S. Morrison read his second lecture shed a halo of splendour on every institution necessary or useful for the advancement of Art and Science, and which, whilst possessing abundantly within itself, all the means to continuate to the happiness of its inhabitants, was, by the wisdom of its laws, and the exnations and countries, the beacon in the road of improvement and civilization—to see it at this advanced and scientific age, reduced to a state of destitution and discontent unparrallelled in the history of any country. Nothing could be farther from our wish that the desire of any data upon which could be formed the conjecture that any serious derangement will happen to the institutions of that country, which would obscure her pessed glory, disorgenize the machinery of her venerable, and long established government; we mean only to furassh our readers with matters as we now find them there; but no person can shut his eyes to the fact, that the

This market is overstocked with Pitch tive of the most serious disasters, unless re-medies, as yet undiscoverable, be found for Pine. their prevention. No country, with whose history we are acquainted, presents such a discordant state of society, as England does at this time. On one side, there are to be found, formidable masses of the lower order forming the formidable masses of the lower order formidable masses of the lower order forming the formidable masses of the lower order form of the population, hitherto comfortable and independent, brought down to a state of ab-ject misery and destitution, assembling daily in countless numbers, ruminating under the galing influence of starvation, on the causes independent, brought down to a state of abwhich led to their present misery, and enlarg-ing the circle of discontent by their appearance and cravings; whilst on the other, a-rich and gorgeous aristocrocy, revel in the enjoyment of unbounded wealth, scrupulously tenacious of its possession, and allured and blindfolded by the dazzling splendour of their titles and honours, are weefully insensible to the wants and abjectness of their suffering and famishing fallow m reals. Of two such classes is the society of England, at present formed; and certainly never were any two principles more betterogenious and antagon-istical than these two classes are opposed in interest, in feeling, and pretensions, and in everything else necessary for the well being of society. For years, have those causes, though visible as the noon-day sun, been in operation, which leave England, with all her glory and greatness in her present sad, and perhaps irremedial condition. Ever since those institutions disappeared which held out the hand of trendship to the poor, and upon the hand of friendship to the poor, and upon which they might fall back in time of need, and the removal of which had thrown them on their own exertions, and made them the dependents of the unfeeling aristocracy, so-ciety has been rapidly advancing to its pre-sent discordant and unnatural state; and so lar are both parties from improving by the experience of the past, that the contrary seems the case, the lower orders (and it is much to be feared, they are acting under the impulse of necessity) are daily becoming more turbulent and retractory, holding in deri stated authority of the most succed character, and so disail cited to authority of every name and character, as to be forming formid able designs for their riddance from all. aristocracy are still the same inexorably tenacious of absolute dominion of their properdecous of absolute dominion of their proper-ties, "to hold fast to as rights without heed-ing to its duties," glorying in their ancestori-al privileges, and basking in the sunshine of their honours, they can't behold through the mists of happiness which surround them, the wants and sufferings of their less favoured fellow creatures, whose natural guardians they should be, and for whose sustenance and should be, and for whose sustenance and confort they are invested with their stations and properties and to show with what obstinacy they have and are detainmed to persevere in their immonitie course, so matter in what manner appeals are more to them is remained them of their duties to society to its present distracted state—whether plant appeals are made to their language and generosity, or that the destinate metaltodes send them deputations erea to enquire into their condition, with a view to adopt any measures, even temporary, to meet their afflicting evils—in every case and instance those "privilcondition, with a view to adopt any incessaries, even temporary, to meet their afflicting evils—in every case and instance those "privileged classes" are found guity of gross sins of omission, as forgetful of their imperative obligations, as they are heedless and insensible to the crying wants of the destitute. And this delesion, this recklessness of duty, and insensibility to the craving of humanity, in its most pitiable condition, is deplorably universal; it not only affects those possessing property handed down upon ancestorial deeds, but even those who receive and amass properties from the hard earnings of the poor. In fact, whether you take the pensioned aristocrat or the country proprietor, it is all the same, they are bent upon the maintenance of their rights, privileges, and properties, inviolably, come what will to the poor.

What this infatuated and unfeeling conduct on the part of the aristocracy, on the one hand, the destitution impoverishment and widely growing discontent of the people, on the other, will me the end lead to, time alone can tell. To us it is mysterious, and we succeed trust it will not be worse, though had we connected in the opinious of some of the
