It has been a very difficult matter to obtain reliable information from any outside sources with respect to the amount of damages consequent upon the dumping in of the saw-dust and mill refuse into the Ottawa River. When asking information I have found reluctance on the part of the mill-owners to give answers which might be used against their interests. Mill-owners who do not place their saw-dust and mill refuse in the river did not wish to have their names mentioned as giving information against those who do. Merchants, shippers, traders and others, living in and near Ottawa, are so dependent upon the mill-owners and lumbermen that they declined to give information, except in a few cases.

It will thus be seen that what with the above and the fact that in the Public Works Department we have no record of any former examination or survey that would give me data for comparison, it is impossible for me to state the extent of damage done to the river from the saw-dust and refuse.

That millions of saw-dust and mill refuse fill the bays and creeks and cover the shores of the Ottawa River, gradually encroaching upon the channel, and in many places obstructing navigation, cannot be denied.

Some idea of the quantity of saw-dust deposit in the river may be formed from the following official return of last year's business of the Chaudière mills :

	Feet, B.M.
Bronson & Weston.....	65,000,000
J. R. Booth.....	70,000,000
E. B. Eddy & Co.....	69,000,000
Perley & Pattee.....	70,000,000
Hurdman & Co.....	56,000,000
Grier & Co.....	35,000,000
Total.....	365,000,000

This return is said to be some 15 per cent under the amount of previous years. It is estimated that at least one-eighth of the amount of material cut is saw-dust. Now, taking the above figures, we find 365,000,000 feet B.M. equals 4,380,000 cubic inches, equal to 2,534,722 cubic feet or 93,878, cubic yards; allowing that more is cut from the log than returned as feet B.M., and also that the above return is 15 per cent under the amount of former years, then at least 100,000 cubic yards is the output, and one-eighth of this means 12,500 cubic yards of saw-dust alone deposited into the Ottawa River every year from the Chaudière mills from the process of cutting up the logs.

The above is only saw-dust. To this must be added slabs and edgings. Much of the slab wood is broken up by "hogging" machines and this increases its damaging effect upon navigation, this operation causing it to be the sooner water-logged and consequently to sink. If the stuff was allowed to go into the river as slabs it would be picked up for firewood; now it is useless and sinks to the bottom, forming with the other material a mattress, which, in course of time, cannot be broken up or lifted by dredging. This difficulty was, I am informed, met with at the mouth of the Gatineau River.

There are lath and other machines dumping the saw-dust from year to year into the river.

It is no uncommon occurrence for explosions to take place in the gas generated from the saw-dust. In January last an explosion took place opposite the Rideau River and broke up the ice, bringing from the bed of the river a large amount of mill refuse. Another explosion took place on the night of the 11th April, and ice 14 inches thick covering an area of 1,500 feet was thrown up and broken into small pieces.

To remove the saw-dust and mill refuse from the river, or a portion of same, by dredging, is a most difficult problem to solve. Where it is loose a dredge bucket cannot pick it up, and where it has become matted together it would have to be cut or separated by explosives before being dredged. But even if it were easy to be taken out of the river where could it be deposited?

By Hon. Mr. Scott :

Q. Have you had any experience as to the effect of saw-dust in other localities?—A. No.

Q. I understood that you had made some examination at Spanish River?—A. I received some information when I was making inquiries respecting the river here. I was in Collingwood some little time ago and a gentleman there told me that at Spanish River, Byng Inlet and Serpent River, where they have large mills they found it almost impossible to work them. The men after going there took typhoid fever and the doctors in the vicinity say that it is attributable to the gasses arising from the decomposed saw-dust. If you take a stake and push it down through three or four feet of water just below Kettle Island, and pull it up quickly you will see the gas bubbling up, and the smell arising from where we took the boring was something unbearable at times.

By Hon. Mr. Clemow :

Q. Have any of these samples been analysed?—A. No.

Q. Are you aware of any method of destroying the saw-dust?—A. No.

Q. Do you know of any mechanical means by which it could be utilized or burnt?—A. It is burnt at other mills. At Mr. Edwards's mills and on the South Nation River it is burnt, and I have seen all the mill refuse burnt at the mills at Midland, Waubashene, Penetanguishene and other places.

Q. At Edwards's mills they consume all the saw-dust?—A. Yes, and at the mills on the South Nation River.

Q. Do you think that the hogging machine is a detriment rather than an advantage?—A. I do, most decidedly.

Q. Some years ago it was considered an advantage?—A. It is no advantage. The wood being broken up, of course it becomes water-logged quicker and sinks to the bottom where it becomes a perfect mattress.

Q. I suppose in course of time, when these bays are filled up, the refuse most naturally goes into the channel?—A. There is no other place for it to go.

Q. Ultimately the whole channel must be filled up?—A. In a few years' time there would be no navigation of the river.

Q. I understand that the water was very low last year?—A. Yes, very low—four feet ten inches above the sill at the lower lock of the Rideau Canal.

Q. You had an opportunity of judging of the character of that saw-dust and you say that the smell emanating from it was so obnoxious that you could hardly stand it?—A. It was very obnoxious.

Q. And injurious to health?—A. Yes, I know the effect it had on myself.

Q. You can speak of it from your personal experience?—A. Yes. When our boring tools would come up, the sickening smell would be so great that at times I had to go to the stern of the vessel.

Q. Then you became actually ill?—A. Yes.

Q. Had it the same effect on others?—A. Some of the men on board suffered the same way.

Now here is another gentleman, Mr. Brophy who was employed by the government on this place for a great many years and has charge of the works above Ottawa:

Q. How long has he been employed in the department?—A. Since 1873.

Q. Before the mills were erected?—A. No, since then.

Q. You know nothing as to the river prior to the erection of the mills?—A. No.

Q. You have examined the river from time to time, I believe?—A. Yes, I have been up and down the river pretty often.

Q. Have you observed the effect of the saw-dust?

—A. I think the saw-dust and mill refuse are constantly accumulating and encroaching on the river channel. I have never made any survey as Mr. Gray has done, but I know from my own observation that the mill refuse has accumulated at certain points.

Q. Will you speak as to these points?—A. For instance, in these bays that Mr. Gray speaks of—McKay's Bay, and Black Bay further down, and all on that side of the river, I know the saw-dust is accumulating constantly, and it is accumulating in the Gatineau around the government booms. In 1874 we had to put dredges on to dredge out a channel. We found a very large quantity of saw-dust and this stuff from the hogging machines and slabs, all interlaced and very difficult to move. So much so that in many places we have to turn the dredge around and just force the stuff up to the side and let it remain there.

Q. At the entrance to the locks, you understand about the accumulation there?—A. Yes.

Q. From your observation there is a great deal of accumulation of saw-dust and refuse lessening the depth of the water in those places that you mention?—A. Yes; at one particular point I had charge of the dredging one year—I think it was in 1876—across Green Shoals, and we found the saw-dust and slabs all interlaced there with the layers of sand as we did the dredging—that was about 4 or 5 feet down—and the pilots at that time and the boatmen all said that the saw-dust and slabs were accumulating gradually and closing up the channels. There was undoubted proof of it there at that particular place, because we had to dredge it out.

Q. What place is that?—A. Below Kettle Island—Way's Shoals.

By Hon. Mr. Clemow:

Q. Is the channel shallow at that point?—A. No; but it had filled up. The pilots on the boats at that time claimed that it had filled up there and they could not use it, and they crossed to the north channel, but they preferred the other, and we dredged it out.

Q. They could not use that channel?—A. They could not use it until it was dredged out.

Q. Have you noticed those offensive gases that Mr. Gray spoke of?—A. Yes, I have often noticed that when boating, and when we were dredging it was unendurable. The refuse will often come up almost dry and moulding.

Q. You know that there was a great deal of sickness here last fall?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know that it was attributed to the gases coming from the decomposed saw-dust?—A. There have been a great many theories about that.

Q. In boating on the river have you observed this gas rising?—A. Yes, I have seen the explosions, as they call them.

Q. And when not boating you have observed the odour of the gas?—A. Yes, when dredging.

Q. If you were near one of those explosions, such as you have seen, would you be in danger?—A. I have never seen but one that would upset a small boat; that was at the foot of that island, but the smell is unbearable.

Q. Mr. Arnoldi said yesterday that he had seen explosions that would destroy the "Peerless" if one of them had occurred when she was passing over it?—A. I have no doubt of it.

Now I will give you the evidence of Mr. Arnoldi, late engineer of the Public Works Department, whose business it was to navigate this river for many years—a man well skilled in navigation and a competent authority. He gives us information which I think will be satisfactorily received by this House:

Q. You are mechanical engineer of the Public Works Department?—A. Yes, and I am also superintendent of dredging for Ontario and Quebec.

Q. You are well acquainted with the Ottawa River?—A. Yes; I have been travelling on the Ottawa on the dredging service since 1879, and before that on my own account as well.

Q. Can you give us your experience with reference to this river from the time you first knew it up to the present time? You were here before the mills were erected?—A. No, not before, exactly. I have been residing in Ottawa since the year 1866; from the year 1869 I have been living on the Ottawa front, in the proximity of Rear Street, commanding a full view of the river, and since 1873 I have been living on the very brink of the river. When I first knew the river, the portion where the water works now discharges, what was called Cockburn Bay in olden times, it was in its natural state—mud to the water's edge, and a resort for pleasure excursions, row boats, picnics and things of that kind. There was no possible obstruction at that time to the free navigation of the river for small boats.

Q. Was that below the falls?—A. Yes, below the falls. It is what is called Cockburn Bay. There was no obstruction to small boats in any shape or form, and this clear water navigation extended all the way up Bingham's Creek to the rapids, and the place now called Ratté's boathouse was also a great resort for small boats, and I never saw any difficulty in using any of those places for boats to go in and out of.

By the Hon. Mr. Botsford :

Q. Please explain where Ratté's boat-house is?—A. It is the bay where the "Peerless" wharf is. It is the eastern edge of Major's Hill. From the year 1866 the obstruction there from saw-dust and mill refuse has been gradually increasing, until it is now almost impossible to navigate that bay in a small boat, and I am under the firm belief that this obstruction extends almost the whole way down the river, cropping gradually into all the bays. Of late years I have had more to do with deep craft boats, like tugs and dredges. I have the management of all the Government dredges, and we have had sometimes great difficulty in getting over the bars in the river from want of water, especially at the Blanche, opposite Rockcliffe. In the vicinity of Rockcliffe, and down to the mouth of the Lièvre, there are very large deposits of mill refuse. I might give you a kind of recital of what I know merely in a casual way, because I have never made a special soundings of the river. I am speaking as a navigator. Do not confound my evidence in any way with a report or examination which has recently been made from a civil engineering point of view. At the foot of what is called Pine Tree Island, as well as I can find out from inquiry, at the time of the survey by Mr. Walter Shanly, I think it was in 1859, it was reported to me that there was 39 feet of water below that island; and in the year 1866 a shoal of saw-dust and mill refuse stood out of the water on that same spot, probably 4 feet.

By the Chairman :

Q. At what season of the year?—A. It does not make any matter what season of the year or condition of the river; because you take the maximum depth of water 39 feet.

Q. Was it at high water?—A. The information I had in 1859 was that there was 39 feet of water there in high water. I am giving that 39 feet as the best information I could get about it. At the low water in 1866, as near as I could calculate the thing, a shoal of mill refuse was standing out from two to four feet above the low water level and this extended I think fully six or seven hundred feet down stream from the island with a proportionate width. This was a sufficient obstruction to navigation that many boats grounded on it. The least carelessness in following their channel would ground a vessel on that shoal. I was on it myself, Mr. Gilmour's yacht was on it, and other vessels plying on the river have been on it.

Q. Did the island cause accumulation at that point?—A. I ascribe this accumulation as being formed by the strong current coming down in high water and washing out the bays in the vicinity. Wherever you have an island or any obstruction in a rapid current it forms an eddy and the refuse settles in the dead water. In the year 1887 at low water, it was very much lower than in 1886, I think it was the lowest water we have had for forty years—this shoal had practically disappeared from observation. I did not run over the ground as I was very busy, but I think the greater portion of the shoal had entirely disappeared to a certain limit of depth showing that the mill refuse is not permanent when it forms a shoal—that it will move according to the state of the water and finds other localities to deposit itself in. I am also aware that the bay at the mouth of the Rideau Canal between Major's Hill and Barrack's Hill is so filled with mill debris that it is almost impossible to navigate there at a low water. It is a positive obstruction and the material is of such a nature that it cannot be removed by ordinary dredging plant. Special appliances will have to be constructed to remove that deposit or any other deposit of mill refuse.

Q. You say it cannot be removed by ordinary dredging plant?—A. No, you have got to have special arrangements, because a dredging tug has just a big scoop and there is teeth in it for hard packing, and if you put that down into mill refuse and it comes against a slab it is stuffed and sticks on the teeth. Then when you start it again and get the stuff into a bucket you cannot dump it. It will be a scientific problem how to take that stuff out. Another difficulty which will be attendant on the removal of this mill refuse, differing from the ordinary dredging in the channel of a river, is in the dredging of ordinary earth in clay or gravel or such natural deposits, you can dump it into scows or you can throw it on the banks if you are near enough to do it, and that is the end of it. In regard to working it by scows the scows when loaded are towed off to deep water and emptied there, forming no obstruction to navigation; whereas in the case of mill refuse it has all got to be taken ashore somewhere, and an apparatus constructed for burning it, which is going to be a very expensive operation. It will take some time to dry the material to such a condition as will allow it to be burnt. Further than that, in a river like the Ottawa where you get high freshets there is a great deal of sand and silt, and ground up gravel and one thing and another which gets mixed with the saw dust and which prevents it from being of a very combustible nature. In fact I see no way at all to get the stuff lifted from the bottom or getting rid of it except by this burning process or by carting it into valleys or gulleys. It has to be handled on shore. It cannot be got rid of in the water by dredging. I should estimate the cost of handling, that by the time you are finished with it at ten times the amount of ordinary dredging. A year ago, and also three years ago the navigation of the River Gatineau within a mile of the mouth where it adjoins the Ottawa was so obstructed that barges loading at Gilmour's mills could not be taken either up or down. They could be taken up light, but the tow boat that had to take them could not go and bring them down loaded from the piling grounds. Consequently, the Department of Public Works had to dredge there on both those occasions to open a passage for the lumber trade.

By Honorable Mr. Botsford :

Q. Were those obstructions caused by the refuse from the mills above here? A. I am coming right to that. In the course of the progress of this dredging I frequently examined the material taken from the bottom, and I find it to be a mixture of ground granite and sand and sawdust, &c., from the mills. I showed it to Mr. Gilmour, one of the applicants for the dredging, as he was the only one interested in this navigation, and he had to acknowledge that there was a good deal of mill stuff in it. These obstructions without any doubt at all, are merely and purely from the mills above on the Gatineau. Of course it must be admitted at the same time that a raging torrent, such as the Gatineau is, for miles and miles brings down boulders with the ice, and they grind against each other and make the most beautiful sand in the world. For building sand it could not be excelled. No doubt a great deal of that is attributable to the spring freshets coming through this every rapid river.

Q. Mixed with sawdust? A. Yes, to a certain extent. In some places we would get pure sand and then the next yard or so we would get on to a mixture of sand and sawdust.

Q. That came down from Gilmour's mills? A. Certainly.

Q. Do they grind their slabs there? A. I think they put them through the "hog." Any observer going up the Gatineau River just above the railway bridge—a few hundred feet or so, will see a large shoal right in the middle of the river extending probably four or five feet over the level of the water composed entirely of mill refuse. There is a channel on either side and in the middle is this great amount of mill refuse. It includes also stumps and roots and sticks and one thing and another, and keeps enlarging year by year. In all rivers where there is a flow of silt and freshets if you stick a walking stick into the channel the silt will form a shoal in a few days. Near the mouth of the Gatineau there are a large number of piers for tying booms to, and beyond everyone of those piers you will see a large shoal just as I explained just now in the eddy of the current. I have seen ten or twelve feet of water right along on one side of the pier and by going around to the other edge of it you would find a shoal dry out of the water. Of course the great argument with the lumber men is that the main channel of the river is not obstructed by sawdust. I will admit that to a very great extent but that is not the question. That is their way of defending themselves but it does not settle the question at all. You take a river indented with bays along its banks. The great stream runs down the centre. As the water runs it carries with it in a floating state the silt, sand, sawdust and mill refuse. Of course they will not stand in the main channel. They slide off into the bays where the current forms an eddy. In some of those bays you will find 20 or 30 feet of silt and sawdust. Therefore the reason why the channel is getting shallower on the whole route on the river is because the sawdust and mill refuse has taken up the space that nature provides for the silt to settle in. The sand being heavier than the sawdust it remains in the bottom of the channel and the sawdust floats into the bays where it sinks. The main channel is thus obstructed by the natural silt of the river because the sawdust fills the place that nature intended for the silt to be deposited in.

Q. When the bays get all filled up with sawdust what will become of this other stuff? A. It is lodging in the channel now. The bays are nearly filled with mill refuse now. You ask me what will become of the river after the bays are all filled up. I believe that after the bays are all filled up the river will become a sort of road bed for a railway or something of that kind—it will not be navigable. The lumbermen will tell you plainly that there is nothing in the channel and they are quite right. The mill refuse will not stay there; but the river from the time you leave Ottawa until you reach Grenville is interspersed with islands and the consequence is the water is thrown from one side to the other forming eddies into which the sawdust is gathered and it is filling up all the little bays. There is a very large shoal at the mouth of the Lièvre where it was once deep water and now you cannot run a skiff in. Below Government House here at the city the square timber men used to band up the rafts in the bays; now there is about thirty feet of sawdust there standing out of the water. The bays all the way down are filled in that way. When you ascend the Lièvre River a few miles, and at Buckingham there are large mills, the refuse from which is thrown into the river. Then when you get down to Petite Nation you find the Edwards mills; and they burn to a certain extent their refuse and are doing very fairly. At North Nation there is a bay there, also a mill, and when you get to Montebello there are mills again on both sides of the river, all contributing their share to the refuse that is filling up the bays. At the mouth of the South Nation we had to dredge last summer on a shoal of this stuff. We have also had to dredge the mouth of the Salmon River, three miles below the Montebello River to let cordwood barges in. I admit that we dredge sand there, but the shoal is the result of the natural bays of the river being taken up by sawdust and slabs. When you get down to L'Original wharf there is about six miles of a run there, and if you do not keep the lights exactly right you will surely go ashore. The shoals in the channels there are pure sand, and there is where the natural freshet silt is coming to, it is coming down the channel and depositing itself in the middle of the river instead of going into its natural receptacle, the bays. You might have that sand shoaled there without a mill on the river however.

Another large shoal has formed in front of the Grenville Canal, and you have to hug the north shore very closely through a narrow channel to get into the canal. That shoal is pure sand, but it is formed there to a great extent by not having any chance to be deposited elsewhere, the bays having been filled up with sawdust.

By Hon. Mr. Botsford :

Q. Then, according to that, if there were no mills on the river, the silt would fill up all those bays which are now filled with saw-dust?—A. Yes, but that would take centuries.

By the Chairman :

Q. And there would be no difficulty in dredging it?—A. No, an ordinary dredge such as the government use will lift all sand or mud such as the Ottawa river is composed of, from 400 to 700 cubic yards per day. Now, if she took out of that saw-dust 100 yards a day, I think she would be doing very well. The first cost would be, a tug could only do 20 per cent of what she could do in ordinary dredging; then the next cost is that it is almost impossible to get rid of this saw-dust and mill refuse after you have it dredged. It would have to be thrown into scows, and carted on shore and dried and burned, or filled into gullies, which would cause an enormous amount of handling. Right in the middle of Cockburn's Bay here below the city, the shoal stands right out of the water now. It is right in front of my own house, and I see there is another shoal which has been forming for years on the opposite side of the river, which is also appearing above the water.

Q. You think if no steps were taken to provide a remedy, the evil will go on increasing until the river becomes useless?—A. The channel will become so contracted that it will not be navigable. Of course when you shut the channel of a river up it will begin to scour and find another channel. The channel will frequently change like in the Mississippi, and the shoals will shift from one place to another. The floating refuse as it appears to the eye on the surface of the water, all depends upon the wind as to which direction it will take. It may be all on the north shore for perhaps a week or a fortnight, and the wind will turn to either north or north-west, and it will blow it all to the south side, and a certain proportion of it is carried down the middle of the river to some of the shoals or bays.

Q. Is there any difficulty in getting rid of the saw-dust at the mills without throwing it into the river?—A. There is no mechanical difficulty at all in providing means for getting rid of saw-dust. The fact of the sunken saw dust and mill refuse being a permanent obstruction wherever it is deposited in the river, is well known. The late Horace Merrill, superintendent of the Ottawa River Works in his lifetime, and who had as much experience on the river as most men have had, told me that he had dug up saw-dust it had been down forty years, without the slightest sign of rot in it. From my own personal observation, in dredging at Shannonville, I have seen the dredge take up saw-dust from the bar at the mouth of the river, although a saw mill had not been on the river for thirty years. Before retiring from this part of my duty, I want to put in something that perhaps has not struck anybody as being important, and which I consider to be one of the most important facts against the saw-dust nuisance that has ever been brought to notice. As I have told you, I live right over the cliff, and from my own window while dressing, I can see the barges and the cribs and the saw-dust and refuse coming down. Now, a thing that demands the most serious attention, perhaps more serious than anything else is the danger that is arising from the saw-dust deposits. These piles of saw-dust in the bottom of the river generate a gas which produce explosions by which the "Peerless" might be broken to atoms. I have seen three explosions a week occur in front of my own house. I have seen a barge thrown clear up on top of the water by an explosion of this kind in front of my house. In proof of the danger of these explosions there is a shipyard on the Hull side, opposite the steamboat wharf, and in the course of my duties I have used that ship-yard for wintering government vessels. About four or five years ago, during the winter, when the ice was a couple of feet thick, I crossed over to Hull by the regular main road across the ice, say on Thursday, and the very next day, in the middle of the river, the whole of that ice was blown up for about two acres—broken into atoms, right over the very route the steamer comes when coming in with her passengers. These explosions you may have at any moment on the river. Now, to continue the statement about the ice, the broken ice froze together again solid, and within a week or ten days it blew up again in the same place. That is the most extraordinary part of it. One would have thought that the gas had been got rid of by the first explosion, but such was not the case. I apprehend that some very serious accident will arise from these spontaneous explosions. I cannot say how far down the river these explosions occur, but I know that from the proximity of the Queen's Wharf to the discharge from the city water-works, they may be expected at any moment, at any hour of the day, or any season of the year, but probably most in summer. You can imagine yourselves what a tremendous deposit there must be from those mills. I think that it is the most serious aspect of the whole thing. Of course, from the obstruction of the river is a commercial loss, but the danger of life is still more serious. The stench that arises from the river after those explosions is terrible. It comes from the fermentation of this mass of organic matter. Of course, the Ottawa water contains a large amount of vegetable and chemical matter in suspension, and when it is deposited with the saw-dust and other refuse, the fermentation of the mass creates this gas. There is another point worthy of consideration. Every steamboat that navigates the river has to take its supply of water for the boiler from below the water line. They put in a pipe with a rose at the end to prevent any foreign material from entering the pipe, but it is with the greatest difficulty they keep their pumps in working order in the vicinity of Ottawa, owing to the saw-dust. In navigating the Ottawa myself, I have always to run outside of the floating sawdust to avoid getting the pumps choked. Sometimes in navigating the river it is like going through porridge from 6 inches to a foot thick, according to the pressure of the wind. Sometimes you have got to go through it; you cannot avoid it, because the water is so shallow outside of the channel.

