OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

FIFTH SESSION OF THE SEVENTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE EIGHTEENTH DAY OF APRIL, IN THE FIFTY-EIGHTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 18th April, 1895.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 2.30 p.m.

Prayers.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. Joseph Octave Arsenault, of Prince Edward Island, was introduced and, having taken the oath prescribed by law, took his seat.

The House adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House was resumed.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

At THREE o'clock P.M., HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber, in the Parliament Buildings, and took his seat upon the Throne. The Senators being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being present, His Excellency was pleased to open the FIFTH SESSION OF THE SEVENTH PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, with the following Speech:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is with much satisfaction that I again have recourse to your advice and assistance in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion.

By the sudden and lamented death of the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson, Canada has sustained a grievous loss. The deep and heartfelt sympathy expressed by Her most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and the manifestations of sorrow with which the distressing intelligence was received throughout the Empire, as well as tokens of esteem and respect everywhere paid to the memory of the deceased statesman, have been gratefully appreciated by the people of Canada.

Satisfactory assurances having been received from Her Majesty's Government respecting the interpretation of certain clauses in the Treaty of Commerce with France, ratifications will be exchanged as soon as the necessary legislation has been passed.

The recent action of the Imperial Parliament enabling the various Australasian Governments to enter into preferential trade relations with the other self-governing Colonies of the Empire, affords gratifying proof that the suggestions of the Colonial Conference are being favourably entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

In conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissentient minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education, I have heard in Council the appeal, and my decision thereon has been communicated to the legislature of the said province. The papers on the subject will be laid before you.

The depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world for the past few years has made itself felt in Canada, but fortunately to a less degree than in most other countries. Although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from Customs and Excise. In order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

During the period that has elapsed since the last Session of Parliament, I have had an opportunity of visiting many portions of the Dominion, including the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. Throughout these tours I have been impressed and gratified by manifestations of an abounding loyalty and public spirit; and notwithstanding the phase of trade depression already referred to, I observed everywhere unmistakable signs of that confident hopefulness in the future, based on thorough belief in the greatness of the resources of Canada, which is one of the characteristics of her people, and which furnishes a good augury and pledge of further development and progress.

The Government of Newfoundland having intimated its desire to renew negotiations looking to the admission of that colony into the Dominion of Canada, a sub-committee of my advisers have recently met in conference a delegation from the Island Government and discussed with them the terms of union. It will be a subject of general congratulation if the negotiations now pending result in the incorporation of Her Majesty's oldest colonial possession into the Canadian Confederation.

Measures relating to bankruptcy and insolvency, and to joint stock companies will be laid before you. You will also be asked to consider certain amendments to the Insurance Act, to the Act respecting Dominion Notes, to the Dominion Lands Act, to the Indian Act, to the North-west Territories Representation Act, as also a Bill respecting the land subsidy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I have directed that the accounts of the past year shall be laid before you. The estimates for the ensuing year will also be presented. They have been framed with every regard to economy compatible with the efficiency of the public service.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I now leave you to the discharge of the important duties devolving upon you with an earnest prayer that being guided by the spirit of wisdom and patriotism your deliberations may, under the divine blessing, conduce to the unity and well-being of Canada.

The House of Commons then withdrew.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE moved—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for His Gracious speech at the opening of the present Session; and, further, to assure His Excellency that—

We also thank His Excellency for the expression of his satisfaction at again having recourse to our advice and assistance in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion.

We share most sincerely His Excellency's feeling that by the sudden and lamented death of the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson, Canada has sustained a grievous loss. The deep and heartfelt sympathy expressed by Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, and the manifestations of sorrow with which the distressing intelligence was received throughout the Empire, as well as the tokens of esteem and respect everywhere paid to the memory of the deceased statesman, have been gratefully appreciated by the people of Canada.

We learn with interest that, satisfactory assurances having been received from Her Majesty's Government respecting the interpretation of certain clauses in the Treaty of Commerce with France, ratifications will be exchanged as soon as the necessary legislation has been passed.

We are pleased to be informed by His Excellency that the recent action of the Imperial Parliament enabling the various Australasian Governments to enter into preferential trade relations with the other self-governing Colonies of the Empire, affords gratifying proof that the suggestions of the Colonial Conference are being favourably entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

We thank His Excellency for informing us that, in conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissentient minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education, His Excellency has heard in Council the appeal; that His Excellency's decision thereon has been communicated to the legislature of the said province; and that the papers on the subject will be laid before us.

We are glad to hear from His Excellency that the depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world for the past few years has made itself felt in Canada to a less degree than in most other countries. We regret, however, to learn that, although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet that, owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from Customs and Excise. We respectfully concur in His Excellency's opinion that in order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

We are greatly pleased to hear that, during the period that has elapsed since the last Session of Parliament, Your Excellency had an opportunity of visiting many portions of the Dominion, including the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia; that throughout these tours Your Excellency was impressed and gratified by manifestations of an abounding loyalty and public spirit; and that, notwithstanding the phase of trade depression already referred to, you observed everywhere unmistakable signs of that confident hopefulness in the future, based on a thorough belief in the greatness of the resources of Canada, which, you are graciously pleased to say, is one of the characteristics of her people and furnishes a good augury and pledge of further development and progress.

We receive with a deep sense of their importance Your Excellency's statements that the Government of Newfoundland having intimated its desire to renew negotiations looking to the admission of that colony into the Dominion of Canada, a sub-committee of Your Excellency's advisers have recently met in conference a delegation from the Island Government and discussed with them the terms of union, and that it will be a subject of general congratulation if the negotiations now pending result in the incorporation of Her Majesty's oldest colonial possession into the Canadian Confederation.

We thank Your Excellency for the information that measures relating to bankruptcy and insolvency and to joint stock companies will be laid before us, and that we shall be asked to consider certain amendments to the Insurance Act, to the Act respecting Dominion Notes, to the Dominion Lands Act, to the Indian Act, to the North-west Territories Representation Act, and also a Bill respecting the land subsidy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Your Excellency may rest assured that all these matters will receive our most careful consideration.

In entering upon the discharge of the important duties devolving upon us, we join Your Excellency in an earnest prayer that being guided by the spirit of wisdom and patriotism our deliberations may, under the divine blessing, conduce to the unity and well-being of Canada.

He said: When asked to accept the honour of moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, it was with much trepidation and many misgivings that I consented to make the attempt; and for any shortcomings or imperfections in my effort to discharge the duty which has been assigned me, I crave the indulgence and kind consideration of this honourable House. Of one thing I can assure you, and that is, that I have the best possible intention to spare you the infliction of a lengthy and in all probability desultory speech, and myself the mortification of making so grave a mistake, and in order the better to secure this very desirable end, I shall confine myself pretty closely if not exclusively, to my manuscript, all the more so, that the Speech from the Throne treats of some topics of which I simply dare not trust myself to speak extemporaneously. It must be gratifying I think to the members of this honourable House as an integral portion of the Parliament of Canada, to observe the prominence given by the Queen's representative in the opening clause of the Speech, to the expression of his sense of the value of the advice and assistance which he expects to receive from both Houses, in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion, and so his recognition of the value of our system of government. And, now, I come to a portion of the Speech to which I wish I could speak as I fain would. In the very forefront, in the place in which we should expect to find it, stands His Excellency's eloquent and touching reference to the sudden and lamented death of the Right Honourable Sir John Thompson, with all the sad circumstances attendant upon which we are now unhappily so familiar.

Tragic in its awful suddenness, as well as in many of its surroundings, was the untimely taking off of our late so honoured and beloved premier, when he had just reached the acme of his prosperous and distinguished career. Having heard the voice of his earthly sovereign, and having just passed from her presence, after she had conferred upon him one of the highest honours within the power of even her hand to bestow, he heard the call of the King of Kings, and the Lord of Lords, and to-day our late honoured and beloved premier wears the insignia of an order, higher far than is embraced in all the heraldry of earthly kingdoms and courts, insignia whose radiant lustre not all the attrition of the rolling cycles of eternal ages shall ever dim or tarnish. Yes! His glorious sun did in very deed go down at high noon, and who shall say what the alas now for ever unwritten record of his life might have embraced, of the great and noble in purpose and in achievement, had he been spared to us and to his country. In his death Canada has indeed sustained a grievous loss. Fruitful mother as she is, of honoured, eminent, and worthy sons, she can ill-afford to lose from the family register, the name of a son so illustrious as he who has left us for ever here, and as she looks upon the vacant chair which he filled with so much credit to himself and honour to her, her sorrows are stirred to their deepest depths, and the fountain of her tears is opened. Reference is made in the speech to the deep and heartfelt sympathy expressed by Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen. This was made manifest in many ways, in word and deed, but I shall select an incident as illustrative of this, which some perhaps might think a very insignificant one, but which, in my view at least, is so full of rich significance as to almost baffle language to express it. We often use the words "Her Most Gracious Majesty," but with not the smallest approach to an adequate conception of the grand amplitude of their meaning and significance as applied to the present illustrious occupant of the throne of the mightiest, the most intelligent, and the most progressive nation that the world has ever known. Queenly woman! womanly queen! what but the promptings of her womanly mother's heart, drawn out in deepest loving sympathy, induced her on that dark day of trial, to stoop and imprint a kiss upon the pale face of the well nigh heart-broken young girl, who stood trembling before her, dazed under the weight of the awful stroke that took her much loved father from her as in a moment. Does any one say that was a trifling incident? Why, honourable gentlemen, the magnetism of that kiss went tingling like an electric current along the pulses of the world, and evoked from many a heart, far and near, the fervent "God bless her."

Little wonder, honourable gentlemen, that for such a Queen the prayer should often go up from their heart of hearts, from a multitude almost innumerable throughout the bounds of her wide domain, into the ears of the Eternal: "God save our gracious Queen."

I most heartily endorse the statement made in the speech, that the manifestation of sorrow throughout the empire, on the receipt of the sad intelligence of the death of the late premier, as well as the tokens of esteem and respect everywhere paid to his memory have been gratefully appreciated by the people of Canada, and now may we not ask ourselves in this connection as assembled here in Parliament, has Canada as yet done all that might be expected of her in recogdition of the eminent services of him who is gone? Would it not be a graceful and fitting act on the part of the Government to make a suitable appropriation for the benefit of those whom he has left behind him? I am not aware whether this would be a departure from established usage or not, but even though it were, the circumstances are so very exceptional that such a course, I feel persuaded, would meet with the approval of the great majority of Canadians, and I would ask the Government to take the suggestion into their favourable consideration.

It will be in the remembrance of the members of this honourable House, that when the French Treaty was ratified, it was stipulated by France that in the event of any trade concessions being made to any third power, she should enjoy the same privileges. The question then emerges, as to whether or no the British colonies were to come under the caption of third powers under the treaty. France was inclined to maintain that they were, but Sir Charles Tupper, the British plenipotentiary in the negotiations, took the ground that this never was contemplated, and that the colonies being part of the British Empire (one of the contracting parties) they could not be considered as third powers, and the speech informs us that satisfactory assurances have been received from Her Majesty's Government respecting this debated interpretation, and an understanding having been reached, final ratifications will be exchanged as soon as the necessary legislation has been passed; and let us indulge the hope that this will result in a very considerable expansion of the trade and commerce of Canada.

I think that we all entertain very pleasant remembrances, of the presence among us during last session, of the intercolonial delegates; and I am sure that those who came in contact with those gentlemen during their stay, could not fail to be impressed with the fact that they were representative men, intimately conversant with the trade requirements of the various colonies which they represented, and keen to extend the circle of their trade relations, where resultant benefits might be reasonably anticipated. Imperial legislation originally existed, whereby they were restricted in their trade relations with the other self-governing colonies of the empire, and it is a subject for congratulation to learn from the speech from the throne, that the Imperial Parliament has recently taken action, freeing them from this disability, and in this fact we see the first fruits of the Colonial Conference held last year in this city, and are led to entertain the hope that further suggestions emanating from that conference, are likely to receive favourable consideration by the Imperial Government. The fact that Her Majesty's Government was becoming alive to the possibilities likely to result from a mutual interchange of commodities, and the establishment of closer trade relations between the different colonies, even before the conference met, was made manifest by the appointment to that conference of their very able and experienced representative, Earl of Jersey, whose report to his government is believed to have been very favourable. If we associate with these proposed new conditions, the construction of a line of cable between Australia and Canada, it would, I think, be difficult to over-estimate the value of the benefits to accrue to Canada and to the empire at large from such a new order of things. To my mind it is "a consummation devoutly to be wished" and should it ever be achieved, Her Majesty's Government, this honourable House and this country will, I am sure, be ready to acknowledge the debt of gratitude which they will owe to the minister who personally visited these far distant colonies, and by his extensive knowledge of the principles of trade, by his energy and skill, piloted the movement through its initial stages, some day, ere long, we hope, to reach its beneficent consummation. I refer to our distinguished premier and leader of this House, the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell; and as I happen to be the first speaker at this session, I shall take carte blanche, and with its permission constitute myself, for the moment, the mouthpiece of this honourable House in expressing to him the ardent wish that he may long be spared to enjoy and worthily wear the honours which Her Majesty has recently conferred upon him, in recognition of his distinguished services, and also to convey to him our warmest congratulations on his promotion to the premiership of this great Dominion, to the discharge of the onerous and responsible duties of which he brings all the ripe fruitage of a long parliamentary experience.

In the matter of the Manitoba School case, the Lords of the Privy Council having decided that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba had been infringed upon, by the provisions of an Act intitled "An Act respecting the Department of Education," and an "Act respecting Public Schools," and that they had the right of appeal to the Governor in Council, and their appeal having been heard, the Governor in Council was pleased to decide and declare, that "it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the rights and privileges of which such minority has been deprived," and it is earnestly hoped that the Manitoba Legislature will at its approaching session, enact such legislation as shall remove all ground of complaint, and restore harmony among Her Majesty's subjects in that province.

The speech refers to the depression in trade which has been so general throughout the world for the past few years, and frankly makes the admission, that that depression has made itself felt in Canada. It would be a very extraordinary thing indeed if it had not done so; no nation in the world, however vast may be its resources, however intelligent, energetic, and self reliant its people, is so entirely self contained, so thoroughly independent of existent conditions in other countries, especially in those contiguous to its own borders, as to have complete immunity from a share at least in the experience of such general depression, but we are pleased to know that it is a fact, and a fortunate one too, that Canada has experienced that depression to a less degree than other countries. It has not, however, resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, a statement which, I think, will be verified on consulting the Trade and Navigation Returns, but whilst the volume of our foreign trade has not materially decreased, the values have; and as quite a number of changes were made in the tariff from specific to ad valorem, and quite a number of articles transferred from the dutiable to the free list, there has resulted a serious decrease in revenue derived from customs and excise, a condition of matters which as the speech states, calls for the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

In the next clause of the speech, His Excellency speaks of his visits made to different portions of the Dominion, since last session. These visits have embraced a very wide range, extending from the Maritime Provinces in the east, to British Columbia in the west, constituting pretty much the scope of the Dominion, and as His Excellency is known to be a very acute, close and accurate observer of men and things, any conclusions at which he may arrive or any opinions which he may express are entitled to very great consideration and respect, entirely irrespective of his high official position, and I am sure that this honourable House is profoundly grateful to him for the very kindly words contained in the speech expressive of his gratification at the manifestations of abounding loyalty and public spirit which were brought under his observation, during his tours. It is emphatically true of our Canadian people, that they are intensely loyal to the British Crown, and to the traditions of the great empire of which they form a part; and that they are characterized by a strong public spirit is abundantly evidenced by what they have accomplished, and not always under the most favourable circumstances. The next paragraph has such a magnificent ring of confidence and hopefulness and cheer about it, that I cannot consent to its mutilation, by merely treating of excerpts from it, and so I quote it in its entirety, "And notwithstanding the trade depression already referred to, I observe everywhere, unmistakable signs of that confident hopefulness in the future based on a thorough belief in the greatness of the resources of Canada, which is one of the characteristics of her people, and which furnishes a good augury and pledge of further development and progress." What leal hearted Canadian does not endorse that inspiring word picture of the condition of matters in his country? Yes, the true Canadian knows well, and appreciates to the full the value of his God given heritage. Where is the country that can compare with her, in the greatness and variety of her resources of sea and land, the teeming earth that yields such bounteous harvests, the untold riches of the mine, the exhaustless wealth of the deep? Little wonder that the true Canadian has confident hopefulness in the future of his country, despite any temporary depression that may exist.

Instead of aggravating that depression, by the expression in word or act, of hopelessness or despondency, or adopting a course which has any tendency to belittle the glorious land in which we live, let us be of one mind about this at any rate, on whatever other matters we may differ, that we will do all that in us lies, to help this Canada of ours onward and upward through all opposing influences and obstacles, emanate whence they may, towards the accomplishment and realization of that magnificent destiny which her almighty maker has so plainly designated as hers.

In regard to the conference recently held in the city, with a view to the admission of Newfoundland into the Dominion, it is I think for many reasons very desirable that she should join the sisterhood of provinces, and so complete the autonomy of the Dominion. Her very important geographical position, relatively to Canada, her wealth of minerals, timber and fisheries, would under ordinary circumstances render her advent into the Canadian confederation a matter for general congratulation; and let us hope that the difficulties which at present stand in the way, may be finally overcome, and the path made clear for the accomplishment of the desired union. It is gratifying in this connection to note that it is proposed to ere long introduce measures in the Newfoundland legislature bearing upon the removal of some of the more important of these obstacles.

We all remember how much of our time was taken up last session in the endeavour to frame an Insolvency Act, which would meet the requirements of the country, and be generally acceptable, and the large number of experienced banking and mercantile men who for so long a period gave the matter unremitting attention, resulting in the bill reaching a stage when it was sent to the House of Commons, where it may possibly have amendments or additions made to it having a tendency to render it more workable.

It would appear that some amendments to the North-west Territories Representation Act are to be proposed, looking towards the providing for increased representation, should the census which is being taken by the North-west Mounted Police in their rounds, show that the population has increased to such an extent as to warrant it. Should events prove that the territories are entitled to an increased representation, it will furnish another index of progress and advancement.

I am personally, as I am sure is this honourable House, in the heartiest accord and sympathy with the sentiments expressed in the concluding paragraph of the speech, when His Excellency in taking his leave does so with an earnest prayer that "being guided by the spirit of wisdom and patriotism, our deliberations may under the divine blessing conduce to the unity and well-being of Canada." The spirit of wisdom and patriotism as exemplified in legislation for the nation is of itself a potent factor, and has accomplished much for them in their past history, and will doubtless work new wonders for them in the coming years; but for our Canada we crave, in addition to that, that the legislation effected in her interests may from its inception to its completion be guided, governed, permeated with the divine blessing, and thus will extreme party acrimony and rancour be largely eliminated from our debates, and from our intercourse, and under such conditions, we shall have the best of all guarantees for the unity and well-being of this land which we love so well.

Hon. gentlemen, I have the honour to move the adoption of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has found it necessary to ask the indulgence of the hon. members of this House, I also ought to ask such indulgence, and more particularly as this is the first time that I appear before this honourable body, and, therefore, have not very much to say. However, as it is my duty to offer a few words, I will proceed. The first item in the speech is a very sad one, as it has reference to death, nothing so certain as death, and nothing so uncertain as the time that it will happen. It has no regard for persons or positions; it enters the palaces of kings, as well as the huts of the poor, and often strikes at a time when least expected. Within the last four years no less than three of our ablest statesmen have passed away, Sir John Macdonald, of happy memory, the founder and father of confederation, the able statesman and the beloved leader of his party is no more. It has been often said of him that he was the only man in the Dominion who could maintain the Liberal-Conservative party in power, and that after him there would be "the deluge"; but he has gone and the deluge has not come. Sir John Abbott, next appeared on the scene as the leader of the Conservative Government, a man of fine abilities who commanded respect and influence; but after one session of Parliament owing to ill-health he resigned the position and shortly after was called to his long home. These two statesmen died full of years and honours, in the midst of their dearest friends and families.

The death of Sir John Thompson was particularly sad. He was stricken suddenly and without warning in the prime of life, thousands of miles away from his country, from his friends and family, at a time when he had just attained to the highest honour that can be conferred by our Queen. The people of Canada were shocked and astounded when the melancholy news of his death was flashed to us from over the ocean. Our people lamented the sad death of the brilliant statesman, our sovereign mourned the demise of her able and faithful councillor, and all that could be thought of by her to show her sympathy and love for her illustrious Canadian son, was done in the most costly and elaborate manner possible, I need not say anything of the royal conveyance which was given his mortal remains, to their last resting place in the land of his birth under, I might say, the supervision of Her Majesty herself. Such sympathy and such love of her subject by our Queen, well deserve our most unbounded love and loyalty. Sir John Thompson is no more; his deeds only remain.

It is satisfactory to learn from the speech of His Excellency that negotiations are being carried on with foreign powers, and the different colonies of the empire, for the development of better trade relations with the Dominion, thus showing that the colonial conference held here about twelve months ago has been productive of some good.

For some time past dissatisfaction has existed in the province of Manitoba, owing to an Act of the legislature depriving the minority of that province of their rights and privileges in educational matters. These rights were embodied in the constitution of that province, and were guaranteed by the Parliament of Canada. The policy of the majority of one denomination, attempting to coerce the minority in educational matters, is, I think, to be deplored. Until 1890 all denominations in that province were living in unity and peace, since then a large portion of the population have not enjoyed the same benefit from the school tax that they had enjoyed till then. The question has been before the courts of the Dominion and finally been carried before the Privy Council of England, where the question was decided in favour of the minority. The remedial order has been argued by counsel on either side before the Privy Council of Canada, and the remedial order has been sent to the Manitoba Government for necessary legislation in accordance with the decision of the Privy Council of England. Let us hope that the legislature of Manitoba will view the decision in a spirit of fair-play and that the question will be satisfactorily settled for all time to come.

The fathers of confederation had in view the possibility that the ancient colony of Newfoundland would at some time form part and parcel of the confederacy, but up to a recent date the people of that province had shown no disposition to be united to the Dominion of Canada. Latterly, however, the sentiments of the people seem to have changed, and they have sent delegates to discuss terms of admission into the union. Let us hope that such a union may be consummated, thereby completing the confederacy of the British possessions on this side of the Atlantic. Newfoundland being the key, as it were, of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, will be a valuable acquisition to the Dominion. The resources of the island are many and extensive, and a large interchange of commerce will undoubtedly take place when brought under the same tariff as the other provinces. Thanking hon. gentlemen for their indulgence, I will conclude my remarks by seconding the motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This House is always very considerate in listening to the utterances of hon. gentlemen who for the first time are called upon to address this chamber, recognizing that in doing so they experience some degree of embarrassment. I think we must all feel that both the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne have discharged their duty with very good taste and judgment. The hon. Senator from Pictou is not a new member of the legislature. This I believe is the third session that we have had the pleasure of listening to his voice. I remember on many occasions having listened with a great degree of pleasure to the hon. gentleman when he expressed his opinions without the aid of notes in this chamber. I think I may offer, therefore, on behalf of the House, our congratulations to both gentlemen on the way in which they have discharged their duties. They are not responsible for any of the shortcomings of the address which His Excellency's advisers have seen fit to present to Parliament, and I think it must be apparent to all of us who have given any thought or consideration to the address that there is one very important subject that has been omitted, that is to say, it contains no apology to Parliament for the late date at which it has been summoned. It is part of the unwritten law of this country that the Parliament of Canada should be summoned not later than the beginning of February, following the precedent of the British Parliament. During the years when the Liberal administration was in power (excepting the year in which the election took place) Parliament was always called together by the beginning of February usually the first week or early in the second week, and that good example was kept up from 1878 downwards. I have here a memorandum of the dates at which Parliament was convened year by year, from which it will be apparent that that has been the recognized practice in our constitution. It is very well known and has often been alluded to in Parliament that it is necessary to summon the legislature at a period when it is convenient for public men to attend and when there would be the least interference with the business interests of the country. In 1879 Parliament met on the 13th February, in 1880 on the 12th February, in 1881 on the 9th December. In that year it was prorogued on the 21st March nearly a month earlier than we have been called together this year. In 1882 the House met on the 9th February; in 1883 on the 9th February; in 1884 on the 17th January; in 1885 on the 29th January; in 1886 on the 25th February. In 1887 instead of calling Parliament together the government—I will not say with the view of getting a snap shot at the electors—unexpectedly dissolved Parliament instead of calling it together. The House was called on the 13th April, but even in that year the date was earlier than during the present year. In 1888 it was the 23rd February, and in 1889 the 31st January. In 1891, when hon. gentlemen opposite suddenly dissolved Parliament, as was then publicly announced, with the view of completing a treaty at Washington, the House was called together on the 29th April after the elections had been held. In 1892 we went back to the normal period 25th February; in 1893 it was the 26th January. Last year it was later than it has been any year previously, the 15th of March. In that year the Premier felt it his duty to explain the reasons that had induced His Excellency's advisers to summon Parliament at so late a date. The reason assigned was that they were revising the tariff, and it was necessary for a committee of the Government to meet the people of Canada, that it was quite impossible to prepare the reports of that committee any earlier, as it involved the revision of no less than 900 or 1,000 items of the tariff. That was perhaps a good reason, but the instance shows that it was recognized by the then leader of the political party at present in power, that Parliament ought to be called at an earlier period. Now, it is no secret, I think, that this Parliament was somewhat unexpectedly summoned. It was pretty thoroughly discussed by the journals which had the ear of the Government, and we even had intimations given by some members of the Government themselves that there would be a general election. We all know that the voters' lists were being hurriedly prepared, that the Printing Bureau, here, was extremely busy, that all the staff that could be obtained was employed in getting the lists ready for a particular day. So great was the hurry that the lists of Toronto and Montreal had to be sent to local newspapers. Suddenly, from some cause or another, of which we are not informed, instead of dissolution we have a session. I think it would have been only fair that the people of Canada, and more particularly the people's representatives, should have been taken into the confidence of the government and some explanation offered them, why it was that dissolution did not take place and that Parliament has been summoned at so late a date. I am quite aware, however, when I read the explanations made elsewhere, that excuses have been found for this state of affairs. These excuses refer to a number of subjects, the much discussed Manitoba school question being one of them. Another was that the conference with Newfoundland was taking place, but I would point out that the conference did not begin till long after the time for summoning Parliament had passed by. Long after the period when the Parliament should have been called together, the delegates came up from Newfoundland to discuss the question of that colony's entering the Dominion. I really think it is due to this House that some explanation should be given of the reasons for the late meeting of Parliament.

We all share in the very touching and beautiful observations made by the hon. member from Pictou (Mr. Primrose) in reference to the second paragraph of the Speech of the Throne, that relating to the death of Sir John Thompson. We all share in the feeling that animated him in making those observations respecting the tragic event. There can be no doubt whatever that Sir John Thompson's sudden death evoked an extraordinary feeling of deep sorrow and sympathy over the length and breadth of Canada, which I feel safe in saying was shared in by all parties irrespective of race, religion or politics. Sir John Thompson was no ordinary man. Highly endowed by nature, he was possessed of those other qualifications which are so essential to success in life. In his early years he was favoured by no extraordinary or adventitious circumstances. His rise in life was due entirely to his own probity of character, his talents and industry. He occupied the first position as a reporter in the chamber of the legislature of Nova Scotia. It was not many years after, that he became a member of that House, rising rapidly to become one of the Executive Council of his native province, and stepping on from that position to the premiership of the province. Few men had as rapid a rise, and he occupied the highest position by the universal consent of his fellow-citizens. Soon after that he was appointed to the Supreme Court of the province of Nova Scotia. During the few years that he was a member of that body, he elevated the judicial tribunal to a very high standard. Ten years ago he was comparatively a stranger outside of the province of Nova Scotia. It was due to his marvellous knowledge of men that the late Sir John Macdonald selected him as the very best man to fill the position of Minister of Justice. At the time, the selection was carpied at. People asked who was John Thompson. Sir John Macdonald's answer was "wait until you know him." He had been in Ottawa but a comparatively short time when the wisdom of the selection was exemplified by the manner in which he discharged the duties pertaining to his position. Afterwards when, on the death of Sir John Abbott, he was called upon to fill the position of Premier, it is universally admitted that he had won the respect and esteem, not alone of those with whom he was politically allied, but also of those of the opposite side of the House. He came here under a disadvantage. There was, unhappily, a prejudice against him, because he had, from a conscientious feeling, adopted another religion. It is gratifying, and a compliment to the people of this country, to say that when they knew Sir John Thompson, they recognized that that should no longer be a barrier to the esteem in which he should be held. They recognized that he was simply obeying his own conscientious conviction, and he lived down any prejudice that had arisen from a hasty conception of his character. Sir John Thompson's name will long live in the history of Canada. His high character; his pure and unsullied life—the reputation he made for himself in serving not alone the Dominion of Canada, but the empire at large, point him out as a model that may be copied by the young men of this country, because it was through his own merits alone that his elevation to the high position he attained was due. The honourable Senator from Pictou has alluded to the circumstances under which Sir John Thompson died, and to the fact that the country ought to consider the position in which the late statesman left his family. We know that Sir John Thompson, with his great abilities, had he chosen to devote them to business pursuits, instead of giving up his life to his country, could have amassed a fortune to protect his family from want in the future. It is very well known that with ample opportunities to become rich he died a poor man, and although some generous friends have already contributed towards the maintenance of his family in the degree of life in which they have for some time lived, yet, I think it would be but fair and reasonable that the country should be called upon to supplement that, in order that they may feel that Canada was not ungrateful to one of her best sons. I do not quite understand the next paragraph in the speech which refers to our treaty with France. That treaty was made on the 6th February, 1893—over two years ago. The House sat that session until the first of April, and the treaty was discussed to some extent, but was not adopted. Last session the treaty was adopted, and it was understood that it should go into operation forthwith. The delay, I understand, is due to some extent to the claim of France to be put on the same footing as the colonies of the Empire in dealing with Canada. Of course, Canada would not consent to that and whether France has conceded that point, we are not informed in the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne.

The reference to the Manitoba school question is a very non committal one. Hon. gentlemen will remember that it is now over five years since the question became a burning one—over five years since Manitoba passed an act taking away from the minority those rights that they had supposed were secured to them under the treaty made with Canada in 1871—a treaty which was ratified by the Parliament of Canada in the legislation known as the Manitoba Act, and confirmed by an imperial statute. It is unfortunate that this question was not dealt with promptly at the time. I cannot but feel that had it been so disposed of promptly, we should have had no protest whatever on the subject. I cannot take the view that the question of provincial rights arises in this case at all. I just ask hon. gentlemen to consider for a moment what would be thought if the Quebec legislature were to pass an act taking away from the minority of that province the privileges that they have enjoyed, not alone under the British North America Act, but under local legislation passed by the provincial legislature since confederation? Would it have taken five years for the majority of the people of this country to have discovered that a wrong had been done them? I just put that question now to the majority of the people of Canada. Would they have permitted five years to go over when they knew, not alone that the dissentient schools had been abolished, but that the school-houses erected with the money of the minority had been confiscated and the funds placed in the banks by the trustees of the minority had been roped in by the provincial treasurer—what would have been the indignation in all parts of the Dominion? Would any government dare, under such circumstances, to say “you must go to the courts. It is quite true it will take five years before it goes through all the courts, where they will make confusion worse confounded—more particularly if it goes through the Privy Council—and when it comes back we will consider what ought to be done.” Yet that is the case to-day. Do you consider it at all consistent with what is proper, or the construction which ought to be put on the Manitoba Act? There are living witnesses—one or two in this chamber now, at all events—who are cognizant with all the circumstances that attended the passage of that legislation in 1871. They knew that they were voting to decide whether separate schools should be given to Manitoba or not. Some were of opinion that they should be given, others that they should not, and finally, after discussing the question in plain, simple language, and conceding that if the clause were not struck out the effect would be that the provincial government never afterwards could interfere with or disturb the act, the legislation passed through Parliament. One of the most distinguished legislators of the day, the Hon. Wm. Macdougall, then a member of the House, and who had been one of those who attended the conference at Quebec and at London drafting the British North America Act in which a similar clause occurs, said to the House of Commons on that occasion: “If you pass the Act in that shape and do not accept the amendment to strike out that clause, the effect will be that for all time to come the provincial legislature of Manitoba will be powerless to disturb by one iota the rights that the minority now enjoy.” We have not to go back to history for these facts. The men are alive to-day who not only listened to the debate but drew up the clauses, and to their honour be it spoken, the majority of the Protestant members of Canada—wholly excluding the province of Quebec—a majority of the Protestants of this country said: “It is only fair, and it is part of the conditions under which the province of Assiniboia is coming into the confederation, that this concession should be made.” They did not hesitate to say so, and by a large majority, exclusive of the Roman Catholics, voted in Parliament that it would tend to greater harmony and friendship and happiness in that country if the same rights that were conceded to the minority in Quebec and the minority in Ontario were granted to the Roman Catholics in Manitoba. In view of these facts, does it not seem extraordinary that at the end of five years—yes, more than five—we are still debating most tenderly and delicately, fearful that we may trespass on somebody’s prejudices, whether we shall carry out what we solemnly agreed to do among ourselves in 1871. That educational Act which was repealed by the legislation of 1890, was passed in Manitoba at either the first or second session after the province entered the union, and was on the lines of the Act as we understood it in 1871, and not as they claimed to understand it twenty years later. Who were the men who were right? The men who interpreted the Act when it was passed originally, or the men who are discussing it to-day? Did we undertake to deceive the people of Manitoba when we gave them a writing saying that we undertook to carry out this, but in our own minds and hearts declared that when we should be powerful and strong enough in Manitoba, and the Roman Catholics should be a weak minority, we would take from them those privileges which we conceded by the Act of 1871? No man who values the honour and dignity of his country ought to hesitate for a moment in appreciating the true position of the question. It is this unfortunate attempt to trench upon the rights of the minority that has caused all the trouble. I say there are no provincial rights when the rights of the minority are at stake. It would be absurd to propose in the province of Quebec to take away from the dissentients the rights that they enjoy, and to say “let the minority go to the courts, and five or ten years hereafter they will probably be able to convince the majority that they are right and the legislature is wrong.” Is that what honourable people should propose, or tolerate, or permit? I think this subject ought not to be viewed from a political standpoint. I make no adverse criticisms on the line which those gentlemen took who advised the course that was taken in 1890. I believe myself it was not thought that any tribunal would be formed that would take any other view than the one that the people of Canada then understood, and that was the reason that it was allowed to go. Of course, had it been for a moment assumed that the question would go before a tribunal that did not understand our constitution or did not seem to take the trouble to become familiar with the subject, it never would have been permitted to remain in doubt. It has been very unfortunate because it is now an extremely difficult and delicate question to settle. I quite appreciate all the surrounding difficulties that have grown up and the prejudices that exist and the utter impossibility of making the great mass of the electorate comprehend the question. We all know that in sentimental questions of that kind, where prejudices arise, we cannot reach the calm judgment of the electorate. They are carried away by the first impulses of their nature, and the impulses follow their prejudices. It is very unfortunate and very unhappy, and I cannot but regret the course which has been pursued by the Government of Manitoba. It has certainly not been that of a judicial body disposed to fairly consider the question. Without even reading the papers they took a high and lofty stand under the impression that they have the power to dictate to the minority and they take their stand on the narrow ground of provincial rights. The Judicial Committee clearly set forth that it is not a question of provincial rights, that the provinces have not the right, under certain circumstances, to legislate on the subject of education. If they had the right they could do as they pleased, but why is it, under the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act, that those powers were taken from the province? They were given control of education under certain circumstances and conditions. When those circumstances or conditions are in any way disturbed or endangered, then the province does not possess the power. There can be no encroachment on provincial rights in such cases. It is not given to the province absolutely to deal with them. The power is reserved. Read all the clauses of the 92nd section of the British North America Act and only on that one subject is the power reserved to the federal authorities. There are one or two subjects on which there are equal powers given to both parties, but there is no other question but that of education on which there is a power reserved to the Federal Government to interfere, and therefore there can be no question of provincial rights in this case. It does not arise, and the decision of the Privy Council is very distinct in that part of the judgment. It would have been more satisfactory if the government had stated what their policy was. This paragraph leaves it just where it was. It has been unfortunate that this subject for five years has been practically hung up and tossed about from one court to another, and from one government to another, and we are in a very much worse position now than we were five years ago to deal with it.

The next paragraph of the speech admits that the "N. P." is a failure—that it did not stop the depression. There was a time when the hon. gentlemen who draughted this address thought differently—thought that we could be made rich by Act of Parliament—that all we had to do was to reserve Canada for the Canadians and shut out all foreign competition and we should be happy, but I think the admission made in this paragraph seriously conflicts with the prophecies we then had. It certainly has not stopped the exodus, and it has not furnished a home market that is worth very much, nor has it filled up the North-west. These are lamentable failures with which the National Policy has to be charged. The Government admits that even with the National Policy it is possible to have a deficit, and so we are told that this is due somewhat to the lowering of the duties last year. I think, from my standpoint at all events, the question of a deficit, even in the condition in which Canada is now, could have been easily got over if we desire to encroach upon the manufacturers. It would have been very easy to relieve the people of this country from their burdens and yet to have a surplus.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend laughs at this. I could name half a dozen articles which, by reducing the duty on them one-half, would yield a revenue that would more than cover the deficit. There is no doubt about that—all the six millions. Not only that, but you would relieve the people of this country from the payment of thirty or forty millions of dollars that they are paying now to those protected industries. The pinch in Canada to-day is due to the fiscal policy—the absurd proposition of subsidizing about three per cent of the population and compelling the 97 per cent to pay them a part of their earnings. That is practically what we are doing to-day. People do not understand it, and therefore they do not know where the pinch comes in, but if anybody chooses to analyse it, he will readily see that where you force the body of the people to buy certain articles in Canada at a higher rate than they could buy them elsewhere, they are paying just so much more than their value to the Canadian producer. I do not propose to enumerate the articles just now, but I could very readily do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
Give us the articles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not want to go into a discussion on the trade question, but I have been challenged to name a few of the articles. If you reduce the duty on the cottons that come into this country, you will double—more than double, you will quadruple the importation. Take the duty off woollens, and you will have the same result. Take the duty from iron, and you will more than double or quadruple the importation. Of course it will not suit the woollen and iron men.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—And it will feed the workmen!

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The workmen are not getting the advantage that the protected industries are supposed to give to them. Workmen will find other industries that do not need protection. What do the exports of Canada consist of? Do they consist of woollen, cotton and iron manufactures that are being protected by the fiscal policy of Canada? No, they consist of the produce of the farm—cattle, butter, cheese—and of the products of the mine and the forest that are sent abroad. Does the fiscal policy help any of these industries? Our cheese exports have been going up steadily from year to year. The demand for our cheese is increasing in the British market, and more of our people are going into that industry every year. It is one of the best industries that we have, and our people are now educated up to making a very superior article. There are other articles which they could produce which would give relatively as great a profit. The fiscal policy does not help the lumbermen who cut down the trees and convert them into boards. The national policy taxes them and all their operatives, and the same way with all our natural industries. They are steadily prejudiced by the fiscal policy of the Government because they are paying high figures for all the articles they consume, which are protected by the policy of the Government.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume they buy woollen goods. Whether they buy sugar or not I do not know, but they take a great many other things. It is these natural industries that make up our wealth. The manufacturing industry does not contribute $10,000 a year; in fact it contributes no sum whatever and therefore, I say, it is a very easy matter, if one chooses to revise the tariff and reduce the rate of duty, by that means to more than quadruple the consumption. Cheapen the article and the consumption becomes greater. When articles are dear, people cannot buy them; if you cheapen them, then you at once add to the consumption. It does not need any special philosophy to prove that. On coal oil I think we are now paying from 75 to 80 per cent above its value.

We all join in that part of the address which refers to His Excellency's visit to the other portions of the Dominion, including the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and the North-west Territories. It is pleasant to note that His Excellency and Lady Aberdeen, I may add, take such a very warm interest in the growth of Canada and in all that tends to its social development. They have ever manifested a deep interest in the prosperity of the country and have in a comparatively short space of time become exceedingly friendly with the Canadian people. We are therefore glad that His Excellency has enjoyed his trip throughout the Dominion.

In reference to the paragraph of the address which speaks of the possible admission of Newfoundland into the Dominion, I may say that we shall all be glad to receive Newfoundland into this confederation. Of course it is only a question of terms, and it is to be hoped that a settlement may be arrived at on a fair and reasonable basis. The two important questions for consideration, no doubt, are the financial one and the unfortunate French shore question. The financial one, I think, could be satisfactorily got over, but I do not propose to discuss what is possible just now, because we are not in possession of sufficient information. Whatever exchange of ideas took place at the conference at Ottawa was necessarily confidential, and, therefore, we are not in a position to discuss the matter in detail. We all, however, recognize that the French shore question, relating as it does to an extent of over 800 miles of the coast of Newfoundland, is a very grave one. The rights of the French, while very small at first, have through encroachments from time to time during the past 100 years, grown until they have acquired—I will not say a prescriptive right—privileges other than those given them by the treaty. Yet we all know how difficult it is to take away privileges which have been enjoyed for any considerable length of time. I have heard it stated informally in another place that the French shore question is likely to be settled. If this is true, and I am sure we all hope that it may be, there can be no real or substantial grounds why Newfoundland should not enter into confederation. It would, no doubt, be in harmony with the views and aspirations of Canadians, and I trust also of the people of Newfoundland, and the feeling would be shared by the mother country, because we all know that it has been the policy of England at all times to favour the federation of the various provinces for the reason that fewer complications are likely to arise under confederation than where the country is subdivided into a number of different colonies. I do not see that there is anything very important in the shape of legislation to be laid before us which would afford a pretext for postponing the meeting of Parliament. The principal measure that is mentioned in the speech is that relating to insolvency and that we all know was pretty well threshed out by the members of this chamber last session, when we spent a couple of months in considering the question.

Having made these few comments on the speech, I now come to a pleasanter task. I cordially join in the observations made by the hon. gentleman who moved the address, in the encomiums uttered with regard to the leader of this chamber, and I take the opportunity of expressing my gratification—since we must have a Conservative leader under present conditions—that the choice has fallen upon him. I tender him my congratulations and the congratulations of those who sympathize with me politically on the recognition of his services which has been extended to him by our sovereign. I hope he may long live to enjoy that recognition, but further than this I cannot go. The hon. the mover of the resolution, with very good taste, (considering the political party with which he is allied) expressed the hope that the present premier would long retain his position. While we applauded him on several other sentiments we were obliged to remain silent with regard to that one. I have a great regard for this country and I believe its prosperity is being seriously retarded at present by his policy. I know my hon. friend is a protectionist and while I recognize that he is so because he believes firmly that that is best for the country, yet, holding the conviction that a change of fiscal policy would be beneficial, I am afraid I cannot join in the hope so eloquently expressed that he may long continue at the head of the administration. Whatever mandate the electors may give after another election—whether they endorse the policy of the government in the past and so give my hon. friend the leadership for another five years, or whether they reverse the policy of the country which has prevailed for so long, causing my hon. friend to be cast into the cold shades of opposition—I will do him the credit to say that whether as a member of the government or a member of the opposition, I believe him to be actuated by high and conscientious motives and that he will act in all cases in what he believes from his standpoint to be the best interests of the people of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Permit me first to compliment the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I regret my inability to deal with the subjects before the Senate in the same eloquent manner as these gentlemen have done. Before referring more generally to the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, I have to thank my hon. friend from Pictou (Primrose) as well as the hon. the leader of the Opposition for the personal remarks which they were pleased to make in reference to myself. No member of this chamber feels the high responsibility devolving upon him more deeply than I do. When I consider for a moment the illustrious gentlemen who have been prime ministers of this country since confederation, I must say that I feel my utter inability to occupy the position and to perform the duties attaching thereto in the manner in which they have been discharged by my predecessors. Those who have given attention to the history of this country and have watched its progress, know to whose great ability its prosperity is largely due, and they must come to the conclusion that the names of those hon. gentlemen who have formerly occupied the position of premier of Canada will last for all time to come. As long as history shall exist, Sir John Macdonald's name will not be forgotten. Following him came a very practical, sound, level-headed man in the person of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I can truthfully say of him, as the hon. the leader of the Opposition has been pleased to say of myself, that although I differed from him in almost every act of his political life, although I regarded him as an extreme free trader—I had almost said a Scotch Radical—he was ever actuated by the best and purest motives, and in all his actions in the high position which he held, he did what he believed would be for the best welfare of the country. At the end of his term of office he was succeeded by Sir John Macdonald. After his demise came a man eminent in his profession, who had scarcely a peer at the bar—one whom we all knew and revered and whose talents were appreciated and respected everywhere—the late Sir John Abbott. Following him came one with whom it was my good fortune to be intimately associated during the whole of the period he was a member of the Conservative Administration. I am therefore in a position to say, that the opinion which has sometimes been expressed, that Sir John Thompson was somewhat bigoted in his views, could only have emanated from those who knew little or nothing of him. A man of broader views, a man of keener intellect, a man who desired to treat all classes of the community more equally, never, I believe, lived in Canada. Nova Scotia has cause to be proud of such a son. I shall not indulge in any further eulogy of the departed statesman. No one grieved more than I did when I heard of his untimely death, and I can truthfully say that ever since, I have not ceased to regret his untimely end particularly on account of the great loss which Canada has sustained, and from the fact that his onerous and responsible duties have devolved upon my shoulders; but I can say to hon. gentlemen that whatever my defects may be in the important position which I now hold, that I shall continue in the future as I have endeavoured in the past, to do my duty to my country as far as in me lies, firmly convinced when I adopt a course of action that it is right, and that it is conducive to the advancement of the best interests of the Dominion. Of Sir John Thompson I can say very little more than to utter the deep regret which pervaded all classes of the community when the news of his sudden death was flashed across the ocean. It was a tragic ending. He was a man who rose, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, to the highest position in the House by his industry, energy and integrity, and the country will long have cause to regret that he was removed so suddenly from the sphere of action in the administration of the affairs of this country. Having said this much, I may refer very shortly to the remarks made by the hon. leader of the Opposition with which, I may say, I have very little fault to find. We all know that the duty of an opposition is to find fault, and, therefore, while he grumbles we should not be at all annoyed. He was very mild, and his remarks were a repetition of the remarks of the leader of the Opposition of the other House, and, consequently, are not new. We have heard a good deal about the unwritten law of Parliament. We know that the constitution under which we live is of an elastic character, and therefore preferable to that which is written and which is obligatory upon all governments as is the case over the border.

The death of the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, the then leader of the government, threw matters into a state, if not of chaos, at least disarranged matters to such an extent that time was required for consideration. The hon. gentleman says that the delegates from Newfoundland left for Canada after the calling of Parliament. That is very true, but he might also have stated that we had been in communication with the governor and the Government of Newfoundland for the last two months, and also with the authorities in England with reference to this very question, and I should have been only too pleased had we been enabled to come to the House with a series of resolutions for the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation. However, that is impossible at the present time, for reasons, which I am not at liberty at the present moment to divulge; but I hope that the time is not far distant, when the Dominion will be rounded off by the accession of Newfoundland to its territories, believing, as I do, that it will add greatly to our country and prove beneficial to the people of Newfoundland themselves, and it will place us in a position to treat the questions with which the country has to deal in a more effectual manner than at present. The hon. gentleman said that he did not understand the paragraph in the speech in reference to the treaty with France. It is quite true that the question arose as to whether the treaty was being made between France and Canada or between France and the mother country. If between France and the mother country, the question was whether the colonies might be considered as a third party or not. That has been set at rest by the interpretation given to it by the imperial authorities. But there was another question which required legislation before the treaty could be put into full operation, and which the imperial cabinet desires to have placed on the statute-book before they can ratify the treaty with France. I think it is unfortunate, but it is the fact that in the favoured nations treaties which were entered into between the German Zollverein and some other countries, Belgium among them, there is a provision that a British colony cannot give concessions to the mother country or to any other country in its tariff legislation, that are not given to those nations which are parties to those treaties; and Great Britain asks that Canada, in the present instance, make the concession to those countries which are parties to those treaties, before the ratification of the treaty, and it is only within the last month or so that we have been placed in a position to say to the mother country that we are prepared to accede to their request. Hence, it will be necessary to insert in the tariff resolutions a clause which will give effect to that, or to introduce a short bill declaring that the countries which are parties to the favoured nations treaties shall have the same rights and privileges that are given to France. That is what is meant by the paragraph to which my hon. friend alludes. I sincerely regret the tone, although very mildly uttered, in which the hon. gentleman opposite alluded to the vexed question of the Manitoba schools. A moment's reflection would have shown him that if he were true to the party to which he belongs, and of which he is the honoured leader in this House, he would not have given utterance to the sentiments which pervaded his whole speech. The five years which have rolled around since this question came before the public have been occupied in going through the courts from one appeal to another, and, when he tells us that there should have been no difference of opinion as to the powers and authority of the province of Manitoba he forgets—or if he did not forget, he failed to give expression to the fact—that these differences of opinion existed in the highest courts of the land; and he should also have told us that when this question first loomed up, his great leader, the Hon. Edward Blake, in the House of Commons, introduced a resolution to remove the question altogether from the political arena, and take it out of the power of any legislature to declare that interference with the rights of the minority in any province should be dealt with by the administration. His resolution, so clear and distinct in its character, was accepted by the leaders of the opposition, and by Sir John Macdonald, and all parties believed that this question of sentiment would have been removed from the political arena altogether and left to the courts to decide. He is not in accord, either, with the sentiments expressed so often by the hon. leader of the Opposition in the lower House. Scarcely a speech has that hon. gentleman made in which he has not affirmed strongly his belief in what are termed provincial rights. My hon. friend says, and I fully concur with him in the sentiment, that it is with the greatest reluctance that any government should interfere with the rights and privileges given to a province under the constitution which governs it. Mr. Blake, when he moved the resolution to which I refer, declared that he had but one object in view; that he had no desire to embarrass the government at the time, his only wish being to avoid the introduction of a disturbing element. He had no desire to embarrass the government of the day, but seeing the difficulties which were arising in Manitoba upon this very school question, he proposed, as a true statesman, to remove it from the arena of politics.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was in 1890, the very year that this Manitoba Act was passed. As my hon. friend on my left says, it was one month after the passing of that Act. Mr. Blake saw the difficulties arising—saw the political animosity that would be engendered by the discussion of a question of this kind, for no matter what our religious views may be, whether we are Roman Catholic or Protestant, the moment you touch a question affecting a man's conscience, you rouse the most stubborn passions in his nature. Desiring to remove that vexed question from the political arena and take from the administration the power to deal with it, he moved the following resolution—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I spoke for myself. I think Mr. Blake would admit now, in the light of subsequent events, that he made a mistake when he proposed that resolution. I think the experience of the last five years would convince any one that it was a mistake.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not for me to vouch for the stability of Mr. Blake's opinion any more than I would for that of the hon. gentleman. We are all apt to change to a greater or less extent. It is only a question of time as to how it may affect us. However, Mr. Blake in his resolution said :

It is expedient to provide means whereby, on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance, or the apparent power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reason or opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

Now, that is precisely the course that was followed by the administration on this question. I might quote from Mr. Blake's remarks, in which he proved beyond a doubt what his intentions were, and his great desire to prevent the introduction of those semi-religious or educational questions, and their being dealt with by the executive for the time being. My hon. friend says that in 1871, when the Separate School Act was enacted by the province of Manitoba, they then understood what they were doing. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman on that point, and I quite agree with him that they knew in 1890 what they were doing. It is a matter of satisfaction to me to know that the Conservative party in 1871 were in power in Manitoba, and that they were desirous of maintaining intact the obligations into which they had entered when that province came into the confederation, and it may also be a satisfaction to the hon. gentleman to know that it was his party that was in power in 1890, when they violated the agreement into which they had entered when Manitoba became a province of the confederation. So it has been from the beginning with that party. If the minority in any province expects to have its rights preserved, whether that minority be Roman Catholic or Protestant, it will have to look to the Conservative party which has controlled the destinies of Canada since confederation, with the exception of five years. Minorities will have to look to the Conservative statesman to maintain those rights. Although I am not an advocate, nor am I in favour per se of separate schools, yet I hold that the word of the sovereign, when pledged, whether it is in accord with my particular sentiments or not, should be held inviolate in the governing of the country. The hon. gentleman referred to the debate which took place in 1870, and he stated correctly the opinions held by members of the House of Commons at that time. I remember the discussion well. I took the same position then that I take to-day, and the same position that I maintained in 1863, when I was defeated in my own county. I stated to my constituents then, that if the question was whether we should establish separate schools in this country or not, I should vote against it. But separate schools having been established, I would not be a party to depriving the minority of the rights that they had acquired under the constitution which governed them. I expected that the hon. gentleman would do as Mr. McCarthy did when he argued the question before the Privy Council—point out how I had voted on that question. I remember that debate. Mr. MacDougall stated distinctly that the passing of the Act without amendment would be a perpetuation of the separate schools in Manitoba. Mr. Chauveau, Mr. Cauchon and others took the same line, and it proves to my mind, and it must prove to every reader of that debate, this important fact, that when the resolutions were introduced, admitting Manitoba into the confederation, it was believed at that time that we were granting the same rights and privileges to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba that had been granted to the minority in Quebec and to the minority in Ontario in relation to schools. It was for that reason, believing that we were making that concession to the Roman Catholics to that province, that I recorded my vote as I then did, and I trust the day will never arrive when the party with which I am connected will violate any agreement into which they have entered. The minority who did not obtain their wishes at that particular time should not forget that this country has to be governed by the majority, and in the interests of the whole, and not in the interests of the few. I might enlarge on this question, but I do not think it at all necessary to do so. The government took the strictly constitutional course in reference to the Manitoba School Act. I am a very strong believer, as Mr. Blake is, in provincial rights, and it was for that reason that I was obliged in 1888 to record my vote (nearly getting defeated by my constituents, subsequently for doing so) in support of the contention of the province of Quebec in regard to the Jesuits Estates Act. I believe that the province of Quebec had a perfect constitutional right to pass that Act, and that they acted within their powers. They were disposing of their own moneys, and I took the view that it was none of my business in what manner they chose to do so. Consequently I refused to support the motion seeking to condemn the government for not disallowing the legislation of the province in that regard; and I hold that the same principle must be applied to the whole of the legislation and administration of the country. Under the very principles embodied in this resolution of Mr. Blake's, the Manitoba school case was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. That court decided that the School Act of the province was ultra vires. The hon. the leader of the Opposition says that everybody knew that, or that if they did not know it they did not understand the matter. Notwithstanding his statement, there was a considerable diversity of opinion on the point, and when the case came before the Lords of the Privy Council in England they decided that the School Act was intra vires, that the legislature of Manitoba had a perfect right to legislate as they had done. Then arose the question of the right of the minority to appeal to the Privy Council of Canada for remedial legislation. That again went to the courts in Canada, and our Supreme Court decided that the minority had no right of appeal. Then the matter was on appeal laid before the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council, who declared that while the Act which had been passed by the legislature of Manitoba in 1890 was within the powers of that legislature, the people of Manitoba belonging to the Roman Catholic faith having no rights either by law or practice in respect of separate schools at the time of the admission of Manitoba into the confederacy in 1870, the Act of 1890 had infringed upon the special privileges conceded to the minority by the provincial legislature in 1871, and that, therefore, the minority had a constitutional right of appeal to the Privy Council of Canada. The government lost not a day in summoning the parties interested on either side to appear before the committee of the Privy Council of Canada, there to argue the question in its various aspects pro and con. It was not a week afterwards that the remedial order was issued, asking the legislature of Manitoba to restore to the minority, those rights and privileges of which they had been deprived, as indicated by the decision of the Law Lords of the Privy Council. I do not know that the hon. the leader of the Opposition stated it, but it has been stated here, and throughout the country—it was stated in the debate on the address in the other House by the leader of the Opposition—that that remedial order meant nothing. Then, in the very next breath we are told, that the government has issued a dictatorial order to the province of Manitoba. The opinions of those who are in opposition to the government on this question are as diversified as the colours of the chameleon.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As diversified as the opinions of those who are supporting the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My remark applies particularly to those who belong to the party led by the hon. gentleman opposite. In Antigonish, we were condemned for not going far enough; we were assailed at Verchères on the ground that we had done nothing to relieve the minority; on the other hand, we have it on the authority of a gentleman immediately associated with the Liberal party, speaking in the constituency of Haldimand, that the remedial order was issued for the purpose of buying the votes of the members from Quebec. No matter where you turn, no matter what section of the country you enter, the same divergence of opinion may be observed. All you have to do is to ascertain the views which are held by the majority in that particular section, and you will learn that these are the views which are being taken up by the members of the Opposition who are agitating this question. The organ of the party which is leading them on (as my hon. friend opposite hopes) to victory—when we shall be cast into the cold shades of Opposition, and he shall be triumphantly seated on this side of the House directing the affairs of the country in the course in which he thinks they ought to go—is telling the people of this Dominion what a bad lot the Conservative Government are, how terribly wicked they have been in even suggesting to the people of Manitoba that they should do justice to the minority. Talk of unity—the organ of the Liberal party from which it draws inspiration, is an admirable specimen of unity, I must say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The organ you mention is not the mouthpiece of this party.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know the hon. gentleman has already repudiated the Globe, and I am quite sure that any one who is consistent in his opinions and who desires to see this country governed always repudiate that organ, properly will but it is always a pleasure to me to hear that repudiation come from hon. gentlemen of the party to which it ostensibly belongs, seeing that they will look to it for inspiration when the proper time comes. I am aware that it has been claimed that a certain hon. gentleman who formerly belonged to the Conservative party, and who has been active in his opposition to the appeal, still is a member of our party. All I can say is that we cannot prevent any one calling himself a Liberal or a Conservative, but it is very strange if the proper course to pursue to maintain one's position with a political party is to adopt the opinions (I was going to say fads, but that might be unparliamentary and consequently I will not use the word)—to adopt all the views held by the opponents of that party—if that entitles a man to be called a member of a party, I can only say that I have yet to learn what political allegiance means. I hope sincerely with the mover and the seconder of the address that the people of Manitoba may see their way clear to settle this question among themselves, and to relieve the Parliament of Canada from the serious obligation which will devolve upon them otherwise. It is a very serious matter for the Government of the Dominion to undertake to deal with a question which affects solely any one section of the country. If the people of Manitoba are patriots they will keep this question out of the arena of Dominion politics, but if they desire to continue flinging fire brands among the electorate of this country (who I am sure are desirous of living in peace and harmony) if they reject all overtures and act upon the suggestions of those who are leading the Opposition throughout the country, I can only say that when the time comes, if it should come, for action by this government, the people of Canada will find that the present administration are quite prepared to assume the responsibility which may fall upon them, no matter what the results may be.

I do not think that I shall be justified in referring at any great length to the trade question. I am under the impression that most of the hon. gentlemen present have heard this matter discussed so often that it is scarcely worth while repeating the arguments which sustain the government's position. We have heard a great deal about the manufacturers and about the evil effects of the National Policy, that it is ruining the country, that it has not provided a home market, that it is driving people out of the country, and that the aid given to the various industries of the country has been an injury rather than a benefit. The hon. gentleman forgets once more that his own party is committed to the very principle which he condemns—that of bonuses to industries. The premier of Ontario, of whom the hon. gentleman is such a great admirer, and whom he supports and votes for every year, only two sessions ago placed in the estimates $25,000 as a bonus to the iron industries of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A piece of folly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a folly which has been perpetrated and practised by that hon. gentleman and his party; but I regret to say that they were not sincere—if that is not an unparliamentary expression. They voted this large bonus for the encouragement of the iron industry in Ontario, and particularly in the Algoma district, which they were fearful of losing at that time. That was just before an election, but when the election was over, and they had secured Algoma and the other iron regions of the province, they were satisfied, and they have not repeated the experiment of bonusing since. If it be wrong for the Dominion to encourage the industries of the maritime provinces, it is equally wrong for my hon. friend's party to do the same in the province of Ontario. I do not, however, hold that it is wrong. For once, at least, Sir Oliver Mowat and his cabinet did right, and I can only regret that they did not continue their action as I hoped they would.

We were informed by the hon. gentleman opposite, that the reduction of the duty on cottons, woollens and iron would only have a temporary effect in the reduction of the revenue, but that ultimately it would give us a surplus. On that principle we ought to remove the duties altogether; that would in his opinion be much the better way. Free all the articles that are imported into the country from duty, and if the people can get the money to buy them we shall have good times and a surplus; but the misfortune would be, that our population would have no employment and consequently no money to buy with, and the revenue would fall off tremendously. But did my hon. friend, when he was in the government, adopt the policy of reducing the rate of duty when deficit after deficit came upon his party? Did they reduce the tariff in order to increase the revenue? Not at all, that eminent financier of the party with whom the hon. gentleman is still allied—a member of the same government—came down to Parliament with a proposal to raise the tariff all around, not to reduce it; and of course his proposal was hailed as one of those magnificent strokes of statesmanship that astonish occasionally the financial world. The readjustment of the tariff of which we hear so much, was simply the adoption of the tariff of Sir Francis Hincks holus bolus, except that it was raised  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent all round. My hon. friend says that theirs is a tariff for revenue only, but the argument which my hon. friend opposite is advancing is, that if you want to get more money you ought to reduce the duties on certain articles. In rebuttal of that argument I say that that was not the policy followed by the hon. gentleman when he was in power himself. The record shows that his party acted in a manner diametrically opposed to the principle which they are now advocating—they raised the duty all round. I leave this argument for him to wrestle with and hope he will be equal to the task of reconciling what he is now advocating with what his party practised when they were at the head of affairs.

The hon. gentleman said that he could not join my hon. friend from Pictou in wishing me a long occupation of this seat. I am quite in accord with the hon. gentleman in that respect. I have no desire or particular ambition to occupy the responsible position that I do to day, but I trust the day is far distant when somebody holding the same views and opinions that I do and that the party to which I belong holds, may have to vacate it for those who are now in Opposition. It is not a question with the Conservative party as to the individual who may occupy this or any other position, but it is the great principles by which we are guided and which we believe will lead this country to a prominent position of which we may be proud. The only hope I have is that no matter who may form the administration, they may be men holding the same views and following in the footsteps of our illustrious predecessors, Sir John Macdonald, Sir John Abbott and Sir John Thompson, and the result will be not only that the country will prosper but that it will occupy a position in the world second to none. It is all very well to tell us that the great wealth of this country is its agricultural products. We admit all that, but the hon. gentleman forgets to look at the statistics and to tell this country what they prove. I am not going into them minutely, but if he will examine them he will find that a home market has been produced and maintained to such an extent as to provide a market for the produce of the farm, and it has doubled, trebled and quadrupled our exports of the products of the farm. Look at the figures that I gave to this House last year, and you will find an extraordinary increase in many products. I refer particularly to the product of the hog. Whereas we imported some 14 or 15 million pounds of that product for home consumption, last year it fell to about 4 million pounds, while the exports of the product of the hog had risen from 4 to 5 millions to 14 or 15 millions of pounds. That is but one illustration of the effect of protection to the farmers of this country and of the wise policy that has been inaugurated and carried out by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. I think the time will soon arrive when we shall be able to occupy as prominent a position in the English market in butter as we do in cheese. We are encouraging these industries to such an extent that we expect to inundate the English market with our dairy produce. See the enormous quantity of dairy products that are consumed in England! The English market will take all that we can raise, even if we continue to increase our production as rapidly in the next twenty years as we have increased it in the past ten years. I have no fear as to the future of this country. When you tell us, as we have been told on every stump, that the value of farm property is decreasing, and that farming is not as profitable as it has been in the past, and that the cause of it is the National Policy, and the protection of our industries, let me refer the hon. gentleman to the condition of England to-day, where land is going to waste or into pasturage. That is the condition of the farming industry in free trade England. Let me call his attention to the speech on that very question made recently by Lord Salisbury, in which he admitted the fact that the free trade policy of England had ruined the agricultural interests of that country. What did he give as the reason for pursuing a free trade policy? He said the lesser must give way to the greater. He said that the great mass of the British people demanded free trade and food as cheap as it could possibly be obtained in any part of the world, and therefore the agricultural industry had to suffer for the benefit of the great mass of the people. Apply that same logic to Canada and what follows? The agricultural community of Canada are the great mass of the people. There are more people engaged in that industry than in any other. If we are to adopt Lord Salisbury's principle and carry it out in this country, the lesser has to give way for the greater by adopting a trade policy that will foster agricultural industries, and so you might pursue this argument for hours. I can show, and prove by statistics, that lands in England have fallen proportionately far lower in value than farm lands have in Canada. There are many reasons for the decreased value of farm lands in the older provinces of this country. We have opened up for settlement millions of acres of land in the North-west. We know that from 15 to 25 millions of bushels of wheat have been produced annually in that part of Canada of late years, and this grain has come into competition with the grain produced in other parts of the Dominion. We know also that there has been a vast production of that great staple of life, wheat, in Australia, Russia and other countries, and that it has been exported in large quantities to England, reducing the price, and necessarily the price of the land on which wheat is grown has diminished in this country. There is no use in attempting to hide that fact. To attribute the decrease to the fact that a duty of 15c. a bushel has been imposed on wheat, and 20 per cent ad valorem on cotton, and 30 per cent on iron or other articles, is to give utterance to opinions which, I scarcely believe, the hon. gentleman has any faith in himself. Compare the position of Canada to-day with that of any other country. When we see the Australian colonies with scarcely a bank that has not broken, and when we look across the border and find that three or four hundred of their banking institutions have gone to the wall, while we in Canada have stood firm through the whole crisis and not a single bank has closed its doors, I think we have reason to be proud of our country. You may depreciate it as much as you please; you may attempt to attribute whatever depression exists in Canada at the present moment to the operation of the National Policy, but I venture this assurance that if you had not had the National Policy for the last fifteen or sixteen years, this country would be in an infinitely worse position than it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I fully concur in all that has been said by every hon. gentleman who has spoken here this afternoon with respect to the great loss that Canada has sustained by the tragic death of the late premier, Sir John Thompson. I also congratulate the House that again we have the premier of Canada in this chamber, and I congratulate the hon. gentleman who leads the Senate, and the government, on the honours which have been bestowed upon our premier. I also congratulate the hon. gentleman who occupies the seat to his left (Mr. Ferguson) at this moment, in having been chosen one of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors for Canada. But, while I congratulate the Government on these points, I must find a little fault with them, not for the sake of finding fault, but with good reason. The province from which I hail has been a member of the confederation for 24 years, Prince Edward Island has been a member of the confederation for twenty-two years and during that period, has had no less than three of its representatives members of the Privy Council of Canada. The first was Mr. Laird, the second was Mr. Pope, and now we have the Hon. Mr. Ferguson. I find no fault whatever with the government for making this last appointment and giving Prince Edward Island representation in the Cabinet. But I do find fault with them, and I am expressing the almost unanimous opinion of the people of British Columbia, for the gross injustice that has been done to our province ever since it entered the union. Some ten years ago I introduced a resolution affirming the principle that each of the four natural divisions of Canada should be represented in the Cabinet. The first division was the maritime provinces, the second Ontario and Quebec, the third the prairie section, the fourth the Pacific coast. I pointed out on that occasion that, in my judgment, the dissatisfaction which gave rise to the last rebellion in the North-west Territories, was attributable to the fact that there was no representative of the prairie region in the Cabinet, and that the rebellion was due to the ignorance of the government of the true condition of affairs in the North-west and the consequent gross injustice of the treatment that the people of that country received. That outbreak resulted in the loss of 62 precious lives and about $9,000,000 in money. Not only that, but the rebellion retarded the settlement of the country and we feel the effects of it even to the present day. Before the outbreak there was a steady stream of emigration into the country, which ceased immediately after the rebellion broke out. Comparisons, we are told, are odious, but I am forced to make comparisons, I do so, however, without any ill-feeling to the hon. gentleman who has been brought into the government to represent Prince Edward Island. I am happy that he is there and it is only right and proper that the island province should be represented in the Cabinet, but I claim that British Columbia should also be represented, and for several reasons which I shall now give. In 1892 the province of British Columbia was the third largest in its contributions to the public treasury from customs and excise, standing even ahead of Nova Scotia. I want the hon. member from Lunenburg, to take particular notice of that.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—British Columbia contributed nearly $1,750,000 that very year, while the province of Prince Edward Island contributed only a little more than one-tenth of that amount. Another reason why British Columbia should be represented in the Cabinet is its great distance from the capital. While Prince Edward Island is within easy reach of Ottawa—less than 1,000 miles—British Columbia is no less than 3,000 miles from the capital, and it is almost impossible for its representatives in either house to come here and make their opinions felt as is done by the representatives of the maritime provinces. We should have some representative to whom we could look, and whom we could hold responsible for fair treatment towards our province. British Columbia, being furthest removed from the capital, should, above all other provinces, be represented in the Cabinet. We have occasional visits from ministers of the Crown in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, and we are always glad to see them. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that we generally treat them very well—that is as long as they behave themselves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They always do that.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I must confess the hon. premier does, and some few others also do, but there are others who behave differently. Those annual pic-nics, I understand, are made at the cost of the country, and the ministers can stay only a day or two. They are very willing to lend a listening ear to any complaints that we may make, and they take notes of our complaints, but that is all we ever hear on the subject. British Columbia has an enormous area—about 300 times as great as the little island province in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and certainly that ought to be taken into consideration. Not only that, but the maritime provinces are comparatively finished provinces. They increase in population very slowly. Between 1881 and 1891, I believe, Prince Edward Island increased its population by only about 100 souls. In our province, on the contrary, the increase was from 49,000 to over 99,000. We have practically the same number of people that Prince Edward Island has—in fact, I believe we have a greater population to-day. Taking into consideration the amount of revenue that we are contributing, and the distance that we are from the capital, it was only right and proper that the premier, in forming his cabinet, should have taken into it a member from British Columbia. I do not ask this as a favour—I demand it as a right. Ever since confederation, my native province, Nova Scotia, has had two members in the Privy Council, New Brunswick has always had two.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—If I am wrong I hope the hon. gentleman will put me right. If they have not had two members continuously, they have been but a very short time without two.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the Honourable Mr. Pope was a member of the Administration from Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick had but one—Sir Leonard Tilley.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was only for a short time. I think I can account for Prince Edward Island being favoured as British Columbia never has been. When Prince Edward Island entered the union it was represented by six Liberals, and a majority of its representatives in the commons have always belonged to that party. British Columbia, on the other hand, has given an almost undivided support to the Conservative party, and the reward for its fidelity has been that it has been made a Tory preserve. But there is a limit to the patience of even the long-suffering people of the Pacific province. Quebec has always had four or five Ministers. Ontario has five—three with portfolios and two without. Manitoba, fortunately, has a representative now. It is right and proper that she should have, but to use the hon. premier's expression, "to round up the confederation," I think it would be only right and proper and in keeping with the policy that he has laid down, to round up the government by taking into the cabinet a member from British Columbia. The first time I brought up this matter, ten years ago, the late respected Sir Alexander Campbell was leader of the Senate. While he was one of the most courteous and gentlemanly of our members, yet he forgot himself to such an extent in making his reply that he actually insulted every member from British Columbia and the North-west Territories by informing them that not until Manitoba and British Columbia should send men qualified for the position would they have representatives in the cabinet. I say here fearlessly that there has never been a cabinet since confederation that has not possessed members with whom the ordinary members of British Columbia would compare favourably. I make no exception—my remark applies to all cabinets, Liberal and Conservative. Both parties have been unjust to British Columbia in this matter. In forming the cabinet, why was not my hon. colleague, Senator MacDonald, who has been a member of this House for twenty-four years, selected? To go to the other House, what was wrong with the gallant Colonel Prior? Why was he not made Minister of Militia, or given some other position in the cabinet? Why was not the amiable and successful merchant, Mr. Earle, taken in? Why was the politic Mr. Mara not taken in? Why was not the Queen's Counsel, Mr. Corbould, taken in? I must inform the premier and this House that the North-west Territories and British Columbia will not submit much longer tamely to being treated as a preserve. We have been treated always, especially British Columbia, as a preserve, and no matter what treatment we received, we had to be satisfied with a smile and a bow from the men in authority. That must come to an end, no matter whether it is a Conservative government or a Liberal government. We must have a representative in the cabinet in the true interests not only of the province, but of the whole Dominion, and I sincerely hope and trust that the hon. leader of the government will take a note of it and act upon the suggestion that I have made.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved that the debate be adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE SENATOR TASSÉ.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the House do now adjourn. He said :

I may be permitted, in moving the adjournment of the House, to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the death of one of our members—I refer to the late Hon. Mr. Tassé, who occupied a position in the Senate very acceptably for a few years. Mr. Tassé commenced life as a journalist in this city, and occupied a much more prominent and important position in the city of Montreal, where he conducted the leading French journal in that city—La Minerve. I am sure that to those who knew the hon. gentleman and had the pleasure of sitting with him, as I did in the House of Commons, for five years, and occupying a seat with him in this chamber, also, will regret that one so talented and so gifted, and who had done so much in bringing the country prominently before the world, should have been cut off at such an early period of his life. He was only 47 when he died, and if he never did anything more than the delivering of that speech in Chicago in defence of Canada, pointing out its resources and its greatness, to the world—for it was published and circulated everywhere—he earned for himself the gratitude of every Canadian. I do not know that I ever read a speech which gave me more pleasure, and which breathed more true patriotism, and conveyed to the world what Canadians thought of their country, of its greatness, and of its prospects, and of its future, than did that utterance of Mr. Tassé. It was my very great pleasure personally to thank him for it when he returned. Coming as it did from a representative French Canadian, upon whom many of the Americans, particularly in a large city like Chicago, look upon as discontented and desirous of severing connection between this country and the Empire, it was a revelation to them at least, although it was not to the Canadians who heard and applauded him. I was greatly pleased, as I am sure every one was who read his speech,—and also that which followed by Mr. Larke, an Ontarian, who now is in Australia, when combating the views uttered by the late Mayor Harrison of Chicago, when he had the indelicacy to talk of bringing Canada under the folds of the stars and stripes—when Mr. Tassé came to the rescue of his country and pointed out that under no circumstances would the French Canadian people ever submit to acknowledging the sway of the United States. I deeply regret that one so young and so gifted should have been removed from the scene of what would have been his increasing usefulness.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I join in expressing the regret that we all feel at the early death of the late Senator Tassé. He had a bright intellect and used his intellectual powers at all times to show his love for his native country. His services were highly appreciated, and on no occasion more by his fellow countrymen than at the particular time to which the premier has just alluded. We all deeply regret his death.

THE ADDRESS.

SEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called :—

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech, on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Seventh Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I regret that yesterday, in consequence of the non-arrival of the train until after the debate had concluded, I had not the pleasure of hearing the remarks of the hon. mover and seconder of the address on this occasion. We may congratulate the hon. gentleman from Pictou on his coming into the Senate. The first thing that we have to deal with of any importance in the Speech from the Throne, is the reference to the late Right Hon. Sir John Thompson. I must unite with those who have preceded me in expressing the great regret that the whole country felt at the untimely death of the late premier. I may also include in that remark a reference to the death of one of our colleagues, the Hon. Mr. Tassé. Sir John Thompson is the third premier who has departed since this Parliament was elected. The two last,

Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Abbott, died when they had finished their work. Unfortunately, Sir John Thompson died when he was only commencing his work, and I may say that the country has suffered a very great loss indeed in the sudden and untimely death of our late premier. It was a tragic death. He died at the feet of Her Majesty, and it brought prominently, not only before the people of Canada and the British empire, but before the people of the world, the close connection existing between this great country, the rest of the British empire and the sovereign; and I trust that the sympathy that was exhibited towards the late premier of Canada will bear just fruits in cementing more firmly that unity which should exist, that friendship that should prevail between the various colonies of the British empire and the heart of the empire itself. I regret, very much from a personal standpoint, the death of our late colleague, Mr. Tassé. He was, from the first, a friend of my own, and I shall miss him from this honourable House very much indeed.

The next subject that we are called upon to discuss in the debate upon this address is the question of the French treaty. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that last year I gave a considerable amount of criticism to the French treaty when it was before this House, and I think from the evidence that we have here in the Speech from the Throne, that that criticism was well-timed and just. I see that it is necessary to introduce legislation in order to make more clear the terms upon which the French treaty has been passed between France and Canada. The point that I made last year myself was that in giving France the right of entry into Canada at a certain rate of duty, we would open the door to all those countries to which Great Britain and Canada in so far as she is included in the treaties grants most favoured-nation treatment, but not necessarily to our sister colonies. It had that peculiar anomaly, and it is necessary to bring legislation down, as notified in the speech from the Throne, in order to give effect to the French treaty and make it perfectly clear that our sister colonies shall enjoy the same favoured terms as France in this country. All those nations that come under the Imperial clauses in most favored nation treatment will have exactly the same advantages. I pointed this out last year, and as the subject will come before this honourable House when that legislation is brought down, we will have a further opportunity of discussing the question when we know exactly the terms of the legislation which we will be called upon to express our views.

The next clause in the address is :

We are pleased to be informed by Your Excellency that the recent action of the Imperial Parliament enabling the various Australasian Governments to enter into preferential trade relations with the other self-governing colonies of the empire, affords gratifying proof that the suggestions of the Colonial Conference are being favourably entertained by Her Majesty's Government.

Now, I feel that the conference that we had here last year has been, and will be in the future, productive of good results. The legislation here referred to is legislation which interferes with imperial legislation and interferes with the Australian colonies themselves—the various provinces that compose the Australian colonies from applying the principle of tariffs such as we have had in Canada—that is to say one province in the continent of Australia could not enter into a trade arrangement with another province. Great Britain was to have exactly the same treatment, and it is to remove that obstacle that imperial legislation is sought for. The present government is directing its policy towards increasing our trade relations with the Australian continent, the Cape of Good Hope and the other self-governing colonies of the Empire. It is doing that on the principle of reciprocity I have no doubt—I do not see how they could do it in any other shape. They propose to have a preferential arrangement in favour of one another as against the rest of the world. That is the only way I can interpret the policy now proposed by the present government. I would warn the hon. leader of the government of this, that as sure as we go on educating the self-governing colonies in the principles of protection, such as we have in force at the present moment in Canada, we may expect, when they are so educated, they will protect themselves and not do anything that is likely to help Canada at their expense. The same way with the people of Great Britain. If the people of Great Britain should be led, under adverse circumstances, by principles which may be enunciated here, to abandon free trade, which has governed them for the last 50 years, and to adopt the principle of protection, it will be for the purpose of protecting the thirty-eight millions of people in the British Islands, and not in any shape or form to protect the people of Canada. I would hold out a warning voice and say that it is a great deal better for us to proceed on the commercial laws of Great Britain rather than try to induce the people of Great Britain to adopt the commercial idea of the people of Canada; otherwise, I fear the doors of Great Britain will be closed to the people of Canada as well as to the people of the United States and the rest of the world should Great Britain be induced to change her policy and adopt protection, and to the extent that she does so her purchasing power as a consuming market will be weakened and will react upon ourselves.

I wish, therefore, to dwell again upon that particular phase of the address where it is congratulating us on the legislation of the Imperial Parliament in regard to the Australian colonies. I wish to remind this House that that legislation is sought for to enable the various provinces of the Australian continent to unite themselves into a confederacy, as the people of Canada have united themselves in this Dominion. It is not desired, I think, in the interests of Canada, that that confederacy, when formed, should unite on the principles of protection such as we at the present moment have adopted, but rather on the principles of free trade, in unison with the commercial policy of Great Britain.

The next clause in the address is a most important one at the present moment, because it is a question of the adoption of domestic economy, I might say, by the people of Canada themselves. I congratulate the hon. leader of the government upon the wisdom displayed by the government in bringing on this session of parliament instead of having a dissolution as was at one time spoken of. The statesmanlike way of ascertaining public opinion on new questions when they arise, is either to appeal to the country for the confidence of the people, or to appeal to certain constituencies in order to find out the drift of public opinion to guide the government of the country. We have just had four by-elections in various parts of the country, and it is from these by-elections that the government to a certain extent draw their inspiration in guiding them. The government is merely the exponent of public opinion through the representatives of the people in Parliament, and it is from the representatives of the people as elected, that they have to gauge what public opinion is, in certain directions. The result of the by-elections has been a guide to the government themselves, and to those who are opposed to the government in criticizing their policy. We in this honourable House of course, act in an independent manner in so far as we are not responsible to the people. We are not influenced in our action by feelings of passion which may be aroused in the heat of a political contest when religious questions are the forefront of that discussion, but I say we are fairly representative of the people in so far as we live among them and we are drawn from every portion of Canada, and we are able to a certain extent to tell what their feelings, their ideas and motives and anxieties are in any given direction. This is an important question that is contained in this clause:

We thank Your Excellency for informing us that, in conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissentient minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education, Your Excellency heard in Council the appeal, that your decision thereon has been communicated to the legislature of the said province, and that the papers on the subject will be laid before us.

I come from the province of Manitoba, which is affected by the legislation that it is proposed to put on the statute-book in regard to this question before us, and I would say this, that in so far as the government have gone—I may even go so far as to say that in the expressions that fell from the hon. leader of the government yesterday have gone—I have no fault to find. The hon. leader of the government and the government itself, in passing the remedial order which has been transmitted to the province of Manitoba, have merely given effect to the decisions resulting from the various judicial steps that the Roman Catholic minority of the province had taken in order to ascertain what their rights were, I do not see that the government had any other course to pursue than the one they did follow in hearing the appeal and transmitting the decision to the province of Manitoba. To that extent, I think, that the government acted in accordance with the decision rendered under the constitution. In that they have not shown exactly what course they may yet pursue in regard to this matter. When you wish to direct the mind of the government in any given direction—when you wish to bring to the minds of the government any grievance that you may feel in regard to any proposed legislation, the time to do it is in the early stages of the session, before the government is committed to any particular line of policy, in order that their minds may be directed by any strength of argument we may be able to bring to bear to induce them to proceed in any given direction, and it is for that reason that I propose to take up perhaps a little more time in the discussion of important questions in the debate on the address than is usually given. I wish to present, from the standpoint of the people of Manitoba, how far they feel the effect of the ruling of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, followed up by the remedial order of the Dominion Government.

The people of Canada understand what led to the foundation of the legislation that is now being put in force for the first time in this country, when we formed our confederation in 1867, it was by an agreement between the various provinces in the east agreeing to form a national union—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, agreed with one another to form the federation which has now grown into the Dominion of Canada extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The province of Ontario and the province of Quebec had certain legislation in regard to separate schools passed by themselves when they had the individual power to adopt or reject such legislation, when they formed the confederation of Canada, it was felt that that legislation which had been put on the statute-book of those provinces should be protected by legislation in some manner, and with that idea, section 93 of the British North America Act with its subsection was put in the constitution for the protection of the minority existing in Quebec or Ontario. I refer to this case because it has been quoted that the case of Manitoba is similar to that of Ontario and Quebec.

The case of New Brunswick was not similar, nor was the case of Nova Scotia or of Prince Edward Island similar to that of Ontario and Quebec. No more is that of the province of Manitoba. We have to deal with the Manitoba case on its merits. Now, what are the conditions attached to the question in regard to Manitoba. In 1869 the imperial government desired to transfer to the authority of Canada that vast territory then under imperial control between the bounds of Ontario and the Rocky Mountains. It was, at that time, an unoccupied territory under the control of the Hudson Bay Company. There was a small population which had grown up in the country in connection with the employment offered by the fur trading companies which had planted themselves there. That small population was centred around what is now the city of Winnipeg and in the Selkirk settlement, numbering altogether twelve thousand people equally divided between the Roman Catholic faith and the Protestant faith. When the country was about to be transferred from the Imperial to the Canadian control, the flag of rebellion was raised in order that the attention of the people of Canada might be called to the fact that a portion of the population of the Red River settlement desired to be guaranteed in certain rights before the transfer of the country actually took place. The result of that trouble, in the winter of 1869-70, was an intimation from the Imperial Government to inquire into the rights, and a notification from the Canadian Government that they wished the transfer which was to have been carried into effect on the 1st December, 1869, postponed until the country would be peaceably handed over by the Hudson Bay Company. The result of that was that through Sir Donald A. Smith, the commissioner of the Canadian Government, delegates were invited and came down representing the people of what was then known as the Selkirk settlement, in order to confer with the government of Canada as to what the terms should be upon which they entered the confederacy—as to how far their rights would be protected after they had joined the confederacy. What I contend is that the communication that went on between those delegated and the government of Canada was confined to the population of Selkirk settlement. It was not a conference for the purpose of directing the destinies of that great western country which extends from the bounds of the province of Ontario to the bounds of British Columbia, it was not conceived by those 12,000 people there who nominated the delegates, Judge Black, Father Ritchot and Mr. Scott, it was not that they were to impose restrictions upon the people of the future who were going to occupy that country. It was merely that the people who did occupy that Selkirk settlement at that time amounting to twelve thousand people should be protected in whatever rights they possessed, or desired to possess, after they had become a part of the Dominion of Canada. Now, if you look at it in the right spirit you will realize that this is the fact. This fact is more impressed upon us in consequence of the small territory that was first of all included in the province of Manitoba. The first territory that was carved out for the purpose of being included in the province of Manitoba was the territory comprising Winnipeg as a centre and a radius of 60 miles around Winnipeg. That was the first territory to which those rights were to extend. Since then, the province of Manitoba has been enlarged until it has a boundary extending east to Ontario and west to the 29th range, which is a very different province to-day from what the province of Manitoba was when those delegates came down to confer with the government of Canada in 1871. Now, if in 1871 the Selkirk settlement were accorded certain rights which were to be lasting to them as individuals, are the people who are included in the portion of the province of Manitoba in which I reside to be brought under the legislation known as the Manitoba Act in its constitutional restrictions? Now, that is the position we have to decide upon. What is the ruling of the Privy Council? The ruling is that the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba under the legislation of 1870, which constituted the Manitoba Act—not under the British North American Act—and under the legislation passed by the legislature at its first sitting after the passage of that Act have the right of appeal to Parliament. I wish you to realize that there are no rights beyond the right of appeal. All through the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—all through the argument before the Judicial Committee—it was made perfectly clear that the right of appeal to the Governor in Council constituted the right of that minority, and, when it went before Parliament, their rights ceased. Parliament is a constitutional body with perfect right to say. "We will adopt one policy to-day and we will adopt another policy to-morrow." The constitutional liberty of the people of Canada under the British constitution is such that they have perfect constitutional liberty to change, day by day, any policy that they consider in the public interests of the country. Have we not gradually changed our policy in regard to the veto power after twenty-five years experience of its working in the direction of granting fuller liberty to the provinces not inconsistent with the national interests of Canada. Had not the government the power to veto the Provincial Act of 1890? Now that the veto power of Parliament is called into play, is the government now going to recommend Parliament to exercise the veto power which they themselves did not consider it wise or politic to exercise? I will just show you, from the reading of the argument before the Judicial Committee of the Council, what was in the minds of the Lords of the Council themselves—what was in the minds of those who were appealing on behalf of the Roman Catholic minority, in order to show that they expected Parliament only to exercise its constitutional power as a matter of policy, and not as a statutory obligation—

LORD WATSON—The Governor might be of opinion to-day or this year that it was not desirable, in the interests of the community, that certain previous privileges given by Parliament should be repealed; but ten years hence, he might be of a different opinion. If there were legislation of a prohibitive kind included in this remedial legislation, there would be an Act of Parliament in the way of his exercising his discretion on the subject.

I can see all through the argument that was made before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the Lords of the Council themselves were somewhat puzzled between the anomaly of having a constitution which was a constitution of liberty and having a restrictive influence such as is imposed by the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act. They saw, themselves, that it was anomalous to a certain extent, but as a judicial tribunal they merely had to give their judgment as it was presented to them in the wording of the legislation on which they were called upon to pronounce themselves. I will read you also what Mr. Ewart, who was the counsel for the appellants, said in his remarks before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

He says :

Before closing, I would say a word or two as to what we are seeking. As it has been already remarked, we are not asking for any declaration as to the extent of the relief to be given by the Governor General. We merely ask that it should be held that he has jurisdiction to hear our prayer, and to grant us some relief if he thinks proper to do so. It may be that the Dominion authorities may not choose to re-establish us in all the rights and privileges that we enjoyed prior to this Act of 1890.

You will see that, in the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the counsel for the Roman Catholic minority contended there that the Dominion authorities might only grant a portion or they might grant the whole. If they were entitled to grant only a portion and not the whole, therefore they might consider it advisable not to grant any at all. That is the position in which the matter stands before the Parliament of Canada to-day. The matter will be in the hands of Parliament after the province of Manitoba has notified the Dominion Government as to what stand they will take in regard to it. So far as we are able to ascertain from public opinion in Manitoba, the disposition was not to accept any interference from the Dominion authority in regard to the provincial legislation enacted in 1890. But that whatever legislation was necessary, whatever the rights were, it was merely an agreement between the Dominion Government and the people who existed in Manitoba in 1870. However, I am not in the confidence of the government of Manitoba, and we will see what action they will take when the legislature meets again next month. I will read another extract from this blue-book. The Lord Chancellor says with regard to the Governor General :

He cannot do anything himself. And the last resort the only person or body who can do anything more are the Parliament of Canada, who are certainly not under legal compulsion to act and certainly would not act unless they conceived there was some substantial ground for it.

You see the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, the Lords of the Council generally have shown the constitutional power of Parliament is preserved in all its principles, that if a change of mind should come over the Canadian people in their policy as laid down 20 or 25 years ago, that so far as the Parliament of Canada is concerned it is at perfect liberty to take some other course if they think it desirable in the public interest to do so. I say that it is desirable in the interests of the good government of Canada that we should preserve the constitutional liberties not only of the Dominion Parliament, but of the legislatures of the various provinces as clearly and as closely as we possibly can, that we should expand them rather than contract them. The principle that is in the minds of some of the people of Canada to-day is that under remedial legislation these liberties should be contracted rather than expanded. I raise my voice on behalf of the good government of this country. Canada is being governed on the sound basis of self-government, not as Russia is governed, by an autocratic. This is a democratic country under the democratic influence of the British constitution, the most enlightened, I may say in history, under a limited monarchy, which is subject to the constitutional power of Parliament, that that constitutional liberty is greater than is known in any country in the world. We must not impair that constitution in any degree, abridge any liberty that it confers on the people of Canada. Therefore, I think this is not an ordinary case which is now before the people. We are asked to establish a precedent in one direction or another which will influence the future of this country for all time in an injurious or a beneficial way. At page 266 of this book, Mr. Blake concludes his argument before the Lords of the Privy Council as follows :

What we ask your Lordships is, what the privileges were and how far they have been infringed; and then we propose to ask the Governor General to determine how far he will go. I do not ask your Lordships to make any suggestion as to his action, which I conceive from the beginning is political. He is to be instructed as to the law; and then his action and the action of the Parliament will carry the thing out.

I have quoted Mr. Blake, who was the leading counsel for the appellants. I have quoted Mr. Ewart, who was also counsel for the appellants. I have quoted also the idea that passed through the minds of the Judicial Committee themselves as they were impressed from day to day by the arguments brought before them. All those go to show to you that the action of the Parliament now is a political action and not in any sense a judicial action—that both under the British North America Act and the Manitoba Act the right of any minority is merely the right to appeal to Parliament, and their rights having been put before Parliament by the appeal to the Governor in Council, they then and there cease—that they then come under the British constitution and that the representatives of Canada in Council assembled must debate and argue what is the best policy for the good government of the whole of Canada, and on that argument must rest the concluding decision of this great question now before the people of Canada and before Parliament. It is necessary for us to consider fairly and well how far it is possible for us to go. The claim is put forth that not only the rights which were acquired in 1870, prior to the transfer of the country, but any right subsequently acquired should also be restored—in other words that a statute having once been put on the statute-books, there is no power or right or authority on the part of the provincial legislature to remove that law from the statute-books. If we were to establish such a precedent we should be plunging the country into difficulties of which no one can foresee the end. The province of Manitoba, at the time that that legislation was put on the statute-book in 1871, consisted merely of a population of 12,000, one-half of whom were Roman Catholics, the other half Protestants. It is natural to suppose that, being divided in this way, they would put on the statute-book what they desired to have at the moment, and that they would carry out the idea that they had sent their delegates down to express. But to say now that I, who live 250 miles west of the scene of that legislation, 25 years afterwards, am going to be deprived of the constitutional liberty that I claim as a right—to say that I must be dictated to and told that I must have legislation imposed upon me by the Dominion Government, is to tell me that I am to be deprived of a right which is nowhere else denied throughout the Dominion of Canada. If you say that I, in the province of Manitoba, may be thus interfered with, it is tantamount to saying that a similar course may be taken throughout the whole of the North-west Territories. If the added portion of the province of Manitoba which had no part or parcel in the legislation of 1871 is to be included in the proposed remedial legislation, then it may as well be extended to the bounds of British Columbia in the west and to the Arctic Ocean in the north for all time to come. It would be placing legislation on the statute-book to be maintained formally for all time so far as legislation in educational matters are concerned, and that would be depriving the whole western portion of Canada of the constitutional liberty which the people of that great country should enjoy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman's argument is a fairly strong one looking at it from his own standpoint, but he is leaving out of sight the fact that the Parliament of Canada in 1874 extended to the whole of the North-west Territories the same provisions with respect to separate schools which had been applied to the then province of Manitoba by the Act of 1870.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware that what the hon. gentleman says is correct. I am quite aware that the Act of 1870 has been extended and that we are being governed to-day by the Act of 1870 which was passed at the time of the transfer of the country. Prior to the transfer of the country I have nothing to say against that. I am not complaining of that, but what I say is that what might have been in the minds of the Canadian people in 1874 may not be in their minds to-day. Are you going to bind down two or three millions of people, who thirty years hence may occupy that country, by legislation placed upon the statute-books to-day?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would ask the hon. gentleman if it should turn out that one political party becomes stronger in the country than another, can that greater political party change the whole constitution? The hon. gentleman argues in this way because he himself has gone into that country. Now, other people may have gone in and may go in knowing what the constitution is: would he hold that they would have a right to change the whole constitution?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Every time the balance of party changes, we might see the rights of the weaker party trampled upon.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the constitutional power of the people of Canada. The fact that I went in there knowing that certain legislation was on the statute-books, does not imply that I was tied by the leg, so far as my vote was concerned, for all time to come. If you put that forth as a precedent to be followed in the future, you will be depriving a very large section of the people of Canada of their constitutional liberties. The argument which has been put forth is an impossible one, and the position is an impossible one for the people of Canada to maintain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman entirely ignores the fact that Canada cannot now change the constitution of Manitoba. It is only the Imperial Government that can do that. The constitution is an existing fact, and we cannot change it no matter how much we may desire to do so without the aid of the Imperial Government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have already explained to the hon. the leader of the Opposition that the first decision of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council distinctly declares that the exclusive right of legislating on educational matters belongs to the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You won't find that the British Parliament will be governed by that decision.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—Subject to restrictions, but what are those restrictions? Simply that the minority, if they feel unjustly treated, have the right to appeal to the Governor in Council, but the fact of their having that right does not tie Parliament. It does not compel Parliament to say "Since we in 1874 included the whole province of Manitoba under the operation of the legislation of 1870, we have now no power to repeal that legislation."

Hon. Mr. BERNIER.—What is the use of having the right to appeal if the minority cannot ask for anything further?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—I wish to draw a great distinction between the claim put forth on behalf of the minority and the question of a remedy. I do not deny for one moment that there is an inherent right in the minority to appeal to Parliament to obtain redress. I am not arguing against that, for I have not come to that point yet; but what I wish to do is to confine to their legitimate limits the rights which the minority possess and to define distinctly how far it is right for the Parliament of Canada to say that the views of the minority in regard to education should be imposed on the people of the country. These rights do exist, but it is equally true that they are limited. I believe it is true that the people of the Selkirk settlement did enter into a treaty with the Parliament of Canada, and that Parliament entered into a treaty with them to guarantee them certain rights and privileges. To that extent I say the Parliament of Canada is properly and justly entitled to see that they are guaranteed the enjoyment of those rights and privileges. It is very much the same ground that I took in reply to the hon. member for St. Boniface some two or three years ago. The rights that were acquired, and which the Parliament of Canada have now to take into consideration, are only the rights of the population as it existed in 1871, and Parliament must deal with those rights without interfering in any shape or form with the constitutional rights of the province of Manitoba in regard to education. No one in the province is being deprived of his constitutional rights or privileges. The people may bring whatever constitutional influence they possess to bear upon the government of the province to have their views carried into effect in a constitutional way. That right is not being forbidden to them, and in this respect they possess exactly the same right as I possess, and they can exercise it in exactly the same way. But the fact is, a small minority are attempting to have things their own way, simply because certain legislation was passed at one time, irrespective altogether of the changes which have taken place since. In my opinion it would not be wise to urge that claim. What is the condition of the people of the province of Manitoba to-day? Take the county in which I reside—the constituency of Marquette. There are in that constituency 36,000 people of whom 1,900 are Roman Catholics; the balance are Protestants. In that constituency there are ninety-five churches; five of them are Catholic, the balance are Protestant. Now, the constituency of Marquette is entirely west of what is known as the Selkirk settlement. It has sprung up since 1871, being included in the added territory to which I have already referred. Now, are you going to bind down 36,000 people to the views of the 1,900 Roman Catholics in that constituency?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Would not the same argument apply to the other provinces, supposing the relative position of the different religious bodies were changed?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The provision in the British North America Act applies to the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, but, as I have already stated, it does not apply at all to British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and the finding of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council says subsection 3, of section 93, British North America Act, does not apply to Manitoba that the case is governed by section 22 of the Manitoba Act. This western territory is a great tract that has yet to be occupied. It was not occupied at the time of which I am speaking. At that time there were only 12,000 people residing in the Selkirk settlement. It was a very limited colony, indeed, and the rest of the country was a bare plain. That bare plain has since, in the course of the development of the country, become occupied, and now the settlers who are coming in there, settlers who possess the same constitutional rights and privileges as those who were there before, are called upon to defend themselves against what may be very properly termed—I will not say an effort to deprive them of their liberties—but their claim to a right which undoubtedly exists in every other part of the Dominion. The effort which is now being made to extend those limited rights is depriving us of our constitutional privilege to say how we will conduct the educational affairs of the province. In the constituency of Marquette, there are ninety-five churches, five of which are Roman Catholic. In the constituency of Lisgar, there are forty-eight churches, nine of which are Roman Catholic. A portion of Lisgar is in what used to be called the Selkirk settlement. In Provencher, which is essentially the Selkirk settlement, there are thirty-three churches, fourteen of which are Roman Catholic. In the constituency of Selkirk itself, which is in south-western Manitoba, the constituency which is represented by the Minister of the Interior, there are ninety churches, seven of which are Roman Catholic. In the city of Winnipeg there are twenty-five churches, only two of which are Roman Catholic. This will indicate clearly in what proportion the population is divided as to religion. Then take the population of the different constituencies. The population of Lisgar, which is situated north of Winnipeg, and part of which used to be in the Selkirk settlement, is 22,000, of whom 4,000 are Roman Catholics. In Marquette, there are 36,000 people altogether, 1,986 of whom are Roman Catholics. In Provencher, there are 15,469, of whom 8,900 are Roman Catholics. In Selkirk, that is to say in south-western Manitoba, there are 53,000 persons; 3,198 of those are Roman Catholics. In the city of Winnipeg there is a total population of 25,639, of whom 2,470 are Roman Catholics. That is the way the population is divided, so far as religions are concerned, and so far as we are able to gauge from the erection of churches in the province. The constituency of Selkirk, containing 53,000, forms part of what is called the added territory of Manitoba and did not come within the bounds of the Selkirk Settlement at all. It has a Roman Catholic population of only 3,198, and the argument is that these 3,198 Roman Catholics, sparsely scattered throughout the 53,000 people, shall be granted privileges which are denied to the remainder of the 53,000 people. The province of Manitoba as expressed in its legislation is opposed to anything in the shape of denominational schools. Recollect, I am not now arguing on the question of separate schools, which I contend is a question of provincial politics altogether. If it was a question in Manitoba whether there should be separate schools or not, I am not prepared to say what stand I should take—I am not prepared to say that I am irrevocably opposed to separate schools. But it is not that question which is before the House. It is not a question whether the Dominion Government shall say there shall be separate schools in Manitoba or not. The question we have to deal with is how far should the Dominion Government interfere with the constitutional liberties of any province of Canada. That is a question far greater than the rights of the Roman Catholic minority in this particular case, because if you were to place us in the position that some would place us in, you would convert a right to a minority into a great wrong to the majority. In trying to do justice to a small minority you would be doing injustice to a large majority, and it is to avoid being placed in a position of that kind, that I have thus early brought this matter before the House.

Mon. Mr. KAULBACH—How does my hon. friend contend that by giving the minority their rights it would deprive the majority of theirs ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the majority of Parliament have the right to say "you have no more control over your educational legislation in Manitoba from this hour," I say, you would be doing a very grave injustice to the majority—you would be inflicting a wrong on them in the light of experience and in the light of the history of the world to-day. It is not for us in Canada to make a retrograde movement so far as our constitutional powers are concerned. As I said before, I am not at all criticizing the government for their action up to the present, but I wish to warn them on the part of those whom I represent here—on behalf of the 36,000 people in the constituency of Marquette, whose feeling, I think, I appreciate under the circumstances—I wish to ask the government how far it is wise for them to go in the interests of the good government of Canada, and I want to point out a remedy that might be applied without infringing upon the constitutional rights granted to the people of that western country and of the people who will occupy it in the future. Manitoba is a very great country of which Canada may well be proud of—a country that Canada can nurse not only in its commercial aspects, but its political aspects as well, in order to extend the dignity power and greatness of the Dominion. It is a country of great productive power, of good climatic conditions, and is going to assist Canada to exercise that influence and power on this continent and in the history of the British Empire, of which Canadians can well be proud. I wish to point out, without going into this matter any further than merely to give expression to these views at this early stage, a remedy which might be applied with justice to the minority, and without any injustice to the majority—that is, by the power of compensation that exists with the Dominion Government. What is the condition that we find so far as the Roman Catholic minority are concerned since the Act of 1890 was put in force ? The position is this, that in the whole province of Manitoba, extending from the western bounds to the eastern bounds there have been one hundred and one Roman Catholic schools. A certain number of those Roman Catholic schools have adopted the national system. A separate school, named after my hon. friend from St. Boniface, the Bernier school, was one of the first to come under the national system after the Act of 1890 was passed. Another, named after the Hon. Mr. Arsenault, has also come under the national system of education and has ceased to be a separate school. In the case of the Bernier school it has been a national school for four years. There are thirty-six of the one hundred and one schools that have come under the national system of education. Therefore, on the part of the population comprised in these school districts there is no grievance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was no alternative : they were forced.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, they had an alternative.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—All their schools were suppressed and their property confiscated.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, by the law of 1894.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not as I understand it. A large number—perhaps the largest number—of those schools that have come under the national system, are in what is called the added territory of Manitoba. The majority of those who have not come under the national system are in Provencher and the Selkirk settlement. Those who are living in the western portion of the province are satisfied with the national system of education, and very properly so. There is no grievance. In my immediate neighbourhood, there is a separate school named after the clergyman, Father de Corby, who founded it. He conducted a separate school there for years, to which the Protestant population in its neighbourhood all went. They were well satisfied with the school ; they had no complaints to make of it. They took advantage of it, because it was the nearest and best they could attend. When the legislation of 1890 was enacted, the school immediately came under the national system without any complaint or grievance, and went on identically as it did before under the supervision and guidance of the priest of the parish and head of the school. Of the one hundred and one schools, twenty-two are disbanded, for what reason, I do not know. Whether it was that the demand for education no longer existed I cannot say. It may be in consequence of the Act of 1890; perhaps it was. There are thirty-five schools that have not come under the Act of 1890, and are maintaining themselves at their own expense. It is those schools that have a grievance. It is the supporters of those schools who from conscientious motives desire to conduct them on the separate school principle. Those schools are mainly, or altogether, in what is called the old Selkirk settlement. The Act of 1890, of the province of Manitoba does not deprive any one from educating his child as he thinks best. He can educate his children in any manner or form he thinks proper, but, of course, if the school to which he sends his children takes the government grant and public aid, then it has to conform to the laws of the country governing education. If he does not wish to comply with the laws of the country governing education then the school does not get the grant.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They must all pay taxes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am going to explain to you about the taxes. In the first place, the government of Manitoba gives a grant of $130 to every school, or rather to each teacher in every school that is maintained open for twelve months. If it maintains itself opened for six months, it gets half of the grant; if for three months, it gets one-fourth of that grant. That grant comes from the revenue of the province of Manitoba—there is no tax for that. It is merely a deprivation of that portion of the public money to which they might be entitled. Our School Act says that each municipality shall out of its revenue pay $240 to each teacher. For that, of course, the individual members, composing the municipality, would have to contribute their share of taxes. Those are the taxes that the people have to pay; they have to pay their proportion of taxes to any public school in the locality. That is the way the public school is supported—$240 from the municipality, $130 from the government, or in all $370 for each school, or in the case of two teachers $370 more. Any additional sum required for the support of the schools would have to be taken from the school district which is carved out of the municipality in order to accommodate those within a radius of three miles of the school centre, but the main part of the money which supports our schools come from the municipality and from the legislative grant. The legislative grant, as I have explained before, is not a burden on the taxpayer; it is taken out of the provincial revenue. The $240 may be considered a tax, so far as their share relates to other schools in the municipality, on those who support their own schools, but do not come under the national system, but, of course, in their case if they do not accept municipal aid there is no tax raised by the municipality for their school and they have not to pay it. You understand that those thirty-six schools to which I have already referred come under the national system. They get from the municipality $240 a year for each teacher, and from the government $130 a year, and they conduct their schools under trustees elected by themselves. The convent at Brandon gets its share of the government and municipal grant. If it conforms to the regulations of the provincial system the convent in Winnipeg the same under the national system of education.

If they happen to be all Roman Catholics, they will have all Roman Catholic trustees. If the population is divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants they have to regulate it as they best can, but they are subject to no disability at all. The only question is as to the regulations in regard to teaching religion, and I feel quite sure that there is a reciprocity about that. I feel quite sure that there is an elasticity about that. If it is a Roman Catholic school the inspector comes around once in six months, and that is about the limit of the supervision that is given. If, in the meantime, the priests desire to impart any religious instruction, I do not think anybody, unless it might be the trustees themselves, would have either the authority or the desire to interfere, so that the national system is not such an injurious one as many people believe. However, that I have nothing to do with; that is a question for the Roman Catholic minority to decide, they have put forth the claim that they have been deprived of certain rights, and we, as part of Parliament, have to consider what were those rights and how far they have been deprived of them, as well as how a remedy can be applied without impairing the constitutional power of the people or infringing upon the autonomy of the province of Manitoba. I say it can be done, by compensation. All the Dominion Government will have to do would be to make a grant in order to supplement the moneys lost to the minority through the contribution which they have to make to the municipalities. For the thirty-five schools referred to, I am satisfied that $10,000 a year would be the extent of the grant; but I go further than that, I say that the bargain made in 1870 under the Manitoba Act with the people of that western country was not a bargain made exclusively with the Roman Catholic minority; it was made with the whole population of the Selkirk settlement; and were a grant to be given to assist any particular class of schools irrespective of provincial authority, in order that they may impart that distinctive instruction which they desire, it is nothing but just that the same assistance should be granted in like proportion to the rest of the people of the Selkirk settlement, or rather to the schools that existed in that particular district. That would be just and right, and nothing more. However, that is not dealing with the question of the rights of the minority. It is the minority which has the right to complain. It has been decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the majority has no right to complain because being in the majority, they can reverse the state of things if they see fit to do so; but inasmuch as they propose to legislate in a certain way in accordance with the ideas of the great mass of the people, they ought not to be ruled out altogether, but Parliament is now called upon to deal with the minority. Have the majority no claims? Have the majority no grievance? As already stated, the amount that would be necessary in order to rectify the present position of affairs, in order to make this wrong a right, would not exceed, so far as the Roman Catholic minority are concerned, $10,000 a year. Now, I do not ask the people of eastern Canada to put their hands in their pockets and take out a sum sufficient to meet the requirements which have arisen in connection with this dispute, but I say that in the revenue derived from the public lands of Manitoba there is a source from which the necessary compensation can be drawn. I have always contended that the public lands of that great western country are held in trust by the Government of Canada for the benefit of the inhabitants of that section, and to assist in its development. Up to the present moment these lands have been held and appropriated for the purpose of encouraging the extension of railways, but the time has now come, I think, when it is desirable that we should take a different course, and, instead of dissipating and alienating this great heritage, we ought to carefully nurse it for the benefit of the people who occupy that country in the future. It is out of this source, I think, that a small compensation could easily be provided, in order to put an end to what might otherwise become a very grave dispute as between different sections of the Dominion which are governed more by their feelings than by anything else in regard to religious matters. A small sum of money like that which I have mentioned, is nothing in comparison with the harm and wrong that would be done upon the people of Canada by bringing on a dispute of this kind, or by depriving that western country of the constitutional powers and privileges to which they are entitled. Now I have said as much, perhaps, on the present occasion as is necessary, but it is my desire to put myself clearly on record while this subject is before the Parliament of Canada, and in some small degree at least to give expression to what I believe to be the feelings of the people of that western country upon this subject. I apologize for imposing myself upon this House at so great a length, but there are several great questions before us to which I should like to advert.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—What about the school lands?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The school lands, I may say, are held by the Dominion in trust for the province of Manitoba. They really belong to the province of Manitoba, and the Dominion Lands Act clearly states that the revenues derived from them shall be paid over to the government of Manitoba for educational purposes. Any other disposition of them, in order to overcome the difficulty which I have dealt with would, I think, be an infringement upon the rights of the province, and would be looked on as such by the people of the province. In the next clause of the address, in reply to the speech from the Throne, the trade question is dealt with. It says:

We are glad to hear from Your Excellency that the depression in trade which has prevailed throughout the world for the past few years has made itself felt in Canada to a less degree than in most other countries. We regret, however, to learn that although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet, owing to low prices and recent reductions in and removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from customs and excise. We respectfully concur in Your Excellency's opinion that, in order to produce equilibrium between revenue and expenditure for the coming year, it will be necessary to observe the greatest possible economy in the appropriations for the various branches of the public service.

Now this is a very large question, and perhaps a question that we can discuss from a more general standpoint than that which I have been speaking of. The government propose to restore the equilibrium between the revenue and expenditure by resort to economy. I would point out that there is an easier way of accomplishing this object, and that is, in one word, by reducing taxation. If you reduce taxation you will immediately restore the revenue. That is a well known axiom in political economy. I would strongly urge upon the hon. the leader of the government to take this into his most serious consideration. A great predecessor of his, in the Imperial House, Sir Robert Peel, on the eve of bringing about free trade stated, "When I want to increase the revenue I take off the taxes." This is the same position the people of Canada find themselves in to-day. The government insist on applying economy, which is indeed a proper and desirable thing to do, but what I ask is that in addition to applying economy they should adopt the economic principle of assisting the industries of the country by a reduction of the taxation. The cessation of expenditure is not always economy: projecting a useful work in an economical manner is my idea of economy, while careless extravagance is a spendthrift policy. If they do the former they will find that the revenue will immediately respond. I have observed in the public press and the Conservative journals several references to the depression existing in the country, but whenever anything is said upon this question they say: "Oh well we ought to be very thankful because the rest of the world is very much worse off." I do not know if that is an argument that can be properly used. If I have anything like a correct idea of what protection was designed to accomplish, it was to so contract our foreign trade that we might trade with one another and with one another only, and by that means to neutralize the effect of any depression that might exist in the outside world.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We would not be buying so much from other countries.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Or selling so much to other countries, because you cannot buy without selling and cannot sell without buying.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We will be able to keep the money in the family.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It all depends, if you keep the money in the family, how it is distributed. If you concentrate it in a few hands, which I contend is the effect of the present commercial legislation, then I say it is not a wise policy. The second sentence in the paragraph is:

We regret, however, to learn that although this has not resulted in any considerable decrease in the volume of our foreign trade, yet, owing to low prices and recent reductions in the removal of taxation, it has been followed by a serious decrease in revenue derived from customs and excise.

That is not exactly an impartial statement to begin with, according to the pamphlet issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I am very glad to see that it is issued every quarter, and it brings down the returns as far as December 31st last. That is to say, we know exactly what the country has been doing under the new tariff between the 1st of July and the 31st of December last. I am sorry that these returns have not been brought down to the 1st of April. I do not know why the delay has occurred, unless it is that the showing is worse than it was before. I hope that is not the case. Up to the 31st of December we find a reduction in imports and a reduction in exports as well.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you mean a reduction in value or a reduction in quantity?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—A reduction in value.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought so. The value may be decreased somewhat and yet the quantity remain the same, the articles being cheaper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I find a reduction of $7,000,000 in the imports and of $5,000,000 in the exports.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Never mind the imports. We never buy more than we want.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is where you make a mistake. According to my argument my hon. friend says that as the reduction relates only to imports we need not be frightened. The fact that we are not importing is an evidence that the purchasing power of the people of Canada has been reduced by just so much as the imports have fallen off.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the prices of articles imported had been reduced 15 per cent or 20 per cent where would your calculation be then?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I doubt if that is the case for the whole of the year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is the case, nevertheless. It is the reduction in value that explains the situation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I find that our export trade has decreased $5,000,000; that is to say, there has been labour in the country that has not been productive or employed to that extent.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Perhaps it is another case of increase in volume.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not think that the same causes can be assigned for the falling off in our exports.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What about the wheat?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Our wheat has not been reduced below what it was the year before. Our North-western wheat, particularly, averaged a good price as compared with the wheat produced in the rest of the world, for which I am very thankful. The yield was of a remarkably good quality, and was eagerly sought after, not only by the people of the United States but by the people of Great Britain and the people of Canada as well. That competition assisted us materially in obtaining a much better price than was obtained by the wheat production of the world generally. However, what I wish to impress upon the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is the fact that the present taxation is bearing heavily upon the people of Canada, which is a dire consequence of the continuation of the commercial policy of the government. I find it here put into the mouth of His Excellency that the falling off of the revenue is caused by a reduction of taxation. No, the imports and the duties collected show that the taxation has increased under the tariff of 1894. In 1893 the average rate of taxation was 30 per cent; it is now, under the new tariff, 30·82 per cent, or very nearly 31 per cent. Now if this is the case, I say that it is a manifest injustice to increase taxation in the face of business depression. That policy should be changed and the taxation should be reduced. I say further, and I wish to impress this upon the members of the government who are in this House, that the taxation of the people of Canada is not merely the sum that is raised for the purposes of the revenue, but it is a tax multiplied twice, yes, three times over as a direct consequence of the protection that is afforded to the industries of the country. I wish to take this opportunity of proving that to the hon. the leader of the government in order that I may bring to bear upon him such views as I may be able to express, in the hope that that burden of taxation, which is excessive, which is pressing on the country, which is creating a great injustice and great injury in the western country where I reside, may be modified if not removed during the present session of Parliament. The present session should not end until they have reduced the tariff that was imposed in 1894, if they wished to do justice to the labouring men of the country—to those whose incomes are small—to those who are living by the sweat of their brow. If the government wish to do justice to the people from one end of Canada to the other, the leader of the government should seriously consider the question of reducing the burden of taxation raised by the tariff of 1894, by at least 25 per cent. It is not necessary to spend the session in going into details, but a general reduction of 25 per cent on the basis of the present tariff would be a wholesome reform and an indication that the government were prepared to confess sin of omission and commission under the experience of 17 years life under a high tariff. I wish to prove to hon. gentlemen there is room for it. We have here the census returns showing the manufacturing power of the country, most minute details as to all the manufactures which enter into the raw material which my hon. friend on my right says is of so much advantage to the country. I do not rise to argue the destruction of the commercial interests of Canada; if I thought that what I advocate was going to destroy the manufacturing power of the country. I would hesitate to raise my voice towards that result. I wish to impress upon my hon. friend on my right that the exporting power of the country requires no protection, whether our export be of cheese, butter, wheat, boots and shoes, sugar or anything else. Any exporting power that we possess requires no protection. It is the exporting power of the country that is the measure of its wealth, and that exporting power is regulated by the cheapness of production which is artificially increased by the protective tariff. I wish to show this honourable House the figures presented to us by the census in regard to manufactures, and which is the basis of argument by protectionists through the country, in defence of protection from their standpoint. What are those figures? They are that the capital invested in the manufacturing interests of Canada is $354,000,000; that the wages paid out in manufacturing in this country amount to $100,000,000: that the money paid out for raw material in conducting the manufactures of the country is $250,000,000, and the value of the articles produced $476,000,000. That is very good if it does not increase the burden of taxation on the people in consequence of the policy that brings it out.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Are those annual amounts?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—These are compiled from the census of 1891. The figures relate to that year, and to that year only. Of course, you can only get those figures by the census.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The production of the manufacturers that year was $476,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. Their value returned by the manufacturers to the census commissioner.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Then, all that was kept in the country?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to show at what expense it has been kept in the country, if your idea is that without protection they would leave the country which idea I challenge. That is my object in quoting the figures. These are the figures put in our hands—the figures by which the government justifies the infliction of protection and the continuance of protection. I wish to show that the government is not justified in any degree in continuing protection—that so far as those figures show it is not to the advantage of the country. I wish to show you the difference between the cost of the manufacturing that is there shown by the figures, and the value of the articles produced as shown by the census. The capital invested in manufacturing is $350,000,000, 10 per cent on that is $35,000,000. One-half of the capital is called working capital; the other half is called fixed capital—that is, capital invested in lands, buildings and plant. The working capital is what you may call banking capital used for paying wages, buying material, etc. Ten per cent interest on that amount of capital, is a very fair earning power for the capital invested. In addition to that we have $100,000,000 paid out in wages, and in addition to that $256,000,000 paid out for raw material. I say $35,400,000 interest on capital which is the share that capital gets in the manufacturing and $100,000,000 which is the share wages gets, and $256,000,000 which is the share raw material gets in these manufactures, the addition of interest on capital, wages and material, should show the cost of manufacturing. If there is anything else there is no detail of any other cost to the manufacturer given. But there is a column which shows the value of the articles produced, and that is $476,000,000. The difference between the three items which go to show the cost of manufacturing these articles in Canada and the value of the articles produced, according to the census returns, is $84,000,000. That $84,000,000 has to be borne in consequence of the duty that is imposed for the purpose of protecting those manufacturers—or in other words 25 per cent represents the $84,000,000 added to the cost of manufacturing 25 per cent represents the duty that is imposed for the protection of those manufactures. In this $476,000,000 the retail selling price is not represented, wholesale men purchase from the factory or rather manufacturers, wholesale agencies charge enough to the retail trade to cover the cost of selling. In order to produce a revenue of $21,000,000, raised in 1893-94, according to the Trade and Navigation returns we have at our disposal, we imposed an additional burden of taxation on the people of Canada who have to purchase their necessities of life amounting to $84,000,000.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What are the necessities?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will show you what those necessities are. All that I wish to do is to convince honourable gentlemen that if we are going to continue to force the needlewomen of Canada to pay $20,000 taxation for the needles they require; $75,000 on the thread they require; $20,000 on the boot-laces used by the people of Canada, you are imposing a burden on them. You are asking me what are those necessities. Take rice. There are 3,000,000 pounds of rice imported, which is protected by a duty of one and one-quarter cents per pound and 24,000,000 pounds of uncleaned rice imported nearly free, three-tenths of a cent per pound I believe is the duty, to be cleaned in this country to which the one and one-quarter cents protection is added. Rice is delivered at seaports at two cents per pound, yet I pay seven cents per pound for it where I live.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The duty would not make the difference.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The duty and freight and the profits of the middleman on the price raised artificially increased the price to that amount. The revenue gets the benefit of the duty on 3,000,000 pounds of rice. The manufacturer gets the benefit of the profit in consequence of the duty, on 24,000,000 pounds of rice. The proof I give you for it, is the evidence furnished in this book, that the difference on all the articles included in the necessities of life is about 25 per cent after providing for the wages and cost of the raw material, and interest on the capital invested as shown by the returns.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman contend that we would consume more rice if there was no duty on it?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If there is $85,000,000 imposed on the industries of Canada in consequence of the protection—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am speaking of rice.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am answering the question. We would in all probability not consume more rice, but the difference in the amount we have to pay in consequence of the protection would enable us to purchase other necessities to increase the comforts of the population. If there is $85,000,000 collected—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—On needles and rice?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No. On all our necessities our purchasing power is reduced for those necessities by the amount of the duty, and its ally, protection, increase the purchasing power of the masses, and you increase the demand for labour to produce the articles we are enabled to purchase by the increase of that purchasing power. I will read the articles if you like. There are 450 industries included in this book. It is not necessary for me to enlarge upon them, because they contain all the articles we require for use.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Are boot-laces and stays necessities of life?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It depends on whether you are a married man.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How do you propose to get the revenue?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will try and throw some light on that when I have got through my argument, because this is an argument that I wish to impress on the leader of the government. I am very thankful that we have in this House the present opportunity of bringing our individual opinions to bear upon the leader of the government, because it increases the force, and adds to the dignity and power of this House. I will pick out an individual industry just to prove more conclusively the position that I desire to present: that is, agricultural implements, the duty on which is a cause of complaint in the province of Manitoba, and the North-west Territories. We are obliged to purchase agricultural implements very largely, and it is only our ability to purchase them that enables us to distribute the products of our industry over the whole of Canada. We sent out this year, I think, in the neighbourhood of 15,000,000 bushels of wheat, worth to us at our various stations delivered, from 38 to 40 cents per bushel, this year. But that is not the only amount distributed: the distribution of capital on the products of our industry was by the time it reached the seaboard nearly 80 cents a bushel. So by the product of our industry we are able to distribute 15,000,000 bushels of wheat at 80 cents a bushel before it leaves Canada for export. The value of that industry to Canada is enormous, and anything that will increase the development of it will add to the greatness, prosperity and wealth of Canada. What are you doing by the present policy? You are imposing a tax of 40 per cent on the value of the plant that we require to carry on this industry profitably, and it is having a very depressing effect on the producing power of that great western country. I will take out one interest here, and I am not specifying it maliciously, but, because I can fix the name of the manufacturer exactly. It is in the city of Toronto. In that city there happens to be only one manufacture of the kind, and that is the Massey Manufacturing Company. We find here that this company has a capital of $42,000 invested in that land on which their buildings are erected; $75,000 invested in their plant, and $75,000 invested in their buildings—altogether $200,000, in what is called their fixed capital.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Is that in the city of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What about Brantford and other places?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am only dealing with their industry in Toronto. The Brantford works are enumerated with others in South Brant. Their working capital is $1,000,000—that is, their banking capital to keep their stock of material on hand, etc. They employ 575 men. They pay in wages $250,000 a year, and for raw material $350,000 yearly. I maintain that if we allow the Massey Manufacturing Company 10 per cent interest on their $1,200,000 capital we are allowing a very fair rate of profit, especially as $150,000 of it only is subject to fluctuation in consequence of wear and tear. The balance of it is not. Taking 10 per cent on their $1,200,000 capital, it represents $120,000 a year profit on the capital as shown by this return. Then take $250,000 wages to add to that, makes $370,000, included in the wages they pay out, and interest on their capital. Add to that $350,000, for raw material which they pay for. Now, that is $720,000. That should, I think, in the minds of all fair-minded men be considered a fair representation of the cost of making their machinery. They sell it and make their profit on the sales in other directions and through their agencies, but that is the cost of making their machinery, so far as shown by them from the census returns. That information could only be got from the manufacturers themselves. The census commissioner goes round and visits every manufacturer in the country, and obtains this information for the guidance of the public. That information is given to them by the Massey Manufacturing Company, presumably in good faith, and it is shown there that $720,000 is the cost of making their machinery after allowing them 10 per cent on the capital invested. What is the return in the column opposite their name as the value of the articles produced? It shows that the value of the articles produced is $1,250,000, or a clear profit on the manufacture of their agricultural implements of $530,000, on an investment of $1,200,000.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Do they not sell them as cheaply as in the United States?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I want the United States to be able to sell machines here on the same terms as are accorded to the Massey Manufacturing Company. I do not want that company to make such a tremendous profit in consequence of the protection afforded them. I do not want the people of this country to bear the burden of double, yes quadruple, taxation in order that the Massey Manufacturing Company may be so highly protected.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman says that 10 per cent is enough to cover interest on capital and all risk of losses: would not 20 per cent be nearer the mark?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will add 10 per cent more and make the rate of profit on capital 20 per cent. I still maintain that after allowing 20 per cent on capital there is a surplus of $434,000 unaccounted for, which is a burden those have to bear every time they buy machinery in the west. Every time a farmer has to purchase machinery he helps to bear a part of that burden. Now, I want the leader of the government to refute this argument if he can, or to say that I am incorrect in my figures. I am taking the figures as they are put into my hands, in fact, I take the figures used by those who desire to sustain the protective policy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Your figures may be right, but your deductions are wholly wrong.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is for somebody to put me right then upon my deductions. I claim that according to the figures, I am correct. I wish these figures to be explained away if possible. I wish that surplus of $430,000 to be explained away if it can be. I find it is used as an argument that the value of the manufactures produced is $476,000,000. It is clear that there is between the value of the machinery produced by the Massey Manufacturing Company and the cost of its production a profit of $430,000 after providing for 20 per cent interest on capital.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Could you buy the same article cheaper in the United States?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Allow me to prove my case first. What I am intent upon proving is that the burden of taxation upon our individual industry is four times the amount which is raised for the revenue of the country, and I claim that it is an injustice to the people whom I represent that they should, in pursuing their avocations, have to bear such an enormous burden in order to raise a revenue.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How can there be any burden upon the people when you can buy as cheaply as in the United States?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You cannot. Iron costs $9 or $10 a ton in the United States. The Massey Manufacturing Company in making their purchases have to pay that $9 or $10 per ton, plus the amount of duty, and the manufacturers of the United States ought to be able to produce the machines that much cheaper.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They are cheaper in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They are not cheaper. Competition is the great leveller. If you throw the Massey Manufacturing Company into competition with the manufacturers of the United States the result will soon be obvious.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They are cheap enough now.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am not arguing that point, however cheap they may be in consequence of the general fall in prices the world over they are artificially raised for us over the world's competition and that neither labour nor raw material share in that artificial raising. What I wish to show is that the government themselves recognize that the Massey Manufacturing Company are resting under a disability in the direction I have indicated, in regard to their power to export, for they have taken off the duty for the Massey Company in order that they might make the machines cheaper, and by that means promote exportation beyond the bounds of Canada, in their competition with the United States manufacturers in foreign markets, thus enabling the company to enjoy the profit to be derived from the establishment of a foreign trade. In other words, the government of Canada put the Massey Manufacturing Company in a position to make agricultural machinery cheaper for the people of the Argentine Republic, Australia and Russia (who are wheat growers and with whom we have to compete in the open market of Great Britain for the sale of our wheat) than for the Canadian farmers, and we have to pay a bonus to enable the company to supply these foreign nations with cheaper machinery than we ourselves are able to purchase—is that justice?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is incorrect.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is it not correct that you are giving them a rebate of duty?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not correct to state that articles which are manufactured in Canada are sold any cheaper in Australia than they are in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You have, however, to support either one position or the other. Either they are sold cheaper in Australia than they are in Canada, or else the profits of the manufacturing company on the goods produced by them must be excessive.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not follow either.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If you relieve the company of the duty on the articles which they export, to that extent you are cheapening the articles for the people of Australia. The Massey Manufacturing Company can export agricultural machinery to Australia for exactly the same freight as they can send it to the province of Manitoba, the ocean transport being so much cheaper than railway rates. So far as the rate on the freight is concerned there is no difference, either to Australia or the Argentine Republic over transport to Manitoba. A manufacturer told me that he had a market in British Columbia for some goods which he produced in eastern Canada, and that the freight rate was so high that he could deliver his products around by Cape Horn to Pacific ports cheaper than he could deliver them in Manitoba, the rate by Cape Horn being $1.24 per 100 pounds, while to Russell, where I live, the rate on the same goods was $1.29 per 100 pounds. If the freight rate is no greater, and if the duty is remitted on the machines made for the people of the Argentine Republic and Australia, either the machinery can be sold cheaper or the profits of the exporting company are increased by the remission of the duty.

My next point is with regard to the cost of production of agricultural machinery. The total value of the machinery produced is $7,524,000, that is to say the total value of the articles produced of which the Massey Manufacturing Company form an important part is that amount. The capital invested in agricultural machinery works in Canada is $8,500,000 or say $850,000 a year interest on capital. The raw material used in the manufacture of this machinery is returned as costing $3,126,000. The wages paid amount to $1,812,000. Arguing from the same basis as before, we find that the cost of producing the machinery including 10 per cent interest on capital, wages and cost of raw material, is $5,788,000. The value of the articles produced is $7,544,000. Therefore the profit of the manufacturers is $1,736,400. That rests as a tax upon the increase in values artificially raised. I will just quote one more instance to emphasize the argument which I have advanced, and that is in regard to nail and tack factories. I may say that any one can verify these conclusions for himself by sending up to Mr. Botterell and getting No. 3 of the census returns and working out the calculations for himself. If he does this I think he will agree with the argument which I have presented to this House in regard to the commercial conditions of the country.

Now, take the nail and tack factories. The value of imports is $40,000, and the duty imposed and collected is $14,292. In consequence of that protection which is imposed for the purposes of inducing this condition there are 12 factories employing 300 men, 64 women and 41 boys. The fixed capital employed by those 12 factories amounts to $155,000; working capital $247,000, a total of $402,000. Taking 10 per cent interest on that, we have forty thousand dollars as the profit of capital, or if we accept my hon. friend's suggestion, 20 per cent if you like, it only alters the condition in degree. The amount of wages paid $152,000, raw material used $457,000. These are the three items that go to make up the cost of producing nails and tacks in Canada, and they amount altogether to $641,000. The value of the articles produced in the nails and tack industries is $744,000 or $103,000 is the difference between the cost of the articles produced—according to my showing—and the value of the articles produced according to the showing of the census return, and in that case again we have the cost increased by about the value of the duty imposed. But there is this position to be taken in regard to the question, and that is while the labour and industry in Canada that is supplied with the nails and tacks have to bear a burden of $116,000 a year, the revenue of the country only gets $13,000. There the tax is multiplied nearly eight times over what is raised for revenue purposes. It is that great burden of taxation that is going to produce disastrous results in the long run. We have not felt the full effect of it yet, but we are bound to feel the effects of it in connection with the depression to which His Excellency has referred. If it is necessary to impose a tax of $103,000 on our mail and tack industry over and above the tax the revenue gets the benefit of, what is that imposed for? It is imposed to press upon the industry of the country for the benefit of these twelve factories.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why does not my hon. friend start one in Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not wish to start one up there. In fact it would be impossible for us to do so. You can only start a factory in a district where there is a population large enough to warrant its maintenance. The smaller the population you have to serve, the greater the cost of supplying the population. It is on that basis and for that purpose that protection is afforded. Because we have a small population, manufacturers cannot compete if they are restricted to the local market, and that is why so many manufacturing industries have been closed. I would not argue for the abolition of our commercial policy, if I thought it was going to destroy our manufacturing power; but I know it will not destroy our manufacturing power. By the adoption of the policy of the people of Great Britain under which their manufacturing power has been increased so enormously, we will multiply our industries in Canada. Take the Massey industry as an example. It could multiply its output in the city of Toronto four fold by the adoption of a policy which would cheapen the cost of their raw material. If, instead of having to pay 50 per cent on the bar-iron they use and other raw material, 575 labouring men working for them have to pay taxation on the necessaries of life, I say that the Massey Manufacturing Company would then have a chance of entering the markets of the world for the sale of their manufactures. There are markets in the Argentine Republic, the Cape of Good Hope, Hungary and all over the world where agricultural machinery is used, and if you can supply a cheaper machine, you can have no difficulty in extending your foreign trade to an extent undreamt of in the history of Canada, and by seeking to enlarge the population for whom you are able to manufacture by a new economic condition, you are bound to cheapen the articles to home consumers without impairing the value of the industry to the country but on the contrary you increased the demand for labour and employment in the country, because if you can compete successfully in the foreign market you can also do so in the home market.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why is it Great Britain does not take advantage of that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Because we have made a speciality of agricultural machinery. Our prairie country has taught us the best and cheapest methods and produced the best patents for agricultural machinery. Other countries are not placed exactly in the same way. We have the experience of the great prairies of the western states and of our own country to help and guide us to perfect machinery, both in economy of production and ease of action, and other countries have not been able to produce them to compete with us. We can compete with the United States and with the world in the production of these machines, provided the commercial conditions are made so that we can successfully compete. If you cheapen the cost of production to the Massey Manufacturing Company by 30 to 40 per cent as the case may be, and they are permitted to exchange the home market for a foreign market, by the cheapening of production, is not the population of Canada and of the city of Toronto particularly going to be multiplied to the extent that the manufacturing of that machinery will involve. No doubt the Massey Company will say to the government, give us the home market by protection and give us the foreign market by a remission of duties, but can manufacturers have their cake and eat it. The government themselves have acknowledged the principle—they have taken off the duty imposed on the Massey Manufacturing Company and other manufacturers in order to put them in a position to compete in foreign markets and to export their manufactures. I say it is an injustice to the farmers of Canada and to the people of Canada generally to continue a policy which is increasing the price of every necessity of life and retarding every effort to increase our industries beyond the purchasing power of five millions of people. We are not pursuing the true national policy which is calculated to develop the resources of our country. Nobody more desires to see Canada taking its place as an important part of the British Empire than I do, and I repeat, instead of trying to induce the people of Great Britain to adopt a protective policy we should try to work together with the people of the mother country. If the mother country were forced into the position of adopting a protective policy it would be turned at once against the people of Canada. They will not pay for protection for the benefit of the people of Canada or of Australia or of any other outside portion of the Empire. They are conducting their business on a business basis. The indications are that the policy of our government is working in the direction of trying to induce a policy of imperial protection. I do not think, however, that any movement on the part of the colonies will ever induce the people of England to change from free trade, but at the same time, in so far as our efforts are directed in that way they will re-act upon ourselves. The people of Great Britain are suffering to-day, no doubt, but it is not in consequence of their free trade policy, but because their chief customers have impoverished themselves by protection.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the policy of the British Government is tending to protection?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I said that notwithstanding the efforts we might put forth to produce such a change we will not succeed in moving the British people from the sound free trade policy which they have pursued so successfully for half a century. What I do say is that the depression in Great Britain to-day is due mainly to the decreased purchasing power of Canada, the United States, the Argentine Republic and other important customers of Great Britain, and to the extent that our purchasing power is reduced we are unable to purchase the commodities of Great Britain. The Trade and Navigation Returns, for the last six months of last year, show that there has been a decrease in the purchasing power of the people of Canada to the extent of seven millions of dollars less than in the corresponding six months of the preceding year, the first six months under the new tariff. Of course, the cheaper things are the more we are able to purchase. Under protective taxation there is an artificial price created for the necessaries of life, while the price of our material and natural products is left to natural and competitive conditions. If you alter your policy you will increase the purchasing power of the people. It is in consequence of the restrictive power of protection in the United States, Canada and other countries, that there is a lack of employment for labour in England, that great consuming market for the surplus production of the world. Protection is a policy of restriction to create scarcity, free trade is a policy of competition in order to produce plenty and to the extent that it is pursued to that extent you are increasing the demand for labour in order to manufacture and produce the larger quantities that labour is able to purchase in consequence of the abolition of that 40 per cent protective taxation on the retail value of the necessaries of life in Canada. The House has listened to me with a great deal of patience, but I trust I have brought forward facts and figures that will cause the leader of the government to make himself at any rate acquainted with the truth of what I allege. I only advance these statements to the House as they present themselves to my mind—as they present themselves to our mind in that western country where we have to buy agricultural machinery for our own use and where we find the necessaries of life abnormally increased. I can only present them in that way and it is for those who desire to continue that oppressive policy to prove that I am incorrect in the statements that I am making.

The next clause of the Address is :

We are greatly pleased to hear that, during the period that has elapsed since the last session of Parliament, Your Excellency had an opportunity of visiting many portions of the Dominion, including the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia; that throughout these tours Your Excellency was impressed and gratified by manifestations of an abounding loyalty and public spirit; and that, notwithstanding the phase of trade depression already referred to, you observed everywhere unmistakable signs of that confident hopefulness in the future, based on a thorough belief in the greatness of the resources of Canada, which, you are graciously pleased to say, is one of the characteristics of her people and furnishes a good augury and pledge of further development and progress.

I may say that I had the pleasure of meeting their Excellencies out west myself, and their visit afforded a great deal of pleasure to the people there. They saw in the province of Manitoba and in the Territories progress and prosperity so far as the bounties of providence are concerned. We have a prolific soil and an exceedingly rich country, and are able to produce in consequence of the climatic conditions there a class of cattle and a grade of wheat that will always be sought for, and for which we can get the highest price. It would perhaps surprise honourable gentlemen to know that of 85,000 head of cattle exported from Canada last year, about 35,000 head went from Manitoba and the North-west. To that extent we have occasion to be very grateful indeed, but there are some who by legislation desire to take the cream off the milk in the province of Manitoba and the Territories, and it is our effort to preserve that cream for those whose industry and labour create it so far as justice demands. I do not see why we should be made hewers of wood and drawers of water, to distribute wealth improperly and unjustly so far as our territory is concerned. If we have a fertile soil, and are able to produce the best class of wheat, we want to get whatever value there is in it, and if the legislation of the Federal Parliament enables a favoured class of people to profit by our industry to a greater extent than legitimate competition would enable them, a manifest injury is done by the government that imposes that upon us. Notwithstanding the oppressive tariff, such is the richness of that country, that I think their Excellencies were impressed with the beauty and value of the country and with the high character of the population existing there. They must have seen that everything augurs well for the future of that country, and it is for this Parliament to assist us in developing our resources by fair and proper legislation. We are essentially an agricultural community in the North-west, and I feel perfectly sure that a change in the commercial conditions of the country will make this eastern portion of Canada one of the greatest industrial centres on this continent, if not in the whole world, but a continuance of the present policy will bring disaster upon the country, and especially upon western Canada.

The next paragraph deals with the admission of the Island of Newfoundland to the union. I trust that the people of Newfoundland will decide in favour of joining the confederation, and I believe that the result will be of great and lasting benefit, not only to them but to the whole Dominion, extending the principles of the British constitution and its liberty loving progress on the continent. There are several bills to be presented to us. There is just one thing that I should like to say so far as the passing of bills is concerned—I see no reference to the Copyright Act or the Freight Rates Commission. There has been a great deal of discussion with regard to copyright, and it is desirable that we should inquire carefully as to all the merits of the case. It seems to me that the Copyright Act is being pushed in this country in the interests of the publishers as the protective policy is being pushed for the benefit of the manufacturers. The rights of authors and patentees should be well considered. We have talent in Canada and that talent must find its outlet in other countries as well as in this. It is not desirable therefore that any copyright that we should force upon the Imperial Government should in any way have the effect of driving our authors and men of brains out of the country. The fine arts are an important factor in the progress and development of our christian civilization and deserve the earnest consideration of the government. I merely draw the attention of the government to the fact that there are two sides to this question, and I do not know that it is a wise thing for us to keep ourselves out of the Berne convention as we have done and are seeking to do at the present moment. It would continue to place us at a great disadvantage, so far as copyright is concerned. The report of the commission on freight rates, which is merely a collection of the data given by interested parties through departmental inquiry, will afford Parliament an opportunity to inquire whether, in the collection and distribution of the large revenue earned by the Canadian Pacific Railway, there is not a discrimination against our western country in the vital question of inland transportation. I trust the report will be available before the session closes. Before concluding, I feel it incumbent on me to congratulate ourselves on the addition of another honourable member of this honourable House to the Cabinet, and I congratulate the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island on being the one selected, the next step, I hope, will be a portfolio.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That pursuant to Rule 79, the following Senators be appointed a committee of selection to nominate the Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees, namely :—The Honourable Messieurs Allan, Angers, Bernier, Macdonald (Victoria), McClelan, Miller, Power, Scott, and the mover; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the Senators so nominated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman move that as a motion or is he merely giving notice ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a motion. It has been on the notice paper for two days.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not usual to introduce any business until after the passing of the address.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If there is any objection to the course I am taking, I shall not press the motion now. I have only done so to facilitate business.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not press the objection.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been read ; Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech, on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Seventh Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER said : I presume that the proper course, with respect to certain changes which have taken place in the government since last session, would be to wait until the leader of the House had made his explanations, which I presume will come after the adoption of the address to His Excellency; but inasmuch as the mover of the address and certain other hon. gentlemen have referred to the changes which have taken place in the Administration, I presume that I shall be pardoned if I follow their example. I fully endorse what was said by the hon. mover of the address, and by other hon. gentlemen too, with respect to the honours which have been conferred upon the leader of this House since last session. The honour which Her Majesty was graciously pleased to bestow on that hon. gentleman is one to which he is, in my opinion, entitled. I think that the leader of this House should be a knight, and I am certain that the leader of the government should, if he wishes, be a knight; and if any Conservative is entitled to the distinction, nobody deserves it better than the hon. gentleman who leads this House, apart altogether from his position. This government is a protectionist government. The hon. gentleman is a thorough-going protectionist. He has been a protectionist for a good many years, and has been consistent as far as he knew how to be; and, what distinguishes him from a great many other protectionists, he is, I believe, thoroughly honest in his advocacy of protection. The hon. gentleman has also been promoted to the leadership of the government, and those qualifications and claims which entitle him to the honour of knighthood, entitle him in a great degree, to be leader of a protectionist government. Apart altogether from the hon. gentleman's political views, we have had some experience of him in this House. He has been the leader of the Senate for two sessions previous to the present one, and he has shown himself economical and business-like in dealing with the affairs of the Senate. If he deals in the same way with the business of the country, I have no doubt that under his leadership we shall have as good a government as we can get from the Conservative party. Any deviations which may take place from the right path in the conduct of the government—and I have no doubt there will be a good many—must be attributed not to the hon. gentleman, but to his wicked partners in the other House of Parliament. There was one thing that struck me in the speeches of two or three hon. gentlemen who preceded me—particularly the speech of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, who seconded the address. These hon. gentlemen dealt in a very feeling way with the recent mortality amongst premiers. Now, I respect and admire the hon. leader of the government and of this House, and I have a very considerable degree of affection for that hon. gentleman, and if this mortality amongst premiers is to continue, I believe that the hon. gentleman's chances of living a long time, as we all hope to see him live, will be very much promoted by his coming to this side of the House and allowing my hon. friend from Ottawa to take the seat which he now occupies. Hon. gentlemen laugh. They do not seem to perceive that the mortality has prevailed only amongst Conservative premiers; and perhaps after we have been in power for eighteen years we may not object to having some of our leaders die off too.

Another change has been made in the administration which has been referred to by one or two hon. gentlemen, and that is the taking into the government of the hon. gentleman from Marshfield. Although I do not know very much of the hon. gentleman's career in Prince Edward Island, I know enough to be aware that he has been a very prominent and active member of the Conservative party there for many years—that probably for the last few years he has been the most prominent and active member of that party in Prince Edward Island, and we know that since he has been in this chamber he has been active in doing the work of the government and of the Conservative party; and I do not think any one will question his claim to the seat in the government which he now occupies. It has occurred to me that, while that is perfectly true, there was a great deal of force in what was said by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia the other day, when he complained that his province, during all the years it has been in the union, has never had a representative in the Cabinet. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman gave the reason or not—I am disposed to think he did—but I consider that one of the principal reasons for that non-representation in the Cabinet is that British Columbia has sent to Parliament an unbroken phalanx of supporters of the Conservative government. If British Columbia had done as Prince Edward Island has done—sent four out of six members to oppose the Government—it is not unlikely that the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) would have been a member of the government some time ago. There is another point in connection with the province from which I come that deserves consideration. The Island of Cape Breton has sent an unbroken phalanx of members to support the government, and the hon. gentlemen in this Chamber from that island have also continuously supported the government, and it did seem to me that in the recent reconstruction of the government, some of those gentlemen from Cape Breton might have been thought worthy of a place in the administration. As it is now, the two members of the Cabinet from Nova Scotia are practically both from the county of Cumberland. The Minister of Justice and the Minister of Militia are both Cumberland men, we may say; and in addition to that we find that the important office of High Commissioner in London is filled by another gentleman from Cumberland. I do not say that there is a family compact, but it looks like a county compact when, of the eighteen counties in Nova Scotia, only one is represented in the government, and that by two members of the Cabinet, in addition to the High Commissioner. I should hope the hon. leader of the government, in whose sense of justice I have great confidence, will see that this inequality—to put it mildly—is remedied before we meet again.

Taking up the Speech from the Throne, the first paragraph deals with the lamented death of the late Premier. If I were to undertake to add anything to what has been so admirably said by several gentlemen who have preceded me, beginning with the hon. gentleman from Pictou, it would be attempting to "gild refined gold," and I shall not undertake the task.

The next paragraph of the speech refers to the treaty with France. In that treaty I took a great deal of interest. We discussed it at considerable length during a previous session, and it was an open secret that the hon. gentleman who is now Premier and the hon. Minister of Finance, who now leads the House of Commons, were not at all in love with that treaty. I do not propose to discuss the subject any further, except to say that I can understand why these hon. gentlemen were not in love with the treaty. The Premier is, above all things, a protectionist; and this treaty, as far as it goes, is a free trade measure. It proposes to allow certain productions of France and, as a consequence, of Germany and Belgium, to come into Canada at reduced rates of duty and—that is the important point—to compete with our own products. We know that numerous signed petitions against the ratification of that treaty came here from the vine-growers of the hon. Premier's own province, and I can understand how he should not be in love with the treaty. Then, again, the treaty is by no means a prohibitionist measure. It proposes to make wine cheaper to the inhabitants of this country; and I can understand how a gentleman like the Minister of Finance who, when he first entered Parliament, at any rate, was a champion of temperance and prohibition, should feel some qualms of conscience in supporting a measure which would render wine cheaper and more abundant.

The next paragraph of the speech deals with intercolonial preferential trade and expresses gratification at the fact that there will be an opportunity for the different colonies to reduce the rate of duty on goods imported from one colony to the other. I can hardly understand the attitude of the government with respect to the trade with the Australian and other colonies—because we see from the papers that they propose to reduce the duties on articles coming from South Africa as well as from Australia. It seems to me that if lowering the tariff barriers and allowing the products of those colonial regions to come into Canada is a good thing, there is no reason why it should not be a good thing to lower the tariff barriers and allow the products of England and the United States to come in at low rates. Why is this distinction made? Why does this government, which is a protectionist government, when we deal with England and the United States, become a free trade government when we come to deal with Australia, Cape Colony and, to a certain extent, with France? Is it because the products of England and of the United States compete chiefly with the products of our manufacturers, while the products of Australia, Cape Colony and France compete with the products of our farmers? Is that the reason? There does not seem to be any other sufficient reason given. Just look at this Australian trade. Last year we paid $125,000 in steamship subsidies to enable the Australian farmers to compete with our own in British Columbia. Our total export to Australia was only $322,000; and we paid this subsidy to allow the farmers of Australia to send their mutton, butter and other products into Canada, chiefly into British Columbia, to compete with the mutton, butter and other products of our farmers. I cannot understand how gentlemen, like the members of the government, who proclaim themselves to be the farmers' best friends, can justify such action as that.

The next matter of which the address speaks is the Manitoba school question. I regret that I shall feel obliged to deal with that somewhat in detail, but before I express my own views on the subject I may be pardoned if I refer briefly to the speech, made yesterday by the hon. gentleman from Shell River. That hon. gentleman made a very eloquent and valuable speech, as he always does, but he laid down some propositions with respect to constitutions and to the school question which certainly possessed the merit of novelty. The hon. gentleman, for one thing, laid down the proposition that because in 1870, when the Manitoba Act was passed, the Red River settlement was included within very narrow limits and had a very small population, therefore, when the limits of the province were greatly widened, and when the population had greatly increased, the province was not to be bound by the constitution which had been formed for it in its infancy. The hon. gentleman did not carry that argument any further. He limited that condition of things to this school matter alone. The same logic would apply to every other provision in the Manitoba Act. If Manitoba, now that she has outgrown her swaddling clothes, is not to be bound by the provisions in the constitution with respect to the school law, why should she be bound by the provisions with respect to any other subject dealt with by the constitution? I think the hon. gentleman will find it very hard to tell why. The hon. gentleman took the ground that it was unfair that the majority should find their hands tied by this constitution framed so many years ago when the population was so small. The hon. gentleman seems to altogether misapprehend the intention of constitutions. What is the object of a constitution? It is not to protect the majority, who can always protect themselves. The object of every constitution is to protect the minority from the perhaps unwise and possibly tyrannical acts of the majority.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not by special legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Every constitution is, in some sense, special legislation. The constitution of Manitoba, is just like the British North America Act—it contains provisions almost identical with those of the British North America Act. I have not heard the hon. gentleman say that those provisions of the British North America Act with respect to schools which deal with the province of Quebec are highly objectionable, and should be got rid of, and that the majority of the province of Quebec should to-day dispense with that portion of that constitution. The hon. gentleman does not seem to understand what the constitution is for. In the United States every one recognizes the fact that a constitution is simply intended to prevent a temporary majority from doing unwise or unjust acts, or acts which are deemed by those who frame the constitution unjust or unwise. There is a way of amending the constitution of Manitoba, just as there is a way of amending the British North America Act or the constitution of the United States. An address to Her Majesty, asking for imperial legislation, is the proper and constitutional way to go about it. I do not propose to deal with the merits of the separate school question. The hon. gentleman spoke as though the fact that the minority had separate schools was a grievance to the majority. Inasmuch as the minority numbered altogether only 20,000, surely the fact that they had their own separate schools could not very much effect the 200,000 people outside. There is no tyrannizing by the minority over the majority. Then the hon. gentleman told us that the minority had no grievance. I think he said that distinctly, that the Manitoba Act of 1890 had not done the minority any injury.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not think you will find that in my speech.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Substantially, yes. I understood the hon. gentleman to take that ground—that the minority had no grievance. I am within the judgment of the House. Now, I turn to the decision of the Privy Council delivered by the Lord Chancellor; and I may observe, hon. gentlemen, that there was no Catholic among the law lords who gave that judgment. At page 8 of the pamphlet which has been distributed, I find this language :

The establishment of a system of public education in which both parties would concur was probably then in immediate prospect. The legislature of Manitoba first met on the 15th March, 1871. On the 3rd of May following, the Education Act of 1871 received the royal assent. But the future was uncertain. Either Roman Catholics or Protestants might become the preponderating power in the legislature, and it might under such conditions be impossible for the minority to prevent the creation, at the public cost, of schools which, though acceptable to the majority, could only be taken advantage of by the minority on the terms of sacrificing their cherished convictions. The change to a Roman Catholic system of public schools would have been regarded with as much distaste by the Protestants of the province as the change to an unsectarian system was by the Catholics.

And then their lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council deal with another argument of the hon. gentleman as to provincial rights.

Before leaving this part of the case, it may be well to notice the argument urged by the respondent that the construction which their lordships have put on the second and third subsections of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is inconsistent with the power conferred upon the legislature of the province to "exclusively make laws in relation to education." The argument is fallacious. The power conferred is not absolute, but limited. It is exercisable only "subject and according to the following provisions." The subsections which follow, therefore, whatever be their true construction, define the conditions under which alone the provincial legislature may legislate in relation to education and indicate the limitations imposed on, and the exceptions from their power of exclusive legislation. Their right to legislate is not, indeed, properly speaking, exclusive, for in the case specified in subsection 3, the Parliament of Canada is authorized to legislate on the same subject. There is, therefore, no such inconsistency as was suggested.

Then, on page 9, the Judicial Committee deal with the ground taken by the hon. gentleman, that the minority have no grievances—

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law, there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment, was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statutes fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children, than if they were distinctly Protestants in their character.

It is not necessary for me to deal further with the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, so far as it relates to the matter of schools. I think he is sufficiently answered by the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I presume the hon. gentleman will not say that that is either a prejudiced or incompetent tribunal. Leaving the speech of the hon. gentleman, I may say that with respect to this Manitoba school case, there is very little said in His Excellency's speech. The paragraph says :

We thank your Excellency for informing us that, in conformity with a recent judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the effect that the dissentient minority of the people of Manitoba have a constitutional right of appeal to the Governor General in Council against certain Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba in relation to the subject of education, your Excellency heard in Council the appeal, that your decision thereon has been communicated to the legislature of the said province, and that the papers on the subject will be laid before us.

Now that is a very non-committal and purely harmless sort of paragraph ; but while there is very little said on that subject in the speech made by His Excellency to Parliament, a great deal has been said on the platform and in the press. The hon. Minister of Justice came down to the province of Nova Scotia and went into the county of Antigonish, a county which is almost altogether Catholic, where five-sixths of the voters are Catholics, and he told the people that this question of the Manitoba schools was the great question for the electors. The hon. Minister of Public Works, I understand, went into the county of Verchères and talked very much in the same way. Hon. gentlemen will see what the position is with respect to this Manitoba school question. I shall ask leave to read two or three more extracts from this pamphlet ; and I shall not read now from the judgment of the Privy Council, but shall read from the Order in Council. The order recites the decision, which I need not refer to again; but there is this language used in the order made by the Imperial Privy Council when the decision of the law lords was submitted to them:—

That the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular, whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being and all other persons whom it may concern, are required to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

That is pretty emphatic language. It has been said that the government had the discretion to act, or not to act, as they pleased. I appeal to hon. gentlemen of this House, when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had decided that certain rights of the Catholic minority had been interfered with and that they had the right to appeal—I appeal to the hon. members to say whether when the Imperial Order in Council ended with that language it was open to the government here to fold their arms and say "We shall not do anything about it." That is the attitude of some hon. gentlemen who oppose the government, as well as some gentlemen who support the government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Had the Privy Council the right to pass the order?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, they decided on the law, and that was their opinion. This remedial order gives in detail the rights of Roman Catholics which the minority had been deprived of by the Manitoba Acts of 1890. They are enumerated at page 24. My view is that the government here were not in a position to act or not to act. I feel that in issuing the remedial order which they did the government here were simply carrying out the decision of the Imperial Privy Council and doing what they were ordered to do by that decision; and that they were practically doing the sort of work a sheriff does when he serves a summons or any other writ. The court had given its decision and the writ issued. I do not complain of the remedial Order in Council. I think that the government merely did their duty in this matter; but hon. gentlemen, the government are so little in the habit of doing their duty, and their followers as well as their opponents so rarely find them doing it, that most people were more or less surprised that they had done their duty. It is not a remarkable thing, but the government being so unused to doing their duty they thought that because they had in this particular matter done their duty for once, therefore, they were entitled to the support of all parties, not in this particular matter alone (I hope in this particular matter they will have the support of all parties) but in all matters. When they went down to different constituencies in this country, they thought the people of these constituencies should forget all their shortcomings and manifold offences during the last eighteen years and return their candidates simply because they had in this particular case done their duty. It is something the same as though a man who was about dying and who had led a particularly bad life, who had been a drunkard, a thief and a liar and had violated nine out of the ten commandments, should think he was entitled to a high place in the next world because he had not broken the tenth commandment. Now, hon. gentlemen, the voters of Antigonish and Verchères did not look at the thing just in that way. The electors of Antigonish thought that the fiscal policy of the government should be somewhat considered. The voters of Antigonish knew that the government professed to be the friends of the farmers, they knew that the policy of this farmer-loving government had depopulated their county to the extent of one-tenth—that the population had been reduced by one-tenth between 1881 and 1891. It is not because the people of that county are not given to marrying and giving in marriage, but it is simply because the people have had to leave the county because under the beneficent policy of the government they could not make a living in that county—one of the best agricultural constituencies in the whole Dominion. The electors knew that the promises of 1878 had not been redeemed. They knew that the emigration had not been stopped. That was one of the things which the former leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, declared that the new policy was to do—that it was to put an end to the emigration from Canada. The people of Antigonish knew that instead of an end being put to that emigration, the emigration had largely increased. Then there had been speeches made by former leaders of the government as well as by the departed premier—the one last deceased—to the effect that the public business of this country was to be carried on in the most scrupulously honest way. The electors of Antigonish felt that those promises had not been redeemed. They were fairly familiar with what is known as the McGreevy case. They were not aware at that time that Mr. McGreevy was to sit again in Parliament as a supporter of the administration, but they knew the history of what was known as his case. They knew of what is commonly described as the Curran Bridge case, knew something about what was spoken of as the hard-pan claims in their own province, and they had the fact that the Minister of Justice who came down to ask them to vote for the Conservative candidate had, before coming down, reinstated in his place an officer who had been dismissed by the former representative of Antigonish for gross misconduct—that is, the deputy warden of the penitentiary of British Columbia. Under these circumstances, the administration of the present government was not satisfactory to the voters of Antigonish and they decided to elect a man of their own choice, a man who supported the reform party whose general policy they preferred. The government candidate professed to make the Manitoba school question the sole issue. The gentleman, they did elect is as good a friend of the minority in Manitoba as the man who was not elected, and if any measure to improve the condition of the minority in Manitoba, is introduced, I have no doubt but that the government will have the support of that gentleman. Then when the electors exercised their undoubted right to elect a man of their choice, what was the line taken by the government press? I have said that the government did their duty, and if they had done this through a sense of duty, they would have been entitled to a certain modicum of credit. But, if we judge from the language of the Montreal Gazette, which I think is looked upon as being one of the organs of the government, the government were not guided solely by a sense of duty. What does the Gazette of Friday last say—two days after the election?

One inference drawn in some quarters is that if the electors who spoke on Wednesday fairly voiced the sentiment of the country, and they spoke in three provinces, the government has not only received no encouragement, to proceed with remedial legislation but has actually been instructed that any measure towards that end will obtain scant support. Under the circumstances the question whether an appeal to the whole electorate ought not to precede remedial legislation may fairly be raised, if the Manitoba Government declines to obey the suggestion and finding of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

And again :

The speech from the throne affords no clue to the course the government may deem fit to pursue in the event of the Manitoba authorities declining to modify their school laws, but it would be folly to shut our eyes to the fact that the result of the bye-elections has somewhat altered the position of the question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How does that affect the position you take, that the government is not honest?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the government were actuated solely by a sense of duty, the fact that when they appealed to two or three constituencies, those constituencies had not returned members to support the government would not affect their subsequent action at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is one of the deductions drawn from the result of the elections by the editor of that paper, that is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a rule, what one sees in the Montreal Gazette is not likely to be far away from what the government and its supporters think. The government had no choice in dealing with this Manitoba school question. I may say that, up to last Monday, it was not at all clear—Parliament had no inkling in fact—as to what the government proposed to do. Their remedial order was simply, as I said, the sort of ministerial work, which is done by a sheriff. I call the attention of the House to the fact, that when challenged on the hustings in the county of Antigonish to state what the government would do if the legislature of Manitoba refused to obey the remedial order, the Minister of Justice did not venture to say what their policy would be. That being the case, it is clear that the government candidate was in no sense entitled to claim in a special way the support of the Catholic electors. I am free to admit that the speech made by the hon. leader of the government on Monday did put a somewhat different face upon the matter. What he said is in the remembrance of hon.

members, but I just quote one expression which seems to me to make fairly clear what he and presumably the government propose to do :

It must prove to every reader of that debate, this important fact that when the resolutions were introduced admitting Manitoba into the confederation, it was believed we were granting the same rights and privileges to the Roman Catholics of Manitoba that had been granted to the minority in Quebec and to the minority in Ontario in relation to schools. It was for that reason, believing that we were conceding to that province what they did not then have, that I recorded my vote as I then did ; but I trust the day will never arrive when the party with which I am connected will violate any agreement into which they have entered.

The hon. gentleman recognized the Manitoba Act as an agreement. I hope that in making this utterance, he was speaking in his capacity as leader of the government and as representing the sentiment of the government. I was a little surprised at the reference made by the hon. the leader of the government to what had taken place on former occasions. The hon. gentleman said that it was a matter of satisfaction to know that in 1870 and 1871, a Conservative government was in power in Manitoba ; and he intimated that if a Conservative government were in power there now, they would do justice to the minority.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There never would have been any occasion for such action.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman perhaps is right—perhaps he is not. He referred, in his speech which I have just quoted, to the difference between the opinions expressed by various members of the Opposition. I am not aware that there has been any very great divergency in the opinions expressed by the members of the Opposition, but if there has been, they are no worse than the government, for the hon. gentleman's own colleagues told totally different stories in different parts of the country. Down in Antigonish and Verchères the electors were asked to support the government candidate because the government proposed to introduce remedial legislation. In the county of Haldimand, however, it was represented that the remedial order was a mere mechanical act on the part of the government—an act, as I said before, somewhat similar to that of a sheriff who served a writ—and that it did not commit the government to anything. The hon. gentleman took the ground that always and everywhere the Conservative party was the party which had supported the rights of minorities. Now the hon. gentleman's memory must be failing ; because it is within the knowledge of every hon. gentleman here that during the last three elections in the province of Ontario the party with which the Dominion Government is associated made their greatest attack upon the local government on this very question of separate schools, claiming that the Liberal government were too friendly to the separate school system. Not only is that the case, but I happen to have under my hand an extract from a platform adopted by the Conservative party of the province of Manitoba previous to the election of 1892. This document was adopted at a convention held in Winnipeg on the 30th of May, 1892. The sixth article or plank of the platform relates to schools and is as follows :

The Opposition hereby declare :

1. That they are in favour of one uniform system of public schools for the province.
2. That they are ready and willing to loyally carry out the present act should it be held by the judicial committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain, to be within the legislative power of the province.
3. That in the event of such school act being held by the judicial committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain to be beyond the legislative power of the province, they will endeavour to secure such amendments to the " British North America Act " and the " Manitoba Act " as will place educational matters wholly within the legislative power of the province of Manitoba, without appeal to the governor in council or the Parliament of Canada.

Now in the face of these facts, I must say I was surprised at the line taken by the hon. the leader of this House, I have always admired the boldness of our opponents ; and I do not know that I have ever seen a better example of that boldness than is afforded in this case. As to what the government ought to have done in this matter I do not propose to say very much. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Mr. Scott), said that the government ought to have disallowed the Acts passed by the legislature of Manitoba in 1890 ; and, under all the circumstances, perhaps if I had been a member of the government I should have been in favour of that line of policy. At the same time, I am not prepared to say that the government were very much to blame for the line which they did take. The resolution introduced by the Hon. Mr.

Blake in the other House of Parliament, which was afterwards crystallized into a statute, was, on the whole, a wise and judicious one. When questions come up which are calculated to excite strong feeling, like questions of race and religion, it is well to have an impartial tribunal to deal with them, and I am not prepared to say that Mr. Blake made a mistake in that instance. I think, however, that the event has shown that it would have been the wisest plan to have disallowed these Acts at first, because a great deal of difficulty would have been avoided. It is a very hard thing now to go back to the position in which things were in 1890. With respect to the future, I hope that the province of Manitoba will itself settle this difficulty. That province was the cause of the difficulty, and I think it should settle it. There is this further advantage to urge on behalf of such a course (among others) that any statute passed by the province could at a later date be amended if necessary, while it is questionable whether we could amend the Dominion legislation. I think we could, but the remedial order expresses a doubt, and it is better that there should not be any doubt on a question of that kind. I am glad to be able to gather, from the observations of a member of the government in the other House of Parliament, that the government would not insist upon the absolute re-enactment of the Act of 1881. That is the Act which I believe was repealed by the Act of 1890, and in it were embodied and consolidated the previous provincial Acts relating to education. In other provinces of the Dominion it has been found practicable to combine efficiency in secular teaching with a certain amount of religious training; and I feel that there ought to be statesmanship enough in the province of Manitoba to be able to bring about that state of affairs there also. I do not feel that I am authorized to speak for the opposition, but I am not going too far when I say the government may feel assured that if action on their part becomes necessary through the inaction of Manitoba, there will be no attempt on the part of the opposition to embarrass them any more than there was on the question of the Jesuits' Estates Act. The hon. the leader of the opposition stated months ago that he did not propose to make use of the Manitoba school question as a means of getting into power, and I do not think that he has changed his views upon that subject.

To my surprise I find a paragraph in his Excellency's speech referring to the existence of a depression in trade in Canada. Now I did not think that we were ever to have anything of that sort in Canada again. We were told that one of the main objects of the National Policy was to render Canada proof against all these attacks of depression in trade. This paragraph mentions the fact that this depression is world wide. Well, there was world wide depression in 1877-78, but I remember that the hon. gentlemen and their friends did not say that that was any excuse for depression in Canada then. They blamed the government of the country for it. They held that the government of the country should make the country prosperous by legislation; and we remember the contemptuous way in which the government of that day, who did not pretend that they could control this world wide depression and keep it out of Canada, were spoken of as "flies on the wheel." Now those gentlemen, who ridiculed the government of that day as flies on the wheel, have come down to Parliament and admitted that, after all, they are only flies on the wheel themselves. I am not going into this trade question particularly, but there are two or three points about it which suggest themselves to one. The government try to pose as friends of the farmers. It is a curious thing that, after seventeen years of this policy of the farmers' friends, there are according to the census about 7,000 farmers less in the country than there were in 1881. The government may be fostering national industry, but they are certainly not fostering the national farmers. The hon. the leader of the government, to my surprise, claimed for the National Policy our increased export of cheese and butter. The hon. gentleman did not show, and no hon. gentleman can show, how the National Policy, which makes the principal necessities of life dearer to the farmer, to the people who raise butter and cheese, helps them to increase their export of these articles. The letting of Australian butter into British Columbia and other parts of the country is not calculated to increase the market of the farmers. Then this paragraph of the speech, in a lame sort of a way, tries to find reasons for the deficit which they have to admit, a very large deficit, and they say that it is due to a certain extent to reduction of taxation. Now, inasmuch as a careful investigation shows that the total reduction of taxation amounts, on the business of the last fiscal year, to one-tenth of one per cent, it is quite clear the reduction of taxation has not had much to do with the reduction of the revenue. If there was one thing which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in opposition, and for many years after they had come into power, were fond of talking about, it was the deficits under the Mackenzie administration, and now, hon. gentlemen have got to come to Parliament with a deficit for the present year, which is as large as all the Mackenzie deficits taken together.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman may say no, but there are the figures. The deficit is over five millions, and it will probably be six millions by the first of July. The only remedy suggested by His Excellency's speech is economy. Now, hon. gentlemen, the intentions of the government, with respect to economy may be very good, but up to the present time, their execution has fallen short of their intentions. The government have been economical now for more than a year. I think the Finance Minister last year spoke of the necessity of economy, but they are still spending, in spite of their economy, about twelve million dollars a year more than their predecessors did. Mr. Mackenzie's administration spent in their most extravagant year a trifle over $24,000,000, and the present administration have spent somewhere in the neighbourhood of $37,000,000 during the past year; and it will be remembered that in those days my hon. friend from Quinté and other hon. gentlemen who thought that $24,000,000 was a great deal too much to spend, and that the business of the country could be conducted on about $22,000,000; and how these hon. gentlemen can now defend their expenditure of $37,000,000 or $38,000,000, while they are labouring under the present attack of economy, is something one cannot understand. Although this is not perhaps the time to discuss the expenditure of the country, I cannot forbear to call attention to a scheme, illustrative of this proposed economy, which has recently come to light. It has been stated in the newspapers, and I think there is good foundation for the statement that the government propose to make a grant to the Hudson Bay Railway Co. of something like two and a half million dollars, which would involve a permanent charge of about $100,000 a year, which is a great deal more than would be made up by many small economies; and the government propose to do this in the face of the fact that, in as far as evidence taken with respect to that Hudson Bay route is concerned, the weight of that evidence is altogether against the practicability of the Hudson Bay route as a means of getting out the harvests of the North-west.

