, bounded on the E by Buckinghamahire, on the W by Gloufcestershire, on the Sby Berkshire, and on the N by Warwickshire and Northamptonshire. Its extreme length is 48 miles; its greatest breadth 26. It contains one city, 15 market towns, 280 parishes, 14 hundreds, 534,000 acres, and about 120,000 sords. The air is sweet and pleasant, and the soil rich and fertile. The lower parts consist of meadows and cornfield, and the higher were covered with woods till the civil wars; in which they were so entirely destroyed, that wood is now extremely scarce and dear, except in what is called the chiltern, and so is coal; of consequence fuel bears an exorbitant price. The county is extremely well watered, by the Windrush, Evenlode, Cherwel, and the Windrush, Evenlode, Cherwel, and Tame; the latter, although an inconsiderable rivulet, has obtained some importance from having been supposed to give name to the Thames. The products of Oxfordshire are chiefly those common to the midland farming counties. Its hills yield other, pipe clay, and other earths, useful for various purposes. Corns and must are conversed. poses. Corn and mait are conveyed from it, by the Thames to the metropo-lis. Good cheese is made in the grazing parts. The greatest want in this county is that of fuel; for the woods, with which it once abounded, being greatly diminished, it is necessary to supply the deficiency with coal brought by a long and troublesome navigation from London. The junction of the Thames with the Trent and Mersey, by the canal from Braunston to Hampton Gay, and by another canal from Braunston to Brentford, will greatly remedy this inconvenience.

Palermo, a city of Sicily in the Val-di N gate called Ports Felice, the happy Mazara, with an archbishop's see, and gate; and terminates on the S. The

a large harbour. This city, which is the capital of Sicily, is of great anti-quity; and if a conjecture may be formed from its ancient name Panormus, which signifies an universal harbour, it was formerly in a very flourish-ing condition. By whom it was founded is uncertain, nor have we any authentic accounts of its inhabitants till it became a colony of the Phomicians, after which it passed into the hands of the various nations that became masters of this island. The present city principally consists of two wide, uniform, and well-built streets, each about a mile in length, crossing each other at right angles in the centre, where there is a small octathe centre, where there is a sman octa-gon space, ornamented with four statues. Most of the cities of Sicily have sur-names: Palermo is denominated The Happy. It has gained this epithet, no doubt, on account of the advantages of its situation. It has two harbours: in the one, which is very large, and in which there is a mole 1300 paces in length, ships lie at anchor; in the other their cargoes are laden and unladen. Both the harbours open to the W: there is also a superb quay which extends a mile from W to E, in a rectilinear di-rection, and is called La Marine. The prospect is, on the one side, lost in the wide expanse of the ocean, and on the other confined by the walls of the city: the walls appear adorned with pilasters, and crowned with a row of ballustrades through which the eye discovers a long range of palaces. These objects alto-gether form a delightful spectacle. Indeed nothing can be more picture-sque than the bay of Palermo. It forms a large amphitheatre, with the capital of Sicily in the centre; surrounded for some miles by a most delightful coun-try, and inclosed by romantic rocks and mountains. The town was formerly surrounded by a strong wall; but the fortifications are now entirely neglected, except towards the sea, where there are still a few weak works. The quay is the principal public walk here. Palermo is embellished all round with avenue of trees, and has four principal entrances, facing the four cardinal points, which are at the extremities of the two spacious streets which cross each other. The most frequented of these two streets is called Cassero. It egins where the quay ends, with the

Porta Felice opens to the Marino, a de-lightful walk, that has on one side the when they died. The number of the wall of the city, and on the other, the inhabitants is above 200,000; and the sea; and in the centre is an elegant kind of temple, which in summer is made use of as an orchestra. Palermo is quite filled with public monuments, churches, monasteries, r.d.ees, fountains, statues, and c. t.mns. The churches amount to 300, and many of them are very rich and magnificent. them are very rich and magnificent. Spring-waters are very copious in this city. Not a quarter but is liberally supplied with fountains, most of which are marble, all of them adorned with pieces of sculpture, and all afford large quantities of water. The situation of this city is truly happy; the sea, the hills, the lofty mountains, present on all sides beautiful and striking objects. Freed from the fetters of the Inquisition, the abolition of which was procured by the marquis of Caraccioli, and from the influence of some other unfavourable in-stitutions which are rapidly declining, Palermo must become one of the finest cities in the world; and the island of which it is the capital, being all cultivated like a garden, one of the most en-chanting spots on the face of the carth. Palermo is the principal residence of the greater part of the Sicilian nobility; and as it is not the custom for any gentlemen to walk in the streets, at least 1000 carriages are said to be kept in the town. They are for the most part in the English taste, very elegant, shown to the greatest advantage, with anown to the greatest advantage, with beautiful horses richly caparisoned, and as many footmen in splendid liveries as can be crowded together, behind. Every evening all the people of rank drive about in this manner on the grand public terrace by the sea-side. There are also very convenient hackney-coaches, covered and open, waiting all day in their respective stations. It is very re-markable that the dead in Palermo are never buried. The dead bodies are carried to the capuchin convent, which is one of the largest in Italy; where ofter the funeral service is performed, they are dried in a stone, heated by a composition of lime, which makes the skin adhere to the bones. They are then placed erect in niches, and fastened to the wall by the back or neck. piece of coarse drab is thrown over the shoulders and round the waist; and may yet be seen. Paraguay, a large country of South America, bounded on the N by Ama-zonia, on the E by Brasil, on the S by Patagonia, and on the W-by Chill and Peru. It contains six provinces; namely, Paraguay Proper, Parana, Guaria, Uraguay, Tucuman, and La Plata, from which the whole country is also called La Plata. It has numerous lakes and rivers; of the latter, the three princi-pal are the Paraguay, Uragua, and Pa-rana; the united streams of which form the celebrated Rio-de-la-Plata. These resides, and the most considerable city rivers annually overflow their banks, in the province, next to Peking. It has twenty others under its jurisdiction; ed by a slime, that renders the soil extremely fertile. This vast country is far from being wholly subdued or planted by the Spaniards; many parts being still unknown. The principal province of which we have any knowledge is that called La Plata, toward the mouth of the Rio-de-la-Plata. This province, with all the adjacent parts, is one con-tinued plain for several hundred miles; tinued plan for several numered mines; extremely fertile, and producing cotton in great abundance, tobacco, and the valuable herb called Paraguay, which is peculiar to this country, and the infusion of which is drank in all the Spanish provinces of South America, in-stead of tea. They have also a variety of fruits, and very rich pastures; but the country is destitute of woods. The air is remarkably sweet and serene.

The Spaniards discovered this country, by sailing up the Rio-de-la-Plata, in 1515, and founded the town of Buenos Ayres. In 1580, the Jesuits were admitted into these fertile regions, and in the next century, founded the famous missions of Paraguay; which were number of colonies, each governed by the other his curate. They had long resisted the Spaniards and Portuguese; but the Jesuits, by learning their language, conforming to their manners, &c. soon acquired great authority among them; till at last, by steadily pursuing the same artful measures, they arrived at the highest degree of power and influence, being in a manner the absolute sovereigns of a great part of this extensive country; for above 350,000 families are said to have been subject to them, living in obedience and awe bordering on adoration, yet produced without the 24 N. least violence or constraint. In 1767, Paria, or New Andalusia, a province the court expelled the Jesuits, and the of Terra. Firma, on the banks of the natives were put upon the same footing with the other Indians of the Spanish

The most interesting of the manufactures of Paris is that of the Gobelines (so called from a family of celebrated dyers settled in this city in 1450), in which tapestries are made after the pictures of the greatest masters, to such perfection, that one, representing Louis XV. a whole length, framed, and placed among the masterpieces of painting, was taken, for many days, by multitudes of visitors, for a finished piece. The manufacture of plate-glass likewise merits attention.

The finest college in Paris is that of the Four Nations, called also Mazarin, from the name of the cardinal its founder. There were lately six academics in Paris; namely, the French academy, founded by Cardinal Richelieu; that of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, by Louis XIV.; that of the Sciences; and Louis XIV.; that of the Sciences; and those of Painting and Sculpture, Architecture, and Chirurgery. Among the public libraries, that lately called the King's, holds the first rank in respect both to the extent of the buildings, and the number of the volumes. It was founded by Charles V. in 1372. The nounced by Charles V. in 1372. The other libraries are those of St. Genevieve, the College of Mazarin, St. Victor, of the Doctrinaries, of the Advocates, and of the faculty of Medicine; that of St. Germain des Pres, one of the richest in France, confuning between fifteen and tweety thousand many fifteen and twenty thousand manu-scripts, and near a hundred thousand volumes, is open every day to men of letters. The Royal (now National) Observatory is built of freestone, and neither iron nor wood has been employ-ed in the erection. The Botanical ed in the erection. The Botanicar Garden, is worthy, in every respect, of its late appellation of Royal. The four principal palaces are the Louvre, the Thuilleries, the Palais Royal, and the Luxemburg. The Louvre is distinguished into the Old and New. The Old Louvre was begun by Francis I. in 1828, and the grant gallary, 1329 feet. 1528; and the grand gallery, 1362 feet long, and 30 broad, which joins it to the Thuilleries, was begun under Charles IX. and finished by Louis XIV. who likewise built, in 1665, the New Louvre. But it is still an unfinished structure. In some of the apartments different academies have held their sittings; and in others are the work. shops and lodging rooms of artists.
The Thuilleries, begun in 1564, by Catharine of Medicis, continued by Henry IV. and completed by Louis XIV. takes its name from its situation in a place in which were formerly many tile-kilns (tuileries), which, for three or four The cathedral of Notre Dame, a Goth- centuries furnished the greatest part of the tiles used in Paris. The garden of the E side of Shenaodoah river, about the Thuilleries, in front of the palace, 25 miles SW of Harper's ferry on the and on the banks of the Seine, is unquestionably the finest public walk in Paris. From this palace, when attack-ed by the enraged mob, on the 10th of August, 1792, the unfortunate Louis XVI. went for an asylum to the hall of the national assembly, thence to a prison, and thence to the scaffold. The Palais Royal was built by cardinal Riche lieu in 1629, and had the name of the Cardinal's Palace, till Anne of Austria came to reside in it, in 1643, with her son Louis XIV. It has been long the property of the late duke of Orleans; and the interior has been recently embellished with many beautiful buildings, with shops, coffeehouses, and a garden, which render it like a pernetual fair. and one of the most pleasing walks in the city. The palace of Luxemburg was built by Mary of Medicia in 1715, and, in form, somewhat resembles Queen's College, Oxford. Its gardens are open to the public on festival days. Parye, a mountain in the isle of Anclesey, famous for a copper mine, probably the largest bed of ore of that metal hitherto discovered in the world. "It is not wrought (says I)r. Aikin) in the common manner of subterraneous mines, but, like a stone quarry, open to day; and the quantities of ore raised are prodigious. The ore is poor in quality, and very abundant in sulphur. The purest part is exported raw to the smelting works at Swannea and other places; the more impure is first calcincil and deprived of most of its sulphur on the spot. Quantities of nearly pure copper are obtained from the waters lodged beneath the bed of ore, by the intervention of iron. A lead ore, rich in silver, is also found in this mountain. The wealth and population of Anglescy have received a great m-crease from the discovery of this copper mine.

subject of controversy to the learned. They are supposed to be one of the wandering tribes, which occupy that vast, but least known region of America, which extends from the Rio-de-la-Plata to the straits of Magellan. Their proper station is in that part of the interior country which lies on the riv-er Negro; but, in the hunting season, they often roam as far as the straits which separate Terra del Fuego from the mainland. The first accounts of this people were brought to Europe by the companions of Magellan, who described them as a gigantic race, above eight feet high, and of strength in proportion to their uncommon size. Cap-tain Wallis landed here in 1766, and having purposely provided himself with measuring rods, found that the tallest man among them measured only six feet seven inches high; several were within an inch or two as tall ; but the ordinary size was from five feet ten inches to six feet. It is pity that none of our voyagers thought of measuring the whole size of one of those gigantic men. They tell us indeed, that they are well made, that they are proportionably large, and that they are robust and bony; but they give us no crite-rion to judge of their bulk, nor one in-stance of their extraordinary strength. As they are represented not only peaceable, but remarkably tractable, some trials might have been made of the weight they could have lifted, and respect the strongest man in the ships. This in a great measure, would have determined the point, which is yet left doubtful by the different relations that are given by the different voyagers who have seen these people, no two of them agreeing in the same description. and those appointed to relieve them. Before each gate a space is left of more than three hundred and sixty feet: this than three numered and sixty feet? this is a kind of place of arms, enclosed by a semicircular wall equal in height and thickness to that surrounding the city. The streets are perfectly straight, most of them three miles in length, and 120 feet wide, with shops on both sides; but the houses are poorly built, and have only a ground-floor. It is surprihave only a ground-floor. It is surprising to see what numbers of people there are in the streets, and not one woman among them. There is always a great confusion, occasioned by the vast numbers of horses, camels, mules, asses, waggons, carts, and chairs, without reckoning the several mobs which gather about the jugglers, ballad-singers, &c. Persons of distinction have always a horseman who goes before them to clear the way. All the great streets are guarded by soldiers, who patrole night and day with swords by their sides, and whips in their hands, who patrole night and day with swords by their sides, and whips in their hands, to chastise those who make any disturbance, or take them into custody. The little streets have lattice-gates at their entrance into the great streets, which are shut up at night, and guarded by soldiers, who suffer no assent. ed by soldiers, who suffer no assem-blies in the streets at that time. The support of this police costs the emperor a great deal; for part of the soldiers we have mentioned are maintainoters we have mentioned are maintained for this purpose only. They are all infantry, and their pay is generally very high; their employment consists not only in watching for those who may occasion disturbance in the day-time, or walk abroad during the night; they must also take care that the streets are kept clean and swept every day; are kept clean and swept every hay that they are watered morning and evening in time of dry weather; and that every nuisance is removed; they have orders also to assist in this labour themselves, and to clear the kennels, that the water may have a free course. The emperor's palace stands in the middle of the Tartar city. It presents a prodigious assemblage of vast buildings, extensive courts and magnificent gardens, and is shut up on all sides by a double wall, the intervening space whole length of Sicily. On this mount being occupied by houses belonging to the officers of the court, eunuchs, and St. Rosolia, who is said to have died

The exterior circumference of this immense palace is reckoned a league and a half. Although the Chinese architecture has no resemblance to that of Europe, the imperial palace of Pekin does not fail to strike beholders by its extent, gran-deur, and the regular disposition of its apartments, and by the singular struc-ture of its pavilion-roofs, ornamented at each corner with a carved plat band, the lower extremity of which is turned upwards; these roofs are covered with varnished tiles of so beautiful a yellow varnished tiles of so beautiful a yellow colour, that, at a distance, they make as splendid an appearance as if they were gilded. The temples, and the towers of this city, are so numerous, that it is difficult to count them. The that it is dimenit to count them. The country about it is sandy, and not very fruitful; yet provisions of all kinds are exceedingly plentiful, they being, as well as the merchandise, brought from other parts by canals cut from the rivers, and always crowded with vessels vers, and always crowded with vessels of different sizes. An carthquake, which happened here in 1731, buried above 100,000 persons in the ruins of the houses. The inhabitants of Pekin are estimated at 2,000,000. A Russian church is established here with a seminary in which the students are permisely. minary, in which the students are permitted to reside for the purpose of learning the Chinese language. Since this establishment, many interesting publications have appeared at Petersburgh, relative to the laws, history, and geography of China, translated from the originals published at Pekin. Pelew Islands, (The), were, in all probability, first discovered by the Spaniards of the Philippines, and by them called the Paloo Islands from the tall palm-trees that grow there in great numbers, and which at a distance have the appearance of masts of ships; the word palos, in the Spanish language, sometimes signifying a mast. There is every reason to suppose, that no Eu-ropean had ever been upon them, before the Antelope, a packet belonging to the East India company, and com-manded by captain Henry Wilson, was wrecked there in the night between the 9th and 10th of August 1783.— This misfortune was the more distress. ing to the crew, as they were utterly ig-norant what resources the islands afhorant what resources the islands ar-forded, or supposing them to be inha-bited, what might be the disposition of the inhabitants. However, they found these islands inhabited, and that the natives were simple in their manners, delicate in their sentiments, friendly in their disposition, and, in short, a people that do honour to the human The natives are of a deep copper colour, and go naked; and the as-tonishment which those, who first discovered the English, manifested on seeing their colour, plainly shewed, that they had never before seen a white man—The cloaths of the strangers also puzzled them exceedingly; for it seemed to be a matter of doubt with them, whether these and their bodies did not form one substance. When one of the crew, the captain's brother, was deputed to wait upon the king, who resided at an island at some distance from that whereon they had sav-ed their lives, he accidentally pulled off his hat, at which the gazing specta-tors were all struck with astonishment, as if they thought it had formed a part of his head. They had no idea of the nature of powder and shot, and were exceedingly amazed on seeing its effects. The principal arms of this people consist of bamboo darts, of five to eight feet long, pointed with the wood of the beetle-nut tree; but there are short ones for distant marks, which are thrown by means of a stick two feet and a little twine. With respect to property in these islands, a man's house, or canoc, is considered as his own, as is also the land allotted him, as long as he occupies and cultivates it; but, whenever he removes with his family to another place, the ground reverts to the king, who gives it to whom he pleases, or to those who solicit to cultivate it. The country is well covered with timber trees, the trunks of which furnish the natives with canoes, some large enough to carry 30 men. There are but few other trees of much use to the natives. Yams and cocoa-nuts being their chief articles of subsistence, are attended to with the utmost care. From the scanty produce of the country, it is plain no luxury can reign among the in-babitants in their diet, and the milk of the cocca-nut was their common drink. On particular occasions, they added to their ordinary fare certain sweetmeats and sweet drink, obtained by the aid of a syrup, extracted either from the palm-tree, or the sugar-cane. houses are raised about three feet from the ground, the foundation beams being laid on large stones, whence spring the upright supports of their sides, which are crossed by other timbers grooved together, and fastened by wooden pins, the intermediate space being closely filled up with bamboos and palm-tree leaves, platted together. The tops of the houses are thatched with bamboos and palm-trees; and the inside of the house is without any division, forming one great room. As to domestic implements, they have little haskets very nicely woven from slips of the plantain-tree, and wooden baskets with covers, neatly carved and inlaid with shells. Of the plantain leaf are formed mats, which serve the people as beds. They also use a plantain leaf at meals, instead of a plate, and the shell of a cocoa-nut supplies the place of a cup. There are vessels of a kind of earthen ware, of a reddish brown colour, in which they boil their fish, yams, &c. A bundle of cocoa-nut husks tied to gether, serves them for a broom; and gether, serves them for a proom; and thick bamboos, with bores five or six inches in diameter, are their buckets or cisterns.—Their hatchets are like those of the South Sea islands. They have also a few articles, which in these islands are the called hypries. The islands may be called luxuries. The shell of the tortoise there is remarkably beautiful, and the natives of Pelew have discovered the art of moulding it into little trays or dishes, and spoons. Some of the great ladies have also bracelets of the same manufacture, and ear rings inlaid with shells. The natives in general are a stout well made people, rather above the middling stature, and of a very deep cop-per colour, but black. The men are entirely naked; the women wear two little aprons, one before, the other be-Both men and women are tatooed, and their teeth made Black by art. Both sexes are very expert at swimming, and the men are such ad-mirable divers, that they will readily fetch up any thing from the bottom of the sea which attracts their notice. The conduct of these people towards the English was, from first to last, uniformly courteous and attentive, ac-companied with a politeness which surprised those who were the objects of it. Such an opinion had the king of the island entertained of the English, that on their departure he suffered his second son, Lee Boo, to accompa-ny them to England, where this hopefolly outh unhappily died of the small pox, in Dec. 1784. The East India Company erected a monument over his grave in Rotherbithe church yard where he was buried. These islands who confirms the account given of them and their inhabitants by captain Wilson. In his journal, captain McCleur says, "having pitched my tent in a bay opposite to the ship, I found my-self in a perfect paradise, and could have been happy to have continued here the remainder of my days." They are situated between 5 and 9 degrees of N lat. and 130 and 136 degrees of E lon. They are long, but narrow, well covered with wood, at least such of the islands as our people had an op-portunity of seeing. They are encir-cled on the west side by a reef of coral, of which no end could be seen from any eminence our people were on.

It lies in the province of Canterbury, and diocese of St. David's, and sends one member to parliament. The air of this county is esteemed very salubrious, and the soil is fertile, for here are but few mountains, and these, which are chiefly situated in the N E part of the county, yield good pasture for cattle and sheep; towards the seacoast, the land extends into rich meadows and corn fields. The country abounds with horned cattle, sheep, goats, and wild fowl of various kinds, some of which are seldom seen in any other part of Britain. These are migratory sea birds, that breed in the isle of Ramsey, and the adjoining rocks, called the Bishop and his Clerks. Thither yearly resort, about the beginning of April, such flocks of birds, of several sorts, as appear incredible to those who have not seen them.

the hills are very extensive valleys, yielding all manner of grain and fruit, and the weather temperate. The Andes are covered with snow the greatest part of the year, and consequently cold. The sea bordering on Peru is called the South Sea, but more properly the Pacific Ocean, the weather on this coast, from lat. 4 to 25 S being gene-rally serene. No rain falls in this tract unless within four or five degrees of the Equator, where they have it con-stantly when the sun is vertical, as is the case within this distance all over the globe. On the Cordillerss or high mountains, it rains or snows two thirds of the year. The vintage here is in the fair season, and vines thrive best in the valleys near the sea, where little or no the rivulets coming down from the hills, collected and turned into the fields and gardens; where they have this opportunity, they have ripe grapes when they please, and they make ex-cellent wines, which cannot be done in any other country between the tropics. The fiercest beasts of prey in Peru are the puma and jaquar, inaccurately called lions and tigers by the Europeans, but possessing neither the undaunted courage of the former, nor the ravenous cruelty of the latter; they are hardly formidable to man, and often turn their backs upon the least resistance. A quadruped called the lama, peculiar to this country, was tamed to domestic purposes by the ancient Peruvians. In form it bears some resemblance to a deer, and some to a camel, and is of a size somewhat larger than a sheep. Its wool furnished the Peruvians with clothing, its flesh with food. It was even employed as a beast of burden, and carried a moderate load with much patience and docility; but it was never used for draught. Among the birds, the most remarkable is the condor, which is entitled to pre-emicontor, which is entured to pre-em-nence over the flying tribe, in bulk, strength and courage. The river Guy-aquil abounds with slilgators, and the neighbouring country swarms almost as much with snakes and vipers as that round Porto Bello does with toads. Besides their fruit-trees, which have been transplanted hither from Europe, they have those of the Caribbee islands, streams from the hills turn. Between others peculiar to Peru. The tree most valued is that which furnishes them with quinquina, or Perovian bark, of the size of a cherry-tree, principally growing in the province of Quito, about 5° S of the Equator; it bears a long reddish flower, which turns to a pod, but the fruit is not of equal virtue with the back. Name the Fourier with the bark. Near the Equator grow cedars, cotton-trees, cocons, sugar canes, palms, and a great deal of good timber; but very few forest trees in other parts of Peru. But what the Spaniards value this country most for is he vast treasure of gold and silver they have drawn from thence for up-wards of 200 years, the mountain of Potosi alone, in 22 S lat. having yield-ed two thousand millions of pieces of eight the first 40 years the mines were wrought. When the Spaniarda landed in this country in 1530, they found it governed by sovereigns called Incas, who were revered by their subjects as divinities; and the inhabitants were found to be much more polished than the natives of other parts of America, those of Mexico excepted. These were soon subdued by a few Spaniards, under the command of Francis Plzarro. Peru is inhabited by the Spaniards, the native Americans, and a mixture arising from both, called Meatics. The native Americans, who live among the forests, form, as it were, so many small repub-lics, which are directed by a Spanish priest, and by their governor, assisted by the original natives, who serve as officers. They go naked, and paint their bodies with a red drug, called rocu. The same man is of all trades, for he builds his own hat, constructs his own canoe, and weaves his own cloth; but if a large house is to be boilt for common use, every one lends a helping hand. The natives who live at Quito seem to be of a different temper; for they are extremely idle, and so stupid, that they will sit whole days together upon their heels, without together upon their heels, without stirring or speaking. Their garment is a sort of sack, with holes to put their arms through; and this is given them by their masters as part of their wages. The Mestics, though illegitimate, have all the privileges of a Spania, d, and ure the persons who carry on all trades; for the Spaniards think it beneath them to meddle with any thing of this sort: they behave in a more tyrannical manasananas, guayavas, plantains, bananas, they behave in a more tyrannical man-melons, and water melons; besides her over the real Americans, than even

In the jurisdiction of the second, established in 1776, are the provinces of Plata, Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, Tucuman, Potosi, St. Cruz de la Sierra, and the towns of Mendoza and St. Juan. the government of the same name. It is scated on the Neva, near the gulf of Finland, and is built partly on some islands in the mouth of the river, and partly upon the continent. At the be-ginning of this century, the ground on which Petersburgh now stands was only a vast morass occupied by a few fishermen's huts. Peter the Great first began this city by the erection of a ci-tadel with six bastions, in 1703, he built also a small but for himself, and some wooden hovels. In 1710, count Golovkin built the first house of brick : and the next year, the emperor, with his own hands, laid the foundation of a house of the same materials. From these small beginnings rose the imperial city of Petersburgh; and, in less than nine years after the wooden hovels were erected, the seat of empire was transferred to it from Moscow. The streets, in general, are broad and spa-cious; and three of the principal ones, which meet in a point at the Admiralty, and reach to the extremities of the auburbs, are at least two miles in length; most of them are paved, but a few are still suffered to remain floored with planks. In several parts, wooden houses, scarcely superior to common cot-tages, are blended with the public build-ings. The brick houses are ornamented with a white stucco, which has led several travellers to say that they are built with stone. The mansions of the nobility are vast piles of buildings, furnished with great cost and in the same elegant style as at London. The Neva is, in many places, as broad as the pany, for whose accommonation there we as, in many places, as broad as the is a ball-room and many elegant Thames at London, deep, rapid, and houses. It is a little to the W of Buchances, and 34 miles N E of Aberdeen. Lon. 1 28 W, lat. 57 28 N.