Then Robert Surtees, city engineer of the city of Ottawa was called and states :

Q. You are city engineer of this city?—A. I am water works engineer at present. I have been city engineer for the past twelve years.

Q. How long have you lived in this part of the country?—A. About twenty-eight years in New Edinburgh and Ottawa.

Q. Will you be kind enough to give the committee any information you have respecting this saw-dust matter commencing at the time you first knew the river and following it up?—A. There are only certain parts of the river I am acquainted with. There is the second bay below New Edinburgh that I know most about. I made a survey of that river front for the Mackay estate twenty-eight years ago, and I remember that bay distinctly, that there were the ordinary water plants and growth along the bay—it was in its natural state and with a good depth of water in it. I do not know what the depth of the deposit of sawdust there is now, but I know that the bay is filled up to the line between two points, and there is a very large accumulation. There is an eddy which works up towards the Rideau Falls above that and I know that that is being rapidly filling up also. I know that opposite the mills in New Edinburgh boats used to come in there at all stages of the water without difficulty, and I now believe at low water it is very difficult for them to come in at all.

Q. You have seen the deposit of saw-dust at the foot of the locks?—A. Yes, I remember a few years ago that boats could not get in there on account of the saw-dust and it had to be dredged out.

Q. Does that trouble prevail at the present time?—A. Yes, all the time, especially with prevailing west winds when the saw-dust is blown in there in immense quantities.

Q. Has it had any effect on the water?—A. As you are aware we have had difficulty in connection with the recent epidemic of typhoid fever and we have had analyses made of the water and the analysts all agree that it came from pollution of the water by organic matter, bark, saw-dust and sewage. Apart from that the water is pure.

Q. You give this as your opinion as manager of the waterworks?—A. Yes.

Q. Twenty-eight years ago was there good fishing in the river?—A. Yes, splendid fish.

Q. What kind of fish?—A. Pickerel principally.

Q. How is it now?—A. It is about five years ago since I fished below the Rideau Falls and I did not get any there. I used often to get a dozen in the evening in the first bay when I lived below New Edinburgh.

Q. What size do the pickerel grow here?—A. I have got them three pounds in weight, but they are generally from 6 to 9 inches in length. You very seldom get them large. I have seen maskinonge caught below the falls some years ago, and pike.

Q. Do you know the river from the Ottawa down to the mouth of the Gatineau?—A. Yes; I see that the island opposite Bank Street has been extended down the river some hundreds of feet by sawdust, and the channel between the island and the Quebec side is all blocked up compared with what is used to be.

Q. Have you noticed the large amount of saw-dust and refuse opposite the mill which used to be owned by Batson & Currier?—A. Yes, that is the channel I speak of. It is all filled up. That is the island opposite Bank Street.

Q. From a sanitary point of view, what is your opinion of the effect of this saw-dust being thrown in the river?—A. I do not think it can be good. I think it would be a scientific question for analysts. I know the smell of it is bad. We have not got it quite as bad above as it is below.

Q. Can you give us any idea as to the best means of getting rid of these accumulations and preventing further obstructions of the same kind?

—A. There would be no difficulty in burning the refuse.

Q. But as to the present deposit?—A. That is another matter. It is quite a problem what to do with it. It is not dry enough to burn. You cannot take it up the same as sand; it would require special appliances to dredge it. I saw the difficulty they had in dealing with it at the foot of the locks. They had to get a special arrangement to pull it out into the current and let it float away. Of course that would go to some other place further down the river. They tried to take up the stuff but they could not dredge it.

Q. I presume it could be done?—A. Yes, it could be done, but it would cost a good deal of money.

Q. Are you aware of any means which could be adopted to prevent further depositing of saw-dust and mill refuse in the river?—A. It could be burnt as it comes from the saws in the mills.

Q. Without incurring vast expense?—A. Yes, without incurring a very large expense. I know three miles down the river which make steam with the saw-dust.

Q. Gilmour's mills, Batson & Currier's and others consumed the sawdust in that way?—A. Yes, they never bought any other fuel; they made the steam from the refuse.

Q. But in the case of water mills they would not do so?—A. They would require a special appliance to burn the saw-dust and refuse. They would require a furnace like the one down at Rockland.

Q. Is there anything else that you wish to state to the committee?—A. I noticed an explosion which occurred during the winter on the ice road from the Queen's wharf over to the Quebec side. It occurred during the night and blew up 50 or 60 square feet on the ice right on the road. If there had been any teams there lives would have been lost.

Q. You did not see it yourself?—A. No, it occurred during the night, but I saw the place the morning and the ice was all broken and sawdust was scattered all round on ice.

Q. The explosion was the result of accumulation of gas?—A. Yes, I have often seen the gas escaping down opposite New Edinburgh in that part of the river.

Here is the evidence of Mr. Lett, who was city clerk for many years, and a great sportsman. He spent most of his leisure hours in fishing, and his evidence is valuable. It is as follows:

Q. You were here before the construction of these mills at the Chaudière?—A. Yes; I was here when there was only one single upright saw.

Q. And you have been on the river a good deal during that time?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you give us your experience of the river before the construction of the saw-mills and since?—

A. The navigation was never obstructed in any particular before the construction of the mills. Out here where this big bed of saw-dust is now, after you got a little bit from the island, there was 30 to 40 feet of water all the way down, I know that positively, having fished there, from the length of rope I used to have for an anchor. At the foot of the locks, as soon as the deposits of mill refuse unite with the bed of saw-dust in the eddy, the navigation of the canal will be completely blocked. That will be within five years, I think at the outside. I may say at the commencement that I have read Mr. John Arnold's evidence very carefully, and Mr. Gray's evidence, both of whom have had good opportunities of knowing all about it, and I corroborate all that they have stated to the committee. They have touched nearly every point that I could touch myself.

Q. You can state your general knowledge of the river before the mills were erected and what you know of it now at different points?—A. The saw-dust is filling up all the bays and eddies and little channels between the islands all down the river, and it very much obstructs the usefulness of the river. The consequence is that in very high water the low lands on the north side of the river between here and Grenville are overflowed some two or three feet every year more than it used to be before the obstruction of the river—the meadow lands and lands of that kind. I did not notice until last summer that a large island was formed in the river just on the other side. I went up there in a canoe one day last spring and discovered this island that I had never seen before. I went over to it and found that it was formed of blocks, edgings, saw-dust and other mill refuse. It seems to me that that island before five years will close in right up against the dock on the far side, and they cannot take a barge there at all. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that unless some remedy is discovered, and that very soon, no steamboat in low water—no tug boat or boat the size of the "Peerless," ten years from now, will be able to go to Grenville at all. It is a difficult matter now in low water.

Q. You used to fish in the river in your early days?—A. Yes, it was one of the best rivers for fish that I know of. Every eddy was full of fish. The fish is a matter of some importance, though it is of little consideration now.

Q. Were there and salmon in the river?—A. No, but there were pickerel, pike, black bass and a great many maskinongé.

Q. Are there any fish in the river above here?—A. Yes, up at the Des Chênes Lake, at the Britannia Rapids, a great many fish are caught still. I live on the bank of the river near New Edinburgh, and there is a little eddy between the corner where Sir John Macdonald's house is and the dock of McLaren's mills: I never had to go further than that to catch fish. I could catch any number that I wanted during the lawful season; now you might fish there for a week and perhaps would not catch two. There were very fine black bass in the river. Over at the north side of the river, where the tall chimney stands, you could catch as many black bass as you wish before the fish were fished out, and while the river was clear. The bottom of the river is covered with saw-dust, and the pickerel, which is a ground fish, and was the principal fish in the river could not remain. It has disappeared. It must have sand, earth or gravel.

Q. The people had sufficient in those days to supply them?—A. It was a matter of very great importance to the people. I suppose there were sixty or seventy thousand people living between here and the confluence of the Ottawa with the St. Lawrence—there are fifty thousand adults at any rate, besides the children and the fish they caught and benefited by would be worth $2 for each adult for the year over and above what is now, when the river was in good condition.

Q. That is a loss of $100,000 a year alone?—A. Yes, although it is smallest consideration in this matter. The maskinongé is the best fish in the river, or in any, except the salmon.

It is an immense fish and the very best fish. About the gas explosions I have noticed them more particularly when the water gets a little lower than usual. I go out in the canoe every day I can get out after 6 o'clock and spend the time until dark on the river. The gas explosions occur in every part of the river between the Chaudière Falls and Gatineau Point and below that. I have seen the saw-dust rise and the river rise too. The highest one I ever saw was 3 feet, out in the open river, and the saw-dust would spread all out for a circle for at least 100 to 200 feet, and the water would seem as if it were mixed up with mill refuse.

Q. Would there be any danger to your boat?—A. If you were crossing in a small canoe when one of the largest explosions took place, it might possibly upset; with any kind of a good boat it would not. I remember the explosion under the ice which Mr. Surtees referred to. I saw the fragments of the ice lying over the surface of the river next morning. Mr. Henderson told me that there was one of the same kind last year opposite McLaren's mills. The extent of it I do not know. The bay spoken of by Mr. Surtees, called McKay's Bay—at least we call it the Second Bay—is filling with saw-dust. I suppose there must be at least 20 or 30 feet of saw-dust deposited there now. It was one of the most beautiful eddies on the river before it was filled with saw-dust.

Q. I suppose there is refuse of other kinds as well?—A. Yes, mill refuse of all kinds—slabs, sawdust, blocks, &c. Another consideration—I suppose the least of all—is the right that every man has to the free and unobstructed use of that river, even in small boats. The small boat has a right, a minor right of course, as well as the big steamer, and every man that lives on the bank of the Ottawa, ought to have free and unobstructed use of that water as it ought to be, without being obstructed by refuse of any kind. I say so with great unwillingness because, I am disinclined to say a single word adverse to the great enterprise at this city, but I am here to state what I know about the subject.

Q. You say that the refuse from the mills interferes with the small boat navigation?—A. It is an intolerable nuisance to the small boats as it is to the large boats, such as propellers. The saw-dust gets in and does immense damage. It greatly interferes with the right of people to go out in small boats in the months of July, August and September, when the water is low and the current less than it is now; you get stuck then in the refuse. It would take half an hour to get from the shore to the middle of the river owing to the obstruction caused by the mill refuse.

Q. Have you seen those explosions that have been talked of?—A. Yes, I have seen six or seven of them in the same evening. They very often occur when the "Peerless" comes in. When the waves roll in we see the bursts of gas all over.

Q. Do you detect unpleasant gases when passing over the water in your boat—is there a smell from the water?—A. There is when a very large one comes up. You can smell not exactly an odour of turpentine, but a disagreeable smell; more particularly in the banks of saw-dust if you stir them up here and there—you get a very obnoxious smell.

Q. The water was very low there last year?—A. Very low.

Q. Did you observe the effect of the saw-dust during the time of low water—Did you observe any obnoxious odours from it?—A. I was not very much down where the saw-dust was. I was only once down the river; any distance, and I did not visit the banks until late in the fall when the water got cold, but I know that when the saw-dust is stirred up where it is in deep mounds near the islands, it has a very bad smell.

Q. Should this refuse be thrown into the river at all?—A. No; the nuisance is almost intolerable. Everyone who has got to use a large boat or a small boat of any kind on the river finds it a nuisance.

Q. You consider it an interference with a great public right—the free and unobstructed navigation of the river?—A. I do. It is the chief river of the fifth class, and it stands at the head. Certainly there is no more beautiful river on the continent of America of the same size. The eddies particularly are very beautiful, where very much pleasure was taken by those who had small boats. You cannot get into them with a boat in low water; it is only in high water that you can use them. What we call the Hospital Eddy—that is the name it is known by on account of the cholera hospital being located there in 1832—is completely obstructed with saw-dust. The saw-dust and refuse from the mills on the Gatineau do not come up here, of course, but they are equally destructive to the river with the materials thrown into the river from the mills here. The channel where they run the saw-logs out from Leamy's Lake is almost filled up with mill refuse, and they have to use horses and carts every summer to clean it out. They employ this means and take out hundreds of loads every summer where the channel has been filled up. The late Mr. Lyman Perkins one day made a calculation in my office of the amount of mill refuse cast into the river in one year—that is 15 years ago, and there are a great many more saws going now than there were then—and he clearly demonstrated that one-sixth of every log went into the river, and at that time there was a bulk of 850,000 solid logs thrown into the river every year in saw-dust, slabs and edgings.

Q. From the mills at the Chaudière?—A. Yes; from the mills at the Chaudière.

I now come to the evidence of another gentleman, Mr. Wise, who was a civil engineer and superintendent of the Rideau Canal for many years. He was a gentleman on whose evidence the utmost reliance could be placed. He testified as follows:

Q. You are the engineer in charge of the Rideau Canal?—A. I am.

Q. Will you give us any information you possess respecting this question?—A. The information I can chiefly give is what happens to the navigation at the entrance to the locks. I have been on the canal since 1872. In 1881 the accumulation got so bad that they had to stop navigation, and we had to spend $2,000 there in clearing out the entrance. We did it by a specially constructed machine. We dragged it forward by means of a machine like a big scraper between two barges. There was a windlass to lift it up when it got filled, and we drew it out to where there was about 40 feet of water.

Q. You put it in the water again?—A. Yes.

Q. To do harm elsewhere?—A. Yes. Last year we should have had to do the same thing, the entrance was so blocked up, but it was too late to do anything. Next year we will have to do the work if the water is at the same pitch as it was last year. In addition to that we had to dredge a channel 100 yards wide at the foot of the lock, but the refuse at the bottom came in from all sides.

Q. Fell into the cut?—A. Yes, fell into the cut. We had that place all clear then in 1881; now it is all filled up again.

Q. How was the canal in 1872 when you took charge of it?—A. I cannot tell—there was no complaint of it then. We did not pay any attention to it until the navigation was threatened with stoppage.

Q. And the obstruction to navigation is attributable to the mill refuse altogether?—A. Yes, altogether. It is so situated that a north-west wind blows it all into the bay, and it has no chance to get out.

Q. Have not the people who are interested in navigation remonstrated from time to time?—A. Yes.

Q. And you undertook the dredging?—A. Yes, but from 1881 to 1888 it has all filled up again, just the same as it was then.

Q. What was the material composed of that you took up, or carried out into the river?—A. The top part was mostly saw-dust, and then below it was slabs very closely compacted indeed. It was very hard to get the scoop to take it up. It seemed as you got down to get harder and harder. We found them about forty feet of water outside of that. The current sweeps around there, and, of course, it would take the saw-dust away to other places.

The next witness was a gentleman who occupied a farm a few miles down the river, and whose property was rendered valueless by the saw-dust. He was afraid to enter an action, because we all know the mill-owners will defend any action in the courts, and by their financial strength can ruin any poor man who attempts litigation against them. I will show you that in the case of Ratté, to whom the Minister of Agriculture has referred, the lumbermen applied to the legislature of Ontario to prevent an injunction being taken out against them. Ratte and this unfortunate farmer came before the committee to give evidence, and while we may not be able to afford them relief, they should at least command our sympathy, since they have been ruined by this nuisance which has been permitted to exist so long. Mr. Dunning's evidence was as follows:—

Q. You were here before the mills were erected at the Chaudière?—A. I have been back and forwards here for over 40 years.

Q. Give us your opinion about the river as it was then and as it has been since?—A. In those days, of course, there was no saw-dust to be seen. The shores were perfectly clean, the bays were all clean, and there was any depth of water where now they are all full of saw-dust.

Q. I suppose there was abundance of fish in the river then?—A. Yes, there were lots of fish, but, of course, there was not as large an amount of fish consumed then as now, but there was any quantity of them.

Q. Are there any fish now in the river?—A. Not so many now; they are a good deal scarcer.

Q. Could you give us any particulars respecting special places in the river where those obstructions are most noticeable?—A. What obstructs our operations most in running logs, is the refuse at Wright's slide and at the foot of the island here. For the last six years in the summer I have been here and the saw-dust is a good deal higher now than it was six years ago—much higher.

Q. Where do you work?—A. On the river.

Q. You ought to have a personal acquaintance with nearly all the points of obstruction on that portion of the river on which you worked?—A. I just got up the Quio and up the Gatineau as far as the Pêche, but the principal obstruction we meet is at the foot of the slide. Of course it becomes a nuisance when it gets mixed with our logs: it takes six more men than we would otherwise have. We do not want to tow it to the mills because it would sink and become an obstruction to us there.

I now come to the evidence of Ratté, who has been fighting the mill-owners for a number of years, and is a ruined man to-day. I presented a petition from him the other day, which I propose to read before I sit down, in order that the public may understand how little consideration these mill-owners deserve. They have no regard for anybody's rights. They ride rough-shod over every one, and want to own the whole country. This man Ratté had been engaged in the business of hiring boats for a number of years, and he carried it on successfully until his business was ruined by the saw-dust. Not only has his business been ruined, but lives have been lost through the accumulation of saw-dust about his boat-house. People have stepped on it thinking they had firm footing and have been drowned within a few feet of his boat-house. His evidence was as follows:

Q. How long have you lived here?—A. I have been over 47 years in Ottawa.

Q. You were here before any mills were erected at the Chaudière?—A. The only mill that was in Ottawa when I came here was a small mill run by Burwash.

Q. You have been on the river continuously since you came here to live?—A. Yes, I have been on the river every year.

Q. What was the condition of the river when you first knew it?—A. I have been a boat-keeper here for 38 years. Some of my boats would get scattered away from me and I would have to take a boat and hunt them up. I always found lots of water. I could go ashore any place at all. For the last six or seven years I have to portage the boat at a good many places and sometimes turn back and go round another way. All the bays are closed from Rockland up all the way to the Little Blanche. There is an eddy on the north side and from above Rockland until you get to that bay, between Laroque Island, I used to pass up between the island and the shore with a sail boat. You could not get a bark canoe through that channel now in low water. I tried to get through it with a boat drawing two and a half or three inches of water and could not get through. I had to turn back. That island is two and a half or three miles long and extends from Horseshoe Bay to Rockland. The next island is called Capt. Petrie's Island. I used to sail on the south side of that, between the island and the shore, but that is filled up too.

Q. What is it filled with?—A. With the material cut by the hog and saw-dust. In the old times when the mills first started they used to tow slabs into the river and sometimes three inch plank. If there was anything wrong at one end of them they would throw away the whole length. A good many of them floated into those channels and are there now. Then the material from the hogs filled in on the top of that. Petrie's Island is about two and a half miles long, and in summer in low water you can now walk across the channel where I used to sail up with little boats. The next big island is Kettle Island. Capt. Williams used to be captain of the "Shannon" and "Porcupine" and he used to run his steamers in the channel on the north side of Kettle Island. It was a good channel then. Now at low water we cannot pass through that channel with a bark canoe. A log will not float through it; the logs stop there. The saw-dust forms a crust on top of the water. Sometimes the wind blows in one direction for some days, and when the wind blows steadily from the north-west for eight or nine days it fills my bay with sawdust mill refuse so that you cannot get to the shore with a small boat. Captain Cook used to be captain of the "Maggie Bell," and one time he tried to start a boom of logs with a big tug boat to tow a boom down the river from Hospital Bay, where I live, but he could not start it, owing to the refuse on top of the water. He had to leave it there.

Q. How long ago is it since that happened?—A. That was six or seven years ago. I saw him from my door. Sometimes I am obliged to anchor a boat out in the middle of the stream and have a rope from my boathouse to that boat to draw the boats out through the mill refuse. They could not be rowed out at all. I have to pull them out that way for about an acre or an acre and a half from my boathouse. I have seen yachts try to land there but they could not get to the shore because of the accumulations of saw-dust.

Q. Did you know the bay when it was deeper? Was it deep before the saw-dust floated there?—A. About 250 yards from my boathouse there used to be 150 feet of water in low water. Mr. O'Neil and I went and inspected that place about five years ago and found only 14 feet of water. Some years the Ottawa rises about ten feet higher than other years, and when that occurs it shifts this mill refuse to other places. Sometimes it goes down the river. Between the Little Blanche and the Big Blanche, a distance of a mile, at one time there was no obstruction; now there is a bed of sawdust and sand, the current sometimes shifts that from one place to another.

Q. What depth of water is there in your bay now?—A. In my bay there is a strong eddy, and the saw-dust is carried into the middle of the bay. It forms a mound in the bottom of the river about 250 yards from the "Peerless" wharf. The water is deep enough where the current is strong. At the foot of the locks there was nothing but gravel in the bed of the river when the locks were built, but the saw-dust has been deposited there by the eddy and the accumulation is growing all the time, the same way as at my bay. Take the Little Island above the ferry. Some four years ago a measurement was taken there and they found that it was so high with saw-dust that it was exposed in low water, and would dry so that the wind would blow the dust from it. They found it hard and solid enough to build on it. Last year the water was very low, yet there was hardly any of that accumulation there, the current had moved it to some other place. Last summer the water was two feet four inches lower than it had ever been known before, yet I could not see any saw-dust at that place. The year before the water was between three and four feet higher yet the saw-dust bank for three or four feet above the surface, so it must have been moved to some other place by the current. I suppose a man ought to have a right to the use of the river with a little boat just as much as if he had a big boat, but I cannot find room for my boats owing to the quantities of saw-dust and material from the hogs that are carried into the bay where my boathouse is. I am quite sure that there is three times as much stuff from the hog as from the saws. If they must throw that stuff into the river it would be better to throw in the slabs and edgings whole, so the people could pick them up along the shores and use them for firewood.