Hon. Mr. PEKLEY—It is not the Hudson Bay Railway. It is a colonization road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Well, it is called in the newspapers the Hudson Bay Railway. The government, the other day, were thinking of having a general election, and it was hinted that they were not quite as popular in the North-west as they had been, and it was supposed that the people of the North-west were in favour of this wild scheme of a railway to Hudson Bay; and the government, therefore, proposed to spend the two and a half million dollars with a view of economically securing the votes of the people of the North-west.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The hon. gentleman does not want the government to suspend those works in progress in Halifax, because we want them very much.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I forbear to make any observation on the interruption of my hon. colleague. I shall only say that I do not think logic is the hon. gentleman's forte, and shall let it go at that. I was rather surprised that the premier, who usually appears disposed to receive courteously the suggestions of the opposition, did not show the gratitude he might have done for the suggestion made by the hon. leader of the opposition, that he should reduce the duties upon certain staple articles with a view of increasing the revenue. The hon. leader of the government actually did not seem to understand the argument of the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. The tariff of the present government is avowedly a protective tariff. If a protective tariff is successful, it shuts out importations, it prevents importation. That is what it is intended for, to exclude foreign products; and if it excludes foreign products, we get no revenue. If there are no products coming in to pay a duty, it is perfectly clear we do not get any duty. If you reduce the protective tariff so that the goods can be imported, then there is a chance to get revenue ; and anything clearer than that cannot be well imagined. If you have a revenue tariff, a tariff fixed at a pretty low figure, which does not shut out importations and is not protective, a slight increase in that tariff will give you an increased revenue, because our people have to get goods from the outside world.

His Excellency refers to his travels during the recess of Parliament ; and as to that paragraph of the speech I wish simply to remark that His Excellency and his countess made a most favourable impression on the people of Nova Scotia wherever they went. I hope that this feeling is mutual. I hope that His Excellency and the Countess of Aberdeen have been favourably impressed by Nova Scotia and its people.

There is another important paragraph in the address, and when I have done with that I shall resume my seat—that is the paragraph with respect to the admission of Newfoundland. This paragraph says :

We receive with a deep sense of their importance Your Excellency's statements that the Government of Newfoundland having intimated its desire to renew negotiations looking to the admission of that colony into the Dominion of Canada, a sub-committee of Your Excellency's advisers have recently met in conference a delegation from the Island Government and discussed with them the terms of union, and that it will be a subject of general congratulation if the negotiations now pending result in the incorporation of Her Majesty's oldest colonial possession into the Canadian Confederation.

It would be a benefit to the province from which I come if Newfoundland entered the union. It would probably be of some benefit also to other portions of the Dominion ; but the action of Parliament on the question of the admission of that island should depend on the terms agreed upon. There is such a thing as buying even Newfoundland at too high a price. We should not purchase a quarrel. Canada should insist that the question of the French shore should be settled in a satisfactory way before Newfoundland comes into the union. We all know that England finds that question troublesome and England would be only too happy to get rid of the trouble and hand it over to Canada to be dealt with. We have trouble enough of our own of various kinds, and we should not consent to take Newfoundland in until this question has been finally settled in a satisfactory way. There is another important point with respect to the proposed admission of Newfoundland. Whatever terms are agreed upon between the present government of Newfoundland and the government and Parliament of Canada, should be submitted to the popular vote in Newfoundland. The present representatives of that island were not elected with reference to the question of union at all. That question was not in issue in any sense. The present representatives of the constituencies of Newfoundland have no mandate whatever to hand over their island to Canada, and Canada should not be a party to any such transaction as that would be. I never supposed that anything of the kind was probable ; but I have noticed in the papers since the visit of the delegates to Ottawa, statements that it was not intended to take the sense of the voters of Newfoundland on this question. I hope Canada will not be a party to what all fair minded men must regard as a gross outrage on popular rights. If sound principle and a feeling of fair play to the voters of Newfoundland do not prevent the Parliament of Canada from agreeing to the union without a vote of the island electors being first taken on the question, surely the experience which Canada had of Nova Scotia in the early days of confederation should prevent us from having a second edition of Nova Scotia. We can afford to wait until Newfoundland is ready to come in, until her people are satisfied to come in. The day will come when the majority will be satisfied to come in, if they are not satisfied now, and we can wait. Some hon. gentleman spoke of Newfoundland as being the key of the confederation, and he seemed to think that was a very strong reason why we should grant almost any terms for her admission to the union ; but while the key of confederation is in the hands of the mother country, I think we can rest easy.

With respect to the measures which are proposed to be introduced, there is only one to which I wish to refer, and that is an insolvency law. Hon. gentlemen know that a good deal of time was devoted last year to the consideration of a measure respecting insolvency, and that when that measure had reached its final form, there was still a good deal of difference of opinion amongst hon. members with respect to its merits. That measure was asked for chiefly by the boards of trade and the banks of Ontario and Quebec. The representatives of those bodies stated before the committee of the House that if they had in the other provinces the same sort of legislation that exists in Ontario or Quebec, they would not ask for this insolvency law. Since the prorogation of Parliament last year the province of New Brunswick has passed an Act almost identical with that of Ontario. A similar measure was introduced in the legislature of Nova Scotia last session and was defeated more by chance than otherwise in the legislative council during the closing hours of the session. I have no doubt, but that the measure will be passed at the next session of the local legislature; and there does not seem to be any reason to devote our energies during the warm weather to going all over that matter again. There are other things that I might refer to but I think I have said enough already. I can only say, with respect to the closing paragraph of His Excellency's speech, that the Queen's representative may feel sure that the members of the opposition will bring to the deliberations of parliament at least as strong a love for their country, and just as earnest a desire to do that which is best for the country as the supporters of the administration.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I do not intend to refer to all the paragraphs in the address, but I wish to say a few words on two or three of the subjects dealt with by His Excellency. Although it has been customary for the leader of the House and the leader of the opposition to monopolize the expression of their approval of the speeches delivered by the mover and the seconder of the address yet, on this occasion, I wish to depart from that custom, and express my admiration for the speech of the hon. gentlemen from Pictou, which was couched in the most perfect and appropriate language, and also the pleasure with which I listened to the speech of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. In addition to the eloquence which they displayed, there is another phase of their speeches to which I wish to call attention. The speech from the throne generally concludes with an invocation for divine guidance in the proceedings of Parliament, and very often that paragraph is passed over lightly by movers and seconders; but on this occasion both of these hon. gentlemen referred to that paragraph in the most reverential and solemn manner. In days such as we live in, it is gratifying to find some who have convictions and who have the courage of their convictions. I do not intend to follow every paragraph of the speech of His Excellency. On the trade question I will simply place one or two economical facts before the hon. the leader of the opposition who has made extraordinary statements on the subject. It is well known that food and products of all kinds have not been so cheap for the last forty years in Canada, the United States and England as during the last year. It is also known that there are more hungry, idle, unemployed people in these countries at present than there have been for years. What benefit is it to the farm labourer in England if foreign and colonial wheat, beef, cheese and butter are cheap if he cannot earn a day's wages? What benefit is it to the Manchester cotton spinner and weaver if imported American cottons are cheap if his own factory gives him work and wages for three days only out of six? What benefit is it to the iron workers of Sheffield, Newcastle, Birmingham, and Glasgow if foreign iron is cheap if they are working on half time? The hon. gentleman from Ottawa says: lower the duty and you will increase the revenue, but he failed to show how that could be done. England is held up by that gentleman and others as having the model financial and commercial system of the world. Does she lower her taxation when increased revenue is required? Just the contrary: she at once raises her income tax—and this very year it is higher than it has been, excepting when war was going on. Any one who tries to show that the policy pursued there could be adopted here, is very much at fault in his political economy. The conditions of the two countries are entirely different. England has a large accumulation of wealth, with abundance of cheap labour, cheap coal and iron, and large fleets of ships on every sea carrying her products hither and thither. This country is young, comparatively without capital, labour is dearer, coal and iron are dearer—there can be no comparison between the two countries. The hon. gentleman from Shell River in his efforts in behalf of free trade, has made a very strong case for the National Policy. He has shown that one hundred millions of dollars annually are paid out in wages by manufacturers. Is not that large sum, spent amongst the labouring population of this country, a great boon to them? Were it not for the moderate protection afforded the industries of this country, that large sum now expended for wages would be paid in other countries manufacturing for our wants, and not paid in Canada. The hon. gentleman has also shown the enormous volume of annual production of commodities, over $400,000,000. Just think of the wealth and consuming power of this country to be able to absorb such an immense value in addition to our annual importation of about $120,000,000? Then, again, look at the large amount of wealth kept in the country by reason of this home production. One can readily understand why a decline may take place in our imports and revenue, when we have so large a quantity of home production to supply our wants. As a matter of course, the more we supply our home market with our own manufactures the less we require to import, and the less will be the revenue from importations. So that before very long other sources of revenue may have to be looked for.

With regard to the Manitoba school question, I am fully convinced that an injustice has been done the minority which should be and I hope will be rectified. A prescribed right exercised for twenty years has been ruthlessly taken away from the minority, an act not to the credit of the Grit government of Manitoba. My voice and my vote will go for justice to the minority.

I have to express on behalf of the people of British Columbia the great pleasure we had in the visit of the Governor General and Her Excellency the Countess of Aberdeen last winter. Everywhere they met with a most enthusiastic and loyal reception, and they endeared themselves to all with whom they came in contact. During the whole of their stay at Victoria they worked incessantly attending meetings of school children, charitable and other institutions, speaking kind, useful and encouraging words wherever they went. We earnestly hope Their Excellencies will repeat their visit. I now pass to a darker side of the picture. Few, if any public men have died in Canada whose loss has been so much felt and lamented as that of Sir John Thompson. Those who came in contact with him could not help being impressed with his fairness, his high sense of justice, and integrity. Modest in his demeanour, he was always courteous, civil, and kind. I often noticed, that although leader of the House of Commons, he very seldom spoke, and never sought to impress his own superiority; but when he did speak, his words carried with them quasi-judicial weight, which gained the respect and confidence of his political opponents, as well as of his own friends. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has expressed his condolence in very considerate and appropriate language. Advancing from a humble position in life, by his indomitable perseverance to the high and honoured position he occupied in the councils of the country, and in the hearts of the people, the life, and progress of Sir John Thompson may well be emulated by the young men of this Dominion. Great and small, rich and poor, however, must die, and leave this sphere of action, and many would wish to end their days amidst surroundings of their own selection; but the highest ambition of the departed premier never anticipated such royal surroundings as he had—romantic and tragic in the highest degree, surrounded by the noble of the land. The heart of the British nation, and the sovereign head of that great nation were with him in that last hour. Our gracious Queen marked her esteem and tender sympathy by her attention to the dead premier's family, and by the honours paid to his mortal remains—all of which is a source of pride and satisfaction to this country, as well as to his family and relations. But we must not dwell too much on such sad events in public life. The world must move, the work of this country must go on, and in our sorrow we may congratulate ourselves that men can be found qualified to take the places of those who have gone. In Sir John Thompson's successor to the premiership, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, we have a man who will fill the office with assiduity, integrity and ability. I cordially join the mover and seconder, and this House, in giving him our hearty congratulations for the title conferred on him by our gracious Queen, and will add, as others have done, long may he live to enjoy his title, and long may he as premier continue to lead his party, and this House on to victory.

The remarks of my hon. colleague from Victoria about representation in the Cabinet are perfectly correct as far as the opinions of the people of British Columbia are concerned. They believe they have not been treated with the consideration and justice which their position commercially and financially gave them the right to expect. Ever since British Columbia came into the union they have sent supporters of the Liberal-Conservative party to Ottawa. As this is manifestly a party and government of fairness, I feel sure that this matter has been an oversight, and that justice will speedily be done the province that I have the honour to represent.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I generally like to follow my hon. friend from Halifax. His views and mine are so opposite to each other and his opinions are so heterodox, in my opinion, on public matters and policy, that I generally find a great deal to say when he gives me material for thought and speech, but on this occasion he has left me very little. I have listened to his comments upon the question before us and I am certainly with him on everything he said about the Manitoba school question. The action of the government is simply sustaining what many of us last session considered were the rights of Manitoba, of which they had been unjustly deprived, and therefore we should give them redress. That came up before us in a resolution by my hon. friend from St. Boniface, in which I took the same position as the government has now taken, and which the judicial committee of the Privy Council have determined are their rights; so I may at a future stage of my remarks comment more fully upon that, but for the present I may say I am fully in accord with my hon. friend. The government have done nothing more than they should have done, nothing more than they were justified in doing, nothing more than they were compelled to do under the decision of the Privy Council. No man doubts or denies that the Manitoba Act of 1890 deprived the Roman Catholics of their constitutional rights, and the order of the Governor in Council, following the decision of the Judicial Committee, directs restoration of those rights, and we here have heard the declaration which our premier plainly expressed, that if the Manitoba Government does not provide remedial legislation, the Dominion Government will do so. The remedial order was passed exactly after and in accordance with the decision of the Privy Council, that the separate school system of 1870 should be restored and that Roman Catholics should not be obliged to contribute to any other schools. My hon. friend from Halifax dealt with the trade question and commenced by questioning the policy of the government with regard to the French treaty. That question was before us last session and fully discussed and the merits and demerits of it laid before us by my hon. friend, as well as by the persons who supported the government on that treaty motion; therefore, I have little to say upon it. My hon. friend says it is free trade. Well, that is part of our policy in regard to extending our trade with other countries. It is simply more reciprocity, and, instead of being an injury to us, we consider it a great benefit to us in many of our fisheries, the lobster fishery particularly, and the lumber trade, two important industries in this country. There are the cheese industry and others, and I believe if that treaty is completed and acted upon it must redound to the benefit of Canada. And the Governor General's speech informs us that satisfactory assurance has been received from Her Majesty's Government respecting the interpretation of certain clauses in the treaty, which requires legislation. Then my hon. friend talked about Australia, the money expended on a steamship subsidy, and the small exports sent out of this country, and he says that all that we could expect of it was to bring the products of Australia into competition with the products of Canada. I do not view the matter in that light. I believe that the duty of 30 per cent upon mutton and such products amply protects us against any importation of meat products from Australia. But my hon. friend might like to have the addition of the American market, which he always did enjoy—that is, the Oregon and Washington territories. The meat generally came from there, and I think that if we can by any legislation open a trade for our fellow colonies and bring the meat into British Columbia it would be far preferable to having a treaty with a foreign country. And that was one of the great troubles with British Columbia. They could not get the meats; and we had to go across the border.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Since they began to import meat from Australia it has completely destroyed the importation of cattle from the North-west Territories into British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I did not know that many went across there, and I know the complaint was that they could not get their meats from the North-west Territories, they had to import from Oregon, and there was a large amount of revenue raised by importing them from Oregon territory.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—My hon. friend on my left has been a large exporter of butter for years, and when the Australian butter came in he had to abandon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—According to my hon. friend's views we should increase the duty to meet that case. If my hon. friend will refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that the meat which went to Australia the year before last was over half a million from Washington Territory alone, and the reason was the duty on the live meat was only 20 per cent ad valorem, while the duty was 3 cents a pound on the dead meat. This is really an admirable illustration of the theories and doctrines of the hon. gentleman. Thirty per cent is not enough to protect the people of British Columbia, and if it is not enough, I should be glad, as a high protectionist, to double it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I was merely correcting the statements that the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg was making, but since the hon. gentleman has mentioned it, I will inform him that it was owing solely to the scheduling of American cattle which came in there that the importation of American cattle into the Pacific province has dropped off. Before that they were allowed to go in there as freely as from one province to another, but some years ago, I believe, at the instigation of the stock raisers in British Columbia and the North-west Territories, they were placed on the same schedule as here, and were required to remain three weeks in quarantine, and we cannot import any live stock.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is from the United States and not from the North-west. Cattle have not been admitted into this country free for a great many years.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I do not mean free, but they have to remain in quarantine three weeks.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Ninety days.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That is three months.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—And that regulation is only laid aside for the purpose of providing beef for British Columbia merely in case of an emergency.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think my hon. friend has found after all that any statement of mine is incorrect. I must thank the hon. leader of the House for so clearly stating facts which are within his own knowledge, but which at the moment I could not be expected to be prepared to present to this House. He has clearly illustrated the advantages which are gained by this trade being diverted from Washington and Oregon to Australia, but that is only one side of the question. We expect to enlarge our trade with Australia in the near future. Many of our manufacturing establishments have taken hold there already and have agents there, and the reports coming from those colonies as to the expansion of the trade are of the most encouraging character. Many of our manufacturing industries, which are despised so much by my hon. friend and which the policy of his party is so inimical to, are finding a market for their surplus products in the Australian colonies and that market is certain to be largely increased. If my hon. friend had any desire to promote the progress of this country, if he wished to see it expanding its border and its trade, he would not have made the objection to which we have listened in regard to the advantages to be derived from the extension of our trade with Australia, from which British Columbia does now obtain direct, not only mutton, but all the products of a tropical climate. Now, as regards the statements made by my hon. friend on the subject of the election in Antigonish, I am not going into that matter. It is enough for me to know that one of my hon. friends here was present in the constituency, one of the Ministers who sits opposite to me, and he knows very well what influences were brought to bear. The Senator from Halifax, (Hon. Mr. Power) is drawing largely upon his imagination with regard to the influences at work in that constituency. It is one which we ourselves scarcely expected to gain, for it has always been a stronghold of the Liberal party. It was only the wonderful magnetism, the wonderful power and personal influence that Sir

John Thompson possessed, which ever enabled us to win an election there. It has simply gone back again to its normal condition and I do not therefore consider it as a loss to the government. My hon. friend however claims that that is a great victory. The amount of bombast indulged in by our Grit friends over this one election only serves to remind the public how rarely they have a chance for such rejoicing. It is only one case out of many. Since this Parliament came into existence look at the number of constituencies we have won. I think 54 by-elections have been won by the government as compared with 15 which have been gained by the opposition, and the government has a vote of 28 more than it had at the commencement of this Parliament. I might refer to the state of affairs which existed, in contradistinction to this, when the Liberal party was in power. During the little time that they lived, death stared them in the face. They were paralysed from the beginning of their term of office. They spring into power upon a policy which the country could not sustain, and if I mistake not they lost 24 seats during the four or five years that they were in power, only gaining two during that time. Their influence was waning from the first, and no one seemed to have sense enough to prescribe the proper medicine which the country required to invigorate it and bring it back to a condition of prosperity. They would not take the advice of the members of the opposition who told them plainly enough that their policy was working destruction to the country, that they must endeavour by some means to protect themselves against the inroads of foreign countries, but they were so stubborn in their policy that it was impossible to do anything with them. They talked about being "flies on the wheel," and claimed that no fiscal policy could restore us to a state of prosperity. Year after year went by, leaving them in a worse condition—they were running into debt and finally they were forced to make an effort to remedy the state of affairs by increasing the taxation. They did not attempt to protect any particular industry, but they raised the duty all around ruthlessly, recklessly without regard to any particular industry. They clapped on an additional duty of 2½ per cent, and the result was simply to give them a larger deficit, and finally they went out of power in a most inglorious manner after having heaped up an additional debt of $40,000,000. That was the character of their government, and I may add that that was the end of them. They left the country in an almost deplorable condition. The only institutions which prospered under their rule were the notable soup-kitchens for the relief of the poor. It was at that time that the exodus from the country commenced; it was then that the flood gates were opened. My hon. friend says now that the people have gone from Antigonish to the United States as a result of the National Policy. It is impossible that the population could have been decimated in that way, but the fact is that the people commenced going to the United States before the National Policy was introduced, and when they had settled there they drew their friends and relatives to them, and it has taken and will take a long time to counteract the disastrous effects of Liberal rule. The Mackenzie government said it could do nothing to protect Canadian industries or alleviate the existing distress, but it ruthlessly, without regard to consequences, other than to raise money to support a moribund semi-defunct government, added to the then burden and distress of the people by an additional tax of 2½ per cent, and with all that additional money forced from the people, deficits continued to increase. When they were hurled from power they left nothing but a depressed country and crippled industries, with a legacy of $40,000,000 of debt, for which their successors, our Liberal-Conservative Government, had to provide and Canada was to pay. But what do we find now? Under the National Policy the people are leaving the United States, are flocking back into Canada, both to the province of Quebec and to the Northwest, taking up our land and seeking a livelihood in other ways. I therefore claim that it is not the National Policy which is responsible for any exodus. I thank God that we have the National Policy. If it had not been for that where would we have been to-day when we look around us and see the world-wide depression which exists everywhere? My hon. friend from Halifax quotes a remark in the speech from the throne about the depression in Canada, but he did not read the remainder of the sentence which says: that the depression has made itself felt in Canada, "but fortunately to a less degree than in most other countries." If it were not for the fiscal policy which we have adopted in this country we might expect the same results which exist everywhere else. Our production is as great as ever, our accumulation of wealth is as great as ever. The trouble is to be found in the foreign markets; they cannot buy our products, and the cause of the failure of our trade is to be found in the inability of our foreign customers to purchase as formerly. We cannot regulate the prices which prevail in outside markets. They are resting under a depression, and they cannot buy as much of our goods. The same cause operates to produce a depreciation in the value of the goods. It is, therefore, not the policy of the government which is at fault. I claim that our industries are just as vigorous and as strong as ever they were. We produce as much as we ever did, but it is simply because we could not find a market except at depreciated prices. No wonder there is a deficit. We have exchanged our specific duties for ad valorem duties, and in this way we have reduced the volume of our taxation about $5,000,000 owing to the falling off in the values of the commodities coming in. Is it a wonderful thing that we should find a deficit corresponding very closely to the reduction in our tariff?

Then my hon. friend from Halifax spoke of the economy practised by his government when it was in power, and contrasted it with the expenditure of the present administration. He claimed that the Liberals only spent \$24,000,000 a year, while we spent \$37,000,000. My hon. friend is not here, but I should like to ask him to what particular expenditure he objects. Is it that relating to the extension of railways, to the extension of the postal system, or to the internal development of the country that we find going on everywhere? Can he point to a single item of our expenditure and say that it is not in the interests of the country? I wish to note here that year after year, with a few exceptions, we have had a large surplus out of which we have contributed largely to the consolidated revenue fund—some \$15,000,000, I believe, and now that a state of things has come about for which we are not responsible, we should not feel alarmed because there is going to be a small deficit. I believe our deficit is about  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. England's, I believe, is about 10 per cent, and that of the United States is about 11 per cent—I believe, about \$50,000,000. It is all owing, in their case, to tinkering with the tariff, and the uncertainty which surrounds commercial legislation in that country. I hope the government, under present circumstances, will not undertake any revision of the tariff, for I believe the uncertainty which arose last year and the year before did mischief, and had a tendency to prevent the revenue reaching as large an amount as it otherwise would have done. People sometimes magnify the dangers which attend a change in the rate of duty, and imagine that the effect upon their particular branch of industry will be greater than is really the case, and they delay the making of contracts until such time as the fiscal policy shall have been determined for the year. I therefore think that if the government would announce that they have no intention of touching the tariff this session, it would have a beneficial effect. The present depression I believe is not a permanent one, and in my opinion the revenue will shortly be as large as heretofore. I really think the government would be justified in doing at this juncture what Sir Richard Cartwright did when he was Minister of Finance, that is to say, take a little off the surplus which we have accumulated in past years—borrow a little of it, so to speak, to tide us over present conditions. That, at all events, would be very much better than interfering with the tariff. It is a matter of history that Sir Richard Cartwright took the money out of the consolidated fund—which, by the way, he did not increase—and used it to meet the public debt of Canada.

My hon. friend spoke of the admission of Newfoundland into the union. I am in favour of Newfoundland joining the confederation, because I believe it will be to the mutual advantage of the island and of the Dominion. I know it will be of incalculable value to this country, apart altogether from the terms that may have been demanded and conceded. If the people of Newfoundland have time given them to impartially consider the subject, they must see that their interests are bound up with ours in every way, and they should take advantage of this favourable occasion to come into the union. We should not take advantage of their embarrassed position to impose hard terms upon them, but should be ready to give them even more than we might consider their right. We should be magnanimous in dealing with Newfoundland, and it will be to our advantage to use every effort to bring the island into the union now. With Newfoundland a member of the confederation, we should have no more trouble with Bond-Blaine treaties. If we do not treat Newfoundland generously now, the island government will be quite justified in saying "what right have you to interfere with the treaties that we are endeavouring to make for the promotion of our own prosperity?" It will be of great advantage to our fishermen, and the farmers of the maritime provinces especially, to have Newfoundland added to the confederation. It will give us sea-coast fisheries of enormous value, and many other advantages to which I need not at present allude.

I agree with the hon. gentleman from Halifax in what he says in regard to the Insolvency Act. I was not very favourable to the measure last year. The province of New Brunswick has provided all that is necessary with the winding up of insolvent estates, and Nova Scotia will probably soon do the same. Even in mercantile communities there is a difference of opinion as to whether a bankruptcy law would be advantageous to Canada or not, and if the measure can be held over until after the next election it can then be dealt with by men coming fresh from the people. At the present time when depression exists everywhere about us and in Europe and the United States, it would be unwise to place such a law on our statute-books, apart altogether from the effect of bringing up such an important measure at a late season of the year, when it would inevitably involve a protracted debate and a long session. I know how diverse were the views of the members of this chamber on the subject of an Insolvent Act last session, and how close the votes were on some clauses of vital importance to the principle of the bill. On the whole, it is better to let the matter stand for another year. I listened with very great pleasure to the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address. The speech of the hon. member from Pictou was characterized by fine diction and lofty sentiments, expressed in language which I, at least, could not attempt, and we have good reason to congratulate ourselves that we have in this chamber men who possess the ability and the grasp of the subjects of the day shown by these hon. gentlemen in their addresses. My hon. friend from Ottawa complained of the late period at which Parliament was summoned. It is undoubtedly a late meeting, but we know something of the difficulties which the premier had to encounter when he took office. I am sure he has not found the position a bed of roses. He has had to deal with questions of the greatest importance. He was called upon suddenly and unexpectedly to form a government when we lost our great leader, whose memory I always revere, whom I have always loved and known since he was a boy. I watched the career of the late Sir John Thompson from the time he entered public life up to the day of his death. He seemed to rise step by step, less by his own volition than by the force of public opinion. He was exceedingly modest and entirely free from arrogance. He discharged his duties with honesty of purpose and perfect sincerity. Those are the lessons which he has taught us. With all his ability he had the heart of a child. While he served his country faithfully and zealously, he did not forget to serve his God. His convictions were strong, and the sincerity of his character was shown in every act of his life. In forming his religious convictions he must have made great sacrifices, not only of his personal ambition, but also of pecuniary advantage. I knew him as a young man when he studied law, and I have followed his career in all its phases, and throughout all admired him to the end. When we met I am sure it was a pleasure both of to us to enjoy each other's conversation. Considering the great ability and experience of Sir John Thompson, his successor must have felt somewhat diffident in undertaking to form a government, and he could only have acted from a sense of duty. The present leader of the government, like his predecessor, has risen by his own ability, integrity, indomitable perseverance and sense of right and duty, and I felt satisfied when he assumed the responsibility of forming a cabinet that he would be a success, because his followers know him to be a man on whom they can rely, a man of irreproachable character who would never do anything for which they would have to apologize. When my hon. friend became the leader of the government, he had great difficulties to face. Necessarily it took some time to form the government and to realize the position in which they were placed. Then came the Manitoba school question, in dealing with which, while they took prompt and vigorous action, a good deal of time was consumed. Then came the Newfoundland delegates to discuss terms of union. I am not surprised that the meeting of Parliament has been delayed beyond the usual time; I am only surprised that the government are so well prepared in so short a time to meet the representatives of the people. Now, with regard to the Manitoba school bill, my hon. friend from Ottawa said that the government should have taken a different step, that they ought, in the first instance, to have decided and done what they considered right to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba. I do not know that there is any man more inclined to stand up for provincial rights than the leader of the opposition. He has always taken that position and had the government taken any other position than they did under Sir John Thompson, leaving the rights of the Catholic minority to be determined by the courts in accordance with the resolution passed in the Commons when this question first appeared to be looming in the horizon in 1890, they would have merited censure. Had the government attempted to interfere in the matter, or had they even given advice, they would have acted unwisely and imprudently and would have had the censure of the country upon them; but they took the proper steps and took them in time. The courts of Manitoba decided that the local government acted within their rights, and we find the Supreme Court divided on the question. The majority I think determined that the legislation was ultra vires. The case went to England, and was sent back again for the purpose of being extended. It was rather too narrow in the first instance, and it was then determined that the rights which they had acquired since confederation had been taken from them and that the government here should see that they got redress. I think the government had no right to deal with the question until such time as the courts had finally and fully determined upon the matter. Might not the Roman Catholic schools have suffered under the provincial rights cry, had the government taken action before the legal and constitutional rights of the Catholics had been fully, finally and completely determined by the highest court of the Empire? The Premier has said, that if Manitoba fails to do her duty in this matter, the Dominion Government will not shrink from their duties. They are prepared to do what is right under the constitution. Now, my hon. friend from Marquette seemed to think that the action of the government should be confined, if anything was done, to some portion of the territory which was called the Selkirk settlement. Well, supposing a township or town, as a corporation, should extend its boundaries, do you think that the added territory would not come within all the privileges and immunities which the others had before them? By the Act of 1884, they were guaranteed all the rights that belonged to them. My hon. friend says that many of these Manitoba schools have come in under the national school system of the country. Will my hon. friend say that they came in of their own choice? Certainly not. He would not attempt to say so, because we know that the Roman Catholic Church calls for the education of their conscience. Religious training is an element in their schools. They consider that children are not properly fitted for the duties of this world, or of another, unless religious education is combined with secular instruction, and if any part of the Roman Catholic population of Manitoba has gone in under the national school system, it must be because they had no alternative. It was because they had to do it, by compulsion and, having done so, it is no argument for my hon. friend to say that so many have gone in that the rest are a small minority. Why, what is this parliament here for but to give protection to minorities? The very formation of the Senate is to protect the minorities of the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To protect the minor provinces.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, and every part thereof, and the minority thereof, in all their constitutional rights and privileges. Even before we confederated, when the question first came up in 1863, it was at the instance of the Protestant minority of Quebec that this legislation was first adopted, to protect the Protestant minority of Quebec. The minority, I believe, in Ontario at the time had their rights recognized and it was for the protection of the minority chiefly in Quebec that this clause in the Confederation Act was introduced, because if you refer to Galt, to Letellier, to McGee, and other men in the Parliament of old Canada in 1863—I read the report last session—I cannot remember it exactly, but these men all spoke upon this question, and protection for the minority was incorporated in the constitution of the country. Now, as regards Manitoba, the matter was dealt with in a similar way, and I contend that the minority of Manitoba have their rights under the constitution as safely given and guaranteed to them and they cannot be deprived of them. We have no right to take their rights from them if we would. They are as clearly entitled to their rights as the premier or the Attorney General is to represent the country. Their rights are under that Confederation Act, and I say that under that Confederation Act the Roman Catholics have that inalienable right, and because their numbers are diminished they should not and cannot be deprived of their rights. If the numbers had been increased, we should not have found Manitoba acting in this tyrannical way. It was only because the majority and the government deemed the Roman Catholics an insignificant body in the country that they took upon themselves to ignore them. I say their rights cannot be ignored, and that they will not be ignored, and if any province of the Dominion attempts to ignore the rights of the minority or the just rights of any body, the tendency is to make the demands of that body more vigorous, and in the end their rights must be acknowledged. But we know well how the Liberal government of that time obtained office. They rode into power upon false pledges. When it was considered that the rights of the Roman Catholics were in danger, they declared to them upon the hustings that their rights were inalienable; that they had them under the constitution; that they were inalienable rights under the constitution, and could not be taken from them. By their conduct and their false promises they lured the people from taking the stand that they would otherwise have taken. Even the Archbishop was approached and made to believe that the rights of his body would not be infringed upon and that he should not use his influence in the election to protect their schools, which were not in danger. By means of these false promises the Ministry came into power, and you see how they used their power. They used it in a way that cannot be commended. Because of their mismanagement and maladministration they became unpopular and then, in order to sus-tain themselves in power, they took advantage of the prejudices of the majority of the people and by such means they were enabled to continue in power. I cannot see in what way my hon. friend could sustain or attempt to sustain the position he took with regard to the insignificance of the minority in that province, or say that the Roman Catholics would ever consent to a diminution of their privileges unless they were compelled to do so by some stronger influence which could be brought to bear upon them. It is contrary to their conscientious convictions to adopt the general schools of the country and contrary to the dictates of their church. Even our own church of England is in favour of church schools. We believe that to train a man and bring him up properly he should be educated in religious observances and should have a proper religious faith—that he cannot well fulfil his duties and prepare himself for his end unless with his secular education is blended a religious training.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke of the National Policy having been a failure and he told us that the manufactures of Canada were a fungous growth; in fact he would have us go back to a half civilized state. In his opinion manufactures are not indigenous to the soil or country and are being kept up artificially, and he thinks that we ought to do without them, that we should confine ourselves to the farm, the fisheries, the forest, and the dairy. I do not believe in any such policy as that. I do not know that my hon. friend would make a success of milking cows, and I would not be of much account on a raft, nor would he. I believe our industries should be developed, because the manufacturing industries are a great benefit to the home market. The best market for our Canadian farmers is the manufacturing and labouring classes in the country. Nine-tenths of the farm products of the country are consumed by the artisans and labourers of the country, and the hon. gentleman would deprive them of that, and do as they did under the Mackenzie government, when many million dollars worth of United States products were admitted free of duty and brought into direct competition with our own farm products in our own country, while our exports were met at the boundary of the United States by a high tariff. That was the position of affairs under the Mackenzie administration. All

United States surplus products were brought into the country comparatively free of duty. Now, I find that the total trade of Canada in 1893 was $247,638,620, which was about $6,000,000 larger than it has been at any other period. As I said before, that surplus over and above last year does not indicate that our country is retrograding in the slightest. On the contrary, considering the reduction is only in values, not in volume, because the quantity was larger, it indicates that it is prospering, and I also find that the export of agricultural products in 1893 was over $22,000,000, whilst in last year it was only $17,677,000 which shrinkage is entirely owing to the depression in foreign countries which have not the means of purchasing as largely as they did, and pay the prices which prevailed in 1893. The decline is simply in value, not in quantity, and our showing is comparatively greater than what can be made by the United States. The falling off in this instance is simply in the foreign markets. The depression in other countries prevents them from buying. Take the fish industry for example. Our fishery products are as large as ever, but what about the prices? They have fallen off one-half and in consequence of the market being so low they have realized nothing and our fishermen are practically worth less than when they started on their perilous voyages in the spring. It is simply the consequence of the people not being able to purchase our products. Had there been no protection what would have been the result? We would not have had the control of our own markets but we would have had all the old productions of other countries, and especially United States products to contend with. Instead of that we control our own market, which is the best market for the farmers of the country. It is a protection which we give them and the more we extend our manufacturing industries the greater will be the market for the farmers. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition argues that the best way to get rid of deficits was to reduce the tariff one-half. I thought it was rather paradoxical to claim that by reducing the tariff you get a larger revenue. With all the economy they can display, and every advantage taken, our people can just simply exist. They are making no money. The tariff was lowered here a year ago just as low as it possibly could be to keep the home market for our own industries, and if you were to take off one half, the result would be just what my hon. friend desires, it would destroy every manufacturer in the country, and we would have to rely upon the products of our farmers and lumbermen to sustain the country. He then spoke about the fisherman being taxed. I do not know whether fishermen are taxed more than others, but if my hon. friend's free trade policy came in they would have no protection. Certainly the bounty system is the highest protection. If you come under a free trade tariff, free trade as in England, why the first thing that would have to go would be the bounties to the fishermen. They are protected and in many things free from duty. Then with regard to the woollen industry it has been considered for the benefit of the fishermen whilst my hon. friend knows that woollen goods are cheaper here to-day than in the United States. They can undersell us in cottons but not in woollens. In the United States they get from us our woollen goods because we can make the woollen goods, which the fishermen use, much cheaper in Canada than in any other country, less the duty. Now what about this free trade matter? We had the tariff before us last year for revision. The Finance Minister well knows how many men approached him from Grit constituencies asking for protection in their particular industries? I know that in Yarmouth, there is an industry employing a large number of hands. The government was impertuned to increase the protection to that industry. Then we know how anxious many were to have the tariff on petroleum reduced, and that could not be done because of the petroleum interest in western Ontario in a grit constituency. If you go all over Canada you will find wherever there is an industry in the country the Grits there want it protected. A few months ago these Grits feared that there would be a general election, and wherever the leader of the opposition and his colleagues went they suited what they had to say to the wishes of the people of that province. Down in Nova Scotia they said nothing against the iron or the coal industry, but when in the west all those industries had to be destroyed. Down with us! It was the milling industry which was to come down, and we were to have cheap flour. Along the international line they should have reciprocity and down in Montreal they said they would not injure the manufacturing industries of the country at all. In every place they went they had an argument and policy to suit the locality. I am pointing this out to show they were not honest; they had no policy. They advocated reciprocity in one place, commercial union with the United States in another, and now they demand what they call free trade as it is understood in England. The position resembles that of two farmers, owning adjoining farms. We are asked to take down our fences and allow our neighbour's cattle to come in and eat up our pasture while we cannot send our cattle into their pasture. The opposition claim in effect that our industries must be destroyed and paralyzed whilst our neighbours keep up their high protection.

THE BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) rose to ask the government:

1st. If James Fitzsimmons was dismissed from the Deputy Wardenship of the British Columbia Penitentiary? If so, what was the date of his dismissal?

2nd. Has James Fitzsimmons been reappointed Deputy Warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary? If so, what was the date of his reappointment?

He said: It was my intention to follow up this by asking for a return of the instructions issued to the Royal Commission that sat last year to investigate the charges of irregularity and wrong doing on the part of the warden and deputy warden and other officers of the British Columbia Penitentiary, also for a copy of the evidence that was taken before that commission and the report to the government of the Hon. Judge

Drake, the commissioner, on the evidence taken, but since placing this notice on the order paper I see that the hon. gentleman who represents New Westminster District in the House of Commons, Mr. Corbould, has called for the very documents that I want. If they are brought down in the other House within a reasonable time I shall of course be saved the trouble of asking for them here, but I hope they will be brought down within a reasonable time and, when submitted, that they will be printed and not merely a type-written copy placed on the table. I want a copy of them to be put in the hands of every member of both Houses for the very good reason that it is an important question indeed, not only to the people of British Columbia but a question involving a principle which is of interest to the whole Dominion. It has given rise to a great deal of dissatisfaction in British Columbia, and if there is justification for that dissatisfaction, I think it is only right and proper that we should have the whole case before us, so that hon. gentlemen can weigh the evidence and judge for themselves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before answering this question, I desire to point out the very great inconvenience that must always arise from asking questions of this character and making speeches or drawing deductions from the answers which may be given, for the reason that the House is not in possession of the facts and consequently is not in a position to judge of the merits of the case properly. I am very glad that my hon. friend did not pursue the course that is very often followed, in discussing a subject merely upon a question placed on the notice paper. I do not criticise the correctness or incorrectness of the rule which prevails here. I know that it does exist in the House of Lords in England to some extent, and to a less extent in the House of Commons. I have sat in the gallery of that House and heard these questions put and discussed for hours. The Speaker, however, always keeps the discussion within the limits of the question asked, and does not allow the debate to drift into other questions. I do not think, however, it is a good plan; I like the course pursued in our own country best—simple questions and simple answers without any affirmation whatever of the correctness or incorrectness of the question asked. However, this is not the time to discuss that point—I merely call attention to what I think is a very objectionable course pursued frequently in the Senate. In answer to my hon. friend I am furnished with the following reply:—1. An investigation into the administration of affairs of the British Columbia Penitentiary was authorized by a Minute of His Excellency in Council on the 22nd May, 1894, and Mr. Justice Drake was thereupon authorized by commission to conduct such investigation. Mr. Fitzsimmons being concerned in some of the charges which led to the investigation, was, by direction of the late Minister of Justice, relieved of his duties pending the investigation. Afterwards, upon consideration of the evidence and the report of Mr. Justice Drake, Mr. Fitzsimmons was, by a Minute of His Excellency in Council of the 24th October last, retired from office without prejudice to consideration for re-employment in the penitentiary service. 2. Upon a further consideration of the evidence and report and the supplementary statements and explanations of Mr. Fitzsimmons, he was reinstated in his former office by Order in Council of the 25th March, 1895. I have no doubt that the papers to which the hon. gentleman has referred will be brought down and laid on the table of the House of Commons at a very early date. Whether they will be in type writing or in the hand writing of one of the clerks of the department, I cannot say. As the hon. gentleman knows, these papers when laid before the House of Commons are referred to the Printing Committee and the Printing Committee will decide whether they shall be printed or not.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called—

Resuming the further ajourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Seventh Parliament.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said: I must thank you for the indulgence you afforded me yesterday, when my voice and my health did not fairly justify me in addressing the House on this important matter. I regret also that I had not the proper papers before me by some mistake and was not able to follow the line of argument in consecutive order which I intended doing, and that, largely, what I did say came simply from memory. I also regret that I was led into this discussion on the National Policy. The House has had so much discussion on the National Policy year after year for the last fifteen or eighteen years, that really very little remains to be said upon the subject, and I regret that I did not confine myself, as some hon. gentlemen do, simply to a short commentary upon the various clauses of the address. But I was forced into the line I took chiefly by the leader of the opposition in this House, who started with the assertion that the National Policy was a dead failure, and based that assertion upon the lowering of the exports, upon the deficits and debt of the country. Now I consider that was rather a fallacious argument, and, therefore, I think proper to enter upon the subject. My hon. friend must be aware that that National Policy, adopted some fifteen years ago, has met with the approval of Canada in four or five general elections; it has been endorsed at every election, and the government of this country stands by that policy. That is their policy. It is the will of the people expressed through their electorate and though we may readjust it to meet the varying conditions of trade at home and abroad, it is the government's duty not to change it—the policy is clear. It is the raising of a revenue sufficient only to meet the exigencies of the country, to place it so that there will be raised no more than necessary for the ordinary needs of the government, and place it so that it will work in favour of protection to the industries of the country. My hon. friend talked about the failure of the National Policy, but I am at a loss to know how he can justify his remarks. When we look at the present condition of things, when we see now that our labouring classes are more largely employed, that wages are higher, and the necessaries of life but one-half of what they cost under the Liberal government from 1873 to 1878, I fail to see how he considers that policy a failure. Their policy was simply to raise revenue regardless of consequences, regardless of how it might affect the industries of the country. My hon. friend must remember that in 1876, a committee was appointed to inquire into the depressed and paralyzed condition of the industries of the country. On that committee sat as chairman the Minister of the Interior. Evidence was produced which showed clearly and unmistakably that the policy of the government was unsound, that the policy of the government was paralyzing the industries of the country. That even the products of our farmers were met by the products of the United States coming in and competing with them in our own market. It was called the jug-handled policy of the government. What did the government do? Did they do anything in the interests of the country? No, in order to raise the revenue, they went over the whole tariff and raised it indiscriminately 2½ per cent. The report of that committee showed a sad condition of things. The majority of that committee were supporters of the Liberal government and, after having carefully collected the evidence, they reported that in the year 1875 there were 1,391 failures. Fancy 1,391 failures in Canada, with losses aggregating $26,933,000. That was the condition of Canada under my hon. friend who now leads the opposition in this House, and my hon. friend it seems to me had a great deal of assurance, after the verdict of the country in condemning the policy of his party, and after seventeen years of our policy has proved, as I believe it has proved, that every branch of industry has been strengthened and developed, in coming here and making an assertion of that kind about the National Policy being a failure simply because last year there was a deficit and the national debt was the same and not increased. Now, I showed yesterday, although I had not the statistics before me, that our trade and commerce had not decreased; that the chief thing to depend upon was the exports of the country, our power to produce and to sell, and I showed them that we had never before arrived at so high a degree of prosperity. We had the largest exportation in 1893 that Canada ever had: such a large amount of the products of industry to export was marvellous, and it was last year that I showed that the products of the country equalled if they did not exceed what they had been in previous years. But simply in consequence of the paralyzed condition of trade in other countries our products did not bring the value they should have brought. It is not that the industries of the country have failed, nor that the government have failed, nor that their policy was wrong, but simply because the depression in trade and business in every country to which we exported was so great that the values fell, and consequently the value of our exports fell. I have here a statement covering the periods from 1888 to 1894, inclusive, which shows, year by year, the increase in the productive industry of the country and the total foreign trade of the country during that period. It is as follows:—Value of the total foreign trade of Canada for the years 1888 to 1894:

1889	.....	204,414,098
1890	.....	218,607,390
1891	.....	218,384,932
1892	.....	241,369,443
1893	.....	247,638,620
1894	.....	240,999,889

The decline last year is not in quantity but in prices. No such satisfactory showing can be made by Great Britain or the United States: in those countries it was not only in values but in volume.

Now let us take the exports for the same years:—

1888	.....$	90,203,000
1889	.....	89,189,167
1890	.....	96,749,149
1891	.....	98,417,296
1892	.....	113,963,375
1893	.....	118,593,352
1894	.....	117,524,949

This also shows that our exports are yearly increasing in quantity and value. Reckoning the lowest price of wheat and other products last year.

1888	Imports	$102,847,100	Duties	$22,209,641
1889	"	109,673,447	"	23,784,523
1890	"	112,765,584	"	24,014,908
1891	"	113,345,124	"	23,481,096
1892	"	116,978,943	"	20,550,581
1893	"	121,795,030	"	21,161,710
1894	"	113,093,983	"	19,375,822

The following table also shows the total value of exports from Nova Scotia in the year previous to Grit government rule, during the years under Grit free trade, and during the past five years:

1874	.....$	7,656,547
1875	.....	6,679,130
1876	.....	7,164,558
1877	.....	7,812,041
1878	.....$	7,500,783
1879	.....	7,364,324
1890	.....	9,468,409
1891	.....	9,925,646
1892	.....	10,982,509
1893	.....	10,634,863
1894	.....	10,713,440

Which is conclusive evidence of the extraordinary productive prosperity of Nova Scotia, despite depreciated values of our exports in foreign markets, the West Indian market for fish having dropped far below paying prices. If the tariff had not been reduced and values had remained as in 1893, we would have had a surplus last year of over $3,000,000, instead of a deficit of over $1,000,000, and it could be also clearly shown that customs duties per capita were no greater last year than they were during the time the Grit government was in power, in 1878.

Talking of the public debt of Canada, which is not materially increasing, four items alone of government expenditure amount to more than the debt by about $12,000,000—

Provincial debts assumed.	$110,000,000
Canadian Pacific Railway.	63,000,000
Intercolonial and branches.	45,000,000
Canals .....	39,000,000
	$257,000,000
Deduct net debt about	245,000,000
	$12,000,000

Besides providing annually for the interest and daily expenditures of the government service. Then, as regards the public debt, it has not increased to any appreciable extent; and what is our public debt composed of? The figures I have given show it. It is composed of four particular items and the expenditures on three services were really the whole amount of our national debt, and I will again read them to you. The provincial debt was first $110,000,000 as near as I can come at it. The government is not responsible for that debt. Then we have the Canadian Pacific Railway, $63,000,000; we have the Intercolonial and branches, $45,000,000 and Canals, $39,000,000, making $287,000,000 expended on those works. Were they not for the benefit of Canada, and is not Canada deriving the benefit of them? Is there any man in this House or in the country who would say that any one of those enterprises is not in the public interest and that we do not receive advantages from them more than their cost? Then, we deduct the public debt. The debt was about $245,000,000 and then we have a sum of $12,000,000 that those works cost more than the national debt of the country to-day. Therefore, I may say to my hon. friend, when he based that assertion that the depression and the failure of the National Policy, was owing to the debt of the country and the deficit and the falling off of exports, that he was not justified in making such a statement. I will now turn to my hon. friend from Marquette, and I regret that I do not see him in his place. I was very much surprised at the assertions he made, and the position he took here in the House. To me it was deplorable to find the hon. gentleman labouring under the delusion that we, by decreasing the tariff, would increase the revenue and increase the manufacturing industries of the country. It was novel to me; it was a position I thought that no person had ever taken in this House and a position which I could not see how he could attempt to justify. My hon. friend seems to think that we can do without any revenue at all—at least, that is the deduction that I draw from his remarks—that we could carry on the government in all its different branches without a revenue. The hon. gentleman must know that we have to make up $35,000,000 a year in order to carry on the ordinary expenses of the government. If the free trade principle which the opposition profess were to prevail, how could that revenue be raised? The opposition went to the people in 1891 on a policy of going into a commercial partnership with the United States and we know the result. The people rejected that policy and the hon. gentlemen are still in opposition. No wonder they are growing desperate and are taking up a policy which even in England itself is condemned by the masses of the people. When free trade was established, Cobden himself declared that, within ten years, every civilized country in the world would adopt free trade. The result has been the reverse—every country excepting England has a protective tariff and is competing with the English manufacturers in their own market, and competing with them successfully in every market throughout the world. There is a feeling in England that things cannot remain as they are—that there must be some change in the interest of labour and the industries of the country which will prevent them being swamped by foreign competition. When a change comes it must be in the direction of protecting the industries of their own country. My hon. friend from Shell River claimed that the manufacturers of this country were making enormous fortunes.

He took the census of 1891, and said that capital invested in manufacturing interests in Canada amounted to $354,000,000, that the wages paid out amounted to $100,000,000, and that the productions of that labour were $476,000,000, and he allowed as a fair return on the investments, 10 per cent. His contention is that the manufacturers are making $85,000,000 profit every year. I do not see how that can be. I should be glad to know that they are successful, but I do not think that in 1891 or at any time prior to that year, or subsequent to it, the manufacturers have been making any such profits. The hon. gentleman forgot, in making up his calculations, to include other expenditures which are incidental to every industry. He forgot to mention interest, insurance, agencies, deterioration of plant and, most important of all, the profit and loss account.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The gross fire insurance paid in the year was $5,000,000, while the taxes to which I have referred amount to $90,000,000. Even charging all the insurance to the manufacturing industries, it would leave an enormous margin still.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman has made up his figures as I have described, and he allowed 10 per cent as sufficient remuneration to those employed in those industries. I repeat I do not see where the profit is; I do not believe that the manufacturers in Canada have been so successful, and, as I stated, he must have left something out of the calculation. Everybody knows that the profit and loss account is large, that not all of the products of the factory are convertible into cash, and that there are many bad debts to be taken into account. Any one who has a technical knowledge of the subject can take up these figures and show that there is nothing in my hon. friend's contention, and if there has been a profit, it has not been large. The hon. gentleman made a special reference to the Massey Manufacturing Company. Now, I do not pretend to know much about agricultural implements, but I do know that we can get them as good and as cheap in Canada as in any other country in the world. There is a member of this House from the North-west Territories who can speak from personal knowledge of the subject, and he can tell the House that instead of the country being injured by the protection of the agricultural implement manufacturers, the country is generally benefited in having such an industry, and that no part of the Dominion benefits more by it than the North-west Territories. In Nova Scotia, I know we can get agricultural implements, made in this country, which are as cheap as any that are sold in the United States. After hearing the calculations of the hon. gentleman from Shell River, I would not consider him a safe man for the position of Finance Minister of Canada. His statements are not logical, nor do they show a practical knowledge of the subject which he has been discussing before the House. He thinks that the public service can be carried on without a revenue tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The ground I took is that if the country can bear a protective taxation of $90,000,000, in addition to the $20,000,000 of taxation for revenue purposes, if you remove the $90,000,000 taxation from the shoulders of the people they will be in a better position to contribute whatever revenue is necessary.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then my deduction from what the hon. gentleman says is correct—that he considers a revenue tariff unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You may put the tax on incomes.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is what I hoped to draw from my hon. friend. My hon. friend's free trade policy would put the burden on the labouring mass and on the farmers, would tax everything tangible, houses, lands and property, and would allow foreign manufactures and farm products to come in and make Canada a slaughter market without contributing anything to our revenue. The hon. gentleman would tax the land owner dead and alive—tax him eternally. That is his policy, and I am very glad to have drawn him out to make the admission. Free trade in Canada would mean throwing down our wall of protection and allowing everybody to come in and make this a slaughter market without paying anything whatever in the way of taxes, while our people would have to bear all the burden, and yet we have our exports taxed in all foreign countries. I tell the hon. gentleman that that policy will not go down in Canada. I have heard the subject discussed many a time, and the general impression is that the opposition are not in earnest in advocating free trade. Where would our industries be if we adopted free trade—where would our fisheries be?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They require no protection.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Our fishermen will know that such is the policy of the Grit party, that the bounties would be taken away from them, that their salt, lines, twines, would have no protection from taxes. The fishing industry has been worked up by the National Policy—by the bounties paid to the fishermen, and the only trouble with our fishermen to-day is that they cannot find foreign markets for their fish—they catch more fish than they can sell. My hon. friend would have this country inundated with the productions of the United States. Such a policy is not in the interests of Canada and whatever the Opposition may say or do, their free trade policy will be condemned in the next election. I am satisfied that the consensus of public opinion will be strongly in favour of the National Policy.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What about your shipping industry?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Our shipping industry is prosperous. The tonnage is increasing everywhere. In 1876 the tonnage of sea-going vessels entering and clearing in Canadian ports was less than 10,000,000 tons. Last year it had increased to 20,000,000 tons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman referred to the tonnage owned in Canada.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The coasting tonnage increased from 10,000,000 tons in 1877 to 26,000,000 tons last year. I have not the facts before me showing the tonnage of vessels owned in Canada, but I believe there is an increase. So far as the county of Lunenburg is concerned, our tonnage is increasing, but even if the figures show a decrease, it could easily be accounted for by the change in the carrying trade. Wooden ships are going out of use, and are being replaced by steamships, and one steamship can do five times as much as a sailing vessel of equal tonnage. At one time the harbour of Halifax was a forest of masts, but now the business is largely done by steamers.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the hon. gentleman will examine the government returns he will find that the average tonnage of vessels is just exactly one-half of what he says—that is new vessels built.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is because we are going out of wooden ships.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am including steam vessels.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We are keeping up with the progress of the country, and of the age in which we live. When the Opposition were in power, they were satisfied with sailing vessels, but we are a progressive people and have a progressive government, and we have adopted steamships chiefly for our foreign trade. If my hon. friend and his party were in power our trade would be done without steamers, as it used to be when they held office before. We used to ship our products to the West Indies entirely in schooners; that business since then has changed. I believe we will soon be building iron and steel vessels in Canada instead of having to get them from other countries. As we develop the iron industry, the facilities for manufacturing such vessels will increase.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Protect them by free trade.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know how we could protect them by free trade. It would give other countries the benefit of our markets and would not help our shipping industry. The result of a free trade policy would be that the vessels would be built and owned abroad, and would do our carrying trade, whatever little we would have to export. There has been an entire change in the business of the country, and we do not care whether wooden ships are employed or not: that is solely the business of shippers. The hon. gentleman makes a comparison between the period of wooden vessels and the present time as if we were still in the sailing period. The march of progress is so great, the enterprise of the people is so active, and the competition so keen, that we cannot any longer ship our products and trade to the market by sailing vessels. I think I have said enough on the trade policy. I believe the present policy is the true one for the development of the country. It has stood the test of seventeen years' experience, and will be sustained by the people at the next election. If the government in every way do their duty there will not be a change of administration on the ground of their national policy. To free trade as in England, our people are opposed.

There is one part of my hon. friend's speech to which I must refer, but I did not wish to go back to the school question of Manitoba. It is generally admitted that every citizen should feel safe in all his rights and religious liberties as guaranteed him under the constitution of his country. He admitted that the school system of 1870 should in some way be restored. The Roman Catholics should not be obliged to contribute to the public schools. My hon. friend stated that here, and I am very glad that he made that admission. He in effect admits the injustice, but what would he do? He would make compensation. He would ask the Dominion Government to make compensation and, it seems to me, it is want of foresight and want of acumen to say that the Dominion Government should support the Roman Catholic schools of Manitoba by means of the Dominion lands of this country. How are you going to convert the Dominion lands into money? I do not believe that the Dominion lands, valuable as they are for settlement, should be converted into a school fund, and to ask this government to surrender that estate which we have in lands for certain denominational schools in Manitoba, is to me a suggestion which cannot be justified. I see no reason or justification for saying that the Protestants should have to bear all the taxation of that country and that the Roman Catholic should be granted this land. I do not see how you are going to convert the land into cash.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Because you do not live there.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But my hon. friend lives there, and yet be failed to show us the way to do so. They would not probably be of any value to them and it would be bad policy for a government, when a province has acted in the way Manitoba has done towards a large element of the community, to say that we should relieve them of the duties that devolve upon them under the constitution, and that we should compensate and make up for the wrongs the local authorities have done. That would be most unreasonable and improper, and I do not think the government should undertake anything of the kind. I perfectly agree with all the statements in the address. I only hope that our present premier may adopt the same policy as his predecessor, and will follow in his footsteps and be guided by his principles, that he may in the same way rise, step by step, until he becomes the equal of his predecessor. Our late premier ascended, step by step, until he reached the highest pinnacle to which a statesman of Canada can advance. I very much regret the loss of our great leader here and I cannot help sighing for the "touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." I feel sadly the loss of our late and lamented premier and I hope that his successor will have in the same degree the confidence of the people which he possessed.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Four days have been devoted already to the discussion of the address in answer to the speech from the Throne, and perhaps it should not be protracted longer. But I ask the permission of the House to add a few remarks to what has already been said. Some of the previous speeches made by hon. gentlemen did not allow me to remain silent. I refer to some remarks of my hon. friend in connection with the school question. But, before taking up that subject, I desire to refer briefly to the lamented death of our late premier. The sad occurrence has elicited from all the previous speakers forcible expressions of the deepest sorrow for his tragic and premature departure and eloquent eulogies of the statesman now at rest. I most sincerely join in these expressions of sorrow and eulogies. I desire also to put on record my regret at the death of the late Hon. Mr. Tassé, who was an ornament to this House, to politics and to literature. In mentioning the death of our late premier, I should not forget to congratulate our new premier on his accession to power, and on the well earned honours which Her Majesty has been pleased to confer upon him. I also congratulate the hon. member from Prince Edward Island on his preferment to the position of cabinet minister.

I now come to the question which is the principal object of these remarks. It has been my intention from the first to give it some consideration, but contrary to what might have been your expectation, my reference to that subject was to have been very brief. On the reception of the Order in Council, the Manitoba Legislature adjourned till May 9th, with a declaration on the part of the government that the delay was for the purpose of taking into consideration the warning they had received. It seemed to me that, under the circumstances, the best thing to do was to leave that matter at rest for the moment, so as to give the provincial authorities full and undisturbed opportunity to make up their mind. That was a kind of truce which I was quite disposed to observe and maintain. I quite realize the gravity of the situation; the question requires grave and calm consideration. No one is more impressed than I am with the responsibility that may fall upon us within a short period; no one is more desirous than I am to see this vexed question taken away from the political arena. My intention was simply to do what I feel to be a duty on my part, that is, to declare and express the complete satisfaction which the Order in Council has given to the minority, and to join in the hope so earnestly expressed by the mover and the seconder of the address, as well as by the hon. leader of the government, that the provincial authorities will at last come to their senses and will loyally and patriotically retrace their steps and do what is right. To that only were my remarks to be confined had not my hon. friend from Marquette entirely changed my mind by his own remarks on the same subject. I must confess that these remarks took me completely by surprise. I have always been one of the most attentive and patient listeners to the hon. gentleman and, though having serious doubts as to the advisability of realizing his commercial conceptions, still I could not help admiring his faith and his industrious and elaborate eloquence. Although he did not depart, I must admit, from his customary gentlemanly way of propounding his doctrines (I heard some one say his fads) he has gone so far astray in this instance, and has forgotten his usual fairness to such an extent, that I am afraid he will have to make very great efforts to convince me on any other matters in future. It may be advisable to state, at the outset, that the minority in Manitoba never had, nor has it at present, any desire to interfere with the school legislation of the province in so far as non-Catholics are concerned. We never asked for any such interference. Let them have if they like what they call, very improperly, national schools. Different interpretations have been placed upon the Order in Council—some have said that it was mandatory, others that it was the very opposite. I confess I have not much concern as to these different interpretations. The Order in Council, to my mind, speaks for itself. I am sure there is no one in this Dominion having any doubt as to its effect. It is the fair warning required by the constitution to the provincial authorities of Manitoba that if they refuse or simply neglect to remove by proper legislation the grievances of the minority, this Parliament will be empowered to do what Manitoba should have done. Their inaction will have given jurisdiction to this Parliament according to the provisions of the constitution. The whole case is now in the hands of Manitoba and if at any future time this Parliament is called upon to legislate for that province in the matter of education the fault will lie with the province and not with the federal government or with this Parliament. Such legislation by Parliament will not be an encroachment upon the rights of the province. From the beginning of confederation it was contemplated that the minority should be protected. Sir Etienne Taché, who was president of the conference in Quebec in 1864, and who was afterwards premier of Canada spoke in this way—being premier of Canada he had authority to speak for the government and to declare the policy of that government and the meaning of its legislation. He said:

If the lower branch, of the legislature were insensate enough and wicked enough to commit some flagrant act of injustice (I desire to remark here that Sir E. Taché does not limit his declaration to acts within the constitution, he speaks of any act of injustice). If the lower branch of the legislature were insensate enough and wicked enough to commit some flagrant act of injustice against the English Protestant portion of the community, they would be checked by the general government. But the hon. gentleman argues that that would raise an issue between the local and the general governments.

We must not, however, forget that the general government is composed of representatives from all portions of the country—that they would not be likely to commit an unjust act—and that if they did so, they would be met by such a storm of opposition as would sweep them out of their places in a very short time. (Conf. Deb., pp. 236-7.)

Of course these remarks applied to the Protestant schools then, but it is obvious that they must apply also to a Catholic minority, when in any province it happens that the Catholics are in the minority.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that the judgment of the Privy Council said that the British North America Act, section 93, subsection 3, relating to education, did not apply to this case.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I am sorry to say that I do not think that the interruption of the hon. gentleman applies in this case either, because I am speaking of the general principle which lies at the root of the Confederation Act—its fundamental principle in fact.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Does the hon. gentleman from Shell River refer to the last judgment?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The British North America Act, which created the confederation you speak of, does not apply to the Manitoba case.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It does apply by induction, because by an Imperial statute all the clauses of the Confederation Act which were not inconsistent with the Manitoba Act, were made to apply to Manitoba. I desire to call attention to one of the remarks made by Sir Etienne Taché. You will observe that he says:—

If the lower branch of the legislature were insensate enough and wicked enough to do some flagrant act of injustice.

He does not speak of any constitutional or unconstitutional act. The ground for appeal in all these matters is not really the fact of the Act being constitutional or unconstitutional. It is injustice that opens the door to appeal. We are continually being told, and it is being represented to the people of the Dominion at large that we are always asking for something new and for additional privileges. Now I wish to demonstrate that the first to require that protection for the minority should be provided for in the constitution were the Protestant people. By the exertions of English Protestants the protection of the minority by the Federal Parliament has become a fundamental principle of the constitution. Without it confederation would never have existed. Sir John Rose and Sir A. T. Galt were in the front rank of those who exacted that principle and who declared that without it the Protestant people would not accede to the proposed new regime. I quote from the speech of Sir John Rose:

Looking at the scheme from the standpoint of an English Protestant in Lower Canada, let me see whether the interests of those of my own race and religion in that section are safely and properly guarded. There are certain points upon which they feel the greatest interest, and with regard to which it is but proper that they should be assured that there are sufficient safe-guards provided for their preservation. Upon these points I desire to put some questions to the government.

He states his questions on the first point and then he goes on:

The second is, whether such safe-guards will be provided for the educational system of the minority in Lower Canada as will be satisfactory to them. Upon these points some apprehensions seem to exist in the minds of the English minority in Lower Canada.

I also quote an utterance made by Sir A. T. Galt:

It must be clear that a measure would not be favourably entertained by the minority in Lower Canada which would place the education of the children and the provision for their schools wholly in the hands of a majority of a different faith. It was clear that in confiding the general subject of education to the local legislature it was absolutely necessary that it should be accompanied by such restrictions as would prevent injustice in any respect from being done. Now, this applied to Lower Canada but it also applied and with equal force to Upper Canada and the other provinces, for in Lower Canada there was a Protestant minority, and in the other provinces a Roman Catholic minority. The same privileges belong to the one of right here as belonged to the other of right elsewhere. There could be no greater injustice to a population, than to compel them to have their children educated in a manner contrary to their own religious belief.

It is well known that the requirements as to legislation which were sought for by the English Protestants for their protection were acceded to. Now the province of Quebec is in one respect in the same position as Manitoba. Indeed all the provinces are on the same footing, and it is an erroneous statement to say that Manitoba is receiving exceptional treatment. If any other province were to try to do as Manitoba has done it would receive the same treatment. Take Nova Scotia for instance. At the time that confederation came into existence there was no law providing for a separate school system in that province. Consequently the minority could not under the constitution come here and appeal against the existing law. Suppose, however, that Nova Scotia were to establish by law such a system of schools. The minority would thereby acquire rights and privileges which could not afterwards be injuriously affected by subsequent legislation. If their rights were so affected the minority would have a right to appeal, and the province of Nova Scotia would have to abide by the results. On this point I will quote subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, which is my authority :

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council, from any Act or decision of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

I claim that if at the present day Nova Scotia were to pass an act establishing separate schools, the rights acquired by the minority under that law could not be taken away from them without giving them a right of appeal to this government and afterwards to this Parliament. The position of the province of Manitoba to-day is just the same as the position of Nova Scotia would be in that case, because the judgment under which they are seeking redress is based upon legislation by the province since confederation. The same principles pervade the federal and local charters, and I hold that Manitoba ought not to be relieved from the application of these general principles. Why should not the Catholics of Manitoba be accorded the protection that the English Protestants in other portions of the Dominion demanded to be made a clause of the compact under which they entered confederation? It may be very well to say in a superficial way, that the majority does not want to be fettered by any restriction nor to see its rights encroached upon. Any one who makes himself familiar with the circumstances of the case and gives to the subject his honest and earnest consideration, will admit that nothing of the kind is intended. There is no wish to place restrictions or fetters upon the majority, there is no proposition to preclude that majority from continuing to have their own schools conducted in such manner and under such laws and regulations as they desire.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman permit me to interrupt him once more. The objection we have out west, where I reside, to the separate school system is, that we have in the one district a separate school containing say, 20 Roman Catholic children, and another district containing 20 Protestant children. Thus we have two poor schools instead of one good one. We want to have a good school and we can only have that by having a united school.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That is a very small matter—a matter of detail which certainly cannot be taken in opposition to the general principles that we are seeking to have applied to the province. The majority in Manitoba have had their own schools in the past without interference on the part of the minority or anybody else. They have them at present, and there is no intention to interfere with them in the future. The only thing that is desired by the minority is to be treated in the same way, and have their schools conducted according to the dictates of their own consciences, just as the majority have. That right the minority had before 1890, and the recent judgment of the Privy Council declares that it was wrong to dispossess them of that right, that this grievance should be remedied, and Her Majesty acting on the advice of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has ordered that "the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular, whereof the Governor General of Canada, for the time being, and any other person who may be concerned, have to take notice and govern themselves accordingly." On that judgment the government of Canada has notified the provincial authorities in Manitoba to govern themselves according to the command of Her Majesty, and that in default they would have to conform themselves to the constitution and propose such remedial legislation as the circumstances may require. It might not be useless to remark that the government has been acting and that Parliament will be called to act, not under any power that may be conferred on them by the general Confederation Act but by the Manitoba Act, by the charter of the province itself. Surely it cannot be said that the federal government or the Parliament of Canada are invading any provincial rights when they are acting by virtue of the powers contained in the local charter and on a specific subject, and in default of the provincial authorities acting as provided by such local charter. That theory of provincial rights which is so largely propounded in this case, is not tenable and would drive us to the worst results if it were carried to its logical consequences. Let us consider the matter for a moment. A verdict has been rendered in this case by the Privy Council. That verdict is that the minority have rights, that the legislation of 1890 has caused them a serious grievance, that we have a right to complain, that we have done it in proper form, and that the grievance should be remedied. If we are right, then, hon. gentlemen, the others are wrong. There cannot be an escape from that proposition, and if they are wrong their rights are not invaded by the redress of their wrong. It should not be sought to take advantage of the theory of provincial rights to cover and maintain provincial wrongs. Everybody should feel that the only duty we have to perform is to loyally submit to the findings of the Privy Council and to the commands of Her Majesty, thereby restoring peace and harmony where they prevailed before, restoring a condition which should never have been altered. I say more, not only restoring peace but taking away one of the drawbacks from which our province, has suffered even materially. A good deal of discussion is going on at present about the depression of affairs, and the tariff is said by some to be one of the causes of that depression. I have nothing to say at present on that subject, but I will say this, that in Manitoba one of the principal causes of the slow progress that has been made is the agitation to which we have been subjected almost permanently for one cause or another. At a distance it seems as if we ever were almost on the eve of a civil war, and the consequence is that emigrants are deterred from coming into the province. For the sake of our welfare, for the sake of the rapid development of our immense territories, let us cool down, let us put together our intellectual and physical forces and let us work up our national resources in a spirit of generosity and citizenship, in a spirit of charity, and like good Christians and true Canadians. I must also give some consideration to another part of the subject. I refer to the standard of our schools, although the hon. gentleman did not refer to the subject. I must enter here my strong protest against the allegation that our schools are inferior to the other schools. It is a very delicate subject to deal with. Comparisons are very often offensive. As a rule we abstain from any research into the schools of non-Catholics, because we consider it is not our province to criticise those schools and we are not concerned about them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if he will allow me, if any school that complies with the conditions of the law fails to get the grant both from the municipality and the government.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—You mean the present law?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—If my hon. friend will wait for a moment, I will come to that subject and I will explain all that. I was saying that at times, if we indulge in comparisons between the non-Catholic schools and ours, it is not with a view of finding fault, but to find whether ours could not be improved, because, whatever may be said to the contrary, it is our aim to have as good teachers and as good schools as possible. In any community there are drawbacks, and we have our share of them, we humbly admit; but that is no good reason for passing a general condemnation on everything that belongs to us. Whilst we are doing our best to advance in every situation of life, it appears that our opponents are doing all they can to discountenance our efforts. They have been making some inquiries as to the working of our schools, but they have been precluded by their prejudices from making those inquiries perfect, or to see things as they are. By force of circumstances, the majority of our schools are generally conducted in the French language, although the English language is also generally taught, which teaching, by the way, gives to our school a superiority over the others in that branch, and increases the number of subjects taught, leaving consequently less time for some other subjects. Now, how can a man who does not visit a school and who does not know the language of the children, be a good judge of that school? Most certainly, he cannot be, and I dare say that almost all those who take upon themselves to criticise the Manitoba Catholic schools, are in that position; consequently their testimony is not worth consideration. But I will go further and put before you as good evidence as can be had that our schools were as efficient as the circumstances of the province could allow. First take our programme; that programme contains 15 clauses and the subjects to be taught according to that programme are these:—Religious instruction in the child's language; reading, spelling, grammar, analysis and composition, these four subjects in French and English; penmanship, drawing, arithmetic, mensuration, and algebra; book-keeping, single and double entry; geography, all parts of the world; sacred history, history of Canada, England and France; good behaviour, etc., useful knowledge, chemistry, agriculture and astronomy. For the girls, domestic economy, sewing embroidery, etc. Now, I contend that this programme is as comprehensive as it should be for a primary school. It must not be forgotten that the aim of an ordinary primary school is not to make scientists. It is to give a good start for the higher studies for those whose circumstances will permit them to make such a study, and for others a sufficient knowledge to hold their own in the humble condition in which God has placed them. The programme which I have just read to you fulfils the condition. To increase in that programme would be cramming, and would tend more to injure the health and intelligence of the child than to do him good. At times some chances are given when a kind of test may be made as between the various schools: exhibitions, for instance, and opinions from people who, by their position and previous relations, may be said to be good judges. It has been the privilege of our schools to be submitted to such tests, and here are the results. At the first school exhibition at Portage la Prairie, in our own province, we had an exhibition where the Protestants and the Catholics exhibited side by side the work of their pupils, and general school work. Our schools were then awarded a diploma for general excellence. Some years afterwards we were invited to take part in the London Colonial Exhibition; and we sent there, though very reluctantly, as the notice appeared too short, exhibits from eleven schools. Nine were awarded the diploma, and the Catholic superintendent was also in receipt of one of those diplomas. The Protestant schools may also have received some, but I must say that I have never heard that they did. And now, if we go to the grand Chicago Fair, there also the Catholic schools, their methods, their teachers and their exhibits were declared to be of a superior order by friends and foes, by experts and visitors of distinction, and finally by the judges. However, it may be said that it was not the Catholic schools of Manitoba but the Catholic schools of Quebec which exhibited, but as the accusation of inferiority bears not only on the Manitoba schools but generally on the Catholic schools, it is quite proper to refer to the result of the Chicago exhibition as offering a sure evidence of the adequacy of our system, and of the Catholic schools everywhere, and unless these exhibition tests are ignored—and if they be ignored what is the use of having them—unless these exhibition tests are set aside it must be considered that they entirely destroy that accusation of inferiority. So much for the exhibition. Let us take some of the testimonials that were sent to us by persons in a position to know. On the occasion of the Colonial exhibition at London, we had correspondence from which I quote. I will first read a letter from Captain William Clarke who took part in the repression of the rebellion in the North-west in 1885:—

LONDON, 27th July, 1886.

DEAR SIR,—I can speak with experience with reference to the excellence of your section, two of my daughters having been for a long time with the good sisters of St. Boniface, where their progress was as satisfactory to me as it was pleasant to them.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM CLARKE.

That letter was addressed to me as superintendent of education. Mr. Clarke was not a Roman Catholic, but was a very decided Protestant. Sir Charles Tupper was not a Catholic either, yet he wrote this letter:

COLONIAL AND INDIAN EXHIBITION, 1886, CANADIAN SECTION,
LONDON, 29th July, 1886.

TO T. A. BERNIER, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR,—I duly received your letter of the 3rd inst., and thank you for the memorandum which you have prepared on behalf of your section of the Manitoba educational exhibit. I shall be pleased to receive a thousand copies of the memorandum and to see that they are carefully distributed. The exhibit which you have taken such pains to collect has already attracted considerable attention, and I do not doubt it will add to the success of the Dominion at the exhibition.

I remain yours faithfully,

CHARLES TUPPER.

I take the following extract from the Canadian Gazette of London, published on the 4th November, 1886 :

It is generally believed that of all the sister provinces, that of Manitoba is the least advanced towards civilization. We already know that in many respects such is not the case, but if we consider the excellent scholastic exhibition of that province, we see in what degree that impression is erroneous, especially in the matter of education.

The collection contains samples of books, exercises, scholastic material, &c., coming from the Catholic schools as well as from the Protestant schools of the province.

The excellence of the work, and especially of the geographical charts, is incontestible. This is the more pleasing, if we consider the fact that many exhibits are dated from the year 1884, and the beginning of the year 1885. It is evident the exhibit is composed of the ordinary duties of the schools in all parts of the province, and not of work specially prepared for the occasion.

No pretension has been made to eclipse the school exhibits of the other provinces, but the collection that is under our eyes denotes that in one of the most recently organized provinces of the confederation, there exists a school system which, although respecting the faith and religious convictions of the population, offers to every one an education capable of fitting for the highest rank in society, the child who is placed under its care.

This refers more especially to the Roman Catholic schools. That is evident from the fact that some of the sentences in that passage are almost word for word taken from the memorandum which I had prepared to accompany the exhibits of the Roman Catholic schools to London. Now let us see whether we could not arrive at the same conclusion by the results of common examination. There was no such common examination in the primary schools, but there were and there are still common examinations in higher branches at the University of Manitoba. I may say that we have a university the institution of which is unique in the Dominion, I believe. It is a federation of colleges, including institutions of all denominations. We have four examinations, the preliminary, the previous, the Junior B. A. and the Senior. In the Junior B. A. and the Senior B. A. the students generally branch off, some graduating in mathematics, some in natural science, some in classics, some in mental and in moral philosophy, but at the preliminary and previous examinations the students of all the colleges come into contact and pass a common examination. The papers are corrected by professors of the various colleges. At those examinations the students of the Catholic college of St. Boniface have always had their full share of honours, prizes and scholarships, and sometimes more than their proportionate share. The argument that I draw from this is that in education every thing is connected and the last result is generally an indication of what the beginnings were. The students of the St. Boniface college begin their studies and make their preparations in our primary schools, and, if these schools did not do proper work, those students would not be able in after years to post themselves sufficiently in the higher subjects to compete with the students of the other colleges. The fact that they do compete and take their full share of awards is a test of our primary schools, and one that is in our favour. Of course, the remarks are not in answer to the hon. gentleman, because he did not touch that subject. Now as to the other contention of the hon. gentleman—that the agreement of 1870 could not be binding on the present population, I wish to say a few words. To begin with, is there not some inconsistency in the contention of the hon. gentleman? He says first that there is a part of the province which is entitled to a remedy; he admits thereby that the agreement holds good for a part of the province, but in the next breath he argues that the agreement could not have the effect of binding the population for all time to come. Surely there is a contradiction in these two propositions. Let me take first his contention that the agreement entered into by the province of Manitoba must apply only within the limits of the original province. That is a proposition which bears its own refutation. By legislation on the part of both of the federal parliament and of the provincial legislature, the same rights and privileges which the population of Manitoba, irrespective of creed or origin, had then have been extended to the added territory. That legislation could not in fact impose on that new portion any other rights or privileges. Those rights were extended in the same proportion, to the same extent, in the same shape and form, and with the same meaning which they had in the original province. All the legislative authorities possessing jurisdiction over that territory have declared that the added territory should enjoy the same rights and privileges as the original province. How then can it be contended that they come under a different rule? It would be as reasonable to contend that the territory itself was not added. The provincial legislature extended the educational acts then in force in the original province, to the added territory and having been once applied to the added territory I do not see how those rights can now be declared not to apply to it. The hon. gentleman says that the agreement is not binding for all time to come because when the original right was granted there were only 12,000 people in the Selkirk settlement, whilst that population has since increased to about 200,000 people. If that increase of population is a reason to set aside the original agreement, it is also a reason to set aside that agreement for the older part of the province where the population has also increased.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What I said was that the rights of the minority were confined to the Selkirk settlement, but the right is only a right to appeal—that when that appeal comes before Parliament there is a constitutional right on the part of Parliament to change their policy in any direction that they see fit.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—This Parliament has no right to change the constitution of Manitoba; only the Imperial Parliament can do that. The hon. gentleman said substantially that an agreement made by some 12,000 people could not be binding for all time to come on a population largely increased coming into the province afterwards. The answer to that is that it is binding until it is cancelled in a regular and constitutional way. It is like a man who has given his note and is bound by his signature. Afterwards his heirs are bound by the note until they are legally released. There is, in legal parlance, an expression which is used to describe an unpaid note; we say that the note has been dishonoured. In this case until the constitution is changed the agreement stands, and what Manitoba has been doing for the past five years, is to put herself in the position of a man who allows his note to be dishonoured. It was with sentiments of national pride that I heard the other day the hon. leader of the government declare that the signature of our sovereign should not be dishonoured. As a matter of fact that agreement was made with the whole population of Canada. It was made by the 12,000 people that were there on the one part, and the Dominion at large on the other part, and the witness to that agreement was Her Majesty herself, for it was sealed with the great seal of the empire.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And what was that agreement?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The agreement was that the rights and privileges of the minority should always be respected, which has not been done during the past five years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In what district?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—In all the province.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What was the size of the province?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I cannot give the number of square miles, but it does not appear to me that the size of the province has much to do with the rights of the people.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is an Act of 1884 extending the limits of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I presume the hon. gentlemen from Shell River refers to that extension of the boundaries of the province. By an Act of Parliament the institutions of the province of Manitoba have been extended to the whole of that province including the added territory and afterward the provincial legislature itself extended all its legislation in all its various purports, including the educational acts then in force, to the added territory. The inhabitants of the added territory thus were endowed with all the privileges and rights in every shape and form and in all their bearings which were enjoyed by the remainder of the province. That is declared by the Parliament of Canada and by the province itself, yet, some 20 years afterwards there are some who say that the minority in the newer portion of the province do not enjoy the privileges that were conferred upon the original province. We have legislation which expressly extends to the added territory the constitution and the laws of the original province and yet afterwards the hon. gentlemen comes and says that they do not apply.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Would the hon. gentleman take the ground that the Parliament that extended the boundaries of the province of Manitoba and included the added territory within its limits has no power to repeal its legislation if it sees fit?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As to that I do not think it has, seeing that all this legislation has been ratified by the Imperial Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not as to the extension. The Imperial Parliament has nothing to do with the extension.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—If the Imperial Parliament has nothing to do with the extension, it may be right to say that this Parliament would have the right to repeal what it has done. That is a general principle. There may be some clause in the constitution which would have the effect of preventing that; at present I am not prepared to answer the question fully. The general principle, however, is that the power which makes a law has also the power to repeal it unless some restriction is expressly placed upon that law which is the case with regard to educational matters in the province of Manitoba. Now, let us for a moment take the ground of the hon. gentleman that the Manitoba Act or the agreement of which the Manitoba Act was the result, does not apply to the added territory. Then surely there must be some law which does apply to that territory. What is that law? It is the Confederation Act, that and no other act can apply. In what position are we then? We certainly are in a better position: that is to say, the Catholics of the added territory are in a better position if we adopt the ground of the hon. gentleman than those of the old Selkirk settlement. The province of Manitoba has, by its own legislation extended to that new territory the application of the statutes in respect of matters of education. That means that they had given them the same rights and privileges that the older portion of the province enjoys. In either case there is undoubted right of appeal from any injustice subsequently done by the local government to this Parliament. It is only because rights and privileges have been affected that the way is open for an appeal. That is decided by the judgment of the Imperial Privy Council from which I quote as follows:

So the question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer.

For that added territory we have the post-union legislation of the province, which legislation gives rights and privileges to the minority; and you also have here a judgment of the Privy Council which declares that these rights and privileges have been affected by the Act of 1890, thus giving a clear right of appeal to the Governor in Council and to this Parliament, under the third subsection of the 93rd section of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

The Manitoba legislature having established in the added territory, after its union with confederation and with the province of Manitoba, a system of separate schools, it follows that this section, should the contention of my honourable friend be right, would be applicable to that added territory, and would give a right of appeal to the Catholics living there, in view of the recent judgment of the Privy Council. Therefore I hold that the contention of the hon. gentleman as to that portion of territory is not tenable at all. If it were, it would go against him. I now return to the hon. gentleman's statements with regard to the agreement which was made by the then population of the province, as not being binding upon the present population. As a matter of fact that agreement was made not only with the 12,000 people who were there at the time but with them, their heirs and successors, as all agreements are made. I would just like to put a practical question which, it seems to me, is a very pertinent one in this connection. How could the agreement have been made with the 12,000 people only and for their sole benefit and not for the benefit of those who were to come after them? The Roman Catholic population of the province at that time had no need of the protection which was provided, for they were not in the minority. They were actually in a small majority. It was the Protestants who were in the minority—not so small a minority that any other section of the population could encroach upon their rights however. I say, then, that the population of the country as it existed at that time had no need on either side of any such protection and it is therefore evident that the agreement was made for a future time and for those who should go to settle in the province thereafter. It was made with the view of getting rid for all time to come of this vexed question. There is another side to this agreement also. Those who do not share our views in the matter of education knew before settling in the province what the law was and that this agreement was in existence, and they must have made up their minds to accept that condition of things. As for those who like myself believe in the system of schools in existence for twenty years in the province of Manitoba without friction, and which leaves to the parents the legitimate control of the education of their children, we went up there believing that such a system was to remain in force. Both the federal and the local governments have repeatedly invited the inhabitants of the eastern provinces of Canada to go and settle there and help in the building up of the province and in the development of the resources of that part of the Dominion; and under the promises made to us in that respect, under the faith of the constitution as it stood we went and settled around Fort Garry; we induced others to go and one of the inducements was just that feature of the constitution. That agreement stands for all time, that Catholic schools shall be protected, and the largest part of the Catholics who are now settled in the province have gone there relying upon the assurance that that protection would always be extended to them. I might declare here that I, myself, would not have gone there if I had been informed that sooner or later that feature of the constitution would be altered. Had I been informed, that after 10, or 15, or 20 years, the rights which were understood then by everybody to be of a permanent character would be disregarded, had I been informed that instead of the protection to which the minority is entitled, the majority would take upon themselves to change at their will, and at any time, the condition of things, even if it were manifestly unjust, and throw upon me the extra charges of maintaining schools which are of no avail to me—had I been informed of all that, I would never have dreamed of leaving my native province to go and settle in that western territory. I would never have induced anybody to follow my example, and to-day it is a startling discovery to be told that one of the principal features of the constitution was merely a trap which the majority could make use of one day or other to crush down a minority who had loyally trusted themselves to the generosity of their fellow citizens for the enjoyment of what they considered the most sacred right, that of educating their beloved children according to their own views. True, the circumstances are altered. At the time of the union we were in a majority, and we had at the time no idea of preventing our fellow citizens from having the kind of schools they liked, and now we are the minority. Instead of 12,000 people we have to-day about 200,000, but if circumstances are changed there is something that has not changed, it is the duty and the natural right of the parents to give an education of their choice to their children and to control that education. Whether a minority or a majority, the child is always the child, the parents are always the parents and their rights with reference to their children are always the same. Those rights are recognized by the constitution, and that constitutional agreement is binding upon the province and the Dominion to-day as it was in 1870. As a matter of fact, the agreement has been entered into not only with those who made the original bargain but with all those, who, relying on the recognized permanent character of the same, went up there since and have made Manitoba or the North-west their adopted home. Further, that agreement has been ratified and entered into again and again by the province itself. The province has ratified that agreement each time that it has legislated in the matter of education without changing the principles upon which it was based, and such legislation the legislature of the province has passed almost every year for 20 years. In consequence of that yearly ratification for so long a period, it can be said that the agreement is not alone the act of that 12,000 people referred to, but also the act of the increased population. The hon. gentleman from Marquette has laid a good deal of stress upon the fact that we are in a small minority, and he has taken a good deal of trouble in quoting figures to prove the fact.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In the west.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Well, we admit we are in a minority in the whole province. The hon. gentleman having so established that we are in the minority he has argued from that fact that such minority should not be allowed to have anything to say in the matter.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You have got your constitutional privilege the same as I have.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—But the Privy Council has declared that we are the parties having rights and privileges in this matter. The others having done wrong, you cannot speak of their rights; they have no rights but they have wrongs to talk about. I ask pardon for the expression I am about to use, but there is about this contention a breeze of impertinence that I did not expect on the part of the hon. gentleman, on the fairness of whom I had always relied. We surely do not deny that we are in a small minority, but we resent the idea that because we are in a small minority, because we are weak, no attention is to be paid to our interests or our feelings. The law was passed in anticipation that there would be a minority. It was passed for the protection of that minority. The majority does not need such constitutional protection. It can take care of itself. Here is a law made, here is an agreement entered into, just in anticipation that in after years there might be a discrepancy in the numerical strength of the various elements that were to compose the population of the province. That law was made so as to give comfort and protection to the minority against the possible encroachments of the majority. That is the object of the law, but now the majority come and say, "Oh, you are a minority of no importance, we will do just as it pleases us, and you will have nothing to say. The majority rules. True, there is an agreement. True, there is a constitution construed in favour of the minority by the decision of the Privy Council, but all that does not amount to anything, you are the minority, and we are the majority, and we need not trouble ourselves for all that." Does it not seem, rather, that the smaller the minority the more appropriate is the law, the smaller the minority the more cogent is the law, the more necessity of it must appear, the greater is the obligation of adhering strictly to the constitution? The smaller the minority, the more should the majority show their generosity in allowing their fellow-citizens to enjoy the rights which they had been told by that very majority they would have for all time to come. I am sure that the doctrine would not be applied to the minority of the province of Quebec. I am at present referring to something existing in the province of Quebec, which I think is an instance that presents about the same feature as our privileges in the west. Apart from the protection that every Protestant in Quebec demanded at the time of confederation, they required some further protection. They asked that a certain number of counties be reserved for them, and that those counties should not be changed only under certain circumstances. The majority in those counties were English Protestants. There are thirteen counties in that position. Since that, however, the complexion of the majority has changed, and the population has also increased. Should now that increase in population be a good reason to do away with the protection that was then promised—to do away with the agreement that was entered into by the province of Quebec, that was entered into in connection with all these thirteen counties? I do not think that such a contention could be sustained.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Could the Dominion government interfere in that?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS.—It could only be done by Imperial Act.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There is something astounding about the doctrine of the hon. gentleman. True, he says, there was an agreement and that agreement has been embodied in the constitution. That agreement has been relied upon by a large section of the people, that agreement has been ratified by the province itself at various times, that agreement bears the seal of Her Majesty, but nevertheless he proclaims that because the majority is no more pleased with it, its binding feature is gone. Where should we go with such a doctrine as that? If the majority have a right to get rid of any institution that displeases them without any regard to the existing agreement and the existing laws, then there is no more law, and no security in the land. Why should not the province of Manitoba declare tomorrow that the public lands, for instance, which were vested in the Dominion government by the same agreement, should be no more Dominion lands but provincial lands? If they have a right to ignore the agreement made with respect to education, they have the same right to ignore any other part of the agreement because it was entered into upon the same occasion, upon the same date, between the same parties, between the same 12,000 people and the Dominion. Where, in that doctrine, is the guarantee for all the provinces, for the Dominion, for future generations, in British North America? We are about to take into consideration the advisability of admitting another province into the union. Negotiations to that effect are pending between the Dominion and Newfoundland. What guarantee can we offer to Newfoundland that the terms on which it will be admitted will be in the future respected, if we proclaim that all agreements can be violated without any regard to the form of law, without regard to the constitutional way of realizing any reform that is deemed proper, but on the sole whim of a majority and only because it is the will of a majority that it should be so? What guarantee have we for the existence of confederation itself? When confederation was inaugurated there were only four provinces forming the union. Very soon the number of the added provinces will exceed the number of the original provinces. Shall these new provinces be entitled to say to the original provinces that because they were not parties to the original constitutional agreement entered into by the former four provinces, because they are now a majority, they are at liberty to disregard all previous arrangements? Are they at liberty to smash the whole confederation scheme, simply because it is their will and without even seeking their way out to the changes they would like to have brought through the proper and constitutional channel? That doctrine leads to such consequences that it must be said it is unsound, absurd and immoral. There is only one way for Manitoba to be relieved of what some are pleased to call a disability: it is by an amendment to the constitution by the Imperial Parliament. It would be an unwise course for the province to seek for such an amendment, but yet I could not question the right of the majority to ask for it. Until that is done, the old population of Manitoba and the province itself is bound by the constitution, whether it rests on an agreement or a pure legislative enactment. I have gone over that part of the speech of the hon. gentleman rather extensively, but I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen of this House to the fact that our case does not rest exclusively on the agreement referred to by the hon. gentleman. It rests mainly on the legislation of the province after the union. Our first contention was that by practice we had rights at the time of the union. The first judgment of the Privy Council disposed of that, so far as the legal construction of the constitution is concerned. I merely state the fact without criticising the judgment which was rendered on an imperfect understanding of the case. After the point had been decided we raised the second point; this time resting our case mainly on the rights acquired after the union. The recent judgment of the Privy Council has decided that we were right in that contention. I have already quoted the judgment of the Privy Council, so when the hon. gentleman speaks of the original agreement between the 12,000 people of former days and the Dominion, he does not speak exactly to the point. It is not by virtue of this former agreement, that the case comes before Parliament. It is by virtue of the legislation of the province itself, that legislation which was repeatedly enacted by the province, which is the act of the increased population of the province and which has given us certain rights which we are by the constitution entitled to keep. These rights have been acquired by law, and they stand at present on the same footing as do the rights of the minorities in Quebec and in Ontario. In Quebec especially, the rights enjoyed by the minority to-day have been acquired by legislation since confederation, and they are binding now on the majority, which could not alter them to the prejudice of the minority, unless the doctrine propounded by the hon. gentleman from Marquette as to the sweeping power of the majority to do what they please, even in violation of justice, could get some hold in that province. I wonder whether that doctrine is taught in what are called the national schools. The opponents of our schools are trying to make a good deal of the fact that some of our schools seem to have accepted the new law. I am in a position to say that not a single one of those school districts is in favour of the new system. If left free they will all favour the Catholic school system. Notwithstanding all that has been said about us, so eager are we to give our children the best instruction available that some of our school districts, deprived, as they were, of their legitimate share of the government grant, deprived of the right to levy taxes on their own property for the support of their schools, obliged to pay besides for the maintenance of the so-called national schools, were unable to keep up their own schools. Still they were desirous of not leaving their children without education. Inducements were offered to them by the local government through their officers to attend the schools without entirely sacrificing their views, and they thought they might try the new system. It is not on account of any preference for the public schools but because of their poverty and of the peculiar inducements offered to them. The local government were anxious to have some of our schools brought under the law in order to be able to base an argument upon the change. An inspector was sent to them who told them that if they wanted to keep up their schools the government would not be too exacting about compliance with the regulations. He told them that they might quietly give any religious instruction in the school after school hours. He told them that they could begin and close school work by saying the ordinary Catholic prayers and even suggested how it should be done. Instead of opening the school at a certain hour, they might open some few minutes before, and at the closing they might close a few minutes after the regular hour, so that they might be able to say that there had been no prayer during the school hours. There are forms of report provided by the government. I have been informed by certain parties that the teachers of those schools were advised that if the clause as to religious instruction was embarrassing to their conscience, as this report has to be under oath, they might strike out that clause. It was by such inducements, contrary to the spirit of the law, that those schools, in their poverty, thought they might avail themselves of the opportunity presented to them to get their share of the taxes and of the government grant, and thereby keep up their schools. The changes having been brought about under those circumstances, the opponents of our schools cannot base any solid argument against our contention. It might be said that the local government, being disposed to shut their eyes to the management of these schools, we might be satisfied and let the matter drop. My reply is that there are principles involved which we cannot overlook. Besides, the result would be that it would work well enough for some years and then, after abandoning all our rights, we might wake up some fine morning to find the law applied to us in all its severity and we would be without recourse. We are justified in apprehending this when we bear in mind the doctrine lately advanced in Manitoba and expressed yesterday in this House, that the majority cannot be bound by any previous agreement. Let us look at this assertion about the rallying of certain schools to the new system, in some other way. If we look at the report of the government, we see that some of these schools never received any grant from the government. How can they be said to have been under the law? Is it by the election of trustees? There being no law in force at present in Manitoba except the school act of 1890, if we want to keep up our school organization we must elect trustees as required by law, but this alone cannot be said to be a test. I repeat that all these schools without an exception would gladly return to the Catholic school system if an opportunity were given them to do so, and therefore the argument based upon that falls to the ground. I know personally that some of the schools in Manitoba have never had anything to do with the new law except perhaps to receive taxes from the municipality. They could not receive the taxes unless they, to a certain extent, recognized that they were public schools, but really it is more a matter between the municipalities and the school districts than between the government and the schools themselves. I may add that if to-morrow our rights were restored all those schools would return to the Catholic system. The hon. gentleman has also propounded another strange doctrine, which is but a repetition of what was urged before the Privy Council when the appeal was argued. It is this : there is a wrong, there is a grievance, there is a right of appeal against that wrong, there is a power to remedy the wrong, but the wrong should continue, no remedy should be applied. I never heard such repudiation of all the principles which underlie the British constitution. It is so glaringly unjust that it seems useless to enter upon an argument to contradict such a theory. One naturally asks what is the use of giving any section of the population a right which cannot have any sanction? What is the use of giving a right of appeal against any injustice if the tribunal to which that appeal is taken has no obligation to adjudicate upon it? It may be a matter of policy says the hon. gentleman from Marquette. There are two axioms which struck my mind when, as a young man, I began to study British institutions. The first is "where there is a wrong there is a remedy;" the second is "honesty is the best policy." That there has been a wrong done us has been decided by the judicial committee of the Privy Council. The judgment goes further and describes the wrong, and, while leaving the application of a remedy to the proper authorities, it suggests that it should be applied, and to what extent. The best policy is for all to accept the judgment and to act accordingly. Any other kind of policy would be a dishonest one and would shatter confidence in our public men and in our institutions. We have the assurance of the government that the agreements entered into by the Dominion will not be violated so long as they remain in power. Let us hope that a majority of the people will support that policy, and that peace and harmony shall be restored. Let all true Canadians unite in doing justice and be instrumental in promoting the welfare of the people and the development of the resources of the country, and in building up a grand, prosperous and intelligent nation and in securing the triumph of justice and genuine liberty.

Hon. M. ARMAND—Honorables messieurs,—En débutant dans l'adresse en réponse au discours du trône, je dois une mention honorable à la mémoire de notre illustre leader qui vient de descendre dans la tombe au regret de son pays. Oui, honorables messieurs, s'il est dans la vie des circonstances agréables dont les souvenirs durent longtemps il en est aussi dont les souvenirs semblent être bien plus profondément gravés dans la mémoire. Oui, honorables messieurs, la disparition subite, imprévue, occasionnée par la mort prématurée de Sir John Thompson, arrivée au foyer de l'empire, en est une qui bien certainement vivra longtemps dans notre souvenir. Sir John Thompson fut un de ces hommes humbles, pratiques, laborieux, qui apparaissent de temps en temps, mais rarement, et à de longs intervalles. Quand Sir John Thompson quitta le toit paternel, il emporta avec lui pour tout patrimoine que sa plume derrière l'oreille; depuis il a démontré à l'évidence, à la jeunesse intelligente et laborieuse de son pays toute la véracité de cette parole qui dit qu'il faut vouloir pour pouvoir. Oui, Sir John Thompson a démontré à ses compatriotes que l'on peut toujours acquérir l'honneur, la gloire et la fortune, que l'on peut toujours graviter l'échelle sociale, quant à la fortune il n'a pas pu l'accumuler, mais des personnes sympathiques, philanthropiques ont fait pour sa veuve et ses enfants ce que le temps ne lui a pas permis de faire, mais il a laissé ce que les anciens désiraient laisser bona fide. Je n'en dirai pas davantage, ses actions sont là. L'histoire de sa vie sera un miroir dans lequel la jeunesse laborieuse viendra étudier, méditer pour faire ce qu'il a fait.

Honorables messieurs, relativement aux écoles séparées du Nord-Ouest nous devons féliciter, remercier les présents ministres du gouvernement pour la détermination ferme et sincère de faire exécuter le jugement du Conseil privé de notre auguste et gracieuse, de notre bien aimée souveraine l'Impératrice des Indes, celle qui préside si dignement aux destinées d'Albion.

Moi, pour un, parmi mes coreligionnaires je suis heureux de voir que les nobles Anglais, les braves Écossais, les enfants de la belle et verte Erin comprennent que le Dieu qu'ils adorent est le même que celui que nous adorons, avec cette différence que leur manière de l'adorer n'est pas la nôtre. Je suis aussi heureux de voir qu'ils comprennent que nos intérêts sont les mêmes. Oui, les intérêts sont les mêmes puisque nous sommes tous appelés à respirer le même air, à nous abreuver de la même eau, à nous nourrir des aliments du même sol.

Je sais que dans certaines questions de détails il peut et il doit y avoir divers genres d'opinion, mais jamais divers genres d'opinion tels que nous ne puissions pas nous entredonner la main, aller bras dessus bras dessous, en mettant ce qu'on appelle, un peu d'eau dans son vin. S'il en était pas ainsi c'est qu'il n'y aurait pas dans un des partis une étincelle de ce patriotisme épuré qui brilla dans ces ancies citoyens d'Athènes, de Rome et de Carthage.

Honorables messieurs, quand le gouvernement sera appelé à renouer des traités de commerce, soit avec nos intelligents et industriels voisins, ou chez les nations éloignées, connaissant que le gouvernement comprend que les jeunes pays ont besoin d'une légère protection s'il ne veulent pas voir encombrer leurs marchés, paralyser, si je puis m'exprimer ainsi leur agriculture, leurs industries nouvelles par le surplus des produits étrangers.

Si les gouvernements sont fidèles à maintenir cette légère protection, les populations de nos différentes provinces de notre beau pays qui vient en étendue immédiatement après celui de la Russie pourront croître et grandir en traversant les âges et en s'avancant dans la postérité.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day having been called—

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Fifth Session of the Seventh Parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said: An hon. gentleman in the Opposition, at an early stage of this debate, complained that the speech from the Throne was a very meagre bill of fare. The experience of the last few days must have convinced this hon. House, that if the speech itself was meagre it has nevertheless given rise to a very interesting discussion. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition made a long and interesting speech upon the subjects referred to in the speech from the Throne, and I am a little surprised to find him evincing what I might call very destructive tendencies. We usually look upon him as a very mild and courteous gentleman, and it is rather surprising to hear him condemning, not the government or its policy, but the party with which he is himself associated and the policy of that party. He expressed himself as being strongly opposed to what has been regarded in the past as the leading plank in the platform of the Liberal party—that is provincial rights. Notwithstanding the fact of that policy being put so prominently before the Parliament and the people of Canada for a great many years by the Liberal party, we find the leader of the opposition in this House setting himself up against it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman will hardly contradict me when I proceed to show that he argued that it was the duty of the federal government to disallow the Manitoba School Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear. That was not a question of provincial rights at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman's colleagues in the other House in other days thought that it did involve a very important principle of provincial rights. The disallowance of provincial legislation has been the ground on which the battle of provincial rights has always been fought, and yet we have the leader of the opposition in this House finding fault with the government because they did not disallow the Manitoba School Act in place of sending it to the courts to be settled in a judicial way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not settled yet.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is settled as far as the courts are concerned—at all events it has received a judicial solution, and the hon. gentleman has set himself up as against any such course as that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The courts have done nothing really.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As against that opinion of the hon. gentleman, I will set up a number of facts showing that the courts have done something. There have been references to the courts—there have been two decisions of the courts, and a final decision on which the remedial order was issued the other day. Then the hon. member set himself up again in a destructive mood against the Liberal party of Manitoba, which passed the Manitoba School Act of 1890. He agreed with everything that had been said by the hon. leader of this House in condemnation of the passing that act by the Manitoba Legislature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is correct.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And I am glad to see he does not go back on that statement in the slightest respect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And he says, further that he never did and that he is quite opposed to the action of the Liberal party in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. ARMAND—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend the senior member from Halifax took occasion to remark in the course of his speech that the Conservative party in Manitoba were also identified with the Liberal party in the passage of the Manitoba School Act. As against that I will read an extract from an address of Archbishop Taché upon the question. He says on page 36 of the pamphlet :

Mr. Prendergast placed himself in the foremost position, being endowed with a superior order of literary, historical, political and social knowledge. Nothing was neglected to defend the Catholics. The five Protestant members of the Opposition joined them in the very heart of the battle, but numbers, that ultimate resource of constitutional regime, crushed every effort.

The same statement regarding the attitude of the Conservatives in Manitoba was repeatedly made in the late contest in Antigonish. It was stated there by the Liberal speakers that the Conservative party had assisted in passing the Manitoba School Act of 1890. It was a misrepresentation but, nevertheless, it was made and repeated many times in that contest. It was made in my own presence on more than one occasion. Now, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this House has also attacked the Toronto Globe, or agreed with my hon. friend the leader of the House in condemning the action of the Toronto Globe, which is the leading organ of the Reform party in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Globe is an independent paper.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend disowns the Globe. Next I will have my hon. friend disowning everything connected with the Liberal party in the country. He disowns the Toronto Globe and condemns its attitude, and now he asks that the Toronto Globe shall not be considered the organ of the Liberal party at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not so far as I am concerned.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then, my hon. friend was still in a destructive mood when he found fault with the policy of Sir Oliver Mowat's administration in Ontario in giving iron bounties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not the Debates here, but he disclaimed that action altogether—found serious fault with it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—"A piece of folly" I think the words were, as to Sir Oliver Mowat's granting iron bounties in Ontario. But he has not done yet. He condemns the Hon. Edward Blake for having moved a resolution in Parliament providing for the submission of educational difficulties to the courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I did not condemn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It sounded very much like it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is usually fair. I do not think he should put in my mouth words that I did not utter. I said, that in the light of past events for the last five years, there might be a doubt whether Mr. Blake had not made a mistake.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for having made the matter so clear to the House, that he is not altogether prepared to go back on the action, but he thinks a mistake was made, and I do not know that that makes it any better.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the light of five years' experience.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have pointed out that the hon. gentleman, in the course of an hour's speech, expressed himself on a great many questions, at variance with the policy of the Liberal party, of which he is the leader in this House. For a speech of an hour, that appears to me to be a pretty good record. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax, referring to the French treaty, expressed himself of the opinion that that treaty was a free trade measure and he asked why the government did not go further and adopt free trade all round. I am sure that my hon. friend is clear-headed enough to know that if the government adopted free trade all round, they would not be able to make very many reciprocity treaties with other countries. The hon. gentleman must know very well that free trade and reciprocity are perfectly incompatible. A country that adopts a free trade policy can make no reciprocity treaty; it has no basis to go on, and it is only a country that has a policy such as we have, which can make a reciprocity treaty with any country. I have here a pamphlet issued by the Cobden Club of England, which is headed "The Reciprocity craze." It denounces the idea of Great Britain negotiating reciprocity treaties as a craze, regarding it as perfectly incompatible with free trade doctrines.

With regard to the Manitoba school question which is alluded to in the address, and very much discussed by gentlemen who have preceded me, I wish to say a few words before I pass on to a discussion of some other matters. In the first place I wish to point out that it is not a question between Catholics and Protestants at all and should not be so regarded. When the Manitoba Constitutional Act was passed the Protestants were a minority in Manitoba and the Catholics had a small majority. The provision in the British North America Act, as found in subsection 3 of section 93 was not placed there in the interest of the Catholics at all, but, as I understand from my reading of political history, in the interest of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. Now, having these facts in mind, we should approach the question without any regard whatever to its creed aspect, because Protestants are a minority in the province of Quebec, and if the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba are encroached upon or invaded by the majority, the same or similar rights enjoyed by the Protestant minority in Quebec might be encroached upon some day. Therefore, it is in the interest of all creeds and all classes to approach this question with a sense of what is right, altogether irrespective of whether Catholics or Protestants are affected in the case which is now engaging the public attention. Neither is this a question as to whether secular or denominational schools are the best for Canada or any part of Canada. That question very properly came up and, no doubt, to some extent was considered when the Manitoba Constitutional Act was considered. That was the time for the framers of that act to have considered the question as to whether denominational or secular schools were best or those that should be provided for the province of Manitoba. But, at the present time and in the present state of the question, that aspect of it does not come up for discussion. And it is not a question now as to whether the schools established under the Manitoba School Act of 1890 are Protestant schools or secular schools. The leader of the Liberal party in the other House, in many speeches which he has delivered throughout the country during the last three or four years, seems to think it a very important question as to whether the schools that have been brought into existence under the Act of 1890 in the province of Manitoba, are Protestant schools or secular schools, and the hon. gentleman appeared to think (if I could draw any inference from his references to that subject), that if they were secular schools, there remained nothing upon which the public mind should be disturbed at all. Now, I do not think that that reaches the question. It is not important or material to the controversy whether they are secular or Protestant schools. The hon. gentleman knows that they are not the schools that were guaranteed to the minority under the Manitoba Act of 1870. Nor do I think that it is a question of very great importance to this discussion, whether the separate schools which existed in Manitoba before 1890 were efficient or otherwise. A great deal of stress has been laid by a member of the Manitoba government—who has been addressing meetings in this part of the Dominion recently, and by a leading exponent of the opposition to the minority in Manitoba in the House of Commons—on what they claim to be the fact that the separate schools existing under the laws of Manitoba before 1890 were very inefficient, I do not think that comes in appropriately, because if these schools were inefficient, the fault lay with the legislature of Manitoba. On them devolved the duty of making the Roman Catholic schools as efficient as the public schools of the province. If there was anything wrong with the management of these schools, the provincial authorities had the power to improve the management and make the school efficient. I would say further that there is not now a question before the country as to whether the minority has a grievance or not. That has been settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. They have decided that the minority has a grievance, and that point need not be discussed at any great length. The hon. gentleman from Marquette seems to be of the opinion that that grievance only exists to a modified extent—that there is a portion of the territory now embraced in the province of Manitoba in which there exists no grievance. The hon. gentleman's contention in this respect was very well met by the argument of the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, and when my hon. friend from Marquette looks into it closely, as no doubt he will, he must see that there is very little in that point. The province of Manitoba, having certain limits, became a province with a constitution. It enlarged its boundaries with the consent of this Parliament and of the portions of territory that were brought in, and as soon as the boundaries were enlarged, the added territory came under the laws of the old province of Manitoba in every respect, and the Separate School Act applied there as well as it did in the old province. Therefore, under the 93rd section of the British North America Act, that part is in precisely the same position, with respect to education, as the older part of Manitoba. Without wishing to indulge in any levity, I might be allowed to illustrate it in this way. The hon. gentleman from Marquette, like most other men, came into this world without a beard. Since then, he has grown a beard, and although his, like my own, is becoming a little gray, it is part of himself, and he cannot disown it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Unless you cut it off.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then it would grow again as long as the hon. gentleman continued to possess vitality. I may say further that there is not now, as far as I can see, any question before the Senate or before the country as to whether this Parliament has power to apply a remedy if the legislature of Manitoba does not. The decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council settles that; it declares that this Parliament has power to apply a remedy and the question, therefore, is narrowed down, and there is not that field for discussion that there has been in former sessions in this House. The question now is shall the remedy come from Manitoba or from the Parliament at Ottawa—that is the real question. It rests in the first place with Manitoba itself. If the legislature of that province fails to find a remedy for the grievance which has been decided to be in existence, it will be equivalent to an abnegation of its functions, and on the Manitoba legislature will devolve the responsibility of any action that the Parliament of Canada may find it necessary to take to remedy the grievance admitted to be in existence. An hon. gentleman who has taken a very great deal of interest in this question, although I think from a wrong point of view, in addressing the House of Commons the other day, took the ground that the legislature of Manitoba had to obey the remedial order to its fullest extent or had to refuse to do anything—that there was no alternative. I think there is no necessity to discuss that question now; it is for the legislature of Manitoba to declare what they will do, and if they make an effort to provide what they conceive to be a remedy, it will be for this Parliament to consider whether that remedy is sufficient or otherwise. I do not think that the remedial order has any such effect as that the legislature of Manitoba must accept it in its entirety or do nothing. The political aspect of the question comes in at this stage. My hon. friend from Halifax, in discussing it the other day, seemed to minimize the action of the Government in regard to passing that remedial order. He thought that there was no other course open to them, but simply to act as a bailiff would do in carrying out the instructions of the court. Another gentleman, Mr. Dalton McCarthy, speaking elsewhere takes a very different ground from that. He says that the government of the Dominion was perfectly free to have refused to do anything, and should have done nothing notwithstanding the decision of the Privy Council in the matter—but of course they would have to assume the responsibility of their inaction. These are very conflicting views coming from two gentlemen who agree so well that the government should be condemned. I think I can notice the political aspect of the question coming out on both sides. The hon. gentleman who leads the opposition to the remedial order wishes to make it appear in some parts of this country that the order is something that the government went rather out of their way to make, while my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax, speaking for another part of the population and for another class of constituencies, says that the government were only carrying out the mandate of the court, just as a bailiff who serves a writ in accordance with the decision of a judge. The question may be asked, how does the government stand? I think it is scarcely necessary to answer that question. We have had the statement of the premier of Canada, in this House who has explicitly declared the position of the government in regard to this matter at its present stage. The action of the government from first to last is now a matter of history—the reference to the courts, the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the hearing of the appeal by the Privy Council of Canada, the decision upon it, and the passage of the remedial order followed by declarations by members of the government including the premier himself in this House and before the country. There is no mistake as to the attitude of the government, but let me ask where do the opposition stand? It is true the leader of the opposition in this House, if I have understood his speech correctly, believes that the government has done right in passing the remedial order. I have not understood the hon. gentleman as criticising or finding fault with the government for doing that, but we must look to the leader of the party in the House of Commons, who is the recognized leader of the Liberal party all over Canada, for some expression of opinion that will be held in some way to bind his followers. I ask what is the attitude and position of that hon. gentleman in regard to this question. We have recently had four by-elections in three different provinces of this Dominion—one in Antigonish, N.S., two in the province of Quebec and one in Ontario. In two constituencies there were no recognized Liberal candidates, although in Haldimand the opponent of the government candidate was actively supported by Liberals. But there were Liberal candidates in Antigonish and Verchères, and I have yet to hear that the leader of the party or any leading Liberal made a declaration on this question in any way whatever in connection with either of those elections. When the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council gave its decision and the government of Canada acted on that decision, it was due to the Liberal party and to the people of Canada of all parties and classes that the Liberal leaders, especially Mr. Laurier, should have been heard from. I would have excused Mr. Laurier had he delegated to some of his lieutenants the duty of speaking on the trade question, because he and his party are on record upon that subject. They have indeed put themselves perhaps a little too much on record on the trade question, but with regard to the Manitoba school question it was an extraordinary thing that the leader of the party, Mr. Laurier, and the leader in the maritime provinces, Mr. Davies—because they have a divided leadership—should have avoided these contests and failed to explain their attitude. I do not know why these hon. gentlemen have avoided the question, but their failure to declare their views has enabled their friends in these different constituencies to assume a great variety of attitudes in dealing with the subject, and to make very conflicting statements at different meetings suitable to the complexion of the several localities. I should be sorry to say that the leader of the opposition kept out of the contest to enable his followers to take conflicting courses, but I do say, and I think I will be sustained by the hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, that it was the duty of the leader of the opposition to have taken a part in these contests, at all events to have placed himself on record on this question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is only since the elections have been held and since Parliament has met that the government have in any way put themselves on record as to what they would do if Manitoba refused to obey the remedial order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Does the hon. gentleman say that the government has not placed itself on record?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Until the leader of the House spoke in this House the other day.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I read a speech delivered in the county of Haldimand by Mr. Montague himself, which put the government on record in almost the same language as the premier used in this House the other day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—By no means.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The government put itself on record by its action and again by passing the remedial order, and there were explicit declarations made by Mr. Montague in Haldimand, by Mr. Ouimet in Verchères, and by Sir Hibbert Tupper and myself in Antigonish, as to the stand of the government on this Manitoba school question. Explicit statements were made in all of those constituencies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be good enough to quote the explicit statements made by Mr. Montague in Haldimand.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not got it at my hand, but I remember reading it in a report of Mr. Montague's speech which I think was published in the Mail and Empire. In that speech he expresses himself almost to the same effect as the leader of this House did the other day—to the effect that the government had passed this remedial order and would do its duty when the time came.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What its duty was is the question.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The remedial order, however, was a sufficient declaration. The hon. member from North Simcoe, in the House of Commons, does not fail to find, nor do his friends and supporters fail to find in that remedial order something which they say has put the government on record very decidedly. The attitude of the Liberal leaders on this question reminds me very much of boys going to rob a hen roost. The leader secretes himself in the bush and sends his companions to steal the chickens, because it would never do for him to appear in the matter, but as soon as his friends come out with the plunder the boy in the bush has a share of it. That is the way the Liberals have acted in these elections. Mr. Laurier and his associates have remained under cover until the contests were over and they will have no hesitation in reaping any political capital they can from the result of the action of Mr. McCarthy and their other friends. Now I have looked carefully over all the speeches that I could lay my hands on delivered by the hon. Mr. Laurier on this Manitoba schools question, and there are two or three statements, at different times since this question has come up which, serve to show how his opinions have run, since 1893. In 1893 he said in Parliament:—

If the statement is founded on fact which is made by His Grace Archbishop Taché, and which is repeated in all the petitions coming from the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, that under the guise of public schools, Protestant schools are being continued, and that Roman Catholic children are forced under that law to attend what are in reality Protestant schools; I say this—and let my words be heard by friend and foe, let them be published in the press, throughout the length and breadth of the land—that the strongest case has been made for interference by this government. If that statement be true, though my political life be ended for ever, what I said now I shall be prepared to repeat, and would repeat on every platform in Ontario, every platform in Manitoba, nay every Orange lodge throughout the land, that the Roman Catholic minority has been subjected to a most infamous tyranny.

I am not aware that the hon. gentleman is entitled to admission to the Orange lodges throughout the land to give his views there, but he says he is bold and brave and prepared to repeat the opinion in every Orange lodge throughout the land that the Catholics have been subject to tyranny. There is, however, an "if" in every part of this. If Archbishop Taché and the others who have signed the petition are telling the truth, and if the schools which have been established are really Protestant schools, he is prepared to take this bold action; but he says further:

I would not hesitate, if the statement is true, to go ahead and plead the case of the Catholics in Winnipeg with the government of Mr. Greenway himself, because, if there is such an outrageous state of things existing in the province of Manitoba, not a moment should be lost in coming to the rescue of the oppressed minority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was three years after the Manitoba School Act was passed, and perhaps it might be excusable for the hon. gentleman not having in those three years been able to discover this fact—which I do not think is an important fact at all—as to whether these were Protestant or Catholic schools. Notwithstanding he thought a moment's time should not be lost in getting a remedy. Now, we find the hon. gentleman putting himself again on record in 1893, at a Liberal convention held in Ottawa, and I shall read everything he said about the Manitoba school question in that convention :

Now it is my duty to refer to another question which is an irritating subject, because it touches questions of creed and race, I refer to the Manitoba school question. I have received several communications urging me to take a course upon that question. Different persons in the different provinces have asked me to take opposite courses. To them, I have given no answer.

I hope I will be excused when I say that this explanation of his having been asked by friends in one part of the country to take one kind of action, and by friends in another part of the country to take another action, and that he has given no answer, reminds me of the story of Buridan's ass who was placed midway between two bundles of hay and before he could make up his mind which bundle to feed from he died of starvation. So the leader of the Liberal party finds himself in this position; he is implored by people from one province to take one side, and implored by another class of people to take another side, and to each of them he gives no answer.

I give it now, he says. I wish the question were in any another condition.

The complaint the hon. gentleman was making was that the government had tied the matter up by sending it to the courts, but he wished it was relieved from this condition, so that it could be fully and freely discussed.

Those of you who follow political events know that Mr. Tarte on the one hand and Mr. Dalton McCarthy on the other, agreed that the government were a pack of cowards—that they did not deal with that subject in a manly way. For my part, I speak in the same sense.

They were all happily agreed on that point.

And I now say that the government acted in a cowardly way and did not dare to speak either one way or the other. It was there bounden duty to say one thing or the other. But instead of acting like men of courage they allowed passion to be inflamed in Manitoba and Quebec, and never dared to stand up like men and put an issue of the question. They are to be blamed for this. They shunted the question to the courts where it is now. The opposition are not in a position to take any action until such time as a report has been given by the courts.

Here the government were a pack of cowards because they did not discuss it when it was before the courts, and he turns round and says the opposition were not in a position to say anything upon it until such time as a decision was given by the courts. He adds :—

And until the courts have decided whether or not the government have no right to interfere. Then it will be time for us to say we will act or not.

At all events, we learn from this that the hon. gentleman was not then prepared to speak. He had been pressed by his friends from different parts of the country, holding conflicting views, to take one side or the other and he gave no answer, and he condemned the government because they did not do anything, and then says the opposition could not do anything until the question came out of the courts. Now, the hon. member has spoken again on this question. I might quote from a speech which he made in Winnipeg, in which he substantially repeats what he said in April, 1893. In Winnipeg, on the 3rd September, 1894, he declared that he is a firm believer in provincial rights. I must quote his exact words in order that there may be no misapprehension about it. It was on this very question that he was speaking when he declared in this way that he was a firm believer in provincial rights, although my hon. friend does not seem to think that provincial rights are at all involved in this question. He says.

I am a firm believer in provincial rights. In the Dominion House of Commons I have stood up for the authority of the provinces. When I took up the petition of my fellow-religionists of Manitoba, complaining of the legislation of the government of Manitoba, I asked myself, what is the complaint? * * * I took up the petition of the Archbishop and of those who signed it with him, and the complaint which was made was that the government of Manitoba—I speak here in the presence of the members of the government—had adopted legislation which, instead of improving public schools in the country, imposed upon them Protestant schools, and that they were bound to send their children to Protestant schools. In the other, the government of Manitoba denied the statements in toto.

Here was the contradiction again, the same as in the House of Commons, and the question seemed to turn in his mind on whether the schools established under the Act of 1890 were Protestant schools or secular schools.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—Is the right in question here not a Canadian right rather than a provincial right?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—A Dominion right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I understand my hon. friend to say it is not a provincial right but a Canadian right.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Mr. Laurier seems to be of a different opinion, because he qualifies all he says on the subject by saying he is a firm believer in provincial rights.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—He may be an advocate of provincial rights and make that announcement, but the right under discussion is not a provincial right.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know how my hon. friend may view it, but I am speaking of how it was viewed by the Hon. Mr. Laurier. I am dealing entirely with the opinions expressed by the Hon. Mr. Laurier, and he says he is a firm believer in provincial rights; and I was going to read a little further:

I said to the government of the Dominion here is a simple question of fact, you have to determine whether the statements are true or not. But instead of doing that, they went on appealing to the courts and evading the question.

Mr. Laurier put it on the question of the provincial rights and it pervades the whole of his remarks, and he does not fail to characterize how great the outrage would be in his mind if the minority were forced to attend Protestant schools. He does not hesitate to say how great he would regard the outrage; but, does he say that this Parliament should come in and interfere. Nothing of the kind. He says:

I will be prepared to go before the people of Manitoba and tell them such legislation should not stand. I have nothing more to say in Winnipeg than I have said on the floor of Parliament, in Quebec and elsewhere.

The remedy of Mr. Laurier was not a remedy such as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have decided it is proper to give, but he started out by declaring that he was in favour of provincial rights, and the fair meaning of his language was that he would not pass any law, but he would go personally and use all the influence he possessed with the people of Manitoba and the legislature of Manitoba, his political friends. I hope the hon. gentleman is doing that, and that he is using his influence with them in this matter. At all events, I say he is not, by the public attitude he is taking, helping in any way towards a fair solution of this difficulty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would ask the hon. gentleman if the minority have been forced to attend Protestant schools?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think that is a question which affects the discussion at all. The schools that were guaranteed to the minority were separate schools, and it is well known that our Roman Catholic friends entertain objections to secular schools as well as Protestant schools, and Mr. Laurier was beating about the bush, and the difficulty does not lie in the place where he was putting it. It lay in another point altogether. In speaking in the House of Commons the other day, the hon. gentleman has put himself on record again on this question:

But I have only this to say and to repeat that I have no desire to create political capital out of this question. I have no desire to get into power through it, if the government solve it as they should, but I am not ready to offer advice to the advisers of His Excellency. I shall wait until they bring in their message.

Now, from the extracts I have already read, it will be found that, up to the time that the government passed the remedial order and up to the time that the decision of the Privy Council was rendered, the hon. gentleman, as leader of the party, declared that the government treated him very badly, treated his friends badly because they had tied this question up in the courts and prevented them from taking a manly and courageous stand which they were so extremely anxious to take on the question before the country. That horrid Tory government of Canada that had sent this question to the courts had prevented the Liberal party from taking up the question and discussing it, but we had the decision of the Privy Council rendered some time in January last. We have had the remedial order passed for more than a month and we have had several by-elections. Parliament has met and the people are busy discussing the question, but still the leader of the Liberal party is hiding in his cave, holding himself in readiness to take advantage of any complication that may arise and make political capital out of it, notwithstanding his declaration that that is not his wish. Perhaps I have said enough on the Manitoba school question. My hon. friend from Halifax, speaking the other day, said that the electors of Antigonish did not render their verdict in the recent by-election on the Manitoba school question but upon the fiscal policy of the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think I suggested that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I think those were his words, if not I would like to know what the hon. gentleman did say. "The electors of Antigonish decided that election on the fiscal policy of the country," those were his words I think. Well, perhaps to some extent they did so, but the government did not shirk discussion on the fiscal policy. A very large part of the discussion was devoted to the trade policy. In fact, so far as the members of the government and their friends were concerned fully as much time was given to the trade question as to any other. At the same time, I do not think it is altogether right to say that the electors of the constituency gave their verdict altogether upon the trade question. Having been there myself, and having attended some of the meetings where I heard speeches by members of the Liberal party, I know I am right when I say that the opposition candidate and the opposition speakers went beyond the government in regard to the Manitoba school question. They said that the Government had not gone far enough and that the remedial order was only so much waste paper, because it did not set forth a day and intimate to the Manitoba government in plain terms that if they did not by that day restore the separate schools to the province the federal parliament would intervene. The opposition speakers found serious fault with the government because they did not threaten in that order what they would do in the case of inaction on the part of the province and name a day when they would do it. So far, therefore, from giving an adverse vote to the policy of the government, in so far as the passage of the remedial order is concerned, the electors may be said not only to have endorsed it, but to have gone beyond it from the fact that the opposition speakers went further than the government in promising to take a strong course on the question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They saw you and went you a little better.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—Perhaps that is about the way to put it. My hon. friend admits that the opposition went one better than the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me—the hon. gentleman is fond of talking about what other people say. I simply say after hearing the hon. gentleman's story that it appears now that the opposition speakers saw the hon. gentleman and went a little better.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—I think I have made it clear that they did go one better. They went a good deal better, and that may account to some extent for the vote given to Mr. McIsaac. I know that the speakers on the Opposition side denounced and condemned the Government for having trifled with the question, claiming that the remedial order did not meet the requirements of the case. There is no doubt, however, that the fiscal policy of the government was discussed very fully in the contest, and that the opposition candidate in that contest assured the people that if they supported him and the Liberal party were returned to power they would be able to buy kerosene oil at three or four cents a gallon. The statement which I refer to was made I was told in meetings throughout the county by the Liberal candidate himself. Now I have in my possession quotations showing that the whole sale price of kerosene oil in New York and Boston at the present time is about twelve cents a gallon, to say nothing of the duty or the cost of importation. This dis-scussion has turned to a very considerable extent on the trade question, and my hon. friend from Marquette—I am sorry to see that he is not in his place—has discussed the theory of free trade very fully and at great length in this debate. I may be permitted to say that in my opinion in discussing fiscal questions in Canada, we have very little to do with the abstract theories relating to free trade or protection. We do not advocate protection as an abstract theory and insist that it shall be maintained in all ages or in all countries alike. We do not pretend anything of the kind. That has never been the view of the Liberal-Conservative party, and when I heard the hon. Senator from Marquette speaking at great length and with great eloquence upon the benefits of free trade, discussing the question from a theoretical standpoint, I think it was altogether beside the mark. If theories were to prevail entirely, there would be very little need of Parliament; theories could be ground out by the universities, and there would be very little need of the adoption of fiscal policies by Parliament. As opposed to that view which permeated the speech of my hon. friend in favour of the abstract theory of free trade as against that of protection, I set up this statement, that the framing of a fiscal policy for a country like Canada, which would suit the country at the time it was framed, is a great effort of statesmanship. It is one of the most important, if not the most important, matter which the Parliament of a country has to deal with. From 1873 to 1878, during the time when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition occupied a position in the government of Canada, we find that new conditions had arisen with regard to the industries of the country. My hon. friend will say “why were your party not protectionists before that; they were free traders before that.” I admit that many of them were, but the reason of that is to be found in the fact that about that time new conditions began to come into existence on this continent which had never been observed before. About 30 years ago, in 1865, the United States civil war came to a close, and large numbers of men returned from the battlefields, north and south, to their former peaceful pursuits. A vast proportion of the population which had up to that time been engaged in preparing supplies for the army, and in meeting other contingencies arising from a state of civil war, returned to peaceful avocations, and the United States was compelled to adopt an extremely high tariff, not merely for purposes of protection, but to meet the extraordinary interest charge upon the war debt which they had to assume. This high tariff brought about an unprecedented development of American industries. By the high prices which labour produced, immigrants were drawn to the country in larger numbers than ever before, and in a few years the industrial life of the nation was quickened to an extent which had never been anticipated. That went on until during the seventies the United States found themselves producing more than they could possibly consume, and they commenced to look about them for customers to buy their surplus products. Canada at the time had a low tariff, and her industries were still in the infant stage; it was thus easy for the Americans to dump into Canada such of their products as they did not consume themselves. We all know what the result was. Many, perhaps, might say it was a very good thing for the country, but I think it has been clearly proved that that was not the result. As time went on the Americans resorted to many methods of discrimination. In the matter of sugar they went so far as to grant a rebate on exportations which was actually larger than the duty on imported sugar, and their sugar thus came into Canada displacing that produced by our own refineries. Our sugar industries were ruined, and other industries also suffered. It was during this time that the question of the trade policy of the country forced itself upon our public men. There had not existed up to that time such conditions as were then to be found, and in my opinion that is where the leader of the Liberal party and his friends missed their opportunity. They were then at the head of affairs and had the first choice of policies. Had they been equal to the occasion and furnished to the industries of Canada some measure of protection, they might not have been in opposition as they have been for the past seventeen or eighteen years. The Conservative party, led by the greatest man we have had in this Dominion, and perhaps on this continent, during the past fifty years, Sir John Macdonald, was not slow to grasp the situation. Sir John Macdonald listened to the cry that went up from the farming, manufacturing and other interests of the country, and adopted the National Policy. We often hear about the proverbial "fly on the wheel," as depicting the attitude of Sir Richard Cartwright in 1878. I think he furnished the proverb himself, but, to my mind, the helpless position of Sir Richard Cartwright and his friends remind me more of the simpleton in the fable who came to a river whose waters were deep and swift, and instead of trying to ford it or cross it in some way, he lay down on the banks and waited until the water should all flow away. That is what the Liberal party did in 1878 with regard to the trade question. They adopted a policy of inaction until the Conservative party came into power. Some hon. gentlemen are very fond of stating that this country has not prospered under the National Policy, and, with singularly bad memories, they very often assert that in 1878 the country was fairly prosperous, and that from that time forward the country had been going from bad to worse under the operation of the National Policy. I will take the opportunity of reading from the last budget speech made by Sir Richard Cartwright in the House of Commons in 1878. He said :

It is not often in the commercial history of any country that we are called on to chronicle so great a reduction, not merely in the total volume of our trade, but also in the revenue derived therefrom, as we have seen within the last two or three years, * * * The total revenue of trade and commerce of Canada has, in that short interval, been reduced by nearly $50,000,000, while the revenue derived from customs alone, shows a decrease in that period of something like $3,000,000. The actual figures in round numbers being that our trade and commerce collectively has been reduced from $218,000,000 to $168,000,000 * * * Whereas a few years ago with a total population of 3,600,000 souls, we imported something like $127,000,000 worth of goods, we found ourselves with a population of 4,000,000, importing a little over $94,000,000 worth. In other words the total imports have fallen off from an average of $35.25 per head to something like $23.50 per head. There has been an enormous shrinkage in the lumber trade from $28,000,000 to $13,000,000. There has been a great shrinkage in bank stock and some of these institutions have gone down altogether. The depression in real estate has been general and long prevailing and entails an enormous loss. Our exports have fallen off because we have been poor that we have not been buying much.

This is not any picture of mine or drawn by any Conservative, but an extract from the Budget speech delivered by Sir Richard Cartwright in the House of Commons in 1878. My hon. friend the senior member from Halifax, speaking the other day, deplored the condition of the farmers of the country, and he referred to the census which, I think he said, showed that we had 120,000 less farmers in Canada than at the time of the adoption of the National Policy. I have heard the statement made repeatedly, that the census returns show a decrease in the farming population, and a considerable increase in the cities of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the falling off in the number of farmers was 7,000.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was what I found myself, and I was surprised when the figures were given as 120,000. My hon. friend seems to think that that is a very deplorable state of things as regards the farmers. I speak as a farmer myself on this subject, and to my mind the fact that the hon. gentleman states, does not convey that lesson at all. I look upon it that every farmer added to the population of the country becomes a competitor with his brother farmers, but every man, woman and child who is added to a city becomes a customer of the farmer, and it is in the interests of the farmers themselves that the population of the cities should increase. The fact that the hon. member quotes, so far from being against the farmers, is in their interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then why does the hon. gentleman spend money to encourage the immigration of farmers into this country ?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There will be plenty of moving backwards and forwards. We must keep up a prosperous farming class in the country ; but while the number of our farmers has not sensibly increased during that period, I contend that the farmers as a class have done very well. They have held their own better during that period than perhaps any other farmers in the world. Let us look at a few figures in relation to that subject. In 1877 we imported a great deal of agricultural products from the United States. I have looked over the figures, and I find that we imported from the United States over and above agricultural products, not the produce of Canada, that we send out of the country, $12,000,000 worth. Last year I find that that was reduced to two or three millions of dollars—There is a difference of ten millions of dollars between 1877 and the last financial year that I have been looking over. The home market has been conserved under the National Policy to the farmers of Canada to the amount of at least ten millions of dollars. That is not all. Take the exports for the year ending June, 1893, and it will be found that we sent out of the country that year of agricultural products more than we did in 1878 over twenty-one millions of dollars' worth, and we must remember that there has been a great depreciation in prices and that that twenty-one millions of dollars' worth of products represents a volume altogether greater than the value would indicate on account of the depreciation in prices, especially of wheat, which formed a considerable portion of our exports. The National Policy has conserved to our farmers, our own markets to the extent of ten millions of dollars, and we have invaded the markets of the world with twenty-one millions of dollars' worth more of agricultural products than was sent out in 1878, notwithstanding the depreciation in prices. More than that, we have fed our own home population of three-quarters of a million more people in the cities than in 1878. Hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of saying that the population of Canada has not increased—that there has been an exodus. That is no doubt true. These movements of population are attributed by our friends opposite to the operation of the National Policy. I do not think that is reasonable or fair, because these movements of population have always been going on as regards the races to which we belong. There would have been no people in Canada now had it not been for the feeling of unrest that the races to which we belong have manifested. I have the Financial Reform Almanac before me, a reliable book issued by the free traders of England, which contains some statistics with regard to emigration from that country. I find in this volume it is set forth that in the 15 years from 1879, when the National Policy was adopted in Canada, up to 1892, 3,185,000 people emigrated from the British Islands—that is after deducting the number of those who came in during that period. That was the net emigration from the British Islands—in free trade England—and of that number 2,780,000 went to the United States. There has been an enormous exodus from the only free trade country in the world to a country which has the highest protective tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What has been the increase of population that remained behind in England?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—There may have been an increase of population—I am not dealing with that—I am dealing with the people who have gone out of the country. I put that fact before the House—it is important when we find that 3,185,000 people over and above those who came into Great Britain and Ireland during those years went out of the country, and that most of them went to the most protected country in the world.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Just as large a proportion of the people of Canada have gone out, and the increase of our population is not any greater in proportion than that of England.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—That is a subject that is so often discussed, that it is scarcely necessary to go into it now, but the hon. gentleman knows very well—no one knows better—that the census of 1881 and the census of 1891 in Canada were not taken on the same basis with regard to the time limit of absentees. I remember after the census of 1881 was taken, our friends in the opposition, Sir Richard Cartwright and others condemned the census of that year as being wholly unreliable, because they said that the system adopted led to the counting in of a vast number of people who had left the country for years and who might never return. The government felt that there was some force in this objection, and in the census of 1891 instructions were issued that no absentee should be included in the population of the country unless some satisfactory assurance was given that he would return in a reasonable time. If the census of 1891 had been taken on the same basis as the census of 1881, it would have shown—in fact there is every evidence of that,—that Canada improved rapidly during that period, and that there was a substantial increase of population. Hon. gentlemen are fond of referring to the deficit of the present year and of last year, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in this House was kind enough to suggest a way in which the deficit could be removed. He suggested that duties should be taken off some of the staple articles of import, although my hon. friend the leader of the House very clearly showed him, in reply, that he had pursued a very different course himself when he was in the government, and had a deficit to meet; but if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the matter, they will see that there is another way in which the government could easily have got over the deficit of this year, which may not be as large as hon. gentlemen seem to think. We had a deficit last year though not nearly so large as the Liberal government had while it was in power. I would submit to hon. gentlemen that if the present administration had put the same duties on some of the staple articles of imports necessaries of life—such as were on during the Mackenzie administration, they would not have had a deficit this year or last year. If they had restored the duties that my hon. friend opposite imposed on tea and sugar in 1877 and 1878, the whole difficulty would have been overcome. I have gone over the blue-books and made calculations on the subject, and I was amazed to find that if we had continued the duties imposed by the Mackenzie administration on raw and refined sugar, they would have yielded, in the last three years above the revenue that we did get, over $20,000,000. On tea, last year, the imposition of the old duty would have yielded $1,000,000, and since the duty on tea has been removed, government had kept up the duty at the same rate as the Mackenzie administration had it, there would have been $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 more revenue in the treasury of the country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—Now transferred to the manufacturers' pockets.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—My hon. friend does not surely say that any one does manufacture tea in Canada. I am dealing with a bare, bald fact that if the duty imposed by the Mackenzie administration in 1877 and 1878 on tea and sugar had been imposed of late years, there would have been no deficit. A duty on these articles is to be the policy of the Liberal party, I believe, if they ever come into power. An eminent gentleman of that party in the Ottawa convention which met in 1893, Mr. Charlton, declared that if they got into power they proposed to raise a revenue of $3,300,000 on sugar. The Hon. David Mills another very eminent gentleman of the party, treated the House to a discourse on the duty on tea last year and claimed it to be a free trade tax. The hon. gentleman was right, it was a free trade tax, and he was preparing the way for a tax on tea if his party ever came into power. When we look at the record of the different Conservative administrations, we need not be much troubled about the deficit of the present year, for which we have not the exact figures. We find during 16 years of Conservative administration a surplus of about $16,000,000, an average of about a million dollars a year, notwithstanding the fact that the expenditure occasioned by the North-west rebellion was incurred during that period. There is no occasion for alarm at a showing such as this when we recall the fact that under the Mackenzie administration there was on an average a deficit of over a million dollars a year.

I am very much obliged to different hon. gentlemen who expressed themselves so kindly, with regard to my own selection to take part in the government of the country. It was very kind and very unexpected to me, and I was paid compliments which I feel I do not deserve, but I shall do my best to deserve if I live. In connection with this matter I want to say one word in reply to the observation which fell from my hon. friend from British Columbia with regard to the representation of his province in the government of the country. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he found no fault with the representation of my little province in the councils of the country, but he complained that the province that he has the honour to represent in this House has not been similarly treated. On matters of fact, I am rather at variance with the hon. gentleman in one or two particulars. It is within my memory that the province of British Columbia had one of its representatives as premier of Canada for a time. Not only had they a representative in the Cabinet but they had the honour of being represented by the greatest statesman that Canada has ever produced.

Hon. Mr. McINNES, (B.C.)—I regret to say it because he has passed away, but Sir John Macdonald became a representative of one of the British Columbia constituencies after he was rejected by his own constituency in Kingston, and in the true sense of the word he had never been in British Columbia; he did not understand British Columbia, and it was merely a compliment paid to him at the time, and in the true sense of the word, he was not a representative from the province.

Hon. Mr. ROBITAILLE—I should like to know why he did not understand it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend's argument is rather against the earnest plea he set up for the representation of his province in the Cabinet the other day, because I think hon. gentlemen will come to this conclusion, that if the presence of Sir John Macdonald as the representative of a British Columbia constituency in the House of Commons, in the Cabinet, and as Premier of Canada, was not a benefit to the province, I do not think the province can be benefited by a representative in the Cabinet. As for myself, perhaps I may not be a benefit to my own province; very likely I may not be, but that does not affect the question. Sir John Macdonald may have been a feeble representative of British Columbia in the Cabinet, but I do not think that that affects the question which I am discussing at the present moment. I want to point out, however, to my hon. friend that much later a former representative of British Columbia occupied a Cabinet position for many years. I refer to Mr. Dewdney. It is true that at the time Mr. Dewdney was in the Cabinet he did not represent a British Columbia constituency, but he was at one time a representative of that province, and he has gone back to occupy a prominent position there.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The province never recognized Mr. Dewdney as representing them in the Cabinet after he left British Columbia; and I ask the hon. gentleman, if he lived in British Columbia and never went to his own island, could he represent that island properly, and with satisfaction to his own people? Although we gave Sir John a seat, and were proud to do so, he never represented British Columbia in a proper manner, as a native of that province could have done.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not going to discuss the question as to whether these gentlemen were efficient representatives or not. I know that when Mr. Dewdney was a member of the Cabinet he did not represent a constituency in British Columbia, but from the fact of its being his adopted province, though he did not live there, it is probable that he may have understood the needs of British Columbia. I simply say this in answer to what has been said with reference to Prince Edward Island. Now, I have been in the province of British Columbia and I do not think my hon. friends have been in the province that I represent. I admire the province of British Columbia, and I do not know that many members of this House have a greater appreciation of the wonderful resources of that province than I have. If British Columbia should get one or two seats in the Cabinet, I am sure I should be very far from sorry. I know my hon. friends do not feel at all sorry that Prince Edward Island has got representation. We are agreed thus far, but I do differ from my hon. friend from British Columbia who brought this matter up with regard to the comparison, he instituted between British Columbia and Prince Edward Island in the matter of contributions to the revenues of the country. I thought we were done with hearing the customs entries at any ports quoted as an evidence of the contributions of any part of Canada to the revenue of the country. We know very well that no fair comparison can be made in that way at all. We know that the importing for Canada is done at certain centres at the present time. The hon. member from Victoria referred to this matter and pointed to certain figures as really representing the contributions of the different parts of the country. That would be very important if they really did represent the contributions, but I submit they do not. I am not very well acquainted with the nature of the importations or the destination of the dutiable goods that are entered in the ports of British Columbia, but I think, looking upon the fact that these ports of British Columbia are the only ports of entry on the Pacific coast, that a good portion of the goods so entered are consumed in other parts of Canada and not consumed in that province—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, they are.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Well, with regard to Prince Edward Island, I know that our imports represent but a very small proportion of our consumption ; that the dutiable goods from foreign countries are entered at Montreal. Montreal has become the great centre of importation for Prince Edward Island,—St. John, Halifax and Toronto to some extent—but principally Montreal, and very little of our goods are imported direct as they were in the olden days. We are also larger purchasers of Canadian goods than we were years ago, and I say that the returns do not indicate to any extent what the contributions of Prince Edward Island are in this matter. Take the North-west Territories ; we find last year that only $11,012.47 was paid in duties in all the territories. I know that my hon. friend from Wolseley will bear me out in saying that it would be very absurd to suppose that that was all the duty paid on goods consumed in the North-west. I believe that that paltry $11,012 does not by any means represent their contribution to the federal treasury. I think there is no doubt that a considerable portion of the goods that are imported in Montreal and Vancouver and Victoria may be consumed in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No, they go through in bond. All the goods we pay duty for are consumed in the province, but goods coming through, from Montreal and other parts, do not go through in bond, and do not appear as goods we have paid duty for.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The goods that are shipped for merchants east will go through in bond, but goods imported by Vancouver or Victoria merchants for the purpose of meeting their trade, whether inside or outside of their province, will be paid in the port of entry, and I think the extraordinary discrepancy between the North-west Territories and British Columbia may be accounted for in some such way as I have indicated. It would be preposterous to say for a moment that $11,012 represents the contributions of the North-west Territories to the treasury of the country. I have been through the North-west Territories, and I know very well they are large consumers of dutiable goods and they must come from somewhere. I say this because the statement made by my hon. friend was calculated to create a wrong impression—I do not say with regard to his own province. He may be right about that, but so far as the province of Prince Edward Island is concerned, it created a wrong impression. To get at the true contributions of the province of Prince Edward Island you might multiply the figures that he quoted by eight or ten.

I feel that I should not resume my seat without saying a word, feebly as I feel myself able to do it, with regard to the great loss which Canada has sustained within the last year in the person of our late premier, Sir John Thompson. All the gentlemen who have spoken on both sides of the House, have very feelingly and fittingly expressed their great admiration for that eminent man, and their sense of the loss which Canada has sustained by his being taken away. His career was truly marvellous—a wonderful career in any country. Only ten or eleven years had he been in the arena of Dominion politics, and at the end of that time he stood away above and beyond I might say every man in public life in Canada in regard to services and in regard to ability, and in almost every respect his career was a wonderful one. The almost tragic ending of that career was calculated, to make an impression on the minds of the people of our country which time will not efface. I cannot do better in closing my remarks than to quote the words of Sir Walter Scott with regard to Lord Nelson :

“To him as to the burning levin
Short, bright, resistless course was given,
Till burst the bolt on yonder shore Rolled, blazed, destroyed and was no more.”

The motion was agreed to.

MINISTERIAL CHANGES.

Hon. Mr. POWER—During the discussion on the Address some reference was made to recent changes in the administration, and perhaps the hon. the leader of the government will be prepared to make these explanations now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In accordance with constitutional practice on similar occasions, and with the permission of the Crown, I have briefly to acquaint the House with the proceedings which took place consequent upon the lamented death of Sir John Thompson.

On the evening of the day following that which witnessed the tragic event at Windsor Castle, England, I received the Governor General's commands to wait upon him. In the course of the interview, His Excellency did me the honour to propose that I should undertake the formation of a new administration. This task I conceived it my duty to accept. The first step towards its fulfilment was to ascertain from my late colleagues whether they would consent to retain their positions, and on their agreeing to do so I advised that they be continued in their respective offices subject to any such changes as might in the interest of the country be deemed advisable. I may add, however, that Mr. Patterson expressed his wish to retire, but consented to remain at my special request until such time as I could conveniently make other arrangements.

The Cabinet vacancy caused by the death of Sir John Thompson was filled by Mr. Dickey, M.P., for Cumberland, who accepted the portfolio of Secretary of State.

The isolated position of Prince Edward Island renders direct representation in the Ministry desirable. Hon. gentlemen will, I am sure, agree with me that in the accession of the Hon. Senator Ferguson to the Cabinet the people of the island province have every assurance that their interests will be well safe-guarded. The Hon. Sir John Carling having intimated his wish to retire, it was considered expedient further to strengthen the Executive by inviting Mr. Montague, the member for Haldimand, to join the administration without portfolio. In assuming the duties of First Minister, I felt it due to myself that I should be as far as possible untrammelled by departmental responsibilities. With this object, I assumed the Presidency of the Privy Council, my colleague, Mr. Ives, accepting the office of Minister of Trade and Commerce vacated by myself; Mr. Costigan became Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the room of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who succeeded to the portfolio held by our late leader.

Subsequently Mr. Patterson renewed his request to be relieved of the cares of office; and the state of his health precluding further postponement of his determination to retire, I was reluctantly compelled to submit his resignation to the Governor General. Mr. Dickey was thereupon transferred to the vacant portfolio of Militia and Defence, and Mr. Montague was appointed Secretary of State.

The Senate adjourned at 5.10 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 29th April, 1895.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SAW-DUST IN THE OTTAWA RIVER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV moved :—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all reports, plans, profiles or other evidences in the possession of the government, showing to what extent the Ottawa River has been affected in the past by the dumping therein of saw-dust, mill or other refuse.

He said: As hon. gentlemen are aware, at the last session of Parliament an amendment was made to the Fisheries Act whereby the dumping of saw-dust and other refuse into rivers and streams was prohibited, especially in the case of the Ottawa River. This address is for the purpose of obtaining copies of reports, profiles and other evidence in the possession of the government respecting the effect such dumping has had upon the river. They were prepared some years ago by an officer of the Department of Public Works, and I think they are in the possession of the government. I believe it is intended to move in the direction of having the amendment repealed or modified in some way, and I think it is most desirable that this information should be placed before this House, in order that we may arrive at a proper conclusion with respect to the effect of this dumping in the past. Therefore, I hope the government will bring down the papers. It will have a very desirable effect, and I see no reason why it should be refused in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to oppose the motion of the hon. gentleman from the Rideau Division, but I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that if the law as it now exists is carried out, there is no necessity for the inquiry which the hon. gentleman proposes to have made, or for submitting the information. When the bill to amend the Fisheries Act was before this House last year, it will be remembered that the hon. gentleman from Rideau Division moved an amendment which is now to be found in section 6 of chapter 51 of the Acts of last year. The early part of the section provides for the punishment of persons who cause, or knowingly or wilfully permit any noxious substance, saw-dust, mill rubbish, &c., to pass into any river, and at the end of the section there is this proviso :

Provided always that this subsection shall not go into operation as to mills and streams which have been heretofore exempted until the 1st of May, 1895.

So that on the day after to-morrow the general law laid down in the earlier part of the section, a portion of which I have read, will apply to the Ottawa River. That is a very desirable condition of things. The hon. gentleman satisfied the Senate that this action was necessary ; that the Ottawa River had been very seriously damaged by allowing saw-dust and mill refuse to pass into it ; and he succeeded in inducing this House to make the amendment, which has been indicated, to the measure of last year. Inasmuch as we have had no official information that it is intended to repeal section 6 of the Act of last year, I cannot see why the hon. gentleman should ask for information now. The House had sufficient information last year to induce it to take the action to which he refers, and unless it is proposed to undo that action, I fail to see what useful end is to be gained by bringing down information which is in the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in what he says, but I understand that the parties aggrieved do intend to endeavour to have the Act repealed or modified, and it is desirable, therefore, to have this information before the House. I believe that some measure will soon be brought down to modify the law and, in order to prepare for that contingency, I have asked for the papers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no objection to the motion being acceded to. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the interested parties, mill owners, have during the recess moved and had meetings concerning the lumbering interest, especially at Ottawa, and it is likely that some bill may be introduced in the other House, or perhaps in the Senate, to modify the Act and save the lumbering interests in this section of the country and some other interests on the St. John (which is an international river) where the law applies uselessly from the fact that on the American side they can throw as much saw-dust as they choose, and the mill owners on the Canadian side would be deprived of the advantage enjoyed by their competitors. It would be putting our mill owners and our lumber trade at a disadvantage compared with the American mills on the other side.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am quite satisfied now as to the reason why the hon. gentleman requires the information, and I am glad to see that he has taken time by the forelock. I may say that the dread which he expresses is perhaps strengthened—at least the probability that some such action was in contemplation is strengthened—by the fact that the Department of Marine and Fisheries last year employed an officer to inspect the rivers in various parts of the country with a view of ascertaining how much mischief the depositing of saw-dust was causing, and I understand that since the change in the headship of the Department of Marine and Fisheries the work has been discontinued and the officer who was engaged in the work has been recalled to the capital. That would appear to indicate a change in the policy consequent upon the change of ministry.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Some few years ago this subject was referred to a committee of this House, of which I had the honour of being chairman, and a very full and exhaustive examination was made of quite a large number of witnesses on the subject. The report (which I presume will be brought down upon this motion) clearly recommended that steps should be taken to prevent the destruction of the Ottawa River by sawdust being thrown into it from the mills at the Chaudière. The expression of the Committee was so strong at the time, and the report was so unanimously adopted by the House, that it was thought it would not prove a dead letter as it has done ; but unfortunately the preservation of our rivers from destruction has been altogether overlooked in consequence of the great influence of the mill owners with the government. I quite sympathize with my hon. friend from Ottawa on this matter. I think he represents very fully and very fairly the opinion of the public of Ottawa in relation to the manner in which this noble river is being destroyed by refuse and saw-dust from the mills. If it were impossible to prevent this evil, then there might be some excuse for continuing it, but I believe it is admitted that there is no impossibility about applying a remedy to the grievance complained of. There are mills on the Ottawa River, one especially, owned by Mr. Edwards at Rockland, in which appliances are in operation for consuming the saw-dust, and there is no reason why similar appliances might not be furnished at every mill on the river, and thus prevent the complete destruction, which will inevitably take place if we do not prevent this practice now. I regret to learn that there is an intention to suspend the operation of the law on the 1st of May, through the influence of which I have just now spoken, an interest which I think is opposed to public opinion, and certainly to the interests of all persons holding property on the Ottawa River, and that the effectiveness and usefulness of the law are likely to be very greatly impaired. Of course, the government have the matter altogether under their control and will take the responsibility of their action. I regret, however, that the policy, which present circumstances indicate, is to prevail. It is not in the right direction in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend has expressed my views upon this matter better than I could have done it myself. There is not only the evil to which I have referred, but it will have a prejudicial effect everywhere on other rivers as in the county of Lunenburg. There the law has been enforced in a most arbitrary and tyrannical way. The whole argument of the mill-owners, the most unanswerable defence they make, has been: "Look at the Ottawa River. Under the eyes of Parliament you allow this violation of the law to exist, and you give a preference to the mill-owners on that river over those of us whose mills are located in Nova Scotia." The same rule that applies to the Ottawa River should apply to all rivers. The practice of dumping saw-dust and mill refuse into the water led to the destruction of the river fishery of the La Have River, even before the big gang mills were erected, and it has a demoralizing effect to find that we here, sitting and legislating generally in the interests of the fisheries and navigation of Canada, spending millions on both, allow such a nuisance as this to exist within sight of the parliament buildings.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My hon. friend in his motion here asks for all reports, plans, profiles, etc., in possession of the government. I hope my hon. friend, when he brings up this subject in the House again, will also lay before us the plans and profiles prepared by Mr. Thomas Keefer, which were submitted by me to the House at the time this discussion took place last year. They show very clearly indeed the enormous mischief that is being wrought in the bed of the river, by the increasing extent to which it is being filled up by saw-dust from the mills.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—I have it here.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I understand that it is very easy, in constructing a new mill, to build it so that the saw-dust can be caught and destroyed, but that in the case of old mills they are so built, that it is almost impossible to change them, so that the saw-dust can be collected and burnt. That being the case, I think very stringent laws should be enforced with regard to new mills but that old ones should be dealt more leniently with, and the owners should not be put to the immense expense of rebuilding them. Personally, I know nothing about the subject, but the information that I have is from a very good source.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I am sorry to hear that the government has any intention to interfere with the working of the act as it now stands. Anything that has been said here to-day in reference to the owners of mills, not being able to consume their saw-dust, should have no effect whatever upon the law. In the lower provinces the Fisheries Act has been more stringently enforced than in this part of the country. There the mill-owners were compelled, whether their mills were old or new, to catch and destroy their saw-dust. The expense to the mill-owners has been very great. I, unfortunately, happened to own one of the old mills. We do not find any difficulty whatever in changing the mills; there was a considerable expense, no doubt. Our mills were built over the river just as they are here. When the fishery overseers enforced the Act we found means of complying with the letter of the law. No doubt it involved great expense, which we would gladly have avoided, but still we found means to dispose of the saw-dust. The contention made on behalf of the mill-owners of the Maritime provinces, is much stronger than any claim put forward on behalf of the mill-owners at Ottawa. You must remember that the lumber that is sawn there is largely spruce. It is not worth more than 50 per cent of the value of the pine lumber that is manufactured here, consequently the percentage of cost in making the change was much heavier there than it would be at the Ottawa mills. If such a nuisance is tolerated, under the eyes of Parliament, and the law is not enforced here, you will find that the people of the Maritime provinces will have just cause to complain, and will remove their chutes, from under the mills, and allow the saw-dust to run into the river, utterly destroying the fisheries as has been done here. Our fisheries are valuable : they tell that yours were at one time quite as valuable here. We cannot afford to pay anything like as much for changing our mills in proportion to the value of our lumber as they can here. Therefore, I say the excuse of expense should not be tolerated. What we can do, and what we have been compelled by the law to do, should be enforced in every section of this Dominion. It has been stated that an exception should be made in the case of the St. John because it is an international river. How far should that apply? True, a certain portion of it is on the United States side, but how far up the St. John river do you go before you meet that? I think it is close on 200 miles, and then it only bounds the state of Maine for a short distance. Suppose the mill-owners up there put saw-dust in the river on the United States side, how much would that affect the fisheries on our side? I contend that the saw-dust entering the St. John River will affect their portion only. It will not extend to our side. For 150 miles up the river the law is enforced on both sides and in all the tributaries, as it is on the Miramichi and other rivers in New Brunswick. On the St. John River as it now stands, and I presume the law is fully enforced there, the fisheries have seven-eighths of the bed of the river that will be free from saw-dust and pollution, and it will make perfectly clean spawning beds for the fish. To appoint fishery officers to protect the fisheries, to appropriate money for breeding fish and then to put the fish in polluted streams where they will die within 24 hours, is throwing away money in a manner which should not for a moment be tolerated. The case of the St. John River will not bear investigation ; the cost of changing the mills will not bear investigation, and there is no impossibility about being able to dispose of all the saw-dust here, as we have done for many years down in the lower provinces, at all events during all my experience in the saw-mill business in the Maritime provinces.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman who it is that enforces the act in these cases?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I think the fisheries inspectors. In fact I do not know who would enforce it.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved :—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be made a survey of the Ottawa River, from the Chaudière Falls to the mouth of the Gatineau River, at as early a date as possible, to ascertain the localities, depth and extent of the deposit of saw-dust, mill or other refuse in that part of the river above indicated ; and that plans and profiles of such survey be furnished to the Senate immediately after completion.

He said : This is in order to find out whether, from the evidence of the last survey, this nuisance continued unabated, or whether it has decreased. It has been stated in some quarters that the spring freshets remove a great deal of the saw-dust. We can find by actual examination whether such is the fact or not. In my opinion, and from the best evidence I can obtain, the spring freshet has no such effect. The saw-dust continues to extend. It sinks in the river, and you will find, by an additional survey, that the deposits have very much increased. I think it highly necessary to have information before the House if the question should come to be fully considered. I am not going to enter into the merits or demerits of the case until the papers come before us. The nuisance has continued for a good many years, and the sooner it is abated the better. Mr. Edwards, of New Edinburgh, has made arrangements in his mill by which he burns the saw-dust, and if it can be done by him on the Rideau River it can be done by the mill-owners at the Chaudière. It is merely a matter of expense and that is a small matter compared with the destruction of the Ottawa River. Therefore, I hope the government will lose no time in having an additional survey made, and I hope they will employ the same officer who made the former examination, to ascertain whether the nuisance has increased or not. I think the results will alarm many in this House. The diagram last year showed a deposit of 62 feet of saw-dust, and you will find, if an investigation should be made, that that has extended considerably. The part of the river to be examined extends only from the Chaudière Falls to the Gati-neau River, and the investigation could soon be made. It will give us information which will enable us to vote intelligently on the question when it comes before us.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL introduced Bill (A) "An Act respecting Insolvency," and moved that it be read the first time. He said: In moving the first reading of the bill relating to Insolvency it were well to offer a few remarks in explanation of the measure now submitted for consideration. Hon. gentlemen will remember that a bill dealing with the subject was introduced in this House last session and referred to a Select Committee of the Senate, who after a lengthened and very careful study of its provisions and after hearing the views and suggestions of representatives of the banking and commercial interests in this country, reported to the Senate a bill which was substantially concurred in. The session was then so far advanced that it seemed impossible for it to receive in the other House that close and careful consideration that its importance demanded, and accordingly the government deemed it advisable not to proceed further with the measure last session. The bill now introduced is with some slight changes in the wording of some of the clauses to all intents and purposes the bill passed last year by the Senate. Hon. gentlemen will, however, readily understand that despite the utmost care preparing a bill containing so many clauses as this does, and which had been drafted, re-drafted, amended and re-amended, contradictory provisions would creep in and enactments be allowed to remain which were necessary in one draft but which became unnecessary in consequence of changes made in said first draft. The bill, therefore, has been carefully revised during recess and unnecessary or contradictory provisions have been eliminated or harmonized. Changes have also been made in the verbiage of some of the sections with the view of making the meaning more plain or the language more concise. The method of procedure has also in some cases been more clearly defined, but the main principles of the measure adopted by the Senate last year have not been interfered with. As the changes made, and the reasons which led to those changes, can better be discussed when the bill reaches the committee stage, I shall defer further comment until the bill reaches that stage. I therefore beg to move, seconded by Mr. Angers, that the bill "An Act respecting Insolvency," be now read the first time.

THE CHAIRMANSHIP OF THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, presented their first report, and moved that the same be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Before that report is received, I desire to call the attention of the House to an irregularity in the organization of that Committee. It was called to meet to-day at 10.45 a.m. My watch is correct, both by the gun and the clock. I left my room in plenty of time to be present at the meeting at the hour for which it was summoned, but, to my great surprise, before I reached the door of the Committee room, I met the members coming from it, and was told that the Committee had met and organized and that everything was over. This is the first time that I ever knew of such an irregularity, which certainly amounts, under the circumstances, to a discourtesy to every member of the Committee who was not present, and I cannot allow it to pass unnoticed. I wished to be on that Committee at the meeting for organization, because I knew that a new chairman had to be appointed. Although I was not ambitious for that honour myself—in fact, would not have taken it if it had been offered to me, as I have had as much experience as chairman of committees since I have been a member of this House as I desire—I thought as former leaders of this House have always thought (Sir John Abbott and Sir Alexander Campbell)—that in arranging for chairmen of the committees due regard should be had to giving fair representation to the various provinces of the Dominion. These distinguished men, who so long led this House, and with such success, and who were particular in paying the greatest deference in regard to justice and courtesy to members of this House from the various provinces representing the Dominion, always considered this a matter of very great importance. I want it to be understood that I have no personal objections to the hon. gentleman who has been chosen to preside over this committee. He has been a useful member of that committee for a great many years, but so have other gentlemen who are at present on that committee. Instead of having any personal objection to him, perhaps there is no member of this House for whom I have a higher personal esteem, and my relations with that gentleman since we have been together in this House have been of the most cordial character. The members of that committee will recollect that, on an important occasion—I allude to the time when the Baie des Chaleurs investigation was before that committee—when Mr. Dickey had to leave his place in the Senate to go to England, a vacancy occurred in the chairmanship of the committee. I was pressed by members of the committee to accept the chairmanship then; but I declined to do so, because I felt that my duty required me at the Table at that time, where I thought I could render more efficient service as an ordinary member of the committee, and on my motion, the hon. member from Sarnia was put in the chair and acted as chairman. So that it must not be supposed that any objection I make at the present moment is of a personal character, but quite the contrary. Now, what are the facts? As all hon. gentlemen are aware, there are twenty-four members from the province of Ontario in this House and twenty-four from the Maritime Provinces. Now, the twenty-four gentlemen from Ontario will have, I presume, three of the most important committees of this House. My hon. friend, the chairman of the Printing Committee, has not yet, I presume, been appointed, but there can be no doubt that that committee will not lose his valuable services and experience, and that he will be appointed chairman at its first session. Ontario will also have the important Committee on Banking and Commerce, and the Committee on Railways—three of the most important committees as regards legislation of this House. And the Maritime Provinces will have what? The chairmanship of the Committee on Contingencies, whose duties are to report as to the messengers of this House and things of that kind—a committee which has no connection with the legislation, but merely the internal economy of the House and nothing more. Of course it is a very important committee in its way, but not what you would consider a leading committee of the Senate. Although at present there are four vacancies in the representation of the Maritime Provinces, even as we stand, can such a comparison be drawn between us that three times the representation should be given the chairs the committees of this House to Ontario than to the whole of the Maritime Provinces combined? I do not think it is right, and although I presume it is no use for me to object, still I felt that the discourtesy extended to myself and others who were not allowed the regular time to get to the committee and express our views, should not be passed over in silence. Injustice is also done to several members of the committee who have served a long time on it. Can it be said that there were not gentlemen from the Maritime division qualified for the position of chairman? There is the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. He has never occupied the position of chairman of a committee of this House, but has served on committees for years, one of the oldest members of the House—where was he? I do think that it would be proper to allow this invidious distinction to be made without calling the attention of the House to it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I must thank the hon. gentleman for his very kindly reference to myself. The matter is one which he has a perfect right to bring before the House, but it is rather an awkward thing that the only person responsible for any wrong which may have been done is one who is not here to explain or defend his conduct. Now, it so happened—I do not know whether my hon. friend inadvertently mentioned the time—it so happened that this committee met at 10.30, not at 10.45, and if he came at 10.45, he was fifteen minutes behind.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I was on time according to the notice—whatever the notice was.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The notice which I received was 10.45.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes; 10.45 was the time.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I know I just met the members coming out.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I stand corrected. What I wish to call attention to in defence of the clerk, who commenced the proceedings, is this, that having noticed that a committee which had met a few minutes before had been very sharp in the way alluded to, and concluded proceedings before I reached the room—I was desirous that this should not be repeated in the Railway Committee, and I can call upon my hon. friend the Premier, who was also there taking an interest in it, to vouch for the fact that the clerk consulted his watch and was careful not to call the meeting to order until the proper time arrived. He assured me that his time was right with the tower clock. I think it is right that I should make this explanation in order to excuse the course which was taken and which seems to have been premature. However, I cannot refrain from expressing my deep sense of the kind manner in which my hon. friend has spoken of myself. It is no doubt an honour to be conferred on any member to occupy such a position; at the same time, it is an honour which involves trouble and some work and sacrifice of time. As far as the honour is concerned, I would willingly pass it over to any hon. gentleman in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I deeply regret that any member of the committee should feel aggrieved at anything that occurred, more particularly arising out of an accident, if such it were, on the part of the clerk. I was sitting alongside of him and he consulted me as to calling the meeting to order. I told him to be cautious and not call it before the time had expired. His reply was "It is now 3½ minutes; you have more than a quorum. Shall I call them to order." I said "No, wait until your watch indicates the proper minute," and I did make this jocular remark to him, "I think, in a matter of this kind, you acting as chairman, should pursue the same policy as we do at elections: we take the returning-officer's watch as our guide and not our own."