Peterhoff, in Russia, is situated about 20 miles from Petersburg, and is dissipance, and the academy of arts, are

On the S side are the imperial palace, the Admiralty, the mansions of many Russian nobles, and the English line, so called, because (a few houses excepted) the whole row province of Samland, 24 miles E of (a few houses excepted) the whole row is occupied by English merchants. In the front of these buildings, on the S side, is the quay, which extends three miles, except where it is interrupted miles, except where it is interrupted by the Admiralty; and the Neva, du-ring the whole of that space, has been embarked at the expence of the late empress. by a wall, parapet, and pave-ment of hewn granite. Petersburgh, although it is more compact than the other Russian cities, and has the houses in many streets contiguous to each other; yet still bears a resemblance to the towns of this country, and is built in a very straggling manner. It was in 1783 inclosed within a rampart, the circumference of which is 14 miles. The in-habitants are computed to be 130,000. Petersburgh, from its low and marshy situation, is subject to inundations, which have occasionally risen so high as to threaten the town with a total submersion. These floods are chiefly occasioned by a west or south west wind, which, blowing directly from the gulf, obstructs the current of the Neva, and causes a vast accumulation of its waters. The opposite divisions of Petersburgh, situate on each side of the Neva, are connected by a bridge on pontoons, which, on account of the large masses of ice driven down the stream from the lake Ladoga, is usually removed when they first make their appearance; and, for a few days, till the river is frozen hard enough to bear carriages, there is no communication between the opposite parts of the town. Among the noblest ornaments of Petersburgh is an equestrian statue of Peter the Great, in bronze, of a colossal size; the pedestal of which is a huge rock, brought to the spot by the empress at an immense expence: by this contrivance the great legislator and civilizer of his country appears in the attitude of ascending a precipice, the summit of which he has nearly attained. It was erected with great solemnity by Catharine II. in 1782. Within he walls of the fortress is the cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which are deposited the remains of Peter the Great, and of the successive sovereigns, except Peter II. buried at Moscow.

Plymouth, a scaport in Devonshire, with a market on Monday, Thursday, and Saturday. It is seated between the mouths of the Plym and Tumar; and next to Portsmouth, is the most considerable harbour in England for men of war. There are, properly speaking, three harbours, called Catwater, Sutton Pool, and Hamouze. The first is the mouth of the Plym, and affords a safe and commodious harbour for merchant ships, but is seldom entered by ships of war. The second is frequented by merchant ships only, is almost sur-rounded by the houses of the town, and rounded by the houses of the town, and has lately been further secured by an extensive pier. The third is near the mouth of the Tamar, and is the harbour for the reception of the British navy, being fitted with moorings for about 100 sail, and having good anchorage for a much greater number. Adjoining to it, are docks, arsenals, and other conveniences for the building and fitting out of ships of war. These harbours are defended by a fort on St. Nicholas' Island, and by a citadel nearly opposite to that island, upon a hill snow.

The king of Prussia took pos-session of all the western parts of Po-merania, bounded on the S by the river of Dantzic and Thorn excepted. Of sian part is the largest, the Austrian the most populous, and the Prussian the most commercial. The population of the whole amounts to near 5,000,000 of souls; the first containing 1,600,000, the second 2,500,000, and the third 850,000. The three partitioning powers, moreover, forcibly effected a great change in the constitution. By this all foreign candidates for the elective throne of Poland are excluded; none can be chosen king of P dand, and great duke of Lithuania, in future, but a native Pole; the son or grandson of a king cannot be elected immediately upon the death of his father or grandfather, nor be eligible till after an interval of two reigns; and a permanent council is established, in which the executive power is vested. By this change, the house of Saxony, and all foreign princes, who might be likely to give weight to Poland by their hereditary dominions, are rendered incapable of filling the throne; the faintest prospect of an hereditary sovereignty is removed: the exorbitant privileges of the equestrian order are confirmed in their utmost latitude; and the prerogatives of the crown, before too greatly reduced, are still further diminished. In 1791, the king and the nation, in concurrence, almost unanimously, and without any foreign intervention, established another constitution. By this the evils of an elective monarchy, by which Poland, on almost every vacancy of the throne, had been involved in the calamities of war, were avoided, the throne being declared hereditary in the house of Sax-ony. The rights and privileges of all orders in the republic (the king, the nobles, the citizens, and the peasants), were alike equitably consulted. In a word, it was not, on the one hand, the haughty despot dictating a constitution to his people; nor, on the other, a proud

But the principal object for which the Re sian army emered Poland was not jet attained. The empress had planned, in conjunction with the king of Prussia, a second partition of this unhappy country, which actually took place in 1793; and in 1795, the act of partition and abdication was signed by the unfortunate Stanislans at Warsaw. By this the empress obtained nearly the remaining part of Lithuania, with the palatinates of Podolia, Kiof, and Bratzlaw. flesides the voj-wodships or provinces of Posen, Gnesen, Kalish, Siradia, Wielun, Lens-chitz, Cujavia, Doorzyn, Rawa, port of Plotsk, &c. with the city and monas-tery of Czentstokow (the Loretto of Poland), and its rich treasures, the king of Prussia obtained the great object of his wishes, the cities of Dantzic and Thorn. By the constitution of 1772, the Roman Catholic religion is declared the established; but although the Dissidents continue excluded from the diet, the senate, and the permanent council, they enjoy the free exercise of their religion; are permitted to have churches without bells, and schools and seminaries of their own. They are capable also of sitting in the inferior courts of justice; and in the tribunal appointed to receive appeals in matters of readmitted as assessors. In consequence of this toleration, the Dissidents have constructed churches in different parts of the kingdom, and the Lutherans, in particular, have built one at Warsaw. Various other causes might be mentioned; as the multi-tude of hospitals and convents; the inconceivable wealth which lies useless in these convents and in the churches; the inquisition, and the rigour of the papal government. Hence it is, that in no part of Europe are to be found people more wretched than the pope's temporal subjects. The pope, according to the ancient canon law, is the supreme, universal, and independent head of the church, and invested with sovereignty over all christian sovereigns, communities, and individuals. His arrogant pretensions are so well known, that it is needless to expatiate upon them. Happily, the Reformation begun by Luther dispelled the delusion in many parts of Europe; and the progress of learning, and the spirit of free inquiry, has enlightened many even of the Roman catholic countries, o's see, 240 miles NE of Quito. The women puncture or stain the chin with black, that comes to a point meach of their cheeks. Their canoes are of two sorts; the one large and open, the other small and covered. The framing consists of slender pieces of wood, and the outside is composed of the skins of scals, or other sea animals, stretched over the wood. Their weapons and implements for hunting and tishing, are the same as those used by the Greenlanders or Esquimaux. Many of their spears are headed with iron, and their arrows are generally pointed with bone. The food they were seen to cat was the fiesh of some animal, either roasted or broiled, and dried fish. Our knowledge of the animals of this part of the continent is entirely derived from the skins that were brought by the natives for sale. These were principally of bears, common and pine martens, sea otters, seals, racoons small ermines, foxes, and the whitish cat or lynx. The birds found here were the haleyon, or great king fisher, which had fine bright colours; the whiteheaded eagle, and the humming-bird. Pramide of Egipt, structures formerly counted one of the Seven Wonders of the World. They are built upon a rock, at the foot of the high mountains which accompany the Nile in its course, and aeparate Egypt from Lybia. Various have been the conjectures how and when they were built, yet no two authors agree exactly about them; however, this is certain that they are extremely ancient, and that there is no gle comprehending 2079 feet, and the account, in any author of credit, when perimeter of the basis 2772 feet. or for what reason they were founded: Whence the whole area of the base con-

The plain they stand on is a continual rock, almost covered with a moving sand, in which are great numbers of shells and petrified oysters: a thing the more surprising, as the Nile never rises high enough to overflow this plain; nor are there any shell-fish in that river. The most northern of these great pyramids is the only one that is open; and those who enter it, and clamber up to a sort of room, find at omb, or sarcophagus. The external part is chiefly built of great square stones, of an equal size; but have all the figure of a prism; that they may adhere to each other the closer; for they have neither lime, nor cramps of any metal. The country is diversified with plains and mountains, and the land is so fertile, that it produces two crops every year. Trade and the fecundity of the soil supply this province with every thing that can contribute to the pleasures of life: it furnishes gold, precious stones, silk, pearls, eagle-wood, tin, quicksilver, sugar, copper, iron, steel, saltpetre, ebony, and abun-dance of aromatic woods, which are in great request. All the coasts abound with fish, and furnish great quantities of oysters, crabs and tortoises of an immense size; of their shells the Chinese make several pretty toys. A prodigious number of tame ducks are raised in this province; the particular care and industry employed by the Chinese in breeding them, have multiplied them here exceedingly They load a great number of small barks with them, and carry them in flocks to feed on the sea shore, where at low-water these fowls find shrimps, oysters and other kinds of shell-fish. These small fleets generally go in company, and the ducks soon mix together on the shore; but when night approaches, they are collected together by only heating on a hason: they immediately form themselves into different flocks, and each returns to the vessel it belongs to. Although the climate of this province is warm, the air is pure, and the people are robust and healthy They are very industrious; and it must be allowed, that they possess, in an eminent degree, the talent of imitation: if they are only shewn any of our European works, they execute others like them with the most surprising exactthem with the most surprising exactncess. Rome, a very ancient city, formerly the Roman empire, lately the residence of the pope, head of the Roman church ; none can compare with it in respect to the magnificence of its buildings and antiquities, the snumber of its monuments and curiosities, and the singularity of its historical events. Before it was plundered by the French in 1799, it was the centre and magazine of all it was the centre and magazine of all that is exquisite in painting, sculpture, and architecture. It was founded, according to some, 753 years before the birth of Christ, by Romulus the first king. Its form and site have frequently been changed, particularly after the seven principal devastations of it by the ancient Gauls, Vandals, Heruis, East and West Goths, and by the Ger-mans under Charles of Bourbon in 1527, when it was taken and miserably sacked, and the pope being closely besieged in the castle of St. Angelo, was obliged to submit to the conqueror. At present it stands upon 12 hills, but great part of them being washed down in the valleys, the Tarpeian rock, once a terrible precipice, from which malefactors were thrown, is now no more than 20 feet high. The city is surrounded with a wall about 10 Italian miles in circuit; but not half of this space is occupied by houses, as many places where state-ly structures once stood, are now gar-dens, fields, meadows, and vineyards. According to an account taken by pope Clement XI. in 1714, the number of its inhabitants amounted to 143,000, and are at present computed to amount to 170,000. palaces, of which there are several in palaces, of which there are several in this street, range in a line with the houses, having no courts before them. The Strada Felice, and the Strada di Porta Fig., are also very long and noble streets. There are no lamps lighted in the streets at night: and all Rome would be in utter darkness, were it not for the candles which the devotion of individuals sometimes places before the statues of the Virgin: these appear glimmering, at vast intervals, like stars in a cloudy night. The footmen carry dark lanterns behind the carriages of dark lanterns behind the carriages of people of the first distinction. This darkness, it may be supposed, is not unfavorable to assignations among the inferior people 1 and when a carriage with a lantern behind it, accidentally comes near a couple who do not wish to be known, one of them calls out, solid lanterns that the lanterns are the lanterns are the lanterns are the lanterns. volti la lanterna, turn the lantern : and is immediately obeyed. Rome exhibita is immediately obeyed. Rome exhibita a strange mixture of magnificent and interesting, and of common and beggarly objects: the former consists of palaces, clurches, fountains, and the remains of antiquity; the latter comprehend all the rest of the city. The church of St. Peter, in the opinion of many, surpasses, in size and magnificence, the finest monuments of ancient architecture. It is increased without architecture. It is incrusted without with marble; its length is 730 feet, the breadth 520, and the height from the pavement to the top of the cross, which crowns the cupola, 450. A complete description of this church, and of its statues, basso-relievos, columns, and its statues, basso-renevos, columns, and various ether ornaments, would fill volumes. Adjoining to St. Peter's is the Vatican, or winter palace of the pope, with the richest library of the choicest books and manuscripts in the world. The Vatican consists of several thousand rooms and other parts, of the most adjusted as its great library and the prost adjusted as its great and the prost adjusted as its great and the second series and the second series are series. which the most admired are its grand Rome was in Trajan's time, when the staircase, and a charming garden, caled by way of eminence Relvidere, havcuit, and the number of its inhabitants

Its height is 150 feet, and its breadth nearly the same. There are no windows; the central opening in the dome admitting a sufficiency of light. The rain which falls through this aperture, immediately drains through holes, which perforate a large piece of porphyry, that forms the centre of the pavement. Being converced into a christian temple, the Pantheon, originally erected to the honour of all the gods, is now dedicated to the Virgin, and to all the martyrs and saints. As the Pantheon is the most entire, the Amphitheatre of Yespasisn is be most stupendous monument of antiquity in Rome. About one half of the external circuit still remains; which a pretty exact idea may be formed of the original structure. By a computation of Mr. Byres, it could contain 85,000 spectators. The Campidoglas is an elegant structure, rais en part of the ruins of the ancient ca-pitol. But the antiquities of Rome are too numerous to be minutely described. 36 N. It is the most considerable place in Holland, for size, beauty of its buildings and trade, next to Amsterdam. It is a large and populous city, of a triangular figure, bandsomely built of brick, the streets wide and well paved. Its port is very commodious; for the canals which run through most parts of the town, bring the ships some of 200 or 300 tons, up to the merchant's done; a conveniency for loading and un-loading which is not to be found in other places. The great ships go up into the middle of the town by the canal into which the Macse enters by the old head, as it comes out by the new. A stranger upon his first entering this place, is astonished at the beau-tiful confusion of chimneys intermixed with tops of trees with which the ca-nuls are planted, and streamers of vessels; insomuch that he can hardly tell whether it be fleet, city, or forest. This port is much more frequented by the British merchants than Amsterdam, insomuch that, after a frost, when the sea is open, sometimes 300 sail of British vessels sail out of the harbour at once. There is always a large number of British subjects who reside in this town, and live much in the same manner as in Great Britain. The reason of the great traffic between this place and England, is because the ships can generally load and unload, and return to England from Rotter-dam, before a ship can get clear from Amsterdam, and the Texel. Mussia, a large empire, partly in Asia, partly in Europe; bounded on the y the Frozen Ocean; on the S by at Tartary, the Caspian Sea, and sia; on the E by the sea of Japan; on the W by Sweden, Poland, and Black, Sea. There were three thirds the sea of Mussian States. ntries that had the name of Russia:

namely, Red Russia, which see; White Russia, which comprehends Lithuania; and Black Russia, which comprehends the governments of Kaluga, Moscow, Tula, Rezan, Volodimir, and Yaroslaf; and hence his imperial majesty takes the title of emperor of all the Russias. This empire, exclusive of the late acquisitions from the Turks and from Po-land, (see Poland) may be compared to a square, whose sides are 2000 miles each. Russia occupies more than a seventh part of the known continent, and nearly the 26th part of the whole globe. Its greatest extent from W to E, viz. from the 39th to the 207 degree of lon, is 168 degrees; and if the islands of the Eastern Ocean be included, it will then be 185. Its greatest extent from N to S, that is, from the 78th to the 50 deg. of lat. is 27 degrees. The greater part of at is 27 degrees. The greater part of this empire lies in the temperate zone, and a part of it, viz. that which is be-yond the 66th deg. of lat. lies in the frigid zone, and the whole surface con-tains above 2,150,000 square versts, There therefore is not at present, and There therefore is not at present, and never has been in any period, an empire, the extent of which could be compared to that of Russia. The seas of Russia are, the Baltic, the White Sea, the Frozen Ocean, the Black Sea, and the Caspian Sea. There are also five large rivers; namely, the Dnieper, Volga, Don, Dwina, and Oby. Its lakes are Ladoga, the largest in Europe, Onega, Tchude-Ilmen, Bielo, Ozero, Allin, Baical, and many others of less. Allin, Baical, and many others of less consequence, most of them abounding in fish. A country of such vast extent must lie in different climates, and the soil and products must be as different. The most fertile part is near the frontiers of Poland; insomuch that the in-habitants are able to supply their neigh-bours with corn; the N part is not only more cold, but very marshy, and over-run with forests, inhabited chiefly by wild beasts. Besides domestic animals, wild beasts. Besides demestic animals, there are wild beeves, reindeer, martins, white and black foxes, wessels, ermines, and sables, whose skina make the beat furs in the world, as also hyenas. This vast empire was dividcountries. This vast empire was divided by the late empress into 41 governments; namely, Petersburgh, Olonetz, Wiburg, Revel, Riga, Pskof, Novogorod, Tver, Smolensko, Polotsk, Mohilef, Orel, Kaluga, Moscow, Tula, Rezan, Volodimir, Yaroslaf, Vologda, Archangel, Kostroma, Nishnei-Novogorod, Rasan, Simbirsk, Penza, Tambof, Voronetz, Kursk, Novogorod-Severskoi, Tebernigof, Kiof, Kahrkof, Catharinenslaf Caucasus, Saratof, Usa, Viatka, Perm, Tobolsk, Kolyvan, and Catharinensiaf Caucasus, Saratof, Usa, Viatka, Perm, Tobolsk, Kolyvan, and Irkutzk; all which see. The inhabitants in general, are robust, well-shaped, and of pretty good complexion. They are great eaters, and very fond of brandy They use bathing, but smoke no tobacco, lest the smoke should dishonour the images of the saints, which they have in great veneration; however, they take a great deal of snuff which they have in great veneration; however, they take a great deal of smiff made of the tobacco brought from the Ukraine. They were formerly the most ignorant, brutish people in the world, and many of them are now little better. Formerly no Russians were seen in other countries, and they seldom or never sent ambassadors to foreign courts; but now the gentlemen are mos polite, and study the interests of different nations. Their armies are always very numerous. They had no men of war, nor merchant ships before the reign of Peter the Great; but, in the late reign, powerful Russian squadrons appeared, not only in the Baltic, but in the Black Sea, and in the Mediterraneam. They have images in their churches; and believe no man sure of salvation in this life, for which reason the pairest date and present to those that of war, nor merchant ships before the salvation in this life, for which reason the priests give a passport to those that are dying, addressed to St. Nicholas, who is desired to entreat St. Peter to open the gates of Heaven, as they have certified that the bearer is a good chris-tian. The church is governed by a paenas. Those that hunt these creatures open the gates of Heaven, as they have for their skins, use no fire-arms, for certified that the bearer is a good christiant fear of spoiling them the seas, the lakes, and the rivers, supply the inhabitants with large quantities of fish, bitants with large quantities of fish, part of which they dry. They Great undertook to introduce the arts and sciences; and, in 1724, the first although subject to great exactions university was founded that ever was in Russia; there is also an academy of Russia; there is also an academy of much more secure of their property sciences at Petersburgh, supplied with the peasants belonging to individuals, who are the private property of the some of the best professors in Europe. With respect to dress the merchants and commonalty still retain their beards, and regard them with the utmost veneration, not willtstanding the edicts of Peter I. and it is only those depending upon government, in the army and na vy, who have yet complied with the custom and the wish of the court, as no person in any place can retain their beards and ancient dress. The clergy only excepted, none can procure any place, or favour from court, upon other conditions than banishing the Asiatic sheep-skin robes. The worn-out veteran retires with a pension, upon the express terms of never again assuming the habit of his fathers. But so zealously attached are the multitude to forously attached are the minitude to for-mer manners, and so honourably do they esteem them, that a Russian dressed in his beard and gown, tells you by his looks, that he has not prostituted the memory of his ancestors. The inhabitants in general may be dirided into four orders. 1. The nobles and gentry; 2. The clergy; 3. The merchants, burghers and other freemen; 4. Peasants. The three first include the free subjects of the empire, and the latter, the vassals or slaves. The first comprehends the nobles or staves. The first comprehends the nobles or gentry, who are the sole persons that have a right to possess land in Russia, (the conquered provinces excepted) and who are obliged to furnish recruits in proportion to the extent of their es-The second are divided into regular and secular, the latter, who may, and ought to be the most useful members of society, are generally the re-fuse of the people. The dignitaries of the church are chosen from the first; these are archbishops, and hishops, abbots and priors. The third comprehends that class of men between the nobles and the peasants, who being neither gentlemen nor peasants, follow the arts and sciences, navigation, com-merce, or exercise trades. The fourth comprehends the peasants, who are slaves, and may be divided into peasants of the crown, peasants belonging to individuals. The former inhabit the imperial demesnes, and may form the

who are the private property of the land-holders, as much as implements of agriculture, or herds of cattle; and the value of an estate is estimated as in Poland, by the number of boors, not by the number of acres. The Russian peasants are in general a large coarse hardy race, and of great bodily strength. Their dress is a round hat or cap with a very high crown, a coarse robe of a very high crown, a coarse robe of drugget, (or in the winter, of sheep-skin with the wool turned inwards) reaching below the knee, and bound round their waist by a sash, trowsers of linen, almost as thick as sack-cloth, a woollen or flannel cloth wrapped round the leg instead of stockings; sandals woven from strips of a pliant bark, and fastened by strings of the same materials, which are afterwards twined round the leg, and serve as garters to the woollen or flannel wrappers. In warm weather the pessants garters to the woomen or named wrap-pers. In warm weather the peasants frequently wear only a short coarse shirt and trowsers. The dress of the women is the reverse of the men, both women is the reverse of the men, both in fashion and colour; every part, of it being as short and tight as decency will allow, and very gaudy. It is exactly the same with that of the Highland women in Scotland; both have the short jacket, the striped petticoat, and the tartan plaid; and both too, in general, have a napkin rolled about general, have a napkin rolled about their head The Russian women are, however, far more elegant and rich in their attire; nor is gold lace and paint wanting to set off their charms. The young generation are modernizing these young generation are moderning these antic vestments; the stiff embroidered napkin is supplanted by one of flowing silk, the jacket and petticoat are of muslin, or other fine stuffs; and the plaid is exchanged for a silk or satin cloak, in the cold season lined with fur. The better class of females wear velvet boots. The dress of the higher ranks is after the French and English fashion; is after the French and English fashion; and all wear a covering of fur, six months of the year. In 1778, her navy consisted of 28 ships of the line, 15 frigates, and 109 galleys. Perhaps no country ever exhibited, in so short a time, the wonders that may be effected by the genius and exertions of one man. Much has been written concerning the great civilization which Peter I. introduced into this country; that he oblig-ed them to relinquish their beards and their national dress; that he naturalized the arts and sciences; that he disciplined his army, and created a navy; and that he made a total change throughout each part of his extensive throughout each part of his extensive Hexham.