Q. What was the state of the river when you first came here?—A. There was only Burwash's mill then. There was nothing but bush on the banks then. The river was clean. You could go along by the shore anywhere. There was nothing but clean banks and you could go into any bay or the mouth of every little creek, but if any man can find a creek that he could go into now I am willing to pay him something.

Q. Were there any fish then?—A. Yes. I knew a fellow that used to fish near the bridge and he would catch a barrel in an hour and a half. It was a great river for catfish at that time and bass too, but especially catfish.

Q. Were there pike and pickerel? A. Yes, plenty of pickerel.

Q. And maskinongé?—A. Yes, I remember a fellow catching a maskinongé that weighed 37 pounds. They were caught larger than that.

Q. Was there a large quantity of fish caught then?—A. A fellow could in ten or fifteen minutes catch as much as he could carry. Opposite my place was a good bay for fish, but now I can fish from morning till night and catch none.

Q. Have any accidents occurred at your place through people walking over the sawdust and thinking it the land?—A. Yes. I remember once a gentleman who had taken out a boat came in with it with a lot of black stuff in it. I thought it was sand. There had been a burst of saw-dust and enough was thrown up out of the water to fill his boat. My boathouse is hemmed in with saw-dust as tight as can be and strangers who are not acquainted with the river step on the saw-dust thinking it is a part of the boathouse.

Q. Have any fatal accidents occurred there? A. Yes.

Q. When?—A. Eight or nine years ago. A gentleman and two ladies came to the boathouse one time and the ladies disappeared. We could not tell where they had gone, and we found that they had stepped on the saw-dust and got drowned.

Q. Have you had any experience on the river, other than at the boathouse there, as a pilot, as to the depths of water along the river?—A. Yes, for forty-seven years. I have been on the river all the time for 47 years. Of course I know a great deal because I am hunting for row boats in the bays. As I kept boats for hire they sometimes used to be stolen from me, and I used to go to the little creeks and bays where they would hide my boats to hunt them up.

Q. So that the way in which you found this matter interfered with you I suppose has been practically as owner of a boathouse on the shore of the river?—A. Yes, the mill refuse has been filling in my bay.

At six o'clock the debate was adjourned until to-morrow.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WARK rose to—

Call attention to the unprofitable system of cultivating the soil so prevalent over much of this continent, and ask the Government whether the Experimental Farms, especially in the North-west might not be advantageously used in introducing valuable improvements in the system?

He said: The subject of keeping lands in a proper and fertile condition has engaged the attention of men of experience and practical men of all ages. We know what efforts British farmers make to keep up the fertility of their soil. They not only apply manure on the farm but they also apply lime, and they ransack the whole world for bones and go to the extent of carrying guano from the Peruvian Islands to the mother country to fertilize their fields. They wish to keep up the fertility of the soil so that an acre will not yield less than 30 bushels of wheat, and even at that rate they are unable to compete with foreign countries. They had a very able agricultural chemist 50 years ago, Professor Johnston, whose name was known on this side of the Atlantic before he came here himself. I saw in a newspaper in 1849 that he was about to come to this side of the Atlantic, to Nova Scotia. I was then a member of the House of Assembly of New Brunswick, and I moved an address to the Lieutenant Governor asking him to invite Professor Johnston to visit New Brunswick, which he did. At that time our people were so much engaged in timbering operations and fishing, that agriculture was neglected and it was not uncommon to hear people assert that New Brunswick was not an agricultural country. He was invited because we thought our province could make a good showing in agriculture. I am going to refer to what he said about the United States. He pointed out that at one time they cultivated wheat successfully in the New England States, that when they had exhausted the soil there the wheat growing district moved to New York. Then Ohio took the lead, and the New York farmers found it would be necessary to alter their system. He delivered a course of lectures before the legislature of New York and published a very interesting book called "Notes on America." I want to show the state of agriculture in the United States now so far as the cultivation of wheat is concerned. They have 47 states and territories. In 1893 they had an estimated area under the cultivation of wheat of 34,629,480 acres, an immense extent for one description of grain. The estimated produce of this vast area was 396,131,725 bushels. Now that gave an average of only  $11\frac{4}{10}$  bushels to the acre. Deducting the seed from that, it reduced the quantity which the cultivator had to dispose of down to a little less than 10 bushels. I dare say many of you will remember that when the production of gold fell off in California the cultivation of wheat began, and the land was found to be very productive, but in the year 1893, I find that in California the production had fallen to  $11\frac{4}{10}$  bushels, just what it was over the whole of the United States. They might have expected that. They went on ploughing and cropping year after year without manuring. They set up their threshing machines in the centre of a field and used a header to go round and cut the heads off the wheat and carry them to the mill, and they burned the straw and went on ploughing and seeding again without fertilizing the soil. I remember reading a little pamphlet published by an Englishman who went to Illinois when it was a new state. He described the fertility of the soil there as being almost inexhaustible. But now, Illinois produces only  $11\frac{5}{10}$  bushels to the acre. This exhaustion of the soil has spread over the whole of the United States and has rendered the profit of cultivating wheat undoubtedly very small. Coming to Ontario, I have taken the average of 17 years between 1868 and 1892, and I find the averages ranges, as shown by the statistics collected by the government, from  $11\frac{4}{10}$  bushels to  $27\frac{5}{10}$  bushels but taking it over the whole of Ontario, the average is  $18\frac{2}{10}\frac{5}{10}$ . The average of fall wheat is about 20 bushels, and of spring wheat about 15 bushels, but I have given the average of both. That is much better than the United States, but far below what the English farmer expects to derive from his labours. I took another plan of ascertaining what progress agriculture was making by referring to the exports. In 1867, reducing flour to wheat by multiplying barrels by four, I found we had exported that year 5,000,054 bushels, and we exported last year only 4,963,564 bushels, so that really in 20 years the exports increased only some 36,977 bushels, which does not show we are making much progress. I come now to the system of experiments that they have been making at the Agricultural Experimental Farm. On page 27 of the annual report they showed that they have experimented on 21 little plots of ground on the subject of manure. They have tried different kinds and different combinations of manure on those plots, and I will just call your attention to the results. A plot fertilized with barn-yard manure, well mixed, produced 25 bushels to the acre. Another experiment was with mineral phosphate, 500 pounds, and that acre produced only 12 bushels and 50 pounds. Another lot, No. 9, was manured with mineral phosphate, 350 pounds, and nitrate of soda, 200 pounds and that acre produced only 12 bushels and 10 pounds. Here, then, were two acres, manured with these minerals, which just produced no more than the one acre fertilized with manure from the barnyard. The conclusion come to by a very eminent agriculturalist who tried the experiment in England several years ago, and who had been engaged in experiments for several years, was that the best manure and the cheapest is manufactured on the farm. Now, I think that is the experience of most people. I ought to remark, in connection with those experiments, that number five on this page produced from land unmanured an average in 7 years of ten bushels and 7½ lbs. It would take 2½ acres cultivated in that way to produce what one acre did the other way. What we should endeavour to avoid is cropping the same land year after year without manuring the soil. It is the most unprofitable system that the farmer can adopt, and we should endeavour to dissuade the settlers from the plan of attempting to raise wheat year after year without the aid of any fertilizer. What I have referred to here shows that people should be very cautious about spending their money on artificial fertilizers. It is throwing away money to endeavour to farm land without fertilizers, and unless a system can be introduced whereby abundance of farm manure can be obtained the country must become poor and the soil will become exhausted with no means to restore it. If a proper supply of manure is to be provided, then the system must be changed and stock must be kept. If stock is kept dairying must be introduced, and we will have another export which will be more profitable than wheat, viz., butter, cheese and bacon. Experience has taught already that wheat cannot be carried to market without a very large percentage of waste, and consequently it ought to be marketed in the shape of flour. If it goes out in the shape of flour the bran remains in the country. Farmers when carrying their milk to the creamery ought to bargain for the return of the skim milk in carrying their milk to the cheese factory ought to bargain for the return of the whey. It will enable them to produce pork cheaply and that will lead to another important industry, the manufacture of bacon, which can be carried to market much cheaper than pork in barrels. We will then have the export of butter, cheese and bacon instead of being bound down to the export of flour alone. We would have the farms increasing in fertility by the larger quantity of barn yard manure. I know I am speaking in the hearing of experienced farmers who have paid great attention to the subject, and who, I have no doubt, understand the necessity of fertilizing their farms, and I daresay they have seen with regret their neighbours exhausting the soil by an injurious system of cultivation. I hope we shall hear from them on the subject. I do not know that I ought to resume my seat without referring to an institution existing in Ontario, which has done a great deal to impoverish the land. They have 82 loan companies and building societies in Canada, of which Ontario has 72, Quebec 8, and Nova Scotia 2. Their loans amount to \$1,015,000,786. Of that amount \$110,116,119 is our yearly contribution. That amount of interest to be paid by the farmers must be a terrible drawback to their success, and the fertility of many of the farms must be reduced by the efforts to pay that interest.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is the great province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. WARK—To look at such a burden on a province is really discouraging.

These societies have now abandoned real estate of the value of $3,298,424 for sale. The men who have abandoned their estates must have struggled year after year to meet the interest, and must have been exhausting their farms during all the time by some means or other to meet that interest. They must represent at least 1,000 farmers who have been struggling to pay their interest and who have at least abandoned their property altogether. I think this is well worthy of consideration as one of the causes why land is becoming exhausted. I ought to say a word about what is desirable—that is, that the model or experimental farms should introduce a system of experiments such as those valuable experiments which are going on here but which are confined to manure. The experiment to which I refer would be in general farming. Lay off a number of fields and the best lesson to give would be to crop one of these fields year after year without manure to see how long it would be worth while to cultivate it. I have seen myself a piece of land from which it was said the first settler had taken eight crops of wheat in succession, and the last was a perfect failure and the cultivation of it had to be abandoned. I have been in a settlement, and heard one of the old settlers complaining that he could not understand why the farmers were not so well-off as they had been a few years before. I saw two of these men leave their farms, they had become so unproductive—farms with a fair quality of land. They let the field go in common, and the buildings rot down, while they went into the woods to make new farms. The secret of their failure was that they did not know that cropping land to excess exhausted it to such an extent that they could not make their living by it. An experiment on one piece of land to show how long it would bring crops until it became unprofitable to plough and sow it, would be of very great value. Then I should like another piece of land to be used in experimenting with rotation of crops. Rotation which is profitable in one part of the country might not be profitable in another. Turnips is a favourite crop in England and Scotland, but ensilage is taking the place of roots. On some land, no doubt, oats would be best in the western country. They are indispensable, but material for ensilage would have to be raised, and wheat would have to be one crop, and such rotation would have to be adopted as would leave part of the farm in hay and part in pasture. They are experiments that would have to be tried, and, instead of raising wheat every year, raise it every three or five years. Stock must be kept on every farm in order to produce enough manure to keep up the fertility. Mixed farming is what is required in that country, and I hope the government will make such experiments as will show the profitableness of pursuing a system of rotation of crops instead of doing, as they have been doing, raising wheat year after year, until the farms will not produce enough to pay the expense of cultivating them. I have shown how unprofitable it has proved in the United States, and that unless we improve our system it will result in the same way in this country.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not wish the statement to go abroad that the large indebtedness to which the hon. gentleman has referred is held against the real estate owners of the province of Ontario. The loan companies of the description that my hon. friend mentioned are expressly chartered, and are supposed to be doing business in the interest of parties borrowing money for the purpose of improving their lands and perhaps paying for their property. Moreover, a great deal of that money may be loaned on real estate in cities and towns.

Hon. Mr. WARK—Very little.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, there is a very large amount in the city of Toronto, I know. Some of the companies suffered on account of the large amounts they had loaned on real estate in the city of Toronto for the erection of buildings there.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In answer to the question brought before the House by the hon. member, I may say that a short perusal of the report of my department would convince the House of the endeavours which are made all over the Dominion to protect our own country from the abuses which have prevailed on the other side of the line, and which have led to diminish the fertility of the soil to a great extent. The hon. gentleman has shown that in the United States the farmers have been very imprudent in many sections of that fertile country in continually cropping wheat from the same fields. One object that the parliament of Canada had in view in establishing experimental farms, was to warn our farmers, the new settlers in the west as well as the old settlers in the east, that they were not likely to prosper if their farming was not done according to the most scientific and improved methods. Our people have taken great interest in those experimental farms. To give you an idea of the interest that our farmers take in those farms, I may say that last year we had 12,000 visitors from different sections of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I have attended a number of those visits, which are popularly called amongst our farmers pic-nics, and seen the farmers there and in no instance have I heard complaints, and I may say in every instance I have been told by farmers that all who visited the farm brought home with them some useful information. The experiments have been numerous and varied. They consist in producing new species of oats, barley, wheat and other grains, and in ascertaining the soil best suited for such crops. They consist also in demonstrating by experiment the advisability of adopting rotation in the cultivation of their lands. Their attention has also been drawn to the fact that the most paying, and the safest of all cultivation is mixed farming, where a man does not depend for his prosperity on good prices for any single crop, because if that crop should be a failure he is sure to be unable to meet his obligations. I may say that in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, although the country is an open plain ready for cultivation on entering it, there are considerable difficulties in the way of the settlers there. Wood is scarce, fencing and buildings are expensive and implements have been costly; consequently the people of one section combined together to go into the cultivation of one kind of grain which was then the most paying and profitable, and that was wheat. They required between their farms no fencing or ditching. They kept few cattle, and there were no cattle roving over the country; consequently they dispensed with fences. They needed very few buildings also. They threshed the wheat on the field, and it was brought to the elevator and disposed of there. They could, at first, do nothing else. That was the only way open to them in the beginning. It was profitable in the first years, but of late it has not been so remunerative. Wheat has been abundant all over the world; it has been sent to Europe from South America, from Egypt, and even from India. The result has been to bring down prices so that its cultivation is no longer profitable. For the last two years the government has been endeavouring to direct the attention of the people of that country to the fact that they must divide their energy and go into some kind of mixed farming—keep stock and go into dairying. To teach this new industry to the settlers, the government went to the expense of having travelling dairies, so that they were brought to the doors of the farmers throughout the country. The travelling dairies have gone through the North-west and are in British Columbia to-day, and before long I am quite sure that the people of the west will soon be in a position, while continuing to produce wheat, to have other resources when the price of that wheat is low. We must not judge the farmers of to-day by the standard of fifty years ago. Farming to-day is—not what I might call mere toiling—it is a profession, requiring knowledge. The man who does not study, or read, or follow the experiments made in his neighbourhood or described in books, cannot farm successfully to-day. The endeavour of a country like this—which is an agricultural country after all, owing to its fertility and extent—should be to encourage our young people to become farmers instead of professional men. I have heard the statement made, as a reproach to a class of education elsewhere, that a young man on coming out of such schools immediately returned to the farm. Such schools are, in my opinion, the very best for our children. We were given also on this point a statement to show the income of gentlemen in the liberal professions. They receive on an average from two dollars to two dollars and a-half a day. A prosperous farmer in the North-west or Manitoba, if Providence treats him kindly—if he gets rain in proper times, and if he gets up in proper time, also and works the soil properly—can earn an income twice as large as that of a lawyer. We have known farmers in the North-west and Manitoba to realize over $3,000 net from one year's crop. That is a very handsome income. Therefore all the endeavours the government can make to induce the young people to go into farming, to make that branch a desirable profession, are in the right direction. Under the circumstances, I hope I may satisfy the hon. gentleman by telling him that the government is endeavouring to act in the sense indicated in his question.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would just like to inform the Minister of Agriculture that in my own neighbourhood a man who had been farming five years, and raised from $2,000 to $3,000 worth of crops annually, has just given up farming and become an insurance agent.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I am very glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture explain to this House how the farmers of this country should cultivate their land and how they should move in the way of rotation of crops. That is very desirable and I approve of it, and I say the model farms are doing a great deal of good; I go further, if they teach people nothing more than how to grow trees, they are a need in that great country, the North-west, where we have not forest enough. When the hon. gentleman speaks of the cultivation of the soil and the improvements of the farms, I think it is proper that they should see that our farms are drained. At present all their action in railway matters is to stop the drainage, and they won't let a farmer improve his land. I hope they will take that into consideration and amend the railway law so as to allow the farmers to settle their difficulties about drains at home, and not bring them to Ottawa before the Privy Council in order that they may get permission to drain their farms properly. That is a consideration which is of more importance than any question that has ever come before this House since I have been in parliament, and my hon. friend who brought up the question about agriculture and the interests of the farming community, will tell us that it is impossible to raise a crop upon land which is improperly drained. You may raise cranberries but you cannot raise grain on wet land. Now as to what has been said of the indebtedness of the farmers of Ontario, I can tell my hon. friends that a large proportion, perhaps one-quarter of them, have money in bank to-day. They are not so badly off; they are progressing, and if the government of this country will give them facilities to drain their lands, they will all be prosperous, I speak of this because it is pertinent to a bill that will be up very soon in this House, and I hope they will amend the railway law so as to allow farmers to settle their difficulties at home. I introduced a bill for that purpose into the House not long ago; it passed the Senate, but was defeated in the Commons, and we may have more to say about drainage in this House by and by.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The farmers of the North-west should feel greatly indebted to the hon. gentleman who has brought up this subject and to the Minister of Agriculture. One fault that those people are liable to fall into is that they do not take care of their land. Prairie land is very rich and if there is a proper rainfall will produce a good crop. I am afraid the difficulty a great many farmers are falling into is that they are cultivating the land too much. If a proper rotation of crops is given it will have a beneficial effect to preserve the fertility of the land. Even on the experimental farms of this country they are killing the land, the soil is undergoing cultivation all the time. It is necessary from the start that we should commence a proper system and preserve the fertility of the land, and not have it exhausted at an early stage, because once you exhaust the fertility of the soil it is a hard job to restore it or make it profitable. Therefore, I think the point taken by my hon. friend is a very good one. Mixed farming should be practised by the people of the country and they are not doing it in many instances, I regret to say. As a farmer in that North-west country, I make it a practice not to raise two successive crops on the same land. I summer-fallow it, but there is many a farmer in that country to my own personal knowledge who does not do so. The first year after the land is broken the farmer will take wheat off. They make a point to break the land and prepare it for the first crop,—one of the mistakes they made at the start. They thought any kind of cultivation would bring a crop and so it would with good rainfall; but in some sections, more adapted to wheat growing than others, they break the land and thoroughly cultivate it and have it ready for crop next year they go on, and if there is any rainfall, and in almost any case, they will raise a fair crop the first year; the next year they burn the stubble and put on the seed drill and they raise another crop; the next year they do the same, and they raise three crops in succession with the one ploughing. It is not necessary to tell any agriculturist that that system must prove ruinous, and I think that the government farms should make it a point to bring it to the notice of the farmer that this continual cropping with slight tillage will ultimately bring ruination upon those people. If they impress that upon the minds of the people who first occupied the land and advise them not to impoverish it in that way, very great good will be done. A man going to the North-west would naturally feel somewhat impressed with the vastness of the country. The land can be ploughed as well as any meadow land in Canada. The early settler becomes a speculator. He says "all I have to do is to sit on my gang plough;" but that has become a thing of the past. It is now the walking plough and they can plough more to-day than in any other part of Canada in the same time. They harrow it and prepare it and when the crop is ripe the grain cut with the binder, and naturally there is a temptation to go into wheat raising because if the crop is good there is nothing that pays better, and in no way can you get the money in your pocket quicker. But if the season is dry, there is nearly a total failure and the wheat will barely pay for cutting and threshing, and then there is hardship among the farmers because they have only one means of revenue. The system to be adopted in that country is a system of mixed farming. A great many of us learned by bitter experience that that was the proper way. Where I reside every farmer has a certain quantity of wheat for sale, a certain number of beef animals for sale, a certain amount of butter, cheese and pork and other products which he brings with him whenever he comes to market which is once or twice a month. He carries on mixed farming, and if the price of some articles is not high he is very certain to get a very fair price on other articles. So on the whole there is a fair average price obtained for farm products. My hon. friend says you do not put a tax on agricultural products high enough. I do not hesitate to say that the farmer is as well protected as any man in Canada. I am a manufacturer and am well protected. I am a farmer just as much as the man who makes the binder that I use on my farm. I till the soil and apply my labour to produce wheat. I can produce wheat, pork or butter from the farm. No manufacturer can do more than that. Therefore, I can properly class myself among the manufacturers of this country and I have, I think, a fair protection. But as far as that protection is concerned, when I undertake to sell my butter to-day in competition with the products of other countries, in the British Columbia market, I am told by a merchant that he can get the best creamery butter laid down at 14 cents a pound from California—good choice dairy butter at 12 cents. Therefore, I say that a little more protection in the line my hon. friend indicates would not be amiss. It was not my intention to make a speech on this question, but the farmers of the North-west are largely now, by experience and intelligent thought, adopting the principle of a system of mixed farming and they do not have their eggs all in one basket. They raise beef, wheat, pork and butter to sell and in that way I am proud to say there is a very great degree of prosperity in that country, and if we do not suffer from any calamity, the North-west will be the most jubilant part of the Dominion this year because the prospect to-day is better than in any other year that I have been in that country. It would be well, however, for the government, through the experimental farms in that country, to bring to the knowledge of the farmers the very great importance of not tilling one piece of land too often in succession. There is where failure will meet us in that country. The land is rich. With a little labour and one ploughing you raise three crops. Many of my neighbours do that, but it is a dangerous precedent to establish, and will be fraught with disastrous results in the end.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman who has just spoken asked for more protection, and I said that it was the only thing needed to make the farmers prosperous and happy, although the minister seems to think the rotation of crops the best means. Speaking seriously, there was one point which the hon. gentleman from Wolseley referred to which deserves the attention of the ministry. He pointed out that on the experimental farm in the North-west at Indian Head, which is supposed to be under the direct control of the hon. minister, this rotation of crops which he has been speaking of was not practised. The government should see that they not only preach but practice a little; and I think further, with respect to the experimental farm at Ottawa—and possibly the same remark applies to the other experimental farms—they are altogether too expensive. Those farms, while called experimental farms, are regarded by the farmers as a great measure model farms. Now, a model farm which costs about four times as much as it brings in—as is the case at Ottawa—is not the sort of farm which is to be held up as a model farm for the farmers of this country. The government might make an effort, now that they have been experimenting for many years with this farm, to make it bring in something nearer what it costs than it has been doing in the past.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. member from Halifax states that the experimental farms are too expensive, and that they should be made model farms. Well, that is not the object of the law at all. Is it possible that the hon. gentleman does not understand the difference between an experimental farm and a model farm? If the hon. gentleman understands the difference between the two, he should not calculate that the expense should be the same for both. The experimental farms are not established for the purpose of showing the farmer what amount of money he can derive out of so many acres of land. The farm is there to make experiments,—sometimes expensive experiments: analysis, growing fruit, and experiments of all description. All that, of course, is expensive, and on these farms they get no crop, or just a trifling crop. The cultivation is made in small plots for experimental purposes. You find wheat on one, then a patch of oats, then pease, then potatoes, and so on. There is a great deal of expense in cultivating a farm in such small pieces; and, as my hon. leader suggests, experiments are made in bringing fruits and trees from other countries and ascertaining whether they suit the climate here. So that in dealing with the experimental farms, if you compare them with model farms, you do a great injustice, or you show that you understand very little about the subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think my knowledge of farming is not very far behind the hon. gentleman's knowledge.