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I heard you say it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And my hon. friend from British Columbia will remember we were very cautious in telling the clerk not to call the meeting to order until the proper time by his watch. I regret a great deal more the fact that my hon. friend from Richmond should have supposed for a moment, or that he should think it possible—I will put it as strong as that—that I should do any act in this House for the purpose of throwing discredit, or an act which might be considered discourteous to any member of the Senate. I have been exceedingly careful since I have been here, knowing the length of time my hon. friend and others have sat in this House, not to do anything that would bring me in conflict with any of them. In reference to my selection of the member from Sarnia, his name was suggested by a large number of the committee. I explained to them that I had received a letter from Mr. Dickey declining further election. In introducing the name of Mr. Vidal, I mentioned to the committee the reasons why the former chairman was not here, deeply regretting—and I repeat it—the cause which retains him at his home. There was not a man who approached me, or whose opinion I asked in reference to a successor to Mr. Dickey, but united in recommending the hon. gentleman from Sarnia. I knew that he had been a very valuable member of committees on which he had acted as chairman, or had anything to do with, and had always attended to the public business most assiduously. It was not upon my own responsibility alone, or altogether, but on the concentration—if I may use that expression—of opinion of the members of the committee who spoke to me on the question of the chairmanship, that Mr. Vidal was selected. I repeat and with a great deal of sincerity, that I disavow in the strongest possible manner any intention or desire to cast a reflection upon any one. I was not responsible for the calling of the committee at the moment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not insinuate anything of that kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, my hon. friend did not insinuate anything of that kind, but he did throw out the insinuation, which I do not hesitate to repudiate in the strongest possible language, that I had shown discourtesy to any hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not use any such language.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman referred to my predecessors and said that they had been very cautious not to do any such thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is a different thing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That implies the same thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Oh no, it does not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am glad to hear my honourable friend's disavowal because it has been my good fortune, since I have been in the House, to be on friendly terms with my honourable friend. Nothing would grieve me more than to suppose that one of the oldest members of the House, whom I have looked up to for advice and assistance, could by any possibility believe that I could be guilty of an action of that kind. I go further than that while I recognize the fact that every section of the Dominion should be represented equitably upon the committees, we ought to ignore as far as possible what might be termed "provincialisms" in the administration of public affairs in this country. I appeal to the senior member from Halifax whether I have not, on many occasions, in striking committees called attention to the fact that members from certain provinces should be equally represented on the different committees. I only mention this to show the hon. member from Richmond, if he has any such idea, that so far as I am concerned I desire to see every province properly represented on the committees, particularly where they would be interested in the legislation which might come before us. The chairmanships held by Ontario members, as I understand it, are precisely the same this year as in former years. My hon. friend shakes his head—perhaps I am in error—

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The chairmanship of the Railway Committee has been taken away from the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One of the others had been taken from an Ontario man and given to a Nova Scotian.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Who is that one?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Hon. Senator from Quinté Division (Mr. Read) used to be chairman of the Committee on Contingencies. He has been replaced by a Nova Scotian.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Hon. Mr. McKay was the chairman of the Contingent Accounts Committee last year. I am talking of this year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am talking of last year as well as of this year. Nobody objected to the change which was made last year, and I should be sorry to see any question of the kind arise now.

The Joint Committee on Printing has been presided over alternately year after year by two members from Ontario. When the chairmanship was in this House the Hon. Senator from Quinté was generally the chairman, and when it was in the House of Commons, Dr. Bergin, from Cornwall, was chairman. There has been no change in that for a great many years. I was on that committee for twenty-five years and I never heard this provincial question being even mooted. I have the following note from the law clerk, and I think it is only justice to him that I should read it in order that the House may understand that he did not do anything with the intention of exceeding his duties :

Please say my watch was set by the tower clock. I did so when coming in and as a matter of fact my watch was  $1\frac{1}{2}$  minutes slow by that clock, and I called the Committee to order at 10.45 precisely.

So that by his own statement he called the meeting a minute and a half too late.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. leader of the government has endeavoured to leave the impression on the House that I accused him of a desire to treat unfairly or improperly members of the House in his action on this committee. In referring to the two previous leaders of the Senate in connection with the Conservative party, I referred to their practice without any intention of casting a reflection upon him more than would arise from an inadvertency. But the result of an inadvertency is just the same as if the act were intentional. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the fact that I have given this matter a provincial aspect. In reply to that I will only say my record in this House will show that no member has been less sectional or been less given to sectional prejudices than I have been since I have had the honour to occupy a seat in the Senate, and no member has been more ready to concede to portions of the Dominion outside of his own district their just rights than I have been, but what I contend is that it is wise and proper to keep certain conditions and facts in view in regulating the business of this House. You cannot ignore them, but I think it is altogether out of the question for the party that does ignore them and get all the advantage to be gained by ignoring them, to turn round and say that we should not think of these things at all. If the provinces which are ignored should say so, it would have some force, but it has no force in the mouth of a gentleman representing a province which gets the advantage of all the want of fair play exercised in the appointment of chairman of committees for the present session. I do not want to prolong this discussion, but I am very glad that I raised it, and if it will have no good effect at the present time, I hope it will not be forgotten in the future.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My name has been mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Richmond in this matter, and I am thankful to him for the manner in which he brought it up. I certainly think that the meeting was called some minutes before the time designated in the notice. A messenger came and told me that a quorum was wanted, and that I should come in. I went in, thinking I was ahead of time some five minutes, though I did not look at my watch. I always deem it an honour to preside over any committee. I have acted temporarily as chairman of the Railway Committee in the absence of the regular chairman, and had my name been mentioned on this occasion to fill the position I should have hesitated whether to accept the honour or not, but I was never consulted in the matter, nor did anyone speak to me about it. I consider, myself, that Mr. Vidal having been attentive to his duties as a member of the committee—as I have been myself, for I have never failed in my duties as a member of the House—that the appointment was appropriate. I have been here twenty-four years and have never failed to do my duty, though at times it might be unpleasant to some members and place me in opposition to a majority of the committee, especially on the Divorce Committee. I understand that thoroughly. Last year I stood alone in my independent judgment of matters, and the result was that my position was confirmed by this House and by the other House. The result was what generally happens when a man asserts his conscientious convictions and follows them up by his acts. That has been my course in this House and outside of it, in my private relations as well as in politics—I have never allowed myself to be driven into a position that my opinions did not justify. I have never asked for or received any favours of the government; neither do I impose or volunteer advice. I simply stand by the government, believing in its general policy. Although I am well pleased to see Mr. Vidal chairman of the committee, yet there is a good deal of force in what my hon. friend from Richmond has said as to fair representation of the different provinces on the committee.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—If the library clock is right the committee must have adjourned five minutes before the time it was summoned to meet. I had five minutes to go from the library to attend the committee, and I met the members of the committee in the corridor coming away from the meeting. My only regret is that I was not there to vote for Mr. Vidal as chairman, which I should have done. The premature meeting was an irregularity which I hope will not occur again. There are other irregularities this session which I think might well be reformed. For instance, this session has been called at an irregular time of the year, and although we have been nearly two weeks in attendance, to-day we have an order paper with nothing on it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The clerk of the committee opened the meeting by his watch, which is set by the tower clock. I find that the tower clock is about  $4\frac{1}{2}$  minutes ahead of the cannon and that might account for his unwittingly opening the committee meeting before the right time.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND IMMIGRATION

A SUGGESTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As there seems to be nothing before the House, I ask permission of this House to call attention to a possible action. Yesterday when the report on the standing committees was moved for adoption, it was my intention to call the attention of the House to the suggestion which I am about to make, but I missed my opportunity. There is in the House of Commons a standing committee on Agriculture and Immigration. I want to ask this House whether it would not be a good thing for this House to have a similar committee, or rather a Joint Committee with the other House. It is a very important matter and would bring the Senate in close connection with the Commons on this subject. I do not know what proceedings should be taken to have this suggestion carried out, but I did not wish to do anything before seeing whether it was agreeable to this House or not.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This is a subject in which my department is most interested, and I will consult the members of this House and know exactly what is the intention of the leader of the government upon the question of the usefulness of having a joint committee with the Commons, and will ascertain also if it would be agreeable to have such a joint committee. In a few days I will be in a position to give the hon. gentleman and the House information upon the subject.

The Senate adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adoption of the first report of the Committee on Divorce re William Colton petition. He said: The committee found that the proceedings in this case had been regular and in accordance with the rules laid down by the House. Personal service has been effected on the respondent.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV introduced Bill (B) "An Act for the relief of William Wallace Colton."

The bill was read the first time.

THE FALDING DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adoption of the second report of the Committee on Divorce re Mary Bradshaw Falding petition. He said: In this case also the proceedings have been complied with as the rules direct.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV introduced Bill (C) "An Act for the relief of Mary Bradshaw Falding."

The bill was read the first time.

THE JARVIS DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adoption of the Third Report of the Committee on Divorce re Helen Woodburn Jarvis. He said: What I have said with regard to the two preceding reports applies equally well to this report.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV introduced Bill (D) "An Act for the relief of Helen Woodburn Jarvis."

The bill was read the first time.

THE ODELL DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the adoption of the fourth report of the committee on Divorce re Luke Sewell Odell petition. He said: There has been a counter petition filed in answer to the petition of the applicant herein. It seems that in this particular matter the applicant, previous to taking proceedings for the passage of this bill, had instituted proceedings en séparation de corps et de biens in the Superior Court of Quebec. The trial judge pronounced judgment in favour of the petitioner upon those proceedings. There was afterwards an appeal taken from the Superior Court to the Court of Queen's Bench in the same province, and the five judges constituting the Court of Appeal unanimously reversed the decision of the court of first instance, I understand. The petitioner, or the applicant—because there are two petitioners—the applicant, Luke Sewell Odell, then instituted an appeal in the Supreme Court of Canada from the finding of the Court of Queen's Bench, reversing the judgment of the court of first instance, but in the meantime he had instituted proceedings here for the purpose of obtaining a bill of divorce from Parliament. The counter petition desires that the proceedings before this House should be stayed, pending the hearing of the case before the Supreme Court of Canada. The disposition of the committee is that there should be no interference with the proceedings now pending before the courts, but that all the facts should be before the committee. It was thought desirable that both parties should be heard before the committee by their counsel in regard to this counter petition. The applicant, apparently, has not been served with notice of this counter petition having been laid, and therefore, in justice to both parties, it was thought desirable that an opportunity should be given to them to appear before the committee and to show cause why the proceedings should be continued before Parliament, or why they should be stayed before Parliament, pending the proceedings to which I have already referred. The report, therefore, recommends that notice be served on both parties to appear before the committee and show cause why the proceedings should be continued, or stayed, as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—Does that necessarily affect the first reading of the bill?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—I understand everything is ready, as far as the application to this House is concerned, and the only thing is the consideration of this counter petition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, everything is quite regular, according to the rules.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—I thought the bill might be introduced to-day and taken into consideration at another time. However, if it is understood that it will not be delayed in any way, I have no objection. Of course, it cannot be heard until after the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would suggest to my hon. friend from Rideau Division that if the steps were taken at once, it might be possible to have the parties appear before the committee before the adjournment takes place. I do not know whether they have to come from Quebec, but I understand the solicitors for the applicant are Ottawa gentlemen. I am unaware who the solicitors for the respondent are. Possibly they may be here also and appear before the committee.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—As long as it will not debar the petitioner in any way, there is no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 4 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 2nd May, 1895.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE GRAIN TRADE AT PORT ARTHUR.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved:—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return of the number of bushels of wheat delivered to the elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, and the grade; the number of bushels loaded on vessels, and the grade; the nationality and destination of the vessels carrying the grain; also, a copy of the conditions of the grade as fixed by the Board of Inspectors assembled for the purpose of fixing the grade for 1894.

He said: I had intended to ask the House to allow this motion to stand until after the recess, but as the hon. member from Richmond has a motion on the paper with regard to a question which is perhaps of more immediate public interest than this one at the present moment, I shall merely move for the return without giving any reasons for doing so, and when the papers are brought down I shall be in a better position, perhaps, to discuss the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no objection to the motion, so far as it is in the power of the government to bring down the information asked for. The question is one involving a rather important matter in connection with the carrying trade. It may be of advantage to the House and to the country to hear the hon. gentleman's views, and all the information that can be brought down will be produced.

The motion was agreed to.

THE HUDSON BAY RAILWAY SUBSIDY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all Orders in Council, letters or other papers relating to any subsidy, loan or guarantee, in connection with the Hudson Bay Railway within the last two years.

He said: I think the House will agree with me that it is very desirable that accurate and full information should be placed before the Senate in regard to the subject of this motion, at the earliest possible moment. This subject has been brought to the notice of the House of Commons, and the Finance Minister has promised that all information in connection with it shall be duly submitted to that House, but I consider it is only proper, in event of legislation being required at the hands of Parliament in connection with it, that we should have, in the regular way, all the papers connected with the Order in Council before this House as well as before the other branch of Parliament. It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that in the session of 1891, a bill was introduced and passed through Parliament granting a subsidy to the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway, a subsidy of $80,000 per annum for twenty years in connection with the road from Winnipeg to the North Saskatchewan, a distance of about 250 miles. That bill received the sanction of Parliament, and was very strongly supported in this House. I myself spoke and voted in favour of it, and I thought at the time the legislation was, as far as we could foresee, wise and proper. The subsidy asked for on that occasion was of a special character, although an instance of the same kind had occurred with regard to legislation in the North-west Territories before. Under the terms of the Act granting that subsidy the company undertook to render service to the government in the carrying of mails, men and materials to the full value of the money which Parliament agreed to give them. At that time I thought the legislation was in the public interest, and if our financial circumstances were to-day what they were then, I have no doubt I should be prepared to vote as I did on that occasion. But I need not remind hon. gentlemen that the circumstances of the country have very much changed since then. We have gone through a period of financial depression. We have arrived at a condition in our financial affairs which unfortunately was not anticipated at that time, and we are facing now a very large deficit in the revenue. I think, therefore, that as our position is very different at the present moment, it is the duty of Parliament to view with the greatest care and caution any fresh liability which we may be asked to assume. The Act of 1891 contemplated the construction of a colonization road. It was supported in this House strongly and chiefly on the ground that it was a colonization road, but it was very well understood that in case of the completion at any time of the larger project of the Hudson Bay Railway it would form the initial section of that line. It was in view of these facts that Parliament passed the Act of 1891. It is well known to hon. gentlemen that within the last year strenuous efforts have been made to get a further subsidy or further aid in some way, and if rumour be correct—and I think we have more than rumour to go on—we have in fact the utterances of the Finance Minister in another place—an Order in Council has been passed within the last year by which a subsidy or loan of $10,000 per mile is to be given to the same section of the road provided for in the Act of 1891—more as a colonization road than as the initial section of a through Hudson Bay Railway, amounting in the whole to the sum of $2,500,000. It is true the government have no power to appropriate the revenues of the country without the sanction of Parliament, and I take it for granted that that Order in Council was passed with the provision that it was subject to the approval of Parliament. I cannot suppose that the government has done anything else, and if Parliament does not see fit to ratify the position the government has assumed there will be no harm done. Now, I need not dilate to any extent upon the present financial condition of this country. We all know that a deficit of some millions will be upon us during the present year, and that we are imperatively required under the circumstances to be most careful in regard to the public expenditures. I am happy to perceive that the Finance Minister fully realizing his responsibility under the circumstances has very largely cut down the estimates for the present year, and we are told further that no supplementary estimates are to be introduced. Whether this is to be taken as conclusive that the government does not intend to recommend a large subsidy or loan of two millions and a half to this section of the Hudson Bay Railway or not, I do not know. There are so many ways in which the expressions from a Minister in either branch of Parliament can be explained away, that it might be just possible that the government intend to adhere to their policy as foreshadowed in this Order in Council. I hope, however, such is not the case, but should it unfortunately turn out to be true that in the present depressed condition of our finances this large liability is to be added to the public indebtedness, I hope that the fate which overtook the Short Line Railway Bill a few years ago—and which redounded so largely to the credit of the Senate—will be meted out to this new endeavour to saddle the country with a new and unnecessary burden. If my information is correct, the subsidy is altogether excessive for the work which is intended to be done. If the whole line from Winnipeg to York Factory on the Hudson Bay were under contract, $10,000 per mile might not be too large a subsidy because the country from the Saskatchewan to the waters of the Hudson Bay is admitted to be a very difficult country for the construction of a railway, but the line from Winnipeg to the North Saskatchewan is admitted to go through a very fine agricultural country where the road can be built and equipped—it is said on good authority for seven or eight thousand dollars per mile. If this be the case, the House will perceive that the government must have committed itself to a very improvident bargain indeed. I shall await with interest the explanations I shall receive on this point, before commenting any further upon it, but I think it is necessary now that some expression of this House should have been had with regard to the policy of any further railway expenditure in the North-west at the present time at the expense of the Dominion. It must be admitted that having regard to the proportion of population, Manitoba and the North-west have railway communication and facilities greater than any other country perhaps in the world. Although I would be one of the first to do anything in my power to open up that country and develop its resources, and would be willing to go as far as any man to construct a through line to Hudson Bay, if communication with the outside world for commercial purposes was feasible by that route—although I say I would be willing to go as far as any member of this House to support a scheme tending to that result, I do not believe even if we had all the information we would require—which we have not on these points, that at the present moment we are in a position to assume any fresh responsibility. I see by the papers recently that the contractors have gone out to Manitoba and intend to enter at once upon the work of construction. Now, I think it would be a kindness on our part to let them know that they should not do so hastily—they should not incur any expenditure until they are satisfied that Parliament is at the back of the government in regard to this project, and if they do, they should be given to understand it is at their own risk. They must be warned in time that if they make any mistake of this kind, it will give them no claim to be reimbursed their losses from the public funds. I will conclude my remarks which, to some extent, may, perhaps, be considered premature in the absence of the information I desire to obtain, by reading an extract from the Montreal Gazette, an organ not unfriendly to the government, the sound sense of whose article must commend it to the approval of this House :

A despatch from Ottawa brings information that Mr. Hugh Sutherland has gone west for the purpose of starting, with the new contractors, the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. The despatch adds that it is intended to begin building immediately at Gladstone, Manitoba, under the terms of the Order in Council passed on the subject. It would be prudent, in our opinion, before any liabilities are created in connection with this work that the contractors should be assured that the money to pay them will be forthcoming when earned, and that the government should be assured that the Order in Council will be approved by Parliament. Our understanding of the subject is that the Order in Council commits the Cabinet to nothing beyond a submission of the propositions of the company to Parliament with a favourable recommendation, so that if in the view of Parliament it is inexpedient and undesirable to burden the public finances with a large liability on account of this project, the responsibility of the government will at once terminate. The contractors, therefore, might do worse in their own interest than to refrain from spending money in connection with the work they have undertaken until their security is better determined. The business of the ministry is with Parliament and the public, and it would be well to ascertain the opinion of both upon the merits of the proposed aid to the Hudson Bay road before any steps in the direction of legislation are even attempted.

I hope this warning voice will be heeded by the promoters of the Hudson Bay Railway and that the work of construction will not be entered on until it is certain that Parliament is at the back of the government in regard to its new policy.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before the hon. leader of the government replies to the hon. member from Richmond, I should like to take advantage of the question that has been put by the hon. member to give some information, as well as my views upon the subject that is now before this House, in view of the public interest that is being taken in the project, not only in the press of Canada but in the minds of a large number of people. Before proceeding with the subject I desire to point out this fact, that it is doubtful what the motive is for the opposition to the Hudson Bay Railway, whether it is in consequence of the possibility of its diverting trade and traffic from eastern channels, or whether it is in consequence of the large grant that it is proposed to give in aid of the enterprise. Probably a little of both may be the incentive that has led to the criticism that it is now receiving. I would, however, say this that so far as diverting trade and traffic from eastern channels is concerned, the people of Canada are now permitting, in consequence of the policy which is being pursued with regard to our trade and navigation laws, the wheat trade of that great western country to find its way by the city of New York to Europe instead of through the port of Montreal. We all know in the west that the bulk of the wheat trade of our western country found its way this year by way of Buffalo and the Erie Canal, through the port of New York, and if we are going to be satisfied that our trade and traffic shall pass through New York instead of by way of Montreal what objection can there be in allowing the Hudson Bay Railway to go on if we, in that western country, believe that it is a practicable route and that it is going to increase the competition that is absolutely essential to the welfare of the people in that country? The argument that the Hudson Bay Railway is going to divert the trade and traffic is met by the statement you had better try and keep the trade of Canada in Canadian channels before you complain that we are trying to divert it to another route. At all events, if it goes by Hudson Bay, it will go through Canadian ports instead of through United States ports. One thing that we lack in that western country in our inland transportation is competition. Competition is absolutely necessary for our success. Without competition we are borne down by the monopoly of one or two railways, and it is impossible for us to conduct our operations and produce our grain and make a reasonable profit so as to induce our people to remain there for the benefit of the country, or to bring fresh immigrants there.

I should like to point out to hon. gentlemen this fact in relation to our transportation—it will come out when the report of the commission on freight rates is laid before this honourable House—that in the report of the Department of Railways and Canals last year, and in fact every year, you will find on page 467 a showing of the train mileage earnings of the various railways in Canada. Every railway in Canada is shown there, and you can see what its train mileage earnings are. It is by the train mileage earnings that the public can see what the railways are accomplishing. In the Canadian Pacific Railway returns the train mileage earnings are shown to be $1.50 per mile; in the Grand Trunk Railway returns $1.03 per mile, and Intercolonial 69cts. per train mile. In other words, the people of the western country have to bear a train mileage earning of $1.50—that is to say, the traffic that passes over their lines is charged amounts sufficient to pay an earning of $1.50 per train mile. The average rate that is charged to the people of the province of Ontario on the Grand Trunk Railway is $1.03 per train mile, and as I said before, in the case of the Intercolonial 69cts., and until the Minister of Railways took hold of the road and brought up the returns, it was, I believe only 49 cents per train mile that the people who provide traffic for the Intercolonial were paying. But I would further point out that the Canadian Pacific Railway is divided into two parts; 2,500 miles is east of Callander station, and 3,500 miles west of Callander station. All the 3,500 miles of road west of Callander station is supported by our western trade, and what through traffic may pass over it between the Atlantic and the Pacific. The traffic east of Callander on the 2,500 miles is mainly supported by the province of Ontario. When the Canadian Pacific Railway comes into competition with the Grand Trunk Railway, the train mileage earnings naturally come down to $1.03. When it comes into competition with roads in the maritime provinces, it must come down to that of the Intercolonial. Therefore, if the Canadian Pacific Railway earns on an average on 6,000 miles $1.50 per train mile, and it has to carry freight at a lower rate in the eastern section of the country, it is natural to suppose that they would have to charge us who supply the traffic in the North-west, $2.50 per train mile, which I think is about the average that the people in the western country have to pay for their traffic. Now, it is in order to get rid of this excessive burden by competition that the people of the west are so intent upon finding an outlet by way of Hudson Bay. I merely mention these rates in order to show hon. gentlemen the incentive that exists to secure an additional outlet and further competition in our western country. In order to do that, hon. gentlemen know what my views are with regard to the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway. They have always been that it should be constructed as a public work. I do not think, that any private corporation can take hold of the Hudson Bay Railway and build and carry it on successfully. The main incentive of many people to secure the construction of that road is to carry on the operation of constructing it and make what profits there may be in the construction of a road of that kind. After the resources supplied by public aid have been exhausted, then the road has to rely entirely upon the development of what we all admit is a difficult route at the present moment. There are many things that will have to be done in order to maintain the efficiency of the road and make it successful. For that reason, I have always held that it should be constructed as a public work. I do not know that the public mind is sufficiently advanced to induce the government or either of the governments in the west, or the government of Canada to undertake it as a public work at the present moment. Therefore, we go on to the consideration of the question that is put by the

hon. member from Richmond, as to the advisability of granting $10,000 per mile for 250 miles of the road as a direct bonus to the enterprise. I agree with my hon. friend that that is an excessive amount, that a bonus should not be granted in that way. There are modes in which the same ends could be arrived at without putting into the hands of the contractors and promoters of railways such a heavy asset in order that they may reap the benefit and profit of it themselves. Our experience in the west has been that the public aid that has been granted has not gone to the reduction of freight rates or to the maintenance of the road after expenditure has been exhausted—that it has been absorbed in the cost of construction, and I believe the result will be the same in regard to the construction of the Hudson Bay Railway, under the grant of $10,000 per mile. In my opinion, that great North-west country is going to support railways very profitably such as the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Manitoba and North-western, the North-west Central and South-western, when it becomes populated and people are producing traffic for export, and making wealth so that they can travel and bring in large quantities of merchandise. Every one of those lines is going to be self-supporting, and will yield a fair financial return in profits after the cost of operating has been fully provided for. I am now referring to those lines wholly situated in the prairie belt. All those lines that are situated outside the prairie belt, in the Rocky Mountains and between Lake Superior and easterly, will be supported by the production and trade of the prairie belt, but those lines that are in the prairie belt will of themselves be very profitable. I say, as one coming from that country, that any aid to those lines should be given in such a way that the whole burden will fall upon the traffic of the railway company itself. But what do we find? When a railway like the Manitoba and North-western, the North-west Central, or a colonization road such as the one now under consideration is to be built, we find that the bonds that are issued bear 6 per cent interest, and when they are put on the English market they do not realize more than 60, 70 or 80 cents on the dollar according to the confidence of the public in the company promoting it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And they pay no interest. None of those roads are paying any interest—the Manitoba and North-western or the North-west Central.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can tell you that the Manitoba and North-western Railway traffic earnings show, according to the report made at the investigation by the present bond-holders, that there was an earning of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on the bonds over and above the cost of operating the road.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—The road is in the hands of a receiver.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, at the instigation of the company. There is a very great difference between being in the hands of a receiver at the instigation of the owners, and being in the hands of a receiver at the instigation of the creditors. Mr. Allan, the owner of the road, had a receiver appointed. However, I wish to lead up to the point: if you say it is never going to be profitable to build a road there, and never going to pay any interest and you will not give any aid, there will never be any development or any construction there.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Never is a long time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Well, it will be a long time as far as you and I are concerned. We want to see the development of the country proceed upon an intelligent basis. As I have said, in raising money to build these roads, the bonds bear 6 per cent interest. The amount we receive is not par value, but 60, 70 or 80 cents on the dollar as the case may be, and therefore there is not only a heavy burden of interest to pay on the bonds, but there is a heavy depreciation of capital which goes into the cost of constructing the road. I am perfectly confident that under ordinary circumstances those roads can bear their own burdens and pay their own way, but it takes a short time before a population can be placed in a new district opened out by a railway and become productive to create an earning power through its production. In the case of the Manitoba and North-western Railway to which the hon. leader of the opposition has referred, it starts at Portage la Prairie and goes out into the great western prairie where there is no terminus and no population. To Russell where I live there is only a weekly service. To Yorkton, the terminus, there is only a weekly service. You cannot expect rapid development under such circumstances, or great earning power, especially where there is no western connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under the rates that are being charged at present on the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is self-evident that those portions of the line from Winnipeg westward in the province of Manitoba are eminently profitable. If they are not profitable where the population exists and production exists, what is it that maintains the mileage earning of $1.50 per mile? or for $2.50 per train mile as it must be in the case of the 3,500 miles west of Callander. I mention that to show that in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway it is eminently profitable. Why is it profitable? Because the road maintains a daily through service and maintains itself in a state of efficiency that gives every facility to the population along the line to produce successfully so far as the management of the road is concerned. When it comes to the question of the division of profits between those who produce and those who take the money for the traffic, then I must diverge from them, but when it refers to the management of the road, I say they deserve all the success that has attended their management for the way they have conducted their road. We see the flourishing towns of Moosomin, Virden, Brandon and other towns along the line. We see prosperous settlements growing up every eight or ten miles along the railway. Is it not a great advantage to Canada that that should be so? If new districts can be opened up, will it not add to the wealth of Canada? Is not a great portion of the earnings of the people out there drained through eastern Canada in consequence of the distribution of the products of their industry year after year? Have we not in one year sent out 15,000,000 bushels of wheat and some 35,000 head of cattle? Is not that an advantage to the people of Canada? The people in eastern Canada are as much interested in the development of that western country as the people out there, and therefore we should approach this question not in a spirit of hostility or viewing it as a diversion of traffic to another route, but as a measure calculated to advance the prosperity of that country in order that the whole of Canada may benefit from the enormous exporting power it possesses. The soil is all ready for the plough, the grass is there for the cattle to feed upon and all that is needed is additional labour to extend the producing and exporting power of the people of Canada and to add to the greatness and wealth of the country. At the present moment the Hudson Bay Railway has a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile within the bounds of the province of Manitoba, and a land grant of 12,800 acres per mile beyond the boundaries of Manitoba. The route is divided into two portions; the first is looked upon as a colonization road, through a good region, and the other runs through a rocky region. Then there is a grant of $80,000 a year for twenty years in order to extend it as far as the Saskatchewan River. The promoters of the road found that they could not raise the money on that grant; they could not induce capitalists to go into it as a colonization railway upon such a magnificent grant as that. There must be something wrong with the credit of the country, or the railway credit of the country, or with the enterprise itself, if a grant of $80,000 a year for twenty years, backed by a land grant of six thousand four hundred acres per mile and the ownership of the railway itself going through a fertile country, does not induce capitalists to invest money. It may be a combination of the whole three which prevents capitalists taking hold of an enterprise of that kind. Unfortunately the Manitoba and North-western Railway has been placed in the hands of a receiver, and the North-west Central Railway has been placed in the hands of a receiver in consequence of a fight between the company and the contractor. It is the interest of Canada to assist in the development of country through which these railways pass, by promoting railway enterprise. It is utterly impossible for a man to drive his grain 50, 60, 70 or 80 miles to market. We can go out there and live no doubt—one might possibly go to the North Pole and live, but he would have to live out there alone. If a man going into that country and settles in a far off region where he is unable to distribute the products of his industry, the country reaps very little benefit, indeed, from his labour. What I suggest is, that instead of handing over 6,400 acres of land per mile to the Hudson Bay Railway, and offering a subsidy in money as well, it would be far more feasible to retain the subsidy under the control of the government for the benefit of the country and of the people who are going to reside there. Let the government retain the land grant in their own hands. I say, without fear of contradiction by any one that knows that country, that the upset value of land in Manitoba and the North-west Territories—that is, land fairly fit for agricultural settlement—is $5 per acre, and I would a great deal rather purchase land at that figure near a railway, than do as I have done—take up a homestead and go through all the hardships of making a home away from a railway. The upset price of the Hudson Bay lands is $5 an acre, school lands the same. The North-west Land Co., and the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., are realizing on sales nearly the same. Instead of giving the lands to the railway company, the government should hold them in trust for the future development of the country, and throw the burden upon such a line as the present one in consideration, or any other railway in that country, so that when the country is developed, it may pay back to the public all that it may have secured in the way of aid.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After listening to what the hon. gentleman says with regard to the land grant, I do not see how he proposes to build the road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am coming to that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would the hon. gentleman tell us what population is settled north of Gladstone, say, for 20 miles on each side of the projected line, for the first 200 miles?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The only means I have to answer the hon. gentleman's question is the report of the revising barrister who went out there the first time to make a list of voters. Recollect, the district that I am speaking about is the district that I represent in this House. He found in the Lake Dauphin district one thousand voters. That represents a population of, say, 2,500.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Five thousand.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There are a good many bachelors there. What I wish to say is this, that if the government were to guarantee the bonds of the line—I am not speaking of this line only, but take, say, the Manitoba and North-western, which is also a line that is hardly treated and wants assistance to reach Prince Albert—supposing the government were to take back the unearned land grant, and guarantee the bonds, take the first lien on the railway itself and then set aside 6,400 acres of land per mile to be specially hypothecated as security for the guarantee the government give the bonds, and let those bonds bear three per cent interest, what would be the result? The railway company would be able to get 100 cents on the bonds in consequence of the Dominion guarantee, so that there would be a dollar available for construction where there is only sixty or seventy cents available under the present system. Then, in addition to that, instead of paying six per cent interest on the bonds which the traffic has to bear, it would only have to pay three per cent, so that we would be gaining at both ends, gaining in capital available for the construction of the road, thereby cheapening the cost of it, and in the interest on the capital account, and when hon. gentlemen realize that we have to pay on an haulage of 1,000 miles of inland transportation, you will understand the importance of the question to us. Is the railway itself with all its equipment considered sufficient security for the road? If it is not, then you have 6,400 acres of land per mile of the public lands, set aside as collateral security, that the treasury will never be called upon to meet any obligation in connection with the line.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The country owns that land now.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You propose to give that away under the present system. You gave twenty-five millions of acres to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and two or three millions to the Manitoba and North-western. If you give them away they pass into private hands, and the $5 an acre that is charged to the people has to be paid all the same. What I say is, do not give them the lands, but hold them as collateral security set aside for any particular guarantee that you may make in connection with the construction of a line in that north-western country. Apply the proceeds of sale to a reduction of the government's responsibility, and I say, without fear of contradiction, that within five or six years after the line has been constructed in that way, the traffic that the people will supply to the road, with that low rate of interest on the capital, will yield such a revenue that the government will never be called upon to pay a cent. I say further—issue a certain amount of bonds, say $15,000 a mile, and retain say $3,000 per mile of that in order to meet the first two or three years' interest. The cost of construction and equipment is about $12,000 per mile on prairie land.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Will the bonds float.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, they will be readily taken up in the English market. In England anything that Canada's name is attached to, I am happy to say, is worth its face value. By doing that, the cost of constructing the road is cheapened, the interest is less, and the country benefits from the construction of the line. Now, in regard to the particular section of the country in question, there is another railway which we are interested in. We want to get direct connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway on the west. At present, if we want to send out a carload of butter, or if we want to bring in a carload of coal or shingles—if we want to communicate with the western markets, we have to send our produce and bring our supplies round by way of Portage la Prairie, which entails an additional mileage of 400 miles. We settled in our district (and a very fine district it is) expecting that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be built in that direction. For public reasons it was diverted from there to a more southern line, and at present we have no direct connection with the west. We are put under an unnecessary and heavy tax to make our western connections. In addition to that, Regina is the capital of the North-west Territories. I am on the boundary between Manitoba and the North-west Territory, and the people who live immediately west of me have all their associations with Regina, while I have to come east to Winnipeg. All the witnesses and judges who have dealings out there, have to come around by Portage la Prairie, or else drive 150 miles. Hon. gentlemen will remember that I applied for a charter for the purpose of bridging that difficulty if possible. There is a railway called the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway, whose bonds were issued and lodged in a London bank, and the company were ready to go on with the construction of the road, but on the land grant alone they could not raise the money. As I came through Winnipeg, there was a complaint made to me there by the people interested in the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway that the land set aside for the promotion of that particular railway had been taken to promote the Hudson Bay Railway. Now, let us utilize the lands of that western country instead of alienating and dissipating them, as we have done. Do not place them in the hands of any one company. I do not find fault with the policy heretofore pursued, because it was done for the best at the time, but if we find that it has not accomplished all the results that we expected it would, can we not find a more intelligent way of developing that country by adopting another system. What I recommend is that the government, instead of giving these lands away to a railway company, should utilize them in some such way as I suggest, and by doing so the Manitoba and North-western Railway, which is now in the hands of a receiver, would effect a western connection with Regina, and we would have a direct connection with the city of Winnipeg in the east and Regina in the west. The Great North-west Central would enjoy the same advantage. One of the difficulties we suffer from is the sparseness of our population, odd-numbered sections alienated and vacant. If the government were to put $5.00 an acre on the odd-numbered sections, throw them open for settlement on the payment of 3 per cent interest on that amount annually until paid for, settlers without capital could then enter into settlement on a rental of $24.00 per year. Settlement would then be promoted, and a revenue would be derivable from our public resources which could be husbanded for future development. The moment you put the Manitoba and North-western in that connection, you enable them to maintain a daily train service past our door through to Regina and make it a profitable route, where to-day it is in the hands of a receiver. Take the Manitoba and North-western Railway in its promotion to Prince Albert; we all want to see it built on to Prince Albert, and Battleford and Edmonton, and so on, across the continent because the country is a fine country along the whole route, pronounced by Government surveyors to be the fertile belt. It will pay the country; it will be a profitable investment for Canada. It will be a great aid in the distribution of the profits of labour and industry in that country. It is a country capable of great production, and we can find a profitable market in Great Britain for every single thing that we grow. It has been stated that we cannot grow wheat as cheaply or as successfully there as they can in other countries. That is a mistake, while perhaps we cannot grow it as cheaply as the Argentine Republic, we can grow much better wheat, which makes up for a portion of the difference. The value of wheat in the North-west country is 15c. more than in Ontario. Its value is actually in the baking power of the flour made from the wheat. A bag of flour which was manufactured up there was brought down here and tested in Belleville, or Trenton, or somewhere, against a bag of Ontario flour, and it made 12 pounds more bread per 100 lbs. of flour. There is the difference—one is soft wheat and the other hard wheat. These are facts which cannot be ignored. That gives a value to our wheat which the wheat of the Argentine Republic and other places does not possess. Therefore, while the country is eminently fitted for mixed farming, still there will always be a large amount of wheat grown. I will not detain the House any longer explaining my views in regard to this, beyond saying that the Lake Dauphin district is one which should have a railway built to it as soon as possible. There is a large population there, and they are 70 or 80 miles away from any communication. I see that the public press has stated that the Hudson Bay Railway parallels the Manitoba and North-western. In the press yesterday, I read an interview with Mr. Sutherland as to the proposed route. He spoke of utilizing the 40 miles that had been built, and then diverting the line round by the south of Lake Manitoba, and then extending northward on the west side of Lake Manitoba. Now, hon. gentlemen,

I do not think that that would be an intelligent route at all; I think it is an impossible route. As the hon. gentleman from Richmond says with regard to proceeding with the construction of that road before anything can be done at all, the engineers have to go in and the plan must be prepared and approved by the government; so that no expense can be incurred by the government or anybody else, until that is done. Further than that, the Hudson Bay Railway route is defined by statutory enactment. In the statutes of 1887, page 100, you will find an Act consolidating and amending the Acts relating to this company, and in the third section of that Act the route is defined as starting from Winnipeg northerly to Port Nelson, or Churchill, or some other point of the Hudson Bay, and to construct a branch from any point on its main line, at or near the crossing of the Saskatchewan River to a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Lake Winnipegosis. Now the rule is, the route must be as straight to given points as possible. The statute of 1890, page 108, extends the time for completion of the main line to the Saskatchewan to four years from 21st June, 1890. The statute of 1891, page 88, says that the line of railway to be constructed south of Saskatchewan shall not be commenced until the location of the line is approved by the Governor General in Council. The statute of 1894, page 175, changes the name subject to former enactments of Hudson Bay Railway; therefore the location is governed by the enactment of 1887. If so, it would appear the Hudson Bay Railway must go between Lakes Manitoba and Winnipeg, which would not be serving the Lake Dauphin district, the immediate purpose we have in view. We want to see a road built by some company in some way into the Lake Dauphin district. We want to see the Manitoba and North-west Railway extended to Prince Albert, and the North-west Central extended to a point of junction with the Manitoba and North-west and both routes afforded a western connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Regina. We cannot move without public aid, and the lands that are now being given to the Hudson Bay Railway will provide aid and means for the construction of every one of these roads under the system of public aid that I have suggested, by the Government guaranteeing the bonds at 3 per cent salable only at par and holding the railway companies responsible for the payment of interest by a lien of the land and in the hands of the government and a lien on the railways. By that means, the public treasury is not depleted and the same lands will be available for future development elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You do not want the Hudson Bay Railway?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, I tell you I think the Hudson Bay Railway should be built as a public work. We want the Hudson Bay Railway, and we are going to get there as quickly as we can, but the enterprise has to wait on public opinion. What I wish to point out is that the 6,400 acres per mile that is alienated and given to one road, if utilized in the way I speak of will build 1,700 miles, if the roads are built in sections where they will make a return and pay their own interest. It is purely a matter of economy that I am speaking of, and it is not in any hostility to the Hudson Bay road. I know the feelings of the people of Manitoba with reference to that Hudson Bay. They look to that great inland sea as placed by nature for their advantage, in order to provide an additional and cheaper outlet for them to the seaboard.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As the hon. gentleman has used my name in seconding the motion, I may be permitted to make a few remarks. I have always been favourable, since the North-west country was opened up, to giving that country an outlet to the ocean, and when my hon. friend says that we are opposed to the Hudson Bay Railway because we are afraid that it is going to divert the trade of the country from the St. Lawrence route, does he for a moment think what amount of money it will cost to get from the North-west to the St. Lawrence? Does he know that our canals have not been deepened yet? And until the canals are deepened, how can we look for the trade of that North-west to go to the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is the Erie canal deepened?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am speaking of the canals of Canada. The trade that goes from Canada to the United States goes by railway, not by the Erie Canal. How much money have we spent on deepening the St. Lawrence, enlarging our canals, building the Canadian Pacific Railway, and building the Sault Ste. Marie Canal? For whom was that money expended? Was not that for the people of the North-west as well as for the people of the other provinces? I feel as much interest in the welfare of the North-west as my hon. friend does. He tells us that he wants the government to keep the land and the cash too. If the government is to keep the land and the cash, how is the railway going to be built? This Hudson Bay Railway has been before the country a long time. If the project is feasible, if there is proof before the people of this country that it is feasible and that it would be an advantage to the North-west and to this part of the country, I should willingly support it, but I will not support a wildcat scheme and burden the people of this country with that large expenditure of money. We should husband our resources. I always support railways in the North-west as far as I can, and am willing to do it to-day if it is right and reasonable, but I am not going to support a mad scheme, to go through the icebergs, when we have spent so much money to improve the St. Lawrence route. I feel that every member in this House knows as much about the subject as I do. The leader of the government knows that, and must have considered it in all its bearings, and he knows better whether the country will sustain him in spending money on the Hudson Bay Railway, but whether he does or not, I shall not by my vote support such a project.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend thinks that we consider it necessary that all the trade of that western country should come through the St. Lawrence. I do not look at the matter in that selfish light. I believe that the Hudson Bay Railway is a national undertaking, a national enterprise, in which a large area of Canada is interested. From the first time I entered this Parliament until now, I have been a strenuous advocate of that road, and I agree with the hon. member from Marquette that nature intended Hudson Bay to be a highway to open up that great North-west country and Manitoba, and an outlet for the products of that country. I do not look upon this as a Manitoba question at all. The greater part of Canada is as much interested in it as Manitoba is. To build a railway as far north as the Saskatchewan must eventually lead to the tapping of that road by branch lines into the far North-west. Now, my hon. friend from Richmond agreed with me in 1891. We both advocated that the government should grant $80,000 a year for twenty years in aid of the Hudson Bay Railway and a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile. He thought it in the public interest that that road should be constructed, not as far as North Saskatchewan only, but the whole road through to Hudson Bay and I think he must be in error now as to the Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I said in 1891—and I would adhere to it still if the resources of the country would permit it—that even if the opening of the Hudson Bay Railway interfered with the traffic which we expected from the large expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway, drawing freight to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, I would still support it as a national undertaking; that is, if it could be shown that the road was feasible.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend considered at the time, as far as his information went, that it was feasible.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And he thought the resources of the country would warrant that expenditure?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He says now that the financial depression does not justify us at the present moment in making the expenditure. I think that is the burden of his remarks.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Yes, to-day.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Well, I look upon this as being simply a loan or substitute of so much money to the company in lieu of what was granted in 1891. They found that they could not build the road, and this is simply to help them along, 250 miles at $10,000 a mile, and being a loan, merely an advance, we were to take the rolling stock, the land grants, and any subsidy that might be given as security for the repayment of our money. I trust that the Order in Council is upon condition that Canada is to be freed from all liability to the company under the legislation of 1891. If the road is built as far as North Saskatchewan, I believe it will not end there, I believe that public spirit will so manifest itself that the road will go through to Hudson Bay, and then I have no doubt that there will be navigation to Europe. The straits are navigable, I believe. We had that question before us long ago, and it was proved that for hundreds of years sailing vessels passed in and out of the bay, and we would be able to overcome all the difficulties in the way of navigation in the straits. I have no doubt if a railway is built to the bay it will lead to the opening of a large trade. I do not believe that we will be able to fill up that section of the North-west Territory until we have that railway to Hudson Bay. Last autumn when the leader of the opposition was gallivanting through the North-west Territories and Manitoba, angling for votes, he spoke of the Hudson Bay Railway as a great enterprise.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is quoting the Montreal Gazette.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am not drawing on my imagination or quoting the Montreal Gazette, but my information may have come from that. However, he was up there last autumn when he was angling for votes. He said it was his desire and his hope that on his advent to power the railway from Manitoba to Hudson Bay would be completed at an early day. The government here and the country are committed to this railway—at least as far as North Saskatchewan—as part of the whole route, and we undertake to give $80,000 every year for 20 years, and I consider now that we are not in a position to take a gloomy view of things. Yet our expenditure should be kept within the limits of our income. It is true that we have gone through a period of depression and that the expenditure this month has been $450,000 larger than it was in the corresponding period last year, but it is the fog end of the depression, and we begin to see daylight and sunshine. The reaction will set in, and it will be as decided as the depression while it existed. Therefore, I believe that the government is ready to advise Parliament to give this money as an advance and simply as a loan or substitution for what we are now obliged to give the company. I cannot see how much more the burden would be upon the country than they are already committed to. I cannot see that it is a large amount or how the country is committed when it is a mere advance, a mere loan. If the government has given this undertaking and assured these parties that this arrangement will be carried out, I for one will support them in it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The manner in which this subject has been introduced to the House is indicative of the feeling that is held by a number of gentlemen upon this very important question. No one can complain of the tone or manner in which the hon. mover has brought the subject before us. He has, however, been misled by the newspaper reports which have appeared at various times. I shall not enter at present into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the action of the government, because I think it would be much better understood when the papers come before the House. I desire, however, in the few remarks I shall make, to call attention to one or two statements which the hon. mover made, the information having been derived by him from newspaper statements and not from any official source. There has been no subsidy of $10,000 per mile agreed upon, or offered, or even suggested, in addition to $80,000 per annum which the government and Parliament of Canada are now pledged to, in consideration of certain services which are to be rendered, nor is there any additional grant offered or proposed. It is a rearrangement of the liabilities of Canada, in consideration of the surrender of all the liabilities that they are now under in order to assist the road. The House is aware that the government is now pledged to a land grant of 6,400 acres per mile, and a payment of $80,000 per annum for 20 years in aid of the construction of the road. The $80,000, as I have already intimated, is in consideration of postal service, etc. The present proposition, or the Order in Council, which the hon. gentleman will better understand when it is laid before the House, is simply a rearrangement, or in other words, a loan of $10,000 per mile for a certain length of time, for which the company surrenders, or rather gives in security, the $80,000 per annum and the 6,400 acres per mile. I know that people will say that this is taking back the land which belongs to us, and it is giving security upon $80,000 per annum to which we are now pledged which we need not give if the road is not built. That is quite true, but these are liabilities into which the country has entered, and which we are bound to pay in case they construct the road. They have represented to the government that they could not, with those securities, float the bonds and obtain the money and they asked for a rearrangement, or readjustment of the aid which was to be given. Now that is as much explanation as probably, is necessary for the House at the present moment. As to the merits of that rearrangement, that is a question for members to discuss and to approve or disapprove when it is submitted to them; as my hon. friend to my right says, it is subject to the approval of Parliament. The constitutional procedure to which the hon. gentleman from Richmond referred is the correct one; no government has the power to bind itself to pay any public money or to make any readjustment of a contract into which they have entered with any company or with any individual without the consent of Parliament. That is really the whole position. I am sure my hon. friend from Richmond will be glad to know that the government were not so regardless of the interests of the country, or so lavish in their promises in aid of the construction of the road, as to pledge themselves to a grant of $10,000 per mile in addition to the 6,400 acres of land which they had agreed to give, and the $80,000 per annum. Such is not the case. I shall not enter into a discussion of the trade policy, or the effect of the trade policy of the government referred to by the hon. member from Marquette. It opens up a very wide field, and I know that the hon. gentleman is very much interested in that subject. He enters into the details minutely. When his motion is made it will be then a question more legitimately for discussion as to whether our policy tends to the diversion of trade to New York, or whether we should surrender what rights we have now in support of our own shipping by which the trade of the country is carried on. It is a question which I shall be quite prepared to discuss when it arises. I may say that the government has shown not only a disposition, but it has laid before Parliament repeatedly a number of propositions, to aid in the development of the great North-west, and I am not boasting when I say that few governments would have gone further. It is a very grave question whether we have gone too far, as intimated, and very properly so, by the hon. member for Richmond, considering the finances of the country. That is a question that we may possibly discuss more intelligently when the papers are laid before the House. I will see that all the papers asked for contained in the motion are laid before the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the rearrangement is carried out, I should like to ask whether it is to be made the subject of an Act of Parliament. There have been occasions when a resolution passed by the Privy Council has been approved by the other chamber and has sometimes been acted upon. What I desire to know is whether this rearrangement will be made the subject of legislation, and whether both Houses will be asked to pronounce upon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was under the impression that I had made that statement. The arrangement is subject to the approval of Parliament, and occupies the same position as the Short Line proposition.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to ask, is this subsidy conditional upon the road being constructed as a through road, or simply as a colonization road? Has any assurance, or financial guarantee been lodged with the government as to the ability of the present company to complete the road?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The change in the contract, or the agreement with the company, relates only to the extension of the road as far as Saskatchewan. There have been no securities lodged, and we were not in a position to enter into any contract or any agreement with that company, until the approval of Parliament had been obtained.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then it is only as a colonization road that the government is coming to the assistance of the company, I understand?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the government spoke of the change in the manner of giving the subsidy to this company as a mere rearrangement, and he rather gave the House to understand that there was not any reason why the hon. gentleman from Richmond, or any other hon. gentleman, should be at all disturbed; that we were not increasing our liabilities, but simply rearranging them, putting them in better form. That reminds me of the old story told in 1878 when the people down in the lower provinces were a little nervous, having heard talk about increasing the tariff, and when Sir Leonard Tilley telegraphed to Sir John Macdonald at Ottawa to know if it was intended to increase the tariff, that astute gentleman telegraphed back that he did not mean to increase the tariff, but only to readjust it. This is a case of readjustment something like that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has scarcely quoted my words as I uttered them. However, as it enables him to draw a deduction, I do not object to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish to attribute to the hon. gentleman language which he did not use. While the premier's language may be in a certain sense correct, it does not tell the whole story. As the legislation stands to-day, before Canada could be called upon to pay a dollar, the road has to be built and in operation. Then the company are entitled to get a land grant, and a subsidy of $80,000 a year. If the people who took hold of the undertaking were substantial capitalists, that ought to be a satisfactory proposal to them, but the new proposition does not bind the company to do anything. They get $10,000 a mile for the road as it is constructed, and they may drop—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That only shows the inconvenience of discussing in detail a question which is not properly before the House. The hon. gentleman says they are not bound to do anything; they are. The Order in Council lays down what they are to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We have had a good many other companies in the North-west building colonization roads, and they have got into difficulties. They constructed their lines to a certain extent, and had to discontinue the work and those roads are in a much more favourable country than the section which is to be traversed by this road. It is just possible that when the papers asked for by the motion of the honourable gentleman from Richmond, come down, the government and Parliament—the government at any rate—will be so far committed to this scheme that it will be almost impossible, or at all events impracticable, to withdraw. We find the contractors, or would be contractors are not waiting. They are going to work apparently as if they felt certain that this grant was to be made. I think that Parliament should express its opinion upon the matter before steps have been taken which perhaps cannot be undone. I do not wish to inflict a speech upon the House if we have an undertaking from the leader of the government that the papers will be laid upon the table promptly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS introduced Bill (E) "An Act to amend the Civil Service Act." He said: The object of this bill is to provide for the necessary proceedings in cases of irregularity and fraud practised at the examinations of persons seeking for certificates. It provides that in case of refusal of persons to answer questions, they may be committed for contempt.

The bill was read the first time.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Senate will remember that last year when we introduced the Insolvency Bill, there was a great demand for copies of it, particularly by the commercial community throughout the whole Dominion, and in order to meet that demand we ordered the printing of 2,500 in English and 1,000 in French. I do not think it necessary that we should go to that expense this time, and I was thinking that if we ordered the printing of just one-half the number, it would be quite sufficient on the present occasion. With the concurrence of the Senate, I move:

That in addition to the regular number of copies of bill (A) entitled: "An Act respecting Insolvency," 1,250 copies in English and 500 copies in French be printed for general distribution.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Are the amendments that have been proposed of such importance as to justify another issue of the bill? Would not a leaf, showing where the amendments come in, be sufficient without having the bill printed entirely?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no amendment in principle proposed in the bill; it is more in the verbiage, and changing sentences and rearranging some clauses. As I explained when I introduced the bill, the changes which were made in special committee, and also the changes and alterations which were made at the table in the House, were somewhat in conflict with some of the other clauses as originally drafted, and this is simply a rearrangement of the whole bill. The changes are not of sufficient importance to justify a reprint after we have reconsidered it here.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What I wished to know was whether the changes were of sufficient importance to necessitate the printing of a new edition.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 5.05 p.m.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC moved:

That when the Senate adjourns this day, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 21st instant, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would ask the leader of the House if this long adjournment meets with his approval.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only answer that I can possibly give to the hon. gentleman's question is that it appears to be the desire of a majority of the Senate. Personally I do not approve of it. The discussion on the budget and the questions arising out of it in the other House will probably occupy some time and until that debate is over there will be very little for this House to do.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adoption of the first report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting. He said:—The report is divided into three parts. The first part directs the attention of the House to the system adopted last session. The reporters are required to send their manuscript to the printers without delay, and on receipt of the proofs to deliver them to the members whose speeches appear on them. Then, 24 hours thereafter, if the proofs are not returned corrected, the reporters are instructed to notify the Printing Bureau to proceed with the publication of the daily issue. The system has been adopted to avoid delay in the publication of the Debates. The second part of the report recommends the employment of Mr. Smith to furnish a daily summary of our debates and proceedings for the press. Some such report is necessary if the public are to be kept informed from day to day of what takes place in this House. As the service will not cost more than from $300 to $500 per session, no objection can be raised to giving it a trial at all events. The third part of the report recommends that a convenient room be provided for the reporters. Every member of this House knows that the room occupied by the reporters is too small for their work, and when the session extends late into the spring or into the summer, it is not only too small but too warm. The recommendation of the committee is that the reporters be furnished a larger and better ventilated room.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is this additional reporter, Mr. Smith, a stenographer, and is he employed to assist in reporting the Debates, or simply to prepare a summary for the papers?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—His duty is to prepare a summary of the debates and proceedings, which he will send to 27 or 28 newspapers.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is a question for the House to consider whether it is advisable to incur that additional expenditure.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—It is a small matter.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Small as it is, I think it is an unnecessary expenditure, for which I do not think we will get value.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at 3.40 P. M.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (F) "An Act to amend an Act intitled: 'An Act respecting Copyright.'" (Mr. Angers.)

Bill (G) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL presented a message from His Excellency transmitting the report of the proceedings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Manitoba School case, prepared by the appellants' solicitor in London.

The message was read in English.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I wish to call attention to the fact that it has been customary to read these messages from the Governor General in French as well as in English. I know that some of the Governors made it a practice to send French as well as English copies. Generally we do not ask to have the whole of the message read in French, contenting ourselves with a few words to give an idea of what it is about.

The message was then read in French.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (E) "An Act further to amend the Civil Service Act." He said: The main object of the bill is to provide for enforcing the attendance of witnesses and for their punishment for contempt in case they fail to attend. The Act, as it stands, at first sight seems to provide for this, but it gives to the chairman only such power as in like cases was conferred upon a justice by section 32 of the Summary Convictions Act, and upon reference to that section it will be seen that it does not apply to the case of default by non-appearance, but only to the case of refusing to answer. The Bill, therefore, gives the power of a justice under section 582 of the Criminal Code in case of default by non-appearance, and the power of a justice of the peace under section 585 of the Criminal Code.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (E) "An Act further to amend the Civil Service Act."

In the Committee.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certain frauds have been committed before the Board of Examiners for the Civil Service. Prosecutions were instituted for these infringements of the law, and it has been found that the board has not sufficient power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to pronounce condemnation for contempt in the case of witnesses refusing to appear, and also in the case of refusing to answer questions. The object of the bill is to give the board the same powers that are possessed by justices of the peace under secs. 582 and 583 of the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend might extend the power of the board of examiners in this instance and not make it simply the power of a magistrate. If the board of examiners are satisfied, from what knowledge they have, that a party can give material evidence, and he does not appear on summons, or evades service, I think they should have power to issue a warrant without having to go through the form necessary in the case of a magistrate. A magistrate must have an affidavit produced before him that a party is able to give material evidence. If the examiners are satisfied that he can give material evidence, with the facts there before them, then I do not see why they should be obliged to have an affidavit that the man is able to give that evidence. The examiners may be fully invested with the knowledge that a party can give that evidence, and if he either does not attend to answer the summons, or evades the service of summons, then I think the power might be fairly given to the board of examiners to issue a warrant without the affidavit. My hon. friend shakes his head; my impression is that that is not an arbitrary power to give the . . . If they are satisfied that he can give evidence, they should be able to issue their warrant without an affidavit that the party can give material evidence; otherwise the ends of justice may be defeated, and a proper affidavit might not be obtainable at the time. Greater powers might be given to examiners to issue a warrant on it appearing that the man has evaded service, or, having been served, has refused to attend.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend upon this point. It must be recollected that we are dealing with the liberty of the subject in a case of this kind. This procedure is to be followed by imprisonment and a fine. When you come to deprive a man of his liberty because he did not attend the court or tribunal, you should establish, in the case of a civil servant as well as in ordinary criminal cases, that the man is a competent witness, and that the person making the affidavit is credibly informed that he can supply material evidence, and that he has been properly served and summoned to come before the board. Therefore, I think the same precautions that are taken in the ordinary criminal courts, before they send a man to jail for contempt, should also be observed in a case before a Board of this kind. I hope, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will waive his objection, as he will understand that, in dealing with the liberty of the subject, too many precautions cannot be taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I desire to address the House on a question of privilege. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a letter which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Thursday. It is as follows:—

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

Editor Citizen: In the first paragraph published on this institution in this morning's issue of the Citizen, the following is quoted from my annual report to the Minister of Justice: "The subsequent career of many of the witnesses, notably of the accountant and storekeeper (a nephew of Senator McInnes, of British Columbia), etc." This is an error. It is not W. H. Keary, the dismissed accountant, but Thomas McInnes, late steward, and now a refugee in the United States, who is nephew of the polished and amiable Senator referred to.

The two quotations in the third paragraph appear to involve a contradiction. I said, "As might be expected, the penitentiary was deteriorating these last two years." And again, "My inspection of this institution not having been made since October, 1892, I have no information to give regarding its administration." This means information derived from my own personal knowledge and observation, but in my official capacity as inspector. I had other sources of information, even from the acting warden, which enabled me to form an opinion as to the incompetency and shortcoming of the present administration of the penitentiary. Hence the two statements can be reconciled as facts without being a "fling."

Yours truly,

J. G. MOYLAN.

OTTAWA, 22nd May.

With respect to the first part of that letter, I may say that I had a nephew in the position of steward in the British Columbia penitentiary for 12 or 14 years. During the investigation held last year, under a royal commission appointed by the Federal Government to investigate the irregularities in that institution, not one fact came out which would connect him with any wrongdoing in that institution. I have not seen the report of the commissioner, Mr. Justice Drake, since it was brought down in the other House, but I am aware that there was nothing in the evidence to show that he was in any way whatever connected with anything dishonourable or discreditable to himself or to anybody belonging to him. It is true that the accountant was discharged at the same time that the warden and deputy warden were discharged in October last, but my nephew was not discharged. He continued to perform his duties as steward of that institution until October last, when, of his own free will and accord, he resigned the position and went to live in the United States. To say that he was a refugee in the United States is an unqualified falsehood, and I am forced to state that this man Moylan, when he wrote those words, knew that he was writing that which was not true. With respect to the accountant, whose character Mr. Moylan wishes to impeach, I may say that he has occupied the position of alderman in the city of New Westminster for a great many years and is a man who is respected generally in that place. His bare word, as well as that of my nephew and of nearly every person who gave evidence on that occasion, would be taken in preference to the sworn statement of Fitzsimons, or the late Inspector of Penitentiaries either. I do not intend to analyse that report. I shall wait until all the papers are before the House, when every member of the Senate will be in a position to see for himself that I was right when a number of years ago I called attention to grave irregularities in the penitentiary. The investigation proved a great deal more than I even insinuated on that occasion, but I want to call the attention of the House to this fact that ever since I made those statements on the floor of the Senate this man Moylan has on every occasion that presented itself insulted not only me but other members of this House, and that too under the authority of the Government in his annual report.

I would call the attention of the hon. Premier to the fact that there was no necessity whatever for Mr. Moylan, the late inspector, to announce the fact in his report that this Thomas A. McInnes was a nephew of mine. I am not ashamed of that nephew, but I would ask, in all fairness, am I to be held responsible for the actions of a nephew, or even of a much nearer relative? Would any hon. gentlemen here be held responsible for the actions of their friends, however near and dear they may be to them, so long as those friends are not under their control or influence and are of the full age of responsibility? This was a gratuitous insult, not only to me individually, but to every member occupying a seat in this House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would ask my hon. friend and the House whether, on a question of privilege, the hon. gentleman can make a speech reflecting upon the character of a gentleman of intelligence and integrity, who is well known in the community and to the public at large? I do not think he can do this simply on a letter found in a newspaper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The point is, whether when a writer in a newspaper, or the newspaper itself, calls a senator's nephew a fugitive from justice, the senator can claim the right, as a question of privilege, to defend his nephew, and attack the newspaper writer. He certainly cannot.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Before a decision is given on the point that has been raised, I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and also of the hon. gentleman who has raised this question of order, to the fact that on two different occasions, to my personal knowledge, a question has been brought up in precisely the same way as I have brought this up. When the hon. gentleman from Delanau dière was attacked, by this imputent fellow Moylan, I brought it up myself, and it was discussed here for some two or three hours—the whole of one afternoon—by more than a dozen hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If the hon. gentleman himself were attacked he would have a right to defend himself if it came under the class of privilege, but we have no right to take advantage of our seats in this House to defend anybody but ourselves on a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—That is precisely what I am doing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. member from Richmond will see this; a government official attacks a member of this House and tries to connect his name with a criminal, a person whose word is alleged to be unreliable, and this House ought to give every liberty and facility to that hon. gentleman to clear his own character, and if he attacks Mr. Moylan for going out of his way to put his name in a report where it should not be, Mr. Moylan deserves all the lashing this House can give him.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am not here as the advocate of Mr. Moylan. I am not expressing approval of anything that Mr. Moylan has done. I have not read his letter. I am not prepared to say what judgment I would pass upon it if I did read it. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this, that I do not think it is within the scope of the question of privilege for a member to attempt to defend any one but himself.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I quite agree with what the hon. gentleman states, but if the hon. gentleman paid attention to the letter when I read it, he would see that I am directly attacked through the medium of my nephew.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—The letter reads:—

This is an error. It is not W. H. Kearey, the dismissed accountant, but Thomas McInnes, late steward, and now a refugee in the United States, who is nephew of the polished and amiable senator referred to.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is not an attack.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—It is an implied slander. There is no question about it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It may be that—on the nephew.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I am not prepared to go on to debate this question of privilege, but I do claim that I am doing what is the duty of every member of this honourable House when he is attacked, especially by a civil servant, or a person in a still worse position, a man who has been superannuated, and is living on the tax payers of this country. In my place in the Senate, over six years ago, I called attention to scandals in a public institution and my statements were subsequently proved to be all true. If I can be attacked with impunity by the man who should have prevented these irregularities, I think that this House has fallen very low indeed if it will not defend itself. This Mr. Moylan is an old offender. Within the last six years he has been called to account for similar misconduct no less than twice to my personal knowledge. During the incumbency of the late Premier, Sir John Abbott, Mr. Moylan made an unjustifiable attack on the honourable member from Delanau dière in his annual report. He was brought to task for it, censured and punished. Even the $500 that was placed in the Estimates for an increase of his salary was wiped out upon that occasion, and he was then cautioned not only by the late Sir John Thompson, but also by the late Sir John Abbott, that if he should be found guilty of any such offence again he would be suspended or severely dealt with. Two years after that he attacked me in his report, and that attack appeared in the annual report of the Minister of Justice. It was done without the knowledge of the Minister, or the Deputy Minister of Justice. Mr. Moylan only showed it to the private secretary, and it was smuggled into the departmental report in that way. I found that out subsequently. I was perfectly satisfied that Sir John Thompson would never lend himself to anything so low and unworthy as that. He was then summoned to appear before the bar of this House. But on the following day, before the meeting of the Senate, he apologized to this House, and Sir John Thompson gave a pledge that he would not offend another time. Now, unfortunately for this House, and I may say for the country, when Sir John Thompson dismissed the warden, the deputy warden and the accountant of the British Columbia penitentiary, he made the fatal mistake that he did not dismiss this J. G. Moylan, because when the papers are brought down, I can show very conclusively that he was probably the cause of nearly all the irregularities, all the wrong doings and all the malfeasance in office in connection with that institution. It may be contended by some hon. gentlemen that now he is not in the employ of the government, as he is superannuated,—that the government have no control over him. If there are any in this House holding such views as that, I claim—

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I rise to a question of privilege. I appeal to the Chair.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There is a question of privilege before the House at the present time.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The question is whether my hon. friend can go on with this tirade of abuse against a gentleman who is not in the civil service, and not in the employ of the government. It is entirely beyond his privilege. He is taking advantage of his position in this House to abuse the character of a man who stands as high as any hon. gentleman in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that when a question of order is raised it is the duty of the speaker to sit down until it is decided. The hon. member must have forgotten that.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not forget it. The hon. gentleman rose to a question of privilege he stated, and not a question of order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it was an act of discourtesy to the hon. gentleman as well as to the House. I was charitable enough to think the hon. gentleman had forgotten the rule for the moment.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman rose to a question of privilege, and not of order, consequently I was perfectly justified in not sitting down—it was discourtesy to the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The hon. gentleman from Lunenburg in his last remarks used the word privilege instead of order, but when he first took the floor he rose to a question of order.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I ask the ruling of the Chair on the question of order.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I throw myself on the indulgence of the House. This man Moylan is, or ought to be, under the control of the government, just as much as if he were in their employ. He has been superannuated, but surely we are not going to allow superannuated civil servants to have free scope to attack members of this House and of the other branch of Parliament with impunity and without redress. I appeal to the Premier if it is not his bounden duty—a duty that he owes to himself, to this House and to this country—that this man's superannuation should be immediately stopped, or that he should be cautioned that if he attacks any member of this or the other branch of parliament it will be stopped, notwithstanding anything that the counsel for the late inspector may have to say to the contrary in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman in the remarks that he has made, because I am strongly of the opinion that the matter brought up by him is not a question of privilege in any sense of the word. If every attack that is made upon a public man in a newspaper, either by inference or directly, is to be considered a question of privilege, there are very few of us who could not occupy the time of the House during half of the session.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—We would not want any adjournment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the other House it has grown into practice to explain any attack made upon a member in the public press, and also to defend oneself. I do not wish to be understood as approving in any way of the parenthetical sentence put into the report of Mr. Moylan. On the contrary, I had a conversation only last Saturday with the Minister of Justice, who authorized me to state, when the question came up in this House, that he deeply regretted it himself; that how it got into the report he could not understand; that when he read the report as presented to him, he put his pen through the reference to the hon. gentleman, considering it irrelevant; and how it got in afterwards he does not know. I told him that I should take the first opportunity to explain the matter to the House. For my own part, I think it is reprehensible on the part of any public servant, or of the public press, to associate a gentleman's name with that of another who may have done wrong, simply because he happens to be a connection by marriage or by blood. I do not know of any meaner mode of attack. Still, I question very much whether it becomes a question of privilege that should be brought up in this House. I have the report before me, and the House will see that the reference to the hon. gentleman was altogether unnecessary. The inspector says in his report:—"The subsequent career of many of these witnesses, notably of the accountant and storekeeper"; and then he puts in parenthesis, "nephew of Senator McInnes, of B. C."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the third offence of the same kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Now that the hon. gentleman has called attention to it, I remember that Mr. Moylan was taken to task for a similar offence before, but I can only say, so far as the Minister of Justice is concerned that he was not aware that it was published until his attention was called to it by the questions on the paper. How far the hon. gentleman's suggestion, in reference to dealing with Mr. Moylan's superannuation could be acted upon is a question that I shall have to leave to the lawyers to decide. My own impression is that he is as independent of the government to-day as the hon. gentleman is himself. We have no control whatever over him, and he has the same right that every other citizen has to write articles in the newspapers, if they think proper to publish them, and he must be held individually responsible, whether in courts of law or otherwise, for his conduct. I deeply regret, as a member of the government, and I desire to express equally the regret of the Minister of Justice, that a report coming from any department of the government should, even inferentially, attack any hon. gentleman. I do not know that the remark made by Mr. Moylan in that letter that has been read would be considered a slander. He says that the hon. gentleman from British Columbia is "polished and amiable." If he had added "handsome" he would not have said anything in excess. If ridicule would justify the bringing of such matters before this House, I think I might mention quite a number of newspapers in which I have been ridiculed in a way that has amused me and my friends, and disgusted some of my family, who think that it should not be allowed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Not by pensioners of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have nothing to do with the pensioners of the government.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Withhold their pensions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no law which would justify the government in doing so. If you think the offence is so grave as to justify that, it is a matter which we can consider in the future.

THE BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. McINNES inquired:—

Is it the intention of the Government to reappoint Arthur McBride, late warden, and William Keary, late accountant, to the wardenship and accountantship, respectively, of the New Westminster Penitentiary? If not, why not?

He said: The reason why I ask the last question "If not, why not?" is this—it was proven during the investigation that both the warden and the accountant were merely carrying out the instructions given them by the deputy warden and the inspector of penitentiaries—that the warden was a mere figurehead—placed in that unfortunate position by the inspector, and had to carry out the instructions given him by the deputy. Of the three men, the guilty person was reappointed, while the comparatively innocent men were not reinstated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not the intention of the Government to reappoint Arthur McBride, late warden, and William Keary, late accountant, to the wardenship and accountantship, respectively, of the New Westminster Penitentiary. Reason, on account of their unsatisfactory records while holding such positions. If the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that the warden was a mere figurehead and only carried out the orders of a subordinate, is true, it is the very best reason why he should not be reappointed.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.) inquired:

1. Was it on the recommendation of a member of the Dominion Parliament from British Columbia, that James Fitzsimmons was reappointed Deputy-Warden of the New Westminster penitentiary? If so, what is the name of the member?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Deputy-wardens in Canadian penitentiaries are appointed on the responsibility and on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, and not on the recommendation of a member of Parliament. This course was followed in the case of James Fitzsimmons.

ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAILWAY SUBSIDY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) inquired :

Has Mr. James Dunsmuir, of Victoria, British Columbia, President of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, or any one else on behalf of said railway company, applied for the usual railway subsidy of $3,200 per mile to assist in extending their road from Wellington to Comox? If so, is it the intention of the Government to grant the application?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Dunsmuir has made application for a subsidy of $3,200 per mile for the extension of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway from Wellington to Comox. The Finance Minister made the announcement in the House of Commons a short time ago (which is now repeated) that the government does not contemplate granting any cash subsidies to railways this session.

BRITISH PACIFIC RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) inquired :—

Has Mr. R. P. Rithet, of Victoria, British Columbia, Vice-President of the British Pacific Railway Company, or anyone else on behalf of said railway company, applied for the usual railway subsidy of $3,200 per mile to assist in building their railway? If so, is it the intention of the Government to grant the application?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No application has been made by Mr. R. P. Rithet or anyone else for a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, in aid of the construction of the "British Pacific Railway."

THE PROPOSED MONUMENT AT LOUISBOURG.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired :—

Is the Government aware that the "Massachusetts Society of Colonial Wars" is about to erect a monument at Louisbourg, Cape Breton, commemorative of the taking of that place in 1745? What inscription is this monument to bear? Does the site of the old fortress of Louisbourg belong to the Dominion Government? If not, to whom does it belong?

He said: I find that a member of the other House has put the question whether the Dominion Government had granted the Massachusetts Society of Colonial Wars leave and license to erect a monument at Louisbourg commemorating the capture of that place in 1745, and that the answer was "no." I am further assured that the Minister of Militia has refused to allow Canadian militia to parade at this celebration on our soil. This information is gratifying, and so much of a vexed question is settled, but who granted that permission? One would naturally think that this affair, being of an international nature, would require the assent of the very highest authority in the land. Was permission granted to the Society of Colonial Wars by the Imperial authority? I do not know, but I cannot believe it. The British are accustomed to win battles, but, as far as my knowledge of history goes, they refrain from acting meanly after a victory. They know how to conquer, but they know, too, how to be magnanimous and act with propriety.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They put up their own monuments.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—They put up their own monuments, and I do not know that they have tried to go into foreign lands to erect monuments commemorating their victories there. If they were to do so, which would be absolutely unseemly, no doubt they would find themselves in many cases in trouble, because they would be in a position to erect such monuments in almost every civilized and uncivilized country in the world. But that is not the question before us now. The announcement of the intention to erect a monument commemorating the victory of 1745 over France and the French Acadians has aroused an unpleasant feeling in the maritime provinces, at least amongst a large portion of the population. I am the recipient of many letters on the question. Many newspapers have commented upon it, and not knowing from whom the American society had obtained permission, and not believing at all that such permission had been granted, such papers as L'Evangeline in Nova Scotia, the Courrier des Provinces Maritimes in Gloucester, and the Moniteur Acadien in Westmoreland county, have been discussing the question. The articles are not at all aggressive, but they show in what spirit that commemoration is received among a large portion of the citizens of the lower provinces. I will simply read the conclusion that one writer arrives at in an article signed by himself. He is a responsible man who writes in the Moniteur Acadien, a newspaper published at Shediac. Commenting on this celebration, the writer gives the history of the capture of Louisbourg in 1745, and by way of conclusion says:

It is certain that very few Canadians, either English or French, Protestant or Catholic, will take any pride in the aggressive demonstration that a few Americans of the old school take upon themselves to make at Louisbourg.

And the newspaper goes on and gives the full reasons why it should be discountenanced. Now, some English-speaking papers have taken up the question too, and I will simply give a short extract from a Nova Scotia paper, the Casket, published I believe in the county represented by the late Sir John Thompson:—

A monument at Salem to mark the spot where the so-called witches were burned would be in order, as that is a chapter in the history of our neighbours well worth commemorating as an historical fact, but if a monument on Canadian soil should be erected by aliens on the spot hallowed by historical scenes and fraught with painful suggestions to the descendants of the French nation, who now form a part of this country of ours, appears an action entirely uncalled for and which would hardly receive the support of Canadians in general.

No such insult on the part of the Imperial authorities towards the French Canadians would be contemplated as is conveyed by this action of the Massachusetts Society of Colonial Wars.

I will give you no more readings from newspapers, these will suffice to show the hon. House that the proposed erection of a monument is received in anything but a friendly spirit by many of our people. The fact of alien people taking upon themselves to erect a monument on a foreign land is, in itself, a thing unheard of among civilized nations. Why should the Americans, who are more or less friendly to the empire, come here and commemorate a military event in a manner calculated to give offence to a part of the population who are loyal subjects to the Crown of England now, or to the whole population I may say? Would the United States or any other nation tolerate such a thing? I do not believe it. No doubt they carried Louisbourg, but if we go to history we must also admit that the glory of that capture, if glory there was, is not wholly American. If Pepperrell and his chaplain and his followers had been alone, I believe Louisbourg would never have fallen into their hands. If Commodore Warren had not been there, no demand would be made for the erection of a monument to-day. Louisbourg would still be French. Why should the Americans come and take upon themselves the glory, if glory there is? Their part of the affair is not a glorious one, and the real capture of Louisbourg is due to the English—Warren and his officers. But that is not the question. If to-day, for example, it is proper for the Americans to come here and erect monuments of their supposed glory on our Canadian soil and stir up feelings which are anything but pleasant, then it would be proper for the colonists of France, the Normans, to erect a monument where the battle of Hastings was fought, commemorating the conquest of England by the French. The English would not tolerate it, and no Frenchmen would ask it, because it would be looked upon as absolutely unseemly; it would look ridiculous. Supposing now that Canadians were to go and erect a monument at Carillon where Abercrombie with his 16,000 men were routed by 3,500 Frenchmen, how would the press take it? What would the American Government say to that action? Of course our people would not dream of such an unseemly action, or demand a thing so unreasonable. Or supposing our militia, commemorating military achievements of ours, were to go with or without—I believe in this Louisbourg case it was without—permission and erect a monument at Monongahela where Braddock with his troops and Washington who never told a lie were licked by the Canadians—how would the Americans accept it? We would hear a justifiable howl. The men who would attempt such a thing would never come back to this soil to tell the story. Why should we do, or allow others to do what our neighbours would certainly not tolerate from us? If this monument was simply in honour of the dead, it would be right enough. Those people, French, English and Swiss—because the French garrison was composed mostly of Swiss who died a military death—died for their country or their pay and they deserve commemoration, but if I understand the meaning of the proposed monument it is not to be erected to the memory of the dead, but as an apotheosis of war and victories. It is a monument that, if those soldiers who are sleeping their last slumber could understand it, would mean glorification for some of them and the reverse for the others. There is no occasion for that. The time for those bitter wars is past, and if we are going to erect monuments, let us raise monuments to the dead without discrimination. Now what inscription is that monument to bear? That is an important question. We have no control over them, apparently. They are going there to erect a costly monument of marble or granite, but what inscription is it going to bear? If those who are going to erect it wish to be true to history, I suppose they will have to portray the one that first landed in the batterie Royale, and who is he? They will have to put the picture of an Indian who was given a bottle of brandy to go and see why it was that there was no cannonading from the French fort and who had the courage, under the influence of his bottle of brandy, to go up to the fort. He saw nobody there, and said, "Hurrah, we have the fort." I suppose he will have the foremost place on the monument, because Louisbourg, being defended by Swiss mostly, and those soldiers not being paid and their rations being very poor, offered no resistance in trying to defend the "batterie Royale" and went away allowing it to be taken with all the ammunition and all the guns, and the one who took it was an Indian from Massachusetts, not one of our Indians, who are temperance people. What next? Will Peppercell's chaplain be depicted on one of the four faces of the monument—because there will be four faces—waiving an axe in his hand and announcing that he is going to that French fortress to "demolish the cross and other emblems of idolatry?" I suppose so, if these gentlemen wish to be historical. Will they also mention in the inscription on the monument that four hundred men who were sent out, after the taking of the fort, to destroy all the French settlements and houses in Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island, did most fully and most religiously perform their work amongst a peaceful population? I suppose that the episode will also be inscribed on the monument. And, since it is a commemoration of a great deed, will they also recall the fact that the taking of Louisbourg was accompanied by very few fatalities? However, after the fortress was taken, as is shown by the report of Governor Shirley himself, within a very short time, 890 colonial soldiers did die within the fortress of Louisbourg; but not from the effects of balls and bullets, nor from cannons, but from other causes which history will tell, and which, for fear of scandalizing our temperance people, I will refrain from mentioning. I suppose those foreigners are going to commemorate all that; and they will have to do so if they wish to be true to history. It is not worth while to erect a monument to recall such feats, and if there is any way of preventing it, either by an expression of public opinion or the action of the imperial authorities or of this government and making those people, who seem to have no sense of international decency, understand that while there is nothing exceedingly harmful in their actions, there is something unseemly and uncalled for and would be rendering them a service indeed. We know the actual sentiment of some of those New England States towards England by the resolutions they have recently passed anent the Nicaragua troubles, I do not see why we should allow these very men to come here and erect a monument on our land, against the peace of British subjects and Canadian citizens. Therefore, on behalf of a large portion of the people of the maritime provinces I protest against the erection of a monument glorifying the action of the colonists in the taking of Louisbourg in 1745, as unnecessary, uncalled for, highly improper and offensive.

. Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In reply to the hon. gentleman, who has made a very interesting and historical speech, I can inform him that, so far as we know, the scheme for the erection of a monument in commemoration of the taking of Louisbourg in 1745, by the militia of the state of Massachusetts, originated with a historical society formed in Boston and in the neighbouring localities, of which the Canadian Government had no knowledge, nor was its consent asked. The government have no knowledge what inscription is to be placed on the monument. The Department of Militia and Defence has no property at Louisbourg, nor has it any knowledge to whom the property upon which the proposed monument is to be erected belongs.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (F) "An Act to amend the Act intitled an Act respecting Copyright."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to make some remarks upon this question of copyright, and as the hour is late I would ask the hon. gentleman to postpone the second reading of the bill until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the hon. gentleman only wishes to speak upon the bill, and his remarks are confined to it, his speech would be very short. The bill has this in view: at the request of Lord Ripon we have agreed to bring in a bill to obtain from persons depositing books for copyright three copies instead of two. At present we have two copies, one for a record in the Archives Department and one for the Library of Parliament, and now the third copy is to go to the British Museum. That is the sole object of the bill; it only alters the word "two" to "three," and states where the third copy is to go. Of course, the hon. gentleman would be offered very limited scope in discussing the copyright question on this bill. I think he had better create some other occasion where he could express his opinion on the question of copyright.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I was not aware what the scope of the bill was, but I will defer my remarks.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (G) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act." He said: I have a minute of the amendments, and perhaps it would be just as well that I should give them to the House now, in order that members may be better able to judge of the merits of the bill when it goes to committee for discussion of the details. Clause 1 of the bill repeals section 38 of the act as enacted by section 3 of chapter 32 of the Statutes of 1894, and substitutes a section which gives wider scope as to leasing for the benefit of individual Indians land held by them. Even under the provision made last session as to the leasing of land held by individual Indians without a surrender, cases have arisen in which such land could not be leased without the consent of the band, though it was plainly a question in which the band was not, as a whole, interested. There are Indians who are neither sick, aged nor infirm, nor yet engaged in occupations precluding them from cultivating land, who ought to be free to lease land belonging to them (with the consent of the department) which they do not wish to cultivate, and it is scarcely fair that it should be in the power of members of the band to prevent their doing so. There are in Canada Indians living on their accumulated earnings, who have no need of cultivating land for their support, and in such cases it is felt that the department should be free to authorize their leasing the land held by them on the reserve without a surrender. As it is impossible to specify accurately in the Act the different cases in which land may be leased for the benefit of the Indian shareholders thereof, it is thought best to make a general provision such as that proposed, leaving the department free to lease land in such cases as it considers it in the interest of the Indian holders to lease it for their benefit. It will be observed that the proposed section is so worded as to preclude the leasing without a surrender of any land except such as is held by an individual Indian, and then only for his benefit. Clause 2 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 70 of the act. There has been some question as to the exact meaning of section 70 as it stands in the act, and the object of the change is to make clear the meaning which the department has always acted upon. The way the section now reads there seems room for the view that the Governor has not authority to direct the expenditure of capital from time to time, for the purposes mentioned in the three last lines of the section, and he can only order that a certain percentage or portion shall be set aside to form a fund for the said purposes. Moreover, while the section, as it stands, provides for contribution-being made to schools, and although it has been held that capital may, under that section, be expended in building schools to be attended by the Indians, it is thought well to have the proposed words added so as to make the point perfectly clear. It has been held that the construction of roads included the building of bridges, but doubt has been thrown upon that interpretation; it has, therefore, been thought well to insert the word "bridges" and also the words "ditches and water courses," so as to prevent any difficulty arising in future, as it is necessary that the Governor in Council should have the power to expend the capital of a band, in doing such work without the consent of the band, for otherwise roads leading through reserves might be allowed to get into such a condition as to detrimentally effect the interests of dwellers in neighbouring settlements, and if the Governor in Council has not power to build and support schools out of such money without the consent of the Indians, it will be in the hands of the Indians to impede the Indian educational policy of the government. Clause 3 of the bill substitutes a new section for section 75 of the Act. Under the law as it stands, it would appear that the Governor in Council has only power to depose chiefs chosen under the elective system after the same has been applied to the band by Order in Council. As there are very many bands in which the system has not been applied and cases have arisen in which the interests of such bands call for the removal of chiefs on account of immorality, &c., it has been felt that the law should be so amended as to make it clear that the Governor in Council has power to remove any chief for the causes mentioned in the section. In amending the section it is thought well to wipe out the distinction between head chief and second chief, as in councils chosen under the elective system the distinction has no significance and only tends to confusion. The law as it stands make the maximum number of chiefs which a band may have six head chiefs and twelve second chiefs. The proposed amendment makes fifteen the maximum number of chiefs. In the law as it stands there is no provision under which an Indian who becomes enfranchised can be paid his share of the moneys of a band unless the band takes action under section ninety-three for the general enfranchisement of its members. The department has been asked by enfranchised Indians for their share of their band's moneys, and as it is thought that Indians who so desire and are found qualified should be given their share of the capital, as well as of the land of the band, and thus be entirely removed from the guardianship of the department. All that part of section 93 (beginning at the twelfth line) which provides for the payment of band funds, &c., to enfranchise Indians when the whole band decide upon enfranchisement, has therefore been embodied in section 88*a*, which clause 4 of the bill proposes to add to the Act, in such a way as to make the provisions as to payment of band moneys apply to cases of individual enfranchisement. As the new section 88*a* contains all necessary provisions for the payment to enfranchised Indians of their share of band moneys, it is not necessary to repeat them, and clause 5 of the present bill, therefore, provides that section 93 of the Act which contains the provisions embodied in section 88*a* be repealed, and a short section substituted, which simply provides for bands taking action for general enfranchisement, and makes all provisions as to enfranchisement of individual Indians apply in such cases. It has been found that section 114 of the Act as it stands is insufficient to prevent the holding of such Indian festivals such as the Potlach or Tamanawas. The late Chief Justice of British Columbia expressed the opinion that it would be difficult to convict under it. It has been held that the mere designation of the festival or dance, such as the Potlach or Tamanawas is not sufficient for conviction of an Indian or other person engaging or assisting in celebrating it, but that what is done thereat, which constitutes the offence, must likewise be described. As there is a similar dance to the Potlach celebrated by the Indian bands in the Northwest Territories, known as Omas-ko-sim-mowok or "grass dance," commonly known as "Giving away dance," and there are, no doubt, Indian celebrations of the same character elsewhere, all of which consist of the giving away, parting with, or exchanging of large quantities of personal effects, sometimes all that the participants own, and it is considered better to prohibit all giving-away festivals, as they are conducive of extravagance, and cause much loss of time and the assemblage of large numbers of Indians, with all the usual attendant evils. The Tamanawas, which has been known to last from October until March, result in great waste of time and much demoralization. It consists of orgies of the most disgusting character, viz., biting the arms of spectators, eating, or rather tearing to pieces, dogs and human bodies exhumed for the purpose. The initiation is looked upon as an honour and eagerly sought after. Large quantities of property being given to the head Tamanawas man for admission into the rites, which are made as mystical as possible. It is known as medicine work, and is a prominent and chief feature of savage life. It prevails at Nass, Kit-amaht, Owickanoe, Knight-inlet and among the Kwa-kewlths of the north coasts of Vancouver Island and the southwest coast of the mainland of British Columbia. The proposed clause 7 differs from the law as it stands in that it gives Indian agents the power of two justices of the peace in cases of offence by Indians, against any of the provisions of part XV. of the Criminal Code, as well as part XIII., and it gives agents magistral powers over non-treaty Indians. It is thought desirable and admissible also that agents should be empowered to try Indians for vagrancy under part XV. of the Code, as well as for offences against morality under part XIII. It is frequently difficult to bring Indians, guilty of vagrancy, before two justices of the peace, and evil results follow from such offences being allowed to go unpunished. In drafting the section as it stands upon the statute-book at present, sight was lost of the fact that the term "Indians" used therein did not, as defined by section 2, paragraph (h) of the Indian Act, include all the Indian population of reserves, for in some cases, part of the Indian population came under the designation "non-treaty Indian," as defined in paragraph (1) of the said section. In the proposed amendment this oversight is remedied. Clause 8 adds two new sections to the Act, viz., 140 and 141. Section 140 provides that when an Indian leaves one band and enters another, his share of the capital of the band that he leaves shall go to the credit of the band that he enters. In certain transfers from one band to another which have taken place, complaint has been made by some Indians that the band from which an Indian withdrew to enter another, gained by the withdrawal, while the members of the band which he entered lost by having their share of interest money diminished, and it has been held that an Indian leaving one band and entering another should take with him his share at least of the capital. The contention is considered a fair one, and the proposed section has been drafted to meet such cases. Clause 141 provides for the reduction of the price at which Indian lands have been sold or the rent at which they are leased, when the same is excessive. It has been the custom of the department to make such reductions as are contemplated by the amendment, it having been considered that the department was within its right in doing so when the circumstances of the case warranted a reduction, but where reductions were made on a large scale, as was the case on the Saugeen Peninsula in 1875, the authority of His Excellency in Council was obtained. When, however, the question came up of wiping out part of the arrears due by the censitaires of Sault St. Louis, the matter was referred to the Department of Justice for advice as to the course to be followed, and the Minister of Justice expressed the opinion that it would be necessary to have the authority of Parliament for foregoing any part of the amount due. This gave rise to doubt as to the legality of the department's reducing, even with the authority of His Excellency in Council, arrears of purchase money on Indian lands, or the interest thereon, and on the advice of the Department of Justice was informed that the Minister of Justice was of the opinion that the authority of Parliament was necessary for the making of such reduction. The cases in which the making of such reductions was authorized by order in council of the 30th September, 1875, afford striking examples of purchasers of land undertaking to pay exorbitant prices. Several purchased at public auction in 1856 and 1857, when speculation in land was rife, and undertook to pay as high as $5 and $6 and $7 an acre for land which proved to be wholly unfit for cultivation. Others who bought in the ordinary way paid in accordance with a surveyor's valuation, which was made when the land was thickly wooded and the real estate market in an inflated condition. It would have been utterly impossible to have collected the amounts due by the purchasers, and to have evicted them would have been a hardship. Individual cases of a similar nature freely come before the department. Too high a valuation is often made of land, and even practical farmers are frequently deceived as to its value, finding after they begin to clear that there is no depth of soil and that the bare rock will be exposed on a fire going over the land. But the opinion of the Minister of Justice, bars the department from giving in this, and other cases, the relief which it is customary to grant. Hence the authority of Parliament is asked for making reductions by way of foregoing part of the purchase money due or the interest thereon. Very few reductions have ever been made in rents payable under lease. Indian lands are mostly leased for the benefit of the individual Indian owners thereon, and only occasionally for the whole band, and when reductions in rent have been made in cases of land leased for the benefit of the Indian owner, the consent of the Indian owner has first been obtained. It is doubtful, however, whether the department has authority to reduce rent, even with the consent of the Indian owners; and, as there is sometimes very good reason for reducing rent, it is thought well to remove all doubt as to the department's right to do so. There are a number of cases which I could cite to show the hardship which would be inflicted upon purchasers, were the full amount exacted, but I shall not weary the House with them. They can be given when in Committee, if such be deemed necessary.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman spoke of taking power under the bill to pay enfranchised Indians their interest in the property of the band. What would become of the Indians who are not enfranchised? What would become of widows whose husbands were entitled to a share? How would they get their share of the common fund? There is a case in point with which I am acquainted. There is a large amount of money in the hands of the government from the Songhees reserve. There is a widow now belonging to the band who is badly off. Her husband was the chief of the Songhees, and she had to sell her cattle in order to get wine and other comforts for her husband when he was sick, and after her husband's death she lost her child, and she is now quite destitute. She applied the other day to the Indian agent in Victoria for relief, and he gave her nothing. He told her to go to work. How she is to get work I do not know. The only work that she could do is washing, and on the coast that is done by Chinamen principally. There is no work for women. Men can go hunting or fishing or go out to labour in the fields. What is meant by "enfranchising" in the Act? I do not understand the term. Does it mean that a man is entitled to vote at elections?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—An enfranchised Indian is placed in the same position as a white man, and holds his property in his own name.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In this case, to which I have referred, the woman is very badly off. The money of the tribe is lying in the bank, and she cannot get enough to buy a loaf of bread. Now, with regard to the Potlatch and the Tamanawas, the government cannot possibly stop these, for this reason: that all around the coast the Indians at the villages have these dances, and the government have not police all over the country, and they never will have police at these points. The Act will be, in a great measure, a dead letter in British Columbia, where those dances are held. Even in Victoria it will be difficult to stop them, but out in the country it will be impossible to prevent them. I think the government should not pass a bill which would be a dead letter.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to ask if the superintendent is given full power under the first clause of the bill to lease the lands of Indians? It seems to me that this is giving to the superintendent a very extraordinary power. It gives him solely and fully the power of dispossessing an Indian of his land, and leasing it without the interference of the Indian himself. The cases in which the power could be exercised might be described.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In reply to the hon. member for Victoria, I am not aware of the regulations governing the disposition of an Indian's property in British Columbia, but I have made a note of it and will make inquiry and I hope to be able to get the information. As the hon. gentleman puts it the case seems to be one of very great hardship. If there is any property belonging to an Indian his wife or children ought to get it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is $10,000 of that money in the hands of the government now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be some restrictions as to the mode of disposing of it at the death of the Indian. However, I give no opinion. The hon. gentleman from St. Boniface calls my attention to another point. I do not know whether he understands the meaning of the word "superintendent" in the Act—if he means the superintendent of the Indians on the reservation, the clause does not apply. It gives the power to the Superintendent-General—that is the head of the department in Ottawa, who would have to instruct his subordinate what should be done. The clause as it reads now contains these words:

Indians engaged in occupations which interfere with their cultivating the lands on the reserve, and all sick, infirm or aged Indians and all widows and orphans or neglected children.

These are words which are struck out of the new clause. You could only lease for the benefit of Indians included in the words which I have just read. The present clause reads:

No reserve or portion of the reserve shall be sold, alienated or leased until the same has been released or surrendered to the Crown for the purposes of this Act, but the Superintendent General may lease for the benefit of any Indian, land to which he is entitled without the same being released or surrendered.

Under the old Act land could not be leased or re-leased unless it had been surrendered. The Indian holding the land now can have it leased for his benefit whether he has surrendered it or not, and it also can be leased for the benefit of any Indian. It is not restricted to those who are cultivating the land on the reserve, who are sick, infirm or aged, or widows or orphans or neglected children. It simply gives the superintendent general power to lease land for the benefit of an Indian who does not desire to live or work upon it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Without the interference or consent of the Indian himself?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no; presumably on his application.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It only gives a wider power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that there is some force in the objection made by the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface, because, while it is true that this Act is supposed to be done by the superintendent general, who is the Minister of the Interior, everybody knows that the minister at Ottawa acts upon the recommendation of his inferior officer on the spot.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He cannot be on the spot himself and he must act on the recommendation of his subordinate. I wish to point out to the leader of the government, with a view to his considering it between the present time and the time when the House is in Committee, the possibility that this privilege might be abused in this way—that the superintendent general might lease land which continues to be a portion of the reserve (that is what the latter part of the clause applies to) for the benefit of any Indian without the same being released or surrendered. That would enable the superintendent general, on the recommendation of a local officer, to lease, nominally for the benefit of the Indian, land in the middle of a reserve. There is no limitation as to the person to whom the land might be leased, and you can imagine a white speculator leasing land in the middle of a reserve, a thing which would be very objectionable and which has caused serious difficulties in some of the older provinces. The Minister might consider whether, when the bill goes before the committee, he could not provide against that. Then, I think that clause 141, which is proposed to be added to the Act, gives a very sweeping power to the Governor in council, and although no doubt the leader of the House has the utmost confidence in the present Governor in council, there might arise a Governor in council in whom he would not have the same confidence and to whom he would not like to give so much power. It seems to me that it would be judicious to add to this proposed section 141 a provision that a yearly return, showing the case in which the action proposed in this new section had been taken, should be laid before parliament so that an opportunity would be furnished to know the cases in which the government had acted.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The contention which the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface raises is this: The Indians are in tribes, the Act allows individual Indians to withdraw from the tribe and from the treaty, the government pays an Indian, under such circumstances, no more treaty money, and he falls back on his 320 acres of land. This amendment is for the purpose of allowing the government to deal with the case of an Indian dying and leaving a helpless family behind him, to deal with that land in the most profitable way for the support of the family.

The bill was read the second time.

DESCHENES BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McLAREN moved the second reading of Bill (30) "An Act to incorporate the Deschenes Bridge Company."

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—This bill contains a great many provisions which I think should be inquired into. I have no objection to the bill itself, but there are some extraordinary powers asked for, which it would be well for the committee to understand and consider when the bill goes before the Committee on Railways and Canals. The bridging of the Ottawa is a subject which requires grave consideration. In the past, as far as the St. Lawrence River is concerned, it has been found necessary to limit the number of bridges over that river. We must bear in mind that the Ottawa will form some day the great avenue of traffic between the east and the west. I expect to see the Ottawa and Lake Huron Canal constructed, and it would be well to consider whether the proposed erections will interfere with that great project to any extent, and now is the time to make provision for such a contingency. We know that the more obstructions, the greater will be the difficulty of building the canal. Already the obstruction to the navigation of the Ottawa caused by the deposits of sawdust and mill refuse in the river has, to some extent, retarded the enterprise. This route is the natural one between the east and the North-west, as was clearly demonstrated by the Royal Society a few days ago. I have no doubt that some day the Ottawa Canal will be constructed, and now is the time to prevent any further obstructions of the river. We know that the dams and booms and piers which have been placed in the Ottawa affect navigation. The water supply at the Chaudière has been interfered with to a very great extent, partly the result, I believe, of the erection of these obstructions. Now is the time to provide against such obstructions in the future, and that is why I call the attention of the committee to this matter and ask them to consider it carefully. I know that other parties are applying for similar privileges, for the construction of a bridge within a few hundred yards of this one referred to in the bill. It seems perfectly unnecessary that two bridges should be required to do the business which is to be done at this point for years to come. The committee should adopt a plan of having but one bridge constructed, with a provision that it should be available for all parties requiring to use it, as is the case with railway bridges. The two companies should come to an understanding and use but one bridge. It is well that the committee should understand that these points will come under their consideration, and I hope that the promoters of the bill will have sketches of the point where the bridge is to be built prepared, and that evidence will be adduced to show that the bridge will not impede or affect the navigation of the river in the future. I should much prefer that these provisions should be made statutory. I have every confidence in this government, but we do not know how long the present government may be in existence, and I may not have as much confidence in their successors. It is better to have all these matters statutory in their provisions in order that no difficulty may arise to prevent the carrying of them out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Such a provision is made with respect to the international bridge at Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—Certainly, and the same can be done in this case. I throw out this suggestion in order that the committee may take these matters into consideration, and that nothing shall be done to retard or prevent the construction of the Ottawa canal in the future.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is a matter of gratification that my hon. friend has confidence in the government in this instance. Does he know that there is a regulation, as far as navigable streams are concerned, that plans of all bridges have to be submitted for the approval of the government before work can be proceeded with? I do not know that it is necessary to warn the members of the committee to discharge their duties with regard to this bill or any other bill. They are prepared to guard the public interest in every way. I am gratified to know that my hon. friend has such confidence in the government, even on the sawdust question.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 10 p.m.

CUSTOMS SEIZURE AT MONTREAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE rose to inquire of the Government—

1. At what date certain books or pamphlets bearing among other titles the following:—“For Steepy Americans, a literal translation from Li-guori's Theology, or Questions put daily by the Romish priests to women in the Confessional,” were entered at the custom-house at Montreal?

2. Whether these books were not confiscated by the officer at the head of the customs at Montreal as being of too immoral and too indecent a character for circulation?

3. If so, at what date and by what officer?

4. To whom were these books consigned?

5. Whether the consignee or importer has been prosecuted according to law?

6. If so, at what date? If not, why the law has not been put in operation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Comptroller of Customs informs me that no book bearing the title mentioned by the hon. gentleman has been seized, but there was a book entitled “Fruits of the Confessional.” He is now searching for the papers, and hopes to be able in a few days to give a full answer to the question.

The inquiry was postponed until Monday next.

THE COPYRIGHT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (F) “An Act to amend the Act intituled: ‘An Act to amend the Copyright Act.’”

Hon. Mr. LANDRY, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (29) “An Act to incorporate the James Maclaren Company (Limited).”—(Mr. McLaren.)

Bill (32) “An Act respecting the Ottawa, Arnprior and Parry Sound Railway Company.”—(Mr. McLaren.)

Bill (50) “An Act respecting the Manitoba and South-eastern Railway Company.”—(Mr. Bernier.)

CANADA AND MICHIGAN TUNNEL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (36) “An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company, and to change the name of the Company to the Canada and Michigan Bridge and Tunnel Company.”

He said: This is simply a bill to change the name of the company and grant them the privilege of building either a tunnel or a bridge.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the bill, but it makes quite a difference whether you go above the surface of the river or under the ground, and the question must be looked into closely in order to see if you are going to impede navigation. Therefore I think the hon. gentleman should explain a little more fully before we adopt the principle of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The true meaning of the bill is this, that they could not build the tunnel, and this is to enable them to float their bonds and get more money with which to build a bridge instead of a tunnel. As far as the principle of the bill is concerned, I know very little about it, but when it goes before the Railway Committee there will be ample opportunity for all parties opposed to it to present their case there.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

SABLE AND SPANISH BOOM AND SLIDE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the second reading of Bill (33) "An Act to amend the Act to grant certain powers to the Sable and Spanish Boom and Slide Company of Algoma (Limited)."

He said: This is a bill in amendment of the charter granted this company. It is purely a domestic arrangement to enable them to collect tolls in order to pay for the improvement of the dams and sildes on the river. I know they have done a great deal of good already by their operations.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned at 3.45.

THE CHUTE DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their eighth report on the petition of Julia Ethel Chute. He said: The effect of this is, not that she may be relieved of all expenses, but that the deposit of $200, that ordinarily is made in such cases with the Clerk of the Senate, be dispensed with. A number of affidavits have been laid before the committee from which the committee are satisfied that neither the petitioner nor her near relatives or friends can pay the money. In view of these facts the committee recommend that the rule requiring a deposit of $200 with the clerk be dispensed with. I move that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ODELL DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Committee on Divorce, presented their ninth report, on the Odell divorce case. He said: On a former occasion the recommendation of the committee was that this matter should be deferred until such time as both parties could be heard by counsel. The committee have heard both parties by their respective counsel, and have decided to recommend that the petition be proceeded with. I move that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE POST OFFICE SERVICE IN VICTORIA, B. C.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) inquired:

Is it the intention of the Government to do away with the provisional allowance of ten dollars per month to the post office clerks and letter carriers in Victoria, British Columbia, which they now receive in addition to their salary, and substitute in lieu thereof a fixed salary?

If so, what will the fixed salary, of each, be per month?

He said: The reason for asking for this information from the government is in consequence of a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs which exists in Victoria. The allowance of $10 to the third class clerks and the letter carriers was withheld for five months. Their regular salary, I understand, is $31 per month, and after paying their superannuation fee, which I believe is $1.90, it only left them $29.10 to live on. They petitioned the government and it is alleged got the representatives from Victoria in the House of Commons to present their case to the Postmaster General time and again. Finally, the clerks and letter carriers became desperate, not receiving a sufficient amount of pay to clothe and feed themselves and families, they went on strike for a few hours. In the meantime, the Board of Trade took up the matter. At a meeting of the Board of Trade, the members from Victoria in the Commons were present and stated that they did not at all blame the clerks and the letter carriers for the position that they had taken. However, they advised them to go back to their duties. They were only on strike a few hours, but a few hours after they had returned to work a telegram was received from the Postmaster General ordering them all to be discharged. The consequence was that for several days the Victoria Post Office service was in a thoroughly demoralized condition, and citizens, especially business men, greatly inconvenienced. The people of Victoria felt so much sympathy with these poor men that a large meeting was held in the city hall, which was addressed by the clergy of all denominations (with the exception, I think, of the Roman Catholic Church) and by other public men, and they urged, in the strongest possible way that the government immediately reinstate those clerks and letter carriers and pay their back salaries—at least this provisional allowance of $10 which had accumulated to the amount of $50 for each. I believe that the resolutions passed at the public meeting were forwarded to the Postmaster General, and a copy was also sent to the present Premier, who was then acting Premier in the absence of the late Sir John Thompson. Nothing was done, I understand, to rectify the gross injustice done these people, until, through the kind intercession of His Excellency with the present Prime Minister and the Postmaster General, those people were placed back in their former positions and received their back pay. As far as I have been able to learn there is no provisional allowance made for similar employees of the government other than in the province of Manitoba, the Territories and British Columbia. I see no good reason why this provisional allowance should be made. I am strongly of opinion that it would be much better—certainly better for those letter carriers and post office clerks—if they had a fixed salary, the same as they have in other provinces of the Dominion. Even with the provisional allowance of $10 added to their salary of $31, and deducting their superannuation fee, it only amounts to $29.10 a month, a salary altogether inadequate to the positions they occupy and services rendered, because I need not remind the House that those officials have to be educated and responsible men and ought to live in keeping with their positions. It is certainly in the interest of those people, and I believe in the interest of the service and the public, that a fixed salary should be allowed each of those employees and that it should not be less than $50 a month. Taking into consideration how expensive it is to live in the western provinces, especially British Columbia and the Territories, $50 a month would not go as far towards supporting those people and their wives and families as $35 would in the older provinces. From looking over the report of the Postmaster General I think that in nearly all the cities of the eastern portion of Canada they receive between $45 and $50 a month. I hope that the Government will at once increase their salaries to not less than the figures I have mentioned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not the intention of the government at the present moment to do away with the provisional allowance to post office clerks and letter carriers in Victoria, B.C. When they do come to a decision to do away with that extra provisional allowance, they will then adopt a scale of salary commensurate with the positions they hold.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MILITIA RIFLE RANGE

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) inquired :

Is it the intention of the Government to provide a convenient and suitable rifle range for the use of the large body of Militia in Victoria, British Columbia?

If so, when will the range be ready for use?

He said: I may inform the House that in Victoria alone we have something in the neighbourhood of 400 volunteers or militia men, and we have no rifle range worthy of the name within 14 miles of the city. We have one at Gold Stream, which is away out on the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, 14 miles from the city of Victoria. One-half of the year there is only one passenger train going each way over that road, and it is utterly impossible for the majority of the volunteers to spare the time and bear the very considerable expense of going out to that range to practise rifle shooting as they should. We have an old range that has been used in the city of Victoria known as Clover Point rifle range. It is on a narrow neck of land running out about 200 yards into the Gulf of Georgia and the main drive of the whole city of Victoria passes immediately along the very edge of the firing point at 400, 500 and 600 yards so that on Saturday afternoon when the most of the volunteers, who are mechanics, labourers and clerks, have time to go out to practise rifle shooting they are frequently stopped by an almost constant stream of carriages passing along where they are firing. Besides, this range has been kept in repair, almost solely by the local riflemen themselves. I am not a militia man; I never was, and I suppose I am a little too old now to become one. However, I am somewhat of a rifle crank, my friends tell me. I know a little about rifle practice and how to use the rifle and I cannot help remarking that if a great deal of the money that is now spent in drilling the men was expended in instructing the volunteers of our country in the use of the rifle, they would be a great deal more effective should the necessity ever arise for their active service. I venture to say that a very small percentage, probably not more than 10 per cent, of the volunteers know how to use effectively any rifle that may be placed in their hands, especially the modern rifles, and one of the greatest necessities to-day in order to make our militia efficient is to give them a great deal more rifle practice, and much less drill.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I like to see a body of military men presenting a fine appearance, but at the same time it would be very much better that they should be acquainted with the use of the rifle and make drill a secondary matter. I might also say that this rifle range at Victoria is within the limits of the city and we are there actually on sufferance. We got permission from the city council, but that permission is liable to be withdrawn from us at any moment, and I think it is too bad, after spending thirty-five or forty thousand dollars in building a very fine drill hall there, that our militia should be deprived of one of the many necessities to equip them for active service. I therefore hope the government will at once secure a convenient rifle range—and there are many places within easy reach of the city of Victoria that can be got. We have two electric tramways, one running northward and the other eastwards that can take the volunteers within two or three minutes walk of places where a first class rifle range could be established at a very moderate cost.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In answer to the hon. gentleman's question I can inform him that no action has been taken towards providing a rifle range for the militia of Victoria, B. C. No report from the local officers has reached the government as to the necessity at present for a range in that locality. When that is done, the government will consider the matter, and do that which is deemed best in the interests of the militia force.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask if the representatives from Victoria have ever applied for a new rifle range? Can he inform me on that subject?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I am not in a position to answer that question. I have given the hon. gentleman the answer which has been provided by the department.

NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McINNES moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General: praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate:—

1. A copy of the instructions to Mr. Justice Drake, 1894, relative to the inquiry into the management of the New Westminster Penitentiary.

2. A copy of all the evidence given before the Royal Commission held before Mr. Justice Drake, in 1894, relative to the management of the New Westminster Penitentiary.

3. A copy of the report of Mr. Justice Drake thereon.

He said: The only thing that I desire to say in connection with this motion is that I waited for a long time before giving this notice, hoping that the returns called for in the other House would be brought down, but up to the time I gave the notice they had not been submitted. I understand that since giving this notice they have come down. I hope the hon. minister will see that a copy of them is laid on the table of the Senate within a few days. I might also state that a preliminary report was brought down some days ago. I tried to get a copy of it in the other House, or see it, but it was in the possession of members who were very much interested in the subject and I was not able to get it. When the other papers that I have called for are brought down I hope that these other documents will be brought down as well.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no objection to complying with the request made in this motion, and if there are any other papers in connection with the case not called for in this motion, I shall endeavour to have them all laid before the House at the earliest possible moment. Should the Printing Committee in the other House order that they be printed, it would not be necessary to have them reprinted for this House. However, we will have them laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—The only object I have is to get possession of them in a reasonable time.

THE INSOLVENCY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (A) "An Act respecting Insolvency."

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Give us an explanation of the bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I scarcely think that I should be justified in wearying the House with so long a statement as I made last year explaining the provisions of this bill. I can inform my hon. friend that there are no changes in the principle of the bill as it passed last session. The changes that have been made in the bill are more verbal in character than affecting the principle involved in an Insolvency Act. It was found, on a close study of the bill, that so many changes were made in it last session that there were some incongruities, and they have been changed, but the alterations are more in the verbiage than anything else.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If it is important, in the interest of the people of Canada, that an insolvency law should be placed on the statute book, I presume that the one under consideration is as free from objections as any that could be devised, except on a few points which were discussed in this chamber last year. Since the House rose last year, however, I have failed to observe any great demand in the country for the passage of an Insolvency Act. In Ontario the law now authorizes the distribution of the estate of insolvent debtors in two ways, one in the event of a party failing a creditor can come in, much in the same way as under the law in the province of Quebec. The law also provides for the distribution of the assets amongst the creditors. The only difference between that law and the one under consideration is that the Ontario Act omits to provide (as the province had not the power) for the discharge of the insolvent; so that, as far as the two larger provinces are concerned, Ontario and Quebec, there is really at the present moment no great necessity for the passing of an Insolvency Act. The Ontario Act has been passed in New Brunswick since last session, and I have no doubt it will be adopted, if not in the same words, at all events in the same spirit, in all the other provinces. Under those provincial Acts the expense is much less than under the machinery provided for in this Act. Under the circumstances, we should consider whether there is really any necessity to pass this bill. We devoted a great deal of time to the subject last session, and no doubt improved the bill very considerably. One does not desire seriously to go into the consideration of the measure now unless there is some assurance that it is to go beyond this chamber, and that there is a reasonable probability of its being passed in the House of Commons. I am, of course, unable to make any observations on that point, as I do not know what the sense of the House of Commons would be on the subject, although I recognize, as every one must, that there is no great necessity for such a law at present. I do not propose to oppose the bill at this stage, but shall be very glad to hear the opinions of other hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—In every mercantile community an insolvency law is necessary. I am aware, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that there is an insolvency law in several of the provinces. There is none, however, in the province of Quebec, where the common law is found to answer the purpose very well. But it is exceedingly desirable that the law should be uniform from one end of the Dominion to the other. It is objectionable that a discharge cannot be given under the provincial Act, as has been stated by the honorable gentleman from Ottawa. The object in view in every insolvency law should be to see that the assets of the insolvent are equally and equitably distributed among all the creditors. It is my opinion, also, that the insolvency law should apply to all debtors so that all should participate in the advantages, or the disadvantages, if there are any. If there are any penalties for wrong-doing they should be imposed upon one class as well as upon another. Any other law would, in my opinion, be wrong. This insolvency bill is a step in the right direction, and when it goes into committee of the whole, amendments can be considered more fully than they can be at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I am very glad that some attention is to be given to this measure. The course pursued last year seemed to place those who did not agree with the principle of an insolvency law in an unfortunate position, because, although the bill was brought in by the government it was referred to a committee, and the committee, after considering the details, reported the bill. The argument was then used that the committee having reported upon the measure it was wrong to throw it out, or even to discuss its principle. I think the bill is a step in the wrong direction; it would be a step in the right direction to throw it out now. The basis of legislation hitherto in the British colonies and, in fact, all civilized countries, has been, as far as possible, never to impair contracts which have been legitimately made under existing laws. To a certain extent this general rule would apply in opposition to the principle of an Insolvency Act, but that general rule, like all general rules, should admit of exceptions, and the question now is whether sufficient exceptions exist in the present state of the country to justify the government in passing a general Insolvency Act. The remarkable business depression now apparent has doubtless influenced the government in submitting this bill as a possible remedy. Just as in 1875, the government was actuated when the country was undergoing a similar period of commercial trouble, but I am unwilling to believe that an insolvency law is justifiable or will provide an adequate remedy. I am forced to this conclusion more particularly from a slight retrospect of the history of the past. During the history of confederation, we have had on the statute-book for a year or two one insolvency law. Now, permanency is necessary to ensure the usefulness of a law of this kind and we know very well, looking at the history of legislation in this direction in Canada and elsewhere, that permanency is not an element in insolvency laws. During the last century in the neighbouring republic—where surely with the amount of business they are transacting there would be as much necessity for moving in this line as in any other country—they have, on only one or two occasions, enacted a temporary insolvency law, which lasted a very short time on each occasion. At the present time throughout the union they are discussing two bills, one a general bankruptcy law under federal auspices to apply to the whole union, and another, and shorter act, to confer upon the different states the power to legislate in accordance with the conditions and requirements of each particular state. Then if we look to the mother land, England, what do we find there? We find there that they have had since the reign of Henry VIII. a bankruptcy law, or rather they have had a law for the relief of insolvent debtors. It would be more properly entitled a bill for the punishment of debtors. In the early history of that country debtors were imprisoned for debt and it became very important that these men, who were subject to long terms of imprisonment, should be relieved from unmerciful and exacting creditors. That is the foundation of the English system of insolvency, which has frequently changed, but we know very well that the conditions of countries differ, and when we undertake to draw a parallel between countries, we should look into their relative conditions. In Great Britain the area is small, 70,000 odd square miles, with population of about 40,000,000. They are peculiarly a commercial people within that confined and restricted area, and not only that, but the British Government is not a dual government as ours is. In this country, with its extensive area and scattered people, we know the difficulty of meeting the wants and wishes and requirements of different localities. We have machinery in Canada, as they have in the neighbouring union, by which laws of this character can be made to suit the varying circumstances of the several sections of the country. I therefore differ from the hon. gentleman from Burlington as to the necessity for uniformity. But if there were a necessity for it, we would hardly secure it by the passage of this bill. We know that several sections of this bill are simply confirmatory, if I mistake not, of enactments in the province of Quebec, indicating that it would not be prudent to apply a general bankruptcy law to that province. Then, again, it was developed during the discussion in committee last year, that the rising province of Manitoba is entirely differently situated from other provinces with reference to the amount of property subject to execution. In Manitoba some twelve or fifteen hundred dollars worth of property is exempt from any law which we may pass in this parliament. This makes another distinction, and therefore we find a vast difference between the operation of this bankruptcy law as applied in Manitoba or as applied in Prince Edward Island or in Nova Scotia. So in its provisions and details and operation it is impossible to secure that uniformity to which my hon. friend from Burlington has alluded. My hon. friend from Ottawa, in his few remarks, stated that whilst last year there had been some application on the part of the banks and boards of trade for bankruptcy legislation, this year there have been no petitions for it. We have never heard anything indicating a desire on the part of the farmers, the artisans, the merchants and the traders of this country for a law of this kind. There was some pressure from boards of trade, but even the boards of trade have not unanimously favoured it. Last year there were two or three petitions from boards of trade against the passage of this bill. That was a year ago, and my hon. friend has referred to the altered condition of things since then. It was not generally known then that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had confirmed the local Act passed by the Ontario Parliament, which does away with the real grievance that many of those who appeared before the committee desired to get rid of—that is to say, that there should be an equitable distribution of estates and a cheap way of examining into the affairs of an insolvent to show that there was no fraud. Since that Act has been confirmed and is in lively operation, the New Brunswick Government has taken the same view and we have on the statute-book of New Brunswick now a law similar in many respects to the Ontario Act—I think precisely the same—which, so far as I have seen it reported in the St. John papers, has met the requirements of the St. John Board of Trade. That is what the boards of trade particularly required, because the necessity of some action as evinced by the complaints from Montreal, arose in this way—in the lower provinces a great many traders, who, perhaps, never should have been trusted at all, who had very little property responsibility and perhaps less aptitude for business life—after procuring credit through the commercial agents who come to our province like a wolf on the fold, credit which should never have been forced on these at all because they were in no position for trading—after a year or two when failure came, as failure almost always comes in such cases, then there was an assignment to a friendly assignee with preferences to their local creditors, leaving the Montreal merchants, and perhaps the Toronto or Hamilton suppliers, out in the cold. That was an unfortunate condition of things which ought to be remedied, and no doubt it led the wholesale dealers of commercial centres to demand, as they did last year, a bankruptcy law to meet the difficulty. That has all been met, so far as Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick are concerned. A similar bill was passed in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, but was thrown out, unfortunately by a small majority in the Legislative Council. I have no doubt that it will be passed at the next meeting of the Nova Scotia legislature. When we have, in a very cheap way, without a cumbrous general law of 155 sections, such as this, the means to meet our local requirements and provide an equitable distribution of an insolvent estate without preferences, when we have everything which seems to be required to ensure the honest winding up of an insolvent estate excepting the actual discharge, I do not see any great necessity for this legislation. If men are really striving to pay 100 cents on the $1 and cannot meet their obligations, I do not think we ought to put it within the power of anybody to drive them into insolvency. I do not believe that such a law is a good one. In many cases, if they are honest, and are let alone, they ultimately will pay their debts. If they do not, and have to make a distribution all around, I do not think there would be one case in ten where a creditor would refuse to give a discharge where everything has been done fairly and squarely and above board. That difficulty ought not to be brought up as really a very great objection. In the first place, the crediting is a voluntary thing. Men are not compelled to supply these people, and in most cases they should not be supplied. For the reasons that I have given they should in many cases remain upon their farms. They should not be so ambitious to handle dry goods. They have not the aptitude or training for it, and it is only confusing the legitimate business of the country. But if wholesale dealers chose to exercise their discretion to supply them, it is their own look out. They are not compelled to do so, and it is scarcely fair that we should give them the power to force these people into insolvency afterwards. I had the honour last year of being upon the committee, and I did the best I could to help to improve the measure, but I never felt that I was committed to the principle of the bill in any way. I simply brought to bear upon it whatever I could think of in the way of rendering it as harmless as possible, but I and other members of the committee reserved the right to vote against the principle of the bill; I hope the measure will receive careful consideration before it is allowed to become law and that the country will be saved what I think will be a degradation and the government themselves the odium of passing an Act that cannot fail to be injurious to the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hesitate as to the position I should take upon this bill. Last year when it came before us I gave all my knowledge and ability towards the perfecting of the bill, that is to make it as little injurious as possible. I did not like it as a whole, but I thought it better to let it pass its third reading and see what improvements might be made in it elsewhere. This year I was in hopes that it would not come before us, at least that it would be introduced in the Commons. The feeling of the merchants and others in the province from which I come is opposed to this bill, and I had hoped the government would have delayed it, as it was not a party question, until a new parliament had met, when the members, fresh from the people, would be better able to deliberate and decide upon its merits or demerits. Looking back at the old law of 1869 to 1875 and 1880 and seeing the vast amount of injury done by it during that time, I doubt the wisdom of passing such legislation. Instead of raising the standard of public and commercial morality and securing honest and fair trade, it had the opposite effect, and I know that in 1880, when it was abolished, the people rejoiced that they were freed from the incubus. The country has prospered ever since and I do not see at the present moment any necessity for a bill of this kind. Even now we are so assured by those who spoke to-day on this bill. The leader of the opposition and his followers declare that the country is not in that condition to require it. A permanent Act I do not think is necessary at any time. In an extreme emergency legislation may be needed, and therefore I feel very great hesitancy in voting for the second reading of this bill. I should like to hear from other hon. gentlemen, who know what the impressions are in their part of the country, and before I commit myself to it. I am in favour of a general law. My objection in the past has been to having a law for each province, if those laws were at variance with each other. It is now decided that the provinces can pass insolvency laws. Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick have their laws and Nova Scotia will follow. We should have a common law affecting all provinces alike, and I was in hopes that the legislature of Nova Scotia last year would fall into line with Ontario and New Brunswick. I believe the bill they introduced was in harmony with that of New Brunswick, and if I could be shown to-day that these various bills were for the equitable distribution of estates and to prevent preferential assignments, it is all that we require. If that can be effected so that the laws of the several provinces will be alike as far as possible, that is all that should be asked. Therefore, I am hesitating at this moment. I very seldom hesitate as to what vote I give upon anything because I am generally strong in my convictions with regard to legislation. I should like to hear from other hon. gentlemen from various parts of Canada, as to whether we should pass this bill now. My impression is that no harm would be done if it were delayed until after the next election and the government would act wisely by not pressing this bill.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—As the Debates show, I voted last session against this bill, very much for the reasons which have been so well given by the hon. gentleman from Albert. During the recess I made inquiries in the constituency from which I come, as far as I could, and found I might say almost a universal consensus of opinion that they would much rather not have such legislation—that the effect in very many cases would be, to say the least of it, prejudicial instead of beneficial. I do not intend to make any extended remarks on this occasion, for the simple reason that the hon. member from Albert has expressed very clearly the grounds upon which I intend to act, and for those reasons I shall vote against the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is well known in this House, and throughout the country, that I am not favourable to legislation such as this, and I am surprised that the government seek it. I doubt if they really are in favour of it, although it is brought in here. The question in my mind is—Who asked the Senate to pass this bill? Where are the petitions asking for legislation which is going to change the whole relations of the commerce of this country? We should be careful before we change the relations between creditor and debtor. There were petitions here last year from boards of trade and wholesale merchants who want this legislation, but, as has been pointed out, these wholesale merchants are not obliged to trust their customers. They have the power to protect themselves in their own hands, and I do not see why this parliament should aid them to collect their debts by enacting this bill. The law of the country at the present time ought to be sufficient for them. The merchants are, of course, respectable men, but they should not ask parliament to legislate for them. It is class legislation. The merchants send their drummers out, and you meet them at every cross-road coaxing and almost forcing people to buy goods; and after all this, they wish to get the power to put their customers into insolvency if they do not get their money at once. The debtors do not ask for this legislation. A great deal has been said about the poor debtor, but they do not want this legislation. If this bill goes on the statute-book, it will have a demoralizing effect on the country. When we had it before, from 1875 to 1880, what was the result? It was an incubus and a nightmare hanging on the country and when it was repealed in 1880 there were bon-fires all over the country and people were glad and shaking hands with one another saying: "Now every honest man has a chance to get along; he has not got to compete with the schemer who goes into business and undersells him and then goes into bankruptcy and compromises for 50 cents on the dollar." We had the experience of the previous law for five years, and this is simply a transcript of it with a little variation. Of course, we change the name and instead of "assignee" we have it now "receiver." The honest people of this country do not want this law. Honest retailers have succeeded fairly well, but what will be the result if we pass this law? You give the chance to the schemer to buy goods and start in business, then prepare himself for difficulties and go into insolvency and pay 50 cents on the dollar, and afterwards start anew and undersell the honest retailer who will be obliged to go out of business and shut up shop. That will be the effect of it if we make the mistake of passing such a measure. I have very great regard and admiration for the Prime Minister of this country, but he is not going to carry me away from my duty to the people. I would consider it ruinous legislation. It has been stated by some hon. gentlemen that the bankers and wholesale traders met before the committee, and we should not lose the time that we spent last year, and therefore we must put the bill through now. It would be better that we should lose the whole session and other sessions than to pass this bill, because we know what the disastrous effect of an Insolvent Act was before, and what its effect will be now. Why should the bankers of the country have anything to say about a bankruptcy law? If you go to a bank to get money, they want you to furnish a good endorser, and they are sure to take the interest in advance every time, and if you are not able at the end of three months to pay, they will take the interest again. The bankers of this country ought to be satisfied with the advantages they already possess. I am proud to say that our banks are in a good position, and it shows the honesty of the people—that they have paid their debts fairly well, since banking is so profitable. Look at the bank stocks of this country and compare their value with what it was fifteen years ago. Bank stocks have risen in value since the old insolvency law was repealed; they have doubled, and it has helped the country very much all this time. The government thought that the people were so well off in this country that they did not want to pay 4 per cent on deposits in the savings banks and the rate is down now to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  and 3 per cent. The banks induced the government to do that; and then they put down the interest in the banks. Supposing a man took stocks fifteen years ago, to-day he will almost double his money. They have been paying 7 or 8 per cent all the time and now they ask us to pass this bill. Did anybody ever take the trouble to see the amount of money we have in the banks of this country? It is surprising. We can pay cash if we want to. I said before if the wholesale merchants kept their drummers at home, we could do very well. The people of this country have got in the banks \$194,924,776, and the banks are paying 2 and 3 per cent. It is not necessary that wholesale men should trust the people quite so much, because the people could pay cash if they wanted to do so. We are asked to legislate for the banks and the wholesale merchants of the country, while the masses of the people do not want legislation. I say this fearlessly and honestly, and I don't care who hears me, that if the government press such legislation as this, they will get wrecked when they come before the people. I have great respect for the Prime Minister of this country; I think very much of him; and I feel satisfied that many in this House, from the respect they have for him, will support the bill, even though they know that the legislation is wrong, but if they had to go before the country very few of them would come back here. Knowing the disastrous effect that the former law had, I want to oppose the bill at this stage. I do not want it to go any further. I hope the government will withdraw it. The hon. gentleman has surely seen enough to know that the majority of this House do not want it. I am sure that the members of the House of Commons do not want it, and that it will not pass there. I ask him as a favour, and in the interests of the people, and of the government, and all honest men who wish to see this country prosperous, to withdraw this bill. If he does not, as far as I am concerned, I must do my duty and oppose the bill at every stage, and I think this is the proper time to stop its progress. It is a transcript of the old law, only a little worse, because, in the old Act, a man had to owe \$500 before you could put him into insolvency, but now for a debt of \$250 you can send a man into bankruptcy in a few days. Under the present law for collection of debts, if you sue a man for \$250, he can enter a defence in court, and he can arrange the whole matter. Under this bill you can crush him out of existence. Therefore, I cannot be a party to such a measure, and I would ask hon. gentlemen not to let their regard for the Prime Minister carry away their conscience. With all my Conservative proclivities, I stand here in opposition to this government measure, and I will try to do my duty honestly. I therefore move that this bill be not now read, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I cannot give a silent vote on this measure. Hon. gentlemen know that I am opposed to such legislation, but my reason for the opposition is a special one. I believe that in the province of Quebec we have all that is necessary, so much so that all legislation which has taken place of late years in the same direction in other provinces has been found to work a great deal worse than the legislation that we have in the province of Quebec. Not only in our province but in other provinces they have felt that they are in a better position to deal with insolvency than the Dominion Parliament is. Nevertheless, I am not yet ready to tell the government that their efforts to provide a general insolvency law have been in vain, and that this House should not try to make the bill workable. The bill can be opposed at any stage—you may ask for the six months' hoist at the third reading, if the House, after the committee stage thinks that the bill cannot be made workable. It is too soon to move the six months' hoist now, and I regret to say that I cannot support the amendment. It has been argued by the hon. gentleman from Burlington that it is necessary to assimilate the laws of the several provinces. I do not agree with him. If you do so, you will find great difficulty. I have been sitting here with him for 13 or 15 sessions, and I would remind him that almost every session we have passed laws making exceptions in the case of the several provinces. It is impossible in a country like ours to have uniformity in legislation. We must consider the circumstances of the several provinces. Sometimes the west and the east may not agree. We must at times take into consideration special circumstances and concede something. Though the principle of a bill may be the same for all the Dominion, yet the details may vary for different provinces. Then the hon. Senator from Burlington said that he believed in the principle that every class of the community ought to be brought under the law of bankruptcy. That is not only bad in principle, but it is also unjust. In passing such a law you have to take into consideration the difference which exists between the people at large and the traders. Would it not be unjust to treat the farmer as you do the trader? Why is it necessary for you to have a law for the traders? It is because if a debtor is not stopped before he has expended the whole of what he has on hand, the creditor is in great danger of getting nothing. If there is an insolvency law the creditor can stop the debtor and have a chance of recovering 25 or 50 per cent, but with the farmer it is not the same. The farmer has his property, and when the creditor thinks that the farmer owes too much, and has been too long in repaying the money, he may at once sue him, get judgment and recover, or he may go to a notary, have a mortgage on the property, and then it is only leaving his money out at 5 or 6 per cent, and it is to the advantage of the creditor. Such differences existing would it not be unjust to make the law apply to all classes? Any one who knows anything about the people generally knows that the farmer, if this law applied to him, would become involved until the whole of his property was swallowed up. So it would be unjust to allow the farmer to come under the bankruptcy law. As regards that class of people, it would be better to restrict than to give full liberty to go on. In committee, if I am present, I shall vote against such a clause. There are other clauses for which I shall not vote. The bill may be so amended in committee, so that I could not oppose it, because such legislation may be required in provinces which have not such good laws as we have in Quebec. I know the great city of Montreal supplies the whole Dominion and that is a reason why there may be a necessity of assimilating the laws. It would not be fair to force our merchants to study all the laws of the several provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We cannot always, as legislators, insist upon our own views; we must try to promote the general good, and it is on that principle that I am speaking. So, after having voted against the six months' hoist, I shall oppose all the clauses of the bill which I think are not in the general interest.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Like the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière, I do not wish to give a silent vote. I may say very frankly, for my own part, I regret that the government has introduced this bill, because, so far as I can learn, there does not appear to be any very general consensus of opinion in favour of such a measure, at all events in Ontario. At the same time, as I do not entertain the same strong convictions against the bill that the hon. member for Monck does, I shall not vote against it, but reserve my objections until the bill goes into committee.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C.B.)—I am opposed to the bill. It is not asked for except by the merchants of Montreal and Toronto. Such legislation is not wanted in Nova Scotia, not even a bill for the equitable distribution of insolvent estates, as is proved by the action of the local legislature last session. However, I think that action was a mistake, and that provision should be made for an equitable distribution of insolvent estates. I do not see that we could very well pass a uniform law for the Dominion without combining with it the principle of granting a discharge to an insolvent debtor from the responsibility of paying his debts, and to do that is immoral. I do not see why we should interfere and make it legal for a man not to pay his debts. This bill is simply to enable the dishonest trader to be relieved from the responsibility of paying his debts. There is no necessity for that. The honest trader will always be able to secure a discharge from his creditors, and a dishonest trader should not receive his discharge. I believe the consensus of the country is against this bill, and that it would be better for the country to withdraw it. I shall vote against the second reading.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—There seems to be a great diversity of opinion this session as compared with last session. Last year I thought the opinion of this House was favourable to an insolvency law of some kind. There has been an agitation for such a law for some years. The people of this country have been calling for some Act whereby the honest trader would get a discharge from his liabilities. The people of this country consider that its credit has been injured in England for the want of some such law. Last year, it is true, I opposed a great many clauses of the bill. I agreed with the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière that the farmer should not be included, but it was carried against me. On the general principle, however, I think it was admitted very generally that the country required some such act whereby the honest man would get a discharge from his liabilities. It has been urged that there is a law in Ontario which takes a man's estate from him and distributes it among his creditors, but there was no power to give that man his discharge, and that was one of the principal causes for this bill. The Dominion Parliament is the only authority to carry such an act into effect. I am sorry to see such a feeling prevailing to-day, and possibly it would be better to adjourn the debate and give time for further consideration. I believe firmly that a great many people of this country are desirous of having some such measure. Whether this bill meets their views or not, I am not in a position to say. It does not meet my view entirely, but we must give and take and we made the very best possible bill that we could, and took a great deal of time to consider it, and it is rather a strange thing that we should now cavalierly dispose of the bill. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised at the motion made by the hon. gentleman from Rideau. The hon. gentleman seems to think that by some mysterious influence the minds of hon. gentlemen will be changed between to-day and to-morrow. The members of the House have had a whole year to consider this bill and ascertain the feelings of the people of the different parts of the country. I do not think there is any ground at all for a postponement of the decision. I was also surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Rideau tell this House that for a long time the people of this country had been clamouring for an insolvency law. The hon. gentleman is the only member who has heard even a loud whisper in favour of an insolvency law. The statement of the hon. gentleman from Monck is perfectly correct, that there was a feeling of relief when the original insolvency law, or the law as amended in 1875, was repealed in the session of 1880. There was a feeling that an incubus had been removed from the shoulders of the people in trade in this country, and there has never since then been any manifestation of a desire on the part of any large portion of the population for another insolvency law. It is perfectly correct to say that last session petitions were presented to this House coming from the boards of trade of certain cities, Montreal and Toronto more especially. My hon. friend from Monck is in error in supposing that the bankers made any especial request for the passage of an insolvency law.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think one hon. gentleman addressing this House last session said that the committee had met the bankers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—When it was understood that the government intended to introduce an insolvency law, then the representatives of the banks came here to see that they got fair play. It has been suggested by an hon. gentleman in my neighbourhood, and there is a good deal in the suggestion, that considering that this bill was carefully considered in this House last session and sent to the other House, it would have been, on the whole, more appropriate to introduce it this year in the House of Commons. I cannot help making an observation on the ground taking by the hon. member from De Lanaudière, that while he was opposed to the principle of the bill, still he proposed to vote for its second reading. The hon. gentleman told us, and told us truly, that they have in the province of Quebec a law which suits the business men of that province admirably, and that they do not wish it changed. Does not the hon. gentleman realize that if this bill is passed, and he helps to pass it if he votes for the second reading, then that admirable law which they have in the province of Quebec will cease to be operative and the province of Quebec, like the rest of the Dominion, will come under the operation of the measure before us? If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with the present law of the province of Quebec, and his language indicates that he is, then he would not be justified in voting for any law which proposes to change it. Every one knows the story of the man who was well and would be better, and the result. I hope that will not be the case with the hon. gentleman. Not only was there a feeling of relief throughout the whole country when the former insolvency law was repealed, but there was a feeling of regret last year through the country when the impression got abroad that another insolvent law was likely to be passed. No petitions came here in favour of this bill last year from any bodies except the boards of trade. Some boards of trade were opposed to this measure. If I am not mistaken the board of trade of the city from which the premier comes sent a petition against this bill last year.

Hon. Mr. READ (Québec).—That is the only one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know whether a petition against it came from the board of trade of Halifax, but I know the board of trade of Halifax is altogether opposed to the passage of an insolvent law, and their opposition to insolvency legislation was so great that they would not even pass a resolution in favour of the insolvency bill before the Nova Scotia legislature this year. There have been no petitions for this measure this year at all. It may be said, and probably the Prime Minister will say, that if there have been no petitions for it there have been none against it. Why have there been none against it? Simply because the impression got abroad that the bill was dropped—that there was no inclination to proceed with the measure. I know that was the impression in the city from which I come. It will be remembered that in the speech from the throne this year we were told by His Excellency's advisers, through his mouth, that the business depression which had prevailed so extensively throughout the world had not been as keenly felt in Canada as in other places. One great reason for that was that we had no insolvency law here. Just on account of the absence of an insolvency law business has been done in a careful and conservative way. Business people did not take any risks, either sellers or buyers. A small dealer who felt that he had to pay 100 cts. in the dollar was very likely to be careful not to buy more than his business called for. If he felt, as would be the case if this bill became law, that he could settle with his creditors for 50 cts. on the dollar, he would not be so careful or so conservative. I feel that now, when the opinion is that the lowest point of depression has been passed and that times are likely to improve, to pass an insolvent law the practical effect of which would be to allow a man to pay $1 with 50 cents, would be to make a very great mistake and to take a step which would be calculated to interfere with the revival of business and for that reason I think this bill should not pass. It is true it seems a regrettable thing that we should have spent a considerable amount of time on this bill last year and devoted a great deal of labor to it, but we did not hurt ourselves—it kept us, perhaps, out of mischief. Our object was to make the measure as little injurious as possible, but that end will be much better gained if the bill does not pass at all. The position, as the hon. member from Albert said, has been changed since last year. The bill which was passed in this House last year was introduced at the instance of some boards of trade of the upper provinces. Hon. gentlemen, who were members of the special committee who had charge of this bill last year, will remember that the representatives of the boards of trade and of the banks both said before that committee that if they had in the smaller provinces such legislation as existed in Quebec and Ontario, they would not ask for a Dominion measure. Another thing has been stated by the hon. member from Albert, that at the time we met last year there was some doubt as to whether or not the Ontario Act was within the jurisdiction of the legislature of that province. Since that time the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have decided that the Ontario Act is intra vires. The Ontario Act has given satisfaction, the Quebec Act has given satisfaction, the New Brunswick Act will no doubt give satisfaction in that province, and then we have only to deal with Nova Scotia and one or two other provinces. As to Nova Scotia, I have very little doubt but that a bill containing similar provisions to those of the Ontario Act will be passed at the next session of the local legislature. It passed the House of Assembly during the late session and was killed in the council just at the close of the session, largely because there was not time to look after it, and the government were taken by surprise. It was killed by gentlemen who really did not understand, I believe, the effect of their action. It has been stated already and is undoubtedly true that those local acts are suited to the wants of each province. The province of Quebec has a law which satisfies its own people admirably. Ontario has a law which satisfies her people admirably, and I think the local acts satisfy the people better than any general law could.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of fact, I think the law which prevails in Quebec would not probably satisfy all the other provinces, and the laws which prevail in the other provinces would not satisfy Quebec so well. The Ontario law is likely to be enacted in all the other provinces, and you will have practically a uniform law everywhere except in the province of Quebec. There is this other reason why we should not interfere—the insolvent law was repealed in 1880, now fifteen years ago. The Dominion Government and Parliament have stood by and allowed the local legislatures to enact laws for the purpose of dealing with insolvent estates, and these laws deal with them in a satisfactory way, and to come in now at the eleventh hour and enact a law which we failed to enact when it might have been looked for, is uncalled for and unwise. It is not a proper course of action to take at all. It should be taken only in the presence of something approaching absolute necessity. There has not been any evidence whatever produced that there is any such necessity now. This is a bill which, if it became law, would be likely to disturb the business relations of the whole country, and the presumption is, judging from our experience with former insolvent laws, that it would disturb business with injurious results. There is no necessity for it, no demand for it, and therefore, I think Parliament would not be justified in passing it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was my intention to support the motion made by the hon. member from Welland with regard to the six months' hoist, but as I have been put down as a seconder of the motion of my hon. friend for the adjournment of the debate, I think that that, probably, is the most sensible course that we could pursue at present. We should never do anything in haste. This is an important question, the question of bringing our whole relations as regards debtor and creditor under an Act, and it should not be disposed of hastily. As far as I am able to judge of public opinion, I have not seen any particular demand since we met last year for this Insolvency Act, and it would do no harm if the bill were thrown over from one year to another until a demand does spring up. If it would improve our credit in the markets of the old world, from a free trade standpoint, I say that anything that will assist in that direction is desirable, and an insolvency bill probably is more for the purpose of improving our commercial credit abroad so as to bring the whole of our commercial interests into one uniform channel. In that respect it commends itself to my mind. But, in the absence of any public demand, or expression of opinion, with regard to the desirability of this legislation, I think it is probably premature to bring the measure before the country at the present moment, and in the best interests of the country, it would be desirable to support the motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I prefer that the debate should be adjourned to give members an opportunity of discussing it, but if a division is forced on the six months' hoist I shall vote for that. I have no expectation myself that the bill could be so amended that I would support it. I agree with the arguments of those who say that the public are satisfied with the laws that the local legislatures can make for themselves and my impression is that the people of Ontario are quite satisfied with the laws that they have. At the same time, a bill that has had so much supervision should be allowed to stand over—it should go to the committee with the reservation that we shall vote as we like after that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I can judge from the expression of opinions that have been given by members of the Senate who have spoken, I should come to the conclusion that the consensus of opinion was against the Insolvency Act. That this is the sentiment of the Canadian community I am not prepared to admit. No one could find fault, however, with the spirit in which this question has been discussed by members of the Senate. They have given freely and frankly their opinion. There are many reasons, I doubt not, that have led many hon. gentlemen to the conclusion which they have formed; there is one thing, however, that I was somewhat gratified at learning, —and more particularly from those who have so long denounced the policy of the government, and have so long declared their want of confidence in the party who now rule the destinies of this country,—that is, that the country is in such a state at present, business has improved so rapidly, that there is no necessity for any legislation which could by any possibility interfere with that prosperity. That is the confession made by the hon. leader of the opposition, and by his lieutenant behind him, and also by the hon. gentleman from Albert.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I referred to the Governor General's speech.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I trust that upon all occasions when they may find it necessary to express sentiments in opposition to any bill that is presented to the Senate, that they may be prefaced by such remarks. If all that be correct, I would almost be inclined to yield to the sentiments expressed; but whatever course we may follow in future I must take exception to some of the reasons that have been given by the gentleman who have opposed the bill. The hon. leader of the opposition told us he had failed to discover any reason why this bill should be introduced at the present time. Every gentleman who has spoken has repeated that there has been no demand on the part of the trading community of Canada for the reintroduction of the bill or its being placed upon the statute-book. Now that may be correct, but these hon. gentlemen should remember that the late premier of the Dominion, when he postponed the consideration of the bill in the House of Commons last session, made a solemn promise that it should be presented to Parliament at the then next session, which is the present session, and the people of Canada, I am glad to know, had sufficient confidence in the leader of the government at that time, and those with whom he was associated, to trust in the promise which he made. It is a very good answer to the gentlemen who have taken this objection to say that that promise having been made by the leader of the government at the time, it was not necessary that boards of trade, or merchants, bankrupts or those who were interested in an Insolvency Act, should again petition and keep continually petitioning Parliament. It must be a pleasure to every Canadian to know that when the premier makes a solemn promise the general community believe in him and act in accordance with the statement he has made. That is the only answer I have to make to the objection that there has been no petition for the reintroduction of the bill. Whether this bill is to become law or not, the government of which I am at present the head have done their duty in carrying out the promises which were made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me. The suggestion made by the leader of the opposition in this House is, a very reasonable one, that if it were not intended that the bill should be introduced into the lower House, it was useless for us to occupy our time in considering it here. I am fully in accord with that sentiment, believing that it would only be child's play to introduce a bill into this House particularly a bill involving such important principles as those contained in an insolvency law, merely for the purpose of sending it to another House knowing that it would be rejected there, or perhaps not considered. If I could believe for a moment that that was the intention of the Commons—I know it is not the intention of the government—I would not proceed one step further with the bill even if this House approved of its principle. The fact that some of the legislatures have passed Acts would have some force if all the local legislatures had acted in the same way, and if the provisions of the different laws in the different provinces were such as to protect creditors in different parts not only of the Dominion, but of Great Britain as well. It has been very well said by the hon. member for Marquette that a bill of this kind would have some effect upon the credit of the Dominion abroad. It has been alleged by English merchants, and by merchants in other European countries, that there was no law in Canada by which they could be protected if they gave credit to Canadian merchants. The practice in the past has been, in too many cases, that where there were dishonest men, to whom my hon. friend from Monck referred so often, they have taken advantage of that Act and made assignments or effected settlements by which the European creditors were cheated out of every dollar that was due to them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not think I said cheated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman spoke of dishonest men.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And honest men too.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will come to that presently—and that these men would take advantage of a bankruptcy law in order to cheat their creditors and undersell their competitors and thereby injure the trader who was pursuing an honest and legitimate business. That was one reason why it was thought in the interest of the credit of the country that a Bankruptcy Act should be placed upon the statute-book. One hon. gentleman objected to the bill because there were certain exceptions, or certain provisions which did not apply to the province of Quebec in the same manner that they applied to other provinces. Now that is a clause which does not in the least affect the principle of the bill; it is simply a provision to carry out the law as it exists in the province, in the advertising of and the disposition of the property and particularly of the real estate of the debtor. That is the only exception in the bill, and it cannot be considered at all fatal to its passage. I do not know what the hon. gentleman who spoke of the bill as not coming before the House in a legitimate manner meant. I should take it for granted that any bill introduced and going through its proper stages was legitimately before this House, and I object to the term that this bill is an illegitimate one in any sense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know whether the hon. gentleman refers to me, but I never used such an expression.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no recollection of attributing the expression to the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said it did not come here in the ordinary way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I took down the exact words that were used but I mentioned no names.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I suppose the reference is to some remark of mine. I intimated that it was not presented in this chamber in the ordinary way that government measures are presented. It was brought here without the principle being discussed on the second reading in any way, and referred to committee, and it came rather, as I said, as the emanation of a committee of this House than as emanating from the government. I did not intend to apply it in the sense that the hon. the First Minister mentions. The hon. leader also made a reference to my objecting to the bill on account of there being a variation in it as far as relates to the province of Quebec. I made that observation, not as an objection to the bill, but because my hon. friend from Hamilton said it would be a uniform measure. I said it would not be uniform, because the same provision would not apply to Quebec as to the other provinces; I did not speak of it as an objection to the bill at all. Then my hon. friend alluded to me along with my hon. friend from Ottawa and my hon. friend from Halifax, alleging that I stated that the country was not now in a state of depression, and thereupon congratulating himself. I did not say that. I stated that I assumed that the bill was introduced last year on account of the state of depression in the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to the interruption of the hon. member, although it is rather unusual to interrupt a speaker and make a second speech.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I was correcting three misrepresentations with one interruption.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman, like many others, has to explain what he really did say, or what he meant. It must also be gratifying to the hon. gentleman to explain what might be considered an expression of approval of what had been done, or an admission that the country was not in as bad a state last year as it was in 1875 and 1876. I know from past experience that men holding rather strong political opinions are very apt to give expression to them and then, when their real honest sentiments are expressed, they forget that they have been politicians, and give vent to that which is really correct. I am glad to know that that sentiment pervades all members of this House. However, I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill at any length, nor to refer to all that has been said. There was one sentiment expressed by the hon. member from Lunenburg, which I thought had very great force among the many opposite views that were presented. He thought that as there was likely to be an election in a short time, this measure might very properly be delayed until the expression of opinion of the Dominion had been given. There is a great deal of force in that statement. If this question were to be a test question at the polls, I would accede at once to the suggestion which had been made, but that will in all probability not be thought of unless it is considered in connection with the great trade question of the country, and it is just as well to decide whether this bill shall become law at the present moment, or not. The great and paramount reason for placing an Act of this character upon the statute-book is to deal with the great question affecting debtor and creditor and make the law general. We should have as great uniformity as possible throughout the whole Dominion. By doing that the creditor who trusts his goods to any person in a remote part of the country knows that in case of a failure he will have as fair an opportunity of receiving his proportion of whatever assets there may be as the man who lives near by. I am not so sure that the statement made by the hon. member from Halifax is correct, so far as the province of Ontario is concerned. It is true that there is a law upon the statutes providing for the distribution of assets; but a Montreal merchant, the president of the board of trade, called my attention to-day to the fact that a debtor can mortgage all his book accounts. Now if that be correct—and I have no doubt it is from the statement he has made; I have not investigated it myself or examined it—then the result would be—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could not do it if he was insolvent at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He does it before he goes into insolvency.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would be the same under the Insolvent Act; it would be void as against the creditors if there was fraud.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If he is indebted he can mortgage it to the party he owes.

Hon. Mr. MCKINDSEY—Only for a bona-fide loan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then that makes it a great deal worse, because if a dishonest trader, or a man who desires to be dishonest, has a book account worth $10,000 or $15,000, he can raise his $10,000 in cash by mortgaging them and put the money in his pocket. He is in a much better position than if he were not able to mortgage and raise the money at all, unless he could be compelled, in the borrowing of that money, to pay off his other indebtedness, and that is what the honest man would do; but the Insolvency Act is for the purpose of preventing, as far as possible, a dishonest man from disposing of his property to the disadvantage of his creditors. There is no doubt about that; and it is not, as my hon. friend from Monck imagines, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to a dishonest man to cheat his creditors. The dishonest man, who goes into trade for the purpose of making money at the expense of those who trust him and for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, will do so no matter whether there is an insolvency law on the statute-book or not.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You encourage them by this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says the bill encourages them. Instead of giving the dishonest man a greater opportunity to cheat his creditors, this bill would prevent him. I am quite in accord with all that has been said in reference to the working of the old law. The assignees and the lawyers, under the old Act, did appropriate the greater portion of the different estates—at least that is alleged to have been done.

The receiver under this bill does not occupy the same position in any way. The receiver only takes possession of the property of the debtor and holds it without dealing with it in any way until the creditors appoint their liquidator; the object of the bill is to throw the whole responsibility on those who are most interested, the creditors, of dealing with and disposing of the estate instead of leaving it, as the old law did, in the hands of assignees and those by whom they were surrounded to dispose of and absorb. So much for that portion of the bill. It has been objected that the bankers and the merchants are the parties most interested in the passing of this bill. There can be no doubt of that fact. It is from the fact that the wholesale merchants and the bankers are the parties who give credit to the persons who ultimately go into bankruptcy, and that being the case, I know of no class of men who could be so deeply interested in securing a proper and legitimate distribution of the estates as those who have trusted them. I am in full accord with my hon. friend behind me who said a few moments ago that he could see no reason why a bankruptcy act should not apply to all classes of the community. I expressed that view very strongly years ago in the House of Commons; I expressed it also when this bill was before the House last session, and when it was before the Committee. The great majority of the gentlemen present took a different view; and in that, as in some other cases, much against my will, I had to yield to the opinion of the majority. My opinion, however, on that point has not at all changed. I know of no reason why the law as it exists in England should not exist in Canada, any Bankruptcy Act which is put upon the statute-book should apply to all debtors, whether a chimney sweep or a formerly princely merchant. In that respect I think the principle upon which the English law is based is the correct one, that every man should stand before the law in the same position and in the same light. However, I know that merchants, and others who are not traders, take a different view in Canada, and the majority under our system must rule; but it is one of those instances where, speaking individually, I think the majority is wrong. The difficulties that have presented themselves in the past continue in the future. In Nova Scotia there is no such act upon the statute book as that which exists in New Brunswick, and in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Neither is there any such law existing in Manitoba or in British Columbia. I cannot understand how the objection which was raised, I think, by the hon. gentleman from Albert—that is the reference which he made to the law of exemption—can apply in any way to this question of bankruptcy. The law as it stands upon the statute-book in Ontario exempts certain properties from seizure for debt. It goes to a much greater length in the province of Manitoba; but if a merchant gives his goods to a retailer in Manitoba or in Ontario, he knows, or ought to know, that that is the law of the land, and to that extent his security is of no avail, and consequently he gives the credit with a full knowledge of what security he has—the honesty of the man himself. If the law were to abolish the power of collection of debts altogether, then the trader who trusted his goods would know that he was giving them to the party who purchased, upon his sole responsibility and honesty. But as that does not exist, and as there should be a fair and equitable distribution of the debtor's estate when he goes into insolvency, I see no reason why this bill should not be placed upon the statute-book. In reference to the motion for the six months' hoist, of course if that carries it puts an end to the bill, so far as this House is concerned, and for this parliament and perhaps for all others. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for the good opinion he expressed of me. I do not think, however, that there is any gentleman in this House who would cast his vote on that consideration. I should not expect or ask, no matter how high an opinion anyone might have of myself individually, that he would cast his vote contrary to the principles which he holds, or against the dictates of his conscience. That would be asking a good deal too much. I, however, do say to my hon. friend that the six months' hoist is rather a summary mode of disposing of a bill of this character. I do not complain even of that, because I know what strong views my hon. friend has upon the question and the sooner he could kill the bill the better he would like it. The motion made by my hon. friend for an adjournment of the debate is one that is usually adopted in all deliberative assemblies when a question of this character, and one which involves so grave a consideration, is under discussion, where the Government, or the individual (if a private measure) would desire to consider the question as to whether he would press it, or not, and knowing that to be the practice in all deliberative bodies unless there is a determination to kill or strangle the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think that that is the intention of the House. After the remarks which have fallen from the hon. Premier, I presume there will be the usual courtesy extended to him that there would be to any mover of a bill and that the adjournment will be granted. I intended, however, had that motion for the six months' hoist been pressed, to vote for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was intimating what the practice was on these questions, and I am glad to know that one of the best parliamentarians in the House takes the same view that I do. It is an important measure, and much time has been given to the preparation of it; but to those who think an Insolvency Act should not be placed upon the statute-book of Canada, I frankly admit that it is their duty to oppose it. I would not ask any man to vote for a bill of that kind if he thought it was going to prove detrimental to the interests of the country. But I do wish to impress this upon the House, that it has been strongly urged upon the government that some measure should be placed upon the statute-book which would give the merchants of Great Britain and foreign countries confidence, not merely in the laws of their country, but that they should not be deprived of their rights in the proper redistribution of estates when the traders of this country became insolvent. I might go on for an hour and point out, as every merchant who has done business in Canada knows, and as every banker knows, frauds and iniquities have been perpetrated in the past in the manner in which foreign creditors have been deprived of their share of the estate of debtors. In those provinces where there is no such law and the creditor can take advantage of his position and his proximity to the debtor, and thereby get an assignment by which he can secure his debts at the expense of another, that is a reason why they would oppose a general act. But I do not think it is a statemanslike view to take of a question of this kind. I have no more to say at present, but as it has been moved by my hon. friend from Rideau that the debate be adjourned, I shall accede to that, as far as I am concerned, and vote for it if it is the will of the House that it should be done.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would like to make a correction. The hon. Premier stated that an English gentleman had informed him that as the law stood in his province, where there was distribution of estates a party could mortgage his book accounts. Well, I am inclined to think that the law of Ontario on that subject is even better than the proposed provisions in the Insolvency Bill. Under the Insolvency Act the time fixed within which it shall be lawful for a party who subsequently goes into the insolvency court to make any assignment or transfer is 30 days.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are referring to what?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To the observation that one of the necessities for an Insolvency Act was that a merchant might mortgage his book accounts and subsequently go into insolvency.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not referring to the English Bankruptcy Act. I was referring to the Act relating to the distribution of estates as it stood upon the statute-book in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But that has been an argument used to show the necessity for an Insolvency Act, that at present a merchant might mortgage his book accounts. I say the position taken under the Insolvency Bill is not as sound and judicious a one as the provision in the Ontario Act. Under the proposed insolvency law and assignment or transfer made anterior to the insolvency might be good. The clause in the Ontario Act would be more satisfactory than the one in this bill.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Did I understand the premier to say that in England the same law applies to the whole community, and to ask why should there be a difference between this country and England?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It designates them as debtors no matter who or what they are.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I find a great difference between the circumstances of England and of Canada. In England, there is an aristocracy, who are quite wealthy; then there is a great middle class, who are the tradesmen—the debtors; then there are the working men, but these men have no property generally. In Canada, there is only one class, the middle class—the proprietors, the owners of the soil,—and to make them subject to this law is quite unjust, because they have in their hands sufficient to cover any debt they may contract.

The motion to adjourn the debate was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (F) “An Act to amend the Act intitled, ‘An Act to amend the Copyright Act.’”—(Mr. Angers.)

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (G) “An Act further to amend the Indian Act.”

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think there is a little ambiguity in the wording of the first clause, which might lead to some misapprehension as to its meaning; and I would therefore move that the word “but” in the third line be struck out, and that the words “provided that” be substituted therefor. The first portion of the clause prevents the leasing or alienating or selling of any portion of the reserve until it has been released or surrendered. Then it says “but the superintendent general may lease.” It might be inferred that the latter clause was contradictory to the first. The Minister of Justice suggested that these words “provided that” would convey the meaning better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That alters the wording of the clause, but it does not alter the meaning. My objection to this provision is this: These Indians are treated as the wards of the country. They are treated as children, and properly so. The Indian Act makes special provision to hinder the reserves, which are set aside for the Indians, from being appropriated to other uses than those of the bands of Indians residing on them. The old Indian Act forbade any reserve, or a portion of a reserve, being sold or alienated until it was surrendered to the Crown, except in the case of Indians being sick or otherwise unfit to cultivate their land, in which case the superintendent general had power to lease the lands to which those persons were entitled. That limits the power of the superintendent general. The old Act contains provision preventing any reserve from being released except with certain solemnities. What does this clause propose to do? It proposes that the superintendent general may lease for any Indian the land to which he is entitled without any release or surrender. The superintendent general takes his information from the officer who is specially charged with the management of Indian affairs. That officer may or may not be a reliable man. It is presumed that he would be. But the acting head of the Indian Department at Ottawa takes his information from the Indian officer near the reserve. We have no guarantee that those men are any better than their neighbours. I presume that they are of good character generally, but we have instances in which they have been proved to be subject to temptation to do wrong, and we put them under greater temptation than we should when we allow an Indian officer in some remote part of Manitoba or British Columbia, or some other place distant from Ottawa, to recommend that a certain portion of the reserve be leased; and that portion may be leased to white friends of the agent. There is no provision forbidding the leasing of a portion of the reserve to some person other than a member of the band, and it must strike the House that it would be highly objectionable that white speculators should be allowed to come in and lease land, possibly in the middle of an Indian reserve. I have not, unfortunately, made myself familiar with the whole of the Indian Act, and that is one reason why I should have preferred to have this matter adjourned until another day, but so far as I can see, there is nothing to prevent an Indian officer recommending that a portion of an Indian reserve be leased to some white friend. These Indians are, as I have said, regarded as infants in the eye of the law, and should be protected, and there should not be any opportunity given for speculators to go on those reserves and get possession of their lands. Serious difficulties have already arisen where outside persons have got on the reserves in the eastern provinces. There should be some qualification of those powers given the superintendent general. I do not think any person who is not a member of the band, should be allowed to occupy land on an Indian reserve. I submit that, however, for the consideration of the committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is the superintendent general the Minister of the Interior?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then I do not see the same objection that I otherwise would have to this clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax are evidence that he has not given much study to the settlement upon these reserves. If he will some Saturday, when I have time, come with me to the Bay of Quinté I will take him to an Indian reserve where he will find two-thirds of the lessees of Indian lands are white men.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a great abuse.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, because if that were not the case the lands would be lying waste and the Indians would not receive the benefit which arises from the rents paid for those lands. There is a very large reserve in the township of Tyendinga, and that is an illustration of the whole, so far as Ontario is concerned. There are many Indians occupied in stores and shops. I know of one who is book-keeper of the great firm of the Rathbun Co., which is one of the largest lumbering firms in Canada. Other Indians have their allotments of land—it applies as much to them as it could to any Indian who forms part of the band. The gentleman to whom I have referred as being a book-keeper in the Rathbun Co. is an educated man—a gentleman in every sense of the word. He does not think proper to live upon his land, but he goes into a lumbering establishment and occupies the same position there that a white man would as book-keeper of the establishment. If my hon. friend's views were carried out, this Indian's land could not be leased or rented for his benefit, unless it were done for the purposes that are defined in the old act where Indians are engaged in occupations which interfere with their cultivation of the land. These words are struck out of the amended Act and enable the superintendent general to lease property such as that to which I have called the attention of the House for the advantage of a man who may be occupied in pursuits outside of the reserve. The state of affairs to which my hon. friend objects has existed ever since the law has been on the statute-book. The clauses to which he refers makes provision that you cannot dispose of or lease those lands without the consent of the band, but this takes power to enable the superintendent general, in cases such as that to which I have referred, to lease the land of the Indian for his benefit. Otherwise it could not be done. That is really the only change in the law. I am quite sure if my hon. friend were acquainted with the practical working of it, he would withdraw his objection.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Does the hon. gentleman say that this law does not take away the right of the band to consent? Does it require in every case the consent of the band?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No not for the individual, nor did the old law. If you wanted to lease a farm, or a portion of a reserve which belonged to an individual Indian who did not live upon the reserve but earned his living otherwise, under the law as it stands on the statute-book you could only lease it under such circumstances as are specified in the law. The provision of the new law is that you could lease it for the benefit of the person who owns the land without the consent of the band.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—And without his consent?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh no, not at all. Under no law could you take a man's property and lease it without his consent.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As this clause reads it would appear to be so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is provided for in other clauses. The amendment simply amounts to this, that the superintendent general may lease the property belonging to an Indian, who does not desire to live upon his land, for his benefit. There are, as I pointed out before, Indians in Ontario who live upon their income and they do not want to work their farms. They go into the towns to live. They own their property and it is leased for their benefit.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly true that I looked at the law from the standpoint of remote regions.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES, from the committee, reported that they had made progress with the bill and asked leave to sit again.

The Senate then adjourned.

REBATE ON EXPORTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing the loss to the revenue occasioned by the payment of rebates of customs duties on articles exported.

He said : Before putting the question I should like to make a few remarks explanatory to the position that I feel we are placed in with regard to the question of rebates on exports. It is a question that is eminently fit I think for a member from the North-west Territories to discuss before this honourable House, because we are growers of wheat and the raw products of the country, and are depending upon the machinery and other things necessary for us to produce that grain. I wish to point out how far the question of rebates on exports is likely to effect us in competing with those nations with whom it is proposed to give more favourable terms for the purchase of machinery than we in the North-west Territories and in Canada generally are to be allowed to enjoy. A great discussion has just been brought to a close in the budget debate to which we have listened and heard, and in which both the parties have discussed the commercial questions affecting the country. Last night I had the pleasure of listening to a very eloquent speech from the Secretary of State in which he presented the commercial policy of the country from the standpoint of protection. I may congratulate the government upon having brought into its council a man who has displayed so much ability as he displayed in presenting the arguments on behalf of the policy that has been pursued by the present government for the last seventeen or eighteen years. My hon. friend on my left says it is a good cause—it is a bad cause in its commercial aspect, as time has proved. Both parties have presented their views on the commercial policy of the country. As hon. gentlemen know when I rise to present my views upon the commercial question it is always upon the basis of free trade. Liberal leaders have in the House of Commons during the course of the debate advanced in some instances sound free trade arguments, but unfortunately the Liberal party as a whole has announced its policy when in convention assembled a couple of years ago, and they have mixed up reciprocity with free trade. In my opinion, the Liberal party want to throw their protectionists overboard before they can present to the Canadian people a sound commercial policy that will lay the foundation of permanency, economy and expansion. The same argument might also properly be applied to the Conservative party, if they desire to retain the confidence of the people. Time works changes in the public mind. I presume, that the protectionists in the Liberal ranks have held down the free traders so that there may be an open door in order that they may modify the views of the party on the line of protectionist interests that may exist in the Liberal ranks. I consider that reciprocity and free trade are two different things. They do not amalgamate—they cannot amalgamate. You cannot have reciprocity and free trade at the same time. Reciprocity conceives the idea of trading freely with one country to the exclusion of other countries in the world. Free trade means that you shall open your doors to the competition of the world in order that by that means the cheapness of production for all the commodities of life may be so assured to the labour and industry of the country that they may compete successfully in the larger markets of the world which are open to those who are able and have the resources and the faculty of producing or manufacturing. For that reason I desire to preface my question with some remarks on the question of free trade and of revenue which is involved of course with it. The rebate on exports is really a bounty on exports—and what has induced the government to adopt a new policy in regard to rebate on exports which has free trade for its foundation? The reason they have adopted a new policy, I think probably commences with the agitation launched by the Massey Manufacturing Company. That company is a large agricultural machine company, with a large capital employed in the city of Toronto. They have been manufacturing agricultural machines very largely for us in the North-west Territories and in Manitoba. They have sold us machines there on credit and long credit—one, two and three years, and the difficulties that we have had to contend with, the cost of the machinery, the distance, the freight rates and one thing or another has operated to such an extent that the Massey Manufacturing Company have been obliged to withdraw a large portion of their trade and change the conditions on which they conducted it. Because they found we were not able—not that we were not willing, but we were entirely unable out of the receipts in pursuing our industry in that country in the growth of wheat, we were not able to meet the heavy demands made upon us for the purchase of machinery for the producing of that wheat, and they had to seek some other market for the employment of skilled labour and their capital which they had at their command. They conceived that it would be necessary for them possibly to change the location of their works—to move from Toronto to Buffalo in order that they might manufacture for the United States market, where they could get the articles entering into the production of their machinery for less money, where they can get iron at $9 a ton, coal without duty, coal oil at 8 or 10 cents a gallon, and crude coal oil at less than 1 cent a gallon, etc., etc. All these things enter into their machinery, and if they wish to get into the markets of the world with a cheaper article it will be necessary for them to move from the city of Toronto to the United States in order that they may have the benefit of the cheaper articles to enlarge their operations and enter the markets of the world for the production of their machinery.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To a protective country.