We may readily allow the truth of this eulogium with respect to his improvements in the discipline of this army, and the creation of a navy, for these were objects within the reach of the persevering genius of a despotic sovereign; but the pompous accounts of the total change which he effected in the national manners, seem to have been the mere echoes of foreigners, who have never visited the country.

Samoyedes, once a numerous and powerful nation of Tartary. They inhabit the coasts of the Frozen Sea, from the 65 degree of N lat. to the sea shore. The countries they occupy are marshy and full of rocks, so that from the 67 degree of lat, there are no trees of any kind; and the cold that preva s in these climates prevents vegetation to such a point, that even the little brush wood, here and there to be seen, dwindies away to nothing as you advance to-wards the north. In stature the Samovedes are scarcely of a middling height; it being rare to meet with a man of more than five feet, though it must at the same time be confessed, that the shortest, who are about four feet, are equally scarce. They seem all of a heap; have short legs, small neck, a large head, flat nose and face, with the lower part of the face project-ing outwards; they have large mouths and ears, little black eyes, but wide eyelids, small lips, and little feet. Their winter huts are made half way in the ground, like those of the Ostiaks, and are seldom more than two or three by the side of one another. Poles plaseed so as to lean against zach other, and covered with the skins of rein deers, or hark of birch, make the whole of their composition. In summer they travel from lake to lake for the purpose of fishing; and wherever they stop for a time, there they build temporay hovels upon the ground. Hunting, fishing, and tending their rein-deer, make the whole of their employment. The two former are the common business of all, as furnishing them with the principal part of their subsistence. Sandwich Islands, a group of islands in the S Sea, among the last discoveries of captain Cook, who so named them, in honour of the earl of Sandwich, under whose administration these discoveries were made. They consist of eleven islands, extending in lat. from 18 54 to 22 15 N. and in lon. from 150 54 to 160 24 W. They are called by the natives, Owhyhee, Mo-wee, Ranai, Morotoi, Tahoorowa, Woahoo, Atooi, Nechceheow, Oreehoua, Moretinne, and Tahoora, all inhabited excepting the two last. An account of all the inhabited islands will bility of look that render them very enhe found in their proper places in this are no traces of those violent winds and hurricanes which render the stormy months in the West Indies so dreadful. There is also more rain at the Sandwich Isles, where the mountainous parts being generally enveloped in a cloud, successive showers full in the inland parts, with line weather, and a clear sky, on the sea shore. Hence it is, that few of those inconveniencies, to which many tropical countries are subject, either from heat or moisture, are experienced here. The winds, in the winter months, are generally from ESE to NE. The vegetable produc-tions are nearly the same as those of the other islands in this ocean; but the turo root is here of a superior quality. The bread-fruit trees thrive not in such abundance as in the rich plains of Otaheite, but produce double the quantity of fruit. The sugar-canes are of a very unusual size, some of them measuring eleven inches and a quarter in circumference, and having 14 feet eatable. There is also a root of a brown colour, shaped like a yam, and from six to ten pounds in weight, the juice of which is very sweet, of a pleasant taste, and is an excellent substi-tute for sugar. The quadrupeds sre confined to the three usual sorts, logs, dogs, and rats. The fowls are also of the common sort; and the birds are beautiful and numerous, though not various. Goats, pigs, and European seeds, were left by captain Cook; but the possession of the gnats soon gave rise to a contest between two districts, in which the breed was entirely destroyed. The inhabitants are undoubtedly of the same race that possesses the islands south of the equator; und in their persons, language, customs, and manners, approach nearer to the New Zealanders, than to their less distant neighbours, either of the Society or Friendly islands. Scilly, a cluster of islands and rocks, lying almost 10 leagues W of the Land's End, in Cornwall, and are easily discerned from it. Of these only five or six are inhabited. They are supposed formerly to have produced much tin, but are now chiefly known as a resort for seafowl, and a place of shelter for ships in bad weather. The inhabitants principally subsist by fishing, burning kelp, and acting as pilots. The chief of the islands is St. Mary's, which has a good port, is the best cultivated, and contains more inhabitants than all the rest put together. In this island, and in two or three others, are various antiquities, particularly the remains of a temple of the Druids, and ancient sepulchres; but the greatest ornament is the lighthouse, which, with the gallery, is 51 feet high, and is a very fine column. Scilly, a group of Islands in the South Pacific Ocean, discovered by captain Walls in 1767. Lon. 155 30 W, lat-16 28 S.

It is 32 miles long, and 15 broad, and a mountainous country; yet fruits of various kinds grow in the fields, such as oranges, citrons, o'ives, mulberries, pomegranates, interspersed with myrtles and jasmines. The wine of Scio, so celebrated by the ancients, is still in great esteem; but the island is now principally distinguished by the profitable culture of the mastich; it has also some trade in silk, wool, cheese, and figs. The women are better bred than in other parts of the Levant, and their dress is odd, but very neat. They have tame partridges which they send every day into the fields to feed, and in the evening call back with a whistle. It is computed that there are 10,000 Turks, 10,000 Greeks, and 10,000 Latins, on this island. The Turks became masters of it in 1566.

Scio, a scaport, the capital of an island of the same name, and a bishop's sec. It is the best built town in the Archipelago; the houses being commodious, some of them terraced, and others covered with tiles. The castle is an old citadel built by the Genoese, in which the Turks, have a garrison of 1400 men. The harbour is a rendezvous for ships that go to or come from the Constantinople; it will cont in 80 vessels, and is protected by a low mole and two lighthouses. It is seated on the E side of the island, 47 miles W of Smyrna, and 210 S W of Constantinople.

Scipio, a military township in Cayugacounty, New York; situated on the E side of Cayuga lake, where is a post office 13 miles N W of Milton, 30 miles W of Marcellus, 30 miles W of Tully, and in the neighbourhood of Pompey, Sempronius, and many other townships designated by great names of antiquity.

Scituate, a post town in Plymonti-county, Massachusetts; eight miles N by W of Marshfield, and 28 S E of Boston, with 2728 inhabitants.

miles long and eight broad, and a mountainous country, but has no mines. The vines make the beauty of the island. and the wine is excellent; nor do the natives want wood. It contains only the village and convent of St. George, both built on a conical rock, 10 miles from the harbour of St. George. The superior of the convent exercises despotic sway over the inhabitants, whose superstition is more excessive than that of the other Greeks in the Archipela-go. The inhabitants are all Greeks, but the Cadi is a Turk.

Skenectady, the capital of Skenectady county, New York; lying on the S side of Mohock river, 16 miles N W of Albany, and the same distance S of Ballstown. This, though comparatively an ancient towa, and planted on navigable water in the bosom of a fertile country, has but about 3000 inhabitants, the descendants of early Datch emigrants. Many of the dwelling houses are built in the old Dutch style.

Sclavona, a country of Europe, be-tween the rivers Save, Drave, and Da-nube. It is divided into six counties, and belongs to the house of Austria it was formerly a kingdom, and is not above 75 miles in breadth; but it is 300 in length, from the frontiers of Austria to Belgrade. The eastern part is called Ratzia, and the inhabitants Rascians. These form a particular nation, and are of the Greek church. The language of Sclavonia is the mother of Bohemia, Poland, and Russia.

Scone, or Schoone, a village in Perthshire, on the E side of the river Tay, N by W of Perth. Here is the ancient royal palace (now a scat of the earl of Mansfield) and the celebrated stone chair, now in Westminster abbey, in which the kings of Scotland were crowned. It is 30 miles Not Edinburgh.

Scopelo, an island of the Archipela-go, five miles E of Sciati, and 17 N of Negropont. It lies at the entrance of the gulf of Salomchi, and is ten miles long and five broad. It is very fertile, produces plenty of good wine, and contains 12,000 inhabitants, who are alnost all Greeks

To Scotland also apportain the Hebrides, or Wentern Islands, the Orkney, and Shetland Islands, and many others amounting in tant from the shore. This country may be divided into three parts, viz. the N, the Middle, and the South divisions. The boundaries of these are strongly marked by the hand of nature. The first is cut off by a chain of lakes which cross the island in an oblique direction from N E to S W stretching from Inverness to the isle of Mull. The se-cond, or middle division, is separated from the southern by the hollow tract between the Forth and the Chide, through which the great Canal is carried. The face of the country, in the northern division, exhibits, in general, little else than an assemblage of vast dreary mountains. On the northern and castern shores of this division, however, there are many vales and level tracts of considerable fertility. The middle division contains many great ranges of mountains, which traverse this part of the island in various directions. The most southerly ridge, called the Grampian Hills, extends from Aberdeenshire in a S W direction, ter-minating in the Great mountain Benlamond, in Stirlingshire. In this division too, cultivation and improvement are chiefly found on the eastern coast: and one of the finest tracts in Scotland, perhaps is the great vale called Strath-more, stretching along the southern base of the Grampian Mountains. In both these divisions, however, which comprehend more than two thirds of Scotland, the arable ground bears but a small proportion to the mountainous regions, of which the sterility will ever,

of the middle, and in the whole southresemblance to England; and the proportion of cultivated ground is very considerable. The rivers in Scotland are in general rapid, and remarkably transparent. In so narrow a country, indeed, we cannot expect to find rivers equal of the Rhine or the Danube; but, when their rapidity and the shortness of their course are kept in view, we must allow that the Scottish streams are by no means inconsiderable : half all to 300. After these, we may notice the Esk, the Annan, the Nith, and the Southern Dee, which, with several other fine streams, fall into the Sol-way Frith. The lakes of this country are numerous, and some of them very extensive. Any attempt to describe, or even to enumerate these, in this place, would greatly exceed our limits. The climate of Scotland is various in different places. The northern extremity, which is on the same parallel of lat. with some parts of Norway, is very cold: but the frosts are much less intense here than in any part of the continent equally far N, an advantage arising from an insular situation. whole W coast is subjected to frequent summer rains, and sudden changes in the atmosphere, equally unfavourable to the ripening and gathering in of the products of the earth. considerable, but lime-stone, shell-sand, and marl, those rich manures, are found in great plenty in different places. Even the rocky shores produce abun-dance of kelp, an article of considera-ble importance in several manufactures. The fisheries in the surrounding seas have long been esteemed an object of national importance; and when increasing commerce shall enable the inhabitants to form roads, erect towns, and open canals, in those remote parts of the country, these fisheries may be come a real source of wealth to the na-tion. The products of Scotland, in general, however, are multifarious and valuable. It feeds vast herds of eattle, and its hills are covered with sheep; it produces much grain and flax; its woods of oak and fir might furnish masts and timber for the use of the British navy; its mines are rich in coal, lead, and iron; freestone, lime stone, and slate are found in abundance ; neither Greece nor Italy can boast a greater store of beautiful marble; fine rock crystals, pearls, and variegated pebbles, are not uncommon; and its rivers and lakes are richly stored with salmon and trout, and a variety of other fishes. The Scottish mountains, in former times, were infested by the welf and the bear; hut happily those ferocious animals have long been extirpated. The wild ox was also an inhabitant of the Caledonian forest: herds of wild roes, to this day, range at large in the northern mountains; and the stag is often seen in the woods. There, too, the beautiful bird called capercailzie, or cock of the wood, is sometimes found. The lofty summits are the haunt of the ptarmigan and the Alpine hare and black game, and grouse swarm among the heath, and often become the prey of the eagle and the falcon. Among the wild animals which Scotland possesses wild animals which Scotland possesses in common with England, are the fox, the badger, the otter, the hedgehogs, the hare and rabbit; the weazle, the mole, and other small quadrupeds; the partridge, the quail, the snipe, the plover, and many other birds. The cattle and sheep are small, but much valued for the delicacy of their flesh; and the fleece of the Scottish sheep often emulates the finest Spanish wool. Even the shepherd's dog peculiar to Scotland, so hardy, docile, and sagacious, is not of it, nor is the passage so extremely

The produce of the soil in the northern unworthy of mention. Though the est-parts of Scotland and its isles is not the in the high grounds be dominutive, yet in many parts of the country the horses and cows are not inferior in size and beauty to those of the English breed. Scotland is divided into 33 counties; namely, Shetland and Orkney, Bute, Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, Cromarty, Naime, Inverness, Marray, Banff, Aberdeen, Kincardine, Angus, Perth, Fife, Kinross, Clackmannan, Stirling, Dumbarton, Argyle, Renirew, Arr, Wigton, Krikeudbright, Dum-fries, Roxburgh, Schiek, P. chles, Lanerk, Linlithgow, Edinburgh, Haddington, and Berwick. These send one dington, and Berwick. These sent one member each to parliament, except Bute, and Cathness, Cronarty and Narne, Kinross and Clackmannan, which send members in conjunction; so that the counties send 30 members, which, with 15 sent by the boroughs, make the 45 members sent by Scotland. The established religion is the Presby-terian. The trade and population of great towns have considerably increas-ed of late. Some districts, however, on the western shores, especially, have been greatly thinned by emigration; the spirit of which, however, is now happily subsided.

Scharanpour, a town of Hindoostan Proper, capital of a district of the same name, between the Johnna and the Ganges, in the country of Delhi. It is 86 miles N of Delhi. Lon. 77 15 E, lat. 30 4 N.

Seiks, or Sicques, the most western, and a very poverful nation of Hindoostan; they do not form one entire state; but a number of small ones, independent of each other, in their internal government, and only connected by a fedor Moultan, and the W part of Delhi: the dimensions of which tract are about 400 miles from N W to S E; and from 150 to 200 broad, in general : although the part between Attock and Bebker cannot be less than 320 miles in extent. We know but little concerning the state of their government and politics; but the former is represented as being mild. In their mode of making war they are unquestionably savage and cruel. Their army consists almost entirely of horse, of which they are said to be able to bring at least 100,000 into the field. The founder of their sect was named Nanock, and lived in the beginning of the 16th century. They are the des-cendants of his disciples: the word sciks in the Sanscrit language signifying disciples. The forces of this nation are very numerous, a Sicque will confidently say, that his country can furnish 300,000 cavalry; but if we admit that the Sicques when united can bring 200,000 horse into the field, their force in cavalry is greater than that of any other state in Hindoostan. The civil and military government of the Seiks, before a common interest had reased to actuate its operations, was conduct.

tant affairs; such as declaring war or peace, forming alliances, or settling the necessary contributions; but since their dominions have been so widely extended, the grand assembly is now rarely summoned. The Sicques are in general strong and well made; accustomed from their infancy to the most laborious life, and hardest fare, they make marches, and undergo fatigues that really appear astonishing. They have really appear astonishing. They have commonly two, some of them three horses each, of the middle size, strong, active, and mild tempered. Though they make merry on the demise of any of their brethren, they mourn for the death of a horse: thus shewing their love of an animal so necessary to them in their professional capacity. Their dress is extremely scanty: a pair of long blue drawers, and a kind of checkered plaid, a part of which is fasten-ed round the waist, and the other thrown over the shoulder, with a mean turban, form their clothing and equi-page. The chiefs are distinguished by wearing some heavy gold bracelets on their wrists, and sometimes a chain of the same metal bound round their turbans, and by being mounted on better horses: ntherwise, no distinction appears amongst them. The cliefs are numerous, some of whom have the command of 10 or 12 thousand cavalry; but this power is confined to a small number, the inferior officers maintaining from 1 to 2000, and many not more than 20 or 30 horses; a certain quota of which is furnished by the chief, the greater part being the individual pro-perty of the horsemen. The Seiks are now become one of the most powerful states in Hindoostan. Their capital is Lahore.

Seine, a river of France, which rises in the department of Cote d'Or, and late province of Burgundy, and flowing by Troyes, Melun, Paris, and Rouen, falls into the English Channel, at Havre de Grace.

Others, however, confine the country between Cape Verga and Cape Tagrin. In the open and plain parts, on the banks of a river of the same name, the heat of the sun before any breeze arises, is almost intolerable; but as a refreshing gale constantly springs up about noon, it renders the country supportable. The whole tract, on each side the river, is rich in rice and millet, which is the chief sustenance of the inhabitants; and upon the whole it is one of the best countries on the coast. In 1791, an act of Parliament was obtained, incorporating a company called the Sierra Leone Company, for the purpose of cultivating West India, and other tropical produc-tions on the banks of this river. The first settlers amounted to 200 white persons, hesides a number of free blacks from Nova Scotia. The natives appeared to be extremely friendly, and a few, in 1792, had come to work for the colony. On the setting in of the rains, about the latter end of May, the same year, a considerable degree of sickness and mortality prevailed, occasioned chiefly by the insufficiency of the temporary habitations, which could not be completed before the rains set in. Thirty-five white persons (of whom fourteen were soldiers) and many of the blacks died of this sickness. The next year the setting in of the rains was not productive of the same effects. The colonists were in good health, were all put into possession of small lots of land, and a new town, on a regular and extended scale, was begon to be built. Besides the Nova Scotia blacks, a large party of the natives were at work for the company, and the experiments in sugar, cotton, &c. appeared, to be promising. The native chiefs and people appeared to be extremely friendly, and the Company's schools were regularly attended by 300 children, among whom were some children of the natives. But this chee; ful seens was soon overcast, and this beau-tiful and prosperous colony overwhelm-ed with ruin. In Sept. 1794, a French

They killed all the cattle and animals they found in the fields or streets, yards, or elsewhere, not spar-ing even asses, dogs, and cats. These proceedings they continued the whole succeeding week, till they had entire-ly ruined this beautiful and prospering colony; and when they found nothing more worth plundering, they set fire to the public buildings and all the houses belonging to the Europeans.

There is a long pean Turkey, in Bulgaria, with a citation of the Companies of the cliain of mountains, which separate Si-lesia from Bohemia, one half belonging to the one, and the other to the other, and they have their particular names. On the top of the mountain of giants, is a famous spring frequented by a great number of people, partly out of devo-tion, and partly to drink the waters. There were mines of gold, silver, and other metals; but they have not been worked for many years. There are also some precious stones, but too much time is required to procure them. The highest mountain of Silesia is called Zotenberg, situated in the principality of Schweidnitz, and is 104 miles in circumference. The most considerable silver-mines at present, are at Reitstein, in the principality of Breig. There are also mines of lead, copper, and iron, and quarries of various stones; besides antimony, salt-petre, sulphur, alum, vitriol, quick-silver, sealed earth, and other minerals. The principal manufactory is linen-cloth, and they have also some woollen manufactories, and glass-houses. They feed a great number of cattle, have large studs of horses, and plenty of game in the woods. They have but few lynxes and woods. They have but few lynxes and bears, and fewer wolves, because they give a ducat a head for every one that is killed. They have a great many lakes full of pikes, carps, and other good fish; also plenty of beea, which produce a great deal of honey and wax. They have wheat, barley, oats, millet-seed, and turnips, sufficient for the use of the inhabitants; and in some blees they cultivate asffron, but their places they cultivate saffron; but their wine is very bad, and therefore they turn it mostly into vinegar. Silesia is divided into the Upper and the Lower. In the Upper, the inhabitants are generadly Roman-Catholics, speaking the Polish language, and in the Lower, almost all Protestants, and speak their mother-tongue. Silesia is divided into 17 small dutchies, and 7 free states, without country of without comprehending the county of Glatz. These are taken notice of in their proper places. Sind, or Scind, a province of Hindoostan Proper, bounded on the W by Persia, on the N by the territories of the king of Candahar, on the N E by those of the Seiks, on the E by a sandy desert, and on the SE by Cutch. It extends along the course of the Indus, from its mouth, to the frontiers of Moultan, 300 miles; and its breadth, in the widest part, is 160. In many particulars of soil and climate, and the general appearance of its surface, it re-sembles Egypt; the lower part being composed of rich vegetable mould, and extended into a wide delta; while the upper part is a narrow slip of country, confined on the Persian side by a ridge of mountains, and on the other by a sandy desert ; the Indus, equal at least to the Nile, winding through the midst of this level valley, and annually over-flowing it. During great part of the S W monsoon, or at least in July, Au-gust, and part of September (which is the rainy season in most other parts of of India) the atmosphere is here generally clouded; but no rain falls except near the sea. Indeed very few show-ers fall during the whole year. Owing to this, and the neighbourhood of the aandy deserts on the E and on the N W the heats are so violent, and the winds from those quarters so pernicious, that the houses are contrived so as to be occasionally ventilated by apertures on the top, resembling the funnels of small chimnies. When the hot winds prevail, the windows are closely shut, by which the hottest current of air, near the surface, is excluded; and a cooler part, because more elevated, descends into the house through the funnels. The roofs are composed of thick layers of earth instead of terraces. Few countries are more unwholesome to European constitutions, particularly the lower part of the Delta. The Hindoos, who were the original inhabitants of Sindy, and who are reckoned to out-number the Mahometans, as ten to one, are treated with great rigour by their Mahometan governors, and are not permitted to erect any pagodas, or places of worship: and this severity drives vast numbers of them into other countries. The inland parts of Sindy, produce saltpetre, salammoniac, borax, bezoar, lapis-lazuli, and raw silk. They have also manufactures of cotton and silk of various kinds; and they make fine cabinets, inlaid with ivory, and finely lacquered. They also export great quantities of butter, clarified and wrapped up in duppas, made of the hides of cattle. The ladies wear hoops of ivory on both their arms and legs, of ivery on both their arms and legs, and when they die they are burnt with them. They have large black cattle, excellent mutton, and small hardy horses. Their wild game are deer, hares, antelopes, and foxes, which they hunt with dogs, leopards, and a small fierce creature called a shialgush. Its name signifies literally, the Hall of Snow, from snow and down. This is the most noted eminence in the whole region of the Welsh Hills, and may, with propriety, be styled the British Alps. The height of this mountain was measured in 1682, when it was computed to be 3720 feet; but more modern calculations make it only 3568, reckoning from the quay of Carnarvon to the highest peak. The stone that composes this mountain is excessively hard. Large coarse crystals, and frequently cubic pyrites are found in the fissures. An immense quantity of water rushes down its sides in numerous rivulets. It is boggy on the top, and has two lakes that abound with fish, particularly the char and the guiniard. It was held sacred by the gimmard. It was need sacred by the ancient Britons, as Parnassins was by the Greeks. From its summit may be seen a part of Ireland, of Scotland, and of Cumberland, Lancashire, Cheshire, and all North Wales.