NEW SENATOR.

GEORGE THOMAS BAIRD was introduced, and, having taken the oath, and signed the roll, took his seat.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOLS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence and telegrams that have passed between the government or any member thereof, and His Grace the Right Reverend Archbishop of Rupert's Land, or any body of non-Catholic clergymen or any other member thereof, on the subject of the Manitoba school legislation.

He said: I do not intend to detain the House very long in discussing this motion. I have nevertheless, a few observations to offer, for which I ask the kind attention of my hon. colleagues. I have no exact idea of the form which the correspondence to which I refer may have taken. It would appear, however, by what has transpired elsewhere, that insinuations, or perhaps, assertions have been made to the effect that the Catholics had by the educational laws in existence prior to 1890 some privileges over the other sections of the population. I wish to demonstrate to you that if such assertions have been made, they are inaccurate. We had then but one law and but one school system, applicable to all—to Catholics as well as to non-Catholics. All the schools were public and national schools. To establish that I will quote the words of a man who cannot be suspected of partiality to us. Rev. Dr. Bryce, who has been, since 1890, in the front rank of the supporters of the Manitoba Government in their new educational policy, said in 1877:—

The separate school supporters in Ontario are viewed in the light of being exempt from the general law which establishes a national system of education. In Manitoba the Roman Catholic schools are as much national as the Protestant. No special rights are given to either Catholics or Protestants.

This must dispose of the idea which appears to exist somewhere, that in Manitoba the schools controlled by the non-Catholics, and to which they sent their children, were the public schools, and that the Catholic schools were not public, but separate schools,—that is, an inferior plant grafted upon a big tree. It was not so, hon. gentlemen: we had but one beautiful and noble tree bearing fruits suitable to the taste of the whole nation. It was truly national, affording comfort and relief to all. It is true that we had two sets of schools, the Protestant schools and Catholic schools; but these two sets of school worked under the same general law, and under the same fundamental principles, viz., the controlling of the schools by the parents and ratepayers. The term "separate schools" is not even quite accurate, if applied to only one set of these schools. The Protestant schools were as much separate schools to ours, as ours were separate schools to theirs. If, for the sake of convenience, the term "separate schools" is to be used in connection with the Manitoba schools, prior to 1890, it must be used as applicable to both the Protestant and Catholic schools. That was the law, of which I will give you a synopsis, showing that both classes were on the same footing, and consequently had no privilege one over the other.

The law provided that there was to be a general board of education composed of Protestants and Catholics. The Protestants had on that board twelve members, and the Catholics only nine. The Protestants were in the majority; they were then in a better position than ourselves. If any party was specially favoured in that case, we were not that party. The law provided that the Protestant schools were to be under the control of the Protestant section; the Catholic schools under the control of the Catholics. There is in this provision no special advantage for one class over the other. The law provided that the examination and licensing of teachers, the selection of text books and the appointment of inspectors, were matters to be dealt with by the respective section for their respective class. How can it be said that in this the Catholics were singled out by a way detrimental to others when the Protestants, as a class, enjoyed the same privileges as the Catholics did? The Protestants had a superintendent with certain duties and privileges, so had the Catholics. Is not that perfect equality? The law provided for official visitors of the schools, amongst others clergymen, the judges and members of the legislature. Protestant clergymen had no right to visit Catholic schools, but on the other hand, Catholic clergymen had no right to visit Protestant schools. If there is any class legislation in that, were not the Protestants as much favoured as the Catholics? All the judges of the Queen's Bench and county courts, and all the members of the legislature, had the right to visit at any time, all the schools, Catholics and Protestants. The large majority of these exalted gentlemen, the members of the government inclusive, being Protestant, the Catholics were in that respect in a remarkable inferiority, far from being favoured in any way. If they could be said to be singled out, it was to their detriment. The whole school law could be gone over in that way, with the same conclusions. As to money matters, they were provided by the law in an equitable manner. According to clause 30 of the School Act, in no case was a Protestant called upon to pay for the support of Catholic schools and vice versa. The government grant was equally divided between the two sections according to the school population, as ascertained by the school census. The members of the government themselves, and they only were empowered to make the division. The majority of that government was Protestant. We may believe then that Protestant interests were well guarded. As to that government grant, Dr. Bryce wrote in 1877:

The government grant is voted for one system of schools, and is divided according to the population of children. No special rights are given to either Catholics or Protestants; all moneys are equitably distributed.

Both sets of schools, or if you like, both classes being equally favoured, it follows that none could be accused of enjoying special privileges. And as the whole population of the province was embodied in these two divisions, it follows also that the interests of the whole people in matters of education were equally, wholly, and properly attended to in their unavoidable diversity as well as in their special features. Considered from that high and broad standpoint, the law in existence prior to 1890, and not the subsequent legislation, is entitled to be called truly national. Dr. Bryce had reason then to say in 1882 in his book: "Manitoba, its infancy, growth and present condition:"

Lord Selkirk's scheme of perfect religious equality and toleration is that still subsisting in Manitoba.
* * * * There is no bone of contention to disturb the prevailing harmony. No church is given any place of precedence.

That was written in 1882, by an eminent Presbyterian minister, who is not at all in accord with our views on educational matters. His evidence must go, therefore, a long way to convince everybody that we were not a privileged people. That reverend gentleman would have talked without hesitation in quite a different way, if the Catholic church, either in educational or purely religious matters, had occupied in any way a privileged position. Such was the condition of things in 1877 and in 1882. Now the School Act having remained the same until 1890, it follows that the words of Rev. Dr. Bryce are equally applicable to the condition of things existing at the latter period.

Neither section then was privileged over the other. Now, who is responsible for that division in two sections. I maintain the Protestant population is as much responsible as the Catholics? Its action in this respect in the Canadian North-west dates back to the early days of the colony. In the Journal of the Council of Assiniboia, minutes of the meeting of 16th October, 1850, we read :—

Adam Tom, Esq.—A motion for taking into consideration the propriety of granting public money for education.

And in the meeting of 1st May, 1851, the following motion was moved and carried :

That £100 be granted from the public funds to be divided equally between the Bishop of Rupert's Land and the Bishop of the North-west (St. Boniface), to be applied for by them at their discretion for the purpose of education.

In the minutes of the 27th November, 1851, "a petition was read from the trustees of the Presbyterian church of Frog Plain, asking for a grant for education," which reads as follows :—

To the Governor and Council of Assiniboia :—

The petition of trustees of the Presbyterian church of Frog Plain humbly sheweth :

That a church has existed for two years on the glebe of said church; that the said school as not being on the patronage of the Bishop of Rupert's Land, does not appear to have been contemplated in the grant of £50 which you gave to his Lordship in April last for the purpose of education; that during the latter part of the interval the said school has been placed under the auspices of a duly ordained minister; that in reliance on his active and enlightened superintendence, your petitioners and those they represent, hope to see the said school raised in some measure to the level of the parochial schools of Scotland.

That, as the improvement of education seems to be more requisite, at least among the Protestants of the settlement, than its mere extension, your petitioners pray that their ministers may receive from the public fund a sum proportional to the £50 as aforesaid, granted to the Church of England, without prejudice to the recognized equality in the premises between the Protestants as a whole and the Roman Catholics.

That request was granted and the following resolution was accordingly passed on the 13th day of July, 1852 :

That £15 be granted to the Rev. John Black, of Frog Plain, for the purpose of education in accordance with the petition of the committee of his congregation.

Carried unanimously.

And in compliance with the principle laid down in the latter part of the above petition, viz., "The recognized equality in the premises between the Protestants as a whole and the Roman Catholics," a further sum of £15 was voted on the 9th of December, 1852, to the Bishop of St. Boniface, for the same purpose; so as to make things even between the Protestants as a whole, and the Catholics.

The same "equality between the Protestants as a whole and the Roman Catholics" was again accepted by all the Protestant denominations when Manitoba became a province of the Dominion and enacted its first educational laws. That distinction subsisted without any objection on the part of any of the Protestant denominations till 1890. It must be admitted that the principle of considering the various Protestant denominations as forming one class, and the Catholics as another class, has been affirmed, proclaimed and accepted by the Protestants themselves as a fair and proper classification from the early days of the colony till 1890.

This policy is only in keeping with the policy of the Protestants in other provinces. Take for instance the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, where that problem has been agitated; there we find the various Protestant denominations willing to form a unit—one class—under the general appellation of Protestants. When Sir John Rose and Sir A. T. Galt, at the time of confederation, were so much concerned about their co-religionists, they did not make any distinction between the different Protestant denominations, but included them all in one section. No wonder that it be so. It is very well known that the clergymen of the various Protestant denominations do exchange pulpits at certain times in the year. This fact, combined with their readiness to unite in matters of education, is for the public more than an indication that in so far at least as this subject is concerned, there is no substantial variance in their views, and consequently, no harm nor injustice done to them, no violence made to their conscience, when the rule laid down by themselves, viz., "the recognized equality in the premises between themselves as a whole and the Roman Catholics" is embodied in the law. Now that we have shown that there were two classes recognized by our educational laws, and that the Protestants themselves are responsible for being regarded as a whole in the classification, let us see more closely in the new legislation. It is clear that under the old law there was no privilege to any one. But there is at present a privileged class, and the Catholics are not that class. That the old Protestant schools have been continued by the new law, under the same supervision and regulations, there cannot be any doubt to-day. It is generally admitted. Mr. Martin, as reported in the semi-weekly Winnipeg Free Press, of the 22nd day of February, 1894, speaking of the school law, said that:

He was himself not satisfied with the school Act, and had never been so. He had made a strong effort to have the public schools, controlled by the government, really made national schools with religion obliterated. He was now more convinced than ever that that was the only school which would be justified as constitutional. It has been urged by satisfied supporters of the Act that none could complain of the devotional element introduced as it was of the broadest nature, but they found that the Roman Catholics had the very greatest objection to this provision of the Act and he was dissatisfied himself. * * It had been said that in the event of his opinions being adopted, our public schools would be godless schools, but by many staunch supporters of the school Act it had been privately admitted to him that the religious exercises practised in the schools at that time were without value. But as a matter of sentiment they added,—oh, as a matter of sentiment perhaps—but he could not understand such an argument. The Roman Catholics had honestly stated that in their belief the two forms of education should go together. The Protestants admitted, on the other hand, that it was impossible to have religious training in schools, and only asked that it be recognized, insisting, however, on imposing their views on others in that respect. Rather than that small amount of religious training should be done away with in the schools, the Protestants said they would prefer the old state of affairs. He would leave it to his audience to determine which was the more honest stand of the two.

A non-political newspaper, the Commercial, published in Winnipeg, says:

There is some religious teaching in our schools, and as this teaching is not in accordance with the Catholic church, there is some thing certain that our schools are not Catholic schools. Now, as this religious instruction is not at least objectionable to the Protestants, and in fact we may say some religious exercises were provided for in the new school regulations, in deference to a demand from a section of the Protestants, there is some show for the claim that our schools are now Protestant schools. This of course gives the Catholics an additional objection to our present school system.

The Winnipeg Free Press says:

Mr. Martin, the author of the bill abolishing separate schools, has said that he thinks the present schools are Protestant schools * * It is manifestly unfair to insist on religious exercises that one section of parents believe, rightly or wrongly, to be injurious to their children. It is not a sufficient answer to say that no dogma is taught; those who are satisfied with the exercises are not the sole judges of that.

Exactly so, the Protestant divines are not the judges of what is suitable or not to us in matters of religious training.

The Brandon Mail, says:

In refusing to patronize schools that employ religious teaching to which they object, the Catholics have taken strong and reasonable ground.

The Nor'-wester, says:

The existing system is too repugnant to the most obtuse sense of common justice to be perpetuated for any considerable length of time.

It must be admitted then that the Protestant population enjoys to-day the advantage of religious exercises and training in their so-called public schools which are not distasteful or objectionable to their conscience, while we have not the same privilege—their religious exercises being impossible of acceptance to us on conscientious grounds. Then on account of the change in the laws introduced in 1890 in our province, the non-Catholics form a privileged class, while the Catholics are detrimentally and prejudicially singled out. It is no answer to say that all citizens have the same right to make use of the public schools. It reminds us of the fox and the crane—the law spreads an abundant feast indeed, but in platters and bottles where we cannot touch it. To offer us the advantage of the law as it stands is equivalent to saying to us, "Give up your religious views, and we will educate your children." It was known beforehand that we would not give up our religious views. It was known generally, but our board of education thought it their duty to bring the matter more specifically before the government of Manitoba, in the following resolution:

"The Catholics express their opinion that the proposed legislation is:

1. A distinct blow to the natural right of parents of guiding and controlling the education of their children, assailing thereby the liberty of their conscience.

2. The banishment from the schools of the province of religious teaching which is the foundation of morality and of true domestic and social happiness.

3. A direct violation of the rights secured to the Catholic population by the treaties which determined the entry of Manitoba into confederation, as well as by the federal and imperial statutes creating the province.

The offer to participate in the advantages of the so-called public schools, upon conditions known beforehand to be of impossible acceptance, is wilful and deliberate exclusion; and to compel payment of taxes, and to exclude from participation in the advantages offered in the form of a government grant, is political injustice, because all who pay should share. We pay our taxes, we pay our share of the public funds, in equity we should receive a share of all those funds. When it is refused to us, except on the condition that we surrender our religious faith, it is a confiscation of our property, it is a penalty imposed upon us for not believing in religious matters as our neighbours do. When it is said that the law is not responsible for the effect it has upon us, it is clearly suggested (it has even been asserted) that our religion is responsible. We thought the penal laws had disappeared from the realm, but they are being revived in the colonies, and Manitoba seems willing to take the lead in carrying out this outrageous policy.

In connection with this question, it is often asserted that in allowing religious exercises of a denominational character in the schools, the state is endowing the churches. This is a fallacy, in so far, at least, as the Manitoba schools were concerned. I make here no distinction between the various denominations. I desire to put them all on the same footing. In common with their fellow citizens of other creeds, the Catholics hold that it is not the province of the state to teach dogmas or to give any religious training. This statement, perhaps, almost unexpected by many as coming from me, is, I hope, plain enough. Nevertheless I state also that religious instruction, of a positive character, can and must be given in schools. To authorize and to facilitate religious teaching is not teaching; it is a passive and not an active mission or discharge of duty. And when that is done, the state, in giving assistance to such schools, is not in the least endowing the churches. It pays only for a part, a small part of what it receives from the school, or rather from the parents whose school it is. For the school is not a prolongation of the state, but a prolongation of the family. If the parents could on all occasions, and in every branch, teach their own children, they would have a right to do so, in accordance with the law of nature, without the interference of the state, just as they provide food and clothing for their children. But this being impossible in most cases, especially with poor people, or people in ordinary circumstances, the families, within a certain radius, open a place, called a school, where a teacher, engaged and paid by them, gives lessons to their children, in their name and under their control; and nobody has a right to interfere with that education. And it is not only Catholics who hold these views, but English and Protestant moralists and statesmen also. John Stuart Mill, in his Essay on Liberty, says:

That the whole or any large part of the education of the people should be in the state hands, I go as far as any one in deprecating. It is not endurable that a government should, either in law or in fact, have a complete control over the education of the people.

Chancellor Kent says:

The duties of parents to their children as being their natural guardians consist in maintaining and educating them during the season of infancy and youth.

Sir William Blackstone says:

The last duty of parents to their children is that of giving them an education suitable to their station in life; a duty pointed out by reason and of far the greatest importance of any.

Dr. Wayland, whose books have long been standard works in moral science in the United States, and also, in the Protestant schools of Manitoba prior to 1890, if I am not mistaken, says in his Elements of moral science:

The duty of parents is generally to educate or to bring up their children in such manner as they believe will be most for their future happiness both temporal and eternal.

Again:

He is bound to inform himself of the peculiar habits and reflect upon the probable future situation of his child, and deliberately to consider what sort of education will most conduce to his future happiness and usefulness.

Again, he says:

The duties of a parent are established by God, and God requires us not to violate them.

"According to the laws of nature," Wayland says in some other part of his book, "the teacher is only the agent, the parent is the principal." He does not say that the state is the principal, but the parent. And Wayland continues :

If he (the parent) be under obligation to educate his child in such manner as he supposes will most conduce to the child's happiness and the welfare of society, he has, from necessity, the right to control the child in everything necessary to the fulfilment of his obligations.

Speaking of the teacher, he says :

If he and the parent cannot agree, the connection must be dissolved.

Lord Salisbury, the leader of the Conservative party in England, said :

There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men ; and that is, that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching which the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects. That is a right which no expediency can negative, which no state necessity ought to allow you to sweep away.

Mr. Forster, the author of the Education Act of 1870, in England, denied, on a certain occasion that the Act assumed the education of the people to be the right and office of the state. He quoted, in support of his denial, the Act of 1876, the words of which are as follows :

It shall be the duty of the parent of every child to cause such child to receive efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic.

And on the same occasion he said :

The state may aid them (the parents) to fulfil, and may compel them to discharge, that duty, but that, except as a penalty for neglect, the state cannot assume it itself.

The right of the parents in matter of education is thus clearly demonstrated to be a doctrine held not only by the Roman Catholics, but also leading men not in sympathy with our religious views. However, in modern communities, it has been the policy of the state, as Mr. Forster says, to aid the parent in the fulfilment of his duty, by a grant of money, and, as I have said on some other occasion, the state has a right to see that its money is not misapplied. But because the state helps education with its money, because it has a right to see that its money be not misapplied, that help and that right do not destroy the right of the parents, nor the fact that the state is receiving, as a return for its aid, more than what it gives. I could here not improperly expand my remarks, and enter into a general discussion of all the advantages, material and moral, that religious education confers upon the state, directly and indirectly. I could insist upon the social results, and the immediate and beneficial effect of a good religious and moral education for governments and the community at large. From that I might draw the conclusion that the state, in allowing the religious teaching and in aiding the same, is simply working in its own interest. I shall, however, confine myself to quoting the opinions of a few leading men :—

Plato said :

Ignorance of the true God was the greatest pest of all republics.

Guizot, the great French Protestant historian, and for several years Prime Minister in France, said :

In order to make education truly good and socially useful, it must be fundamentally religious ; national education must be given and received in an atmosphere religious. Religion is not a study or an exercise to be restricted to a certain place or hour. It is a faith and a law which ought to be felt everywhere.

Disraeli, later on Lord Beaconsfield, said :

I am not disposed to believe that there is any existing government that can long prevail, founded on the neglect to supply or regulate religious instruction to the people.

Lord Derby :

Public education should be considered as inseparable with religion.

Gladstone :

Every system which places religious education in the background is pernicious.

Horace Mann :

We are fully persuaded that the salt of religious truth can alone preserve education from abuse.

The great Napoleon said :

Society without religion is like a ship without a compass, uncertain as to whither it is going.

Of the good effect of religion on society and industry, I may quote the following from the Montreal Gazette, of the 5th September, 1893 :

For its population and industrial importance, Montreal has been exceptionally exempt from troubles. Although it has from time to time had strikes in one or other departments of industry, it has been singularly free from those obstinate and violent conflicts between employers and employed, which have arrayed class against class in other communities. That this is, to a considerable extent, due to the influence of the Roman Catholic church and to the more or less pronounced relations between workmen's societies and the parochial clergy may, we think, be pleaded without fear of contradiction.

Supported by these authorities, I can safely assert that the state is receiving such advantages from religious instruction that it is but right that it should pay for it. I stand, however, by my first proposition, namely: that in aiding the school where religious instruction is imparted to the pupils, the state cannot be said to endow the churches. And confining myself to a more restricted standpoint than the general one to which I have above referred, I shall, I hope, demonstrate, with almost mathematical accuracy, by facts and figures, that my proposition is correct. Before doing so, however, I will support my opinion by a quotation from the report of the English Royal Commission, instituted in 1886, to inquire into the elementary education Acts in England and Wales. The 66th conclusion of the commissioners is as follows:

(66). That the state cannot be constructively regarded as endorsing religious education, when, under the conditions of the Act of 1870, it pays annual grants in aid of voluntary local effort for secular instruction in schools in which religious instruction forms part of the programme (page 213 final report).

That is the verdict of a set of men composed of leading statesmen and educationists, laymen as well as churchmen, after the hearing of 151 witnesses, and inquiries upon the educational systems of almost all the countries in the world.

This evidence should go a long way to convince people of at least the plausibility of the grounds we take. But, I will go further and show by figures that, in the province of Manitoba, the government did not give one cent for religious teaching, but, on the contrary, was receiving as a free gift, the benefit of the teaching paid by the parents, not only in religious matter, but partly also in secular subjects.

Let us see first what was the cost of maintenance of the schools and then what was the proportion of the aid given by the state. The average cost of maintenance of the schools was about $425. The average of the subsidy given to each school was $175, that is, less than one-half of the total cost.