Hon Mr. BOULTON—Yes, but from a country where the articles they require are higher than they are in the United States in consequence of unnecessary taxation. We in Canada have a protective policy, and, although in the United States iron, through the competition of the south entering into competition with the north, has brought the price down to $9 a ton, we put on 50 per cent duty before the Massey Manufacturing Company can purchase that iron or iron produced in Great Britain or elsewhere by competition. It is quite evident to any one that it is impossible for the Massey Manufacturing Company to go beyond the confines of the protected area of Canada for a market for their machinery, when they have had to pay 40 per cent or 50 per cent more for the raw material they require for the product of their manufactures, and compete with a country that gets it at a lower price.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They can do it by a rebate.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is exactly what I am coming to. I was merely explaining why the government in order to retain the Massey Company and other companies within the confines of Canada to pursue an industry that they had all the facilities for pursuing in the confines of Canada and make this a field for operating instead of the United States for foreign markets, that the government adopted the policy of giving a rebate on exports; that is to say, that any machines that are made by the Massey Company to be exported to Russia, the Argentine Republic, Australia or the European continent or any other part of the world should have the benefit of the cheaper material for manufacturing purposes than we are to be allowed to compete with in Canada in the purchase of machines from the Massey Manufacturing Company. Now, hon. gentlemen the price of our wheat is gauged entirely by the export value. We have to compete for the sale of our wheat in the English market, which is the great consuming market, and consumes all the surplus product that the world offers, and the price of our wheat is gauged entirely by the value that we obtain in competition with other countries in Great Britain. We have to compete there with Russia, the Argentine Republic, Australia and with India and all other countries. Now, the policy of giving a rebate on exports is a policy to enable the manufacturer in Canada who is protected by the advantages that Canada offers. They are going to be put by a remission of taxation upon their raw material in a position to sell to our competitors machines for the production of wheat, and every other line of industry in which we enter into competition with them at a lower rate than is to be allowed to be purchased by the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Supposing we do not manufacture them in this country at all. They cannot export them. The people get the benefit of the employment here if they are taken into other countries. The object of manufacturing is to get the money made for the labour of the people and manufacturing men. If they did not manufacture them here, of course they would not want the drawback; so, really, the government loses no money by manufacturing these machines in this country but on the contrary, when they export them to other countries we get the benefit by our people being employed in their construction.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Well, the hon. gentleman has put it from the manufacturers' standpoint, or, perhaps, from the protectionists' standpoint, but all manufacturers are not protectionists. The hon. gentleman has put it, probably, from the standpoint in which he enjoys the benefit of being in proximity to the manufacturer as a farmer which he is—a large farmer. He puts it from that standpoint. I would however point out to the House of Commons that under a system of free trade the growth of our towns and cities will be greatly stimulated under the commercial system of free trade. I am presenting it from the standpoint of the farming community of the great West, which depends entirely upon seeking a foreign market, thousands of miles away, for the sale of their product. If by a different system those centres which consume our wheat can be brought closer under a more enlightened policy. We are put at a very great disadvantage in producing our wheat with machinery that costs more than we are by legislation permitted to purchase, while Russia and people in other countries enjoy a rebate. Now, I do not think that any one can successfully argue and successfully refute the statement that if it is necessary for the Massey Manufacturing Company to get into the markets of the world to sell a machine that will find a ready sale in the markets of the world, and that in order to enable them to do so, it is necessary to put them in a position to produce that article cheaper, that they have to compete closer and have to sell for less, then I say, hon. gentlemen, it unquestionably must be sold to those foreign countries cheaper than it would be allowed to be sold to the people of Canada, and what I wish to argue is that if it is advisable to stimulate our manufacturing industries—my hon. friend from Welland stated by a rebate on exports—why is it not advisable to put the people of Canada in a position to sell everything they are able to sell in the markets of the world by a rebate on exports or on duties of all kinds that enter into their industrial life. I do not say only upon exports, but a rebate of duty on everything. That is what free trade is. Free trade is the competition that has only been secured by the people of Great Britain; not secured because it is forbidden to anybody else, but it is secured because other countries have failed to realize the full strength of the policy of Great Britain in so applying her commercial principles that the cheapness of her products can enable her to conduct enormous productive enterprises in various industries and to sell the product of that industry in the markets of the world and to compete with every other country in the world and penetrate their barriers. If the people of Great Britain are enabled to do that to-day, then I say all that we have to do is to apply the same economic conditions to ourselves in Canada the same commercial conditions will flow from it, will be ours. A great argument which is advanced on behalf of protection is that by confining within our own bounds the power of manufacturing for the people in a restricted area, that by that means we build up commercial centres, and bring them closer to the farming population. What I have to say is this, that the commercial centres that are built up in Canada, and have been built up in Canada are confined in their operations and in their growth entirely to the purchasing power of the 5,000,000 people. The manufacturing has got to stop, the growth of towns has got to stop, the growth of everything has got to stop the very moment the purchasing power of 5,000,000 people have been fully satisfied if they have no power as far as our manufacturing is concerned to go beyond the confines of Canada for the sale of articles that it is eminently fitted that we in Canada are enabled to produce in consequence of our magnificent water power, in consequence of the intelligence and industry of our population, in consequence of the facilities that we have for exporting to the markets of the world by ocean transport, the cheapest form of transport that there is known. We have all those facilities, we have all those conditions hon. gentlemen. We have the avenues opened up by the commerce of Great Britain. We have that commerce protected by the navy of Great Britain. We have all those advantages which are ours and costing us nothing. I wish to impress upon this House the fact that this rebate on exports is putting our competitors in a better position to sell their wheat at a lower price and forcing us into closer competition to sell our wheat in consequence of the cheapening of the machinery which they are employing to-day.

It is really an export bounty, and we have seen what the effect of an export bounty has been in Germany and France and continental countries in the case of sugar. The continental countries developed the policy of making this sugar to compete with the cane sugar from the West India Islands, the Java Islands and other countries that produce it, and they gave an export duty on sugar, and the result of it was after their own market was glutted, and ruin stared this exotic industry in the face, in order to get it abroad and enter it in competition with the cane sugar, they found it necessary to tax themselves to an enormous extent to maintain the industry; and what has been the result? The result has been that in France the tax has risen as high as eighteen million dollars a year that the sugar industries of France were paid in order to enable them to get beyond France with their sugar. The people of Germany taxed themselves eight million dollars a year in order to give cheaper sugar to Great Britain and other countries. Now what was the result of the people of the country itself? In Germany it was brought out that the people of England, while they were maintaining a very large import of cheap sugar, were getting a consuming power of 75 pounds per head of the population while the people of Germany were only able to consume, for their own use, 15 pounds per head, in consequence of the increased price by protection and lessened purchasing power.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Now, that was the effect. They were impoverishing their own people—they were reducing their purchasing power through the taxation they were putting upon themselves in order to foster an exotic growth instead of leaving it to the freedom that free trade would give them to develop their industries by natural means. If we commence a policy of that kind under a policy of rebates on exports we are going to arrive at exactly the same position. If we give rebate on exports of agricultural machinery why not on exports of beet root sugar, why not on cheese, butter and every article produced in the country? If you do so you are going to find that the revenue of $36,000,000 a year is by no means going to be sufficient to run the country when you have arrived at a development of a policy of that kind and try to regulate an equal distribution of the profits of labour by legislation. The people will have to put their hands in their pockets and submit to an extra taxation of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 a year according to the growth and development of the policy. Therefore, I have risen in my place here to hold out a warning voice in order that this policy may not be pursued any further unless the same benefits are accorded to the Canadian people themselves. A more wholesome policy than that of giving rebates on exports is open to the people of Canada—that is the entire abolition of duties on the necessaries of life and all that enters into the industries of the people, whether it be coal oil, iron, cotton, sugar or any of those articles that we require and that are now highly protected by the protective duties imposed during the past seventeen years. Of course there is no doubt about it that the question of revenue enters into any discussion with regard to the question that I am now bringing before the House. It is therefore necessary for me to outline some idea as to how the revenue may be raised before I can justify the position that I am taking. Hon. gentlemen, when I have before discussed this question of free trade, have asked, how are you going to raise the revenue, and that has always been to the people of Canada a very serious matter. As one gentleman said to me, show me how you are going to raise a revenue under free trade and I will vote for it, but I cannot see how a revenue is to be raised under the system that you suggest.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, this subject which he proposes to deal with now is very interesting and important, but I cannot see that it has any direct connection with the notice that he has given.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We ought to hear the hon. gentleman out. He is going to show us how he is going to get a revenue under free trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shell River must see this, that however pleased we might be to listen to him for some time, we would not, perhaps, be so willing to have the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg and some other hon. gentlemen rising to make speeches on the general question of free trade and protection when the hon. gentleman sits down, as they will have a right to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or to receive a lecture from the senior member from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I was particularly anxious to have a free discussion of this question in its relation to revenue and I consulted with my hon. friend from Halifax (who on matters of procedure is a good authority) how it was best to get it before the House, so that I might not be confined. The hon. gentleman will see that the question of revenue is involved in a matter of this kind because there has to be something to replace the revenue loss to the country by the adoption of free trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is perfectly proper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The rebate of duties means that certain articles come into the country paying a duty and when they go out of the country again these duties are refunded. I happen to know that there are 150 binders manufactured, by the Massey Mfg. Co. ready for export to Russia. The government is called upon to pay any duties that may have entered into the construction of those 150 binders.

Hon. Mr. MACINNIS (Burlington)—You mean dutiable goods?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. The government will return to them the money that the Massey Company paid on the articles entering into those exports. It brings the question of revenue prominently before the House in the discussion of this question. I wish to show how a revenue can be raised to replace these rebates on exports and rebates of duties not only for the people of Russia but for the people of Canada as well. I do not expect the government is going to make any relaxation or change in their policy unless they know how they can replace the revenue in regard to a thing of this kind, and I am anxious not only that there shall be a rebate of duties for Russia and other countries, but also for the people of the North-west Territories and the people of Canada generally. For that reason, with the hon. gentleman's permission, I will just deal with the question of revenue. The budget speech brought down by the Finance Minister shows that that there has been a deficit which he was obliged to make up of two millions of dollars, and in order to do so, what did he do? He commenced placing sugar back again on the dutiable list. Only three or four years he took three cents a pound off raw sugar and released that much from taxation.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—Are not the people of Canada supplied with the cheapest sugar in the world?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I was offered in my home in the North-west Territories 22 pounds of German beet root sugar for $1, or 18 pounds of Montreal refined sugar. Of course, I took the 22 pounds of German sugar.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The sugar was not as good.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is what the storekeeper told me, but we thought differently—four pounds is quite a difference. In consequence of the beet root sugar coming into the country the result has been, in order to keep the sale of beet root sugar down, the Canadian refiners have made a great effort, and by giving 28, 30 and 35 pounds of sugar for $1 they have managed to keep out the cheaper sugar. The Finance Minister puts a duty of one-half cent on the raw and increase correspondingly the protection on the refined, so that the duty on refined sugar now is one and one-eighth cents per pound. That half cent on the raw will utterly preclude the German beet root sugar from the market, while they enjoy the benefit of six-tenths of a cent protection on the refining.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How do you establish that fact? The relative protection to the refined is precisely the same now as it was before. There is not a mill difference, except the percentage lost on the raw sugar, which is against the refiner.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is not only protection but it is the duty on the raw which helps to keep out the German sugar as well as the protection. It strikes me if we want to counteract the bounty given by Germany and refuse their cheap sugar, a cent a pound without any protection would effect it. The Germans cannot sell in the Canadian market for the same price as if it was free. Just the same as tea—tea is admitted free.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sugar never was free.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Raw sugar was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But you do not buy raw sugar.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was raised from 14 to 16 Dutch standard, and when it was raised to 16 Dutch standard we were then able to purchase brown sugar. I may be wrong and the hon. gentleman may be right in it, but I am inclined to think that the imposition of a half cent on the raw helps with the protection more effectually to keep out the German beet root sugar.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The old duty was six-tenths of a cent per lb. on all refined sugar and raw was admitted free. A half cent additional has been placed on the refined, and a half cent on the raw so relatively the two kinds of sugar occupy the same position precisely, except as to the loss in the manufacture of the raw sugar, which, as I have already stated, is against the refiner.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I accept the hon. gentleman's correction, and assume that he is correct. But there is the protection at all events. The hon. Finance Minister when he restored the revenue to its proper position and provided for the deficit that was staring him in the face put this duty of a half cent on the raw sugar which is going to add $1,600,000 a year to the revenue, if I was going to tackle that question of revenue, I would proceed in an entirely different way. I would have left the Canadian homes alone with their cheap sugar—I would have left the taxation on sugar alone. We have in Canada a grand country for growing fruit. That fruit can be manufactured and transported to the markets of the world if we had sugar as cheap as the people of England have it under free trade—perfectly free, Canadian refiners competing with German refiners, or refiners elsewhere, the economy of free trade and transportation will counteract the bounty. If the price of sugar is brought down to that basis our farmers can increase the productiveness of their farms and put in their fruits and manufacture jams and jellies of all kinds and conduct a larger trade which is not only a trade in the raw article which the farmers produce, but the manufactured article as well. Half a cent a pound on the raw sugar and half a cent additional on refined sugar will utterly preclude the development of that industry beyond the restricted area of Canada. So far as the 5,000,000 of people in Canada are concerned it will not affect them except that they will get less sugar and will be able to grow less fruit for the production of jams and jellies that would be open to them under different conditions. The excise offers a far better field for the resuscitation of the revenue for the providing of a revenue to carry on the operations of the country, and enable us to come down to a basis of absolutely free trade. Now what is the condition of things to-day? The excise under the last budget is $1.70 a gallon and the duty $2.25 per gallon on spirits. The manufacture and consumption of spirit generally in Canada is 3,000,000 gallons annually. It maintains in round numbers that amount for the last four or five years. There has been very little variation—about 12,000,000 for the last four years has been manufactured in Canada according to the Inland Revenue returns. Under the present excise that would pay $1.70 per gallon. Then in addition to that 3,000,000 gallons manufactured in the country we have 1,000,000 gallons imported and the import of 1,000,000 gallons spirit is protected by a duty of $2.25, so that any other nation that wishes to send in whiskey to this country has to pay a duty of $2.25. The difference between the excise of $1.70 and the protection of $2.25 is 55 cents a gallon—that is, the protection afforded to our distillers in the manufacture of 3,000,000 gallons of spirit produced in Canada. $1,500,000 is the protection that is afforded to them, which protection gives them a profit of $1,500,000, which I say should justly belong to the revenue. How can that be restored to the revenue? By making the excise and the duty exactly the same. The duty is $2.25, and therefore there can be no objection from a smuggling point of view or any other point of view to raise the excise up to $2.25. If you do that then the revenue will get the benefit of $1,500,000 by simply taking off the protection that the distillers enjoy and putting it on the excise. There is just one simple operation by which the revenue might be restored without putting it on the sugar of the country. But that is by no means all. We have then in addition the import of wine—435,000 gallons, on which the duty is $308,000. I have not gone into the protection on that at all. Then the duty on ale and beer is 16 cts a gallon if it is imported in casks and 24c a gallon if imported in bottles. The duty collected on that is so small that the revenue is virtually nothing, so little is imported. Then we come to the question of beer manufactured in Canada. If you treat beer exactly in the same way you produce identically the same results. We consume in Canada 18,000,000 gallons of beer made in the country. That is protected by 16 cts. a gallon. There is an excise on malt, which enters into the manufacture of beer of 1½ cts. a pound and there are about 4 lbs. of malt to a gallon of beer. Therefore the excise that beer pays is about 6 cts. a gallon. The protection is 16 cts. a gallon and the difference between the import duty and the excise is 10 cts. per gallon. Therefore the 18,000,000 gallons of beer produced in Canada is protected by 10 cts. a gallon. If that 10 cts. were turned into excise, instead of having a cent and a half on malt by putting 4 cts. on malt you will resuscitate the revenue by $1,000,000 by that simple process.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Then we would be taxed all the same.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We are taxed on the 18,000,000 gallons of beer, but it does not go into the revenue. That is what I complain of. All we get out of beer, by excise, at the present time is $1,000,000. The sale of beer is protected in the country by a protection of 16 cents. The brewers can, amongst themselves, arrange an increase of price of their beer, so that they get this full benefit of the 16 cents. Bring the distilleries and breweries under the keen competition that we, as farmers, have to pursue our industries upon, and without putting it up to 16 cents a gallon, by putting it only about 11 cents a gallon and transferring the protective tax to excise, you immediately add another million dollars. The distillers and brewers need not fear the competition they will be subjected to, they have raw materials cheaper than their competitors. Scotch and Irish spirits which enter into competition at present are largely made from corn transported across the Atlantic and the manufactured article transported back again. Canadian barley is available to our brewers and maltsters for 50 or 60cts.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What will you do with this revenue when the Scott Act is passed in every county of this Dominion? What becomes of your revenue?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman will understand that I am not arguing the question on any position that may hereafter be assumed. I am arguing on the question as it exists to-day. I am not arguing on behalf of prohibition. I do not want it to be understood that I am—I do not think that prohibition would be a good thing for the country. There is one broad principle on which I put those views forward—I do not think it is right to make that a crime by legislation which is not a crime without. To that extent I am not in accord with the prohibitionists. On that broad principle I am opposed to prohibition but I am also opposed to the building up of a great influence such as our liquor interests and protecting them to the enormous extent that they are being protected to-day, giving them an influence in the country that may be exercised in an injurious manner to the physical well-being of the country as a whole. It only costs 25 cents to make a gallon of whiskey. That 25 cents is protected by 55 cents. There is a protection of from 200 per cent to 300 per cent afforded to the distillers, and 100 per cent to 150 per cent protection afforded to the brewers. Hon. gentlemen will recognize that in the consumption of that there is a great deal of money turned over. That money should go into legitimate channels—into the revenue of the country instead of being given as a private profit to the individuals who are promoting those industries by special legislation. I have mentioned only two or three industries among the many that I propose to deal with in the same way, not for the purpose of destroying those industries or diminishing the capital or industry of Canada but for the purpose of developing our resources, increasing our wealth and adding to the volume of our export trade—cheapening everything and adding to the comforts of the people in a ratio far beyond what anybody in this House can appreciate now. It may be accepted as a fact that if you release labour and industry from taxation imposed by special legislation, you create capital. Tax it and you destroy capital—capital is the production of labour, wealth is the distribution of its profit. What I wish to establish further, hon. gentlemen, is that with regard to tobacco exactly the same thing occurs. Tobacco is charged with an excise of 25 cents per pound and it is protected by a duty of 35 cents specific and 12½ per cent ad valorem. Raw tobacco is admitted free, but its manufacture is protected by 35 cents specific and 12½ cents ad valorem, in all about 40 cents per pound. If protection were removed and the excise made 50 cents the revenue would be increased by 25 cents per pound, or on the present consumption of 10,000,000 pounds $2,500,000 cigars are protected by a specific duty of $2 per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem, and in 1893-94 cigars yielded a revenue from excise of $700,000. What I say is, tobacco will bear a tax of 50 cents per pound. That would be 10 cents per pound more than the present tax.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That would not be free trade.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes; free trade means throwing the labour and industry of the country open to that competition which would enable it to produce so cheaply that it may extend its operations and not be restricted to a small area and thereby secure permanent employment. It is perfectly clear that those who buy their coal oil for 9 cents a gallon have more to spend on other necessities than those who have to pay 30 cents for it; this creates a demand for employment to provide them. Free trade is the foundation of that healthy competition. I am now showing that by a change in the mode of levying duties and excise on tobacco, spirits, beer and wine from which we derive a revenue now of $11,000,000, we would be raising $18,475,497 on present consumption.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman says that he would allow tobacco to come in free and raise the excise duty on the manufactured article. Does he mean that he would allow tobacco to come in free in its manufactured as well as in its raw state?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I mean of course that the 10,000,000 pounds of tobacco would come in free as it comes to-day. It is subject to an excise upon manufacture of 25 cents per pound. What I say is let the raw tobacco come in free but subject it to an excise of 50 cents a pound and remove protection.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Where will the benefit be then to the consumer if he pays 50 cents excise?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You understand that tobacco and spirits are legitimate objects of taxation, they are not absolutely necessaries. While it is not wise to tax flour, rice or coal oil or those things necessary for the comforts of our families generally, spirit and tobacco do not enter into the necessaries of life.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What benefit will it be to the consumer if he pays as much as the other?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You are paying to-day the price of whiskey at $2.25 a gallon. You are not going to increase the price of these articles by the system which I propose except tobacco which will be increased 10 cents. The consumer would only be worse off to the extent of 10 cents on tobacco, and I advocate raising the excise on spirits by 25 cents. Now in England the duty on tobacco is 75 cents, and the people of England consume per capita less tobacco than we do in Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—They have free trade and cannot afford to buy it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is a very curious thing that if you ever want any money you go to that free trade country to get it. Tobacco is made dearer by the revenue and the revenue gets all there is in the tax. The consumption of this article is always increased by the increase of prosperity of the people, and the consumption is affected in the diverse ratio by the increase in the cost of purchase. Now the British Isles derive a revenue from excise and from liquors and tobacco at $5.50 per head.

Canada only derives a revenue of $1.60 per head from the same sources. The hon. Finance Minister told us in his budget speech the other day that the people of Canada consumed three-quarters of a gallon a head, I think that is very little below what the people of Great Britain consume in the way of spirits. Now, while the people of Great Britain are consuming liquor to the same extent as the people of Canada, consuming less tobacco, but more beer, they are raising a per capita revenue of $5.50 by the free trade policy they pursue in the regulation of that free trade and tariff as against Canada, raising $1.60 per head consuming more tobacco and the same spirits, and only a difference in the amount of beer. So if we want to raise a revenue, and do justice to the people of the country, and to the trade of the country, we cannot do that justice by giving a rebate on exports, and putting foreign nations in a better position to compete with us.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We put ourselves in a better position.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Putting foreign nations in a better position to compete with us in the markets of the world where we have to sell our products in competition with theirs. Isn't it a better policy to put the regulation of this traffic upon the basis that I am laying down that will give us a revenue of $3.50 per head upon present consumption, where to-day we are only deriving a revenue of $1.60 per head. That is one mode in which I would raise the revenue by pursuing that policy and taking that position by increasing taxation on tobacco only 10c. and by increasing the excise on spirits 25c.—you will increase your revenue $7,500,000 to-day. Is not that a source of revenue to the people of Canada?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—Why not tax tea?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is another question altogether. You can tax anything you please. At the present moment we are taxing rice and clothing and everything that comes into the country. We are raising nineteen millions of taxation on seventy-one millions of imports which come into the country and thereby create a hidden tax.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—By simply making the revenue on tobacco through the customs the same rate as the excise, you would raise two million dollars, because then the whole duty of 25 cents a pound would be paid upon the tobacco coming into the country, whereas now we are giving the difference between 25 and 35.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is just exactly what I have been arguing.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—If you would put it on that basis the House would understand it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—My hon. friend will have an opportunity of replying to the position I have taken, and I shall be glad of his assistance in making it clearer. I am merely pointing out to this honourable House that in the question of levying our duties upon spirits and tobaccos, while in Great Britain the revenue derived from this source is $5.50 per head it is only $1.60 per head here, and by adopting the duty and excise that I have presented to this hon. House, that we would increase our revenue from $1.60 per head from these sources to $3.50 per head and it is a more legitimate object of taxation than the taxation of the necessities of life, than the taxation of all that enters into the cheapness of production in pursuing our industries and in this way we bring down the price of sugar again to 30 pounds to the dollar. The customs revenue as I have said before is derived from the taxation on seventy-one million dollars on imports. That is the value we imported in 1894. The duty was nineteen million dollars on that seventy-one million dollars according to the last reports of 1894. Of that nineteen million dollars there is three million dollars collected on spirits, etc., included in what I have been arguing and therefore that brings us down to the discussion of how sixteen million dollars is to be provided to maintain our present revenue of thirty-six million. The revenue is derived from three sources. One is public works, and the post office, &c., eight million dollars, another is the excise, eight million dollars and the other is duties. Now we have to deal with nineteen million dollars in duties. Three million dollars of that is already dealt with in the excise; and therefore we have simply to consider how we can raise sixteen million dollars for the treasury in order to enable us to initiate the policy of free trade and so open the markets of Canada to the competition of the world, in order to induce a growth of our industries and allow it to be expanded beyond the narrow confines of the consumption of five million people, that we can get out to the market where there are five or six hundred millions of people ready to be supplied with articles we can produce or manufacture.

The next question of revenue that we have to deal with is the post office. There is $5,517,000 expended in the post office department and the receipts are $2,809,000 leaving a deficit in operating our post office of $708,000. Now these receipts are derived from a postal revenue of three cents and of course under free trade the business of our post office will be extended enormously in consequence of the correspondence that will be carried on with foreign nations and the rapid growth of business generally in the country. There is no doubt about that. The revenue of Great Britain in the post office department is fifty million a year. People will say "Oh well, Great Britain is a wealthy country; it is conducting great operations." I have shown you to-day that while we thought it was the prosperity of England and the consumptive power of England in raising $5.50 a head in the excise it is simply the difference of paying the excise into the treasury of the country instead of giving it to private profit. So it is with the post office. The post office will be increased so that the deficit will be changed to a surplus of five hundred thousand dollars. The per capita return of the post office in the United Kingdom is $1.10 at two cents postage. The per capita revenue in Canada is 55c. at three cents postage. I have not the slightest doubt that the five years after the adoption of the policy of free trade you will wipe out that deficit of $707,000 and replace it with a surplus of $500,000. Of course that is simply supposition, but at the same time we are not arguing upon any theory such as preceded the adoption of free trade in Great Britain. We are arguing with the solid experience of the mother country which has for fifty years enjoyed the principles of free trade, and it stands to-day pre-eminent in the countries of the world in its commercial supremacy, in the power of its revenue and the comfort and prosperity of the people.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the duty on spirit?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is ten and sixpence a gallon, $2.62½.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But the percentage?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The duty is less than the excise.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is 225 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The excise on spirits is ten and sixpence and the duty is a trifle less; but I would like to point out to hon. gentlemen that the revenue of Great Britain to-day is one of the few revenues that has stood the last few years of depression. It has raised and raised until now it has turned the corner of £100,000,000, there is no stand and deliver position, which is the policy of protection. It is a voluntary contribution by the people. The only taxation there is upon the necessaries of life in Great Britain amounts to 12½c. per head.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Income tax.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No; I am now speaking of the taxation on the necessaries of life. An income tax is a forced tax. The taxation on the necessaries of life is a forced tax also. If a man has an income of $750 a year he is not taxed, but the income tax is on the wealth of the country. I am now speaking about the question of duties and the revenues derived from the necessaries of life under our system if we want to buy a machine, a gallon of coal oil, a pound of rice or anything at all it is taxed or protected. A barrel of flour is taxed 75 cents. Everything else is protected and the duties collected on $71,000,000 is a stand and deliver imposition on the necessaries of life to the extent of $16,000,000. I do not think any hon. gentleman can combat that position.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—What about tea?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is one of the necessaries of life. We import $38,000,000 of free goods in which tea and raw material is included. The $71,000,000 are the dutiable goods, upon which there is a revenue derived of $19,000,000, and $3,000,000 of that is on spirits and tobacco, and the rest is the necessaries of life. The people of Great Britain are only taxed on the necessaries of life 12½ cents per head, which is mainly composed of a tax on tea, and taxation on the necessaries of life to the people of Canada is $3.20 per head. In England the tax on the necessaries of life, which is almost entirely composed of tea, is 12½ cents per head. In Canada there is $3.20 per head imposed on the duties levied on the $71,000,000 of imports, and therefore we have to compare that with Great Britain, and recollect, hon. gentlemen, there is no hidden tax, no protection, no tax for rebates on export. Then there is the revenue which is derived from the prosperity of the people through the post office. That is £10,000,000 a year. There are £20,000,000 a year from customs, mainly spirits, £26,000,000 from excise, and £15,000,000 from stamps, &c.; but we have not got a great navy to keep up, or an army, or ambassadors and consuls all over the world, and it is not necessary for us to put anything on income. I am going to show you how, without putting anything on any one of those things, that we can entirely remove taxation from the country and still maintain the $16,000,000 of revenue which is now imposed on the necessaries of life; but the question I was just pointing out was that while there are people who say—and it is argued that the prosperity of the United Kingdom is not what the people imagine it to be—I say, hon. gentlemen, you have got to go to the public returns and see that that is not the case, that we find that the English people are maintaining a revenue by a very large portion, one-half of which is contributed by voluntary taxation. That is, out of their prosperity they pour into the coffers of the country more than one-half of their revenue; and then take the British Board of Trade Returns—what do they show? They show that $2,000,000,000 is the value of the imports and that the exports from Great Britain amount to $1,080,000,000.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That covers Great Britain and Ireland.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, of course, but the value of the imports is £408,000,000, and the value of the exports £216,000,000. You will see the peculiar anomaly that the imports are almost double the exports. Their prosperity is so great that they are enabled to purchase that much more in the way of imports than their exports because hon. gentlemen will understand that in conducting affairs between nations there is no such thing as money changing hands. It is purely a trade relation.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES—Where does the wealth come from ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It comes from the product of labour. Another argument that is used is that the people of Great Britain are importing enormously foreign and colonial goods. That is a mistake. They imported last year £68,000,000 out of £408,000,000 worth of manufactured and partially manufactured goods from abroad, but they exported at the same time of those very same goods £57,000,000 worth, so that they were merely the medium of transferring the foreign and colonial goods from one part of the world to the other through their channels of trade, and the argument that is used that they are being undersold is a mistake, because a nation that can maintain successfully year after year a continual growth, no falling back, an import and export trade of that kind with a revenue of £100,000,000 a year, I say, hon. gentlemen, that we are making a mistake when we imagine for one moment that there is that want of prosperity in Great Britain ; but that it is exactly the reverse under their free trade policy. Naturally they are affected by any depression in trade in other countries, but they are affected much less than other countries in consequence of a healthy competition constantly bringing the best elements to the top. I would like to cite an individual instance taking the farming community as an example. I have in my mind two farms, one in Canada and one in Scotland, to show the difference that exists as far as farming is concerned. My hon. friend on my right has a fine farm up in the Niagara district. I was talking to him about his farm, and how many men he employed. He said : " I employ six men the year around ; I give them $200 a year wages, a house and garden and certain other little comforts. I have 800 acres of land and last year I farmed the whole of the land and I did not do more than just make both ends meet." Now I have got another farm I am intimately acquainted with, and I am stating facts. That is in Scotland, and it is a farm of 600 acres, and the farmer employs five men the year round in addition to the other labour. I did not state all the labour my hon. friend employed, but those are the permanent employees. My hon. friend employs six men on the 800 acres, and the Scotch farmer employed five hands permanently.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What were the wages ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—$250 a year, a house and garden, and cow, and an allowance of oatmeal, and no lost time for sickness. Those are the conditions on which that farm was worked. My hon. friend is running a magnificent farm in a good district, paying wages of $200 a year, and only able to make both ends meet. On his farm there are only two parties—the owner and the labourer. In Scotland the tenant was paying £700 a year rent, £700 a year for manures, and £700 for oil-cake for feeding. Now, that was the way that that farmer in Scotland carried on his business, and leaving the question of manure, etc., out of it, he had been paying a revenue of £700 a year to the owner of that farm.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How far was he from the market ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Ten miles from Edinburgh, and my hon. friend is ten miles from one of our large centres.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—By water or by land ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And the farms within four or five miles of Edinburgh rent from £4 to £5 an acre, and there are perpetual applications for them. This farmer in Scotland was getting his paraffine oil at 9 cents a gallon, and 14 pounds of dairy salt for twopence. Those were the prices he was paying for the articles that entered into the necessaries of his consumption in conducting his operations. My hon. friend will tell you he was paying for his coal oil 25c.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not burn any coal-oil. I burn natural gas ; it is cheaper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Some of them have to pay 25c. to 30c. for coal oil, where the farmer in Scotland only paid 9c. This oil is made from the shale in Scotland, and the American oil has to meet that competition in Great Britain when it gets there; and the American oil is retailed in composition with that oil at 9c. a gallon, and where it is retailed in Canada it is sold at 25c. to 30c. a gallon. That is the condition of the two farms. I can vouch for the truth and accuracy of these two cases, as far as I received them from my hon. friend and my friend at home.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You forgot the cow.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, I forgot the cow that my hon. friend allows each labourer, but I am near enough at any rate. Then there was another friend of mine up in the North-west that came out and got married, and she had three acres of land in Devonshire, and she was getting £10 a year rent for it for some years, and on coming out to Canada she gave instructions to sell, and it was sold and realized £65—$375.00—an acre. It is five miles away from any town, and just used as a field for pasture and hay and meadow land, it was sold for £65 an acre. Another friend of mine sold eight acres the other day for £200. Now these are just two or three instances that have come under my own personal observation to show you what the price of land is there, and how far the conditions are favourable. I do not say I am stating the condition of things all over, that where there has been a failure in consequence of the reduction in the price of wheat. But are not our prices depressed? Do not we sell at so much less when we export to England? Is not the English farmer so much better off by the cost of taking that wheat or those cattle from here to England? I am stating this to show that it is perfectly correct that, though there are individual hardships, the condition of England is one of prosperity, and that is indicated through the returns. I would like to complete this question of revenue, and by taking the railways I wish to show that the public works produced a revenue of $3,067,549.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not see how the country gets poor by it, because if you did not give the drawback it would be manufactured in some other country. Do all the employees stand idle after they get through with this work of manufacturing for five millions in Canada and supplying outside parties? I do not understand the hon. gentleman's reference to the drawback. On a former occasion the hon. member spoke of the Massey Manufacturing Company. I am satisfied he does not want to advertise their wares, but he says the drawback given by this government on the duty on what is exported from this country, is in favour of the foreigner, and not in favour of the people of this country to enable the manufacturer to manufacture here and to export, but the people do not lose a dollar by it, and they keep the people employed enabling them to purchase the necessities of life, because they get the benefit of the manufacturing industry in the country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What has brought me to argue this question is the fact that we are brought face to face after 17 years of protection, with a deficit of $5,000,000 a year in our revenue, and that that revenue is not likely to be made up, but that that deficit is likely to continue, because we are thrown back now entirely on our own resources. We have not been constructing any public works for a year or two. We have not been importing anything. Recollect when we borrow money abroad these imports come into the country, and the duty is collected on them, and in that way a revenue is obtained. Of course, while we are doing that our debt is increased, but the revenue keeps up. The Finance Minister has announced a policy of economy and cessation of expenditure, but that will operate against our ability to purchase. It will aggravate the difficulty that we labour under with the five million deficit. I wish to see that the revenues of the country shall be resuscitated, and shall not go down hill in the way that appearances indicate they are likely to go under present conditions. Free trade will increase our purchasing power and develop trade and industry. I should like to ask the hon. leader of the government if he would tell me how long the mills of Canada were out of work during the year 1894 and how many men have been forced out of employment in the industries of the country? If he were to ask for a return from the public corporations he could ascertain. I know the woollen mills in Cobourg were shut down for some time and I know the car works there are now shut down and the skilled labour idle. Every time a mill is closed and the men are thrown out of employment the purchasing power of the people who were employed is stopped, and in that way a deficit takes place. It is with a knowledge of that fact that I have brought this question before this honourable House, and for the purpose of showing how, by the adoption of a different policy, we can obtain a revenue. I have been arguing this policy on the present consumption of dutiable goods, but if free trade were adopted and were followed by anything like the prosperity which ensued upon the adoption of free trade in Great Britain the population would increase and the revenues from the post offices, the railways, the canals and every other source depending on the trade and commerce of the country would increase. Last year the expenditure upon our government railways was $3,670,000, while the receipts were only $3,180,000, leaving a deficit of $480,000 a year. After expending $50,000,000 on the promotion of our public railways, they do not pay their way but show a deficit of $580,000 a year. I do not believe for a moment that that is at all due to a want of trade and commerce, but it is due entirely to the management of the road so far as the rate charged is concerned. As I said the other day in this House, we, in the North-west, are paying $1.50 a train mile, while in Ontario, the Grand Trunk railway is paying $1.03 a train mile, while the government railways earned only 69c. per train mile. There is not one dollar earned for dividends and in fact there is a deficit. All that is required to resuscitate that is to establish the freight rates on an equitable basis and increase the volume of traffic by opening the doors to the trade of the world. It cannot be fair to say that in the west we who maintain the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be obliged to pay $1.50 per train mile.

Hon. Mr. MACINNIS (Burlington)—Where did you get that? The last annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company show that their earnings per train mile amounted to less than that, only $1.33?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I got it out of the trade returns for last year. I am quoting last year's report. If the hon. gentleman will turn up last year's report he will see that the earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway were $1.50 per train mile. I want the government railways to be so managed that they will meet expenditure. The railways of India and Australia are government railways and pay 3 per cent on cost. The Canadian Pacific Railway pays 3 per cent on its mileage of 6,000 miles at a cost of $50,000 a mile; the Grand Trunk pays 3 per cent on its mileage of 3,000 miles at a cost of $53,000 per mile. The Government railways of 1,100 miles should at least be made to pay their way. I saw the statement made by the Minister of Railways in the House of Commons the other day that he had given instructions that the roads should be maintained with the utmost efficiency, but that revenue and expenditure should meet, and when they had met it should stand at that—that no attempt should be made to earn a profit on the road. That is the statement of the Minister of Railways. While he succeeded in equalizing expenditure and revenue on the Intercolonial Railway, on the whole of our public railways, that has not yet been done. I say it can be done, and that it will be unjust to the rest of the people of Canada if it is not done. I say there should not be a deficit of $580,000 a year on railroads which have cost $50,000,000—$50,000,000 paid by the people of Canada who have their own burdens of transportation to maintain in addition to maintaining their share of the interest on this $50,000,000. The road should be managed, and can be managed not only to cover that deficit, but to supply a dividend at least of 1 per cent on the capital invested. If that was done it would alter the position and add to the revenue $1,000,000 and that through an increase in the volume of traffic under the stimulus of free trade. Then take our Dominion lands, a revenue can be obtained from them greater than is obtained to-day. There is a duty collected on silks amounting to $750,000 a year. Silk is an article of luxury and could very properly be left as it is. Dried fruits and nuts bring in a revenue of $512,000, and coffee $105,000. There is a revenue of $4,000,000 from those sources. That added to the $7,725,000 by equalizing the duties on spirits, etc., and excise is $11,635,000, altogether provided out of the $16,000,000 that I said we would have to provide to raise a revenue such as was raised in 1894. Then the difference between the $11,635,000 and $16,000,000 there is $4,459,000 to be made up. A duty of 5 per cent on the gross imports of $113,000,000 would produce $5,650,000 which could be maintained until by increase of trade and population it could be abolished, that 5 per cent could be reached by a gradual reduction of the present average rate of 20 per cent on our imports, at the rate of one-fourth each year till 5 per cent was reached.

I desire to give these figures, because the addition of these figures gives us $17,000,000, or about $1,000,000 more than we require and without imposing one single solitary penny of taxation on the necessaries of life, nothing on tea, nothing on sugar. That takes the taxation off the necessaries of life. The reason Great Britain puts 8 per cent on tea is because it gives no manufacturer any undue advantage over those who are subject to the competition of trade. The moment you put a duty on sugar you immediately tax the power and ability of our farmers to produce fruit and our canneries to produce jams, you give the refiner an undue advantage.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend from Halifax was pleased to listen to the remarks of the hon. member from Marquette, but feared that the consequence would be the infliction of a speech from myself. Out of deference to my hon. friend, I am not going to deliver a speech. I will disappoint him on this occasion. The hon. gentleman from Marquette is a very free and fluent speaker and hesitates not in the free expression of his views, but I cannot follow him. He is full of theory and seems to be reasonable, but when he come down to a practical demonstration it amounts to nothing. I should like to see my hon. friend discuss simply the question he puts before us—the granting of drawbacks on exports. My hon. friend is a free trader out and out, and does not believe in the vociferous policy of the opposition. Well, what is the granting of drawbacks? Simply free trade in the raw or unmanufactured article imported, to which is to be added skill and labour, and then it is exported. It is giving back to the manufacturer the duty that he has paid upon the importation of certain articles. The country gets the benefit of the labour on that particular article that has been manufactured, but it does not go into consumption in Canada and the duty is refunded. My hon. friend would have sugar admitted free to enable the farmer to make jams and jellies. We want iron when imported to be used in agricultural implements for export, admitted free to put the labour of the country upon it. It is a free trade principle, nothing more, nothing less—simply getting the benefit of the industry in the country upon an article and giving back to the manufacturer the duty he has paid on the importation of the raw material. It is based on the principle of free trade on raw materials—that is the whole principle of drawbacks. My hon. friend has been rather joked by somebody who drew a comparison between his place in the North-west Territories and a farm in Scotland, situated a quarter of an hour from Edinburgh. The Scotch farm is only ten miles from the city of Edinburgh where the country is laid out, I suppose, in small market gardens. Such a comparison is absurd. The hon. gentleman is drawing too largely on the credulity of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The farm I am speaking of is devoted purely to the feeding of cattle and sheep, and there is not a single market garden on it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I would rather see that farm than believe what I was told by some one else. I know from personal observation that what he says is not the case in England. The iron industry in England is not protected. The pig iron industry has not been protected in England for 25 years, and it has not increased in the same ratio as the population. We do not go to England for our rails or pig iron, we go to the United States. The iron industry of England has gone down steadily—so the president of a large association in England says. In the United States in the same period it has increased 435 per cent, in Germany it has increased 249 per cent, in Russia it has increased 162 per cent, while in England, under free trade, it has increased only 23 per cent in the last 25 years. My hon. friend wants us to follow the example of England. How does England derive the bulk of its revenue? By direct compulsory taxing of the people, but we are in a different condition altogether in this new country. My hon. friend would take the duty off tobacco, and extract the revenue directly from the people of this country. He would actually tax the industries of the country and allow foreign manufactures to come in free. It is impossible to raise a revenue that way. I like to listen to my hon. friend from Marquette, but there is something visionary about him with regard to this hobby of his. When he proposes that we should tax the labour and industry of this country, and that foreign products come in free, he proposes a policy by which we would soon all be paupers. We would be like poor old Ireland after England adopted free trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to say much on this subject. I wish to say a word or two on the question of procedure. Hon. gentlemen of the Conservative persuasion feel that the hon. member from Shell River has travelled beyond the record in the very instructive and interesting speech to which we have listened. I was very much reminded, when listening to these comments on his speech, of a time when gentlemen who were then the pillars of the Conservative party delivered speeches, just as long but not as able as that of the hon. gentleman from Shell River, upon notices which gave less indication of what the speeches were to be about than the notice of the hon. gentleman, and if my recollection is not at fault, the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg heartily endorsed and applauded the action of those gentlemen, who were then leaders of the Conservative party. The Prime Minister felt that I was, perhaps, assuming an improper attitude in indicating that there was some objection to making speeches which were not confined to the question before the House, but it is the right of every member of the Senate to try and see that that order is observed. I did not wish to interfere with the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Shell River, but I had hoped that we would have, on the resolution of which he had given notice, an interesting discussion in which other members of the House could have taken part, but the hon. gentleman himself must see that it is now hardly possible that the discussion can be continued now with the other orders on the paper unless we have a night session. Everything that the hon. gentleman said, or nearly everything, was perfectly true, and if he had only by his notice indicated that he was going to deal with so broad a subject, we might have been prepared to deal with it, and made up our minds to a long debate. I do not propose to discuss the question, but I quite concur in what the hon. gentleman said with respect to drawbacks on goods imported in this country and then manufactured and exported. The hon. gentleman was perfectly right as to the unfairness of the practice. The illustration which he took was a proper one, and all the more appropriate because it is understood that this drawback system was adopted largely in consequence of the attitude assumed by the Massey-Harris Manufacturing Co. As the law stands now, the Massey-Harris Co. have a rebate on the imported articles used in the manufacture of agricultural implements which they export to Russia, Australia and, I understand, to the United States also. When the hon. gentleman said they exported to Russia, I do not think he brought the enormity of the position home to the average Canadian as much as if he had said that they export agricultural machinery to the United States. It just means this: that the Canadian farmers in Ontario or in Manitoba have to pay a higher price for the Massey agricultural implements than the farmers in Dakota or Michigan. The hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in the statement that he made, but we realize it more vividly when we bring it home that way. The government are fond of speaking of themselves as the farmer's friends. This is the way they show their friendship for the Canadian farmer. They benefit the Canadian manufacturer at the expense of the Canadian farmer. The revenue which the country loses by this drawback has to be made up largely by the Canadian farmer. If the drawback was not taken out of the revenue the revenue would be larger than it actually is, and the proportion of the burdens borne by the farmer would be smaller.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But if it never went into the revenue?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If there is a sum of $1,000 paid into the revenue, $990 of it is paid back to the manufacturer as drawback. The country has to make up the revenue in some way, and the burden which is taken off the shoulders of the manufacturer must ultimately be borne by somebody, and the majority of the people have to ultimately bear their portion of the burden that is taken off the shoulders of the manufacturers. These same gentlemen who are now benefiting the Australian, the Russian and the United States farmers and putting them in a better position to compete with our farmers are only logically following the principle which they adopted when they reduced the duty on Australian mutton and other products and then offered subsidies to steamers to carry Australian farm produce into this country to compete with the products of our own farms.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You have been reading the Globe.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not read the Globe. I suppose it is a confession I should not make; but all the newspaper reading which I indulge in I get in other journals. Ideas may occur to one without going to the Globe for them. I do not read the Mail and Empire either, and do not get any ideas from that paper. This drawback system is simply logically pursuing the policy adopted by the government in this particular matter. The drawback is quite consistent with a policy of subsidizing steamers to bring Australian goods here to compete with our own produce. If foreign goods come in to compete with our own manufactures, the government are protectionists and try to take care of our own manufacturers. When foreign farm produce comes in they are free traders. I presume when the time for raising election funds comes round the government will expect more from the manufacturers.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I would not have said anything on this matter if the hon. member from Halifax had not begun his remarks by saying that every word the hon. gentleman from Marquette uttered was correct.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Nearly every word.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—He said he was inspired by the senior member for Halifax to put the question of bringing this discussion before the House. I suppose that is a true statement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I think the senior member from Halifax did show extreme selfishness in not wishing to hear anybody speak except the member from Marquette. He said it was always a pleasure to hear him speak, because he came from a sort of Eutopia where no taxes or duties were imposed, and he goes on expanding in an eloquent manner on the great advantages of that country, but I think it was extremely selfish for the hon. member from Halifax to say that it would not be in order for anybody to speak but the hon. member for Marquette.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to correct the impression that the hon. gentleman from Halifax inspired me to make the motion. It was nothing of the kind. I worded it so that I might have full scope.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The arguments of my hon. friend from Marquette were well answered by the interpolation of my hon. friend from Monck. Before replying to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Marquette, I may say I regret the sarcasm indulged in at the expense of the senior member from Halifax for the reason that had I been of as conservative a character as he, I should have insisted on putting a stop to so irrelevant a speech as that of the hon. member from Marquette, it having no relevancy to the motion on the paper. I promise him this, that I will assist him in future in trying to keep members, particularly himself, to the question before the House. I shall only refer to one point mentioned by the hon. gentleman, and I must express my very great surprise at the conclusions at which he appears to have arrived from the facts as they exist both in law and in practice. He tells us that if we pay a $1 of drawback upon an article which is being manufactured from imported material, that that is a depletion of the revenue to the extent of that dollar, and therefore it has to be taken out of the pockets of the farmer. Does not the hon. gentleman know that if the 50 machines to which my hon. friend referred as being now exported to Russia had never been built in the country, the duty paid upon the material which went into their construction would never have gone into the revenue? If it had never gone into the revenue, only for the purpose of being refunded when the article manufactured from it was exported could the farmers be injured by taking out that sum which had been placed to the credit of the Receiver General for the purpose indicated? That is the matter I should like the hon. gentleman to solve before he attempts to discuss the question again. Then my hon. friend says it enables the Massey Manufacturing Company to manufacture goods and send them to Australia, and it was argued by my hon. friend opposite that they must sell them cheaper there than they sell them at home. But that is not the gravamen of the charge; the charge is that by getting a Massey machine cheap the Australian is enabled to cultivate his land and reap his wheat and bring the wheat which he has produced into this country cheaper than he otherwise could. If the Massey Company in Toronto manufacture a machine and send it to Australia, and he competes with the United States machine which is made from the same material and which would have been purchased instead of the Canadian machine—how in the world does that enable the Australian to produce his wheat cheaper? I cannot arrive at any such conclusion, and neither can he if he will think over the matter and then speak. The whole system of drawbacks—and I shall not depart from that one point—resolves itself to this point, and this, alone: the drawback is granted because of the cheapness of the material out of which these machines are made, the iron and steel particularly, in a highly protective country like the United States—the result I hesitate not to say of that protection to a very great extent, and the depression in trade at this particular moment, which created not only a glut in the market but lowered the prices to such an extent that even in that country they could produce the article and export it cheaper than we can in Canada. We say to the manufacturer in Canada “you can bring the cheap material, which is your raw material, from the foreign market, you can manufacture and export it, and we will refund to you 99 per cent of the duty which you have paid into the revenue immediately upon the production of a certificate of the export of the article.” How does that affect the revenue? Would the Massey Company, after having manufactured a full supply for the 5,000,000 people in Canada to whom you have referred so often, go on manufacturing 150 other machines to send to Russia, or 500 or 1000 machines for Australia, if they could not get their material just as cheap as it is purchased in the United States, from whence they sent the article, and in which country they compete with them? How, I ask again, does that affect the pockets of these poor down-trodden farmers, who are taken under the wing of my hon. friend, or those who support him? I have read these arguments—and I apologize to the hon. gentleman for having accused him of reading them—in the Globe over and over again, and I supposed my hon. friend, being a member of that great party, and being an admirer of the organ that has controlled the destinies of that party, was one of its regular readers. It is only another illustration of the old adage that great minds run in the same channel; I won't say small minds, because it seems to me that to reach the conclusion to which my two hon. friends who have discussed the question have come, they could not really understand what they are talking about. I do not mean that offensively. I mean precisely what I say, as far as this particular point of the hon. gentleman's motion is concerned. Adopt the policy of my hon. friend opposite, a humble follower of the ardent free trader behind me, and you deprive the workmen of the city of Toronto of the full benefit of the labour of manufacturing those 150 machines, and the 500 or 600 machines, or the 1,000 machines which are now manufactured for the Australian market. If that is an advantage to the farmer, I should like to know how you arrive at that conclusion. If there are 500 or 600 people who are earning their daily bread from that one establishment alone in the city of Toronto, and if 150 of them have to go elsewhere to seek employment from the fact that they could not carry on the manufacturing industry for export, then you deprive the farmer of 150 families who would have been their customers, and if that is a benefit to the farmer I should like to know where the benefit comes in. There is no objection to bringing down all the information in the possession of the government on this question, and I hope when my hon. friend has read the statement and studied it he will come to a sounder conclusion than the one he has given utterance to to-day.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—I agree with the remarks of the hon. Premier, and I do not agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax, that the drawback injures the farmer. Refunding the duty that was paid on bringing in those materials and enabling the materials to be manufactured in Canada, has been a benefit to Canada and a benefit to her artizans, but I do think that it is an abandonment of the general policy of the government of which my hon. friend is the leader. To that extent it is tantamount to free trade, and is, therefore, an abandonment of the protective policy of the government of the day, and so far I have reason, instead of condemning the transaction, to congratulate the government upon their change of policy. It is an admission that the policy of free trade, to that extent, is sounder than the policy of protection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the hon. member speaks of the policy of the government he should go back as far as 1869, when Sir Leonard Tilley made his first budget speech and put the first tariff upon the statute book, in which I had some little hand, he will find that just as far as we possibly could we put raw material and what was not produced in this country on the free list. That was our policy.

The motion was agreed to.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to Ask the government if the Great Northern Railway of Winnipeg is acting within the law by virtue of the Statutes of 1887, fixing the point of commencement at the city of Winnipeg, thence northerly?

He said: This is what is popularly known as the Hudson Bay Railway, and I see they are surveying their route, starting from Gladstone, a point about 100 miles west of Winnipeg. I should be sorry to see any complication arise, as it is desirable that the railway company should keep within the law the statutes of 1887, appear to bind the railway down to starting at Winnipeg and going northward. I merely point it out so that there will be no misapprehension as to the law. I may be wrong. The statutes of 1891 bind the company to obtain from the government the approval of the location of the line before commencing operations.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think there is anything which requires them to start at one end. They can start at any point between those terminal points.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is a question, as far as one can understand it, of a legal character, and perhaps the best answer would be that some lawyer should examine the statute and give an opinion. If the hon. gentleman will read the question, he will see that it is quite difficult to answer, because there is no statement in the question as to what the railway is doing. It simply asks whether the Great Northern Railway of Winnipeg is acting within the law by virtue of the statute of 1887 fixing the point of commencement. That is a declaration that the law fixes the place at which the railway shall be commenced. That being a statement of fact, it is not regular to put it upon the order paper as a question, to begin with; and in the next place, he does not say what the Great Northern Railway is doing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is what he wants to know.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then he should have so framed the question. We are told it is commencing somewhere else, and if that be the case, I suppose the hon. gentleman is as capable of judging whether they are within the law, as I possibly can be. The law says that the road must begin at the city of Winnipeg and be extended northerly at a point at Fort Nelson, or Churchill, or some other point on the shore of Hudson Bay. The company have built forty miles, beginning at Winnipeg, from Winnipeg northerly, and no further. These actions appear to be within the law, by virtue of the statute of 1887. What they have been doing since, or whether they are going on with the road at all, I do not know; neither does the government.

The Senate adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 31st May, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

RETURN BROUGHT DOWN.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL laid on the table a return to an address of July 11th, 1894, calling for a statement in detail of the expenditure for public printing in 1883, and 1893, respectively. He said: Hon. gentlemen will see that there was some excuse for not laying this return before the House last session. It is not strictly in accord with the wording of the motion which asks for details. It is of a bulky character without the details, but if the House insists upon it, the contents of these two volumes will have to be copied. I do not produce these in order that they may become a record of the Senate, but to show the immense amount of work involved in preparing some of the returns asked for. My hon. friend from Marquette inquired yesterday when the return moved for with reference to the number of bushels of wheat inspected at Fort William would be brought down. I inquired of the Inland Revenue Department and they state that they are endeavouring to get the information, but as the inspection is optional, only a portion is inspected of which they have returns. Any statement beyond that can only be obtained from the owners of the elevators at Fort William, if they choose to give them. The department has written asking for the information, and as soon as it is obtained it will be laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word with reference to the voluminous report which has been laid on the table to-day. The motion for the return was made by myself. I regret very much that the return should be so voluminous, and I do not wish to have any other details than those contained in the report laid on the table. The resolution asked for a statement in detail of the expenditure for public printing in 1883 and 1893 respectively, and my motion was simply to get the amount which had been paid for each service—not for each item of every service—in order that Parliament might be in a position to judge as to whether or not it was desirable to continue the printing by the government which has been in vogue for the last few years.

A CORRECTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I desire to call the attention of the House to a report that appeared in the Citizen and the Montreal Gazette with regard to a question that I asked yesterday. The Citizen says:

In the Senate yesterday Hon. Mr. Boulton, in moving for a return of rebate to manufacturers of exported goods upon the raw materials therein, denounced the practice.

I wish to correct that, and say that that is not the position I took at all in the remarks which I made in this House. I said that it was manifestly unfair to give the rebate on taxation to the farmers of Russia, Australia and the Argentine Republic, to whom these machines were shipped, while it was denied to the farmers of Canada. In the Montreal Gazette, also, there is an incorrect report. It says that I asked if the Great Northern Railway was acting within the law in commencing work at Winnipeg, whereas the question in reality that I asked was whether the Great Northern Railway was acting within the law in not commencing work at Winnipeg—exactly the reverse.

THE CHUTE DIVORCE CASE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in the matter of Julia Ethel Chute's petition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to have this report read. It is a matter as to which there is some difference of opinion in the House.

The report was read at the table.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I shall not support that finding of the committee, not that I dispute the fact of the petitioner's inability to pay or procure the means to prosecute her appeal before the House. What I object to is to create another precedent for an application of this kind. We have only one now, and we are asked to allow this petitioner to come in here and apply for a bill of divorce without making the usual deposit to meet the expenses of parliament. The feeling of the Senate has been to restrict, as far as possible, within reasonable bounds, the granting of divorces, and that is one of the chief reasons why we have kept the power to grant divorces in the hands of parliament. It was thought that the creation of a divorce court would be an encouragement to parties to seek divorce. In a civil tribunal, parties who wish to enter a case must be prepared to do so in the regular way. I do not feel very strongly opposed to the present applicant, but I think we should determine now, whether we will establish this precedent or not. We know that there are many solicitors in the country who, (at least some of them) if applications might be made in forma pauperis, would encourage people to seek divorce and bring cases of the kind before parliament. Now I should like to discourage that as far as possible. We have all read, in one of Warren's books, of the firm of Quirk, Gammon & Snap, who were always ready to snap up cases. Is it wise for us to repeat a bad precedent and permit persons without means to come here and seek divorce? I simply want the House to decide whether this should be done or not. I think it is a dangerous precedent and contrary to the policy which parliament has hitherto pursued. It would give applicants for divorce here privileges which they would not have before a civil court, and have a tendency to encourage people to separate when they might condone their offences and live happily together. I think the poor should have the same rights as the rich, but as a matter of fact they have not in the civil courts. If they have not money to prosecute their case and employ counsel, they cannot go into the law courts. I do not think it would be right, considering our policy has been to discourage divorce, to give parties advantages to appear here which they would not possess to go before a civil tribunal.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—The hon. gentleman has spoken very plainly and properly in this instance. I do not think the practice should be encouraged, but there are peculiar circumstances in this case. This woman and her family, it was shown by affidavit produced before the committee, are utterly unable to deposit this $200 fee and the committee decided that the fee should be remitted. There are precedents for such action, and the committee, after considering the case carefully, thought it was only right and fair that the woman should be allowed to proceed and not give the idea to the public that divorce could only be had by the rich. I see no reasonable objection to the adoption of this report. On one occasion at least the fee was remitted. The committee thought that they should report as they have done. This woman is living in the city of Toronto and earning $5 a week. The members of the family are impoverished, owing to the distress in Toronto, and are unable to help her. All those facts are vouched for by respectable people in Toronto, and have led the committee to report as they have done, to enable this woman to seek her rights without payment of this fee. I do not think that divorce should be encouraged, but I see no reason why this poor woman should not have the advantage given her that has been given to another applicant. I do not wish to have it a general thing that persons could come here and apply in forma pauperis unless they could establish their inability to deposit the $200.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not deny that the woman is unable to get the money.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—The affidavit showed that she was only earning $5 a week and the other members of the family could not assist to the extent of $1. If the House thinks she should be allowed to come, under those circumstances, they will adopt the report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would ask the Minister for divorce to be kind enough to give the House the precedents to which he refers. I do not think there has been more than one.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—There was one quoted.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, one case.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—Mr. Gemmill, the lawyer who appeared, said there were similar cases in England. However, we have only one case here. If the affidavits are true why should not the woman have relief?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There is a good deal of truth in what has been frequently said about the Senate, that it is only a court for the rich to obtain divorce. In this particular instance there was a precedent established some six or seven years ago. In that case the Divorce Committee followed precisely the same course that we are asked to pursue in this instance.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is not disputed.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The committee recommended that the petitioner be relieved from the necessity of depositing the $200, and only the $200. The expense of bringing witnesses here and the counsel fees will be borne by herself or her friends. She is a poor woman and the funds will have to be furnished by her near relatives, so that the government will be at no pecuniary loss whatever other than that of the $200 which is generally required to be paid in to the clerk of the Senate before such cases are proceeded with. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg that it is undesirable that divorce should be more easily obtained than it is at present. One remark of his amused me and that is this—that if this were made a precedent, the legal profession would connive at getting up cases and bring them before the Senate in order to get the fees, I do not think that the hon. gentleman was serious in casting such a reflection on the profession to which he himself belongs, and which he is a shining light. I rather think the hon. gentleman did not consider the force of his remark.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I fully considered it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I know too much of the fraternity to believe that any legal gentleman would go deliberately to work to to get up a case for the sake of the few dollars he would get out of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is a good deal of force in what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. We should be cautious indeed in throwing down any of the barriers which the Senate has raised in regard to approaching this tribunal. It is not wise to establish a precedent which might be availed of very generally to allow people to come in here to seek divorce in a free court, as it were, so far as the expenses of parliament are concerned. But the question of precedent should depend on whether the application is right or wrong. If the application is right and based on justice, then whether it establishes a precedent or not should not be considered by this House. We should do what is right under the circumstances in the particular case, regardless of what precedent may be established by our action. If the members of the committee are satisfied that this woman is not in a position to avail herself of the tribunal which the constitution has provided in cases of divorce, and she has a good case to present to them, then I think they were within their limits in recommending that the fee should be remitted. Every case of this kind should be considered upon its merits, and it is to be presumed that a committee so carefully selected as this Divorce Committee, have not made this recommendation to the House without feeling satisfied that they are justified in doing so.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the duty of the hon. gentleman who acts as chairman of the committee when making a recommendation of this kind to give the reasons and the authorities on which the recommendation is based. I hope my hon. friend will do so now.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—This committee did not report on this matter without having something before them to be guided by. There are precedents not alone for the $200 not being deposited, but also for the deposit of $200 being refunded at a subsequent date. The first case to which I shall allude is the Campbell divorce case, one which was before this House for a considerable period. In 1878 Mrs. Campbell renewed her application to be allowed to prosecute in forma pauperis, but was obliged to abandon it owing to the fact that the publication of notice was not sufficient. In 1878, the application having been duly advertised, Mrs. Campbell's petition to be allowed to proceed in forma pauperis was granted.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend will see in that case Mrs. Campbell was not the petitioner—it was her husband. The husband applied for divorce, and in going through parliament the bill was changed, and she was made the applicant for divorce herself. All the other cases referred to, or that can be found, have been where the petitioners have failed to obtain divorce, and the unexpended balances in our custody have been returned to the petitioners.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In 1888, on the petition of Mary Matilda White, it was ordered that the fee of $200 be refunded to her. That is a case in which, even after the action was brought, the money was refunded.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But here no money has been put in.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In 1889 in the Lawson case the deposit was refunded.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He did not get his bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—In 1890, in the case of Mrs. Walker, there was also an order that $200 paid by her should be refunded.

Hon. Mr. POWER—She did not get her divorce.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—But that is not a special reason why the money should be refunded.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In those cases it was only the balance that was not used up in the publication of the bill and petition, and one thing and another that was refunded. It is only the balance remaining ; and the bill was not granted in any of those cases.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—There was another case which I cannot lay my hands on, where the party was allowed to appear in forma pauperis, and in England, although the idea was that it was a rich man's court, and not a poor man's court, they held that the poor man should not be debarred from asking for a divorce.

Hon. Mr. READ—I think this would be an extremely dangerous precedent, and I voted against it as one of the committee. I think the hon. gentleman has not stated the Campbell case as it occurred. Campbell asked for a divorce against his wife, and he did not get it, and she asked for alimony against him, and she got it in parliament, and it was contested in the courts, and the law was sustained, and Campbell's property was held for alimony. It is quite a different case from the one which the hon. gentleman puts.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—We do not generally take part in discussions on these matters, but I am astonished at what has taken place to-day. Seven or eight years ago I heard more than a majority of this House state that though believing in divorces and voting for them, it was a thing that was not to be favoured. It is argued in this case, that the petitioner is a poor individual, and we should come to her rescue. If you do that, you are doing all that is possible to favour divorce. Is divorce a thing in the interests of the public at large? No; certainly not. Why, then, spend public money for this purpose? Is it right? I say it is not. The House is taking upon itself to do a thing which, as is admitted by the great majority of this House, ought to be resisted. We would be acting the other way if we used public money to help those parties out of a difficulty, and the public would receive no benefit from it. I hope this report will not be adopted without taking a vote upon it.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—I think the precedent proposed is a bad one and in opposition to the policy of the House, because if you allow this practice to prevail it will be an inducement to bring such cases here. It is stated that the poverty of the applicant is affirmed upon affidavit evidence. That is poor evidence on which to rely. There is no question of it that in courts elsewhere ex parte affidavit evidence is not relied upon, and unless very direct evidence is adduced this application should not prevail. I am not at all satisfied with a case of this sort sustained merely upon affidavit evidence and that is all that is referred to. If this case is allowed to pass and the application be granted, there is no reason in the world why you can deny any similar case in the future. The precedent is a bad one and opposed to the policy of parliament, and I do not think it should be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. member from Richmond in his remarks expressed precisely the views that I hold in this matter. You have intrusted your committee with this branch of the work, and it has been proved to the satisfaction of the majority of the committee that the woman was in such circumstances that in no other way could she obtain the relief she sought.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not only the majority but the whole committee.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Yes. The Senate has been called the rich man's court, and I think it is a great pity there should be any reason existing why it should be so called. Why should a man who happens to be the possessor of wealth be able to apply for and receive relief at the hands of this committee, while a poor man, because he happens to be a poor man, is debarred. It has been abundantly proved to the satisfaction of the committee to whom you have intrusted this matter that this poor woman was in a position in which she could not otherwise obtain relief, and whilst admitting the force of all that has been stated about it being a bad precedent I still think in this case the request should be granted.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division :

THE FALDING DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce re (Bill C) "An Act for the relief of Mary Bradshaw Falding."

The motion was agreed to, on a division.

THE COLTON DIVORCE BILL.

REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the eleventh report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in the matter of William Wallace Colton Relief Bill.

The motion was agreed to, on a division.

Hon. Mr. MCKAY—We have adopted the report of the committee in one case where the evidence is not before the House at all, and we have not read it. It must have been passed under a misapprehension. This is the first case on record where a bill has passed the House without the evidence being before us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—-I think the wisest course to pursue now is that the hon. gentleman shall not move the third reading until the evidence has been distributed.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The last report of the committee is merely a report calling upon the petitioner to find means for the defence and to provide counsel, and the other was a report on the merits of the bill, in which they approve of the bill and ask for its adoption. That was carried, but certainly the evidence has not been printed and circulated.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—It will be printed and circulated before the third reading.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But we have adopted the report.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resumed in committee of the whole consideration of Bill (G) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the committee rose it was engaged in considering the first clause. The bill had been amended by the hon. the first minister, and I think I had suggested that it might be still further amended. In the course of my observations I stated that the policy of parliament had been to keep those reserves strictly for the use of the Indian tribes who lived on them. There appeared to be some doubt about that. With the permission of the committee I shall call attention to certain provisions of the Indian Act which seem to bear out the view I expressed; and those provisions bear on the propriety of the alteration of the law which is to be made by this amendment. Section 18 of the Indian Act says:

The conferring of any such location title shall not have the effect of rendering the land covered thereby subject to seizure under legal process, and such title shall be transferable only to an Indian of the same band, and then only with the consent and approval of the superintendent general whose consent and approval shall be given only by the issue of a ticket in the manner prescribed in the next preceding section.

Now, hon. gentlemen, that section of the Indian Act certainly lays down directly and positively that no one shall own lands on the reserve and have a location title who is not a member of the band on the reserve, and there is very nearly the same objection to leasing the land to an outsider that there is to giving an outsider a location title. Section 21 of the Indian Act is as follows:—

No person or Indian other than an Indian of the band shall settle, reside, hunt upon or occupy or use any land, or shall settle, &c., on any road running through the reserve, and all mortgages given and consented to by any Indian and all leases—

I call the attention of the Minister particularly to this:

And all leases, contracts and agreements made or purporting to be made by an Indian whereby persons or Indians other than Indians of the band are permitted to reside or hunt upon such reserve shall be void."

Then section 22 contains a like provision, providing for the removal of any person which goes on the reserve who should not be there:—"If any persons or Indian other than an Indian of the band settles, &c.," and section 92 implies the same policy. It is pretty clear that it has been the policy of parliament that persons other than Indians of the band should not reside on those reserves. However, I do not propose to move an amendment to that; but I propose to move an amendment, which I think ought to commend itself to the good judgment of the Committee, to the effect that the portion reserved shall not be leased for the benefit of any Indian or for his alleged benefit without his consent. I think that is not too much to ask. The probabilities are that in most cases the consent of the Indian would be obtained. I propose this amendment which I presume the First Minister will have no objection to accepting. After the word "Indian" insert at the end of the third line from the end of the clause, "with the consent of such Indian, his guardian or other legal representative."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Indians have no idea of business whatever. To give a consent of that kind they could not judge whether it was for their benefit or not, and therefore it must be left entirely to the Indian superintendents in different parts of the country. In Victoria we have one of the most valuable reserves of its size in the whole country. It is worth about $300,000. There has never been any complaint of injustice in connection with that reserve. What was applicable eight years ago may not be applicable to-day, because Indians die and changes take place, and it may be found more advantageous to let the lands and give the Indians the revenue derived from them. I daresay many of the reserves are too large. The Indians are poor tillers of the soil, and they would get much more benefit by having the land leased to white men than by holding them themselves. What was applicable ten years ago may not be applicable to-day.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think it would be much better to leave the matter as it is in the old Act.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The Indians being wards and under the care and the protection of the Superintendent General, it is just as safe to leave him the discretion whether this Act should be done for the benefit of the Indian.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—While I commend the hon. gentleman from Halifax for taking the precaution of bringing this point before the House, his amendment should conceive also the idea of forbidding Indians from alienating their lands. If the hon. gentleman's amendment is intended to forbid the Government from letting the land go unless the Indian consents it should also provide that the Indian cannot alienate his property and fall a prey to the white speculator without the consent of the Government. As the Indians have always been regarded as the wards of the Government, it is desirable that they should continue to be so regarded.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A moment's reflection will show that the amendment proposed by the hon. member from Halifax would be more injurious to the Indians than to their advantage. At first blush when the suggestion was made I thought there could be no possible objection to it, but there are many cases where those lands have to be leased for the benefit of infants and orphans. It must be understood that this clause applies to only individual holdings. It does not apply to the property of the band generally. No property of the band is leased or disposed of in any way without the consent of the band, not even a single dollar, because there are cases which are constantly coming before the Government in Council for authority and power to appropriate in some cases $25, in others, $100 or $200, for the purpose of improving the land in the way of fencing or the construction of roadways, but even that is never done without a resolution having been passed first by the band asking that this sum be appropriated and expended, and then the Superintendent General comes to the Council and gets an order in council which is sanctioned by the Governor General before that can be expended. In addition to the infants, there are Indians of unsound mind who have holdings, and they are leased for the benefit of the family. If the restriction which is suggested by the hon. member from Halifax were adopted there would be no power in the hands of the government to lease these lands for the benefit of the widow and children. If there should be an amendment of that kind it would have to exempt the cases to which I have called the attention of the House. Otherwise these lands would either lie waste, or some person in the band would take possession of them without paying any rent. In this case there never has been, so far as I can learn by inquiry at the department, any abuse arising under it. This is in favour of the families of Indians of unsound mind, or of infants and widows and orphans, and also cases such as I have referred to, particularly in the locality and county in which I have been living nearly all my life, in which there are educated men who are members of the band. They have their individual holdings, but their time is spent away from the reserve at other vocations. There are a number of young men in that band who have received a liberal education and they occupy their time away from the reserve. The only change in this law from the law as it stands on the statute-book is to give the Superintendent General, with the surrounding checks to which I have called attention, the power to lease for the benefit of the Indian having an individual holding, and who does not desire to live upon his land, and also for the benefit of widows, sick, infirm and aged Indians. If there had been a case of hardship arising out of this, or had the power which is vested in the Superintendent General in the past—that means the head of the department here and not the agent living upon the reserve—been abused I would be quite willing to have it surrounded by all the checks desired. The hon. gentleman speaks of the guardians of minor Indians—who are the guardians? I have never heard of any guardians of infant or insane Indians. They are the wards of the country and I have never yet known a Superintendent-General in Canada to abuse the power which has been vested in him in dealing with these Indians. In fact, my great difficulty has been in the past, when a member of the House of Commons in trying to get what I believed to be the rights of the settlers on Indian lands, recognized by the department. There is always great sympathy with the Indians. It has been expressed here more than once, more particularly by my hon. friend from Victoria and others who have had anything to do with the Indians. Their sympathy is always with the aborigines of this country and against any interference with their rights and privileges. I think, after this explanation, my hon. friend will see that his amendment would be altogether unnecessary. If the House thinks an amendment is necessary one will have to draw making the exceptions to which I have called attention—that is to leave the power in the hands of the Superintendent General to lease these individual holdings for the benefit of widows and orphans and Indians of unsound mind, and those who are too aged to work on their lands, and there are many of them, and also to allow the Indian who belongs to a tribe and has rights in the land but does not desire to cultivate the soil to have the land leased for his individual benefit. The experience on the reserve near where I have been is that it is best to allow the whites to settle upon these lands and pay the rent. As a rule they are the best farmers among them. The Indians who do live upon the farms emulate not only the industry but the improvements made upon the lands by the whites. I hope the hon. gentleman from Halifax will, after this explanation, see that there is no necessity whatever for the amendment which he has suggested. My attention has been called to the fear that exists that any power of this kind should be vested in the Indian agent particularly in the west, where there is a speculative character amongst them, and that they might make recommendations which would be to the disadvantage and injury of the tribe, but in no case can land be leased which belongs to a reserve without the consent of the band.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—When I first read that section I considered it very objectionable and I am sorry to say that I am still of that opinion. I cannot see that we should adopt the principle of giving an unqualified power to the superintendent-general to lease those lands. It means that they have the right to dispossess the Indians without their consent. It is true the law says that that power is to be exercised by the superintendent general, but as a matter of fact it will be the local agent who will decide upon the whole thing. He will make a report to the higher officer, and that higher officer will make a report to the superintendent general, and the order in council will be passed on that. From the experience that we have had in the west I am afraid it will open the door to abuses, and it would be much better, it seems to me, to adopt some limitation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think there is the objection to this amendment which has been suggested by the leader of the government. Those intelligent Indians at Deseronto, of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken, would have no difficulty whatever in giving consent to the leasing of their lands. There is no difficulty whatever in their cases, and, further, there is not nearly as much danger of abuse of this power in places which are near at hand—which are under the eyes of the government and members of parliament. The danger is in more remote places, where the leases would necessarily be made on the recommendation of the local agent. The first minister has objected to the wording of the amendment. It is possible that the wording is not just what it should be. If the hon. gentleman will turn to section 20 of the Indian Act he will find who the legal representatives of the Indians are. An Indian under this section has the power to devise his land. In case he dies intestate, the widow takes one-third of the land; and, if he has no children, she takes more. The superintendent general is, in cases where there is no provision in the law—in most cases there is no provision made—the guardian of the Indian. I see no objection to this amendment at all. Where an Indian is intelligent enough to know what his rights are, he is intelligent enough to give his consent. If incapable of giving his consent he must have some legal representative, and that is what the amendment says.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the hon. gentleman has met the objections which I took to his amendment. Supposing an Indian is a worthless man. Supposing he leaves his family and goes away and refuses to work his land, where is the power to appoint guardians and who shall say that the land shall be leased unless the power is given to the superintendent general? I am dealing with cases where the Indians are more civilized than those to whom the hon. gentleman refers. I can appreciate very well the fears he has that in the west where they are not so advanced in civilization abuses may occur. If any injury could be pointed out that had arisen under this power to the Indians, there would be a good deal of force in what he says, but the reports of the local agents are all very closely scrutinized before they are acted upon and much more so when the report is from a part of the country remote from headquarters and where there might be a suspcion of an attempt to take advantage of the credulity, or want of knowledge, or uncivilized state of the Indians. My hon. friend from St. Boniface will understand that I am speaking more from my knowledge of the working of the Indian Act in the old provinces. I have not as much knowledge of the habits of the Indians in the Northwest as his long residence in that country would give him. Still I am quite certain that it would never do to hamper this clause in the manner suggested by the hon. gentleman from Halifax.

The amendment was declared lost on a division, and the clause was adopted.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would this clause cover the case in connection with the Songhees reserve of which I spoke yesterday?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This does not make any provision to meet the case suggested by the hon. gentleman from Victoria. The only way that you could obtain any of the money which stands to the credit of the band would be with the consent of the band, and if the band consented to make an appropriation of the surplus funds to their credit, it could be applied for the widow and the children of the deceased Indian, but not otherwise. Whether application was made in that case or not I do not know.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Premier will see that it is almost an impossible thing to get a consent of that kind owing to jealousies and local feelings among the Indians, and I think it would be well if the Premier would say what could be done in the matter before the third reading, because there are often destitute Indians and they have no means of getting any of their own money. There should be some way whereby, if the superintendent of Indian affairs was satisfied they were really deserving objects, they could get relief, because it is their own money, and it has never been touched in any way to relieve these Indians and their old men and women who cannot work. Their own money is in the bank and they know it, and they regard it as a continual grievance and hardship.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The remarks of the hon. gentleman show conclusively the absolute necessity of placing more power in the hands of the Superintendent General. Here is a case in which the chief of a band dies without property of any kind; his widow and children are left paupers upon the country; she has to sell her cow and every little chattel in order to raise money to bury her husband, and there is no power in the hands of the government or the Superintendent General to take from the fund, amounting to some ten or twelve thousand dollars which stands to their credit in the bank, one single cent in order to assist that poor woman.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the case.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Now if you hamper the bill in the way that has been suggested, you deprive the Superintendent-General of the power of exercising the necessary authority in the case to which my hon. friend refers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If it were necessary to have the consent of the band of Indians to get any money for anybody, you would never get it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have made a note of the case and I will call attention to it and it will be considered.

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. POWER—As a matter of information I should like to understand the exact meaning of sub-clause 2. What particular value is there in the title of life chief, if he can exercise no powers? I am simply asking for information. I do not exactly understand the object of continuing life chiefs if they have no powers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is retained in order to satisfy the vanity, if you like, of the old men who have ceased to be active chiefs in the band. They like to retain the honor, and they like to continue it until removed for some immoral or bad conduct.

The clause was adopted.

On clause 6,

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hon. gentlemen will observe in reading this clause it provides for all these dances, orgies and festivals. I remember a remark made when we were discussing this at the second reading that there was no use in having clauses in the bill which in many cases could not be carried out. I have no doubt that in the more remote districts of British Columbia and the North-west it would be some years before we could completely eradicate these abuses, but in the more settled portions of the North-west they have already put a stop to them, and are enforcing the law gradually and as fast as they possibly can, and it is well to have it upon the statute-book in order, where it is possible, to put a stop to the immoralities that exist in the carrying on in many cases of these Indian festivals; but if you read it carefully you will see that the proviso at the bottom says:

Always provided that the foregoing shall not apply to any agricultural show or exhibition at which prizes are given to the best exhibits thereat.

Now if this clause remains as it is, it will permit all these iniquities we are trying to prevent being performed at an agricultural show. The reason for making an exception of agricultural fairs was that it was thought that if the clause was passed without a proviso, it might prevent the giving of prizes at these exhibitions where the Indians compete, as they do in the North-west, for prizes. I move that the proviso be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the holding of any agricultural show or the giving of prizes for exhibits thereat."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the Premier will find wherever this custom has been stopped it has been done by missionaries and by Christian influences, and that is the only way it can be broken up. They used to have numerous orgies out there and eat dead dogs and so on, and Mr. Duncan broke the custom down in the north, and imprisoned the chiefs to stop this. That, together with his teaching, broke the custom down. There is no harm in this clause being passed. Of course it will be a dead letter to a great extent. In Victoria there was a large feast under the eyes of the police a few days ago. The old Act gave sufficient power to deal with this, and the Indian superintendent was there at the very door to stop it, and this was going on for four or five days, celebrating the Queen's birthday in proper style. It was very orderly and there was no drunkenness, but it was done under the eye of the police. Those Indians consume a lot of goods of all kinds at those fairs. They buy biscuits and blankets and goods of other kinds, and if that were stopped it would be a restraint of trade; and I suppose the police have some sympathy with the traders. In cases of that kind perhaps 2,000 or 3,000 Indians come in and buy a great quantity of goods and carry it away perhaps to the United States shores, and smuggle them in, and in that way it helps the trade of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope that that does not meet the approval of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh, yes, it does; I think it is quite legitimate for them: they do not know what the law is. However, this can never be stopped by the police, in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I regret that I have not been able to read that bill, but I hope it does not interfere with any of the old customs of the Indians, however barbarous they may be.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, that is just what it does.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We must consider what took place in the mutiny in India because the cartridges were greased with hog's lard. Thousands of lives were lost by the uprising of the natives in consequence of it, and atrocities were committed on both sides, some of which we are ashamed of now. My hon. friend from Vancouver says this bill will never be acted on after it is passed. Perhaps no legislature in British Columbia will carry it out; but suppose some Englishman comes out and he does not know anything about the customs of the natives; he reads the law and sees that these things should not take place. There may be insurrections occurring in consequence among the Indians, and war may take place and many lives may be lost and the Indians may be lost. If the Indians wish to take up dead bodies and like to eat them, all right, so long as they don't ask me to dine with them. I said to a gentleman once, "Friend, I saw you eating grouse all over maggots, and you say that is the proper 'way that it should be eaten.'" "Yes, it is the way grouse should be eaten," was the reply. I think that we should leave these things to men's tastes, and they will cure themselves.

The clause was agreed to on a division.

On the 7th clause, subsection 2,

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is provided that in the North-west Territories and the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia every Indian agent shall for the purposes mentioned with respect to the Criminal Code be ex officio a justice of the peace. The province of Manitoba has been pretty well organized, and that province, I should think, ought to be exempted from the operation of this provision.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There are certain parts of Manitoba, in the north and east, which are very remote.

The subsection was adopted.

On the 8th clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause gives a very sweeping power indeed to the Governor in Council. The objections to any such power as that being given to the administration of the day, or to their local officers, must be apparent. There may be cases, however, where it is desirable that the amounts of the purchase money or of the rents might be reduced, and I suggest that the clause be amended by adding a subsection to provide that every year a return of such reductions shall be submitted to Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the suggestion is a very good one. It might have a deterrent effect upon the abuse of the power given under this clause to the government of the day. As I explained at the second reading of the bill, the reason why this clause is inserted is that in the early seventies lands were purchased at excessive rates, and it has been found necessary to make reductions. A large reduction was made in 1875 of the prices at which these lands were sold, but of late when it was proposed to carry out the same system which has been in vogue for the last twenty years, the Minister of Justice reported that he thought there was no power vested in the Superintendent General or the government to make these reductions, and hence it was deemed necessary to take the power and legalize what has been done. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Senate then adjourned.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Pursuant to the notice on the paper, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to the large number of vacancies now and for some time past existing in the Senate, and to ask the Government why such vacancies have been allowed to remain so long unfilled?

I do not now intend to offer more than a few remarks to the House in relation to this inquiry, because I will probably have another opportunity of speaking on the subject. It is my intention, unless the answer I shall receive to my question is satisfactory, to take the sense of the House on a future day by a formal resolution declaring the unconstitutionality of allowing vacancies to exist in this branch of Parliament from session to session, as has been the practice of late years. I do not bring this matter forward with the desire of making an attack on the Government of my hon. friend who now leads this House, because I frankly admit the existing state of affairs, with one exception, is an inheritance from his predecessors. The vacancy made by the lamented demise of the late Senator Tassé is the only one that has been created since the present Government assumed office.

I think, however, the time has arrived when it behooves some member of this body to break the silence that has so long been allowed to prevail in reference to the subject of my inquiry. There are at present no less than ten vacancies in this Senate, namely: two in Ontario; four in Quebec; one in Nova Scotia; and three in New Brunswick. Some of these vacancies have existed for years, notwithstanding that the constitution guarantees to every one of these provinces a specified representation in this branch of Parliament, as clearly as it provides for representation in the House of Commons. Section twenty-two of the British North America Act, 1867, is familiar to every hon. gentleman who occupies a seat in this Senate, but I may nevertheless be permitted to quote it:

22. In relation to the constitution of the Senate Canada shall be deemed to consist of three divisions:—

1. Ontario,
2. Quebec,
3. The Maritime Provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which three divisions shall (subject to the provisions of this Act) be equally represented in the Senate as follows:—Ontario by twenty-four Senators; Quebec by twenty-four Senators; and the Maritime Provinces by twenty-four Senators, twelve thereof representing Nova Scotia, and twelve thereof representing New Brunswick.

These provisions so far as they relate to the Maritime Provinces are modified by clause 147 of the Act providing for the admission of Prince Edward Island into the union, on which event Nova Scotia and New Brunswick gave up two senators each to that colony.

It is the undoubted right of these provinces, under this section of our constitutional charter, to have at all times the representation in this body therein specified. The present state of things can only exist in defiance of the law and the constitution. I repeat it is the unquestioned constitutional right of every section of the Dominion to have at all times in both branches of the federal parliament the full representation accorded to it by the Act of confederation. I contend it is as great a violation of the letter and spirit of the constitution to leave vacancies in the Senate, session after session, as it would be to permit seats to remain vacant in the House of Commons during a session of parliament. The law creating the two bodies—the British North America Act—the charter of our rights, powers, and privileges—is as clear and emphatic on this point in relation to the Senate, as it is in relation to the House of Commons. There is no distinction made in this respect between the two Houses in our written constitution, and no language can be more clear than the thirty second section of the Act in regard to vacancies in this body; which I beg leave to cite:

32. When a vacancy happens in the Senate by resignation, death or otherwise, the Governor General shall, by summons to a fit and proper person, fill the vacancy.

This clause does not certainly bear out the extraordinary doctrine started in another place that vacancies in the Senate are to be filled at the convenience of the government. I have little doubt that if an address were presented to the Governor General calling His Excellency's attention to the subject of this inquiry, and to the above clause in the British North America Act, the result would not be in harmony with the language to which I have referred. I think it would be found that the existence in its integrity of the highest deliberative body known to the constitution, was not, after all, so insignificant a thing as to be at the whim or convenience of any minister or government.

I will not enter on any discussion to-day with regard to the special interest the smaller provinces of the Dominion have in seeing that this Senate shall continue to exist with all the rights powers and privileges which it was intended to possess by the framers of the British North America Act—but above all that it should exist in its integrity and completeness, apart from the convenience of any government. It is well known that when, at the union, the principle of representation by population in the lower House was conceded to the larger provinces, a larger representation than our numbers justified was given to the smaller provinces in this Senate as a balancing wheel in the working of our governmental system. It was contended that in this House the smaller provinces would always be strong enough to protect themselves. But if vacancies can be allowed to exist for years to suit the convenience of any government, how easy might it not be to completely destroy this safeguard and protection? At the present time one-fifth of the representation of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in this Senate is vacant, and has been so for several years. If four seats can legally be kept thus vacant, why not a dozen seats, or for that matter the whole representation of these provinces?

Neither do I intend to-day to discuss the question as to how far the keeping open of vacancies in the Senate may be improperly used to control action elsewhere, because I would not think of imputing anything of that kind to the hon. gentleman now at the head of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot say that I regret that the hon. senator from Richmond has brought this question before the notice of Parliament. I am thankful to him for the introductory remarks in which he says that whatever wrong may have been committed has been inherited by myself. I will say further that I agree to a very great extent in every point which the hon. gentleman has made, and it shall be my endeavour at the earliest possible moment to have the vacancies which now exist in the Senate filled. Beyond that, I do not know that I have anything to say. To attempt to combat the hon. gentleman's arguments from a constitutional standpoint would be futile, and it is much better that I should honestly acknowledge it. Before I occupied the important position that I fill now, I impressed earnestly upon those who had the responsibility of filling these positions that they should fill every vacancy promptly, and I can assure my hon. friend, and also the Senate, that I shall endeavour to have this cause of complaint—this grievance, if it may be so termed—removed at the earliest possible day. I am gratified to know, however, and I think my hon. friend will admit it, that nothing has occurred to lead the representatives of the Maritime Provinces to the conclusion that their rights have been in any way jeopardized, or interfered with, by the majorities from the other provinces, although I equally admit that that is no answer to the argument of my hon. friend that such might occur under circumstances where they were not represented to the fullest extent. We will endeavour, as far as possible, to prevent the opportunity of any injustice occurring in the future.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of all memorials, petitions, representations and correspondence addressed to the Government by the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, or by any other corporation or individuals, concerning the finances of the said corporation, the cost of works in progress or proposed for the enlargement of the harbour of Montreal, as well as of the modifications suggested in the said works ;

Also, a copy of all memorials, plans, reports, petitions and correspondence relating to the construction of an inland basin and a dry dock in the eastern part of the harbour of Montreal ;

Also, a copy of all resolutions on this subject passed by the Montreal Harbour Commissioners ;

Also, a copy of the Order in Council appointing a commission of engineers to inquire into the nature and cost of the works now being executed in the harbour of Montreal, together with a copy of the instructions given by the Government to this commission ;

Also, a copy of all evidence, or summary of evidence, given in the course of the inquiry held by the said commission ;

Also, a copy of the report of the said commission, and of any special report by any of its members, and of all plans and statements of cost accompanying such reports.

He said :—It is not my intention to make any remarks further than to call attention of the government to this subject in view of the fact that, if we are well informed, the harbour commissioners of Montreal have petitioned the government for aid, either in the form of a subsidy or of a guarantee which will help the commissioners in completing the works actually in progress in the harbour. The government is aware, very likely, that upon those works and the system under which they are carried on there is a great diversity of opinion. For a long time the aim of the commissioners seems to have been to bring into the smallest possible area the largest number of ships, so as to place them in front of some of the offices in Montreal, leaving the question of the access of the ships and steamers to the harbour to be dealt with by the railway companies or others interested in transportation. It is not the first time that this matter has been brought before the public. For the last 40 years there has been a conflict of opinion about the way the harbour was being extended, or supposed to be improved, and the result proves after all that those who objected to the policy pursued by the commissioners were not altogether wrong. It is well known that while the government has been spending large amounts of money to perfect the system of communication between the west and the east, and to make Montreal a great national harbour, and while it is admitted that our system of canals is vastly superior to that of the United States, and that the deepening of the channel of the St. Lawrence and placing buoys, beacons and lights, from the port of Montreal to the extreme east of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, making it the best and safest route to the most inland port of this continent on the Atlantic sea board, yet, with all this, we find that most of the western traffic still continues to go to the United States seaports, and why? The great reason, so far as we can understand it, is this: that shippers are handicapped at Montreal, that when the traffic has reached that port, either coming from the ocean or going from the west, the facilities there are so far lacking that in order to avoid the cost and the inconvenience which the traffic meets with there, they prefer to go by the United States ports and there have the goods distributed through the western part of the country. The subject is very important, and it is quite in order to raise the question when that commission, after such results, comes to the government for help to continue a scheme which has evidently been a failure. The great error seems to be this: they have followed the tradition of the first engineers, who expressed the opinion that there would never be any possibility of railways competing with canals for the carrying of heavy freight, such as grain, lumber, or anything of that kind, and the great efforts of the commissioners have been to bring the harbour of Montreal into as close communication as possible with the Lachine Canal, without regard to the means of reaching the harbour by rail. Before that commission goes any further with those works, which are in the most contracted part of the city, the government, which is so much interested in solving that problem of the national port, should interfere and say if we must keep in the old rut, or, taking a broader view of the subject, see if easier access for the railways to the harbour of Montreal cannot be provided than that which we have been able to obtain so far. It is very well known that the traffic from the west destined for shipment by steamer is blocked for the greater part of the day. It is only between the hours of 7 o'clock in the evening and 6 in the morning that cattle can be transferred from the cars to the steamers, owing to the congested condition of the place the whole day long. Trains of freight coming from the west are always exposed to being delayed twelve hours before they can reach the steamers, because the commissioners have always stuck to the idea that the steamers must be in sight of the officers of the shipping agents, so that the shipping agents may be able at all times to go down if they choose to the ship in smoking cap and slippers. The natural harbour of Montreal is between two and three miles down. It has always been admitted to be the best harbour for ocean steamers, and yet should the idea of the engineers of twenty-five or thirty years ago, that the agents or shippers would find it inconvenient to have to go two miles to do business be still adhered to? Can we find any other ports where such ideas would not now be laughed at? With the easy communication we have by telephone and electric cars there is no reason why we should adhere to the old idea of contracting the interests of the harbour into such a narrow area as that which we see now in front of Montreal. I hope to find in the report of the commission of engineers lately appointed that more modern ideas prevail on that question—that the rules of commerce which applied thirty or forty years ago are no longer to govern the commissioners. It is very important that those documents, which I am asking for should be brought down before Parliament is called upon to vote for any appropriation to help the commissioners to continue in the same line that they have followed in the past, or to authorize the guarantee of the county to procure a loan for the same object.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
There can be no possible objection to bringing down all the papers in the possession of the government referring to the important harbour of Montreal. Everyone must recognize the force of the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Hochelaga. The trade of the St. Lawrence has increased rapidly from year to year, and the western portion of the harbour has become altogether too limited for the requirements of the port, and more particularly for the requirements of trade which is flowing eastward. Anything that can be possibly done to increase the facilities for shipping at the lower ports in order to prevent our trade from gradually drifting to the southward, should be done by the city and its inhabitants, aided to the utmost possible extent by the Dominion. The harbour of Montreal is really as much a Dominion as it is a local work and I can only hope that the time is not far distant when the facilities which should exist, and which can be provided by going a little eastward, will be furnished for the increasing trade. A distance of two miles does not amount to anything in these days. With the telephone and the electric car a few miles is of very little consequence. It struck me that if two or three miles is an objection to business men in Montreal, who have to send their officials to the ship, the merchants of London and other great cities would be in a very bad position. Many business men in London live eight and ten miles from the harbour and the objection to a distance of two or three miles in Montreal, if it has been an objection in the past, must now vanish. I will see that the papers are brought down at the earliest possible moment.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day being called third reading Bill (G) "An Act further to amend the Indian Act,"

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: I notice some errors in the bill which I wish to correct, and I therefore move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

In the Committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I promised the hon. gentleman from Victoria to make inquiry about the case on the Songhees reserve, to which he referred at the second reading of the bill. I have the following information:—The agent, Mr. Lomas, has discretionary power to supply assistance from the vote for relief where absolutely necessary to relieve sickness and destitution; out of this there is still about $1,200 still unexpended. The Indians (Songhees) have about $2,000 of interest at the credit of their trust account, and have made requisition on the department for expenditure of a portion of the amount to assist some of the poor people on the reserve, one of them is Mrs. Freeze. The agent has been authorized to expend $50 for this purpose, pending a more detailed report from him as to the circumstances, &c., of the persons whom it is desired to assist.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The reply is entirely satisfactory, and I have to thank the hon. gentleman for the information.

Hon. Mr. MacINNIS (Burlington), from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE JAMES MACLAREN COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (29) "An Act to incorporate the James Maclaren Company (Limited)" with amendments. He said: The bill is for the incorporation of the Maclaren Company, and it comes from the House of Commons. It gives power to the company to do a great variety of things, to carry on the manufacture of timber and lumber in all its branches also pulp wood, bricks, terra-cotta, build docks, vessels, &c., and is precisely similar to bills which have been passed here from time to time; for instance, it is very similar to the Rathbun Company's bill passed a few years ago. Amongst other things, it takes power to acquire patents and patent privileges for the production and proper working and disposing of electricity, and also to construct dams, piers, bulk heads, &c., electric hydraulic power, manufacturing light or heat, or for any other purposes. In similar bills incorporating companies for the production, working, or disposal of electricity, electrical or hydraulic power, there are subsections prescribing certain rules or conditions with respect to the exercise of these powers, such as the height of wires and the kind of poles to be used, and various other provisions of this kind. The committee deem it right that those sub-sections should be introduced into this bill, as evidently they have been omitted by oversight from the clause relating to the exercise of those powers. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill to move that the amendments which are very long, extending from a to m be taken into consideration to-morrow. They will be printed in the Minutes, and hon. members will all have an opportunity of reading them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—In the absence of the hon. member from Perth, I move that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (33) "An Act to amend the Act to grant certain powers to the Sable and Spanish Timber and Slide Company of Algoma, Limited."—(Mr. McCallum.)

CUSTOMS SEIZURE AT MONTREAL.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is not my intention to make any remark at present on the question which I am about to put. If the Premier will allow me, I will put them seriatim and then if the answers are satisfactory I shall have nothing further to say.

If they are unsatisfactory I shall have more remarks to make. The first question is:

At what date certain books or pamphlets bearing among other titles the following: "For Sleepy Americans, a literal translation from Liquori's Theology, or Questions put daily by the Romish priests to women in the Confessional," were entered at the custom house at Montreal?

I may say that the book which the hon. Premier spoke to me about on a former occasion, and which bears the title "Fruits of the Confessional Box," is the book referred to in my questions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The officials in the Customs Department have been unable to find the papers relating to the book entitled "Fruits of the Confessional," which appear to have been mislaid, as well as some others, and cannot be found since the Watters investigation. The Customs records do not show that any book of the name referred to has been confiscated or detained. A book entitled "Fruits of the Confessional," which may be the one referred to, cannot be identified with the title quoted in query No. 1, either by the records in the department, or by reference to Montreal, where inquiry has been made of the seizing officer.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The second question is:

2. Whether these books were not confiscated by the officer at the head of the customs at Montreal as being of too immoral and too indecent a character for circulation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The books were detained by the customs at Montreal and the detention reported to the department.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The third question is:

If so, at what date and by what officer?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They were detained on the 3rd of May, 1894 by Mr. Appraiser Ambrose.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The fourth question is:

To whom were these books consigned?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The books in question were consigned to Mr. Norman Murray.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The fifth and sixth questions are

5. Whether the consignee or importer has been prosecuted according to law?
6. If so, at what date? If not, why the law has not been put in operation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know, I am under the impression the consignee was not prosecuted; the late acting commissioner reported having obtained a legal opinion to the effect that the books should be released, and made his report in these terms, under provisions of section 179 of the Customs Act, which report was adopted by the controller.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—What is the opinion that was given by the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This opinion must have been obtained from the Minister of Justice. We never apply to outside lawyers except on special occasions. The answer put in my hands is that the acting commissioner (that is Mr. Watters) made a report upon the legal opinion which he had received, was to the effect that the books should be released, and made his report on those terms under the provision of section 179 of the Customs Act.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I cannot accept those answers as leading me to believe that the Controller of Customs has done his duty. While I admit frankly that the different answers given by the hon. premier fully agree with the information that I have, I regret that I am obliged to take exception to the reason given for the course followed by the Controller of Customs. It is unfair to compare, as lawyers have done, the St. Liguori theology with the dirty book which is the subject of my question. Indeed, it is offensive to all ideas of propriety and tends to confuse the public conception of right and wrong. St. Liguori's moral theology, to which reference is made, is a work which defines the duties and establishes the obligations of every individual towards God, and his neighbour and himself, and is founded upon divine law. Now is not a book of that character a most precious and valuable work? The objection may be raised, but are there not in this book some pages which are immoral and indecent? My answer is yes; there are in this precious book, divided as it is into a good many volumes, some very few pages indeed which are certainly not decent, just as there are such passages in our voluminous criminal codes and medical works, and even in our statutes, and especially in commentaries on them, There are certain parts which certainly are not decent, but this cannot be avoided—it is the natural and inevitable consequences of the fall of our first parents. From that sad event all kinds of misery have become the lot of mankind. Men have ever since had a tendency to do wrong. They became so corrupt that God had to give them his commandments, and neither religious nor civil society can be indifferent to the enforcement of those divine laws. Society, religious and civil, had to deal with them each in its own way, to force men to obey the great precepts of their Maker. God having prohibited, by two of the commandments in the decalogue, all forms of lust, religious society by the church, through her theologians, had to interpret those commandments and explain their meaning in order that her ministers, to whom power had been given to forgive or to refuse to forgive, might faithfully perform so important a duty as enforcing the observance of those laws within the limits of her jurisdiction, which is spiritual. So, also, had civil society, by her legislators and her jurists, to make laws and interpret them within the limits of her jurisdiction and in obedience to the divine command. Neither religious nor civil society could have accomplished that end without using the language which they have employed and which certainly is not, and cannot be, more decent than the subject with which they deal. But such a use of the language could not have caused inconvenience nor could it have been circulated to such an extent as to warrant an objection being made to the importation of the books which contained it. No one can deny that a vast number of offences and crimes would be committed daily if such rules and laws, religious and civil, had not been framed and enforced. It is obvious that those books, whether they be medical, legal or ecclesiastical, being generally voluminous and expensive, are not popular works, and consequently cannot have done mischief. As a rule, they are never bought except by those whose profession renders the use of them necessary. Some ignorant people may say, "Is it not a disgrace that priests should put such questions to women in the confessional?" I answer, have not the ministers of the church of Christ been established as spiritual judges? Do we not read in St. Matthew, "I will give to thee the keys of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind in earth, it shall be bound also in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven." In conformity with this order of Christ to his apostles, they and their successors have heard confessions. The confessor must know the different circumstances of the offence in order to decide what shall be done, and he must ascertain whether the offence was of a serious or of a light character, and deal with the case according to the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Looking at the notice which the hon. gentleman has put on the paper, I see that he refers to books with English titles. As I understand, the title is either as it is given in the notice placed on the paper by the hon. gentleman, or it is "The Fruits of the Confessional." The remarks of the hon. gentleman are now directed to an explanation of the things which may be found in books written in Latin. St. Liguori's theology has not been translated into English; and I really do not see the appropriateness of this speech. If the hon. gentleman means that what may be truly said of a work written in Latin only for students is also true of a book written in English, apparently for the purpose of casting reflections upon St. Liguori's church, I am puzzled to understand him.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—As I said at the very beginning, my question is there. I did not know under what title it had been given. It has three or four titles. And I answer to the hon. gentleman that it is the same book that I have asked the question about, so that I am dealing with the case as it stands there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The book of which the hon. gentleman is speaking is not either of these books. The hon. gentleman is telling us something of the things which are contained in the course of theology written by St. Liguori. What has that to do with this book published in English and dealing only with a certain small portion of the subject?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Has not the hon. gentleman read in my questions that the writer of the obscene book describes it "A translation from Liguori's Theology." I have, therefore, to establish that while the works of St. Liguori may be sent abroad and received by the Comptroller of Customs, the French version given by laymen ought not to be received, and to make my argument I have to say what the first book is and what the second book.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the House would be willing to accept the hon. gentleman's statement without any elaborate argument. It does not appear to me that this is the place for a theological discussion.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am surprised at the hon. gentleman, because he was the last man in the House from whom I should have heard an objection, belonging, as he does, to the same church as I do. If I would attain the end I desire he should not object.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not finding fault with the hon. gentleman's theology; but I doubt whether this is the time and place to give it to us.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The hon. gentleman is only trying to persuade the House to prevent me from going on but let me tell him that he cannot succeed. I thoroughly understand what the rules of Parliament permit me to do and say, and I intend to proceed with my remarks. I was remarking that the confessor must know the circumstances of each case, just as our civil tribunals must know the facts before giving judgment. Hon. gentlemen know how indecent the details of criminal cases sometimes are—they are shocking; nevertheless, in the public interest, the evidence must be taken, and in open court. The confessional, however is secret, and those details are not made public. Does that make the system less moral, or more objectionable? Are not medical men allowed constantly to take women into their offices and investigate cases by personal examination which could not be otherwise? Yet husbands and fathers consider such a thing proper and necessary: Why, then, should it be thought wrong to allow a priest to hear confessions and inquire into the details of offences on which he is required to pass judgment in order that he may relieve the consciences of penitents. The mere statement of the fact is sufficient to establish the propriety of the system to all who are not bigots or fanatics.

I now come to deal with the filthy book which has imposed upon me the duty of calling the attention of the House to the circumstances under which it has been imported into Canada by one of our citizens with the aid of the Comptroller of Customs. Even the cover of the book shows the spirit which prompted its publication. Besides a nasty engraving which appears on the cover, and an eye over which are the words "An eye observer," you find the following:—"The fruit of the Confessional Box" "By their fruits ye shall know them," "Son of man seest thou what they do in the dark," and some others, and on the back of this contemptible book is found the name of the writer, P. A. Seguin, ex-priest, with the following sentence "The tamer of the Romish beast," and some other sentences of the same character. I find in the dictionary the following definition of "hatred"—"it is a sentiment of aversion for a person or for an object which you consider is an obstacle to your happiness or which runs against your passions." If such is hatred when it enters the heart of a man towards his fellow men, what must it be when it finds its way into the heart of a son against his mother? What must it be when it enters into the heart of a man who, when taking holy orders, has solemnly and deliberately, before God and man, taken the vows which every priest has to take? What must it be when it has entered into the heart of a man, whose passions have forced him, it seems, to be untrue to such solemn engagements towards God? What is thought amongst laymen of one who has bound himself in honour to do a thing which he fails to do? Any charitable man, following his conscientious convictions in deserting the Church of Rome and joining another church, would certainly not have prepared and put into circulation such a pernicious book. Even in the pursuit of this bad object, prudence should have suggested to the writer the advisability of concealing his hatred for his mother church and his eager desire to create a scandal. Self interest should have dictated a different course from the one which he has pursued. On the cover of the book, as I have said, is an eye, over which appear the words "An eye observer." Anyone who reflects a little must know that confession, being most secret, no eye can observe what is done and no ear can hear what is said in the confessional except those of the priest and of the person who is making the confession. The only conclusion which one can come to is that the writer meant that he himself, having heard confessions, had been tempted to abuse the trust reposed in him, and finding that the sacred work was too great a strain upon his virtue, had to abandon it and leave the church, lest he should give way to his passions and do what he insinuates is done by other priests. Let me add, en passant, that he is not the only priest who has left the Church of Rome, and there is nothing extraordinary in the fact. It will occur from time to time, for is it not written in the holy book that scandals and abuses will come? But look at the list and point out the name of a single priest who has not given some good evidence of the passion under which he was forced to leave the church. Sometimes it is excessive love of money, as was the case with Judas; at other times it is love of liquor, as was the case, it seems, with the monk spoken of by the Ottawa Citizen of the 29th May last in the following words:—

An ex-monk of the Roman Catholic denomination who flung away his faith and became a Baptist minister, then fell into dissipation and evolted into a thief, was in the prisoner's dock (at Buffalo).

Sometimes it is excessive love of women, as is often shown by those ex-priests marrying after deserting their mother church. So it is with the other passions of which the heart of mankind is full, and which lead them into all kinds of humiliations and misfortunes if they are not subdued at the proper time. Do we not read in Scripture that St. Paul had to fight continually against himself, in order to release himself from the bondage of the body? I have mentioned these facts in the hope that hon. gentlemen will be led to sum up the number of priests that we have in Canada and the percentage of them that have fallen from one reason or another. I am convinced that if they investigate the subject they will admit that the number of those who have swerved from the path of duty is comparatively very small. The small proportion is all the more striking when we bear in mind the fact that even in the time of Christ there was one traitor among his disciples. That this pamphlet to which my questions relate has been circulated for the purpose of injuring the Church of Rome and creating scandal is very evident and so long as one copy of it is permitted to be circulated it will be a curse to many people, especially the youth of the country. But it cannot injure the church. No reasonable man will be deceived by such a book. As evidence of that fact I may mention that five weeks ago I knew nothing of this dirty book, but when this House adjourned on the 3rd of May and I was on my way home passing through Montreal on the 4th of May, I was met by a gentleman who, after exchanging some words, said: "Have you heard of a certain obscene book which our Controllor of Customs has allowed to be put in circulation?" I replied that I had not. We'ld said he "the facts are these: Some months ago a very bad and immoral pamphlet was confiscated at the customs house here in Montreal because of its indecent character, but your Controllor of Customs ordered the seizure to be released and the books to be delivered over to the consignee. Now I would rather lose $1,000 than see this book in the hands of my children, and, no doubt Mr. Wallace would not allow his children to see it, but his hatred for your church has no doubt suggested the course which he has followed." I have related the whole conversation because the gentleman to whom I refer is a Protestant in Montreal, a member of a rich wholesale firm doing business in that city. This same gentleman added: "Could you not do something in the matter and protect our youth?" I replied that I could, but that it was necessary that I should have more information and see the book to be certain of what I was about. "Very well," replied the gentleman, "I will give you the book and all the necessary information." He did so and I decided at once to make this my first duty when the House should meet after recess. Accordingly, the very first day after the Senate reassembled on the 21st instant, I gave notice of the questions with which we are now dealing. Having now shown the indispensable nature of the St. Liguori theology, and its resemblance to all other professional books as far as the objectionable parts of it are concerned, having also shown the object of the writer of the disgraceful pamphlet, I come now to speak of the latter itself. It is not, as St. Liguori's is, a complete course of theology; it contains only a translation of that part of

St. Liguori's work which deals with the two commandments of the Decalogue, prohibiting all forms of lust. Let me remark here that no theologian has ever written a word in connection with those two commandments in any other language but Latin, lest it should happen by accident that one of these books should fall into the hands of the people at large and they should be scandalized, yet here is this miserable priest translating and publishing the immoral part of those books to give it as a food to the intelligence of the people, and we have the sad spectacle of the Comptroller of Customs finding fault with his subordinates in Montreal for having confiscated those filthy books, and ordering that they be delivered to the importer, for sale in Canada. Theological works are very expensive, because they are, as a rule, voluminous, and being written in Latin, no one but a priest would be interested in buying them. Why then select a few obscene pages from them, translate them into a vulgar language and sell them at a low price, in order that they may be circulated throughout the country to become germs of demoralization? Is it not the first duty of every government to prevent the demoralization of the people over whom they rule, and what other object had this parliament in view when they adopted the law prohibiting the importation of immoral books and pamphlets? Such a law being on our statute books—parliament having been asked by the government, of which the present Premier was a member, to pass such a law, it should be enforced. What use was there in adopting it if the government are the first to violate the law? I have no hesitation in saying that I know of no book better calculated to demoralize its readers than that obscene pamphlet. The law is made of no effect—has it been put on the statute book without any intention of enforcing its provisions, and merely for the purpose of deceiving the people and leading them to believe that their representatives are protecting them from scandals and keeping out of the country literature calculated to ruin their children. No doubt there are people who will object that the translation is no worse than the text. To that objection, which I heard only to-day, I have this reply: What is the spirit of our legislation prohibiting the importation of all books, pamphlets, pictures of an indecent or immoral character? Is it not, in order to prevent the demoralization of the people at large? Such demoralization will not follow the importation of professional books such as medical, legal or ecclesiastical works of which I have spoken, for the good reason that they are expensive books and can hardly be bought by any except professional men to whom they are necessary in fact, indispensable, and therefore, they can have but very limited circulation. If you allow a book or pamphlet containing a translation of such parts of the professional book as are objectionable apart from the original book, to pass at the customs house and be circulated you admit a book prepared for the simple purpose of spreading demoralization, and it is for that object they are sold for a few cents. So that, following the spirit of the law, the importation of medical, legal or ecclesiastical books which are absolutely necessary in the interest of the people at large, is and must be tolerated, however objectionable parts of them may be. While under the law the sale and circulation of any translation of objectionable parts of these books, but in pamphlets, ought not to be allowed because far from necessary books they are, on the contrary without utility, obnoxious and most dangerous. Let me put the question in a more practical form.

Suppose, for instance, I obtained from a doctor a book on anatomy which contains plates of an indecent character. Such a book cannot be objected to, and the Customs Department is obliged to admit it, because it is necessary for the professional men who are interested in it. But suppose I were to take certain passages and plates from that book and have them printed in pamphlet form and exposed for sale at a few cents each, would not any member of this House pronounce that that pamphlet ought not to be put in circulation? These medical works can never be popular because they are very expensive; as an example, there is one book in our library consisting of two volumes which cost $25 in the United States on account of the expensive character of the plates. There is no danger of the public generally buying such books. It is the same with the work in question, and other theological works. Let me add another circumstance which is in favour of theological books. While medical works are printed in French or English, as the case may be, theological works are printed only in Latin, so there is no danger that they will ever be circulated generally among the people. Take the Criminal Code which was prepared and passed in this House. It has many clauses which contain indecent and obscene words, but the necessity for such legislation arises from the condition of society, the result of the fall of man 6,000 years ago. I have seen commentaries on our criminal law which are worse than any book I have ever read. Cases arise in the courts which are of such a character that judges are obliged to exclude the public, yet the evidence must be taken—it is a matter of necessity and the natural consequence of the downfall of man. We must do the best we can to deal with such questions without corrupting the public, but there is no necessity for circulating such a dirty book as this which was seized in Montreal. I do not know the man who sells the book, but I will read a letter which I received from him to-day and which gives an idea of his principles. He sent me a copy of a book, containing about 30 pages, the conclusion of which gives an idea of the whole work. I will read his conclusion. The title of this book is "The Rise and Fall of Jewish, Roman and Protestant Priestcraft, By Norman Murray. The conclusion of the book is as follows:—

Hear the conclusion of the whole thing: One God, one religion for all men in all ages; fear God, keep his commandments and do good to all men. No monopoly or tariff in trade or religion, no dictation from Rome or Washington under the British flag. The Church of Rome is a fraud, the Church of England is a farce, and the so-called Church of Scotland is an imposition. They get other people's money for nothing. The Church of England was conceived in sin, shapen in iniquity, born in crime and nursed with the blood of the Puritans and Covenanters. As a man lives, so shall he die. No holy water, made with common water and salt, will purify a rake whose heart has not been changed. If a man promises a woman to love and protect her, no imposter with a black petticoat or white neckwear can relieve him of his responsibility. If it is improper to marry a first or second cousin, or a deceased wife's sister no dispensation from an Italian fraud can make the matter right. The letters of Archbishop Fabre and Cardinal Tascheran to the ex-priest Martin should be brought in evidence against these imposters, and if they were both put in jail for six months it would be a lesson to others in future to keep them from trying to do mischief.

Is any one so foolish as to suppose that God has more respect for an Italian cardinal than a good honest Scotchman? If there is a heaven and a hell you will see Protestant Scotchmen up above, and Italian and French cardinals in hell, when you go to the other side.

This is what Mr. Norman Murray writes to me personally :

2108 ST. CATHERINE ST.,
MONTREAL, June 3, 1895.

SENATOR BELLEROSE :

SIR,—I understand you are interesting yourself in the books seized on me last summer which Rome's hirelings had to release. I would not like any better fun than to be prosecuted for selling these books, so as to have an opportunity of cross-examining some of the priests of anti-Christ as to whether they do or do not ask these questions of women in the confessional. What is the confessional for, anyhow, but for asking all sorts of dirty questions? I shall have some accounts to settle with your crowd yet, so you had better set the ball rolling again.

Yours, &c.,

N. MURRAY.

This quotation, as also the letter of Mr. Murray, show what is aimed at by these people. I only received the letter this morning, and have to thank the Premier for having requested me to let the matter stand until now, because it has enabled me to use this letter and the extract from the pamphlet, to show the disposition of the man who sells the book and the character of the book itself. I do not think that the matter was treated as it ought to have been by the Customs Department, but I could not charge the Controller of Customs with having been animated by an hostile feeling against the church to which I belong. I rather would say that he was deceived, nevertheless even if he was but little responsible for the release of the books, I cannot help saying that he ought to have made this case a test one. In the Montreal office there are Protestants and Catholics, and I do not know by whom the seizure was made—whether Protestant or Catholic.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is a Protestant.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—This speaks in my favour, and it shows the morality of the officer who did it. Now, there is another question that may be raised by the Premier as to the law as it stands. Here is the law prohibiting the importation into Canada of any goods mentioned in schedule "C"—779, books, printed papers, drawings, prints, photographs, or representations of any kind of a treasonable, seditious or of an immoral or indecent character. I cannot admit that professional books fall under the law, they are a necessity and can hardly have a large circulation on account of their high cost. They are only for the use of professional men, either lawyers, doctors or priests. But as I said before, when you take out of those books anything which is objectionable, indecent or immoral, and make it a cheap book, evidently it comes under the law. It is done to demoralize and do injury to the people, and I cannot suppose that the lawyers or the Minister of Justice feel that under the letter of the statute they can do nothing to prevent it. I say furthermore that the government are responsible, because they ought to have amended the law long ago in order to establish the difference between books which must be imported and books which are circulated at a very low price in order to demoralize the people.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend is anxious to prohibit the importation of any literature which would affect injuriously the morals of the people, and incite to undue indulgence in lust. My hon. friend is right in that, but I do not think that our criminal law meets this case of what appears to be garbled extracts from a scientific work on physiology, ethics, or the science of living beings, or moral philosophy, and under the law I do not think the officers could have done anything else than they did do; but I think my hon. friend has failed in what he desires to accomplish. He has given publicity to the book which sweepingly denounces the Church of England to which I belong, and also the church to which he belongs, and Protestants generally. Any of us would be inclined to get that book and read it ourselves. I never heard of it and I do not think it would have had much publicity but for the course pursued by my hon. friend. I think Norman Murray will thank my hon. friend for the publicity given to his book. The hon. gentleman asks who will read it? Why, anyone of an inquiring mind will be disposed to read that book now. I therefore think my hon. friend has done more harm than good by his speech. He has advertised the book and given notoriety to the publisher and the public will read it now, whereas they would not have done so but for the hon. gentleman's remarks to-day.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Inasmuch as I interrupted the hon. gentleman from Dela-naudière, I may be allowed to say one or two words as to why I did so. I do not often agree with the hon. member from Lunenburg, but I do on the present occasion. My great objection to the course taken by the hon. member from Delanaudière is that he has taken the very best means in the world to increase the circulation of this improper literature; and I have no doubt but that Mr. Norman Murray will be so cheered and encouraged by the notice taken of him that he will take steps to have a further importation of these villainous books. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking that this book is a vile one and that it comes under the provisions of the criminal law. Section 179 of the code says:—

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse, publishes, sells or exposes for public sale or public view any obscene book or other printed or written matter or any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals.

And section 100 says:

Anyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment who imports for transmission any obscene or immoral book.

I cannot help feeling that the officers of the Customs Department—I presume the Controller of Customs is ultimately responsible—have failed in their duty in allowing this book, which as the hon. gentleman points out undoubtedly comes under the category of an obscene book—one which would corrupt morals—to go into circulation. When the officer saw the book he should have prevented its circulation. That is very true; but the hon. gentleman by calling attention to the matter in this public way and going into details and reading Norman Murray's views on religious matters, is simply giving publicity to this work and to Mr. Murray's views. It will lead, probably, to a good deal of discussion and give a great deal more publicity to those objectionable books and views than they would otherwise have had. For that reason I regret that the hon. gentleman should have discussed the matter at such length. I think it would have been quite sufficient to call attention to the fact that there had been either a deliberate neglect of duty in the Customs department, or that a serious mistake had been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should not have said anything but for the reflections cast upon the customs officials, by the Senator from Halifax, who are charged with not having done their duty. It might be regarded as presumption on my part to say that I disagree with the hon. member as to the application of the two clauses which he has read from the code, and I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am only speaking of the duty of a customs official who is administering the law upon the statute-book. If a book, no matter what its character, can be imported into Canada legally, when published in Latin, or Greek, or Hebrew, there is no power under the law to prevent its being imported into Canada, though printed in what my hon. friend calls the vulgar tongue—the English language. If the work is admissible in one language, it is equally admissible in another. I repeat I am not speaking of the merits or demerits of any book. You cannot, in administering the law, draw a distinction between a book that is imported for ecclesiastical purposes or for the use of any special profession, and a book imported by other persons who are not professional men. You cannot say that the importer had not the same right to import the book provided he pays the duty. I see the distinction which the hon. gentleman draws; but there is one point to which I will allude in reference to that matter. I am not able to speak positively about this book, not having seen it and not knowing its character, but while I was administering the Customs Department there were one or two books imported which were extracts from the works of Voltaire and Tom Paine. Now, you will find Voltaire and Tom Paine in almost every library in the country, taken in their entirety, and unquestionably under the law no judge would declare that those books should not be imported by any person; but it is a very different matter to make selections from them, as was the case in the two books to which I am now referring, of the most objectionable character, and which no man having any regard for himself or his family would permit them to read. Those books I seized and confiscated. The question arose at that time as to whether I had done that which was within the law. Some lawyers in Toronto, whose names I might mention, who stand at the head of the profession, in an interview with me said that I was not acting within the law. My answer to that was, "I care not whether in your opinion I am within the law ; I believe it to be so, and if you desire to test this before any jury of twelve honest Canadians, I am quite sure you will lose your case," and it there ended. What the character of this book is I do not know ; whether it contains selections from the work which my hon. friend said in his opening remarks was not a bad book, but a good and precious book when its use is confined to certain parties, then I do not know what opinion I might give ; but in defence of the Controller of Customs, and speaking from the answer which he placed in my hands, I say he had no alternative but to give them up. He says that under a certain section of the Act his commissioner made a report, after obtaining legal opinion, I presume, from the the law officers of the crown, and if they said it did not come within the category of indecent and immoral books, then he was quite right, as an administrator of the law, in releasing the seizure. I quite agree with my hon. friend as to the impropriety of the introduction to the general reader of books of that character, but we must consider the distinction between what we conceive to be in the general interests of the community and of the general reader, and the law as it stands on the statute book. It is a very serious question, one affecting the feelings of every parent in the country, that the circulation of such literature should be stopped as far as possible, but the Controller of Customs is not deserving of the censure which has been thrown upon him, because acted in accordance, as I am informed, within the decision of the law officers of the crown.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Does not the hon. gentleman think the case important enough and the book sufficiently odious to justify the government in having the question tested ? Because it will have to be tested some of these days. If there are differences of opinion they can be solved in that way.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Never having seen the book, I am unable to give an opinion.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The officers of the department must have seen it. There was an order stopping the book, and there is the order cancelling that warning, and there must have been some reflection.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I only desire to be satisfied that I have done my duty.

Notwithstanding the observations made by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg and the hon. gentleman from Halifax, I must say that I still believe that I have done right, and that they are wrong. There is no use in concealing those facts. I am in duty bound to take exception to bad books being allowed to be put in circulation, and since the Premier himself has discovered that there were different opinions as to the interpretations of this section 179 of the schedule, it is his duty to have this question settled, to have an amendment to the law to prevent the circulation of immoral books such as those I have named. It is for the Premier, now that we are in session, to explain this clause so that the Controller of Customs in the future may know the difference between a bad book and a good one. If the law is of any value then we should not allow bad books to enter the Dominion. If I become aware at any time that such books have been admitted, I shall raise my voice in this House and complain, whatever may be the consequences, and prevent as far as I can the mischief which follows the sale of such books.

HALIFAX AND JAMAICA STEAM-BOAT SERVICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DEVER inquired of the Government—

If it is their intention to comply with the desire of the merchants of St. John, New Brunswick, as expressed by a resolution of the Council of the Board of Trade of that city, that any arrangement which may be made by the government, with any party or parties, for a steamboat service between the City of Halifax and the Island of Jamaica ; and also between the City of Halifax and the Islands of Porto Rico and Hayti, that the port of St. John, as well as that of Halifax, be included in said service, on the outward as well as the inward voyages of said steamers to said islands ?

He said :—The question which I have the honour to present to the House is one of more importance to the people of the provinces and the cities by the sea than possibly to the people of Canada generally ; but as a good deal of our time has been spent to-day in listening to a lengthy discourse, I feel that at this late hour I must not allow myself to go into what I can see might verge into a general trade discussion in this House. I would not be in the position to-day of a suppliant, or applying for a subsidy on behalf of the cities of Halifax and St. John, N.B., to keep up a trade with the West Indies, if we were in that position that we occupied some years ago. If our trade were free and unembarrassed and our ships and steamers could secure freight in paying quantities it would not be necessary at all to apply to the government for a subsidy; but under the circumstances, we feel, inasmuch as certain portions of the fiscal policy of Canada are against this trade, that we cannot keep up a steady line of steamers or vessels of any class without asking for a subsidy. I might point out to the Premier—and I do it, not with a desire to raise a question that might be offensive—that there are three articles of staple goods that we naturally and necessarily import by those steamers—sugar, molasses in great quantities, and spirits of various kinds.

Now, it is a fact known to gentlemen in the trade that the latter article of merchandise cannot be imported at all. And why? Because it is by the existing arrangement of our policy that the spirit trade is carried on in Upper Canada. The whisky trade for the last four years got from the people of Canada no less a sum than $7,000,000 over and above what we would have to pay in case we imported the same quantity and strength of spirit from abroad. Under these circumstances, it is an utter impossibility with the present arrangement of trade, to get a full cargo of merchandise such as I have described. I know it is not a pleasant subject to discuss, because I find it is not popular in Canada. The whisky trade has a monopoly here and wishes to retain it. They have retained it during the last four years at an expense of over $7,000,000 to the people of Canada. We have taken for consumption, according to the report of the Inland Revenue Department, 11,000,000 gallons of spirit, during the last four years, on which we have given a bonus amounting to seven millions of dollars. We cannot afford to go on in this way giving moneys, made out of other sources of trade, to one industry of this kind. It strikes me we cannot do it very long, and I felt it my duty to present this fact to you. I am satisfied that the Premier is willing and anxious to do what is right.

Probably in the past it was impossible that he should go into details of this matter, but when it is presented in this way I believe he will give it consideration and see that fair play is given all round to the several portions of the Dominion, and that the merchants by the sea will not be hampered but will get permission to do business in a less restricted way. The West Indies always took our goods and why should we not get permission to take theirs? They take our hay and beef and butter; they take our cheese, they take our flour, in fact they take our general goods, and it is fair and proper, I hold, that inducement should be held out to them to show that the trade is not all one sided.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The answer which I have before me I will give without discussing the different points raised by the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I would have only asked the question if I had supposed the hon. gentleman would have understood the question without an explanation. I know it is not a pleasant subject to deal with.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not only pleasant to me to hear the explanation, but it is instructive. I want to have the opinion of hon. gentlemen who have large experience in business. It is in that way that we derive information and are able to frame our policy. Hence it is not unpleasant to hear the hon. gentleman discuss the subject. The contract for a service between Halifax and Jamaica was entered into before the resolution referred to was received by the government, but in the event of a second service being undertaken, council should take power to compel the vessels to call at both ports. The hon. gentleman is aware that in the past, steamers which have been running between the West Indies and some of the Spanish Antilles and Canada, have been obliged to call at both ports, and this is the case with other lines. Difficulties present themselves, in entering into contracts of this character, in compelling vessels to go to certain ports when they can obtain full freights more conveniently at others. I will not enter into a discussion on the point raised by the hon. gentleman, because I did not hear him sufficiently well to form a correct opinion, but if I did hear him aright he objects to any restriction or restraint upon trade generally.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would remind my hon. friend from Marquette that if there were not some restriction, the whole of the sugar trade and the tea trade would go through the United States instead of by Halifax and St. John as it does at present, and hence in carrying out our policy, to which the hon. gentleman from Marquette will of course object, we will endeavour, if it is possible to do so by legislation, to force the trade from the West Indies and the Antilles to our own ports. We will continue to do so until some other party gets control of the destinies of this country, when I think they will destroy the whole of it and reach that elysium which my hon. friend from Marquette desires, when all of us will become poorer than we are now and have much cause for regret. I thank the hon. gentleman from St. John for having called my attention to the subject and I can assure him that it will not be forgotten.

Hon. Mr. DEVER. I do not feel satisfied that the Premier should misconceive my position, as he certainly has, if I am to judge by some of the words he has uttered, I did not say that I was opposed to restrictions generally on trade, but I said there was a restriction on one particular article coming from the West Indies, that is spirits—there is a restriction of 62½ cents a proof gallon upon it, and consequently we cannot import it. Now I hold that that is too much, because it has given the manufacturer in Canada the benefit of $7,000,000 in the past four years. The people have paid that much more for a spirit of an inferior character than they would have had to pay for a similar quantity of a better article that they could import. The manufacturers of spirits in this country have over 100 per cent protection, and consequently the other spirits are excluded and our ships have to come empty, and we have to ask for a subsidy to make up for our loss of freight. That is the position we are in and the one that I take.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL. I have to apologize to the hon. gentleman. I did misunderstand him. I now understand him thoroughly—that he wants the difference between the customs and excise reduced so as to enable us to import rum from the West Indies, by that means collecting through the customs the revenue which we now get from excise.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I cannot allow the few remarks which have been dropped by our leader to pass without comment. He made the statement that it was necessary to adopt this policy in order that the sugar and teas which we use in this country should not be imported through the United States. I should like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the flour which goes from Ontario and western points to the Maritime Provinces is sent via Boston and also to the fact that all our wheat shipped from the North-west Territories to Great Britain goes via New York.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Well very nearly all. I have asked for the figures and they have not come down. I draw attention to these facts to show the beautiful manner in which our trade is regulated by protection, and how it fails to accomplish what we desire to obtain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is because we have not gone far enough.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Perhaps the hon. gentleman contemplates adopting McKinleyism, but I should think that my hon. friend possesses too much common sense to do anything of the kind. There are 40 carloads of metallic roofing and sheeting going up for elevators about to be constructed in Manitoba and the North-west, and instead of being carried through Canadian channels they are going by way of Duluth and the Northern Pacific. What I want is to have all trade kept in Canadian channels instead of having it diverted to United States channels. A change in our navigation laws and commercial policy will accomplish that result.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club."—(Hon. Mr. Kirchoffer).

BICYCLES ON PARLIAMENT SQUARE.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Senators to a matter which should not be overlooked. My friend, the hon. member from Quinté, after leaving the Chamber last evening, was met by a bicycle and almost knocked down. Some arrangement should be made by which these bicycles should either be excluded from the grounds, or the riders should be required to ring a bell to give notice of their approach. Mr. Read had a narrow escape from a dangerous accident.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—I was leaving the House and caught sight of a young man on a bicycle approaching me. I thought he would run me down, but he sheered off, and I was very lucky that I am not in bed today with broken legs or something worse. It was a very narrow escape. I remonstrated with the young man, but he was very saucy, and said he did not strike me. I think he was a poor rider, but he sheered as he came to me and merely touched me. Fortunately I was not hurt. While Parliament square may be a proper place for bicycles, there should be some regulation by which they should either have bells or other means of warning people.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We are under an obligation to the hon. gentleman from Rideau division for bringing this matter up. I have often felt that members whose eyesight is not good, are in danger of being run down by bicycles. Something ought to be done to prevent the nuisance.

Hon. Mr. READ—I hope the hon. gentleman does not think that my eyesight was defective.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Even if my hon. friend's eyesight was very good it is no reason why he should not be protected from such dangers as that. Most elderly persons may have poor sight. The experience in Toronto is that nearly as many persons have been injured by bicycles as by the new electric street cars, and the number of street car accidents has been enormous. It is not too soon to make a complaint of this sort, and the hon. gentleman is quite right in bringing it up to prevent parties running their bicycles about the grounds of the buildings, unless they can find some line or portion of the road upon which people are not walking. We may wait until some serious accident has occurred, but that is not the right way. We should not wait to lock the stable until after the steed has been stolen. We should prevent these things. Putting bells on bicycles is not altogether sufficient. Only last week a bright little girl, the only daughter of a respectable family in Toronto, was killed by a bicycle, although the rider rang his bell and thought it was sufficient. It tended to disconcert or confuse the child and she was run over and killed. Scarcely a week passes without some accident occurring from bicycles. In Toronto now the authorities will not allow bicycles to run on the sidewalk, but even with this regulation, people who are just learning to use their bicycles, and think they are doing a great thing, run against parties before they can sheer off. There is no harm in bringing these matters before the public and adopting precautions to diminish the danger of accidents occurring.

The SPEAKER—Although I am a young man, I had a pretty narrow escape the other day from a bicycle, and I believe that parliament square is not a right place for bicycle riding. At least the front of the building should be protected against them. If they were to use the road which runs round all the buildings, probably we might escape them, but when they cross here in front of the parliament buildings it is very dangerous. The bell system would not do at all, because in that case hon. members would have to fly when they hear the bell. Well some of us, perhaps, would not like it very much or perhaps could not do it very well, so that if bells are to be used at all, the senators should ring them and not the bicycle riders. It would be better to do away with the bell altogether and prevent bicycles passing in front of the building, because it is very dangerous.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I shall draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to this matter. There is only one possible cure which would be complete and that would be to prevent bicycles coming on the ground at all. How popular that would be in the city I do not know. Or some regulation might be made that they should only use the outside roads of the grounds and not cross in front of the building. I leave the matter to the discretion of the Minister of Public Works who will deal with it probably to the satisfaction of this House.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—There is a portion of the ground where ladies and children often come up for the sake of the fresh air, and I think very properly so, and it is for the protection of such, especially that bicycles should be kept off what you would call the pleasure portion of the grounds.

THE COPYRIGHT LAW.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return of the correspondence in regard to international copyright during the past year.

He said :—I might, in order to give larger scope to a discussion of this kind, have brought in a motion; but my object is never for the purpose of embarrassing our government, but rather for the purpose of giving such views as I think are necessary to give from certain standpoints, or, in other words, arguing a brief from the other side; and, therefore, I put my question in this way, and I have no doubt it will lead to a sufficiently large discussion, in order that the true merits of the case may be brought out. Hon. gentlemen will understand that this question of copyrights has been an object of discussion—nay, even an object of conflict—with the Imperial Government for the past five years, ever since the Act of 1889 was passed, and that it has been the subject-matter of a great deal of correspondence between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government in regard to copyright. The position in which it stands is this: we passed the Act of 1889, and the Imperial Government thought that the royal assent to that Act should be withheld until it was brought into harmony with the Imperial Act with regard to copyrights.

The Copyright Act that we are working under to-day is the Copyright Act of 1887. That Act was passed subsequent to the international convention that was held among the nations of Europe for the purpose of procuring an international copyright. I should like to read to you what the international copyright is. There are two International Copyright Acts. One relates to the authorship of books, music, paintings, photographs, etc., and the other relates to industrial trade marks and designs. The object of both these conventions is to give an international character to the protection of works by individuals so that the nations generally will respect the inherent right to the possession by the author or designer or patentee of anything that has been the creation of his own brain, just as much right of possession to the ownership as a man would have to his horse or his bushels of wheat or machinery or anything which is the product of his labour. In the United States this question of copyright had been ignored until the Copyright Act of 1888 (amended in 1891 in its present form) was passed; in the United States there was there what was generally known as a system of piracy, that is to say that no foreign author was protected in the United States or could take out a copyright which would protect him in the United States, but the individual publishers of that country were at liberty to pirate any work brought out by foreign authors and use them as they thought fit. This was reversed, as I say, by the people of the United States in 1891 and the Copyright Act was passed there which although not to the full extent granted in Great Britain, still gives copyright to foreign authors. The question of international copyright has been a matter of great discussion for many years. The first move that I see was made in regard to it, was in 1837, when Henry Clay presented to the Senate of the United States a petition from British authors asking for copyright privileges in that country. It was referred to a select committee, consisting of Clay, Webster, Buchanan, Preston and Ewing. The report took high ground in favour of the rights of authors. It said:

That authors and inventors have, according to the practice among civilized nations, a property in the respective productions of their genius, is incontestable; and that this property should be protected as effectually as any other property is by law follows as a legitimate consequence. Authors and inventors are among the greatest benefactors of mankind. . . . It being established that literary property is entitled to legal protection, it results that this protection ought to be afforded wherever the property is situated. . . . We should be all shocked if the law tolerated the least invasion of the rights of property, in the case of merchandise, whilst those that justly belong to the works of authors are exposed to daily violation, without the possibility of their invoking the aid of the laws.

No action was taken on this report, nor on an invitation extended by Lord Palmerston the succeeding year, 1838, for the co-operation of the American Government in an international copyright arrangement.

That is the view taken by those celebrated men so long as '37, and those views were pressed from time to time by the authors and publishers in the United States. I quote the poet Longfellow's sentiments, copied from a letter to a friend :

Whatever is just is for the benefit of all ; and I wish we could have a law providing, between England and America, that a copyright taken out in either country shall be equally valid in both.

Yours very truly,

HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

October 8th, 1878.

I would also like to show the tenor of Mr. Lowell's mind when this question was up for discussion in the United States. He penned these few lines, which express his moral view of the past action of his own government in regard to copyright and its legalized piracy :

In vain we call all notions fudge,
And bend our conscience to our dealing,
The ten commandments will not budge,
And stealing will continue stealing.

Again Mr. Lowell says :—

There is one thing better than a cheap book, and that is a book honestly come by.

These are the impressions Mr. Lowell wished to convey to the public generally as to the action of the people and the government of the United States for permitting literary piracy which had been carried down so late as 1888, and when an effort was being made to bring about an international copyright and not only to bring about international copyrights, but to include the government of the United States, and the people of the United States in the Berne Convention, which was adopted at a convention held in 1886 on international copyright rights. Now, the position that our government has assumed on this question ever since the Act of 1889 was passed is very similar in its character to that which the people of the United States have just abandoned. When I discuss this question it is not out of any disrespect to our late lamented leader, Sir John Thompson, who gave expression to some very able views upon the subject in 1890, and again in 1892, and again, I believe, in 1894, which is the correspondence I am asking the leader of the government to bring down. But the late leader, Sir John Thompson, was arguing the question from the standpoint of some publishers who were pressing it, and while I desire to present the case from the standpoint of the authors, I only disagree with the position Sir John Thompson took in the case just as I would disagree with any hon. member if he were advocating protection and I was advocating free trade. I say that to show that it is not out of any disrespect to his memory or to the able manner in which he brought the facts before the Imperial Government in pressing upon them the necessity for the Canadian Government and people to assert their right of copyright legislation and to deal with it just as they saw fit whether it was piracy or not piracy. In 1884 there was an international convention for trade marks and designs in regard to fine arts. That was a convention by which certain nations agreed with one another to have international rights respected in regard to these marks and designs, which secured for them in one country the same protection that was accorded for them in their own country, and which was made applicable in all countries included in this convention. I will read you the convention in regard to the trade mark; and designs. It is as follows :—

International Convention between the Governments of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, France, Guatemala, Italy, Netherlands, Portugal, Salvador, Servia, and Switzerland, for the protection of Industrial Property. Signed at Paris, March 20, 1883.

Ratifications exchanged at Paris, June 6, 1884.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Article I.

(Translation).

The Governments of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, France, Guatemala, Italy, Holland, Portugal, Salvador, Servia, and Switzerland constitute themselves into a union for the protection of industrial property.

Article II.

The subjects or citizens or each of the contracting states shall, in all the other states of the union, as regards patents, industrial designs or models, trade marks and trade names, enjoy the advantages that their respective laws grant, or shall hereafter grant, to their own subjects or citizens.

Consequently, they shall have the same protection as the latter, and the same legal remedy against any infringement of their rights, provided they observe the formalities and conditions imposed on subjects or citizens by the internal legislation of each state.

Article III.

Subjects or citizens of states not forming part of the union, who are domiciled or have industrial or commercial establishments in the territory of any of the states of the union, shall be assimilated to the subjects or citizens of the contracting states.

Article IV.

Any person who has duly applied for a patent, industrial design or model, or trade-mark in one of the contracting states shall enjoy, as regards registration in the other states, and reserving the rights of third parties, a right of priority during the periods hereinafter stated.

Consequently, subsequent registration in any of the other states of the union before expiry of these periods shall not be invalidated through any acts accomplished in the interval, either, for instance, by another registration, by publication of the invention, or by the working of it by a third party, by the sale of copies of the design or model, or by use of the trade-mark.

The above mentioned terms of priority shall be six months for patents, and three months for industrial designs and models and trade-marks. A month longer is allowed for countries beyond sea.

Article V.

The introduction by the patentee into the country where the patent has been granted of objects manufactured in any of the states of the union shall not entail forfeiture.

Nevertheless, the patentee shall remain bound to work his patent in conformity with the laws of the country into which he introduces the patented objects.

Article VI.

Every trade mark duly registered in the country of origin shall be admitted for registration, and protected in the form originally registered in all the other countries of the union.

That country shall be deemed the country of origin where the applicant has his chief seat of business.

If this chief seat of business is not situated in one of the countries of the union, the country to which the applicant belongs shall be deemed the country of origin.

Registration may be refused if the object for which it is solicited is considered contrary to morality or public order.

And I wish to draw attention to the fact that the Imperial Government came under that convention in 1884 in which it says:

The undersigned, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the French Republic, declares that Her Britannic Majesty, having had the international convention for the protection of industrial property, concluded at Paris on the 20th March, 1883, and the protocol relating thereto, signed on the same date, laid before her, and availing herself of the right reserved by Article XVI. of that convention to states not parties to the original convention, accedes, on behalf of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the said international convention for the protection of industrial property, and to the said protocol, which are to be considered as inserted word for word in the present declaration, and formally engages as far as regards the President of the French Republic and the other high contracting parties, to co-operate on her part in the execution of the stipulations contained in the convention and protocol aforesaid.

The undersigned makes this declaration on the part of Her Britannic Majesty with the express understanding that power is reserved to Her Britannic Majesty to accede to the convention on behalf of the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands, and any of Her Majesty's possessions, on due notice to that effect being given through Her Majesty's Government.

In witness whereof the undersigned, duly authorized, has signed the present declaration of accession, and has affixed thereto the seal of his arms.

Done at Paris on the 17th Day of March, 1884.

(Signed) LYONS.

That is the convention in regard to industrial property. The Imperial Government in joining that convention, joined it on the terms that Her Majesty's possessions should have the full benefit of that international convention in regard to that important branch, when they desired to avail themselves of it, but I believe we have hitherto not availed ourselves of it. We have kept ourselves outside of the pale of that convention so that there is no copyright or no protection that that convention gives within the bounds of Canadian territory to foreign industrial designs, nor protection to Canadian industrial designs in other nations. As I said before, it was felt that an international copyright was essential for the well-being of authorship and for the well-being and protection of authors, and painters, and sculptors of all kinds, and there was a convention called the Berne Convention, assembled in 1886, upon the invitation of the little republic of Switzerland, and this is a portion of the articles which governed its deliberations:

Article I.

The contracting countries are constituted into a union for the protection of the rights of authors in literary and artistic works.

Article II.

Authors of any of the contracting countries shall in all the other countries of the union enjoy for their works whether manuscript or unedited or published in one of those countries, the advantages which the respective laws actually accord or shall hereafter accord to natives.

These advantages shall, however be secured to them reciprocally only for the period of existence of their rights in their country of origin.

This enjoyment is subject to the fulfilment of the formalities and conditions prescribed by the law of the country to which the author belongs.

Article III.

The stipulations of article II. apply equally to the publishers of literary or artistic works published in one of the countries of the union.

Article IV.

The expression "literary and artistic works," comprises books, pamphlets or all other writings, dramatic or dramatico-musical works, musical compositions with or without words; works of design, painting, sculpture and engraving; lithographs, illustrations and geographical charts; plans, sketches and plastic works relative to geography, topography, architecture or science in general, in fine all productions whatever in the domain of literature, science or art which may be published by any method of impression or reproduction.

Article V.

The legal assigns or representatives of authors or in the case provided by Article III. publishers shall enjoy in every respect the same right as those accorded by the present convention to authors or publishers themselves.

Article XIII.

Every pirated work may be seized on importation into those countries of the union where the original work has the right of legal protection. The seizure shall take place either at the request of the public ministry or of the party interested conformable to the domestic legislation of each country.

Article XVI.

It is understood that the governments of the countries of the union reserve to themselves respectively the right to make separate arrangements between themselves in so far as these arrangements shall confer upon authors or their representatives more extensive rights than those accorded by the union or shall include other stipulations not opposed to the present convention.

There are 21 articles altogether.
Conference recommended copyright should last for life and for a period after death not less than 30 years.

Now, hon. gentlemen, that is what is called the World's Convention of International Copyright, and that gives an equal right to authors and sculptors and painters or workers in the fine arts of all kinds within the bounds of one nation, to be extended to all those nations that come under the Berne Convention, and the policy that we have been pursuing with regard to these matters is to keep ourselves outside the pale of that convention. Also, of course, when the convention was formed in 1886, and when the British Government became part and parcel of the international copyright or of the Berne Convention, it included all the British dominions, and when the Canadian Government passed the Act of 1889 we then and there demanded that we should not be included in the international convention, that we should have a right to put the Act of 1889 into force and that we should not be tied down. The Imperial Government, as I said before, through the Governor General, exercised his prerogative and withheld his assent, and by that Act to-day we are working under the Act of 1887 and are subject to and have the benefit of all the conditions of the Berne Convention which was passed in 1886. Now, hon. gentlemen, I would like to draw your attention to the Act of 1887. The Act of 1887 is the Act we are working under, and it says:

The condition of obtaining such copyright shall be that the said literary, scientific or artistic works shall be published or reprinted and republished in Canada, or in the case of works of art that they shall be produced or reproduced in Canada whether they are so published or reproduced for the first time, or contemporaneously with or subsequently to publication or production elsewhere; but in no case shall the said sole and exclusive right and liberty in Canada continue to exist after it has expired elsewhere.

2. No immoral, licentious, irreligious, or treasonable or seditious literary, scientific or artistic work, shall be the legitimate subject of such registration or copyright. 38 V., c. 88, s. 4, part.

Every work of which the copyright has been granted and is subsisting in the United Kingdom, and copyright of which is not secured or subsisting in Canada, under any Act of the Parliament of Canada, or of the legislature of the late province of Canada, or of the legislature of any of the provinces forming part of Canada, shall, when printed and published, or reprinted and republished in Canada, be entitled to copyright under this Act; but nothing in this Act shall be held to prohibit the importation from the United Kingdom of copies of any such work lawfully printed there.

2. If any such copyright work is reprinted subsequently to its publication in the United Kingdom any person who has, previously to the date of entry of such work upon the registers of copyright imported any foreign reprints, may dispose of such reprints by sale or otherwise; but the burden of proof establishing the extent and regularity of the transaction shall, in each case, be upon such persons. 38 V. c., 88, s. 15.

Upon what grounds has that assent been withheld? The Imperial Government says in effect: "We do not desire to interfere with the Canadian Government in their mode of dealing with their own authors as they see fit. They can pass any copyright to restrict or tie down or confine their own authors within any bounds they choose, but when it comes to passing an act that is going to legalize the piracy of British authors' works, then we think we are justified in stepping in and saying as a part of the British dominions, and as a part of the British Empire, is it right for you to pass that Act which is an Act of piracy against British authors. We feel in justice to imperial interests that it is right to withhold our consent until you have given that deliberation and thought, and until it has been forced upon the attention of the Canadian people the full extent of the Act they are passing, and the injury it is going to inflict does inflict upon British authors and other authors who are included in the Berne Convention." That is the position the Imperial government takes, and I say it is a fair position for them to take. The Governor General has been refusing his assent until the question is brought up for discussion before the Canadian people, and all sides of it may be heard, and it is with a view to presenting the Canadian authors' position in regard to this matter that I am now discussing the question. I wish to point out the difference between the Act of 1887 and 1889. There was no objection taken to the act of 1887 because it permitted English copyright to stand in Canada unless the work was published in Canada and a copyright taken out in Canada. When the copyright was taken out in Canada, then it came under the Canadian Copyright Act; but before any Canadian copyright was taken out in Canada, then the British author was protected by this Act in consequence of no copyrights having been applied for or taken out. It places the foreign author in Canada under the Act of 1887. Under that Act there was no objection offered by the British Government. But certain publishers in Canada who got the ear of the government desired that they might have the right to publish the works of foreign and British and American authors without regard to any bargain they may make with them at all; and the Act of 1889 changed the Act of 1887 in so far as that no works were protected for copyright in Canada for British authors, American authors, or foreign authors of any kind, unless they published, printed, and manufactured the books in Canada in one month after it had been brought out in Great Britain or elsewhere; after it had been brought out in England, it was absolutely necessary that it should be brought out in Canada, published, printed and manufactured here in order to give it any protection at all. If the British author failed to apply for copyright under those conditions, which required that they should go to that expense, then there was no protection; then any publisher in Canada had a right to take possession of any work that they chose, and publish it without reference to the author himself. There was a provision made that the government would license, not one author with a copyright, but that they would give a license to every publisher in Canada to publish those works just as they saw fit upon payment of 10 per cent of the cost to the English author, if copyrighted, or 12½ per cent if licensed.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Provided the British author did not print and publish it in Canada within a certain time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, the penalty put upon the British author was that he should print and publish the work in Canada within one month after it was published elsewhere. If he did not go to that expense, then there was no protection afforded to the British author, and the Act of 1889 is designed to show a spirit of fairness by saying that when a license is granted to a publisher in Canada to take possession of a British author's works without his consent, the licensee should pay ten per cent on the value of the work to the author; and at the time the act was passed, I believe it was upon the statute-book that the Canadian Government would collect the 12½ per cent through the custom-house. Now, I believe that protection, so far as the custom-house is concerned, has been withdrawn, and that that protection is no longer in existence, so far as the government becoming responsible for the collection of the 10 or 12½ per cent; therefore there is absolutely no protection to the British author in regard to the matter.

Supposing that one of our one cent newspapers of Canada takes possession of a popular work and publishes it, he calculates, or computes what the 12½ per cent of the value of the work is. I say that it is a most unfair way of dealing with the author to say, "We will fix the remuneration and let you whistle for it to the best of your ability."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman wants us to be denied the rights which our neighbours possess and compel us to pay it to the Americans.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is just exactly the question I am going to discuss. I am going to show a great deal more profit will accrue to the publishers and labour employed in Canada than by the policy we propose to pursue at the present moment. We are not leaving the individual to run risks as to the piracy of works, but we seek to legalize that piracy of the authors of our British dominions when we receive the protection of that large field of authors which is now being denied to British authors on Canadian soil; but what I want to point out is that there is no protection to the British author in the clause that gives 12½ per cent commission to any licensee, that there is no way in which a British author could come over here and bother about collecting it; that during a period of 10 years while that Act was in force, and while the Canadian Government became responsible for that 12½ per cent, there was only $5,000 collected upon copyright; so that it shows that even when the protection was afforded by the Canadian Government becoming responsible for all this, there was only that amount of $5,000 collected during a period of ten years. Now, hon. gentlemen, is it wise for us to continue, to legislate under such a condition as that? I am now purely speaking from the standpoint of honest statesmanship. Is it right that we as a government should so frame our Act that we are going to rob our fellow subjects in Great Britain of the just right of their brain which is accorded by almost every intelligent nation in Europe as an inherent right to them, and the protection which they are giving and affording to them? We say: "We will not give you that protection; we will pirate your works and give our publishers leave and license to pirate them to any extent they choose subject to the percentage condition."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That was not the effect of the Act of 1889. We say, print and publish your works in Canada. If you refuse, then we claim the right to do so and pay you a percentage.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, that is the effect of the Act of 1889; if the British author does not comply with that condition.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Oh, yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You impose upon a man an enormous pecuniary penalty for the sake of obtaining Canadian readers, when he has sixty-five million readers in the United States, and sixty-five million readers in British possessions, and here for the sake of three million and a half readers in Canada—or one million and a half French Canadian readers—you are going to impose on the author the expense of publishing that work here to prevent his work being pirated. I say it is too heavy a penalty to place an author under. I do not think it is fair at all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The 10 per cent is the compensation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is provided the work is copyrighted in Canada. If the English author does not think it worth while to copyright his work here for the three and a half millions in Canada after having published it for the sixty-five millions in the United States, I say you are imposing too heavy a penalty on him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How does that affect the sixty-five millions in the States?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The English author pursues this policy: When he has written a work he desires to copyright it. He desires to get that copyright extended, and copyright it in England. It is a condition of the international convention that his protection extends all over the world. The United States have not yet included themselves in the Berne Convention. They have only given up piracy for the last few years. They have not an Act yet to make them part of the Berne Convention; such an Act will, I believe, be passed very soon, but at present they are not in the Berne Convention.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They can send their books to us while we cannot send ours over into the United States. They hold the monopoly of the Canadian market and are not compelled to print their books in Canada, whilst we, to secure the United States market, are compelled to print and manufacture them in that country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to point out that the English sell the copyright on this continent to a publisher in the United States or Canada. He will sell to the Canadian author just as well as he will to the English author.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg pardon. The Canadian author can out-bid the American author and get possession of that work published in the United States and published in Canada if he choose. That is exactly the position in which it stands. There is nothing in the world to prevent our publishers making a bid for any work of an English author and overbidding the American, and the Canadian publisher by that means can get possession of the copyright on the continent. All he has to do in the United States is to set the type there.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The same thing here.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, in Canada it has to be printed, published and manufactured. Type need not be set in Canada. But it is a very different thing putting an author to the expense of printing a work for sixty-five million readers and putting him to the expense of printing for three million readers.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—He will not publish himself, in Canada, and won't allow us to publish, but he wants to force us to buy from the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to explain to you in what favourable position the Canadian publisher stands; the condition upon which copyright is obtained in the United States to the sixty-five millions readers is that they shall set the type for the work in the United States. They are not required to manufacture or print or publish only so far as two books are concerned. To get the copyright in the United States they have to deposit with the librarian of congress two works that have been printed, published and set up in the United States. Now here is nothing to prevent a Canadian publisher purchasing the copyright from English author, setting up the type in the United States, striking off the plate, bringing the plate into Canada and publishing the whole work for this continent in Canada. There is no law against that. The only condition that is attached to the American copyright is that one condition of setting the type. Then from that type stereotype plates can be struck off. They can be brought into Canada here and the work published in Canada and then distributed over the United States and sold there and that will hold the copyright for this continent.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, you would have to pay duty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly they have to pay duty, but there is no other man can go into competition with you. There is no other publisher in the United States or elsewhere can go into competition with you. Our publisher would have the sole right on this continent to sell that work. I am only showing you that Canadian publishers are not forbidden, and all they have to do is to have the pluck and enterprise in order to take hold of it, and they are quite capable of doing it. But so long as they have the right to publish in Canada without costing anything, and pirating the best works in the United States or Great Britain I do not suppose they ask for anything better than that, and therefore they are quite satisfied to leave the matter in its present position. As I said to a manufacturer "If you were to have free trade in this country you would quadruple your business compared with what you are doing to-day." He says, "I believe that, but I am very well satisfied as it is." That is very much the position the Canadian publisher takes. If they have the right to pirate the popular works and pay nothing for it they are very well satisfied; and that is the position in which we are placing our publishers or rather the copyright association seek to place us. Now, I wish to point out to the hon. leader, because he is a man of sufficient experience in legislation and statesmanship to know that public approval has to be at the bottom of all safe legislation. I take the census returns just to see exactly the number of printing and publishing offices and I see that there are 589 in Canada that includes newspaper and all; that their working capital altogether amounts to eight million dollars; they employ altogether 7,500 hands. The total amount they paid out in wages was three million and seventy-nine thousand dollars and the total amount paid out for raw material two million nine hundred and ten thousand dollars, and the total value of articles produced according to this return is eight million three hundred and eighteen thousand dollars. Now, how many publishers and individuals are there in the copyright association who are pressing for a change in our laws so far as withdrawing from the Berne Convention and introducing piracy. Only 26, according to a correspondent in the Mail, out of 589 publishers in Canada who have taken no action in the matter whatever the copyright association only appear to have brought the attention of the government to the matter and upon which the government has been acting. Now, hon. gentlemen, those printing and publishing establishments have attained those large dimensions without the aid of literary piracy, and I would urge upon the government to pause upon the threshold before they legalize what has been termed an immoral practice in dealing with the rights of those who are at our mercy.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

FUR SEAL FISHING IN THE NORTH PACIFIC.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria) rose to Inquire of the government if the Imperial Government has submitted a draft of the proposed bill in restraint of, or to further regulate "Fur Seal fishing in the North Pacific Ocean," and has the Dominion Government furnished the opinions of experts on this subject, or has it been asked by the Imperial Government to do so? Or, will the government be able to indicate now, wherein the proposed legislation and regulations will differ from that now in operation?

He said: This question is one of importance to the whole Dominion, but more particularly to British Columbia. While I admire British institutions, I have to admit that when the imperial authorities come to arbitrate on colonial affairs, especially in connection with international matters in which the United States Government is concerned, I have no confidence in them, and any imperial legislation relating to this country requires the strictest attention here. I have no doubt that our government have safeguarded the imperial legislation in this case with regard to the taking of fur seals in the Pacific Ocean, and that we shall have a bill based on common sense, an element entirely lacking in the regulations now in force. If these regulations had been framed for the purpose of killing off the seal life in the Pacific, instead of protecting it, they could not have been better adapted for the purpose. The seals begin to move from the southern part of California to the breeding grounds in the north in January. Our vessels leave British Columbia in January and go south to meet the seals. They follow them for four months on their way to Behring Sea, and the seals are killed off while they are with young. Then when the seals reach Behring Sea, the prohibition begins, just when the killing of the seals ought to be allowed to go on. I do not know what the regulations will be, but those which are in force at present are simply absurd.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The sooner the seals are killed off the better for British Columbia and for Canada generally. They are great destroyers of the food fish of the country especially salmon, and for the few skins that our sealers secure, it is not worth while protecting them. I believe it is better to preserve the food fish as far as possible, and let the seals go. The object of the British Government seems to be to protect the seal for the benefit of the United States. The sooner we get our claim for damages settled by the United States, and the seals are killed off, the better for Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—How would the hon. gentleman like to have the codfish killed off?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They are food fish; seals are not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The only knowledge the government has of the contents of the measure which has been submitted to the imperial parliament is what they have gleaned from the cable reports that have appeared in the newspapers. Immediately upon reading the cablegram as published, I telegraphed to the High Commissioner to impress upon the Imperial Government not to proceed with a bill of that character until it had been transmitted to the Canadian Government, in order that we might make any comments that we thought necessary upon a question affecting the interests of this country, and himself to send a copy of the bill at the earliest possible moment. It is impossible to say what the intention of the Imperial Government is in reference to this question of the regulations further than this: the law as it stands on the imperial statute books, based upon the award and decision of the Paris arbitration is not such as met the approval of the Canadian Government. Our objection was in the direction indicated by the hon. member from Victoria. We pointed out what we thought was objectionable, and also objected in very strong terms to portions of the regulations which we believe gave to the United States fishermen advantages which could not be enjoyed by Canadians. I will not detail, at the present moment, what they were. Some of these claims have been conceded by the British Government, and we are in hopes that the bill which has been introduced is in the direction of the requirements and wishes and representations of the present government. As soon as we can get any definite information, I shall be glad to lay it before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I am very glad to hear of the steps which have been taken by the government in this matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might add, for the information of those who are particularly interested in the Pacific coast, that no step has been taken in this matter that has not been very closely watched and scrutinized, and not a moment's time is lost in entering our protest where we think the regulations are adverse to our fisheries.

THE FALDING DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of Bill (C) "An Act for the relief of Mary Bradshaw Falding."

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The evidence was only brought down, or placed in my hands, last evening about nine o'clock. I have no objection to the bill—I believe this is a case in which the divorce should be granted—but the evidence should be in our hands at least forty-eight hours before we are called upon to deal with the case.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The evidence was in my possession yesterday. I do not understand how it takes so long to print this evidence. The printing committee ought to see that there is greater promptitude in printing the reports.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time, and passed on a division.

THE ODELL DIVORCE CASE.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE REJECTED.

The Order of the day having been read,

Consideration of the Ninth report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in the matter of Loop Sewell Odell petition.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER said: In moving the adoption of this report a few words of explanation might not be out of place in order that this House might be further seized with the position in which the case now presents itself. I should like the House to understand that the case has not yet come before the committee in any way on the merits—only in reference to the legal points which have arisen in connection with it. The petition of Mr. Odell was duly presented. It was found to be in order and was so reported to this House, but when it was brought in, a counter petition was filed by the respondent, who while not admitting any of the allegations contained in the bill, and in fact expressly denying them and reserving to herself all the grounds and rights she has in contesting the bill, still insists that these proceedings should not now be taken into consideration, because a suit in which the same questions arise is now before the civil courts of this country. It appears that last year Mr. Odell brought an action in the Superior Court for the district of Quebec for a separation, for the custody of the children, and for a settlement of certain rights of property. This case was tried before a single judge, and a verdict was recorded for the plaintiff against the present respondent. Upon this, however, being appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench, which is the highest court in the province of Quebec, the finding of the court below was reversed, and the action was dismissed. Against this judgment Mr. Odell has now appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. The case has not yet been tried, and I understand it has been postponed to the fall term of the Supreme Court, in which case it will be impossible—at least I hope it will be impossible—that it should be adjudicated upon during the present session of parliament. The respondent alleges that the case will be prejudiced and her rights and interests will be jeopardized by these proceedings being now taken into consideration, because she states, in the event of a divorce being granted the relative positions of the parties to the suit might be materially affected. Upon this counter petition being presented, your committee reported that the petition was correct, and that they had considered this counter petition and reported as follows :

3. Your committee have also carefully considered the petition of the said Marie Louise Laurentine Gregory, the respondent in this matter, presented to your honourable House on Monday, the 29th of April instant, praying that in view of an action en réparation de corps et de biens now pending between the said parties and in appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec, she may not be subjected to a double trial, and that the bill of divorce may not be taken into consideration until such time as the issue raised in the civil courts, now pending in the Supreme Court of Canada, be finally determined.

4. On consideration of the said petition of the respondent and of the certified copy of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec filed therewith, your committee recommend that further action on the petition of Loop Sewell Odell be deferred until such time as the respective parties have been heard by counsel before your committee and report thereon has been made by your committee.

In accordance with instructions, both parties to the suit were notified to appear before us on a certain day. They did so by their counsel, and the case was very fully and ably argued by Mr. Pelletier, for the respondent, and by Mr. Hogg and Mr. Lemieux for the petitioner, with the result that, as the opinions of these eminent counsels were diametrically opposed to one another, your committee had to give the matter their own most serious consideration and draw their own conclusions on the subject. It was perfectly plain that the questions which were at issue before the courts—that is the custody of the children and the right of property—were such as this House would not take cognizance of. It was equally patent that the remaining portion—that is the petition for divorce—was one which was out of the jurisdiction of the courts, and so far there was no conflict. The only question then was as to whether, in the event of a divorce being granted and the marriage tie being dissolved, the position of the relative parties to the suits in question would be altered to the prejudice of either or of both. Your committee came to the conclusion that they had nothing else to do with the matters outside of those which came before us in their own particular province ; that if they were to allow extraneous matters of this sort to be introduced where parties to a divorce wished to have a postponement, either before or after divorce proceedings were instituted, one or other of them might take action against the other, and then apply for a stay of proceedings here on the ground that certain matters in question were sub judice. The opinion of several members of the committee was that, even in the event of a divorce being granted, the proceedings in the courts might be very easily amended so as to meet the altered condition of affairs by the divorce ; and, indeed, I do not see why we ourselves, if we were to make a report recommending a divorce, should not provide that in such an event the relative position of the parties to these suits should not be changed in any event, outside of what we are to decide by our dissolution of the marriage tie if we did so. I hope this explanation has placed the matter clearly before the House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH.—My hon. friend has fairly laid before the House the position of the case, but he must see that the same ground upon which the action was instituted before the courts, are the grounds on which the divorce is sought here. The question of adultery is the main question which is yet on trial in the civil courts in the province of Quebec and you are asked virtually here now to sit in appeal and to overrule the decision of the highest court in Quebec, the Court of Queen's Bench over-ruling five judges, headed by Chief Justice Lacoste, who dismissed the case. It was tried before one judge and the main issue was simply one of adultery; and the trial judge decided in favour of the petitioner, but on appeal the action was dismissed by the court of five judges. Now we are virtually asked to sit as a court of appeal and to overrule the judgment of the highest tribunal of the province of Quebec. How unreasonable, how unqualified we must see ourselves to be to assume such a position, constituted as we are? I do not see any reason why we should do that. I cannot see that there is any occasion for it. This petitioner, Odell, a wealthy man, makes his choice. He prefers to go to the civil courts of the land instead of coming to Parliament, and the courts have decided against him so far, and he is not satisfied with the decision of the highest court in Quebec but he appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada and puts his wife to all the expense of this litigation (and the expense has been enormous), and while that is yet undetermined, he comes here and asks us to overrule the judgment of a civil tribunal, the court which he selected to obtain redress. Now, I ask the House in all seriousness whether they will do that—whether a man will have a right to carry on a double action? He has utterly failed in his civil action, and he comes and endeavours to get from the Senate what he has failed, so far, in getting from the courts in the province of Quebec. I think this tribunal is not anxious to be in conflict with the judgment of the civil court. Why not let this litigation go on to a final termination? The expenses have all been met and they are very great. You ask this woman to bring up all her witnesses and try the case de novo before us. I think we should not do that. It seems to me to be taking the case out of the hands of the civil tribunal while it is yet pending and to determine it here, and, in fact, to overrule the decision of the highest court in the province of Quebec. I think we should not take that position. This petitioner should do one thing or the other. He should either withdraw that suit from the civil court and go on here or else indemnify his wife—for I suppose she is a comparatively poor woman—for the cost of bringing all those witnesses before the divorce committee. It is a dangerous proceeding to be taken by parliament, which is by no means as qualified and capable as the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench or the Supreme Court of Canada, to which the petitioner, Odell, has now appealed, to try such a question. Of course the court there cannot separate them. They have not the power; but if he succeeds in his action before the civil tribunal, the other, as a matter of course, will follow; but it is merely a question of adultery as it now stands, the highest court in Quebec having decided that the plaintiff has no cause of action, I do not think that we are to sit as a court of appeal to attempt to over-rule their decision. This divorce bill is asked for on the ground of adultery, and the civil suit now pending is based on exactly the same charge.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—As a member of that committee I must differ from the remarks of the last speaker. When the case came up before the committee, as the hon. mover of this report has said, it was very ably argued by counsel on both sides. The position is simply this: the petitioner applied for a legal separation and the case was tried before a judge of the Superior Court in the Quebec district. Adultery was proven beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the judges' ruling was found to be based upon false premises I do not think the hon. gentleman is justified in saying that. I understand five judges over-ruled the decision of one judge.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The evidence of her adultery was overwhelming, according to the statements made by counsel for the petitioner and not contradicted by the opposing counsel. She appealed from the decision of that judge to the Court of Queen's Bench in the province of Quebec, by which court it was tried. The decision of the single judge was reversed, not on the ground that she was not guilty of the offence alleged, but simply because the husband had condoned her offences. Upon that verdict being given, the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and the case has not been heard there yet.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, I think it is premature to bring a matter of that kind before this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not think it is fair to the respondent, nor do I think this House will listen to it. Whatever may have taken place in the court at Quebec is a different thing from what may take place here, and it is time enough for us to get that evidence when it is reported from the proper source, but to prejudice the case at this stage is not fair.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—When I was interrupted, I was replying to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. My only reason for referring at the present time to the evidence adduced before the Quebec courts is that the evidence was argued for hours before the committee by able counsel on both sides, and I am endeavouring to show the House why the committee came to the conclusion to recommend the report now under consideration. The counsel also states that the respondent would be put to double expense. The committee gave the respondent to understand, through her counsel, that every dollar of expense that would be incurred by her having to appear here and defend herself, and the cost of bringing her witnesses here, would be borne by the petitioner.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That has been repudiated by the party since then.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—As far as I am aware it has not been repudiated by the petitioner and his counsel.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend is in error.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—If I am in error, all I have to say is this, that every member of the committee, with the exception of the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, hold the same views that I do on the question. I know that the majority of that committee will not proceed with the case until an order is made by them that he will supply every dollar necessary to bring her here and to defray her expenses and the expenses of her counsel and witnesses. The position we took was this: That as long as the petitioner complied with all the rules and regulations, it was not for them, a committee of this House, to take cognizance of any other case pending in a lower court. Parliament is the supreme court, and if the petitioner has not a good case, and if he has condoned her offences as the counsel contended, then he will simply not get his divorce. I know that the committee will not for a moment consent to grant him a divorce if he has in any way condoned his wife's offences, and as far as the other case pending in the courts here is concerned, we were given distinctly to understand that it simply involved the custody of the children. The Senate has not for a great number of years interfered in any way as to the custody of children. We have nothing at all to do with that; and consequently I cannot see how the recommendation of the Divorce Committee or even the granting of a divorce, can in any way prejudice the respondents, case now before the Supreme Court, or affect injuriously the interests of the children.