Nature has been on that subject. Pattire has plen-equally bountiful in uncultivated plen-ty, and the inhabitants are as luxurious, and as indocent. A plantain branch is the emblem of peace, and changing names the greatest token of friendship. Their dances are more elegant, their dramatic entertainments have some thing of plot and consistency, and they exhibit temporary occurrences as the objects of praise or satire; so that the origin of ancient comedy may be al-ready discerned among them. The people of Huaneine are in general stouter and fairer than those of Ota heite, and this island is remarkable for its populousness and fertility. Those of Ulitea, on the contrary, are smaller and blucker, and much less orderly Captain Cook put on shore a Cape ewe at Balabola, where a ran had been left by the Spaniards; and also an English boar and sow, with two goats, at Uli-tea. Solfaterra, a mountain of Italy in the kingdom of Naples, and Terra di Lavo-This mountain appears evidently to have been a volcano in ancient times; and the soil is yet so hot, that the workmen employed there in making alum need nothing else besides the heat of the ground for evaporating their liquids. In the plain within the crater, smoke issues from many parts, as also from its sides : here, by means of stones and tiles heaped over the crevices, through which the smoke passes, they collect in an awkward manner what they call sale armoniaco; and from the sand of the plain they extract sulphur and alum. The hollow sound produced by throwing a heavy stone on the plain of the crater of the Solfaterra, seems to indicate that it is supported by a sort of arched natural vault; and one is induced to think that there is a pool of water beneath this vault (which boils by the heat of a subterraneous fire still deeper), by the very moist stream that issues from the cracks in the plain of the Solfaterra, which, like that of boil- of them is a league long, and consist of ing water, runs off a sword or knife, an eminence, to which the Spanish dising water, runs off a sword or knife, presented to it, in great drops. ciency of grain, which is chiefly owing to the neglect of tillage. Wheat and barley are the most common grain; the former of which is said by some to be the best in Europe. There is not much flax, hemp, oats, or hay, in Spain; but there is plenty of honey, salt, fine wool, silk, and cotton; and in some places, of rice and sugar-canes. Here also are abundance of mules, and, in some provinces, of horses, to-gether with deer, wild fowl, and other game, chamois and other goats, but few horned cattle. Wolves are almost the only wild beasts in the country. The herb kali which is used in making salt, soap, and glass, grows in great plenty on the sea shore. The wild bulls, used in their bull-fights, are bred in Audalusia. The seas about Spain are well stored with fish; among which is the anchovy, in the Mediter-ranean. We may guess at the num-ber of sheep here by that of the shepherds, which is said to be about 40,000. The sheep that bear the fine wool move regularly, every summer, from S to N, along the mountains, which yield a great variety of sweet herbs and plants, and return again to-wards winter. During this progress, large quantities of salt are distributed among them, and all possible care is taken both of their health and fleeces. The chief mountains are the Pyrenees, which stretch from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic Ocean, but not in a direct line, for near 200 miles: their breadth is, in some places not less than 80. The mountains yield great quantities of timber for shipping, which are conveyed by the Ebro and other rivers to the Mediterranean. According to the ancient and modern writers, they abound also with gold, silver, iron, lead, tin, cinnabar, quick-silver, alum, vitriol, copperas, lapis figs, chesnuts, pomegranates, capers, and parade, in what regards religion a pears, and peaches; but not a suffi- and no where less true Christianity. Their zeal and their superstition exceed that of any other Roman Catholic country, unless perhaps we should ex-cept Portugal. There are eight arch-bishops in Spain, seven in America, and one in Asia at Manilla; each of which has his suffragan bishops, 44 episcopal sees, and 24 universities. Though the rest of the nation is poor, the clergy are innensely rich, and their revenues of all kinds very great. Most of the towns and estates belong to them, and are exempt from all public burdens a vet their avarice is insatiable, especially that of the Mendicant friars, though they profess poverty. Their commerce, which is free from all duties and imposts, is also a rich fund to them. Though the Spaniards are naturally men of wit and of an elevated genius, yet little progress in the sciences is to be expected from them, while the cler-gy use their utmost efforts to keep them in ignorance, branding all literary researches with the name of heresy, and inveighing against the seats of the mu-ses as the schools of hell, where the devil teaches sorcery. The chief ma-nufactures of Spain are those of silk, wood, iron, copper, and other hard-wares; but these fall far short of the flourishing condition to which they might be brought; hence a great part of the treasures of America go to the foreign merchants, who supply them with goods for that part of the world. How-ever, it is certain, that Spain, since it hath had princes of the house of Bourhon upon the throne, hath improved its revenues, increased its forces by sea and land, and applied itself more than it did before to manufactures and husbandry; having shaken off, in some measure, that idle indolent disposition which rendered it so contemptible in the eyes of other nations : but it will saver, alum, vitroi, copperas, lapis the eyes of other nations: but it will mineral waters both hot and cold. The gold and silver mines are not tworked at present, but those of iron are. The neglect of the former is owing partly to the indolence of the separated with the second with the se Spaniards, and partly to the gold and silver imported from America. The principal rivers are the Douero, Tajo, Guadiana, Gaudalquiver, and Ebro. The Spaniards are zealous Romanists. Contained between twenty and thirty No where is there more pomp, farce, millions; whereas now it does not contain above nine; and this, among other causes, is owing to the pride and laziness of the inhabitants, want of manufactures and good regulations, neglect of the mines and agriculture, the expulsion of the Moors, the peopling of America, heavy taxes, the great number of convents, excessive venery, and the consequent infecundity of both sex-es. Their debauchery and sterility are partly occasioned by their way of living ; for they make great use of spices, and drink a great deal of chocolate, and strong wine mixed with brandy.

The causes assigned for the want of people in Spain will account in some measure for its poverty; notwithstaud-ing it is computed that it receives one year with another, setting aside other sums, above 26 millions of pieces of eight, in registered gold and silver. As most of the manufactures that are sent to America are furnished by Britain, France, Italy, and Holland, so a great part of the treasure brought home by the galleons is paid to the merchants of those nations. In the last century, the revenues of Spain amounted to 32 or 33 millions of livres ; but afterwards they were so reduced, that they did not exceed seven or eight millions. At present, the revenues of the crown arising in Spain are computed at five mil-lions Sterling per annum, besides what arises from America. The silver mines arises from America. The silver mines there are inexhaustible; and of the produce of these, a fifth belongs to the king. The taxes in Spain are nume-rous and heavy. The land forces, in time of peace, are computed at about 80,000; and in time of war, must be much more numerous. Their navy at present can-not be ascertained. The language of this country, especially that spoken in Castile, which is by far the purest, approaches the nearest to the Latin of any language in Europe, mixed with Ara-bic words and terminations introduced by the Moors. The Spaniards in ge-neral are tall, their complexions swar-thy, their countenances expressive. As to what regards the character of the Spaniards, they do not want either an inclination or capacity for the sciences; but have hardly an opportunity of acquiring any true learning or knowledge, at least in their schools and universities. They are admired for their secrecy, constancy, gravity, patience in adver-sity, and loyalty. They are also said to be true to their word, great enemies marche of Brandenburg, surrounded on to lying, and so nice and jealous in point of honour, that they will stick at nothing to wipe off any stain that is cast upon it. The heauty of the ladies reigns chiefly in their novels and romances; in their persons they are small and slen-der. Jealousy is no longer the charac-teristic of a Spanish husband; the mar-ried ladies have here the cortejo, or male attendant, in the same manner as the Italians have their cicisboos. The established religion is popery; and here the inquisition once reigned in all its horrors: but, although it still exists, it has been lately rendered, by the intervention of the royal authority, comparatively harmless. Spain, once the most free, is now one of the most des-potic monarchies in Europe. They had once their cortes, or parliaments, which had great privileges: but though not absolutely sholished, they have no part in the government. They are assem-bled indeed, occasionally (as at the ac-cession of the monarch) but merely as an appendage to the royal state, without power or any other consequence than what results from their individual rank. Madrid is the capital.

Here is also a cavern, called Fin-ma-coul, or Fingal's Cave, which extends 250 feet under ground. Its entrance is a natural arch, more than 100 feet high; it is supported on each side hy ranges of columns, and roofed by the fragments of others that have been broken off in forming it. The mind can hardly form an idea more magnificent than such a space, supported on each side by ranges of columns; and ranfed by the bottoms of those, which have been broken off in order to form it; between the angles of which a yel-low stalagmitic matter has exuded, which serves to define the angles pre cisely; and at the same time vary the colour with a great deal of elegance, and to render it still more agreeable, the whole is lighted from without; so that the farthest extremity is very plainly seen from without, and the air with-in being agitated by the flux and re-flux of the tides, is perfectly dry and wholesome, free entirely from the damp vapours with which natural caveros in general abound. This island is every where supported by basaltic rocks and pillars, superior in beauty and gran-deur to those which form the Giants Causeway in Ireland.

principal towns are, Stirling with its | by numberless rocks of granite, rising boldly from the surface of the water, partly bare and partly craggy, and partly dotted with houses, or feathered with wood. The harbour is an inlet of the Baltic; the water is as clear as crystal, and of such depth, that ships of the largest burden can approach the quay, which is very large, and lined with spacious buildings. Towards the sea, about two or three miles from the town, the harbour is contracted into a narrow strait, and winding among high rocks disappears from the sight; and the prospect is terminated by dis-tant hills overspread with forest. It is far beyond the power of words, or of the pencil, to delineate these singular views. The central island, from which the city derives its name, and the Ritterholm, are the handsomest parts of the town. At the extremity of the harbour, several streets rise one above another, in the form of an amphithcatre; and the royal palace, a magnifi-cent building, crowns the summit. In respect to soil it may be divided into three portions. The seathe most part sandy, and is distributed into arable land, heaths and marshes. The arable produces execlient barleys and towards the S E great quantities of carrots are grown. The heaths afford extensive sheep-walks; and the marshes feed numbers of cattle. The soil has in many parts been much im-proved by shell-marl, (called here erang) of which vast beds have been discovered, particularly in the neigh-bourhood of Woodbridge. The sea shore is chiefly composed of loamy cliffs, which are continually falling down, undermined by the waves. Hence great changes have been effected on this coast; and some towns, once considerable, as Dunwich and Aldborough, have been almost washed away by the sea. About Orfordness there are various salt-water creeks and inlets, which form extensive marshea. The internal part of the county, from N to S, and across quite to the S W angle, is in general a strong clavey soil, fertile to a great degree in all the objects of husbandry. It is about from the island of Java. It is about 900 miles in length, but from 100 to 150 only in breadth. No account had been given of this island by any Erglishman till the year 1778, when Mr. Charles Miller (son of the late botanical gardener) published an account of the manners of a particular district. These were the Battas, a people who live in the interior parts, called the Seltampour, a town of Hindoostan toners, in the province of Lahore, on 73 50 E lat. 30 25 N.

The men are rent, and not as common food, though beardless, great pains being taken to they prefer it to all others, and speak with peculiar raptures of the soles of the feet and palms of the hands. They expressed much surprise that the white people did not kill, much less cat their prisoners. From this country the greatest part of the cassia that is sent to Europe is procured. It a bounds also with the camphire trees, which constitute the common timber in use 1 and in these trees the camphire is found native, in a concrete form. In 1783, Mr. Marsden, who had been secretary to the president and council of Fort Marlborough, pub-lished a history of Sumatra, with very copious particulars of the island. He represents it as surpassed by few in the beautiful indulgences of nature. A chain of high mounta'ns runs through its whole extent; the ranges in many its whole extent; the ranges in many parts being double and treble; their altitude, though great, is not sufficient to occasion their being covered with snow during any part of the year. Between these ridges are extensive plains, considerably elevated above the surface of the maritime lands. In these the air is cool; 'and from this advantage they are esteemed the most eligible portion of the country, are the best inhabited, and the most cleared from woods, which elsewhere, in gene-ral throughout Sumatra, cover both hills and valleys with an eternal shade. Here too are found many large and beautiful lakes, that facilitate much the communication between the different parts. The heat of the air is far from heing so intense as might be expected from a country occupying the middle of the Torrid Zone; and it is more temperate than many regions within the Tropics; the thermometer at the most sultry hour, about two in the afternoon, generally fluctuating be-tween 82 and 85 degrees. Mr. Marsen divides the inhabitants into Malays, Achenese, Battas, Lampoons, and Rejangs; and he takes the latter as his standard of description, with respect to the persons, manners, and customs inhabitants. They are rather below the middle stature; their bulk in proportion; their limbs for the most part slight; but well shaped, and parti-cularly small at the wrists and ancles; render them so when hoys, by rubbing their chius with a kind of quickline. Their complexion is properly yellow, wanting the red tinge that constitutes wanting the red tinge that constitutes a copper or tawny colour. They are in general lighter than the Mestees, or half-breed, of the rest of india; those of the superior class, who are not exposed to the rays of the sun, and particularly their women of rank, approaching to a degree of fairness. If beauty consisted in this one quality, were of them tends surplus surprise on him. some of them would surpass our bruthe fernales are ugly, many of them even to disgust; yet among them are some whose appearance is strikingly beautiful, whatever composition of person, features, and complexion, that sentiment may be the result of. Some of the inhabitants of the hilly parts are observed to have the swelled neck or goitre; but they attempt no remedy for it, as these wens are consistent with the highest health. The rites of marriage among the Sumatrans consist simply in joining the hands of the parties, and pronouncing them man and wife without much ceremony, excepting the entertainment which is given upon the occasion by the father of the girl. The customs of the Sumatrans permit their having as many wives as they can pur-chase, or afford to maintain; but it is extremely rare that an instance ocand that only among a few of the chiefs. This continence they owe, in some measure to their poverty. The dictates of frugality are more power-ful with them than the irregular calls of appetite, and make them decline an indulgence from which their law does not restrain them. Mothers carry their children, not on the arm as our nurses do, but straddling on the hip, and usually supported by a cloth which ties in a knot on the opposite shoulder. The children are mirsed but little; are not confined by any swathing or bandages; and being suffered to roll about the floor, soon learn to walk and shift for themselves. When cradles are used, they swing suspended from the ceilings of the rooms. The Sumatrans are so fond of cock-fighting, that a father on his deathbed has been and, upon the whole, they are grace known to desire his son to take the

When a cock is killed or runs, the other must have sufficient spirit and vigour left to peck at him three times on his being held up to him for that purpose, or it becomes a drawn battle; and sometimes an ex-perienced cocker will place the head of his vanquished bird in such an uncouth situation as to terrify the other, count situation as to territy the other, and render him unable to give this proof of victory. The wild beasts of Sunatra are tigers, elephants, rhinoceroses, bears, and monkeys. The tigers prove to the inhabitants both in their journeys and even their domestic occupations most destructive enemies. The number of people annually slain by these rapacious tyrants of the woods is almost incredible. The bezoar stone found on this animal has been valued at ten times its weight in gold; it is of a dark brown colors, smooth on the outside; and the coat being taken off, it appears still darker, with strings running underneath the coat: it will swim on the top of the water. If it be infused in any liquid, it makes it extremely bitter; any injund, it makes it extremely bitter; the virtues usually attributed to this stone are cleansing the stomach, treating an appetite, and sweetening the blood. Of birds they have a greater variety than of beasts. The coo-ow, or Sumatran phensant, is a bird of uncommon heauty. They have starts of or Sunatran pheasant, is a bird of in-common beauty. The size and strength of the species which prevails on this island is prodigious. They are said to break with a stroke of their fore paw the leg of a horse or a buffalo; and the largest prey they kill is without difficulty dragged by them into the woods. This they usually perform on the second night, being supposed on the first to gratify themselves with sucking the hlood only. Time is by this delay afforded to prepare for their destruction, either by shooting flum, or placing a vessel of water strongly impregnated with arsenic near the carcass, which is fastened to a tree to prevent its being carried off. as to centain little or no alloy. The na-tive indolence of the Malay disposition prevents them from collecting more simple wants of a race of men as yet unenlightened by civilization and sci-ence, and ignorant of the full extent of the advantages of the country they inhubit. The roads leading to this golden country are almost impervious; affording only a scanty path to a single tra-veller, where whole nights mar be passed in the open air, exposed to the malignant influence of a hostile climate, in a country infested by the most fero-cious wild heasts. These are circum-stances that have hitherto checked curiosity; but perseverance and studied precaution will surmount the obstacles they furnish, and such discoveries might be made as would amply compensate for the difficulties leading to them. The gold merchants who come from the neighbouring and less rich countries, give us such accounts of the facility of procuring gold, as border nearly on the marvellous, and would be altogether incredible, if great quanti-ties of that metal produced by them did not in some degree evince the certainty of their accounts. .The English and Dutch have factories on this island : the principal one of the former being Fort Marlborough, on the S W coast. The original natives of Sumatra are Pagans; but it is to be observed, that when the Sumatrans, or any of the na-tives of the eastern islands, learn to read the Arabic character, and submit to circumcision, they are said to be-come Malays; the term Malay being understood to mean Musselman. Sura, a town of Sweden, in the pro-vince of Westmanland.

Surat, a city and scaport of the Dec-can of Hindoostan. It is said to have 200,000 inhabitants, and its trade is very considerable. In this city are many different religious, for there are Ma-hometans of several sects, many sorts of Gentoos, and Jews and Christians of various denominations. The Mahometans at Surat are not by far, so strict as they are in Arabia, or in other Turkish countries, nor are the distinctions of tribes among the Hindoos who reside here, strictly observed. Towards the middle of the last century this place was only the resort of a few merchants, who, under the shelter of an old insignificant eastle, laid the first foundations of a city, now almost as large and fully as populous as London within the walls, and containing many fine buildings of Indian architecture, which is partly Gentoo and partly Morisque. Those of the greatest note are so contrived, that the gateway is defensible against any sudden irruption of a few armed men. The private apartments lie backwards for the conveniency of the women, of whom the Moors are remarkably jeal-ous. During the intense heats of summer they have country retirements a little way out of town, where they reside, or go in parties to anuse them-selves. The streets are irregularly laid out; but have one property which ren-ders it agreeable to walk in them, viz. that a competent width being left at bottom, the upper stories of the houses time that a proper ventilation is not impeded, but rather promoted. The shops, not with standing the vast trade carried on in this great and populous city, have a very mean appearance, ow ing to the dealers keeping their goods in warehouses, and selling by samples.

No place is better supplied with provisions, than the city of Surat, where its communication with the country remains open. Besides the unbounded importation, by which every article is brought here in great abundance, the natural productions of the soil are excellent, though less cheap than in other parts of India, as at Bengal especially; yet in that place, though the cattle and poultry are bought originally at a very low rate, they turn out very deer by the time they are fed for the table. Here, however, all kinds of catables may be had at a reasonable price, ready for immediate use, and as good as can be found any where. The wheat of Surat is famous all over India for its singular substance, whiteness, and taste; and its sallads and roots are likewise of an excellent quality. There are also many kinds of wild-fowl, and other game to be had at an easy rate; but for wines and spirituous liquors they depend most on importation. Surat surrounded with a wall in a short time after it had assumed the form of a town. The fortification, however, was meant only to prevent the incursions of the Mahrattas, who had twice pillaged it; so that the place was by no means ca-pable of standing any regular siege. Even the castle appears but a poor defence, being mounted with cannon here and there, without any order, or without any thing like an attempt towards military architecture. One thing singular in Surat is, that, though there is no hospital for human beings, there is an extensive establishment of this nature for sick or maimed animals. When the Europeans turn out m old horse, or any other domestic animal to perish, as uscless, the Hindres voluntarily assume the care of it, and place it in this house, which is full of infirm decrepid cows, sheep, rabbits, hens, pigeons, &c. The charitable Hindoos keep a physician to look after these animals. The country round Surat is fertile, except toward the sea, which is sandy and barren. Before the English E Inon the coast of Malabar was at Surat; and they had a factory established there. Even after the presidency was transferred to Bombay, the factory was continued. The Great Mogul had then an offleer here, who was styled his admiral, and received a revenue called the tanka, of the annual value of three lacks of rupees, arising from the rents of adjacent lands, and the taxes levied at Surat. The tyranny of this officer fowards the merchants, induced the E India Company, in 1759, to fit out an armament, which dispossessed the admiral of the castle; and soon after, the possession of this castle was confirmed to them by the court of Delhi. They obtained, moreover, the appointment to the post of admiral, and were constituted receivers of the tanka, by which their authority in this place became supreme. Sussex, a county of England, 70 miles in length, and 28 where broadest; hounded on the N by Surry, on the N E and E by Kent, on the S by the English Channel, and on the W by Hampshire. It lies in the diocese of Chichester; contains 65 hundreds, one city, 16 market-towns and 142 parishes; and sends 18 members to parliament. The N part of Sussex, a tract continued from the Weald of Kent, and of the same nature with it, was formerly entirely covered with forests; and though many of these have been cut down, it is still well furnished with timber both of large and small growth.

The middle line of the county is a rich tract of arable and meadow. To it suc-ceed the Downs, a range of green open hills of a chalky soil, affording excellent pasturage for sheep, and in many parts fertile in corn. The birds called wheat-ears are particularly numerous and excellent on these Downs, and are caught by the shepherds in great numbers. The tract from Lewes and its heighbourhood to the sea is peculiarly famous, under the name of the South Downs, for its fine velvet-like turf, and the goodness of its wool and mutand the goodness of its wool and inde-ton. Towards the sea the land in ge-neral declines, and in some parts is marshy. The same may be said with regard to its climate, soil, &c. Summer bursts from winter; and vegetation is more speedy than in southern climates. Stoves and warm furs mitigate the cold of winter, which is so intense, that the noses and ex-tremities of the inhabitants are some-times mortified. The Swedes, since the days of Charles XII have been at incredible pains to correct the native barrenness of their country, by erecting colleges of agriculture, and in some places with great success. The soil is much the same with that of Denmark and some places of Norway, generally very bad, but in some valleys surprisingly fertile. The Swedes till of late years, had not industry sufficient to remedy the one, nor improve the other. The peasants now follow the agriculture of France and England; and some late accounts say, that they rear almost as much grain as maintains the natives. Gothland produces wheat, rye, bar-ley, oats, peas, and beans; and in case of deficiency, the people are supplied from Livonia and the Baltic provinces. In summer, the fields are verdant, and covered with flowers; and produce strawberries, raspherries, currants, and other small fruits. The common people know, as yet, little of the culti-

Sweden produces crystals, amethysts, topazes, porphyry, labis lazuli, agate, cornelian, marble, and other fossils. The chief wealth of the country, however, arises from her mines of silver, copper, lead, and iron. The last mentioned metal employs no fewer than 450 forges, hammeringmills, and smelting-houses. The first gallery of one silver mine is 100 fa-thoms below the surface of the earth; Sweden has preserved. The dress of their common people is almost the same with that of Denmark ; the better sort are infatuaed with French modes and fashion. The common diversions of the Swedes are, skating, running races in sledges, and sailing in yachts upon the ice. Their houses are generally of wood, with very little art in their construction. The roofs, in many places, are covered with turf, on which their goats often feed. There is no country in the world where the women do so much work; for they till the ground, thresh the corn, and row the boats on the sea. The revenues of Sweden amount to people know, as yet, little of the cultivation of apricots, peaches, nectarines, ling, but may, on an average, be taken pinc-apples, and the like high-flavour of fruits; but melons are brought to great perfection in dry seasons. The animals are horses, cows, hogs, goats, sheep, elks, reindeer, bears, wolves, faxes, wild cats, and squirrels. In winter, the foxes, and squirrels, become grey, and the hares as white as snow.