Now take the subjects taught in the schools. They are as follows:—

1. Religious instruction in the child's language.
2. Reading.
3. Spelling.
4. Grammar and analysis.
5. Composition.
6. Penmanship.
7. Linear drawing.
8. Calculation, arithmetic, mensuration and algebra.
9. Book-keeping, single and double entry.
10. Geography of all parts of the world.
11. Sacred history, history of Canada, England and France.
12. Good behaviour, politeness and becomingness.
13. Vocal music.
14. Useful knowledge, from the most rudimentary to the elements of physics, chemistry, agriculture and astronomy.
15. For the girls, domestic economy, sewing, embroidery, etc., etc.

Out of fifteen subjects, thirteen are secular and only two religious subjects. That is, more than four-fifths of the subjects are of a secular character. Then while the state was contributing to the teaching less than  $\frac{5}{10}$  of its cost, it received, as far as the subjects are concerned, more than  $\frac{8}{10}$  of the instruction. If we take the time given we will have the same result. Religious subjects were taught as a rule not more than half an hour in the day. A school day was of 5 hours' duration. Half an hour gives a proportion on the whole time of  $\frac{1}{10}$ . Then while the state was contributing less than  $\frac{5}{10}$  of the cost of the school, it received as far as the time was concerned,  $\frac{9}{10}$  of that time, which was given to secular training. The state was accordingly receiving, as a free gift, from the parents, as far as subjects were concerned, at least  $\frac{3}{10}$ , and as far as time was concerned,  $\frac{4}{10}$  of the instruction. From the consideration of all these facts and opinions, we must come to the conclusion that one of the greatest fallacies in education is the contention that the churches are endowed when religious training is allowed in the schools aided by governments. It would be nearer to the truth to say that in disendowing religious education, the state is endowing irreligious training.

In connection with this motion, I cannot refrain from referring to a statement made last year by the Primate of the English Church in this Dominion. He was reported as saying:

It is a matter of regret that the Roman Catholic church in this province (Manitoba) in the effort of securing specially favourable terms for itself, is opposing even what remains of religion in our schools.

I am sorry to say, with all due respect to the high dignitary of the Church of England who uttered these words, that they are a misconstruction and, consequently, a misrepresentation of our claims and of our sentiments. I do not question the motives; I do not for a moment doubt the good faith of the eminent prelate. In my personal intercourse with him, I have learned to honour him, and I have for his person and for his dignity a deep respect. But his utterances on that occasion are an instance of the easy way in which good men sometimes unwittingly misrepresent us. Those words have been printed and reprinted, they have been circulated all through the country, and as our correction will not, in effect, reach the same parties, we will stand misrepresented, and a good deal of harm will thus have been done to the cause of harmony and of mutual regard. Under the circumstances it is my duty to the Primate of the English Church in Canada himself, as well as to the country and to the Catholic Bishops of the Dominion, whose petition of last year was the occasion of those objectionable statements, it is my duty to all to say that such are not our claims or sentiments and that nothing in the petition referred to could warrant the assertion. That we do not seek for "specially favourable terms," I have fully demonstrated in the former part of these remarks. We only want to return to that situation so correctly defined by Rev. Dr. Bryce in 1877, when "no special rights were given to either Catholics or Protestants," when "the Roman Catholic schools were as much national as the Protestant," when "no church was given a place of precedence," and when there "was no bone of contention to disturb the prevailing harmony," on account of the "perfect religious equality and toleration subsisting in Manitoba" in 1882. Neither do we oppose "what remains of religion" in the so-called public schools of Manitoba; on the contrary we heartily rejoice that so much of christianity yet remains in those schools. It is a gain for which we thank God, but His Grace the Primate himself acknowledges in the same breath that it is too little—"Alas, too little!" he exclaims.

In that we agree with the metropolitan of Rupert's Land. We believe that the mere reading of a few passages of the Bible selected by the state is a creedless christianity. It is not the teaching of religion, because there is no teaching unless the true and intrinsic meaning of a subject is imparted to the student. Fancy an undergraduate undergoing an examination on his Euclid with a general notion of it only. Would not that man be plucked? That kind of religious exercises is nothing but the system deprecated in the following words by Lord Salisbury:

Numbers of persons have invented what I may call a patent compressible religion, which can be forced into all consciences with a very little squeezing; and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. What I want to impress upon you is that if you admit this conception, you are entering upon a religious war of which you will not see the end.

Again we say, with the Right Reverend Metropolitan, what Christian reading there is in the schools at present is "too little." We do not oppose that much, but, acting consistently with our principles and our judgment, we urgently pray that a supplement be added to that "too little" already given, so as to make the teaching of religion equal to the requirements of conscience, equal to the requirements of a Christian nation, equal to the rule laid down and unanimously resolved by the General Synod of the English Church, as stated by the eminent divine above referred to, namely:

That religious teaching in our public schools is absolutely necessary in order to fulfil the true purpose of education and to conserve the highest interests of the nation at large.

Here, let me quote a few words from Chancellor Von Caprivi, speaking in the German Assembly, on school matters:—

We feel we are living in very serious time amid forces against which we must rally all our resources of defence * * It is certain we cannot dispense with religion in this work. It is beyond dispute that most schools need christianity. The school however, cannot possess this without creeds; it must therefore be connected with the churches whence creeds emanate.

Von Caprivi only draws in these words logical conclusions from a sound principle. Once more, I say, we do not oppose any of the christian features that the schools under the supervision of the advisory board may have, but until that is done in Manitoba, until the needed supplement can be given to that "too little," we maintain without disturbing the schools of our Protestant fellow citizens, and at an extra cost, our schools where proper and sufficient religious training is given, we cannot help thinking with his Grace, that what is given at present in the schools of Manitoba in the way of religious instruction is "too little." And we fear that, in the course of time, such a deficiency in religious training in our schools would make of the latter what the editor of the New York Methodist called once in speaking of the United States schools, "hot beds of infidelity." We want, by persisting in our stand upon this matter, to be worthy of these remarkable words pronounced in the House of Lords, in 1891, by Lord Argyle :

In Victoria, the Roman Catholics had the high honour of standing alone in refusing to pull down in their schools the everlasting standard of conscience. The resistance on the part of the Roman Catholics I believe may be the germ of a strong reaction against the pure secularism, against what I venture to call the pure Paganism of the education of the colony.

With these few remarks, for the patient hearing of which I most sincerely thank this honourable House, I move for the return to which my notice relates.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—There is no objection to bring down and lay before the House all the correspondence, such as there is, but I am not aware at the present moment that there has been correspondence of any consequence. My recollection is, however, that a letter was received, but I think it was to myself from the Right Rev. Archbishop of Rupert's Land. Speaking from memory, I should say that it is of such a character that there will be no objection whatever to lay it before the House, or any other information of the character required by the hon. gentleman.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES BAY RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to Bill (87) "An Act to incorporate the James Bay Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then read the third time and passed.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee on the whole on Bill (92) "An Act further to amend the Insurance Act."

In the Committee.

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to direct the attention of the minister in charge of the bill to the fact that there is an omission in the proposed subsection 7. It reads as follows :

7. The statements mentioned in the next preceding section and the statements of Canada business provided for in the first subsection of this section shall be deposited in the office of the superintendent on the first day of January next following the date thereof, or within two months thereafter; and every statement of general business provided for in the first subsection of this section shall be deposited in the office of the superintendent within fifteen days after it is required by law to be made to the government of the country in which the head office of the company whose statement it is, is situate, or within fifteen days after the submission of the same at the annual meeting of the shareholders or members of the company, whichever date first occurs: Provided however, that no such statement of general business need be so deposited earlier than the first day of May, nor shall it be so deposited later than the thirtieth day of June next following the date thereof.

I wish to direct the attention of the minister to the fact that in the first subclause, line 24, he has provided for another case which he has not provided for here :

And, in the event of no such statement being submitted to such members or shareholders, shall show in concise form the assets and liabilities of the company at such balancing day and the income and expenditure of the company for the year ending on such balancing day. The blank forms of the statements of the Canada business shall be supplied by the superintendent.

There is no provision made for the date at which that statement shall be submitted. I suppose something of this sort would do; "or if no such statement is submitted to the shareholders; then at the close of the company's business year, or two months afterwards," or something of that sort.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The proviso at the end of the clause covers that case "provided, however, that no such statement of general business need be so deposited earlier than the first day of May, nor shall it be so deposited later than the 30th day of June next following the date thereof." That applies to the statement filed with the department and would also cover the case referred to by the hon. gentleman. It covers all statements. They have to be put in at such a date and not later than the date mentioned.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is, I think, true, but then I should ask the committee if there does not appear to be a conflict between the earlier part of the subclause and the latter part :

Every statement of the general business provided for under the said first subsection of this section, shall be deposited in the office of the superintendent within fifteen days after it is required by law to be made to the government of the country in which the head office of the company whose statement it is situate, or within fifteen days after the submission of the same at the annual meeting of the shareholders or members of the company, whichever date first occurs.

That is an express provision.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—"Provided that in no case shall it be later than such a date."

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing the business year ends at the end of the calendar year, this latter part is directly in conflict with the earlier part :

Nor shall it be so deposited later than the 30th day of June next following the date thereof.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If the business year ended in January, they would, according to law, be bound to give the statement not later than fifteen days after.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You say it need not be deposited earlier than the first of May nor later than the 30th June. It is all right to say that it must not be deposited later than the 30th June, but why should you say it need not be deposited before the first of May ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The law provides that companies that give statements to the shareholders must file them within thirty days after such statement is made. That applies to companies who make statements. There are companies who do not make statements to their shareholders. In that case we say it shall not be later than the 30th June next following the date thereof.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be the intention, but it is not carried out in the clause.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It seems to me quite clear as it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I appeal to the committee if I am not right—if it is not perfectly clear that this proviso applies to all the general statements.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The construction put upon this by the officer who is specially in charge of the service agrees with the one I have given to the House, which is this, that when there is a date fixed by a company to give its statement, that statement should be given to us fifteen days after, that when there is no date fixed, they have to send that statement to the department here, and it is not required to be earlier than the first of May, but it must not be later than the 30th June, so that it covers all the cases that can come under the effect of that clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not undertake to say what the department meant. I am not raising any question about that, but I appeal to any man who can understand the English language as to what it means. I think there is a direct conflict between the proviso and what goes before. The Minister says the proviso was only intended to apply to cases where no statements were made by the companies to their shareholders. Why not limit the proviso to those cases ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—What amendment do you suggest ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is for the department to take care of the bill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Then I move that the clause be carried as it is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have only read the bill hastily. There are two cases provided for, one where the company have a general meeting under their own charter and are obliged to make returns to the government of the country where they hold their charter. In the one case they are obliged within fifteen days after that meeting to send a return to Ottawa to be filed here. There is another case where they have not had a general meeting and have not made up a statement under their charter. In that case they must send a statement here between the 1st May and 30th June. There is no doubt that proviso would apply to both cases, which creates some inconsistency.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The superintendent of insurance says that he referred it to the Minister of Justice who thought that the language covered the point.

The clause was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen will recognize that within the last year or two there was very considerable attention drawn to insurance on children, and I think we should add in our schedule the list of what we call industrial insurance take on lives below 10 years of age. The subject is creating a good deal of discussion and a bill has been introduced into Parliament on the subject, limiting the amount. There was pressure brought to bear on insurance companies to extend the amount to be put on children and that was extended, but I think the Minister should draw the attention of the department to the importance of having a special provision as to that, making the companies in their returns show the number of children under ten or 8 or any age they may fix, but it struck me ten would be about a fair age. It is certain that the system has been very much abused, and in the interests of good morals I think it highly important that we should have some such provision added.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—In Massachusetts the most strict and careful inquiry that ever was made about that same subject in any country resulted in a report strongly in favour of the insurance of children. It is not perhaps generally understood that up to a certain age—13, 14 or 15—if anything was to happen to the child and it died they got no benefit, but simply got what they paid in, and while the hon. gentleman from Ottawa may be quite right in wanting the returns brought in, I think anybody who has taken the trouble to look into the matter must come to the conclusion that there has been a great deal of talk about the insurance of children which was undeserved and undesirable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In confirmation of what the hon. gentleman has stated, as I understand from the insurance companies, they limit themselves, of their own mere motion, the amount to a sum considerably less than the latitude afforded them under the Ontario statute. So I think it is quite in the interests of all parties that we should know the real facts.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In answer to that request, I may state that under the present law the inspector is empowered to obtain from the companies a return showing the ages of children insured by the different companies. The section that would apply to it is section 19. And the attention of the department will be drawn to the fact that the reports should show what the hon. gentleman mentions. I may say that I have since the discussion brought before this House by the hon. gentleman from Hopewell, drawn the attention of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec to the law enacted in Ontario limiting the insurance of children, and he gave me to understand that in his province he would submit to the legislature a law to the same effect. I think before long the other provinces will follow the example, and no evil will result from it. I now hold in my hand an amendment which I thought the hon. gentleman from Ottawa was going to propose, and which I should support myself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move the following amendment:

That the following amendment be made to section 4 of the Insurance Act, to be designated subsection a :—

Subsection a—Provided always that before issuing a license to a company, legally formed elsewhere than in Canada, the Minister must be satisfied that the corporate name of the company applying for the license is not that of any other known company incorporated or unincorporated, or any name liable to be confounded therewith, or otherwise on public grounds objectionable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think we should qualify that so as to provide that it shall not be the name of any other company doing business in Canada because there might be a company in England or some where else.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am following the statutes of England.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—This clause would cover the objection made the other day to a private bill which came before this House, where private individuals were trying to get an incorporation under the name of the Bankers' Life Association. Referring to the name the other day I made, what I thought, would be taken as a joke. Now, the very fact that that joke created a certain impression shows how important the name of a company is. It only gives force to my argument that men in most cases are deceived by the name.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) from the committee reported the bill with one amendment, which was concurred in.

THE COMPANIES' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the Whole on Bill (K) "An Act to amend the Companies Act."

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN from the Committee reported the bill without amendment.

BANKERS' LIFE ASSOCIATION BILL.

REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being read "Consideration of amendments by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill (26) "An Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada,"

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the 49th rule be suspended with regard to this bill.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—Before this bill is further proceeded with, I think it should be referred back to committee with a view to changing its name.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This motion does not involve the consideration of the question as to the name, but merely as to publication. When publication appeared in the newspapers with reference to the bill it was not advertised in the various provinces throughout the Dominion, owing to an omission in a certain circular issued by the clerk of the House of Commons. I therefore ask for a suspension of the rule and after that I will move for the adoption of the report, and then the hon. gentleman will be in order to discuss the title of the bill.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—The motion the hon. gentleman has made it is competent for me to speak of the bill as I do. The name of the Bankers' Insurance Company is calculated to deceive and therefore should not be countenanced by this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I call my hon. friend to order, because there is a notice of motion with reference to the name which will be moved after the House expresses itself on the suspension of the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the amendments as embodied in the report of the committee be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Among the amendments is a change in the name of the company. If we adopt those amendments it will compromise the House in taking exception to the title of the bill. The title has been amended, and that must be excepted from the amendment which we are asked to concur in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—With the consent of the House I will put the motion in this way—that the amendments be concurred in with the exception of the amendment with reference to the title.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the concurrence of the House in the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to the title, "The Bankers' Life Insurance Association of Canada."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move in amendment that said bill be referred back to the committee with instructions to select another name.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—That is the purpose with which I started.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It will be quite consonant with parliamentary practice that the title be amended without referring the bill back.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—The correct course is to send the bill back to committee with a view to the substitution of another name for the name inserted here, because I think we are all proud of the status of our banking institutions and we should allow nothing to be engrafted upon them that would be calculated to mislead the public. The very name here would give this insurance company a sort of credit or weight. It is not desirable that that should be done, and I therefore agree with the motion made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa to refer the bill back to committee with a view to having the name changed to another, and that the name "bank" or "bankers" be not incorporated with the bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—As I understand the question, it is not desirable that we should give countenance to this name if we can avoid it, because I know it would have the effect of giving an undue strength to this company in the country; but as I understand the matter, there are two or three insurance companies in the United States that are ready to come into this country and the inspector of insurance here tells us he cannot keep them out.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—We have amended the law to-day to do that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Then I was speaking under a misapprehension. What I was about to say is this— if we are to have this name at all, I should prefer one of our own companies to have it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The amendment does not keep the company out with a particular name, it simply widens the discretion given to the government in regard to saying whether a company shall come into the country with a name conflicting with the name of any other company.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Or otherwise objectionable.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope my hon. friend will not say that the name is objectionable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On public grounds it is.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the hon. gentleman views the matter differently from the people of the United States and England. The hon. gentleman from Alma said he was unaware of any other company with a similar name. In deference to the wishes of the promoters of the bill, and in explanation of their action in asking that this name be given to the company, I may mention the fact that in the United States and in England there are various companies bearing this appellation. In England there are two companies, one known as the Bankers' Guarantee, Limited, and the other Bankers' Guarantee Insurance Company, doing a large business in Great Britain. So far as I am aware, no such objection has been raised to the adoption of those names by the companies to which I have referred, as appears to exist in the minds of the hon. gentleman in this House. It did not appear from the action of the Committee on Banking and Commerce of the House of Commons and also the House of Commons itself that the objections which weigh so seriously here in the minds of hon. gentlemen weighed with the more popular body in reference to this particular company. In the United States where insurance is carried on to probably a higher degree of excellence than elsewhere there are no less than 6 or 7 companies with a similar name doing business. With the permission of the House, I will enumerate them:

The Bankers' Insurance Association of Des Moines, Iowa

The Bankers' Life Association of St. Paul, Minnesota.

The Bankers' Life Association of Kansas City.

The Bankers' Life Association of Illinois.
The Bankers' Life Association of Lincoln, Nebraska.

The Bankers' Life Association of New York.

For ought I know, there may be other associations on the continent doing business under a similar name. Why should such apprehension exist in the minds of legislators in this House, when in so conservative a country as Great Britain, we find companies doing business under this particular name? I mention this fact in vindication of the action taken by the promoters and in justification of their application to Parliament that they should assume this name. My hon. friend from Ottawa yesterday took the liberty of saying that we were perpetrating a fraud on the public in permitting any company to adopt this name.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend's olfactory organs may be more sensitive in detecting a scent of fraud than those of others, but I fail to see how fraud is attempted on the people of Canada because we give a company a respectable name. I have sufficient confidence in the intelligence of our people to believe that they will not be deceived because a company has this name or that they will associate it with the name of some institution which has no connection with it. Will my hon. friend say that any intelligent man seeking insurance and looking at the name of this company will conclude that it is a company run by the banking institutions of Canada? I will hazard the opinion that there is not an intelligent man in the Dominion of Canada who can possibly think, that because an insurance company adopted this particular name, it necessarily follows that it is an institution doing business under the patronage of or in connection with the banking institutions of Canada. The amendment proposed by the hon. member from Ottawa, and apparently accepted by the government, to the General Insurance Act, will not obviate the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member from Monck. If any insurance company coming from the United States, or from Great Britain, should ask for a license to do business in Canada, I apprehend that the Department of Finance at once, seeing that the Government of Great Britain or of some State in the United States, allowed the company to adopt this particular name would likewise permit them to do business in Canada under that name. Will any one tell me that when an application is made by a company for a license that the government could with justification say to them "this name is infringing on the banking institutions of this country, and notwithstanding the fact that the government of Great Britain allowed you to use this name, we will not permit you to use it in Canada?" Could such a course of reasoning be adopted by a department of this government on an application for a license made by a company duly authorized by a foreign government to do business under a similar name? There should be strong and reasonable grounds before this House permits this name to be rejected, and unless you pass an Act of Parliament expressly precluding Parliament in the future from granting this name to any company, in the very near future there will either be a company incorporated by Parliament to do business under this name or license will be granted to a foreign company to do business under this name in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell me how many companies there are in the United States with that name?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I mentioned the number, but the hon. gentleman was not in his place at the time. I am glad the hon. gentleman has just come in. My hon. friend the other day took occasion to say that he was very familiar with the names of the various insurance companies in the United States, and was unaware of any company of any standing doing business under this name. I have taken occasion to make inquiries and find that in Great Britain there are two companies and in the United States six companies doing business under names similar to this.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will you say that none of those companies originated with the banks—that is the whole point?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In answer to the statement made by the hon. member from Calgary that in the United States there are six companies and in Great Britain two companies doing business under the same name, I want to point out the fact how very catching that name must be. Why would there be six companies doing business under that very name in the United States if it was not a catching name? The idea of the House is that we should not sanction the use of a catching name to deceive the public. If this institution was to be carried out by bankers there would be no objection to incorporating it, although it is for the purpose of life insurance, but if there are no bankers connected with the company why should Parliament allow the name to be taken? It is said that in England Parliament has allowed the use of the name and would the Department of Finance here be justified in refusing to give a license to an English company under that name? If the Parliament of England has incorporated a company to do life insurance business under that name, I assume that the association must be a bankers' association, because I do not think the Parliament of England would allow the people of that country to be deceived by a name, nor should we do so here. In the United States if they have incorporated companies under that very name, I hope they have been influenced by the same motives—that they must be really banking institutions who intend to carry on the business of life insurance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I said they were insurance companies, not banking institutions.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If they allow them to take that name, they must have been bankers or banking institutions that wanted to do a life insurance business. If not they have deceived their people, and I think they have from the fact that six companies have assumed the name. Should we allow the same thing here? That is the question. I do not think the House would oppose the name in any way if this life association was to be carried out by bankers, but we find out that there is not a banking institution that has one cent of capital in it, and we are asked to lead our people to believe that this company has accumulated capital and is one of the wealthy institutions of the Dominion. That is the only objection to it, and to-day in accepting the useful amendment made by the hon. member from Ottawa to the Insurance Act, the government will have in its hands sufficient power to refuse a license to a foreign company with an objectionable name; I think such a name as the one proposed in this instance is an objectionable one.

The motion was agreed to.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—At the adjournment yesterday I was reading the evidence of Mr. Ratté, who owns a boathouse and whose business has been very seriously interfered with. He is the gentleman who presented the petition to which I have referred. Then there is the evidence of John Heney, "honest John," who knows a good deal of the river and has given us some valuable information respecting it:

Q. How long have you resided in Ottawa?—A. Since 1844.

Q. You have known the Ottawa River for all that time?—A. Yes.

Q. Are you engaged in the forwarding business?—A. Yes, we have sent boats the last fifteen or twenty years up and down the river, chiefly for cordwood along the river.