Hon. Mr. READ (Québec)—The question of expense came up in the committee and at once the complainant's counsel stated—and I think the gentleman who was asking for the bill was sitting by—that they would bear all expenses. I have been on that committee all the time since and I have never heard that that offer has been withdrawn. Certainly it has not been withdrawn when the committee has been sitting. As I understand the case, this complainant can prove several cases of adultery against the respondent; but the Court of Queen's Bench held that he had condoned two cases. As I understand, there are several other cases to be brought against her. The other issues are to be tried besides the two cases which the court held he had condoned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a maxim of law that it is the part of a good judge to increase his own jurisdiction, but I do not think that is the feeling of this House; on the contrary, hon. gentlemen in this House have time and again stated their strong opinions that those divorce cases should be taken from the jurisdiction of the Senate and tried in the courts, on the ground that the ordinary tribunals of the country are better able to deal with questions of evidence and law than was the committee of the Senate. Now, I am surprised to hear some of the very gentlemen who took that ground most strongly advocating that the Senate Committee should act as a sort of Court of Appeal from the highest tribunal in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—But they are not applying for a divorce there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says that they are not applying for a divorce. As I understand the case it is just this, that the same evidence which would be required to satisfy this House that the party was entitled to a divorce would be required in the province of Quebec to entitle the party to a séparation de corps et de biens. The cases are exactly similar. The Court of Queen's Bench of the province of Quebec—a court composed, I understand, of able judges and presided over by a gentleman whom we all know to be a sound lawyer and a man of ability and integrity, the Hon. Sir Alexandre Lacoste—unanimously decided that the petitioner in this case was not entitled to a séparation de corps et de biens, and not entitled to the custody of his children. The petitioner is a rich man, and appeals from that decision to the Supreme Court of Canada; and now this House is asked, at this juncture, to step in and take the question from out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and to deal with it here. It is a proposition such as has never been made to this House before and one that I do not believe honourable members of this House will entertain. Look at the future. I have the greatest respect for the Committee on Divorce in this House.

Hon. Mr. READ—You never give them a vote.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have the highest respect for the legal knowledge and ability of the hon. gentleman who is now acting as chairman of that committee. Partly because I have confidence in and respect for the committee, I believe that the committee would ultimately arrive at the same conclusion which the Court of Queen's Bench in Quebec have come to, and then all the time and money expended in connection with the hearing before this tribunal would have been wasted. Why should we do that?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The petitioner pays for it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Admitting that he pays for it: why should the time of the committee and the House be taken up with a matter that is now being considered in a tribunal which is much better fitted to deal with it than this House is? Hon. gentlemen speak as though the only question involved were the question of money. Anyone who has been present at a meeting of the Committee on Divorce of this House must feel obliged to dissent from that opinion. The position of the respondent in this case, being examined and cross-examined in the presence of a number of gentlemen, would be a most painful one, and I do not think we are justified in compelling that lady to undergo such torture, when there is no necessity for it. The position of the respondent is quite as bad as the proverbial one of the toad under the harrow. If by declining to go further with this matter now we were closing the door to Mr. Odell for the future, there might be some question about the propriety of our not hearing the case any further now; but it seems to me the ends of justice will be best met in this way; let the proceedings before the Divorce Committee cease, with the understanding that if Mr. Odell succeeds before the ultimate court of appeal, the proceedings can be taken up next session at the same stage at which they stop now. I think that will be a reasonable course and will not involve any needless additional expense to him and it will not involve any unnecessary delay. The husband is separated from his wife now, I presume, and he can bear the separation for a few months more. I hope that the Senate will not establish what I feel will be a very vicious precedent by undertaking to proceed with this case. The proper course is to decide now that we shall go no further, but that the proceedings shall be suspended until the Senate is made aware of the decision of the Supreme Court. The hon. gentleman from Victoria was very emphatic on the point that we were not supposed to know anything about the proceedings which were taken elsewhere. In former years, when we dealt with alimony, or undertook to deal with alimony and the custody of the children—and I fancy it is still the practice—it was quite a common thing under our rules where proceedings had been taken in any court, that exemplifications of those proceedings should be submitted to this House and referred to the committee to help them in their inquiries. It is absurd to shut our eyes to the fact that this case has gone through the courts of Quebec and is now before the highest court of appeal in Canada.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—There is one explanation I forgot to make. I intended to refer to the Hart case which was before the Senate in 1888. Mrs. Hart applied—

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken; it is not an explanation of what the hon. member from Halifax has said. If he makes another speech I shall have an opportunity to answer that, with regard to the Hart case.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—What this report is asking from this House is to settle here a question of civil rights which is now pending in the courts. That is the real issue involved in the adoption of the report.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is not the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I will prove that it is the question. What is the question before this House? The petitioner comes here asking that this House shall declare that the tie of marriage is dissolved; then if that is to be the solution, what will be the position of the parties before the other courts? What will Mr. Odell or Mrs. Odell gain by a judgment of the Supreme Court when this House has declared that the tie of marriage is dissolved.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This House will decide that question on evidence and evidence alone.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Now it is said that all the rules and regulations have been complied with, and, therefore, that Mr. Odell has a right to come here and seek a divorce. Well there is one thing that we must not forget; public rights must be superior to private rights, and when a matter of public interest, involving the question of civil rights is at issue, I think that public rights must supersede any private rights of Mrs. or Mr. Odell. It has been said that the court below has reversed the judgment, but not on the ground that adultery had not been proved. Well, as a matter of fact, the Court of Queen's Bench in Quebec in reversing the judgment said: "We do not want to ascertain if adultery has been committed or not; we do not want to enter into that matter, but should it be the case that adultery has been proved, there is also the proof that condonation took place. We do not say that adultery has been proved, but even if it has been proved, there is condonation, and for that reason we reverse the judgment." That is not finding that adultery has been proved. As regards custody of the children, that does not come up here at all. Whatever decision the Senate comes to, the children will be given to the parent who is fit to have the custody of them. They may be given to the father to-day, and if the father does not behave well, they may be removed from him later on and given to other relations. That is a separate question altogether and does not come up here for redress; but one thing is evident, and will I suppose impress all the hon. members of this House that in passing a bill of divorce to-day you are changing the position of the parties before the courts, and rendering all appeal from the courts impossible. Some one said that a stay in the proceedings of this House on the ground that there is actually an appeal in the Supreme Court might have this effect in the future; that anyone petitioning for a bill of divorce here may have his case blocked at any time if the respondent takes a suit in the civil courts. In this instance such is not the case; it was not the respondent who took the case in the courts, it is the petitioner himself, it is the same party who addresses himself simultaneously to the courts and to the Senate, so that that objection cannot apply to the facts of the present case. The members of the Divorce Committee will remember that the respondent offered, by her counsel, to come before them provided the petitioner would withdraw his suit from the Supreme Court. What was the answer to that offer? The petitioner refused. He said: "I will accept it provided you sign an undertaking that I shall have the custody of the children." But the question of the custody of the children had nothing to do with this case.

Hon. Mr. READ—It has everything to do with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No. At the present moment the father has all the children. I think this offer made by the respondent before the Committee on Divorce will show this House that she does not refuse to accept the decision of the committee, but she does not want her position with the other party to be changed by any ruling of this House before the suit is dealt with in the Supreme Court, For this reason I move in amendment :

That the ninth report of the Select Committee on Divorce be not adopted, but that it be referred back to the said committee with instructions to amend it in such a way as to allow the counter petition of the respondent Mary Louise Laurentine Gregory and to stay proceedings pending the proceedings in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—This amendment seems to place this body in an inferior position. I hold it is the highest tribunal in the land ; and it is not proper to say that we should wait to hear the decision of some tribunal. The issue to be tried before this committee of the Senate are different It is simply the question of adultery, and this issue cannot be tried in any other court in this country.

HON. Mr. KAULBACH—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—I mean the question of divorce ; whereas in the other court they have to decide on the other point, as to their civil rights. We do not intend, and never did intend, to interfere with their civil rights. Supposing this goes on and the Senate agree to give this man a divorce, they have the same alternative and the same power of applying to the other courts in Quebec on the other points involved as to the maintenance of the children and some other questions which may arise ; therefore, the two cases are not the same. Now in this case I am told (whether it is true or not I cannot say) that evidence will be brought before the Senate which has never been brought out in the courts of Quebec—evidence of such a character that will incriminate this woman to such an extent that it will be utterly impossible to refuse to grant the divorce. Would it not be more satisfactory to everybody to let this evidence be brought out here, rather than leave the case to be decided by judges who, however eminent they may be, must base their decision on the evidence taken in the court below ?

If this case would prejudice in any way the case of the respondent, I should not advocate it, but I cannot see how it will have such an effect. On the contrary, it will have the effect of settling a long standing dispute between the parties. It is all-important that the matter should be decided as soon as possible. The husband says that his wife has committed acts of adultery, and she, in the counter petition, denies the charge to a great extent. He says in reply "I can prove to the satisfaction of the House to the fullest extent that my allegations are true, and that I am entitled to the relief which I ask." If that is the case, will it not be a denial of justice to prevent that person bringing forward evidence which will establish his case before the highest tribunal in the land? I have the greatest respect for the judges of the province of Quebec, but we know that they are divided in their opinion on the case. Since the trial of the suit other evidence has been discovered which, I claim, should be submitted to this House. In the Hart case, which has been referred to, the court below decided against the petitioner, but the Senate, the highest court in the land, over-ruled that and granted the woman the release which she sought. We ought to be very careful and guard our own rights, and we should not be influenced one way or the other, but, since this power is delegated to the Senate, we ought to fulfil our duties fearlessly and independently. If you want to abolish the court, all right. If you want to prevent divorce altogether, all right, but so long as we have the duty of acting in these matters we should not allow any outside tribunal to interfere with the discharge of that duty. I think the committee have acted judiciously in reporting as they have done. A great deal of time has been lost already, and I hope the House will be prepared to let the evidence be taken. And if it is of the character that the petitioner describes, let the man have his divorce. If it is not, the case will be dismissed and there will be an end to this unfortunate litigation.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have had some experience on the Divorce Committee, and since I retired from it, I have felt disposed always to give a great deal of weight to the report which the committee may make after hearing the evidence presented to them on both sides ; because I am bound to believe that they have very much better facilities to determine the rights and the wrongs of the parties than the Senate as a body. This is not a motion to grant a divorce; it is a preliminary report on a difficulty which has arisen with regard to procedure. In discussing all these cases we are sitting here as judges. We are not here to speculate as to the probable evidence that will come before us in the future. We can only take cognizance of what has come before the court already. I do not agree altogether with the remarks made by the senior member from Halifax. His argument seems to be based on the conclusion that the action in the civil courts and the action before the Senate are analogous. The two contests are parallel so far as the facts on which they are founded go, but the results are entirely different. The case before the civil court relates more particularly to the custody of the children while the case before us is an application for an absolute divorce which the civil courts are unable to grant; and therefore whatever may be the result of the contest in the civil courts, the application for divorce must finally be decided by the Senate. Therefore the contests are different, but I submit when it has been clearly shown by the petition of the respondent that a case is before the highest court of appeal involving the question largely of adultery, and that being the question on which this divorce must finally be decided by the committee, it is scarcely seemly that this matter should be proceeded with now if the effect would be to prejudice, as it possibly might, respondent in the case. We must remember that the plaintiff in the civil courts is the plaintiff here for this divorce. He is the same party, and, therefore, under all the circumstances, as it only involves a matter of delay and the plaintiff is unwilling to drop one or the other case, it appears to me with all deference to the committee, that it would be more seemly and judicious and in the public interest if the consideration of this case were deferred until the decision in the Supreme Court is heard.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As a member of the committee I should like to express my views upon the motion that is now before the House. When the case was before the committee, I asked particularly whether, in hearing this evidence, there was anything that was likely to prejudice the case before the civil courts, and I gathered that there was nothing that was likely to take place that would do so. From what my hon. friend from Rideau division has said, I take a different view of the matter. He has stated that evidence is likely to come out before the Divorce Committee that will prejudice the case pending in the civil courts. I do not think the Senate should be made a medium by which the lower courts may be influenced in any decision that is brought before them.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—There is no reflection on the committee if we adopt the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is no reflection on the committee and no injustice to the petitioner. He can come here next year and get his divorce if he is entitled to it. If the object is to divert attention from the case now before the civil courts, I do not think we ought to assist the petitioner in accomplishing that object. It only brings out more vividly the necessity of establishing a divorce court that is more capable of taking hold of these things than the Senate is. Questions affecting legal points should be consigned to legal tribunals. Divorce is decided upon a question of fact, not as a matter of public policy, a light it seems to be frequently regarded in by hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—While the civil courts held that two cases of adultery had been condoned, it was stated by counsel for the petitioner, within hearing of the opposite counsel, that other and fresh cases were to be brought before the committee. As I understand it, the Supreme Court will only have the evidence which was given before the court below, and will know nothing about what has taken place since the action was tried. If this misconduct is going on, if there is a continuation of misbehaviour on the part of the complainant's wife, why should it not be brought out?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is only what the counsel said. That is no evidence.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—It is no evidence, but that is the statement of counsel. It was publicly stated by petitioner's counsel also that all the expenses would be paid. Of course this is another religious fight.

One is a Roman Catholic and the other is a Protestant, and that is why the report is opposed. (Cries of no, no.)

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am not a Roman Catholic and I oppose the report.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—I hope there will be some Premier in this country who will have back-bone enough to establish a divorce court for old Canada. There are divorce courts in the other provinces, and why should we not have them in Ontario and Quebec and relieve this House of this class of cases? I hope my hon. friend, the senior member from Halifax, will introduce a bill of that kind if his party should ever be in power. Something was said about this report being a reflection on the court. Do we not know that Mrs. Campbell was refused alimony by the courts and did not Parliament give her alimony? That is a case in which Parliament over-ruled the decision of the courts below.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not very often that I take part in discussions of these delicate questions, but on all occasions I pay great deference to the reports of the committee, taking care (not from any love I have for that kind of literature) to read the evidence in order to satisfy myself that the reports based on the evidence are such as to justify me in voting for any divorce. But in this case I must confess that my mind runs precisely in the same direction as that of the hon. gentleman from Hopewell. I can see no particular injury that can possibly arise to Mr. Odell by allowing the Supreme Court to decide, while the case is before it, what the rights of the parties are. The Senate has, as my hon. friend from Marquette says, but one duty to perform, and that is to ascertain whether the plaintiff is entitled to a separation from the wife or the wife from the husband. In this case you have one court deciding in one way, and you have another court deciding in another way. It may be, as the hon. member from Quinté has intimated, that fresh evidence can be brought before the committee, but does it not strike all of us as rather an indelicate position in which to place the Senate by stating that the plaintiff intends to prove so and so? The allegations may be true or false, but the House will not record a vote upon what may or may not be established. It is time enough for us to decide that question when the evidence has been taken by the committee and laid before the House. No matter which way the Supreme Court of Canada decides this question, it will, to a greater or less extent, prejudice the other party. If the Supreme Court affirms the decision of the court below, then it will be upon the evidence which is placed before it, that if the woman has committed adultery whether there was condonation. We have nothing before us at the present moment to show whether other acts on her part have been committed which would justify a divorce; it will be time enough to decide that question when the evidence is brought before the House. If I thought it would not prejudice the case before the Supreme Court, I would vote for the report of the committee, but we would be acting very precipitately were we to intervene between these parties who are now in litigation and particularly while the case is sub judice before the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You do not block the case by the decision.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We do not by our action to-day block the case no matter what way it may be decided by the Supreme Court. If the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench of the province of Quebec is proved to be right, and sustains the woman in her contentions, that does not prevent the petitioner from going on afterwards and applying for a divorce upon the further evidence which my hon. friend from Quinté says can be produced, as to which the petitioner would probably prove that there had been no condonation. For myself individually I feel constrained to vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—When I was called to order I wanted to remind the House of a case which came before us in 1888. Mrs. Hart, who was the petitioner, had applied to the courts of the province of Quebec for a legal separation, the only separation that could be given in that province. The court decided against her, and notwithstanding that, she applied to the Senate for a divorce. I happened to be a member of the Divorce Committee at that time, and the committee reported in favour of granting the divorce and the House passed it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend must remember there was no appeal taken in that case.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am aware of that, but if the recommendation of the committee is an act of discourtesy or disrespect to the courts of the province of Quebec in the present instance, was it not a still greater act of disrespect on the part of the Senate to take up a case that had been adjudicated upon by the courts of that province. In this case the petitioner may bring fresh evidence here and establish his case, or he may not; my contention is that as the Parliament of Canada is the highest tribunal in the land, if a case is brought before us in a regular form the committee has no right to know whether a case is pending in the inferior courts or not. If every rule of the Senate has been complied with, I claim that we cannot do otherwise than proceed with the case, and if we find the petitioner has a just and good cause, to report in his favour, and if not, to throw it out. In this case, if adultery cannot be proved, the committee of the Senate will recommend that no divorce be granted, and that ends it, and then it will be in favour of the defendant in her case before the Supreme Court of Canada. This is a case that will work both ways. If the petitioner is successful, it may possibly prejudice her case a little. If he is not successful here then there is no doubt about it that they will throw him out of court although the issues are somewhat different.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman from Victoria refers to the Hart case. I was on the Divorce Committee when the Hart case was before it; there was no appeal pending in that instance. The case had gone through the courts and judgment had been rendered, and we were obliged to take cognizance of the decisions of the other courts. My hon. friend is in ignorance as to the position in which we stand under the rules of the Senate. That case had been finally decided. We want the same thing done here—let the case be finally decided in the courts, and if the party who loses there has a good case on new matter, arising since he instituted proceedings in the Superior Court of Quebec, then we can deal with it here. In the Hart case there had been no appeal—it came up on a new petition and fresh evidence. The Hart case was tried on its merits. Let us take the same course here, and then if there is new evidence it can be brought before this tribunal.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I merely rise for the purpose of removing what may possibly be a false impression. As far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for the other gentlemen on that committee, there has not been any feeling, personal or religious, in the decision at which we have arrived. I wish to say that because the statement has been made, As far as the report of the committee is concerned, if the House chooses to take the case out of our hands, and say that we are not to take it up this session, I shall be very glad. We have had a toilsome session of it, and have been dealing with important and protracted cases. Whatever may be the feeling of this House with regard to the decision of the courts, and whatever influence it may have on the hon. gentlemen themselves, they are quite mistaken if they think that the action of the Senate will have any effect upon the Supreme Court. That court is not waiting to get the opinion of gentlemen in the committee, or in this House, on cases which come before them on appeal, and, therefore, the decision of the House on this report will not affect the case before the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—While agreeing fully with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Hopewell, I do not agree in the conclusion which he draws from them. The very thoughts which he presented to us have led me to form the opposite conclusion of believing that the report of the committee should be sustained. I have great faith in the committee which has been appointed. They have been very carefully selected, and they represent probably the very best elements of the Senate that could be put on a committee for that purpose. It would, therefore, require very strong evidence that they were mistaken to induce me to disapprove of any report they might make—strong evidence that they have been led astray. Such proof has not been submitted to the House. Many points have been brought up which have no relevancy to the case. The remark has been made here that we might, by our action, jeopardize the rights of the parties in the case now before the Supreme Court. I regard the question very much as the hon. member from Quinté division does—the two things are so totally distinct that while the divorce can only be granted by the Senate, the custody of the children and the disposition of the property comes exclusively under the jurisdiction of the civil courts. They are totally distinct things. No other court can give the relief which is sought from the Senate in the matter of divorce. It is admitted by all that in settling any case in a court it is desirable that the whole of the truth should be brought out. Is it not put in the oath of every witness that he shall speak not only the truth, but the whole truth? The statement has been made that the only evidence which can be submitted to the Supreme Court is the evidence already taken. The question which they have to decide is not whether this woman has been guilty of adultery, but whether the Court of Queen's Bench of the province of Quebec, gave a proper decision on the evidence submitted to it. It has been very plainly stated, and I have no doubt with truth, that there is a great deal of additional evidence to be brought out, before a right conclusion can be arrived at as to the guilt of the respondent. If so, why should it not be brought out? It cannot be brought out in the Supreme Court and the Senate is the only place where it can be.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They can await the decision of the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Where is the necessity of awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.—Why did the petitioner go there?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Under these circumstances, believing that no injustice would be done, that the civil rights of the parties will in no degree be prejudiced by the action taken by the Senate, and that the Senate is the only court where the question of divorce can be considered and decided, I shall support the recommendation of the committee.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I have not, though a member of the committee, taken part in the debate on this question. The hon. member from Sarnia has expressed the views which I hold, and which lead me to the conclusion embraced in the report of the committee.

The Senate divided on the amendment which was adopted by the following vote:

THE CHUTE DIVORCE CASE.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the 12th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce in the matter of Julia Ethel Chute's petition.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW introduced Bill (1) "An Act for the relief of Julia Ethel Chute."

The Bill was read the first time.

SHORE LINE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (H) "An Act respecting the Shore Line Railway Co". He said: This railway runs from St. John to St. Stephens in the province of New Brunswick. It follows the shore of the Bay of Fundy. It was built a number of years ago and called the Grand Southern Railway; and subsequently by the action, I think, of the mortgagees, the name of the company was changed in the local statutes, and it is now called the Shore Line Railway Company. This Shore Line Railway Company now ask for legislation in order that they may be recognized as a Dominion road, or come under the jurisdiction of the Dominion, and have the power of extension and connection and to purchase another line of railway, called the Central Road. These are the only points that it is necessary to explain about the bill. It is not a very long one, and I trust that the committee will be able to examine into it when it goes before them.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

ST. JOHN RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER moved the second reading of Bill (28) "An Act to incorporate the St. John River Bridge Company." He said: The bridges are to be located on the St. John River above the Grand Falls, between the Grand Falls and Fort Kent, 160 miles up.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In what county?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It stops at the Grand Falls.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Away up the river?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Yes. It is proposed to grant the company the privilege of building four bridges at different intervals, as they are required.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (57) "An Act to incorporate the Trail Creek and Columbia River Company."
—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington).

HAMILTON DISTILLERY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (38) "An Act to incorporate the Hamilton Distillery Company, Limited."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise for the purpose of directing the attention of the hon. gentleman from St. John to the character of this bill. It is an Act to incorporate the Hamilton Distillery Company, Limited. The effect of this bill will be to intensify and aggravate the unfortunate state of things which the hon. gentleman exhibited to the House yesterday. The little opportunity there is for getting in good old Jamaica to the lower provinces will be further diminished by this company. I have no doubt they are a company of bloated capitalists, and our importers in the lower provinces will have their business in regard to importing Jamaica almost completely destroyed by this bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman from Halifax feels sore, because Halifax is the depot for Jamaica. They used to live on Jamaica, but recently the merchants of St. John came here and asked for a steamship service to keep up the trade they had lost. Therefore, I do not think it behoves the senior member for Halifax to get up here and throw ridicule on the trade of his old city, because it is well known that if it were not for the West India trade and the few troops that are stationed there, Halifax would be a very small place.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Halifax has lost her little liquor trade and the county from which I come now enjoys that trade.

The motion was agreed to.

THE JAMES MACLAREN COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (29) "An Act to incorporate the James MacLaren Company, Limited."

The motion was agreed to and the bill was then read a third time and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

INSURANCE ON LIVES OF CHILDREN.

INQUIRY POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN rose to Direct attention of the Senate to the crimes said to have been developed from the practice of affecting "Insurances on the lives of children, and those incompetent to make personal application for such insurances," and ask the government if they propose to take any measures to restrict or prevent such practices?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I would request the hon. member to let this inquiry stand until Tuesday next. There is a very serious question involved in this matter, and the government has had no opportunity of considering the propriety of adopting such legislation as the circumstances may require. We are endeavouring to procure necessary information, and it is very likely that by Tuesday next I shall be in a position to declare what the intention of the government is. I refer to the point which seems to have arisen from the fact that life insurance companies are largely insuring children, and that some of the insurances thus effected have been for illegal purposes.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have much pleasure in acceding to the request of the hon. minister, and will not proceed with the matter to-day.

The motion was allowed to stand until Tuesday next.

SECOND READING.

Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club."—(Mr. Kirchhoffer).

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (56) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited."

He said: This Parliament last session passed an Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited. One of the principal provisions, I believe, of that Act was to enable this new company, incorporated by the Act, to take over the business of two existing companies, one of which is the Nova Scotia Steel and Forge Company, and the bill which is now before the House is to ratify the sale made by the Steel and Forge Company to the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited, and also to amend one section in the act of last year. Subsection "b," of section 10, of the Act of last year, authorized the company to secure any sums borrowed by the company. The clause of the bill before us makes the subsection read "Hypothecate, mortgage or pledge the real and personal property and franchise of the company"—the words "mortgage" and "franchise" are inserted—"or any part thereof to secure any sums borrowed by the company." I wish it to be understood that in moving the second reading of the bill, I do not feel bound to support it, in all its details, or without any amendment, hereafter. The bill comes from the province of Nova Scotia, and the petition was handed to me to introduce. The bill was placed in my hands, but I do not wish to be understood as advocating that the bill shall pass in the exact form in which it comes here. The committee to whom the bill will be referred will of course consider the bill and give fair consideration to any objections which may be urged against it in its present state. I understand there are some of the shareholders in the Steel and Forge Company who object to the passing of this bill, and I presume that representatives of those shareholders will appear before the committee. I have no doubt the committee will do what is right and just in the matter.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I suppose it has received the assent of a majority of the Steel Forge Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, it has received the assent of the majority of the shareholders of the Steel and Forge Company. Those who think their rights would be unduly interfered with if the bill passed in its present state are in a minority.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It is simply to confirm the sale.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Chiefly.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I do not rise to oppose the second reading of this bill, but to thank the hon. member for the fair and candid way in which he has explained it to the House. Very strong representations have been sent here against the bill passing in its present shape, and those will be laid before the committee to which it is referred, and I trust the committee will give them serious consideration, because if the allegations of the parties who have petitioned against it are true, it is a piece of unjust tyranny by the majority. I trust, therefore, that it will be fully considered before the committee.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I think the committee would require to take extra good care, because there have been some very false representations made one way or the other. I looked carefully through the correspondence from one of the shareholders, or more than one of the shareholders, and it looks at the present time, from their standpoint, to be a most unfair transaction for a minority to be forced to dispose of property that has been paying and put into the hands of property that has never paid at all since ever it began, and I do think if there ever was a bill which should be carefully looked into, this one should be. I am really astonished that it passed the other House at all.

The motion was agreed to.

RED MOUNTAIN RAILWAY COMPANY'S ACT.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (58) "An Act respecting the Red Mountain Railway Company." He said: This company is incorporated in British Columbia as a railway company, and seeks a Dominion charter to enable it to sell its bonds in England more readily. The bill contains the usual clauses about the issuing of bonds, so much per mile, and the capital stock, and about having telegraph wires along the whole of the lines and the usual clauses of a Railway Act.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (54) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa and Aylmer Railway and Bridge Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

THIRD READING.

Bill (38) "An Act respecting the Hamilton Distillery Company." (Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

TRAIL CREEK AND COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (57) "An Act to incorporate the Trail Creek and Columbia Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: The committee thought that the time, which was reduced to two weeks notice by the clause, is insufficient. They thought it better to retain the clause which we have in the Railway Act requiring a notice of four weeks.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It brings the bill in conformity with the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the adoption of the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE BEHRING SEA SEAL FISHERY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the prime minister if any further information has been received from the Imperial Government with regard to the proposed regulation of the seal fisheries in the Pacific

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I informed the Senate a few days ago that on reading a cablegram in the newspapers I telegraphed to Sir Charles Tupper to ascertain what they proposed to do and also to delay any action in case it should affect in any way the seal fisheries of this country. I received the following telegram to-day :

Colonial Office say apparently some misapprehension about Behring Sea Bill. It simply renews Fisheries North Pacific Act, 1893, which expires July 1st. That it will hardly get through so could not be delayed. Is required to give effect agreement Russia as to Western Pacific sealing and will be found more favourable than Sealers' Act, 1893.

It shows at least that they have acceded to some objections which we have entered in a protest against some of the provisions of the old Act. Whether it goes as far as we should like or not, I am unable to say.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Act of 1893 did not deal with that part of the Pacific.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The agreement was between Russia, Canada and the United States as to certain sealing restrictions which had been made. This, as I interpret it, means that it is more favourable to British sealers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Russia came into the agreement after 1893, and now she wants to be on the same footing as the United States of America. That is the idea, I believe.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Russia was not a party to the agreement.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No. She wishes to become a party to it now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My impression is that it means the agreement with Russia is more favourable than the agreement of 1893 with the United States.

THE COPYRIGHT ACT.

DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Boulton :

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General ; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return of the correspondence in regard to International Copyright during the past year.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said : When the debate adjourned on Wednesday I was engaged in discussing the question of copyright so far as it effected the authors and publishers of Canada. Since speaking on this subject, I have been corrected in regard to the dates of the Acts I have been referring to. The Act of 1875 is, I believe, the foundation of our present copyright legislation. The Act of 1842 governs at present our copyright relations with Great Britain. This Act gives to British authors under their copyright registration protection throughout the British Empire. Since 1886 the same privileges have been enjoyed by Canadian authors under their copyright registration. This is one of the grievances which the Copyright Association in Canada complain of, although reciprocal they wish it stopped. This reciprocity in copyright was secured to us in 1886 by the International Copyright Act, which appears in our statutes of 1887.

The right of British authors was affirmed in Smiles vs. Belford, 23 Grant's Chancery Reports, page 590, where the question of copyright is very fully discussed and applies to the present state of the law. It was further found in that case that if a British author desired to prevent the importation into Canada of pirated copies in a foreign country, he must copyright his book in Canada as well as in England. This is the only reason why British authors who have obtained copyright in the mother country, also copyright in Canada for the purpose of preventing, if possible, American reprints from entering Canada, in which case they would, of course, not be entitled to the twelve and one-half per cent collectable by the Canadian customs.

The non-admission of foreign reprints was a subject of bitter complaint here many years ago. It was on this account that the Imperial Government sanctioned the "Foreign Reprints Act of 1847," whereby they agreed in the event of colonial authorities collecting the twelve and one-half per cent royalty at the customs, that they would agree to the admission of foreign reprints into the colonies. It appears as if we were withholding the collection of this twelve and one-half per cent for the purpose of bringing British authors into our views. I stated in quoting from the census returns that there were 589 publishers in Canada, composed of those who are engaged in the manufacture and publishing of books as well as the publishing of newspapers throughout the country. In addition to that I wish to say that there are annually about 500 copyrights taken out by Canadian authors for the publication or perhaps I should say for the protection of their photographs, &c., &c., and the comparative merits of these two classes of industry in Canada apparently do not coincide so far as the representation made by the Copyright Association of Canada is concerned in so far that they wish to withdraw Canada from the Berne Treaty and to impose such restrictions upon the rights of British and foreign authors that should come in under the Berne Convention that will be practically nullifying any advantages there may be in belonging to the Berne Convention or rather I should say imposing in that Act such provisions as preclude us from the Berne Convention and restrict privileges of Canadian authors to a smaller field than the convention confers upon them. The Berne Convention contains in its second article the following:—

Article II.

Authors of any of the contracting countries shall in all the other countries of the union, enjoy for their works whether manuscript or unedited, or published in one of those countries, the advantages which the respective laws actually accord or shall hereafter accord to nations.

These advantages shall, however, be secured to them reciprocally, only for the period of existence of their rights in their country or origin.

This enjoyment is subject to the fulfilment of the formalities and conditions prescribed by the laws of the country to which the author belongs.

Now we have authors in this country, apparently to the number of about 500, who annually seek copyright in Canada, and it is a matter of very great importance to those authors that the privilege of copyright in Canada shall carry with it the protection that is afforded to all authors who come within the limits of the Berne Convention; or, in other words, while our Act of incorporation would confine the profitable employment of the labour and brains of authors in Canada to the few readers composing the population of Canada—divided as they are between French and English—you are restricting very much indeed the advantage to Canadians to pursue authorship, and in literary works and works of art of every description you are contracting them within a very narrow limit indeed. Instead of placing the product of their labour and their brains before an extended English-speaking population comprised in the United States, Great Britain, and the British dominions generally, as well as in France and other countries, you are confining them simply and solely to the profit of working for the Canadian market. But not only are you doing that under this Act, so far as it operates against our authors, but you are putting into competition with our authors the works of foreign authors or British authors in our market free of any compensation whatever; and if every newspaper is entitled to publish under license from the government the works of foreign authors, what chance is there for the book trade and the labour engaged in it? What I wish to point out is that the author in Great Britain, under our act, if he does not think it worth while to take out a copyright for the restricted area of the Canadian market, then, under our Act, the Canadian market becomes an open market for the publication of foreign works without paying anything therefor. To be sure, the Act intends to protect by the 10 per cent duty on works copyrighted, or 12½ cents on works licensed, but it affords no practical means to make it worth the while of a foreign author to come and protect his rights on Canadian soil; and the result of that would be that every newspaper in Canada would have the right to publish the works of foreign authors—no matter how valuable they may be, no matter how popular they may be—for nothing, subject to this limitation; or rather, after the author has published the work, after it has been thoroughly advertised in the United States papers in consequence of its popularity, and after its having been thoroughly advertised in the English papers on account of its popularity there, then the Canadian publisher can take and choose among the popular works, and take possession of those works—publish them virtually for nothing; according to my contention.

Now is that a fair position to place Canadian authorship in? Is it right to say to our authors "If you wish to write for the Canadian public you will have to enter into competition with the talent of that extended area in Canadian territory which is published for nothing, or virtually nothing under license. Can our publishers pay anything in Canada for the encouragement of Canadian authors? I say if you continue to impose that condition, as a necessary consequence you must drive the brains of Canada that devote themselves to literary and artistic pursuits beyond the confines of Canada to seek in foreign countries a more liberal extended market and more treatment for their talents. In Great Britain if an author goes there he receives the extended privilege of publishing for the large population that exists there and not only that but he comes under the Berne Convention in a more extended direction. Now is it worth while for us to so frame our legislation that we offer encouragement to our own children, to our own young people who are growing up, and our own talent, to remain on Canadian soil and take advantage of that more extended field or to force them out of the country in order that they may find profitable employment for their talents. I think on consideration it will be found it is far more preferable to frame legislation that our own Canadian authors can remain on Canadian soil and while they are using the advantages, the originality, the morality that prevails in Canadian homes, using that and extending its influence through the world by the power of the pen. Under the terms of the Berne Convention that it is far better that we should frame our legislation in that direction rather than that we should say to them "We cannot give you a profitable field in Canada and you must go to the United States to get the advantages of the sixty-five million people who read English or the thirty-eight or forty million people who read English in Great Britain can or the thirty-eight million who read French." They are working at a great disadvantage and then become exotic or house hot plants because they are working in a field surrounded by new circumstances apart from what they were reared in, instead of taking advantage of the originality that preceeds from the surroundings in which they were reared and which strengthens with age. What do we see at present? Gilbert Parker, a Canadian author who has gone abroad to find scope for his talents, has received an order to publish Canadian life in the North-west, a story of the Hudson Bay Company and so on. He has for many years parted his connection with Canada although using the Canadian history and Canadian sentiment generally as his theme. He has been sent out here and he travels about to pick up materials for that purpose. Then we have an authoress, a sister of Mr. Dougall of the Montreal Witness, Sarah Jeannette Duncan, who has published several works. She has gone to England in order to find larger scope for her talent, and I might go on enumerating many instances in which the same conditions occur, and it is not a wise thing for us to pass any legislation that will restrict the advantages we have within ourselves, the power to extend to Canadian authors an enlarged market in order that they may use Canadian soil for the profitable prosecution of their work. Now, hon. gentlemen, that is one side, from the Canadian author's side, on the other side comes in the question of the legislation that we have put upon the statute book which to a very large extent induces what is called literary piracy, and I do not use this term in an offensive sense to any one, as I stated the other day that literary piracy was pursued by the Americans until a very late date when their Copyright Act giving power to foreign authors was passed. That literary piracy received its quietus in the United States, and now the international copyright law has been passed. In considering our legislation we are too apt to pass it with an eye upon our neighbours instead of judging the question upon its sole merits, we always press forward the view of what our neighbours are doing, and seek to retaliate upon them in some form or other in order that we may try and force some equitable terms according to our view of it. I do not think that it is a wise position for us to take. I think that we have sufficient scope in our own country, and that we possess sufficient advantage in belonging to the great British dominions and considering ourselves part and parcel of them and the extended area which they cover without narrowing down in any degree our nationality to Canadian soil in regard to these matters and if our neighbours choose to take an illiberal view of a subject of this kind, it does not follow that because that illiberality may prevail to a certain extent against us in their market that therefore we should be imbued with the same illiberal sentiments, but I do think that in the domestic legislation of our neighbours that they are retracing their steps considerably and the passage of their Copyright Act is only one of many evidences that they are making a retrograde movement in favour of basing their legislation upon higher grounds. So far as the term literary piracy is concerned it might be applied to the Act we are now passing, similar to the letters of marque that two centuries ago were issued to men like Sir

Francis Drake upon the high seas for the honour and advantage of Great Britain in extending her operations in the wide field of the world, but there is just this to say that civilization is advancing since that date and Sir Francis Drake and men of that stamp ran great risks to develop their enterprise, and had to be endued with the spirit and the pluck, and the ingenuity of all Britain's great leaders in those days, and he took great risks in what he did. We propose to issue letters of marque to literary pirates, without imposing any risk upon them and give them all the profits that may accrue from it, but to the great demoralization of Canadian writers and possibly readers. There are a certain class of books though popularly advertised, are not always the class of works you desire your children to read. There is a literary degeneracy in morals which it is not desirable to spread under the stimulating influence of our licensing system; for that reason I think, honourable gentlemen, that we should hesitate before we throw our Canadian authors into competition with that class of unpaid for literature. Now in 1891 the Copyright Act of the United States was for the first time passed and it was the subject matter of a great deal of inquiry. There was a Senate commission appointed to invite the publishers and authors to go before that commission in order to show what grounds they had for defending themselves from their respective points of view and I would like to read you one or two observations dropped from the mouths of some of the men whose names are familiar to us such as Mr. Putman, one of the great publishers in the United States, and Mr. Estes and others all of whom appeared before this commission. Mr. Putnam says:

The American public is entitled to the best literary and scientific work which can be secured for it from the writers of the world, and at the lowest prices. It is impossible, however, for the publisher to provide such material unless he can be permitted to control undertakings which he has planned and, in a sense, has created. American writers also lose the advantage of co-operating in such international series, and the work of American scientists and scholars is each year becoming more entitled to international recognition.

In Europe, under an international copyright, the cheapest books are the best books by the best authors of all times. In the United States under the "scramble" system of publishing the cheapest books are the inferior stories of contemporary English novelists. Our present state of things discourages good books and encourages poor books.

These were some of the sentiments among many uttered by one of the leading men in that country when this question of copyright was up. I will quote another from Mr. Dana Estes, who appeared before this commission also:

Mr. Estes of the firm of Lariat & Estes before the same Committee.

The CHAIRMAN.—There is no reason to suppose if you put in this bill, what is a regulation of import duties, that Great Britain is going to change her system of imports.

Mr. ESTES.—My own opinion is that it will not give us reciprocity at all that if we put this clause excluding foreign plates into the bill, the result will be that it will not be accepted by foreign nations. I regret to say this, gentlemen, but it is my conviction.

The CHAIRMAN.—I supposed you gentlemen had agreed on this bill.

Mr. ESTES.—We agreed to it and ask you to pass it.

The CHAIRMAN.—Still you regard it as defective?

Mr. ESTES.—I do regard it as a very serious defect, and so do all the gentlemen who are associated with me as publishers; and right here let me read a letter from the largest publisher and book manufacturer in New England.

THE CHAIRMAN.—Suppose it should turn out that Great Britain did not interdict the exportation from this country to Great Britain, or the importation into Great Britain from this country, would you still have your objection to this clause?

Mr. ESTES.—Not at all. I should be very glad to have it as restrictive as it is possible for us to have it, because it is for my business advantage, and that of the compositors and printers.

Permit me to read a letter written by Mr. H. O. Houghton, proprietor of the Riverside Press, one of the largest printing establishments in the country. It is directed to Mr. Chace. With his permission, I will read it:

"BOSTON, March 7th, 1888.

"HON. JONATHAN CHACE,
"United States Senate,
"Washington, D.C.

"DEAR SIR,—Please accept my thanks for the notice of the hearing on Friday. I regret that it is not convenient for me to be present, but I scarcely believe it will be necessary, as my views are well known to you, to authors, the trade, and employees. I am prepared to give assent to any form of bill you may think it wise to push. I have the greatest confidence in your judgment in this matter. If it would avail anything, I should like to protest earnestly against the requirement that all books should be reset. I am sure that such a course would go a great ways to making nugatory the best effects we expect from an international copyright law. There are a great many books, the plant of which costs from $50,000 to $100,000. I mean by plant the cost of engraving, typesetting, and electrotyping. The owners of this class of books would not avail themselves of the international copyright on account of this extra cost, but the English would make the books there and send sheets here, thus depriving a great many workmen of employment, which would naturally come to them if the plates were sent over and the books manufactured here. Besides, the public would not be so well served, and there would be just indignation at requirements which compel people to do useless labour. I am sure that none of my workmen who fully understand the subject would ask for such a provision. I think also that those of the trade unions who fully understand the question would not demand it. We certainly do not want to be 'hoist by our own petard.'

"Profoundly grateful to you for your interest in the subject, so important to all makers and readers of books, I remain,

"Yours very truly,

"H. O. HOUGHTON."

I will quote the clause in the Act of the United States referring to the conditions of copyright:—

Clause in American Act, 1891.

Sec. 4956. No person shall be entitled to a copyright unless he shall, on or before the day of publication in this or any foreign country, deliver at the office of the librarian of Congress, or deposit in the mail within the United States, addressed to the librarian of Congress, at Washington, District of Columbia, a printed copy of the title of the book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, cut, print, photograph, or chromo, or a description of the painting, drawing, statue, statuary, or a model or design for a work of the fine arts for which he desires a copyright, nor unless he shall also, not later than the day of the publication thereof in this or any foreign country, deliver at the office of the librarian of Congress, at Washington, District of Columbia, or deposit in the mail within the United States, addressed to the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, District of Columbia, two copies of such copyright, book, map, chart, dramatic or musical composition, engraving, chromo, cut, print or photograph, or in case of a painting, drawing, statue, statuary, model or design for a work of the fine arts, a photograph of same: Provided, that in the case of a book, photograph, chromo or lithograph, the two copies of the same required to be delivered or deposited as above, shall be printed from type set within the limits of the United States, or from plates made therefrom, or from negatives, or drawings on stone made within the limits of the United States, or from transfers made therefrom.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Can my hon. friend give us any quotations from any authors or publishers in Canada?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—This is dated March 7th, 1888, when the commission I have just referred to was sitting.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the present United States copyright law was passed?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was under consideration, and it was finally passed in 1891. That is the view expressed by Mr. Dana Estes and Mr. Putnam and many others who went before that commission. The difficulty that appeared to present itself to their minds was that in that effort to obtain an international copyright they did not want any obstructions in the way, while they disagreed with the resulting clause they were prepared to accept the bill with the clause in it, trusting that when once they got the international Copyright Act upon the statute-book that then possibly in time they would be able to amend and make it a more liberal Act than in its present form, and so bring it under the extended operation of the Berne Convention.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand you object to the provision in the United States law which compels the publication and printing of it in the States?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, naturally and that letter objected to it. Simplify work and you increase trade. The United States however does not require publication and printing except as to two books, it is resetting they require. I say if the United States and Canada and Great Britain were unitedly to take the same views many of the great authors and great publishers expressed on that occasion it would not affect the question of the employment of labour, the extension of publishing or the encouragement of authors and writers who are essential to publishers and printers except in a beneficial way. At any rate Canada will lose nothing by taking the right stand. So far as the American Act is concerned I think it does not operate against Canadian publishers. Some Canadian publishers might prefer of course to be free under the legislation of the country to select such works as they like, and put them in their newspapers or publish them in books without paying anything therefor, except under the doubtful licensing system, and if possible to smuggle over into the United States the same as if it were taken out of bond.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not wish that statement to go abroad uncontradicted; neither the publishers nor printers in Canada ask for any such privilege. All they ask is precisely what the publishers in the United States asked and what the hon. gentleman has just read.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The publishers, as represented by the Copyright Association, ask for the enforcement of the Canadian Act of 1889, and I presume the withdrawal from the Berne Convention. What I contend is that if a foreign author wishes to save his copyright in Canada the conditions of our Copyright Act are so costly in a limited market, as a general rule foreign authors or their assigns will not try to protect themselves, except at the boundary line—while if our publishers were prohibited from using the works of foreign authors except by arrangement, they would then find it to their advantage to encourage and remunerate Canadian authors, when there is such a large field for them under the Berne Convention. I will read a clause from the Act of 1889 :

The conditions for obtaining such copyright shall be that the said literary, scientific, musical or artistic work shall, before publication or production elsewhere, or simultaneously with the first publication or production thereof elsewhere, be registered in the office of the Minister of Agriculture, by the author or his legal representatives, and further that such work shall be printed and published or produced in Canada, or reprinted and republished or reproduced in Canada within one month after publication or production elsewhere ; but in no case shall the sole and exclusive right and privilege in Canada continue to exist after it has expired in the country of origin.

Section 6 of the said act is hereby repealed.

If the person entitled to copyright under the said Act as hereby amended fails to take advantage of its provisions, any person or persons domiciled in Canada may obtain from the Minister of Agriculture a license or licenses to print and publish or to produce the work for which copyright, but for such neglect or failure, might have been obtained ; but no license shall convey exclusive rights to print and publish or produce any work :

A license shall be granted to any applicant agreeing to pay the author or his legal representative, a royalty of ten per centum on the retail price of each copy or reproduction issued work which is the subject of the license and giving security for such payment to the satisfaction of the minister.

The royalty provided for in the next preceding section shall be collected by the officers of the Department of Inland Revenue, and paid over to the persons entitled thereto, under regulations approved by the Governor in Council ; but the government shall not be liable to account for any such royalty not actually collected.

This last clause is repealed.

Now that is the Copyright Act of 1889. Those are the conditions of publication.

The Act, as I stated the other day, that we are working under is this Act of 1887. What the hon. leader of the House wishes to convey is, that the publishers are not asking for the right to pirate works—they are asking for the right to pirate works subject to a payment of 12½ per cent. There is however, no contract as between the author and the publisher—there is nothing of that kind, the Act provides the means and if there is no copyright here they apply to the government and the government takes possession of the stranger's work and issues a license, not to one man only, so as to make it worth his while to do it in the very best possible way, but they may issue 50 or 60 or 80 licenses as the case may be, according as they are applied for. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, would you like to entrust your goods or wares to any such condition as that, when a man has the right to go to the boundary of the country and take possession of a barrel of pork or a bale of goods or anything comes into the country, and say we will authorize you to take that, but you have to pay the owner for that a certain price. How is the owner going to collect this? There was some years ago a protection granted by which the Canadian government became responsible for the collection of the 12½ per cent, but they have withdrawn themselves from the responsibility of that. At the present moment, there is no means at all, excepting the author likes to come in and hunt up the publisher for the value of his labour and brains, a value that may lead to considerable dispute, after the author's work is taken possession of. That is the position in which this Act is placing those authors, to that extent, I say it is literary piracy—not literary piracy in which the individual takes his chance the same as an ordinary smuggler would in the case of reprinting for the United States, but piracy, which is made legal over people who have no redress and no rights which they can control so far as Canadian legislation is concerned. It is not taking that advanced position in the civilization of nations that Canada should take as being part of the British Dominions. I should like to read to you something which I got out of the public press, with regard to contraband music. A large seizure was made at St. Albans, Vermont. The article taken from a Montreal paper is as follows :

CONTRABAND MUSIC.

CONSIGNMENT FROM MONTREAL SEIZED AT ST. ALBANS, VT.—PUBLICATIONS OF AMERICAN COPYRIGHTS BROUGHT IN FROM CANADA.

ST. ALBANS, May 6.—The most important seizure of contraband mail matter that has been made in recent years has just been brought to light in St. Albans. Beginning three months ago and continuing at different times since three large sacks of mail matter containing musical publications have arrived at this post office from the Montreal post office. The matter was looked upon with suspicion, and Postmaster Larner, knowing of the rigid rules which exist regarding the importations of the copyrighted American publications, held the contents for investigations, which were made, and the matter was found to be reprints of valuable American copyrights of musical pieces and music books, and the seizure proved to be the largest and most valuable ever made, the music being valued at from $2,500 to $3,000.

In the past 10 years there has developed in Canada several large concerns which make a business of reprinting and republishing American copyright pieces and musical books, and as there are no royalties to pay their music is sold at prices ranging from 50 to 75 per cent less than the prices asked by the American copyright holders and publishers.

As St. Albans is but one of the many hundreds of frontier post offices it can be readily seen that the business is capable of great magnitude and extent.

There is no way in which the publishers can be punished otherwise than in confiscating and destroying the property. The music will be forwarded to the dead letter office at Washington, where it will be condemned and destroyed.

The facts in connection with that are that the seizure consisted of 4,000 pieces of music, and the parties to whom they were addressed, numbered about 200 and there was hardly a state in the union which was not represented. That is the work of just one publishing firm in Canada. When there are perhaps, three or four publishing firms conducting the same profitable operations, it is perfectly evident, that if the Imperial government was to give its sanction to the Act of 1889, and we were to work under the Act it would give rise to what might properly be called a very flourishing business in literary piracy. Ninety per cent of all the works published in Canada would be published not for Canadian readers, but for the purpose of being sent across the line at reduced rates for the United States readers. It is certainly not a wise position for us to take that we will by our legislation constitute ourselves a source of annoyance to our neighbours and foster under a show of legality what is dishonest—"Do unto others what we would they should do unto us," is a safe foundation for us to rest upon in framing our legislation. Or as President Garfield put it in giving advice to the manufacturers: "Gentlemen it pays to be honest." It will pay our publishers far better to take advantage of the international copyright law than to ask our government to withdraw from it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—And has not the United States a monopoly of our markets for these books and music, while we are deprived of going into their markets on the same terms?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, the United States has not a monopoly of our market. As I explained the other day if an English author writes a work and he wants to take advantage of the Berne convention or take advantage of the United States and Canadian markets he will sell his copyright to a United States or Canadian publisher.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not answering the question. If he sells the copyright to a United States publisher for America, including Canada, has he not the sole control of the Canadian market?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, but on the other hand if he sells the copyright to the Canadian publisher the Canadian publisher has the exclusive control of the United States market. If we grant copyright to an author do we not give him sole control of the Canadian market.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, that is the case.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No, you must print and publish in the United States.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is nothing to prevent getting a copyright in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The mode of procedure is this, for I had occasion to copyright a small work for my daughter the other day which caused me to ascertain exactly what I had to do in order to get the more extended copyright. At present registration here protects her work under the Berne Convention. If an author was to sell his copyright to a Canadian publisher with the right to this continent—to the United States as well as to Canada—he could do so by overbidding the United States publisher. If he would give a higher price than his competitor he could do so. Then he would publish the work here in Canada or he would publish it in the United States. The condition of the copyright in the United States is that the type shall be set up there—nothing more than the type-setting.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But two books must be printed there?

Hon. Mr. BOLTON—Two books must be run off with type setting in the United States and deposited in the congressional library. That is the condition of getting a copyright in the United States. The Canadian publisher, if he got copyright, all he would have to do would be to get that work set up in the United States, run off these two books there and bring his stereotype plates over to Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing the works to which you have alluded were copyrighted in Canada, does that prevent a United States publisher from publishing them if he thinks proper without buying that copyright?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No. If you copyright any work in Canada and no one purchases it in the United States, is there anything in the law of the United States or any international law existing between the United States and England, or under the Berne Convention, to prevent a United States publisher from publishing it if he thinks proper?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not without copyrighting in the United States—certainly not and so it is in Canada. You have got to copyright the work in Canada, but what I wish to show is that if the Canadian author outbids a United States author he can secure the right of this continent through Canadian channels for his work and under our present Act of 1887 registration here protects the work in the British dominions. Then all the Canadian author has to do is to copyright that work in the United States and Canada in order to secure both countries and rights under the Berne Convention, he has to simultaneously place the books in the congressional library and two books in the Canadian library or under the Canadian law he has one month to do that. The difference between the Canadian law and the United States law is that the latter only requires the type-setting—it does not require the printing and publishing. The Canadian law does not require type-setting but it requires printing and publishing—there is the difference between the two laws. In the United States type-setting is the condition; in Canada printing and publishing are the conditions. Supposing that the publisher in Canada was to obtain the copyright of a popular and valuable work of a British author or for that matter from a United States or a Canadian author then all he would have to do in order to secure this would be to copyright this by setting up the type in the United States, striking off the two copies and then bringing the stereotype over here to Canada to print and publish in Canada for the whole of this continent.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But he must print two books in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is all he has to do, but he can print a million books in Canada and take them to the United States. When the type is struck off there is no great difficulty in printing two books. What I wish to point out is that the Canadian publisher has that advantage of setting up the type in the United States he can bring the stereotype plate free of duty into Canada and can then publish for the whole continent however large the circulation may be. I know of a publisher in Canada who got an order from Chicago to print and publish ten thousand almanacs for a firm in Chicago. If he can do the work cheaper and better by perfecting his machinery and working under free trade here than he can do it in the United States he is going to infinitely increase the business of publishing on Canadian soil over and above any possibility of arriving at the same results under the Act we are proposing to enforce withholding protection from British authors and withdrawing from international protection. Under that Act we are limiting the powers of publishers to the small market of Canada, we are limiting the powers of Canadian authors to the small market of Canada unless they go abroad to secure greater rights and not only that we are throwing into competition with the Canadian author all the most popular works of Great Britain and the United States which is obtained virtually for nothing by Canadian publishers. That is the position exactly in which copyright would place us under the enforcement of the Act of 1889. By taking a more liberal view of it; by taking the view that the people of Great Britain take on that matter so far as the Berne Convention is concerned we as authors or publishers will be placed in an infinitely better position than we possibly can be by trying to enforce this Act of 1889, in so far as it conflicts with the Berne convention of international copyright. Then another point to which it is desirable to draw attention—that is our responsibility under the British constitution. We are part of the British Empire and we wish to say virtually by this Act, although we are part of the British dominions quite irrespective of any rights that they may possess as working alongside of us as brothers and sisters under the same constitution. They have no power except to make representations to the British government. They have no power to come here and say we shall do so and so, because we control our own legislation, but the position that the British government is taking under the British constitution is this—they say so far as you in Canada decide to restrict your own publishers and authors within the bounds of Canada we offer no objection at all, but when it comes to you legalizing your publishers to take possession by force of arms through your legislation of the works of British authors, we, as the head of the empire, certainly will interpose our objection, at all events to give you ample time to consider the full force of the legislation you are seeking to impose. I say if you look into the question in a spirit of honesty and fairness, you will see that the Imperial government has taken the proper constitutional position. It is not a position of interference with Canadian rights, but it is an inter-position with Canadian legislation interfering with British rights. That is the view that I think, should be presented. In order to bring it more forcibly before this House and to show exactly the position that the British government has been taking in regard to the matter. With regard to the comparative value of the Canadian market, and the value of the United States market to authors, I should like to read to you what is published in the papers, by way of prizes that are offered for the publication of works. The New York Herald of May 19th, 1895, publishes the following offer to authors:—

HERALD'S PRIZE OFFERS.

NINETEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS TO BE AWARDED TO AMERICAN NOVELISTS AND POETS.

The following is a list of prizes which the HERALD offers to American writers:—

The HERALD will award a prize of $10,000 for the best serial story of between 50,000 and 75,000 words by an American writer, whether professional or amateur.

The HERALD will further award prizes of $2,000 and $1,000 respectively to the serial stories which shall be adjudged second and third in excellence in this category.

CONDITIONS OF THE CONTEST.

The condition of this contest are as follows:—

The manuscripts must be submitted anonymously, and must bear only the initials of their authors or other private identification marks.

The Herald will nominate a committee of ten well known literary men, and from them the readers of the Herald can select by ballot the final committee of three, who will choose the best works and make the awards.

The stories so selected will be printed in the Herald Daily and Sunday, as occasion requires, beginning early in October, 1895.

The manuscripts other than the three selected by the examiners will be returned to the writers upon their identification by means of their initials or private marks. The writers will be at liberty to publish these returned manuscripts elsewhere, and no reference will be made by the Herald to the fact that they have been rejected.

The works that are adjudged to be first, second and third in the several competitions will be returned to the authors, after publication, and they will have the privilege of selling their works anywhere, the Herald meantime having protected them by copyright.

All manuscripts for this competition must be submitted before July 1, 1895.

PRIZES FOR EPIC POEMS.

The Herald also offers three other prizes—the first, of $3,000, for the best novelette of between 15,000 and 25,000 words: the second, a prize of $2,000, for the best short story of between 6,000 and 10,000 words, and the third, a prize of $1,000 for the best epic poem based on some event of American history that has occurred since the beginning of the war of the revolution.

The conditions that will govern the competition for the prizes of $10,000, $2,000, and $1,000 will also govern those for the prizes of $3,000, $2,000 and $1,000. The chosen manuscripts will be published in the Herald in turn, upon the conclusion of the serials.

All manuscripts for these latter competitions must be submitted to the Herald before September 1, 1895.

Manuscripts should be addressed as follows:—
For the $10,000 prize, Serial Story Competition, the New York Herald; for the $3,000 prize, Novelette Competition, the New York Herald for the $2,000 prize, Short Story Competition, the New York Herald; for the $1,000 prize, Epic Poem Competition, the New York Herald.

Now what I wanted to point out in reading this extract to the House was the fact that there was $19,000 offered for works published by United States authors, of which $10,000 was for the first prize. Then, after the New York Herald had the privilege of publishing the story, the manuscript would be returned to the author copyrighted, and it would become his own property to make whatever he could out of it, so far as the value of the work and the advertising it receives is concerned.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is United States authors.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly. I want to impress upon the hon. gentleman's mind that fact, that after the New York Herald publishes it once, then the manuscript reverts to the author to be published for his own profit afterwards. I dare say the hon. gentleman has seen an advertisement—in fact it was pointed out to me by my hon. friend from Lunenburg, in which a similar offer for a prize for the encouragement of Canadian authorship is made by Dr. Williams of the patent medicine company, and what was the prize offered in that advertisement? It was $300, of which $100 was for a first prize, the other $200 was to be divided up into three or four prizes. Then, after the Canadian authors had set to work competing for those prizes, the best were to be selected, and they were to divide the prizes of $300 for all the labour and work of composing, recopying, type-writing, etc., and then after that had been done the successful prize owners were to get the prizes and Dr. Williams's Company was to own the copyright. Can you consider that the Canadian market can be worth very much in its limited sense, if that is the only offer and the best offer that can be made for the publication of works? The Williams Company get all the benefit of the advertising connected with it, and I think that should be sufficient to justify him in offering the prize, but after he has set all these authors to work and selected the best works amongst them, then he is to own the property of the successful prize winners. Then again the London Statist offers a prize of one thousand guineas for the best essay on Imperial unity, not confined to the British Isles, but open to any resident in the British dominions. Compare these three advertisements, one in a United States paper, another in an English journal and the other in a Canadian paper, as to the value and advantages of the respective markets, so far as the prize offers gauge them. We have the opportunity of taking advantage of the United States market where a prize of $10,000 is offered under the conditions that I have mentioned, but by our own legislation for the sake of publishing the works unauthorized for publication by the authors themselves, we propose to narrow the efforts of Canadian authors and publishers or drive them out of the country, force them to become residents of the United States or Great Britain in order that they may take advantage of the larger number of readers. We drive them out of our country simply because the conditions that we are imposing and restricting as we think for our own benefit and for the benefit of a certain class of publishers, and we think we are doing a wise thing. Would it not be more patriotic and more to their pecuniary benefit if Canadian publishers would encourage Canadian authors in order that through them they could extend their publishing business? When thoroughly considered in all its bearings it will be found that it will be wise for us, as our neighbours have done, to retrace our steps in regard to this copyright question, and take a broader view of the question in all its bearings. Let us put alongside the interest of those publishers who desire to place foreign authors under onerous conditions the rights of the authors. These publishers are not alone to be considered. The publishers generally have not petitioned for this, because, as I stated the other day, out of the five hundred and eighty-nine publishers in Canada, publishers who have built themselves up to the position that they occupy to-day without the aid of any literary piracy, and have attained that position that they can continue under legitimate methods to develop their capacity—compare these publishers with five hundred authors that copyright their works, are they not worthy of consideration as against those publishing interests that are seeking to impress their views upon the public through the International Copyright Association? As a matter of policy in the employment of labour, I say, although the copyright association did present, along with their own representations, a resolution to the government passed by one of the trade unions, that it was desirable that the imposition of printing and publishing within a month, should be inserted. The view that labour should take of these questions is not to narrow its view down to the private interests of the individuals who compose the union, but when a labour organization bands itself together for the promotion of the cause of labour, they should take the whole question of labour into consideration, and not simply the local or special interests of those who compose the labour union. The broader the view they take the greater will be their political force and so far as this question which I have put before the House is concerned, I believe the cause of labour will be infinitively, better promoted by taking advantage of the Berne convention and building up the publishing interests of this country so as to secure a greater extension of publishing these works on Canadian soil, both for the English market and for the Canadian market and through Canadian talent. The Canadian Copyright Act does not require type-setting as I have explained and the stereotype plates after striking off two books in the United States can be imported into Canada and we would then have a magnificent field for publishing on this continent. Let the publishers lay their foundations on those lines and success will attend their efforts. I will not detain the House any longer with my views on this question, though its importance does not require an apology for taking up so much of your time. I would suggest that in dealing with it—because it is a matter that we should desire to be in accord with Imperial legislation upon. I would suggest that if the members of the government have not thoroughly made up their mind—have not thoroughly concluded as to what are the real rights of the matter as between the English and the Canadian authors and publishers, it would be desirable that a committee should be appointed from this honourable House or in any form that it is thought best, in order that a better understanding of the whole merits of the question could be had by personal contact with the interested parties in Canada.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend is nothing if he is not unique. He sets himself up as the mouth-piece of 589 publishers and 500 authors in Canada. I should like to know by what authority he assumes that position?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I never mind that remark, my hon. friend always misunderstands me.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman spoke in their interest, and I presume he had some authority—some mandate from them to speak, when he advocated their cause. He certainly does not represent their views, their wishes or their interests. I ask my hon. friend if he can find an author or publisher in Canada who has presented the case in the way in which he has? Have they not all taken one position and gone in one direction and asked for a copyright law such as the Act of 1889? It is a pity my hon. friend could not have brought this up on a substantive motion, and so test the position. He would have found himself all alone in that case—without one follower in parliament. Now, how does the matter stand? We know that long ago there has been a clamour in the colonies that we should have a copyright law of our own. That has been the clamour everywhere. I can remember that this copyright question used to come up periodically and receive the approval of the Senate. We find that as far back as 1845 England—

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is a chestnut.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, but as sound as ever. It has never been reversed; you will find that when Earl Grey was Secretary of State for the Colonies, he said:

Her Majesty's Government propose to leave to the local legislature the duty and responsibility of passing such enactment as they may deem proper for securing both the rights of authors and the interests of the public. Her Majesty's Government will accordingly submit to Parliament a bill authorizing the Queen in Council to confirm and finally enact any colonial law or ordinance respecting copyright notwithstanding any repugnancy of any such law or ordinance to the copyright law of this country.

That was in 1845. How was that followed up? But I never heard of that promise being fulfilled. No such bill was presented to the British Parliament. No such authority was passed, but by our Confederation Act in 1867 the whole power was given to us to deal with copyright, the same as we have the right to deal with many other subjects enumerated in section 91.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not the power to pirate.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We do not want to grab or steal, and we do not want isolation, but we want fair reciprocity, which we have never got. Then what have we next? We passed our law with the suspension clause, and England, no doubt on account of some international arrangement with other countries, has not thought proper yet to give us what we claim as our right under our constitution, and to which, apart from that right, we are fairly and justly entitled. That is the position in which we stand, that law passed in 1889 unanimously in both Houses I think my hon. friend was a member of the Senate at the time, but we did not hear his voice in opposition to the measure then.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I was not in the Senate until 1890.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman was in the Senate in 1891, when we passed an address to Her Majesty praying that the Act of 1889 should come into operation. It went without a dissenting voice, and this is one of its paragraphs:—

The provisions of the Act of 1889 just mentioned are such as are required for the interest of the people of Canada, and its provisions have not been shown to be in any respect unfair as regards any portion of Her Majesty's subjects. The Act was passed unanimously by both Houses of Parliament of Canada and has been earnestly pressed by the Government of Canada upon the favourable consideration of your Majesty's Government.

My hon. friend was here when the address was passed, although he was not here when the Act itself came before us. Why did he not raise his voice on behalf of the authors and publishers in Canada then? Because he must have felt, as everybody else felt, and as we yet feel, that it was a right law. It does not legalize piracy. We say to the English and foreign authors: "You shall not play the dog in the manger. You have a perfect right to obtain copyright here, but if you refuse—if you will not print the book after you get your copyright, and if you will not copyright in Canada and print and publish there after a certain time, we will seek by license to do it, giving you the fair royalty of 10 per cent on the product of the work which we engage in." How does that compare with the position of the question in the United States? The publishers of that country can print their works there, and without having to print and publish them in Canada, can circulate them throughout the Dominion, while we cannot do so in the United States, unless we come under their Act and set up the type and print books there.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Would the hon. gentleman like Britain to deal with his ships in that way?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I cannot understand the interruption. The hon. member will not contend that we have the same rights in the United States that they have in Canada, as to making, printing and publishing books. The principal expense of publication is in setting up the type and the plates for the books; when the stereotype work is done, you can print any number. The United States publishers have a monopoly of our market and we have access to theirs. Then what have we to do with England? The copyright can be procured in England and a book can be printed in the United States and circulated here while we cannot do likewise. The publishers in the United States stipulate in the agreement with the English author, that they shall have the Canadian market; they have the monopoly of the whole of our market and we are perfectly powerless in their hands; I am surprised at my hon. friend standing in such a unique position so adverse to the interests of those for whom he pretends to speak. Under the present condition of things, we are in effect prohibited from reprinting English copyright works, and must purchase in the United States or do without them. What we mainly want is to reprint English and other works, unless the owners of the books print and publish them here within a reasonable time. If this were a debating society and had not the responsibility of legislators I should like to hear my hon. friend discuss this subject, but we must remember that solemn responsibilities are cast upon us. I think my hon. friend has fallen short in presenting the interest of the authors and publishers. Nobody has asked him to do it. He cannot show me one paper that has taken his view of the matter. He must see that he is diametrically opposed to the interests of Canadian authors and the printers and publishers. I cannot imagine how my hon. friend can take the view he does when there is such a consensus of opinion in both branches of the legislature and throughout the country that we should have in Canada the right not only to print our own works, but if English and United States and other authorities will not publish in Canada, that we should have the right, after giving them proper notice, to publish ourselves. That is the position we have taken throughout, and there has not been a discordant voice in all Canada until my honourable friend comes up and advances his peculiar views in this House. The last time our lamented chief, Sir John Thompson, went to England, that was one of the things that he went to accomplish—to have this law put on the statute book. His untimely death prevented his doing it, but I think the government will now press for that right. We have a right to make our own copyright laws and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will see that this injustice shall no longer exist.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised at the speech which my hon. friend from Lunenburg has just made. I do not always agree with him, but I have always given him credit for many good qualities, and one which I think characterizes him to a very great degree is gratitude. The speech that he has just made is an instance of the most flagrant ingratitude. The hon. gentleman from Shell River has given him an opportunity of making the best speech which he has delivered this session, and instead of thanking that hon. gentleman, he proceeds to denounce him in very strong language. It was hardly parliamentary for the hon. member for Lunenburg to ask for the credentials of the hon. gentleman from Shell River. That hon. gentleman has brought before the House, and discussed in a very intelligent and, to a certain extent, unique manner, as my hon. friend from Lunenburg says, a very important question. The hon. member from Shell River, as I understand him, did not profess to speak on behalf of the publishers of Canada; he spoke I think on behalf of the authors of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He advocated the interest of the authors of Canada, as he understood it; and every member of this House has the right, without holding a power of attorney from any particular class or individual, to advocate what he believed to be the interests of that class or individual. The hon. member from Lunenburg very often gets up here and advocates certain policies which he alleges are in the interests of the fishermen of Lunenburg county. He never exhibits a power of attorney from the fishermen. The hon. member from Shell River seems to be pretty familiar with his subject; just as much so as the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg is with the fisheries. I do not propose to discuss the subject before the House at any length, but I have thought it my duty to call attention to the extraordinary behaviour of the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. With respect to the question before the House, I have only one or two observations to make. I do not profess to be in a position just now to judge whether the policy indicated by the hon. gentleman from Shell River is a better policy than the one embodied in the Canada Copyright Act of 1889 or not. I think there is something to be said on both sides. The hon. gentleman from Shell River has shown that there is another side to the question, and that is a very important point gained; but I feel that whether the Act of 1889 was right or wrong, whether it was a wise or unwise procedure in the interest of Canada, there is no doubt but that it came within our province. Under the British North America Act we have the right to pass such a statute, and as a member of the parliament of Canada, I feel great regret that the Imperial authorities have not up to the present time allowed that Act to go into operation. I do not say whether the Act was a wise one or not. It may have been foolish, just as our tariff policy is foolish, but as the Imperial government allowed our tariff policy, which was felt to be unwise, and which they knew to be injurious to the Empire, to go into operation, I think they should have allowed this Act to go into operation also, and after we learned wisdom, we could amend it as we pleased. On that point I feel that the Imperial authorities are not treating Canada as she should be treated, and as far as that goes I am at one with the government and the other gentlemen who are insisting that this Canadian Act shall be allowed to go into operation. We can repeal it or amend it as we please, but we have a right to pass it, and I do not think the Imperial authorities should interfere with the exercise of that right.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The government has no objection to bringing down any papers in the public Archives which have not already been printed and laid before the House. I might briefly state that there is very little new matter, or correspondence exchanged between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, since last year. The late Sir John Thompson was to meet the Imperial authorities to discuss with them the main question of the copyright. He was unfortunately summoned away, and we were deprived of his valuable services. Since then the Colonial Secretary has sent to Canada an invitation that we should send over a representative to discuss the question with the authorities on the other side. To this we have expressed our willingness, and an Order in Council has been passed within the last week or so appointing a fit and proper person, who was going to England on some legal function, to appear before the authorities there and discuss the position that Canada intends to hold in the matter. The main question is this: Has Canada the right to legislate upon copyright, as we have the right to legislate about tariff or any other matter that the Constitution has given us? I agree fully with the remarks made by the senior member for Halifax, that the main question is not whether the statute was a wise one or whether it should be amended, but it is, has Canada the right to legislate upon this subject?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is it wise to belong to the Berne Convention?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Is it wise to belong to the Berne Convention? Is it wise that we should amend our statutes, that we should adopt another, that we should take legislation from the authors and printers in England without any reference to the interests of our authors or our printers on this side—these are questions which I am not at liberty to discuss at present, from the very fact that the government is now in conference with the home authorities upon all those subjects.

Therefore, we have no objection to bringing down the papers, but there is strong objection to the matter being discussed by any member of the government during the conference which will take place presently.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (J) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain Female Offenders in the province of Nova Scotia."—(Hon. Mr. Power.)

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES, (B.C.)—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the Government when those papers in connection with the Royal Commission held last year to inquire into the irregularities in the British Columbia penitentiary, for which I moved some time ago, will be brought down. I mentioned the matter the other day to the premier, and he promised to ascertain when they would be produced. It is now over six weeks since I moved for those papers, and it surely ought not to take so long to prepare the return.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The papers are being prepared. It is an extensive record, comprising, I believe, over 500 pages of type written matter.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman will bear in mind that the return was brought down in the House of Commons some time ago, and I have been unable to get a copy of the evidence. It cannot take very long to prepare the return for the House.

THE DESCHÊNES BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM, in the absence of Hon. Mr. McLaren, moved the third reading of Bill (30) "An Act to incorporate the Deschênes Bridge Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—When this bill was reported from the committee, I asked the hon. gentleman to postpone the consideration of the amendments until to-day. I wish now to direct his attention to the fact that one of the amendments made in committee is incorrectly reported in the minutes. I presume it is simply a printer's error, but it will be well that there should be no mistake about the words that are used here.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I see no reason why the third reading of the bill should be postponed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not wish it postponed.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Is it not a desirable work to be constructed in the interest of the country? There is not another bridge across the Ottawa for 40 miles, and why is this bridge project obstructed in this way? There must be an African in the fence somewhere. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa has a notice of an amendment on the paper; he had better move the six months' hoist at once if he wants to kill the bill. What is his object? Somebody has got a charter to build the Ottawa Barge Canal. I remember once reading about a young lady who lived near the river. There was an opening in the fence fronting the river. The lady wanted to get married but she said: "Suppose I get married and have children, and they should have children and another generation should arise and some of my grandchildren should get through this opening in the fence and get drowned, what would become of me." The objection of the hon. gentleman is of a similar nature. We can deal with the Ottawa Barge Canal when somebody undertakes to build it. The whole object of the amendment is to delay the bill. The promoters of the measure are satisfied with it and the government of the country, the guardians of the peoples' rights, have allowed it to go through, and it is not fair to load down the bill with such an amendment. As a rule the hon. member from Rideau and the hon. member from Ottawa are as far apart as the poles are asunder, but they are united on this question—why? I begin to suspect that it is not exactly in the public interest. They want to keep up the present non-intercourse between the two provinces in order that people for 40 miles up the river may be brought down to Ottawa. The promoters of this bill are in earnest—they own the property on both sides of the river, and they are prepared to go on and build the bridge. I am satisfied that the House does not want to impose any condition that would keep them from proceeding with the work. Let the hon. gentleman from Ottawa move his amendment and the House will soon dispose of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret very much that the hon. gentleman should be under the impression that I have the slightest desire to delay his bill. I did not propose to move any amendment, or to refer the bill back to committee—I simply called the attention of the House to the fact that an amendment made in the Committee on Railways and Canals was incorrectly printed in the minutes, with the object that the clerk at the table might see that the amendment was correctly entered. The hon. gentleman sees several men in buckram who are opposed to this bill. He is quite mistaken. There were some amendments made to the bill in committee; that is not an unusual thing, but the hon. gentleman himself pursued a rather unusual course in moving that the amendments made in the committee be concurred in when the report was presented to the House. The wisdom of postponing the concurrence in the amendments is proved now. I find some of the amendments incorrectly recorded in the minutes, and it is well for those who are interested in the bill that it was not read the third time on Friday, because now the corrections can be made. It is best to take the usual course, and when amendments are made to give time for their proper consideration.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There may be an "i" that is not dotted or a "t" that is not crossed, but that is no reason why the bill should be delayed. It is usual when amendments of a private character are made to a bill in committee to concur in them without delay and let the bill pass. The amendments do not affect the public at large, but the hon. gentleman wants to show that he is a lawyer—he is educated to find fault. Of course I have no objection to his doing so. He opposed the bill from the start, and he raised this question at the very beginning, and warned the committee against passing it in its present shape. In the committee the hon. gentleman voted for this amendment, of which we have notice on the paper, and got only four votes altogether. I believe he will not get any more in this House when the unreasonable amendment is moved.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg to assure my hon. friend from Monck that he is entirely mistaken in assuming that I intend to offer any opposition to the bill. I did not oppose it at any stage, and I do not wish to oppose it now. When the bill was before the committee, reference was made to the fact that there was another bill asking for a bridge across the Ottawa. I stated then, and I state now—and I think all persons who give the matter any consideration will agree with me—that it is not desirable to multiply bridges if parties in the locality could agree upon one bridge. Make it wider if you like, but make them agree upon one bridge. With a view to accomplishing that object it was suggested—not by me, but I supported the suggestion—that the bill should stand till the Aymer and Ottawa Railway and Bridge Company's bill came up, and that was the feeling of the committee. When the order was called at the last meeting of the committee, the other bill for building a bridge alongside of it was not before the committee; and so the friends of this bill determined to push it on. Of course they had a perfect right to do so, but I thought it could stand. It was not with the object of obstructing it in any way. If an amicable arrangement could not be made for one bridge, I was not going to insist upon my view. It is a possibility—and I hope a probability in the future—that there will be a canal built there. Forty years ago this country voted a considerable sum of money for canalling the river at the Chats, and a large sum was expended. I had the pleasure of voting for that expenditure; but in 1859-60, owing to the fact that we were then paying 8 per cent for our money, there was a feeling in the Ottawa district that any moneys that could be spared should be devoted to the construction of the buildings here, and the canal scheme was dropped for the time, notwithstanding the large expenditure that had been made. That scheme has been revived again. It is not a scheme which can be lightly thought of, because the canal would be of immense advantage to the whole country. It would shorten the route and lessen the expense. I am not going to discuss the matter, but in view of that project, if both parties insist upon having bridges, it seems to me neither company should make it a subject of damages if the bridges should be converted into swing-bridges. If both insisted on having bridges, it seems to me that they should take them under that condition. I proposed the amendment to the bill, and I thought it was not unreasonable. I am not going to thwart the bill, or interfere with it in the least; I am not going to take the sense of the House, because the committee was so largely against the proposal that I am convinced it would be no use. I therefore bow to the sense of the majority of the committee, but I think it is a matter that the government should take cognizance of, when the plans come before the government. I do not think they would be justified in taking the stand that they should pay for these alterations, if it should ever become necessary to make them. There is now no project for the canal before the government, and they probably do not regard it as a possible enterprise. The committee maintained that it was the duty of the government to take cognizance of it; and I said no, it was the duty of Parliament to take cognizance of it, and so the motion was voted down. The proposal had only four supporters. The amendment was:—

That should the proposed canal be built along the Ottawa River, then in that event any necessary alterations in the construction of any part of the said bridge shall be borne by the company, and such alteration shall not form the basis for any claim for compensation or damages.

I did not think it was a serious block to the enterprise, because if the canal were constructed the swing bridge could be built.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman is making an argument which should not have any weight. If these men are going into the markets of the world to borrow money to build this structure with a charter loaded down with this provision, it would only be necessary to boom the Ottawa Canal and they could not get money anywhere to build their bridge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going to discuss that matter. I do not think it would be any cloud on the attempt to float the bonds, because it is not a matter of such supreme importance. I have no doubt the sense of the committee is the sense of the House. I have simply called the attention of the government to it, so that when the plans come to be considered the responsibility will be thrown on them. I do not therefore propose, as there seems to be such a desire to get both bridges, to put my amendment to a vote.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I think the discussion upon this point has arisen out of a misunderstanding. In the minutes of proceedings of the House, the amendment reads “trains” instead of “trams,” and the hon. member for Halifax has drawn the attention of the House to the fact. If the error appears in the bill in the same way it should be corrected. I think he was quite right in stating that there was an error in the minutes of the House. I have sent for the bill and I find that the amendment made by the committee has been properly entered in it, and consequently there can be no objection to the third reading of the bill unless some other motion is made.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No other motion can be made.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I wish to assure the House that the committee in rejecting the proposed amendment did not act hastily or without consideration or a knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the case. As a matter of fact, the canal which was spoken of has never been contemplated to go in that part of the river which it is proposed to bridge. The plans, specifications and examinations made under the expenditure to which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa referred, all place the site of the canal half a mile inland from these rapids. I went to visit them on Saturday for the purpose of making myself personally acquainted with the surroundings, and I am perfectly satisfied—although nothing is impossible to engineering skill—that it would be impracticable to construct a canal via the Deschênes Rapids to bring vessels from above the Deschênes Rapids to below the falls here in the city. It could not be done, whereas taking the canal through the land they could make it of any required capacity. So the building of these bridges, in my judgment, should not be interfered with, because of the impossibility of a canal being made in the bed of the river.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (57) “An Act to incorporate the Trail Creek and Columbia Railway Company.”—(Hon. Mr. Vidal).

Bill (28) “An Act to incorporate the St. John River Bridge Company,” as amended.—(Hon. Mr. Poirier).

THE JARVIS DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV moved the adoption of the 13th report of the standing committee on divorce re Helen Woodburn Jarvis relief bill.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

OTTAWA AND AYLMEY RAILWAY AND BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV moved the second reading of Bill (54) “An Act to incorporate the Ottawa and Aylmer Railway and Bridge Company.” He said: This is a bill very similar in its character to the one relating to the Deschênes bridge, which we have just passed. The object of this company is to construct a line of railway from the western limit of the city of Ottawa to a point on the Deschênes or Remoux Rapids, to bridge the Ottawa and to extend the line to connect with Aylmer and Hull, and possibly later on to extend the road along the shores of the beautiful Lake Deschênes. It will afford means of transportation to many who are now without any such facilities. Britannia is a popular summer resort, and Aylmer contains a considerable population. With the extension of this road along the shore of Lake Deschênes, many beautiful localities will be utilized for summer residences. The project is in the interest of the whole community and should meet with the unanimous approval of the Senate. I do not care to discuss the bill which we have just passed, but I had been in hopes that the two companies would agree upon one bridge instead of erecting two separate structures. However, the matter will be brought up in the Railway Committee and I have no doubt that everything will be arranged in a manner that will be satisfactory to the Senate and the community generally.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate then adjourned.

INSURANCE ON LIVES OF CHILDREN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN rose to Direct attention of the Senate to the crimes said to have been developed from the practice of effecting "insurance on the lives of children, and those incompetent to make personal application for such insurance," and ask the government if they propose to take any measures to restrict or prevent such practice.

He said:—In calling attention to the subject of life insurance, I beg, at the outset, to disclaim any interest therein personally. I have no connection with life insurance companies, and, therefore, I am not biassed by personal interest. Insurance in its various forms is very general and extensive, permeating every portion of the community. This is not surprising in view of the character of the insurance companies and the numbers and intelligence of their agents throughout the country, and considering also that the press and even the pulpit encourage life insurance. Even as regards marine and fire insurance, I think the House will agree with me that however much good may arise from the protection thus afforded to property, there is a certain amount of evil arising from the system. But while occasionally a house may be burned or a ship scuttled for the purpose of gain, we must regard these as exceptional cases, and believe that human nature is not, after all, so bad as it is painted. But those are not cases in which the life of a human being is involved. Life insurance has special characteristics in which it differs from insurance in its general form. Life insurance as a whole demands the consideration of the government and of parliament. It has become so universal that no parliament or government can venture to infringe on the prerogative of the insurance companies or interfere with their business since the most influential elements of society favour it. Even from the pulpit we are sometime taught that after having performed all the duties and displayed all the virtues set forth in the book of books, we should as a matter of duty put our trust for worldly prosperity in incorporated insurance companies. The subject which I bring up to-day, however, is one that does not affect life insurance generally. It relates more particularly to a form of insurance which has not yet obtained so strong a foothold in Canada as in some other countries—the insurance of people who are not competent to make personal application or perform any of the functions of one party to the contract. I refer particularly to infants, and when I use the term I do so in its legal sense. To effect insurance on the life of a minor, or any one not fully competent to be a party to the transaction, should in my opinion be considered a misdemeanour. Not only is infantile insurance separate and distinct from general life insurance, but in this country, where that class of business has not been transacted to any extent comparatively, it would be an advantage to the older societies to legislate against it, because I am quite convinced that if this form of insurance continues to increase and grow, there will be, among those who look more to the philanthropic advancement of their fellow-beings than personal gain, a strong outcry against it which might extend even to the general principle of life insurance on adults. In bringing this subject to the attention of the government it might be expected that I would at least give some instances of the effect of child insurance in other countries where it has been thoroughly tried. I find that in the United States, according to the Boston Herald, there are over seven million children who are subjects of life insurance, that in Massachusetts alone there are over one hundred thousand children under ten years of age who are insured, and I think in very many states of the union, the Metropolitan, a large company whose agencies extend largely over the country make a specialty of child insurance. In only one state has the legislature intervened to prevent this business; that is the state of Colorado. Many prominent men in Massachusetts, occupying the very highest and best positions in society, have investigated this matter with no object of gain whatever, but simply influenced by christian humanity and philanthropic feelings, and I shall give the views of some of them. The statements which I am to quote were made before a large committee of the legislature of Massachusetts, when a bill prepared by the humane societies, to prevent infantile insurance was under consideration. The bill was placed before a committee, and evidence on both sides was heard. The committee reported in favour of the legislation petitioned for. However, when the bill was reported to the full House it was rejected. The insurance companies, with the influence which they had in the press, and other influences which are possible there, though not possible here, brought to bear on the members of the legislature, succeeded in defeating the bill, and yet there were 23 gentlemen connected with that legislature who had heard the statements on both sides, who favoured that enactment.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Do you mean that the bill was defeated by the action of the insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—That is my opinion. The legislation was founded upon a petition signed by two thousand citizens of Massachusetts, comprising legal and medical men, clergymen, men and women who control institutions of charity in Boston and other cities of Massachusetts. The statements made before the committee were so explicit that it is not surprising that they reported favourably upon the bill. I will refer to one or two of the statements made before the committee. Dr. Charles Mack, of Boston, gave testimony in favour of the bill, but his evidence was not so strong as that of others. Then the Reverend Father Munday, of the Church of Annunciation, Cambridgeport, was next called. He said that he had come in contact with the poorer classes. In one or two cases, where mothers had told him that they were unable to procure medicine for their sick children, an insurance man came and collected money for premiums. He did not think life insurance of this kind should be allowed, as it was a premium for a funeral, rather than to preserve life. There is a temptation to these poor people to neglect their children, and he could not see why the law should allow a system to be in use that causes neglect to the living to secure money to pay for a stylish funeral. In answer to a question by representative Davis, Fr. Munday said he had personally met but two or three cases in which there had been neglect, where the children had been insured.

Mr. George T. Angell, president of the American Humane Educational Society, said to a reporter of the Boston Herald:

If what I find stated in a report of the state board of health in Tennessee is true, the business, it seems to me, is simply infernal, and our legislature should enact a law to send to state prison any man who engages in it.

Dr. Samuel Boyd, secretary of the state board of health in Tennessee, states that he has been watching the growth and tendency of parents to commit this crime, and that the results of his observations are appalling to him. Dr. Boyd says: "There is no doubt that many children have perished in my city (Nashville) for lack of proper treatment who would have been living today if no inducements of a pecuniary nature had been held out."

He further says: "And many, too, have in my opinion been murdered outright for the purpose of getting the insurance. I have seen many cases full of horrible suspicion."

The chairman of a special committee on the subject of 'Child Life Insurance,' Dr. Daniel F. Wright, calls attention to an alarmingly great increase in the amount of child murder for the sake of trifling sums of money obtained under such policies. He says:

"Were the statements not well substantiated they would be almost incredible. The means employed for the murder of the innocents is generally no more violent than the withholding of a mother's care, starvation and the lack of medical attendance. We are told that conviction for the crime can seldom be secured, although abundant circumstantial evidence can be presented."

"Why is it not possible," continued Mr. Angell, "for a charitable society to take charge of the burial of the children of poor parents for one-half the charges of the insurance companies, not paying any money except for the actual purposes of burial?"

"For my part, I cannot understand why, if persons in Boston are too poor to bury their children, the city should not give them at its own expense a respectable and proper burial in either a Catholic or Protestant cemetery, as may be desired."

Then there is an article from the Boston Herald against child insurance from which I will read some paragraphs. This is from Mr. Charles Coolidge Read, who was the counsel on one side against ex-Governor Long, who opposed the bill in the state legislature. In opening the case for the petitioner, Mr. Read read the names of some of the petitioners, to show, as he said, the character of the people who are asking for the legislation. They include representative men from all walks of life. He said:—

The society which I primarily represent has no personal interest in the matter. It is engaged in caring for and looking after the children, and its only interest in this question is whether or not insurance is for their safety and welfare. We have no desire to oppose industrial insurance except so far as it relates to children under 10 years of age. We do not base our case upon any claim that murders are being committed every day as the result of issuing policies on the lives of children; but we do believe that cruelty does frequently follow such insurance.

Money that should buy bread to sustain life goes to the insurance agent, and the result is that children, in many cases, are improperly fed and clothed, when, if it were not for these payments, they would be better cared for. In cases that have been brought to light, the diet is largely baker's bread and tea; and their chief motive in this method of saving is that a grand funeral may follow in case of death. In fact, the money that ought to go to the care of the children finds its way to the pocket of the undertaker.

It is among the poor and ignorant people that the agents representing industrial insurance companies circulate. They have many sharp, shrewd, enterprising men in their employ, who go among this class of people, instructed to make a house to house, floor to floor, and room to room canvass, and to secure insurance upon the lives of every one they meet.

The speaker drew a graphic picture of one of these agents going to a poor, ignorant family and urging the mother to take out insurance in order that, if her child is taken away, it may have a white casket and be borne to the grave in a white hearse with white plumes, instead of being buried in a pine box.

He instanced the case of a woman in Lynn, who was approached by an agent and asked why she did not insure her children. The mother replied that her husband was out of work, and she could not afford it. The agent replied by advising her to scant them on their food and put them to bed without supper, in order to save money to insure them. "That woman," said the speaker, "did not insure her children, and I will have her here to testify before the hearing is closed."

It is a wrong for these sharp, shrewd agents to visit these people, and present the arguments they do for insuring the children. This five or ten cents a week paid for insurance is so much taken from the bread of the family, and goes largely to the insurance companies to build marble blocks and costly offices.

Then here is another extract:

This business is morally bad, and ought to be stopped by the legislature. It is cruel to the children and demoralizing to the parents; and, besides, it is unfair to the public charities of the state who provide food to the poor families whose money goes to the insurance agent. It would be far better for these poor people to learn thrift by putting money into the five cents saving bank, or giving it into the Society for Home Savings, than to buy insurance as they do now. But this is not simply a question of figures, but a moral issue affecting not only the parents themselves, but their children, and is worthy to receive the most careful thought of all who are interested in the public welfare.

Speaking of the income of these companies, the following article, from the Christian Register, furnishes interesting information:

Here we find actual payments on account of lapsed and surrendered policies of only $212,813,-62, largely, moreover, on non industrial policies: whereas the full net reserve alone is $14,998,083, and it is admitted that hundreds of thousands of this company's industrial policies lapse every year. In 1894 the number was 1,637,030. It is evident that, if the payments on lapses and surrenders were increased only five fold, by giving full credit for reserve on all lapses the company's surplus, which is shown to be only $661,744.72 in excess of the guarantee capital, would be wiped out, which is equivalent to saying that the lapses go to help pay the expenses or make their payment possible. Thus we see no reason to retract the substance of our remarks. The companies of other states are not legally limited at all as to forfeitures, and the John Hancock is so limited only after two years; whereas the entire average duration of industrial policies probably does not exceed, if it equals four years. Since Gov. Long's reply was written we have taken pains to verify again the statements and figures here quoted by reference to the reports of the Insurance Commissioners of New York and Massachusetts. The statement we made that, of nearly $1,900,000 received monthly, nearly $1,100,000 monthly, or nearly 60 per cent, is absorbed in the cost of the business, is substantiated. Gov. Long's defence that this includes the amount required to be held as reserve is incorrect. The totals referred to are made up chiefly of agents' commissions, salaries, medical examiners' fees, and similar items.

Setting aside the whole question of the neglect of children alleged by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, it seems to us that the enormous cost of industrial insurance compared with the returns which the insured obtain from it is one of the greatest objections to the system. We believe in encouraging thrift among the poor, but by some better method than this enormously expensive way; and, if the state has the right, which it now freely exercises, to protect the insured and assure to them a fair return for what they invest, it certainly has a right to extend this protection here.

Rev. Chas. Mack, of East Boston, who appeared before the legislative committee testified that he was called to a baby farm, and at that time there were three babies, a boy fourteen years old. All were insured and all neglected. He spoke also of another case at No. 15 Adams street, Roxbury, where a child died under one year of age, and was insured. It died from neglect. The medicine left was spilled, and the child was not given proper food.

Before the same committee Mr. Frank B. Fay, general agent for the Massachusetts society for the prevention of cruelty to children, said:

This question of child insurance came up before us a few weeks since by a letter from Tennessee asking us if our society was in favour of it. We made an investigation, and found as a result of our inquiries that we could not give it our approval. We believe that a child is more entitled to care when alive than after it has passed away. This form of insurance tends to please the vanity of parents of poorer classes, and they expend their money for providing for a showy funeral for the dead, rather than for the taking care of the living.

Mrs. Lucy P. Atwood, assistant general agent for the same society, was next called, and testified that she had been with the society for three years, and for nine years previous had been connected with the associated charities, she said:

In my opinion, child insurance is a decided evil among the poorer classes. I have a very large acquaintance among the poor families at the north end, and they have come to look upon me as their friend. I speak, therefore, for the children of my friends. I have often seen the money for the payment of the insurance lying on the corner of the mantel when there was no bread in the house, and I could not induce the mother to take the money to buy food. Never but once have I prevailed upon the parents to spend such money.

The witness told several stories of destitution and want that had come to her notice, in many of which five, ten or fifteen cents a week were spent for insurance, while charitable people were virtually supporting the family. She related a story of a child living with a stepmother. The child was insured, and there was most unwarrantable cruelty bringing her almost to the verge of starvation. The society the witness represented took the child away, and it was now being cared for in a good family. This child was insured, but when the child was removed the insurance was dropped.

"From my experience in cases of which this is a type," she said, "I do not at all believe in child insurance, and we have therefore asked the legislature to forbid the issuing of policies on the lives of children under ten years of age."

Miss Myra Frenyear, an agent of the Associated Charities for seven years and a visitor of the Children's Aid Society, was next called. She said at the outset that her belief was that it is wrong to insure children of any class, rich or poor. To her it seems unnatural, for it can be of no benefit to the children. Child insurance flourishes among the poorer people, who, in many cases, are helped by public and private charity.

I have 575 families in my care to-day, she said, and have visited very much among the poor. Living on Mendora street, near the Roxbury crossing—one of the very poor, short streets of the city—there are 45 families, having 195 children, of whom 15 are too young to be insured; 75 are known not to be insured, and in regard to 4 it is not known whether they are insured or not. The remainder—101—are all insured.

My investigations in general lead me to believe that more than half the children of poor families are insured, and the average age is about 5 years.

The witness cited the fact, also, that of 119 families tabulated in ward 22 there was no insurance in 29, in 16 the insurance had lapsed, two families had paid-up policies, and 72 families were carrying insurance. Of 444 children, 149 of the insured were more than and 74 were less than ten years old. In a given period the number of deaths among the uninsured was 11 and among the insured 33.

Miss Frenyear at this point began to cite cases of wretched destitution in large families where the children were insured, and in many instances went hungry in order to save money to pay the premiums. One case which she discovered last Thursday was of a young couple, aged 20 and 24 years, with two children. They had recently come from New York and were in utterly destitute circumstances. A ten-cent can of condensed milk was the food of the children for a week. Insurance had been placed upon these children since they came here, three months ago.

Five children out of six, in another family, were insured at 55 cents a week. A pint of milk a day was all they could afford for food.

In another case, several members of a family were insured, the premiums amounting to 85 cents a week. They had paid in a total of $186.50. An undertaker is now paying the premiums and has the policies.

In another family were four children under 10 years of age, all insured.

The Rev. Albert E. George, of St. Matthew's Church, South Boston, said that he knew personally of starving families in which premiums are paid on the lives of young children who are regarded as an encumbrance. He promised to prove that in one instance, at least, an undertaker and the insurance agent had divided profits after the death of a child.

Richard H. Dana, whose standing made him an exceedingly trustworthy witness, said there was no truth in the claim of the companies that they do not seek insurance in the slums. Their canvassers go wherever there is a prospect of making a dollar. The $28 which the parent receives at the death of his child is to him an enormous sum, larger than any he ever saw, and it affords great temptation for desiring the death of the child. Ex-Governor Long, counsel for the companies, in attempting to make a point out of an admission by the witness, was badly worsted. Mr. Dana having allowed that the charitable society savings banks answered all the purposes of the insurance companies, Mr. Long insinuatingly asked: "If the families pay ten cents a week to these organizations, does it not deprive them of food just the same as if they were paying it to an insurance company?"

"Yes, sir," was the reply, "but they are not compelled to lose all they have paid in case of failure to pay, nor are they encouraged to pay when they need the money for food."

"Can they draw out the money when they want it?"

"Yes, and they do not have to wait till the child dies, Gov. Long."

Dr. Florence Leach, who has a large practice among the poor, multiplied harrowing details of suffering in families where the lives of little children were insured, until the committee told her it was more than satisfied and told her to stop. One case was that of three young children who were insured; the family was in a starving condition. The mother said, when asked why she paid twenty-five cents a week insurance, that if the child died she wanted it to have a good funeral. One bright boy of eight in a family that depended on begging for support, and where fifteen cents a week was paid for insurance, remarked when another child was born, "One more to beg for!" A woman who had pawned her furniture to obtain money to pay the insurance on the lives of her children said that her reason for doing so was that if a child died she would have a good funeral and ride in a hack.

These are of course all statements made by parties who favoured the legislation in Massachusetts and it might be thought that I should not particularly refer to them, but there is no way in which I could bring this subject so clearly before the government, as by citing these instances of how the business has worked in other places. I will now read from an article from a Connecticut paper headed: "Premium on murder, insured babies killed by inhuman parents, danger in the practices of industrial companies."

New Haven, Ct., March 10, 1895.—City Attorney Fox of this city has called the attention of insurance commissioner Mansfield to a practice on the part of certain life insurance companies which he believes to be full of danger.

The insurance companies in question are those which conduct what are known as "industrial departments."

Mr. Fox laid some startling facts before the commissioner, and urged him to consider the advisability of securing legislation whereby poor people who take out these small policies on weekly payments may be protected from loss and deception.

Commissioner Mansfield will take some steps to bring about a change in the present system of industrial insurance.

One of the most telling arguments that Mr. Fox brought to bear on Commissioner Mansfield was the danger of crime resulting from companies insuring babies.

Mr. Fox is satisfied, from facts in his possession, that many babies who have been insured have been put out of the way in order that the parents might secure the insurance money.

Many cases of this nature have come to the attention of Mr. Fox, but in none of them could the evidence be gathered sufficiently to warrant a prosecution for murder.

Now those are some of the statements made by prominent people before the legislative committee, and show how the system works so far as Boston and Massachusetts are concerned. Now with regard to child insurance in England, I have some further information to give. It is stated last year there were 4,500,000 children insured in England. Of course child insurance in that country has been in existence about twice as long as it has been in the United States. Every hon. gentleman in this chamber knows how difficult it is to procure legislation restricting the business of societies incorporated as these have been, with large capital and extensive powers and which have been doing business for a long period. It is almost impossible after the business has become a part of the social fabric to a large extent, to provide by legislation a corrective which would impair their business. In the motherland, on several occasions parliament has been asked to appoint a committee to investigate the evils existing there in connection with the insurance of children, and on several occasions benevolent societies have succeeded in getting partial legislation. For instance, they have succeeded in getting the limit raised from six years to ten years. They have also by stating who shall be the beneficiaries taken away from inhuman parents the inducement of gain. I refer hon. gentlemen to an article in the London Lancet of January 1895, in which a very strong opinion is expressed in opposition to the principle of allowing children to be insured. I will now read from the Journal of the Royal Statistic Society of March, 1894, an extract from a prize essay written by Hugh R. Jones, M.A., M.D., D.P.H., Cantab, B.Sc., Honorary Ass. Surgeon to the Infirmary for Children, lecturer on Bacteriology, Royal Southern Hospital, Liverpool:—

The idea that child insurance is directly responsible for much of the waste of child life is very prevalent. For the last half century child insurance, either in the form of burial insurance or of life insurance, has been in existence, originating in Liverpool and other towns where high infant mortality prevailed. For the past thirty years it has been alleged that this child insurance tends to excessive infantile mortality, for in 1871 Mr. Curgenvan, giving evidence before the Select Committee on the Bill for the Protection of Infant Life, stated his belief that "children insured in burial clubs die in a much larger proportion than children not so insured." Other witnesses were of a like opinion. The committee stated in its report that it had been suggested to them "that no infant or very young person should be entered in a burial club or become the subject of life insurance."

The report of the Royal Commission on friendly societies in 1874, expressed the opinion that "infant life assurance, if badly administered, was mischievous," a fact which no one would venture to question, and added, "that if well administered it was not harmful but beneficial."

The Rev. R. Waugh estimated that over 1,000 children die, or are made to die, every year for the sake of the insurance money. He estimates that 33 per cent of the children of the industrial classes are insured.

Further on the writer of this prize essay qualifies that view and fails to express so strong an opinion against child insurance as that particular clause would indicate. He refers to the evidence given by other witnesses of good standing. Efforts have been made several times in the course of the legislation in England to effect some amelioration of the evil. Before passing to the Canadian part of the subject, I want to read the following opinion given by Mr. Edward Atkinson, whose name will be familiar to many hon. gentlemen in this House as a leading insurance man. He said in his remarks before the committee on insurance:

It has been suggested to me to come here because it had been assumed that I had some knowledge of what might be called the philosophy, or even the psychology, of insurance. It is known to some of you that the department of insurance in which I have a leading position is devoted to maintaining the duration of the life of the factory, to maintaining it in a condition of health, of comfort and efficiency,—not to pay something on its death by fire,—that is an obnoxious incident due to the fault of the owner or the occupant, and to the want of care of the insured property. One of the most curious psychological observations that one makes is the difficulty which one has in impressing upon the owner or the occupant of property that he himself is the only one that can insure it against loss by fire, and that upon him develops the responsibility for the care and for the precautions intended to save that property. This curious tendency—and some of my friends of the stock companies who are on your committee know it very well—this curious tendency is that when the man has insured his property he puts the responsibility on the insurance company. He says, consciously or unconsciously, to himself, "I have got a contract of indemnity; you have got our money; now we will neglect the property,—we will put in anything and everything. We will allow benzine to be used in a most dangerous way; we will not look after anything ourselves. It is none of our business; that is the insurance company's business." That is the most curious tendency of the human mind,—the most difficult thing to be overcome, when one, who has not been insured under our system, which tends to the preservation of the life and to the care of the property insured, is brought to a sense of his own responsibility.

Now, then, gentlemen, I know a little something of life insurance, I think it is prudent for every young man to begin, as I did, many years ago,—choosing preferably the life insurance company which charges the highest rates, and is conducted on the safest principles,—to put away a little saving with the view to present or prospective family; not as an investment, but as an act of prudence.

As an investment, life insurance is subject, I think, to the heaviest charges and to the most costly system of administration of any great business that I know of; I therefore do not believe in that kind of investment. But as a matter of prudence, for an adult who is in charge and custody of his own person, it is a wise and prudent safeguard.

Now we come down to this matter of child insurance, to which I have given, since it was forced upon me, not only careful, but, I might almost say, prayerful consideration. You are dealing not with property but with human life. If the tendency should be the same here as it is in respect to property, for any one to say, consciously or unconsciously, "The child is insured; its care may be neglected, its health may be disregarded; then, if the one who holds the policy realizes a profit by death, it is all right; the insurance company has taken care of it,"—then it is your duty to regard that possible element, possible or probable or proved, whichever it may be. It seems to me, from what attention I have given to it, it has in some cases been proved. That is what you are to pass upon, bearing in mind that upon you rests the honour of the state of Massachusetts. If I were a judge, charging you as a jury, what I would say to you would be this: if there is a doubt—give it for life, not for death—if there is a doubt in your minds that by licensing child insurance of tender years you may promote death, notwithstanding the incidental benefit, notwithstanding all that may be put before you of what has been gained, the gain is not worth the price of the death of one single infant; you, who hold the honour of Massachusetts in your custody, will see that you do not give warrant for the neglect of the feeble and the helpless, or the death of an infant.

Now, then, when you come to regard the question merely from the economic standpoint, what is your alternative? Are there not savings banks in which the savings of the community can be put, provision for the funeral made; are there not organizations for promoting and soliciting the deposits of the poor in the savings banks without charge, without any element of personal profit and without the incentive of gain to those who lend themselves or give themselves to that benevolent purpose? We all know that there are. Now, if it costs, as it is alleged, a dollar or a dollar and a half, in the expense of conducting this system of insurance, for every dollar that is paid out in the alleged benefits, then weigh the relative merits of this with the systems for saving at the least cost or charge which are offered alike to every man and woman who is responsible for a child in this community, and choose which you will.

I can say nothing more. I think I have put in the case as it has presented itself to my mind as an expert in one kind of insurance, in which I am obliged to deal with the fundamental principles governing these contracts of indemnity, and the fundamental motives which, as men and women are constituted, may govern some members of the community. It is true that humanity is better than it is claimed to be; it is true that a vast number of those who insure their property, or insure their lives, or insure their children, are honest and sincere people who intend to do their duty. It is true that, in the commerce of the world, ninety-nine in a hundred would pay their debts whether there were any law for the collection of debts or not; it is true that, whether for self-interest, or from integrity, or from principle, the mass of men do rightly and mean rightly; but your protection is called for in defence against the one hundredth man—the one hundredth man who would defraud the insurance company by setting fire to his insured property; the one hundredth man who would cheat his creditor; and the one hundredth man who would neglect his child. He is the one to whom you must give your regard in framing the statutes of the old commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Cross-examination.

Q. (By Mr. Hollis)—Do you believe in a system of child insurance under any restrictions?—A. I do not, sir, having come to that conclusion because I give the doubt in favour of life, and not of death.

Q. (By Mr. Davis)—Mr. Atkinson, you wouldn't have us wipe out mill insurance because of incendiarism, but you think that child insurance ought to be prohibited because it is possible to result in the abuse of a child?—A. I think there is this curious psychologic principle that governs the human mind: that when people put over somebody else the responsibility, they neglect their own duties.

Q. That would be true of all kinds of insurance, would it not?—A. Yes; I think we should have much less loss in the community by fire if it were not possible to make a contract of insurance, but a contract of insurance is necessary to an extension of the business of the country and to the credit of the country, and therefore the gain is much greater than the loss, but there you are dealing with property and not with life.

Q. (By Mr. Maccabe)—Now, as a matter of fact, would it not impose more or less hardship on respectable people—would it, or would it not—if a bill were passed prohibiting insurance on the lives of any children, whether their parents were able to pay the premiums or not?—A. With all the opportunities that there are for receiving benefits from the investment of small sums, I think that they could find some other place to put the money that would pay them just as well, if not better.

Q. (By the Chairman)—Now, Mr. Atkinson, there is a moral hazard, a percentage of moral hazard, for every child that is born into the world?—A. Unquestionably.

Q. Now, do you think that that moral hazard would be increased by having the child insured?—A. I am constrained to say that I think there is a fraction of the community—how large I do not know—to whom that would be an incentive, and an increase of the moral hazard.

Q. (By Mr. Davis)—That is an opinion gained from what you have seen in the newspapers within the last three or four weeks?—A. It is an opinion gained not from what I have seen in the newspapers, but by taking the subject up and going through it in a certain philosophical way, and governed by my knowledge of conclusions arrived at in fifty-three years of experience.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Was that the evidence given before the joint committee in Massachusetts?

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Yes, before a committee on insurance this year. Then referring to the Christian Register, which goes into figures to show that poor people, who think they are gaining something financially, are losing. They are paying $5 perhaps and certainly not getting more than $2.50, probably not that if the interest on the premium money was reckoned. In order to show that more particularly it might be well for me to give a little table of the industrial insurance lapses. Child insurance in this country is always called industrial insurance, and in looking up the returns to find some statistics in this matter, I fail to find any reference to child insurance. It is all industrial insurance. This article is headed:

Industrial insurance lapses as applied to the three companies operating in the state of Massachusetts.

These are taken from the returns furnished by the insurance commissioner and no doubt are correct:

John Hancock Co. Number of policies in this company which ceased to be in force at the end of 1894, by death, was 10,154, representing $999,404. Number of policies in this company which ceased to be in force at the end of 1894, by lapse, was 184,638, representing $20,878,319.

Evidently the contributions from the poor people have gone to make up this:

Metropolitan Company. Number of policies in the company which ceased to be in force at the end of 1894, by death, was 57,633, representing $5,612,408. The number of policies which ceased to be in force at the end of 1864, by lapse, was 1,637,030, representing $208,290,063.

That is the Metropolitan—the largest company engaged in this class of insurance. I mention this because, in looking over the records of the Massachusetts legislature, I saw the statement made that only for the Metropolitan, which they considered their home office, they would grant the petition for the bill. They felt like it; but their head office was doing a large business, and they could not give it up. Then I come to Prudential Company. Number of policies in this company which ceased to be in force at the end of 1894, by death, was 1,603, representing $3,834,720. Number of policies in this company which ceased to be in force at the end of 1894, by lapse, was 1,345,097, representing $159,327,057.

There is a note to this:—

NOTE—Governor Long says: “The work of the industrial insurance companies is among the worthy poor, and asks that “the petition to prohibit insuring children’s lives under ten years of age be rejected, because it deprives the poor of a genuine benefit.” And yet, if over one million and a-half policies in one company lapsed in one year, does not that sufficiently show how the money of the poor goes into the expenses of the companies and not for the benefit of the poor?

Now here is an article by ex-Governor Long which gives his side of it and the answer to it. Coming to this Dominion, I have tried to get information, having given notice of this matter, which is somewhat new, but I have not been able to gather from the commissioners’ report anything that seems to throw very much light upon it. Before reading the statistics I might quote from a recent article in the Ottawa Citizen:—

INSURANCE OF CHILDREN—BOARD OF HEALTH MEMBERS CONDEMN THE PRACTICE—DR. ROBIL-LARD’S STATEMENT—THE PRACTICE IS INCREASING—CITY CLERK HENDERSON’S EXPERIENCE—THIRTY THOUSAND CHILDREN INSURED IN CANADA—RECOMMENDATION SHORTLY TO BE MADE.

The question of child insurance was discussed at a meeting of the board of health last evening, the members condemning the practice pretty strongly.

It was brought up by Medical Health Officer Robillard, who called the attention of the board to the fact that it was increasing. In a communication he stated: “But that there is a great temptation for the indigent and not over scrupulous parents to wilfully neglect to properly care for their offsprings under such circumstances, has been made painfully evident to me during the last year whilst in discharge of professional duties.”

Ald. Cook remarked that the doctor’s report was pretty strong, when the city clerk said: “It isn’t stronger than is warranted.”

A CASE IN POINT.

The medical health officer stated that in one case three children whose lives were insured, had died without being attended by a doctor. Then the city clerk told his experience the substance of which was given in the Citizen some time ago. He said one day an insurance agent came to his office with the father of a child who had died and asked for a certificate of the death of the child from a return presented. The return did not give the cause of death nor the name of the physician who attended it. Inquiry elicited the information that the child had not been attended by a physician, that it had been insured, that the father desired a certificate so that he could get the insurance on the child’s life, and that the agent was perfectly satisfied that he should. The city clerk said he had told the agent that he thought it was a disgraceful proceeding and as he was not obliged to give a certificate he would not. The clerk added that an address given him by the father at the time was false, as he discovered when he made inquiries later on.

“It is the fault of the Act,” said the clerk in conclusion, “and the legislature should be petitioned to abolish it. The Act is a disgrace to it. Insurance of children too young to understand what is being done should not be allowed.”

30,000 IN CANADA.

Ald. Cook said he had read the insurance returns a few days previous and he saw that there were 30,000 child policies in Canada.

Ald. Stewart told of Mr. Kelso, of Toronto, writing him on the matter, when he had sent the particulars of a case aired in the police court.

WILL TAKE ACTION.

Ald. Payment and others expressed themselves to the effect that it was a practice that should be stopped as soon as possible.

The board will no doubt shortly make a recommendation to the effect that the legislature be petitioned to abolish the Act permitting the insurance of young children.

I have also found several articles in newspapers in Montreal and other places in condemnation of the practices which are being introduced.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Were those insurances effected in Canadian companies?

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I will come to that directly. I presume they are principally in the Metropolitan Company of New York, because they do the bulk of that class of business. The report of 1894 shows that the industrial policies of the Metropolitan in force are $2,932,064. Now how many of them are children? It is impossible to tell, because industrial policies are policies taken out on a whole family from the parents down to the youngest. Then the London Life has 17,000 of those policies, and the American Life has 11,000; altogether $2,061,000 of industrial policies, as I make it up from the commissioners' report. The gentleman in the Ottawa paper apparently managed to get more definite figures. He speaks about there being 30,000 children insured. I read recently an article which very plainly showed the actual profits of these companies, but it would not be new or interesting, because I dare say many hon. gentlemen are stockholders in those companies and know that the dividends are quite large, notwithstanding the enormous palatial residences that these companies erect. They pay salaries which reach as high as $75,000 a year to managers of those companies, and each company keeps a large staff of canvassers who necessarily are intelligent and capable men and who must be very well paid. We all know perfectly well the amount of expenditure made by these gentlemen, yet in addition to all that expenditure they are able to pay the stockholders good dividends each year, and that fact establishes the profitable nature of the business. There is one other subject to which I made reference, and that is the insuring of people without their knowledge, or "insuring on the quiet," as I believe they term it in some of the United States papers. That is to say, they take a risk on anybody's life on payment of the premium, and I am credibly informed that some agents, in the lower provinces at any rate, have proposed to do that in this country. Of course legal gentlemen would meet that by saying it would be useless because it would be illegal. My answer is there is nothing in the general law of insurance to prevent it, so far as I can discover. Then they will say there is no insurable interest and the common law of England will prevent it, but there is an insurable interest; if a man owes me money, and I have no other chance of getting it, and an insurance company agrees to take a risk on his life. If that man dies the debt is paid, and there is nothing to hinder a company from taking that risk. That is insuring people "on the quiet." My hon. friend from Ottawa says it could not be done in Ontario. I see nothing in the law to prevent it, and I know of nothing to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Except this, that no respectable company would take it without a medical report.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have discovered many instances in Massachusetts in which insurance has been offered without any intimation to the party,—without any solicitation and without the knowledge of the individual. Anybody may be carrying on his life $50,000 and be as innocent of it as one of these babies to whom we have referred.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The only thing I was anxious to bring out was that the hon. gentleman was speaking of foreign companies. I do not believe there is any respectable Canadian company that would insure a child 5 years old.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I am not making an attack on the companies at all. I am showing what is being done in other countries and it would not be at all surprising if it were introduced into this country. I have endeavoured to show that 30,000 children in this country are insured already.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—By foreign companies.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN. Yes, but the question is whether the Government should not make it a misdemeanour. That is the point of my reference. An ounce of prevention is said to be worth a pound of cure, and if I can show to this hon. House that evils have arisen from this practice in other places, although it has not obtained a strong foothold here, it is the duty of the Government, before it becomes an embarrassing duty to perform, to prevent the further introduction of the system. If it once attains the proportion that it has attained in Massachusetts, I can quite understand how difficult it would be to prevent it. The very fact of such legislation being rejected there, after being favourably reported upon by a committee of the legislature, is a point in my argument why something should be done in Canada, in order that we may not be placed in a similar unfortunate position. There are some who, like the Ephesian silversmith, would be willing to cry "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." I hope there are not many in Canada who would say so. It will not do, however, to say because gain is being made by the system that therefore nothing should be done to check the business. Almost the whole of this insurance, I think, is done by the Metropolitan. I have, under my hand, a statement of one of those cases to which I have referred, in which no medical examination was required and the policy was taken out without the knowledge of the insured. I have tried to bring before the Government the enormous extent to which the business has progressed in the adjoining republic and in England, in order to show the difficulties which beset benevolent individuals there in furnishing any protection in consequence of the enormous increase of infantile insurance and it only remains for me to put this question which is on the paper. I do so with the utmost confidence that the hon. premier, who in a former part of this session stated that he always had been and always would continue to be the defender of the weak against the strong, will take some action to prevent the extension of this system of insurance. Here is certainly a case in which such protection is needed. Since I have referred to this matter publicly I have been favoured with a good many documents on both sides of the question. It would be absurd to undertake to occupy the time of the House in bringing forward the arguments on both sides. My personal opinion is very strong on this point. The subject is one which will interest the Government, which claims to be paternal, and I hope they will consider this matter as I do, one to be regulated.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I am sure everyone who has heard my hon. friend must be strongly impressed with his earnest desire to do right, and his benevolent feeling towards a class of humanity who are not always protected. I have noticed on several occasions that my hon. friend has always the courage of his convictions, and in this case, if I rightly understand his views, he is indeed a bold aggressor, for he takes issue with nearly every civilized country on the earth with respect to the benefit of fire and life insurance.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I did not connect the life and fire insurance with this subject of child insurance. I merely stated that there was a difference of opinion as to the benefit of insurance. My object to-day was to attack this particular form of insurance.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—The same argument which he applied to life insurance would apply with equal force to fire insurance, but in the one case, the crime which might result from it would be greater than in the other. In one it would be merely arson, in the other it might possibly be murder; but I think where my hon. friend makes the great mistake is this—that he reasons (which is illogical) from the abuse against the use. Now experience has shown in all civilized countries the immense benefit of life insurance.

It is very true that if people could be induced to put their savings into some savings society regularly, they would at the end of a good many years have a large sum of money at their disposal, but people sometimes get in trouble and, a fear of distress upon them, they draw the money out. If people could be impressed with the value of saving in that way, it would be very well, but there is a strong and decided opinion all over the world in favour of life insurance and the business will continue. Now, my hon. friend has quoted statistics and made some very touching remarks, but the statistics which he quotes are not from this country, they are nearly all from the United States. I have some knowledge of the way life insurance is managed in Canada and I think it is carried on with a great deal of caution, and every insurance company that has a risk on a particular life is in the position of a custodian of that life. Of course it is impossible to prevent crimes in all these matters. The crimes of violence of former days have become crimes of fraud in the present day, and it is unfair to reason from the abuses which prevail in other countries against the working of the insurance system by companies in Canada. I know something of the country and I know cases where frauds were committed and sometimes grave suspicious pointing to murder. One or two cases have recently occurred in which crime was suggested, but such cases are few, and the system of insuring children is not at all common in Canada. I am acquainted with several of the insurance companies in this country. People naturally like to have some place where money can be deposited and increased. Men who have children naturally desire that they should be insured, and wish to encourage their young people to effect insurance upon their own lives at an early period. I know I have done so with reference to some of the members of my family—young men. It might be difficult at times to keep up the payments, but when they come to marry they would by exercising some self-denial, have a nice accumulation for themselves. I don't say that evils such as the hon. gentleman refers to, do not exist in Canada, but I claim that they are not common. The hon. gentleman is wrong in reasoning from these views he has read, against life insurance here, and I think he is dead set against life insurance in any form. The notice on the paper does not refer to such matters generally but merely to child insurance. If that prevailed in this country to any large extent and was followed by any evil, I would say my hon. friend has made a good appeal, and no harm can be done by it. But you must remember that those who insure a young child are watched closely and companies would be careful to resist any claim based upon fraud or crime.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am glad my hon. friend from Barrie appreciated the motive that induced the hon. gentleman to bring this subject to the notice of the Senate. It is a matter of great importance and I think he has stated the case in a very honest and sensible way. My hon. friend from Barrie was scarcely justified in drawing the general deduction that he did, that the hon. gentleman was adverse to all systems of insurance. I did not so understand him at all. He confined his argument to the dangers that are incidental to the insurance of children. The insuring of children's lives had its origin in England, and the motive was to provide money for the burial of the child in case of its early death and the sum was limited to about burial expenses. In the earlier times, when it was first introduced, the money was frequently payable directly to the undertaker. So it is quite evident that the motive of the parties was not to gain any pecuniary advantage. I am quite free to admit that it has extended and enlarged the temptation, and when the amounts became larger there possibly have been inducements to take the life of a child. But one can scarcely understand that in a country like England, where child insurance exists so largely, it has been opposed to any considerable extent; had it been society as constituted there would certainly have intervened by legislation and put a stop to it. It no doubt has been opposed there, and perhaps in the United States, but I do not know that it has been opposed in Canada. The paragraph which the hon. member read from the Ottawa paper was controverted afterwards, but where the amount is larger than the amount calculated for the burial expenses, there is a temptation perhaps to shorten the life of the infant. The same objection, however, can be urged to all classes of insurance. My hon. friend gave the illustration of scuttling a ship to get the amount of the policy. These crimes do occur from time to time, but they should not be brought forward as an argument against the general principle of insurance. Nor would my hon. friend think it an improper thing for him to insure his life for the benefit of his wife and children. All over the country friendly societies are formed, Foresters, Templars, &c., who have their own insurance agencies within themselves, showing that the whole tendency is to make provision for those dependent upon the bread winner. and therefore it is idle now to say that it is not a wise and a prudent arrangement for a man to take out insurance on his life, but my hon. friend did point out that there was such great danger in reference to the insurance of children that the subject at least ought to be inquired into. In reference to the allusions that he made to the effort made in Massachusetts to procure legislation on the subject, although I have not the figures by me, I remember that the committee, after hearing all the evidence that was adduced on both sides—that is, on the part of those who contended that the the system was a good one and those who contended that the lives of children were endangered by it—by a very large vote, I think a two-thirds vote, declined to interfere with the operations of the companies or to disturb the principle on which those policies were issued. That would be the general conclusion with regard to the system in England, where the number insured is so very large. No doubt there are occasions where there is great importunity on account of poverty to shorten the life of the assured, but the proper way to check that, in my judgment, is to limit the amount. It should not be extended. Of course the smaller the amount the less the temptation ; but unfortunately the tendency of late years has been, under the pressure of the insurance companies and under the belief that no harm was being done, to raise the amount of the insurance. Under the law of Ontario the amount originally fixed was, under the age of two years, $25. Under the recent statute passed the other day that amount has been extended to $32. Then children under three years could not be insured for less than $30 originally. That has been extended to $40. Under four originally a child could not be insured for more than $35 ; now, under the statute passed two months ago, it can be insured for $48. Children under five originally could not be insured for more than $40 ; now that has been extended to $56. There may be, of course, a very proper criticism on these extensions. At ten years the amount runs up as high as $147, which is another departure from the original principle on which this subject of child insurance was predicated showing that there might be an inducement to crime. I am not prepared to say that it has been abused ; I have no doubt that my hon. friend, in reading the extracts that he did from the benevolent and philanthropic people in Massachusetts was very much impressed by the conclusions which they drew. Still, as has been very properly observed by the hon. member from Barrie, the same argument might apply in other cases where we are not prepared to interfere. With regard to the action which parliament should take, that is a subject which requires careful consideration. Insurance is a matter of contract. When my hon. friend from Hope-well said that a policy could not be issued on the life of a person who might be wholly unaware of the fact, I said it would be impossible to do so. That is something which the Ontario statutes would not justify. The Ontario law provides that, in order to make a contract for life insurance valid, the beneficiary must be either the parent or guardian, or the nominee of the insured, or a person entitled under the law to act for the applicant, or one who must have had at the date of the contract a pecuniary interest in the duration of the life of the assured. So that in the broad case which he put as to the latitude allowed in effecting life insurance, he was not correct, because the policy would be void. A company could not make a contract of that kind ; there must be a direct pecuniary interest. A person may take out a policy on his own life and transfer it to his creditors ; that is a common thing, but I doubt whether even a creditor could take out a policy on the life of a debtor without that debtor being aware of it, because the insurance company must, in some degree, be a party to the fraud for the reason that there must be a medical examination. From my experience of insurance companies, I know that they are exceedingly careful in all those cases. They have sustained serious losses in many cases and have been taught caution, because no doubt many frauds have been committed against insurance companies. I know one company in Ottawa which has been defrauded to the extent of many thousands of dollars. Of course the agent had to be a party to the fraud, but when the attention of the company was called to the matter they disputed the policies and compromises had to be made. Insurances have been effected in a very irregular way on very questionable lives, but it required the agent to be a party to the fraud, and in some cases the medical examiner also, showing the care which insurance companies take to protect themselves against abuses of that sort. I think the hon. gentleman is entitled to our thanks for having brought up this question, but it would be a rather grave question for parliament to declare insurance of that kind a crime, particularly as the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction in matters of this sort. They can declare that a contract on the life of a child under 10 years is invalid. There is nothing to prevent that. I am not aware that there is any legislation on the subject in other provinces, but I am quite sure that in the advanced province of Ontario, if it were found that there was any abuse whatever on the subject, legislation would be at once invoked and the terms of the present Act would be altered so as to reduce the possible temptation of taking the lives of the insured. I do not think that it was wise to enlarge the temptation as the legislature has done. I should have preferred to see the law remain as it was before, because it does not seem judicious that a child under 5 years of age can be insured for $56. It could not be argued that it was for burial purposes, and that was the object that parliament had in view 25 or 30 years ago when they permitted policies of that kind to be issued on the lives of children.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If I correctly understood the argument of the hon. gentleman from Hopewell, I should divide it into two parts, as the hon. member from Barrie has done. In the latter portion of his remarks he gave us figures and statistics to show the enormous amount of money paid on life insurances and the forfeitures on them; giving the House to understand that most contracts were made for the benefit of the insurer rather than for the benefit of the insured. This led me to believe that the hon. member from Hopewell was opposed to life insurance on principle. But I must lay aside that portion of his argument as not at all justified by the question which he has brought before the House. The hon. member's object was mainly to establish that the taking of insurances on the lives of children led to infanticide, to the neglect of children for the cruel purpose of collecting a few dollars which, according to the limitation put on insurances of children, would hardly amount to the fees necessary to meet the requirements of a decent funeral. He has dealt extensively with the question; but to bring any fact to the attention of the House I am glad to say he has been obliged to travel outside of Canada and go to the United States. Now, this is what occurred in Massachusetts. A crusade was instituted by the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children against child insurance as practised for many years by the industrial life insurance companies. This society had probably dropped out of sight and wished to draw public attention to itself. They went before the Massachusetts legislature with a bill against child insurance. They went before a committee of the House; and when the good sense of the state legislators was put to the test, by a vote on the bill, they voted 149 against and 23 in its favour. Showing, therefore, that there was no necessity for interference with and prevention of insurance of children, and that no case had been made out to justify such a step. "This society in its efforts against child insurance undertook to manufacture an evil for the purpose of suppressing it. A weakness of such an organization is an itching desire to magnify their office. When they relieve real distress and grapple with real evils they are worthy of all praise; but when they charge crimes without reason or proof, and attack institutions of real beneficence, they become an impertinent nuisance and should be met with severe rebuff. The society in this case assumed that the insurance of children is a murderous arrangement, culminating in violent infanticide for the sake of the insurance. They made the charge and then sought for the proof. The evidence to sustain this atrocious accusation, so insulting to parental affection, could not be found. They mitigated the indictment and said that payment for the insurance, generally five cents a week,—and not seventy-five cents as one zealous lady testified,—was the means of depriving the child of proper sustenance and subjecting it to slow starvation."

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—From the Insurance Critic, referring to the very bill to which the hon. gentleman from Hopewell made allusion. We have heard from him evidence in support of the bill. I now claim indulgence of the House to hear me give evidence against the bill and relate the grounds on which it was rejected.

Ex-Governor Long, writing to the Christian Register, of the 27th April, 1895, states as follows:—

I thank you for your courteous invitation to write something in favour of child insurance; and in answer to your editorial of last week perhaps I can do nothing better than to inclose you herewith my argument before the committee, and let you make any extract you please from that. I wish you had waited to hear both sides before writing. You would have escaped some errors.

For instance, you would not have made the misleading statement that "few disinterested persons have opposed the bill" to prohibit child insurance. Nearly all the opponents, and they are legion, are disinterested. Clergymen like E. A. Horton, Stopford W. Brooke, and John Cuckson of our denomination, and a score of others; city missionaries; eminent charity workers like Edward Frothingham, general agent of the Boston Provident Association; Mr. J. Lewis Crewe, secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Pennsylvania; the agent of the Louisville Charity Society; and Sister Pamela of Albany; our most eminent physicians like Dr. William L. Richardson, Dr. Edward J. Foster, Dr. Francis Minot, Dr. J. Foster Bush; citizens like Curtis Guild, jr.; ex-mayor Hart; city physicians, overseers of the poor and a multitude more—an entirely disinterested class.

Then you intimate that "from the start" it was not claimed that child murder results from child insurance; on the contrary, Mr. Reed, for the bill, started with that claim in his very opening. It was that charge which roused all the feeling that has existed against this insurance; and, but for that, I do not hesitate to say that the public would have at once recognized that poor industrial people ought to have the right to insure their children if they desire thus to lay by a little provision for their last sickness and burial. Of course, the charge has been withdrawn and abandoned, because it is now admitted that in twenty years experience in our country, not a single case of child murder for insurance has occurred, while in adult insurance it is not infrequent. The whole charge has come down to a criticism upon poor people for funeral expenditure, and the temptation to spend five or ten cents a week for insurance that might be saved for food.

May I not say that legislative prohibition on these two points is a pretty severe interference with personal rights, and is really class discrimination?

Let me also say concisely, that at the hearing, while cases of cruelty, drunkenness and poverty were shown, not one was shown in which any injury to the child was traced to its insurance. Not a charge was made against insurance of children under ten that is not equally good in respect to children over ten, or, indeed, against life insurance in general.

Child insurance is not a recent scheme, like the bond investment craze, which defrauded people a few years ago, and exploded. It is a system which has existed forty years in England and twenty years here, constantly growing, because meeting a popular necessity and demand. It has been repeatedly investigated by the British Parliament, and always given a larger field. So also in this country in state after state. Our own insurance department has, under three commissioners, reported favourably on it. In 1891 our own Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children inquired into it and spoke well of it. And what is particularly striking is that in its last report, December 31st, 1894, while touching on every phase of that society's work and forecasting its future fields of labour, and reciting in detail a large number of cases of suffering children, there is not, from beginning to end of the report, a single allusion to child insurance. Why? Because there is nothing in it to call for action, either by the society or by the legislature.

Many persons, when this hearing began, supposed that child insurance offers the temptation of the large amount of adult insurance. The average amount is twenty-eight dollars. It begins with fifteen dollars the first year of insurance—and no child can be insured under one year of age—and while the premium, five cents a week, remains the same, does not reach one hundred dollars more till after ten years of age. This little sum is not only a resource for burial and doctor's bills and help to other sick children in the family, but the existence of the fund undoubtedly secures better medical attendance and care. The statistics show also, and it was not controverted at the hearing, that the death rate is less among insured than among non-insured.

People, however poor, will bury their children decently; and it is a question either of pauper funerals, which is a matter of self-respect, nobody will encourage—or else of the alternative between an insurance fund and debt, with its heavy interest. There would be just as much economizing in food to save money to pay debt as to pay insurance.

Since child insurance began in Massachusetts pauper funerals have diminished nearly one-half in number. Abolish child insurance and you will either go back to an increase of pauper funerals or put a new drain on your charity funds, and pass the hat to meet the expense. You will stop the habit of saving, which of itself is an education in social economy among the poor that should be encouraged. The savings banks do not meet this need of five cent savings. There is no competition between the two systems. Each meets a different necessity; and instead of one cutting into the other, both have been increasing in their business at the same time.

The remarkable thing in child insurance is that at the hearing, as also in the 1894 report of the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which I above cited, not a case of suffering is traced to the system. And yet we are asked to abolish it, and to deprive one hundred thousand children under ten years of age in Massachusetts, and the families they represent, of the privilege they now enjoy without the slightest effort, even if there be fear of some attendant and occasional evil, to meet it by some amendment rather than by the wholesale destruction of the system.

More than one-fifth of the population of the state are industrially insured, including the above 100,000; and it is significant that not one of them appeared at the hearing to support the bill.

You are also in error in intimating that there is no insurable interest on a child under ten years of age. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided otherwise. There is certainly an insurable, or what you call "commercial" interest, to the extent of the cost of the last sickness and burial. And for some years under ten, in many poor families the child is rendering little services that are of actual value; while the prospective chance of the child's growing up and later becoming the reliance of the parent is of very great value.

Referring to the present state of the law in Canada, there is in Ontario a statute that deals with the matter. My hon. friend from Ottawa has already referred to it. It limits the amount for which children may be insured. The maximum amount for which a child may be insured if it is two years old is $32; 3 years, $40; 4 years, $48; 5 years, $56; 7 years, $92; 8 years, $110; 9 years, $120. Now, I leave it to the House to say can this be an amount the payment of which would have sufficient interest to extinguish in the parent's breast the natural affection for the child? It would be hardly sufficient to pay the undertaker. We heard last year in this House a discussion upon the excessive charges made by undertakers for burials. Is it possible, under the limitation put by the Ontario statute that any parent could be induced to insure a child for the purpose of neglecting it? I do not think so. It is not within the breast of our people. It has not been proved to be within the practice of the people of the United States, from the investigation made in connection with the bill submitted to the legislature of Massachusetts. We have a few companies in Canada who insure children. I believe there are only two incorporated by the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Are they Canadian companies?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes. I think there are two incorporated by the Parliament of Canada who insure children. I may state, as a fact, that although there is no statute in the province of Quebec limiting child insurance, the companies which do business in that province and in other sections of the Dominion have made it a rule, and it is printed upon their policies, that the enactments of the statutes of Ontario are those followed throughout the Dominion, and no child is insured for any larger amount than I have already mentioned. So that the practice in this country does not seem at present to justify interference in the matter. There is another matter to which my hon. friend from Ottawa has referred. It is that unless you make child insurance a crime it is not a subject matter for the legislation of the Parliament of Canada. It is one for the local legislatures to deal with. It is for them to state the requirements, limitations and the necessary interests in a civil contract. Of course, if the Parliament of Canada was willing to deal with this matter as one of enormity, if we were to publish to the whole world that the parents of this country have so little affection for their children that a misdemeanour had to be created in order to prevent them from entering into child insurance for illegal purposes—we would have to declare that the insuring of children was a misdemeanour. This would be contrary to the practice followed in England, in the United States, and throughout civilized countries. The insuring of children has existed in England for over thirty years, and in the United States for fully twenty years. The British parliament has twice instituted thorough inquiry into the alleged slaughter of insured children, and in neither instance has it found the necessity of special legislation upon the subject. No case of abuse of child insurance has been made out in Canada. Consequently, on behalf of the government I must declare that at present there is no evidence before this House or before the government to justify the necessity of interference in a matter of this kind.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to say a word or two in reference to the matter before the House. The question is a very interesting and appropriate one to bring up. Helpless children sometimes require the protection of the state where a parent may be viciously inclined. The evils arising from child insurance have not reached a stage in Canada where the practice can be condemned, but it is the growth of an evil we have to anticipate when insurance agents are anxious to push their business, and the House has done wisely in calling public attention to what has taken place in other countries. I should like to see a system of state insurance adopted which would not only cover cases of child insurance but to a limited extent insurance for classes who wish to get cheaper insurance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is a full blown protectionist.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not see how protection or free trade comes in. We have a good system now of post office savings banks, by which thrift is engendered among the people, and if we had a state insurance of $1,000 upon each individual, I think a great boon would be conferred upon the people of Canada. Those people who wish to lay by a moderate sum could do it by state insurance. The system of insurance is one that is well worth being discussed. We have seen lately several cases in which crime has been committed in consequence of people trying to make money out of insurance. That must entail a moral risk on insurance companies and a raising of the rates which places greater difficulty in the way of poor people securing insurance, to say nothing of the large expense agents go to in pushing their business. There is to-day too much money being withdrawn from the industry of the country, owing to the assiduity and persistence of agents. The state might very wisely supply a cheap insurance for the working classes limited to $1,000.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It strikes me that the House is gradually departing from a regular custom; that is that the answer given by the government to an inquiry closes the debate on that subject. That is the proper system. Something might be said by a member which the minister giving the answer would have referred to before he closed the debate. When a question is asked of the government it should be an understood thing that when the answer is given the matter is ended. Of course, anybody would have a right to speak before the answer is given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. member is not asking a question here; he is simply, calling attention to the subject.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I contend that it is free to all the members of the House to speak before the answer is given, but after that they cannot.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The practice has been a very wide one in this House. The hon. member seeing the minister rise once or twice to speak and not wishing to interfere with him, sat down and waited until he had spoken.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If he had given the slightest intimation to the hon. minister that he desired to speak he would have deferred his answer.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

Upon what scale of prices do customs officers base themselves in collecting the duties imposed by law upon agricultural instruments? On the real value or on the cost price, or on the current price, or on the price of the instrument as sold at wholesale in the country whence it is imported, or is a deduction made, and if so what, upon the invoice as sent or upon the catalogues of prices as circulated?

Have the customs officers received instructions on this subject? What is the date of such instructions? Are they issued by the Department of Customs, and are they the same for all customs officers? Or are they sent in pursuance of an order in council, and if so, what is the date of such order in council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps it is neglect on my part, but I may inform the House that I have not considered this inquiry yet. However, as it is one generally affecting the collecting of customs dues, and therefore can readily answer it. There is a general law regulating the value of an article for duty. It simply provides that when an ad valorem duty is imposed upon any article, the value of that article for duty, when imported into the country, is the price at which it is sold in the country from whence exported.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Wholesale or retail?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The word "wholesale" formerly existed in the clause, but it was struck out some years ago; so that if an article is sold by the manufacturer to what is termed a jobber, and he imports it into Canada, the price paid for it, if it be the price at which the same article is sold in the market where purchased for home consumption that is the value for duty in Canada; but it is the practise to sell an article for export at a lower price than when sold for use or consumption there in the home market. In such a case the value for duty is increased to the price at which it would be sold for home consumption. The ruling price in the country where an article is purchased is the value of the article for duty. There is no reduction in value for an article except in cases of this kind. Formerly the law imposed a duty upon the price paid for an article, no matter how it may have fallen in price at the time of exportation, but if it had increased in price from the period at which it was purchased to the time of exportation, the law compelled the officer to increase the value of the article for duty. In the amendments to this law which I introduced in the other House, I thought that was not equitable or fair, and the law as it stands now is that if you purchase an article in a foreign country and you pay a certain price for it, and if it is not shipped for a month or two and it falls in price, then the value of the article for duty is the price at which you could purchase it at the time of shipment, or if it increases in value it makes no difference what you paid for it, it is the value at the time of shipment that rules for duty. The second question I have already answered, because the law governs the value of an article for duty. Instructions are often given—and perhaps that is what my hon. friend refers to—calling the attention of the collectors of customs and customs officials in different parts of the country to the fact that articles are being imported and entered at a less rate than that at which they are sold in the country for general consumption; or in other words, a manufacturer of an article in the United States, or in England, or any other country, when selling for exportation—when the article does not go into consumption in their own country and therefore does not interfere with the sale of the article in that country, they sell at a lower rate than they do to their own people. If that is done, then it is the duty of the customs officials to increase the face of the invoice to the regular and legitimate price at which the article sold in the country were purchased. I could not answer as to the date of the instructions. These instructions are only given when the attention of the department is called to the fact that the revenue is being defrauded in the way that I have pointed out, and the instructions are given departmentally and not by order in council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—There is no order in council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not in cases of that kind.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY OF WINNIPEG.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON inquired:

If the statement which is in Saturday's Globe is correct, that the plans and profiles of the Great Northern of Winnipeg had been approved by the Department of Railways and Canals, and transmitted to the company?

Have they been submitted to and approved by the Governor General in Council in accordance with the statutes of 1891, governing the charter?

He said: This is the second time I have asked a question with regard to this railway. I may apologize for having done so, but it is a railway passing through the district which I have the honour to represent in this House, and the road in question is the subject of a great deal of controversy. The Act says that the Governor in Council must approve of the location, and the Act also fixes the location and says that it shall start from Winnipeg and go north. I do not know the legal position in regard to it, but at the present moment the survey referred to in my question is starting from Gladstone, and when I rise to ask the question it is not for the purpose of opposing the railway starting from Gladstone, or opposing the company as a company in any form. Forty miles of the road were built nearly 10 years ago and the iron was laid; it is now lying there useless, and the money has been wasted. If there is any legal obstruction in the way of their starting from Gladstone, it is a notification to the company that their subsidy and charter and everything else may be forfeited if they act outside of the law in regard to this matter, and it would be a great detriment to the people, who are dependent upon railway communication in the Lake Dauphin district if legal difficulties arose to deprive them of their much needed railway. It would be a serious injury to the railway credit of the country if anything should happen that would leave any portion of this railway in the same condition as that 40 miles of it has been left. For that reason I make these few observations in asking the leader of the government for public information if the road is going on under their instructions, and under the charter which governs them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In answer to the hon. gentleman, I have to inform him that the right-of-way plans, profiles, and books of reference have been received by the Department of Railways and Canals for expropriation purposes and have been examined and certified according to section 125 of the Railway Act. Two copies were returned to the company, but they have not been approved by the Department of Railways and Canals, the certificate specially mentioning that it conveys no approval. To the second question I say No, they were not sent in for submission to the Governor General in Council according to the statutes of 1891 governing the charter, but merely for certificate of deposit. What they are doing with this railway to which my hon. friend refers, I am not in a position to say. This I do know, however, that it is not going on under the direction or control or management in any way of the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is just one question that I should like to ask the hon. gentleman from Shell River. I think from his knowledge of that part of the country he might be able to answer it. Some 40 miles of rails running north from Winnipeg, I believe, were laid by a company having the same head which the present company has, some 10 years ago. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us, knowing a good deal of the climate and the nature of the soil of the region on which those rails still remain, how much of them has been consumed by rust, and if it would be worth the while of the new company, or anyone else, to take up the 40 miles of rails and lay them down in the more genial climate in the neighbourhood of Lake Dauphin.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am unable to answer the question, never having visited or inspected the line, but the hon. gentleman himself can calculate how much rust would accumulate on the rails in 10 years.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, because I understand the country where the rails were laid is rather damp.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be able to come to a conclusion as to the quantity of rust that has accumulated if he will study the history of the rails which were deposited at Fort William.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may say that I think the almost universal feeling throughout the western country now is, that a gross blunder was made in departing from the old location of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where?

Hon. Mr. POWER—From Winnipeg to the Pacific coast.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has nothing to do with Fort William. The hon. gentleman is astray in his geography. These places are about 400 miles apart.

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

REPORT.

The Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER presented and read the following report:—

The undersigned members of the Divorce Committee having decided to decline to serve any longer upon that body wish to place before the House their reasons for having adopted that course.

While quite admitting the abstract right which the House has to disagree with or negative the reports of any of its Committees, we are of the opinion that this is a right which, out of respect for the dignity of the House itself and out of courtesy and consideration for and to its members upon those Committees, should not be exercised on any private, personal or religious grounds, or through caprice or whim, but solely, where upon a careful study of the facts or evidence which has been produced before the Committee, it can be shown that that body has reported contrary to the rights and justice of the case.

The appointment of the Divorce Committee is merely a convenience for having the evidence heard and reported upon to the House. The members are, however, but individual members of the whole House, the full Bench, whose duty it eventually becomes to read and determine whether the finding of the Committee is just and in accordance with the evidence presented to them.

It is well known that a certain number of the hon. senators are opposed to the principles of divorce entirely. They do not allow even an undefended bill to pass without a protest. They refuse to act upon the committee. They say practically: we do not look into the facts of these cases, we do not listen to the arguments, we will not read the evidence: "our convictions are that this thing is wrong in principle and on that account we oppose it, not on the merits." Hence it follows that when the evidence has been completed and a report is made to the House, it is well known that nearly one half of the full bench of judges are sitting with their judgments prepared, saying in effect: we do not know anything about the case, we do not care to know, but our minds are made up; and although the hostility is not actively endorsed, we know that it is there and ready to be used whenever it is considered that the occasion requires it.

We consider that a party concerned in divorce proceedings before this House cannot expect to have justice done to them if nearly one-half of the judges have, before its inception, already decided upon the case.

We find that the committee is in constant hostility to a considerable portion of the House, and that under certain conditions, a report cannot be passed unless the committee make a personal matter of it, and not always then. We have, this session, sat day after day and week after week, listening to evidence and arguments of counsel, with the prospect that, after we make a report upon what has come before us, the House, a large number of whose members know of the case only by name, may at any time proceed to negative it.

We say that a vote, under such circumstances, adverse to the finding of a committee whom you have asked to conduct these inquiries, is an indignity to which no member of this House should be liable to be subjected.

We consider that the committee is too heavily handicapped by the conditions we have described, but though these may be understood in the House, the public and the country at large, not acquainted with the circumstances, and seeing only that reports of the Divorce Committee are negatived almost every session, naturally must come to the conclusion either that the committee has not done its duty, or that it has not got the confidence of the House.

Feeling, as evidenced by the report just adopted, that the latter is the correct interpretation, we have decided to resign.

J. N. KIRCHHOFFER,
ROBT. READ,
JAMES A. LOUGHEED,
G. C. MCKINDSEY,
THOS. R. MCINNES,
C. PRIMROSE,
JOHN FERGUSON.

In presenting this report, I wish to state that I, myself, was appointed upon this committee without my knowledge. I am not exactly aware what the formalities are in striking these committees, but I understand that as a number of hon. gentlemen decline to serve on Divorce Committees, the choice of the Government is necessarily limited. I was never asked what my views were on this question, was never consulted whether I would act, but having no conscientious scruples against divorce, I accepted the position prepared to do my duty to the best of my ability; but the events of the last three sessions during which I have served on that committee have given me all the experience that I care to acquire. As has been stated in the report which I have just read, we find that under certain conditions a report of this committee cannot be adopted unless the members of the committee make it a personal matter. By acting as they did in a case last session, in the most undignified way, as I thought, by electioneering dodges, which are quite beneath the dignity of this court, such as getting some hon. gentleman to remain away and not vote, and getting others to come from long distances to cast their votes, they may succeed in passing a report through the House, but I want you to consider the indignity of the position in which they are placed. I need scarcely say neither collectively as a committee, nor individually as members of the committee, have we any personal interest in any case that comes before us. We are supposed, and I think rightly so, to have an average amount of the intelligence of the House. Many of the members of the committee have had large experience in divorce matters. All of them give their time and ability cheerfully and willingly to this work, which has been allotted to them. We have sat this session generally from ten in the morning until one, and at times again from eight in the evening until midnight, listening to the most disgusting and revolting evidence. We have sat there hour after hour and day after day listening to the low, vile and disgusting evidence of procuresses and prostitutes until our very souls were sick from the loathsome details. It is not as if the members of this committee were receiving each an income of six or seven thousand dollars a year to discharge this duty. Nor are our members men of low and prurient tastes, who take a delight in listening to these revelations. They are respectable country gentlemen who, by their surroundings, are quite unfitted for association with the people and the incidents which we have recorded. This committee, selected by yourselves from amongst your own members, and asked to make these inquiries and listen to these cases, only a few days ago was practically defeated on a report in the Chute case. We carried it certainly, but only by a majority of two, which I consider is equivalent to a defeat. Then in the Odell case we had not even the courtesy extended to us of having the report referred back to us for further consideration, but it was simply referred back with the mandatory command to bring in a report entirely contradictory to the one which we had formulated. (I take this opportunity of stating that the majority of the committee at least is entirely in accord at the present time on the original report.) That is not a position in which your committee ought to be placed. What have we done to entitle us to receive such an indignity at your hands? Has the committee been derelict in its duty, or has it failed in its capacity? Have its members shown that they are unable or unwilling to hear the evidence and arguments adduced before them, or that they are unable to give attention to and decide on the evidence produced there? I say it is an indignity to which no member of this House should be subjected, to have a report negatived as ours has been. I make this statement more in sorrow than in anger. I am not averse to work. I like to take my full share of whatever is going in the House, but I am a man of peace; I like to live on good terms with my fellow men, more particularly the members of this Hon body, in whose dignified and pleasant society I expect to spend many years in future—forty or fifty years I should think at least. This cannot be done with the hostile and bitter feeling which is engendered between members who take an active part in these matters. I trust you will pardon me for raising this discussion. I feel, like Othello, my occupation's gone. Like him, too, I am not easily upset, but, being moved, perplexed in the extreme, and although you may not understand my feelings, it has taken me much time and consideration and no little pain to arrive at the conclusion mentioned in the report. I beg to move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. The report is laid on the Table and cannot be considered now.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It cannot be considered to-day. There must be time given, according to the rules of the House, and I shall certainly contradict many of the statements in that memorial. Better fix Friday next. The report is quite a surprise to me.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The matter cannot be debated now.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Surely it is not the intention to ask the consideration of the report now. You are springing on the House one of the most extraordinary reports ever presented to the Senate. That it should be taken into consideration immediately is altogether unreasonable, and I hope my hon. friend will move its consideration at some future date.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Then I move that the report be taken into consideration on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

RED MOUNTAIN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (58) "An Act respecting the Red Mountain Railway Company" with amendments. He said:—These amendments make no material change in the Bill. One of them is a mere transposition, to bring a part of the Bill into its proper connection. The other is the insertion of the clause generally required in all these Bills bringing the telegraph system under the portion of the laws governing telegraphs. There being no alterations in the spirit of the Bill, anyone may move the third reading now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It cannot be done without notice. Rule 70 says that no private bill shall be read the third time, the same day on which it is reported from the committee.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I stand corrected, but it is the practice of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is sometimes done, and it is very objectionable. We had an instance of it yesterday. The proper thing is to move that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow, because we cannot tell what the effect of these amendments will be until we see them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved that the amendments be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CRIMINAL CODE, 1892.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved that the Hon. Messrs. Miller, Dickey, Scott, Gowan, Power, Loughheed, Poirier, Desjardins and Kirchhoffer be appointed to a joint committee of both Houses to report upon Bill (51) intituled: "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not intend to oppose this motion but I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that we are establishing a precedent which I think may be found objectionable. In the case of the criminal code of 1892 it was different. There a joint committee of that day dealt with the whole of the criminal law. It was a very serious undertaking, and it was desirable, of course, that the opinions of members of both Houses should be had on the Bill before it was introduced into this House. But this bill proposes to make six amendments—and not amendments of very great consequence as far as I can judge—in the Criminal Code of 1892, and it does seem to me that it is carrying the principle too far to say that there will be a joint committee appointed for the purpose of considering these few amendments. I do not say there has been any sufficient reason shown for departing from the usual parliamentary procedure. This bill would, in the ordinary course of events, pass the Lower House and then come up to us to receive our independent consideration and I do not think there has been any good reason shown that that course should be departed from. We should not make a precedent of this.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The objection would have been a pertinent one, perhaps, if made in the House of Commons when the bill was first moved, but it would be unbecoming for the Senate after a message has been received from the House of Commons asking us to join them in the joint committee on the Code, to decline and to state that the amendments proposed are only five in number and of so little importance that we would not join them. The proceedings having reached this stage I think this House could adopt no other mode than the one which I have suggested. The hon. gentleman states that it would have been better had this House decided to deal with the bill independently when it comes up. This will in no way prevent independent action when the bill is reported here. The Senate will have to go into Committee of the Whole upon it just as if the bill had never been before a joint committee of both Houses. Under the circumstances, this mode having been adopted by the House of Commons, it would not be gracious or courteous on our part to decline joining in this committee.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I think the hon. member opposite has forgotten what I believe was done, if my memory serves me right, when the code was introduced in this House by the government. It was considered a matter of very grave importance; it was a very important question—a question in which science should be supreme, and it was thought better to have a joint committee. The House of Commons were invited to appoint a joint committee. The committee met and finally made a report. Now, with respect to these proposed amendments the House of Commons has adopted precisely the same course. I can see no objection to accepting the invitation of the House of Commons to form a joint committee. In fact, I think it is the best course that could be taken. What passes in the joint committee may be of great benefit to members in discussing the questions in the bill that has been submitted. I think the hon. member has failed to remember this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Barrie has misunderstood the hon. gentleman from Halifax, inasmuch as he did not propose to offer any opposition to the motion, but he said it was a new departure in this particular case. It is quite true that the codification of the criminal law was the result of a joint committee, but then the government the second year after introduced bills changing and altering the code on several occasions. On that occasion no joint committee was appointed to consider it; the government took the responsibility of submitting to parliament the changes which they thought in their wisdom should be made, and the bill was considered in the ordinary way. My hon. friend speaks as if, in reference to this particular subject, the Criminal Code, this course was adopted as a practice. It was not adopted as a practice. It was only when the code was first framed that the joint committee was appointed.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I did not intend to say that the code could only be amended by a joint committee of both Houses, but I said that the House of Commons having adopted this course, I did not see how we could reject the proposition.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not oppose the motion; I simply said I hoped it would not be made a precedent.

The motion was agreed to.

LANGENBURG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (53) "An Act to incorporate the Langenburg and Southern Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the motion is carried, I wish to observe that in letting the second reading pass without discussion the House does not commit itself to the principle of the bill, which is to duplicate or parallel existing lines.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to disabuse the minds of hon. members of the House in regard to the statement made by my hon. friend. This line neither parallels nor interferes with any existing road, except to give a line of railway to a district of country over which no road runs. It may be in opposition to existing lines but over a different tract of country. However, I will quite relieve my hon. friend from being held to be acceding to the principle of the bill by permitting the second reading to pass.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

THE POST OFFICE SERVICE IN B. C.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) moved

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General: praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and telegrams that have passed between the Postmaster General, or any member of the government, and the British Columbia Board of Trade, the City Council of Victoria, the members representing the city district of Victoria in the House of Commons, the postmaster of Victoria or anyone else, from the 1st of January, 1894, to the 1st of May, 1895, relative to the "provisional allowance," and the withholding of the same from the post office clerks and letter carriers of the city of Victoria, British Columbia.

He said:—I will only say at present that I have very good reason to believe that the correspondence is not voluminous. Any ordinary typewriter can put the return in shape inside of an hour; consequently I hope the government will bring it down inside a day or two.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS SEIZURE AT MONTREAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE rose to Inquire of the government whether it is the intention of the government to introduce, during the present session of Parliament, an Act to amend The Customs Tariff, 1894, so as to interpret Item No. 779 of Schedule C thereof, which item has for its object the prohibition of the entry into this country of books, paintings and pamphlets of an indecent or immoral character, and to give to the said item the true sense that Parliament had in view to give thereto when it passed that item?

Whether it is the intention of the government to prosecute under article 179 of "The Criminal Code, 1892," one Norman Murray, of the city of Montreal, who has exposed for sale, and has sold since the month of May, 1894, a certain obscene book, tending to corrupt morals, and having as headings or titles, the following, to wit:—

"The Fruits of the Confessional Box!"
 "For Sleepy Americans, a Literal Translation of Ligouri's Theology, or Questions put daily by the Romish Priests to Women in the Confessional"

He said:—The discussion which took place some days ago on the questions that I asked, has forced upon me the duty of putting further questions to the government on this question of immoral books being circulated in the city of Montreal. The Premier seemed to lay down as a principle that the Controller of Customs was not bound to act in accordance with the interests of the country at large, but must submit to decisions which certainly were not of a character which could be relied upon. The Premier said:

You cannot, in administering the law, draw a distinction between a book that is imported for ecclesiastical purposes or for the use of any special profession, and a book imported by other persons who are not professional men. You cannot say that the importer had not the same right to import the book provided he pays the duty.

Now I cannot agree with that. It is not in accord with sound principles of law. What is the wording of the Customs Act? It is in these words:—

The importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in schedule "C" of this Act is prohibited, and any such goods if imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and shall be destroyed, and any person importing any such prohibited goods or causing, or permitting them to be imported, shall for each offence incur a penalty of $200.

Then comes the said schedule "C."

779. Books, printed papers, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs, or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious or of an immoral or indecent character.

Those are prohibited. Now, the law is general; I admit that. What is the Controller of Customs to do in such a case? See that the law is carried out in the true spirit in which it was framed. What was the intention of Parliament in passing that law? Was it to prevent good books, of prime necessity to the country at large, to be imported? Not at all: the intention was to prevent demoralization. Therefore, I say that the government, and especially the Controller of Customs, is in duty bound to see whether those books belonged to the class mentioned in schedule "C." Law books, ecclesiastical books, theological books, medical books, are all of prime importance—they must be imported. They cannot be considered as falling under the law. The public at large do not want them for their own use, but for the doctors, the lawyers and the clergy. So it is important that they should be imported and the law never contemplated excluding them. It contemplated preventing demoralization. So, when an indecent portion of a book, which, in itself, is a good and a useful one, is published, the law prohibits the circulation, because such extracts are unnecessary, obnoxious and tend to the demoralization of the public. I intend to prove that books must be taken for what they are, and even if the publisher says that his intention is good, the book must be taken for what it is worth. If it is a demoralizing book, it must be held that it is published for the purpose of demoralizing the public, and the law of the United States and of England prevents the circulation of such literature. If the principles which I have set forth are sound, the Controller of Customs was wrong in releasing the books. If they had been seized by a member of the church I belong to, I would hesitate to take the fact of the confiscation into consideration, because it would be said they were biassed in their judgment, but the Premier tells us that the gentleman who made the seizure is a Protestant. This shows much in favour of my contention. The Premier told us that the government had acted on legal advice. I defy any lawyer to show that it was a proper view of the law, and in support of this view of mine I will quote some authorities. I could quote United States books, but it perhaps is better to take English authorities, I refer to Folk-ard's Law of Slander and Libel, where I find the following :

Although many vicious and immoral acts are not indictable, yet if they tend to the destruction of morality in general, if they do or may affect the mass of society, they become offences of a public nature.

Then again we find :

In short whatever outrage public decency and is injurious to public morals, and done in contempt of the law of decency, is indictable as a misdemeanor.

It is not supposed that the government should allow books which were subject to criminal indictment to be admitted at the customs. This same author adds :

Ever since the decision in Curl's case, it seems to have been settled that any publication tending to the destruction of the morals of society is punishable by indictment, and a great number of convictions have since taken place for publishing and vending immodest books and pictures.

Now, I will refer the House to some cases which I find in this same book. The first is the case of King vs. Echlin and others :

In a recent case which came before the court as a special case, seated by the recorder on appeal from quarter sessions at Wolverhampton, it appeared that an order had been made under the abovementioned Act, by two justices of the borough, that certain books which had been seized in the dwelling-house of the defendant be destroyed, as being obscene books within the meaning of the statute. The defendant was a member of a society styled "The Protestant Electoral Union," whose objects were stated "To protest against those teachings and practices of the Romanist and Puseysite systems which are un-English, immoral and blasphemous, to "maintain the Protestantism of the Bible and the liberty of England" and "to promote the return to parliament of men who will assist them in these objects; and particularly will expose and defeat the deep-laid machinations of the Jesuits and resist grants of public money for Romanist purposes." The defendant, in order to promote the objects of the society, purchased from time, to time and exposed for sale at their office a pamphlet, entitled "The Confessional Unmasked, Showing the Depravity of the Romish Priesthood, the Iniquity of the Confessional, and the Questions put to Females in Confession." This pamphlet consisted of extracts from the works of theologians on the doctrines and discipline of the Church of Rome, and particularly on the practice of auricular confession.

On the dise of the page were printed passages in the original Latin, correctly extracted from the works of those writers, and opposite each extract was placed a free translation of it into English. The pamphlet also contained a preface and notes, and comments condemnatory of the tenets and principles of the authors of the works from which the extracts were made. About one-half of the pamphlet related to casuistical and controversial questions which were not obscene, but the remainder of the pamphlet was obscene, relating to impure and filthy acts, words and ideas. The defendant kept and sold these pamphlets with the purpose of promoting the objects of the society, and exposing what he deemed to be the errors of the Church of Rome. The pamphlets alluded to were the books which formed the subject of the order; and it was held, that where a man publishes a work manifestly obscene, he must be taken to have had the intention which is implied from that act; and that notwithstanding the object of the defendant was not to injure public morals, but to attack the religion and practice of the Roman Catholic Church, this did not justify his act nor prevent it from being a misdemeanour proper to be executed, as the inevitable effect of the publication must be to injure public morality; and although he might have had another object in view, he must be taken to have intended what was the natural consequence of his act, and had therefore been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the statute.

Now, is not this is a case in point, and it is not the only one. The case went further than that :

Shortly after the above decision the same society (the Protestant Electoral Union) published a new edition of the pamphlet, in which some of the most obscene passages remained; but there remained abundant matter of a disgusting and offensive nature, which rendered the book not distinguishable in principle from what was before the court in the former case; and one Mackey having been tried at the Court of Quarter Sessions at Winchester for selling copies of the new edition, when the jury being unable to agree, were discharged without giving a verdict, and report of such trial was published, in which the new edition of "The Confessional Unmasked" was set out at full length; although at the trial it was not read aloud.

Look at the precaution taken in England. They did not allow them to be read aloud. Can it be that there is more morality there than in this country? They were not permitted to be read in court, but simply taken as read :

And passages in it only were referred to. In other respects, the report was, substantially, a correct one of the trial and proceedings. A number of copies of this report having been seized at the shop of the appellant (where the same were sold and exposed for sale), and ordered by a police magistrate to be destroyed as obscene books within the statute above mentioned; on a case stated for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, it was held (following the above decision in the Queen vs. Hicklin) that the new addition of the pamphlet being still of such a character that it would necessarily tend to the deprivation of the public morals, was an obscene book, within the meaning of the statute, notwithstanding that the object of those publishing it might be to suppress a system which they thought immoral and pernicious. Held also (following the decision the King vs. Carlile) (b.)

that the privilege given by the law to reports of judicial proceedings does not extend to reports which contain matters of an obscene and immoralizing character; and that the case was therefore within 20 and 21 Vic., c. 83, and the decision of the magistrate correct (c.) In the course of the argument it was strongly contended by counsel for the appellant that the book treated of a matter which might properly be made the subject of public discussion and controversy, and that the object of those who put it forward being not only innocent, but praiseworthy, inasmuch as they intended thereby to advance the interests of religion and of the public, the publication of it was not a misdemeanour and consequently the book was not obscene within the statute. But Bovill C. J., in the course of his judgment observed, "there is no doubt that all matters of importance to society may be made the subject of full and free discussion, but while the liberty of such discussion is preserved, it must not be allowed to run into obscenity, and to be conducted in a manner tending to the corruption of public morals. The probable effect and natural tendency of the publication of this book being prejudicial to public morality and decency the appellant must be taken to have intended the natural consequences of such publication, even though the book were published with the objects referred to by his counsel.

Now, gentlemen, those are two cases just to the point, and they show that an error was committed by the Controller of Customs.

In Curl's case the Attorney General exhibited an information against him for printing and publishing an obscene book, intitled, "Venus in the Cloister or the Nun in her Smock." The defendant having been found guilty, it was moved in arrest of judgment, that the offence was of mere spiritual cognizance, that in the reign of Charles the Second there was a run of obscene writings for which no prosecutions were instituted in the temporal courts and Read's case was cited. It was answered by the Attorney General that to destroy morality was to destroy the peace of government, since government was no more than public order, that the spiritual courts punished only spiritual deformation by words; but that if it were reduced to writing, it would be a temporal offence punishable as a libel, and judgment was entered for the Crown.

Now, there is another case in point where the same thing has been decided, and the government, by the Attorney General, stated the facts. Then there are others. I thought it better to refer to these very cases which are not only in point, but deal with the same subject always, the confessional. I believe I have perfectly well established that the Controller has something more to do than he has done. The Premier stated that when he was at the head of the department he did order the confiscation of such an indecent book, and that lawyers told him he was wrong, but that he stood by his decision. That was manly. The premier showed that he knew what public morals were. That is the duty of a public officer who is responsible for the public morals. Now, the premier excuses his colleague who has done the very worst. The book was confiscated at Montreal. Why not keep it and make it a test case? If he had a keen sense of his duty to the country he was bound to let the confiscation stand and make it a text case. At the time the hon. Premier was acting in that capacity, such a case occurred and there is another to-day. Why not make it a test case, and see what our courts would decide? But the government neither tested the case nor did they get the law amended, so that if another case should arise to-morrow, Controller Wallace will act as he has done in this instance, and, on the advice of a lawyer, let the demoralizing book be circulated through the country. Is that doing what is right? I say no, the government are not doing their duty. But it may be objected by some that they do not know anything about the book, and, therefore, the House has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman says it is immoral.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The House has to hear the discussion and see whether I am right in the question that I put, or the government are right in their answer. It is a matter between the member who raised the question and the government. Whose fault is it if the House and the government do not know the character of the book? Is it not the fault of Mr. Wallace, who let the book go into circulation? He should have kept a copy of the book on record in his department, so that if the question should ever be raised, he would be in a position to produce it, and let the House judge whether it was a work that should be circulated or not. The Premier says the book cannot be found.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Has the hon. gentleman seen the book himself?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I have, and I state here, upon my honour, that there is no book better calculated to demoralize the public than this one to which I refer, and I challenge the Premier or Controller Wallace to say to the contrary. I have shown that in England a book which was reprinted with nearly all the obscene parts omitted was confiscated. The Premier asked us the other day why should we not do here as they did in England when the bankruptcy law was under discussion; I ask him why cannot we do as much here for the public morals as is done in England? Let us do in these matters what they do in England and I will be satisfied. We are told that the book is not to be found in the department: I frankly say I do not believe it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You say you have a copy yourself.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—As I stated before, a Protestant in Montreal, a member of one of the wealthiest firms in that city, put it into my hands on condition that I would destroy it after looking through it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But you are not done with it yet?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am done with it. Having made a special study of divinity in the past, I know about St. Liguori's theology, but I did not know that the scandalous fellow who published that book had made a true translation from the Latin. I therefore compared the English version with the Latin, and I must say that it is sufficiently correct to be called a good translation. Some words are added, making it stronger in certain parts, so as to make it more attractive to young readers. When I undertook to bring up this question, I prepared myself thoroughly, because I knew that I should meet with some opposition here. I prepared myself for opposition and I am here ready to fight on that question. Even on a point of law I made myself safe, because I have cited cases which show that I was right in the position I took the other day.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You have got the weapons and we have not—we have not seen the book.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It is not necessary for you to see it. In England, in the case which I have referred, the book was not allowed to be read. It was not my duty to show that the book is a bad one; it is the duty of the government to show that their action was right.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But if they have not got the book.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Then they were wrong, because if they had not the book before them they were not in a position to render judgment and permit the circulation of the work. If you will go to the library you will find in St. Liguori's Theology the Latin version of what is published in that book. The two commandments which prohibit all forms of lust are the subjects of that part. I have looked up in Webster's dictionary the meaning of the words in the statute "indecent" and "obscene." I find that the meaning of "indecent" is "unfit to be heard or seen," and all the offences referred to in those two commandments are unfit to be seen or heard, especially when one goes into details. Now, what are the offences under those commandments? They are adultery, fornication, bestiality, incest, abduction—and those are the offences which are dealt with in that part of St. Liguori's book to which I have referred. Anything which could be said about those offences would be unfit for general circulation. Now, what is the meaning of "obscene"? It is "expressing or presenting to the mind or view something which delicacy, purity and decency forbid to be exposed." I should think that purity and delicacy prohibit the publication in the vulgar tongue of a treatise about those offences. I have done what the government ought to have done—they have not got the book and do not know what it is; I have said enough to show what it is. The premier made an argument the other day as to the Latin and French version of the book, contending that if it was good in one language it was good in another. Now, I never contended that crime in any language was anything but crime, but what I did say was that professional works, like that of St. Liguori's, being intended for a useful purpose, did not come under the denomination of obscene literature. I said also that while medical works were published in French and English, theological works are always in Latin and were therefore less dangerous to the public at large. The man who published that book put the Latin version in one column and the English in a column beside it, and I must say that he did his work of translation well, except to add a word here and there to make the English version stronger than the Latin. I believe I have made out my case, and it cannot be denied that this book ought not to have been released when it was confiscated and that it should not be allowed to be sold in Montreal. Since giving these notices I have received another letter from the bookseller Murray which I will read to the House, because I might make it a question of privilege. The letter reads :

NORMAN MURRAY,
Book, News and Advertising Agency,
2108 St. Catherine St., Montreal.

SATURDAY, 8th June, 1895.