1397, it was stipulated that the same | tues, and attract a numerous company monarch should rule over Deumark, Sweden, and Norway, to be chosen by the deputies from the states of those the deputies from the states of those three kingdoms assembled at Calmar. By this regulation Sweden became a mere tributary kingdom to Denmark. From this state of subjection to a tyranical foreign yoke, it was rescued by Gustavas Vasa, on whom the Swedes, in 1523, conferred the sovereignty, and made the crown hereditary in his male issue, with this reservation, that in de-fault of such issue, the right of election should return to the states. But queen Christina, the last of Gustavus's descendants abdicating the crown, she persuaded the states to confirm the right of succession on the descendants her cousin Charles Gustavus, count palatine of the Rhine. In 1682, the states agreed that the daughters should succeed in case the male heirs failed. The kingdom became hereditary, and soon after absolute by Charles XI. whose son Charles XII, carried his authority to the highest pitch of despotism : upon his death his sister Ulrica Eleonora renounced for ever all absolute power for herself and her successors, determining to re-establish the govern-ment in the ancient form it happily enjoyed in former times. Upon commendation, her consort, the here-ditary prince of Hesse, was elected king, and it continued in the same manner till 1772, when the states, who had obtained the whole power since the death of Charles, and made a very in-different use of it, were entirely subjected by a dexterous maneuvre of Gustavus, the late king, so that the government is now altogether as despotic as it was during the reigns of Charles XI. and XII. He was assassinated in 1792, leaving his son Gustavus Adolphus a minor, who attained his majority in 1796. The established religion is the Lutheran, and they have one archbi-shop, and seven bishops. The chief riches of Switzerland consist of excellent pastures in which many cattle are bred and fattened, and the goats, and chamois, feed on the mountains, and in the woods. The Swiss are a brave, honest, hospitable, hardy people : very true to their engagements, friendly, and humane. In short, there is not a people in Europe whose national character is better. In their persons they are generally tall, robust, and well made; but their complexions are none of the best, and those that live in the neighbourhood of the mountains are subject to wens. The women are said to be generally handsome and wellshaped, sensible and modest, yet frank, easy, and agreeable in conversation Few of the peasants are miserably poor; many of them are rich, especially in the protestant cantons, and that of Derne in particular. In 1797, the French having long endeavoured to excite intestine commotion and discord in Switzerland, succeeded but too well in their mischievous designs. Being favoured by the disturbances they had excited, their troops entered Switzer-land, and defeated the Swiss troops, who opposed them with great courage and resolution in several desperate engagements. The whole country was subdued and obliged to submit to the galling yoke of the French, who comoverturned the constitution of the principal cantons, and imposed up-on them what they called the Helvetic republic, with a form of government, like that of France, composed of a legislative body, consisting of two councils the sea, 72 and a directory On the recommencement of the war with the emperor of lat, 37 5 N.

It is bounded on the N and W by Kiangnan, on the S W by Kiangnan, on the S by Fokien, and on the E by the Ocean. The air of this country is pure and healthful; the plains are watered by a number of rivers and canals, kept in good order; and the springs and lakes with which it abounds, contribute greatly to its fertility. The natives are mild and lively, and very polite to strangers; but they are said to be ex-tremely superstitions. In this province whole plains may be seen covered with dwarf mulberry trees, purposely checked in their growth; and prodigious quantities of silk worms are bred here. Their silk stuffs, in which gold and silver are intermixed, are the most beau-tiful in China. The tallow tree grows here, and here are found the small gold fish, with which ponds are stocked.

Among the birds was a species of duck, of the size of a goose, which ran along the sea with amazing velocity, beating the water with its wings and slong the sea with amazing velocity, beating the water with its wings and feet. It had a grey plumage, with a yellow bill and feet, and a few white quill feathers. At the Falkland islands it is called a logger-head duck; among the birds are also plenty of geese and falcons. The rocks of some of the islands are covered with large must's shells, the fish of which is well flavoured. The natives of this country are short in their persons, not exceeding five feet six inches at most, their head large, their faces broad, their cheek bones very prominent, and their noses very flat. They have little brown eyes, without life; their hair is black and druk, hanging about their heads in disorder, and besmeared with train oil. On the chin they have a few straggling short hairs instead of a beard, and from their nose there is a constant discharge of mucus into their ugly open mouth. The whole assemblage of their features forms the most leathsome picture of misery and wretchedness to which human nature can possibly be reduced. Those which Mr. Forster saw, had no other clothing than a small piece of seal-skin, which hung from their shoul-ders to the middle of the back, being fastened round the neck with a string.
The rest of their body was perfectly naked, not the least regard being paid to what the Europeans would term indecency. Their natural colour seems to be an olive brown, with a kind of gloss, resembling that of copper; but many of them disguise themselves with streaks of red paint, and sometimes, though seldom, with white. Their whole character is the strangest compound of stupidity, indifference, and inactivity. They have no other arms than bows and arrows, and their instruments for fishing are a kind of fish gigs. They live chiefly on seals flesh, and like the fat oily part most. There is no appearance of any subordination among them, and their mode of life approaches nearer to that of brutes than that of any other nation.

is upward of 1300 miles; its greatest breadth is 750; but, in some places, toward the Oronoko, not above 180. It is divided into the provinces of Terra Firma Proper, or Darien, Carthagena, St. Martha, Rio de la Hacha, Venezueia, Caraccas, Guinana, and Paria, or New Andalusia. The whole country is now subject to the viceroy of New Granada, who resides at St. Fo de Bogoat. The climate here, especially in the northern parts, is extremely hot and sultry during the whole year. From the month of May to the end of November, the season called winter by the inhabitants, is almost a continual succession of thunder, rain, and tempests , the clouds precipitating the rains with such impetuosity, that the low lands exhibit the appearance of an ocean. Great part of the country is of consequence almost continually flooded; and this, together with the excessive heat, so impregnates the air with vapours, that in many provinces, partic arly about Popayan and Porto Bello, it is extremely unwholesome. This part of S America was discovered by Columbus, in his third voyage to this con-tinent. It was subdued and settled by the Spaniards, about the year 1514, atter destroying, with great inhumanity, several millions of the natives. This country was called Terra Firma, on ac-count of its being the first part of the continent which was discovered, all the lands discovered previous to this being

What was the origin gar error, cannot now be etical fiction, however, has this error, and invested it d of classical sanctity. It ears (says Camden), that is always called Thames or e it came near the Thane; ral ancient charters granted of Malmsbury, as well as sham, and in the old deeds Cricklade, it is never considered under any other name than that of Thames. He likewise says, that it occurs no-where under the name of Isis. All the historians who mention the incursions of Ethelwold into Wiltshire in the river, are Westminster and Longer the year 905, or of Canute in 1016, concur likewise in the same opinion, by declaring, that they passed over the Thames at Cricklade in Wiltshire. It Inames at Crickiage in wittahire. It is not probable, moreover, that Thaines Head, an appellation by which the source has usually been distinguished, should give rise to a river of the name of lsis; which river, after having run half its course, should reassume the name of Thames, the appellation of its parent spring. About a mile below the source of the river is the first corn-mill, which is called Kemble-Mill. Here the river may be properly said to form a constant current; which, though not more than nine feet wide in the summer, yet in the winter becomes such a torrent as to overflow the meadows for many miles around. But, in the summer, the Thames Head is so dry, as to appear nothing but a large dell, interspersed with stones and weeds. Somerford the stream winds to Cricklade, where it unites with many other rivulets. Approaching Kemsford, it again enters its native country, divi-ding it from Berkshire at anglesham. It widens considerably in its way to Lechlade; and being there joined by the Lech and Coln, at the distance of 138 miles from London, it becomes navigable for vessels of 90 tons. At Ensham, in its course N E, to Oxford, is the first bridge of stone; a handsome one, of three arches, built by the earl of Abingdon. Passing by the ruins of Godstow numery, where the celebra-ted fair Rosamond was interred, the river reaches Oxford, in whose academic groves its poetical name of Isis has been so often invoked. Being there joined by the Charwel, it proceeds SE to Abingdon, and thence to Dorchester, where it receives the Tame. Continuing its course S E by Wallingford to Reading, and forming a boundary to the counties of Berka, Bucks, Surry, Middlesex, Essex, and Kent, it wash-

don, and, on the opposite side, South-wark: forming together one continued city, extending to Limehouse and Dept-ford; and hence the river proceeds to Greenwich, Erith, Greenhithe, Gray's, Thurrock, Gravesend, and Leigh, into the ocean. It receives in its course from Dorch ster, the rivers Kennet, Loddon, Coln, Wey, Mole, Wandel, Lea, Roding, Darent and Medway. Lea, Roding, Darent and Diedway.
The jurisdiction of the lord mayor over the Thames extends from Coln Ditch, a little to the W of Staines, to Yendel
or Yenleet to the E, including part of the rivers Medway and Lea; and he has a deputy, named the water-bailiff, who is to search for and punish all of-fenders against the laws for the preser-vation of the river and its fish. Eight times a year the lord mayor and alder-men hold courts of conservance for the four counties of Surry, Middlesex, Essex and Kent. Though the Thames is said to be navigable 138 miles above the bridge, yet there are so many flats, that in summer the navigation westward would be entirely stopped, when the springs are low, were it not for a number of locks. But these are attended with considerable expence; for a barge from Lechlade to London pays for passing through them 13l. 15s. 6d. and from Oxford to London 12l. 18s. This charge, however, is in summer only, when the water is low 1 and there is no lock from London Bridge to Bolter's Lock; that is, for 51 miles and a half above the bridge. The plan of new cuts has been adopted in some places, to shorten and facilitate the navigation. There is one near Lechlade, which runs nearly parallel to the old river, and contiguous to St. John's Bridge; and there is another a mile from Abingdon, which has rendered the old stream toward Culham Bridge uselese. But a much more important undertaking has lately been accomplish-Middlesex, Essex, and Kent, it washes towns of Henley, Marlow, Maidenhead, Windsor, Eton, Egham, Staines, Laleham, Chertsey, Weybridge, Shepperton, Walton, Sunbury, Bridge, near Stroud. The sonal descending hence 134 tons, by 12 tonk a ioins the Thames at Lachtabe, a distance of above 20 miles. In the course of this vast undertaking the seven, from the Severn at Froomlade to Inglesham, where it joins the Thames, is a dis-tance of more than 30 miles. The expence of it exceeded the sum of 200, 000% of which 3000% are said to have been expended in gunpowder alone, used for the blowing up of the rock. in less than seven years from its commencement. A communication, not only with the Trent, but with the Mersey, has likewise been effected by a ca-nal from Oxford to Coventry; and an act of parliament has passed to extend another canal from this, at Braunston, to the Thames at Brentford. This is to be called the Grand Junction Canal. This country is one of the highest in Asia, it being a part of that clerated tract which gives rise not only to the rivers of India and China, but to those rivers of India and Unina, but to unose also of Siberia and Fartary. Its length from E to W, cannot be less than 1600 British miles; its breadth is very unequal. It is divided into three parts, Upper, Middle, and Lower Thibet. The Upper division seems to respect the countries towards the suppose of the countries towards the sources of the country; even the weakest of the Ganges and Burrampooter; the Middle that in which Lassa, the capital, is seated, and of which it forms long journies. The Thibetians are governed by the grand lama, who is not only submitted to, and adored by is not only submitted to, and more dry them, but is also the great object of adoration for the various tribes of pa-gan Tartars, who walk through the vast tract of continent which stretches from the rivers Volga to Corea. He is not only the sovereign pontiff, the vice-gerent of the deity on earth, but by the more remote Tartars is absolutely regarded as the deity himself. They believe him to be immortal, and en-dowed with all knowledge and virtue. He does not reside in the city of Lassa, which here divides Suffolk from Norfolk, is navigable from Lynu; and a

The grand lama salutes no one; he neither uncovers nor rises up to any person, whatever his rank may be; with the same eye, he beholds nt his feet the greatest princes and the meanest of their subjects. He conmeanest of their subjects. He con-tents himself with laying his hand on the head of his adorer, who imagines that he obtains, by this imposition alone, the remission of all his sins. Next to the Thibetians, the Tartars are the most zealous worshippers of the grand lama; they arrive in crowds at Poutala, from the remotest corners

THI

Thiers, a town of France, in the de-Lassa, to prostrate themselves at the feet of the grand lama, is founded on the idea which they entertain of his great power and sanctity. They are fully persuaded, that all the divinity of Fo resides in him, that he is omni-scient and omnipresent, and that he has neither need of imformation, nor orcasion to ask questions, in order to orcasion to ask questions, in order to discover the secret thoughts of men. They believe him to be immortal, and that, when he appears to die, his soul and his divinity only change their place of residence, and transmigrate into an-other body. All their care is then employed to discover the place where it hath pleased him to be born again; even some of the Tartar princes themsearch; but they are obliged to be directed by certain lamas, who alone are acquainted with the signs by which the new born god may be discovered, or rather, they only know what child the preceding dalad-lama appointed to be his successor. In 1774, the grand lama was an infant, who had been discovered some time before by the tayoshoo lama, who in authority and sanctity of character, is next to the grand lama, and, during his minority, acts as chief. The lamas, who form the most numer-ous as well as the most powerful body in the state, have the priesthood en-tirely in their hands; and they constitute many monastic orders, which are held in great veneration among them. Besides the religious influence and authority of the great lama, he is possessed of unlimited power throughout his dominions. In 1774, the English East India Company made a treaty with the lama. The religion of Thibet, though in many respects, it differs from that of the Indian Bramins, yet in others, has a great affinity to it. The Thibetians have a great veneration for the cow, and highly respect also the waters of the Ganges, the source of which they believe to be in heaven. The sunniasses, or Indian pilgrims, often vicit Thibet as a holy place; and the lama always maintains a body of near 300 of them in his pay. See Palte.

Tinian, an island in the Pacific Ocean one of the Ladrones, 12 miles in length and six in breadth. The soil is dry; and being somewhat sandy, is the less disposed to rank and over luxuriant vegetation. The land rises in gentle slopes from the shore to the middle of the is-land, intermixed with vallies of an easy descent; which are beautifully diversi fied with the mutual encroachments of the woods and lawns. The woods consist of tall and well spread trees, and the lawns are covered with clean and uniform turf, producing fine trefoil, and variety of flowers. Here are at least 10,000 cattle, all milk white, except their ears, which are brown or black; also a vast number of fowls. which are easily caught, and plenty of trees, guavoes, limes, sweet and sour oranges, and bread-fruit. Here are also vegetables proper for the scurvy; such as water-melon, dandelien. purslain, mint, scurvygrass, and sorrel. Here are some ruins of a particular kind, consisting of two rows of square pyramidical pillars, each pillar being about six feet from the next, and the about six feet from the next, and the distance between the rows is 12 Dras. Lon. 5 43 W, lat. 28 15 N. feet; on the top of each there is a semiglobe, with the flat surface up-ward, and they are composed of sand and stone cemented together. The climate is extremely healthful, for the rains are not continual, but fall in frequent refreshing showers. There are no streams, but the water of the wells and springs is extremely good. The principal inconvenience arises from the number of muskitoes, and other kinds of flies; and there are likewise insects called ticks, which fasten upon the limbs and bodies of men, and bury their heads under their skins. Tocat, a town of Turkey in Asia, is Natolia, capital of a province of the same name. The houses are handsomely built, and the streets pretty well paved, which is an uncommon thing in these parts ; but the town makes a very odd appearance, and is in the form of an amphitheatre. There are two rugged perpendicular rocks of murble, with an old castle upon each; and so many streams, that each house has a fountain. Here are 20,000 Turkish, 4000 Armenian, and 400 Greek families. There are 12 mosques, and a vast number of chapels; the Armenians have seven churches, and the Greeks only one. Besides the silk of this country, they manufacture much of that of Persia, and make it into sewing silk. Their chief trade is in copper vessels, such as kettles, drinking cups, lanterns, and candlesticks. They also prepare a great deal of yellow Turkey leather. Tocat may be considered as the centre of trade in Natolia; for caravans come hither from several parts. Its territory abounds in fruit and excellent wine. Their like is made in the middle, and they all it round it upon turis. Both sexes are very strong, and broad-faced, and they all ride on horseback, not excepting the girls. Both men and, women dress alike in a, sort of frock, with boots of skins on their legs, and their common drink is water. The Tungusians are of a middling stature; a very tall, or a very short man being equally rare among them. They are all, well, made, and of a good mein. The features, of their face are not a flat as those, of the Kalmouks; they have a fresh complexion, small sharp eyes, a small thin nose, black lank hair, very little beard, and hearing of an acuteness and delicacy almost incredible; but, on the contrary, their organs of touch and smell are considerable kingdoms of an excellences and elicacy almost incredible; but, on the contrary, their organs of touch and smell are considerable kingdoms of the mone at all. The people of Tonquin are ingenious, atrong limbed and well made; their disposition is free and open, although chesting reach. open, although cheating among them, when done with address, is considered as a stroke of prudence and skill They are generous; but their generosi-ty is regulated only by their interest; and when they have nothing to liope, they cannot easily be prevailed on to give: on such occasions, they take great care to conceal their riches, for fear of being importuned; they are in general lavish in their public expences, especially in feasts, marriages and fune rals; they hate the Europeans, and find great satisfaction in being able to de-ceive them. The Tonquinese are nei-ther so flat-nosed nor so broad-visaged as the Chinese; their colour is olive: they blacken their teeth, suffer their nails to grow, and wear their hair as long as possible. The people are slaves one part of the year; for except the citizens of the capital, all the tradesmen, joiners, amiths, masons, carpenters, &c. are obliged to labour three months in the palace, and during two others, for the mandarins and great lords: they are free the rest of a year, and work for those who employ them. Marriages are not contracted here without the consent of the tracted here without the consent of the governor or judge of the place. The day after the marriage, the husband atyles his wife sister, and the wife calls her husband brother. A plurality of wives is permitted at Tong-king; but only the most accomplished takes the title of spouse. The law grants a disporter to the men, but denies it to the women: the children remain with the husband. The favourite diversion of the Tonquinese are comedies, which the generally act at night, and accom-

Toulon, a city and seaport of France, eapital of the department of Var, and late province of Provence. Before the revolution in 1789, it was an episcopal see The inhabitants are computed at 80,000. Toulon experienced the dreadful ravages of the plague in 1418, 1461, 1476, 1587, 1621, 1630, 1647, 1664, and 1720. It is divided into the Old and New Quarter. The first which is ill-built, has nothing remarkable in it but the Rue aux Arbres, (a kind of mall) and the townhouse. The New Quarter contains, (besides the magnificent works constructed by Lewis XIV.) many fine houses, and a grand oblong square, lined with trees, and serving as a pa-sade. The harbour is distinguished likewise by the names of the Old Port, or Merchants Port, and the New Port, or King's Port; but this last appellation has vanished with the abolition of royand variables with the aboutton of royalty. The New Haven was constructed by Louis XIV. as were the fortifications of the city. In the front of this haven is an arsenal, containing all the places necessary for the construction and fetting out of wealth. and fitting out of vessels: the first object that appears is a rope-walk, entirely srched, extending as far as the eye can reach, and built after the designs of Vauban: here cables are made, and above is a place for the preparation of hemp. Here likewise is the armoury, for musquets, pistols, halberts, &c. In the park of artillery, are cannons placed vation. The gallies, transferred from Marseilles, some years ago, occupy at Toulon a second basin in the New Port. Many of the galley slaves are artizans, some merchants, and which is most wonderful, of scrupulous integrity. They no longer sleep on board the gal lics, but have been lately provided with accommodations on shore, in a vast building newly erected for that purpose. Both the old and New Port have an outlet into the spacious outer road or harbour, which is surrounded by hills, and formed by nature almost circular. and torned by nature amost circuit is of great extent; and the entrance is defended, on both sides, by a fort and batteries. In a word, the hasins, docks, and arsenal at Toulon, warranted the remark of a foreigner who visited them in the late reign, the king of France was greater there than at Versailles. Toulon is the only mart in the Mediterranean for the reexportation of the products of the E Indies. It was twice taken by the imperial troops in the 16th century; and in August 1793, it was surrendered by the inhabitants, to the British admiral lord Hood, on condition of enabling them to effect the re-establishment of monarchy in France. It was garrisoned for some time, by the British troops; but the French having laid siege to it, they were obliged to evacuate the place in December following, after having destroyed the arsenal, &c. the province of Yemseisk, near the river of that name. The inhabitants are docile, attentive, eager after mstruction, and well skilled in what tocy have been able to learn. Whenever they have nothing to fear, they discover great frankness of disposition, honesty, and complaisance; but when they have reason to apprehend any severe treatment or fraud, they lye, and are sullen. They shew great friendship, and pay numberless little attention towards numberiess little attention towards each other; but are lazy with regard to all kinds of labour, and their manner of living is dirty. Ever since they have had the custom of living in settled villages during the winter, the great-est number of them sow a few fields with rye, wheat, barley, oats, and hemp, but seldom cultivate enough for their own consumption though their land be ever so fruitful. Many of them sow nothing at all but had rather buy their flour and meal of the Russians, or live without bread, when it is to be had of them. Those who are not averse to the trouble of managing cattle, keep a small number of horses and cows, and a few sheep of the short-tailed kind. As the snow is deep and the winter very long in these parts, they are obliged to lay up a stock of hay for the support of their cattle during the extremity of the cold; a great hardship to people so abandoned to sloth as the fschoulyms. Neither swine nor poultry is to be seen in their inclosures. In imitation of the Ostyaks fishing and hunting are their principal occupations. The latter furnishes them with the means of paying their tribute, which is in Marten skins.

Tschutski, a country of the E extremity of Asia, opposite the N W coast of America, bounded by the Anadir on the S. The climate is cold, the soil marshy, abounding in rocks, barren, bare of woods, and extremely wild and savage. The summer lasts only a few months, but in this season the days are very long, because for several weeks together the sun does not set at all. The winter extends through the greatest part of the year; and during this melancholy season it is almost one continual night. The inhabitants are analogous to the country; being the most savage, the most barbarous, orests, and mountainous only about the the most untractable, the least civilibanks of the two Yiousses, which take | zed, the most rugged and cruel people of all Siberia. They have neither letters nor writing, nor any kind of instruction. They are not yet entirely subdued; and consequently it is but one part of the nation that pays tribute. Their history is enveloped in darkness, as well as their national constitution and force. They will not endure the least constraint; and though they have been several times conquered by the Russians, they have always regained their liberty. By a probable computation they are estimated at 3500 males capable of bearing arms. They are formidable neighbours to the Koriacs, who often experience their depredations. Twenty Tschouktsches never hesitate a moment about attacking fifty Moraiks; and, had it not been for the Russian Ostrogs, the former would long ago have exterminated the whole Koraik nation. The care of their deer is their principal occupation; nevertheless they follow the chace and the fishery. In the number of rein deer consists all the riches of the Tschouktaches. A possessor of ten thousand is not uncommon; and some of fifty thousand are to be met with.