Q. Please state to the committee what you knew about the river forty years ago, its condition at that time and any illustrations that you know of that would show more clearly the condition of things at that time as compared with the state of the river at present?—A. The river was navigable mostly in every part forty years ago, and at that time we had a fair share of water, and as for fishing and the like of that it was all right. We had nothing to interrupt navigation at the time. At that time there were not many mills, only one or two small mills at the Chaudière. The creeks were all clear, and you could sail where you liked through them and through the coves all round the river here. In any kind of fair water you could go where you liked, and now that is not so.

Q. Could you state any particular points of the river that are injured?—A. The part that I have noticed more particularly, because my business leads me to remark it, is at the foot of the locks. At low water it is almost impossible to go in there unless you run the risk of breaking your tow lines. It has been three or four times dredged out to my memory.

Q. I believe you had a dredge working there?—A. Yes. That year the water was low and we could not get into the locks, and the government employed the dredge for a certain number of days to clear the channel out. We cleared it out in a sort of a way for the time and left it so that boats could pass in and out, but it filled in immediately again.

Q. What was the nature of the stuff you removed from it?—A. Pretty much saw-dust and slabs and rough stuff.

Q. Mill refuse?—A. Yes, there was bark and saw-dust, slabs and edgings.

Q. What depth of water was there when you first knew it?—A. There must have been 15 or 20 feet of water at the foot of the locks when I first knew it. I never measured it but from the bottom of the locks there must have been a good depth of water at the approach.

Q. No more than 15 or 20 feet?—A. I cannot say I measured it, but there was no interruption to navigation going in. I never had occasion to measure it.

Q. Did you raise the refuse when you dredged it?—A. Yes, we took it out altogether and brought it out to a point where the current took it away. Since that there was a new plan got up to drag it out to the channel where the current would take it. We took it out of that altogether into the strong current where it was washed away.

Q. Do you know anything about the fishing in that river in years gone by?—A. Yes, there was lots of fish in it when I first came here.

Q. Are there any now?—A. I do not think there are many.

Q. Of all the refuse that you say settles there, which is the worst?—A. I think the sawdust is the worst.

Q. Have you paid any attention to the gradual accumulation of saw-dust and refuse the last few years?—A. Yes, and everybody that has seen it has remarked it.

Q. What do you think is the cause of the fish going away?—A. I cannot say what is the cause of the fish going, but they say they clear away according as the creeks that they used to go into are filled with sawdust. I do not know myself, but I have heard men of experience say so.

Q. You have seen this large amount of saw-dust on the other side of the river?—A. Yes.

Q. And you have seen the explosions that occurred there?—A. No, I did not see them, but I have heard of them often.

Q. Do you know any instance of those explosions occurring in your earlier days?—A. No.

Q. Only since this sawdust has collected there?—A. Yes, that is all.

Q. In your opinion this obstruction of navigation is owing to the saw-dust and mill refuse?—A. It has contributed a great deal towards it, I am sure of that.

Q. You said you did not know exactly what the depth of water was at the locks in the early days?—A. No.

Q. But still you had amply sufficient for your purpose?—A. Yes, I heard two complaints about it. Mr. Hutchinson knows every inch of water that has been there for the last twenty years, but I never had any occasion to measure it.

Q. What do you suppose will be the effect on this river if the practice of throwing in mill refuse is allowed to continue?—A. We will have no navigation at all in any parts of the river.

Q. That is in low water?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you think it has an injurious effect as far as the health of the city is concerned?—A. I cannot say as to that.

Q. You know that we had a good deal of sickness in this city last fall?—A. Yes.

Q. When you refer to the difficulty at the time of the dredging at the foot of the locks was the water not very low?—A. Yes.

Q. Was the water not lower last year than it has been known at any time during the past forty years?—A. It was very low last year.

Q. What is the depth of the water at the foot of the locks?—A. This last few years my boats coming in there cannot load to 5 feet—they used to be stuck in this rubbish coming in loaded at 5 feet.

Q. Do they stick at any other point coming up the river?—A. No, not until they come to the foot of the locks.

Q. Is there not a large forwarding trade in lumber from the saw mills of the Chaudière on that river?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you ever known of the main channel of the river being impeded in any way by deposits of this material, or is it only in the bays or shoals?—A. I saw Captain Bowie's boat stuck in the main channel coming up.

Q. When was that?—A. That was a few years ago.

Q. I suppose she is the largest boat that plies on that river?—A. She does not draw the most water, I do not think she draws as much water as our forwarding boats do.

Q. Was it not in sand that she stuck?—A. Sand and sawdust.

Q. That was on a bar?—A. It was a bar in the middle of the river below the island.

Q. Have you ever heard of any place on the river that required dredging except at the mouth of the canal?—A. Yes, we were called upon to go and dredge in this same bar in the channel and we found sawdust and sand in the channel about the centre of the river at Kettle Island, that vessels could hardly pass over, that is near the centre of the river, in the mid-channel. The island stands in high water pretty near the middle of the river, but in low water it is more to the north of the channel.

Q. Was it not between the Quebec shore and the island the steamer was stuck?—A. No, she does not go in the Quebec channel at all; she keeps the Upper Canada side, and when she approached the upper end of the island she stuck on the bar there that runs out from the island and we were called upon to dredge it and we found both saw-dust and sand mixed in that part.

Q. It is your experience that after the high water these deposits disappeared somewhat?—A. I never remarked whether it was the case or not.

Q. Did you ever take any soundings of any part of the river?—A. Never in my life because we worked away until the stoppage of navigation the best way we could and I never took any soundings.

The next witness whose evidence I will read is Mr. T. C. Keefer a civil engineer, known throughout the Dominion as a very practical and scientific man, who has had a good deal to do with the improvement of this river at various places, and is quite competent to form an opinion. He used to store logs in a bay below Rockliffe and since this saw-dust nuisance was created the bay has become perfectly useless:—

Q. How long have you been here?—A. I have been in Ottawa continuously since 1864, but I came here first in 1845, and remained a number of years here.

Q. Will you please give us the benefit of your experience as to the conditions of the river at that time as compared with the present?—A. When I first came here it was before the era of sawmills altogether. There were no commercial mills. When I returned here to permanently reside in 1863 or 1864 I purchased a piece of property below Rideau Hall Bay—the next adjoining bay. The shores were then entirely clean—rock, sand and gravel, and the beach sandy and gravelly. The bay was used for storing sawlogs. They could be floated in there and got at any pitch of water, and floated out again. One year the Gilmours, on the Gatineau, rented that bay from me for that purpose; but of late years it has not been available to any extent because of the deposit of saw-dust.

Q. What was the depth of water there when you first bought the property?—A. The water was all depths. It began at the shore and went out to forty feet, but some years ago—probably ten years ago—I examined it, and at that time there was a deposit of several acres of saw-dust out in front of this gravel beach, and the outer edge of it was steeper than an ordinary sand bank, and forty feet in depth. I also built a road down at two points on this bay to get access to it to haul out cedars and building timber; but except at very high water I cannot approach within two hundred yards of the roads on account of the deposit of saw-dust, and the boathouse I had there is useless from the same cause. It has not been used for several years. In fact it has been abandoned. The only place where we can get access to the river is on the rocky point where the current is strong, opposite Rockliffe ferry. Then below Rockliffe, at Hillman's mills, there was another bay, a valuable storage place for logs, and that is in the same condition at low water. There are acres and acres of it, just a mass of rotting saw-dust, that you cannot walk on without sinking to your knees.

Q. Is that bed of saw-dust exposed at low water?—A. Yes, it is several feet out of water in low water, and all through the winter.

Q. Are there any other points on the river with which you are acquainted that have been obstructed by the saw-dust and refuse?—A. I have not examined any other part of the river. This point I am speaking of, McKay's Bay above the Government bay is in the same state—in fact it extends over a mile and a-half of frontage from the New Edinburgh mills to Hillman's mills below Rockliffe, all in the same state.

Q. Have there been any explosions in that part of the river?—A. I have seen explosions when boating on the river, but I do not know that I have seen them in any of those places I have spoken of. I have seen them up nearer to the city.

Q. Are they dangerous to boats?—A. If a boat happened to be very near them—a canoe or light skiff—some of the explosions are serious enough to upset them.

Q. You were employed by the Government before the saw mills were constructed?—A. Yes, in 1845 when I built the slides at the Chaudière, that place was all covered with green cedars; and it was only after that, when the Honorable Mr. Merritt came into power that this water power was put in the market. The government had held it as a reserve up to that time. That was in 1850.

Q. And all those obstructions in the river that you complain of were caused since the erection of those mills?—A. Yes, as far as my observations in the lower part of the river go, it has all been caused since 1864 or 1865. I forget when the mill first became important on the river. There was no commercial manufacture of lumber on the river when I first knew it. There was just a couple of local mills at the Chaudière.

Q. Can you give us an idea of what the effect on the river will be if this deposit of mill refuse continues?—A. I have no doubt that the annual freshets will assist to keep the main channel clear, especially with the aid of a little dredging at the bars; but gradually, if this thing continues the bays will fill up. Saw-dust floats, and a large proportion of it is blown into the bay and cannot get out, and remains there until it rots. The bays are nearly all as full as they can be. The remainder must settle in the channel somewhere or another—that is in the deeper portions of the channel, and as it levels them up it must begin to contract the remainder of the channel, so that it is a process which will hinder navigation some time or another. The only point about it is, that it is of a character that the paddle wheels or screws of a vessel can work in it, and they will wallow a hole in it and wear through in time. It is not like a sand or mud bar.

Q. Have you noticed the effect of the hogging process on the refuse? Does it not sink through to the bottom?—A. That binds the saw-dust and makes it more solid, and less likely to change its place, or for the current to act upon it.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the effect it has had upon the fish?—A. I know that fish are very scarce; we cannot get any now.

Q. How was it in the early days?—A. They were very plentiful then. I do not think any respectable fish would come up here now. The shad used to come up in my early days to within 18 miles of Ottawa.

Q. Is it your experience that those deposits you have described are gradually extending?—A. Yes, they must; there is so much saw-dust going into the river, and I do not think it will be carried over the Long Sault rapids or down the river. When it fills up all the bays, it must then fill in the channel in the course of time. It is merely a question of time and the extent of the sawing, whether lumber gives out before the channel does.

Q. A few miles below Ottawa, where the river widens out, the current is not very strong?—A. The current is very strong down below the mouth of the Gatineau; then the river widens out, and it is shallower with sand-bars. Gatineau village is built on the delta at the mouth of the Gatineau river.

Q. Can you give us an idea of the possibility of disposing of the saw-dust in some other way without incurring large expense?—A. I do not think burning is a very expensive process, except the getting of a site for it in this place. The ground is so occupied that it will be necessary to diminish the piling grounds at the mills, or to construct furnaces at the river's edge. I do not think there is any difficulty about it. The expense of the plant necessary would be very slight. The appliances for getting it from the saws and taking it to the furnaces would be the principal question. The saws are not probably high enough above high water mark to convey it readily to the furnaces, but I have never looked into the question to see how furnaces could be used.

Q. Is it within your knowledge that saw-dust can be converted to some other valuable purpose besides fuel?—A. Yes, it has been used for paper pulp, and it is also used in connection with petroleum for patent fuel.

Q. Did you ever try it for bedding for horses?—A. Yes, we have forty horses here for the street railway, and for the last 18 years we have used no other bedding but saw-dust. I consider it the very best material for stables.

Q. Have you ever considered whether it has any ill effect on the health of the locality, where this mass of refuse is allowed to accumulate?—A. When the epidemic at Ottawa last year was ascribed to the water, I was satisfied that it could not be the cause. The Ottawa River flows with a strong current, and is decanted from a series of lakes above here, and no water could be in a better condition, unless it could be poisoned by mills above here. I have not examined the amount of saw-dust deposited in the river above Ottawa, but I do not know of anything to poison the water in any way. It would have to come in contact with decayed saw-dust for a long time to produce that effect. The doctors ascribed the epidemic to the water, because it was a universal that they could not ascribe it to any local cause; but I think that as the water is not used generally by the people except in a boiled state, and the air is used by everybody, I think the air is where we should look for the cause of the difficulty. Ottawa is peculiarly situated to be affected by its atmosphere, in the dry summer, such at last summer was especially. It is almost entirely surrounded by water, and most of that stagnant water. There is on the south-west Dow's Lake; then there is the Rideau Canal, and its filthy gullies, and the Canal Basin, and the Rideau River which about its mouth is a dead pond which is used to receive the water of the by-wash; then on the north we have the river with its vast mass of saw-dust along its banks, and when that is left dry and exposed to the heat of the sun, if anything can affect the atmosphere that should do so. We know that in water reservoirs the water is poisoned under the same circumstances by allowing vegetable matter to accumulate so that it is necessary at times to deepen them and lime them, and every town supplied with water by gravitation has that difficulty to contend with.

Q. Did you ever consider the practicability of removing those deposits?—A. I do not see any way of removing them unless they can be dredged. I think that when you get inside, away from the fresh deposit, the bank is so solid with its mixture of mud and slime that it would be dredgeable material. The outer side would be loosened and scattered, and the only way I know of would be to keep dredging at it during a high water when there is a strong current and keep sending it down the river.

Q. Would not that lodge down below again?—A. You would have to keep it moving wherever it stopped.

Q. If it is an injury here it would be an injury below?—A. It would be spread over such a large area in the lakes below, that it would not be so injurious. But, of course, there would be no use in doing that unless you stopped the practice of throwing the stuff into the river from the saw mills.

Q. Do you not think that would be the most effectual way of stopping the deposits?—A. That would be the necessary way. If it were scattered by dredging, and all put below water it would soon disappear entirely. It is the exposure of these deposits at low water to the action of the atmosphere and the heat of the sun that affects the health question.

Q. But the depositing of saw-dust in the river must be stopped?—A. Yes, I believe it is a great folly to be removing it at one end, and supplying it at the other.

Q. You speak of there being no saw-dust in the river above the city, I believe they are not allowed to deposit any saw-dust in the river above the Chaudière?—A. I have not visited any of those mills, but I understand that the old Skead mill is a steam mill, and so is the one at Masons; and the Water Works Act prohibits anything of that kind from being deposited in the river six miles above the Chaudière. The saw-dust from Hillman's mill is not put into the river. It is only where they have water to carry saw-dust and refuse into the river that the mill owners send it there. A steam mill can get rid of it cheaper by carting it out and burning it than by putting it into the river. It is to the steam mills we look for our supply of saw-dust generally, because they have piles of it, but at the water mills you can only get it while they are sawing.

Q. Do not the steam mills burn all their saw-dust?—A. Yes, at Gilmour's mill down here they burn all their saw-dust, and at Edwards's mills at Rockland their saw-dust is burned. There is no difficulty with the saw-dust in the steam mills; they burn it, and that is the only way to deal with it economically when it is not thrown into the river. Of course if you could market it—manufacture it into anything that would sell—it would be better, but I doubt if it would stand the cost of freighting it away from here.

Q. I think you said that if the sawdust banks were dredged and the stuff was once moved out into the current, it would go down the river. Could its motion be controlled in such a way as to allow it to be deposited in some place where it could be more easily removed?—A. My idea is that if you dredge the face of these banks, which are forty feet deep in some places along the river, into a certain distance, then you would find the saw-dust would be solid enough, mixed as it is with river mud and silt, to be loaded on to scows in the usual way as dredged material. Then it would have to be dumped in some way into deep holes in the river, or carried on shore, which would be expensive. I think the proper way would be to dredge out the bays and scatter the material over the river, removing it from the channel, wherever you found it encroaching. Of course where it is mixed with sand or any material that could be lifted in the dredge bucket, it could be scowed off. If it goes on as it is now there will soon be no part of the river to deposit it in. Of course some parts of the channel are very deep. Opposite the mouth of the Gatineau it is seventy feet deep, but when you get below Kettle Island it is not more than five feet in low water. If this stuff were levelled over the bottom between here and the Gatineau, and the banks were cut down to a couple feet below water line, so that no lowering of the river would expose it to the action of the sun and atmosphere, it would cease to be dangerous to the health of the city.

Q. Do the city authorities permit the depositing of stuff from the yards on the ice in the winter—night soil and yard rubbish?—A. I do not know what they are doing the last year or two; but it was a common practice until very lately to deposit such stuff in front of these buildings from the Queen's Wharf and on the Rideau, the ice used to be covered with it in the spring of the year.

Q. From Hull or Ottawa or both?—A. From both sides. I have seen it going down from this city, but I do not remember exactly when. Of course, before the main sewer was built, and the waterworks were built, it was all disposed of in that way.

By Honourable Mr. Botsford:

Q. Where does the main sewer of Ottawa empty?—A. Through Maclaren's mill yard below Sir John Macdonald's residence. The main sewer leads into this valley directly down from here—between here and Maria street goes under the canal, and through Lower Town on the line of the old by-wash, through Queen street and then straight out into the Ottawa river at Maclaren's lumber yard.

Q. Mr. Gray in his evidence says there are large quantities of sand mixed with the saw-dust in these deposits, but if the shoals are filled up and the bays along the river are filled up, I suppose that would only make the current in the main channel all the more swift?—A. No, it would not affect the current in the main channel. A bay with dead water is pretty much the same as a channel without bays.

Q. If the bays were filled in, and the same quantity of water having to go through more rapidly than if the bays were not filled in?—A. The bays are not the channel. They are out of the line of the channel, and if they did not exist at all the channel question would be the same except that the water as it rose would have a little of the surface of the bay to relieve it and it would not rise quite so high as it would if there were no bays.

Q. Not having the bays the water would be a little higher and be more rapid?—A. Yes.

Q. So far as you have been able to gather, the main channel has not been materially lessened by that deposit?—A. Not from what I have observed. In fact I have not observed it at all. It is only from the examination of the bottom of the shoal places that you can tell whether the saw-dust is encroaching on it or not.

Q. Don't you think that from the class of material thrown in, a current of four or five miles an hour would naturally keep it in motion?—A. If it were fresh, but if it sinks and becomes mixed with the silt and mud of the river I don't think the current would start it. It would carry it off if it were turned up by a dredge or paddle wheel or screw.

Q. Supposing a scheme for the burning of the saw-dust here were to be undertaken, would it be necessary to remove the saw-dust as it was made to a distance from the city or would it affect the insurable property of the city if it were consumed here near at hand?—A. That is a question you would have to ask the insurance companies. What I would say is it ought not to affect the insurance at all, for of course the furnaces would have to be places in a safe position and constructed so that there would be absolutely no danger from them. So I do not see any difficulty in that. It is just a question of the space the furnaces would occupy and the expense of bringing the material to the furnaces.

Q. How high up does the tide affect the Hudson?—A. It affects it up as far as Albany, although the water is not salt.

Q. Would not the sewage of the Hudson affect the fishing?—A. No, I think the sewage would attract fish. It is the saw-dust that gets into their gills that interferes with the fish. Sand has the same effect. That is what drives fish away, any impurity in the water that gets into their gills; but as for sewage anything that enriches the water I think they rather like.

Q. The permanent injury that you refer to on the Ottawa from the saw-dust deposit is in the bays and shoals along the shores?—A. In my case it is a very serious damage to me. It renders my river front not only valueless to me but a very great nuisance. I had made roads to it for the purpose of using it for commercial purposes, and I had a boat-house built which has been rendered useless, and the river lots cannot be sold for residences as they could have been if the saw-dust were not there.

The next witness is Wm. Addison, who had been a navigator of the river a great many years and was lockmaster in this city at the time of giving this evidence :

Q. How long have you been a resident of this city?—A. About sixty years.

Q. You know all about this river?—A. I know considerable about it.

Q. You have been on the river a good deal boating, I believe?—A. Yes.

Q. Just give us an idea of the character of the river before the saw mills were erected?—A. Up to the time I quit boating there was no trouble at all in the river.

Q. How long ago was that?—A. About 20 years now since I quit boating.

Q. How far back does your memory extend with regard to the river and its condition?—A. Thirty years.

Q. What was the condition of the river at that time?—A. It was clear in the bays and every where else.

Q. Was there any saw-dust?—A. There was no sawdust. Coming up the river from Grenville all along the sides of the river you would find stacks of edgings and slabs piled up all along the edge of the shore. Within the last thirty years the saw-dust has accumulated. At the foot of Pine Tree Island at that time there was 40 feet of water to nearly opposite the foot of the locks.

Q. Give us the extent of it in feet as near as you can come to it?—A. Fully 300 feet from the island to the point.

Q. What height was it above the water?—A. About one foot or 18 inches. The men walked about on it picking up the edging.

Q. And it extended 300 feet in length? A. Yes. Then the saw-dust began to work into the eddy at the foot of the locks, and where there was 40 feet of water there, we had not more than five or six feet now. In 1881, I think they gave a contract to Mr. Askwith and he made a large wrought iron scoop—a very large one—and placed it between two barges on a swivel, and he had crabs to hoist it up. He had two steamers. He backed that into the mouth of the lock, dropped the scoop and hauled the refuse that was in the channel out into the river to deep water. He made a channel about 12 feet deep all over in low water. He took the sawdust away to that depth all over the bay.

Q. Do I understand you to say that the channel was obstructed?—A. Yes, I have been four and five hours getting a boat into the lock, and sometimes have had to unload them. Some boats drawing four and a half to five feet of water came there and could not get in.

Q. When was that?—A. That was the year before last, and it was the same last fall. When the water got low last fall, between the foot of the lock and Stirling's wharf there was about 25 feet square of saw-dust clean out of the water altogether. We never experienced so much trouble with the sawdust until they got the hog machines in the mills. They cut the slabs and edgings up into small chips, and they came with the saw-dust, and being all sap they would sink immediately or in a very little time. The prevailing wind in the fall of the year is from the west and north-west. I have known it to blow for weeks steadily from west, for I take the course of the wind regularly every morning, and it is sent in to the department. I do not know very much about the river far down, but on the Hull side of Kettle Island, we used to come there with our boats and barges at one time. I was down there last fall and really I wondered to see the state it was in. No boat could get in there now.

Q. Could not row boats?—A. Well, a row boat could get in of course.

Q. The government have had to employ dredge on several occasions to clean out the sawdust?—A. They employed Heney & McNamee's dredge but did not do much good. The scoop of the dredge does not work well in that material. It used to catch on the slabs and edgings and slide along on them.