SENATOR BELLEROSE,—I want you to understand that you will get paid back with interest every time you stick your nose into my business. Do you know what class of women the first class of women sent over from France were ?

I do not know what the women were. I know the government of the country sent them back.

See my History of Canada.

It is a false history, however,

My God is not the same God as yours.

He must be a Unitarian. He believes in one God, while I believe in a Trinity.

If you want no more of this kind, just you cease meddling with me. I am Highland Scotch, and my people never turn their backs to their foes.

On consulting May's book of Parliamentary Practices, I read the following :

Interference with or reflections on members, shall be resented as an indignity to the House itself.

In the Lords, this offence has been visited with peculiar severity. * * *

On the 22nd March, 1623, Thomas Morley was fined £100, sent to the pillory and imprisoned in the fleet.

On the 9th July, 1663, Alexander Filton was fined £500 and committed to the King's Bench, for a libel on Lord Gerard, and ordered to find securities for his behaviour during life.

Now, here is another case in point :

In 1776 Richard Cocksey was attacked for sending an insulting letter to the Earl of Coventry, reprimanded and ordered into custody until he gave security for his good behaviour.

I could exercise this right to-day ; but I am not disposed to do that. The gentleman states he is Highland Scotch. Scotch are ordinarily intelligent men, so that I am sure that whenever Mr. Murray learns how wrong he is in helping to demoralize the country he will see himself that he is doing wrong, and refrain from selling dirty books.

My intention is not to go further as to this letter. I thought it well to read it because it shows the determination of that man to live on public immorality, and I believe there is no government worthy of the name that would permit him to do as he has been doing. The man may have been ignorant of what he was about, but for the future he ought to refrain from his illegal conduct, or the government should see that he does. I have spoken at length thus, to avoid having to speak a second time. As to the second question, referring to the Criminal Code, the clause 179 says—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly and without lawful justification or excuse, publicly sells or exposes to public sale or publication any obscene book, or other printed or written matter or any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals. No one shall be convicted of any offence in this section mentioned if he proves that the public good was served by the act alleged to have been done.

It shall be a question of law whether the occasion of the sale, publishing, or exhibition is such as might be for the public good, and whether there is evidence of excess beyond what the public good requires in the manner, extent or circumstances into, or under which the sale, publishing or exhibition is made, so as to afford a justification or excuse therefor, but it will be a question for the jury whether there is or is not such excess.

I leave the Premier to answer my second question as to prosecuting the vendor of those books who has violated the law which I have just now quoted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question is simple in its character and one that will not require many minutes to answer. In the first place, the government is not aware that the item referred to in the inquiry by my honourable friend does not bear the construction that it was intended it should bear or that the judges, if the case were taken into court, would not put the construction and meaning upon it which Parliament intended. Until that fact is controverted it will not be necessary for the government to introduce any measure to amend it giving it a wider or a greater interpretation. It will be somewhat difficult, I think, for persons reading that clause to misunderstand its meaning and its object. It reads :

Books, printed papers, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs, or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious or of an immoral or indecent character are prohibited by the law from being imported into the country.

It is for the courts to decide whether the book to which my hon. friend has referred is brought within that category. I might add that it probably would be much better, in replying to the other question, to say that it is not the province of the Dominion Government to enter actions against booksellers or any other persons violating the statutes. That power is relegated exclusively to the local authorities. If there has been a violation of the law, as provided in the section quoted by the hon. gentleman, it is the duty of the people of Montreal, who take the same view which the hon. gentleman does, to lay complaints against this bookseller and then it will be the duty of the Attorney General to prosecute. The cases referred to by the hon. gentleman are very strong, I readily admit, in support of his contention, and it will be for the judges to say whether this book comes within the meaning of the clause.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The Premier in his answer has given good evidence that the government is wrong, because if he is so sure that it is difficult to interpret that clause, then the duty of the government, as soon as they observed that, was to amend the law to make it signify something which the public mind could be guided by. At present the law is not in such a shape that the people understand it, and it shows the Controller of Customs was wrong, when the books had been seized, in not making that a test case. He should have said to his officer, "keep the books and write Mr. Norman Murray, you may sue for the books and we will have a test case and will decide whether the confiscation of the book was right or wrong." They were no doubt about to do that, and it is surprising to find that the government have acted as they have done, particularly so, as the Premier admits that in a less important matter he acted the other way and opened the door to a test case. What is the duty of the importer? If he thinks he has the law on his side, his duty is to sue the government to have his books released, but Mr. Murray would not have done that. It is evident that the Premier was right in that instance, where he confiscated some immoral books and refused to release them. Why did not they do the same in this instance? Generally the Premier is correct in the position he takes and I am surprised, when he knows the character of the book in the case we are now considering and how demoralizing it is, that he stands by his colleagues and tries to make the best of his case. The least that could be asked of the government is to have a test case, and I hope they and the public at large will see the thing in that light. The government should amend the Act immediately to provide that books of such a nature, and which are not necessary, shall be confiscated. Three or four lines would do that. If the government do not take this course it will be because they do not care for public morality.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As to the second question, I cannot say anything more. We have no knowledge, as far as the government is concerned, that there is such a man as Murray in Montreal. We do not know that he keeps a book-store, or that he sells books, and even if we received that information, in the interest of morality, or in view of the law on the statute-book, the courts of Montreal are the parties responsible. It is the duty of the parties aggrieved to enter an action, and have a test case. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the good opinion he has of myself. I offered no excuse for the Controller, or anyone else; I endeavoured to state, in as plain and succinct a manner as I possibly could, what the law was under the circumstances and what action had been taken under the law, by those whose duty it was to seize them. I must again dissent from the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman that it is the duty of the Dominion government to enter actions for the violations of the law. That is the special function, under the constitution of this country, of the local governments, and I think they are quite capable of enforcing the law of the land, and, where necessary, maintaining proper respect for those acts which affect the morals of the people.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Although it may be that the local government could sue, the Dominion government are bound to look into their own laws and see whether they are executed, and as they have been notified in this House that this man Murray is selling indecent books in this country, it is their duty to have the Attorney General prosecute, because it is under their law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the government of Canada were informed that somebody stole a horse, does the hon. gentleman say that it is our duty to see that information is laid?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—In this case it is their own work and it is for them to look into the case.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Why do you not inform the government of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I have informed the government here in the House to which I belong.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) I hope the hon. gentleman, if he brings a case of this kind before the House again, will furnish every senator with a copy of the book published, and then we will be in a position intelligently to deal with the nature of the works.

THE ODELL DIVORCE CASE.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to call the attention of the House to the report of the divorce committee in the Loop Sewell Odell case. I understood the first report was to stand over until to-day, but I find that it was adopted. I thought it was the understanding it should remain over until to-day. I intended to move an amendment to it in reference to the action to be taken hereafter. The committee had some discussion that the proceedings should commence next year in the same way they terminated this year.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They could not do that without an Act of parliament.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—It has been done before.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No, I beg pardon. It could not be done in any parliament where the British system prevails. It has never been done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I rise to a question of order. There is nothing before the chair.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—There is nothing out of the way at all in this discussion. I understood the report was to be taken into consideration to-day.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The committee considered that question and came to the conclusion that they could not make that recommendation; therefore, a great number of formalities will have to be gone through next year.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no question about it. You cannot do anything of that kind under our system of parliamentary government without an Act of parliament. There have been instances in the Imperial Parliament of this character. In cases where it is difficult in consequence of the long distance from England from which evidence has to be brought—from India for instance—where cases have been before the House of Lords, an Act of parliament had to be passed enabling that body to take up a bill or measure before it at the stage at which it was dropped during the previous session, but that was done under the Act of parliament. Neither House has power to provide for the taking up of business, dropped at any time during the session, in the following session.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We considered that fully. Even if we should attempt to pass such a resolution, no lawyer would undertake to proceed again under it. He would have to commence proceedings anew.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—I am perfectly satisfied that there was a precedent for it in this House in the Middleton case, where there was a postponement for some such cause as this. However, if it cannot be done there is no help for it. It was my duty to bring it before the House, and I have done so.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I believe the hon. gentleman can bring it as an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The proceedings have progressed such a very short distance it would not be worth while.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—If it cannot be done I do not desire to press it at all. I have been requested to bring it before the House and I know it was done in the Middleton case.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté) moved the adoption of the first report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament. He said:—This report recommends that certain documents be not printed.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Before the report is concurred in I should like to ask the chairman if there is not some error in it? Are there not some of these documents which should be printed. I was not present at the last meeting of the committee, but some of the documents are important, and I was informed that some of these were intended to be printed and it seems to me that there is some error.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—I made inquiry of the clerk to-day about that, and he assured me that the committee had decided that none of these documents be printed.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN.—Then I was misinformed.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (47) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Order of Foresters." (Mr. Sanford.)

Bill (53). "An Act respecting the Manitoba and the North-west Loan Company, Limited." (Mr. Boulton).

Bill (45) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company." (Mr. Clemow).

Bill (70) "An Act respecting the Temiscouata Railway Company." (Mr. Casgrain).

CAMP HARMONY ANGLING CLUB BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (71) "An Act to incorporate the Camp Harmony Angling Club."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved that the bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is a doubt in my mind whether the third reading can be taken to-day. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Richmond to the subject. He is more familiar with these matters, and I should like to know from him whether a bill coming from a committee with amendments can be read a third time the same day, on which these amendments are adopted or does the rule apply to the day on which the report is presented? It seems to me it is a departure from the rule.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The rule does not at all interfere with its being read a third time to-day. The rule only requires that it shall not be the same day that the report of the committee is presented. The bill was reported yesterday.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is right—that is the rule. If the amendments had been read yesterday, the bill could not have been read the third time then, because it was the day on which the report was presented. It can be read the third time now.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (58) "An Act respecting the Red Mountain Railway Company."—(Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

FEMALE OFFENDERS' IN NOVA SCOTIA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of bill (J) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain female offenders in the province of Nova Scotia." He said: This parliament passed in 1891 an Act giving a judge or stipendiary magistrate in Nova Scotia discretion to sentence any female person who is convicted before such judge or magistrate to an institution known as the Good Shepherd reformatory instead of the city prison or common jail. There are two institutions mentioned in the Act of 1891—the Good Shepherd reformatory, which is intended for "female persons," as they are called in the Act, over the age of sixteen, and the Good Shepherd Industrial Refuge, which is intended for girls under sixteen. The Act of 1891 provided that any girl under sixteen might be sentenced by the magistrate to a term in this industrial refuge not exceeding five years. As to female offenders over the age of sixteen, the stipendiary magistrate had no discretion but to sentence them for the period generally not exceeding three or four months, to which, under the law, they could be sentenced in the city prison or county jail. The experience of four years has shown, what might have been anticipated, that in the case of women who had been leading abandoned lives for three or four or six years, three months spent in a reformatory institution has very little permanent effect, and if any good is to be done to those offenders they must be detained for a longer period than that provided for by the first section of the Act. This bill is to allow the judge or stipendiary magistrate power to extend the term—that is all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—When the original bill was before the House some years ago, a question arose as to the necessity of the government inspection of a private prison of this kind, to see that those confined are properly dealt with, properly fed, properly clothed, and not over-worked. I suppose the Premier cannot tell me, without inquiring, whether any inspection of this kind has ever been had. Perhaps on the third reading of the bill he will be prepared with information on the subject.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is it intended in the case of a girl being a Roman Catholic convicted before a magistrate and who heretofore would have been sentenced to a common prison or jail, but who under cap. 55 of the statutes of 1891 is now sent instead to this reformatory to be reformed, and the reformation does not take place—is it intended that the judge who sentenced that person can extend the sentence until the reformation is effected? Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the imprisonment can be extended for a longer period than was originally intended if it has been found not long enough to secure a salutary effect—is it intended that the term of imprisonment shall be extended until it has a salutary effect? The words “further imprisonment” make the clause doubtful, I would ask the hon. gentleman to explain it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the point raised by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, I would refer him to the 15th section of the existing statute, which of course applies to these institutions. It provides that such reformatory or industrial refuge shall at all times be open to inspection by the inspector of penitentiaries or any officer appointed by the government to inspect, and so long as pecuniary aid is received from the city of Halifax it shall be open for inspection by the mayor, aldermen and stipendiary magistrate of that city. I do not know whether any inspection has taken place at the instance of the governor in council, but I know that the aldermen of the city of Halifax have visited and inspected the institution.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Will my hon. friend answer my question? This is a reformatory to which the magistrate may send parties to be reformed instead of sending them to prison. Is it the intention that the magistrate can extend the period of confinement in order to bring about a reformation? What is intended by the word “further” in the tenth line?

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is substantially the intention. The idea is he shall, in the first instance, sentence the party to the longer period.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN.—As I understand the purport of the bill, it is this, that the short term for which the magistrate was permitted to send the female offenders to the reformatory has been found inadequate to answer the purpose in view, and when they have such a short time there is not as much opportunity for their bad habits to be thrown off, or any substantial reformation accomplished. I presume clause 2 gives power to the magistrate to further increase the term in addition to the term he was originally permitted to impose by the Act of 1891, and I think it is a move in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH. That is, supposing the time has not been sufficient for the complete reformation, the intention is to allow the convicting magistrate to extend the time—or is it for a new offence?

Hon. Mr. POWER. It is for the same offence.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH. And afterwards, on notice being given, he may increase it, to accomplish the reformation? The clause will have to be altered; it is not what is intended.

Hon. Mr. POWER. Oh, no. These questions of detail would be rather a subject for the committee.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I have much pleasure in supporting the bill which is brought in by my colleague. An institution of this kind is very much wanted in Halifax, and I think this one fills the bill in every respect. There is no objection to it at all; the only fault about it is that I think we are paying too much money to support the women there, but that is a matter for the city of Halifax. As they are over head and ears in debt now, it does not matter how much more they get into debt. The institution is an excellent one and I shall be happy to support the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to make one observation in reference to what my hon. colleague has stated and that is that up to this year—although the institution has been going for four years—not a dollar has been paid by the city of Halifax towards it.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE FROM EXCISE AND CUSTOMS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved—

That in the opinion of the Senate, if the excise on spirits, beer and tobacco, were made equal to the protective duty on the same upon the average consumption of the last five years, an increase to revenue would result, amounting to $3,500,000, and if twenty-five cents a gallon on spirits, and ten cents per pound on tobacco were added to the present rate of duty, a further increase would result, amounting to two million dollars more.

He said:—The question, which is the subject of the motion now before the House, I brought up the other day on a motion for papers in regard to the exports, but as the rules of the House did not permit some hon. gentlemen to extend their discussion into the realms of the revenue that I introduced on that occasion, I thought it desirable, in order to get an expression of opinion upon the question of revenue, to introduce a motion and go over somewhat the same grounds that I covered the other day. It will not be necessary to take up very much of your time because I discussed the question pretty thoroughly on that occasion. My object now is to give any other hon. gentleman, who desires to combat the arguments that I then advanced, an opportunity of refuting them because it is a very important point that I have raised, the fact that by equalizing the duty and the excise a revenue of from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 can be obtained which is now, as I contend, diverted into private profits. In quoting from the Inland Revenue Report, I see that in the four years ending June, 1893, the average quantity of spirit which entered into consumption was 2,871,672 gallons. Now, the excise on that at that time was $1.50 per gallon. Under the tariff which is now passing through Parliament the excise has been raised from $1.50 to $1.70 per gallon. The duty on the same class of spirits when imported into the country, is $2.25, having been raised from $2.12½ up to that, in consequence of the increase of excise; in other words, the protection had to keep pace with the excise on spirits. What I contend is that the difference between $1.70, the excise on spirits, and $2.25, the duty on spirits, is protection to the distillers of the country. The question I bring before the House to-day is not whether is it wise to give distillers that protection, but whether by removing that protection a certain revenue will accrue to the country upon the present consumption without increasing the cost to consumers of spirits, tobacco, or beer, as the case may be? Would that increase of revenue occur? Hon. gentlemen will see that $1.70 upon

2,871,000 gallons produces a revenue of $4,881,876. Then if you take the difference between $1.70 and the $2.25 and make the excise $2.25 instead of $1.70 you increase the revenue by $1,579,430. The protection of 55 cents of course enables the distillers to charge up to the exact amount that is levied for duty. The cost to the consumer in the country is $2.25, not $1.70, on a proof gallon, and therefore the increase in the excise of whisky would have no effect upon consumption, because the consumption is governed by the protection that is afforded, $2.25. Therefore we say that, in the case of spirits that are manufactured in the country, by equalizing the excise and the duty you add $1,579,000 to the revenue. Then in addition to the spirits that are manufactured in the country, there are 975,000 gallons imported which pays a duty of $2.25 and returns to the revenue through that means $2,447,500. Now I have coupled with my proposition of equalizing the excise with the duty the desirability of increasing the excise 25 cents a gallon more. It will make no appreciable difference to the welfare of the country. The addition of 25 cents a gallon excise to $2.25, the present duty, will make no appreciable difference, and therefore it merely resolves itself into the question, Is it wise to make the duty on spirits the source of revenue? I do not think any one will combat that position. The addition of $2.50 to the cost of making whisky in the country must have the effect of keeping down its consumption; that is proved to be the case in Great Britain where the excise is $2.50 a gallon. The excise on spirits in Great Britain is 10s. 6d. a gallon, which is a little more than $2.50 and the duty on spirits in Great Britain under the British law of revenue is 10s. 4d., so that in the case of Great Britain the duty is actually 2d. less than the excise. I presume there may be some little thing or other to equal it, but at any rate, so far as it appears on the books, the duty on imported spirits is 2d. a gallon less than the excise. What I am now proposing, so far as revenue is concerned, is that we should make the revenue on spirits equal to the duty and raise the duty and the revenue together from $2.25 up to $2.50 a gallon. By doing that we then add another $1,000,000 to the revenue, because that 25 cents of course would affect not only the spirits that are manufactured in the country, but the spirits that are imported as well. The spirits manufactured are 2,871,000 gallons, and the spirits imported 1,000,000 gallons, altogether about 4,000,000 gallons. On that 4,000,000 gallons at 25 cents a gallon, we would obtain another $1,000,000 added to the revenue of the country upon the spirits which enter into consumption as shown by the public returns today. Altogether there would be from that source $2,527,000, from spirits over and above the $4,881,876 which is the revenue today. Now, hon. gentlemen, there are according to the public returns, eight distilleries in Canada, located at Belleville, Guelph, Hamilton, Perth, Prescott, Toronto, Windsor and Halifax. There was used for distillation 1,409,000 lbs. of malt; 20,000,000 lbs. of corn; 6,000,000 lbs. of rye and 500,000 lbs. of oats and wheat, to produce the spirits that we manufactured in the country last year. Last year no spirits were manufactured in Perth, Prescott and Toronto. At Windsor—which is the largest—there was a consumption of 9,000,000 lbs. of corn and 3,893,000 lbs. of rye, so that we see, so far as the manufacturing interest of the country are concerned, in Windsor, right alongside the boundary of the United States at the most convenient point where they could get the material that is used for the manufacture of whisky, through importation. There are eight points which would be affected by any change in the law. Now is it in the interest of the country, or of these eight particular distilleries, that we should forego a revenue of $2,539,000 for any supposed benefits that we may think arise from the maintenance of these distilleries by high duties? I contend, hon. gentlemen, in the interest of the country that that is not the case, that it is far better that those distilleries should be thrown open to the competition of the world the same as the distilleries in Great Britain are—that if they were thrown open to the free competition of the world they would still maintain themselves, but the profit that is now diverted into the pockets of the proprietors would be returned into the revenue of the country. A portion of the whisky that is produced in Great Britain is, I believe, manufactured from corn. That corn has to go across the Atlantic, has to be manufactured there and brought back here before it enters into competition with the liquor distilled here, and I maintain that so far as throwing it open to the competition of the world is concerned, it would not affect the distilleries, but merely the profits of the proprietor.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I thought my hon. friend said increased taxation would decrease the consumption.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—By raising the excise on spirits we find that our consumption per head has fallen. I do not think our revenue per head has fallen, but our consumption per head has fallen. We find in Great Britain, where the excise is $2.50 per gallon, the consumption is very little greater than it is in Canada under an excise of $1.70 a gallon. The increase of twenty-five cents a gallon will not affect the consumption very much one way or the other, but if there is any effect at all produced, it will rather lessen the consumption, but not sufficiently to make any material difference in the revenue. I do not think it would make any difference. However, the Inland Revenue return shows the distribution of the distilleries in the country. It shows the material that the whisky is made from and the quantity. It shows how far the revenue is affected, or would be affected, by a change of policy in regard to that particular point. What I wish to do is to bring the question before this House so that the hon. gentlemen could figure for themselves by looking through the Inland Revenue returns, exactly what the difference would be in the revenue by diverting the profit that is made in the manufacture of whisky through the protective policy into the treasury.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that the increase which he proposes is not large, but is it not possible that the duty upon whisky is now nearly as high as whisky will stand, without a large increase of smuggling; and that if he increases the excise to a figure 25c. above the customs duties, and increases the customs duty also 25c. there will be a large increase of smuggling and perhaps not so great an increase of revenue as he expects?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is a question, of course, which would come up in discussing that phase of the question. What I am discussing now, is the fact that by doing as I suggest you will increase the revenue to that extent. The fear that the hon. gentleman is raising in his own mind is groundless, because the increase of 25c. will not increase the smuggling. An increase of something like 8 per cent in the excise is not going to have any material effect on the smuggling. There is quite enough inducement to smuggle with a duty of $2.25 if $2.50 would do it. We have to face the question of smuggling, and we have to take effective measures to prevent it. Every country has had to go through the same experience, Great Britain, though an island, has had to deal with smuggling, and I have no doubt has to do so to-day. It is not a question which comes properly into the discussion; the question is whether, by adopting such a policy, certain results would follow.

Hon. Mr. READ (Quinté)—Will the hon. gentleman, before he leaves that question, explain to us how it is that the distilleries at Grenville, Toronto, and Perth were idle last year, if such immense profits are going into the pockets of distillers as he says? We know that only 27 per cent of the capacity of the distilleries last year was working?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can explain it. The Government have adopted a policy by which they require that whisky shall be kept in bond two years, and a large accumulation has taken place in order to provide for two years' consumption. I presume in those places they had manufactured in excess of the requirements of the country. It is not that the distilleries have gone out of use, but there has been over production in a limited market, and the men in those three distilleries have been thrown out of employment.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I can explain it. I think the distillers, finding the enormous profits arising out of manufacturing whisky, have multiplied to such an extent that the consumption of the country does not keep them all employed—that is the cause of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is there a combine?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There is no doubt of it. In one case a concern has retired from business with $15,000,000 made in a few years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And it appears by the press he is residing in Detroit.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The concentration of profits in the hands of the few might come from the fact that Mr. McCarthy's bill failed to go through—his law for the suppression of combines.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. member from St. John has offered another explanation, and it is one that will fit into a great many of our manufacturing industries, because I know that many men have been thrown out of employment during the past year in the industries of the country. If employment has been reduced in that way naturally there is a cessation of consumption. The men who are engaged in these large industries watch things closely and they did not invest any more money by way of putting whisky into bond for future consumption than was necessary. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that at Belleville 233,000 gallons were made; at Guelph 289,000 gallons; at Hamilton, 289,000 gallons; at Windsor 777,000 gallons, and Halifax 95,000. That is the distribution of the manufacture of whisky in the country last year.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—What about Toronto?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There was none made in Toronto, Prescott or Perth. So far as last year is concerned, it affected those five distilleries only. The next article that I desire to call attention to is beer. The beer manufactured last year was 18,299,000 gallons. There was 50,000,000 lbs. of malt used in the manufacture of that quantity of beer, on which excise was collected at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound. It takes about 3 lbs. of malt to make a gallon of beer, so the excise in malt is about  $4\frac{1}{2}$  cents upon a gallon of beer. The duty is 16 cents on beer imported in the cask, and 24 cents if imported in bottles; so the 16 cents, if imported in casks, is the measure of protection which brewers receive in the manufacture of beer. There are 122 breweries in the country which are returned in the Inland Revenue returns as holding licenses for the manufacture of beer. All that they pay to the country through the excise is  $4\frac{1}{2}$  cents a gallon on the malt (if my estimate is correct) used in the manufacture of the beer. These 122 breweries can arrange among themselves to fix the minimum price of beer and in consequence of the absence of any competition from the imported article, they are protected by 16 cents a gallon. It seems to me that it would be possible to raise the excise on beer up to the protection, but if there was even 6 cents a gallon of that equalized with the duties, it would produce a million dollars more revenue from the manufacture of beer. Those people who are now drinking Leer would be contributing a million dollars to the revenue of the country. It would not cost them a million dollars to contribute that revenue because that amount, and more, is diverted for want of competition from their pockets into the brewer's pockets. I do not think that anybody can contend for a moment that the reverse is the case. If there are a few breweries in the country, and they have a small market like this, and they are protected from outside competition by 16c. a gallon it is natural to suppose that they will increase the price of their article up to somewhere in the neighbourhood of the margin that the protection will allow. The price of beer in the country, according to quality, ranges from 30 to 40 c. a gallon. Mr. Sims, of the Bodega, who keeps our restaurant, informs me that he pays 60 c. a gallon for the best quality of beer in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There must be a mistake.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I inquired and find by the hogshead it was 30 cents to 40 cents a gallon according to the quality. So that is the margin of the price of beer. Supposing we were to throw all the breweries open to competition with the world, what position would they be in? We grow the best barley that can be got on this continent. Our brewers purchase that barley for 55 cents a bushel. In England, where they make beer to an enormous extent, the price paid for barley is \$1 a bushel. If it was thrown open to competition we would still continue to make that beer out of our own barley, the price would be very much less, and possibly the consumption would be increased, because the price would be lessened by competition, while the revenue would be increased in consequence of the cheapening and possibly the improvement in the quality of the article. Wherever you have competition there the best is produced. Wherever you lower the price the consumption is increased, and if competition will lower the price then the consumption is increased. To my mind beer is a harmless and wholesome beverage. On the 18,000,000 gallons of beer, now consumed if there was an addition to the excise in some form or other—I do not know how it could be applied whether through malt or otherwise—there would be a million dollars added to the revenue. If you raise the excise still higher you could get a million and a half. However, I have limited my argument to show that you could get a million dollars more revenue without increasing the cost of the beer. The other revenue that I have spoken of to be obtained from spirits, amounts to \$3,500,000. The quantity of beer imported is 310,259 gallons valued at \$161,503 and the duty paid upon it is \$65,060, showing that the duty is just 40 per cent on the value of the imported article. The next article that I have taken up is tobacco. We imported 10,000,000 pounds last year, on which we collected an excise of 25 cents a pound, producing a revenue of \$2,500,000. The manufacture of tobacco is protected by 35 cents per pound and an additional 12½ per cent ad valorem. The 12½ per cent I calculate is about equal to 5 cents a pound so that in reality the protection to the manufacture of tobacco is 40 cents a pound. The excise is 25 cents, so the difference between the excise and the duty is the measure of protection which is afforded to the tobacconist in the manufacture of 10,000,000 pounds of tobacco which is imported free. Now, if the excise on tobacco were raised to be equal to the duty on tobacco—40 cents—there would be \$1,000,000 added to the revenue on that consumption of last year, simply by taking off the protection and adding it to the excise. That would make a difference of \$1,350,000. Then there are cigars that are manufactured in Canada, 120,000,000 cigars at about 57 cigars to the pound. The duty on cigars is \$2 per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem. The revenue from the manufacture of cigars through the excise was \$700,000, consuming 2,000,000 lbs. of raw tobacco in their manufacture. I have not been able to calculate exactly what the amount of protection was, because the duty is by the pound and the excise by the thousand. The excise is \$6 per thousand and the duty \$2 per pound, plus 25 per cent ad valorem; so I have just roughly put down that the difference between the excise and the duty, in regard to cigars, is about \$200,000. Then, if we were to raise the excise on tobacco from 40 cents, which is the duty to-day, to 50 cents, or only raise it 10 cents over and above the duty, which is the measure of price the people have to pay to-day, you would increase the revenue by \$1,000,000, and still be under the excise of Great Britain, which is 3 shilling or 3 and 6 pence the pound. Raising it 10 cents the pound up to 50 cents, and yet keeping it 25 cents below the tax in Great Britain, you increase the revenue to be derived from tobacco by \$1,000,000. In consequence of its cheapness under the present excise, the consumption of tobacco is far greater in Canada than in Great Britain. I think all hon. gentlemen will allow that the excessive use of tobacco is not to be encouraged, that it is to be discouraged within certain limits, and that, therefore, so far as the health of the population is concerned, any reduction in the consumption, either of spirits or tobacco, is to be welcomed. By raising the excise 10c. on tobacco and 25c. on spirits, you increase the revenue \$2,000,000 besides what we save on the beer. The difference between the duty and the excise on spirits is \$1,000,000, excise on tobacco \$1,350,000, on cigars \$200,000 and on beer at least \$1,800,000 (it is much greater than that but I have satisfied myself as to the correctness of that figure) or a total of \$4,209,430. Now the point I have raised here is if the excise on beer and spirits and tobacco were made equal to the protective duty on the same, in the last five years an increase in the revenue would have resulted amounting to \$4,209,430. I have shown by the figures which I have laid before you that the increase is \$4,209,000, and then I go on to say that if 25c. a gallon on spirits and 10c. a pound on tobacco were added to the present duty, a further increase would result amounting to \$2,000,000 more. The total consumption of spirits in Canada is 3,849,000 gallons. The 965,000 gallons that are imported, as well as what is manufactured in the country, would come under the increase of 25 cents a gallon and that would amount to \$902,666, 10 cents per pound on tobacco would result in an increase of \$1,000,000, a total increase of revenue to the country through these articles upon the present consumption would result of \$6,173,796. Now, if hon. gentlemen will look into these figures—for they have the figures which I presented the other day which are somewhat similar—and realize that that is the case, it becomes a matter of discussion in the country whether we could forego the benefit of raising \$6,500,000 from this source while the revenue is deficient and while it is now necessary to tax the 300,000,000 pounds of sugar that goes into the consumption of the country at the rate of  $1\frac{1}{10}$  cents per pound, an addition being found necessary this year of  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent a pound on sugar, which resulted in an increase of \$1,500,000. Now, hon. gentlemen, I show you here that by just altering the terms of our excise and removing the protection from those industries, that \$6,175,000 will accrue to the treasury.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I do not know that, except upon the objection that the motion is somewhat purposeless, there can be much difference of opinion about it, because, if you will observe, it asserts nothing except a plain problem in multiplication. There is no opinion founded upon it, and indeed it is not a matter of opinion. This honourable body cannot, as a matter of fact, dissent from the statement that if you multiply a certain figure by another figure, a certain result will be attained, and that is the results of the proposition which has been submitted to the House when you boil it down. But it might be a matter of doubt whether this honourable House should take the trouble of affirming propositions of that simple character. I am not concerned in whisky, beer, or tobacco, except as a very small consumer of either. The House may be divided into two classes, those who use them and those who do not—those who think everybody should give them up but themselves, and those who think everybody should not give them up. I have no practical interest in the question whether the distillers or brewers or tobacco men make all the profits the hon. gentleman asserts or not, but one can see how extremely simple the procedure of the hon. Senator is; he multiplies the duty by the quantity consumed and at once hits off the profits of the manufacturer. The belated manufacturer in the meantime knows there are charges. I have not studied the question, but I would suggest that probably the corn, the oats, and the other materials from which whisky is made are dutiable articles in this country and that large duties are paid upon them. I would also suggest, as is obviously the case, that the limitation of two years' supply of whisky being kept in the country, for motives of a sanitary nature, before being entered for consumption at all, is a large element in cost which must be deducted from the fabulous profits which he makes out the distiller obtains. In fact the whole question is not so simple as the hon. member would make out. Nothing strikes me so much as the extreme facility which he possesses for solving the most difficult fiscal problems; everything of the kind which rises before him is immediately swept away. He sees no difficulty. The hon. member for Halifax, if I mistake not, stated there was a limit to the imposition of taxes upon whisky, whether of excise or customs, from the facility for smuggling and illicit distillation. Every practical person concerned in the making of the laws of the country recognizes the fact that there is a point in the imposition of duties on whisky and tobacco at which the revenue becomes totally inoperative. The illicit distillation and smuggling reach a point at which they cannot be suppressed. It is all very well to point to the duties in England and say, adopt an excise of so much, as they do. There they have facilities for suppressing frauds upon the revenue which we have not and never can have. They have frontier lines much smaller than ours, a much larger population and facilities which we can never possess. If it were not so, I for one would say by all means increase the duties and excise upon all those articles. I can very well spare them myself, but beyond the simple affirmation which this motion contains I think this House should hesitate at confirming, or being seduced into confirming any propositions of such a hypothetical character. It is perfectly true that if you take the average consumption for the past five years and multiply it by a certain figure, you get a certain result. There is no doubt about that. There are too many "ifs" in his whole proposition, and I for one think it is playing with this House—playing with the earnestness which should distinguish a body of such deliberative capacity as the Senate, to take up its time by the affirmation of propositions like this, which contain in themselves no element whatever of a practical character, beginning in nothing, going on in nothing, and likely to end in nothing.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What are your grounds for saying that ?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The hon. gentleman sees no difficulty. With all respect, I for one, feel, and have always felt, an admiration for the continued urbanity of the hon. member for Marquette. With no disrespect, I would say to him, that it reminds me of a story ; an old salt at the seaside saw some cockneys on a fine day sailing about, and they were cracking on with all sails set. His remark was, "There they goes; they fears nothing, because they knows nothing." Now, my idea is that if the hon. gentleman's enthusiasm for statistics were tempered with a little practical knowledge of business, or manufacture, or administration even—which may be within his reach—he would abandon the unreserved and unrestricted modification of the laws which he is continually submitting to the consideration of this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We of course take different views on subjects of that kind, and with all due respect to the hon. gentleman who has resumed his seat, it did appear to me there was a good deal involving a practical result in the statement made by the hon. member from Marquette. His point was that the revenue could be largely increased by the equalization of the excise and duty. I think that is a pretty self-evident proposition. The only argument that has been advanced against that is that if you increase the excise there is just so much greater inducement to smuggling. I quite admit that it is an increased inducement, but the smuggling goes on all the same at present, and I do not think the additional tax of 55 cents a gallon would affect it materially. The smuggling cannot be so considerable as to interfere very much with the revenue. We have evidence that in England it is found the best policy to raise the revenue on those very items. It was found to be the easiest way of raising a revenue, and it certainly is the very best in the interests of any country that if a tax is to be levied on any article it should be on the articles named. None of them are essential, none are necessities of life; they are luxuries, and it would be a good deal better if less money were spent on them. If an increase has to be made at all, it is better that we should increase the tax upon them than upon any other article.

There is just one point my hon. friend from Kennebec made which I quite saw the force of. He called attention to the fact that there was the duty on corn which would have to be taken into consideration, and I think the hon. member from Marquette did not allude to that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I took it for granted that that would follow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then there is seven cents duty on corn which the distiller would have to pay, which would have to be considered in the rearrangement of any duty between excise and customs.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken that if you increase the excise 55c., there would be no more smuggling in the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No more than there is now.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think that is the sound judgment of the House, because we know there is smuggling in the St. Lawrence and in the province from which I come to a large extent, and if we give the temptation of 55 cents a gallon more on spirits, there would certainly be more smuggling. Instead of having liquors produced in our own country, we will have the spurious liquors of other countries, and in this case would destroy an honest industry of the country, help the smuggler and advance the dishonest dealer. Besides, it is well known that there is a height at which taxation reduces revenue. I have no doubt the government have considered this in a practical manner, in a patriotic spirit, with practical common sense, so as to build up our own industries and to give exclusive employment as far as is reasonable to our own people. This motion is simply a question of arithmetic, and it is a self-evident proposition. If you raise the duty 55 cents a gallon, and the same quantity of liquor is produced in the country, a certain increase of revenue will be obtained. That is a question which does not require the deliberation of this House. The only question is whether my hon. friend's figures are right—whether he is capable of adding figures together. He does not even venture to assert that it would increase the West India trade at all. We would have smuggling from that quarter. Instead of advancing the West India trade, which we in the lower provinces are anxious to do, and getting something in return for the fish and lumber that we send there, it would tend to the smuggling of spurious liquors into the country to the destruction of the revenue. Instead of having as large a revenue as we have now from spirits, we would have less revenue, and the people would be injured by the inferior liquors smuggled into the country. This is but another proof of what one-sided free trade would produce.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not wish to enter into this discussion, because it is not in the line of my argument with reference to the revenue of the country, but I certainly cannot agree with the last speaker when he says that by increasing the excise we would incur the danger of more smuggling, especially from foreign countries. Now that could not be so, because the hon. member from Marquette, only asks that we retain the customs duties as they are at present.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Twenty-five cents more.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he wants the excise raised to be equal to the customs duty on spirits. He means that there should be no protection for the manufacture of spirits in Canada, and to open up the markets of the world to the industries mentioned by the hon. gentleman from Marquette, and give them an opportunity that they are entitled to. I never can see why other portions of this Dominion should be taxed for the purpose of manufacturing alcohol. Some 70 per cent of the raw material from which it is made being imported from the United States in the shape of Indian corn. Whatever excise we may choose to put on, may be governed by whatever excise they are charging in the United States. Whatever duty they put on the liquors there is a complete barrier to us in smuggling, because if we go to the United States and purchase liquor in bond, we must bring it into our ports and enter it and pay customs duty on it. Consequently there cannot be smuggling in that. And if we purchase liquor out of bond and duty paid in the United States, there is no profit smuggling it into Canada either. There is nothing that I can see to controvert the hon. gentleman's argument, if the people choose to raise a revenue the way he proposes. In my judgment there is 50 per cent too much duty on spirits already, and the volume of revenue would be as large if a more moderate duty were imposed. I presume, though, that the government are the best judges in the matter, but if the taxes were equalized more, it would be better for the general trade and there would be less inducements to smuggle. The tobacco question is one that might be studied out with more consideration than at present, because I hold that the manufacture of tobacco does not amount to much after all. The consumer has to pay more than he should for the article. We have to import our tobacco—we do not grow it in this country. The little profit that might be made out of its manufacture in two or three factories in Canada is not worth considering. I do not know that we can discuss the subject properly here, because after all it is a question for business men to decide, and I would most anxiously wish, if possible, that we could have such a board as was petitioned for the other day—a board of real business men, who would project a tariff for Canada that would really be suited to the country instead of leaving it to gentlemen who have had very little experience in commerce.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I think the mover of this resolution has fallen into an error with respect to the effect of raising rates of taxation. In some cases if a rate is raised the revenue is increased. For instance, there is no evading an income tax. In England put on a penny and it produces so many millions of dollars revenue, but it is altogether different in taxing articles of consumption. It was the impression, I know, at one time that you have only to raise the duty and you will get more revenue from it, and you have only to reduce it and it takes a portion of the revenue off. I remember an instance a good many years ago, when a change of tariff, made under that impression, created quite a disappointment. It was thought that the revenue was more than sufficient to provide for the expenditure of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced the duty on tea one-half, and to the surprise of himself and the country more revenue was raised from tea that year than had been raised previously. Again you may reach a point beyond which people cannot bear taxation, and when you try to go beyond that, people give up the use of the article altogether, so that by increasing the tax you may get no revenue at all. A temperance advocate could not wish for a better argument than that which has been advanced by the hon. gentleman from Marquette. He could go to the consumer and say "the government are putting an increased tax on your luxuries. I can remember when tobacco paid only one penny a pound, but it has been raised and raised until the duty is more than the price of the original article, and I advise you to give up the pipe altogether." The consequence would be that the community could be induced, perhaps, to give up the use of tobacco altogether. There is an old proverb that if you tread on the worm it will turn, and if you impose too heavy a tax upon the people who use liquor and tobacco, you can very easily persuade them that they can do perfectly well without either and they will do without them. The temperance advocate would need no better argument than the one which the hon. gentlemen put in their mouths for a crusade against intoxicating drinks and tobacco.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shell River will have an opportunity now to reflect upon the ingratitude of man. The hon. gentleman found the government in a difficulty in respect to the revenue—he found that they expected to have during the present year a deficit of something over $4,000,000. The hon. gentleman, out of the goodness of his heart, undertook to point out to the government how that amount might be raised without any injury to the country, and instead of the advice being received with gratitude and with applause by supporters of the government, he is met with a very severe rebuke by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec division, and with anything but a cordial reception from the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. I asked the hon. gentleman a question with respect to smuggling, and I find that the hon. gentleman from Kennebec division and the hon. gentleman from York (N.B.) who has just taken his seat and whom we are all delighted to hear speak once again in the House, seemed to think there was some force in the point to which my question was directed; but the hon. gentleman from St. John, who has perhaps rather more practical knowledge of the business than these hon. gentlemen, is apparently of a different opinion. He has given a very substantial reason why we should not look for very much more smuggling if the duties were increased, so as not to exceed the excise duties of the United States.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I did not agree wholly with the hon. gentleman from Marquette.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rose largely for the purpose of expressing my regret at the fact that there was so much human nature in the supporters of the government in the Senate. I quite concur in what has been said as to the desirability of raising the largest practicable revenue from liquor. There is one circumstance to which attention has not been called and which I think deserves some consideration. The hon. gentleman who has charge of the finances of this country, in his early days, was above all things an advocate of temperance—in fact, he was in favour of total prohibition. The hon. gentleman from Wolseley says he is that yet. If that is the case, the hon. Minister of Finance, if he were within hearing of the hon. gentleman from Shell River, should rise up and call him blessed for having indicated to him how he can remove his deficit and carry out his—I will not say hereditary principles, but his ancient principles, at the same time—how can he raise a revenue and tend to promote sobriety, and I hope that when the leader of the government comes to say a word on this subject, if he does say anything, he will show a little more gratitude than has been shown by some of his supporters in this House.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I do not often get an opportunity to follow the hon. gentleman from Halifax, because as a rule the hon. member from Lunenburg rises to reply. But in this instance the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg has spoken first, and he is not at liberty to follow his usual practice. My colleague from Halifax, year after year, when there was a surplus, spoke of the surplus as money stolen from the people. Now, when there are deficits, he is not pleased either. He puts me in mind of the soldier who was tied up to the triangles to be whipped. The man in charge of the cat struck him on the shoulder, but the soldier said, "Oh, don't hit me there." He struck lower down, and the soldier said, "Don't hit me there." After a few more blows with the same result, he threw down the cat and said, "Damn it, there is no pleasing you." It is the same way with the hon. gentleman from Halifax—he is not pleased when there is a deficit and he is not pleased when there is a surplus. Now, I shall leave him to say which horn of the dilemma he is most pleased with.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can scarcely believe that my hon. friend who has moved this motion expected its adoption by the Senate. It involves a change in the whole fiscal policy of the country, and if carried out in their entirety, might possibly have the result that he anticipates. He has been so well answered by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec that I need only repeat what he said—his argument amounts to this, that if he multiplies a figure by two, he will get a much larger revenue by multiplying by a larger figure. I do not think it all necessary to enter into a general discussion of a question involving so grave a principle as the one that he has propounded to the House. To treat it seriously if I understand his motion, it means this, that you should increase the excise duty on spirits, tobacco and beer to a sum equal to that imposed upon those articles when imported, and by doing so you would increase the revenue, by a certain sum. If the hon. gentleman's system were adopted, all the spirits used in the country would be imported from abroad; none would be made here, for the simple reason that the corn out of which it is manufactured, is produced cheaper in a foreign country than it is here. He has only to compare the cost of producing spirits in the large distilleries of Ohio and the west with the cost of producing spirits in Canada, to see how fallacious his argument is. It resolves itself into this narrow compass—equalize the excise and custom duties and you close every distillery, tobacco factory and brewery in the country. If that would prevent the consumption of tobacco, spirits or malt liquors, you might say that much good would be done to the morals of the people of this country, but as he proposes to have it imported from a foreign country instead of being made here, the result would be the destruction of the market for all the barley that is grown here and every other grain used in the production of these spirits. The people would have the privilege of paying a duty upon an article manufactured in a foreign country, and would lose whatever benefit would be derived from the local industries. That would be really the practical result if his views were adopted. I do not think this country is prepared for that. If you close the industries of the country and leave no employment for the people, whether it be in the production of one article or another, I should like my hon. friend to solve the problem as to where you would find the throats to swallow the liquor from whom the revenue is raised. If you have nothing for the people to do in the country, they will leave, and consume the products of the country in which they live. I was not a little pleased and amused at the remarks which fell from the senior member from Halifax. He generally reads us a lesson on the manner in which all subjects should be treated in this House, and if we could have listened to him without seeing that smile on his countenance which indicated the keenest sarcasm dealt out to the hon. member for Marquette, we might have believed him to be very sincere in the remarks which he made; but sitting in front of him as I did, and reading as I thought I could read, his real, inward feeling, as indicated by the smile on his countenance, I do not think there is any difficulty in arriving at a correct conclusion as to his meaning when he gave us that little lesson. My hon. friend from Marquette, I suppose, does not mean to put this motion to a vote. I have no objection, if he wishes it, to test the opinion of the Senate on a question of such vital importance. I could not help thinking when I heard the story told by the hon. gentleman from Kennebec, that he might have gone a little further and quoted from Shakespeare the expression of Prince Hal when he read the account of Falstaff's personal expenses—"O, monstrous, but one-half pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack."

Perhaps it is not strictly parliamentary, but it strikes me that the quotation is so pointed and so applicable to the speech of my hon. friend that he will forgive me for reading it. We have an intolerable amount of sack for a very little bread, or in other words, we have a great deal of talk, and a great many statements as to what would be the result by simple multiplication of items in order to increase the revenue, with a very little amount of logic or practical knowledge of the subject with which the hon. member is dealing. If he will reflect for a moment upon the few words uttered by our venerable friend (Mr. Wark) he will find that there is a fund of wisdom and common sound sense in his statements. His utterances were few, but of such practical character that anyone who has given the slightest attention to the operation of the excise and customs duties and their effect on trade generally, must come to the conclusion that that gentleman not only understood what he was talking about but had a practical knowledge of the whole subject. If you admit any such scheme as that propounded by the hon. member from Marquette, the result will be that indicated by the hon. member from Kennebec.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not see that there has been any attempt to confute the statement I have made. There has been a considerable amount of denunciation, but when I am advocating a policy and producing facts and figures which is the guide to the legislation of the United Kingdom in regard to the revenue which has produced such magnificent results in that country, I can afford to rest my case upon the position which has been assumed there. What I am advocating here is identically the method that has been adopted in Great Britain with regard to the revenue—the method that has resulted in not much greater consumption of spirits and a less consumption of tobacco there than here; so that, so far as the effect upon consumption of spirits is concerned, it is beneficial from the point of view of the temperance people; so far as the revenue is concerned, it is beneficial in so far as it relieves a large portion of the necessaries of life from the duty they are subjected to and places it upon that which is not a necessary of life. I can rest my case quite fearlessly upon the broad ground that the policy that I am advocating is the policy that has been pursued for the past 50 years so successfully in the British Isles, where the hon. leader of this government came from in his youth, and it must be still fresh in his memory at the magnificent effort that was made by Cobden and Bright and their allies to throw off the burden of monopoly engendered by the protection of a century and upwards. Seventeen years only has been the growth of protection in Canada and the effort to throw it off here is comparatively easy compared with the efforts put forth in Great Britain in 1845; if the hon. leader of the government will only forego the political benefits he may derive at the hands of monopoly. If he has any regard for pursuing a broad and liberal policy in regard to Canadian unity within the British Empire under the bonds of the British constitution, in regard to the employment of labour, and in regard to the advancement of the labouring classes, I say that he will study the figures that I have put before him and compare them with results that have been obtained in regard to both consumption and revenue in Great Britain and see what effect they are likely to produce on the line of temperance. I believe there are four millions of total abstainers in the United Kingdom. That is his responsibility to the country. The hon. member from Kennebec division is standing up in his place as one who is personally benefited by the protection put upon sugar. 300,000,000 pounds of sugar come into the country raw and it is manufactured by him under the sugar trust, and he is protected in that manufacture by upwards of  $\frac{1}{2}$ -cent a pound by special and favoured legislation which enables him to collect it from the whole population; the whole tax is one and one-tenth cent per pound resulting in a tax of \$33,000,000 upon this prime necessity. I do not know whether he is defending himself for private reasons against the position that I have assumed, but it is quite a difficult thing for the hon. member from Kennebec to rise and combat the statements I have made in order to transfer the burden of taxation from sugar to spirits. To his soliloquy on the folly of free traders, given as follows:—"There they goes. They fears nothing, 'cos they knows nothing." I might add: "They has nothing" because he and his allies "has it all." It is quite a different thing for the leader of the government, who has to deal with these matters honestly between one portion of the country and another, between one individual and another. Why the trade between this country and the West India Islands should be closed and trade opened up with Kansas for corn, I fail to see. That is what has taken place; our trade between St. John and the West Indies that used to flourish is practically closed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where would the whisky come from?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We would manufacture it. Instead of manufacturing whisky from the raw corn, our distillers under the pressure of competition would be compelled to use malt, in order to compete with the Scotch distillers who export so largely, and into such competition our barley could enter most successfully for export. I am not speaking of spirits, or rum; I am speaking of the whole question. At the present moment you levy the duties in such a way that you close up your trade between the maritime provinces and the West Indies, and you open up trade in corn between Windsor and Kansas. We can not benefit in any degree from the corn which goes into the manufacture of our spirits, except by its passage across the river from Detroit. There is a duty of  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. a busbel on that corn imported into this country, but what is  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cents duty on six hundred thousand bushels of corn used by the distillers, \$42,000, beside an increase of two or three million dollars on spirits alone. It is protection that manipulates the legislation to the destruction of one point and the elevation of another. That is the principle we are acting upon at present—a principle which I hope will soon be abandoned for the sake of the greater development of the Dominion, for the sake of the extension of this country upon the broad principle of cheapening the cost of production in order that labour may benefit more through the development of capital and wealth. The leader of the government argues that the result of this policy would be that there would be nobody left in this country to drink anything, but experience has shown that by cheapening the cost of production you do not decrease the population who enjoy the benefits. You may change the methods of industrial works, but you do not destroy the demand for employment, or destroy population, just the reverse. If as the hon. leader says he must vote against the motion because its effect will be to destroy the fiscal fabric which is now the policy of the government, I can only say that it would be well for the leader of the government in that case to consider the wisdom of building the fiscal fabric of the country anew and upon a solid basis, and a basis that has proved so successful in the United Kingdom. The fact that other nations have not the constitutional ability to rid themselves of the monopoly engendered by protection is no argument to the contrary. I have no desire to impose the resolution if the House will permit me to withdraw it, but I think the hon. gentlemen should fairly say that the figures are correct, because if they say they are not, they should be proved to be so.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—Strong a supporter of the government as I am, I would certainly oppose this motion if it were proposed by the leader, let alone being proposed by a member of the opposition. With regard to liquors I will say nothing, as other gentlemen have dealt with that item in a satisfactory manner. We all know that tobacco is very extensively used by rich and poor, by the labouring classes especially, and the taxes they now pay on it are about as high as they can afford. You might as well try to send the fisherman out to sea to fish without nets, lines and bait, as to send him without his tobacco. It is the same with the lumbermen, and with nearly all labouring men. It is a comfort to them to have a smoke, and they will have it. The rich man has his smoke, and many other luxuries; he can well afford to pay for them and no one finds fault. On manufactured tobacco there is now a tax in the shape of duty and excise of over twenty-five cents per pound, and if you add ten cents more on the importation or manufacture, that means fifteen cents more per pound to the consumer. Manufactured tobacco sells now at sixty cents per pound; add fifteen cents and you have seventy-five cents, thirty-five cents of which is duty and excise. Why should the poor man be so heavily taxed on the only luxury he can afford to enjoy? Why would you impose such a penalty on him, in order to raise a revenue for the benefit of the rich man, whilst the poor man is very seldom benefited with the smallest portion? I shall certainly vote against the resolution.

The SPEAKER—Does the hon. member withdraw his motion?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I withdraw the motion on the ground that the question before the House is a matter of fact and therefore not debatable.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest if we are to have a matter of fact resolution which is not debatable on the paper that it should be ruled out of order, but if it is debatable we could vote upon it. It is just as well the Senate should declare whether we should adopt this system—

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The question is not whether we shall adopt that system, but whether by pursuing a certain course, such a result will follow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by saying the question before the Senate affirms no principle. If you say “yes,” it will devolve upon the government, if they act in accordance with the opinions of this House, to change the present system of taxation. If you say “no,” it leaves the government free. You could not put a proposition in a fairer and more distinct form than this is put.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The facts happen to be against the government ; that is all. Do I understand the government supporters propose to vote that two and two do not make four ?

Hon. Mr. MASSON—They may vote that an increase of the excise will not increase the revenue.

The House divided on the motion which was rejected on the following division :

BAIE DES CHALEURS SCANDAL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved for an order of the Senate for copies of the following papers :—

1. The sworn declaration of M. François Langelier, Member for Quebec Centre, given on the 6th November, 1891, before the Royal Commission which investigated the Baie des Chaleurs scandal, stating that he endorsed M. Pacaud's and M. Tarte's promisory notes, but that he never, directly or indirectly, profited a cent by them.

2. The sworn declaration of the said François Langelier, stating that when he gave those notes, he calculated that those notes would be paid by subscription, adding: “We calculated that we would not have to pay a cent on the amount of those notes and we were determined, if we had to pay, to each pay our share of the amount.”

3. The sworn declaration of the said François Langelier, stating that as to the notes concerning the contestations, “We calculated, as he said, that the amount would be paid by the deposits, when the deposits were withdrawn, and that if their was anything lost out of these amounts, we would bear the loss between us, saving the attempt to get assistance from friends as we done previously."

4. The sworn declaration of Ernest Pacaud, making the following statement: "Whether there was a settlement of the election contestations or the disopits were withdrawn in any other way, the deposits were applied to paying the notes, and then those who had signed were no longer liable."

"Q. When you had the notes for election expenses signed and discounted, you intended to get political subscriptions to cover these notes?"

"A. Yes."

"Did you start these subscriptions afterwards?"

"A. No, because I had other money to pay them. I had some subscriptions, but I did not push them as I had other money to pay the notes."

"Q. Money from the $100,000?"

"A. Yes."

"Q. Which went to pay this?"

"A. Yes, Your Honour."

5. The following promissory notes or any other, endorsed by the said Francois Langelier, and paid by M. Pacaud out of the $100,000 of the Baie des Chaleurs boodle.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. As I understand the motion, the hon. gentleman asks for certain papers which were submitted before a Royal Commission issued by the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. Now, the Governor General and his Council have nothing to do with those papers. They are not under their control or keeping, and if the hon. gentleman wants a copy of them the proper place to apply is in the Quebec legislature. I do not intend to argue the question, but it is clear on the face of it that this is not the place to ask for those papers. We had an inquiry in relation to the Baie des Chaleurs matter before the Senate, but that is a different thing. The papers and evidence which were submitted to Commissioners appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec should be asked for in the legislature of that province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Debates, he will notice that all these papers were sent here to Ottawa, addressed to the Secretary of State, for the Governor General.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think that the point of order is well taken. I know that some of the documents, the correspondence exchanged between the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec and the Prime Minister of the province at that time, were duly forwarded to the Governor General.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not these papers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Those papers upon motion were brought before this House, and if I recollect right, after the investigation so as to fully inform the officer to whom the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec was responsible, the report of the Royal Commission also must have been transmitted. There was never any motion to have the whole of it put before the House. The present motion is to have a portion of it brought down. If this report was made, there can be no objection on the part of the government to have the papers brought before the House. The papers are a portion of the public records of the Dominion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LANGENBURG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill (55) "An Act to incorporate the Langenburg and Southern Railway Company".

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to make just a few observations before this bill is read the third time. The House is, as a rule, reluctant to interfere with the report of a committee, but there is no absolute rule on the matter. If there were any impropriety in the House undertaking to discuss and if it thought desirable to send back the report of a committee, parliament in its wisdom would not have provided that the reports of committees should come before the House for approval. It may happen sometimes that the report of a committee does not commend itself to the judgment of the majority of the House, and then it is perfectly right and proper for the House to express its opinion on the report ; and particularly if there has been a division in the committee itself, there is not the slightest reason why the conclusion at which the committee have arrived should not be considered by the House.

Now, this bill is one which deserves some consideration at the hands of the Senate. There was a division of the committee on the matter, and there may be some hon. gentlemen who are not familiar with the bill. It may be well, therefore, to briefly state what it is and the circumstances under which it comes before the House. Some years ago parliament incorporated a company, by the name of the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, for the purpose of securing the construction of a railway from Portage la Prairie to Prince Albert. The original act has been amended on several occasions. The company have been granted extensions of time, and other amendments have been made to meet their views. They borrowed a considerable amount of money—over $2,000,000—from capitalists in England. The company had built at that time, I understand, something like 150 miles of road. They had completed about 150 miles, for which they were in debt, and they had some 30 miles under construction, and in order to secure the money which they required, they mortgaged the first division of their road from Portage la Prairie, to a point at or near Langenburg—180 miles—the first division of the Manitoba and North-western Railway—to the London capitalists who advanced some two millions of dollars. Default was made in the interest, and the holders of the bonds and mortgage have undertaken to realize on their security. Litigation is going on between the two parties ; and that being the position of affairs, the original borrowers come to parliament and ask us to incorporate this company, made up of the original borrowers, who propose to build a road from Langenburg, near the end of the 180 miles mortgaged to the London people, running nearly due south to the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The effect of the construction of that road will be to transform those 180 miles which were mortgaged, as the first division of the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, into a purely local road, while the through business from Prince Albert, if there is any, will go down the new road, which will be operated by the same people who own the Manitoba and North-western Railway—the original Manitoba and North-western Railway Company. The natural effect of that will be, of course, to render the security held by the London lenders of money worth very much less than it would be under other circumstances. They will simply hold security on a local road, and that local road will be deprived of the important branch which is mentioned in this charter. The bill which is asked for is not such legislation as would commend itself to the deliberate judgment of any member who believes that justice is an essential quality in law. Some people think that law and justice are not identical, but in enacting statutes at any rate we should try to make none but just laws, and my contention is that this proposed law is not just. Substantially it means that the borrowers in this case get the legislation for the purpose of diminishing the value of the security which they offered for the very large sum of money loaned them by those London people. I think it is only necessary to state that position to make it clear to the mind of any gentleman who looks at it in any impartial way that the object of the bill is what we might call, from a legislative standpoint at any rate, an immoral object. It has been alleged by some hon. gentleman that we need care very little about the people who loan the money or about the people who borrowed the money ; all we need care about is the development of the country. I do not think there will be any very greatly increased development of the country through the passing of this bill ; but surely the hon. gentleman who take that view loses sight of the fact that the end does not justify the means and that righteousness, and not rapid progress “is the thing which exalteth a nation.” That is my first objection to this legislation that it is unjust and, in a wide sense, immoral. My second objection is that the passing of this bill into law will be injurious to the prospects of railway building in Canada, and more particularly in the North-west. Everyone knows how sensitive capital is, how easy it is to frighten it away from any class of investments, and I cannot help feeling that the effect of passing this measure into law will be to shake the faith of capitalists in London, and elsewhere, in our Canadian railway securities. If, when promoters in this country go to London, or New York, or Paris seeking to borrow money for the construction of a railway in Canada, capitalists feel that the security which is offered to them may be rendered, if not absolutely valueless, still of very much less value than they are given to understand it possesses, by the passing of new legislation, they will hesitate very much about lending their money on the security of Canadian railways. Take the very instance before us; supposing that we pass this legislation, and money is borrowed for the construction of this new line, and supposing such difficulties arise as have arisen in this case, there is nothing to hinder the promoters of this company, the men who borrowed something over two million of dollars in London and who probably propose to borrow more money to construct this road, from building another road starting at a point further west than Langenburg and cutting out the road which is proposed to be built under this legislation. I cannot help feeling that it is a very dangerous thing indeed for us to do anything which is calculated to shake the faith of British, American or French investors in our railway securities. In asking that this bill be not read the third time, and in asking hon. gentlemen to vote against the third reading, I do not think the interests of any one are likely to suffer very much. The interests of both parties in this case are identical; it is nearly as much in the interests of the bond holders of the first division of this road that the line should be built to Prince Albert and that it should do a large business, as it is in the interests of the people who are now seeking to have this bill passed. The more business is done over the road and the more successful it is the better it will be for the persons who own the first 180 miles; but if we can pass this bill we put it into the power of the people who get the legislation to cut off this road from Langenburg to Portage la Prairie and make it a purely local road. If we do not pass this legislation and leave the parties to settle with one another, as I think they ought to do, what will be the effect? The bond holders, or mortgagees, cannot be guilty of any very serious injustice to the incorporators of this new company or to the original Manitoba and North-western Railway Company; and I shall just read a couple of paragraphs of the petition presented on behalf of the mortgagees to show that:—

20. Ever since the appointment of the receiver (August, 1894), the road has been operated under an agreement between the Messrs. Allan and the bondholders; and the revenue and expenditure of the whole line has been divided according to schedules proposed by the Messrs. Allan themselves and ratified by an order of the court (15th August, 1894.)

21. It is in fact absolutely impossible for the bondholders to be unreasonable, even were they foolish enough to desire to injure themselves by so doing, for the following reasons;—

(1.) During the suit there exists the arrangement already referred to. If it should be terminated at any time the court has directed its master to fix a proper division of receipts and expenditures;

(2.) After the suit, if the bondholders or others become purchasers of the 180 miles, the railway act (section 278) provides that the purchaser can only operate the road for a year under license to be obtained from the Minister of Railways; and that during the year the purchasers must come to Parliament for leave to continue.

22. It will, therefore, be seen that it is out of the power of the bondholders to be unreasonable. During the suit the court, and after the suit the Minister of Railways and Parliament, regulate the relations between the bondholders and the Messrs. Allan.

Now, hon. gentlemen, I do not think there is any absolute and urgent necessity for the passage of the bill before us to justify this House in passing it. Those people entered into arrangements and agreements with one another, and I think we had better let them fight the questions out themselves, and not interfere until it is absolutely necessary. This bill is really such legislation as in the United States would be held unconstitutional, inasmuch as it is to alter contracts which have been made between parties. There is just one other observation which I may make incidentally—that if this bill passes and the original Manitoba and North-western Railway Company undertake to construct this road, they will find it much more difficult to borrow money on their road to Prince Albert than they would otherwise, because the whole road from Prince Albert to Portage la Prairie is a better security and investment than the road from Prince Albert to Fleming. I think that is the name of the station on the Canadian Pacific Railway which they propose to select. Under the circumstances we should defer this bill until next session at any rate, and I have no doubt but that in the meanwhile the parties will have agreed among themselves upon some reasonable and equitable arrangement. I think that we should reject this bill.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I was on the Railway Committee and voted for this bill because I was under the impression that those who held the 180 miles were quite satisfied with the lien they had upon that section and had no interest in the road going to Prince Albert—that it would not be built by them and as they had the end of it, they could by reason of that fact, prevent the road being built, and the object was to place the parties in a position under this bill so that they could not fairly negotiate with the owners or mortgagees of the 180 miles, who are trying to separate it from the rest of the railway and leave the line beyond Langenburg worthless, without an outlet. The Allans desire that the whole line to Prince Albert should be built. Unless they got this bill they would be paralyzed and could not continue the road to Prince Albert and it would not be built. They want another road down to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway so that they will be in a position to negotiate with those holding the 180 miles, and come to favourable terms; therefore the suggestion my hon. friend from Halifax makes to wait a year and give them an opportunity to negotiate among themselves would be futile. I do not think this road will ever be built, but I want to see this company in a position to say to those who own the 180 miles “come to fair terms and let us have the road built to Prince Albert, you have the paying part of it, and you want to frustrate the object and intention of the legislature to build the road through to Prince Albert.” I voted for the bill believing it would be the means of continuing this road, as was intended by the previous grant, and the refusal of this charter will prevent the completion of the road, which in the public interest should extend to Prince Albert.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As a member of that committee my hon. friend from Halifax says that it would be better to let the company and the mortgagees fight this among themselves, that we should not interfere. He says their interests are identical. But I would remind the hon. gentleman that there is a third party, the people who live in the vicinity of the road and expect to get railway facilities to bring their produce to market, and it is their interests that I want to look after. The parties who hold a mortgage on the road, have taken their security and should look to it. They invested their money but that does not justify them in retarding railway construction in the North-west for those people who need an outlet. There are people living at Elkhorn, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and Langenburg, a distance of 70 miles. If the company build the line across they will give those people railway facilities. Are we here to legislate in the interest of bondholders who have made a bad bargain, or are we here to legislate in the interest of the people of this country who want an outlet? There is no use coming here and saying the company did not meet the interest on the mortgage when it was due and therefore the people in that country must not have railway facilities. As I understand it, the promoters of the bill before the House now want to construct a railway to give an outlet to the people. They have spent a large amount of money in that part of the country already, and in order to be able to utilize what they have spent, they want this legislation. Are we going to tell them “You shall not go any further with your railway until you pay the mortgagees the last dollar.” The interests of the poor people that are struggling now in the North-west will govern my vote here. Therefore, I have much pleasure in supporting the bill.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I am a member of the committee and before the committee met I had a conversation with the petitioner who spoke to me about that road, and I gave it as my probable decision that I should support the bill, because I have always been in favour of colonization railways, and if everything was as he represented it, I should most certainly vote for the bill; but when the matter was before the committee, and the representatives, not only of the petitioners, but of the bondholders in England, were present and I heard the discussion and learned all the facts I could not help believing that it would be unjust and unfair to the bondholders to grant this legislation. The argument of the hon gentleman from Monck is good—it is an argument which we use very often, that a railway is in the interest of the settlers and of the country as a whole. It helps colonization, it is true, but there is another thing which we must not lose sight of—we must not steal the money of our neighbours to build our railways. My conviction is that that is what we are asked to do now. What are the facts? The company got an act of incorporation three or four years ago from the Canadian Parliament. They went on and built 130 miles of the railway on which they gave a mortgage to the bondholders in England. That was only 130 miles out of over 400 miles, which their charter covered. When the bondholders in England accepted the mortgage on 130 miles already built, was it not with a view that when the 400 miles should be completed their mortgage would be safe? They took a risk, no doubt, but there is risk in all business and even in every day life. They undertook a risk, but as there was 130 miles of the road already built they assumed that risk willingly. What right has this Parliament now to relieve the company of their obligation to build the 300 miles still un-built? Is that in our power? No doubt Parliament is supreme and can do what it pleases, but when I speak of having the power, I mean in equity and justice; have we the right to deprive the bondholders in England of the advantage they would have when the whole road to Prince Albert is built? I say so—it is an injustice. More than that, we are injuring the public credit. Hereafter another company may go to England and ask for money, showing their act of incorporation, and explaining that one-fifth or one-tenth of the line has been built already on which they are prepared to give a mortgage, and they will be told “Oh, your Parliament of Canada has no respect for obligations contracted by a company,—no respects for vested rights.” I consider the whole thing is against the public interest and I felt that I was bound to change my views. I said “I came here prepared to vote for the bill in the committee, but I shall be obliged to vote against it after hearing both sides of the question.” I cannot support such a measure.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—As I had the advantage of being present at the discussion of this question in the Railway Committee, and paid considerable attention to the subject, I will be excused if I make a few observations on the bill more especially in reply to the remarks which we have heard upon it from the hon. member from Halifax. The bill was discussed fully and all the parties were heard at considerable length in the Railway Committee. On the one side Mr.

Allan was questioned very fully and his answers struck me as being frank and dispassionate and in every way reliable. The hon. member from Halifax had every opportunity to subject him to cross-examination, and he took full advantage of his power. On the other side, the statements of the bondholders were presented by a skilled legal adviser, and we all know that when a full statement is made by a lawyer the statements which are made by laymen are comparatively unimpressive and defective. That has been my experience hitherto and it was my experience in the committee when this bill was before us. I am perfectly satisfied that the bondholders' case did not suffer in the slightest degree in the hands of the lawyer who represented them before that committee. Notwithstanding that, after a full consideration the committee divided upon the question and carried the bill by an overwhelming majority, a majority, I think, of three to one, or thereabouts. For my part, I thought the committee were entirely in the right, for, if you will observe, it ceases to be a question of a quarrel between the parties that is at issue in this case, although there are endless questions of quarrel between them. Still, it does not appear to me to be the duty of this House to enter into private squabbles or to take sides on any other ground than the public interest demands. The question comes up—is there in this bill the slightest approach to an interference with the rights of the bondholders in England savouring at all of confiscation or lack of regard for their interests? I think there is none. The hon. gentleman from Halifax omitted entirely—I do not say intentionally—to tell you what the exact facts were with reference to the position of this section of 180 miles. He said: “Grant this bill and this 180 miles will secure only local traffic and will lose the through traffic to Prince Albert.” He omitted to tell you that the portion extending to Prince Albert is not built; he omitted further to tell you that we had the clearest evidence and statements from the parties interested; that if you do not grant this bill that portion will never be built. I can quite understand it. What becomes then of the vested rights in the extension to Prince Albert—rights which do not exist? When the bondholders loaned their money, they loaned it on a perfectly clear and carefully drawn up mortgage bond. Does that mortgage bond, in addition to conveying this line as security for their money, anywhere state that they have a right to control whatever extension is to be made towards Prince Albert? Not at all—nothing of the kind. Are they entitled to take the remainder of the road by the throat and say “not only shall we take the property which is bonded for our money, but in addition to that we will demand from you that you go on with your money and construct the remaining portion of the road to be a feeder to ours?” Is there anything in the bond entitling them to do that? I do not see it. Now, the whole secret of the matter is this: had the population of that district increased with the rapidity which was anticipated when the project was undertaken, we should not have heard anything of those quarrels or of this case, for the road would have been built and paying expenses and giving a profit and everything would have been serene, but is there one of us that has not been disappointed in the progress of that territory? No. A great many of us thought that land would be in great demand and taken up with the utmost rapidity, and we bought property there, but we have been disappointed. We do not turn on the government which sold us that land and say “gentlemen we have lost our money; we put our money into this country and we have had nothing but trouble and worry and constant expense and we look to you to make it up to us.” I do not think the circumstances would be a bit different from those of these gentlemen who, in conformity with the terms of their mortgage bond, have received their property and now own and operate it. In my view we have nothing to do with it. We must consider this question solely in the public interest, and in the public interest it is perfectly clear that the construction of this road is demanded, for, in addition to serving the purpose primarily in view, which is to give such a reasonable prospect of the extension of the remainder of the road to Prince Albert that money will be put into it by capitalists—it opens up a new section of the country and serves a district which at present is entirely destitute of roads. They have no right, therefore, in my view not only to get the road which is covered by their bond, but to have the virtual right to compel people to put money into a project which there is no prospect will pay unless you grant this charter. The hon. member from Halifax says that you must take care and not frighten away capital. That is all right enough, but it seems to me that that is an immoral plea just as much as the other. We are asked to seduce capital to come into this country by carefully hiding up—

Hon. Mr. POWER—By not perpetrating a swindle.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I am quite satisfied that capital will not be frightened out of the country, because these are not stock-holders relying upon an overestimate of the productive powers of the district, but they have come in secondarily and secured all the money they put into it by a mortgage bond. They have or they have not got the terms of their bond; have we been asked by the applicant for this legislation to interfere in any way with the terms of that mortgage bond, or to cut off any advantages that the mortgagees enjoy under it? We have not. There is not a man in this House who would propose or consent to such a thing, so that all the talk about contracts appears to me to be entirely superfluous. The object which Messrs. Allan disclosed to us is that they may be in a position to go on with the construction of the road to Prince Albert. They tell us distinctly that if this charter is not given they cannot get the means to do that, and I can quite believe that they have no such probability. A new country will be opened up by the construction of this road and the extensions of the old Manitoba and North-west to Prince Albert, and I cordially agree with the hon. gentleman from Monck that we should grant this charter.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I concur with the views that have been expressed in this matter by my hon. friend from de Lanaudière, and by the senior member from Halifax. It is not a question to be treated in the manner suggested by my hon. friend from Kennebec, nor do I think that the reason given by my hon. friend from Monck is sufficient to guide us in dealing with this measure. I do not fall one whit behind my hon. friend from Monck in my desire to promote the interests of the settlers in our North-west Territory, but in this matter I am perfectly convinced in my own mind, from what was said before the committee by the promoters of the bill, and by the advocate for the bondholders, that the idea of constructing this new road for the benefit of the settlers never entered the mind of the promoters. Their sole object, clearly manifested by the statements made before the committee, was to obtain such a hold upon the enterprise in its present state as to prevent the bondholders from exercising any authority, control or power beyond what they already possess; and that, if not with the purpose, certainly with the inevitable result of diminishing the value of the bonds of the company, which they hold. Speaking of the bonds, and speaking of the mortgage are two very different things. They have been spoken of here as though they were convertible terms; it is not so. The bonds are the bonds of the company, and hold all the stockholders of the company responsible. The mortgage covers only 180 miles of the road that has been built and was given as part security for the payment of the bonds. It has struck me from the very first that the question before us, and which I believe would have come before the other House had there been an opportunity of presenting it, is a question of high principle, and while all of us are, no doubt, equally with the hon. member from Monck, desirous of promoting and protecting the interests of our settlers in the North-west, I trust that every member of this House and the House of Commons has an equal if not a superior regard, for the protection of the character and good reputation of this country. That, to my mind, is the important feature of this bill—we are asked to do a thing which would subject the Parliament of Canada to a charge of assisting in an act, which I would call an act of gross injustice or wrong doing. I know other people view it differently. I am only speaking of the impression it makes on my own mind. The reason I have for coming to that conclusion I may briefly state. I have the highest possible respect for the Messrs. Allan. I believe them to be among the best and worthiest of our citizens, but the course which has been pursued by the Manitoba and North-west Railway Company indicates a very improper desire to control and do an injustice to the bondholders from whom they obtained their money. In the first place, the bondholders in England had no notice whatever that their rights were to be jeopardized by this legislation. It is quite true that the Manitoba and North-west Company in the early part of the session put a notice in the Gazette, that they would apply for a bill to extend the time to complete the work, in which, of course, the bondholders were as deeply interested as the stock-holders. A few words were added to the notice, "and for other purposes," which attracted a little attention from the bondholders, and one of them wrote to me asking that when the matter came before the Senate, there should be a careful examination of the bill to see that in getting legislation "for other purposes," they did not encroach upon the rights of the bondholders. I mention it to show that there was nothing to call the attention of the bondholders to the legislation now before us, in the notice which was given in the Gazette, although the bill so seriously affected their rights, jeopardizing their interests and reducing the value of their securities immensely. The notice in the Gazette was signed by a firm of lawyers and merely stated that application was to be made for a charter to construct a road from Langenburg to Elkhorn. It was a simple notice and would not attract anybody's attention. If that notice had been signed by the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company, or by the Messrs. Allan, there would have been then an intimation to the bondholders that something affecting their interests in the Manitoba and North-western Railway was about to be accomplished, or that their interests would in some way be affected by it. But they had no such notice, and the consequence was they only learned the fact after the bill had passed the House of Commons when it was too late to appear and present their case. They could only fall back upon the Senate as the last chance of protecting their interests, and they are looking to us to defend them from what they conceive to be a gross outrage and breach of trust. For what purpose can this railway charter before us be desired? It is not needed by the public. If the Manitoba and North-western Railway was working properly there would be no necessity whatever for the Langenburg and Elkhorn line. The gentleman before the committee stated that this line was to be 50 miles long. The hon. gentleman from Monck stated that it was to be 70, but at any rate the distance is not very great between the Canadian Pacific and the Manitoba and North-western Railway on the projected new line. By these two roads, I think the people of the North-west have been afforded as good railway accommodation as they are likely to have for some time. Are we prepared for the purpose of benefiting a few of our settlers, to do what in the judgment of many and in my own judgment, would be a gross wrong to the parties who having faith in us and our country advanced money for the construction of the Manitoba and North-western Railway? They have advanced $2,500,000 for the construction of that road. It was not all used in the construction but it was advanced, and on what ground? Did they expect or intend it to be expended on a local road to go 180 miles only? By no means. The idea in their mind was that it was a part of the road extending over 400 miles to Prince Albert, that it was to be a through road and accommodate the traffic of a large section of Canada. They knew that the land grants and other aid given to this company was to be apportioned to and belong to the whole road. By the 180 miles being cut off, they forfeit all rights to any bonus or grant given to any other part of this road, and induced as there were by these circumstances to lend money, we should think seriously before we venture to pass legislation which, in effect, would be very seriously depreciating the value of their bonds. It is quite true that when failure occurred in the payment of the interest on the bonds the holders took steps to protect themselves. Surely they had the right to resort to such plans as parliament suggests for the preservation of their interests. They applied to the courts and succeeded there. I do not know that even the Allans objected. I believe they did not; I think they were parties to the desire to have a receiver appointed. But there is one fact that should be considered with regard to that matter—that is, that up to the time of the appointment of the receiver the receipts of the road fell very far below the expenditure—some thousands of dollars—but since his appointment the receipts have largely exceeded the expenses. So far as the running expenses of the road are concerned, they are covered by the earnings. I do not know that any dividends have been paid upon the investment, but as far as the running expenses are concerned, since the appointment of the receiver that has been the result. I do not mean to say that there has been very great mismanagement, although the bondholders charge it. I do not say anything about that; it is simply the fact that I am stating. The present position of the road is this, that under the authority of the court a receiver has been appointed. In order to divide the money which was received, an agreement has been entered into. The old stockholders of the Manitoba and North-west Railway Company and the bondholders found no difficulty; they came to an understanding as to the ratio each was to receive, and I am convinced that, if left to themselves and if this lever is not put into the hands of the stockholders of the said company, they will come to an agreement and the road will be carried, according to its original conception, to Prince Albert as one line. I have no doubt as to the result which will be accomplished provided we do not put into the hands of the parties seeking this legislation, the power to cut off the through traffic from the 180 miles and leave it a local road. That is the great danger that I see in it. We ought to consider that here it is our bounden duty to protect the credit and character of the country with reference to those of our fellow citizens in the old country who are willing to furnish funds for the building of railways or any other great enterprise in our land. It is of the highest importance that in a case of this kind the authority of parliament should be exercised for the protection of the rights of those who live in England in preference to promoting the interests and prosperity of a few of our people at their expense. These are the reasons why I think we are in duty bound not to adopt legislation of this kind. It is, to my mind, a grave injustice to those people who believe in the integrity of our country, and relying upon parliament to protect their interests, have advanced large sums of money for the road.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Suppose the Allans were not asking for this charter: supposing it was simply a bill to construct and operate the road, and the Allans were not in it, would my hon. friend have any objection to a charter being granted for an independent road?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not think I should. I would regard it as an enterprise in the interest of the settlers there, but I do not think a company could be got to do it.

The whole gravamen of the charge is that the Allans, or the old company, are doing this. What are they doing it for? Not for the accommodation of the people, but to get a lever to work upon the bondholders.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Would not the bondholders be equally affected if another company built it instead of the Allans?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—No, I do not see that they would.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not like to give a silent vote on this question. I am somewhat astonished at the very great care that my hon. friend from Sarnia and the senior member from Halifax are taking of bondholders in England. They are certainly taking a great deal more care of them than people generally take of themselves. If I understand the matter aright, they have got the security upon which they advanced the money; they are using that security now, and neither the country nor anybody else will be doing wrong if we pass this bill and grant the charter. It would not affect in any way the security they hold for their bonds. I understand from the best authority that if any outsiders instead of the old company had applied for this road, as it is being applied for, it would have been given to them, and if any outsider could get it, I cannot see why there should be any fault found with giving it to these people. I know they have invested a very large amount of money in that country, and their road is of great value to that section. I am not speaking from hearsay, I speak of what I know. The Manitoba and North-west Railway was a very useful road for a long time, and is to-day. My hon. friend from Sarnia speaks about the difference in the receipts since the receiver took charge. Anyone who knows anything about railroading knows perfectly well that a few thousand dollars difference in the receipts does not amount to anything. They should examine and see whether the rolling stock is being kept in as good order now as it was before it passed into the receiver's hands. Of course the receiver is trying to collect all the money he can out of it, because the bondholders are not going to hold it for a long time, I hope, and they want to make just as good a showing as they can, but everyone knows that if you cut off all expenditure in the way of keeping your road and rolling stock in good order, you can soon save a lot of money. There is no trouble in doing that. We also know that a little better crop in one year than another will make a vast difference. I was over the road several times, and I think it was managed carefully. Certainly the company who were running it had no other object than to run it well, for they were paying out of their own pockets the interest on those bonds. They went on paying until they found they could pay no longer, and they are seeking this charter to make the line profitable. We have heard remarks here to-day which were not very complimentary to those who passed the bill in the other House or to the majority who voted for it in the committee here. It is said that this charter would have been given to other people, but I think those whose money is invested there have the best right to it. If the road is going to benefit them—and I hope it will—it will also do the country good. It is to be built where there are no roads for a considerable distance at present, and through a fairly well settled country. The bondholders having properly treated, and having got their rights and all that bond covered, if sympathy should go with anyone it should go with the private individuals who have spent such a large amount of money and have done so much good in that country. It will not interfere with the bondholders to give the Allans those rights, and I hope the bill will pass in the Senate, as it has passed in the committee and in the other House, with a large majority.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to make any observations on the third reading of the bill, considering that it was pretty well threshed out in committee, but I cannot give a silent vote after the implication made by one or two gentlemen, principally the hon. member from Sarnia, to the effect that parliament was not justified in interfering with vested rights. I deny that we are taking from them any rights that were given either in an Act of Parliament or in the order of the court. When this road unfortunately got into default, these 180 miles and also the extension of 42 miles, we had the uncontradicted information of the Allans that for a considerable time they continued to pay the interest to the bondholders of the 180 miles; they had paid a very large sum of money until they felt it was hopeless to go on paying under these conditions and left the bondholders to their choice. They had the option either to take proceedings against the Manitoba and North-west Railway as a corporation and obtain a judgment against the whole line, including the 42 miles, or they could go to the courts and take the 180 miles which was the portion of the road granted to them as security. And here I desire to direct attention to another observation of the hon. member from Sarnia: he intimated to the House that the bondholders were being deprived of certain lands and certain privileges conceded to the company under former charters. That is absolutely impossible. This road was given a land grant of so much per mile. You could not take from them any of the lands given in aid of a road which had not been built; they got what they were entitled to and they choose to take 180 miles. Here is an extract from a letter from one of the bondholders written in July, 1892, in which he says:—

We shall gain possession of the 180 miles and having done so we shall have it for what it is worth either for working, mortgaging or selling, or otherwise negotiating.

Now they took that 180 miles.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have not got it yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The court will give it to them. There is no question about that; it is a question of time. Assuming they take that, if we do not grant this bill what other rights have they? Is the 42 miles of no use to them? It was stated, and not contradicted, that it was not paying expenses. All the Allans expected to keep up the 42 miles when it was not paying? Could Messrs. Allan go to any money lender and say "will you take a mortgage on that 42 miles? We want to raise money on that section to continue the extension to Prince Albert." The money lender would laugh at them and say "Where is your outlet? You have to go over the 180 miles; you are in the power of the bondholders." It is all very well to say "We will come to parliament and see that right is done." Parliament should see that right is done now; and the reason I voted for this bill was that both parties could be put on the same plane and if the charter is granted they do stand on the same plane. The bondholders of the 42 miles can then get a bill elsewhere if the bondholders of the 180 miles refuse to make terms with them. It is not the interest of the Allans to depreciate the 180 miles. It is their interest to keep it up; but they would be fools to allow the bondholders of the 180 miles to take them by the throat and say: "You go on and build the road to Prince Albert, and we will have the security on all the road." It is preposterous to talk that way. What will be the effect of the legislation? The bondholders will acquire the 180 miles; they will then be on equal terms, and fair running arrangements will be made for the 42 miles and any other extension. But there is not a man in the world who would give one dollar on the security of the 42 miles towards the extension; it could not be built. But they have the right to go, somewhere. Getting to this point where you strike the 180 miles, the traffic is nothing, nor would you get the Allans to keep up the 42 miles. It would simply lie and rust, that would be the effect. It is absurd to say we are breaking faith. I think, on the contrary, we would be doing a very serious injury to the parties who have spent a large amount in that country. I think it is admitted that they have spent $2,000,000. Are our citizens who have spent $2,000,000 in that country not entitled to some consideration? We are not asked to take anything from the holders of the 180 miles. They have chosen to take their part, and they have got it and got the benefit of their extension, but they cannot say: "We will hold our 180 miles and everything beyond it although it is not built."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The road for which this bill is intended is in my neighbourhood, and therefore it is incumbent upon me to say a few words, although the matter has been pretty well threshed out. I think those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this bill are making a mountain out of a mole hill. It is not going to inflict any injustice on the bondholders except in so far as it may affect the litigation between the two companies. It is not for us to favour either, the one company or the other in that litigation. The object of this branch from Langenburg to Fleming, straight south is to put the parties in a position, while the litigation is going on, to proceed with the construction of the other line to Prince Albert. The first portion of the road that would be constructed is not this branch, but the projection from the termination of the 42 miles to Prince Albert, continuing to use the Manitoba and North-western covered by this mortgage for an outlet. Therefore the bondholders are going to benefit immensely by this bill, which puts the Allans in a position to go and raise the money. When the Allans have finished their line to Prince Albert, if the bondholders are not prepared to make an equitable arrangement for running powers, they may then utilize this line. That is a question, hon. gentlemen, that will not come up at any rate for four or five years. I quite agree with those who emphasize the necessity of preserving our credit in Canada, and especially in the North-west. I may say that it has been greatly abused. In the case of this Manitoba and North-western, they were endowed with a land grant of 6,400 acres from the Dominion Government, a bonus of $3,200 per mile from the Manitoba Government, and in addition a bonus of $300,000 by the municipalities. How did they go to work? They built the road by a construction company, who manipulated the work as they thought best. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Allans for having pursued that course, but it was the method they adopted, and these people undertook the financing. What is the result? Of the $15,000 per mile bonds, the only amount that went into the construction of the road was $1,800,000. All the rest was absorbed in discounts and what I call waste, and it is in consequence of those heavy discounts and that waste that the discredit has fallen upon the province of Manitoba in regard to the 180 miles that is now under consideration by the House. If we are to succeed as farmers, if we are to be enabled to send out our heavy produce such as cattle, wheat and grain, economy of transportation is absolutely essential to us, and we cannot get economy of transportation if bonds to the amount of $15,000 a mile at 6 per cent are to be issued, and one-half of the capital realized on them is to be spirited away instead of going into the construction of the road. I am quite aware that when you are developing a country like the North-west, capital demands of those who take certain risks a considerable share of the assets to enrich themselves, but it is not in the interests of Canada or of the government, or in the interests of our railway credit that we should proceed on those lines in the development of the North-west Territories, and in the construction of railways there. I wish to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture the fact that it would be a far wiser policy to take back the land grants of 6,400 acres a mile, and the cash grant of $3,400 a mile with which the Allans have been endowed on the 100 miles west of the 42 miles, and guarantee bonds to the extent of $10,000 a mile to enable them to construct the road. Now, what is the effect on the country of these two policies? In the case of guaranteeing the bonds, the government can take back the 6,400 acres a mile, and I have no hesitation in saying that when the population comes in there that land will be worth $5 an acre. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and all these companies who are holding land grants have sold at an average of $4.50 or $4.80 an acre. The government holds the school lands of the whole of that North-west country at $5 an acre, and will not sell below that figure. The Hudson Bay Company will not sell any of their land at a lower figure, and, therefore with these facts before us it becomes patent to everybody that the lands now held by the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company will become worth, as a cash asset to the company, $5 an acre. Now is it wise for us to dissipate that public asset? In addition to that, there is $3,200,000 a mile cash and there is also the construction of the railway. From the termination of the 43 miles right through to Prince Albert, that road can be built without any difficulty for $10,090 a mile. If by guaranteeing the bonds 100 cents on the dollar can be realized by the sale of them, and if the interest paid by the government, is only 3 per cent, we then are afforded cheap inland transportation. The contract for the road can be let upon a cash basis, and to the lowest tender, and great benefits will accrue, not only to the credit of the country, but to the settlers who will have to supply the traffic in order to maintain those roads. I could not lose the opportunity of impressing my views in regard to this matter, and I hope the Minister of Agriculture will seriously take into consideration the fact that the system we have been pursuing is ruining the country and our credit. We have an illustration of it here before our eyes at the present moment. We see people who have issued and sold bonds to the extent of $15,000 a mile, bearing 6 per cent interest, obliged to forfeit their road. What has been the result to Manitoba and the North-west? It is admitted that per cent interest has been earned upon the $1,800,000 which went into the construction of that 180 miles. The earnings of the road this year over and above expenses amount to $52,000 I think, which is about 3 per cent upon $1,800,000, the money that went into actual construction of the road. So you see the government would have ample security that they would not be called on to pay the 3 per cent guaranteed, and they would have at the back of it a line upon the road itself, and they could set aside this $3,200 per mile and 6,400 acres per mile as assets to relieve the treasury from any possible chance of having to bear the burden of carrying any portion of the road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What about the bill?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am coming to it. I was just going to add that so far as the bondholders are concerned, if they were to attempt to find an outlet over the Canadian Pacific Railway by way of Fleming or Langenburg—points that this branch reaches—Langenburg and Fleming being equally distant from Winnipeg, if they attempted to compete with the Manitoba and North-western Railway by running over the branch that is now in contemplation, they would have to carry the traffic 60 miles further than by an arrangement with the bondholders. If you realize that fact you will see that the bondholders' interests are not likely to be in the least degree affected by the bill before the House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As the member who has charge of the bill, I hope the House will bear with me while I make an observation or two with regard to the merits of the application now before us. I should like to remove any impression which exists in the minds of hon. gentlemen on account of the observations that have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Sarnia. One would fancy, to hear my hon. friend dilate on the iniquity perpetrated on the bondholders and the public generally in reference to this bill, that some dark conspiracy had been hatched at the instance of Messrs. Allan and those responsible for the submission of the bill to parliament. If my hon. friend had such suspicions when the bill came before the Railway Committee in reference to the bondholders not having notice thereof, he might have intimated to the committee that fact. He might have taken the members of the committee into his confidence, and pointed out that the necessary advertisements had not been published, as provided by the rules of the House. I assume that my hon. friend knew very well when he made the statement, that it only appeared in the Canada Gazette that the notice of publication respecting this bill duly appeared in the western newspapers, and that no distinction was made between this particular bill and the dozens of other bills which have come before hon. gentlemen of this House. Between this particular bill and the dozens of other bills which have come before the hon. gentlemen as chairman of the committee and before the railway committee itself, I venture to say that to the very letter the rules and regulations of the House have been complied with in reference to the publication required. My hon. friend pointed out to the House that a piece of deception had been practiced on the bondholders, and that a subterfuge had been adopted by reason of the fact that the application was signed in the name of the solicitors of the company, and not in the name of Messrs. Allan or of the Manitoba and North-west Railway Company. No one knows better than my hon. friend that in reference to all these applications they are made in the name of solicitors on behalf of the company. My hon. friend knows very well, or should know very well, that this application could not very well be made on behalf of a company in liquidation, but was made on behalf of an entirely independent company distinct from the company now in liquidation. I rather enjoyed the solicitude displayed by the hon. gentleman from Halifax and the hon. member from Sarnia, regarding the deep interest which they take in North-west matters. If there are any hon. gentleman in this House that have not been guilty in taking a deep interest in regard to North-west matters, it is those two hon. gentlemen and I further fancy that if those interested in the development of the North-west desired champions of that particular section of the Dominion, the two last hon. gentleman to whom they would apply for assistance in so important a matter would be the the two very hon. gentlemen who have been so enthusiastic in endeavouring to defeat the third reading of this bill. The hon. member from Sarnia expressed the very greatest consideration and esteem for Messrs. Allan and in the next breath he told us that he could not find language strong enough to denounce the swindle and fraud perpetrated on the bondholders by those gentlemen for whom he had expressed so sincere a regard. He has also given us a sermon on lofty principle and the necessity of adopting a high tone of morals in regard to our legislation. When I hear observations of that kind from hon. gentlemen I usually conclude that they are more fortunate than their fellowmen in having a monopoly of those virtues which apparently in reference to this matter have been so very scarce in this honourable House. I regret very much that expressions of this character have been made upon gentlemen so deeply interested in the commercial development of this country as the Messrs. Allan. I, as one from the North-west, knowing that those gentlemen have probably done more than any individual family in the Dominion of Canada in the way of furnishing transportation facilities to the people and particularly of that section through which this road runs—I feel bound to express my deep disapproval of the aspersions made on them in regard to the dishonesty of purpose of which they have been accused in regard to this bill. The high reputation of these men in the country should be the very best refutation of the statements which have been made against them. As to the merits of the bill itself, I may say there are two phases of this bill, first of all, the road itself for which application has been made entirely irrespective of the surrounding circumstances. A road is applied for running at right angles to the Manitoba and North-western Railway. It does not parallel that road, it does not interfere with an existing railway—it proposes to open up a section of country which is entirely undeveloped by transportation facilities, which is one of the very best sections of Manitoba and the North-west, and, forsooth, because these gentlemen, representing the best capitalists of the Dominion of Canada, choose to make application for the opening up of that section of the country, and for the building of a railway, we find hon. gentlemen in this House endeavouring to defeat this enterprise, and taking a very much deeper solicitude in regard to the English bondholders than those bondholders themselves apparently have taken. The honourable gentleman from Sarnia appears to have been in communication with one of these bondholders. I fancy that if those gentlemen in England who advanced their money upon this enterprise were as deeply interested as one is disposed to think they would be, judging from the opposition to this bill manifested by some members of this House, they would have appeared in due time, and expressed their disapproval to the government in reference to the passage of the bill in the House of Commons, but we find the bill coming down from that House duly passed, with the approval, I assume, of the government of the day, because we cannot very well otherwise assume that when a bill passes the House of Commons, but it comes here with the approval of the department of the government which has charge of such legislation. Why were not those bondholders more exercised than they appear to be, and why are hon. gentlemen in this House more exercised than the bondholders themselves? I fail to understand it, except purely for a factious opposition which is unwarranted and which has been shown by reason of its being urged more strongly than many bills have been. I will hazard the observation that the legal firm having the responsibility of opposing this legislation the name of whom we find attached to the circulars on our desks, were perfectly familiar with the fact that application was made to parliament for this legislation. The very best evidence we have that the bondholders were aware of the fact that application was made for legislation is the circular before us, signed by a firm of solicitors occupying the very highest position of legal reputation in the city of Winnipeg and who appear to have been acting most energetically on behalf of the bondholders. Therefore finding these gentlemen here opposing the passage of the bill we have evidence that full notice was given to the bondholders in England.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They had not time to appear before the committee of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then it must have been due to the indifference of these gentlemen. If the rules and regulations of the House had been duly complied with it does not lie in the mouth of hon. gentlemen here to say that any over-indulgence should be extended to parties who had the same notice as others that legislation was being sought. It is a regrettable fact that the same facilities do not prevail here for duly explaining this matter as we have in committee. There full explanation was made in regard to the object sought for and I hope hon. gentlemen will bear with me for a few moments while I make this statement in further explanation of what the applicants desire. The Manitoba and North-western Railway as hon. gentlemen know, is a railway extending probably about 220 or 230 miles of which 180 miles viz., the eastern section, is controlled by these English bondholders. The Messrs. Allan have put into that railway quite as much capital as the English bondholders and absolutely control the 60 miles other than the 180 miles. The English bondholders who control the 180 miles say, "We are not going to allow you to operate the 60 miles which you hold west of the point covered by our mortgage except you submit to the terms which we choose to impose." This is to be observed from this circular which has been distributed on our desks that those English bondholders are playing dog in the manger and would impose such conditions as to render it impossible for the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company to agree to the terms which they demand. I ask hon. gentlemen what are you going to do in regard to a situation of that character? Are you going to say to the Messrs. Allan who own 60 miles of the railway there, "We absolutely refuse to give you the bill which you seek and we are thus going to compel you to allow that 60 miles of railway to lie idle to decay and to be of no use whatever to the public and particularly to the people of that section of the country or accept the alternative of compelling you to submit to the imposition of terms made by those English bondholders in regard to the running powers over 180 miles which in a commercial sense we know is impossible for you, the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company to accept." Now it is simply a common business proposition. If these men are absolutely paralyzed in regard to the operation of the sixty miles of road, then the company labours under a deprivation which is of the most serious character, and which is bound to paralyze to a most injurious extent the development of that section of the country, as well as to absolutely ruin the financial interests which the Messrs. Allan have in that sixty miles. That is one consequence. View some of the other consequences which must necessarily ensue from that. The extension of the Manitoba and North-western Railway to Prince Albert has been long looked for by the people of that section of the country, and I venture the statement that there is no work of such vast importance to that section of the country as the opening up of that immense and fertile tract of country west of the present terminus of that railroad. What do these bondholders say? They say, "Messrs. Allan, we will not participate with you in any way in the extension of this line to Prince Albert. If you want to extend the line to Prince Albert, do so; we are satisfied with our 180 miles of line. We will not, however, give you running powers over that section, furthermore we will not accede to the reorganization of the company so you can build to Prince Albert. We will simply tie up this whole enterprise which has cost this country a very large amount of money in land grants and subsidies—given by the Dominion government and the municipalities." Are you going to assist the bondholders to treat the enterprise in the way which is coolly intimated in this circular which has been left on our desks? I have no hesitation in concluding that the wisdom of this House will assert itself otherwise and will grant the promoters of this bill the franchise which they ask—a franchise which entirely apart from the circumstances of the case as a public work will be of gigantic benefit to that section of the country. I ask hon. gentlemen, is this House hereafter going to adjust the differences which may arise between bondholders and the shareholders of the company? Are we going to engage in this internecine strife which we find being waged between the bondholders and shareholders of the company? If we assume a responsibility of this kind, it then would be useless for these institutions to seek relief or redress in the courts of justice. They will realize that it is only necessary to come before this hon. body and submit the serious difficulties which may arise from time to time to this House in the hope of having them satisfactorily adjusted in lieu of a competent court of justice. The position which I wish to submit to this hon. House is this—that it should not be the prerogative of this House to make inquiry as to the difficulties which may prevail amongst bond-holders and shareholders of a company or among those who constitute a company, but that when legislation is applied for that legislation should be considered entirely upon its merits, entirely apart from the spirit which has animated it and it should be regarded merely in the abstract light of the good of the community and the general advantage of Canada. Apart from that, if we take other matters into consideration we will step outside of that domain which properly belongs to this legislative body and entail upon ourselves a responsibility which would only lead to the greatest complication. I hope hon. gentlemen will regard this matter as one in which the people of the North-west Territories are very deeply interested and will permit the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The bondholders in this case are asking for a very small thing—merely a delay to arrange the difficulties that exist between them and the Messrs. Allan. They do not ask the Senate to adjust their quarrels. The hon. gentleman from Calgary has not put it fairly when he says that they want this House to act as arbitrators. I see a great injustice is being done to the bondholders, and I wish to give them time to adjust their difficulties with the Messrs. Allan. The honourable gentleman let the cat out of the bag in another matter; he has shown that it is not the public interest at all that has led to the idea of building this road. The public interest has nothing to do with it. What they want is a power to hold over the bondholders in England to compel them to do certain things for the Messrs. Allan. It is nothing more or less than that. The hon. gentleman from Monck knows perfectly well that the public interest never came into the matter at all.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What I said was that the public were largely interested in it—that the settlers living on that line have more interest in it than the bondholders or the stockholders. They are striving to get an outlet and we should give them every facility to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The gentleman who represented the company stated the object. It was to place them in a position to tell this company that they must take a certain position. The hon. gentleman from Alma asks what would be the difference if this road were built by Messrs. Allan or by any new company. There is all the difference in the world—all the commercial honesty in the world. The Allans have the money of the mortgagees in England. They used it—perhaps wisely, perhaps not—at all events they have failed in paying back the money or interest upon it, and is it fair to permit them to come forward and destroy the security of those bondholders? I will not call it a swindle, but I say it is not fair or just to prevent those people getting back their own money. For these reasons I think the delay should be granted, and those companies should be given time to come together and adjust their affairs. The hon. gentleman from Kennebec division says we have only to look at the public side of this question. We have to look at the private interests involved and at the morals as well. Those bondholders are not here to look after their own interests; they cannot go round this House lobbying—as lobbying has been done to a very large extent—and are we to place them at a disadvantage? The chief reason given for that lobbying—at least in my own case—was this: They had come to a certain basis of arrangement with the bondholders, and it was broken off, and without this power no agreement could be arrived at. I hope the House will not sanction an act of injustice to the people who loaned their money in good faith to the undertaking.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Being a member of the committee, and voting with the minority there, I have a word to say on the subject. This is not an application for a charter to build a railway: it is an application to give the old company better facilities for conducting the litigation that is now pending between the company and the bondholders. That is practically and honestly what it means. How are those bondholders interested in this legislation? They are interested in this railway as they are interested in scores of railways throughout this country. Canada is under a debt of gratitude to English lenders for the immense amount of money borrowed in the English market. It is doubtful if even this road would have been constructed without their aid, although this company happens to be very wealthy. It is a company which no gentleman—not even the hon. member from Sarnia to whom I have listened with pleasure—has denounced. He had not a word to say against the Allans, or against those gentlemen who are the principal stockholders in this company, neither have I heard a word said in all this discussion against their character and position and standing. How are the stockholders interested, we are asked? They are interested in this road as they have been interested in the Caraquet Railway and in Albert Railway. It had been represented to them that there was a railway in the North-west where there were to be five million of people long before this, and that an investment in that road must certainly pay. How often have such investments turned out to be very poor ones! How often have their bonds become entirely worthless! The London sharpers, the London money-brokers present the case so strongly that they were enabled to procure this money, not from capitalists merely, but from men who, perhaps, have invested their all in these bonds, who have very little to spare and who have been deluded by the representations made, not by the Messrs. Allan but by the money-brokers in London, who made a certain offer upon the bonds perhaps, and have undertaken, possibly to share any surplus they might derive. Their prospectuses are extremely alluring; I have seen them in the London papers, and they are comical reading. I have seen them because I have been interested in them. They have come under my notice, because there have been railways in my province which have been bonded in this way and the bondholders lost their money. They also became interested in this particular line of railway, and why? Not alone on account of the great North-west, represented to be so flourishing, and which I hope finally will meet the expectations of everybody; but they were interested in this particular line on account of the high character and standing of those gentlemen who principally form the stock list of this company. They had three or four different things in connection with this particular road which were calculated to give the agents in London great facilities in plying their business to induce investors to give their money. The men who bought these bonds are not dogs in the manger; they paid somewhere between eighty cents on the dollar and par as was represented in the committee. These bonds are now in a state of depreciation, and the company, consisting of the very individuals who profited by this loan of $2,600,000 drawn from these people is seeking for legislation which will still further impair their value. Allowing for all discount, the company borrowed over $2,000,000, amply sufficient, according to the statement of my hon. friend from Marquette, to build the whole road, 180 miles, and yet they had a mortgaging power of $15,000 or $20,000 a mile. That I think was a mistake made by the legislature at the very beginning: it is another inducement and another lever by which these bonds are made to sell in England. Then the bonds depreciated: the country did not fill up with population as we all hoped it would. The road did not cost forty or fifty or sixty thousand dollars a mile, as such roads do cost in England, where they are substantially built, and where immense land damages have to be paid in addition to the large cost of legislation. It is a road that should have been built for ten or fifteen thousand dollars a mile at the outside. These bonds became depreciated. They are not worth what they paid for them. And the bondholders are looking now to get as much out of them as they can, and yet we are asked to-day to grant a charter which will decrease the value of the bonds. My hon. friend from Calgary, says it is for a road to run at right angles instead of a parallel road. Well, it is not a parallel road or a road at right angles. It is not a road at all and it is not intended to be a road. The passage of this Bill is intended by them to be used as a lever by which the bonds will be further depreciated in the market, so that the old company, if they choose, can purchase them at a still lower rate. Yet those men, from whom we have drawn money, are called dogs in the manger because they object to this legislation. I think it would be injurious to the credit of the country and I hope the bill will not pass until present disputes are adjusted.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I should not think of saying one word at this hour, were it not for the observations of some hon. gentlemen, more particularly the hon. member from Sarnia, because I would be very sorry indeed that it should be thought for a moment that I am in any way indifferent to the honour of my own country, or the reputation for justice and honour of this Senate. We may just as well look this thing squarely in the face. It has been asserted that the only way we should look at the bill before us is simply to consider whether the road, for which the charter is sought, is a road for the benefit of the country and for the benefit of the settlers in that section of Canada. This is, perhaps, one way to look at it, but I have read two statements which have been laid on the Table of the House, one in the interests of these bondholders, and the other, the answer to that statement which was laid upon our Table to-day, made on behalf of Messrs. Allan. I am free to confess that I was very much puzzled at first when the matter was before the committee to decide what was the proper course to take, and when I read that statement on Friday, made on behalf of the bondholders, I was still more perplexed, but upon reflection since, and upon reading this answer which hon. gentlemen have before them to-day, I feel satisfied now for the reasons which I shall give, to record my vote in favour of the bill. As the matter comes before us now, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, to a certain extent, we are called upon to decide as to what is fair and just, and (to use an expression which we have heard two or three times to-day) moral in this House to do, as between the parties applying for the charter and those opposing it. Now, the circumstances of the case, as we have had them stated over and over again, seem to be simply these: here are these English bondholders who have their security on the 180 miles of road upon which they have advanced a very large sum of money, and they look to this 180 miles as their security for that advance. On the other hand, we have the Manitoba and North-western or the Messrs. Allan, whichever you choose to call them, who have spent a large sum of money in pushing forward this enterprise, both for their own interests and also undoubtedly to open a most important section of the country, and ultimately, as we have been told several times, and as the answer states to carry forward, the road to Prince Albert. I think those gentlemen are deserving of both our sympathy and our assistance in the undertaking which they have endeavored to carry through, and in which they have sunk large sums of money, and what they ask us to do simply amounts to this; the English bondholders have refused to assist in the extension of the road to Prince Albert, and the refusal of the charter now asked would prevent the completion of the road to that point. The English bondholders say they will hang on to their security, the 180 miles, but will do nothing more. Is it not fair and just, looking at the amount of money those gentlemen have sunk in the undertaking already, to grant them some measure of relief, and place them in such a position that they may go on with the extension of the road from the termination of the 180 miles to the original objective point, Prince Albert, and so give them some possible chance of recouping themselves ultimately for their large expenditure and also for doing that which I think no hon. gentleman can doubt is in the interests of the country, namely the extension of the road to Prince Albert? It is for these reasons that I have made up my own mind, under the circumstances of the case, to vote for the bill before us.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:—

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

CONSIDERATION OF COMMUNICATION POSTPONED.

The Order of the day having been called "consideration of the communication from certain members of the Standing Committee on Divorce."

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE said: In the absence of the chairman of the Committee I move that this item be deferred until Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why till Thursday?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The chairman is not here, and we do not know when he will be here.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Were it not for the last statement made by the hon. member I would not have any objection to the postponement, but he states that he does not know when the chairman will be here. The paper on the table casts serious aspersions on members of this body, and these aspersions have been spread on the minutes of the House and upon the Debates and have gone broadcast over the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is only right and just to the gentlemen so aspersed that the earliest opportunity should be given for reply. I believe when this matter is before the House I shall be in a position to show that the document on our table is a tissue of inaccuracies—I might use a stronger word—from beginning to end.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say it is unfair that it should be delayed a day longer than necessary for its consideration. If my hon. friend was in a position to say that the chairman of the committee will be here on Thursday, I would not object to its postponement until then, but he has told us that he does not know when he will be here. If it is to be postponed again from Thursday, I say it will be most unjust to the members who have been misrepresented by that document which has been scattered broadcast over the country to be compelled to lie under these aspersions for an indefinite period of time. I, for one, am not willing to consent to anything of the kind. I shall, however, consent that the consideration of that extraordinary document shall be taken up by the House on Thursday with the understanding that it shall not be postponed past that day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The first order on Thursday.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The reason Thursday was specified was simply this: I made a mistake in saying that I did not know whether the chairman would be here on Thursday. It is generally understood that he will be here on Thursday, and therefore, I made the motion that the order be postponed until that day.

The motion was agreed to.

SEDITIONOUS AND UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS AND OATHS BILL.

SECOND READING.

The order of the day being read:—Second Reading (Bill 7) An Act further to amend the tenth chapter of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, respecting Seditious and Unlawful Associations and Oaths.—(Honourable Mr. Power.)

Hon. Mr. POWER said: I am not in charge of this bill; I had it put down for the second reading to-day, simply because no hon. gentleman happened to be present at the time who was interested in it. As I understand this bill it is with respect to the Masonic order. The Revised Statutes now exempt the Grand Lodge of Canada from the operation of the law forbidding secret associations, and since that Act was passed there has been a new Grand Lodge established, the Grand Lodge of Quebec. The object of this bill is to extend the protection of the previous act to the Grand Lodge of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I believe this bill was placed in my hands, and I have overlooked the fact, but the senior member for Halifax has stated the object, which is to make the legislation of Quebec and Ontario uniform. There is no innovation or new power asked. I therefore move the second reading.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—It seems to me that this bill is important enough for us to have explanations, which I do not think we have had.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—All it asks for is the substitution of the word "in" for "of."

The motion was agreed to.

SHORT LINE RAILWAY CO. BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN moved concurrence in the amendment made by the standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (H) "An Act respecting the Short Line Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (79) "An Act to incorporate Gilnour and Hughson Company, Limited." (Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

FEMALE OFFENDERS BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House reserved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (J) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain Female Offenders in the Province of Nova Scotia."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (67) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act." (Hon. Mr. Angers.)

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 18th June, 1895.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill

(56) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited," with amendments. He said: As the bill was introduced, the first clause read to the effect that the sale set out in an indenture between the Nova Scotia Steel and Forge Company, Limited, and the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited, and "registered in the office of the Secretary of State in Canada, etc." The committee thought it was desirable instead of the indenture there referred to being registered in the Secretary of State's office, that it should, for the information of all parties concerned, be attached in the shape of a schedule to the bill itself, so that the only amendment to the bill is that made in the first clause by striking out the words "and registered in the office of the Secretary of State in Canada" and inserting "which indenture is set out in the schedule to this Act." It is duly set out in the shape of a schedule. That is the only amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA IN THE CABINET.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to Call the attention of the Senate to the commercial and financial position of the province of British Columbia, and to other matters; and to ask the Government, if it considers that province entitled to as full a proportionate representation, and to all the other rights and privileges now enjoyed by every other province in the Dominion?

He said:—It is not my intention to make a long address or to place a large array of figures before the House. I prefer to be in harmony with the feeling of the House, knowing they like short speeches. The House will absolve me from the thought of bringing this forward from any personal motive or to gratify any personal ambition. There are many gentlemen in this House who know my feelings and sentiments on the subject to which my inquiry refers, and who are aware that I am not after the flesh pots. I bring this forward on general public grounds. I feel it my duty, at this stage of the history of British Columbia, to lay before parliament a statement showing the unrivalled commercial and financial position of that province. I do this also to show the people of our province that their interests, and their laudable expectations have not been neglected, but have been brought to the attention of parliament and of the government, with a view to an early consummation of such expectations. It is only by comparison that we can arrive at an accurate knowledge of our position; therefore I propose to submit a comparative statement of the commercial and financial transactions of the different provinces of the Dominion—excepting Manitoba which, from its geographical position, cannot form a proper comparison—which will show what we have done during a season of great depression and the possibility of greater things in better times. I take this course also to inform the Government, and to strengthen its hands, in dealing with British Columbia, in removing every disability under which it rests, and in giving that province its full proportionate share and voice in the public administration of the country. On this subject there is a very strong and growing sentiment among the electors of that province. The question is asked, and naturally so—why should the province most loyal to conservative principles, and the largest proportionate contributor to the treasury, be treated unequally and unfairly? It is not my intention to find fault with, or to arraign the government for what has not been done, but rather to give my own opinion and that of the electors of my province as to what should be done, and to express the hope that every shred of dissatisfaction may be removed. I know the Prime Minister likes plain talk, because he likes to talk back plainly, therefore I have less hesitation in stating these matters. I may be told that it is not advisable to recognize provincial divisions in forming an administration, that the best men should be taken regardless of locality. It is too late to say that now, when we find locality—special localities—has so much to do with it. Even in England the three great divisions of the Empire are taken into account in forming a government. Hon. gentlemen will at once see how important it is for a province like ours, of great commercial possibilities to have a voice in the forming of the commercial and fiscal system under which we are governed so far as we are concerned, a cast-iron policy is put in operation in which we have no voice, part or lot, but to hand over our shackles. Is this proper, fair or just? I fully recognize—even if we had a voice—that we must yield cheerfully to the opinion of the majority, yet we would have the satisfaction of having the voice, the power to suggest, and the position in which we could approve, or try to amend a policy. Although the representation of British Columbia in parliament is numerically weak, and not strong enough to enforce its claims as other provinces have enforced and demanded their claims, and perhaps little more than they were entitled to, that is no reason for withholding its just rights, but the reverse. Nothing should be done, or left undone, in the weaker provinces, which could not be done, or left undone in the larger provinces. We know that political favourites or political parasites have from time to time been palmed off on British Columbia as if its own people were incapable: that could not be done in the older provinces. The loyalty of British Columbia to the Conservative administration, and its policy has no parallel in provincial history. Not only the electorate, but the provincial governments of the province have been in harmony with the administration for the last sixteen years, whereas in other provinces it has been the other way. I desire to draw particular attention to this loyalty, and disinterestedness for the general good. No province in the Dominion benefits so little by the present trade policy, and feels the taxation so much as British Columbia, because we manufacture little, and import nearly every article we consume. But we have cheerfully given our support to what has been and is for the general good, and to a policy which keeps wealth and labour in the country which would, under a different policy, flow out of it. The Prime Minister knows this as well as I do, and I hope he will bear in mind such disinterested loyalty when giving consideration to railway subsidies and other matters to which British Columbia is entitled. Although our province is rich in natural resources, yet the out-go or drain for imposts and revenue is so great as to make it impossible for our people to find the capital necessary to open up avenues of communication for the successful development of these resources and their transportation to the markets of the world, and for the occupation and colonization of our public lands. For these reasons we ask and should receive subsidies—a generous return of a portion of our own money. The stimulus thus given to trade would well repay the government for any outlay made in the way I have described. The richest mining district perhaps in the world is calling loudly for railway facilities for the removal of ores and supplies, and any aid given private enterprise to assist in the development of the Kootenay mining region will be well laid out. The Provincial Secretary of British Columbia has recently visited this district of Kootenay and if the House will permit I will read a few extracts from a letter of his which appears in a Victoria newspaper. They are as follows:—

American capital is now being directed to this portion of the Kootenay district as well as to the south-west portion, and we may soon look to equally important results. The large bodies of argentiferous galena on the Mowya Lake have been purchased and are about to be developed. Rich gold quartz leads are reported from near Weaver Creek and up Wild Horse Creek. The mines known as the "Dibble Group," near Fort Steele and Cranbrook, have been purchased, and show bodies of peacock copper and grey copper, assaying very high in silver. Numbers of prospectors are coming in from the American side, and the prospect of the building of the British Columbia Southern Railway in the near future, and the introduction of food and cheap fuel has given a great impetus to the mining industry in both East and South-west Kootenay.

The scene at Pilot Bay is one that should warm the patriotism of any true British Columbian. The extensive smelting and concentrating works are in full blast, working day and night. The bullion from the smelting furnace is literally pouring out during the twenty-four hours, and under the able management of Mr. Gordon, all the machinery and adaptations work without a hitch.

I returned to Pilot Bay that evening by the steamer "Alberta," spent part of the night in watching the smelting operations, and the next morning Messrs. Herrick & Gordon kindly placed their steamer at my disposal and accompanied me to the Blue Bell mine. This is the principal source of supply of ore to the smelter, and is owned principally by Mr. Hendryx. It is, probably, one of the largest bodies of ore in the world. It is composed of carbonate of lead, galena and copper, the total width of the vein being 193 feet—namely, carbonate, 100 feet; galena, 87 feet, and copper, 6 feet, the copper being between the carbonate and galena. Five thousand tons of ore were taken out in one month by forty men, and the average daily output is now 180 tons, with thirty-eight men, all told. The outcrop of the season can be traced for a distance of a mile and a half, and it shows nearly the same body of ore. The mine has not been proved much more than 100 feet below the surface, and although it is of low grade, averaging only about ten ounces of silver to the ton, it is impossible to say what discoveries may be made with greater depth. A diamond drill is about to be put in operation, in order to lay out the mine in depth and width.

The Silver King is probably destined to be one of the great wealth producers of British Columbia. It may be described as a great dyke of diorite protruding through shale which contains within its matrix chimneys of copper and silver ores, with iron pyrites. The copper is found as pyrites or cooleopyrites, and also as peacock copper, the latter being richest in silver. There is also grey copper in places and silver glance, which gives great richness to certain bodies of the ore. From 10 to 15 per cent of the general body of the ore averages when picked 100 ounces of silver and 15 per cent of copper to the ton. There are about 100,000 tons of ore in sight, which, taking it as a whole, would average 55 ounces of silver and 10 per cent of copper to the ton. Some 3,420 feet of tunnels and drifts have been made. One tunnel has been driven straight for 918 feet; it struck the body of ore about 400 feet and has been running in ore ever since. Four winzes have been sunk, respectively 90, 70, 70 and 125 feet, exposing the ore. Borings are now being made with an inch diamond drill, so as to feel the way ahead and below and thus lay out the direction and volume of the ore. The width of the diorite varies from 70 to 10 feet, and in 70 feet width 40 feet contains ore.

Our wealth of fish, timber and coal is too well known for me to direct attention to it now. Our exports show what they are. I fully understand, and am fully aware of the fact, that the younger and smaller provinces coming into the federation without the safeguard of written stipulations of their rights, are placed at a disadvantage compared with the older and more populous provinces. I am also fully conscious of the tendency to keep the smaller provinces in leading strings "as hewers of wood, and drawers of water" not from any designing intent on the part of the government of the day, but more from indifference mixed with some selfishness. I think I shall be able to show the government and this House that the time has come when British Columbia should no longer be kept in leading strings, but should be given its legitimate place in the government of the country. The Premier instating his reasons for giving Prince Edward Island representation in his Cabinet, said it was on account of distance. If that holds good in the case of that province, how much more should it do so in the case of British Columbia, which is 1,800 miles more distant from the capital? I will now endeavour to show what the provinces have done in the way of trade and revenue for the fiscal year ending June, 1894, and in doing so, hon. gentlemen will understand that comparisons must be made, but I can assure the House I have no intention to hurt any ones feelings, or intentionally make any invidious comparison. I consider the provinces which are self-sustaining, with an abundance of the necessaries of life, and pay the smallest contribution to the revenue, are in a better position in some ways than those otherwise situated. I will deal first with the province of Ontario:

With regard to the imports of Prince Edward Island, no doubt a great portion of the goods consumed there are entered in other ports of the Dominion and it is only just that $500,000 should be added to the imports of that province to make it what it should be.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How does the the hon. gentleman arrive at the estimate of what should be added?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I arrive at it in this way: our own province has very nearly the same population, and I estimate that we get from the other provinces between $500,000 and $750,000 worth of goods on which duty is paid at ports outside of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the estimate is very much too low in the case of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Then the hon. gentleman thinks they should have credit for more than $500,000.?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, I do.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I am perfectly willing to allow the rate paid by the eastern provinces, $6 per head. The figures which I find in the blue-book show that the revenue collected in Prince Edward Island is only $2.29 per head, but on a liberal estimate let us make it $6 per head. I think it is a very good position to be in to pay a small amount of revenue. The people of the Island can keep the money in their own pockets instead of paying it over to the government. I now come to the province of British Columbia.

As it would manifestly be fair to add about $500,000 to the imports of Prince Edward Island for goods consumed in that province on which the duty has been paid in other provinces, so would it be fair and proper to add to the imports of British Columbia a like amount for goods, and products taken into that province from other provinces and the North-west. With regard to the exports of British Columbia, the volume is so large that some hon. gentlemen might think that credit was given it, and its exports increased, by the products of other provinces shipped at the Port of Vancouver for Japan, China and Australia, and I confess to having thought so myself, but I have proved by investigation that such is not the case, and that the goods from eastern provinces shipped at Vancouver are credited to those provinces, and not to British Columbia. I cannot allow these figures to pass without mentioning the thoughts which came into my mind when finishing the figures as a commentary on free trade as it is in England versus protection in Canada. The population of Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia—these four provinces—is very nearly the same as that of Scotland, but the difference in their contributions to the public revenue of their respective governments is very marked, and very great. The four provinces which I have named contribute about $25,624,212, whereas Scotland, under a free trade system, contributes about $55,000,000, more than twice the contribution of these provinces. I merely mention this to show the fallacy of free trade. I will now group the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and compare their aggregate trade and revenue with that of British Columbia. In this statement I have given Ontario credit for its proportional share of the tonnage previously credited to the maritime provinces and Quebec. I will first take tonnage inward and outwards; the per capita for these five provinces is 1½ tons as against 18½ tons per capita for British Columbia. It no doubt will be said that all this tonnage is not for British Columbia. I admit that goods are landed at our ports in transit for other places, but this is the case also with regard to tonnage to Quebec and the Maritime Province. They carry goods in transit for other places, but the fact remains that the tonnage as stated come to these different ports in the several provinces. The imports of these five provinces show the amount per capita to be $25.88½—as against $53.23 per capita for British Columbia. The exports of these five provinces show the amount per capita to be $24, as against $82 per capita for British Columbia. The revenue of these five provinces per capita is $6.09, as against $17.31 for British Columbia, which shows that our province has contributed nearly three times as much revenue per head as the other provinces. New Brunswick, with three times our population, contributed to the revenue $1,524,478, whereas British Columbia contributes $1,706,090. Our imports are about $200,000, and our exports about $1,500,000 larger than those of that province. I will take another item of revenue about which there can be no mistake, as to its being paid exclusively by the province to which it is credited. I refer to the post office revenue. Prince Edward Island contributed $39,196; British Columbia contributed $135,554, or about $96,358 more under the head above. New Brunswick with three times the population of British Columbia paid commissions on money orders $7,074; Prince Edward Island on the same account, $1,289; British Columbia for the same account paid $9,439—more than those two provinces together—with a population four times greater. I ask

hon. gentlemen have I not proved my contention that we are beyond the stage of leading-strings, and stand in an unrivalled position. I will now ask the question of which I have given notice.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am not going to make a speech. I am very much pleased with the way in which my hon. friend has brought this matter before us, but I want to emphasize a little what he said about Nova Scotia. Notwithstanding the laudations of his own province, he most conclusively shows by his figures, I contend, that Nova Scotia is the banner province of Canada. According to what my hon. friend shows, it has a registered sea-going tonnage employed in carrying cargo to and from Nova Scotia greater than that of any other province. We have about one-third of the carrying trade of the whole of Canada; per capita we have 5½ tons. As far as is possible we should obliterate provincialism, and do justice to all on the broadest ground possible. I hope the Premier, in considering the interests of British Columbia and what should be done for that province, will not forget Nova Scotia, because, after all, it is still the most important part of the Dominion, but we look for nothing but what is in the interest of all Canada.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should like to have some information which is in keeping with the matter brought before us. The hon. gentleman wishes to have a minister from British Columbia. I understand that the members without portfolio have to pay their own travelling expenses. In Nova Scotia a very large sum is paid by the ministers without portfolio when they come to Ottawa. If you grant the hon. gentleman his request, it will ruin the member who is appointed to the ministry. When you ask a man who lives in British Columbia to be a minister without portfolio, the minister with portfolio must feel very uncomfortable in seeing a minister without portfolio doing the same work as they, not only without remuneration, but with great expense to themselves of both time and money. This I understand to be the case of the hon. gentleman who is Minister from Prince Edward Island without portfolio. I should like very much to know from the hon. member from British Columbia whether he would have to pay his own travelling expenses when he came here if he were appointed a minister without portfolio.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I have some sympathy for my hon. friend who has introduced this matter to the Senate, and agree with him that the outlying provinces of this Dominion, have not had an opportunity of presenting their claims in a way that they should have. Coming as I do from the smallest province, in the Dominion, one of the outlying provinces, I have to compliment the government on taking a new departure and extending to Prince Edward Island representation in the Cabinet of the day, although I am not at all satisfied with the position that that hon. gentleman occupies. He is a representative farmer in this Dominion, not by any means very wealthy, and as a member of the government without portfolio, he has no allowance for his travelling expenses or for a private secretary to do his work, of which I believe he is today doing personally as much as any member of the administration. I hope the day is not far distant when the government will see their way clear to taking a better position in that regard. I do not think, myself, that the Premier should be held to hard and fast lines in forming his cabinet and compelled to take members of the government from every province of the Dominion. Circumstances may happen where it is impossible to take a man from a province on every occasion, but, where the circumstances are favourable, the interests of the outlying provinces should be especially taken into consideration. It is well known that the provinces of Quebec and Ontario are very favourably situated in this regard. Here we have the parliament buildings on the boundary between these two provinces, and it is not so necessary to have a number of portfolios held by representatives of those two provinces as it is to have entrusted to representatives from the far distant provinces of British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and also Newfoundland when she comes into the Dominion, which I hope will be before long.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—What about the Territories?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And the Territories also as soon as the government see their way to admit them. It must be obvious that members of the government who live at or near the capital, cannot possibly understand the wants and desires, the interests and necessities of distant provinces like Prince Edward Island. As men who live in those communities do—men brought up in them and having their interests in touch with the people living in those outlying provinces. I know that Prince Edward Island has suffered immensely during the last fifteen or twenty years for want of representation. The cabinet, not for want of a disposition on the part of the government to do justice to all parts of the Dominion, but from actual lack of knowledge, not being in touch with the people there to know their wants and requirements. It would be but fair to these outlying provinces where the circumstances warrant it and where they have men of ability and standing in sympathy with the government of the day that they should have at least one of the portfolios: not that I would take away any of the influence from Quebec or from Ontario, because we know their influence will be paramount in this Dominion for many years to come, at all events, but we know that in these larger provinces there are many men to whom the salary connected with a portfolio is no object whatever—millionaires who, from their long experience and perfect knowledge of public affairs, would be of great assistance and benefit to the government of the day and who would not care to be harassed with the worry and responsibilities of a department. These men, both from Quebec and Ontario, would be of very great assistance to any government, while the portfolios might be given to those living in the outlying provinces whereby they would have sufficient to pay the expenses naturally connected with representation at the seat of government. I wish to make one or two remarks in reference to the comparison which my hon. friend from British Columbia has brought before the Senate on the present occasion. So far as the revenue is concerned the tables that he has read do not in any way fairly represent the importations of the several provinces. In Prince Edward Island, for instance, we import very little now from abroad. The national policy was designed to stimulate inter-provincial trade. Before confederation almost all our importations of foreign goods—goods that we did not manufacture ourselves—we imported from Great Britain. To-day they are almost entirely imported from Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Halifax and St. John. With respect to the goods that we imported from England, the merchants of Prince Edward Island doing a small country business but a very general business in all kind of merchandise, find their requirements so small in any one line that it is more advantageous for them to purchase from the wholesale merchants in the large cities than to import directly themselves. Consequently our receipts from the customs house show a very small sum indeed. If you will take up the statistics and census returns you will find that the people of Prince Edward Island, about 109,000, will compare favourably as consumers with 109,000 people in any portion of this Dominion, I am satisfied that they consume imported goods equally with the same number of people in any of the provinces. I do not wish to make a long speech on the present occasion, but merely to show that we are in a position to consume, and do consume, as large a proportion of imported goods as any other part of the Dominion. The argument of the hon. gentleman in that regard does not bear out the real facts of the case, and does not effect the claim which he has set up, of fair representation for British Columbia in the cabinet. I will make one remark further in reference to the policy of the government. I believe the country can adopt no policy which would be better suited to the development of this country than the encouragement of the mining and manufacturing industry such as has been going on for some time past. I believe our mines are second to none in the world. We have any amount of nickle, iron, gold and silver, and if we can induce people to come into this country to develop these resources, we will be continually making a home market for our farmers. In my opinion these industries should be so encouraged and promoted that they may keep pace with the increased farming population. A good deal has been said with reference to shipping. We know that the wooden ships are being rapidly displaced to-day by iron ships, that the sails are being displaced by steam; and there is no reason in the world, if we have the coal and iron and nickel in this country, why the great ship-building industry that used to exist in Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to a certain extent, should not be largely supplemented by iron works, by large ship-building establishments for iron ships and steamships, the same as they have in the old country. That should be our goal. And when we get the iron from our iron mines, and manufacture it into a valuable product, and ship-building is introduced for the construction of iron ships propelled by steam, in place of sails, this country will progress more rapidly in the future even than it has in the past. One word in reference to the comparison which the hon. gentleman has made of the revenue derived from the people of British Columbia as compared with that contributed by the people of Prince Edward Island. I read from the report that was made by a delegation that went to England some years ago from Prince Edward Island to represent the claims of our province before the home government. It was argued in the presence of and with Sir Charles Tupper in 1886 :

The difficulty of arriving at an absolutely correct calculation of the amount of dutiable goods which the people of Prince Edward Island consume cannot fail to be appreciated, yet the undersigned submit that there are several methods by which it may fairly be estimated. It must be premised that the people of the island are very large consumers of dutiable goods for the reason that, being chiefly engaged in agriculture and fishing, their manufactures are very small as compared with the rest of Canada, valuing, according to the last census returns, only $31.33 per head to $72.63 per head of the other provinces.

In proof of the assertion that the people of the island are principally engaged in agriculture and fishing, the undersigned would again advert to the census returns of 1881, which show that (the Northwest Territories not being included) :

One-half the area of Prince Edward Island is cultivated.

Only one-twenty-fifth of the other provinces is cultivated.

Prince Edward Island has a population of 51 to the square mile.

The other provinces only 4.72.

Prince Edward Island owns 55 live stock for every 100 acres of improved land ; the other provinces only 33.

In field products Prince Edward Island raises to the acre of improved land 108½ bushels ; the other provinces 61½ bushels.

From the fisheries Prince Edward Island produces $17.08 per head value ; the other provinces, $3.55.

The people of the island are generally in comfortable circumstances, in proof of which may be adduced the amount of deposits per head in the savings banks, which average $16.59 for the island against $7.66 for the rest of the Dominion.

These figures clearly prove that the people of Prince Edward Island, from the fact of their not being extensive manufacturers, are under the necessity of using imported goods to a large extent, while the fertility of their soil, the value of their fisheries, and their general independence, demonstrate their ability to purchase. This being understood, the undersigned submits the following calculations, designed to show that the import of dutiable goods into the island are very much larger than suggested by the Committee of Council, and consequently the contributions to the revenue proportionately greater.

I do not think I need go further to show that the calculation made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria is misleading and scarcely fair to any of the provinces. I trust that the advocacy of the proposition made by the hon. gentleman of British Columbia will not be lost upon the government and when the opportunity offers that all the outlying provinces will be fairly regarded and their claims fairly taken into consideration and that they will be represented in the government by suitable men.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I feel that I ought not to allow this motion to pass without offering a few remarks, especially in reply to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. He casts a doubt on the accuracy of the figures presented by my hon. friend from Victoria, and claims that the duty on a very large percentage of the goods consumed by the people of his province is not paid in Prince Edward Island but in other provinces. I admit that that is correct to a very great extent, yet I can assure that hon. gentleman and this House that probably the duty on a larger percentage of goods consumed in the province of British Columbia, is paid in the eastern provinces than is the case in Prince Edward Island. He also claims that the amount per capita paid into the Dominion treasury is as large in his province. I have endeavoured on more than one occasion to explain to this House how it is that the small population that we have in British Columbia contributes such enormous sums to the Dominion treasury, I will repeat the explanation now. In the first place, our population is largely composed of male adults, engaged in different enterprises that enable them to be large importers of foreign goods. I admit that in respect to the fishing industry, the province of Prince Edward Island and British Columbia are on a par, but it is the only respect in which that can be said. We are largely engaged in lumbering, Prince Edward Island is not a lumbering province. We are largely engaged in mining—in coal, silver and gold mining. The province of Prince Edward Island unfortunately has no such industry. I may also say that the proportion of males being so much greater in British Columbia than in the province of Prince Edward Island, or any of the sister provinces, the percentage that we contribute to the Dominion treasury is necessarily from three to four, and in some instances six times, as great as that in the sister provinces.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Are not the females the most expensive part of the family?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In some cases they are undoubtedly the most expensive, but unfortunately we have nothing like the same female population that the sister provinces have. The hon. gentleman and this House must be convinced that whatever claim there may be in the contention he put forward that a great deal of the duty on the goods consumed in Prince Edward Island is paid in other provinces and credited to other provinces, I will call attention to the fact that the exports of our province were over eight millions of dollars last year, while the exports of Prince Edward Island were about one million and a quarter. I find again that in the Post Office Department referred to—and very properly referred to—by my hon. friend who has introduced this subject, that we are contributing no less than $135,000, while the province from which my hon. friend hails contributes $29,000. We contribute over $96,000 more than that province, though we have probably a less population. That will give an idea, and will probably convince even the hon. gentleman himself of the character of the business in which the people of British Columbia are engaged, in order to create such a large correspondence and to pay such an enormous sum to the Post Office Department. I am not going to detain the House any longer on this subject, because it has been so well and ably presented by my hon. colleague, but I can assure this House, that the people of British Columbia are not satisfied, neither will they be satisfied unless they have what they are justly entitled to, namely a portfolio—not merely a member having a seat in the cabinet, but a member holding a portfolio. It is utterly impossible, as has been stated by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, that people from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, ministers who probably have never been even in those western provinces, can intelligently legislate and enact laws and measures by which these different portions of the Dominion can be well and successfully governed. The conditions in British Columbia are different from what they are here, and even more different from what they are in Prince Edward Island. While I am delighted to see every political division in the eastern part of this country represented in the cabinet, yet I claim that the maritime provinces ought to be taken as a whole. In Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there is very little variation in the conditions, and representation should be given them as a group, but the North-west Territories and British Columbia should remain no longer without a representative in the cabinet. It is a downright shame to leave them unrepresented, and I can assure you the people will not submit to it any longer. That is pretty strong language to make use of, but I can tell hon. gentlemen that such a feeling exists in British Columbia, that they will not submit to it, and probably when another election takes place this House and the government will realize the fact. I care not, as I said before, whether it is a liberal or a conservative government is in power, we want to have a representative in the cabinet that we can hold responsible, and that we can appeal to, and see that he carries out or tries to carry out what is in the best interest of that distant province. That is the object we have in view. I feel it; every British Columbian feels, no matter whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative, that we have been badly used, and I would caution the Premier who is here now to immediately, or within a very short time, appoint my hon. colleague to a position in the cabinet to which he is justly entitled. It has been suggested to me, and I may mention it to the House, that the hon. gentleman who has introduced this subject referred to the very reason why we have not had a member in the cabinet long before now, namely, that they have been too loyal to the government of the day, and not sufficiently loyal to their province. There is a limit to that loyalty, but in order to obviate any more difficulties in that direction, I hope the hon. Premier will immediately give my worthy colleague from Victoria a seat in the cabinet.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No personal allusions please.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The question brought before the Senate by the hon. member from Victoria is one of no little importance, when considered in its broadest sense as affecting the whole Dominion. I may say, however, at the outset, that I hope the day is not far distant when the question of the locality from which any hon. gentleman hails will no longer be considered a qualification either for a portfolio in the government, or as fitting him for a position as an adviser of the Crown, whether having a portfolio or not. I am looking forward to the early extinction of those sectional differences which have existed, but are fast, I am happy to say dying out, since confederation. I do not want to be understood as either advocating or suggesting that any portion of the Dominion should not be represented in the cabinet, everything being equal; but I repeat, that the policy of the present Government has been, not only to do justice to every section of Canada, so far as it has been possible for them to meet the wishes of the different localities, but at the same time to ignore the idea of the particular province or locality from which any individual came being a qualification for appointment either to this House or to the cabinet. While I say that, I repeat now, publicly, what I have stated to members from British Columbia since I have had the responsibility thrown upon my shoulders of being at the head of the government: I hope the time is not far distant when every part of Canada—not because it is a province—should have a representative in the cabinet. In admitting that, I have called attention to this important fact also, that at Confederation certain provisions were made for the representation of Quebec, Ontario and the Maritime provinces. Since Confederation that compact has been carried out as far as possible. Quebec has never lost one of its representatives at the council board. In 1878, New Brunswick was deprived of one of its representatives, Nova Scotia retaining the number given to it at the time of the union. Prince Edward Island was given representation in the Cabinet in the person of the late Hon. J. C. Pope, and Sir Leonard Tilley was the only representative of New Brunswick. Since that time, Manitoba and the North-west Territories have been given representation and Ontario, the largest province in Canada—speaking financially, if I were to adopt the principle which has been advocated by the hon. gentleman from Victoria, it pays the largest amount into the revenue—has been deprived of one of its representatives; but compensation followed as suggested by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. There were gentlemen in Ontario who were willing to accept positions in the cabinet without portfolio. It was a matter of pride to them and it was a great advantage to the province to have their advice and assistance in the administration of the country. This is the first time I have heard that in England, in the formation of any government, the question has ever been considered whether a public man lived in England, in Scotland or in Ireland. We have had viceroys sent to Ireland who were Scotchmen and Englishmen. On some occasions they have been Irishmen—the late Lord Londonderry, for instance. So it has been in the distribution of the different cabinet offices in England—the question of nationality or race, and I am glad to say of religion either at the present day, has never interfered with the calling to the councils of the nation a man fitted for any position, and I hope the day is far distant when a man's race or creed or place of residence will be considered in England a qualification for any position under the Crown. Let us endeavour in this country to follow the example of the old land, and declare that fitness for the position, and experience and ability to administer the affairs of the country, shall be the only recommendations for positions in the cabinet. While I lay that down as a general principle, it is impossible to ignore the fact that a man resident in any distant portion of this Dominion is better qualified to discuss the real wants of that particular locality than a man living 2,000 or 3,000 miles away from it. The same difficulty which we labour under here has been experienced in the United States. The cabinet there is much smaller than ours, and yet the same diversity of interest exists in that great nation as in our smaller Dominion. In the allotment of the different offices, while their system is quite different to that under which we are governed, they have as a rule taken the men who have rendered the best party services as being best qualified to assist in the administration of affairs.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman says hear, hear, and laughs. Should the country ever be unfortunate enough to bring the hon. gentleman's party into power, I am sure they will not forget that cardinal principle; and British Columbia ought to be satisfied with the fact that she has such a representative as the hon. gentleman from New Westminster to look after her interests. That would be some compensation for the great losses which my hon. friend from Victoria claims she has suffered. I do not know that it would be profitable for me to inquire into, or discuss the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that the other provinces have been sufficiently powerful to enforce their rights, inferring that if they were not powerful numerically their rights would not be conceded. That is the only logical conclusion at which I can arrive from the hon. gentleman's assertion. I venture to say, and long experience has taught it to me, that the smaller provinces—not the smallest, territorially, but the smallest in representation—such as the North-west Territory, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, can combine together and make demands just as earnestly and effectually as they do in Ontario and of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—More so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am only putting them on a par. Experience has taught me that they do not lack either the energy or the determination to impress upon the members of the government their wants and necessities, and I hesitate not to say that they receive in as great a proportion as do the larger provinces. An expression fell from the lips of my hon. friend from Victoria, which I regret. He said that political favourites, parasites, were sent from the older provinces to occupy positions in the newer ones. When we reflect for a moment that many of those provinces, so far as the Dominion is concerned, are comparatively young—as they themselves say, new—it has been found convenient and necessary in the past to send gentlemen from the older provinces to occupy different positions. That has been done by political parties, I admit. British Columbia had an Ontario man sent out for governor. I have a recollection of but one—I may be wrong—and that was Mr. Richards, who was sent out as governor of that province. If there have been others they escape my mind at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Mr. Richards was a resident of British Columbia for about a year before he was appointed governor.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not going into the history of how long he was there or why he was appointed to fill that position. The fact is, he was a Canadian, and British Columbia was a portion of Canada. I know a good deal of fault is found because the present governor was appointed to occupy that high and important position in British Columbia. We all know, who know anything of the history of the government of the country, that Mr. Dewdney was as much a British Columbian as any man who lives there to-day. He had lived there the greater portion of his life, had pursued his vocation in that province, and knew, I venture the assertion, as much of its wants and capabilities and resources as any man in the Dominion of Canada. It may be that the North-west Territories would have some cause of complaint on the ground of his being appointed governor of that part of Canada, but from what I know of his administration, he performed his duties well, and was very acceptable to the people whom he governed for the time being. I do not desire to prolong this debate, but I hope my hon. friend from Victoria will forgive me when I state that, in my humble judgment, the charge he brings against the administration of not looking after and to the interests of British Columbia, is not well founded. We have been paying for years large subsidies for steamship services on the Pacific, in order to cultivate a trade between the older lands and our own. While we have been paying towards the development of trade with the Spanish Antilles, the West Indies and other portions of the world in order to bring trade to the maritime provinces as much as possible, have we forgotten the Pacific Coast in the pursuance of that policy? We are paying a large subsidy to-day to build up a trade between Canada and Japan and China.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Why do you not have those steamers call at Victoria as well?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had more municipal politics eradicated from that massive brain of his, he would have been able to comprehend what I was saying without interrupting me. I say in looking after the interests of the whole Dominion, we first subsidized the magnificent line of steamships to develop—and it is developing to as rapid an extent as could have been anticipated—the trade between China and Japan and the Pacific Coast of Canada, in order that British Columbia should not be in a position to say that we were spending the money of this Dominion to develop trade in the east and forgetting altogether trade in the west. We are paying now $125,000 annually towards a steamship line to develop trade between the Australasian colonies and British Columbia, and in that instance, where I had something to say in connection with the contract, I stipulated that they should call at Victoria. I knew the complaints that had been made in connection with the other steamers, and was desirous that as many sections as possible of the British Columbian coast should receive a proportionate benefit from the establishment of that line. I took care that Victoria, the capital of the country, the most important city in the whole province, should not be overlooked. I do not know that I should have referred to this, had not the hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the Japan and China steamers do not stop there. To the results of that policy I am looking forward with a good deal of expectation, because it has been somewhat of a hobby of mine, with me, as my colleagues know, that Canada shall be made the great highway of the world. I trust the time may not be far distant when the popular route around the globe will be by the fast Atlantic steamship vessels, equal to any of the greyhounds that are now ploughing the sea between England and New York, and across this continent to British Columbia and thence by our own steamship lines to the far east. Experience has shown that as you can draw passenger traffic, and particularly that class of passengers who travel for pleasure, just in proportion to their numbers is the expenditure in the countries through which they travel. Have we forgotten, so far as the revenue of the country would justify, the railway enterprise of British Columbia? I know that when we have mentioned in the past, the millions spent in connecting the Pacific Coast with the eastern portion of the Dominion, we have been told "Oh, that was for your own benefit; that was for the benefit of the east." I admit that it was to some extent, but was it not just as great an advantage to the British Columbians as it was to those who live in Ontario and on the Atlantic Coast?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, certainly it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I go further, and say had it not been for the union of British Columbia with the older provinces, and the expenditure of that enormous amount of money in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, you would not be today in as prosperous a condition as you are, nor would you be collecting that enormous amount of revenue which you now boast of contributing and for which you say you do not receive a full return from the expenditure of the country. We have also to the fullest extent of our revenue subsidized lines running into the mining districts of British Columbia, and strange to say the only man out of the 84 members of the Senate who objected to a subsidy to a road intended to run into that rich mining section to which the hon. gentleman has referred, was a British Columbian; yet we find the very same gentleman rising to-day and telling us that we do not do them justice. When we offered to spend the money of the Dominion—theirs just as much as ours—in the opening up and bringing to the markets of the world the great wealth of the Kootenay district, we found a British Columbian solemnly protesting against assisting a line to enable the miners in those mountainous districts to carry out the natural wealth of the country. In saying that, I do not wish it to be understood that I refer to the hon. gentleman who brought this question before the House.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman mention the man who did oppose it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I mean you.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That statement is incorrect. I never opposed any grant or aid, or assistance to a road to open up any one portion of British Columbia. If the hon. gentleman has reference to a bill that was before the House last year, that was creating a monopoly by which the Canadian Pacific Railway—because it was a Canadian Pacific Railway branch—would not allow any other road to be built within 15 or 20 miles of that line. I objected to granting such extraordinary powers, but so far as opposing a subsidy to any road in British Columbia, that statement is incorrect, and I am certain that the Premier must have misunderstood the discussion last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman must certainly have forgotten—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I have not forgotten.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Dominion subsidized a road to connect the Kootenay River, just below Nelson, with the Columbia River. Mines were discovered some distance to the north, and it was necessary to run a road from the foot of Arrow lake into the interior in order to reach those rich mines, and when that question came before the House the only opposition it met with, no matter for what reason, was from the hon. member from New Westminster, and the records will show that the statement I make is quite correct. The hon. gentleman says that it was because the bill was granting a monopoly—a monopoly, forsooth! Who would attempt to run a road into those mountains unless they expected to derive some benefit from it? But no road that has been built into that section of country can have a monopoly when the traffic requires a competing line. I need not mention all the roads to which we have given aid to open up the different sections of that country; we have gone as far as the revenues of the country would justify at the time. I hope that you may have a road running into the Cariboo mines ere long, in order that they may be opened up with the other portions of the country. I readily admit the great wealth of that section and that its resources are such as would justify almost any expenditure that might be necessary to develop and open it up. I must take exception, before I sit down, not to the figures which the hon. gentleman has given to the House, because, I believe they are strictly accurate, but to the deductions and the inferences which he draws from them. Some few years ago, when in the lower House, a somewhat similar question was discussed, an attack was made on the government and an attempt made to prove that the national policy had not increased the exportation of manufactures and other goods to the extent that had been anticipated. Looking at the trade returns of the maritime provinces, I found that the dutiable imports were between 14 and 15 millions of dollars less than before they came into confederation, but did that prove that these people were any poorer? Did it prove that Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick had deteriorated, or gone back, or were not wealthier to-day than when they came into the Dominion? For answer you had only to look at the quantity of goods sent from Quebec, Montreal and other portions of the Dominion into those provinces to supply the place of the very articles that they used to import from England. Take the importations into Prince Edward Island alone: The year before she came into confederation, she imported and paid duty on goods to the value of $1,372,500. That was in 1872. In 1894 she had decreased about one hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollars in her imports, but that is no evidence that she did not consume goods upon which duty had been paid in other portions of the province. We all know that the importations into the province of Quebec, which give her apparently, from the figures, so large a proportionate amount of duties paid into the Dominion—not so much to-day as it was ten or fifteen years ago—are not consumed in that province. Montreal, the head of ocean navigation, is in that province. Thirty years ago we had scarcely any large importing houses in the province of Ontario, and the consequence was that the goods used to be imported, entered, duty paid in Montreal, and then sent on to the western country, as is done now to a large extent into Manitoba and the North-west Territories; so that if we were to take what Quebec pays per head on her imports, we would be led to believe that she pays more than any other portion of the Dominion. Take the North-west to-day; the returns from customs on importations last year was about eleven thousand dollars; yet we know that the North-west has a population that consumes largely of imported and home manufactured goods. To say that these people do not consume as much as other provinces where agricultural pursuits are followed to a large extent, would be to do them an injustice. And it is the same with all the other provinces. The people of British Columbia do not devote time and attention to those industries which produce all that is necessary for their sustenance. Their industries, as has been very properly pointed out, consist in mining, lumbering, fishing and other pursuits which do not meet their wants to the same extent as do the productions of the other provinces, and hence their importation is much larger. The same remarks, arguments and statements may be applied with equal force to the tonnage. Of course, Ontario could not expect to have that tonnage, unless it is inland tonnage, because it is furnished with the goods which are imported from abroad by ships whose tonnage is entered in the maritime provinces, on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic. Now, as for representation in the two Houses, British Columbia certainly stands in as favourable a position as the other and smaller provinces. We all know that at the Union the representation was based upon the unit of 65 for Quebec, but British Columbia was shrewd enough to make a provision, when it came into the Dominion, that it should have six representatives no matter how small the population might be. Prince Edward Island did not take that precaution, and consequently in the redistribution of the representation a few years ago, the little island lost one of its representatives, although it had a larger population than British Columbia has to-day. British Columbia has six and Prince Edward Island only five. I am finding no fault with that, because when you take the population, including the Indians, of British Columbia we find it is about 98,000, giving about 16,333 of a population to each representative; while Prince Edward Island has over 21,600 to each. I merely give that to show that in this particular at least, British Columbia has an equal representation with other sections of the Dominion. As to the post office receipts, I venture to say that if any one will examine them, it will be found that in new sections of the country, the settlers have a larger correspondence with their friends whom they have left than have the people in the older provinces. Hence, the postal revenues of a new province, and particularly a business province like British Columbia, and of the Northwest Territories, are larger in proportion than in the older settlements. It is quite true also that the difficulties in reaching the outposts in those new countries, sparsely settled as many of them are, render it more costly to carry the mail. Hence, it is no argument to say that because it costs so much more to send your mail matter in these new provinces, that they are getting more than their share; but quite the contrary. The conclusion at which my hon. friend arrived was that, considering the importance of British Columbia, they should have a representative in the Cabinet. The junior member for Halifax referred to positions in the Cabinet without portfolio, and he pointed out what is quite true, that in an extensive country like this if a gentleman like my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has a seat in the cabinet without portfolio, it involves a good deal of expense. There is much force in what the hon. gentleman says, and it is a question whether that should not be remedied in some way. I can only say, in closing my remarks, that I hope there will be no cause for complaint in future, and when it can be done, consistently with the interest of the government of the country and consistently with the interests of the different sections of the Dominion, every section should be represented in one way or another. But I wish the House to reflect for a moment upon the difficulty, in the formation of any government, of turning men out who have been in the cabinet for a length of time in order to make room for others. Somebody must make way, unless we carry out the other suggestion which was made, of creating a few more portfolios. That would be the easiest way to do it, but I am sure that were my hon. friend the junior member from Halifax, in the government, he would find by the time he met all the demands of parliament, he would come out of it poorer than he went in. I was going to add that I think there is one gentleman who has had some experience in that matter who will agree with me upon this point more than upon any other utterance I can make on behalf of the government. I can only say to my hon. friend from New Westminster that I rejoice in the fact that the British Columbians, since that province has come into confederation, have been loyal and true to the party that they originally—not originally but always—belonged to; that they never found it necessary, from personal interest or personal ambition, or disappointed speculations, to desert their party and go over to the other side. It is a loyalty that has characterized the members from British Columbia which all must admire, and for which I feel the warmest gratitude, not only as a member of this government, but as an old politician and parliamentarian. It is a pleasure for me to reflect that in all my associations with those gentlemen they have never had but one principle, so far as the administration in the country was concerned, and that was to adhere loyally to the promises they had made to their constituents, and act consistently with the principles they had always advocated. I have no doubt when the time comes to appeal again to the people, that they will be found just as true and just as loyal to the old flag and the old party and the old policy as they have been in the past.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The hon. Premier referred to a bill that I opposed here—a bill providing for the building of a railway in British Columbia. I have sent for the Senate Debates, 1893, and the remarks will be found at page 430. It was the “Columbia and Kootenay Railway and Navigation Company’s Bill” that was before the House, and upon that occasion I delivered myself in the following way:

As far as the building of that road is concerned, I may say that I am as strongly in favour of it as any hon. gentleman in the House or in this country, and my sole object in moving the amendment of which I have given notice is simply to protect and to promote the interests of that particular portion of British Columbia which is being fast filled up, owing to the many mining camps and claims that have been discovered there within the last two years. I moved in the railway committee, when this bill was before it, that a certain portion of the second clause should be struck out. I will read the whole clause in order that hon. gentlemen may fully understand how I want the section amended:

“The company may construct and operate a railway between some point on its recent line between Nelson and Robson on the south and Revelstoke on the north, together with such branch or branches as may from time to time be authorized by the Governor in Council, not exceeding in any one case the length of 30 miles.”

The words that I wish struck out are “together with such branch or branches as may from time to time be authorized by the Governor in Council, not exceeding in any one case the length of 30 miles.” Hon. gentlemen are aware that in the general Railway Act the power of building branches to the extent of six miles is given to railway companies.

I refer to the Railway Act of 1886, 49 Vic., chap. 109, sec. 15, subsection 15:

“Any company may construct a branch or branches not exceeding six miles in length from any terminus or station of its railway.”

That is the power granted in the general Railway Act, and I am not aware that this parliament, or any parliament since 1867, has granted powers such as those asked for in this section, other than that granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway in their original charter. The 14th section of that Act provides, and so on.

It will be seen that I was not opposing the building of a road in British Columbia, or opposing any grant that this government saw fit to make to any road in British Columbia. On the contrary, I was anxious that that road should be built, no one was more anxious than I was, but at the same time I was anxious that the interests of other portions of the province and of other people should be protected as well as those of the company that was applying for the charter. I am charitable enough to suppose that the hon. premier’s memory failed him or he would never have insinuated that I was opposing any grant to that Company or any other laudable undertaking in the Pacific province. I leave it to the House if the tactics of the Premier in misrepresenting me in this matter does not strongly savour of ward politics and is the product of everything but a gigantic brain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
I rise to a point of order. I do not object to an explanation, but I do object to a speech.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I was misrepresented in another way as well, and I intend to call the attention of the House to it. The hon. gentleman and others have continually made the statement on the floor of this House and elsewhere that I was elected to represent a certain party. In my address to the electors of New Westminster, who elected me, I announced myself as independent in politics, and in the first Parliamentary Companion after I was elected I made use of the following words:— “Thoroughly independent in politics, in favour of equitable reciprocity with the United States and the immediate construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.” But when hon. gentlemen have nothing else to attack me on, they have recourse to misrepresentations, a habit the First Minister appears to glory in—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not aware that I mentioned the hon. gentleman's name. I spoke of the British Columbians generally. If my remarks fit the hon. gentleman, I have no objection that he should have the benefit of them. If what he states is correct—and I am not going to dispute him, because it is quite evident he thinks I refer to him—then he has been true to his instincts naturally, whatever they may be since he has been in the House, and consequently he occupies the same position as the others who have stuck loyally to the government. He can take just which horn of the dilemma he pleases.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I never was born to be a slave to any government or party.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am glad my speech brought forth a very forcible Canadian speech from the Premier. It has the proper ring, but he misunderstood me on one or two points. My whole speech was advisory and I was finding no fault with the government. I said I was not going to find fault with or arraign the government for what they have done, but I was simply endeavouring to represent the views of the electorate. I have no fault to find with the government; but things change in time and what our people want should be done. When I spoke about people holding offices in British Columbia, I referred to minor appointments. Governor Dewdney, reading the hon. Premier's speech, would think that I had referred to him as a person sent over there against our wishes. He might have been sent against our wishes, but I did not say a word about him or about Mr. Richards either. I simply had the subordinate officers in my mind. I hope the Premier will take that explanation as the correct one. I made no charge against the government, but simply made an advisory speech, without putting forward my own opinion but giving the opinion of those I represent.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (J) "An Act to amend the Act respecting certain female offenders in Nova Scotia."—(Mr. Power.)

SEDITIONOUS AND UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS AND OATHS BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the House resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (7) "An Act further to amend the 10th chapter of the Consolidated Statutes for Lower Canada, respecting seditious and unlawful associations and oaths."

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Will the hon. gentleman explain the bill now?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—This bill does not propose any innovation or confer any new power. The object being to place the grand lodge of Quebec and Ontario on the same footing. Under the statutes of 1865, passed before confederation, of the late province of Canada, the grand lodge of Canada is exempt from the penalties imposed on seditious and unlawful associations. Inasmuch as the grand lodge of Quebec has now jurisdiction in its own province, while the grand lodge of Canada has jurisdiction only in Ontario, it has been thought advisable to put the two grand lodges on the same footing. The Act in question is amended by substituting the word "in" for the word "of" so that it will read "or grand master or grand lodge in Canada."

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—I am not quite satisfied with that explanation. The old law forbids secret associations and declares in the last clause that Freemasons will be excepted from the provision and it adds this, "any lodge acknowledged by the grand master of England in Canada." I understand the effect of the bill, it changes this and the grand master of England will have nothing more to do in Canada, but it will be the grand master of Canada who will give that permission—is not that the effect of the bill?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—With the exception of two or three lodges, the grand master of England has had nothing whatever to do with the grand lodge of Canada or the grand lodge of Quebec for the past 25 or 30 years.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—How did they go on?

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is simply certain lodges whose head is in Scotland which they control, but now the lodges of Quebec are under the grand lodge of the province of Quebec alone, and this change of one word is simply to place the grand lodge of the province of Quebec in the same position as the grand lodge of Ontario.

The motion was agreed to.

In the Committee.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE moved in amendment that the following clause be added:—

“All societies, associations and lodges, whose members are bound by oath, and whose objects are exclusively of a social, charitable or benevolent character, are hereby exempted from the penalty prescribed by Chapter 110 of the Consolidated Statute for Lower Canada.”

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it is in order for an honourable gentleman to move such an amendment as that in Committee of the whole. This bill deals solely with the Masonic body, and is intended to facilitate their operations. The Masonic Association has been recognized by the law of this country as one to whose operations there is no special objection. Now, the honourable gentleman, in committee of the whole, moves an amendment which is really not germane to the bill before the committee at all. We do not know to what body this amendment may refer. It may refer to any number of bodies. The amendment itself says it refers to oath bound societies. For this committee to undertake to make such a sweeping change in the bill and in the law as would be made by that amendment is a highly objectionable proceeding. This parliament has passed an act incorporating the Orange Association, so that this amendment is not necessary so far as that order is concerned; and my own impression is, and I raise the question, that it is not competent for the committee to undertake to make such an amendment to the bill before the committee.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—My judgment is that the amendment is out of order, as not being germane to the bill.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—I do not think it is out of order. Notice can be given and the amendment can be moved at the third reading of the bill. It merely provides that other societies shall have the same privileges that are now possessed by the masonic society. I do not see why it should not be incorporated in the bill.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I have given my opinion that it is not germane to the bill.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not know what other society the hon. gentleman refers to. Any society which wants those privileges should apply for legislation, and show that it has some status in the country.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee, reported the bill without amendment.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY CO.'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with bill (49) “An Act respecting the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited.”

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—Is the hon. gentleman aware whether there is a clause in this Bill enabling the company to commute their claim with the government for duty?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall be able to answer that question at the second reading.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—My reason for asking the question is that I wish to have a clause prepared to cover that point.

The bill was read the first time.

EASTERN ASSURANCE SOCIETY'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with bill (33) “An act respecting the Eastern Assurance Society of Canada.”

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to ask the indulgence of the House respecting this bill. This company has carried on business for some years, and the business has not been found profitable, and the company authorized its directors to dispose of the business. They have disposed of it to an English Assurance Company, and, as I understand, all or nearly all the corporators of the Eastern Assurance Company have agreed to transfer. Under the provisions of the agreement between the directors of the Eastern Assurance Company and the English Company, the transaction has to be completed, and this legislation has to be obtained on or before the 30th of June of this year. I understand that certain bills will be assented to before that date by his Excellency, or his deputy, and it is very important indeed for the purposes of the people who are selling this company out, that the bill should become law before the 30th of June. Inasmuch as the committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom it will be referred, will have every opportunity to consider any objections that may be made to it, I move that the 41st rule of the Senate be suspended so far as regards this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 19th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SALE OF OBSCENE LITERATURE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, copies of all judgments, correspondence and letters of record in the public departments at Ottawa, and relating to the sentencing to a fine or imprisonment, or both, at Quebec, in the province of Quebec, of one Desjardins, a bookseller, for the sale of books of an immoral and indecent character; also, the evidence taken in the criminal court at Quebec, against the said Desjardins, in October last, and the judgment of the said court.

He said:—The answer which the hon. Premier made to my request for the prosecution of Norman Murray, of Montreal, for the sale of obscene literature there, has led to some correspondence, which has induced me to put this notice on the paper. I have received a letter from Quebec informing me that while the government at Ottawa seems determined to let the provincial authorities deal with the execution of the Criminal Code in such cases, they have taken a different course in a case which came before the courts of Quebec some months ago. I find in the Quebec Chronicle of the 11th of October, the following:—

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH,
10th October, 1894.

PRESENT: The Hon. Mr. Justice Blanchet.

The Crown was represented by J. Dunbar, Q.C., assisted by W. C. Languedoc, Q.C.

The grand jury came into court and brought in the following true bills, the Queen against Frederick Desjardins for selling obscene books. Desjardins was arraigned and pleaded not guilty. He asked permission of the Court to defend his case personally and the Crown fixed the case for Monday next.

The next day the Chronicle says that "Frederick Desjardins made default to answer his name when called, whereupon the court requested the issuing of a bench warrant to secure his attendance." On the 13th I find in the Court of Queen's Bench report that "Desjardins's case for selling obscene books was fixed, with the consent of the accused, for to-morrow."

The Chronicle of the 15th has the following report of the case :—

THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH (CROWN SIDE),
QUEBEC, 13th October, 1894.

PRESENT : The Hon. Mr. Justice Blanchet.

The trial of F. Desjardins for selling obscene books was then proceeded with.

The accused is charged with the sale in June last of obscene books.

The facts are briefly that in June last a young man, 18 years of age, purchased from the accused two books, one by Dr. Garnier, and the other by Emile Zola, for which he paid $2.75. Dr. Vallée, the Rev. Mr. Mathieu, Dr. Dionne, Parliamentary Librarian and Mr. Dorion, advocate, all four pronounced both books as obscene and immoral and only fit to corrupt the morals of their readers, without in any way doing anything conducive to public good.

The defendant personally cross-examined the witnesses for the Crown.

The only witness produced by the defence was the accused's sister, who swore that she owned the store, and that the accused was only her manager.

The accused addressed the jury in both languages and did it in a manner worthy of a better cause.

The presiding judge then reviewed the evidence, dwelling upon it as being very unfavourable to the accused.

The jury at 4.45 withdrew to their rooms, and returned again into the court at 5 p.m., when they brought in a verdict of guilty of both counts, with a recommendation to the mercy of the courts owing to the fact of this being the first offence under the new Criminal Code.

The court then adjourned.

In the Chronicle of the 20th I find the following :

The court then proceeded to pass the following sentences : * * * Frederick Desjardins convicted of selling obscene books, three months in jail on each count—in all six months.

Now, you will see in the province of Quebec they have enforced that law, and the court and jury decided that Desjardins deserved punishment. I am told—and it is the reason why I put the other question on the paper as to the date when Desjardins was released from prison—that the Governor in Council granted a release. I suppose the premier will have no objection to answering the second question to-day and save the necessity of raising it tomorrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no objection to bringing down the papers for which the hon. gentleman has moved, if there are any in the department. I am not in a position to answer the question which is on the notice paper for tomorrow. I have no recollection that the Governor-in-Council ever discharged Desjardins, but I will make inquiry and let the hon. gentleman know tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDNANCE LANDS IN NOVA SCOTIA AND CAPE BRETON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER inquired of the Government—

Was any agreement ever entered into between the Imperial authorities and the Government of Nova Scotia, or the Government of the Dominion of Canada, by which the former undertook to transfer to either of the latter the ordnance lands in the possession of the former, in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton? If so, when was that agreement made, and what were the mutual conditions of it?

What ordnance lands are now in the possession of the Dominion Government in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton?

Has the Dominion Government the possession of all the ordnance lands in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, to which it is entitled by virtue of the agreement aforesaid?

Is the Dominion Government not entitled to the possession of the site and of the old fortifications of Louisbourg?

He said : I have vainly tried to get at the bottom of this question. That is the reason why I am asking for information to-day. In the Departments of Militia and Inland Revenue, there seems to be nothing that can throw any light on this question. On the other hand I am informed that the correspondence that passed between the Imperial Government and the provinces of Canada before and since confederation—the interval between 1862 and 1872, say—were likely to be found in the Privy Council archives, to which I have not had access. I cannot see why it is that to-day the oncemighty fortress of Louisbourg, which cost the Government of France between 25,000,000 and 30,000,000 of francs to build, and which cost the English almost as much to destroy, should not to-day form part of the ordnance lands, and should not belong to either Nova Scotia or the Dominion Government. From what I can find in the newspaper reports, it is from private individuals that our Boston friends, the Society of the Colonial Wars, got the site for the erection of their monument, and that site stands in one of the bastions of the old fortress itself. Now, if I understand the situation well, when it was decided by the imperial authorities to withdraw the troops from the provinces, and subsequently from the Dominion, certain agreements were entered into between the parties interested. The imperial authorities first handed the ordnance lands and other public lands to the Government of Nova Scotia. At confederation, those lands specified in the schedule to certain Acts of Parliament, were to be handed to the Dominion Government. The site of old Louisbourg is not specifically mentioned in said Acts or schedule; but to my mind we are entitled to all the ordnance and military lands owned by the imperial authorities in Nova Scotia, whether specified or not. If so, I would suggest the propriety of getting that possession. It is not at all likely that the imperial authorities allowed those lands recalling historic events of transcendent importance, to be squatted upon by the first comer who should, after a certain number of years, by right of prescription (if such a right does exist against the government, which is doubtful) claim to have such a title as would enable him to sell those lands to foreigners or to our own people. I do not believe it. The Nova Scotia Government were first entitled to the possession of those lands, and by the several agreements that have been entered into, the Dominion Government is entitled to the possession of them now. Of course I have no documents to prove that, but I infer it from what documents I could lay my hand upon and from what Acts of Parliament are made public. If such is the case, the Dominion Government should without delay assert its possession to those old sites and to-day the old fortress of Louisbourg should be classified number A in the militia ordnance lands, such as the Annapolis old fort is. It should have been done before, but better late than never. We should preserve those relics religiously. They are memorials of the past, recalling nothing in the way of bitterness, but recalling historical events when England and France were at war and when the fortunes of war gave to England those magnificent dominions which England now holds. It is a sacred spot which we should keep possession of, because in the first place it is intrinsically quite worth while holding. In America Louisbourg and Quebec are perhaps the most important of old time fortresses. Had the Government been in possession of it we would have been spared such manifestation as were witnessed yesterday at Louisbourg. I do not mean to recriminate upon what has been done. I simply beg leave very respectfully to express my regret that the imperial navy was there and that our governor should be represented by the gentleman who unveiled the statue in his name. I believe he sent letters of regret for his non-attendance. He had a right, no doubt, to do this, but I cannot help regretting that it was done. I would call the attention of this honourable House to the fact that there is a misunderstanding somewhere. I can see by the tenor of the newspapers that most of them are deluded: people generally think that the taking of Louisbourg, which was commemorated the day before yesterday, is the taking of Louisbourg by Wolfe and Amherst, in 1758. Not at all. It was the triumph of Pepperrell that was commemorated; and that triumph was, in a certain way, repudiated by England nine years afterwards, in 1754, when Louisbourg and Cape Breton were restored back to France by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The sequel of the capture of Louisbourg, in 1758, was the taking of Quebec on the year following, and the cession to England of half a continent, which the Empire still possesses under the name of Dominion of Canada. A glorious and lasting result. The sequel of the capture of Louisbourg by Pepperrell and his "Puritan iconoclasts," as Mr. Bourinot in his Cape Breton and its Memorials calls them, was the immediate destruction of the peaceful Acadian settlements in Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island; and, ten years later, in 1755, the forcible expulsion of the whole Acadian race. A foul and blood-stained achievement for which to-day England stands in history responsible, but the responsible authors of which were the ancestors of those very people who came on Monday last and erected a monument to their victorious soldiers. I regret that misunderstanding. I believe if the true historical tenor of it had been properly understood that the imperial authorities would not have been represented there and that our Governor General would not have participated therein. Of course, it is done now, but remember, hon. gentlemen, that this is giving a footing to people that are not very friendly to us nor to England. They came in and they have perpetrated the first act. They will likely come again. The second celebration will recall that which was the consequence of this capture of Louisbourg in 1745, the forcible expulsion of the Acadians in 1755, the theme of Longfellow's immortal poem, and there, no doubt, they will again find sympathisers in our land, and our Governor General, by himself or his representative, will be there again "if Cæsar but carelessly nod upon him."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Not much.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—When our American friends come to Nova Scotia for the third time, having already a foothold there, they will likely try and come to stay. All this, hon. gentlemen, is to be regretted. Now, it has been alleged that the spirit of that celebration was not to exult the American victors only, but also the English soldiers, and also the French soldiers. The inscription on the monument is as follows: "To commemorate the capture of Louisbourg in 1745." "Erected by the Society of Colonial Wars to our heroic dead." Mark, it is the heroic dead of the Americans. Where is the name of Commodore Warren, or of the heroic dead of the defenders? I read a letter published in several newspapers from the Hon. Everett P. Wheeler, disclaiming any idea of making it an American affair, and contending that the object was to commemorate the English and French as well as the Americans, but you see what the inscriptions on the monument are. The United Empire Loyalists of Canada some time ago called attention to the impropriety of this inscription, and suggested that something in commemoration of the bravery of the English and the French should be put on the monument. Mr. de Lery McDonald suggested that one of the faces of the monument should bear this inscription: "In memory of the gallant capture and heroic defence of Louisbourg, in 1745." The president of the association afterwards wrote to the Secretary of the Society of Colonial Wars the following letter:—

188 St. Hubert Street, Montreal.
June 8th, 1895.

To the Secretary of Society of Colonial Wars at Boston:

My dear sir,—One of the members of our Council of United Empire Loyalists has just sent you a letter containing a suggestion and a copy of the memorial of our association. I earnestly beg the liberty of concurring in his suggestion, and of offering an amendment to it; not only as Mr.