It was formerly a sandy desert, to which criminals were banished; those that first landed on it began to till the ground, that they might not perish with hunger; some poor Chinese families emigrated thither afterward; and, in less than ten years, the island was peopled and cultivated. Some parts of it produce wheat, rice, barley, cotton, citrons, and several other fruits, but its principal revenue arises from salt, which is made in such abundance, that the island can supply most of the neighbouring countries. In this island is only one city of the third class; but villages are so numerous, that they seem to touch each other, and to form one continued city. It was built at the sole expence of one governor. It is built entirely of the same kind of blackish stone, and has no arches, but above three hundred large stone pillars, which terminate on each side in an acute angle, to break the violence of the current with greater facility. Five stones of equal size, laid transversely from one pillar to another, form the breadth of the bridge, each of which, according to the measurement I made in walking, were eighteen of my ordinary steps in length; there are one thousand of them, all of the same and affect the same and affect the same and affect the same and affect the same are already thank. size and figure: a wonderful work, when one considers the great number of these heavy stones, and the manner in which they are supported between the pillars! Its forests yield vast quantities of oak and other valua-ble timber. The quadrupeds, and the feathered race, are the same as in all the N of Europe; and, besides the fishes common to most lakes and rivers, there is a fish, peculiar to the waters of these northern regions, called the ster-let, the accipenser ruthenus of Linne, and is a species of sturgeon, highly esteemfor the flavour of its flesh, and for its roe, of which the finest caviare is made. Tver, a commercial city of Russia, capital of a government of the same mune, scated at the confluence of the Tverza and Volga. It is divided into the old and new town: the former, situated on the opposite side of the Volga, consists almost entirely of wooden cottages; the latter, about fifteen years ago, was a few buildings excepted, scarcely superior; but being in 1763, fortunately destroyed by a dreadful conflagrahave endeavoured to add some dignity, tion, it has risen with lustre from its by creeting them into bishoprics. Tuestands as the empress was no sconer Z z z z informed of this calamity, than she or-dered a regular and beautiful plan of a new town to be sketched by an eminent architect, and enjoined, that all the houses should be re-constructed in conformity to this model. She raised at her own expense the governor's house, the bishop's palace, the courts of justice, the new-exchange, the prison, and se-veral other public edifices. The streets which are broad and long, issue in a straight line from a square, or rather an octagon, in the centre: the houses of this octagon and of the principal streets are of brick stuccoed white, form a very magnificent appearance. The New Town when completed, will consist of two octagons, with several streets leading to them, and intersecting each other at right angles, and would be no inconsiderable ornament to the most opulent and civilized country. There is an ecclesiastical seminary at Tver, which is under the inspecry at Tver, which is under the inspec-tion of the bishop, and admits 600 stu-deots. In 1776 the empress instituted a school for the instruction of 200 burghers' children. In June, 1779, an academy was also opened in this town, for the education of the young nobility of the province, at the charge of the same imperial patroness. It admits 120 students; who are instructed in foreign languages, &c. It is a place of considerable commerce; and both the Volga and the Tvertza are covered with boats. It owes its principal trade to its advantageous situation, being near the conflux of those two rivers, along which are conveyed all the goods and merchandise sent by water from Siberia and the southern provinces, toward Petersburgh. This country was formerly a mon-archy; but a difference arising between the father and son, one of whom was for the protection of the Christians, and the other for that of the Turks, in 1574, the inhabitants shook off the yoke of both. From this time it became a republic, under the protection of the Turks, and pays a certain tribute to the Bashaw, that resides at Tunis. The air in general is healthy, but the soil in the E part is but indifferent, for want of water. Toward the middle, the mountains and vallies abound in fruits; but the W part is the most fertile, being watered by rivers. The environs of Tunis are very dry, upon which account corn is generally dear. The inroads of the Arabs oblige the inhabitants to sow their burley and rye in the suburbs, and to inclose their gardens with walls. However, there are plenty of citrons, lemons, oranges, are pienty of etrons, formines, oranges, dates, grapes, and other faults. There are slso olive trees, roses, and odoriferous plants. In the woods and mountains are lions, wild beeves, ostriches, monkies, cameleons, rocbucks, hares, pheasants, partridges, and other sorts of birds and beasts. The inhabitants carry on a great trade in linen and woollen cloth. In the city of Tunis alone, are above 3000 clothiers and weavers. They have also a trade in horses, olives, oil, soap, and ostriches eggs and feathers. The established religion is Mahometanism; and the inhabitants consist of Moors, Turks, Arabs, Jews, and Christian slaves.

Tunis, a large and celebrated city of Barbary, capital of a kingdom of the same name. It is scated on the point of the gulf of Goletta, about ten miles from the site of the famous city of Carthage. It is in the form of an oblong square, five miles in circumference, with a lofty wall, flanked with seve-ral strong towers, five gates and 35 mosques. The houses are all built of stone, though but one story high; and it has a good citadel on an eminence, on the W side of the city. Without the walls are two suburbs, which contain 1000 houses. Within the walls are 10,000 families, and above 3000 tradesmen's shops. The divan, or council of state assembles in an old palace, and the dey is the chief of the republic, who resides here. The city has no water, but what is kept in cisterns, except one well, kept for the bashaws use. The harbour has a very narrow entrance, through a small channel, which is well fortified. The Mahometans here have nine colleges for students, besides a great number of smaller schools. Tunis is a place of great trade, ten miles from the sea, 275 N W of Tripoli, and 380 E of Algiers. Turin, a flourishing city of Italy, the capital of Picdmont, and residence of its sovereign the king of Sardinia, or its sovereign the king of Saronia, with an archbishop's see, and a university. It is scated on a visat plain, at the foot of the Alps, and at the confluence of the Doria and Po. Here are many large squares, among which that of St. Charles is the most spacious and brautiful; the buildings are handsome, and it has extensive areades on each side. Most of the streets are well built, uniform, straight, and ter-minute on some agreeable object: the Strada di Po, the finest and largest, leads to the royal palace, and is adorned with piazzas, filled with shops 1 as are various others of the best streets; all of which are kept clean by means of a canal from the Doria, with sluices that flow through them into the Po. The inhabitants are computed to be 1,000,000. The houses are hundsome, and all built of the same height. The royal palace consists of two magnificent structures, joined together by a gallery, in which are several statues, all sorts of arms, the genealogy of the dukes of Savoy, a representation of the celestial signs, a royal library, and many other curiositics. Besides these Marmora, and the archipelago; on the two structures, there is the palace of the prince of Carignan, the hospital of W by that sea, and the Venetian and the prince of Carignan, the hospital of St. John, the seminary of the Jesuits,

In Africa, the Turks have still a precarious sovereignty over Egypt. Of these countries (which see respectively) the climate, productions, manners, &c. must be various. The Turks are generally robust and well shaped, of a good mein, and patient of hardships, which render them lit for war. They shave their heads; but wear their beards long, except the military and those in the seraglio, who wear only whiskers. They cover their heads with a white linen turban of an enormous size, and never pullit of but when they sleep. None but Turks must presume to wear a white turbun. Their breeches or drawers are of a piece with their stockings; and they have slippers instead of shoes, which they pull off when they enter a temple or house. They wear shirts, with wide sleeves not gathered at the wrists, and over them a vest tied with a sush; their super garment being a loose gown, something shorter than the vest. The women's dress pretty much re-sembles that of the men; only they bave a stiffened cap with horns, something like a mitre, on their heads instead of a turban, and wear their hair dowing down. When they go abroad, they are so wrapped up, that their ta-ces cannot be seen. The Turks sit, ces cannot be seen. The Turks sit, eat, and sleep, according to the custom of the cast, on sophas, or cushions, matresses, and carpets. Rice is their most general food, and coffee their common drink. Their most usual salutation is to bow the head a little, laying the right hand on their breasts; but to persons of rank they stoop so low as to touch the border of their vest. The women are kept under a rigorous confinement. They have generally delicate skins, regular features, black hair and eyes, with an admirable chest. Many of them are complete beauties.

Turkey in Asia is bounded on the N by the smallest hair or the least soil to be upon their hodies. As to the qualities of their minds, they are said to want neither wit, vivacity, nor tenderness; and to be exceedingly amorous. It is no doubt for this reason that the men never suffer their wives faces to be seen, not even by the dearest friend they have in the world. There is no need of much wit to behave one's self well here; for a good mein and gravity supply the place of merit in the cast, and much gaiety would spoil all. Not that the Turks want wit; but they speak little, and pride themselves in sincerity and modesty more than cloquence. The Turks use no unnecessary words, whereas the Greeks talk in-cessantly. Though these two nations are born under one climate, their tempers are more different than if they lived in the most distant countries. The Turks make profession of candour and faithfulness, and are a charitable good natured people, jedousy excepted, and very sober. On the other hand, they are extremely proud, insolent, superstitions and covetous. They are also much addicted to unnatural lusts, and despise all other nations in general, especially those which are not of their religion. The common appeliation, that they give the Christians is that of dogs. An uniformity runs through all the actions of the Turks, and they never change their manner of living. They seem to have no kind of genius for the improvement of the arts They seem to have no kind of and sciences, though they live under the influence of the same heaven, and possess the same countries, as the anpossess the same characteristic free generally loiter away their time, either among the women in the haram, or in smoking or taking opium; and though they herd together, you will observe as hale conversation among them as among so many horses in a stable. They seldom travel, or use any exercise or rural sports; and discover little or no curiosity to discover the state of their own, or any other country; but Turkey, after all, is not without men of parts, probity, and honour; nor without benevolent, liberal, conversible, and ingenious people. They behave very com-mendably to their slaves and servants. and frequently better than the Christions do to theirs. There are no here-Their cleanliness is extraordinary; for ditary governments or titles of nobility they bathe twice a-week, and suffer not in Turkey; and indeed the commonal-

Not many years since a printing-house was set up at Constantinople, where books of all kinds were allowed to be printed, except on matters of religion. The most ingenious Mussulmen employ themselves in reading the Alcoran and the commentators upon it, to which almost all their learning is confined. Some of them amuse themselves with poetry, in which they are said to succeed very well, and other Turks delight in Music. The whole Turkish army, regulars and irregulars, amounts to above 300,000 men. Besides the true junizaries, or junisaries of the porte, and in actual pay, there are great numbers all over the empire, who precure themselves to oe regiswho precure themselves to be en-tered in this body, in order to be en-titled to their privileges. The Turk-ish navy is not so considerable a might be expected in such extensive do-minions, situated on several seas, and abounding in commedious harbours. By their neglecting navigation and foreign commerce, they can never find sailors to man a great ficet; and these Turkin, a town of Russia, situate on they have are unskilful, as well as the Caspian. If they would 15 N apply themselves to navigation, and make the most of their situation and make the most of their situation and advantages, they could not fail to become a very formidable maritime power. Their navy generally consists of about 40 large ships, exclusive of galleys. In time of war they hire or buy merchant ships, and others are sent them four Algies Tunic and Traind. them from Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. The manufactures and commodities of Turkey are silks, carpets, goat's hair, wool, camel's hair, cotton-yarn, dimity, burdets, waxed liner thagreen skins, blue, red, and vellow .gorocco leather; one, red, and yellow Advocco leather; coffee, rhubarb, turpentine, storax, gums, opium, galls, mastie, emery, lemnian bole, pomegranate shells, sponges, dates, almords, wine, oil, figs, raisins, mother of pearl, boxwood, salfron, &c. These are exported in large quantities by the several European trading natures, who import their own goods and purchase those of the courtry. The inland trade is carried on chiefly by the Jews and Armenians; with the title of a grand dutchy; boundand even the Turks send merchandise, both by land and water, from one the Modenese, and the Parmesan; on the Tyre, Sidon, and Alexandria, which once commanded the navigation and trade of the world, are in their possession, but make no figure in commerce at this day: and well it is for the Christians that the Turks are such an indolent generation; for their situation and vast extent of empire would enable them to monopolize the trade of the world, if they attended to it. In this empire there is a great traffic in the human species: not only male slaves, but beautiful young girls, being publicly bought and sold. The Turks believe in one God, and that his great prophet is Mahomet. Constantinople is the capital of all Turkey.

Venice, a territory and lately the re-public of io Italy which comprehends 14 provinces, namely, the Dogado, the Paduano, the Vicentino, the Veronese, the Bresciano, the Bergomasco, the Cremasco, the Polesino-di-Rovigo, the Marca-Trevigiana, the Feltrino, the Bellunese, the Cadorino, Friuli, and Istry, and retired into the islands of the Adriatic Sea. As these islands are near each other, they found means to join them together, by driving piles on the side of the canals, on which they built houses, and thus the superb city of Venice had its beginning. The go-vernment of the republic of Venice was aristocratic, for none could have had any share in it but the nobles. These

Any man of these families above 25 years of age, had a right to be a member of the council, whether he had any capacity or not. It generally consisted of about 2500; and they were accounted great politicians, good negociators, and secret even to a scrunegociators, and secret even to a scruple. They also made a magnificent appearance, suitable to the dignity of their employment. The Doge was elected by a plurality of voices, and kept his dignity for life. In his election they made use of gold and silver balls, which were put in a vessel, and served for balloting. Those who drew nine golden balls, first elected 40 counsellors, who drew twelve others. These elected 25 other counsellors, who drew orected 25 other counsellors, who drew 9 golden balls. These 9 elected 40 counsellors, who drew 11. Those that had the 11, chose 41 counsellors, who proceeded to the election, till 25 votes or more fell upon the same person, who was then declared Doge. After this election they placed the ducal cap on his head, upon which he took possession of the Doge's palace. He never uncovered his head to any person, because he did not wear the cap in his own name, but in that of the republic. When there were any great solemni-ties, a nobleman carried the sword, which was an emblem of the supreme authority; but it was not before the Doge, but before the senate, to shew that the power was longed in them. tria; which see in their proper places. lors called the Signiora. The second was the Consiglia Grande, or Great Council, in which all the nobles had a roice, and sitting. The third was the Consiglio-dei-Pregadi, which was as it were the soul of the republic, and consisted of about 250 of the nobility.
The fourth was the Consiglio-Propria, whose members were called Savii Grandi, or the Great Sages, was joined to the Signiors, and consisted of 28 assessors. This gave audience to the Il-Collegio-dellidieci, and was composed of 10 counsellors, who took notice of all criminal matters, and the Doge himself when accused, was obliged to appear before them. There was no appear before them. There was no appeal from this council, and it was a great misfortune to be cited before it. It was a kind of state inquisition, as severe as that for religion; and they had a great number of spies, who dis-covered not only what was done, but what was said. As to religion, the Venetians are Roman-Catholics, and yet they tolerate the Greeks, Turks, and Persians. The protestants are not allowed the free exercise of their religion; but they are neither hated nor persecuted, as in other Popish countries. The head of the clergy is the Patriarch of Venice, who must be a noble Venetian, and is elected by the senate. This Patriarch, in consequence of the policy of the senate, has scarce any power over the priests and monks, who are greatly corrupted. There is another Patriarch belonging to Venice, whose authority extends over Friuli, lstria, and most of the bishops on Ter-ra Firma. The tribunal of the inquisiion at Venice, was composed of the Pope's Nuncio, the Patriarch of Venice, and the Father inquisitor; but to prevent these from abusing power, three counsellors were added to the number, without whose consent they could determine nothing. The clergy in general are ignorant, and yet they are pretty good orators. When the diverions of the carnival were over, nohing was heard but sermons about repentance, and they declaimed very trongly against the violators of the sixth commandment; however, the

the city, and out of it he was no more in fashion, that the confessors themethan a private person. There were selves treat it as a peccadiilo. The four councils, the first of which was composed of the Doge, and six counsel-ries of the republic, is estimated at ries of the republic, is estimated at 2,500,000. Venice was once one of the most powerful commercial and maritime states in Europe. For this it was indebted, at first, to the monopoly of the commerce of India; the products of that country being conveyed, in the middle ages, up the Persian Gulf, the Euphrates, and the Tigris, as far as Bagdad; thence by land, across the desert, to Palmyra; and thence to the Mediterranean ports ; and, afterwards, the supplying of the crusaders with provisions and military stores was an additional source of wonderful opulence and power. The causes of the decline of Venice were the continual wars with the states of Italy, with the Hungarians, and their own rebellious subjects, which kept them employed so that they had no leisure to oppose the Turks, whose rapid advances ought to have alarmed all Europe. After the destruction of the eastern empire, the Turks came more immediately to interfere with the republic. Whatever va-lour might be shown by the Venetians, or whatever successes they might boast of, it is certain that the Turks ultimately prevailed; so that for some time it seemed scarce possible to resist them. What contributed also greatly to the decline of the republic, was discovery of a passage by the Portuguese to the East Indies round the Cape of Good. Hope in 1499. To this time the greatest part of the East India goods imported into Europe passed through the hands of the Venetians; but as soon as the above-mentioned discovery took place, the carriage of India goods by the way of Alexandria almost entirely ceased. All these causes co-operating have reduced Venice from a state of the highest splendour and importance in European politics, to comparative insignificance. The declension of Verice did not, like that of Rome, proceed from the increase of luxury, or the revolt of their own armies in distant provinces, or from civil wars of any kind, Venice has dwindled in power and importance from causes which could not be forescen, or guarded against by human prudence although they had been foreseen. In their present situation, there is little probability of their atreach of it is so common, and so much tempting new conquests; happy if they are allowed to remain in the quiet pos- 1 ral, are narrow; and so are the canals, stession of what they have. Whatever degree of licentiousness may prevail among the Venetians, jealousy, poison, and the stiletto have been long builshed frow their gullantry. The common people of Venice display some qualities very rarely to be found in that sphere of life, being remarkably sober, obliging to strangers, and gentle with their in-tercourse with each other. The Venetions are in general tall and well made, They are a lively ingenious people, extravagantly fond of public amusements, travaganty ions of punish Lar humons, with an uncommon relish Lar humons, and yet more attached to the real enjoyments of life than to those which depend on estentation and proceed from vanity. The women are of an easy address, and have no aversion to cultivating an acquaintance with those strangers who are presented to them by their relations, or have been properly recommended.

Venice, a city of Italy, one of the most celebrated in the world, and capital of a republic of the same name, with a patriarchate, and a university. It stands on 72 little islands in the gulf of Venice. The approach to the city is marked by rows of stakes on each side, which direct vessels of a certain bur-den, to avoid the shallows. These shallows are a better defence than the strongest furtifications. On the approach of an enemy's fleet, the Venetians have only to pull up the stakes, and the enemy can advance no further. Venice is situate about five miles from the mainland, in a kind of laguna, lake, or smaller inner gulf, separated from the large one, called the gulf of Venice, by some islands, at a few miles distance. These islands, in a great measure, break the force of the Adriatic storms, before they reach the laguna yet, in very high winds, the navigation of the lake is dangerous to gondolas, and sometimes the gondol ers do not trust the asselves even in the canals within the city. This is not so great an inconvenience as might be imagined; for most of the houses have a door ed; for most of the houses have a door opening upon a canal, and another consuminating with the street; by means, of which, such of the bridges, a person may go to almost any part of the city by land, as well as by water. The number of the inhabitants is computed to be about 160,000. The houses are brilt on piles. The streets, in gene pretend, o except the Great Canal, which is very broad, and has a serpentine course through the middle of the city. There are above 500 bridges over these canals, the most famous of which is that called the Riaho. It is built about the widdle of the canal and the series of t rately sho middle of the great canal, which divides Venice into two parts. It is of white murble, and has but one arch, in which its principal beauty consists; and is 90 feet from one extremity to the other. On this bridge are two rows of shops, which divide it into three streets; the largest of which is in the middle The other bridge consists only of one arch, and has no rails on each side. The view from the Rialto is equally lively and magnificent; the Grand Canal covered by boats and gondolas, and flanked on each side by magnificent palaces. churches and spires Except the Grand Canal, and the Canale Regio, all the others are narrow and mean; some of others are narrow and mean; some of them have no quays, and the writer life-cally washes the houses. The only place where a person can walk with case and safety is in the Piazza dist. Marco; a kind of irregular quadrangle, formed by a number of buildings, all singular in their kind; namely the Ducal Palace; the churches of St. Mark and St. Geminiano; the Old and New Procuraties, a noble range of buildings, in which are the museum, the public library, and nine large apartments belonging to the procurators of the public infrary, and time targe spatements belonging to the procurators of St. Mark. All these buildings are of marble. At the corner of the new procuratie, a little distance from the church stands the steeple of St. Mark. enurch stands the steeple of St. Mark, a quadrangular tower, about 300 feet high. The patriarchal church of St. Mark, though one of the richest and most expensive in the world, does not opportu strike the eye very much at first. The hey sel architecture is of a mixed kind, mostly mily wa Gothic; yet many of the pillars are secret r the Greeian orders. The trade of the city at present is far short of whatir brage t was formerly. Their chief manufac-tures are cloth: especially scarlet, silks, gold and silver stuffs, broades, is an op the sea, of gran velvets, and paper, of which, and wine, oil, fruit, sweetmeats, anchovies, and is the bulls a several sorts of drugs used in physic and painting, the exports are still considerable. The low-orgaliery, or piazza, under the palace, is called the Broglio. In this the noble Venetians walk and converse; it was opportunities of meeting together; for they seldom visited openly, or in a fa-naly way, at each other's houses; and secret meetings would have given um-brage to the state inquisitors. There is an opening from St. Mark's Place to the sea, on which stand two lofty pillars of granite. The grand scene of all, the shews and follies of the festivals, is the square of St. Mark, in which bulls are sometimes baited. In the very strange, that the stairs are no better than a privy. In this square besides the church and palace of St. Mark, are two towers, on one side of which is a curious clock; and the other has stairs so constructed that one may ride up on horseback. Opposite to the du-cal palace is the public library of the commonwealth a containing a large collection of books and manuscripts, with some fine paintings, statues, and curiosities. Hard by St. Mark's square is the zeeca, or mint: from zeeca the gold coin called Zeechino takes its name. One of the smallest pieces of name. One of the smallest pieces or money at Venice is called Gazetta; and the first newspapers published there, on a single leaf, having been sold for that a-piece, all kinds of newspapers were from thence styled Gazettes. Then there is scarce any distinction between vice and virtue; for libertinism reigns through the city, and thousands of foreigners frequent it from all parts of Europe. They all appear in masks, which no one can venture to take off: in this disguise they imitate the fary of the ancient Bacchanals; and the nearer Ashwednesday approaches, the more mad they are. The principal spot of the masquerade is St. Mark's Place, where doge's palace all the high colleges held their assemblies; but we are told by several travellers, which seems mountebanks, ropedancers, and puppetshows. Vermont, one of the United States of America; bounded on the N by Canada, on the E by the river Connecticut, which divides it from New Hampshire, on the S by Massachusetts, and on the W by New York. It is 155 miles long and 66 broad, and divided into 11 counties. A chain of high mountains, running N and S divides this state nearly in the centre between Connecticut river and Lake Champlain. The height of land is generally from 20 to 30 miles from the river, and about the same distar se from the New York line. The natural growth upon this mountain is hemlock, pine, spruce, and other ever-greens; hence it has always a green appearance, and on this account has obtained the descriptive name of Ver-Mons, Green Mountain. On some high parts of this mountain, snow lies till May, and sometimes till June. The country is generally hilly, but not rocky. the best of pasturage for cattle. On the banks of the lakes, rivers and rivulets, are many fine tracts of rich interval land. The heavy growth of timber, which is common throughout the state, evince the strength and fertility of the soil. Elm, black birch, maple, ash and base-wood, grow in the moist low ground; and the banks of the rivers are timbered principally with white pinc, intermingled with vales of beech, elm and white oak. The inhabitants cultivate wheat, 25 and 30 bushels of which grow on an acre, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, &c. The corn, however, is frequently cut off by the early frosts, especially on the mountains and hills. That which grows on the banks of the rivers is not so frequently injured. Flax is raised in considerable quantities, and the soil is good for hemp. Potatoes, pumpkins, and garden roots and vege-tables, grow here in great plenty. Large quantities of sugar, of a good quality and flavour, are made from the sugar maple. The inhabitants have been estimated at 106,000. The principal town is Bennington.

In the reign of Lewis XIII. it was only a small village, till Lewis XIV. built a magnificent palace here, which was the usual residence of the kings of France, till 1789, when Lewis XVI. and his family, were forced by the mob to remove from it to Paris. The buildings and gardens were adomed with a vast number of statues, by the greatests masters, and the water-works were magnificent. The great gallery is thought to be as curious a piece of workmanship of that kind, as any in the world; nor is the chapel less to be admired for its fine architecture and ornaments. The gardens with the park, are five miles in circumference, and surrounded by walls. Versailles is ten miles W S W of Paris.