Q. I suppose you have seen large amounts of saw-dust on the other side of the river, opposite Batson & Currier's old mill?—A. I have seen great quantities of saw-dust on that side. I saw the ice blow up there once for about an acre, and pile up the ice in blocks three feet square. They had a race track from there to Gatineau Point and the explosion took place the night before the race was to come off and the whole place was totally destroyed. I do not think there is much sand comes from upwards down this way. I think it comes principally from the Gatineau. I have seen a barge run aground in the evening and you could not get her off; the next morning the men could walk on the sand around the barge. They dug a hole under the bow and another under the stern and by-and-by the sand would begin to go and in the course of a couple of hours the barge could swim about, so I think it is from there the principal part of the sand that lodges this side of Kettle Island comes, and at the head of Kettle Island in the bay there.

Q. Last year the water was pretty low?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you discover any unpleasant odour from the accumulations of mill refuse at the foot of the locks?—A. Yes, when you would have a blow up. I was standing on the pier one day and saw a white swell coming up. There was an old Frenchman approaching with a bun. The water rose about ten or twelve feet square and lifted him fully three feet out of the water.

Q. What size was the boat?—A. It was a square punt, about 14 feet long and 5 feet wide, with a flat bottom. They use them for gathering mill wood. The wind happened to be blowing from that direction, what little wind there was, and the smell was very bad. I measured around in the bay at the steamboat wharf under Nepean Point and there was 30 feet of water and no bottom with my lead line.

Q. When was that?—A. I think that was in 1881.

Q. How is the water now?—A. There is hardly any water there at all. The saw-dust is over the water all summer, in fact. It is full always. As the saw-dust comes down the river, the wind blows it in there and it cannot get out.

Q. Do you consider that the saw-dust is destroying the navigation of the river?—A. I do, most undoubtedly.

The next witness examined was Mr. Besserer, a farmer who lives down the river, who is perfectly conversant with the nature of the navigation :

Q. Can you tell us the condition of the river before the saw-mills were erected and its condition now?—A. It does not lie in a very nice state at present with the saw-dust.

Q. What was your first acquaintance with the place?—A. The river was in a very good condition for navigation when I first knew it. There was nothing to hinder navigation when I first saw it. Of late years the saw-dust has accumulated. It is something fearful in the channel of the river in some parts.

Q. In the channel?—A. Yes, down at the Leonard Islands, for instance, and at the mouth of the Blanche the saw-dust has accumulated very much, blocking the channels between the island where it used to be navigable at one time. Now you cannot go there.

Q. What was the state of the river last fall?—A. Last fall it was in a very bad state. There was an awful accumulation of saw-dust then.

Q. How much water was there in the river at that time?—A. Just by the Blanche there would not be much more than four or four and a half feet.

Q. What was the depth there 20 years ago?—A. There would be quite a channel there then. Of course I never measured it then.

Q. You had no difficulty in navigating it then?—A. No. There is an accumulation of sand and sawdust. It forms a layer of saw-dust and a layer of sand, and it holds there. If you dig in it you find it that way for 10 feet down.

Q. I suppose you come across occasional slabs?—A. Yes, occasionally we come across slabs and edgings that have got water-logged and sank down.

Q. And this material from the hogging machine?—A. Yes, and from the edger. The way I found the sand and saw-dust there when I went to get sand. This saw-dust has been a great nuisance and it has been increasing from day to day. In fact some days if the wind happens to blow from the north to the south shore you cannot get out with a small boat.

Q. What effect has it had upon the fish of the river?—A. It almost banishes them altogether. There is hardly any fishing of any kind on the Ottawa at all now.

Q. And was there good fishing in the Ottawa at one time?—A. Splendid.

Q. As much as people require?—A. All kinds, from pickerel down—all good fish.

Q. Did you discover any ill effects from this nuisance of saw-dust in the way of health in your locality?—A. In the cool of the evening about the wharf there the stench would be terrible. In fact the water is bad.

Q. Has it caused any disease, any typhoid fever?—A. There were a couple of cases in the Murphy family. There was one man who did not do a hand's turn the whole season from it.

Q. Can you say whether any portion of the channel where the navigation is carried on there is anything to stop navigation.—A. There is, in saw-dust and slabs.

Q. Did you ever find by examination of those channels whether there was any stoppage of navigation?—A. Certainly, when the water would get down low, to a certain pitch.

Q. The boats could not go down?—A. The boats could not go down with this nuisance in the river.

Q. The saw-dust comes up to your farm does it not?—A. Yes.

Q. And is a nuisance to you there?—A. It is a nuisance to every person along the river.

Q. Do you know whether there is any difference in the last ten years as to the character of the refuse coming down?—A. There is a great difference; it is saw-dust now instead of slabs.

Q. With regard to this sand mixed with saw-dust, do you find it there in layers?—A. Yes; I can show you it on the clay bank at our side of the river. The wind disturbs the water and the saw-dust is thrown on the shore and stays there.

Q. Is there any saw-dust in the channel of the river now?—A. I do not doubt it at all. You cannot see any saw-dust in the channel now; a man would want good eyes to look down in the channel and see what is at the bottom when the water is high, but if you come down in the summer, I will show you lots of it.

The next is John Tilton, who is an employee of the Fishery Department, and who was called upon to give evidence as respects the proclamation issued by the government with reference to the exemptions:

Q. Do you know anything respecting this question of saw-dust in the Ottawa River?—A. Generally, I understood that the line of information you desired from me was particularly the circumstances under which these exemptions were made and what other exemptions existed as well as that of the Ottawa. The exemptions are made under Chapter 91, of the Statutes of 1886, "An Act respecting the protection of navigable waters."

The seventh section of this Act provides:

"No owner or tenant of any sawmill, or any workman therein, or other person, shall throw or cause to be thrown, or suffer or permit to be thrown any saw-dust, edgings, slabs, bark or rubbish of any description whatsoever, into any river, stream, or other water, any part of which is navigable, or which flows into any navigable river; and any person who violates the provisions of this section, shall, on summary conviction, be liable for the first offence to a penalty not less than $20, and for each subsequent offence to a penalty of not less than $50. The several fishery officers shall from time to time examine and report on the condition of such rivers, streams and waters, and prosecute all persons violating the provisions of this section; and for enforcing the said provisions, such officers shall have and exercise all the power already conferred upon them for like purposes by the Fisheries Act. The Governor in Council, when it is shown to his satisfaction that the public interests will not be injuriously effected thereby, may from time to time by proclamation, published in the Canada Gazette, declare any such river, stream or water, or part or parts thereof, exempted from the operation of this section in whole or in part, and may from time to time revoke such proclamation."

Under that section of the act a report was made to Council and a proclamation issued, which appeared in the Canada Gazette of the 25th of April, 1885. After reciting the acts respecting the protection of navigable streams and rivers and the powers of the Governor in Council under the Act, the proclamation continues:

And whereas it has been represented to us that the public interest will not be injuriously affected by exempting from the operation of the said act all that part of the Ottawa River lying between the Chaudière Falls and McKay's Bay, and also all that part of the Gatineau river from the mill pond above Gilmour & Co.'s mill at Chelsea to the mouth of the said Gatineau river, so far as regards saw-dust only:

Now know ye, that we, under and by virtue of the powers vested by the said Act, and by and with the advice of our Privy Council for Canada, do hereby proclaim and declare that all that part of the Ottawa river lying between the Chaudière Falls and McKay's Bay, and all that part of the Gatineau river from the mill pond above Gilmour & Co.'s mill, at Chelsea, to the mouth of the said Gatineau river, shall, so far as regards saw-dust only, be exempted from the operation of the said act passed in the session of the Parliament of Canada held in the thirty-sixth year of our reign, chaptered sixty-five, and intituled: "An Act for the better protection of navigable streams and rivers."

That is the last proclamation that was issued.

Q. Is this the latest proclamation?—A. This is the latest proclamation affecting the Ottawa—in fact the latest one we have. Perhaps I should mention that a question has arisen since that proclamation was issued, with reference to the Otonabee River. I was sent there by the government two years ago, and after a very careful examination of the river—some complaints having been made with reference to the saw-dust deposit—I examined it over a length of 30 or 40 miles with a good deal of care, and an arrangement was reached between those who were agitating for the entire protection of the river and the mill owners, but if the mill owners would desist from throwing rubbish and edgings into the river, and allow only the saw-dust that fell through the pitman hole, that they would stay their prosecutions. That arrangement has gone on in a measure satisfactorily up to the present spring. Now, the anti-sawdust association, as it is termed, of Peterboro', are again agitating in the direction of having the prohibition made entire. They say that even that exemption is having a serious effect on the navigation of the river, and claim that the arrangement should be terminated. That was only, I may explain, a departmental arrangement. The government had no power, under the Act, to make such an arrangement as that. They must either proclaim the river exempt or it is amenable to the operation of the Act, and information may be laid by anyone who desires to complain.

Q. What is your opinion with reference to the saw-dust and edgings in the river that you did examine, with respect to the navigation?—A. It does not admit of any doubt whatever. The continuous deposit of mill refuse can have but one result—that it is injurious.

Q. And with respect to the fish, what effect has it?—A. There is no doubt with respect to fishing. I am told that in years gone by, the Ottawa River was quite famous for its fish; of late years it is an industry that has fallen off almost entirely. That may be attributable to other causes as well as to the deposit of saw-dust, but I should fancy that probably that is the principal reason. These bays and inlets which are the spawning grounds for the fish are filled with mill refuse.

Q. Do you know anything in regard to the conditions of the Ottawa River?—A. Yes, I have some idea of its condition in regard to the subject of the inquiry. I should think that the result will be somewhat serious to navigation if the practice is permitted to continue. Anyone traversing the river when the water is low cannot fail to be impressed with the fact that the deposits are seriously affecting navigation—I do not think that even the gentlemen who are running the mills will pretend to gainsay that.

Q. Can you speak of any particular points in the river where it is apparent?—A. I have frequently, in going up and down the river, asked the question why the steamer slowed up at certain points, and was told it was on account of the river being so shallow from the deposit of saw-dust and mill refuse; and I have also noticed when a steamer is going into the several wharves, especially in the upper part of the river, that she always stirs up a large amount of sawdust.

Then John Stewart is called and examined at some length. He is a mining engineer and gives his evidence as to this nuisance:

Q. Are you conversant with the saw-dust question on the Ottawa?—A. I understand a little about the uses to which it might be applied.

Q. Will you give the committee the benefit of your knowledge of that subject?—A. It might be utilized in a small way for the manufacture of paper pulp, and making compressed vessels—pails, tubs and vessels of that kind—and for making brick. It has been utilized for those purposes in Canada; but the large application, almost a Dominion one, as it applies to all the provinces, it can be used for the manufacture of gas, by treating it in proper furnaces, for the roasting and re-heating of iron. The heavy matter from the mills could be made into charcoal, and the products of distillation in the process of making the charcoal will pay for the carbonization of it. That could be used in glass furnaces. It has been done on a small scale. It has been experimented on and proved to be practicable, but not to any large extent as yet. It has been used in that way for the last 20 years in Sweden, and the Swedish association of iron merchants presented the inventor of those furnaces with the sum of $10,000 for his ingenuity. The Michigan lumbermen utilize their saw-dust in the manufacture of salt. They live in a salt region, and they bore wells and get salt springs, and evaporate the brine by burning the sawdust and converting the brine into salt.

Q. Do you know how Mr Rathbun disposes of his saw-dust?—A. He uses it all in that way. He makes gas and lights the town of Deseronto, and he makes charcoal which he sells. There is nothing wasted from his mills.

Q. As an engineer, do you think this saw-dust could be utilized profitably?—A. I can see no difficulty in it, any more than in the handling of the same number of tons of iron ore, not so much, because you can elevate the saw-dust in elevators.

You can convey it in a traveller, but you have got to shovel or handle iron ore. Even the saw-dust that is now in the river, some of it could be taken out and could be used in a furnace; because saw-dust coming direct from the saw, from wet logs, containing 45 per cent of water, can be utilized in that way. That was pointed out in the report of the Geological Survey by Dr. Sterry Hunt I think in 1870.

Q. Then in your opinion there is no practical difficulty in those sawmill men utilizing their saw-dust and preventing it from going into the river?—A. If they make sufficient arrangements for it, there is not.

Mr. Dever, a member of the Senate, who has had experience in a variety of places, gave his evidence in a way to convince anyone of the truth of our contention, that this sawdust is a nuisance, not only here but also in many other places:

Q. Have you had any experience in saw-dust and mill refuse on the river St. John?—A. I found at the harbour of St. John, and on the river also, that numerous mills of the same description that you have at the Chaudière here were in the habit of throwing their saw-dust and other refuse into the river and harbour. The practice was so injurious to the waters of our harbour, destroying the fish and creating shoals in the harbour, that we deem it necessary to prevent it, and we did prevent it.

Q. How?—A. By law.

Q. You prohibited the throwing of sawdust into the river?—A. Yes, and the fact is now that the mills consume their saw-dust. It is not our business to say how they shall dispose of it, but we say they shall not throw it into the river. They have also to dispose of their slabs, and bark and refuse of all kinds. They build that in piles and set it on fire, and in that way, we are completely relieved of this trouble.

Q. Were those mills run by steam or by water?—A. Some by steam and some by water. In fact, it is an offence to throw mill refuse into the river.

Q. But it was not so always?—A. In our primitive state, it was not considered necessary to prevent it, but we were compelled to do so, because our harbours and fish pools would have been filled up with this decomposing vegetable matter. It became ruinous to the fish, destroying their spawning grounds and lessening the supply of fish generally.

Q. When saw mills are run by water what contrivance have they for preventing it from falling into the river?—A. They cart it away and burn it.

Q. But how do they prevent the sawdust from falling into the water in the saw mills which are run by water power?—A. The floor is completely covered over and the saw-dust is raked out. It is taken away in carts constructed for that purpose—large wheeled carts.

Q. There is no saw-dust thrown into the water at all then?—A. If there is, they do it clandestinely. They cannot do it publicly now. It is a mere matter of arrangement with those mills I allege. It will be some expense I admit to change the mills here, but it is part of their business to make such arrangements and not impose on the public I think.

The next witness is John Mather, for a long time an employee of Gilmour & Co., on the Gatineau River, who had considerable experience in the matter of saw-dust. He was employed by these millmen at one time to make an examination of the river. He sent in a report which showed that the main channel was not interfered with at that time to any serious extent :

Q. You are engaged in the lumber trade now ?
—A. I am, at Keewatin.

Q. Were you engaged for many years in the lumber trade in the neighbourhood of Ottawa ?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you not appointed a commissioner to examine the channel of the Ottawa river on one occasion ?—A. On two occasions, in 1873 and 1877.

Q. Did you make a thorough examination of the channel of the river respecting the question of saw-dust ?—A. The second time I did.

Q. Will you tell the committee whether in your judgment the saw-dust accumulates in the channel where the current is ?—A. Not where the current is.

Q. There is saw-dust of course in the bays ?—A. Any amount of accumulation in the bays.

Q. Prior to 1877 I understand that the mill slabs were thrown in. Would the throwing in of saw-dust alone have a less effect on the channel ?—A. The slabs remained in the current ; the saw-dust goes out of it if there is nothing to keep it there,

Q. Do you think there is any danger to the navigation of the Ottawa River by throwing saw-dust into it ?—A. The only danger to navigation that I see, is at the mouth of the canal ; it fills up there. The saw-dust will come to the top of the eddy and prevent navigation there.

Q. That is the only place ?—A. There, and around the wharfs of the millmen themselves.

Q. What kind of mills were you engaged in—water mills ?—A. Water and steam mills—principally water mills.

Q. Do you know of any water mill so constructed as to prevent the saw-dust falling into the stream—or do you know of any way to prevent it ?—A. At Keewatin we do not let any sawdust in ; that is a water-mill. We keep it all out.

Q. How do you keep it out ?—A. We catch it as it falls and take it out by carriers and then cart it away.

Q. Was your mill lately constructed ?—A. It was commenced in 1879.

Q. Was it constructed since any of those mills were built ?—A. There have been some new mills built here since then—one last winter and one the winter before.

Then there is the late Hon. Mr. Glasier a lumberman on St. John River, I believe the oldest lumberman living at the time he gave his evidence. He was practical in every way and very observant and stated his opinion in a clear and concise way :

Q. Do you wish to make a statement about the saw mills in New Brunswick ?—A. I will commence with the harbour of St. John and the parish of Portland which are joined together. There are seven or eight mills there. There are no water mills there and those mills burn all their sawdust and a large portion of their slabs, and they have been there 30 or 40 years and I have never heard of any accident. I do not think the fire risk is increased though they are in the middle of the place. There is one mill there that is run both by steam and by water and they burn their saw-dust. That mill has been there for forty years, and they have got a large town around them and a station house. The railway runs through the place. I have never heard of an accident there. Right in the city of Fredericton there is a mill that has been running for twenty years and they burn their saw-dust.

Q. What is the mill ?—A. That is called the Easty mill. And then a mile below the town, Morrison has a very large mill that saws about 50,000,000 a year. It sawed more than that this winter. His mill was burnt down but the fire took from the furnace inside—his own furnace. He did not burn his sawdust at that time. There is another mill below that half a mile. It is a continuous settlement along there. They cart their saw-dust and refuse out and burn it : the only mill on the river that does not consume its saw-dust and refuse is Gibson's. The saw-dust from the mill goes into the river by some concession that the government here have made. They have arranged to let it go into the river but he burns his slabs and refuse right along side of his mill. There are other small mills up the river but they are of no account. As to the navigation of the river St. John there are several shoals in the river where the dredge is at work every summer almost. They dug a channel through half a mile long and ten feet deep.

Q. Where is that ?—A. At Oromocto shoals. The hands that work on the boat told me that two or three feet down they found as much saw-dust as mud and earth all mixed together. It comes in the spring of the year and lodges on the shoals. There is a good deal of sediment there also and it lodges. That current is as strong as the current of the Ottawa. It runs four or five miles anyway and last spring it ran at a higher speed than that. These shoals are increasing continually from all those things accumulating there. It is ruining the fish in the river. That is my experience of the past forty years. As to the increased rates of insurance they do not seem to make any increase at St. John.

Q. Has the salmon fishing decreased in the streams that run into the St. John ?—A. Yes. The streams where the saw mills are located are completely ruined for fishing. On the Nashwaak, where Gibson's mill is situated, which used to be a good river for salmon, they are completely gone.

Q. The salmon used to spawn there, I believe ?
—A. Yes ; I have caught seventy in a day right on my own shore, a little below Fredericton. We used to have the shad, the gaspereaux and the salmon and sturgeon in large quantities. Now they are diminished very greatly. Most of the salmon now that we get are from the north shore—the Baie des Chaleur and the Miramichi.

Q. But still they catch a good many in the harbor of St. John ?—A. Yes, a considerable number and around in the bays, but so far as the obstruction of the River St. John is concerned, it is a very serious thing, and if Gibson continues depositing the saw-dust and refuse in the river a few years longer without check, it will be worse.

Q. How long have you been engaged in the lumber and milling business on the River St. John?—A. I am not in the milling business at all. I have been in the lumber business 60 years.

Q. On the River St. John?—A. On the River St. John and its tributaries. I have taken timber from opposite Quebec at the head of St. John 400 or 450 miles.

Q. You ought to be well acquainted with the navigation of the River St. John?—A. I tell you the navigation of the river is very much impeded. Bars are forming all the time from this material and the other stuff coming down the river.

Now, I will give you the evidence of Captain Bowie, I believe the oldest navigator of this Ottawa River at the present day. He has been commander of the "Peerless," "Empress" and other vessels for over thirty years to my own knowledge. He is every day on the river, and a man quite conversant with all its difficulties, and he gives us to understand what effect this saw-dust has upon the navigation in a way which I believe will convince every hon. gentleman as far as that is concerned. It is a reliable and true statement :

Q. You know a good deal about the subject of our inquiry. Can you give us the benefit of your experience, chiefly with reference to the navigation of the Ottawa?—A. When I first came up the river here I was captain of the steamer "Phoenix." Then I never had any trouble whatever on the shoals. The water was deep enough both in high and low water at all seasons. After a few years, when the mill refuse was going in, and slabs and edgings, they filled up most of the fronts of our wharfs, and at the locks here there was a large quantity of edgings, which are still there. In the channel we find a great deal of saw-dust. Of course, at this pitch of the water, or at the time Mr. Mather took his soundings, which was in high water, and there was a strong current, it is not so apparent, but in September or October I can stop the boat and bring up a volume of saw-dust that would astonish you.

Q. Was that in the channel?—A. In the channel of the river. Of course, at this season of the year, the strong current carries it away. At the locks here I was sending a boat up to the exhibition grounds a year ago, and the captain came to tell me he could not get into the locks, though the boat was drawing only four feet of water. I told him to go back and work her in, he did so, and spent several hours working at the saw-dust and finally got in. That was in September, during the exhibition. She was coming up to convey passengers from the basin to the exhibition grounds. She was a large steamer and filled the locks.

Q. What part of the channel of the river is it that you can stir up the saw-dust with the steamer?—A. That is at Way's shoals.

Q. How far is that from the Chaudière falls?—A. It is twelve or fourteen miles.

Q. What depth of water is there over it?—A. Seven or eight feet. The Queen's wharf, where we now lie, had at one time over 100 feet of water. I have seen the "Peerless" take ten minutes to get to the wharf to tie up.

Q. And she draws how many feet of water?—A. She draws six feet. I have seen her ten minutes working backwards and forwards trying to get into the wharf, and I have seen the cabmen get hold of the springing line and walk on the saw-dust between the vessel and the wharf. We used to lie in there in the winter with the steamers, but we found the saw-dust had so filled up the bay that we have had to leave the wharf and take the risk of the ice out in the stream.

Q. Did you not, at one time, lay up your steamers in Mackay's Bay?—A. Above Mackay's Bay, in New Edinburgh Bay.

Q. Is there much risk of ice where you have to lie up?—A. Yes.

Q. The bays of the river are completely destroyed as winter quarters for steamers?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you seen any of those explosions in the river that are spoken of by other witnesses?—A. Yes, from L'Original to Ottawa.

Q. Have you found any inconvenience from them?—A. The odour arising from them is not very pleasant round the steamer lying at a wharf. There is a strong, gassy smell from them.