Macdonald says, would it be well to put on to Louisbourg monument something to commemorate the gallant defence of the Acadians, as well as the capture by the Bostonians, but would it not be well to invite the officers of the United Empire Loyalist Association, as representing Canadians of both races, to take part in the ceremonies? Sir H. G. Joly de Lotbinière, our vice-president, a fine orator, could eulogize in French the defence of Louisbourg by the French.

I would further add that, if the members of your society take such a pride in the achievements of their sires under the British Empire, as to commemorate them with so much patriotism, care and expense, that it would be exceedingly gratifying to the spirits and memory of their sires if the same flag is unfurled alone to the breeze on June 17th, as that beneath which they fought and bled and gained those triumphs and renown, which your illustrious society was formed to commemorate.

I have the honour to be yours faithfully.

VISCOUNT DE FRONSAC.

No heed was taken of either of these communications. And no mention of the French nor of Old England soldiers is made on the monument. It is erected to "our heroic dead," the dead of New England, to Pepperrell's "iconoclasts." That shows that if this commemoration was not made in a hostile spirit altogether, it was not made in a spirit in which we can detect a sufficient deference to the feelings of a large portion of the people of Canada, and the right acquired by the British soldiers as to justify the demonstrations which were made there the day before yesterday. I do not say this in a spirit of recrimination; I simply mention the fact to impress upon the government the necessity of getting possession of those historic sites, if we are entitled to them, as I believe we are.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We are much indebted to the hon. gentleman for bringing up this subject. I am afraid the possession of the historic ground in Louisbourg has passed out of our hands. It was made over to the local government before confederation, and they have disposed of a great deal of it, and I am afraid we have lost it. That will be borne out by the fact that the society for celebrating colonial wars obtained the site, on which they erected their monument, from a private individual. I do not know the inscriptions on the monument, but I hope when they commemorated the deeds of their countrymen, they mentioned the fact also that they sent in to the British Government a bill to defray the expenses of the expedition, which was accordingly paid.

I find that a medal which has been struck to commemorate this event has the face of Sir William Pepperrell upon it: that is all right. We all know that Sir William Pepperrell was a merchant and a trader and that he organized the expedition and conducted it to a successful issue. When they see his face upon the medal they should remember that a little more than thirty years after the capture of Louisbourg, his son the second baronet was banished from his native land with the notice that if he returned he should be put to death, and that the property he inherited from his father and what he had gained by his own industry, was confiscated, and henceforth he lived on the bounty of his sovereign against whom he refused to take up arms. When we have tears for the Huguenots who were driven out of France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, when we feel for the calamities of the Acadians who were turned out of their homes, we must have a feeling of sympathy for the Loyalists who were driven out of the United States by the ancestors of those men who have erected a monument in our country. The New Englanders were always religious men; do they recollect the saying in Matthew where Christ describes the Pharisees—"Woe unto you Scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites, for you build the tombs of the prophets whom your fathers have slain and garnish their sepulchres." And again in Luke, "Woe unto you who build the tombs of the prophets whom your fathers have slain." I think those verses are very appropriate, and I trust our United States friends, if they have not left their bibles at home, will consult them and see whether they do not apply very strongly to their own case. I think they do. I am afraid we have lost possession of the historic grounds at Louisbourg, but still we have some other historic sites, amongst them the old fort at Annapolis. I am tired bringing this matter before the Senate, and I suppose the Senate is tired hearing about it. More than once the predecessors of the present leader of the House promised me that the old fort should be preserved. The Bible says "put not your trust in princes;" I say, put not your faith in Ministers. There was a promise made that something would be done to save the old fort from destruction. When I first spoke of it, there was an old block house there which had withstood two sieges, one when captured by Nicholson and again when defended by Massassin against the Indians commanded by the warrior priest de Loutre. One very cold winter a man by the name of Hall, at Annapolis, wanted fuel and he wrote the colonel of engineers at Halifax, from whom he had rented the place, stating that the old block house was in a very dilapidated condition, and would fall down and kill some person, and he got permission to convert it into fuel. So far from it being in a dilapidated condition, he had to tear it down with oxen. It was removed after I had received the solemn assurance of the leader of this House at that day, that the fort should be looked after. Within the last two or three months a store has been built on the old site. I communicated with the Minister of Militia on the subject, and he said it never should have been put there and should be removed. There is a cobbler shop built on the place; the cobbler is dead, but the building cannot be removed I fear from long possession. The only building indicating the French possession are the bomb-proof and the sally-port, but some geologist having discovered the interesting fact that the arch of this is built of Caen stone, our United States visitors come along with hammers and break it up and they are carrying it away piecemeal. The officers' quarters connected with the fort still remain, but they were not in existence during the French occupation and there is no antiquity about them, thought I remember them 70 years ago. The only engagement they ever witnessed were in the ball-room, and where there are ball-rooms there are likely to be engagements, but they do not commemorate the capture of fortresses. I have suggested before, and I now repeat the suggestion, that the old fort and the land connected with it at Annapolis, should be handed over to the town authorities at Annapolis to be used as a public ground, on condition that nothing should be done to interfere with the shape of the fortification, or the sally port. That, I have no doubt, the people of Annapolis would be happy to do. It must not be imagined that I look upon our visitors from the United States as vandals; but when they see an old monument they like to carry it off, piecemeal if necessary. Anybody who has read the "Innocents Abroad," by Mark Twain, will remember his description of the trip of some 200 tourists through the Mediterranean and the Holy Land. He says the brethren went to the chapel at Nazareth, but there is no chapel there now, each of the brethren having carried away a stone. They do the same thing now whenever they visit any historic place. At one time block houses were common all over Nova Scotia, but they are all gone but the one at Windsor. There was one at Lunenburg, but that is gone. One at Windsor has escaped, but we do not deserve much credit for the care we have taken of that one. I would suggest that the land there, which is of no use to the government, should be given to the people of Windsor on condition that they will preserve the fort as it is now. I once visited the fort at Annapolis with the gentleman who first had charge of the military school at Kingston. He went over it with me, and he said it was one of the most perfect specimens he had ever seen of the fortifications of the time of Louis XIV. There is another fort at Cumberland. The approaches made by the British army during their attack are still to be seen, and a number of the buildings inside of the place are still standing. The cannon were sold by the government, of which the hon. member from Ottawa was a member, and the metal converted into stoves and grates, many of which are now in the houses in the county of Cumberland, but I will not reproach them, as under the government of which I am a supporter, the block house at Annapolis was demolished, so honours, or rather dishonours, are easy.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As far as Lunenburg is concerned we have two block houses which show the importance of the place with extensive earth works and some old guns. In 1863 I was a member of the local legislature and was very anxious to have lighthouses erected at the mouth of the harbour on ordnance lands at at Battery Point. I had some trouble getting it. At that time I believe no ordnance lands had been transferred to the province. A long correspondence had to take place between the Imperial Government and the Government of Nova Scotia before we could get possession of the land. It was then under lease at a nominal rent. There was then a dilapidated block house and some dismantled guns on the ground. Whether the property was transferred to the local government or permission was given to erect the lighthouse I cannot say, but there was some power by which the local government of Nova Scotia got from the imperial government the right to erect a lighthouse on this very ordnance land, but this was only conceded as a permissive right by the imperial authorities subject to removal at any time if an obstruction to defence or military requirements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not seen the inscription on this monument, but while the hon. gentleman from Shediac was speaking, I happened to read a report of the unveiling of the monument, and from the speeches I was in doubt as to whether the monument was erected to the memory of the Acadians or of the colonists. Certainly the speeches breathe the most generous and chivalrous spirit in honour of both parties. I shall just read one or two extracts for the consolation of my hon. friend. I find in the address of Frederick J. DePoyser, the governor general of the society, the following :

While referring to the valour and courage displayed by the New England forces and the aid rendered by the British fleet, it paid a just tribute to the brave and chivalrous French defenders of the fortress.

Then I find in the report of the address delivered by the Hon. Everett Pepperrell Wheeler, a descendant of Sir William Pepperrell, the following :

It commemorated the heroic courage of the defenders, of Louisbourg as well as the prowess of their victorious assailants.

Then, on behalf of the Nova Scotia Historical Society, Dr. Mackay, is reported as follows :—

He also paid a warm tribute to the chivalry of our French-Canadian fellow-citizens and referred to the high place they occupy in the politics, commerce, history and literature of Canada.

It is some consolation to know that they availed themselves of the opportunity to speak quite as highly of the defenders of the fortress as of the victorious assailants.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall endeavour to answer the question put by the hon. gentleman as fully as possible, in order that there may be a record in our Debates of the properties which we own in the maritime provinces and which are known as ordnance lands.

1. The correspondence between the Imperial government and the government respecting the ordnance lands in the province of Nova Scotia culminated in the Imperial Order in Council of the 18th August, 1882, which vested in the Governor General of Canada certain fortifications and lands in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

2. The military properties taken over by the department of Militia and Defence from the imperial authorities in 1883, under the imperial order in Council of 18th August, 1882, Nova Scotia, are :

In addition to the lands above enumerated are Battery Point, in Shelburne county, about two acres in extent, which was transferred by the Militia Department to the Department of the Interior on the 28th of May, 1894. It should also be mentioned in this relation that the naval reserves in Shelburne Harbour, consisting of islands 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 and Commissary Island were transferred by the Militia Department to the Department of the Interior on the 4th November, 1876.

ment of the Interior on the 4th November, 1876.

3. The Dominion Government would appear to be in possession of all the ordnance lands in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton which had been transferred by the imperial authorities.

4. The site of the old fortifications at Louisbourg is not included in the list attached to the said order in council.

There is nothing to show that the site of those fortifications has ever been transferred to the Dominion government. I may mention, in connection with this, that it is the practice of the Militia Department, whenever lands are not considered necessary for military purposes, to transfer them to the Department of the Interior, which department disposes of them sometimes by auction, or uses them for any purposes for which they may be required. There may be some force in the statement made by the junior member for Halifax that he was under the impression that some lands at Louisbourg had been transferred to the government of Nova Scotia. If so, there is no record in the departments of that fact. The transfer of the different lots which I have already enumerated was made by the imperial order in council, and it may possibly be that the property in Louisbourg was not included in that order in council, for the reason assigned by the junior member for Halifax. I have taken the trouble to make this information as full and as explicit as possible, in order that it may be on record hereafter for any hon. gentleman who is desirous of ascertaining what ordnance property is in the possession of the Dominion Government. I shall not enter into a discussion of the questions raised by the gentlemen who have spoken, further than to add, as to the remarks made by the leader of the opposition, that my reading of the accounts of the unveiling of this monument impressed me in the same manner as the hon. member. Due praise has been given to those who defended, as well as to those who captured the fortress. It must be borne in mind, however, that when that expedition was sent to capture Louisbourg, the American colonies were British colonies and the colonial soldiers were as much British subjects at that time as we are today.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—And the money was defrayed out of the imperial treasury that paid their expenses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am coming to that afterwards. They raised the money, if my recollection of the historical events is correct, by subscription, which was subsequently, as the hon. gentleman says, refunded after the capture by these colonies, and the leader was knighted for his heroism in connection with that battle. There is nothing, however, in all the literature that I have read in connection with this question, that casts reflection upon those who defended the fortress. On the contrary, they are spoken of as brave men, who defended it to their utmost, until the British navy appeared in the harbour, and then they saw it was useless to continue the defence and surrendered. That, I believe, is an epitome of that battle. I will say, before I sit down, that I am fully in accord with the remarks made by the junior member for Halifax, in reference not only to the preservation, but, if you please, to the restoration of all old fortresses which mark in Canada, the different spots where many of our forefathers laid down their lives. I think it is one of the incentives to the youth of this country. It tends to nationalize our people to have these monuments erected. I am not aware what promises were made in reference to the Annapolis forts, but I hope that the hon. gentleman may in the future have cause to believe that the promises of Ministers are carried out. However, you know there is a portion of scripture that speaks of a person being denominated as the importunate widow. Well, I would not like to speak of my hon. friend as importunate, but he evidently intends to pursue the same course as the importunate widow, until he obtains what he wants. He never intends to allow the princes to sit comfortably upon their seats, and I commend him for it, and I hope he will keep at it until he compels whatever government is in power to reserve to the memory of our children that which indicates the heroism of our forefathers.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am an old man and have not much time to wait; so you had better hurry it up.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not make the promises.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the question of the title to the property to which the leader has referred it seems to me the hon. gentleman from Richmond, or the hon. member from Cape Breton, would probably know something about it: After the fortress was razed I should fancy the site of the fortress was treated as other government lands were.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (C. B.)—There seems to be an impression in Cape Breton that there is some land in Louisbourg which belongs to the navy, or which is for the use of the navy. I do not know why the record does not appear in the paper the premier has just read. It may be accounted for in this way, that when the title of the old province of Cape Breton was transferred to Nova Scotia, in 1820—because, you must remember Cape Breton was a province of its own until 1820—the records of the lands belonging to the navy and other lands may have been lost. There is no doubt the impression prevails in Cape Breton that there is a tract of land there for the use of the navy.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of Bill (56) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited)."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think this is the most outrageous and tyrannical bill that was ever passed in the House, and if my hon. friend thinks that I was wrong about the facts, as I state them, I wish he would put me right, and he can answer my conclusions afterwards. I will explain the position of the matter. There were two companies in New Glasgow, one the steel company, and the other called the iron company. This steel company was paying 8 per cent interest and was in existence some eight years, and was entirely out of debt. The other had been in existence for some years, and had not paid a sixpence in dividends. It was over head and ears in debt, and, as was stated before the committee of the Commons, it had already borrowed 60 per cent of the capital from the Union Bank of Halifax, of which Mr. Stairs, senior, is president. The other was a smaller company, and the parties who had shares in the iron company bought the controlling interest in the steel company, and decided that the two should be amalgamated. A number of the members of the steel company protested when they applied for the amalgamation in the local House, but they were outvoted, and one of them came here and appeared before the committee of the Commons, to protest against the legislation, but being taken ill, was obliged to return to Halifax. Mr. Fraser, M.P., who was acting for the iron company before the committee of the Senate, said that it was a very fair agreement, and that it was just and did not injure the other parties. Then a gentleman who owned shares in the steel company had sent a telegram to me offering to sell his shares at par with the interest for the time the shares were taken away from him. Mr. Fraser said "Now, if you do that, the others will be coming in, and we will have to treat them likewise." If it was a fair arrangement, why did the stock depreciate so, and why did Mr. Fraser laugh at the idea of the other man getting par for his shares? I shall not put this to a vote, but I simply make the statement in order that in future days it may be said that there was one man in the Senate that desired to protect the rights of these people. Another thing, this company wanted to borrow from a Halifax society $600,000. If these are not facts, the senior member should deny them. I think we are passing an unjust measure which will reflect no credit on the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—When the bill was read the second time, I called attention to the fact that there were some persons dissatisfied, and I stated that those persons would have an opportunity to be heard before the Committee on Banking and Commerce. The committee held two meetings, at each of which there was ample opportunity for my hon. colleague and any others who had any fault to find with the terms of the bill to appear and be heard.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—And no division was taken in the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me, under these circumstances, that the hon. gentleman is not taking the most admirable course in allowing the bill to pass the committee, and then coming here and attacking it on the third reading, and using such very strong language in respect to it. I am not responsible for the bill in any shape or way, but it has been reported by the committee with an important amendment, and there was no attempt before the committee to have any other amendment made. I think it would be dealing very hard measure out to these promoters if the bill were not allowed to pass its final stage.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In defence of the committee who reported on this bill, I should like to say that it was most fully and carefully considered by them. Representations were made to me as chairman of the committee, that some of the shareholders of one of the companies were very much opposed to the bill, and I stated to the committee that such was the case and what their objections were. No one, however, appeared before the committee to substantiate these or to oppose the bill at either of the meetings, although ample notice was given of the meetings. Satisfactory evidence was produced on the part of the promoters of the bill that the resolution authorizing the sale and the indenture of agreement relating thereto, had been regularly passed by a very large majority of the shareholders. The indenture of agreement was laid before the committee, and was ordered to be added as a schedule to the bill, and the committee could take no other cause than they did in reporting the bill to the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My impression is similar to that of the hon. gentleman who has resumed his seat. There were some exceptions taken before the committee, but I thought all the objections had been satisfied. Every suggestion made for the amendment of the bill was consented to by the committee, and the satisfaction with the bill appeared to be such, that not a single division was taken while the bill was under our consideration, and only a few amendments were made. With regard to the objections, they were only on behalf of two individuals who held a very insignificant amount of stock in comparison with the majority who were in favour of the bill, and the committee considered it was a matter that had been settled to the satisfaction of all the parties.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The discontents were one-third of 1 per cent, as I am informed, of the company that amalgamated with this company that were not satisfied with the terms of the bill, or the transfer—that fact refutes the charges of fraud or injustice.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read a third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (K) "An act further to amend the Penitentiary Act." He said:—The Revised Statutes create in the Department of Justice an officer who is called the accountant of penitentiaries. The intention of the first clause of the bill is to do away with this officer and to vest the duties of the office upon the inspector or any other person in the departments whom the Governor in Council may appoint. Under the present system this accountant of penitentiaries is entrusted with verifying and auditing the accounts kept in the different penitentiaries in the Dominion. For that purpose he has to travel there. The inspector has to perform the same duty, and has also to travel there, and it is thought that the department can economize and save the salary of the officer and the expenses of travelling there by entrusting the duties to the inspector. The second clause submitted for the consideration of this House is to provide for the removing of insane convicts into asylums. Under the present law it is required that a ward, or a portion of the building, be set aside for the purpose of keeping convicts who become insane. It is believed advisable that, instead of doing so, they should be entrusted to the care of the penitentiary asylums in the different provinces after agreement made between the government and the local authorities. That is the object of the other clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the first clause of the bill, inasmuch as it proposes to make a saving, of course it will be a desirable thing, provided the inspector is also a reliable and competent accountant—a thing which I presume the government will see for themselves. There have been inspectors who probably would not have been very satisfactory accountants.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not see anything in this section as to which of the asylums the parties shall be transferred to. The party, say from Nova Scotia, convicted of a crime may be sent to Kingston, as such convicts are when nearer penitentiaries are overcrowded, and it is thought a better place for minor offences than the common jail. Would it not be better if they were sent to the insane asylum in the district in which they belong, because they would be the natural charge upon that province when the term of imprisonment expires and be nearer to friends and relatives.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The province is to be paid for the keeping of the insane.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Should they not be sent to the asylum within the province from which they come, so that their friends could look after them? I can see sufficient reason why the alteration should not be made.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, they should be sent to the asylum nearest to the penitentiary where they are confined.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It does not say so.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Good administration would require that.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—A party may be partly sane and his friends would like to see him and not have him banished for life, so to speak.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—You may be able to make a bargain with one province and not with another as to the keeping of the insane. Therefore I think it is better to leave it as it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is this to be said in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member from Lunenburg that in the lower provinces the penitentiary is situated at Moncton, which is in the province of New Brunswick. Under the provisions of this clause I presume that any insane convict who came from Prince Edward Island or from Nova Scotia would be sent to the insane asylum in New Brunswick instead of to one in his own province.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—He might.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the hon. gentleman think that a very undesirable thing?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Why?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because this insane person is taken away from the reach of his relations altogether.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not know that he should be accessible to his friends. Recollect that he is a convict, and if he is sent to an asylum which is close to his relations we might just as well let him go at large.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Suppose he is put in the penitentiary for two years and becomes permanently insane, he remains in the asylum wherever he is put. Can he be taken from there?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly. The law provides that at the expiration of his term he shall be removed and then he falls under the charge of his relations or province. We cannot keep him there longer than the term for which he is sentenced.

The clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (49) "An Act respecting the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited." He said:—We passed some legislation last year to authorize the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited, to purchase the Western Counties Railway. The Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company have worked, since the establishment of the company in 1865 or 1866, under the provisions of the English Companies Act of 1862. Very considerable inconvenience has arisen from the company's operating under that Act, and a bill has been introduced on their behalf to authorize them to work under a Dominion charter instead of the English Companies Act. There are two bills which are supposed to go side by side. This bill authorizes the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, Limited, to transfer everything to this new company to be incorporated by the companion bill and the companion bill, which is probably on the Speaker's desk now, is intended to give this Dominion charter to the new company. The two bills, I presume, will be considered by the Railway Committee at the same time.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

GILMOUR AND HUGHSON BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (79) "An Act to incorporate Gilmour and Hughson Limited," with amendments. He said:—The amendment which was added is a clause which is to be found in several Acts of incorporation on the statute-book now, and those parties desire to have this introduced to give them power to dispose of, or sell, their business if they desire to do so. That is the only amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

UNION WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

A SUGGESTION.

Hon. Mr. WARK rose—

To call attention to the unsuccessful negotiations with the colony of Newfoundland, and suggest whether it might not be advisable to open a correspondence with the Imperial Government, and propose such joint assistance in that colony as would enable it to enter this Dominion, unembarrassed by financial difficulties.

He said:—The subject which I am about to bring before the House is one which has attracted a great deal of attention of late, and it is a very important one and deserves attention. I regret that the negotiations which were carried on between our government and the delegates from Newfoundland did not succeed. I suppose our government felt, looking at the precedents and the care which had been exercised in admitting other colonies, that they could not go further than they did, and I think both Conservatives and Liberals were of the same opinion. It is a great pity, however, that the negotiations should fall through. It is of very great importance that the whole of Her Majesty's dominions in British North America should be under one government and I think we ought to strain a point on behalf of Newfoundland, I regret that we have not the latest documents from the island. The latest we have in our Library are the proceedings in 1891—that was the year of the great fire which almost desolated the capital of Newfoundland. We never sufficiently realized the extent of that calamity, but the governor, in calling a special session of the legislature, stated in a few words what the extent of it was. Here are the words of his speech at the opening of the session:

On the 8th day of July an irresistible and awful conflagration completely destroyed nearly two-thirds of this city, the capital of the colony and the centre of its trade, and rendered homeless more than eleven thousand of its inhabitants. The destruction of the property occasioned by the fire of the 9th June, 1846, is far exceeded by the recent calamity. The former did not extend over so great an area or involve a loss of so many public buildings and valuable mercantile premises. To-day complete desolation marks the site of the wealthiest and principal portion of our city. The courts of justice, the customs-house, one cathedral, three churches, five public schools, and ten public halls, together with 3,000 dwelling houses and stores have been totally destroyed. Forest fires have also occasioned much loss and suffering in other parts of the colony, and have intensified the gloom which now surrounds us.

This was a very discouraging state of things, and it might have been expected to cast a great damper upon the energies of those people, but so diligently did they apply themselves to their various pursuits, that instead of a great falling off in their exports that year, they actually exceeded the exports of any of the three previous years by quite a large amount. Their exports the previous year had amounted to $6,099,686. In 1891, the year of their calamity, their exports amounted to $7,437,128, showing an increase of $1,334,747, which speaks very favourably for the energy and industry of the people. Newfoundland is very differently situated from any of the provinces of Canada and in seeking a union that should never be lost sight of. They draw their wealth chiefly from the ocean. Here is a memorandum of the result of their labours that year. When they use the word "fish" they mean codfish, and they speak of the other fish by name. The fish that year which they cured and shipped away amounted to $5,110,567; the seal-oil and seal-skins, to $780,807; the preserved lobsters to $429,681; herring, fresh and pickled, $223,491, and salmon fresh and pickled and preserved was $102,000. Thus they exported fish to the value of $6,637,552. Formerly their only export was fish, but I find they are beginning to develop the forests. They exported $1,712,000 worth of lumber chiefly to the mother country and the West Indies. They also exported to the mother country $624,750 worth of the products of the mines, but with the exception of these two items their whole exports are fish. Now I have shown you where they draw their wealth from. Here is a statement of where they sell their products. To France very little, only $17,026. To Italy they send $450,047, while they buy only $92,058. To Spain they send $718,591, and buy from them only $104,708. To Portugal, one of their largest customers, they sell $1,051,830, and buy only $37,000, from them. Germany $23,427; they buy nothing there. The Spanish West Indies $56,491, and they only purchase $20 worth from them in return. Then Brazil $1,102,995, and they buy nothing from them. They sell a little to St. Pierre, and sell $29,678 to Greece but they buy nothing there. You will see, therefore, their exports to those foreign countries amount to $4,083,865, and they buy from them only $476,018 worth, so that the very large balance which remains must come greatly to Canada, if Newfoundland is to become one of the provinces of this Dominion. I have been speaking of their exports; it is with their imports that we are chiefly interested. These amounted in that year to $6,869,458. Of these they purchased from the United Kingdom $2,341,706; from the Dominion of Canada $2,499,945; from United States $1,526,674, in all $6,368,325 out of an import of $6,869,458. So you see a great part of their imports is from these three countries. With the duties in Newfoundland removed from the produce of Canada, and the Canadian tariff extended to Newfoundland, no doubt the whole, or the most, of the import trade of Newfoundland from the United States would be turned over to Canada, and I suppose they would spend in Canada, out of their exports, not less than between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 of cash, besides what they purchase from us.

In considering the terms on which Newfoundland should be admitted, one question which deserves full consideration is, how much of the proceeds of the exports of any province in the Dominion are spent in other provinces. That is a question that we cannot easily trace, but we all know, each from his own experience, how little the people of one province sell in any of the other provinces. The proceeds of their exports are chiefly expended among their own people. I know it is the case in New Brunswick and I know that very little of the proceeds of our exports are spent anywhere outside of our province except what we require to carry on our lumbering operations. As for Nova Scotia I do not know where they spend anything in New Brunswick; if they do, it is very little—it is spent at home. Our money is spent among our farmers and manufacturers, but this cannot be the case with Newfoundland. They cannot fall back on the products of their agriculture—they have none. Their harvest is drawn from the ocean. Nor have they manufactures to any great extent, and consequently, the whole of the proceeds nearly of their exports must be spent, if they come into this Dominion among the other provinces. If we have a cash customer coming in who is prepared to spend four millions of dollars, we ought to extend just the same terms to that customer that any respectable merchant will to a person who buys largely from him. Customers may drop in and buy one or two or four dollars worth, of goods and no discount is allowed, but let a customer come in and purchase $100 worth, and the merchant, if he follows the course that most merchants do, will deduct 5 per cent from the $100 and when he receives his $95 he will feel that that man is a better customer than the others. We ought to extend the same civility or justice to Newfoundland. If they can spend four millions of dollars cash with us, we could well afford to take off five per cent and that would be $200,000, and that would be a means by which the government could escape from their present difficulty. It would be returning to Newfoundland simply what, I might say, we have not a right to take. If our government would go to the Imperial government and say to them "Newfoundland cannot come into the Dominion unless we unite and pay off her debts," that would involve $5,000,000, only £1,000,000 sterling, a small matter to talk about in England. At three per cent it is only £30,000. By this transaction, we get the whole control of the fisheries. We ought to remember what a dilemma we would have been in if Her Majesty's Imperial government had consented to the Bond-Blaine treaty. What would have been the value of our fisheries then had that treaty be ratified? Our getting control of the whole of the fisheries would certainly have a money value, and a very large money value. With Newfoundland brought in, and the fisheries all under the control of this parliament—and that is what I want to see—with the laws of Canada extending over the whole of this portion of the Empire, with the government of Canada having the sole charge of protecting the fisheries and legislating for them, I think that everyone would say there would be a money value in this. We would then have the key of the door of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. We would have both the entrances under our control, and the gulf, would, in fact, be a Canadian lake. What would the Imperial government gain by such an arrangement? They are willing to take over Newfoundland as a Crown colony. Reflect a little on that question! They would first have to assume the debt of Newfoundland, the management of it, the payment of the interest on it; they would have to finish the railway; they would have to legislate and to regulate everything connected with their fisheries, and protect the fisheries. They would have to undertake to pay all the public officers, judges and other officials, and they would have to raise the money for that purpose by taxation on the people of Newfoundland who would not be represented in the body that imposed the taxes. I think when they consider all this, if they got clear of the difficulty by joining with Canada and agreeing to assume a portion of the debt of Newfoundland—I am not going to suggest how the debt should be divided, that would be a matter of negotiation—but at any rate, if they assume a portion of the debt they would relieve themselves of the responsibility which they would have to undertake to govern Newfoundland as a Crown colony. I did not give notice of putting a question to the government, because I would like them to hear the opinions that I hope will be expressed by the House generally and then make up their minds. If I had put a question they would have had to prepare an answer before they heard the opinions of this House, and that would be like trying and sentencing a man without any evidence.

I hope, therefore, that, from the maritime provinces especially, we will have a very decided expression of opinion on the subject. The business which they do now in Newfoundland is a very respectable business. In fact they furnish that colony with all the horses, sheep, cattle, swine, hay, oats, potatoes and other roots that they require—everything goes from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Nova Scotia furnishes the largest share—$810,214 worth, but Prince Edward Island, does well; it sends $144,729 worth to the Newfoundland market and that trade would double if Newfoundland comes into the Dominion. Of course, Quebec gets the lion's share; that is no doubt through the shipments from Montreal, the manufactures of various kinds and of flour required in Newfoundland. They send now of flour and of the produce of their manufactures, $1,355,862 worth. Ontario sends only $166,000 worth, because its exports go to Montreal or Quebec. I leave the question with the House, and leave the government to make up their minds when they hear the opinions of the House on the subject.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure that all the members of this House must be gratified by the excellent speech that we have heard from the hon. member who has just sat down, and that we fully appreciate the valuable points that he has brought to the notice of the government—with one in particular which referred to the value of Newfoundland as a purchasing part of the Dominion. I think he is very just in his conclusion when he says that no province in the Dominion buys as much from all the other provinces as Newfoundland would buy from the other provinces of the Dominion if it were within the confederation. That is perfectly apparent when one reflects upon the situation. Newfoundland would buy all her food supply, outside of the fisheries, and would buy from manufacturers in every part of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman also drew attention to another strong point, that owing to the peculiar situation of Newfoundland, if it were allowed to drift into an alliance with a foreign power, necessarily the Canadian fisheries would be very much diminished in value. Any gentleman who gives attention to that view must readily acquiesce in the conclusion reached by the hon. member, and I think he might have gone further and shown that it was perhaps somewhat due to Newfoundland that we Canadians should give to her a larger share of consideration, inasmuch as we frustrated the treaty that, at least in the opinion of the people of Newfoundland, would have materially added to their commercial welfare. I allude to the Bond treaty which would have been completed with the United States if it had not been for the intervention of Canada. It was considered at the time, and no doubt correctly, that our interests were so intimately concerned in that question that had Newfoundland completed that treaty with the United States, we should have been at a serious disadvantage. The statements of the hon. gentleman are worthy of great consideration and I have no doubt that they will receive the earnest attention of the government if these negotiations have to be reopened.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Coming from one of the maritime provinces which has done considerable trade with Newfoundland, I have a great deal of sympathy with the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Fredericton. It appears to me that we are in the dividing of the ways, as it were, between Canada and Newfoundland at the present time, and unless some extra efforts are made to bring about the union of that province with the rest of Canada, the longer it is delayed the more difficult it will be to accomplish that end. I know that there has been already a little friction between Newfoundland and Canada in reference to trade relations—the efforts that they have made, which have been already referred to in the direction of establishing closer trade relations with the United States. The interference of Canada has caused in Newfoundland somewhat of a bitter feeling towards us, and it would be well for us to consider, as a people, whether it is not wise to endeavour, as far as possible, to conciliate the people of Newfoundland and induce them to come into the union. In my opinion a few thousand dollars, or possibly a few million dollars, is only a small consideration compared with the great advantage it will be to Canada for all time to come to have that important province a part of the confederacy. It lies just at the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and if any trouble should arise between England and other foreign powers, it will be of the utmost importance to the British Empire, and especially to Canada, to have control of that province. So far as the financial part of the terms of union is concerned, the history of Prince Edward Island and of Canada must show that it does not matter very much what terms you make with Newfoundland. Time will regulate these matters and bring about a satisfactory arrangement before very long. If you grant what you consider to-day exorbitant terms to Newfoundland, in 20 years time the probability is that you will find Newfoundland complaining that she is not getting fair play with the rest of Canada as I think we have already shown in this House that has been the case with Prince Edward Island, although when she was admitted into the Dominion the terms of union were considered fair, just and liberal. After 20 years' experience, it has been found that large expenditures of public moneys in Ontario and Quebec and the North-west have largely over-balanced the expenditures which have been made in the smaller provinces, and so it will be in regard to Newfoundland. We know that for many years to come large expenditures of money must be made, not only in the North-west and British Columbia, but also in Ontario and Quebec. Agitation is going on all the time for the expenditure of large amounts of money for the improvement of canals, extension of railways and matters of that kind, which will continue to grow, and if we extend to Newfoundland to-day terms which we consider more than liberal and just to that province the time is not far distant when circumstances will occur which will regulate and equalize the expenditure for that province with the rest of the Dominion. Perhaps there is no province in Canada that the union with Newfoundland will benefit more than Prince Edward Island. You are aware that Prince Edward Island is largely an agricultural province. We do considerable fishing at the same time, but a large amount of our agricultural produce now finds an outlet in the Newfoundland market. If she were admitted into the confederacy the duties which are now imposed on our produce in that country would be taken off and the result would be to increase our exports to that country very materially indeed. The flour imports into Newfoundland come largely from the United States; if confederation takes place with Newfoundland her imports of flour would almost wholly be from Canada. A very good argument has been used by the introducer of this question in reference to the value of Newfoundland as a cash customer. The argument has a feature which I have not heard expressed before, but it carries a great deal of force with it when we know that purchases made by Newfoundland will be purchases made for cash. It will be giving Canada a cash customer. The exports from Canada to Newfoundland for the year ending June, 1894, amounted to $2,494,605. The exports from Canada to all other dependencies of the British Empire, not including the British Islands, were $2,765,948 showing that Canada supplied Newfoundland in 1894 with nearly as much goods as she supplied to all the other dependencies of the Empire. The exports of Canada to all the other nations of the world excepting Britain and the United States amount to $5,460,652; the exports of Canada to Newfoundland amount to nearly half of that sum, showing that our trade with Newfoundland is worth one-half as much as the trade of all the rest of the world together excepting Great Britain and the United States. The exports from Prince Edward Island to Great Britain amounted to $283,208; from Prince Edward Island to Newfoundland $144,729, showing exports from Prince Edward Island to Newfoundland were more than one-half of the exports from Prince Edward Island to Great Britain. The imports from the United Kingdom into Newfoundland amount to $2,174,524; from Canada, $2,423,319; from the United States only $1,247,754, showing that to-day, with all the barriers against our trade with Newfoundland, we do a larger trade with Newfoundland than even the United States. I hope soon to learn that a greater effort will be made to bring Newfoundland into the confederacy, and if we have to spend a much larger sum than has already been offered to Newfoundland, I feel sure the time is not far distant when Canada will recoup herself and it will be a great blessing and benefit to Newfoundland as well as to the Dominion at large. We know this, that Newfoundland just now and for some time past has been suffering under a very great calamity. The fire, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, has been a great drawback and injury to that province, as the great fire which took place 20 years ago in St. John, N.B., was to that province, I doubt whether St. John, N.B., has yet recovered from the evil effect of the great fire up to the present day, and we ought to extend, on that account, some favours to Newfoundland to make up for their present depressed and exceptional circumstances owing to that great calamity. As I said before, time will equalize the claims and the demands of the different provinces, and the outlay will be all made good to Canada by the increased trade and the circumstances that may transpire hereafter.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am sure we will all be disposed to recognize the appropriateness of the fact that a living issue such as this has been introduced to the notice of the House, by the oldest senator in our Dominion, in fact, the Nestor of the Senate, and we are glad to know that it is a proof that he retains still, at his advanced age, a close connection with the living issues of the day. The suggestion contained in the motion is that it is advisable to open a correspondence with the Imperial Government and propose such joint assistance to the colony of Newfoundland as would enable it to enter this Dominion unembarrassed by financial difficulties. I think there is no very great difficulty in the adoption of a course such as that. The reasons for it are very patent, conclusive and powerful. In my estimation (and I think I do not stand alone in giving expression to such an opinion) very large amounts of money have been spent by this Dominion for purposes which would, comparatively, sink into insignificance when placed alongside an object so desirable as the incoming of the colony of Newfoundland into this grand federation of provinces. I hope that the hon. senator may be spared to see this project carried out in its integrity—that he may live to find Newfoundland embraced in the great sisterhood of provinces, which is destined one day, we all feel, and hope I am sure, to take a very prominent place among the nations of the world. The fact of the matter is, she has already done so to a very large extent. One of the reasons why I think this course should be adopted, and why we should not hesitate even to make very considerable, nay, large sacrifices, to attain the end proposed, is the exceptional situation of our sister colony. We all agree as to the importance of Newfoundland to the Dominion of Canada, and how essential it is that the colony should not by any chance fall into the hands of an alien power. Her commanding position at the mouth of the St. Lawrence renders it almost indispensable that she should some day or other become a member of this great Dominion. Then, again, Newfoundland is exceptional in her resources which the introduction of wealth would undoubtedly, in the course of time, develop. She has immense timber areas, rich resources of mines and fisheries, and as a matter of course, in her incoming to the Dominion, she would bring this wealth to us. I wish to emphasise what I have already said, that I think the government of the Dominion should not hesitate to adopt a course, even at considerable sacrifice, which would tend to secure so desirable an end as the introduction of Newfoundland to the sisterhood of provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The speech of the hon. gentleman from Fredericton was a little singular in one respect. It is a speech which is not likely to be paralleled in any other deliberative assembly in the world. The hon. gentleman, I believe, is nearly 92 years of age, and it is safe to say that no legislator of that age is likely to address any other legislative body in the world. As far as I am aware, the only legislator who approaches the hon. gentleman is Mr. Villiers, the senior member of the English House of Commons, whose age is about the same as that of the hon. gentleman who has brought this matter to the notice of the House; but I understand that Mr. Villiers never speaks in the House of Commons, so I think the hon. gentleman from Fredericton can claim to be a unique legislator in this respect. While that is perfectly true, and while we are all gratified to see our venerable colleague able to speak, and to speak in a way showing such strength and clearness of mind as his speech to-day did, still that does not oblige us to endorse all the views expressed by him. I do not propose to make a speech. I have not made a preparation by study of the subject to speak on it; but I say that the gist of the hon. gentleman's speech is that it would be advisable on the part of the government of Canada to open up a correspondence with the Imperial government and to propose such joint assistance to the colony of Newfoundland as would enable it to enter this Dominion unembarrassed by financial difficulties. It must be borne in mind that in the course of the recent negotiations between the Government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland this very question came up. There was a sum of $2,000,000 which the negotiators on the part of Canada were not prepared to assume, and they united with the Newfoundland negotiators in making representation, to the Imperial government with a view to securing their aid in dealing with that amount. The Imperial government refused.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It was about $5,000,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought from the statement made in the Legislature of Newfoundland that it was only $2,000,000. At all events, the Imperial government, as I understand, refused absolutely to have anything to do with the matter or to enter into any pecuniary responsibilities on account of Newfoundland. So I fail to see that any good purpose would be attained by the government of Canada at the present time entering into correspondence with the Imperial government on that subject. If the Imperial government, at a time when those negotiations were at a critical stage declined to give any pecuniary assistance to Newfoundland, it is safe to say that it is not likely that they will give assistance now or in the immediate future. My own honest opinion is that the government of Canada offered reasonable and liberal terms to the Newfoundland delegates and the delegates refused to accept those terms; and consequently I feel that it is, to a certain extent, asking us to place ourselves in an undignified position to try and induce those people who do not wish to come in on reasonable terms to join us by offering them terms which are not reasonable. No doubt, it is a very desirable thing that Newfoundland should enter the confederation, but still Canada has contrived to live a good many years without Newfoundland, and in my humble judgment we can live a few years more; and I do not think that we should deal with her coming in as being absolutely necessary. Two or three hon. gentlemen have spoken of the singular and exceptional position of Newfoundland, located at the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, as being a reason why we should offer unduly generous terms to bring that island in. If Newfoundland were an independent country and proposed, or was willing, to come into the confederation, I could understand that argument, but Newfoundland is, like ourselves, a British colony, and as long as Britain rules the seas, it is not at all likely that any other nation will own Newfoundland. When England says that she is going to cut the tow rope and let Newfoundland go adrift, it may be time enough for us to take her in tow, but I do not think the time has arrived just now. My own belief is that if we wait, time will be on our side, and that perhaps within ten years Newfoundland will think the terms which she was not willing to accept this season quite reasonable and generous enough, and that she will come in. The substance of what I have to say is just this—that while the addition of Newfoundland to Canada might be a desirable thing, there is such a thing as paying too much for it, and the government offered quite enough.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not like the remarks of the hon. member from Halifax, coming as he does from Nova Scotia, because I thought at least on this question his feelings and interests were what Nova Scotia's generally are. Our venerable friend from Fredericton calls attention to the abortive efforts for Newfoundland's political reunion with us, and gives cogent reasons, by facts and figures why we with England should devise means for its entering the Dominion unhampered by financial difficulties. The door is not yet shut to negotiations. Let us seize the opportune moment in the spirit of greater generosity and then, with union accomplished prosperity must come to that ancient colony, increased lustre and greatness to Canada and greater strength and power to the Empire. In the maritime provinces we consider it almost of vital importance that Newfoundland should come into the confederation, and I believe that the people of Canada would say to-day that if it were a question of paying $5,000,000 more to bring Newfoundland into the confederation, if it were absolutely necessary they would prefer to pay that amount rather than leave her as she is now. This surely is a question of imperial importance. The admission of Newfoundland to the union would tend largely to the greatness of Canada, would round off the confederation with the oldest colony in North America, and, in that way, place us in a unique position as a Dominion of which we might well be proud. I am sure that I am but giving expression to the sentiments of truly loyal Canadians. They are the sentiments of the country at large, now finding expression in leading organs of public opinion, not only here, but in England. As we are now Newfoundland is a source of weakness to us. We lose more by Newfoundland being outside the confederation than the interest on $5,000,000 every year. Its isolated position is also a source of weakness to the empire. If Newfoundland sets up free trade what will our position be? If she should again attempt and succeed in any Bond-Blaine treaties where would we be, and how could we with any grace interfere? The Newfoundland fisheries alone are worth all that we would be required to give. If we could control the fisheries and the bait, where would the United States be and where would French claims be? I believe that question of the French shore interests would largely decrease in importance if we had possession of Newfoundland and could regulate the shore fisheries and the bait question as well. I believe the people of New England as well as of France would feel that their interest in our waters was largely diminished, because that bait question keeps the French shore matter alive. If the United States and France fail to get bait there, I believe it will not be long before we would cease to have any contending with our interests in Newfoundland or French shore rights. I do not believe with the hon. member from Halifax that we should wait until the people of Newfoundland got poorer than they are, and that then we can probably get them on the terms we have offered, or even more advantageous terms to Canada. I do not believe it is in our interest to take in the island in that way. We can afford to act not only justly, but generously to Newfoundland, and should do so if we want to make her an integral part and a prosperous part of Canada. Her fisheries are worth now over $7,000,000 a year, and to what extent can that be multiplied if they were in the hands of Canada, with freedom to our Lunenburg fishermen instead of being monopolized by a few merchants in Newfoundland, who wish to keep control of the fisheries and of the serfs under them, who get nothing for their services but the truck in the shops. The fishermen would feel the same independence as the fishermen of Nova Scotia do to-day, and the fisheries of Newfoundland would develop and become of far greater importance than they are at present retarding the prosperity and development of the great natural resources of her forests and minerals on the island. The wealth of the country, instead of being devoted to the development of the mines and forests is now principally concentrated along the shores in the fisheries. Not only have we to consider the island itself, but Newfoundland owns a large portion of the territory on the mainland, and it is important that we should own it. Our fishermen find great trouble when we go round the coast of Labrador, they find that they cannot freely enter the ports which Newfoundland claims, and we are driven out of there because Newfoundland controls that coast and exacts terms and regulations which absolutely prohibit us prosecuting our fisheries along that shore. Our fishermen in Nova Scotia especially are affected by it, and I repeat that since the failure of the recent negotiations, the people of Canada have arisen to a sense of what they have lost. Previous to that, we did not find the papers of the provinces of Canada expressing a positive opinion, but we find now public sentiment everywhere through Canada, the consensus of opinion of the press of Canada, in favour of union with Newfoundland. We feel that it is necessary to our development, necessary to our mercantile trade, necessary to our manufacturing and agricultural interests, and even if we have to pay the whole of the $5,000,000, Canada should do it rather than let Newfoundland remain out in the cold. Newfoundland would then advance in power and importance, the same as all the provinces of the Dominion. I repeat the Dominion wants no hard bargain, but to act justly and generously.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am not going to make any lengthy remarks on this question, but it occurs to me, is it desirable that Newfoundland should come into the union? I do not think that any man in Canada will say that it is not. If that is the case, it should not be a question of dollars and cents altogether. Is it not desirable that we should have British North America under one government from the Atlantic to the Pacific? The government of Canada may have offered fair terms, but I do not want the door closed. I think before long this country will insist on having British North America under one government. The people of Newfoundland are British and if it is going to be a matter of marriage, we should not squeeze them down to the last cent. The reason I am speaking at all is, because I believe there is a feeling of disappointment in the country that the door should be shut, that the negotiations should be at an end. I know there is a feeling that they want to deal reasonably in every respect with Newfoundland. They do not want to crowd these people down because they are in a bad financial position just now. It is true, we have nothing to spare to give away to anybody, but the people of Newfoundland are members of the British family and will become members of the Canadian family, and if we are going into a union, let us take them in on fair terms. I was glad to hear the hon. member from Fredericton address the House; he is the Nestor of the House, and long may he be spared to us. The senior member for Halifax says that we offered Newfoundland a fair inducement to join us. Perhaps we did, but supposing we had gone a little further, supposing they had got a little the best of the bargain to start with; while they are in financial difficulties, we should be generous and willing to extend them our protection as far as possible. It has been the boast of Canadians that we are going to have one half of this continent, that we are going to have British America from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Are we going to prevent it now? No patriotic man would refuse to give good terms to Newfoundland. War may not come in our time, but the time will come when Great Britain, or Canada, will be at war with some other country, and is it not necessary that we should be protected on the Atlantic coast as well as on the Pacific? I say yes, and I tell the government to-day that it is the feeling of the people of this country that we should not close the door, but that we should consider what we can do to bring Newfoundland into the confederation.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I had no intention of saying a word upon the subject, and even upon the risk of only echoing what has been said by the hon. member from Monck and the hon. member from Lunenburg, I desire to say that this is a question which affects the Empire at large. It is not only an imperial question, but it is one of vital importance to this country in particular, and I say it is not a question of dollars and cents. Even at the risk of getting very much worsted in the bargain, I would treat those people generously. I must say it seems to me that the course of the negotiations recently conducted indicates to some extent a lack of serious intention on the part of the delegates from Newfoundland to bring them to a successful termination. I think that is at the bottom of all the difficulty. I give our government credit for desiring honestly and seriously to arrive at fair terms with these people, but it must not be approached simply in a bargaining spirit, but with a broad statesmanlike view of the vital importance of that country to our Dominion, as a whole, and I for one would say sink dollars and cents if an object of such importance can be attained. I think the whole Conservative party, and a large proportion of the opposition, would have endorsed the successful issue of these negotiations on almost any terms whatever. The mercantile community, with whose views I profess to have a little acquaintance, would certainly have stepped a long way beyond the strict limits that the terms given to the other portions of the Dominion would have warranted, to see the negotiations brought to a successful issue. I think our government should be impressed with the importance of re-opening the negotiations at the earliest possible hour. The colony of Newfoundland is by no means out of the woods in a financial and fiscal view of the situation, and the time may come quicker than we anticipate when we will descend from the pedestal which we occupy and stretch out our hands and give terms which might be considered not only liberal but even lavish.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I join heartily in the complimentary remarks which have been made with respect to the hon. and venerable gentleman who has introduced this very important subject to the deliberation of the Senate. The clear and succinct manner in which he put his views before the House must have convinced every one who listened to him, that though he may be the Nestor of the Senate his mind is as clear and as bright to-day as it was in years gone by, and I express the hope of my colleagues in this House that he may be long spared to occupy the seat that he has so honourably and so long enjoyed in the Senate of Canada. I fully realize that in the inquiry which he has placed upon the notice paper, he has taken a line which has suggested itself to those who have had the honour of negotiating with the Newfoundland delegates, and probably I may be excused for dealing with that point for a few moments. He suggests in his reference that he will call attention to the unsuccessful negotiations with the colony of Newfoundland, and suggest whether it might not be advisable to open correspondence with the Imperial Government and propose such joint assistance to that colony as would enable it to enter into the Dominion unembarrassed by financial difficulties. It is just as well that we should hold this strong patriotic and national sentiment to which some of our fellow-citizens have given utterance, but in dealing with a question of this kind, as we have had to deal with similar questions in connection with other provinces, we had to keep somewhere within the line that guided the former negotiations in bringing into the Dominion the outlying portions of British America. Some hon. gentlemen differ from me in that particular view; I see one hon. gentleman shaking his head. Now, if the government had accepted the propositions which were made by the Newfoundland delegates, I have grave doubts as to whether the country would have accepted a bargain of that kind with the unanimity which seems to characterize those who have spoken on the subject. It must be borne in mind—and I am glad to have this opportunity to refer to it—that the statements which have appeared in the press with respect to the manner in which the Newfoundland delegates were received in Canada, that an attempt was made considering their financial difficulties to press them and to “screw them down,” as the expression has been, to the lowest possible amount, have not the slightest foundation for them. In the first place it was the Newfoundland people who suggested the conference in Ottawa through their Governor, and the Governor-General of this country, knowing, as every person in the Dominion who reads knows, that the Dominion government has ever been ready to enter into negotiations and to deal with that ancient colony in the most liberal manner possible in order to affect that rounding off of the Dominion, which we all as British subjects and British Canadians so much desire. We at once, and with pleasure, accepted the invitation to enter into negotiations on this important subject. There were, I may add here, applications to the Dominion before that, for an advance of a considerable sum of money to help them in their extremity, but our only answer to them was that we had no power given to us by the constitution, and that it was only by the action of parliament that we could loan or bestow money upon any country, and much as we desire to assist them, that we were hampered in that respect, and, I may add parenthetically, I think, very properly so. No such power should be given to any government, and under our free institutions it is by parliament and through parliament, by the votes of the representatives of the people alone, that we can extend help to any portion of the Dominion or to any individual. I am glad to see by a report in the newspapers that one member of the Newfoundland delegation, Mr. Morris, stated in the House that they were treated not only courteously here, but he thought they were treated liberally considering the position the government held towards the other provinces of the Dominion. That is in marked contrast to other references which have been attributed to gentlemen who came to Ottawa. Our position was simply this; we were willing not only to consider the terms which were indirectly offered to them in the past, but we were quite willing to go much beyond that. We offered to the people of Newfoundland a money consideration greater than any province in the Dominion received from us. We offered them other considerations, the details of which I shall not enter into now, but simply make the broad statement. We offered to assume some $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 of their debts; but their debt, present and prospective, amounts to about $16,000,000. We did precisely what my honourable and venerable friend suggests. We took into consideration the great importance to England that the union of Newfoundland and Canada would be and what would result from that union, thereby assuming all the responsibility that may devolve upon England in governing Newfoundland as a Crown colony or assisting it in its extremity. We proposed that England should, under the circumstances, come to the aid of Newfoundland directly in the way suggested by the hon. member who moved this motion, instead of indirectly in the way of assuming debts or assisting in carrying on the government of that country as it exists, or by reducing it to a Crown colony; and communications did pass between our government and that of England, asking them to assist in the very way suggested by the hon. gentleman. They declined doing so, and when we look at the position that England occupies to all the other colonies throughout the world, we must come to the conclusion that there must be good and sufficient grounds and a very strong case made out, for England's departing from her known policy of not granting direct aid to any colony. I wish the Senate to understand distinctly that the door is not closed. We propose to pursue the policy which has characterized this government for years past, consistently with the public revenue, and what we believe to be in the interest financially of this country, and what has equally as great an effect upon minds—that is the national sentiment. I believe, in a large section of this country, that they are willing to go even beyond the limits financially speaking, of what has been done in the past in order to round off this Dominion and bring the outlying colony into the Dominion of Canada. I feel and recognize, and everyone who has given the subject the slightest attention and study, must recognize the great importance of having that—I was going to say barrier,—having that difficulty removed which constantly presents itself in our negotiations with our neighbours across the line with reference to our great fishing industries. It is true that in connection with the action of Canada in reference to the Bond-Blaine Treaty they did feel a little chagrined that we should have interfered at all in their negotiations. I do not believe, from a study of that treaty, that they would receive the great benefits which they anticipated from it. There are restrictions in the wording of that treaty which, when studied and when applied to the practical operations of it, should it come into force, would show to the people of Newfoundland that they had not received that benefit from the United States that they anticipated, and I pointed that out to Mr. Bond during the negotiations in Halifax some three years ago, when the late Sir John Thompson, Mr. Chapleau and myself had an interview with the delegation from Newfoundland. Mr. Bond then stated that he had the promise of American statesmen that the meaning which they intended to give to that particular clause would be extended to them. It may have been uncharitable on my part, but I pointed out to him that he had a much better and broader view of American statesman than, I confess, experience had given to me, in dealing with a treaty or anything that was committed to paper in the way of a treaty, or in the matter of tariff. From my experience of Mr. Blaine as an American statesman, I observed that he had one grand idea that prevailed and was paramount in his mind in any negotiations that he had with any part of the world, and I know more particularly with Canada; if you were making a proposition to that statesman, the first question he would ask you would be "How does that affect the United States?" I could not help contrasting that with the position that had been taken—and I hesitated not to say so in his presence during the negotiation—by a number of men who called themselves Canadians. The first question with him was "How does this affect our country?" And if he could in any way show that it was not beneficial, his answer was plain and distinct "No," although they were 65,000,000 compared with our 5,000,000 of people. When I said to him, "Surely you are not afraid to compete with 5,000,000 Canadians with the extent of your territory and wealth, and the great ramifications of your industries." I was speaking of the coasting trade, and his answer was quiet and distinct, "England to-day has the coasting trade of the world except with our country, and we do not propose in this country to give that to you or to them." I point that out as the reason why I do not believe that if Mr. Bond, or those who represent Newfoundland, had gone to them and said "We want you to extend the words of this treaty" that they would have acceded to the proposition or listened to it for a moment. Now our attitude towards Newfoundland is to a certain extent sentimental, but there is something else as well. I agree with the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion that were we once united we would command a large part of the trade of that country, but it must be borne in mind that in connection with these articles which we have to export and which Newfoundland imports, we stand in precisely the same relation to Newfoundland as the United States or any other portion of the world does, and it is only a question as to whether Canada can produce that which is required for the sustenance of the people of Newfoundland as cheaply as they can in the United States, and whether the freight and carrying of it to that market is as cheap and the facilities as great here as there. If Newfoundland became a portion of the Dominion, the tariff wall would be broken down, and we should have free entry into their market, while the outside world would have the disadvantages of the Dominion tariff. That is where our indirect and direct advantage would be, but it must be borne in mind that though the importations into Newfoundland to-day realize to them a certain sum of money, it is not to be supposed that if a union took place we should have falling into the coffers of the Dominion the same amount as they raise to-day, because their policy is to impose specific duties from a free trade standpoint upon articles which they do not produce and which we do. Their highest duty is upon flour and upon those articles that they desire for the sustenance of their people; their duty upon that necessary article, sugar, is considerably higher than you can buy it for in the retail shops in this country to-day. It is $4.50 per cwt., which is over 4 cents a pound. If they came into the Dominion they would have the advantage that we have of the cheap articles necessary for sustenance. It is the same with tea. In this country tea is admitted free; in Newfoundland, for revenue purposes, it is pretty highly taxed. I forget what it is now, but the duty is high. However, I do not know that it is either profitable or desirable that I should enter into details in this debate. I hope that they may be able to emerge in a very short time from the financial difficulties in which they find themselves. How that is to be done I do not know, nor did I receive any satisfactory answer when I put that question to the gentlemen with whom we were negotiating. Borrowing will get them out of the difficulty for a little while, but unfortunately there is a day of reckoning approaching when they either have to pay the interest upon the loan, or the principal itself, and when that time arrives and their revenue falls, as it has been falling, they will be in a worse position than ever. I do not know any person who is better able to speak intelligently and correctly upon that point than the hon. member from Kennebec, as he has had something to do with the financial and monetary operations of that colony. However, let us hope, the door not being shut—and we intend to push forward as my hon. friend suggests—that we may induce the mother country to come to their aid some way or other, in order that the predictions of my hon. friend from Monck may be verified, that he may live long enough to see Newfoundland a part of the Dominion. There are many reasons which I could give, were I on the other side, why it should not be done. There are still greater reasons to my mind why we should persist in the policy we have been pursuing, and never cease until the whole of British North America is under the Dominion Government of Canada.

THE DESJARDINS CASE

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE rose to Inquire of the Government, at what date did the Governor in Council order the discharge of one Frédéric Desjardins, imprisoned in the Quebec jail under a sentence of the Court of Queen's Bench in October last, for having sold immoral books, and what were the reasons which decided such discharge?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—1. The release of Frédéric Desjardins on the 15th February last, was made on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice. 2. The prisoner had been sentenced on two counts, to three months' imprisonment on each count. The conviction was the first under the new law; and as the prisoner had served over four months it was considered that he had been sufficiently punished. The evidence went to show that the transaction had taken place in the ordinary course of business. One of the books was a medical work, or alleged to be, and the other a work of Zola's.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I would ask the Premier whether the Attorney General for the province was consulted?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As to what?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—As to the discharge of the prisoner and as to the whole case?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I could not answer that question, but I do know that whenever an application is made to the Minister of Justice for the commutation of a sentence, or remitting a portion of a sentence, the application is sent to the judges who tried the case or to the magistrate, for their report, and I am under the impression, although I speak subject to correction, that it was done in this case. I have had petitions sent to me praying for the relief of prisoners, and in no case has the Minister of Justice acted until after he has sent them, either to the magistrate who tried the case or to the judges of the court in which the prisoner was sentenced.

RETURNS TO ADDRESSES.

INQUIRIES.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to know when the papers relating to the British Columbia Penitentiary, for which I asked some days ago, will be laid on the table?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Since the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to this matter, I have asked the Minister of Justice, and he gives me the information that he has several clerks copying the evidence and that it would be laid before the House presently. I have not heard from him since; that is a few days ago.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I happened to meet one of the members of the House of Commons from British Columbia last evening, and he told me that a copy of the evidence which had been brought down in the other House, and which had been in the hands of the typewriters for several days, had been returned to their room, No. 16, in the House of Commons, and consequently, I inferred from that that they had got through with it.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Certainly, a copy was made for the House of Commons, and they are now making a copy for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I should like to know whether the documents relating to the harbour of Montreal for which I moved some days ago are ready yet?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have not inquired about it: I will make inquiry. The notice was sent over to the department which has them for preparation. I am in hopes that they will be ready soon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (L) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Boards of Trade." (Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

A POINT OF ORDER.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I desire to call the attention of the House to a mistake in the minutes. I find there are four items placed before the item number (5) which, by understanding, was to be the first Order of the Day. I presume it is a clerical error which can be easily rectified, and I therefore ask that it be placed at the head of the Orders.

The SPEAKER—It was understood that this item should be the first Order of the Day, and it will be called first.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the report from certain members of the standing Committee on Divorce.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I rise to a point of order. It is not competent for a committee, or any member of a committee, to resign without cause, except in certain cases which are specified. In support of my point of order I would desire to quote from Bourinot's edition, page 501 :—

If a member is desirous on account of illness or advanced age, to be excused from attendance on a committee, he should ask leave from the House through another member. Every member of a legislative body is bound to serve on a committee to which he has been duly appointed, unless he can show the House there are conclusive reasons for his non-attendance. If a member is not excused, and nevertheless persists in refusing to obey the order of the Houses, he can be adjudged guilty of contempt and committed to the custody of the Serjeant.

In England Mr. Speaker Sutton, on a proposition to discharge a member of a committee on the ground that he could not attend, for the purpose of substituting another, said:

That he could not find any trace of such having been the practice; he did not perceive any member had been left out, except it was by absolute parliamentary disqualification or physical impossibility of attendance; as to any other disqualification of attendance, there was, so far as his knowledge extended, no account of any case having arisen.

A member has been substituted for another in the Canadian Commons on account of the member originally appointed having acted as counsel for the parties interested in the matter before the committee; or on account of a member of his family being directly affected by the issue.

This, to my mind, is a very sound principle and should be followed strictly. It would lead to utter confusion, if a member of a committee, or a committee, in the middle of business can tender their resignation. Where would the legislation of the country go to? Holding these views, I think that the point of order is a sound one and the motion of the hon. gentleman is out of order.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Much as I regret it, I have to admit that there is a good deal in the point of order which the hon. gentleman has taken. I have always been in doubt whether a committee, whether collectively or individually, were able to resign their position. The points which have been taken and the cases which have been cited by the hon. gentleman seem to me to place that matter beyond doubt. I do not intend, therefore, to press my resolution and I am willing that it should be dropped.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not at all regret that the course taken will prevent any discussion in this House on what will be a very unpleasant subject, but before this matter is dropped, I claim as a right, not to make a speech, but to place on record the result of my searches of the journals of this House on the question of the communication on the Table, because I think it would be an unheard of injustice to allow statements which have been made in the document on the Table to go to the country without allowing gentlemen who are assailed in it an opportunity of putting their answer on record. I presume no fair-minded gentleman will object to what I propose to do.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I rise again to a point of order. I have asked for the ruling of the Chair and while that is still before the House I do not think anyone can interrupt.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is useless for the hon. gentleman to think he is going to prevent me from speaking on the question, for I will if necessary move the adjournment of the House, or get a friend to move it, and place my statement on record. But I thought the best way would be, before the question is dropped, to let me make this statement, in justice to a large number of the members of the Senate, and especially to myself. I do not want to make a speech which might not be acceptable to the House, but if the hon. gentleman will insist on the point of order and not allow me to read the statement which I have taken from our journals, I will move the adjournment of the House in order to do so.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—I do not insist upon the point of order.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The few remarks with which I wish to preface the statement, I have put in writing.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The point of order is before the House and if the hon. gentleman is allowed to go on and even read his remarks it will open up the whole question and make it eligible for every member of the House to discuss it. I think it would be very much better if His Honour the Speaker would decide the question of order and if the hon. member wishes to move the adjournment of the House, it would be the fairest way for all concerned. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman speaking if he wishes to do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it would be more proper if I were allowed to make the statement now. My desire in taking this course is to prevent discussion and I do it at the request of several members of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman must know from his own experience that the proceeding is altogether irregular. The hon. gentleman, as every member of the House, has a right to enter his protest on the journals, but I do not think he has a right, when a question of order is to be considered, to read an elaborate statement. It has never been the practice to read those protests in the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I know I am out of order, but I have asked the indulgence of the House. The whole of the proceedings are out of order, and if any member of the House objects to my reading the statement which I have prepared, I shall certainly take another occasion to do so, but there is nothing on the minutes now to protest against.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—After the point of order is disposed of, some hon. gentleman will move the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no point of order to decide. The question of order has been raised by the hon. member from Truro, and the hon. chairman of the committee has agreed to withdraw his document and therefore I understand the Speaker has no judgment to pronounce.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The chairman of the committee admitted that the point of order is well taken and it is the duty of the chair, unless some hon. gentleman has a different view, to rule the paper out of order.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think there is any necessity for ruling at all. There is an acceptance and it is dropped. That incident is over, therefore.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Then I move that the House do now adjourn. I make this motion for the purpose of reading the statement.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Can the hon. gentleman move the adjournment of the House and then speak?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Of course I can. It is a very strange thing that the hon. gentleman does not know it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is the first time I have seen it done. The usual way is to get some friend to move the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have no desire to provoke an unpleasant discussion on the communication referred to in the order of the day, which has been wisely dropped from our minutes, and I am therefore willing to forego my right to comment upon it, because I do not wish to say anything calculated to disturb the harmony and good-feeling that have always prevailed in this body on sectarian questions. But I have prepared a statement from the Journals of the Senate from the union of the provinces in 1867 until the present day, in regard to all applications for divorce in this chamber, which will speak for itself, and which I feel it my duty to place on record on the present occasion, in answer to the communication above-mentioned. The paper I hold in my hand, and which I shall read to the House, is a simple statement of facts from our journals.

In the session of 1867-68 the first bill for divorce presented to the parliament of the Dominion and the only one during that session, was in the case of one Whitaves, to which an amendment was moved to the motion for the second reading hostile to the principle of divorce a vinculo matrimonii by Senator Bureau, which was defeated by a vote of 34 to 17. This is the only instance in which I ever voted squarely against the principle of any divorce bill during the twenty-eight years I have been a member of the Senate. I have voted perhaps half a dozen times in all in connection with divorce bills, but always on questions of order or procedure. Having placed myself on record at the start, on the principle of absolute divorce, I made up my mind then to abstain for the future from voting one way or the other on such bills, and that I would leave them to the decision of hon. gentlemen who believed that divorces under certain circumstances were justifiable and proper—a rule to which I have strictly adhered during all these years. That bill was passed by both Houses.

In 1869 there were two applications for divorce before the Senate—Jones' Relief Bill (No. 40), on which the Senate committee reported adversely, and which was not therefore defeated in this chamber; and Stevenson's Relief Bill (No. 77) which passed the Senate by a vote of 30 to 17.

In 1870, we had only one divorce bill before us. That of one Martin, which the committee reported against.

In 1871, there were no petitions for divorce presented to Parliament.

In 1872, Martin made a second application for divorce (No. 70). The vote on the second reading of the bill passed in the Senate by 36 to 19. It passed through its various stages in this House by large majorities, but did not get through the Commons. It was the only Bill before the Senate that year.

In 1873, Martin's Relief Bill (No. 70) was again before Parliament, and was agreed to by both Houses, the vote in the Senate being 34 to 18.

In 1874, there were no divorce bills before us.

In 1875, Peterson's Relief Bill (No. 80) passed the Senate and Commons, the vote in this House being 34 to 18.

In 1876, Campbell's Relief Bill (No. 7), a celebrated case, was under the consideration of the Senate, where the second reading was affirmed on a vote of 33 to 14. During the investigation the feeling on the committee and in the Senate changed strongly against the petitioner and in favour of the wife, and the bill was altered to give her a divorce from bed and board, with alimony and the custody of children, which passed the Senate by the large majority of about two to one, but it did not get through the Commons. Religious sects and political parties were much mixed up together on the several occasions it was before the Senate.

In 1877, Mrs. Campbell's case was again before us, and it ultimately passed the Senate that session, but there was a strong feeling among the best parliamentarians then among us, that the procedure was altogether irregular. There were two close divisions on the bill of 31 to 31. I voted in these divisions, in which the bill was really opposed on points of order and want of jurisdiction. A protest, headed by Sir Alexander Campbell, was entered on the Journals of the Senate, which however I did not sign, and the bill sent to the Commons, where it was dropped. This is the only protest of the kind to be found on our Journals.

There was also this year the Bate's Relief Bill (No. 6), passed by the Senate without the "yeas and nays" being even asked for, and it became law.

The course pursued in the Bate's case of not even calling for names, became the rule thenceforward of the opponents of divorce on principle, and has been, with very rare exceptions, adhered to until the present day. The Roman Catholic senators virtually came to the conclusion among themselves not even to vote on divorce bills where Protestants alone were interested, but had their convictions respected, by mutual consent, by having all motions on such bills entered on the journals as carried "on division." I will show as I proceed how strictly this rule has been followed, and consequently how unjust are the charges now made against them, by the communication laid on our table, as well as by the newspapers that communication has misled.

In this year also two other divorce bills were before Parliament, viz., Holwell's Relief Bill (No. 37), and Scott's Relief Bill (No. 80) and both became law. In the Senate the "ayes and nays" were not even asked for in either case on any of the readings.

In 1878 the following divorce cases were before the Senate: Hunter's Relief Bill (No. 29), Johnston's Relief Bill (No. 22) and Lyon's Relief Bill (No. 24). All became law, and all passed their several readings in the Senate without any vote being recorded against them.

In this year, Mrs. Campbell presented a petition to sue in forma pauperis, but the standing orders committee reported that the rules of the House had not been complied with, and the application dropped.

In 1879 Mr. Campbell again petitioned for divorce from bed and board, with alimony and custody of children. A motion made and seconded by Senators Cornwall and Penny to refer the bill to the Supreme Court for its decision on points of law, was lost and the bill ultimately passed both Houses.

In 1880 and 1881, there were no divorce bills before the Senate, so far as I can discover.

In 1882, there was Gardner's Relief Bill (No. 41) before the House. The second reading passed without the "ayes" and "nays" being asked for, but the bill was abandoned by the petitioner before the committee, who reported accordingly.

In 1883, Nicholson's Relief Bill (No. 63) was the only one before us. It got its second reading in the Senate without the "ayes and nays" being demanded, but it was dropped in committee.

In 1884, Graham's Relief Bill (No. 28) passed the Senate and Commons. There was no vote taken against it in the Senate. This was the only bill that session.

In 1885, the following divorce bills were before the Senate. Davis Relief Bill (No. 31), Evan's Relief Bill (No. 40), Hatzfield's Relief Bill (No. 53), all of which became law, and passed the Senate without the "ayes" and "nays" being asked for in any case. Also Smith's Relief Bill (No. 92), which was read a second time without "ayes" and "nays" being asked for in the Senate. This bill was dropped before the committee, who recommended a return of the fee. Also Terry's Relief Bill (No. 100), which passed all its readings in the Senate without the "ayes" and "nays" being asked for, and became law.

In 1886, there was but one divorce case before parliament, viz.: Bissell's Relief Bill, which went through all its readings in the Senate without names being asked for.

In 1887, there were five divorce bills before parliament, viz., Ash's Relief Bill (No. 3), Lavell's Relief Bill (No. 65), Montie's Relief Bill (No. 76), Noel's Relief Bill (No. 80), Riddell's Relief Bill (No. 109), all of which became law, the "ayes" and "nays" not being asked for on the readings of any one of them.

In 1888, there were five divorce bills presented to this House. Irving's Relief Bill (No. 51), which passed all its readings without the "ayes and nays" being asked for; Tudor's Relief Bill (No. 119), on which there was a division of yeas 32, nays 19, on the third reading; Middleton's Relief Bill (No. 65) which passed the second reading and was sent to committee without the "ayes" or "nays" in any motion, but was dropped before the committee; and White's Relief Bill (No. 113) reported against by committee, but no "ayes" or "nays" called for in the Senate.

In 1889, there were Bagwell's Relief Bill (No. 8) which passed all its readings in the Senate without names being asked for; Lowry's Relief Bill (No. 65) on which there was a division, on the third reading, of 28 yeas and 23 nays; Rosamond's Relief Bill (No. 97), withdrawn by petitioner and reported by the committee as dropped; and Wand's Relief Bill passed by Senate and Commons—without "ayes and nays" being asked for in this House.

In 1890, there was Walker's Relief Bill (No. 125), which passed both Houses after a division in the Senate on the third reading, of 23 to 16.

In 1890 there was also the only case in which the Senate ever rejected the report of a committee, the case of the Clapp Relief Bill (No. 23), during the last twenty-eight years, the vote being contents 8, non-contents 35, among the majority being 14 of the leading Protestant members of the Senate.

In 1891, there were four applications for divorce, viz., Bristow's Relief Bill (No. 14); Ellis' Relief Bill (No. 43); Russworm's Relief Bill (No. 109); and Tapley's Relief Bill, all of which passed the Senate and Commons, with no "ayes and nays" asked for on any of the readings of any one of them in this House.

In 1892, there was Aikin's Relief Bill

Bill (No. 2), which passed the Senate and Commons, without any record of a hostile vote in the Senate; the Bennet Relief Bill (No. 6) reported against by the committee without any adverse vote in the Senate; the Donigan Relief Bill (No. 27); and the Harrison Relief Bill (No. 28); both of which passed the Senate without an adverse vote on any of their readings; also Mead's Relief Bill (No. 49), and Wright's Relief Bill (No. 88), both of which passed the Senate and Commons in precisely the same way as stated in regard to the last two mentioned cases.

In 1893, there were seven divorce cases before parliament; Balfour's Relief Bill (No. 5); Ballantyne's Relief Bill (No. 6); Doran's Relief Bill (No. 36); Goff's Relief Bill (No. 43); Hebden's Relief Bill (No. 54); Heward's Relief Bill (No. 55); Schwaller's Relief Bill (No. 87)—all of which passed the Senate and Commons—with no hostile vote on the several readings of any one of them in this House.

In 1894, Dillon's Relief Bill (No. 33) excited the hostility of some of the Roman Catholic senators, as both the petitioner and respondent were Roman Catholics, and their marriage had been entered into according to the rites of their church. There were several close divisions on this bill, but I did not vote against it. Had I done so, it would have been defeated, for it passed the Senate by only a majority of one, and became law. The vote stood 21 to 20 on the last division, and several Roman Catholics did not vote.

There were also this year, Downey's Relief Bill (No. 40), the second and third reading, and all other motions passed the Senate without the "ayes and nays;" Piper's Relief Bill (No. 106), and Thompson's Relief Bill (No. 131), the several readings of which passed the Senate without the "ayes and nays" being called for.

In 1895, the present year, although six or seven divorce bills have been before the Senate no opposition has been offered in the Senate, except in the Odell case, where the wife is a Catholic, and in which a postponement only has been ordered to await judicial proceedings in the highest court in the Dominion. This was done by a vote of 28 to 24, five Protestant senators, including the Prime Minister, voting with the majority.

Here is the record. I have been careful in my searches, and I don't think I have omitted anything, but if I have inadvertently done so, and if other cases can be found, I am quite sure they will only add to the strength of my statement.

The fact is, then, according to the record, that with one single exception, namely, Clapp's case in 1890, no application for divorce, since confederation, whether from Protestant or Catholic, has been rejected by the Senate, that has been favourably reported by a divorce committee invariably composed of Protestants. The vote being as already stated 34 against 8—with 14 Protestants in the majority.

I have now only to express the hope that the newspapers which published unjust statements against certain members of this House will, as a matter of fairplay, give equal publicity to this epitome of facts in reply to the unjust charges published against them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to add a few words to the very calm and deliberate remarks made by my hon. friend from Richmond, and I hope I will do so in the same good temper that he has shown. Hon. gentlemen who have read the newspapers recently published will have noticed that a very unfair and unjustifiable attack has been made upon the Catholic members of the Senate in respect to their alleged aggressive policy during the last 25 years. They have taken up the echo from the report of the committee. I will read one of them to show you that the grievance we complain of is a real one. Comments were made in the Globe, Montreal Herald, the Gazette, and Ottawa papers and the press all over the Dominion, and I will read to the House a sample of these reports. The article I have before me is from the Ottawa Journal:

That on the ground of their private denominational belief, the Roman Catholic senators use their public positions to effect injustice against persons of other denominational beliefs. There is no stop to such a principle short of inquisitional fires.

It goes on in the same strain:

Catholic senators might be pardoned if they merely voted against the applications of Catholics for divorce, although even then the question would arise whether public men morally bound to honour the constitution of their country could rightly refuse for private denominational reasons to allow any citizen of the country the proper benefit of its laws. But when it comes to Catholic senators constantly and coldbloodedly blocking on private Catholic grounds the rights to Canadian law of people who are not Catholics, the matter is one that should be remedied promptly and thoroughly by the government of the country. The Catholic senators should let alone the legal and constitutional rights of the Protestant part of the people. If they will not let these alone, it is the government's duty to interfere.

Further on the report reads :

The majority of the Senate committee on divorce have done well to resign in order to bring to an issue the constant blocking by Catholic senators of law and the constitution without public sense or reason.

I think, after listening to these extracts, that those of us who have read similar comments in the papers will feel that it has been a very unfair and unjustifiable attack on the minority of the chamber. That minority, whatever may be their view, and feelings on the subject, recognize that a majority in this chamber differ from them and I now state—and the record will bear me out—that on no occasion have the Catholic senators of this House opposed a divorce bill except on substantial grounds, on legal grounds, on grounds that have been held to be good elsewhere. I will just succinctly state, in confirmation of what the hon. gentleman who read his paper says, that since confederation there have been eight cases rejected. Of those eight cases six were rejected by the committee who reported against the bill. One was rejected by the Senate. The vote stood in that case eight for and thirty-five against, and a number of Protestants voted against the bill. There was one rejected by the House of Commons. The Catholic members took exception to it and it was rejected there by a vote of 70 against 35. Thirty-seven Protestant gentlemen in the House of Commons voted against it, so that it cannot be said that in any one of those cases the Catholic element had anything whatever to do with whether the bill passed or was rejected. In the House of Commons the lawyers in that case took precisely the ground that the opponents of the bill took here. It was in the year 1890. There was a great deal of interest manifested in the case here. That was the Emily Walker case. Sir John Macdonald, in speaking on that case said :

There is a great deal to be said for the position taken by the Catholic Church against divorce in any case; but looking at the statement we find in the Scriptures that for the cause of adultery divorce should be allowed. I have always voted in that direction. But I will steadily oppose in every possible way any further extension of the rule. My hon. friend says that if a bill of this kind is refused, it would cause an excitement in the country for the establishment of divorce courts. I am opposed to the establishment of divorce courts; I think it has had a bad effect in England; and I am well satisfied that our practice should continue. But if we had a divorce court established to-morrow it would decide according to law, and according to the law of England; and according to the law of divorce as known in England, and as it exists, therefore, in this country, there would under that court be no relaxation of the rule as known and established both in England and in the British Empire generally. On the other hand, if there is to be any laxity, if this legislature is going to adopt the course taken by too many of the state legislatures of the United States, I would go in immediately for the establishment of a divorce court. A court of judges learned in the law, who would decide according to the law of England.

In that particular case the divorce committee felt very much grieved, no doubt, at their report being thrown out by the House of Commons; but that was the opinion of Sir John Macdonald on the subject. I must read the opinion of Mr Dickey, who was quite positive :

This is not a case in which there is any element, so far as I can see from the evidence, that would justify this House in assisting her to dissolve the marriage.

Were the Catholic members right in voting as they did in that case? I do not think that their conduct can be scrutinized when the members of the House of Commons took the same view. Then, in reference to the case on which there were divisions in this House; in the Campbell case the division was not on account of religious belief at all, because in the minority were Allen, Almon, Campbell, Kaulbach, McClellan, Macdonald, Simpson, Pozer and Vidal. So, the Catholics were not an element in the consideration of that case. In the Susan Ashe case, the division was on special grounds that were named and they were supported by two members of the committee, Mr. Haythorne and Mr. Dickey. The chairman of the committee, Mr. Kaulbach, also voted against the bill, but Mr. Dickey and Mr. Haythorne were members of the committee. That is the only case in 1887 there was any opposition to. In 1888 there was a division, but it was favoured by the Protestant element and not the Catholic element at all. It was the Eleanor Tudor case. On that division were McInnes (B.C.), Macdonald (B.C.) and MacFarlane who were members of the committee. Would it not be most unreasonable to say those gentlemen, having heard the evidence and formed opinions, should be precluded from expressing those opinions when it came to this chamber? There was really no opposition to any of the cases except for cause. In 1891 there was an amendment, moved to the Ellis case by Mr. McCallum, seconded by Mr. Cochrane. It was not instigated by the Catholic members, and the bill underwent some change in the other House. In 1892 five cases were before the House and there was no opposition. In 1893, 7 cases and no opposition; in 1894, 6 cases and no opposition except in the Dillon case, and I do not hesitate to say that the grounds taken were perfectly sound, and if the party had been a Protestant he would not have been granted a divorce. I suppose, unfortunately, a feeling crept into the chamber, but finally he was granted the bill, although it was refused at first. On the second occasion there were more members present who voted for the bill and not so many opposed it, and the hon. gentleman from Halifax discussed it on the question of the abandonment of the wife. I quoted some English cases which decided that where a man places his wife in such a position that she was likely to be tempted, the court refused him the divorce. In this case the petitioner left and went to England and was absent for some time. I think it was an extreme case, more especially under the circumstances. Then there were the two cases before us this session. In the first case the petitioner himself was an appellant before the Supreme Court, and that, of itself, ought to have precluded the Senate from considering his case. Now, in order to show how much we were guided in the early days by the courts, the very first case that came before this Senate after confederation was in 1868, Mr. Whitehead's case. I think Mr. Allan was chairman of the committee and they were guided entirely by the exemplification of the judgment of the court in the other provinces, which they refused to take cognizance of it the other day, but in the former case the committee granted the divorce. In the early days, after confederation, we did rely to a very considerable extent on the courts for any assistance or information that could be obtained from the judgments to be found there. Hon. gentlemen must recognize the fact unless they are ipso facto in favour of the principle of divorce, (and I doubt if any of them are, wholly apart from the religious aspect of the question) that it is not in the interests of the country that the domestic tie should be too freely broken up. Experience teaches us in all countries, that the greater the facilities for divorce the greater the number of cases you have. We have had 56 since confederation, and 18 of them have come up in the last three years. It is evident that the numbers are increasing, and it ought rather to be a source of satisfaction to hon. gentlemen if there was something of a brake placed upon the granting of divorces, and that we should not grant them too freely. In the case on which there was a division the other day, we felt that it was an innovation to relieve the petitioner entirely from the payment of the fee and allow her to proceed in forma pauperis. It was said that there were several cases in point. There was not a case in point. Mrs. Campbell was allowed to obtain her divorce without the payment of money, but it must be recollected that her husband paid $200; and there was an application on his part to get the money back and Parliament would not give it to him. That was an important factor in influencing the House to allow her to proceed without the payment of this fee. The Campbell case was before the Senate for four years; the first year it was an application from Campbell. The committee converted it into a recommendation that she should not be granted a divorce a mensa et thoro, and that a certain amount of money should be paid to her. It did not go through at first, but was finally granted. In reference to the other cases where money was returned, it has been the rule of Parliament where ordinary bills are brought which only go a certain distance, to return the fee. That was done in a number of cases rejected by the committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is the balance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. We entered our protest against allowing cases of that kind to come in forma pauperis, as being very improper and offering great inducements to persons to apply for divorce. We stated there was no practical precedent for it. The case of Mrs. Campbell could not be quoted, and the other cases had no relevance whatever: it was simply a return of so much of the money. Now I do not propose to go into this matter further than to express the hope that those newspaper men who have so libelled the Catholic members of the Senate should, on hearing this proper explanation, withdraw the charges. I am sure the gentleman who drew up this report did it hastily without looking into the record of cases. I am sure, from the kindly feeling those gentlemen have always evinced towards the majority, that they would not desire to place them in a false position, and I for one was quite glad when it was proposed to withdraw this report, but it was only fair to those who had been so maligned and abused outside the chamber, that a correct statement should go abroad in order that our position might be justified.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I am not at all sorry that a statement of facts has been read by the hon. member from Richmond after what has taken place in this chamber. It is but fair that some such action should be taken to place the matter fairly and squarely before the House and the country, to show that the minority in the Senate are not altogether guilty of what has been stated in the press, although there may be some of them that feel that they are doing their duty in opposing divorce. The first speech that I ever made in this House was on a divorce matter. I then said it was unfair and unbecoming of any Catholic in this House to vote against a bill to divorce a Protestant. I said, moreover, that when a man or woman comes to this court—because this is the only court they have, and we are all judges—we should not question them as to what church they belong to. We should have nothing to do with that; they come to the court and ask relief, and that relief should be given to them if the evidence is sufficient to show that they are entitled to it. I say further as a Catholic, that I can vote for a divorce bill as a member of this court, without interfering in any shape or form with my duty to my church, because I am not sent here to show my personal feelings, I am here to vote according to the evidence brought before me. That being the case, from the day I came here I have always taken the same course. I advised my fellow Catholics not to interfere with the rights of Protestants and I am pleased to see that the member from Richmond has shown that we are not guilty of what we are accused of, and that a number of Protestant gentlemen, as well as the Catholics, are opposed to divorce. It has been stated that no Protestant senator had anything to do with the opposition to those divorces, but that is not right, because several of them feel that it is not proper that divorces should be granted here. Last year I was away when the Dil'on Divorce Bill was rejected in this House by a very small majority. A member spoke to me about it. I said it was unfair for people who did not believe in divorce under any circumstances to interfere with those bills, and that I would vote for the re-introduction of that bill in the House for the purpose of giving the petitioner fair play before this court; but I also told him that when it came up in the House I would not vote for the bill. I kept my word. When it came to be restored to the order paper I voted that the petitioner should be allowed to come in and get fair play.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I voted with you on that occasion.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—So it must not be put down that we are so bigoted that we would not allow any one to have rights in this House who does not feel as we do. I am not one of those who take that stand and never will be, and I am pleased now that my hon. friend from Richmond and the leader of the opposition have made a plain statement of the facts. It is just as well that the country should know that we are not as bad as we are painted.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) resumed the debate. He said:—I was very much pleased this afternoon with the calm and broad spirit in which the hon. gentlemen from Richmond, from Ottawa and from Toronto discussed the question before the House. They dealt with it in a manner that must have commended itself to every hon. gentleman here, and I will endeavour to follow the good example set me in that regard. The hon. gentleman from Richmond and the hon. gentleman from Ottawa, cited a great number of cases—in fact I think he went back to the beginning of confederation and cited every divorce case that came before this House. As a member of that committee, and one who saw fit to attach his name to the communication which is now under discussion, I felt it only due to myself and the House to give my reason for taking that step. The cases which the hon. gentlemen cited here to day were not at all parallel to the one that came before the House a week or ten days ago, in fact there is no analogy whatever between the cases. Every case that the hon. gentlemen cited was one in which the evidence had been brought down and placed in the hands of the hon. gentlemen in this House, so that they were in almost as good a position to form a judgment as the committee who heard and took the evidence. This report that was submitted about 10 days ago to the Senate was approved by the committee unanimously, with one exception, after hearing counsel on both sides for over two hours. The committee, in order to be thoroughly seized with all the facts connected with the case, set a day apart to suit the convenience and at the request of counsel on both sides. We heard the legal aspects of the question argued fully, and with the exception of one member of the committee we were unanimous in recommending to the House that the case be proceeded with. Hon. gentlemen who were here on that occasion will remember that when the report came before the Senate for consideration, the majority reversed the decision of 8 out of 9 members of that committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Seven out of nine.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I beg the the hon. gentleman's pardon; the hon. gentleman from Shell River voted with the majority in the committee and the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg himself was the only member who dissented.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The original chairman was not present. I am right as to the number.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—After hearing the case, the report was approved of by, at any rate, seven out of the nine members. The report made here was different from any that have been referred to in the cases cited by the hon. gentlemen from Richmond and from Ottawa. In all those cases, hon. gentlemen had the evidence before them; in this case they had no evidence, yet the House, without evidence, without having heard the arguments of counsel on either side, without hesitation reversed the deliberate judgment arrived at by a large majority in the committee; not only that, but in a most imperative way they ordered the committee to reverse their decision. While I am always willing to bow to the will of the majority of this House, I claim that it was placing the members of that committee in a most degrading and humiliating position. To be ordered to reverse our deliberate judgment and to bring in a report contrary to our judgment, contrary to the arguments which had convinced our minds, was placing the committee in a very humiliating position, and I made up my mind that I should never be placed in such a position again and even if I should be taken in charge by the Serjeant-at-Arms, I should refuse ever to submit to such an indignity again. (Cries of "order.") I am perfectly in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman means he will not be a party to such a report again.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I will not serve on the committee—that is what I mean and what I intend to do. Let me give a parallel case by way of illustration; a suit before one of our courts. The arguments are heard by a jury who spend hours in listening to both sides and bring in a certain verdict: suppose outsiders, who never heard any of the arguments, should reverse the verdict of the jury, would not hon. gentlemen here consider it an extraordinary thing to do? Yet that is the position in which the majority of the committee felt themselves placed. Had it been a case in which the evidence had been adduced and submitted to the House, I for one would not feel offended, but in this case we are the judges, and I claim the only competent judges, to decide whether it was a case that should be proceeded with or not. When a jury is empanelled, I understand it is the right, and not only the right but the duty, of counsel whenever they know that a juryman has preconceived ideas in connection with the case that is to come before him, or has in any way expressed an opinion upon it, to immediately challenge him and have his name struck off the list. That is the practice in our courts, and a very just and proper one it is. We were acting as judges on that committee. We went there without having any leaning for or against the petitioner or the respondent. We judged the case on its merits, as far as we possibly could, and made a recommendation which the House rejected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You did not hear the merits.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—We heard the statements of counsel. If we had acted hastily, or without due consideration, it would have been different, but we gave everyone a full opportunity to be heard. Every hon. gentleman when he is appointed to this House, as I understand it, assumes all the responsibilities and all the privileges attached to the position, and I claim that if the large majority of the committee have forfeited the confidence of the House they should be allowed to resign and let those who so strongly opposed our report be placed on that committee. We have divorce courts in some of the provinces and if I mistake not some of the judges who preside in those courts are Roman Catholics. Will it be said for a moment, if a divorce case came before a Roman Catholic judge in Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, or British Columbia, that he would not be in duty bound to try that case?

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—It would be against the law.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I will read the remarks of one of the most respected members in the House, a gentleman who is looked upon as a liberal and fair minded man in every sense of the word, and who is also a Roman Catholic. I refer to the Senate Debates for 1889, at page 294. The hon. gentleman from Alexandria moved the six months' hoist in the Lowry divorce case. That was discussed for a considerable length of time and the late Mr. Carvell, late Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, expressed himself in the following words :

Hon. Mr. CARVELL—While sympathizing very largely with the mover of the amendment, I rise to ask this honourable House to excuse me from voting, because I have not seen the evidence. I understand that it is the proper thing to furnish every member of the House with a copy of the evidence. I have not seen it, or been able to read it, and therefore, I cannot vote upon the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I did move the six month's hoist in that case, and did so because I did not think the evidence justified this House in granting a divorce, and I may say further, that I was agreeably surprised and satisfied when I found that the Right Hon. Sir John Thompson in the House moved the six months' hoist to the bill on the same grounds.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I have no fault to find with the hon. gentleman from Glengarry for the course that he took on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That is the only case in which I ever voted in this House on a divorce case.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I do not want the hon. gentleman to imagine that I find fault with what he did on that occasion, but after Mr. Carvell had delivered himself, the Hon. Mr. Smith, now Sir Frank Smith, made the following remarks, to which I wish hon. gentlemen to pay particular attention :

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I rise to take the same position as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island; I have not read the evidence, and am not, therefore, prepared to vote one way or the other. My feeling is that in these cases, the Senate is a court; the law of the land allows people who seek relief of this character to apply to us for divorce; the Senate has seen proper to appoint a committee to investigate these cases. The House, I believe, has exercised a wise discretion in selecting the best men to form a committee, inasmuch as the law of the land permits divorce under certain circumstances, though I conscientiously believe that divorce should not be granted at all. I would be disregarding my duty as a member of the Senate if I were to vote against the report without knowing anything of its merits. I do not take the ground that I have no right to vote here on such a bill; I think I have. Although the church to which I belong is opposed to divorce under any circumstances, I say that if I were a member of that committee, and the evidence, to my mind, was sufficient to warrant the petitioner in seeking relief, and good reason was shown why separation should take place, I, as a member of that court, acting in a judicial capacity, which have a right to vote yea or nay on that subject. I do not bring my conscience in. I have no right to bring my conscience in here to deprive any person of a right which the law of the land affords him. I have taken that ground ever since I became a member of the Senate. I feel that way now, but inasmuch as I am not familiar with the details of this case I think it would be unreasonable and unjust to vote against the report. If it is possible for the committee to afford members of this House an opportunity to read the evidence in those unfortunate cases, perhaps it would be better for us all that it should be inclosed in an envelope to each member of this House, so that he could inform himself of the facts before being called upon to vote.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—The evidence was circulated.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—Not in an envelope. As an ordinary printed document one may take notice of it or not. I do not speak for myself alone, but for many other members of the House who have not read the evidence and are obliged to take the report of the committee. Most members of the Senate will accept the report of the committee and if it was a matter I was in the habit of voting upon, I would consider the committee a safe guide; but still the evidence should be in the hands of everyone who is called upon to consider the bill. There may be "put up jobs;" no doubt, there are such cases, and I think the more difficult it is to obtain a divorce the better. No Catholic comes here to ask for a divorce. When we are joined together we know that it is until death parts us, but that is no reason why Roman Catholics should come in here and deny to other people, who view the matter in a different light, the rights which the law grants them. I, for one, am not prepared to do it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The speech of the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Smith) explains a circumstance which has sometimes puzzled me. To my knowledge, he is a clear-headed, business-like man, and a conscientious man; and I have often wondered how it was that he supported some of the Government measures that have been brought before this House. His speech just now explains it. He says that when he comes here he leaves his conscience behind him.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I say that every man that comes here should do as a citizen of the land. He has no right to let his conscience stand between him and his plain duty as a citizen—he has no right to let his religious scruples prevent him from giving to every citizen the rights that the law of the land affords him. It is on the same principle that a Catholic judge acts when he is appointed to preside in a court of law. When a matter comes before him that he conscientiously thinks is not right, does he permit that to interfere, with the discharge of his duty? No. He administers the law as he finds it.

When the division was taken the vote stood 28 for the report of the committee and 23 against it. Every Roman Catholic in the chamber (the hon. gentlemen from Toronto, and from Richmond, and some others absented themselves) voted against the bill. The hon. gentleman from Truro, the junior member from Halifax, and the late Hon. Mr. Stevens voted with the minority, but not one Roman Catholic voted with the majority. I cannot imagine a fairer or more sensible view to take of the situation than that which the hon. gentleman from Toronto described in the speech which I have quoted. I do claim that it is placing those of us who believe differently from our Roman Catholic friends in a very awkward position, and, I say it in all kindness, I do think, unless the Roman Catholic members of this House have undeniable evidence that a divorce should not be granted, they should refrain from taking any part in the proceedings. If they persist in taking the course they have hitherto pursued, I claim it is the duty of this House to insist that they shall serve on the Divorce Committee. If the present committee, or any other committee that may be formed, are not discharging their duty properly, I should like to see Roman Catholic members appointed to take our place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a parliamentary rule that no one who is opposed to a principle should act on a committee that deals with it.

Hon. Mr. McINNIS (B.C.)—I can assure the hon. member from Ottawa that there are men on that committee to-day who are conscientiously opposed to granting divorces. I know two for whom I can speak. But they recognize the duty they owe the House and have served on the committee. One outcome which I think will result from the action of the House in forcing the majority of the committee into a certain position will be the establishment before very long of a divorce court, either here in Ottawa for the provinces that have no divorce courts, or one in each of the provinces that require them. I am perfectly satisfied, notwithstanding the views held by others, that it would not increase the number of divorces. I have been a member, almost continuously, of the divorce committee for the last 13 or 14 years, and I am perfectly satisfied that in a number of cases that came before us, some years ago, where divorces were granted, a legal tribunal would not have granted them at all. I am as much opposed to the dissolution of the marriage tie as any one except for the one cause which we recognize as ground for divorce. I believe if that were made the only cause for divorce, the number would not be increased by the establishment of a court. Hon. gentlemen have referred to the enormous number of divorces granted on the other side of the line, but people can get divorces there for a variety of causes. I have heard of a lady who applied for a divorce because her husband's toe nails were long and scratched her. Other cases have occurred where the wife would not sew on buttons for her husband and a great many trivial things like that, besides incompatibility of temper are admitted as grounds for separation. I am satisfied that the number will not increase if we grant divorce for adultery only, and it will be the means of keeping a great many Canadians at home who now go to the United States for relief instead of seeking a divorce here at enormous cost. They will remain at home and apply to our own courts for divorce instead of going over to the United States. Some 60 or 70 divorce cases have been dealt with since confederation, but that does not represent all the divorces granted to people in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I venture to say it is not a tithe of the number. People who were residents and citizens of those provinces, have gone over to the United States and obtained divorces. There is another reason why we should have a divorce court. Of all questions that come up before this House, this one of religion in connection with divorces has created more coolness and hard feelings than any that I know of for a number of years. As the hon. gentleman from Brandon stated the other day, "I am a peaceful man and want to live in peace and harmony with all my fellow senators, and I do not wish to be placed in a false position as a member of that committee doing my duty conscientiously and by that means perhaps getting the ill-will of some of my fellow members." I only speak for myself, but whatever course the rest of the committee, who have placed their resignation before the Senate, may take, it is not my attention to serve on that committee again.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I am very much pleased with the remarks of the last speaker and the compliments he has paid me, I am sorry that he is the only one who insists upon his resigning from that committee. I am sorry that he takes the ground that that committee is infallible. I regret to see him take such a course, because he is the only one that has announced that he intends to resign and is unwilling to serve. If I understand matters right, the rest of the committee are willing to abide by the voice of this House. I have always understood that a committee in all cases are subject to the voice of this House, and I do not think it detracts their dignity in any shape or form if once in a while the House may see fit to reconsider their reports. The hon.

gentleman says it is not the reconsideration that he complains of, but sending it back to the committee. That is not rejecting altogether; when it is sent back you can deal with it again.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—But it was making us do a thing that we did not believe in, and that we could not conscientiously recommend to the House.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—When the report of any committee comes before the House, the majority have a right to reject it, and I think it is a very strong stand that the minority are taking—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—No, the majority.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—That one of the committee has taken in this House, that he will not serve any more because the House sends back a report to them. That is a stand that ought not to be taken by any gentleman under the circumstances. I hope that every other member of the committee will do his duty and serve for the rest of this session without putting the House to any more trouble and annoyance, or circulating an erroneous report through the country about the course we have taken. I hope it will be a long time before such a difficulty occurs again, and that the hon. member from Victoria will reconsider his threat and go back and serve like a man on that committee, and bring in his reports in accordance with the judgment of the majority of the committee.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I regret very much that certain members of the committee gave notice that they decline to act, fortifying it with allegations which were not consistent with facts and which have been disproved by the evidence given here to-day. In no case has there been any justification for the assertion that this House has failed to act conscientiously and in a spirit of justice. My hon. friend gives as his reason for the course he is taking the action of the House in the Odell case. I go on the principle that the committee is simply drawn for the convenience of the House to take evidence and report to the Senate according to their views. They are not the conscience of this House. Every member of the Senate has the same freedom of forming his own conclusions and voting as he sees fit, on what grounds concerns himself. He has a right to exercise his calm conviction of the merits and justice of each case, and he should not be influenced in any way by the finding of that committee. I have found myself in the House, as I have frequently found myself in the committee, with the minority, and the great inconvenience I felt was that many members of this House did not consider my views at all upon the matter, but were governed largely by what the committee reported, not taking into consideration the merits of the case and judging for themselves, and therefore I would say the minority of that committee have more right to complain than the majority. In reference to the Odell case to which my hon. friend from New Westminster refers, I think if there was any case which came before us in which the House were fully vested with all the facts it was that case. We had all the evidence that was before the committee; we had the petition of the respondent; we had the exemplification of the courts; we had everything that was before the committee except the argument of counsel on either side, and we know that they can do. I did not pay much attention to them; the case was too simple to require any of their arguments. The question was this? Shall we interfere with the courts which have the matter under consideration? I repeat there never was a case in which the House was more fully vested with the whole of the facts than this Odell case, and each member of this Senate, regardless of the report of the committee, could exercise his own judgment and act accordingly without any disrespect to the committee, because it was not a case where evidence was taken and where the character of the witnesses contributed largely to the judgment of the committee. In a case of that kind there may be some force in the hon. gentleman's arguments, but this is not one of those cases at all. But are we to be told that because a majority of a committee report one way this House should be in duty bound by it? The fact of the matter is, I stood alone on the committee in favour of respondent's petition. What was the result? The hon. member from Marquette, on the committee voted with the majority against my views, but when he came here and heard the wisdom of this House—in the multitude of counsel there is wisdom—changed his opinion and voted with the majority against the finding of the committee, and in favour of the minority of the committee, which was but myself.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The motion in the case to which the hon. gentleman alludes was carried by a majority in which were five of the leading Protestant members of this House, including the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes, it was. When the House had an opportunity to form its own conclusion upon the matter and the whole case being reasoned out, they simply sent the report back to the committee with instruction to carry out the views of the House. I do not see that there was any indignity cast upon the members of the committee. While serving on this committee I have generally exercised my independent judgment, yet I have not considered it a personal reproach to have the Senate decide against me. The only trouble I have found in coming before the House is that the views of the minority are not fairly considered. No matter how large or how small the minority may be, the finding of the committee has a greater effect than it ought to have, because every honourable gentleman here should exercise his independent judgment, apart from what the finding of the committee may be. The only way to expedite the business of the House is to collect the evidence and to make the report for the determination of this House upon their own independent judgment. My hon. friend contends that the Roman Catholics of this House do not exercise their judgment and do justice in the case, but that they act according to their religious convictions. I have found it quite the contrary. In the Dillon case I was alone on the committee; I was in the minority but I believe the sense of this House was with me, I believe that hon. gentlemen whom I see before me were with me and believed that the questions I asked as to the faithfulness of the petitioner to his marriage vows before and after he abandoned his wife were proper questions to ask. I simply wanted to have those questions put upon the minutes and let this House determine the matter; but the questions were not allowed. I believe the hon. member from Richmond was with me; I believe he thought that I had a right to ask those questions and have them put upon the evidence and with the answers.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I must be bound by my vote on that occasion. I voted against the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. member merely voted to have it placed back on the paper for consideration.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not vote on the main motion, but I voted on a side issue tending to promote the divorce.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Upon the first division we had a majority in favour of my minority report. We had hon. gentlemen from the North-west Territories, we had an hon. gentleman from St. John, and hon. gentlemen from British Columbia and others who supported me in it, not only by their vote, on the first occasion, but by their views expressed in this House, and then when the case was restored to the order paper they declared that because it was made a religious question, they voted against me or abstained from voting. The hon. gentleman from Hopewell admitted he was with me, but simply because it became a religious question he voted with the Protestants.

Hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I know that to be the case, I am speaking advisedly. He would not deny it if he were here; and there were also some six or seven Roman Catholics who abstained from voting when their own consciences were with me, but to avoid voting upon a question of this kind, they withdrew from the chamber thus showing that Catholics do not, as has been alleged, negative divorce bills without regard to evidence on religious grounds. In this Dillon case they did not even vote when justice demanded it. On the second vote the bill was carried by a majority of one for the reason and in the manner I have just now described; and it went down to the Commons, and how was it treated there? The majority of the House sustained my contention and sent it to a committee to have that very evidence, which I contended for as to his own guilt, taken, and the committee reported that they could not get the evidence, because the man was away in England. Not having got the evidence, they determined they would adopt the bill. But my contention was thoroughly sustained by the vote of the House that that evidence was proper and should have been taken, and it was not taken because the party was not in the country, therefore, I was thoroughly sustained on that question, and whenever it comes up again, as long as I am a member of the committee, that question will be asked by me.

Hon. Mr. MacKAY—Have you ever asked it since?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I never saw any case which came before us where the question was pertinent. The cases were such that they did not suggest such a question. If my hon. friend will refer me to any one case in which that would have been a pertinent question, I would like him to do so. I regret that this matter came up in the way in which it did in this House. It took the House by surprise. No one supposed there would be a report of committee when there was no meeting held. The report, which in fact was no report of the committee, has gone to the country that this Senate is not capable of conducting divorce cases with justice and in a calm and deliberate manner. I am glad that the hon. member from Richmond and the hon. member from Ottawa have fully answered the statements made by the majority of the committee to the House, and have shown that there is not one case since confederation where ample justice has not been done to the party.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—With one exception.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—With one exception, the finding of the committee was always confirmed by the House, and in that case the action of the House was justified by the result of the litigation afterwards taken upon it. I have taken a calmer stand on this matter than I would have done if the chairman of the committee had pressed the objections which he raised in sustaining his withdrawal from the committee. As to the statement of the long hours which the committee consumed in hearing these cases, I do not think we sat twenty hours altogether, and during that time we had been honoured by three chairmen before we got through with the cases, so I do not think my hon. friend is satisfied in claiming the forbearance of this House, or that the judgment of the Senate shall be warped in the interest of the committee, or to consider more favourably than they otherwise should do the finding of the committee in consequence of the onerous duties which the committee had imposed upon them. Whenever I have voted with the minority, I did it because I felt it my duty to do so. I only hope the House in future will pay better attention to the views of the minority of the committee, and not do as they have been doing in the past, vote with the majority and in many cases regardless of the good judgment of the minority and the impression it ought to have upon their favourable consideration. Everybody knows that whilst doing my duty conscientiously I do not believe that divorce courts elevate women, or increase the harmony or happenings of domestic life or the morality of the people.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It was not my intention to say much on this question, as I did not hear what passed before six o'clock, but I have been in my seat since recess and have heard two different reasons given in favour of the course followed by the majority of the committee on divorce. The first is, that the committee think they have been ill-treated by the House in two ways, by their report having been set aside and by being instructed to change their decision. What is the difference between a divorce bill and any other bill? I can see no difference. Those bills are referred to select committees, whether you call them committees on Divorce, on Railways, on Standing Orders, on Banking and Commerce, or Private bills,—they are committees of this House and they have to submit to the will of the majority in the Senate. Is there a gentleman in this House who ignores the fact that in England bills have been referred back to committee several times? Indeed, cases have occurred in which they have been recommitted no less than seven times. Was that considered an insult to the committee? No member of the House of Lords ever regarded it in that light. In England the committees bow to the will of the House and report the amendments ordered by the House, or in the direction indicated or suggested by the House. That is my reply to the first reason that has been given. The second reason assigned is that a certain number of gentlemen in this House do not believe in divorce. That is true. Are there not, in the H use of Lords, in England, a good many Roman Catholics, and has a single Lord ever risen in his place to complain because Roman Catholics would not vote for divorce? Not at all. They would be ashamed to do it. They are their peers. No doubt there was a time when in England Roman Catholics were ignored, nay when they could hold no position under the crown. I remember many things of which I have read in the history of England, but those dark days have long passed away. Would hon. gentlemen revive that part of British history? Surely not. Then it is better to let the matter drop and let every senator follow his convictions. It has been said by other gentlemen that Roman Catholics do not vote against divorce as a matter of principle, but there are always a good many Protestants in this House who vote with them. Are they also to be forced to step aside and let the majority of this House, who are generally in favour of divorce, act on divorce bills alone? That is not a reasonable proposition. Even if it were done, we have had to go further than that. I know gentlemen in this House who vote for divorce as a matter of principle, but do not like to grant divorces, because they say it is a cause of demoralization, and the less divorce we grant the better. Those gentlemen also, I suppose, would have to step aside. It shows the absurdity of that argument. In every part of the world there are men who hold different opinions and they are not set aside because of their conscientious difficulties. I am only sorry that this matter has gone so far. I believe the best course would have been to withdraw the report and let us hear no more of it.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That has been done. This debate is on a motion to adjourn.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I know; that is the first thing I inquired about when I came in at 8 o'clock. I was told there was no question before the House but the adjournment, yet we are speaking on the question of this communication from certain members of the Divorce Committee.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am sorry that this question has intruded itself upon the attention of the Senate. When the committee reconsidered their decision and were prepared to withdraw their resignation, the matter should have dropped and we should have had no further discussion on the subject, but the hon. gentleman who forced the discussion, on a motion to adjourn, must take the responsibility of this discussion.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am not at all in sympathy with the hon. member from New Westminster when he declares his determination not to serve again on this Divorce Committee. I think he goes very close to the mark of throwing contempt on the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I want to have a better man in my place.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—He is only following the example of a large number of gentlemen in this Senate who have taken that course for a number of years past. I take it that every man occupying a seat in the Senate is bound by his acceptance of the position to fulfil the duties imposed upon him by the constitution. We are here as a parliament, and parliament has relegated to this branch particularly the duty of examining into such cases, and on this question of divorce it is actually a court and every member is a judge and cannot divest himself of the responsibility connected with that position, whether he is a Roman Catholic or a Protestant. This discussion may bring about a change which will eventually lead, perhaps, to the establishment of divorce courts within Ontario and Quebec. Perhaps it will be the best way to settle the difficulty. I have not thought so hitherto, but if there is to be a deadlock in the Senate that is probably the best way to get over it. If one member of the committee can say to the Senate "I will not under any circumstances serve on this committee," he is throwing out a challenge to every hon. gentleman to take the same course. That is the position taken by the hon. member from New Westminster, and I object to it. I think it is very improper. The committee have something to complain of in the way they have been treated in regard to this question, but the committee themselves are somewhat to blame in initiating the trouble. We find in the fourth report of the Divorce Committee the following:—

3. Your committee have also carefully considered the petition of the said Marie Louise Laurentine Gregory, the respondent in this matter presented to your honourable House on Monday, the 29th of April instant, praying that in view of an acti on enséparation de corps et de biens now pending between the said parties and in appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec, she may not be subjected to a double trial, and that the bill of divorce may not be taken into consideration until such time as the issue raised in the civil courts, now pending in the Supreme Court of Canada, be finally determined.

If they had stopped their report there, they could have gone on with the examination of the case and heard all the evidence and would not have given the Senate an opportunity of saying whether this should be postponed until the Senate was in possession of the evidence. But they went further and said :

4. On consideration of the said petition of the respondent and of the certified copy of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec filed therewith, your committee recommend that further action on the petition of Loop Sewell Odell be deferred until such time as the respective parties have been heard by counsel before your committee and report thereon has been made by your committee.

There was no necessity for these words. If they had not declared themselves in favour of reporting to the Senate before they heard the evidence, we should have had the evidence and decided the case upon its merits. They did report after hearing the arguments. An objection has been raised against the contention of the committee that an unfair decision was given by the Senate because the committee, under the instruction of the Senate, heard the parties interested by counsel and one hon. gentleman said that is a very different matter from hearing the evidence. The highest courts in the empire do not usually hear evidence. They hear the question argued by counsel, and the decision is often given simply on the arguments of counsel. Cases are cited, precedents given, and the arguments are made to the court, and the decision is given on the arguments. The committee had all these arguments before them and precedents cited. The Senate had no evidence at all, and after the Senate gave instructions to the committee to go on and hear the arguments of counsel—

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What is the argument based on? The evidence, is it not

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman does not know what it was based on; he did not hear the arguments. We were asked to come to a decision without hearing evidence or arguments, and if we intended to come to such a decision it was when the fourth report was presented and we should not have allowed the committee to go on and hear the argument of counsel. After the argument of counsel had been heard and the committee reported back to the Senate, the House turns round, without hearing the argument at all, and says "your decision is wrong." I think it is throwing quite a reflection upon the hon. gentlemen who heard the argument. I wish to say just one word in reference to the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. We must regard that hon. gentleman as very high authority indeed in this House and outside of it. He tells us that we are too much in the habit of voting with the majority, that we should pay particular attention to the minority of that committee. I suppose he would introduce the system that two or three gentlemen in this Senate—of course they would have to be lawyers, and I suppose the chairman would have to be from Nova Scotia, and he would like that position himself very well—are to influence the House. We are not to go by the opinion of the majority of the committee on divorce, but we are to pay more attention and respect to the minority of that committee who have been giving a good deal of trouble not only last session but this session also. I see no reason why every member of this Senate should not be eligible and be required to take a fair share of the responsibilities of all the committees connected with the Senate, including the divorce committee. We can exchange views on all these questions and come to a decision outside of our religious convictions, and I think we will get along more harmoniously than if members of certain churches hold aloof from this question altogether. I do not think there is any necessity for it, and the only way that harmony and good understanding can be kept up is by working with a good understanding one with the other.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—The hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière asked such an extraordinary question that I cannot refrain from answering it. He asked what was the difference between a railway bill and a divorce bill? I am surprised that a gentleman holding the views that he does should ask such a question. He looks upon marriage as a sacrament, and a bill to dissolve that marriage must be more sacred than a railway bill. Besides, a divorce bill is a criminal proceeding, any other bill is not a criminal proceeding, and therefore there is a vast difference between the two. The statements made by the hon. gentleman from Richmond and by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa have shown us that the Roman Catholic members of this House have been even more liberal than many of us supposed in matters of divorce—that they had not given the opposition which many of us supposed they had given. They have only to go a little further and they will be altogether lovely—let them take part in all the proceedings and functions of this House and act upon the divorce committee as they do on other committees. Supposing the majority of this House were Roman Catholic members how could a divorce be obtained from Parliament? It would be utterly impossible and therefore the hon. gentlemen of that religion will see how illogical the course they take is. They are here, as the hon. gentleman from Toronto put it, not to carry out their religious convictions but to carry out the quasi judicial functions imposed upon them by the constitution, nothing more and nothing less, and whenever divorce proceedings are before the House they should be guided by the evidence only. If every member of this House were to follow the example of those hon. gentlemen and refuse to act on the divorce committee, could divorce be granted? It would be absolutely impossible, and I would not be at all surprised to find next year that nearly every member of this House would refuse to serve on a divorce committee. If we come to that position it will be necessary, in the interest of the country and in the interests of public morality, that a divorce court should be established. Why should we be behind England in this matter? England some 40 years ago had the same system that we have now, and it was found very cumbersome and expensive; and it was the court for the wealthy man and not for the poor man. Before a divorce could be granted in parliament an ecclesiastical court had first to find a decree, an action for crim. con. commenced, and after that a bill was brought into parliament to dissolve the marriage and enable the parties to marry again. That was found a very cumbersome proceeding. The next step was, instead of referring bills of divorce to the whole House of Commons, they were referred to a committee of nine, and after the committee of both Houses had decided on the measure, they would report upon it and it was accepted by Parliament as satisfactory and conclusive and there the matter ended. Then I think in 1850 a committee was appointed by the House of Lords to go into the matter of divorce and to report to the House on that subject. That committee took two years before they made their report and finally reported in favour of a bill and in 1857 the first bill of divorce was introduced in the House of Lords. The Lord Chancellor of that time, Lord Cranwood, Lord Lyndhurst, the Duke of Argyle and other eminent men spoke in favour of it and the bill became law. Why should we in Canada be behind England in this matter? If England, with all her experience in public affairs, thought proper to establish a divorce court, why should we be behind in this matter? Surely our Roman Catholic friends and colleagues would not object to a thing of that kind. It may be said that divorce courts will multiply the number of divorces. I would just as soon have divorces cases multiplied as to have vice smothered, as it would be, rather have divorce than that class of crime; the difficulty of obtaining divorces does not prevent vice—it only covers it up. Divorce legislation cannot be carried on in this House unless the Roman Catholic members take their part with other members of this House and perform all the functions of parliament.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—As the mover of the amendment that was brought before this House to the report of the committee, I wish to explain my position and supplement the statements made by the hon. gentleman from Richmond. The hon. gentleman from King's County, P.E.I., gave us the reason of the report of the divorce committee. I could supplement his information by reading what the chairman of the divorce committee said before the House when he presented his report. He said:

The counter petition desires that the proceedings before this House should be stayed pending the hearing of the case before the Supreme Court of Canada. The disposition of the committee is that there should be no interference with the proceedings now pending before the court, but that all the facts should be before the committee.

He gave us in plain words, speaking in the name of the committee, an idea of the disposition of the committee itself, telling us that the committee was disposed not to interfere at all with the case pending in the courts. What did we do? We met their views. Then they came with another report recommending interference with the case that was before the courts. We had met their first view, and I proposed an amendment that the report be sent back to the committee to be put in the form that they had given to their first report. The hon. gentleman from Richmond cited cases to show that this House since Confederation the Roman Catholic members have never opposed divorces except on side issues.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No. I said that I had never opposed them myself except in the first case brought before the House in 1867-68. I did not include all the members.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I go further, and I say not only did they not oppose it, but Roman Catholics have voted with the majority, and the votes given by the hon. gentleman from Richmond and the hon. gentleman from Toronto last year prove that position.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That was not on any reading of the bill; it was on a side issue.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—It was on the three months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Look at the Debates, page 86, and you will find that I am right.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It was simply to place it on the paper to be heard when there was a full House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—When the third reading of the bill came up on the 21st of June, I moved that the bill be sent back to the committee to allow those questions to be put that the minority had tried to put in the committee. That proposition of mine was rejected by a vote of 20 to 22.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I voted against it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman voted against it and so did the hon. gentleman from Toronto. Had those two Roman Catholics voted for my amendment, we would never have heard of the bill again.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—We thought your amendment was unfair.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman does not understand the point that I am making. I say, to supplement the information given by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, that not only have Roman Catholics not prevented divorce legislation in this House, but it was through Roman Catholics that the legislation was allowed to pass in this House last year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There is no analogy between that case and the case this year. We had evidence then; we have none now.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island said just now that the course taken by the hon. gentleman from New Westminster in refusing to act on the Divorce Committee, was the course taken by all the Roman Catholics in this House. I deny that. I have never been asked to serve on a Divorce Committee. Who are the Roman Catholics in this House who have refused to act? Why did you not ask them? Because you know that there is a rule in this House which says that when a man has pronounced himself on a matter which is to be brought before a committee, he cannot act on that committee. The same thing applies to a judge. If a judge pronounces himself on a question he cannot act as a judge upon it, and if a judge is known to be in principle against divorce I do not think he would be able to act as a judge in a divorce case. Now, as to the difference between a railway bill and a divorce bill, I do not see the appropriateness of the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He did not exactly state the arguments of the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière. That hon. member did not say that there was no difference between a divorce bill and a railway bill, but that he did not see the difference between the course taken by this House in refusing a railway bill or refusing a report on a divorce bill. As to the argument made before recess by the hon. member from Toronto, I have nothing to say. He has stated his own profession of faith, but I will not take it as mine.

Hon. Mr. MILLER.—If no other hon. member desires to speak, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (66) "An Act further to amend the Penitentiary Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER—When the House was in committee on this bill, I called the attention of the hon. Minister in charge to what I considered a defect in the third clause of the bill, and I think that the matter is of sufficient consequence to ask the attention of the House to it. This clause provides that when the surgeon of a penitentiary reports in writing to the warden that any convict confined in such penitentiary is insane and ought to be removed to an asylum for the insane, the warden shall report the fact to the inspector; and the second sub-clause reads:

The Governor General may thereupon, if an arrangement exists with the Lieutenant Governor of any province for the maintenance of such convict in an asylum of such province, by warrant signed by the Secretary of State or such other officer as authorized by the Governor in Council in that behalf, direct the removal of such insane convict to the custody of the keeper or person in charge of such asylum for the unexpired portion of his sentence.

It will be observed that this sub-clause does not specify to what asylum the insane person is to be removed. I put the case of the maritime provinces. We have only one penitentiary for the three maritime provinces. That penitentiary is situated in the province of New Brunswick, and my impression is that under this sub-clause the insane would be sent to the insane asylum in St. John, even though the prisoner came from Halifax, or from Dartmouth, where the Nova Scotia asylum is situated. It was stated by the hon. Minister of Agriculture that it did not make much difference where you sent the prisoner to, that he did not deserve any consideration, but I do not think the House would be disposed to endorse that view. It is a great misfortune, even though a man is a criminal, to have the additional affliction of being insane; it is a cruel thing to place him in an asylum where his relations and friends can have no access to him, and I do not think there is any desire on the part of government or the department of justice, to do anything of that sort. I propose to submit an amendment in the shape of a proviso to be added at the end of this sub-clause to which I do not think any objection can be made:

That the said bill be not now read for the third time, but that it be amended by adding to the second sub-clause of the third clause thereof, the following proviso: "provided always that if such an arrangement as is mentioned in the beginning of this subsection exists with the lieutenant-governor of the province in which such convict has been convicted, the warrant hereinbefore mentioned shall direct the removal of such insane convict to the custody of the keeper or the person in charge of an asylum for the insane in such province."

The objection taken by the Minister of Agriculture to a somewhat similar amendment which I suggested in the committee was that there might not be any arrangement with the lieutenant-governor in the province in which the offender had been convicted. This amendment is limited to the case where such arrangement does exist, and if an arrangement exists with the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, I think it must strike every hon. gentleman in this House, that if the prisoner becomes insane and has to be sent to an insane asylum, that prisoner, having been convicted in the province of Nova Scotia, should be sent to an insane asylum in that province and not to the insane asylum at St. John.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think this clause is an exceedingly good one. I have had practical observation of the penitentiary at Kingston, where the convicts are kept under the guidance of the attending physician. The argument which the senator from Halifax adduced would not strike any physician as having a great deal of force. Asylums may have special qualities, and I am sure that no one connected with the government would for a moment think of doing anything with an insane person but what was best for him, and if there be asylums throughout the country which may have any special qualities better adapted for the restoration of the reason of an insane convict, why not allow such a patient to be sent there without specifying the province? In my opinion there is a great deal of difference in the insane asylums of the several provinces of the country, and if I were to have the judging of the places where these persons were to be sent, there are special places which I know to be better than others to send them to. I need not mention the names at present. It is very wise to leave the clause as it is in order that the Secretary of State, or whoever has charge of those places, should place them where it is best calculated for their benefit. I do not know of any change which the government has made of a more humane character than this one. I should advise the senator from Halifax to leave the clause as it is, because their friends are of little consequence to the insane. In most cases it is better that they should be away from their friends. It generally has a disquieting influence on their minds, and, therefore, I would certainly favour strongly leaving it undetermined or non-specific.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am convinced by the argument of the hon. gentleman from Kingston, and I withdraw my motion.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

BANKERS' LIFE ASSOCIATION OF CANADA BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill (26) "An Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think this is a most misleading bill. It is an Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada. I am advised that this has no possible connection with any bank in Canada, or the officials of any bank, and it must be apparent to any hon. gentleman that the very name will enable the agents of the insurance company to entrap a lot of people under the impression that it is a bank. It is a fraud on the public that such a name should be taken. We have been proud of our banks, and it would be monstrous to allow that name to be taken by an insurance company. They think the name is attractive, and it will enable the agents of the company to mislead the people and get them to take out policies. They will say it is a bankers' association and, therefore, sound. I was in the committee in the other House, and there was strong opposition to it there. One member told me that he hoped we would look after it in the Senate and not let it go through.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Is it a life insurance company?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understand it is a life insurance company. When this bill goes before the committee, hon. gentlemen on the committee will have an opportunity of hearing a full explanation with regard to what the applicants desire. The bill has passed the other House. The inspector of insurance, representing the Department of Finance, was before the committee, and the matter was duly explained, and in the wisdom of the committee, and in the wisdom of the House of Commons, the bill was duly passed. I want further to say, in regard to the title of the bill, that while my hon. friend may be correct in saying it may be misleading to some extent, yet there is nothing to prohibit anybody else from using the same name and the difficulty that was presented there was this, that there is an insurance company with a similar name in the United States, who propose coming into Canada and obtaining a license here and doing business under the same name. The inspector of insurance when asked before the committee if the Department of Finance would give to that company a license for the purpose of carrying on life insurance, stated that they would.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On, no, no, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say yes, yes, yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the government would do such a thing as that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It was stated by the officer of the government, Mr. Fitzgerald, and I prefer taking the statement of the gentleman charged with that particular duty, to the statement of one who is not charged with it. However, the committee is the arena for fighting this thing out, and my hon. friend from Ottawa will be there to fight it out.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not think that the title of the bill is fair, just or proper. I care not what has been done in the other House. I quite agree with the hon. member for Ottawa that the title to that bill is a most misleading one. The bankers' association is not a life association, and if there is an insurance company with that name coming from the United States here, it must be a precious small and insignificant one, because I think I am very well posted in the names of insurance companies in the United States and Canada, and I never heard of that company before. No matter what was done in the other House, I am perfectly positive that that name is misleading, and should not be allowed by us to be used for an insurance company. There is no company in Great Britain under that name, where they are very particular about names, and I know that our company had to fight a long time before we could get a footing in London to be able to carry on our business there. I quite agree with the hon. member from Ottawa that the name is misleading and the bill should not be passed without a change of title.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make the statement that the government are bound to give a license, if they disapprove of the company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, the statement was made to me by a member of the House of Commons that the inspector of insurance, when asked before the committee if an insurance company doing business in the United States should come over to Canada—and I am informed that such a company does intend coming over here—would the government issue a license to them, and he said they would.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not bind any one.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Sick Benefit Society."—(Mr. McMillan.)

DOMESTIC AND FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (101) "An Act to incorporate the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada." He said:—This is a bill from the House of Commons having for its object the incorporation of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada. This is a society created by the provincial synod of the Church of England, representing the dioceses of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Niagara, Huron and Algoma and its object is to collect and to administer the general missionary funds of the church in those dioceses. It is proposed that it should be incorporated for that purpose and under a canon of the synod constituting the association itself, which canon is set forth in the schedule appended in this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (No. 45) "An Act respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 77) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company." He said:—It is simply a change increasing the amount of the bonds to be used, from five million dollars to eight million dollars.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES BAY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 87) "An Act to incorporate the James Bay Railway Company." He said:—I may say, by way of explanation, that this is a bill to incorporate a railway company to build a road from Parry Sound to French River, and from there to Lake Wahnapiatae and thence to Moose River on James Bay. They have a capital of one million dollars and bonding privileges of twenty-five thousand dollars. I have no doubt any explanations which are required will be given in the Railway Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (48) "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I mentioned at the second reading of the bill of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company that there was a companion bill which would be brought up and this is the bill. It is to incorporate a company to take over the property and franchise and business of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, which company carries on business, as I stated yesterday, under the English Joint Stock Companies Act of 1862. I may say that the manager of this company is remaining here at great inconvenience and at considerable expense and that certain circumstances have happened within the last two days which render it almost absolutely necessary that he should leave the capital. It is therefore desirable that this bill should go before the committee at the earliest date possible. I understand the government are perfectly cognizant of all the details of the bill, and there can be no substantial objection to advancing the bill. I therefore move that the 41st and 60th rules be dispensed with so far as regards the bill intituled "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER CO.'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of bill (85) "An Act to incorporate the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company." He said: This bill is for the purpose of utilizing the water power of the Niagara and Welland Rivers. Many of the incorporators are known to myself personally as men of high standing financially. The bill also provides that they are required to take care of the water. There are a great many clauses in the bill, which will no doubt be fully considered in the committee to which it will be referred.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) moved that the following motions be postponed until July 2nd:—

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the report of Judge Drake, a commissioner appointed by the Government of Canada to investigate charges of irregularities in the British Columbia Penitentiary, and the presentment of the grand jury at New Westminster denouncing the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons to the position of deputy warden of said penitentiary as "an insult to the self-respecting portion of this community"; also, to the annual reports of J. G. Moylan, late inspector of penitentiaries.

That the Senate regards the prompt dismissal of James Fitzsimmons, deputy warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary, and the appointment of a Royal Commission (similar to that held by Mr. Justice Drake, in 1894, to investigate charges of irregularities in the British Columbia Penitentiary) to investigate charges of official misconduct on the part of J. G. Moylan, while acting as inspector of penitentiaries, as necessary in the interests of the public service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I have made inquiry in reference to the delay that has occurred in bringing down the returns relating to the New Westminster penitentiary which the hon. gentleman asked for some time ago and find that the Minister of Justice, in order to save expense, asked the House of Commons to make a copy of the report and send it to him, and it had not yet reached him, but he will immediately make inquiry of the Clerk of the House of Commons to know why it has not been done.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I have no intention of proceeding with these motions until the papers, to which the hon. Premier has referred, have been placed on the Table of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be advisable to alter this first motion to bring it within the rules of the House. It directs attention to a certain matter but does not end with an inquiry or a motion; it should be followed by either one or the other. We have gone so far as to attach inquiries to statements, thereby bringing the statements within the rules of the House, but there is neither inquiry nor motion in this instance.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for directing my attention to the fact. I will amend the motion in the manner that he has suggested before I move it next week. I now move :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of letters 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. Also, cheques A, B and C. Also, letter of Reverend Mr. Morgan, marked exhibit E. All which are referred to in Mr. Justice Drake's report of 1894, on the British Columbia Penitentiary.

I hope that these returns will be attached to the others for which I moved some time ago before I proceed with the main motion.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—There is no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

BOARDS OF TRADE INCORPORATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill (L) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Boards of Trade." He said:—This is a very short bill to enable the people of the village of Mattawa to organize a board of trade. Last year we passed a short act to enable the people of the different sections of the North-west Territory to organize boards of trade by adding adjoining districts or townships to the village or town which desired to establish a board of trade. Under the general law it requires a certain number of inhabitants to reside within the corporation where a board of trade is required. They had not those numbers in the North-west and consequently the Act was amended to enable them to carry out the intention to which I have referred. The village of Mattawa in the district of Nipissing is in precisely the same position—they are desirous of forming a board of trade, and not having sufficient population within the village, they want to include with them the adjoining townships. When the matter was referred to the Department of Justice, the provision of the law to which I have alluded, was pointed out, therefore it is necessary to amend the law in the same direction that we amended it last year, to enable them to carry out their project.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

LINDSAY, HALIBURTON AND MATTAWA RAILWAY COMPANY.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (80) "An Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Haliburton and Mattawa Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As this involves a departure from the general law of the land,

I think it only proper to call the attention of the Senate to the changes proposed to be made in this particular charter. A similar clause was introduced in a bill this session which has passed this chamber. I do not know whether it has passed the other chamber yet, but it passed here unnoticed. I was not aware of the fact of the first bill, but I was present in the Railway Committee when it was introduced in some other bill and I am quite aware also that a bill had passed this Senate some years ago changing the general law, but it was thrown out in the House of Commons. There seems to be a good deal of misunderstanding on the subject. It is well known by hon. gentlemen that when a railway is first constructed, the drainage of any country through which it passes is very much improved. The statute relating to all existing drains is clear; if they divert a drain they have to make ample provision for the outlet of that drain or watercourse, whether large or small. The railway companies, in their own interest, do this and we also recognize that the railway has for its own protection to improve the drainage. There are always culverts alongside of the railway, and usually ditches are made for carrying off water, not alone the water in that particular year, but for years to come, in case of freshet. The policy that has prompted the enactment of this provision has been the protection of the travelling public, because it was considered very important that sudden freshets should not be let down upon the railway embankment. It is proposed now to change the law by this amendment and to transfer the whole subject to the municipal authorities. Before that is done, it ought to be shown that some hardship has existed in the past. As far as I have been able to ascertain, and I certainly have made the fullest inquiry, no case has arisen where redress has not been granted by the railway company. Where, of course, the changes involve a considerable expenditure, it is only right that the section of country that is to be benefited by the change should bear the cost. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to point to any case where a railway company, having been asked to make the change and it being intimated that the cost involved would be defrayed by the municipality benefited, has refused to acquiesce. If any dispute arises, the referee is the Minister of Railways, and I think it could be shown that it involves no expense to the applicant. The proposal is that we should place this matter under the control of the municipality. In Ontario for some years they have been draining large sections of country, practically making canals to carry off the water from lands that have been brought under cultivation. When they come to the railway track the drain requires the construction, probably, of a new culvert. Now, the question arises, should the railway be at the expense of the new culvert, which may cost from $500 to $1,000, depending altogether on its size? The Ontario Railway Act makes this provision: It contemplates in the first place that the work shall be done subject to the inspection of the railway company and of the parties benefited, but it goes on to provide that in order to justify the municipality paying the railway company for the work, there must be a requisition from, in one instance, three-quarters of the parties benefited, and in the other instance two-thirds of the parties benefited. We know very well that it is quite unlikely, in a section of country where they want drainage, when the settlers can make the railway company be at the expense, that you will get them to sign a paper recommending the council to charge it against the funds of the municipality. That is a highly improbable thing, and of course, if this House passes the motion in its present shape, the effect will be that in all those cases of drainage the railway company will be obliged to bear the whole expense. That will be the result if this passes and the municipalities do what they are likely to do. If it were left to the municipal council, without the qualification I have referred to, I think the municipality would do what is fair. If the railway company receive any additional benefit, they should pay their share. The cost should be borne by all who are financially interested—that is, after the railway has been constructed and we are speaking now of future drainage. When the railway is first constructed, there may be no complaint on the subject of drainage, because the law is distinct, in declaring that the railway company must provide for all existing drains. That is clear and plain, and I am not aware that there has been any conflict on that subject. It is when this new question of drainage arises, taking in larger areas than were contemplated at the time of the construction of the railway, that disputes arise, and the effect of this amendment will be to make the railway company pay the whole charge. The municipality and the people interested will say: "The railway company are wealthy enough to make the change, and if the law forces them to do it they must do it." For that reason I do not think it is a wise change.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. member from Ottawa appears to take the whole railway system of the country under his charge. I am prepared to advocate the interests of the settlers of this country and not the interests of the railways altogether. He says he does not know of any grievance that the agriculturists of this country have in reference to the matter dealt with by that amendment. I can tell him there is plenty of grievance. I know there is a case now before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I was there the other day when it came up. It was the case of the township of Wainfleet in the county of Monck. The people of that township have been trying to get the matter settled for the last two years. The Grand Trunk Railway asks them to pay one-half the cost of putting a culvert under the railway. There was a culvert there before, but it was not deep enough, and they asked them to pay one-half the cost of making the culvert deeper. It is an open culvert and they say it will cost $600 to do it. In that case the parties had to come all the way to Ottawa, but the question did not come up yesterday and when we are going to have a meeting of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, I do not know. When the Grand Trunk Railway Company found they were going to be exposed, instead of asking the township to pay $300—half the $600—they came to me on Saturday, as this letter I have got in my hand from the engineer shows, and said "we will settle the question if you pay $100." I do not know whether the township of Wainfleet will pay the $100 or not. I know they should not pay it. But they may prefer to do so rather than to go to the expense of appearing before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I notice that my hon. friend from Ottawa takes charge of the railways of the country. When I had a bill here before the Senate on another occasion he opposed it at every step. He says it will not do to let the farmers interfere with the railways. I agree with him; in no case should it be done, and in no case has it been done. The bill which I had charge of here, and which passed the Senate twice, provided that the railway company should do the work always, but what I have claimed is that the question of expenditure should be settled on the spot by arbitration and it should not be necessary to bring people here to Ottawa at a heavy expense which they can ill afford, and then, when they come here, to compromise with them. They have offered to forego two-thirds of the amount that they claim, and they must feel satisfied that the case of the municipality was a just one, and that if it went to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council the people would not have to pay anything. I see no reason why all new railways should not be subject to the drainage laws in every province. It is in the interests of the country that it should be so. It is easy for the railway companies to appear before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council; they have my hon. friend from Ottawa here, but what are the farmers to do? They have nobody here to represent them unless they come from long distances themselves. If they lived at Vancouver or Halifax they would have to come all the way to Ottawa to present their views, while the railway company could have my hon. friend from Ottawa here to represent them all the time. When the railways were built in many parts of the country they put in culverts where they pleased and did not put them deep enough. The first charter in this instance was granted to the Buffalo and Lake Huron Railway. That road is in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway, and the people think that the Parliament of Canada will not compel them to build culverts where culverts should have been constructed long ago. The companies are rich and can afford to fight and will do nothing for the poor farmers along the line. If a drain crosses a railway and the farmers of this country clean out the ditch to the railway track they cannot carry the drainage across the road, even through a culvert, because under the law they could be fined and imprisoned for trespass if they did. That is the law of the land, and it is not desirable that it should remain unchanged. I tried once to amend it and the Senate supported me, as I hope the Senate will support me on this occasion, by retaining the amendment, so that if we do not get justice in a lump we will get it by instalments.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This matter was very fully discussed before the Railway Committee, and a sub-committee was appointed to consider the whole subject. I was a member of that committee, and after a long discussion among ourselves, and a full consideration of it, we decided to recommend the amendment which now appears in the bill before the House. When the report was presented to the committee, it was discussed and no opposition was offered to it: on the contrary, I thought it was accepted by every member of the committee. If the report of the sub-committee were before the House, hon. gentlemen would see that we recommend the amendment to this bill and that a similar amendment should be added to every railway bill in the future. We do not recommend any retroactive course with regard to legislation of this character, but having the Act of the Ontario legislature to guide us, as well as the bill which passed this House almost unanimously on a former occasion showing that the Ontario Act was in harmony with the views of a large majority of this House, we thought we were safe in recommending this amendment to the Railway Committee. Under the circumstances, I did not expect to see the hon. gentleman from Ottawa opposing the amendment to the bill as he is now doing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not opposing it: I am simply drawing attention to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I hope the bill will be allowed to pass with the amendment.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The hon. gentleman from Richmond has omitted to refer to what came before the committee at the same time that this amendment was made, and that is, that this amendment should be made in all railway bills in future, until such time as the general Railway Act is amended in the direction indicated. That, to my mind, suggests the proper and only constitutional way in which the amendment should be made. I do not think the Parliament of Canada should divest itself of authority and hand it over to the provincial legislature or to the municipalities. My impression is that the right way to meet this difficulty is to carefully frame an amendment and insert it in the general railway law. The committee thought that until something of that kind was done this amendment should be made.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I was simply alluding to the report on the bill which is before the House.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (49) "An Act respecting the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company."—(Mr. Power.)

THE DOMINION ATLANTIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (48) "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN moved

That the said bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by striking out, in the second and third lines of the twenty-sixth clause thereof, the words "or the South Shore Railway Company, Limited," and in the ninth line of said clause the words "companies or either of them," and inserting thereof the word "company."

He said:—The bill as it comes to us provides that the company may enter into an agreement with the South Shore Railway, or the Nova Scotia Central, and the object of the amendment is to omit the South Shore Railway in order that a competitive railway may be maintained. The matter was before the committee, and a vote was taken upon it while I was there, but I did not understand the question at the time and did not vote at all. I think this amendment is in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. MCKAY—I do not think the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment has made out a case. If it is proper to strike out either of these railways as being subject for amalgamation with the line referred to in the bill, he might just as well have struck out the Nova Scotia Central. The Dominion Atlantic Railway runs from Windsor to Yarmouth and is a railway in good standing. The South Shore Railway runs from Yarmouth to Shelburne and would be a fitting railway to connect with the Dominion Atlantic Railway. The promoters of the South Shore Railway are anxious that it should be left in the bill. These charters for railways on that shore have been the making and the unmaking of several members of parliament. There is more politics than money in them and I think it is a bit of a scheme to knife what some people are pleased to call a "Tory railway." I do not think the hon. gentleman knows much about it himself. He is pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for some one else. I hope the House will reject the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Truro does not speak often, but when he does speak, he speaks very much to the purpose. As the introducer of the bill and the member in charge of it, I am prepared to accept this amendment; and further, I may say, after a conversation with the gentleman who promoted this bill, I was given to understand that he attached no importance whatever to this provision. When the motion was made in committee with respect to this amendment, I for one did not think of politics in the matter at all. It may be that the hon. gentleman from Truro has discovered a great deal of politics in it, but I do not think there is. The position is just this: there are two schemes for railways running east and west through the province of Nova Scotia. One set of lines has been completed from Halifax to Yarmouth, that is the one which is owned and operated by the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company. That runs along north of what is called the South Mountain of Annapolis County, and it goes all the way from Halifax to the western extremity of the province at Yarmouth, some 215 miles. Yarmouth is the point of departure for the United States and that is a complete line in itself. The South Shore Railway would be the first link of another line of railway running from Yarmouth to Halifax south of the mountain and near the Atlantic coast. One of the objects in constructing that second line of railway was to give competition to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, or what is the Dominion Atlantic Railway, and it is perfectly clear if you give the western link in that new line of railway to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, that you almost entirely prevent the possibility of any competition between the two sets of lines. Where politics come in I do not exactly see, but I can see that it would be very bad policy, in the interests of the country, to allow the Dominion Atlantic Company to control this line. Another company is chartered to build a line from Shelburne towards Halifax. The people in that part of the country would much sooner have an independent line than a line controlled by the Dominion Atlantic Company. The Nova Scotia Central is a line which runs from north to south—runs from Lunenburg through Bridgewater to a point of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway about 30 miles east of Annapolis. Under this bill the Dominion Atlantic Company can make arrangements with that line, which runs at right angles to their own. There is no serious objection to giving them control of it, but if you give them control of the line running parallel with their own, the probability is that the line will never be built from the Nova Scotia Central to Halifax or Windsor Junction.

Hon. Mr. MCKAY—But it is not running parallel.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The substantial direction of the two lines is east and west. If a road is built from Yarmouth to Shelburne, and Parliament should in its wisdom allow the Windsor and Annapolis Railway to control that road, the company can come to Parliament and look for the power, but at present I think it is altogether in the public interest that this amendment should be passed.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—To show that there is no politics to this bill, I entirely concur in the arguments of my hon. friend from Halifax. There may possibly be a misapprehension as to the geographical aspect of this question. I may say the termini of these two railways—the old railway which is already existing and has already been explained as that on the north side of the mountain, and another railway from the western terminus south of Yarmouth, along the shore by the various towns by a shorter and more direct route to Halifax is nothing but a competing line with the other. It is an alternate line to Halifax, and if I am correctly informed it has been subsidized by the local government. Certain portions of this line have been constructed, and it is going on, and the effect will be that, when this line is finished, it will not only give accommodation to the various towns along the line but it will also be a competing line from Yarmouth to Halifax with the Dominion Atlantic Railway. Therefore it is a strictly competing line and nothing else. Now, that is the state of affairs at present, and this bill asks the power to take that line, as well as the other line, the Nova Scotia Central Railway. This question came up, as has been stated, before the committee, and the promoter of the bill was called upon to give an opinion. He made the statement showing there was no objection whatever to the claim made here to include this South-eastern Railway, because it was only a branch of the main line which led from Yarmouth to Halifax in a part of the county of Annapolis which extended at right angles to the shore, I think somewhere in Lunenburg. Under these circumstances, he was asked: "What about the other line, the South Shore Line? He said: "I have nothing to say about that at all." He had no reason to give why that should be included and he did not profess to give any reasons. We have heard no reasons to-day, but there are reasons why it ought not to be, and the reason is perfectly manifest that if we pass a bill enabling these people to gobble up this line, you will not only destroy the competing line from Halifax to Yarmouth, but you will destroy the line which will give accommodation to all the towns east and west between the termini of the two railways. The termini are the same, on the east Halifax, and on the west Yarmouth, only the one railway starts from the north side of Yarmouth and the other from the south side of Yarmouth. That being the case, it is difficult to conceive why there should be any objections to prevent this amendment taking place. It is just exactly similar in principle to what it would be if the Canadian Pacific Railway, holding a line from Montreal to Ottawa, were to ask for legislation giving them power to amalgamate with and gobble up the Canada Atlantic Railway, which is the competing line from Ottawa to Montreal. What would the members from Ottawa, or any members who are animated by a public spirit, say to that?

They would laugh at the idea. And yet we are asked to put in this bill power to enable the Dominion Atlantic Company to prevent this competing line being built from Yarmouth to Halifax. There ought to be no question about it, and after these facts came out, the promoter of the bill, although he gave good reason for including this South Eastern line, gave no reasons whatever for including the other, and there have been no reasons given to-day why the other should be included, except it will enable the Dominion Atlantic Company, whenever it suits its convenience, to take possession of that line and deprive the people of that section of competition, and deprive the towns along the Nova Scotia coast of legislation for which they have been asking for a great many years.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am surprised at the statement of the hon. member from Amherst that there are no politics in this amendment. I think I can prove to the satisfaction of the House that there is. There were two lines started from Yarmouth intending to proceed from Yarmouth to Shelburne. In the first ten miles they crossed each other three or four times, and on no part of the distance were they more than four miles apart, according to the plans. One was a Conservative road, wide gauge; the other, Grit, was narrow gauge, and was called the Tom Robinson road, as it was through it he was returned M.P.P. for Shelburne, and he is now the president of the road. Neither of these railroads appeared to have much capital, as far as was known. One has burst up and disappeared for a time, although I think it will appear again, and the other one was very much in the same fix; everybody laughed at it. And I would ask my hon. friend if he thinks any capitalist would invest a dollar in that road? I think not. I say it was a bogus railroad and got up in order to obtain votes at the election about to take place in Queen's county and Shelburne, and I think the hon. member from Truro was justified in calling this a political road and clap-trap brought before the House for election purposes. I hope the amendment will be supported by all people who think the railroad should be used for the benefit of Nova Scotia and not for political purposes and humbug.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I have made some inquiry about it and I am inclined to support the report of the committee. I can see—if the hon. gentlemen on the other side cannot—reasons why power should be giving to amalgamate those roads. I know that in old Canada we have seen a great many competing railroads started resulting in ruin to both roads. In Canada very few people who invest money in railroads, ever get anything out of them. It is also well known that our freight and passenger rates are as low as in other countries, and quite low enough. They do not pay at all. I can understand perfectly why, when two roads amalgamate they can save money. When two small roads of that kind get together, it costs very little more to manage them as one system than to manage one of them alone. They are a great deal better when they are under one management and that they help the people whose freight they carry a great deal too. The committee has recommended certain things and I feel disposed to accept their report.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As the county of Lunenburg has some interest in this road, I cannot let it pass without a few words. A great many railways have been projected down there, and none of them seem to have advanced much, and I do not know whether it would be advisable to have my advocacy at all. There is a narrow gauge railway, not yet completed, from Shelburne to Yarmouth, which is called the Grit railway, and the coast line railway superior in financial position, a broad gauge line called the Tory railway, the broad gauge indicating broad views. As this narrow gauge line was only, I think, intended to run from Shelburne to Yarmouth as a branch, I had no objection to the gauge, but a road to connect with the railway system through the province, should be a broad gauge railway. The road is proposed to be extended from Yarmouth passing through all those towns along the south shore to Halifax.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—How far will the roads be apart?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH.—In some places 100 miles apart. I do not approve of this amalgamation, because I think they will not finish it all the way. I should like all our shore towns to get the benefit of that railway; but if it is to amalgamate with the Dominion Atlantic Railway my impression is, it will not be built at all, or, at most, it will only go some distance, probably as far as Bridgewater, and then connect with the Nova Scotia Central and then over that road to Middleton, and then down to Halifax. That will be no benefit to our country at all, and I am opposed to the amalgamation. There is another road which we take an interest in, from Shelburne through the northern part of Queen's County to New Germany; from thence we hope it will go through the northern part of Lunenburg county by way of New Germany and New Ross on to Windsor Junction. That is the railway most in the interests of the county. I do not think a railway running along the shore competing with water service, will ever be a great success, although it may give us some accommodation. But a road through Queen's County, through New Germany and also through the fertile districts of Lunenburg county to Windsor Junction, will open and develop the country very much better than any of the other roads; but that yet is in the clouds, so I must be in favour of this shore road going from Yarmouth on to Halifax; but any amalgamation would only be the means of preventing it going further than Bridgewater, and therefore it will travel by the Nova Scotia Central on to Middleton, and then it will give us no accommodation further than we have now. Instead of being a competing road to the Dominion Atlantic Railway it would be the reverse. I yet hope to see what is called the Herney road, which would connect Shelburne and Liverpool with New Germany, and from thence extended by way of New Germany and New Ross, until it meets the Intercolonial Railway at Windsor Junction.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—Some of us are terribly mixed about the railways. I believe the argument of the hon. member from Amherst has reference entirely to what is known as the narrow gauge railway, and his arguments would be sound as against that; but this is a railway to connect Shelburne with Yarmouth. The Dominion Atlantic Railway does not care very much whether this clause remains as it is or not, but the promoters of the South Shore Railway are anxious that it should remain. Are they frightened that the other railway will prevent it being built?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the House will extend to me the same indulgence as that extended to the hon. member from Truro. With respect to what my hon. colleague has stated, supposing these railway companies are both bogus, which I understood him to say they were—is it a dignified or proper thing for Parliament to give this Dominion Atlantic Company power to amalgamate with bogus companies? Then, with respect to the gauge, I may say both these bogus roads are to be of the broad gauge. The argument of my hon. colleague and the hon. gentleman from Truro would be perfectly good if the question before the House was which of these roads the Dominion Atlantic Company should be allowed to amalgamate with. I say that the Dominion Atlantic Railway should not be allowed to amalgamate with either of these roads. That is the line of my argument and the line of the argument of the hon. members from Albert and Amherst. I think that argument will address itself to the common sense of the House. We do not undertake to decide questions between Grit and Tory railways, or which is the bogus one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not aware that either of these railways is bogus, but I know this, that one of the roads has been subsidized by the Dominion Government and the other by the Nova Scotia Government, and when a question arose as to trying to amalgamate their interests, the Nova Scotia authorities I am informed put their foot down and stamped it out. It must be borne in mind that these two roads run parallel to each other, nearly all the way from Yarmouth to Shelburne.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the two bogus roads.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say they were bogus, and I am not aware that either one of them is bogus; but this I do know, that one road is in the hands and control of one party and the other is in the hands and control of the other party, and as the hon. member from Truro very properly said, they are designated by the names of Tory and Grit roads. I can understand there being no politics in this at all, from the standpoint of the hon. gentleman from Amherst, because he would not lend himself to any Grit scheme to accomplish any purpose, I understood the hon. gentleman's opposition to be on the general principle of amalgamation. What can this opposition road consist of, supposing it were built? Supposing the whole grand scheme of construction of the road from Yarmouth to Halifax was in actual running order to-day, the only people who would be benefited by that competing line as it has been spoken of, would be the people of Yarmouth, and what you have to consider is this—and I would suggest it to those who are interested in the construction of the road—whether, if they are of the character that has been indicated, there is any probability of those people living on the south shore, who have no communication, of ever getting a road if they do not get a powerful company like the Dominion Atlantic at their back. This company is organized; its line is partly graded from Yarmouth to Shelburne. The narrow gauge road which is subsidized by the local government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a broad gauge road now. They are changing the gauge.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of it now as it is. I am glad to know they are becoming of the character indicated by the hon. member from Lunenburg—broad gauge, and broad in their views. Then, there is no more necessity for those two roads being built alongside of each other than there would be to run a road from Montreal or Toronto to Cornwall twenty or thirty yards from the Grand Trunk Railway. That is the position of these two roads and I am firmly of the opinion that if you reject this, the people of Shelburne, who are worse off to-day than almost any other seaport town, will be deprived of a road for a good many years to come. These two companies have been quarrelling for years, unfortunately, their interests being diversified, interests which are not the interests of the people, but of the individuals who are connected with them, whether political or otherwise I give no opinion and I leave that to those who are in that neighbourhood to state; but this we do know, that in Shelburne and that locality that has been a political plank in the late elections, and as indicated a few moments ago, it will be used in future for that very purpose. The fact that that Nova Scotia government refused to aid one road or the other unless they could keep control of it is the very best evidence that it is more political than in the interests of the country. If the south shore people desire the construction of that road and I think there is no place that they require it more than they do at Shelburne—they should allow this clause to remain on the statute-book. Another thing from the Dominion standpoint is this; we are paying a heavy subsidy for connecting Shelburne, Yarmouth and St. John by steamboat communication. If this railway be built through the aid we have given it, and through the financial strength of any larger corporation, than the Dominion Government would be relieved of the subsidy which they have to pay for the steamboat accommodation, except it would be from Shelburne and other ports towards Halifax. These facts came under my notice from having looked into the question of subsidizing the road and from the action of the parties who are seeking incorporation under another company in the lower House for the wide gauge road from Yarmouth to Shelburne. Let me repeat that as far as the competition is concerned and the benefits arising from competition, it would only be from Yarmouth, and whether they went round by the north shore or the south shore, it would not help my hon. friend a particle. If he wanted to go to Halifax he would take the south shore road wherever it would form a junction with the road which runs from Lunenburg and connect with Windsor and Annapolis. But these roads are 50 to 100 miles apart, and the building of that road will be just as much to the south shore people and along that line as the Grand Trunk Railway is for the accommodation of the people along the St. Lawrence. As for its running alongside navigable waters, that is the argument we employed years ago when the Grand Trunk Railway was built. It is true there is the competition with the water and that will always exist with heavy freight, but with passengers it will not. I would advise the House not to adopt the amendment of the hon. member for Hopewell.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (74) "An Act to amend the 25

Act to encourage the development of Sea Fisheries and the building of Fishing Vessels." He said: The object of this bill is to give certain fisheries officers standing power to take evidence under oath when making inquiries into alleged fishing bounty frauds. At present, when a case is reported and referred to an inspector of fisheries for inquiry, he is in many cases unable to get at the facts because of the unwillingness of parties connected with the irregularities, or of those in possession of the facts, to tell the truth. It often happens that when a party gives information with regard to alleged fraud, which he says he is prepared to prove, is called upon so to do, he refuses to substantiate his statements when called as a witness. If the officers had power to get evidence under oath, those difficulties would be removed and better results would follow the prosecution of such cases. Chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, as amended by the Act of 1889, provides for the appointment of commissioners to inquire into matters of this kind, but as frequent complaints of fraud are made, it would be necessary under this act to go to the council for a commission in each case, and considerable delay would follow, whereas the proposed amendment to the bounty act would enable the officer to proceed once a complaint is made and obtain the facts under oath without delay. It is a very small bill with a large title.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who is the fishery officer?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Any officer of the department, for instance, the inspector.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Will it be any officer located at the place where the inquiry is made.?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whenever he deems it expedient to cause inquiry to be made into or concerning any matter connected with the said grant or payment thereof, may direct any officer—an officer of his department, the fishery inspector for instance.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It might be some officer located at the spot. He would be the best.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Have they not that power now?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, at present they have not the power, and a commissioner has to be appointed. It makes a long delay and can only be done by an order in council.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill.

In the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this clause, but I think that this new section may be worded a little differently. Under the language of this subsection the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, whenever he deems it advisable to cause inquiry to be made into any matter connected with the grants to fishermen, which amount to some $175,000, could refer that matter to any fishery officer. That is not really what the object of the clause is. The object of the clause is this, and I think it ought to be set out in that way :

That whereas it has been known that frauds have been perpetrated by persons entitled to receive a grant under the Act, and it is desirable that inquiry should be made on the spot with respect to those matters, therefore the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in any cause where he suspects anything improper, and in order to secure those claims, might direct the fishery officer.

However, that is a matter of taste.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot agree with that suggestion at all. I think it is not necessary to declare in the statute that the people in the maritime provinces, who specially enjoy this bounty, are more liable to commit frauds than others. It would be a stigma of dishonesty which should not be put in the statute-book, and the language adopted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is more suitable than the one proposed by my hon. friend from Halifax. It is perfectly clear as it is, and I cannot adopt his suggestion.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the Committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

DOMINION NOTES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (22) "An Act further to amend the act respecting Dominion Notes."

He said: Doubt arose as to the power of the government to issue bank notes exceeding $20,000,000 and a resolution passed the House of Commons last session upon which a bill was founded giving power to issue notes to the extent of $25,000,000, but for every dollar that was issued over and above the $20,000,000, which they were authorized to issue under the old act, $1 in gold had to be kept in reserve. In the framing of the act, strange to say, while the law gave the power of the government to issue to the extent of $25,000,000, the safeguard to the noteholders was omitted. The law as it stands on the statute-book reads as follows:—

Section 3 of the act respecting Dominion Notes, Chapter 39 of the Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by striking out the word "twenty" in the 4th line of said section and substituting therefor the word "twenty-five."

The provision for a reserve was omitted. The present bill is to provide this security to which I have referred. The present amendment, it will be observed, does not restrict the issue to $25,000,000. The government for the time being can issue to any amount, providing they keep one dollar in gold in reserve in case of a demand for the redemption in gold of the extra sums which may have been issued.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the law as it stands fifty per cent of the issue has to be held in gold. I presume the idea of the present bill is that in any issue in excess of $20,000,000 the reserve shall be dollar for dollar.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will see that we do not restrict the amount to be issued, but the security of dollar for dollar must be provided.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The bill then passed through Committee of the Whole was read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rule.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (92) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act." (Mr. Angers.)

THE LATE SENATOR BURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In my moving the adjournment of the Senate, it is melancholy duty to call to the attention of the House to the death of another of its members—Mr. Burns. The departed senator has been but a short time a member of this body, though he had been for many years in political life in the province in which he lived. Many of us knew him as an energetic business man, occupying the first position in the county in which he lived. He had been elected a number of times to represent the people of his county in the local legislature, and was known for his ability as a business man, and also for a useful member in the House of Commons for some years until called to the honourable position of senator of the Dominion. The deceased, though young in years, has been called by his Maker to his long home, regretted by everyone who had the pleasure of knowing him. I can only say for myself, that, during the few years in which I had the honour of his acquaintance, I always found him to be a straightforward, honest, patriotic citizen of Canada. His one great desire was the advancement of the country of his adoption. I deeply regret that our ranks have been thinned to an alarming extent during the short period that I have had the honour of occupying a seat in the Senate, express the sense that I am sure every one of us feels of the loss that this House and the country have sustained in the demise of one who was so actively engaged in business life. From what I can learn he has not left his family in as good a condition financially as we should all like, but that is incident to every man engaged in a large extensive business. Sometimes it is lucrative, as we all know, and sometimes it is the reverse. In his case, I believe, had he been spared, he would have emerged from the difficulties in which he found himself, and if he had been called away later there would not have been such a severe loss. Still, that is incident to all of us, and I can only again repeat my personal regret at the loss that this House has sustained.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I unite in the Premier's expression of sorrow at the death of Mr. Burns. I had not the pleasure of knowing him except by repute, and from what I have heard I certainly agree in all that the Premier has stated on the subject, but I have no doubt there are some members from his province who knew him personally who will give expression to their regret at his demise.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I belong to the same province from which our late colleague came, but I had not the pleasure of knowing him personally. I only knew of him as a public man, but I, as well as other gentlemen in this Senate, feel great regret at knowing that one so lately appointed to this House has been so suddenly taken away. I have always understood that he was an active commercial man in his part of the country, and I am under the impression that he was a native of the county which he represented. I can only express my sorrow and regret with the other members of the House at his sudden and unexpected death.

The Senate then adjourned.

CANADIAN SICK BENEFIT SOCIETY BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Sick Benefit Society."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—This bill is based upon a petition which was reported from the Committee on Standing Orders on Private Bills. The petition was irregular, inasmuch as the applicants had not advertised in all the provinces in which they proposed to do business. The committee did not wish to block the bill altogether, and they made the recommendation that they should confine the business of the company to the province in which it was advertised. I observe that the Committee on Banking and Commerce took no notice of the recommendation made by the Standing Orders Committee. If the bill is passed in its present shape, the House will be stultifying itself and breaking one of its own rules. Now, there are two courses open to the House—either to suspend the rules or to confine the operations of the society to Ontario, where it has been advertised. I do not wish to oppose the bill in any way, but that is the position in which it stands.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The Committee on Banking and Commerce were not guilty of any neglect in paying attention to the recommendation made by the Committee on Standing Orders, but they were asked to do something which they could not do, namely, to legislate for the incorporation of a society to do business not throughout the Dominion but in one province only and we had of course to disregard the recommendation. When this bill came before the committee proof was furnished that there had been a misunderstanding, on the part of the applicants for this legislation, of a circular sent out by the clerk of the House of Commons as to the notices which should be published before a bill of this kind could be introduced. Proof of this was adduced before the Committee of the other House and, taking all these things into consideration, the committee did not see that they could do anything else but report the bill as they have done.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Very often reports of committees go through the House without much consideration, and a considerable number of Senators know nothing of what they really contain. With regard to the report of the Standing Orders Committee on this bill, I do not think any one knew that it contained such a recommendation as he described. I took the report as a recommendation of the committee that the rule of the House should be suspended in relation to that bill—that is, in regard to not giving notice in the different provinces. The matter was discussed fully to-day in the Banking Committee, and that was the opinion arrived at. My hon. friend from Victoria will see what would be the effect of adopting such a recommendation. Had this company gone to the local legislature and got a charter, it would have been able to do business in any part of the Dominion. It might not be done so conveniently, and parties seeking litigation against it would not be in as good a position to obtain it as if the charter were granted here, because they might have to go to the province where the company was incorporated for the remedy. A bill passed by the local legislature would really be operative throughout the Dominion in that way, whereas if this bill were limited in the manner suggested by the hon. member from Victoria, the company's business would be confined to one province of the Dominion, and the result would be to make an Act of this Parliament less operative than an Act of the local legislature. I do not think it would be advisable to put on our statute-book legislation recognizing anything of that kind. When an Act of incorporation is granted here, it should be recognized that it extends to all the provinces of the Dominion. It was out of no disregard of the recommendation of the Standing Orders Committee, but we thought it would not be a good policy to adopt a principle such as that to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose the shortest way out of the difficulty would be to suspend the 49th rule. The question came up in the committee about suspending the rule, and they thought it would be better not to do so but to explain the whole matter. The company did not publish the proper notices and deserved to have the petition thrown out, but we did not wish to take that course. If the hon. gentleman who has charge of the bill will move the suspension of the rule, it will cover the whole ground.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Did not the report of the committee recommend the suspension of the rule?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—No.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The Standing Orders Committee, in reporting on this bill, with three others, recommended that as the rule had not been complied with and the advertisement had been published in Ontario only, the committee to whom the bill was to be referred should confine the operations of the company to that province, something which we could not possibly do.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The disposition of the committee appeared to be to allow those bills to pass. There were three or four of them, all of an important character, and it was established to the satisfaction of the committee that the difficulty arose through a circular issued by the clerk of the House of Commons from which the word "province" was omitted. This circular was sent out to the promoters of private bills, and they, in accordance with that circular, omitted to advertise in the several provinces of the Dominion. Afterwards, when the bill came up, the committee on private bills of the other House reported that the rule had been practically complied with. This bill has passed the House of Commons and its committees. Explanations were made as to the way in which the difficulty arose from the circular omitting the word "province." The promoters of this bill appeared before the Committee on Standing Orders, and I am justified in saying that the committee desired that the bill should be duly passed. It was suggested that rule 49 should be suspended, and when I left the committee I was under the impression that the report of the committee would be made accordingly, recommending the suspension of the rule. It was not due to any negligence that the publication was insufficient, but as I have explained, through a mistake. I would, therefore, give notice that when the bill comes up for the third reading I shall move the suspension of the 49th rule.

BANKERS' LIFE ASSOCIATION OF CANADA BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (26) "An Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada, with amendments. He said:—This bill is one included in the same category with the one which has just been under consideration in the report of the Standing Orders Committee. The amendments are not of an important character. The principal one is that with regard to the title of the bill. Originally it was "An Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada." Objection was raised at the second reading of the bill that this title might give rise to misapprehension and accordingly the word "Insurance" was added to the title, and it now reads "An Act to Incorporate the Bankers' Life Insurance Association of Canada."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the amendments be taken into consideration tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This report places members of the House who, on the second reading of the bill, took exception to the title, in an embarrassing position. No change has been made in the title of the bill that would meet the objection which was raised when the bill was first introduced. It seems extraordinary that the promoters of the bill should persist in stealing a title—the word is not too strong—a title that will deceive and defraud the community. We know very well that the line which insurance agents take in seeking for business is to furnish evidence of the stability and soundness of the company which they represent. Can they point to any stronger evidence of the stability of this company than by representing it as being the Bankers' Life Insurance Association? This House ought to have some respect for itself and not allow a fraud to be perpetrated on the community. The promoters of the bill are very much to blame. The same protest was made in the other house and no attention was paid to it. One does not like to throw out a bill, but if they persist in adhering to the name, I think it is the duty of Parliament to reject this bill as one liable to defraud and mislead the public. I give notice that at the third reading I shall move the three month's hoist, unless the promoters choose another name.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—This matter was discussed in the committee, a majority of whom were as much opposed to the name as my honourable friend is, but they were informed by the Inspector of Insurance that companies with that name were transacting business in the United States and were likely to do business in Canada if we did not pass this bill. It was thought advisable, therefore, to grant the request of the promoters. The banking committee took very strong objection to it, and were only influenced to support the bill when the additional word "Insurance" was added to the title to show that they had, at any rate, performed their duty as far as possible. I do not see how they could avoid recommending the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I give notice that I will move the suspension of the 49th rule in reference to this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I give notice that I shall move an amendment to change the title of the bill.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I was as much opposed to the title of the bill as anyone. I was opposed to it when the bill first came into the House, but of course it was my duty simply to report what a majority of the committee had decided upon, and having the advantage of the presence of the gentleman in charge of the Department of Insurance, and hearing his statement with respect to similar insurance companies in the United States, and one particularly which at one time had intended to do business in Canada, which bore the same name and which he stated would not have been refused a license had they applied, the committee was satisfied that the explanation was sufficient and that the difficulty was sufficiently met by inserting the word "Insurance" in the title of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to ask if the question was put to him as to whether the government were bound to issue a license to do business in Canada to any company, no matter what their name is? If so, I think the sooner we amend the law the better.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—We could not refuse it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot understand that it is the duty of the government to absolutely issue a license to any company under any name they select.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman had better give notice of a motion to amend the Insurance Act, and obviate the difficulty in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the duty of those who enforce the law to look after it.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—The more I think of the matter the more I share the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Ottawa. I, myself, was deluded by this title. When I saw it, I thought it was a company of bankers in Canada, but I found out to my surprise that there were no bankers among the promoters of the bill. If the company is organized under that name, its agents will very likely, like all other insurance agents, take any advantage they can of a title which would bring to the minds of the public the names of those most acceptable to any people who like to insure their lives. I think it would be much better if the title could be amended.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (Niagara)—I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and the hon. member from Ottawa. This title would be misleading to the public. Why they should take the bankers' name I do not know, except to lead the people to believe that the banks had something to do with it. I think this House should prevent any deluding or entrapping of the public by use of such a name.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—When the matter was discussed in committee I raised the question that the name was misleading, and it was discussed in the committee. It was stated there that the Commercial Travellers' Insurance Association or the Manufacturers' Insurance Company for example were allowed to use those names although the commercial travellers or manufacturers might not be shareholders or have much to do with the companies. It is simply a name given to the company, which it was thought might be misleading, and it was amended by adding "Insurance."