Vesuvius, a celebrated volcano of ltaly, six miles E of Naples. This mountain has two tops; one of which only goes by the name of Vesuvius, the other being now called Somma; but now little sir William Hamilton is of opinion, that cumference. the latter is what the ancients called Vesuvius. The perpendicular height of Vesuvius is only 3700 feet, though the ascent fron the foot to the top is three Italian miles. One side of the mountain is well cultivated and fertile, producing great plenty of vines; covered with cinders and ashes; while a sulphureous smoke constantly issues from the top, sometimes attended with the most violent explosions of stones, the emission of great streams of lava, and all the other attendants of a most formidable volcano. The first of these eruptions recorded in history took place in the year 79; at which time the two cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum were entirely buried un-der the stones and ashes thrown out. Incredible mischief was also done to the neighbouring country, and numbers of people lost their lives, among whom was Pliny the clder. It is the opinion of the best judges, however, that this cruption was by no means the first that had ever happened. The very streets of those cities, which were at that time overwhelmed are said to be part-ly paved with lava. Since that time 30 different emptions have been recorded. some of which have been extremely violent. In the year 1538, a mountain three miles in circumference and a quarter of a mile in perpendicular height was thrown up in the course of one night. There have been instances of ashes and sulphureous smoke being carried not only to Rome, but also beyond the Mediterranean into Africa, and even into Egypt; birds have been suffocated in the air, and have fallen down upon the ground; and fishes perished in the neighbouring waters which were made hot, and infected by it. The operations of the subterraneous fire, appear to be very capricious and uncertain. One day there will be the appearance of a violent fermentation, and the next every thing will be calmed; but whenever there has been a considerable ejection of scorize and cinders, it has been a constant observation, that the lava soon made its appearance, either by boiling over the crater, or forcing its way through the crevices. in the conical part of the mountain The top of the mountain fell in, in 1634, and the mouth of Vesuvius is now little short of two miles in cir-

Vienna, a city of Germany, capital of the circle of Austria, and of the whole German empire. The city itself is not of great extent, nor can it be enlarged, being limited by a very strong fortification; but it is populous, and contains the openings of the neighbouring mountains. No houses without the walls are allowed to be built nearer many houses have extensive gardens belonging to them. Many families who live during the winter within the fortifications, spend the summer in the suburbs. This city has six gates well de-fended, and 12 walled bastions, with strong ravelins. The streets in general are narrow, and the houses high. Some of the public buildings are magnificent: The chief of them are the Imperial P: lace, the Library, and the Museum; the palaces of the princes Lichtenstein, Eugene, &c. Vienna was ineffectually besieged by the Turks, in 1589 and 1683. At the latter period the siege was raised by John Soliciski, king of Poland, who totally defeated the Turkish arms before the walks of this place. roland, who totally defeated the Furk-ish army before the walls of this place. The cathedral is built of freestone, and The cathedral is built of freestone, and the steeple is 447 feet high. Joining to this church is the archbishop's palace, the front of which is very fine. The university had several thousand students, who, when this city was besieged, mounted guard, as they did also in 1741. The archducal library is much frequented by foreigners, as it contains above 100,000 printed books, and 10,000 manuscripts. There are also two remarkable columns, of which one is called the conception of the immaculate Virgin, and the other St. Tri-nity, which cost 300,000 florins It is 66 feet high, in the form of a triangular pyramid, on the top of which are three figures of gilt bronze, representing the trinity. The archducal treasury, and a cabinet of curiosities of the house of Austria, are as great rarities as any in the world. the world. Leopolstadt is one of the suburbs, and scated on an island, formed by the Danuhe; here the Jews dwelt formerly, but they were banished in 1670, and the suburb turned into a church. There is a sort of harbour on the Danube, where are magazines of naval stores, and ships have been fitted out to serve on that river against the Turks. Vienna is an archbishop's see; & in the winter season is frequently visited by dreadful storms, which rush throthe openings of the neighbouring mountains. It is sented at the place where

Great Britain During the present 15 52 N. war, the Caribs revolted; and, assisted Vintim by the French, spread desolation over the whole island. By the exertions of the governor, however, and the British forces in the West Indies, the revolt is in a great measure quelled, though it will be long before things are restored to their former state. St. Vincent is in length about 24 miles, and about 18 in breadth; in circumference between 60 and 70. The climate is very warm: at least in the judgment of the Europeans. The country is in general kills, in some places mountainous ; but interspersed with a variety of pleasant vallies, and some fuxuriant plains, the soil being every where fertile, and the high grounds are at least in general easy of ascent. Few islands of its extent are so well watered; for several rivers run down from the mountains, and smaller streams from almost every hill; there are likewise several very fine springs at a little distance from the sea. The inhabitants raise all kinds of ground provisions in plenty, and with little trouble. The rivers supply them with a variety of fish; and the same may be said of the sea that washes their coasts. They have abundance of excellent fruits, and very fine dance of excenent traits, and very me timber fit for almost every use; and with which they formerly supplied their neighbours. That nere and there some amail hills. I hat near the sea is generally sandy, and without stones, for which reason the horses are seldom shed. The richest lands lie near the branches of the rivers, and abound with various sorts of timber, surprisingly large. The principal produce is tobacco, wheat, and In-dian eorn; but the culture of tobacco has considerably declined in favour of that of wheat. The Virginians are in that of wheat. The Virginians are in general sensible, polite, and hospita-ble, and of an independent spirit. The poor are ignorant and abject, and all are of an inquisitive turn, and in many other respects very much resemble the people in the eastern states. They differ from them, however, in their differ from them, however, in their morals; the former being much addicted to gaming, drinking, awearing, horse-racing, cock-fighting, and most kinds of dissipation. There is much greater disparity between the rich and the poor in Virginia, than in any of the northern states. Virginia is disided into 82 counties, and in 1790, contained 747,610 inhabitants, including, 292,627 slaves. The capital is Richmond.

United Provinces of the Netherlands, a republic of Europe, consisting of seven provinces, which extend 150 miles from N to S, and 100 from E to W. They are bounded on the W and N by the German Ocean, on the S by Brabant and the bishopric of Liege, and on the E by Germany. They rank in the follow-ing order; Guelderland, Holland, Zeaand, Utrecht, Friesland, Overyssel, and Groningen. Besides these provinces, are the lands of the Generality of Bois-le-Duc, Breda, Bergen-op-Zoom, Maestricht, Venlo, Sluys, and Hulst. The seven United Provinces being in great part surrounded by the dams erected for defending the country against the inundations of the sea, and in ditches, canals, mills, and sluices, for draining the marshes. The quanti-ty of grain produced is not sufficient for home consumption; but the pastures in the marshes are so rich, that they can spare a great deal of butter and cheese for exportation. They have also a good breed of sheep, whose wool is highly valued. Their turf, madder, tobacco, some fruit, and iron; but all the pit-cool and timber used in this country, and indeed most of the necessaries of life, are imported All the right branch, then increased by the Vecht, which has now another outlet, overflowing the low swampy grounds through which it passed; and partly by the sea, in the 13th century, breakby the sea, in the 13th century, breaking in, and overflowing a large tract of ground contiguous to that before laid under water by the Rhine. The principal rivers are the Rhine, the Meuse, the Scheld, and the Vecht. There are many smaller rivers that join these, and a vast number of canals; vet there are few good harbours in the previnces. The best are those of Rot-terdam, Helvoetsluys, and Flushing. As to the harbour of Amsterdam, it is inder I one of the largest and safeat in Europe; but there is a bar at the en-trance of it, over which large vessels cannot pass without being lightened or unloaded. There are no mountains in these provinces; and the only lake, properly so called, is that of Haerlem. The provinces are extremely well cultivated, and very populous; especially that of Holland, which, in this respect, perhaps has not its equal in the universe. The towns are very agreeable, and Gronngen. Besides these provinces, are the lands of the Generality being kept clean, and having canals in (including Dutch Brabant, Flanders, and Limburg) in which are the towns trees. The number of inhabitants is computed at 2,000,000. The animals here are much the same as in England; but their borses and borned cattle are of a larger size. Storks build and being in great part surrounded by the sea, lying low, and abounding in marshes, have a damp and unwholesome air. Rains and fogs are frequent; and the gout, scurry, rheumatism, and agues, very common and difficult of cure. The effects of human industry here are worderful in the dykes and home greated for definitions. neither oysters nor herrings are to be found upon the coast: but of other fish they have the several sorts, both in their seas and rivers, that we have in Britain. The established religion here before the Revolution was the Presoyterian, or Calvinism: none but Presbyterians were admitted into any office or post in the government, excepting the army; all religious and sects, however, were tolerated, and had their respec-tive meetings or assemblies for public worship, among which the Papists and Jews were very numerous. Since the late alliance with France, no particular religion is established; and the philegmatic Dutch have drank deep of provinces either lie upon, or communi-cate with the North Sea, by means of the cup of infidelity, mixed by their Doppo

new and volatile allies. With regard them; for they may not be struck or to the commerce of this country, their corrected by them, but the dispute East India company had the monopoly must be left to the magistrate. The of the fine spices for more than 100 years, and was long the most opulent and powerful of any in the world. Though the country itself produces very few things, yet almost all the products and commodities of the globe may be found here, nearly as cheap as in the countries where they are made or produced. A vast variety of manufactures are carried on in the provinces, and with extraordinary skill and dili and with extraordinary skill and dili-gence; and a great number of hands are employed, and much wealth ac-quired, by the herring, cod, and whale fisheries. No nation has equalled them in the curing of herrings; those cured at Glasgow, in Scotland, are thought to come nearest to them. About 150 sail were annually employed in the whale fishery and about 200 in the herring. The profits of the latter, in a good year, after all deductions, were thought to amount to 200 000 Holland Guilders. The principal manufactures here are those of linen, paper, and earthen ware of all sorts. Ship-huild ing also employed vast numbers of hands. The trade of this country, however, upon the whole, has long been declining; owing partly to a decline of their ancient parsimony and industry; but chiefly to the improvement of manufactures, trade, and navigation, in other countries, and at present (1800) is almost ambibilated As to the character of the Dutch, the boors or husbandmen are industrious enough, but heavy, and slow of understanding. The scamen are a plain, blunt, but rough, surly, and ill-mannered sort of people. Their tradesmen are something sharper, and make use of all their skill to take advantage of those they deal with. Every class of men is extremely frugal. All appetites and passions run lower and cooler here than in other countries. avarice excepted Quarrels are very rare, revenge is seldom heard of, and jealousy scarcely ever known. It is very uncommon for any of them to be really in love, or even pretend to it; nor do the women seem to care whether they are or not. People converse pretty much upon a level here; nor is it easy to distinguish the man from the master, or the maid from the mistress, such liberties do they allow their servants, or rather are obliged to allow is the capital; but the seat of the states

Dutch are tall and strong built; but both men and women have the grossest shapes that are to be met with any where. Their garb, except among the officers of the army and some few others, is exceeding plain, and the fash-ions change as seldom as in Spain. The men are addicted to drinking, which some think necessary in this foggy air, both for their health and the improvement of their understandings. Among their diversions, that of skaiting in winter is one of the chief. It is amazing to see the crowds in a hard frost upon the ice, and their dexterity in skaiting; both men and women darting along with inconceivable velocity. The Dutch are remarkable for their cleanliness: nothing can exceed the neatness of their houses, towns, and villages. Many of them have distinguished themselves by their learning, and some even by their wit and ingenuity; witness Erasmus, Grotius, &c. The Dutch excel also in painting and engraving; and some of them have been no contemptible statuaries. In consequence of the Union (See Netherlands) the Seven Provinces guarantee each other's rights; they make war and peace, levy taxes, &c. in their joint capacity; but as to internal government, each province is independent. They send deputies (chosen out of the provincial states) to the general assembly, called the states general, which is invested with the supreme legislative power of the confederation. At the head of this government there has usually been a prince stadtholder, who'exercises a considerable part of the exeecutive power. Having deserted the grand alliance formed against the dia-turbers of the peace of Europe, and the office of the stadtholder being abolished, the Dutch republic, under the name of an ally, is now in reality little better than a province, of France. The consequence of this alliance is what might have been expected. The British government, obliged to attack its chemies wherever it might find them, commenced hostilities against the United Provinces, and in the compass of a very short period wrested from them their most valuable possessions both in the East and West Indies. Only eleven of these states acceded, at first, te the new federal constitution, but they were afterward joined by North Carolina and Rhode Island; and Kentucky, Vermont, and Tennessee, hav-ing since been added to them, the preent number of the states that form this great American republic is six-teen. In the treaty of peace, conclud-ed in 1783, the limits of the United States are thus defined. "And that all disputes which might arise in fu-ture on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and clared, that the following are and shall be their boundaries, viz. From the N W angle of Nova-Scotia, viz. Until the fourth of July, 1776, the present Thirteen States were British colonies. On that memorable day, the Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, made a solemn declaration, in which they assigned their reasons for withdrawing their allegiance from the king of Great Britain. Appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of their intentions, they did, in the name and by the authority of the good people of the colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies were, and of right ought to be "Free and Independent States;" that they were absolved from all allegiance to the Woods to the said Lake of the Woods to the said Lake of the Woods thence through the said lake to the most northwesternmost opint thereof, and from thence, on a totally dissolved; and that as Free and

For the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine providence, the delegates then in Congress, 55 in number, mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honour. At the same time they published articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union between the States, in which they took the style of "The United 15 E, lat. 57 56 N. States of America," and agreed that each state should retain its sovereign-vinces, in Holland. It was taken by the ty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right not expressly delegated to Congress by the confederation. By these articles the Thirteen United States severally entered into a firm league of friend-ship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, and bound themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks that might be made upon all, the archdutchy of Austria, which enor any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, commerce, or any other pretence whatever. But for the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, it was determined that Delegates should be annually appointed, in such manner as to the W, and still farther on the plans the Legislature of each State should to the E of this chain of mountains. direct, to meet in Congress the first Monday in November in every year Gen. Uralian Cossacs, a Tartar tribe that inhabit the Russian province of Oren-burg, on the S side of the Ural. These Cossacs are descended from those of the Dong and are a valiant race. They profess the Greek religion; but there are dissenters from the established religion, whom the Russians called Raskolniki, or Separatists, and who style themselves Staroverski, or Old Believers. These consider the ser-vice of the established church as profane, and have their own priests and ceremonies. The Uralian Cossacs are all enthusiasts for the uncient ritual, and prize their beards almost equal to their lives. They are rich from their considerable fisheries in sturgeons a they have also acquired a spirit of revolt and independence by being situated in a desert between the Calmucs and the Kirghese, who are continually at variance with each other, and often with the Cossacs themselves. A Russian officer having ordered a number of Cossac recruits to be publicly shaved in the town of Yaitsk, in 1771, this wanton insult excited an insurrection, which was suppressed for a time. Many of the rebels made their escape, and, retiring into the desert, chiefly re-sorted to the marshy grounds which lie about the lake Kamysh-Samara, where they derived a subsistence from fishing and shooting wild boars, and were supplied occasionally by their relations with bread and provisions. By these means this desperate troop supported themselves during the space of two years, until the impostor, Pugatclef, having assumed the name of Peter III. appeared among them, and, taking advantage of this circumstance, roused them once more into open rebellion ; the river Yaik was called the Ural; the Yaik Cossaes were denomi-nated Uralian Cossaes; and the town of Yaitsk was named Uralsk.

These Tartars are divided into several tribes, governed by their respective Khans, or princes. When under one sovereign, they were the most powerful of all the Tartarian asmost powerful of all the Tartarian attors. The principal Khans pride themselves in being descended from Tamerlane, whose birthplace was the ancient city of Samarcand, the present capital of the country. The Usbecs, in their persons, are said to have better complexions and more engaging features than the Kalmucs. Their relitures than the Kalmucs. gion is Mahometanism; and they dif-fer, in general, very little from the people of the northern provinces of Hindoostan.

Waldstalte, a name given to the Swiss cantons of Lucern, Uri, Schweitz, and stadte, or Forest Towns of Suabia, which are Lauffenburg, Waldschut, Seckingen, and Rhein-elden.

Waldstetter See, or Lake of the Four Cantons, one of the finest lakes in Swis-serland. It consists of three principal branches, called the lakes of Lucern, Schweitz, and Uri. The apper branch, or lake of Lucern, is in the form of a cross; the sides of which stretch from Kusnatcht to Dullenwal, a village near Central Village near Central Village near Stantz. It is bounded toward the town by cultivated hills sloping gradually to the water, contrasted on the opposite side by an enormous mass of barren and craggy rocks, Mount Pilate, one of the highest mountains in Swisserland, rising boldly from the lake. Toward the E of this branch, the lake contracts into a narrow creek, scarcely a mile across. Soon after it again widens, and forms the second branch, or lake of Schweitz; on the W side the canton of Underwalden, on the E that of Schweitz. Here the mountains are more lofty, and in-finitely varied; some covered to the very summits with verdure, others per-pendicular and craggy; here forming amphitheatres of wood; there jutting ampintnearres of wood, into the water in bold promontories. Towards the end of this branch the lake forms a considerable bay in the midst of which, lies the village of Brumen, near which commences the third branch, or lake of Uri; the scenery of which is most amazingly grand and sublime. It is a deep and narrow lake about nine miles in length, bordered on both sides with rocks uncommonly wild and romantic, and, for the most part, perpendicular; with forests of beech and pine growing down their sides to the very edge of the water; indeed the rocks are so entirely steep and over-hanging, that there are hardly more than four or five landing spots, here the lake is as smooth as crystal; and the silent, solemn gloom which reigns in this place, is not less awful and affecting than the tremendous roaring of the cataract in the other. Some what further upon the highest point of the Seelisberg, there is a small chapel that seems inaccessible. On the opposite side, but farther on, appears the chapel of William Tell, erected in honour of that hero, and upon the very spot where (it is Underwalden. It signifies Forests aid) he leaped from the boat, in which he was carrying prisoner to Kussnatcht. It is built upon a rock that juts out into must not be confounded with the Wald-

Wales, New South, the E coast of New Holland, extending from 43 49 to 10 37 S lat, being the N and S extremities of that vast island. This coast was first explored by captain Cook, in 1770; and a design was formed, in consequence of his recommendation, to settle a colony of convicts at Botany Bay. Captain Fhilip being appointed governor of the intended settlement, as well as commodore on the voyage, sailed from Portsmouth, in May 1787, with a detachment of marines, and 77% convicts, of which 220 were women. He arrived at Botany Bay in January 1788; but finding this bay very ineligible for a colony, he fixed upon Port Jackson, about thre leagues and a half N of Cape Banks; and here a settlement was begun, to which he gave the name of Sydney Cove. For the subsequent pro-rection farther than the eye can trace, about 60 miles inland. The general about 60 miles inland. The general face of the country is pleasing, diversified with gentle risings and small winding valleys, covered for the most winding valleys, covered for the most part with large spreading trees afford-ing a succession of leaves in all sca-sons. A variety of flowering shrubs, almost all entirely new to an European, and of exquisite fragrance, abound in those places which are free from trees; those places which are free from trees; and among these, a tall shrub, bearing an elegant flower, which smells like English may, is peculiarly delightful, and perfumes the air to a great distance. There are but few trees; and, as captured the state of the but the but the state of the but the state of t tain Tench and others relate, of so bad a grain, that they can scarcely be used for any purpose: This, however, Mr. Stockdale uscribes to their being used in an unscasoned state, as has been already mentioned In return for these bad qualities, however, the trees yield vast quantities of the gum already mentioned as a cure for the dysentery. The climate of this continent appears not to be disagreeable, notwithstanding the violent complaints which some have made about it. The heat has never been excessive in summer, nor is the cold intolerable in winter. Storms of thunder and lightning are frequent; but these are common to all warm countries; and it has been supposed (though upon what foundation dees not well appear) that were the country cleared of wood, and inhabited, these would in a great measure cease. A shock of an carthquake has likewise been felt; but these natural calamities are incident to some of the finest countries in the world. It is not known whether there are any volcanoes or not. The quadrupeds are principally of the opossum kind, of which the most remarkable is the kangaroo. Thers is also a species of dogs very different from those known in Europe; they are extremely fierce, and an never he brought to the same degree of familiarity as those which we are acquainted with: some of them have been brought with: some or them have been brought to England, but still retain their native ferncity. These dogs, which are the only domestic animal they have, are called dinge; but all other quadrupeds, ceedings of the colony, we must refer called dinge; but all other quadrupeds, to governor Philip's Voyage to Botany without exception, they name kangaway, and to the publications of captain roo. Several kinds of serpents, large spiders, and scolopen-dras, have also been met with; and dras, have also been net with three or four specis of ants, particularly green ants, which built their nests upon trees in a very singular manner. There are likewise many curious fishes; though the finny tribe seem not to be so plentiful on the coast as to give any considerable assistance in the way of provisions for the colony : some very large sharks have been seen in Port lackson, and two smaller species. The inhabitants of New South Wales are perhaps, the most miserable and savage race of men existing, going entirely naked. They were pleased at first with some ornaments that were given them, but soon threw them away as uselees. It does not appear, however, that they are insensible of the benefits of cloathing, or of some of the conveniences of which their new neighbours are possessed. Some of them, whom the colonists partly cloathed, seemed to be pleased with the comfortable warmth they derived from it; and they all express a great desire for our iron tools. Their clour is rather a deep chocolate than full black; but the filth with which their skin is covered, prevents its true colour from appearing. Notwithstanding their disregard for European finery, they are fond of adorning their bodies with scars, so that some of them make a very hideous figure. Sometimes, the skin is raised several inches from the flesh, and appears as if filled with wind; and all these seem to be reckoned marks of honour. Some of them perforate the cartilage of the nose, and thrust a large bone through it, a frightful kind of ornament, humorously called by the sailors their sprit sail yard. Their hair is generally so much clotted with a red gum, that they resemble a mop. They paint themselves with va-rious colours: they will also sometimes ornament the uselves with beads and shells, but make no use of the beautiful feathers of their birds. Most of the men want one of the fore-teeth in the upper jaw, which also appears to be a

of various kinds; among which the the clumsiness of their amputating instruments, must be a painful operation. The New Hollanders appear extremely deficient in the useful arts. Of the cultivation of the ground they have no noeat our bread or dressed meat. Hence they depend entirely for subsistence on the fruits and roots they can gather, and the fish they catch. They fre-quently set fire to the grass, in order to drive out the opossums, and other animals, from their retreats, and they have been observed to set decoys for quails. As sil these resources must be, at best, precarious, it is no wonder that they are frequently distressed for provisions. Thus, in the summer, they would eat neither the shark nor the sting ray; but, in winter, any thing was acceptable. A young whale being driven on shore, was quickly cut in pieces, and carried off: they broiled it only long enough to scortch the outside; and in this way extent them. and in this raw state they eat all their fish. They sometimes bake their provisions, by the help of hot stones, like the inhabitants of the islands in the Southern Ocean. Among the fruits used by them is a kind of wild fig.; and they eat also the kernels of a fruit resembling the pineapple. The principal part of their subsistence, however, is fish; and when these bappened to be scarce, they were wont to watch the opportunity when the coionists hauled the seine, and often seized the whole, though a part had formerly been offer-ed or given them. They sometimes strike the fish from the canoes with spears, sometimes catch them with hooks, and also make use of nets, which are generally made of the fibres of the flax plant, with very little preparation, and are strong and heavy; the lines of which they are composed being twisted like whipcord. Some of them, however, appear to be made of the fur of an animal, and others of cotton. The meshes of the nets are made of large loops artificially inserted into each other, without any knots. Their hooks orner, without any words. Their moves are made of the inside of a shell very much resembling mother-of-pearl. Their canoes are nothing more than large pieces of bark tied up at both ends with vines; and, considering the slight texture of these vessels, the dexterity with which they are managbadge of honour among them. It is com-mon for the women tocut off two joints ed, and the boldness with which they of the little finger; which, considering venture out to sea in them, are wonderful. There is no good reason for They certainly burn their dead; which, supposing them to be cannibals, but perhaps, has given rise to the story of they eat animal substances raw, or nearly so. Some of their vegetables are poisonous when raw, but not so when boiled. They could never be brought to taste spirits a second time. Their huts consist of pieces of bark laid together in the form of an oven, open at one end, very low, but long enough for a man to lie at full length, they seem to depend more out they seem to depend more for shelter on the caverns with which the rocks abund. So far from being so inured to the cold, by going invariably naked, as to be insensible to the injuries of the weather, the colonists had repeated opportunities of seeing them shivering with cold in the winter, or huddling together in heaps in their huts, or in caverns, till a fire could be kindled to warm them. It is probable, however, notwith tanding their extreme barbarism, that some knowledge of the arts may be introduced among them, as some have been seen attentively considering the utensils and conveniencies of the Europeans, with a view, seemingly, of making similar improvements. In some things also they possess a great power of imitation; they can imitate the songs and language of the Europeans almost instantancously, much better than the latter ean imitate theirs hy long practice; and this talent is discernable in their sculptures, every where to be met with on the rocks; these represent men on the rocks; these represent men and other animals, and, though rude, are very surprising for people who have not the knowledge of constructing a comfortable habitation, or of making clothes. In person, they are active, vigorous, and stout, though generally lean. The women have sometimes been kept back with the most jealous sensibility; sometimes offered with the greatest familiarity. Such of them as have been seen have soft and pleas ing voices; and seem not to be desti tute of modesty. The men display great personal bravery on the appear ance of any danger; but, with all their courage, they are much afraid of a musket, and almost equally so of a red coat, which they know to be the mar tial dress of the Europeans. The mischief which they have hitherto done has been exercised only on some few straggling convicts, most of whom probably have been the aggressors.

They are very expert at throwing their javelins, and will hit a mark, with great certainty, at a considerable distance. They are more numerous than was at first imagined; though still their numbers must be accounted few, in comparison to the extent of the country; and there is reason to believe that the interior parts are uninhabited. It is miles S by W of St. Alban's and 14 above six lengues in circuit, is a beautiful spot, with a surface covered 41 N. with verdure, and composed of hills and plains. The soil, in some parts, is light and sandy; but farther up the country, a reddish cast was seen on the rising grounds, where the islanders held their houses, which are long and spacious. The manners of the people of this island, their general habits of life, and their method of treating strangers, greatly resemble those that presal at Otahoite, and its neigh-bouring islands. There is also a great similarity between their religious opinions and ceremonies. From every circumstance, indeed, it may be consi dered as indubitable, that the inhabitants of Wateroo derive their descent from the same stock, which has so re markably diffused itself over the immense extent of the Southern Ocean.

Westmoreland, a county of England, enclosed between those of Cumperland, York, and Lancaster; the first bound-ing it on the N and N W; the second on the E; and the last on the S and S W. It has the natural boundaries of lakes, streams, and mountains, almost every where except to the S, where it sinks undistinguishably into Lancashire. From the sea it is excluded by the de-tached part of Lancashire; and only just touches upon the bettom of that wide sandy wash which separates the two parts of that county. Its shape is so irregularly angular, somewhat re-sembling that of a vine-leaf. Its size is less than of the other northern counties; yet, in its greatest length and breadth, it measures about forty miles The name of this county is descriptive of its nature. It is the West more land ! r region of lofty mountains, naked hills, and black barren moors, which here, as well as in Cumberland, a e also called fells. The vallies in which the rivers run are tolerably fertile; and in the north-eastern quarter there is a considerable tract of cultivated plain. The rest of the county affords only narrow dells and glens of fertility a-midst the dreary hills and extended wastes. Neither are its mineral treasures considerable. It wants couls, and the metallic ores it contains either lie so dead, or are so remotely situated, as not to be worth working. It as bounds in slate of the finest quality, large quantities of which are exported. The principal rivers are the Eden, Lone, and Ken. It has also several fine lakes, the principal of which is Winnander-mere, or Windermere-wa-ter. In the firest of Martindale, to the S of Ulls-water, the breed of red deer still exists in a wild state. Appleby is the county-town.

sent it as a perfect Paradise The fields are always green, and they cultivate beans, p tatoes, and fruits; nor will the negroes here let a fact of ground remain mentitivated. Besides, they sow again the very next day after they have reaped. The inhabitants are greatly civilized and very respectful to each other; especially to their superiors, and they are also so industrious, that even the women are never idle. These brew the beer, dress the victuals, and sell all sorts of commodities at ars, and self all sorts of commodities at the market. Those that are rich, em-ploy their wives and slaves in tiling the land, and five carry on a consider-able trade with the product as well as in slaves; for some of them are able to deliver 1000 of the latter every month. The chief men have generally 40 or 50 wives, the principal captains 3 or 400, and the king 4 or 5000. However, they are extremely jealous, and, on the least suspicion, will sell them to the Europe-ans for slaves. If any one happens to touch the king's wives accidentally, he is doomed to perpetual slavery. being considered, it is no wonder that the women are not fond of being the king's wives; nay, some of them will prefer a speedy death to such a misera-ble life. The king sets little value up-on his daughters, for he will dispose of them to the factors of the English company, or the masters of ships that come here. They live in a manner by guess ; or they have no festivals nor distinction of days, hours, weeks, months, or years. The custom of circumcision is used here; but they are not able to tell why they use it, nor from whence it is derived. They are such great gamesters, that they will stake all they have at play, not excepting their wives and children. Their religion is very superstitious; for they have a vast number of alols; and they deify the most con-temptible animal that they see first in a morning, not excepting even stocks and stones. However, they have a principal regard for snakes, very high trees, and the sea. An English factor new come over, found a snake in the house belonging to the factory, and killed it other. The houses are small, and round without the least scruple: which so at the top, and encompassed with mud incensed the negroes, that they were

upon the whole factory; but by the force of presents, and the interposition of the people of the other factories, this affair was made up, and the snake hon-ourably interred. However, to prevent the like accidents, they give them warning not to do the like for the future. With regard to the animals, they have oxen, cows, goats, sheep, and hogs, as well as tame fowls; such as turkies, ducks, and hens, which last are extremely plenty. There are many wild beasts within land, such as ele phants, buffaloes, tigers, several kinds of deer, and a sort of hares, with sevecal uncommon animals, which we have not room to describe. The fruits are citrons, lemons, oranges, bananoes, tamarinds, and several others; and they have vast numbers of palm-trees, from which they get their wine. All the common people go naked here, as in other parts of Guinea, only they have a cloth or clout to cover their naked-Their trade consisted of slaves, elephants teeth, wax, and honey. Whitehaven, a town of Cumberland, 10 miles S W from Cockermouth, 36 from Carlisle, and 290 from London, is so called from the white cliffs near it, that shelter the harbour from tempests. It is a populous rich town, chiefly be-holden for its improvement to the Lowther family, containing at least 12,000 inhabitants, and has about 300 ships employed in trade. It has a good artificial harbour, with a long pier. In 1566, it had but six houses, and one fishing boat; in 1582, 12 small ships. The coal-mines here are the most extraordinary in the world, being sunk to the depth of 130 fathoms, and extended under the sea to places where there is over them depth of water for ships of large burden. In 1791, part of the carth of three gardens suddenly shrunk : by this accident several lives were lost, and one building was considerably damaged. Coals had been wrought under the places where the apertures appeared about 50 years preceding 1791. Four fire engines belong to a colliery here, which, when at work, discharge at the rate of 1,768,620 gal-lons of water in 24 hours. Here are copperas-works, which yield considerable profit. Wielitska, a village of Poland, lately included in the palatinate of Cracow, but now comprised in the Austrian kingdom of Lodomeria. It is celebrated for its salt mines, which lie eight miles S E of Craco v. They appear to be inexhaustible, as will easily be con-ceived from the following account of its dimensions. Its known breadth is 1115 feet; its length 6691 feet; and depth 743; and the best judges on the spot suppose, with the greatest appearance of probability, this solid body of salt to branch into various directions, the extent of which cannot be known; of that part which has been perforated, the depth is only calculated as far as they have hitherto dug: and who can ascertain how much farther it may descend. Here are several small chapels exeavated in the salt, in which mass is said on certain days of the year; one of these chapels is above 30 feet long and 25 broad: the altar, the crucilia, the ornaments of the church, the statues of several saints, are all carved out of the salt. Many of the excavations or chambers, from whence the salt has been dug, are of an immense size; some are supported with timber, others by vast pillars of salt, which are left standing for that purpose : several of vast dimensions are without any support in the middle. I remarked (says Mr. Coxe) one of this latter sort in particular, which was certainly 80 feet in height, and so extremely long and broad, as almost to appear amid the subterraneous gloom without limits. The roofs of these vaults are not arched, but flat. The immense size of Turkish armies sent against him. In these chambers, with the spacious pas-

It is certain that there is room sufficient for such purposes; but the fact is, that the miners have no dwellings under ground, none of them remaining below more than eight hours at a time, when they are relieved by others from above. In truth, these mines are of most stupendous extent and depth, and are suffi-ciently wonderful without the least ex-aggeration. We found them as dry as a room, without the least damp or moisture; observing only in our whole progress one small spring of water, which is impregnated with salt as it runs through the mine. These mines have been worked above 600 years. Before the partition of Poland, in 1772, they furnished a considerable part of the revenue of the king, who drew from them an avarage profit of about

It is nearly divided into two equal parts by the river Cowes, which, rising in the S angle, discharges itself at the N into the channel, opposite the mouth of Southampton-bay. The E and W points of the island are almost cut off from the body by arms of the sea. The S coast is edged with very steep clills of chalk and freestone, hol-eages or galleries, together with the chapels above mentioned, and a few rocks, of which the most remarkable are those called, from their sharp extremities, the Needles. Between the island and the main are various sandbanks, especially off the E part, where is the safe road of St. Helen's. Across the island from E to W runs a ridge of hills, forming a tract of fine downs, with a chalky or marly soil, which feed a great number of fine-fleeced slicep. Rabbits are also very plentiful here. To the N of this ridge the land is chiefly pasture ; to the S of it is a rich arable country, producing great crops of corn. The variety of prospects which this island affords, its mild air, and the neat manner in which the fields are laid out, render it a very delightful spot. It is devoted almost solely to husbandry, and has no 'manufactory. It is one of the principal resources of the London market for unmalted barley. Among its products are to be reckoned a pure white pipe clay, and a fine white crystaline sand; of the latter of which great quantities are exported for the use of the glass-works in various parts. Its principal town is the borough of Newport: it likewise contains the two small boroughs of Newton and Yarmouth.

Wigtonshire, a courty in Scotland, comprehending the W part of Galloway, and the Regulity of Glenluce, extends about 31 miles in length from E to W, and as much from N to S, is bounded on the N by Ayrshire, and on the W by the Irish Sea. This part of it stretches into the sea in form of a peninsula, indented on both sides by two inlets called Lochrian and the bay of Glenbace steep clills of chalk and freestone, hollowed out into caverus in various parts. Galloway is a hilly country, well water-ed with lakes and running streams, and having several commodious creeks and harbours, but is destitute of wood and fuel. The people employ themselves perpetually in tishing on the coast, as perpetually in fishing on the coast, as well as in the lakes and rivers; in which last they catch immunerable multitudes N of Halifax, and 19 N E i Hills of ecls, part of which they salt for exportation.—Those who do not employ the aselves in this manner, engage themselves i farming, or in breeding of sheep, whose wool turns out to great advantage; or in raising black cattle, of which 50,000 are annually exported to England. They have like wise a small breed of horses peculiar to the county, and called Galloways; which are very strong, gentle, and fit for labour. The and that projects into the sea between the two bays of Lochrian and Glenluce, is called the Kennes of Galloway, and counted one of the most barren and rugged parts of Scotland. On the W coast is port Patrick, from whence the packet boat sails to Donaghadee, in Ireland; the channel in this place being not more than 20 miles over. From a neighbouring hill, one may see, in a fine day, Ireland to the S W, the coast of Cumberland and the Isle of Man to the SE, and to the N, the island of Il y and the Mall of Kintyre.

It is 53 miles long, and 3 broad; bounded on the N L by Berk shire, on the E by Berkshire and Hamp-shire, on the W by Somersetshire, oa the S by Dorsetshire and Hampshire. and on the N W and N by Gloucester. The land in this county is of various quality, but in general dry and elevated. The N part, formerly over-run with forests, and at present sprinkled with woods, is hilly, but fertile; and allords pasture for eattle The height of this tract is proved by the various rivers which have their sources in it. The heads of the Phames in Gloncestershare are very near the border of this county; and several of its tributary rills rise in the N of Wiltshire. The chalk hills occupy by their various ridges a considetable part of the middle of this connty, forming wide downs in the neigh-bourhood of Marlborough. Below the middle begins that extensive tract of open downs and heaths, great part of which bears the name of Salisbury plain, the most remarkable spot of the kind in England. Over these wilds, stretching beyond the reach of sight, wander vast flocks of sheep with their solitary shepherds, the sole tenants of the plain, except the bustard, the wheat ear, and a few other lovers of the desert. Ruins of Roman, Saxon and Danish monuments are scattered through these districts; among which the famous Stonehenge rises distinguished to the view. soil of this uncultivated waste is said to be naturally good, producing wild burnet, and fine grasses excellent for sheep. Its edges are fertilized by folding the flocks upon the ploughed land, and vield abundant crops of rye, barley, and wheat. To the south of the largest tract of plain is a rich well-inhab ted country, watered by various streams Hetween the rivers Willy and Nadder lies the Chicklade ridge of hills, among which is Chilmark, noted for its quarries. Beyond the Nadder, to the borders of Dorsetshire, the open plain re-appears. The chief manufactures are the different branches of the clothing trade. York, a city, the capital of Yorkshire, with an archbishop's see, and a market on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. It is the Eberacum of the Romans, and many of their coffins, urns, coins, &c. have been found here. It has always been considered as the capital of the North, and in point of rank, as the se-cond city in the kingdom: and, although it is now surpassed in wealth and populousness by many of the more modern trading towns, it still supports a considerable degree of consequence, and is the residence of many genteel families. The cathedral of St. Peter, generally called the minster, is reckoned the most elegant and magnificent Gothic structure in the kingdom, Lincoln perhaps excepted. From its top is seen a vast extent of country, particularly the open Woulds to the E, stretching almost to the sea Besides this cathedral, province of Chang-tong. Torkshire, a county of England, double in size to any of the other; bounded on the N by Dorham and Westmoreland; on the E by the German Ocean; on the W by Westmoreland and Lancashire; and on the S by the counties of Chester, Derby, Notting-bam, and Lincoln. Its most remark-able natural inland boundaries are, the river Tees to the N, the ridge of hills called the English Appennines to the W, and the arm of the sea named the Humber to the S W. The length of this county is above eighty miles, and its breadth an hundred. From its great extent it has been distributed into three main divisions, called Ridings. Of these the N Riding comprehends the whole northern part from side to side, descending to the capital in the centre: the E Riding takes the south eastern part, from the river Ouse to the sea; and the W Riding comprises all the rest of the county, which is not only the western, but most of the southern part. Yorkshire, in this wide compass, contains an abstract of

and affords excellent pasturage for catthe. Much flax is grown in parts of this district. The sea coast except the southern part of it, is in general nat-ed and dreary, consisting of wide ex-tended moors and barren hills. This county is extremely well watered, and ral, in the mountainous skirts of the county, from the N E round to the S W; and, uniting as they proceed to wards its centre, like the veins of a spreading leaf, at length terminate in one main trunk, which issues in the Humber. Of these the principal, and that which alone preserves its name to the furnibular is the number. name to the Humber, is the northern Ouse. From the mouth of the Tees the Yorkshire coast commences high and rude, interspersed with many fishing villages, singularly placed like nests upon the ledges of the rocks. No cost in England abounds more in fish of va-rious kinds than this; and it breeds an industrious and hardy race of fishermen, who pursue their prey to great distances and supply the inland country for a large extent. The district of Cleveland, inland from this part of the coast, is a fertile, though mountainous country, and breeds great numbers of cattle. The worst parts breed lean cattle; but, on the sides of the hills, in the vallies and plains, it produces good corn, and rich pastures for large cat-tle. Richmondshire, on the N W of this riding, was formerly a county of itself: here many lead mines are worked to great advantage. In Yorkshire likewise are the districts of Cleveland, Holderness, and Craven. In this last district are two of the highest hills in England; the one named Warnside, the other Ingleborough. The principal rivers are the Ouse, Don, Dervent, Calder, Aire, Warf, Nidd, Ure, and Hull, all which terminate in the Humber, which falls into the German Ocean, between Yorkshire and Lin-coinshire.

It in 350 miles long and 300 broad, and is divided into 13 counties, broad, and is divided into 13 counties, containing 44,000 square miles. New York, in general, is intersected by ridges of mountains running in a N E and S W direction. Beyond the Allertic and S was a square of the state of the gany mountains, however, the country is quite level, of a fine rich soil, covered in its natural state, with various kinds of trees. East of the Allegany mountains the country is broken into hills with rich intervening vallies. The hills are clothed thick with timber, and when cleared afford fine pasture. The vallies when cultivated, produce, wheathemp, Indian corn, &c. The hills are covered in various parts of the State, with several kinds of oak, such as white, red, yellow, black and chesnut oak. Besides these is the sumach, which bears clusters of red herries; the Indians chew the leaves instead of tobacco; the berries are used in dyes. Of the commodities produced from cul-ture wheat is the staple, of which immense are raised, and exported. In dian eorn and peas are likewise raised for exportation; and rye, oats, barley, &c. for home consumption. In some parts of the state large dairies are kept, which furnish for the market butter and cheese. The best lands in this State, which lie along the Mo-hawks river, and W of the Allegany mountains, are yet in a state of nature, or are just beginning to be settled. This state abounds with several fine rivers and lakes.

Zanguebar, a country on the E coast of Africa, between 3° N and 18° S lat. It includes several petty kingdoms, in which the Portuguese have settlements. The inhabitants except those converted by the Portuguese, are either Mahometans or pagans, the latter much the more numerous. The principal territories are Monibaza, Lamo, Me-linda, Quiola, Mosambique, and Sofa-la. The Portuguese trade for slaves, ivory, gold, ostrich feathers, wax, and drugs. The productions are much the same as in other parts of Africa, between the tropics.

Zante, an island of the Mediterranean, near the coast of the Morca, 17 miles S E of the island of Cephalonia. It is 24 miles long and 12 broad, and very fertile. Its principal riches consist in currants, which are uncultivated in a large plain, under the shelter of mountains, which gives the sun greater power to bring them to maturity. Here are also the finest peaches, in the world, each of which weighs eight or ten ounces; also excellent figs and oil. In short, it would be a perfect paradise if wood were not so dear, though this island was formerly full of forests. The natives speak both Greek and Italian, though there are very few Roman catholics among them; but they have a bishop as well as the Greeks. This place has no fortifications, but there is a fortress upon an eminence planted an island in the Bacific Ocean, discovered by Tasman, in shoot as many in a day, as will serve for 1642. He traversed the E coast from six or cight others. Captain Cook inlat 34 to 43° S, and entered a strait: troduced European poultry, and on his but being attacked by the natives, soon last visit had the satisfaction to find after he came to an anchor, in the place to which he gave the name of Murder-ers Bay, he did not go on shore. He called the country Staten Land, in ho-nour of the States General, though it has been generally distinguished in our maps and charts by the name of New Zealand. From the time of Tasman, the whole country, except that part of the coast which was seen by him, remained altogether unknown, and was by many supposed to make part of a southern continent, till the year 1770, when it was circumnavigated by Captain Cook, who found it to consist of two large islands, separated by a strait four or five leagues broad, to which he gave his own name. On the Waide of this strait, in lat 41 S, Queen Chstlotte's Sound is situated, which was made a principal place of rendezvous in his subsequent voyages. These islands lie between the lat. 34 and 48 S, and between the lon. of 166 and 180 E. The winters are milder than in England, and the summers not hotter, though more equally warm. Among the vegetable productions, the trees claim a principal lace. There are forests of vast extent, full of the straightest and largest tim-ber, fit for building of any kind. The trees are chiefly of two sorts; one as large as an oak, distinguished by a scarlet flower, the wood of which is hard and heavy; another remarkably tall and straight, of which probably very fine masts might be made. Captain Cook, in 1773, planted several spots of ground with European garden seeds; and in 1777, in several of these spots, although totally neglected and over-run with weeds, were found cabbages, onions, leeks, purslain, radialies, mustard, &c. and a few fine potatoes, greatly improved by change of soil. In other places every thing had been rooted out, to make room for temporary villages. The only quadrupeds are dogs and rats; the former are domestic, and for food; and the latter, though not numerous, seem also to be eaten. The birds, like the vegetable productions, are almost entirely peculiar to the country; and though it is difficult to follow them in the woods, on account of the under-them increased, both in a wild and domestic state, beyond all danger of being ever exterminated. Their creeks swarm with fish, which are not only wholesome, but equally delicious with those of Europe. The rocks are furnished with great quantities of excellent muscles, one sort of which men-sures above a foot in length, and with great variety of other shell fish. men are stout, well made, and fleshy; but none of them corpulent, like the lazy and luxuriant inhabitants of Otaheite and the Society isles; and they are also exceedingly vigorous and active.

The women, in general, are smaller and not so tall as the men; but possessing few peculiar graces of form or per-son, are chiefly distinguished by the softness of their voices. Their colour in general is brown, but in few deeper than that of the Spaniard who has been exposed to the sun, and in many not so deep; and both sexes have good features. Their dress is very uncouth, and they mark their bodies in a manner similar to the inhabitants of Otaheite, and which is called tattowing. Their principal weapons are lances, darts, and a kind of battle-axes; and they have generally shown themselves very bostile to the Europeans who have visited them. The people are cannibals ; and for such continual wars, and the inhuman banquet that is the consequence of victory, among a people in other respects mild and gentle, perhaps no better reason can be assigned, than what at first originated in necessity, has been perpetuated by habit, and exasperated by revenge.

Zuric, a canton of Swisserland, 50 miles long and 30 broad; bounded on the N by the Rhine, which separates it from the canton of Schauff hausen on the S by that of Schweitz, on the E by Thurgaw and the county of Tocken-burg, and on the W by the canton of Zug and the Free Provinces. Zuric was formerly an imperial city, and obtained from the emperor Frederick II. very considerable privileges; which were acknowledged and augmented by several of his successors. The civil war between the magistrates and the people, in 1735, was very near reducing the city to ruins; but the former being banished, the citizens, in 1337, established a new form of government, which was confirmed by the emperor Louis of Bavaria. The exiles, after several fruitless attempts, were at length re-admitted; but it being discovered this transaction, the nobles in the neighbourhood took up arms against the kerchie Uri, Schweitz, and Underwalden, and was admitted a member of their coafe NEO 20 N. deracy. This event happened in the year 1351. The four cantons yielded the pre-eminence to Zuric : which privilege it enjoys at present; being the first canton in rank, and the most considerable in extent both of territory and power next to Berne. This canton, in 1784, contained 174,572 souls, including 10,500 in the capital. It abounds in wine and excellent pasture ; but as there is not a sufficient supply of corn, for interior consumption, the deficiency is chiefly supplied from Snabia. The sovereign power resides exclusively in the burgesses of the town, consisting of about 2000, which are divided into 13 tribes. The legislative authority is vested by the burghers in the sovereign council of 206 members drawn from the 13 tribes. This council comprises the Senate, or Little council (composed of 50 members, including the two burgomasters) which has a jurisdiction in all civil and criminal causes. The burghers, moreover, enjoy the sole right of commerce; all strangers, and even subjects, being excluded from purchasing wrought manufactures in any part of the canton.

It stands at the N end of lake Zuric, and occupies both sides of the rapid and transparent Limmat, which issues from that lake, and divides the town into two unequal parts, which communicate by three bridges. It was formerly an imperial city, and is one of the best built in this country, but the streets are narrow, and the houses high. The cathedral was founded by Charlemagne, and is adorned with a statue of that emperor. Zuric was the first town in Swisserland that separated from the church of Rome, being converted by the arguments of Zuinglius. The two divisions of Zuric are called the Old Town and the Suburbs.