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I mentioned the other day that I thought the name was likely to lead people astray, and that I hardly thought it was fair to other companies. To-day I asked one of the gentleman that was on the committee about it, and I understood from him that it was not an insurance company at all, but a company like these benevolent societies. If that is the case, they should not have the name of a Life Insurance Company, because under that name they will have to go under the hands of Mr. Fitzgerald, and they will not fancy that very much. The name is not a proper one to be taken for an insurance company, and I should like to see the title amended if possible.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Notwithstanding the report that has been brought in, I think the feeling of the House is opposed to using the word "banker." The Manufacturers'

Life Insurance Company has been mentioned as a precedent, but that would not deceive anybody. It is not a name which would give it any special credit with the people, while "bankers" would at once bring to the mind of those who wish to be insured the idea of wealth, of capital accumulated to meet insurance claims. I think, therefore, the sense of the House being opposed to the using of the word "bankers," that the hon. member should move to modify the title of the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I most decidedly object to strictures of the kind that we have heard to-day in reference to the charter now being applied for, the promoters of which are reliable men as far as we can ascertain. I ask hon. gentlemen to reserve their opinions till to-morrow, when I shall have an opportunity of pointing out to the House that in Great Britain and the United States there are numerous companies bearing names of this character—companies which we are bound to admit to do business in Canada if they make application to the Department of Finance for a license to do such business. I give more credit to the people of Canada than some hon. gentlemen apparently do; they are not deceived to the extent, which may be apprehended by some hon. gentlemen, when they come to do business with an insurance company or any other commercial enterprise. The mere fact of adopting a name is not, I take it, for the purpose of deceiving the public, but for the purpose of convenience. When the bill comes up for discussion to-morrow, I shall be able to point out to this House that the people of Great Britain and also the people of the United States have not laboured under such very grave misapprehensions, as members of this House think the people of Canada would be under by the adoption of a name of this character.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—Does the hon. gentleman think he would prevent insurance companies in the United States and elsewhere, bearing a similar name, from coming here because of the name of this company? I do not think so.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved—

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a Return of representations, if any, made by the Government of Manitoba, or any member thereof, to the Dominion Government, on the working of the educational system in force in the province of Manitoba, prior to the 1st of May, 1890.

He said: The continual recurrence of this Manitoba school question must, to a certain extent, be a source of some weariness to the House. It has been hanging on for so many years, and the other duties devolving upon you require so much of your attention, that I quite realize the peculiar difficulties I am placed in when approaching anew this question. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the question has to be dealt with, and as one coming from the province where the trouble arose, it falls upon me, more than upon anybody else, to be the exponent of the grievance and of the just claims of the minority in Manitoba. And I have no doubt that the indulgence and kindness shown to me by this House on previous occasions will ever be extended to me whenever I rise to fulfil my duties in that respect. I more particularly crave your forbearance on the present occasion, as I have to deal with matters clad with some unpleasantness. The nature of the observations I have to offer is indicated by my motion. Judging from the public utterances of some of the members of the Manitoba Government, I am led to believe that some representations, or rather misrepresentations, may have been made to this Government, in view of their possible action, on the working of the school system in existence in Manitoba prior to 1890. Otherwise, it would surely strike the mind of everybody that it is, to say the least, a very questionable way of dealing with so serious a subject to go before the public, and now, without any warning to the parties interested, or to the government here, raise objections unheard of before, objections which were not raised at the beginning of this turmoil, nor have been since during the five years of contention just elapsed. That sudden change of front, this volley of accusations, so tardy and new, must at once excite distrust in the accusations and in the accusers themselves. If their intention, when contemplating changes in the educational system, was simply to cure an evil and foster the educational interest of the people (I mean the whole people, not one section only), why did they not begin by making a proper investigation of the whole subject? Why did they not call upon the interested parties then? Why did they not advise the Roman Catholics that they had good reason to believe that there was something wrong in the management of their schools? Why did they not urge upon the minority the necessity of improving their system, and why did they not, after mature consideration and loyal negotiation with the representatives of the Catholic section bring down some measure as framed as to meet the requirements of the case, while respecting the constitution, the vested rights of the minority and the honest and conscientious feelings of the pioneers of education in that country? For, as I will show you hereafter, we were the first to open schools in the North-west. If they had acted in that way they would have shown their sincerity, they would have found men and a whole population most willing to discuss with them the educational interests of the province and to accede to any reasonable suggestions, and thereby save the Dominion from an agitation antagonistic to peace, union and the consolidation of our political fabric. But without any warning except in the public press, without visiting our schools (which they had the power of doing, as I will show you hereafter) without approaching the representatives men of the Catholic population, with the view of considering the best way of curing the alleged evils, without suggesting any mode, regulations or legislation in harmony with the principles laid down by the province at its creation and for twenty years afterwards in the matter of education, they proceeded, seemingly, to replace the old system by a new one, but in reality to wipe out the Catholic schools, and revive, under the name of public schools, the Protestant schools, just as they were before. We were given no alternative, to improve our schools or to lose them. It is the destruction of our schools they wanted; that is the only thing that was signified to us under the form of bills which, with some immaterial amendments, came into force on the first day of May, 1890, and which accomplished the purpose that the Manitoba Government had in view, viz.; the exclusion of the Catholics from participating in the financial advantages offered to others by the province in educational matters unless they would consent to conditions which were known beforehand of impossible acceptance. Let me quote the utterance of a gentleman highly respected here, Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald:

There can be no doubt, he has repeatedly said, that the law was brought into force in the most brutal manner, and for purely political purposes. The men who kept themselves in power by their appeals in favour of national schools, cared very little about the matter, yet they knew by raising such a cry they would draw the public mind away from the short comings of the government and its general policy.

Mr. Macdonald is not alone in his appreciation of the unfair way we have been treated. A provincial newspaper, the Morden Monitor, published in 1892 the following lines:

This measure was carried through by brutal force, without regard to the feeling or sentiment of the minority. No compensation, no conciliation, no compromise was at all attempted. The country never asked for such legislation. It was a measure of revenge. Instead of a measure based on impartiality and justice to all. Mr. Gladstone, in his Irish church disestablishment bill laid down the splendid principle that no interest should be effected without fair compensation, and no living person should be disturbed in the exercise of his right and privilege or position. That's statesmanship; that measure contained no such fairness. All that is held dear to a large number of our fellow country men must be swept away. The ruthless way this act was carried through the Manitoba House would disgrace the actions of the uncivilized savages of the South Sea Islanders, or of a buccaneering crew on the high seas.

This paper is published by a Protestant and is very much opposed to the Catholic church, as you may judge by the way it speaks of the Catholic clergy in the same article from which I have taken the above quotation: "The ruthless" it says, "and tyrannical methods of the Quebec hierarchy have been copied and introduced in Manitoba by the Protestants". This shows that there is no partiality in our favour on the part of that newspaper, and it gives great force to its views. Does not that retrospective view of what took place in 1890, tell the story of to-day? Is not the unfairness of that time suggestive of the probable unfairness of to-day? Can we not assume at once that deeds and legislation born in injustice and brutality are sought to be maintained by abuse and slander? What reliance is to be attached to the utterances of public men who, for the sake of party advantages, pledged their party and their government to the maintenance of institutions which they knew—which had been in operation under their eyes for many and many years, and who, afterwards, for party advantages also broke their pledges, and sullied the honour and the dignity of this province? It is not out of place to recall the fact that the government of Manitoba has been convinced, by incontrovertible evidence, from the ranks of their own party as well as from our ranks, of having, through Mr. Greenway, undertaken to maintain our schools, our language and our electoral divisions as they were at the time he was called to form a government. That was the time for announcing their policy and of indicating to the people the reforms they had in contemplation; that was the time for pointing out the evils of our schools, if any there were; but no, then they were satisfied with the existing condition of things, so much so that they did not hesitate to pledge themselves to its maintenance. Two years had not elapsed, however, when, false to their promises and to their own word, they faced about and threw the country into a state of discontent and almost endless agitation, by wiping out, without any attempt at compromise, the very things which they were bound, in honour and in good policy to uphold. Again, I ask, what credibility can be attached to the utterances of such false public men. None whatever. It seems to me we should have been exempt from going through the ordeal of defending institutions which they had committed themselves to maintain and which they could control. The malicious aspersions to which we have been lately subjected from these gentlemen have evidently no other foundation than the necessity in which they now find themselves to raise false and side issues, in order to make good before a certain public the hopeless position which the decision of the Privy Council has placed them in. They believe by exciting passions and prejudices that they may succeed for some time longer in defeating the ends of justice. Let us hope that the good sense of the people will carry our country safely through this new whirlwind, and that the two sisters known by the names of peace and justice, will conquer the hearts of all the provinces, and draw to them the best part of the nation. The question that is now before the public is not a question of expediency; it is a question of right. It is not a question of regulations; it is a question of principles. Are the Catholics entitled to their schools? that is the question. How to regulate them comes next. The schools might have been the contrary of what the minority claim they were; they might have been a thousand times worse than what they are represented to have been by our opponents; that would not destroy the constitutional and equitable right of the Catholics to their existence, and to have the same restored. The management of the schools is quite a different thing from their constitutionality, or from the vested right of the Catholics to have them. Let the Catholics have their schools, and let the management of the same be properly attended to afterwards. If the government of Manitoba in 1890 had the evidence and the conviction, which they contend now they had, that our schools were in a state of inefficiency, or otherwise improperly managed, they simply have been twice derelict to their duties—first, in not taking the proper means of putting them on a better footing, and second, in encroaching upon the rights and privileges of the minority. For, let us not be deceived by what they say; they had full power and opportunity of exercising control over our schools, as I will show hereafter. Since they had that power and that duty, since they have not thought proper to avail themselves of such power and to fulfil their duty, they cannot base an argument now on their own fault and ask for an investigation the results of which, whether good or bad, cannot have any bearing on the merit of the case as it stands to-day. This idea of having an investigation now is only an afterthought, a new device to postpone the settlement of this important matter. We have been suffering for too many years now to afford to be put off again by such a procrastinating process as has been suggested. It was thought by this Parliament five years ago that it might be better to refer the matter to the judicial tribunals. It has been so referred. The highest court of the empire has adjudged in our favour. This government has very properly taken action on that judgment. So far the Catholics are satisfied, but they are now looking to the carrying out of the government's policy as announced by the Prime Minister on the floor of this House at the beginning of this session, and I hasten to add that they are confident that that policy will be carried out without any undue delay.

I repeat that the re-establishment of our schools must take place as a matter of right. It cannot depend on the state of efficiency or inefficiency in which they might have been prior to 1890 ; it cannot depend on any facts, disclosures, statements or evidence that might be adduced one way or another. We have an inherent right to them outside of any extraneous circumstances. That is the construction put upon the constitution by the Privy Council. Hence, the uselessness of such an investigation. Moreover, that would not cure past evils, if there were any. As to the future, it can be taken care of without the expense to the country, the hardships to the minority, and the trouble to the whole Dominion, that the appointment of any commission now would entail.

But, for all that, hon. gentlemen, the Catholics of Manitoba are not averse to speaking of their schools, which were the equal in every respect to the schools of the other section, and in some respects superior. They were superior inasmuch as the two languages, French and English, were taught in them, while the English language only was taught in the schools of the Protestant section. They were immensely superior again in as much as positive and definite christianity was taught in them and a higher course of religious training given, while in the others, they were satisfied with very little in that direction. I propose now to take notice of the charges that have been directed against our schools and deal fully with such slanderous accusations. As I said at the outset, the fact that these accusations are launched by the very men who have been convicted of having been false to the electors, false to their own word, and false to their own pledges ; who are under the ban of a verdict from the highest court of the Empire, charging them with injustice towards a section of their own countrymen, which is much more serious than if they had been simply declared erroneous interpreters of the constitution ; who did not attempt to prune the tree that displeased them, but simply cut it down and set it on fire—that fact, I say, should lead everybody to hesitate before crediting those denunciations. But there are good people who are apt to be led astray by these charges constantly repeated, and it is but right that there should be given some explanation and contradiction. The first evidence that I will cite is an extract from the speeches of Mr. Martin, the author of the law. It will at once throw light on the subject. He was the strongest advocate of the measure and had no consideration for our views or our feelings. But he took his position on public grounds, fearlessly and boldly, and I have yet to learn that he descended to the abuse to which we are subjected to-day. When introducing his measure in the local House, he said :

The government's action had not been determined because they were dissatisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the department are conducted under this system, but because they are dissatisfied with the system itself.

So dissatisfaction as to the management of the schools was not the cause of the Manitoba Government's action. Mr. Martin was dissatisfied with the system itself, as not agreeing with his views as to what should be a system of national schools. That is all. We may differ from him as to that. I do strongly differ from him in that respect, both as to the matter of policy and, in our peculiar case, as to the constitutional power of the legislature to pass that measure. But that is a stand which rests on public grounds and which can, on that account, be honestly defended without descending to abuse or slander. This declaration of Mr. Martin is clear evidence that the Government of Manitoba was bound then to have the system changed. It was not a question of efficiency or inefficiency. They wanted the change under any circumstances. They needed no investigation and they did not make any. Without going into any inquiry as to the internal efficiency or inefficiency of the system they made the change, and from that we are justified to-day in saying that the new stand now taken by that government is nothing but a subterfuge. And right here may I be allowed, hon. gentlemen, to place before your eyes practical evidence of the efficiency of our schools ? I have placed on the table specimens of work from different schools which everybody may look at, and I am confident that no one will find any fault with them. Some are admirable specimens. All these are the work of the pupils. The maps are done from memory. Of course these come from our best schools, but the teachers in these schools are also the teachers in a great many other schools. In fact these teachers are twenty-five per cent of the whole staff, and fifty per cent of the other teachers are their pupils, and had a normal school training in these institutions from which these specimens are taken. Such pupils having had the advantage of such teachers must surely have some ability of their own also, and be considered as fit for the position of teacher in the rural part of the country. I will now proceed to the consideration of the accusations laid against us. For the sake of convenience I will take the indictment as brought by the Attorney General of Manitoba. It will be found in the Globe of the 25th April, 1895 :

THE OLD SYSTEM.

Mr. Sifton then explained the state of things prior to 1890. There were, he said, what might be called two systems of public schools in existence, a Protestant system and a Catholic system, with a Board of Education having a Catholic section and a Protestant section. The Board of Education absolutely controlled the system, the Catholic section their schools and the Protestant section the Protestant schools. Each section received its grant, and the Government was not seen at all in the system. This state of things lasted from 1871 to 1890, and the people, therefore, had had ample time to see how it worked out. The way that it did work out was that the teachers placed in charge of the schools were not fit to teach anywhere. The examination papers on which they got their certificates were such as would be set for boys of nine years of age. Then the attendance at school was not looked after at all. The schools were not opened regularly, and there was no inspection. The money grants were paid all the same, although schools might not have been opened more than three or four days a week, or for only two or three months in the year. Another objectionable thing about the old system of Catholic schools was that the accommodation was simply abominable except in the case of about twelve or fifteen out of the whole number. Although this was the case, these Catholic schools were getting about twice as much under the Government grant as the Protestant schools were. The result of all this was that under this system one generation of French Catholics grew up almost absolutely illiterate. Mr. Sifton here referred to petitions sent to the Government, in which six out of seven of the petitioners were unable to sign their names and had to make their marks. Since he had come to Ontario on this present visit he had received an urgent petition sent to the Government, and signed by 27 French half-breeds. Of these 24 made their marks, and only three signed their names. This was not a pleasant thing to tell, but it was true, and was the result of the old system, which it was the desire of the Government to restore. One could go from one end of Manitoba to the other, and he would not find among the business or professional men a young man from any of those families. The children of such families remained on the farm where they were born. There was no idea of progress among them. If this system were imposed upon them permanently it would simply make them hewers of wood and drawers of water.

This is indeed a very severe and pretty extensive indictment. The misfortune about it is that it is groundless, abusive and unworthy of a man occupying in his province the position of an adviser of the Crown, and of a sworn guardian of the honour and of the interests of all sections of the province and of the whole population without distinction of creed or race. The statements of Mr. Sifton are not only misleading, but untrue, slanderous and ungenerous. In a very brief manner I will dispose of them. Before, however, considering them seriatim, I want to make this House aware of an important fact. It is this : Never before the Manitoba Government had announced their policy on this matter in 1889, never was any remark made to us about the alleged inefficiency of our schools. Never was a suggestion thrown out to us ; never was blame cast upon us ; never was a hint given us as to any drawback that was supposed to exist or as to any improvement that could have been desired. We were not averse to any fair criticism, if any had to be made. If any desire had been expressed to us as to some advisable reform, we would have received the intimation in the most cordial way, and given it the most serious consideration. But far from that, our schools had been generally praised. Very often people after visiting our settlements and our institutions, came to us, and expressed their surprise—they could not refrain from letting us perceive that our ways, our thrifty and prosperous condition, the excellence of our educational appliances were a revelation to them. So much so that Protestant families were prompted by that excellence, and by the care that the children received in certain institutions, to have their children educated in those institutions. On this point I can give such testimony as that of Captain Clark, which I again ask permission to lay before this House, although it has already been read to you :

I can speak with experience with reference to the excellence of your section, two of my daughters having been for a long time with the good sisters of St. Boniface, where their progress was as satisfactory to me as it was pleasant to them.

I take the following extract from the Canadian Gazette of London, published on the 4th November, 1886, and speaking of our school exhibits at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition :

The collection contains samples of books, exercises, scholastic material, &c., coming from the Catholic schools as well as from the Protestant schools of the province.

The excellence of the work, and especially of the geographical charts, is incontestable. This is the more pleasing, if we consider the fact that many exhibits are dated from the year 1884, and the beginning of the year 1885. It is evident the exhibit is composed of the ordinary duties of the schools in all parts of the province, and not of work specially prepared for the occasion.

No pretension has been made to eclipse the school exhibits of the other provinces, but the collection that is under our eyes denotes that in one of the most recently organized provinces of the confederation, there exists a school system which, although respecting the faith and religious convictions of the population, offers to every one an education capable of fitting for the highest rank in society, the child who is placed under its care.

So, hon. gentlemen, up to the time of the extraordinary change of mind of these gentlemen of the Manitoba Government, instead of being remonstrated with, we had on all occasions been praised, especially for the excellence of our educational institutions. On several occasions, men in the highest position in the land, Governors General and Lieutenant-Governors, and other distinguished visitors, paid to our educational institutions the highest compliments. One day, one of the trustees of the Protestant schools in Winnipeg was invited to visit one of our schools in that city. He had only words of praise to address to the pupils and teachers. How could we suspect then that our schools might afterwards be arraigned in such a general and violent way? But let us admit for a moment that there were some deficiencies in our schools, in the teaching or in the management, what was the duty of the government? Was it necessary to demolish the whole structure to remedy the defects? Most assuredly not. All the subjects of complaint could have been cured in some other way. If we were not considered sufficiently in touch with the government, it was an easy matter to make such amendments to the law as would have been equally satisfactory to both parties. It was an easy matter to approach the general board of education and to intimate to any section that reforms and improvements were desired. And if amendments to the law were necessary, it was an easy matter to have framed them so as to respect the feelings and the rights of all sections of the people. If there was any mismanagement the fault was due to some individuals. Why not remove those individuals and put in better men instead of punishing the whole Catholic population? Such amendments might have been resorted to as a trial at least. It would have gone a long way toward convincing our people that no harm or injustice was intended; but, far from that, all of a sudden, without any warning, we were put face to face with the present difficulties, our schools were annihilated, our properties confiscated, and the schools that were known before as Protestant schools, were continued, in the same shape and form, under substantially the same regulations, under the name of public schools. The absence of regard for our feelings and for our rights is the clearest evidence that some other motives than the improvement of the schools were at the bottom of that campaign. As a matter of fact, Mr. Fisher, the then president of the Liberal Association in Manitoba, informed the country what those motives were. They were for party advantages, and, after having adopted such a policy for party advantages, they persist in it for the same purpose; but as there is some need to disguise that purpose, they resort to slander and abuse in the hope of raising the strongest prejudices to blind the people as to the real issue now confronting the country. Let us look more carefully into Mr. Sifton's statements. He begins by describing the school system in Manitoba and is pleased to inform his audience that we had two systems of schools. This first statement is, to say the least, inaccurate. I have already shown that we had only one system of schools. That was a system of public schools, which were more national than those by which they have been replaced. That system provided for the needs of all sections of the people, and not for a part only. The law itself (statutes 1881) says that it was to establish a system of public schools. There was only one law, applying to all the schools, and it gave, as it should, the control of the schools to the parents, according to their religious convictions. It was so framed and carried out that the term of "separate schools" which is applied to the Catholic schools very often is quite inappropriate. Our Catholic schools were no more separate schools than were the Protestant schools. Each one had towards the other the same status. The Protestant schools were as much separate schools as the Catholic schools. There was no inferiority in the one as to the other; they were on an equal footing. You can go all through that law and you will find its provisions applicable to all the schools. One of our strongest opponents, Rev. Dr. Bryce, has himself confessed the fairness of the system in the following terms in 1877. The government grant is voted for one system of schools. * * No special rights are given to either Catholics or Protestants. In Manitoba the Roman Catholic schools are as much national as the Protestants.

Mr. Sifton complains that the action of the government was not seen at all in the system. This again is inaccurate. The hand of the government was directly felt in matters of money. As a matter of fact the government had the controlling power in financial matters. The law itself provided for the payment to the schools of the government grant. That grant was retained by the government, whose treasurer was the guardian of the school funds. The government themselves had the power to fix the appropriations of the sections of the Board of Education, and no payment was made except through the government and after having been submitted to the control of the provincial auditor, and received his watchful consideration and approval. So in financial matters not only the control of government was seen, but they had their hands completely upon the funds, their distribution and their payment. They were all powerful as to the whole expenditure of the two sections, and they exercised their power, and sometimes they did it in a very high-handed way. In 1889, for instance, we had a reserve fund amounting to nearly $14,000. The government of Manitoba, although not authorized by law to do so, demanded our board to hand over to them that reserve fund. In that demand, however, they fully acknowledged that fund to be ours, and gave us assurance that it would be available to our section at any time.

After having thus given us the assurance that the money would always be available to us, they went back on their own decision, and deprived us of that amount, they refused to distribute that money to our schools, although we had regularly applied for the same, and put before them a regular requisition and apportionment. That is another instance of the utter disregard with which we have been treated. As I have already said, this campaign commenced in 1888, at the St. François Xavier election, by false promises. It has been ever since followed by treason and hardships, which it is hardly possible to describe. Untrue to their pledges from the first, they have been untrue to their own policy as laid down by Mr. Greenway when he went to the late Archbishop Taché, with the view of receiving from His Grace help in the forming of his government, help which, on his pledge, was so willingly given to him only to bring afterwards to the lamented prelate such bitter disappointment that it may be said to have hastened his death.

The government had in another way its hand on the Bureau of Education, inasmuch as they had the appointment of the members of the board. Each year the term of three members of our section expired. On the government devolved the privilege and the power of appointing successors to the retiring members. In this particular also they used their power in their own way, and for their own advantage, in appointing at one time other parties than those recommended by the Catholics, and at another time in neglecting to make appointments. The appointment of the superintendent was also the privilege of the government. More than that, during the whole time, from the accession to power of the Liberal government in Manitoba till the coming into force of the law of 1890, the government was represented on our Catholic section of the Education Board by one of their members, and for the last six months at least there was also a member of the government on the Protestant section of the Board of Education. So the government had two of their members closely connected with the administration of the school law under the old system.

The members of the government and of the legislature were, by law, visitors of the schools. A book was there, in which they could record their comments. Why did not avail themselves of it? From all this, it will clearly appear to everybody that the government had a closer connection with the administration of educational affairs than one would be led to believe by the utterances of Mr. Sifton, and, consequently, that gentleman must be held to have disgracefully attempted to mislead public opinion, unless we come to the conclusion that he has no knowledge of the old law, which would be no surprise to me. On that point, I think I may safely say that at least four-fifths of the members of the legislature which passed that law of 1890 were not adequately acquainted with the old law. That ignorance of the old law was perceptible in the bill that was prepared. For instance, it designated as separate schools, the schools attended and controlled by the Catholics, and public schools those controlled by the Protestants. The fact was that both were simply common schools. That is the appellation which the law of 1881 gave them.

Mr. Sifton says that the system was in force from 1871 to 1890, and therefore the people had had ample time to see how it worked out. Although in discussing this question I am bound to reserve the constitutional question, I am quite prepared also to consider what was the opinion of the people at the end of that period, since there is an appeal made to that opinion on the other side. Is it necessary for me to recall to you that in 1888 an election took place in one of the constituencies of Manitoba, in which election the fate of the administration and of the opposition respectively was at stake? What took place, then? That question first came up in that election incidentally and soon became the turning point. Mr. Fisher, then the president of Liberal association, said in 1893:

This became practically the leading question of the campaign and the contest was a crucial one. Should the Liberals win, it was plain, in the view of the losses sustained by the government, that they must resign. So the success of the Liberal candidates means that the party would at once attain power, while the election of Mr. Burke would almost certainly have insured the continuance of the Liberals in opposition till this day.

It is as clear as daylight, then, that the question came before the people at that election. Let us see how it was dealt with. The Conservatives, by their candidate, wanted to maintain the school system then in existence. Did the Liberals take the opposite view? Not at all. Feeling that the people wanted to maintain that system, they declared the policy of their party in this matter, otherwise the election would have gone against them, and would, to use the words of Mr. Fisher, "insure the continuance of the Liberals in opposition to this day." They then declared—and here I again use the words of Mr. Fisher—that "the Liberals had no idea of interfering with those institutions;" and Mr. Martin gave a positive pledge, in the name of the Liberal party, that they would not do so. Mr. Greenway was a party to the giving of that promise. The pledge was given in the name of the Liberal party, for a party purpose. Without that promise, the party could not have carried the election, and by that election alone they attained power. Now, hon. gentleman, you have here the two political parties making an appeal to the people at a crucial time on that very question; the Conservatives pointing to their past record in favour of the maintenance of that school system; the Liberals desiring to attain power and for that purpose declaring that their future policy would be to maintain in their integrity the same institutions. These declarations were made by the leaders on behalf of their respective parties. They were the declarations, not only of the leaders, but of their followers also. That is, you have in this instance the electors requiring both parties to pledge themselves to the maintenance of the school system which had existed for twenty years. "The people," to use the words of Mr. Sifton, "had had ample time to see how it worked out," and the same people, far from being dissatisfied with the system, felt on the contrary so strongly in favour of its maintenance that both parties (that is the whole of the electors) had to pledge themselves to that effect. That was the verdict of the people at that time. Afterwards Mr. Greenway, when forming his government, went to Archbishop Taché and again pledged his party to the maintenance of that school system, as is proved by the declarations of Rev. Father Allard and of Mr. Alloway, himself a Liberal. After that Mr. Greenway had a general election in the province. The platform of his party, as declared in the previous election between Mr. Burke and Mr. Francis, was public and fresh to the memory of the whole province, and still standing. Did the people then declare themselves against it? Not at all. Nothing was said against that policy. Mr. Greenway, pledged as he was with his party to maintain that school system, was returned to power with the largest majority that ever existed in Manitoba in favour of any government. That verdict is evidence that the people who had had ample time, and good opportunities to judge of the working of that system, were satisfied with it. We have other expressions of the satisfaction of the people with that system in the following fact: In 1888, the same year that Mr. Greenway came to power, the superintendent of the Protestant schools, Mr. Sommerset, expresses himself in this way at a meeting of teachers:—

In connection with its working (the law) during the last seventeen years it may be pointed out that the schools of the province have been managed without a particle of the denominational friction that has caused disturbance and bitterness in other provinces of the Dominion * * the past history of the province encourages the hope that perfect justice to each interest shall result in a continuance of the harmony that now exists.

These words surely do not indicate any desire for a change in the system, although some of the details of the law might require change to suit the circumstances. Another gentleman, Mr. Morrisson, who is himself a Protestant, an Orangeman, and was for a time an inspector of Protestant schools in our province, published last year a paper in which he says :

Throughout all these years, from 1871 to 1888, no complaint was ever made with the workings of the separate schools system. * * * The people, Protestant and Catholic alike, were perfectly contented with the school system as it then existed.

And here, let me recall to you this statement of the Morden Monitor which I have already quoted : "The country never asked for such legislation."

But, honourable gentlemen, above all, the best evidence of the satisfaction of the people of Manitoba in connection with the late school system was the entire absence of complaints about it. They "had had ample time to see how it worked out," and they did not complain, showing thereby that they were satisfied to maintain it. The query must very naturally arise in the minds of the honourable members of this House : How, then, did the legislature come to pass the law of 1890? In answer to that I would say that the question was suddenly thrown upon the attention of the public by a couple of public men without any authorization on the part of their leader. Mr. Greenway, who hearing for the first time of the new platform that two members of his government were advocating, was reported as saying : "It's all bosh." It was contended at the time by a leading newspaper that again this move was inaugurated for party purposes, and the accusation has not been, up to the present, successfully repelled. However, in 1890, the government, which had attained power on the pledge that they would not interfere with the language or institutions of the French Catholic population, introduced in the legislature two bills, by which they proposed to interfere with those institutions, and the legislature, which itself had been elected upon that platform of non-interference, disregarded the mandate it had received from the people and passed those iniquitous laws, with the view in all likelihood to serve party purposes again. And now, I am quite ready to admit that if the question was squarely and solely put before the people at present there is a probability that it would be decided against us, because the passions and the prejudices of the people have been raised, and between the judgment of the people in 1888 declaring itself for the maintenance of the school system then in force, and the contradictory judgment of the same people to-day, I would say that the first was a calm, deliberate, cool and unprejudiced judgment, while the second would not be, and, consequently, the parliament of Canada must in all fairness and equity give their preference to the former, and declare that the people "having had ample time to see how the system worked out," and being satisfied with that system, it was an extreme injustice to interfere with established institutions, an injustice to the Catholic population and an injustice to the country at large, inasmuch as the peace of the whole country has been disturbed by such action. As a conclusion of my argument on this point, I am safe to say that there is no foundation for the assertion that the people of Manitoba have ever asked for a change; I may even say that there was practically, in 1888, at the date of the last general election previous to 1890, a unanimous consent that the existing institutions should be maintained, and the legislature, in passing the laws of 1890 went directly against the mandate it had received from the people. A grave accusation against our people is made by Mr. Sifton in the following words :—

One could go from one end of Manitoba to the other and he would not find, among business or professional men, a young man from any of these families; the children of such families remained on the farm where they were born.

Although unwillingly given and not intended as so, it is the most eloquent test to our school system. If the hon. gentleman had first put himself to the trouble of making the inquiry he was inviting his audience to make, he would have found that he was misleading them. Right in Winnipeg and throughout the Catholic settlements there are young men who are engaged in business, some in professional studies. They cannot be as numerous as the young men of other nationalities, for the simple reason that the group of population to which they belong is a small minority. The fact of a great majority of the population being of a different creed, and having a different language, reduces to a great extent, for our children, the natural field which others have for the display of their ability; and, consequently, it hinders them and reduces their desire to engage in professional and mercantile pursuits. But apart from this there is another reason which Mr. Sifton has given himself, and although that gentleman has done so very unwittingly, that reason is one of the best compliments that could be paid to our young generation and our school system. "The children of such families," said he, "remain on the farm where they were born." True most of our children remain on the farm. If that is the result of our school system, by all means, for the welfare of the country, let us preserve that system. What is, in our days, one of the evils complained of and confronting the normal advance of the social movement? Is it not the migration of the rural population to towns and cities? Is it not the inordinate and disproportionate increase in the number of business and professional men? Not more than two or three weeks ago our distinguished colleague, the member for Hopewell, speaking in this House, said that "many of those who go into business should remain on the farm." And this honest and wholesome truth is in harmony with the views of all thinking people. The Ottawa Citizen of the 2nd of May last contained the following editorial on the subject:—

TOO MANY PROFESSIONAL MEN.

In England the cry is "Back to the land." There, as elsewhere, farmers have been leaving the soil to plunge into the whirl of city life. The glitter and movement, the roar and noise, of large centres attract the countryman, who begins to find his existence on the farm monotonous, and who sees possible prizes for which he thinks he may strive with good chances of success.

Back to the farm, even in this new country, we might well desire our people to go. All kinds of business feel the stress of sharp competition. All the professions are overcrowded. The Canadian Medical Review states that in Toronto there are scores of medical men not making $2 a day,—a very poor return indeed for the long years spent upon their education and for the amount of money devoted to it,—a very unsatisfactory sum on which to keep up the style of living that a professional man aspires to. The Barrister, a legal publication, deals with the same subject in its April number. It says: "It is probable that the incomes of ninety per cent of the profession do not average $600 a year, while fifteen years ago the average was about $1,000 a year." In other words, hundreds of solicitors throughout the country are working for less than brick-layers and carpenters. Young men on the farm would do well to bear these facts in mind when their ambition is aroused by reading stories of the brilliant successes of Lord Erskine, Lord Eldon and other great men who began with nothing but achieved high distinction and won rich rewards. Necessarily the number of the Erskines and Eldons is limited.

If we take into consideration the circumstances of our own province, we could not too strongly emphasize not only the opportunity, but even the necessity for our own sons to remain upon the farms—the necessity not only for their own sake, but also for the sake of the country. East and west, north and south of Winnipeg we have immense prairies, amongst the most fertile land in the world. Our province is above all and almost exclusively an agricultural country. Would it be an intelligent, patriotic and well-conceived policy to induce our young people to leave their farms and go into the cities and towns, where every year there is an influx of half-educated or lazy people constantly swelling that unfortunate portion of the population, whose lot it is to be a burden on the community, whilst if they had remained on their farms they could very likely have been counted amongst the most useful citizens of the land? This does not mean that the farmer should not be educated, but the fact that he is a farmer is no evidence of his being uneducated. And even if he was, I contend that an illiterate but honest, hard-working and fair-minded tiller of the soil is a better citizen than the philosopher whose instruction only serves him to better blaspheme his God. The illiterate farmer is a better citizen than Ingersoll with all his so-called science; the illiterate farmer who lives and lets others live in peace and justice is a better citizen than Mr. Greenway or Mr. Sifton, who go through the country disseminating false information, slandering a loyal and intelligent people, and doing their utmost to excite a section of the community against the other for the purpose of maintaining, against the wish of Her Majesty, the injustice of which they have been convicted by the highest tribunal of the empire.

The country is simply distressed by these politicians, whilst its prosperity and the development of its natural resources are promoted by the quiet, thrifty, righteous, industrious and intelligent, though perhaps underrated husbandman. "I wish," said

Mr. Gladstone, one day in 1889, "to dispel any notions that may be entertained that manual industry is necessarily an ignoble thing. Rely upon it, manual labour is honourable, not only because it is useful, but honourable beyond the measure of its direct utility, when directed to honourable aims and honourable purposes." Fancy now the young Mr. Sifton opposing his dictum to the opinion of the Grand Old Man, and discrediting manual labour in the persons of the farmers and of those of their sons who choose to remain on the farms where they were born. These young men were given education before 1890, and we continue to give them the best education we can provide, notwithstanding the hardships to which we are now being subjected. We believe in education. There is, however, something which is above education, and that is proper education. When Mr. Sifton is discrediting that kind of education to which he attributes the fact of so many young men remaining on the farms, he shows that he has no sound idea of what a good education should be, or of the results that such education should produce. He is advocating that kind of education which, according to the chief of the detective force in San Francisco, "makes the pick, shovel and wheelbarrow repugnant to American youth." Speaking about the same kind of education, Prof. Royce, in his book, "Deterioration and Race Education," says that "the public schools system in the United States (which is the pattern of the system that is tried to be established in our community) kills in the child all inclination for physical work; it fills the country with office seekers," &c.

With the kind permission of the House I will read a picture which a gentleman writing in a United States newspaper, draws of the kind of education obtained in the public schools of that country :

Neither the boys, he says, nor the girls taught (I won't say educated) in the public schools want actual work for a living. Very few of the boys are willing to learn trades, especially if they are kept at school long enough to get notions about being "gentlemen." Nearly all expect to get into some light occupation, something "respectable" and not requiring them to soil their hands or wear workshop clothing. They are willing to be book-keepers or salesmen, or general "clerks," or to be taken into banks, and many of them have an eye on broker's offices in Wall streets, and many more on the offices the politicians are fighting for. But they don't want to turn to and learn to be carpenters or blacksmiths, or plumbers, or bricklayers, or stonecutters, or anything else that seems a steady day's work with the hands. This is why New York is swarming to-day with fairly taught young men looking for situations as clerks or bookkeepers or as conductors on the street cars, or as canvassers of all sorts, and unable to get them. These thousands were produced largely by a false education, twenty or thirty years ago, and we are producing other thousands, many more thousands to-day to replace them when they go.

In conclusion this writer says :

The fancy schools of to-day are in some respect a positive evil. Instead of "fitting our youth to earn a living," they unfit them to a large extent and tend to make them idlers instead of workers.

The same complaint is becoming general all over the world, and in Canada also expression has been given to the same ideas. However, Mr. Sifton wants it to be forced upon the people, and he makes a crime of the unwillingness of a section of the country to adopt his views. He finds fault with a system of education which instead of producing a distaste for rural life tends to keep our sons on the farms; he would prefer a system of education which might tend to take the young men away from the farms and make of them such office-seekers as I have just mentioned, a system that would swell the already overcrowded ranks of professional men in our cities and towns, whilst around all these cities and towns there are splendid farms unoccupied and unproductive to the great disadvantage of the province and of the country at large. I repeat, instead of demonstrating the inferiority of our teaching, the fact that our youth remain on the farms is strong evidence of its soundness both in its conception and in its results.

Mr. Sifton, speaking of the attendance at our schools, said :

The attendance at school was not looked after at all.

From this remark one would think that our schools were deserted. The figures that I will place before you will be a surprise to you, as are many other assertions of our enemies. However, before giving these figures I should like to call your attention to a social aspect of the population of the North-west. This kind of preface is important inasmuch as it warns the public at once that matters in the far west should not be looked at in the same way as one would regard them in the east. Everybody knows that there is, in the province of Manitoba, a section of the population whose origin has much influence upon its views, customs methods and whole behaviour. I am alluding to the half-breeds. These half-breeds are possessed of a noble character; they are brave and intelligent. But you must not forget that they were once almost the kings of the immense prairie. Then, they were isolated and the rest of the world had not much existence for them. They had no idea of the approaching change which took place in 1871, through the acquisition of the North-west by Canada. They were roaming through those solitudes without any apprehension of what was coming, and while proud of the white blood circulating in their veins, the blood from their mother made itself felt strongly. In their estimation, the freedom of their life, while fishing and hunting, was superior to our cares of our civilization. That was a time of liberty for them, and such was the force of the Indian blood quickening their pulse, and the influence of the prairie breeze fawning their brows that to convince them the time had come when they should put a stop to their free life and adopt our methods of life, was a task fraught with difficulties unknown to the larger portion of the present population of the far west. If you take into consideration the instincts of those people, their love of a wandering and unrestrained life, resulting from nature, from their origin, you will not wonder at the indifference at first of some amongst them to education. The Catholic church counts in its rank, by far the largest proportion of that element. Yet, notwithstanding that disadvantage, which necessarily puts us at a disadvantage in a comparison of statistics, I am sure that the Senate will find that after all we did not make too bad a showing. In going back to 1881, and comparing the percentage of the total school enrolment of both Protestant and Catholic children to the whole school population, we find the following:—

PERCENTAGE OF THE CHILDREN ENROLMENT TO THE TOTAL SCHOOL POPULATION.

Protestant schools.....	70 $\frac{2}{15}$
Catholic schools.....	66 $\frac{1}{15}$
1889.
Protestant schools.....	75 $\frac{7}{10}$
Catholic schools.....	69 $\frac{0}{10}$

It is to be remarked that in the case of the Catholics, the percentage is obtained by taking the school population from the age of 5 to 16, while in the case of the Protestants, it is obtained with a school population ranging from the age of 5 and under, up to 21, which must necessarily raise to a certain extent the percentage. But, taken as it is, there is only a difference of 6 per cent which is not sufficient to justify any criticism. Let us now take another point of comparison, that is, the

Protestant schools.....	34 $\frac{3}{10}$
Catholic schools.....	32 $\frac{8}{10}$
1889.
Protestant schools.....	52 $\frac{1}{10}$
Catholic schools.....	46 $\frac{1}{10}$

Here again the difference is only from 2 to 6 per cent. There is nothing in that to have a storm raised. If we look at what has taken place under the new educational laws, inaugurated in 1890, what do we find? A continual decrease in the average attendance to the school population at the so-called public schools. The following figures are taken from the government reports:

AVERAGE ATTENDANCE TO THE SCHOOL POPULATION SINCE THE INAUGURATION OF THE NEW SYSTEM IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS:

Protestants .....	43 $\frac{3}{10}$
1892.
Protestants .....	43 $\frac{0}{10}$
1893.
Protestants. ....	41 $\frac{2}{10}$

These figures show a continual decrease under the new system; and the percentage is less than it was in the Catholic schools as shown by the figures in the first place mentioned under this head. There is a third basis of comparison, and which is the true test of the interest taken by those in charge of the schools in the attendance. It is the percentage of the average attendance to the number of enrolled children and here the Catholics are ahead of the Protestants.

The percentage of the attendance to the whole school population is not the true test of the efficiency of the schools nor of their management. In all countries, there is a proportion of the school population which is not enrolled on the school attendance. That is to be found even in countries where compulsory education is the law. In Ontario for instance in 1891, according to the Statistical Year Book there were 78,512 children between 7 and 13 attending schools less than 100 days, although compulsory education is the law. It has always been so and it will ever be so in all countries, in defiance of all laws and of all exertions on the part of those in charge of the schools to ensure regular attendance. In those matters success is never equal to the will nor to the exertions. And the country which has come nearest to perfection in that respect is a Catholic country, the Luxemburg, in which the census has proved that out of a total school population of 31,580, the number of scholars actually attending elementary schools was 31,249, so that only 341 children were missing. That all the children do not attend school, can easily be explained by various circumstances, as for instance the distance, the severity of the climate, the condition of the roads, the pressure of work on the farms, the natural dislike of certain children to school work, the lack of interest sometimes in education on the part of the parents, all circumstances which are entirely out of the control of the school officials. It is not quite the same thing with the percentage of the attendance to the enrolment at schools. Here, although the rule should not be presented as an inflexible one, yet it is conceivable that the teachers and the officials can moderately influence the increase of that percentage, because they are more in contact with the children who are better situated to obey the impulse of their teachers. That influence we have made it felt as much as possible and the result shows our comparative success.

PERCENTAGE OF THE AVERAGE ATTENDANCE TO THE NUMBER OF ENROLLED CHILDREN.

	Protestants.	Catholic.
1881.....	40·8.....	50·2.....
1889.....	65· $\frac{7}{10}$ .....	66· $\frac{4}{10}$ .....
1891.....	56· $\frac{6}{10}$ .....	} Since the inauguration of the new system.
1892.....	55· $\frac{5}{10}$ .....
1893.....	48· $\frac{7}{10}$ .....

The figures for the Catholic schools cannot be given, as they have been crippled in 1890 and deprived of the regular means to ascertain their condition. But the public schools, under the new regime, have kept in operation, and this table, based on the reports of the education department, is an evidence that they are keeping on decreasing under that so-called public school system, that system which is held before the public like these patent medicines as a cure to all disease.

But this does not tell the whole story. In considering their own reports more closely what do we find? Under the so-called public system, almost half of the whole school population did not attend school for more than half year, which means about five months only of school in the year. Here are the figures taken from their own report.

	Attendance less than 50 days.	Attendance 51-100 days.	Attendance less than 100 days.	Total school population.
1891...	6,656	7,340	13,996	28,678
1892...	6,075	6,231	12,306	29,594
1893...	7,539	8,414	15,953	34,417

Fancy those people, which such a record, cheeky enough to denounce their neighbours whom they do not know but whom they are bound to denounce any way.

As a matter of fact, while the Catholic school authorities exacted as a rule 200 days of attendance during the year, such were the difficulties that confronted the management of the Protestant section, that they requested the legislature to permit schools not kept over 6 months to receive their grants just the same. That was an amendment passed in 1885.

Moreover, for the last six years of its existence, our board with the view of stimulating attendance, had been awarding prizes for attendance in all the schools. This is an answer to those who affirm without any knowledge of what they say, that the attendance was not looked after. In Ontario the attendance was only  $\frac{52}{100}$  in 1891, according to the Statistical Year-Book—less than in the Catholic schools in Manitoba. If I have referred to the other schools it is not to find fault. I am too well aware of the difficulties that have to be encountered in that new province; I am too fair-minded to bring any ill-founded accusation, but if those people are not to be blamed, why should we be censured while labouring in the same country under similar circumstances, having to meet the same difficulties, and showing as good results as others, and even better?

Those difficulties are well described in the report of some of the Protestant inspectors, as follows:—

Owing to the extreme youth of the scholars, it is thought best to close the schools during the winter season.

Another, and also perhaps to some extent, necessary evil, which militates against the standing of our schools, is irregular attendance, the exigencies of haying and harvesting seasons, the inclemency of the winter weather, the sparse settlement, the sordid nature of some parents and their indifference to the intellectual welfare of their children, account largely for the fluctuating attendance. (Report of Rev. J. Pringle, 1886.)

Another one speaks in the following way :—

There are great drawbacks of regular attendance in country schools in this province, the state of the roads in wet weather, the severity of the winter, the long distances to be travelled, the requirements of home work so pressing in a new country, all these combine to make regular attendance at school extremely difficult. Consequently the teachers are at a disadvantage—due allowance must be made for this in judging of the results of their labours. (Rev. A. E. Cowley, 1886.)

The Protestant superintendent sums up these drawbacks, in the following, in his report :

Some allowance can be made for the irregularity of attendance * * * the distance from school being in many cases two or three miles, and the roads or trails few and imperfect.

Notwithstanding all the above reports some people continue to repeat their accusations against our schools, as if theirs could not in any way be the object of unfavourable comments. Our hope is in the sound judgment and good-will of Parliament.

Our opponents now turn their attention to our teachers, and I am sorry to say that the same slanderous way of dealing with them is resorted to. Fortunately for us, and unfortunately for the accusers, they have been so exaggerated in their denunciations that any man, on giving to them his earnest consideration, will detect the imposture that is attempted to be foisted upon the public. He who attempts to prove too much does not prove anything.

“The teachers,” they say, “placed in charge of the schools were not fit to teach anywhere.”

As you see, there is no exception ; all the teachers, according to this assertion, were unfit for their positions.

And by whom is this broad accusation made? By parties who do not understand our language—the language of our schools—and who have never visited those schools. It is characteristic of those who assail Catholic education that they have never set their foot in any of our schools or institutions, and yet they take upon themselves to judge without knowing, not doubting for a moment that they are doing a serious injustice to an important section of their fellow countrymen.

Was the intention of the gentleman who made that remark intending to assimilate the condition of our schools to that of the Protestant schools at a certain period? Very likely not. However, it may be interesting to quote here at the outset what the superintendent of the Protestant schools said in his report of 1887, about the insufficient qualifications of their teachers :

The operation of many of the rural schools during a portion only of the school year renders the task of keeping up a full supply of qualified teachers for the province a peculiar difficult one. Upon the closing of their schools for the winter, many teachers retire permanently from the work, and these schools with others opening for the first time the following spring produce a demand that severely strains the resources of the Board of Education to supply, and necessitates the issue of temporary licenses to a number of persons who are not fully qualified by training or literary attainment for teaching.

If that broad assertion is true, namely, that our teachers are not fit to teach anywhere, then, hon. gentlemen, the Protestant population of Winnipeg must be very derelict in their duties towards their children—for, just at this present moment, when I am addressing you, in one of the Catholic schools in that city, out of an aggregate attendance of above 200 pupils forty-five of them are Protestant children. So, at a time when, on account of the hardships that have been undergoing for five years, that institution must be presumed not to have the same means at its disposal to maintain its high standard, yet we find Protestant parents and children sufficiently confident as to the ability of the teachers and as to the general equipment of the institution, as to send their children to be educated there, and in such numbers as to form nearly one-fourth of the total numbers of pupils. Surely this public sympathy and confidence must show at once to every fair-minded man that the assertion to which I refer is in itself morally and substantially an impossibility, and consequently, a gross injustice to a body of teachers, to the efficiency of whom others also have borne testimony. I have already quoted the evidence of Capt. Clarke. Allow me again to refer to it. So long as the same accusations are proposed, so long must we defend ourselves with the arms which are at our command. Captain Clarke is a Protestant and was chosen by the government of Canada to be one of the assistants of the High Commissioner in London at the Colonial and Indian Exhibition. His high character and his own education give to his testimony which I have already quoted, peculiar importance. Can it be said with any semblance of truth that teachers who are the object of such commendation are unfit for their situation? If the teachers were not fit for their position, could they have formed pupils of sufficient ability to send such exhibits as those to which the Canadian Gazette alluded in such complimentary terms in the quotation I have already made? Mere honest common sense directs the answer!

About 25 per cent of the teaching staff in the province was composed of those teachers; the others were, for the greater part, former pupils, trained under their care during many years, first, as attendants to the classes of the primary schools, and finally, as pupils of the normal classes. We had normal schools which had been in existence since 1883. To get admission, the applicants had to satisfy the Board of Education that they were sufficiently educated to be able to at least take the subjects of second class teacher certificates. The course was of two years, during which they both taught and were taught. At the end of each year they passed an examination and were granted, on satisfactory evidence of their ability, the certificate of second class after the first year, and first class after the second year.

The course of training comprised the subjects taught in our schools, but to a higher degree, and besides a special course in pedagogics. Let us, for the sake of argument, admit for a moment that some of these teachers might not have realized the expectations of the school authorities; surely when it is said that none of them were fit for their position, after such a training, it must strike your mind that such an assertion is of necessity and to say the last, a gross exaggeration and misleading. And any man attempting to mislead public opinion in this way gives just ground to the public for not attaching to his utterances, on any subject, the importance which they might otherwise merit.

As to teachers who could not take the normal school course, they had nevertheless to pass an examination on the same subjects as the normal school teachers. The subjects on which they were examined were—in French and English as follows:—

And moreover, for each certificate of the three classes, every candidate must, to the satisfaction of the examiners, undergo an examination on the Art of teaching in general, and, in particular, of teaching the branches corresponding to the degree of the diploma applied for.

The care of the Board of Education did not stop there. Apart from the first class certificates, which were, during the last year, made permanent, the other certificates were issued only for three years, thus obliging the teachers not to let their minds rest in inactivity, forcing them to continually work and study in order to post themselves for their next examination, and consequently giving ground for a reasonable hope of their yearly improvement. At present there are some of those teachers engaged in their professional work in the North-west at high salaries, showing that they have been found fit for such a position. Even the inspector of the Manitoba government cannot refrain from giving them, though in a half-hearted way, a compliment as to their ability. He says in his report for 1894 :

As a rule the teachers have the ability and energy to do good work, but they lack the normal school training.

Can teachers who possess ability and energy to do good work, be said to be totally unfit for their situation, even if they lack a normal school training, which was not the case with most of them? One province of Canada, in 1893, had 997, teachers, of whom 222 were untrained, 392 who had but third class certificates, and 53 with interim certificates, and this for 718 schools—a total of 445 teachers having only third class certificate, or no certificate at all, employed in 718 schools. That province is under the school regime which the Catholics of Manitoba are asked to accept. Do you care to have its name? It is the province of Manitoba, under the new regime. Does such a record entitle the government of Manitoba, or their supporters, to speak disparagingly of the other schools?

I do not want to leave this matter of the teachers without mentioning the fact that so anxious was our Board of Education to help the teachers in their work and to secure their intellectual advancement, that each one of them was regularly supplied, free to him, with a monthly educational publication. Besides our board had framed certain rules which they had constantly before them. These regulations are as follows:—

Article XV. Besides the duties which are to them prescribed by law, the teachers ought to pay strict attention to the following rules :

1. To begin and to end the school by morning and evening prayers, such as are taught in the catechism.
2. To be watchful as to cleanliness and good order in the school and its dependences.
3. To exact that the children be polite, clean and assiduous, that they shall avoid in going to school and in returning home all that would be unbecoming.
4. To endeavour especially to inspire in the children the love of God so that they will act rather for the sake of duty than through selfish motives.
5. To never lose the opportunity to inculcate in the hearts of the children principles of honesty, truthfulness, and all those virtues without which knowledge would be prejudicial rather than profitable.

6. To win the respect of the scholars by exemplary conduct in all things.

7. To encourage the affection and confidence of their scholars by worthy and conciliating behaviour.

8. To avoid and abstain from triviality and a too great familiarity in manner and language.

9. To beware against all partiality or unjust distinction between children.

10. To never allow themselves to pass any unfavourable remarks in regard to the parents, especially in presence of the children.

11. To subdivide the classes and teach the matters according to the programme of studies.

Article XVI. When the number of children attending a school regularly is more than fifty, the trustees shall appoint an assistant to the teacher.

It has been alleged that the standard of our teachers' examination was not sufficiently high. I have shown by the figures just above mentioned that more than half the schools of Manitoba under the new regime are attended by low grade teachers and in that respect they have no right to assail others. But to return, and in support of the above assertion, some questions put to the candidates at such examination, have been cited as an evidence of the insufficient qualification of the teachers. The way that kind of argument is being brought forward is most discreditable. It consists in picking out of a large number of subjects and questions, a few of these, so as to cast ridicule on the whole examination. After all, it only shows the disingenuousness of our opponents. For instance, they cite examples in four subjects, but they leave out ten other subjects, including pedagogics, grammar, composition, rhetoric, logical analysis, arithmetic, algebra, drawing, agriculture, object lessons, the latter including some rudiments of botany, chemistry and physics. Evidently, such a mode of dealing with the question is not fair. But let us examine more closely into these quotations.

One of them has reference to department :

(1) How is a letter addressed, when written to a prelate, a priest, to a professional man. How are such letters concluded ?

In conversation, what titles do you employ in speaking to those same persons ?

This is simple enough, I admit. Yet, I know some quarters where there is still more simplicity in that respect: they dispense entirely with that subject in education, and it is no wonder that the result is thus indicated in the United States, whose system is offered us as a model. I read from an article in the Evening Post of New York, published in 1889 :

The result is that in all probability our youth is the most ill-bred of the whole civilized world.

Mr. Ewart, our distinguished solicitor before the court, said in his argument before the Cabinet Council in Canada, last winter :

As to those questions...all can say is that I wish that they had been taught in the schools when I was young.

If such wishes as those expressed by Mr. Ewart were realized, such instances as the following would not perhaps take place ; one day a Catholic clergyman of our province, who is a member of the examining staff in the University of Manitoba, was invited by the principal of a Protestant high school to pay him a visit. The invitation was accepted, and the priest went to the high school, but in exchange for this courteous act towards the principal of the school, he was saluted with hissing by the pupils. About letters, it is true that the plain, artless and easy forms such as "your's truly" or even the shorter "your's" which are found at the bottom of so many letters, do not require much cleverness or application, and perhaps they are right in the so-called public schools in not paying much attention to such trivial matters, but since they choose to dispense with that sort of thing, they have no right to complain of what we do in that direction, however little it may be. Be that as it may, we are not left entirely without some comfort, if we proceed to make comparisons.

In one of the public teachers' examinations the following question was asked :— "How many legs has a spider ?" I do not know whether the candidate answered right, but I cannot help thinking that the teaching of good deportment to children is much more important to them than to be taught about the number of legs of a spider. Another question which is found fault with is the following : "What is the capital of England ?" Well, this is not the whole question that was put on geography, but it has been picked up and presented as above in order to produce a better effect. There were other questions on the same subject, such as the following : "Draw the continental limits of North and South America, tracing all the countries, rivers and mountains, and locating the capitals and most important cities of each country." But let us take the first question as it was brought out by our opponents. That is a simple question, I admit, but if I look at the examination papers of the Protestant schools I find such questions as this for a first class teacher—for instance, "What is a verb?" Is not the latter as simple as the former? First-class teachers were asked to parse such words as: we, voice, like, with, etc. Second class teachers were asked to spell the words "sugar, pleasant, truly, Wednesday, February, accommodation," and a few other words, and the examiners in their report say: "The number of mis-spelled words found in the pupils' papers was professedly unaccountable to the teacher, but extremely suggestive to the examiner." Here is another question which is most suggestive:

Which of the following sentences has the better arrangement? Why?

(a.) The French idea of liberty is: the right of every man to be master of the rest; in practice, at least, if not in theory.

(b.) Whatever it may be in theory, it is clear that in practice the French idea of liberty is: the right of every man to be master of the rest.

Quoting the words of an eminent priest in Winnipeg, Rev. Mr. Cherrier, I might say:

Nice reflections, is it not, on French ethics! Let the arrangement of the sentence be as it may, I have no hesitation in saying that in the present instance the examiner could not but instil very strange and altogether unjust and false principles regarding the French idea of liberty.

I would add: How can we rely on such people for the education of our youths? Shall we be compelled to expose our children to such insults to our own blood and to such a distortion of facts and doctrine? I might give these quotations at greater length, but I desire to turn my attention to something more serious. Reference is made to questions as to religious and morals in a way which discloses a lamentable ignorance of our Catholic belief. The following are the questions:—

What is the Church? Where is the true church? Ought we to believe what the Catholic Church teaches us, and why?

These are the questions which are sneered at. Any one conversant with the Catholic religion and morals knows that to answer these questions is almost giving the whole economy of the Church and the cardinal points of Catholic belief. It does not become any one who contemplates divorcing religion from the schools, or who is satisfied with the mere reading of a few selections from the Bible, such only as are authorized by the state, to speak with levity of our examination or of our teaching in religious matters. In connection with this subject I may mention one important thing to be considered: it is the difference of the circumstances and consequently the necessary difference in the object aimed at. In the examination held by the other section they aimed at qualifying teachers not only for the primary schools, but also for high schools, collegiate institutes, and for the principalship of intermediate institutions, but we had no such organization. Our children leaving the primary schools go direct to our college, an institution receiving no public money and where they find professors who are themselves members of the university staff. Owing then to the difference of the work they were called upon to perform, we felt, and I still feel that we would not have been justified in exacting from them such qualifications as would fit them for such high work for which there was no field, and which was not in our gift.

Now, hon. gentlemen, it seems when we hear those critics that everything should be perfection in the other camp. We have not been in the habit of looking through the windows of our neighbours, but since we are taken to task so severely, let us for once pull the curtain aside, just a little bit, and see whether one could not also find fault. I have already called your attention to the low grade of at least one-half of the total number of teachers in the other schools and to the deficiency found in spelling such easy words as sugar, Wednesday, February, &c. In our examinations we would not think of giving any paper on spelling. It is too easy work, in our opinion. But it appears that something of that kind is needed in what are called national or public schools, and to keep ourselves at their level, we had to introduce that subject in our examinations. I am a witness to the fact that some years ago there were so many mistakes in the grammatical writing of the English candidates at the university examinations that the matter was taken into consideration by some of the committees of the council. The question arose whether those mistakes should not be counted in the correction of these papers, even on subjects not connected with grammatical examination. Yet, these students came from the so-called perfect schools, under highly qualified teachers, such as we were held incapable of having. And even during the last years what do you find?

In 1887 some of the inspectors of Protestant schools complained of the "continued scarcity of trained and certificated teachers." Another said: "The principal defect in the teaching was ignorance on the part of some teachers of the proper methods of instruction." The superintendent, speaking of certain difficulties they were labouring under, concludes by saying "that such difficulties necessitate the issuing of temporary licenses to a number of persons who are not fully qualified by training or literary attainment for teaching." I do not refer to this with a view to finding fault. I am satisfied that the best that could be done was effectively done. Considerable allowance must be made in a new province like ours, with a scattered population and with a class of population not supposed to be well off at the beginning of its settlement. The immigrants are coming to the west for the purpose of improving their condition in that respect; but if allowance is made for the Protestant section, why not do the same for our section?

I might go on citing instances, I might recall the letter of a parent in the Northwestern of the 20th or 21st January, 1895, complaining of the cramming system in vogue in the public schools and winding up his complaint with these words: "If the system if persisted in I will have to remove my child, as I had to do with an older sister."

I could also refer to a lecture given in Winnipeg by Rev. Prof. Stewart in January last, finding fault with the normal school of the province, and referring to a case where a young lady of 16 years of age only was appointed principal of a large school. In the same lecture the reverend gentleman complained of the direction given to instruction:

At present, the trend is all towards the teacher's certificate. As soon as a boy got up in his class he began to think about a third class certificate. And when he got that certificate he had either to get a school and teach or else become a failure. The pupil had become too far advanced to soil his fingers with a trade or with farming.

In 1893, the Free Press, of Winnipeg, said that out of every twenty children there was not one whose writing, on leaving the schools, had the required qualifications for business. What is called the public school system, as distinguished from the separate public school system, does exist elsewhere. It is in operation in Ontario and especially in the United States. Is everybody satisfied with it, even amongst the non-Catholics? In November, 1893, a correspondent of the Globe wrote as follows:

The educational advantages (?) offered by the much vaunted public school system of Ontario, as exemplified by some of the schools in this city, are not quite up to the standard claimed by interested advocates for them. In these days of keen competition, the only thing needed is a good commercial education. The public schools were specially designed to impart this knowledge, but on the whole, have signally failed to do so.

The Daily Spectator, Hamilton, of November 28, 1894, said:

We find that while Mr. Ross's system (Ontario) with 10,000 separate exhibits won only 47 awards—3 of them given to please somebody—the much despised schools of Quebec, unenlightened, ignorant, unlearned Quebec, with 10,000 separate exhibits, won 60 awards, none of them begged. Put it another way: Ontario received one award for every 213 exhibits; Quebec one award for every 166 exhibits.

... The time may come when Ontario people will cease to make the worn out boast that this province has the best system of education in the world. The time will come when deluded Ontario people will acquire some knowledge of some other system of education.

The Empire of 24th April, 1890, speaks of the oppressive monopolies for publishing school text books established for a term of years:

The outrageously high prices charged to pupils whose parents have to foot the bills.

The holding of bogus arbitrations so transparently absurd as to constitute an insult to the electors.

The gradual growth of bureaucracy and political scheming in educational administration.

Continual, vexatious and unnecessary changes in the text books to increase ministerial patronage.

It must be obvious that a system open to so many objections, is not perfect enough to justify its advocates in thinking themselves superior in point of wisdom to the bishops of the Catholic church.

Inspector Kelly, of the county of Brant, in 1893, reported:

We in Ontario are prone to boast, and not without a show of reason, of the excellence of our school system. Theoretically it is better than that of any of the neighbouring states, and so far as the primary schools go, better than that of England, Ireland or Scotland. But it is not perfect; those who say so, merely show how narrow their intellectual horizon is. Its cost, especially in the cities, is ever present with us, but its results have for the most part yet to declare themselves.

In the report of the Minister of Education in 1889, Inspector Mitchell, of Lanark county, stated:

A large number of rural pupils over, say, thirteen years of age, are receiving practically no instruction.

Inspector Johnston, of Leeds county, said :

The only serious obstacle in the way of educational advancement is the low grade of teachers—the teacher sometimes does not know history or geography enough to give the class a few minutes' drill without the aid of the book. Grammar in some schools is viewed with reverential fear and dread; the pupils, apparently, think that it is worse than useless, and the teacher has not sufficient tact to dispel unmeaning prejudices.

In the 1892 report of the Minister of Education for Ontario we find the following :

In the county of Lanark there were 134 teachers in 1891; 3 first class, 8 second class, 97 third class, 28 temporarily qualified. * * *

It seems to be a reproach to the intelligence and progressiveness of a county such as ours that so many third class recruits are constantly employed.

Inspector Craig, in 1893, reported :

The condition of the schools in the inspectorate is not very satisfactory; there is an evident lack of interest in educational matters in many of the rural sections, and in some cases this lack of interest has developed into a positive opposition to improvement and progress in school matters; too often the rate-payer elected to fill this office of trustee is a person whose sole object is to curtail expenses and reduce the school tax to a minimum. This leads to a demand for cheap and, consequently, inferior teachers, and as a necessary result, inferior schools.

The investigation in the Toronto University has revealed weak spots. Are we, therefore, to condemn that very high institution, and its professors?

And now, if I am permitted to turn my attention to the results obtained in the United States, here is a sample of the judgments which have been passed upon them.

A newspaper in California, The Alta, said in 1872, "that if we are to judge this system by its apparent fruits, we shall have to pronounce it not only a melancholy, but a most disastrous failure." If we come back to the eastern states, we find one Mr. George A. Walton, agent of the Massachusetts State Board of Education, setting forth as follows the condition of the public schools in a locality bordering on Boston where the inhabitants are somewhat exceptional in wealth. His report is summarized by the Chicago Times, and it says :

The examinations were, in the first place, of the simplest and most practical character. The showing made by some of the towns was excellent.

In the case of others, and of many others, it is evident that the scholars of fourteen years of age did not know how to read, to write or to cipher. They could, it is true—rattle off rules in grammar and arithmetic, not one word of which they understood—if they were called upon to write the shortest of letters or the simplest of compositions, or to go through the plainest of arithmetical combinations, their failure was complete. They had, in fact, been taught what to them were conundrums without end; but the idea that the teaching was to be of any practical use in the lives of these children, when they grew to be American men and women, formed no part of the system, and evidently had never entered into the heads of the instructors. Then, when the letters and compositions were brought in, the ingenuity in bad spelling seems simply incredible. Unless the different misspellings of the word "scholar" for instance, were given, as in this volume they are, who would believe that they would be some two hundred and thirty in number? Then, sixty-five different spellings are enumerated of the word "depot"; one hundred and eight of the common word "repose"; and fifty-eight of "which." Out of eleven hundred and twenty-two pupils who used the adverb "too" in the narrative, eight hundred and fifty-nine or nearly seventy-five per cent of the whole, spelled the word incorrectly. . . . Then we are given facsimile lithographs of these letters and compositions, showing their average excellence in certain of the towns, and anything worse it would be hard to conceive.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jr., in a paper on "New departure in the Common Schools of Quincy," wrote :

It appeared as a result of eight years' school teaching, that the children, as a whole, could neither write with facility nor read fluently.

Mr. Richard Grant White, one of the foremost and brightest thinkers in the United States, wrote an article in the North American Review, December, 1880, on the American school system. In the course of that article he says :

There is probably not one of those various social contrivances, political engines, or modes of common action called institutions, which are regarded as characteristic of the United States, if not peculiar to them, in which the people of this country have placed more confidence, or felt a greater pride, than its public school system. There is not one of them so unworthy of either confidence or pride, not one which has failed so completely to accomplish the end for which it was established. * * * According to independent and competent evidence from all quarters, the mass of the pupils of these public schools are unable to read intelligently, to spell correctly, to write legibly, to describe understandingly the geography of their own country, or to do anything that reasonably well educated children should do with ease. They cannot write a simple letter; they cannot do readily and with quick comprehension a simple "sum" in practical arithmetic; they cannot tell the meaning of any but the commonest of the words that they read and spell so ill. * * * Crime and vice have increased almost pari-passu with the development of the public school system, which, instead of lifting the masses, has given us in their place a non-descript and hybrid class.

I may be asked what is my object in making those quotations? Is it intended to use them as a condemnation of the public school question? My answer is that it is not. It may be or may not be a condemnation of that system, but that is not my object now. My only object is to show that this system also partakes of human weakness, and that if our Catholic schools have weak points the others are not without their own defects. I will add this: Up to the present time, we have refrained from passing judgment upon the public schools. We have stood upon the defensive. But I am bound to say, if that kind of warfare is maintained against us, we will have to change our ways. We will take the offensive. We will carry the war into the other camp. The quotations that I have made must show to all sensible people how easy it would be for us to indict the so-called public school system under all its aspect. I have a pile of such information and documents. I might add, for instance that according to the Census Bulletin No. 17, it is shown that—

The adult population—

—these are the words of the bulletin—of New Brunswick is not as generally able to read and write as it was twenty years ago; whereas the advance in education of the juvenile population of Quebec, between ten and twenty years of age, has been greater than that of any similar group in any of the other provinces.

Is it not a strange retribution? Twenty-four years ago the great argument thundered forth against separate schools in New Brunswick was that they would lead to the same illiteracy that existed in Quebec. Accordingly, New Brunswick refused to give a legal status to the separate schools, and has ever since been retrograding. Quebec keeps her separate schools and has made greater strides than any other part of the Dominion. That is the testimony of the census. Whilst on this subject I desire to enlarge the scope of my remarks. It is not only the Catholic schools of Manitoba that are assailed; it is the whole system of Catholic education, and use is made of the alleged inferiority of Catholic education elsewhere to convince the country at large that it would be bad policy to restore to the minority of Manitoba its rights. It gives to that general aspect of the question an undeniable importance. Nothing is further from the truth, hon. gentlemen, than the broad and persistent accusations against the Catholic church that she aims at keeping the people in ignorance. From the very beginning of her existence she undertook to dispense largely, and gratuitously, not education only, but instruction. She opened schools and already in the second century there were Catholic institutions flourishing in Alexandria, which was then a centre of learning. All the arts and sciences of the time were taught in those schools. A panagerist of Origen, who was a professor in that city, speaks in the following way of his methods:

Before receiving students, he used to examine them by a series of questions to discover their defects, and to try and correct them. He then taught them logic to whet their understanding—not, however, the logic common with ordinary philosophers, but the logic of common sense, which is necessary to all, Greeks or barbarians, the learned and the unlearned, in short for all men whatever vocation they may choose to follow. To logic he added natural philosophy, which he taught in such a manner as to illustrate and classify every single object, to reduce it by a simple exposition to its first elements, and explain the nature of the whole and its parts, and the serious changes to which it has subject. This he did to inspire the pupil with a rational instead of an irrational admiration of nature. Then the student was introduced to the study of geometry, the firm and unshaken basis of all the other sciences; and astronomy, which contemplates the firmament, and leads to the sublime and heavenly. After these preparatory studies, he is taught moral philosophy, and herein Origen exhibited to all in himself a golden mirror of virtue and piety. He taught the student particularly to enter into his own spirit; to provide for the soul above all other things, and to practise piety. He then read with them the writings of ancient philosophers and poets, except those who denied the Providence of God, for these were not considered fit to be read, lest by them the soul should be defiled. The student was made familiar with all the philosophical systems, wherein the teacher accompanied him in spirit, as on a journey, and led him, as it were, by the hand when any thing abstruse, doubtful or deceptive presented itself; or like an expert swimmer, to whom no feat is unknown or untried, who being himself secure from all danger, stretches forth his hand to extricate and save others from drowning. The course of study was concluded with the exposition of the sacred books and the christian philosophy.

This long passage shows how the church, from the earliest ages, was solicitous to teach not only the christian doctrine, but the whole cyclopædia of the known sciences. Alexandria was not the only christian seat of learning of this kind in the first centuries.

There were similar institutions in Jerusalem, Antioch, Edessa, Caesarea, Nisibis, Neocaesarea, Nicomedia, Smyrna, Naziansus, Byzantium, Rome, Carthage, Hippo, Lyons, and other places. These were for adults, which presupposes the existence of primary schools where these adults had received the rudiments of knowledge before going to those high institutions. In fact, there were schools attached to the churches and supported by them. In the second century we trace a priest, named Protogenes, who at Edessa taught the children to read and write and sing the psalms. In the fourth century we find St. Basil the Great, making the education of the youth one of the chief ministries of the monks, and giving them circumstantial hints on the method of teaching. Soon the priests exerted themselves to gather a circle of boys around them to whom they imparted the rudiments of knowledge. This practice was sanctioned by the ecumenical council at Constantinople in 681, which prescribed that schools be opened in all parishes. So a school was attached to each monastery. And when the tide of the barbarians had almost swept away every vestige of civilization in Europe, from whence did come the light which dispelled the darkness hovered over the face of the continent? There was a tiny islet in the western sea, and in that "Gem of the Ocean," almost out of the reach of civilization, were found schools by the hundreds and students by tens of thousands, who soon shed their lustre all over the world. The fame of those institutions were such as to attract students from all parts of Europe, even from the classic shore of Hellas. And the sons of the Catholic and enlightened Ireland turned out and went to bear the good tidings of the Gospel, of science and civilization to the Scot, to the Anglo-Saxon, to the German, to the Swiss and the Gaul. Such were their exertions and influence that a German writer of the ninth century (Emmerich von Reichenau) exclaims with the warmth peculiar to his times: "O, how could we ever forget Erin, from which such light and splendour has dawned upon us!"

Before the reformation there were no less than 66 European Catholic universities of note, of which Italy had 17; Germany, 14; France, 12; Spain and Portugal, 10; England, 2; Scotland, 3; other countries, 5. In the fourteenth century the University of Boulogne numbered 13,000 students, and (including fellows, tutors and students) formed a body of 30,000. The number of years devoted to study, exclusive of the preparatory course, was generally 7 for arts and 12 for professional branches (theology, medicine and law), making in all at least 19 years of higher studies. These institutions turned out men like Alfred the Great, Alcuin, St. Bernard, Albertus Magnus, St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventure, Duns Scotus, Alexander of Hales, Roger Bacon, Dante, Petrarch, Chaucer or Sir Thomas Moore, thinkers, writers and polished geniuses, who not being subjected to our barbarous and criminal cramming, had something more in their intellects than a mere smattering of everything, and to whom humanity and education owe more than to the noisy educationist of our days. True it may be, natural sciences were not as far advanced as they are to-day, but to make a reproach of that would be equivalent to blaming Sir Isaac Newton for not inventing the telephone or the electric light. The church had then not only provided for high education, but she had also primary schools established. At the beginning of the fifteenth century the diocese of Prague, which covered a comparatively limited area, had at least 640 elementary schools. Taking that number as a basis, it would have given for Germany alone 40,000 elementary schools. In the year 1378 we find sixty-three lay teachers occupied in elementary schools. I could go on in the same strain with all the countries, but is not this sufficient evidence that the church is far from being opposed to education? She has founded the first schools in Christendom. She has saved the remnants of ancient civilization. She has given birth to those great institutions of learning which have been the cradles of genius and seats of literature and philosophy. With many it seems as if the normal schools were of a recent foundation. The fact is that as far back as the year 1684, we find a priest, the venerable Jean Baptiste de la Salle, establishing a normal school under the name School Teachers Seminary. The course which he advocated contained for elementary or primary schools: sacred history, religious instruction, reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, rudiments of book-keeping, coin system, weights and measures, drawing, singing, the drafting of the forms used in the ordinary civil acts, and deportment; for the Model school, he had,

besides, history, geography, literature and rhetoric, book-keeping, geometry, architecture, natural history, mechanics, cosmography, music, and some other subjects, like modern languages, &c. In his instructions he says: "We must teach to children but useful things, of which they may be able to avail themselves in after life. The teaching must be practical, and in connection with the state of life to which the child is destined. To teach children the theory and the advantages of the art which they study is a very useful thing, but practice is more necessary than theory." These rules, which are still at the bottom of the Catholic education, show that we are not content with the reciting of prayers or of the catechism, as some are inclined to believe, but that we strive for a good, practical, and useful education, in order to put every child in a position to hold his own in this world and to be a good citizen and a good christian. This aim has been so successfully attained, and that result is so widely known, that our teaching religious orders have been called upon to open schools all over Canada and the United States. From Halifax to Vancouver, from New York to San Francisco, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Arctic Ocean, these able, devoted, and unselfish teachers are found giving their whole and undivided attention, untrammelled by all earthly ties, free from the clogging influences of wordly affections, to the work of education. We find them amongst the Indians, knowing no differences, and imparting to all with the same love and zeal, the godly gift of knowledge. If those teachers were not fit for their work, would they be so universally desired and invited to take charge of the schools, whether primary or high schools? They would not be able to subsist; they would be wiped out of existence. But instead of that, the requests they receive are so numerous, that they are obliged to refuse some of the calls made upon them. Their achievements in the United States have been such as to elicit the following remarks from a Protestant paper in San Francisco, speaking of a Catholic institution in Oakland, California, under the control of the same order to which are entrusted some of our schools in Manitoba:

It is a home where moral and religious teaching go hand in hand with mental and physical training giving healthy action to both brain and soul. The secular curriculum is of the highest order, and the convent of the Sacred Heart has, in the thoroughness of its methods and the scholarship of those who have been educated within its walls, attained an enviable reputation throughout the state.

I have already referred to the success achieved by the Catholic schools of Quebec at the Chicago Columbian Exhibition. I desire, however, to put on record here some testimony of the high appreciation of which they have been the object. I will first quote from the report of our Canadian superintendent of the liberal arts at Chicago during the exhibition. Mr. Morton says in his report, page 42, of the general report of the Executive Commissioners of Canada:

The province of Quebec in this her almost first school exhibit presented to the many millions who visited the fair an extensive, artistic and instructive display. The Reverend Abbé Bruchési had under his charge nearly four hundred schools, representing various religious institutions throughout the province, the primary schools, the University of Laval and Laval Normal School. The display made by the 100 schools of the convent of Notre Dame of Montreal representing 24,000 pupils, elicited much admiration. The excellence attained in those studies peculiar to young ladies, was the most characteristic feature of this exhibit. The Christian Brothers' schools were largely represented by exhibits in drawing, writing and studies in commercial work. They represented nearly 20,000 pupils, and their most marked characteristic was the excellence of the writing, penmanship that was equalled by none at the World's Fair. The primary schools had a good showing in every day school work. The result of this exhibit made by Quebec must dispel the idea wherever it prevails that she is not progressing in education.

The report of Mr. Morton contains also the following lines:

Mr. Serrurier, representative of the French Minister of Education, and author of the inductive method of teaching, said: He had made a minute examination of the several school exhibits, and declared they were the finest of the whole exhibition, not alone in intrinsic value, but because of their admirable arrangement. At this great fair Canada gives an example which should be followed by the older nations of the earth.

I know that these remarks of Mr. Serrurier refer more particularly to the exhibit of the province of Quebec. That gentleman wrote to the Abbé Bruchési in this way:

I have been amazed by the intelligent way in which your exhibits are classified * * * Your copy books are the only ones having clear and precise headings conveying to the observer the information desired as to the school, the standard, number of pupils, the age, &c., I have also noticed with pleasure that the every day school work, in all the standards, bears with it a tone of sincerity which is very seldom found at exhibitions.

The Pilot of Boston also said, June 5th, 1893 :

These exhibits speak for themselves. They reveal the devotedness, the ability of the teachers, the attention and talents of the pupils. Nothing better could be found in the art gallery.

On the 29th of August, 1893, the Daily Sun, of St. John, New Brunswick, said :

The province of Quebec, the oldest in Canada, has made an exhibition of her school system which, to judge from the quality and of the number of the exhibits, will contribute to dispel many false ideas as to her degree of civilization * * In drawing, writing models for teaching the blind, education of deaf and mutes and, in fact, generally all that leads to the advancement of a country and a people in an educational point of view, Quebec schools to-day are in the front ranks.

Mr. Joncas, a distinguished member of the House of Commons, who had gone to Chicago with prejudices against some of the Quebec school, declared after a careful examination of the Quebec school display that he had "to shake off his own prejudices" and he adds: "Our school exhibition is the most practical of all that I have ever seen, and I have seen quite a number" * * "With a great deal of pride I say that the Canadian school exhibition is one of the finest, perhaps the best, in the whole Liberal Arts Gallery." The success of Quebec in Chicago, our own schools had elsewhere, under quite similar circumstances. Though I have already laid before the Senate evidence to that effect, allow me to put again on record a statement of our success at Portage la Prairie, in 1883, where we obtained prizes in cash, and diplomas for our school exhibition; at London, at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition, where we obtained diplomas, the only reward given there.

The late Superintendent of Education in the province of Quebec, is a man of recognized experience and authority in the Dominion. On the occasion of the celebration of his tenth year in the administration of the department, the Protestant Committee in Quebec passed a resolution in which they placed on record :

Their high sense of the equity and ability with which his duties have been discharged and to congratulate him upon the advance which under his energetic superintendence, education has made, and is making, in the province.

This resolution justifies me in attaching a high importance to his testimony. Writing to the Catholic superintendent of the schools in Manitoba, while at London, and after a careful examination of the school exhibition, he said :

After mature consideration, my opinion is that our Quebec system and yours, is as perfect as any other now in force elsewhere.

Our opponents may talk as much as they please after that of our alleged illiteracy; they will not be believed. There is no more illiteracy amongst the Catholics than amongst the non-Catholics. There is less boasting, but there is as much eagerness for education and as much knowledge. That charge of illiteracy, as I have already said, is not peculiar to our province. It is the old and usual charge that is always made by some people against Catholics generally and their church, a charge of which honest and well-informed Protestants disapprove. A man whose reputation does not necessarily fall before that of the men composing our Manitoba Government, Mr. Gladstone, has said :

Since the first three hundred years of persecution the Roman Catholic church has marched for fifteen hundred years at the head of human civilization, and has driven harnessed to its chariot as the horses of a triumphal car, the chief intellectual and material forces of the world; its learning has been the learning of the world; its art the art of the world; its genius the genius of the world; its greatness, glory, grandeur and majesty have been almost, though not absolutely, all that in these respects the world has had to boast.

"The praise of having originally established schools," says Hallam, "belongs to some abbots and bishops of the sixth century."

Ranke also says :

A sure and unbroken progress of intellectual culture has been going on in the bosom of the Catholic Church for a series of ages. The vital and productive elements of human culture were here mingled and united.

A Presbyterian writer, Laing, in his "Notes of a Traveller," made the following statements in 1842 :

The education of the clergy of the Catholic Church is positively higher and, beyond doubt, comparatively higher than the education of the Scotch clergy. * * It is much to the zeal and assiduity of the priesthood in diffusing instruction in the useful branches of knowledge, that the revival and spread of Catholicism have been so considerable among the people of the continent.

Speaking of the assertion that the Catholic clergy leave people in ignorance, the same writer says :

This opinion of Protestants is more orthodox than charitable or correct. In Catholic Germany, France, Italy and even Spain, the education of the common people in reading, writing, arithmetic, music, manners and morals is at least as generally diffused and as faithfully promoted by the clerical body as in Scotland. Education is in reality not only not repressed, but is encouraged by the popish church. In every street in Rome, for instance, there are at short distances, public primary schools for the education of the children of the lower and middle classes in the neighbourhood. Rome with a population of 158,678 souls, has 372 public primary schools, with 482 teachers and 14,099 children attending them. Has Edinburgh so many public schools for the instruction of those classes? I doubt it. Berlin, with a population about the double that of Rome, has only 264 schools. Rome has also her university with an average attendance of 660 students; and the Papal States with a population of two and one-half millions, contains seven universities. Prussia, with a population of fourteen millions has but seven. The statistical fact that Rome has above a hundred schools more than Berlin, for a population of little more than half of that of Berlin, puts to flight a world of humbug about the systems of national education carried on by governments and their moral effects on society.

Coming to a more recent date, we find in the official statistical books of Rome for 1869, the following data:—

	Pupils, Free.	Pupils, Paying.
Male instruction.....	.....	.....
Scientific institutions.....	3,829	.....
Elementary schools..	6,341	1,567
Female instruction.....	.....	.....
Convent and conservatories.....	2,954	553
Elementary schools...	6,490	2,171
	19,614	4,291

Grand total, 23,905, for a population at the same date of 220,532. This showing forbids all adverse criticism, and with the exception of a few, these students were taught free.

To those who concern themselves about having the inner thoughts of the Roman Catholics on the progressive education which is their aim I would say: listen to these words of the present Pope, Leo XIII.:

How grand and full of majesty does man appear when he arrests the thunderbolt ** summons the electric flash ** how powerful when he takes possession of the force of steam ** Is there not in man when he does these things some spark of creative power? ** The church views these things with joy.

The perfection of primary education is to be found in Catholic Luxembourg. The governor of that province said in 1872:

Luxembourg counts at the present time 507 elementary schools—that is to say, one school to every four hundred inhabitants, and such results have not been attained in any other country in Europe.

The number of pupils in the elementary schools exceeded fifteen per cent of the whole population. The year preceding the census proved that there were 31,580 children of an age to go to school, and the number of scholars actually attending the elementary schools was 31,239, so that only 341 children were missing, which produces one per cent, a result which has never been attained in any country in Europe, under any educational system.

In the Dictionary of Statistics, by Michael G. Mulhall, Fellow of the Royal Statistical Society, figures are given showing France at the head of the list for the average attendance of school children with 170 per 1,000 children, Belgium, 135 per 1,000, whilst the United States and England have only 130 and 123 respectively. Another table worthy of examination is to be found in the report of the United States Commissioner of Education. There the proportion of the enrolment of the children in school per 1,000 of population is given, and two Catholic countries, Bavaria and Baden, come at the head of the list with 212 enrolled children per 1,000 of population for the former country and 206 for the latter, while Prussia has only 196, England and Wales, 166; Scotland, 164. Two countries, one Protestant and the other Catholic, Denmark and Spain, may be bracketed, so small is the difference: Denmark being 110 and Spain 104.

As to the efficiency of the Catholic schools, it may be appreciated by the following facts:

Out of 339 pupils who obtained prize exhibitions in Paris in 1878, 242 belonged to the Christian Brothers' schools. Between 1847 and 1877, out of 1,445 such exhibitions, 1,145 were carried off by the Christian Brothers' boys, the public school candidates being the larger number, and the public schools had received 40,000 francs for support. (The Church Review, Protestant Episcopalian, July, 1890.)

In the same period of thirty-one years, of the whole number, 620, consisting of the first twenty leading scholars of each year, the Catholic boys numbered 527—thirty-one victories in thirty-one years, without a break. Another test—the obtaining of the certificats d'études, granted to all deserving students—was kept up for nine years. The results for that period show that of 9,499 certificates, the Catholic boys were 613 in the majority; and that the sum of the averages per school amounted to 194 for the Catholics, against only 55 for the public school boys. In Belgium, the official gazette of that country, the Moniteur, gives the percentage obtained by the Catholic and public schools respectively at competitions for the years 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893. In 1890 the Catholic schools obtained 5·52 per cent; the public schools only 3·96. In 1891, the Catholic schools obtained 5·52; the public schools, 3·55. In 1892, the Catholic schools obtained 5·33; the public schools, 3·56. In 1893, the Catholic schools obtained 6·79; the public schools, 4·39.

The average marks for each competition was as follows:—

1890.	Public schools,	132·1	on 200.
“	Catholic	“	139·4
1891.	Public	“	142·1
“	Catholic	“	142·6
1892.	Public	“	136·2
“	Catholic	“	137·8
1893.	Public	“	146·0
“	Catholic	“	150·4

The above figures and quotations must convince any fair minded man that there is no desire on the part of the Catholic church to keep the people in ignorance, and that the Catholic schools are turning out good scholars.

They answer fully the falsification of figures which are made purposely to arouse hostility against the Catholic schools. Such has been the case in the United States, where one Mr. Hawkins has impudently fabricated figures to suit his fancy and his animosity against parochial schools. Those Hawkins statistics, although refuted more than once, are made use of, are quoted and hurled at us from newspapers and public platforms by unscrupulous enemies, and they make their way through the people and succeed in deceiving friendly citizens who would otherwise be disposed to have the kindest regard for their fellow citizens and their feelings. And so are the accusations hurled at the Catholics of Manitoba at the present time. Those assertions are repeated, and in 25 or fifty years from now they will be re-edited by some parties, ignorant of the refutation, and again the public sentiment will be stirred up injudiciously, unfairly and unpatriotically. Let us hope, however, that day by day, the chances of those agitators will be lessened, and that a time may come when they will have no hold on the great majority of the people.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Hon Mr. BERNIER resumed his speech. He said: I have already stated the peculiar difficulties we had to contend with in our province on account of a large portion of the original population having Indian proclivities. The Protestant had not to contend with such difficulties to the same extent that we had. If it were true, as it has been said, that only 25 per cent of the half-breeds can read we should be credited with the fact that so many have received any education. Mr. Ewart, speaking in Winnipeg lately, said:

I am surprised to hear that it is so great. Dr. Bryce has compared the French half-breeds to the wild mustang, and the English to the patient roadsters, and he is right. The mother tongue of many of those called French is Cree, and their habits until recent years have been those of roving hunters and voyageurs. Why then charge the illiteracy to the Catholic schools. Why not as well charge it to the Protestant schools? Of this 25 per cent, how many owe their education to others than Catholics? Credit the Catholics? I say, with 25 per cent. Do not debit them with 75 per cent. Be fair. Is it not absurd also (even were Catholics responsible) to ask the same results from wild mustangs as from patient roadsters? In the United States educational census, there is a separate column for civilized Indians, coloured people, &c. It is not the best column.

Let us consider that accusation in the light of the statistics. I have already shown that in the percentage of the enrolment of children to the school population, there was only six per cent difference between the Protestant and Catholic schools, and that we were ahead in the percentage of the attendance to the enrolment. Such being the case, it is an impossibility that we should be behind the other section. To controvert that evidence it is alleged that a petition presented to the Government was covered with names of parties unable to sign it for themselves. Even if that were the case it would not be fair to condemn the whole system on one particular fact, which may be the result of certain particular circumstances. It is a fact, for instance, that too many amongst our farmers, and especially amongst the half-breeds (and for that I do blame them) very often by a misapprehension of the importance of their act, for fear of boasting, do not sign themselves their own names, although able to do so, but ask somebody else to do it for them. This is wrong, but it cannot afford sure ground to judge the illiteracy of the people. But in this particular case there is something more. The assertion has been met by the following challenge. Rev. M. Cherrier, speaking at Winnipeg about two months ago, said :

As I wish to give a flat denial to Dr. Bryce's assertion that 4 only out of the 140 French half-bred ratepayers referred could sign their names, here is my proposal to the learned doctor : let him produce the list, and I will volunteer to go with witnesses chosen by him to all the survivors under 50 years of age, of those named in the said list, and I agree to pay all expenses if I fail to bring back another list showing a fair percentage of names written in the signer's own writing, he to sustain the said expenses if I succeed in proving that many more than four out of 140 could sign their names.

This is the challenge, hon. gentlemen, and it has never been taken up or answered.

And if we judge of public schools by the following they have no right to throw stones at our windows. Inspector Lang—report of the Department of Education Manitoba, 1893, page 30, says :

In nearly every school in this division a test was made to discover how many of the pupils above second standard could use correctly the following words : done, did ; seen, said ; set, sit. It was found that about  $\frac{1}{100}$  of the pupils "done" their exercises, "seen" the cows, "set" in their seats, and were in the habit of "laying" down.

In the same report, page 29, he says :

There is considerable time lost during each day in many of the schools owing to lack of system in arranging the day's work.

There was no inspection of the Catholic schools, it is said. This again is an inaccurate statement. We had a staff of inspectors who did their work regularly at a sacrifice to themselves. The Protestant section had appointed clergymen to inspect their schools. It can be ascertained by referring to the report on the Protestant schools in 1886, page 35. We thought that we might in the same way avail ourselves of the ability of our clergymen, and we appointed several of them as inspectors. But while the inspectors of the other section were well remunerated from the public funds, our inspectors did their work, for a nominal sum, which our board gave them as a mere recognition of their devotion to our educational interests. The instructions given to those inspectors were that their duties were not only to visit the schools twice a year, but also to help in the working of the educational laws, and to give explanations of the same to trustees and teachers, and they were supplied by our board with a series of 31 questions bearing on all the details of the school work, both as to teachers and pupils, of the school apparatus and furniture, and of the school house and the accommodation it afforded. Besides that, the trustees were urged by our board to comply with the School Act and visit the schools. Here is an extract of a circular that was addressed to them in 1884 :

School trustees are requested to conform to the clause of the Act which obliges them to visit the schools from time to time ; it is desirable that they should forward to the superintendent a summary of their observations after each visit.

Moreover, by the School Act, clause 80, the resident priest was made a visitor of the schools in his mission, and I know that they did visit the schools and urge all they could the progress of the schools, and compliance with the law, and helped the cause of education by their advice to parents, teachers and pupils, and even to our Board of Education. And now, hon. gentlemen, to complete this information, I may add that the superintendent himself visited the schools. He had made it his duty to go all over the province, in order to show the ratepayers and the pupils the interest that was taken in the education of the youth, and thereby to encourage and properly direct the energy of the population to the cause of popular education. He did it also with the view of making himself personally acquainted with the population, with the trustees, with the teachers, with the locality, the school-house and everything belonging thereto, so as to be able the better to fulfil his own duties, to supply their wants, and to remedy the evils wherever they might exist. We do not contend that everything was perfect. We are human like others ; but—others also have their deficiencies. Protestant schools had their drawbacks. To show it, it is only necessary to refer to their own reports. I take the reports of the inspectors at random. I will quote from some of the inspectors :

My examination of the schools has been uniform. In several schools I found that in some standards the work of the lower standard had not been mastered, arithmetic is the study that many of the standards are backward in, but when schools will be longer in operation than six months in each year, this weakness will be removed.

Another inspector speaking of the school at Dunstan said :

The progress of this school has been somewhat hindered by lack of proper accommodation.

Another inspector speaking also of another school says :

The lower school is very backward and will require the best efforts of the teacher.

Speaking of another school the same inspector says :

It is very backward and will require great diligence to bring it to good standing.

So they had their drawbacks as we had ours. As to ours we were willing to lessen them as much as possible. But, hon. gentlemen, there is more to be said about this. It is well known that this was not the cause of the change of the law. Political advantages were sought ; that is all, and we were made the bone of contention. But, if, as they contend now, that was the cause of their action, why did they not avail themselves, before wiping out our schools, of the power given them, by the School Act, to improve them? By clause 80, they were constituted visitors of the schools--Catholic as well as Protestant schools. There were thirty-two Protestant English members of the legislature (including the Cabinet ministers) who had the right to visit our schools, and pass their remarks, and write them down in a book, which was ever at their disposal for that purpose. The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench had, by law, the same privilege. Did they avail themselves of that privilege? Not at all. Not one of those who are to-day arraigning our schools ever put a foot in them. They have never taken the proper means of acquainting themselves with the working of our schools. As our departed illustrious Mgr. Taché once said :

They know nothing but their own schools, and with self-commendation that characterizes men who know nothing but themselves and their immediate surroundings, pronounce the schools of others to be of no value.

As a matter of fact, I may add, they do not want to know. They prefer to resort to current prejudices and passions, sure to find followers ready to accept their unfounded assertions, without taking the trouble of looking into them. It is astonishing, as well as painful, to see how men, otherwise honest and intelligent, are sometimes easily led astray. For instance, there are many who base their objections to our schools on the testimony of one man, Mr. O'Donaghue, the gentleman sent up by the government of Manitoba as an accuser of our schools. That man appeared before the Privy Council in Ottawa ; every one there present had an opportunity of listening to him and of judging of his own ability. He does not speak or understand our language ; he is not even able to master his own language ; he is not in a position to judge of the efficiency of an English school. Every body would see that when he appeared before the Privy Council his remarks, if at all reliable, applied to 1883 and 1884, and not to more recent years. Yet the government of Manitoba is willing to let its policy rest upon that man. By some, not only one particular school, but the whole school system, the whole Catholic population of Manitoba, in so far as education is concerned, are placed at the mercy of such a gentleman. That is so much opposed to ordinary common sense, that many would regret their hostility, if they were only willing to think over the matter for five minutes.

It has been said also that our schools were open but a few months in the year, but a few days during the week. This again is contrary to the facts. We exacted 200 school days in the year while it was a rule amongst a great number of Protestant districts to have no school in winter. The reports of the superintendent and of the inspectors are evidences of that. That rule was complied with and those who did not comply were but a very few exceptions, and had very good reasons. It is very difficult to meet such general assertions : very often a mere denial is all the answer that can be made ; fortunately, however, it requires but a moment of reflection to discover the truth, We have the reports and it is from them that the high percentage of the average attendance, already referred to, is made up. If the schools had not been regularly opened, that percentage would not have been as high as indicated. This is a striking fact, which nobody having the slightest experience in such matters, can controvert. Our opponents have felt the weakness of their position in this regard, and to get over it they have impudently insinuated that our reports were falsified. Should I go to the trouble of denying such a dastardly charge? Does it not strike you that if the charge was true it would have been exposed before this day? They have been very careful not to particularize their accusations. Why not give names, dates and other particulars? We never wanted to cover any misdoing. Many years ago some of our opponents tried that kind of assault, but they were rebuked by the courts. Here let me quote the words of our distinguished solicitor, Mr. Ewart, a Protestant gentleman, as everybody must know :

Another specific charge is that under the old system the Catholics cooked their returns * * * Upon the only occasion upon which it was made specific, it was proved to be untrue, and that in the most satisfactory way possible, namely, by the finding of the Court of Queen's Bench * * * It was made as to the city of Winnipeg. It was proved to be false. Since then it has * * * taken to the woods.

That was the result of the inquiry. In addition to that I may mention a fact which will appear to you almost incredible. Some years ago, right in Winnipeg, Archbishop Taché was entered on the roll as a Protestant ratepayer. If that had happened with respect to a man less known than Mgr. Taché it could have been excused as a blunder. But Archbishop Taché was so widely known as the head of the Catholic Church in that part of the country, that the fact of his being entered as a Protestant ratepayer is most suggestive as to what may have happened in that respect with regard to other Catholic ratepayers not occupying such a prominent position. We refrain, however, from calling that a fraud ; we prefer to believe in the honesty of the perpetrators of such blunders than to recriminate and to injure the character of our neighbours. These considerations have no weight, however, with our enemies. For them, there is nothing but dishonesty amongst Catholics from top to bottom, and they publish it and proclaim that it is out of interest for us that they do so. What a loving people they are ! Be our brothers, say they to us, or we will knock you down.

Another accusation is that the priests were teaching, and illegally and fraudulently receiving money for their services. To this accusation also I give a flat denial. No priest has fraudulently or illegally received public money for teaching. Unorganized school districts could not and did not get any public money, so the priest could not get any either. In every organized school district there was a board of trustees in whose charge and control was the school. These trustees had by law the right of engaging the services of teachers, whether priests or laymen, and the moment those trustees had engaged their teachers and kept their schools in operation, they had a legal right to their share of the taxes and public money. The fraud and the illegality would have been to refuse them that share of money. In all cases the money went to the school district, and not to the teachers, the latter being paid for their services by the school district, according to their engagement, and if in certain cases public money went direct to the teachers it was only on satisfactory evidence that the school district was owing them the amount. It was not a claim of the teachers as against the board, but a claim of the teachers as against the school district controlled by the trustees. That was the law, so that as a matter of fact the trustees were in this respect the controlling and responsible parties. The moment the latter were satisfied, the law had to take its effect. But now, hon. gentlemen, what are the facts about the priests teaching in schools? I am in a position to assert that within the ten years next preceding the year 1890, there had not been more than three or four priests who, occasionally, taught schools, and when they did, the circumstances were such that no other teachers could be got. They never received money as priests, although they may have received some as teachers from the trustees. And how long did they teach? Out of an aggregate, taken at the lowest figure, of 6,000 months of school teaching during these ten years, for the Catholic schools, the three or four priests, during the same period, were not employed for more, at the outside, than sixty months in the aggregate, that is, not more than one-hundredth of the time. Double that percentage, treble it, make it four times if you like, that would be only four-hundredths of the time. Is that sufficient to justify the storm that is now raging all over the Dominion, even if on some particular points certain deficiency might be found? Is it sufficient to deprive a whole section of the population of the rights it had on account of a few irregularities? If any irregularities did occur they were due rather to the force of circumstances than to any unwillingness or preconceived neglect of duty. I am sure, hon. gentlemen, that I do not in vain call your attention to the difficulties of a new province, with its sparse and far from well off-population. There is an immense area of vacant lands. Day by day it is filling up. As soon as the settlers begin to form a group at a certain point, they look for educational facilities. But times are hard; the poor settlers have not yet recovered from the straightened circumstances in which they were when they came to our new land. Everything has to be done; there is no money to build a school; there is no money even to pay the teacher; what will they do? Just as other people do—the best they can. Under those circumstances the Catholic settlers go to their priest and request him to open a school at a sacrifice of time and money, in order not to let their youth grow up in ignorance. Will you blame them for that? I am sure you will not. But outside of Parliament we find parties always accusing the Catholic clergy of keeping the people in ignorance; the moment, however a clergyman exerts himself to extend to his congregation the benefit of his own education and training, the moment he devotes himself to the work of imbuing the youth with a love of learning, religious and secular, the very same parties who accuse the church of keeping the people in ignorance, are down upon him and wish him to be excluded from the school-house. The three or four priests to whom I have referred did teach under the difficult circumstances that I have first mentioned. The localities were new, poor and remote; some times the board had no qualified teachers to offer them; the trustees and the people who had elected them, thought that the best and only thing they could do was to request their respective priests to open a school for their children; these responded cheerfully, they did good work; some times they were paid for it by their trustees not as priests, but as a teacher; some times they were not, this time because they were priests and ready as such to make sacrifices that a layman would not do, and I stand by them here, and would like to be able to do more for them than to express my gratitude for the services they have rendered to the cause of education. One of these priests was Rev. Father Decorby, and you may judge of him by what my hon. friend from Shell River said in this House on the 23rd of April last:

In my immediate neighbourhood there is a separate school, named after the clergyman, Father Decorby, who founded it. He conducted a separate school there for years to which the Protestant population in its neighbourhood went. They were all satisfied with the school; they had no complaints to make of it.

Yes, some priests did teach, occasionally, and under the peculiar circumstances I have told. And why not? The priest is an educated man. A man who has had at least eighteen years of study; who was taught and has taught before being ordained; he is a friend to the people, he lives amongst them partaking their poor bill of fare, and helping them in all the circumstances of life. The first school in our territories formerly known as the lone land was opened by a priest. When, at the request of Lord Selkirk, the great Bishop Plessis of Quebec sent the first missionaries to the Red River, here are some of the instructions he gave them:

6. Missionaries will take a particular care of christian education among children. And for this they will establish schools and catechism in all the localities they may have occasion to visit. * * *

The missionaries will establish their home near Fort Douglas, on the Red River, will build there a church, a house, a school. * * * *

9. The missionaries will make known to the people the advantage they enjoy in remaining under the government of His British Majesty; will teach them by words and example the respect and fidelity they should have for the Sovereign; will accustom them to offer to God fervent prayers for the prosperity of His Most Gracious Majesty, of His August family, and His empire. * * * *

Pursuant to these instructions, a school was opened in 1818 at St. Boniface, by Rev. Mr. Provencher, afterwards Bishop Provencher. It has never ceased to exist since, and in 1859, the Hon. Mr. Taylor, a United States consul, and in 1869, Sir Charles Tupper, visiting the schools that had sprung out from that first one, could not refrain from expressing to His Grace Archbishop Taché, their great surprise at the excellence of the education given in our Catholic institutions at such a remote period. On account of these beginnings, if not on any other account, is not the priest, who has opened and maintained the first schools in the North-west entitled to some consideration? I do not say that he should be allowed to break the law, but I do contend that when he comes to the rescue of the population, with a view of helping the latter to get over its difficulties, whether in matters of education or anything else, he should be praised instead of being vilified. On account of the care extended to our schools by the clergy, and of our wishes to have Catholic prayers and religious instructions in them, the idea that our schools are church schools, seems to have taken root in the minds of too many of our fellow-countrymen. This is altogether a misapprehension. Our schools were not, and neither are our schools in the provinces of Ontario or Quebec, church schools. Our schools in Manitoba were purely common schools, and public state schools, under the control of the lay authorities to the same extent as the Protestant schools were. In the Protestant schools of Quebec, it was decided in 1890, that they would have half an hour of religious instruction, and the St. John News (Quebec), a staunch supporter of the dissentient schools in Quebec, said in July, 1890 :

Friends of religious education will be glad to learn that the Protestant committee, at their last meeting at Quebec, decided that for the future the first half hour of every day's work in all the schools is to be invariably devoted to scriptural and religious training.

And this is a proper thing because, as the celebrated philosopher Bacon said : "Religion is the aroma which is necessary for the preservation of science ; without the aroma, science would soon decay and dissolve itself."

Now, hon. gentlemen, that was exactly the rule in our Manitoba Catholic schools. The religious instruction did not last more than half an hour, sometimes less. Why should we be condemned for doing in Manitoba what is so good for Quebec Protestants? As to our relations towards the state, I can only repeat what I stated in this House last year :

Neither the church nor the parents have ever refused to the state its legitimate interference. Everybody is in accord in wishing a large and intelligent diffusion of knowledge. Taking into consideration the circumstances surrounding modern communities, the church and the parents admit the assistance of the state in that noble work. They admit that the state has an interest in the education of the people. They admit that the state has a right to see that the assistance given is not misapplied, they admit that the state has a right to exact a full compensation in the form of knowledge, outside of religious instruction, for the money they hand over to the parents to help the latter in the fulfilment of the duties imposed upon them by nature and their religious convictions. As a matter of fact, they only retain practically now-a-days the right of guiding the morals of their children, and of teaching them how to worship their God upon this earth. Thus understood, there is no inconsistency in our theory, there is no clashing between the rights of the parents and the rights of the state. On the contrary, there is a fruitful and harmonious accord which has its continual and delightful echoes in the hearts of all good citizens and brings them together and contributes to the national unity.

Let us now speak about our school-houses and their accommodation, for this also a cause of impeachment against our school system. One is at a loss to understand why, supposing the school-houses were in an unfit condition, it should be necessary to remedy that state of things to overthrow the school system itself. It seems to me it is like a gentleman who would demolish his house because of a smoking chimney. However, that has been done, done unjustly, and without cause. In towns and cities we have, I venture to say, the finest buildings that can be found in the province for educational purposes. There are many hon. gentlemen here who have visited our country and who will not contradict me on this point. As to rural parts, our school buildings and accommodation were on a par at least with the accommodation offered to the Protestant children. Even in 1893 the Protestant schools had 64 log school-houses. I have myself travelled over the country, and I have come across school-houses, belonging to the Protestant section, which were isolated, filthy, ugly and unprovided with school appliances of any kind. To support my own testimony on this I will quote from reports of inspectors of the then Protestant schools. One inspector says in speaking of one school : "There are no maps, blackboard, or, in fact, apparatus of any kind." Speaking of another he says : "The furniture is very inferior." Elsewhere it is said : "The school is not very well supplied with apparatus." Another inspector speaks in the following way of one of the schools under his care : "It is a public hall used for all kinds of purposes, out of school hours, the result being that its condition, when so used, is altogether to unfit it for the work of a school." Another inspector expresses himself in this general way : "There are still a few cases in which the trustees expect the teachers to accomplish their work without giving them the necessary adjuncts in the way of good-sized blackboards, etc., in others the necessary maps have not been procured." Another says : "The progress of this school has been somewhat hindered by lack of proper accommodation." Speaking of another school the same inspector says : "This school has likewise suffered from poor accommodation." Another inspector speaks in this way : "In many cases the school-houses were not in as clean and tidy a condition as desirable. The teachers are largely to blame for this." Another says : "The school-house of this district is of inferior character." Another again says: "The desks are utterly unsuitable for the purpose for which they are intended." Another speaks in his report of four districts where "log houses have been erected." I will stop making quotations, although I might add good many to the above. I cannot overlook, however, the fact that the census of 1891, as compiled in the statistical year-book of 1893 registers 619 log school-houses in Ontario, under the public school system. I repeat here that I am not referring to that for the pleasure of finding fault. Not at all. I do not find fault; my experience prevents me from doing so. I know that a good deal of forbearance has to be exercised in these matters, but am I not entitled to ask for the same forbearance on the part of the adherents to the so-called public school system when dealing with our Catholic schools, which are also public schools, and state schools? Among all our school-houses, I do not think there were more than four or five log houses. The others were all good frame buildings, well lighted, well closed, and provided with a complete set of maps, supplied to them through the care of the general board, and otherwise fit for the school work, although, however, devoid of any pretention to extravagance. General advice was given to our school districts not to run into debt. The consequence was that in 1890, at the time the change took place, the aggregate amount of debt incurred by the Catholic schools all over the province did not reach $6,000, while the Protestant schools had an aggregate financial obligation amounting to about half a million of dollars. Again, I say, I do not find fault with that. It was their right, and we had nothing to say about it. But we may well find fault, when we are called upon to suffer on that account. The necessary results of so large an expenditure was to lead them to heavy assessments and taxation, heavier than those of the Catholics who had been more moderate in their administration. And now comparisons are made between our light assessments and their heavy assessments; these heavy assessments are now brought before the public in big letters, and not only public sympathy is appealed to, but these heavy assessments are given without any explanations, as an instance of the alleged unfair working of the old system. An attempt is made to impress upon the minds of the public that because Catholics are assessed for less than the Protestants, there must have been in that old system something radically wrong and unjust, and that Protestants were paying their money to us, which is not the case. As a matter of fact, it is simply the result of a difference in the principles laid down in the administration of affairs, one section, the Catholic section, cautiously guarding themselves against indebtedness, the other, the Protestant section, running heavily into debt. And now, to use that as an argument against us, and to use that as a reason for wiping us out, is unjust in the extreme. We should not be called upon to suffer in any way on account of that; we should not be called upon to help others out of their difficulties; we should not be punished for any action or state of things with which we had nothing to do, and as to which we are under no responsibility at all. Here are other reasons why the Catholic taxation was not so heavy as that of the Protestants. The Catholic people were enjoying in school accommodation, scattered over the province, and otherwise, advantages to the amount of over $100,000, for which the Catholic rate-payers had not had, and will never have to assess themselves. From whom did that money come? It came from that clergy which is now branded as an enemy of education and of the people; it came principally from the illustrious and grand prelate whom God, in his mercy called away from this world last year, and whom I have seen sobbing and shedding tears at the idea that after his fifty years of labour for his people—for Canada, for England, in a land where the Catholic missionaries had been called by Lord Selkirk to ensure peace and morality in the colony, in a land where he had himself been called by the Canadian and Imperial authorities to restore good feelings and harmony at a critical period of the history of Manitoba, in a land where the Catholics have been the pioneers of christianity and of education—whose eyes, I say, I saw weeping, whose heart I felt throbbing in his bosom at the idea that all these labours, all these sacrifices, and the aim of his life would be frustrated, and that on the eve of taking his departure he had to leave his beloved flock trembling under the threats with which christian education was assailed. And now, hon. gentlemen, since I have introduced the name of our lamented Archbishop Taché, I may just as well use his own words to let you know another reason why our taxations is less heavy than it would otherwise be. His Grace says :

I naturally admit that high price is one of the ways to secure the services of well qualified persons for teaching, and it seems to be the only resource at the command of our Protestant friends. Over and aside of this ordinary way of securing good teachers, the Catholics have an advantage that they highly appreciate, and which is not entirely despised by Protestants of standing and enlightenment. The advantage I allude to is the one secured by the valuable services of persons who do not teach for the sake of money or for making a living out of it, but who do teach as a sacred duty towards God and society, and who teach either for nothing or for the small amount barely giving them food and clothing.

This consideration goes a long way against taxation, and is another factor of the difference which exists between the two sections of our school system. Any person will admit that this does no harm to Protestants, while it does a great deal of good to Catholics. The raising of the salary of these teachers would undoubtedly increase the taxation among the Catholics, but would in no way diminish that of the Protestants, and the cause of education would gain nothing by it.

Ideas on this topic are so erroneous among some people that saving expenses to ratepayers with regard to teachers, means poor teaching. Some men seem to ignore completely that there were, there are and will be thousands and thousands of the very best qualified teachers who never received and will never receive one dollar from any government grant or any assessment levied on ratepayers.

I will examine else where some of the ideas suggested by what has just been above stated, but it is undeniable that as far as money is concerned, the teachers who ask less are a saving resource to the ratepayers, and to tabulate complete statistics, the saving thus effected ought to be taken into consideration ; and while raising a cry among the Protestants because of their assessment with regard to school, fairness would require to state all the reasons why it is so.

To these lines I will only add this : The low percentage of the salary of the teachers is accountable for the fact that a good many of our teachers belonged to religious orders, requiring very little to live, free from the social displays bearing sometimes so heavily on laymen, and teaching, not for the salaries they could earn, but in obedience to their vows. In St. Boniface, for instance, for the sum of $2,500 we secured the services of twelve qualified teachers, who supplied not only the tuition, but the building themselves, leaving to the trustees no other charge than that required for furniture and school apparatus. Considering that matter outside of any feeling or principle, but merely as a matter of business, everybody must admit that we cannot be blamed for availing ourselves of that advantage, which does not affect in any way the position of our friends of the other section. It is not necessary to insist any more upon the causes of the disproportion in the rate of taxation that existed as between Catholic and Protestant. That disproportion existed, to a certain extent, but it was not due to the school system itself ; it was due to causes originating in ourselves, from our Catholic organization, and it did not increase the rate of taxation amongst Protestants : in fact it did not affect it in one way or the other. There was no injustice consequently. This, however, was made one of the arguments for the promoting of the change of the law. And then, not only was the rate of taxation, but the distribution of the government grant also, advanced as a grievance against us. It was contended that we received more than our share of that money. The contention cannot stand for a moment. Figures have been adduced to sustain that assertion. Experts in figures and even muddlers of figures can arrange them so as to prove quite different propositions. But there is one thing which in this instance cannot be used to deceive any one ; it is the text of the law itself, which I will quote and which will show to the satisfaction of all that it was impossible that we should receive more than our equitable share. First as to taxation : the law provides that "in no case shall a Protestant ratepayer be obliged to pay for a Catholic school or a Catholic ratepayer for a Protestant school." It shows that no Protestant money could be levied for the support of Catholics, and if any was the Protestant ratepayer had the means of protecting himself. It is, clear, therefore, that when it was asserted that the money of the Protestant section of the community was taken to build up our schools or our religious denomination, it is obviously groundless, in so far at least as taxation was concerned. As a matter of fact, I do not remember one single case in which the Protestants did make any complaints in this matter. Let us see now as to public money, the money voted by the legislature. That distribution of money was based upon the census of the school population taken yearly in the month of November.

Under the law neither the Protestant section nor the Catholic section had anything to do with the apportionment of the money. We had only to hand over the census returns, and it became the duty and the privilege of the government only to apportion the money. The majority of the government was Protestant. Is it to be believed that they were handing over to us an unfair proportion or one cent more than we were entitled to. During all the time I have been connected with education matters in Manitoba the Catholics never questioned the apportionment. I never heard that the Protestant section did. We were then getting along so harmoniously that it did not occur to our minds, on either side, that any injustice in that respect would be done to either section. Comparisons have been indulged in by some parties to show that we received more money than our share. But these comparisons are misleading. For instance, the number of schools have been taken as a basis, and it has been contended that our schools received more, each, than the Protestant schools. Without going much into figures I will show in a very brief way that this is entirely misleading. First, the law does not say that the division shall be made according to the number of schools, but according to the school population, and very properly to, because it is quite possible to understand that if the money was to be apportioned according to the number of schools, the result would be a tendency to unduly increase the number of schools; in some cases, it might go far beyond the requirements of population. This being the law, it follows that the only fair basis for comparison is the school population. At any rate, it was the law. Any other is beyond the pale of propriety. Secondly, the expenses of the Protestant section were much larger than the expenses of the Catholic section, as the following table will show :

	Protestant section.	Catholic section.
1884.....	$11,831 00	$2,720 68
1885.....	12,816 00	2,064 64
1886.....	13,523 00	1,804 55
1887.....	16,992 00	2,724 10
Total.....	$55,162 00	$9,309 97

The larger the expenses are, the less there is to go to the schools; and less expense leaves more for the schools. This contingency again shows that the number of schools cannot be a proper basis for comparison.

Thirdly: Our Catholic population is not so scattered generally as the non-Catholic population; the consequence is that for a given area, we need fewer schools, although having more children. A group of 15 children would require a school, but if within the same territory there are 40 children, it would require no greater school accommodation. If you apply that to the whole province you will find that for the same school population, there will be less schools for the section whose members are more grouped, and a greater number for the section whose members are more scattered. Such was the position of respective sections in our province.

And such being the case, it is improper to submit figures to show that our schools, each individually, received more than the Protestant schools. It is not the number of schools that are to be benefitted, but the number of children. That was the law and the law was based on a sound principle. In matters of taxation, all who pay should share equally. In a country, every soul is supposed to contribute its share to the public treasury and to receive an equal share in some form or other of the advantages offered by the state to its population. In matters of education the subsidies should be paid, as they were in our province, according to the school population, and not according to the number of schools, the absence or the existence of these being subject to too many contingencies to afford a sure and equitable ground of distribution. Rev. Dr. Bryce, who is to-day, and has been from the beginning, one of our strongest opponents, wrote in 1877 :

The government grant is voted for one system of school, and is divided according to the population of children. No special rights are given to either Catholics or Protestants. All moneys are equitably distributed.

What could be asked more than equity in distribution? To-day there is no equitable distribution; it goes all to one party.

Before leaving this money subject, I must refer to an imputation which was put in circulation with the view of casting doubts on the honour of our board as to the management of the school money. As stated briefly in the former part of these remarks, we had, in 1889, a reserve fund of nearly $14,000 which had accumulated year after year. That was a surplus we had to our credit. But strange as it may appear, there are parties who can never be satisfied. They do not like deficits, and they equally find fault when there is a surplus. We had a surplus, and we have been severely taken to task for it. We have been even accused of misap-appropriation of funds. The facts are as follows, as put before the public once by Archbishop Taché :

The 90th clause of the school law say :

" Each section of the board may reserve for unforeseen contingencies a sum not exceeding ten per cent of its share of the appropriation." Such is the law, it may seem very foolish to some as it seemed tolerably wise to others ; at all events the Catholic section being empowered by the law, took that course and reserved for unforeseen contingencies a sum a little less than ten per cent of its share of the different appropriations. But why have they done so? The answer is this : from the beginning of the province it was found, and the experience is not altogether altered at this date, that the teachers of our schools, besides the insufficiency of their salaries, had often to serve a full term of five months before receiving anything on account of their salary, and after the terms were over, sometimes they had to wait two months and more before their well earned wages were paid, this seemed a great inconvenience which could only be remedied, and in fact was remedied, in having a reserve fund. The moment an account became due and approved by the section of the board, the superintendent paid it out of the reserve fund, and when the government thought it convenient to give an instalment of the voted money, it was deposited in the bank to fill up again or increase the reserve fund, and so forth from term to term and from instalment to instalment. By acting that way, the section of the board avoided what is always unpleasant, to apply repeatedly to the government officers and many times to be delayed by them.

They avoided also which is of more grave consequence, the painful obligation of delaying the payment of the money due to the teachers and others who had served the cause of education. If this is a fault I accept the responsibility, as chairman of the Catholic section of the board of education ; but I cannot abstain from stating, that a government, which would find such a condition of affairs in all the state departments when it is explicitly authorized by the law should easily acquiesce in the results it has brought about. This is called " misappropriation " by certain parties and the remittance of this reserve fund is also, with bad taste, called " disgorging," but I trust that the fair play and the good sense of the public will give the action of the Catholic section of the board in this matter, its true appellation and will view it in its proper light.

So all this transaction was according to an express law ; there was no misappropriation ; there was no secrecy about it. It was known to the public, to the legislature and the government, through our yearly reports ; it was known especially to the latter on account of one of their members having a seat on our board. The same thing had occurred in the Protestant section of the board, which, for a number of years had also unexpended balances ranging from $4,000 to nearly $10,000 constituting, as much as our unexpended balance, a reserve fund. No blame has been cast on the Protestant section of the board for holding it ; and very properly holding it, in my opinion. But why should the Catholics be blamed for the same act? Some may think that it would have been more advisable to spend the whole subsidy yearly and leave no balance. I think his grace Archbishop Taché gave good reasons for the course that was taken then, and to those reasons, I may add another one which some of the members had in their minds. It was expected that by this yearly increase of that reserve fund, a time would come when, with the interest thereon, we would be in a position to maintain, without any extra cost to the province, and without curtailing the allowance to the schools, a normal school for male teachers. We were providing for the future. However, I am quite prepared to recognize that an honest divergence of opinion may exist with regard to this matter. But even if it was unadvisable, there was no necessity to wipe out the whole Catholic school system to enforce another course. Mere representations would have been sufficient. I have stated to you the facts as to the part played by our section of the board in this matter. Let me now put before you the action of the local government with regard to the same matter. On the 12th July, 1889, Mr. Prendergast, then Provincial Secretary, wrote, on behalf of the government of which he was a member, to the Catholic Superintendent of Education, a letter, supported on no legal ground, by which a remittance of our reserve fund to the government was asked for. In that letter, however, he said, speaking on behalf of the government :

This demand refers only to a detail of internal administration, and in no way to the ownership of the amount in question ; such amount is decidedly a vested right and will not admit of a doubt at any time.

This is a clear and positive acknowledgment on the part of the government that the Catholics could not be dispossessed of that amount, and a promise that they would not be dispossessed. On its receipt that communication was taken into consideration by the board, and, although there was no law upon which the government could at that time exact the remittance of that money, it was decided for the sake of conciliation to comply with the demand. So, on the 22nd day of July, ten days only after the requisition had been made, the money was handed over to the government, with a resolution stating the rights and the views of the board. In spite of the promise of the government we have since been deprived of that money. I beg leave to put before the Senate a document which is an official statement of the transaction. It is a copy of the report of a committee of the Catholic section of the Board of Education to take into consideration the question of the reserve fund :

Since the year 1873, and until amended by chapter XXXI., 51 Vic. (1888) the School Acts of this province authorized each section of the Board of Education to reserve for contingencies a sum not exceeding ten per cent of the annual grants.

Clause 90 read as follows :

“ * * * Each section of the board may reserve for unforeseen contingencies a sum not exceeding ten per cent of its share of the appropriation.”

By virtue of that clause the Catholic section of the Board of Education had yearly, until 1888, put aside certain sums of money, which amounted (including the interest), in July, 1889, to $13,879.47, as follows :—

Capital .....	$11,756 57
Interest.....	2,122 90
Total .....	$13,879 47

By chapter XXXI, 51 Vic. the law was changed, and the annual school appropriation, which used to be paid over to each section of the Board of Education, was ordered to be placed “to the credit of said respective boards’ in accounts to be opened in the books of the treasury department, and in the audit office.” This enactment was for future action. But no provision was ever made affecting moneys previously paid to the board, and still in their hands. Consequently, the Catholic section of the Board of Education continued to retain and administer their accumulated reserve fund until July, 1889, when the government demanded that all moneys still in the hands of the board be paid over to the Provincial Treasury Department.

In making this demand the hon. Provincial Secretary stated, that the ownership of said money was entirely vested in our section of the Board of Education, and could not at any future time be questioned.

Although the Catholic section of the Board of Education were then of opinion, as they are now, that this demand had no ground in law, still they complied with the desire of the government and the above sum of $13,879.47 was paid over to the provincial treasurer, the board, however, reserving the rights of the Catholic schools of this province to such money, as may be seen by the resolution which was transmitted to the government with the cheque, and which is as follows :—

“ In compliance with the desire of the government as expressed in the letter of the hon. Provincial Secretary, dated 12th July, 1889, the Catholic section of the Board of Education gives authority to the superintendent to hand over to the Provincial Treasurer the sum of $13,879.47 being the whole of the reserve fund and the balance of all school moneys in their hands.

“ In making this remittance, the Catholic section of the Board of Education beg leave to represent :

“ 1. This reserve fund has originated and accrued by virtue of the provisions of the various school Acts then in force in this province.

“ 2. Only self sacrifice on the part of the members of this section of the Board of Education and their adherence to the strictest economy in the administration of school moneys have rendered possible the creation of such a reserve fund.

“ The ownership of that fund is a vested right in the Catholic schools of this province ; therefore, those who have had to administer the same up to the present time are convinced that the government will not change the destination of said money and will not either decrease the ordinary grants, such being the assurance given us by the government in the above mentioned letter of the hon. Provincial Secretary.”

The above resolution was transmitted to the government, with the cheque on the 22nd July, 1889. The receipt of such resolution and cheque was duly acknowledged by the government. Since then the Catholic section of the Board of Education has received no intimation that the amount of said reserve fund was no more at their disposition. Up to the present time, no legislation has deprived this board of their actual right to distribute said amount to the Catholic schools. Accordingly it has been resolved by said board that said amount shall now be distributed and paid over to all the Catholic schools of this province, according to the requirements of subsection (c) of sec. 90, of the School Act, as amended by sec. 7 of chap. xxxi., 51 Vic. the allotment between all schools being as follows :

Then followed a list of apportionments The whole was duly transmitted to the government before the coming into force of the said Acts. The answer is yet to come. We know, however, that the amount has gone to the consolidated fund of the province. The funds, which had been acknowledged by the government to be ours, have been taken possession of by the same government, and used for other purposes than those for which they had been voted. If anybody is to be accused of misappropriation of funds in connection with this transaction, the Catholic section is not that party. We have been dispossessed of an amount of money to which our schools had a vested right ; the lawful requisition made by our board for the payment of that money to our schools was not acted upon by the government ; the money has gone to the consolidated funds, that is, has been used for other purposes than for what it had been voted that is spoliation, that spoliation was perpetrated by force, there being at the time no law in existence giving even a shadow of right to the government to lay their hands upon it. In connection with this I must refer to an incident which took place last week in the Local Legislature of Manitoba. In the debate on the remedial order, the hon. Mr. Cameron, the provincial secretary, is reported as having said that our section of the Board of Education handed over that money to the government without any protest. I am at a loss to understand how a man holding the responsible position of an adviser of the Crown, speaking from his seat in the legislature, could deliberately mislead public opinion to that extent. The Government of Manitoba acknowledged in the letter conveying their demand to us, that we had a vested right in that sum, there was, it seems to me no necessity for a protest. But, as a matter of fact, we did protest, the resolution and official documents which I have placed here before the Senate cannot be questioned. And what are they, if not courteous, but at the same time strong protests? And if in the presence of these facts and of such action on our part, the Government of Manitoba, being in possession of the documents to which I have just referred, have the audacity to impose upon the public as in this instance, then what reliance, I ask, can be put upon their declarations or accusations? I may safely say that those people are going beyond what decency permits when they accuse the Catholics of having used Protestant money for the support their schools. The very opposite has been the rule since 1889. I hasten to add that I know personally a great many of our Protestant fellow-countrymen who are exceedingly sorry on that account. In Winnipeg some of them said that they were ashamed of being placed in the position of using the money of the Catholic ratepayers to educate their children. They look for a change. They look for a remedy that will relieve them from that uncomfortable position. I hope the remedy will not be long delayed. I hope also that this effort of mine will help to dispel many misapprehensions, and clear the way to such a mutual understanding as will restore harmony in the province.

I have gone I think over all the grounds of accusation against our schools. I might have said much more in their justification. I am sure, however, that I have furnished a sufficient justification to all fair-minded men to enable them to shake off any prejudices they might have had with regard to such schools. I have gone, to a limited extent, beyond the course that Catholics generally take with respect to other schools. As I have already said, we do not as a rule concern ourselves about the schools of non-Catholic people. We are willing and satisfied to let them have the schools they like under their own control. We have lately been assailed, however, with such violence, with such a disregard for our feelings and in such a slanderous way that we were bound to take up the gauntlet and show how easy it would be to retaliate, in case it would be necessary to adopt such a course. But I protest here that my intention has not been to make any reflection on men, on institutions, on schools or on any school system whatever, not being in accord with my own views. I have experience enough in this matter to know what difficulties of every sort are to be met with every day in the management of schools and in the improvements wished for. But, hon. gentlemen, why should we not have the benefit of the forbearance we are ready to exercise towards others? There may be some differences of view as to the methods of teaching; there may be some divergence of opinion as to the relative importance of the various subjects to be taught. But, because of these differences, because some people may think that one subject should be more largely taught than others, it is no reason why one system should be considered as inferior to another; it is no reason for saying that the instruction given in one school is not the equivalent of that given in another school. Let us illustrate these propositions by taking the history of men of different intellectual attainments. Take Shakespeare and Newton. The intellectual attainments of these two men were as widely different as can be imagined. But who will undertake to say that one was superior to the other? Each one was a superior mind, had accomplished training in his way, and the surest judgment to be pronounced with regard to them is to proclaim that both were men of genius, of whom the whole human kind has reason to be proud. In the same way we should mutually have regard for our neighbours. Why not be generous on both sides, and since we cannot agree in matters pertaining to religious and educational matters, why not agree to disagree and direct our energies to the material and national development of the immense resources of our country in a spirit of liberty and common loyalty to the flag that protects us? In that way we would hear no more, on either side, of these vexed questions. When, hon. gentlemen, the brave soldiers of England went to the front at Waterloo or at Balaklava, the English people did not ask those gallant warriors whether they knew how to write or read. Neither was that question put to the Canadian militia when they saved Canada to England. In all these cases the British crown and the British people did not hesitate to acknowledge the services of the troops, and that they had well merited the gratitude of the Empire. Should unfortunately, such occasions as those occur again, the same fidelity and the same gallantry would be found amongst the children of the Canadian nation, whether they would have been taught by a first class or a third class certificated teacher, whether by a nun or by a layman, and in view of that, the war that is raging against the Catholics, their conscience, their views, their children and their liberty of conscience, should be stopped. These last words may seem rather strong to some, but they did not seem too strong to Sir A. T. Galt when the education of the Protestants of Quebec was at stake. Here are his words :

It must be clear that a measure would not be favourably entertained by the minority in Lower Canada which would place the education of the children and the provision for their schools wholly in the hands of a majority of a different faith. It was clear that in confiding the general subject of education to the local legislature it was absolutely necessary that it should be accompanied by such restrictions as would prevent injustice in any respect from being done. Now, this applied to Lower Canada, but it also applied, and with equal force, to Upper Canada and the other provinces, for in Lower Canada there was a Protestant minority, and in the other provinces a Roman Catholic minority. The same privileges belong to the one of right here as belonged to the other of right elsewhere. There could be no greater injustice to a population than to compel them to have their children educated in a manner contrary to their own religious belief.

This is put in the most stringent form, the reverse of the assumption that the state can do what it likes with persons and estates, particularly when it comes to education. This latter doctrine is false in itself, full of dangers for the commonwealth, and repudiated by political economy and by statesmen.

John Stuart Mill who was an advanced Liberal said in his Essay on Liberty :

That the whole or any large part of the education of the people should be in state-hands, I go as far as any one in deprecating. All that has been said of the importance of individuality of character and diversity in opinions and modes of conduct involves, as of the same unspeakable importance, diversity of education. A general state education is a mere contrivance for moulding people to be exactly like one another, and as the mould in which it casts them is that which pleases the predominant power in government * * or the majority of the existing generation * * it establishes a despotism over the mind, leading by natural tendency to one over the body.

Further on he adds :

One thing must be strenuously insisted on : that the government must claim no monopoly for its education, either in lower or in the higher branches, must exert neither authority nor influence to induce the people to resort to its teachers in preference to others, and must confer no peculiar advantages on those who have been instructed by them.

It is not endurable that a government should, either in law or in fact, have a complete control over the education of the people.

Gladstone said on the 24th June, 1870 :

As regards the existing denominational schools, it is a very grave and important question which we have to ask ourselves—whether we are frankly, ungrudgingly, willingly and systematically to make use of that powerful agency for the purpose of good secular instruction, which is placed at our command in a great degree, if not exclusively, through the vigorous actions of religious zeal and love? Let us not disguise from ourselves that this is a question of the greatest moment. The answer to it, I own, appears to me to be perfectly clear. The answer is, that nothing but folly could induce us to refuse to avail ourselves of an opportunity so valuable.

This is the opinion of the former great leader of the Liberal party in England. Let us see now the opinion of the leader of the Conservative party, Lord Salisbury.

Speaking at Preston, some time in the fall of 1893, Lord Salisbury said :

Numbers of persons have invented what I may call a patent compressible religion, which can be forced into all consciences with a very little squeezing ; and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. What I want to impress upon you is that if you admit this conception, you are entering upon a religious war of which you will not see the end. There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men ; and that is that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects. That is a right which no expediency can negative, which no state necessity ought to allow you to sweep away ; and therefore I ask you to give your attention to this question of denominational education. It is full of danger and of difficulty ; but you will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it, and declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the state.

Such is the way in which Lord Salisbury vindicates the rights of parents, the influence of religious truth in education, and defines the rights of the state. I find in the  Owl , February, 1895, on page 292, the following:

Mr. Gladstone says: In my opinion which I have endeavoured to recently set forth in the pages of the Nineteenth Century, an undenominational system of religion, framed by or under the authority of the state is a moral monster. The state has no charter from heaven such as may belong to the church or the individual conscience.

An independent paper, and also a pillar of Protestantism in Quebec, the  St. Johns News , says:

With regard to the separate schools we have little reliable information; they may be mismanaged, or they may not; they may be doing efficient work or not; but it strikes us that granting all that is said against the schools of the minority in Manitoba, some less drastic remedy than their total abolition might be applied. We have the separate school system in our own province, and it is only just to say that it has worked, on the whole, equitably, and to the satisfaction of both the great divisions of christendom, yet if such a system depended merely on the will of the majority of the hour, and not on that higher principle faintly expressed in the words of the governor-general to which so much exception has been taken in certain quarters, "Live and let live," what security would the Protestant minority of Quebec have that their schools would not be done away with, and the whole system of education be made a state affair? The equal-rights agitators clamour for a separation of state and church in this province, but in Manitoba they are working for a union of state and education which is still more objectionable.

But apart from all selfish considerations, the question of separate schools rests on a firmer basis, that of justice. It is not right that the minority should be compelled to send their children to schools controlled by the majority, or let them go without education altogether in many cases. It is not right that the state should intervene and say, there shall be no dissentient schools. In fact, so far as the great majority of dissentient schools in this province are concerned, we may say that they would infinitely prefer to do without the state's subvention if the state, on its part, would relinquish all pretensions of control. Of course there are some institutions that get the lion's share, but the subsidies extended to the rest are merely nominal—$20 to $30 a year to an elementary, $25 to $50 to a model school; in return for which the state issues it diplomas to teachers (who have to pay for them) fixes the standard of work, examines the scholars, and mulcts the teachers so much a year willing or unwilling, for a pension fund. In our opinion, the state gets more than it pays for.

In conclusion, I want to reiterate my statement that the question of efficiency or inefficiency of the Catholic schools does not and cannot come in here. In 1890, the local government could have made an investigation. They did not do so. They went on destroying the system that had been in existence for twenty years. To-day it is too late. That suggestion is evidently a side issue to prolong this irritating contest and to avoid their submission to the highest authority in the land. This federal government cannot accept that suggestion. The action of the local government has forced the subject upon us. They have created the situations described by the lamented D'Arcy McGee in the following words pronounced in London (Ontario) in 1866, and they will have to receive the treatment indicated also in those lines. D'Arcy McGee then said:

The minorities east and west have really nothing to fear beyond what already existed, local irritations produced by ill-disposed individuals. The strong arm and the long arm of the confederate power will be extended over them all, and woe be to the wretch on whom that arm shall have to descend in anger for any violation of the federal compact.

True it is to be regretted most sincerely that such things have happened, but since the difficulties are thrown in our way, since there are wretched people who set the federal and Imperial authorities at defiance, in violation of the rights conferred on an important section of the country, let the arm, the long arm of the confederate power descend upon the guilty parties, so that it may be said that in the Dominion of Canada justice is never refused to those whose grievances have been so strongly, so clearly, and so authoritatively pointed out and determined as those of the Catholics of Manitoba have been by the final judgment of the Privy Council in London, and by the remedial order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council of Canada.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no objection to the granting of the address moved for by the hon. gentleman. I do not know that the papers he speaks of are really on record here. I do not think any such representations as the efficiency of the schools prior to 1890 have ever been filed by the Manitoba Government with the Dominion Government; but if there are any such documents they will be brought down as soon as possible. In acquiescing in the hon. gentleman's motion, I think it is also my duty on behalf of the House to thank him for the valuable information he has laid before us and before the public. I must thank him also for the very great skill, tact and moderation he has shown in the discussion of a question which is to him—and I may say to every Roman Catholic in Canada—a burning one. I hope that in the reading of this valuable speech great light may be thrown on the matter in the minds of many of our people. Now, I may say that there are a number—although I am convinced that that is a small number—of people who to-day need light upon a question which has been so thoroughly discussed and so thoroughly settled by the judgment of the Privy Council in England.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (74) "An Act further to amend the Act to encourage the development of the sea fisheries and the building of fishing vessels."—(Mr. Angers).

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If it is the pleasure of the House, I would move that the second reading of this bill be allowed without any discussion at present, and on the motion to go into committee of the whole to-morrow, a discussion could take place, and we would be advanced one day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I regret to say that I cannot look upon the matter just in the same way as the hon. gentleman from Ottawa. We have had some experience in this particular respect.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Then I withdraw my application, since the hon. leader of the Opposition cannot control his supporter, and move for the second reading to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INCORPORATION OF BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (L) "An Act to further amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Boards of Trade."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

Bill (81) "An Act to incorporate the Ontario Accident Insurance Company."—(Mr. Loughheed.)

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 26th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (77) "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company."—(Mr. Vidal).

Bill (62) "An Act respecting the Buffalo and Fort Erie Bridge Company."—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland).

Bill (101) "An Act to incorporate the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Church of England in Canada."—(Mr. Allan).

Bill (L) "An Act to further amend the Act respecting the incorporation of Boards of Trade."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell).

HAMILTON AND LAKE ERIE POWER COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (85) "An Act to incorporate the Hamilton and Lake Erie Power Company" with amendments.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the forty-first rule of the House be suspended so far as it relates to this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman had better move concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—There are no amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only change in the bill is the transposition of some words.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It was understood in the committee that the changes were merely verbal and that they were not really amendments.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—When we make the slightest change in a bill coming from the House of Commons we should send it back to the House of Commons for their concurrence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But there was no change in this bill whatever.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The chairman stated that the law clerk had recommended that a transposition of certain words should take place and that change was made. It is a substantial amendment, though it does not very much affect the meaning of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Then the question will arise, where shall we stop when we make amendments at all? I perfectly agree with the hon. minister that the bill should be returned to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The amendments certainly do not change the character of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bill was copied out of the statutes of last year and it is absurd to say that the mere transposition of a few words which does not change the sense in the slightest should be considered an amendment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The amendment may be a very slight change, apparently merely verbal, and yet it may completely alter the sense of the whole clause. When you attempt even to change the phraseology of a bill sent from the other House, it is an amendment which requires the concurrence of that House.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—It does not alter the sense of the clause in the slightest degree.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—There is a general principle laid down by every authority that we have in our library, that when amendments are made the bill must go back to the other House. A change, whether verbal or not, is an amendment and is so called by the authorities. I should think the bill ought to go back to the other House. A comma added to a sentence may appear very trifling, and yet it may change the whole sense of the clause. I think these changes should always be regarded as amendments.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed as amended.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (125) "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1895, and for other purposes relating to the public service."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the suspension of the 41st rule of the House so far as it relates to this bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill passed through all its stages.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY DROPPED.

The motion having been called

That he will ask if it is the intention of the government to appoint a royal commission to inquire into the nature of the arrangement entered into between the Dominion government and the delegates invited to confer with the government, prior to the passing of the Manitoba Act, in 1890? On whose behalf the delegates were acting? And from what source they derived their authority?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before withdrawing this motion, I should like to say that circumstances have arisen since I gave this notice which I think render it unnecessary for me to put the question at the present time. I therefore ask permission to withdraw it.

The notice was dropped.

NOVA SCOTIA STEEL COMPANY BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved,—

That an order of the Senate be made, authorizing the clerk of the Senate to return to the solicitors for the Nova Scotia Steel Company (Limited) the original deed of sale, dated 31st December, 1894, made between the said company and the Nova Scotia Steel and Forge Company, Limited, and filed of record before the Committee on Banking and Commerce, for the purpose of being printed as an addition by way of schedule to the Bill (No. 56) from the House of Commons intitled: "An Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited."

He said:—The members of the Committee on Banking and Commerce will remember that when the bill to amend the Act of the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited, was before the committee, the gentleman who represented the promoters of the bill produced to the committee the original agreement between the Nova Scotia Steel Company, Limited, and the Steel and Forge Company, and the original agreement was handed in to the committee annexed to the bill in order that it might be printed as a schedule to the bill. It has been so printed and the committee and parliament do not require the original agreement any further, and the company do require it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not rise to oppose the motion, but I do not think it necessary, although I do not find any fault with the course which the clerk has taken in this matter. It was clearly understood by the committee that this original paper should be handed back to the owners of it after the proceedings were through, and I should think it would be quite enough for the chairman to have asked the clerk to hand it back. The clerk was cognizant, of course, of the feeling of the committee, that the paper should be returned to the parties interested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may inform the House that I had nothing to do with the motion. It was drawn up by the law clerk, who thought it was necessary, and he handed it to me as I had been in charge of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN SICK BENEFIT SOCIETY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

The order of the day having been called,

Third reading Bill (31) "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Sick Benefit Society."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that subsection (c) of rule 49 of the Senate be suspended in so far as the same relates to the said bill.

He said:—I think I explained yesterday the reason why the publication of notice did not appear in other provinces of the Dominion. The omission was due to a circular issued by the clerk of the Commons regarding the procedure in private bills.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (92) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act." He said:—I shall briefly state to the House the object of this bill. Last year we made some amendments to the Insurance Act providing that companies doing business in Canada should be required to furnish a statement of their Canadian business and their general business. It is pointed out that there are foreign companies who are not required by their own government to give any statement at all, and consequently it is found necessary to amend our law so as to provide that they shall furnish us with a statement, even when they are not bound to give one to their own government and that it shall consist of the statement they make to their shareholders at their annual meeting showing their business and their Canadian business, and should a company be found that made no such general statement to the shareholders, it shall have to make and prepare for us a synopsis, or a brief statement, so that we may be in a position to realize their financial position. The last seven or eight lines of clause 20 are added to the law for that purpose; the other amendment is to alter the dates at which statements can be produced by the companies. It is made with a view of meeting the requirements of the different companies. It is provided further that any such statement of general business should not be deposited later than the 30th June next, following. There must be a limit to the time at which they have to give this statement so that the necessary report for Parliament may be prepared. Now this bill provides further that companies, such as the mutual or benevolent companies to-day who do not fall under the section of the Act requiring them to furnish a statement of their business, should also be included and be required to comply with the general law of the country so far as insurance interests are concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I rise to call attention to an amendment which I shall propose when the House goes into committee on this bill. It was given as a reason for the application of a name to a particular corporation whose bill will be considered later on, that the law under which insurance companies are organized does not authorize the Minister in issuing his license to make any inquiry as to whether the title of the company applying for a license is objectionable. It was asserted that any foreign company could come to Canada under whatever name it chose and that it would be entitled to a license on making application in the regular way. It seems to me rather an absurd proposition, and I thought if it were so, the sooner our law was amended the better. I know in countries outside of the Dominion, Canadian companies have great difficulty in getting a license when their name conflicts with that of any other company. Take the case of our Sun Life Company which applied for a license to do business in England. They were met with the objection that it might conflict with the name of another company doing business there. It seems to me that our law is very imperfect if the Minister cannot refuse an application of a foreign company for a license, but is obliged to give it under any circumstances. It is wholly inconsistent with the principles under which our legislation heretofore has proceeded. I have here the General Companies Act, and one of the points on which it is necessary to satisfy the Minister before a charter can be granted is, that the proposed corporate name of the company shall not be that of any known company incorporated and that it is not on other grounds objectionable. I find in the province of Ontario the same principle prevails, that on every application for a charter the Minister is bound to exercise a proper discretion. I presume the same principle applies in all the provinces, and so far as Parliament is concerned it was thought perfectly safe to trust this body not to give a charter which might be objectionable on public grounds, or whose title would conflict with that of some existing company. I therefore propose to add a subsection to section 4 of the General Insurance Act. I should have thought, under the terms of section 5 of that Act, the minister could exercise sufficient discretion if the name of a company which was applying for a charter was objectionable. However, Mr. Fitzgerald stated before the committee that the department did not consider that the minister could exercise a discretion under that clause. The next clause provides that a license shall issue. What I propose to move in amendment when the House goes into committee on the bill, is a subsection to section 4, which would preserve the harmony of our legislation. Section 4 is the one which treats of licenses, and this would come in properly as a subsection there. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the only excuse offered by the company that asked to be incorporated under the name of the Bankers Insurance Company was that some United States company was likely to come in and secure that title, and we were asked to commit a fraud because under our law the fraud might be committed by a foreign corporation. It seems to me that our legislation must be very weak and defective if a foreign corporation could come in and, under any name whatever, however objectionable, insist upon getting a license, and that seems to be the position that the Superintendent of Insurance, who has charge of that special branch, places us in. Although I do not concur altogether in his view, in order to make it perfectly clear that the minister must exercise his discretion, I propose to introduce the amendment of which I have given notice.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole House now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the bill is an important one, and as we had a long discussion on the Act which this bill proposes to amend, I hope the Minister will allow it to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I have no objection if it is the wish of the House, but it would be more convenient to consider the bill after it goes through the committee than now. The bill is now in its crude form, and in committee it may be improved. Let us go into committee of the whole, suggest improvements and changes, and I will not press the bill any further and the House can consider it to better advantage at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman must see that if amendments are to be made to the bill, this stage is the most convenient one at which to make them. I am not asking for any favour; I am simply asking that the rule of the House be observed.

The bill was allowed to stand until to-morrow.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the second reading of Bill (67) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act." He said:—This bill, which is to amend the Fisheries Act, is better known in the Senate as the saw-dust bill. Last year, towards the close of the session, an amendment was made to the Fisheries Act depriving the Governor in Council of the power of exempting certain rivers from the operation of the Act. In passing that amendment last year, I would not say that the House did not give it proper attention, but I do not think that they had all the facts before them when they decided that there shall be no more exemptions in a country which covers half of North America. The question turned wholly upon how it affected the people living on the shores of the Ottawa River. We lost sight of the fact that the change affected not only the Ottawa but every stream in the whole Dominion of Canada. There are hundreds of rivers in the Dominion which the government cannot now exempt from the operation of the Act even when the general interest of the country requires that such exemption should be granted. There are inland streams and small rivers of no consequence at all, streams that are not navigable and where the fish life is of no consequence, and where the lumber business is of the greatest importance. A mill of a certain size on such a stream can supply a whole county with the necessary lumber, and yet to-day the Governor in Council has no power to exempt that stream from the operation of the law, and the millowner, who is serving the public interest by his industry, is liable to a very heavy fine every day if he allows the saw-dust from his mill to be thrown into the stream. There are other rivers where fish live is of so little consequence that the lumber trade is of much greater public interest, and minor interest should give way to the other. I might say that the Ottawa River is of that nature. There are other rivers of an international character where, we cannot prevent saw-dust and mill refuse being thrown into the stream. Our people are liable to a fine of so many dollars a day if they violate the law, while their neighbours in the United States are allowed to throw saw-dust into the river to destroy the fish life where there is any. It is not proposed by this bill that the power which the Governor in Council has enjoyed in the past shall be restored for ever, but a temporary measure is submitted to the House to the effect that this power should be restored for the space of two years. Investigations have been made already, especially in the east, with a view to classifying the rivers and ascertaining where saw-dust could be thrown into the water without any disadvantage to the public interest.

The commissioner, under the instructions of the Minister of Marine, is now in correspondence with the United States authorities with a view to making some agreement about the regulations which should be followed on international rivers such as the St. John, the St. Croix and others. It is almost certain that at the expiration of the period mentioned in this bill an understanding will be arrived at to apply the same regulations on both sides of the boundary. In dealing with this question last year, we were very much influenced by the fact that the Ottawa River—and that was mainly the river, no other points to which attention was drawn were considered—was being destroyed by saw-dust and mill refuse and consequently the exemption should be removed. For many years saw-dust and mill refuse had been thrown in the Ottawa River. The plan which was shown in the lobby of the House established clearly that the river is to-day as navigable as it ever was. At one point there is an accumulation of saw-dust, but there is over that accumulation a very great depth of water. There is not less than 30 or 40 feet over the highest accumulation of saw-dust, and I want to draw the attention of the House to this fact, that even if there was a less quantity of water it does not matter at all for the purpose of navigation, because if you want to test the capacity of the river you have to go to the shallowest place in it; and I invite the members of this House to look at the point opposite La Blanche River shown on the plan. There you will find the minimum depth of water during the summer season is seven feet, and that the bottom is hard pan, bed rock all across, so that if you have deeper water off the city, it will be of no avail because you have got to go over the bar at the Blanche and there is only seven feet on the shoal there.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How far is that from Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—About 22 miles below the city. So that if there is a greater depth of water over the accumulation of saw-dust than over the bar at the Blanche, you have not decreased the capacity of the Ottawa River. Now who are the people who navigate the Ottawa River? What is the transportation over it? Just one class of people, the lumbermen of Ottawa, the men who own the mills here at the falls. Do they come here and complain that the river is being destroyed and that the navigation of the Ottawa River will be impeded in such a way that it will become useless? On the contrary they say that the Ottawa River is as navigable to-day as ever it was. They use the same vessels that floated upon it 20 years ago, because at no time in summer can the draught be more than 7 feet, the depth of the water on the bar at the Blanche which has a bed rock bottom. Now who are those who complain of saw-dust being t-own into the river? Do the fisherman complain? This bill is to amend an Act for the protection of fish, and it could properly be amended in this respect only so far as it would affect fish life. It has been demonstrated by fish experts that the idea we had formerly that saw-dust is destructive to fish life is not quite correct.

There are many rivers in the United States where saw-dust has been thrown in and to-day the fish are as abundant as ever before.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—They get fat.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I do not think as a rule that it does fatten fish, but I say that it does not always destroy fish. That is the opinion of an expert in the matter the Commissioner of Fisheries in the United States. He gives you the fact that on the Hudson River, although saw-dust and mill refuse has been thrown in for years and years, fish life has not diminished. But we have in this case the very best evidence in relation to fish life—the testimony of the fishermen on the Ottawa River. They have sent in I might say a unanimous petition to say that the fish in the Ottawa River is as abundant to-day as it was 40 years ago and more. They do not petition against this bill. They petition on the contrary, that the exemption formerly granted to the millowners be restored. I may add that the riparian proprietors, unanimously almost, from Ottawa to Grenville, have signed petitions asking that the exemptions be continued to the millowners. They have an interest in it. Of course what is useful to the poor man may not suit the wealthy man, with a beautiful sandy beach and a summer residence on the Ottawa River. The sight of a few ships and saw-dust there may be an eyesore to him but to the poor man who lives all along the river, and who from this mill refuse picks up more wood than he requires to keep himself and his family warm during the whole winter, the throwing of the mill refuse in the river is not objectionable.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is profitable fishing for him.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They pick up this wood and it is sufficient for them for the whole winter, and consequently their interest is with the lumbermen in that way. They do not object to the mill refuse and saw-dust being thrown into the river. There are millowners on the Ottawa River, especially at the falls here, who are so situated that they cannot comply with the law as it is now. Their mills were built many years ago. The foundations are nearly on a level with the river. It is impossible for them to construct the necessary appliances to take up the saw-dust and burn it. They would require to have mills differently constructed altogether from those which they have at present, and in many cases the construction would be impossible. If they were in a position to build new mills and burn the saw-dust it would be imposing upon them a very heavy tax. Mr. Edwards, who is the manager of two mills on the Ottawa River below the city, has built the necessary appliances for burning mill refuse and saw-dust. He made a statement in the other House, which I think will commend itself to the consideration of the Senate. His position is very different from that of the millowners at the falls; there is plenty of space under his mills. They are so constructed that they can carry off the mill refuse and saw-dust and burn it. Notwithstanding that, the House must know that we have been imposing upon him a very heavy tax. I inquired whether he could insure his mill and the lumber in his yard for same price as before this law, and I was told no, that the companies exacted an additional premium from the fact that he had to burn the saw-dust there, the danger of a fire being so much greater than if the mill refuse were thrown in to the river. This great lumber interest on the Ottawa which supports thousands of families in this district, which represents, I suppose, an amount of money that I could safely put at several millions of dollars a year. That interest is opposed in this House by the petition of one boatman. There may be some other opponents but they are not known to me. I heard the petition of this boatman who said that from the fact that saw-dust has been thrown in the river his business has been completely destroyed. He leases boats and canoes for sport and pleasure on the river. He has a large boat-house in a bay at the foot of Sussex street, and his trade has been destroyed by the accumulation of saw-dust. That is the opposition that we are met. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact also that there is much less mill refuse and saw-dust thrown into the Ottawa River to-day than there was formerly. There are now, I believe, only three mills altogether over the falls. The percentage of saw-dust thrown into the river to-day is much less from the fact that the saws and appliances for cutting wood are very different from what they were formerly.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—They are thinner.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Thinner, yes; band saws. I have been told there is a great saving in the lumber from the fact that the saws are of a different nature from what they were formerly, and that they make less saw-dust than the old style of saws. Mills are gradually removing away from there, the nuisance is diminishing. This water power is being used for other industries. Under the circumstances, the House would be doing but justice and what I might call acting wisely in adopting the bill which is now submitted to restore this power of exemption to the Governor General for two years, and to provide also that the fines and penalties to which the mill-owners have been subject since the first day of May last until this bill is sanctioned be remitted.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Will the gentleman kindly tell us the locality where there is only 7 feet of water over the bar?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The Blanche River is not the only one where the Ottawa River is very shallow. Within a short distance of Ottawa there are three or four sections in the river where those shallows exist.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Whose plan is that?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Mr. Fleming's.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I thought so.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This plan shows the section of the bottom of the Ottawa River from Ottawa to Grenville. It shows where the shoal is rock and where it is sand.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Is there any place on the Ottawa River where the Ottawa River is shallower than it ought to be on account of the saw-dust?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No; in no place on the Ottawa has the saw-dust accumulated to an extent to lessen the depth of the water to the minimum on a rocky bar at the Blanche River.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has the hon. minister ever been down to the mouth of the Rideau canal?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I forgot to refer to the saw-dust at the mouth of the Rideau canal. That is not a portion of the river—it is a portion of the canal. Of course there is an accumulation of saw-dust there, which sometimes would prevent the entrance of barges into the canal. That is a thing for which the mill-owners themselves provide, and whenever that takes place—it is about the only place where the mill refuse accumulates to interfere with the navigation—the mill-owners of Ottawa dredge the river there and remove the saw-dust. They are the interested parties, the only parties who are using the Rideau canal, the only people who make any transportation over it; and they dredge that place at their own cost every time.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Was any offer made by the mill-owners to abate the nuisance at the end of the two years?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. gentleman will understand that this is not a bill of the mill owners; it is a bill of the government, and the government want that much delay before the law that removes all exemption be enacted. The mill-owners made no proposal, but the government will take such steps that at the end of two years the question shall be solved altogether according to the wish of the House then. The intention is to classify the rivers, if possible, and saw-dust may be thrown into the water where it is established that it is not detrimental to the fish or to the public interest, and the lumber trade requires it. The Ottawa River according to the interests and according to the state of things then existing, will be classified. By that time it may be that no mill refuse or saw-dust will be thrown into the Ottawa River at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. Minister has forgotten to refer to the bearing of this bill on British Columbia rivers. I believe there is an intention to allow the fishermen there to throw fish offal into the river. A proposition is made to manufacture oil from the refuse. The fishermen are rapacious and they must be defended against themselves. I hope if they are given any such permission, it will not be given for a long time.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This question has been before the Senate for the last eight years. I do not believe the Minister of Agriculture was present on any occasion when it was discussed, except last year. I propose to show what has taken place upon those different questions, and what the views of the government have been at those different times, and allow hon. members to judge for themselves, whether the course forced upon us is not perfectly correct and just in the interests of the people of this country. Early this year, at the commencement of the session, I applied to the government for information that I wanted them to supply us with, reliable information from their own engineer, Mr. Gray, who was employed in 1886 or 1887, to make a survey of the bed of the Ottawa River. In place of that, they bring down here a plan made at the instance of the lumbermen, interested party, by a man who, I say fearlessly, was never on the river one minute. They bring that down and practically say that the evidence of their own engineer is not to be relied upon. They certainly ought to have confidence in their own engineer. They appointed him and gave him full instructions to inquire into this nuisance which has been increasing from year to year. There is no knowing where it will stop, because I do not believe the lumbermen propose to stop it at the end of two years. If this were the first proposal on their part, I would consider it reasonable, but in the face of what we know and what has occurred, I do not think they have any intention of stopping it, and this legislation is sought merely for the purpose of evading the difficulty for the present, and at the end of two years they will come and tell you that it is impossible to comply with the law, and will ask for further delay. The Minister of Agriculture says that he has produced before us petitions from a great many persons in favour of the bill, and that only one man has petitioned against it. I know of one petition against this nuisance, signed by 2,000 reliable men, which was presented to the government, but very little attention was paid to it. I intend to go over this matter from the beginning, and show that we have no alternative but to reject this bill. Last session this question was fully debated, and there was such a unanimous opinion in this House that the government very properly gave in. During that interval has one solitary thing been done by the lumbermen to remedy this evil? Not that I know of. They have not made a movement for the purpose of putting an end to the disgraceful state of things which has existed too long, and which is a menace to the navigation of the river and a disgrace to the Dominion. It is unnecessary for me to describe it to you, because everyone of you has seen it for himself, and no man can go down the Ottawa River without seeing for himself that the throwing of saw-dust into the river is a standing disgrace to the parties who permit the nuisance to continue. We are told that the mill-owners intend to remedy the evil. Why have they not attempted something before now? Why have they not tried during the past year to do something? Why when erecting new mills have they not made arrangements to destroy their saw-dust? No, they have not done anything—it is easier for them to throw their saw-dust into the river than to supply the necessary machinery to destroy it. Mr. Edwards, to his credit be it said, has come out in favour of his friends. He has made all the necessary arrangements for burning the saw-dust at his own mills, but he has a fellow-feeling for the gentlemen with whom he is associated, and in his kindly way, he says it is more difficult for them than it is for him to destroy the saw-dust. But we have nothing to do with that. This is a matter that concerns the whole country, and not a matter concerning the city of Ottawa alone. These navigable rivers belong to the whole people of Canada, and I contend it is a matter of right to the whole public that no individuals or corporations, no matter how influential they may be, shall have a right to destroy or obstruct the free navigation of the rivers. It is said that we have no fish in the Ottawa. It is very easy to understand why. It is utterly impossible for fish to live in beds of saw-dust; but I can tell you as a fact, that when I came here fifty years ago there was no river in the world that was better supplied with fish than the Ottawa, but as I have said, it is impossible for fish to live in waters filled with saw-dust, and we have been deprived of that great source of food for many years. This matter has been debated so fully before that hon. gentlemen, except, perhaps, those who have come here very recently, understand the subject thoroughly, and it is unnecessary for me to continue further in this line, except to show the various positions taken by the different parties on this question since 1888. Surely in seven years the mill-owners have had an opportunity to show a disposition to do something. If they had displayed any inclination to abate this nuisance, I believe the people would have been perfectly satisfied, but in place of that they have gone on increasing the nuisance. The Minister of Agriculture says that the quantity of lumber manufactured here has decreased. I can tell him that there are some 500,000,000 feet of lumber sawn at the Ottawa mills, of which 8 per cent is saw-dust which is thrown into the river, and hon. gentlemen can see the danger that that causes to navigation. They tell you that the main channel is not obstructed. That may be at the present time, but will any one tell me that the bays are not filling up? And when those bays are filled, what will become of the saw-dust? It must find some place, and that will be in the channel of the river, and a few years hence the Ottawa River will be unfit for navigation. We have also to consider the riparian rights of the people who live along the shores. Why protect one class of people and not others? I think all should be treated alike, and that the navigable rivers should be kept free from obstruction for the use of all people throughout the Dominion. Therefore, it is nothing but right that the destruction of the river should be stopped. If the government succeed in carrying this bill, I hope they will take steps to compel the mill-owners to do their duty to the public. The best plan for me to pursue is to give you the different stages of the question since 1888. The first action was taken in that year on the 7th May, when I moved an address for a copy of the report of Mr. Gray, the engineer, and asked whether it was the intention of the government to prevent the obstruction of the river by mill refuse. To that Mr. Abbott replied:

My hon. friend has put upon the paper a combined notice—notice of motion for an address and notice for a question, both comprised under the same head. I only call his attention to that; it is a little irregularity of which no one desires to take advantage. With regard to the report of Mr. Gray, he is a subordinate official of the department and he has made a report to the chief engineer, who has obtained other information besides that contained in Mr. Gray's report, and is preparing a careful report on the whole subject. The government have been giving very careful attention to this matter and think it of too much importance to be left entirely to the report of an official. They think it deserving of an inquiry by competent persons, with power to take what evidence may be required in that respect. For that purpose they have determined to ask this House to appoint a committee of its own members, skilled in such matters, as far as may be practicable to enquire into the effect of the deposit of slabs and saw-dust in the river and report on it to the House. I may tell my hon. friend that the law is amply sufficient for the prevention of such deposits. There has been some relaxation for a long time past under an Order in Council, because a good many difficulties exist in Ottawa as to the disposal of saw-dust. Where timber is sawn by steam-power the mills consume the saw-dust, and most mills have facilities for depositing it in the neighbourhood without incurring any great expense, but the Chaudière mills are peculiarly situated. They have no means of burning the mill refuse, nor have they any place which can be reached without considerable expense where saw-dust can be deposited. However, these facts only show that there are difficulties to be considered as well as the questions of removing the evils which exist. I shall move for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the matter.

The following day Mr. Abbott referred to the subject again :

With the permission of the House I am prepared to move for the committee, which I suggested yesterday, with respect to the saw-dust nuisance in the Ottawa. I may say that the session is so far advanced and the season is so far advanced that there is not much time to be lost. The government have power under the existing law to do what is needed and what will be done will depend largely upon the report of the proposed committee. I am prepared to move for the committee if the House is willing.

Then the committee was appointed and my hon. friend from Richmond presided as chairman at its meetings. A good deal of evidence was taken and when the report was brought in the House the hon. gentleman from Richmond said :

In moving the adoption of the report of this committee I do not think it will be necessary for me to occupy the time of the House for more than a few moments. The subject referred to is one of very great importance and it received careful attention from the committee from the time that we had at our disposal. I may state that the committee, composed of ten members of the House from different sections of the Dominion unanimously concurred in the report, and therefore it may be presumed that the report itself was, under the evidence given to us, the most judicious that we were in a position to make. It was found on evidence of the clearest character, that deposits of saw-dust and other mill refuse had been for many years past made in the Ottawa River, destroying largely the navigable passages of the river and also doing a very great deal of destruction to riparian rights of proprietors. The committee after having heard evidence on this point, from gentlemen of engineering skill and qualification, as well as from residents of Ottawa of large experience on the subject, had no hesitation in saying that a serious injury was being done to the river by these deposits of saw-dust and refuse, and that in course of time if the evil was not put an end to, the navigation of the river would be irretrievably destroyed. It was also found that these deposits, in many cases, were considered a dangerous menace to the health of the city, and on that ground also should in the future be prevented. The investigation of the committee also elicited the fact that sawdust and mill refuse could be very well utilized for various purposes and that the destruction of anything remaining for such purposes could easily be effected from the experience of other mills not only in Canada but in the United States as well. However, the large lumbering interest involved in the question referred to us was considered of such importance, not only to this district but also to the country generally, that the committee did not see their way to ask the government immediately to enforce the law in reference to saw-mills on the Ottawa River, but they do recommend that, as soon as practicable, the government having regard for the vast interests involved in this trade, would repeal the proclamation under which exemption is now granted to the mills at the Chaudière Falls and enforce thereafter strictly the provisions of the law. As I do not feel a local interest in the matter and as there were two gentlemen well qualified to speak on it on the committee and no doubt in addition to the general public importance, also feel a local interest in it who will require to address the House, it will not be necessary for me to detain you any further.

There was a good deal of discussion on that, and Mr. Abbott said :

As I expected when I moved for the appointment of the committee, their labours have proved to be of great importance ; and I have no doubt will be of great advantage to the government in forming an opinion as to what should be done to prevent injury to the navigable waters of the Ottawa, and to the health of the people residing along its banks. I shall call their attention to the report and to the evidence, not forgetting the points raised by the hon. gentleman from British Columbia and as soon as the prorogation of Parliament will give them the opportunity of doing so the subject will undoubtedly be taken up and careful consideration given to it. There is no doubt the interests at stake are very large indeed, and cannot be dealt with harshly and carelessly ; but there must be a solution found for the difficulties which this practice of depositing saw-dust in the river seems to cause. It cannot be allowed to continue if it is to result in the way which hon. gentlemen who have spoken describe, and which I think the report largely confirms. I was much pleased in reading the report to find the decided yet moderate tone in which it was couched. I perceive that the members of the committee have understood and considered the difficulties which attend the subject, and I think I can assure them that the recommendation they have given with its qualification will be carefully considered by the government.

Now, hon. gentlemen, there was a preliminary step taken. I shall read some of the evidence produced before that committee, facts of such a character as will convey to every hon. gentleman's mind an idea of the injustice which has been done to this section for a great many years. They were gentlemen holding various positions, among them the mechanical engineer of the government, the superintendent of the Rideau canal, and others, old residents occupying conspicuous positions, who were well acquainted with the river in a variety of ways. Their testimony is given in such a manner as will bring conviction to the mind of any one that they were stating the truth, and nothing but the truth. First, we have Henry Gray, who was an engineer of the government. He appeared before the committee, and had plans and profiles and had bottles of samples of the deposit taken from different places, and he very minutely described the condition of the various parts. Mr. Gray, after giving particulars of the various sections, continued :