Q. Is it unwholesome?—A. I presume so.

Q. Some observations have been made here about vessels carrying smaller cargoes in years gone by than they do at present. I suppose you can give the Committee an idea why it is so?—A. The vessels that carry double the quantity of lumber now that they did in former years have different bearings and different beams, but they do not draw any more water. At that time, when you were steamboating, and when I first came up the Ottawa you could not get a barge measuring over 90 feet through the Grenville Canal.

Q. Do you not keep by the shore a little when you come round the point at McKay's Bay?—A. No, we come straight up; we do not come within hundreds of yards of the sawdust shoal in McKay's Bay.

Q. You know that these barges that navigate there draw 6 feet of water?—A. Yes, and I know they were all aground last fall below Rockliffe, at the point you speak of. The channel is altogether changed here. Formerly we had a good channel there, but now the channel is close to Hillman's mill. The closer we keep to the shore at Hillman's mill the better. We found out a new channel in the low water last summer.

Q. Do you know whether the place where the barges stuck last summer was a sand bar or a saw-dust bank?—A. It was sand and saw-dust mixed—lots of saw-dust. We found this new channel last fall, near Hillman's mills, by accident, from the fact that all the barges were aground in the channel—the barges of Mr. Bangs as well as those of Mr. Murphy.

Q. Have you discovered any difficulty in managing your boilers from the saw-dust?—Yes, in going through the saw-dust we find that we have to keep two injectors in the boiler, and the engineer has to work them by opening one and shutting the other. The saw-dust gets in and opens up the valves of the injection pipes and holds them there, and the water runs out of the boiler. The engineer attributes it to the saw-dust. She gets hot occasionally, while lying at the wharf particularly.

Those are the principal witnesses whose evidence I will read on this occasion. The evidence was very carefully considered by the committee and they submitted the following report for the consideration and information of the Senate:

Having in view the late period of the session at which the order of reference was made, and the desirability of making as complete an investigation as possible into the important subjects referred to them, your committee proceeded with all despatch to the consideration thereof, and have devoted much time and patient attention thereto.

A large number of witnesses, representing the various interests involved, appeared before Your committee and were examined by them. Appended is a list giving the names and occupations of the gentlemen so examined, and your committee submit herewith the testimony given before them.

Although the scope of the order of reference was enlarged by your honourable House, so as to include in the inquiry an examination into the extent and effect upon the Ottawa River of the deposit therein of refuse of all kinds, other than that merely from the sawmills upon the banks of the river, Your committee, in their desire to present a report upon the main questions involved, deemed it advisable to forego any special inquiry into the question of deposits of offal, sewage and night soil and the effect thereof upon the public health, which matters however, will be found incidentally referred to in the evidence of several of the witnesses.

Your committee have also carefully considered the report, made in February, 1873, by the Hon. H. H. Killaly and Messrs. R. W. Shephard and John Mather, the commissioners appointed in 1871 to enquire into the condition of navigable streams, and the report, made in June, 1877, by Mr. John Mather to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on the subject of the disposal of saw-dust and mill-offals in the Ottawa River. They have also had the advantage of the professional evidence given by Mr. John K. Arnoldi, mechanical engineer of the Department of Public Works, by Mr. H. A. Gray, assistant chief engineer of the same department, who was charged to make an examination, in the summer of 1887, as to the actual condition of the bed of the Ottawa River and the extent of deposits therein of saw-dust and other mill refuse; by Mr. G. T. Brophy, C.E., of the same department, superintendent of the Ottawa River; by Mr. F. A. Wise, the superintending engineer of the Rideau Canal, and by Mr. T. C. Keefer, C.E., all of whom, from their official position and peculiar experience, were able to afford your committee most valuable information.

Your committee desire to acknowledge the readiness with which information was furnished them by the various mill owners and manufacturers of sawn lumber who appeared before them, and whose interests were ably represented by counsel, as well as the valuable information afforded by all other witnesses.

These deposits also prevent the utilization of property along the banks of the river for the construction of wharfs and for other similar purposes, and likewise cause further damage to riparian proprietors by the depreciation in value of property on the river front.

Your committee find, from the evidence given before them, that saw-dust and other refuse of sawmills can be economically utilized, and that the destruction thereof is successfully accomplished in at least one saw-mill upon the Ottawa River, and in many others in Canada and in the United States of America.

Your committee are also of opinion that these large deposits of decaying vegetable matter constitute at times a dangerous menace, if not a positive injury to health.

Your committee accordingly recommend that the proclamation, made on the 17th April, 1885, by which that portion of the Ottawa River lying between the Chaudière Falls and McKay's Bay, and also all that part of the Gatineau River from the mill pond above Gilmour and Company's mill at Chelsea to the mouth of the said Gatineau River, are exempted, so far as regards saw-dust only, from the operation of the seventh section of the "Act respecting the protection of Navigable Waters" (R.S.C. Chap. 91), be rescinded by the Government as soon as practicable, having regard to the large and important interests involved in a business of such extent and public importance as is the lumber trade, and that thereafter, the provisions of the said section should, in the public interest, be strictly enforced.

The leader then gave me his assurance that immediate steps would be taken for the purpose of complying with the conditions of the report so ably presented by the committee on that occasion. I allowed the matter to stand on that assurance, and upon the 29th March, 1889, I inquired:

Whether the government have taken, or intend to take, action in reference to the report submitted by the special committee of the Senate at its last session with respect to saw-dust being deposited in the Ottawa River, below the Chaudière Falls, in the city of Ottawa.

It is not necessary to read my remarks upon the motion. Then Mr. Abbott said:

My hon. friend, I am sure, is as well aware as any other member of this House of the importance of the subject which has been brought before the Senate to-day. The question of compelling the lumbermen to deposit the saw-dust elsewhere than in the river, or to destroy it, is one which affects an enormous manufacturing interest in this country, and, so far as the government are instructed, the expense of a change will be very large indeed. I am greatly in hopes that my hon. friend's accounts of the injury that is done to the river by this saw-dust are to some slight extent exaggerated—that it is not quite so bad as my hon. friend says; but there is no doubt—and the government are satisfied—that it does injure the river, more especially the bays and the outlets of streams, and the like, coming into the river. I said last session that the government intended to take action in the matter. They have been making inquiries, taking preparatory action ever since. They have had a survey of it made; they have taken great pains to have the river examined by a competent person employed by themselves, and they have his report, which confirms, to a considerable degree, the report of the committee of this House, which is laid before the government, of course, and which received their full consideration. Since then, the mill-owners have desired to be heard, and represented that they wished to be parties to an inquiry as to how far this damage extends, if there is any damage. Some of them contend that there is none; others admit that there is some; but they desire to be heard, and they have employed Mr. Sandford Fleming, a gentleman well known to every member of this House, to examine the river and make a report on this saw-dust on their behalf. I understand that he is at this moment engaged on that, and that a report from him is expected. As soon as it is received, the whole subject will no doubt be taken up. Inquiries, so far as they are needed, will be made, the subject will be taken up, and some remedy will, no doubt, be adopted for the evils that the deposit of the saw-dust in the Ottawa river produces, of a character appropriate to their extent and their importance.

That was in 1889, after the report of the committee and after the government had made an examination of the river in 1887. This first examination was made by the government prior to my taking the action. The government considered it necessary in the public interest to require the examination to be made by Mr. Gray. The examination was accordingly made, and it is most extraordinary that, having this information before them, they waited for the examination of a gentleman employed by the mill-owners. We know what that amounts to. I am not going to say anything harsh about him, but I am credibly informed, that as far as the examination is concerned, he was never a party to it, and was never upon the river one minute. He entrusted it to some employe; but it is not such a thing as the government, having due regard for their position, should leave in the hands of any private employe. They had a competent gentleman, Mr. Gray, who made a careful examination, and a very full report. He also came before the committee of this House and gave evidence. The other day I asked the government to bring down copies of Mr. Gray's report. I have asked for these reports session after session and have never been able to get them. I do not think that is right. I asked the government the other day to have another examination made to ascertain whether this nuisance exists at the present time. I want to give the mill-men every fair play and let them show, if they can, that they are doing a benefit to the country by throwing the sawdust in. If they can show that it is a benefit to the fish or to navigation, all right, but we must have some reliable information. That is as far as 1889 was concerned, and you can see step by step that I have taken every opportunity of placing the matter before the government and getting their opinion on it. On 21st January, 1890, I moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, copies of all reports and other communications in reference to the deposit of saw-dust, slabs, or other material in the Ottawa, and other rivers of the Dominion.

Then after I had made some remarks, Mr. Abbott said:—

The Government, of course, have no objection whatever to the Address being carried, but I think we might conveniently dispense with a further discussion of the questions which my hon. friend proposes to raise until we have the papers before the House, and can see exactly what these various experts have reported on the matter in question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The papers I suppose will be brought down at an early date; they must be all ready.

Hon. Mr. ABBOTT—They will be brought down as soon as possible. I cannot say whether they are ready.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They cannot be very voluminous.

That is in 1890. That shows I have been desirous of getting all this information, and here in 1890 they promised that the papers would be brought down. Up to the present time they have never complied with my request. In 1891, on the 25th June, I introduced a bill for the purpose of removing this power that was given to the government, and upon the second reading Mr. Abbott said:

With reference to my hon. friend's motion for the second reading of this bill, we have had this matter up before us on several occasions, and there is no doubt it is one of very considerable importance to the effect of allowing the saw-dust from the Ottawa mills to pass into the river and I must say there a diversity of opinion about it. However, there seems to be a strong opinion, a stronger opinion, in fact, in the direction that this saw-dust is injuring the river, injuring the navigation, and also injuring the life of the fish, which is, of course, important to the people along the margin of the river as a means of livelihood in many cases. I have had some representations made to me on behalf of the mill-owners, who represent that the preparation of machinery or appliances for the consumption of this saw-dust on the spot would be very expensive and very difficult—in fact, would expose their entire plant to the danger of fire, and would involve many other inconveniences. I have not had much opportunity myself of investigating this matter, but it appears to be the general opinion of my colleagues, in so far as I have gone into the question, that exception which prevails in favour of the Ottawa river ought to be abrogated, and I would ask my hon. friend to withdraw his bill for this year, in order that the mill-owners may not be too suddenly, by force, compelled to make changes which would be very expensive and inconvenient. My hon. friend has been good enough on that consideration to agree to withdraw his bill for this year, with the understanding that as far as I can say such an understanding can be arrived at before hand, that his measure will receive the assistance of this government if it should be in power in the year to come. I hope that very good friends of ours, and others who are affected by this announcement will take notice also, how far they can avoid the evil consequences which might follow their being suddenly compelled to enter upon an entirely different course of action with regard to their business, which is of course one of the most important in the whole country, and which I have the greatest desire to foster and encourage and have the greatest objection to embarrassing in any way

Then Senators Kaulbach, Poirier, Power, McCelan and McMillan, and a great many others, spoke. Mr. Abbott was very emphatic and induced me to withdraw my bill. I believe at that time the bill would have carried by a very large majority. The fact is, the senators were prepared to vote for that bill and carry it through. At the suggestion of Mr. Abbott, I was induced to withdraw it; but from that day till this, the promise that something would be done has been overlooked for some reason or other. It seems extraordinary, after all the promises made by the government, that up to this time nothing has been done; not the first attempt has been made to modify the law and satisfy the people. I do not propose to read all the discussion which took place. Nothing was done. As you all know our lamented premier, Mr. Abbott, was succeeded by Sir John Thompson. I did not want to embarrass the government or trouble them until last year when a bill for the protection of the fisheries was introduced in the lower House. That bill did not contain the exemption clause; it was put in at the last moment in a very extraordinary manner by some means or other in the Commons, and it was only at the last moment, when the bill came here, that I observed the amendment in the bill. I then proposed the following amendment:

“Provided always that the provisions of this act shall not apply until after the 1st May, 1895, to the saw-mill owners and employees of any sawmill situated on any stream which was wholly or partially exempt from the operation of said subsection 2 of section 15 hereby repealed.

That amendment was carried last year. A great many gentleman took part in that discussion. I think you are all cognizant of what took place, but I read these proceedings because there are some hon. gentlemen who were not present last year. My hon. friend the member for Ottawa took part in the discussion and quoted the opinion of the then Minister of Fisheries, Hon. Mr. Tupper, who took strong grounds that this saw-dust nuisance should be abated, and now at this late hour we are called upon to rescind what we did last year. It is a most extraordinary thing. These gentlemen have been transgressing the law since the 1st of May last. This law has been upon the statute book, and it was the imperative duty of every man in this country to obey it, still they have been acting in defiance of all law, under the eyes of the government, contravening an Act of Parliament in a very serious way, and establishing a very dangerous precedent, which may in the future be fraught with evil consequences to the community in general. What would be thought of a man accused of any crime who pleads in extenuation of the crime his utter ignorance of the law? Does that justify him? No, but quite the reverse. It is presumed that every man knows the law and ignorance of it is no justification for wrong-doing. But the mill-owners are not ignorant of the law that they have been contravening during the last two months. It comes to this, that in Ottawa there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor. It is a very serious matter; the shoe may be on the other foot before long. On some occasion in the near future, when an attempt is made to enforce a law that is not respected, the people will say, “We won't obey your law while under our eyes, right at the seat of government, these millmen are allowed to contravene an Act of Parliament.”

I have referred to the petition of Mr. Ratté, who owns a boat-house here, and whose business has been ruined by the mill-owners. His petition is as follows:

To the Honourable the Speaker,
And the Honourable Members of the Senate of Canada.

The petition of Antoine Ratté, of the city of Ottawa, boatman, humbly sheweth as follows:—
About the year 1865, your petitioner acquired for the purpose of carrying on his business of a boatman a valuable piece of ground between Cathcart and Bolton streets in the said city of Ottawa, having a frontage on the Ottawa River of about 200 feet, and being the most suitable place in and about the city of Ottawa for the purpose aforesaid.

Your petitioner afterwards built a large boat-house in front of said lands costing over $5,000 and he carried on his business therein with great success down to about the year 1879, but since on account of the accumulation of saw-dust and refuse thrown into the Ottawa River by the Chaudière mill-owners your petitioner's business has been greatly injured.

Prior to the nuisance created by the saw-dust your petitioner was realizing from his business $3,000 a year at a yearly expense of about $500, but since 1879, your petitioner has not been able to realize in any one year more than about $400.

Your petitioner's losses on account of the saw-dust has not been less than $2,000 yearly.

Your petitioner, in the year 1884, sued the Chaudière mill owners for damages, but on account of the various appeals taken by them in all the courts up to the Privy Council your petitioner was not able to get the damages assessed till the month of May, 1891, when a report was made for $3,500 for his losses before 1884. Then the Chaudière mill-owners again appealed against this small amount in all the courts up to the Supreme Court, when in December, 1892, the report was confirmed in favour of your petitioner, but the costs of the several prior appeals exhausted most of what your petitioner was allowed.

Your petitioner again, in 1893, sued the Chaudière mill-owners for damages for the six years previously, but on account of new appeals your petitioner has not yet been able to have the damages assessed.

After your petitioner succeeded in establishing in all the courts his legal rights against the Chaudière mill-owners, the Parliament of Canada, by act of last session passed a law to prevent the throwing of sawdust and mill refuse into the Ottawa River.

The Chaudière mill-owners have disregarded that law and they still continue to throw into the Ottawa River the saw-dust and refuse from their mills, and they are now seeking to obtain a repeal of the law of last session.

Your petitioner begs leave to represent that a repeal of the law would be most injurious to the public interest, and would cause your petitioner a further loss of $2,000 a year at least.

Your petitioner has suffered since the year 1879 damages amounting to $2,000 a year, and he will suffer the like damages yearly whilst the mill-owners are allowed to throw the saw-dust and mill refuse into the Ottawa River.

Your petitioner humbly prays that the present law may not be repealed, but should the same be changed it should be only on condition that the mill-owners do give security to pay to your petitioner forthwith the damages he has already sustained and also $2,000 a year whilst the nuisance continues.

And your petitioner will ever pray.

Witness : ANTOINE <sup>his</sup> x RATTÉ,
THOS. J. MORRIS. mark.
OTTAWA, 24th June, 1895.

I want to read another document, one of the most extraordinary things I ever saw—that is, the Act of Parliament passed by the Ontario government instructing the judiciary to act in a certain manner with respect to cases of this kind :

Some ten years ago, when the trade were threatened with vexatious suits, the Provincial Government thought the matter of sufficient importance to make an enactment, which reads in part as follows:—"The court or judge may refuse to grant any injunction in any such action or other proceedings, in case it is proved to the satisfaction of such court or judge by the person against whom such injunction is claimed that, having regard to all the circumstances, it is on the whole proper and expedient not to grant the same, and for that purpose shall take into consideration the importance of the lumber trade to the locality wherein such injury, damage or interference takes place, and the benefit and advantage, direct and consequential, which such trade confers on the locality and on the inhabitants thereof, and shall weigh the same against the private injury, damage or interference complained of;" 48 Vic., Chap. 24.

In other words, the judiciary were instructed not to interfere with the interests of the lumbermen. Now, I have laid the whole matter before you. It is a very unpleasant duty for me. It has been, I can assure you, in many ways disagreeable, but it is a duty that I have undertaken and performed in the public interest. I have been maligned in every way—gentlemen have come to the corridors of this building and have imputed all sorts of motives to me, and I have been told that I am destroying the value of property in the city, and damaging the interests of the Ottawa country. I have taken my course and I think I have shown conclusively that I have done everything with the approbation of this Senate, and of the predecessors of the leader of the government in this House. I am not open, therefore, to such accusation. I do not think it is fair or right to indulge in mean insinuations against me for having done my duty. Our corridors are filled with men, I suppose paid emissaries, who are trying to influence members to vote for this bill. Of course, I know that their efforts will have no effect. I am sorry that the stand which I have been obliged to take is prejudicial to the interests of some of my fellow-citizens, but I am discharging a public duty. I am satisfied that the people of this locality approve of the course that I am pursuing, but the moment they meet any of those millmen they are afraid to express their views and dare not say anything against them. I occupy a different position, however, and I am endeavouring to discharge my duty. I hope that the government will take care, if they make a concession, that it will be of such a nature that the nuisance will be abated before long. I have no confidence that the lumbermen will make any improvement, however. They have had several years to make preparations to change their system, but they have made no movement, and they are not entitled to any consideration in this House. I do not wish to injure them or the business of this city—if I injure them I injure myself to some extent and I am not likely to do that, but you all can see for yourselves from the windows of this building the damage that is being done to our river and you can judge for yourselves whether I am doing right in endeavouring to save it from destruction. I know that public opinion endorses me, and I have the proud satisfaction of knowing, at any rate, that the people respect me for the course I have taken, although I have laboured under great difficulties. All that may be said against me has no effect upon me. They can abuse me behind my back, but they dare not come and look me in the face and say that I am doing wrong. I have met them on platforms more than once and they have not dared to make the accusations in my presence that they make in my absence. If the government are satisfied that those lumbermen intend to carry out in good faith what is now proposed, all right, but the government must take the responsibility. I have been assured from time to time by the government through its representatives in the Senate, that this nuisance would be abated, but no step has been taken to put an end to it. The mill-owners have merely been temporizing. It is not impossible to destroy the refuse from those mills; it has been done elsewhere and it can be done here. It is a mere matter of expense. If these were poor men, merely getting a dollar a day for their services, I would not expect the government to take a decided stand, but we all know that they have amassed immense fortunes out of the best assets of this country, and I do not think that much consideration should be shown them on the ground of the expense it will involve. This is not a political matter. All these mill-owners are united as one man in the promotion of their interests. They are known amongst politicians as hydraulic conservatives and timber limit reformers. Therefore, there is no political significance in this matter at all. They join hand in hand: when you strike one, you strike the whole of them. For instance, Mr. Edwards very generously came out and tried to shelter them. He showed an esprit de corps and took a manly course so far as that is concerned, but he has endeavoured to comply with the law himself. I hope he will show the people of this country that he can and will respect the law and that he will use the appliances necessary to consume the sawdust. It can be done here as it has been done elsewhere, and for my part I will not rest satisfied, if this extension of time is granted, until I see the mill-owners carry out the understanding with the government in good faith. We have been assured from time to time that the solemn decisions of this House would be respected, and the failure of the mill-owners to show the slightest regard for the opinion of the Senate, places us in a very unenviable position. The people think that the Senate has no power to control the action of these powerful lumbermen. You all remember the trouble that was taken in this House to get at the facts—how a committee was appointed and a report presented by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, and the strong feeling of the House in support of my contention. I hope the House will take all those matters into consideration. I cannot blame the Premier for his failure to act on the recommendation of that committee. He was not here at the time when the report was presented. As long as you make concessions to those lumbermen, as long as you allow them to throw the sawdust into the river because it is convenient for them to do so, they will continue the practice. They will never stop it until they are forced to do so. I hope whatever concessions may be made this session will be an ultimatum and that we shall hear no more about the sawdust nuisance. I was forced to take action in this matter because of the outcry in the press and from the public, and I have come to the conclusion that if we do not succeed now in putting an end to the nuisance we never will succeed. If we do not act now, we will find the channel of the Ottawa River filled up with sawdust and we may rely upon the railroads hereafter. We may as well forego the hope of ever having the Ottawa Canal through to Lake Huron. The more the river is obstructed the greater will be the delay and difficulty of getting that canal. These waterways ought to be free and uninterrupted to the whole public. Every man should have an equal right to use them and the sooner the mill men know it the better. If the government has any proposition to make to alter the bill so as to make it acceptable to the House, I am perfectly willing; but I want it to be of a character that it will be a finality, and if I get any assurance that that will be done, I shall not offer further opposition. I say, as I have always said, that I have no desire to injure the trade or any interests of the Ottawa country. There is a diversity of opinion as to whether the city would be injured or benefited if the mills were removed from here. However, that is a matter that I do not care to discuss. The question is, shall we save our river from being ruined by mill refuse? I think we ought; it is a self-evident proposition, and the sooner we accomplish it the better it will be for the country at large and even for the mill-owners themselves. They will find some means whereby they can utilize the mill refuse that is now going to waste, and make it a source of revenue instead of the means of ruining the navigation of the Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I think my hon. friend might well have taken a stand upon the Act of last session and said, here is an Act of Parliament deliberately passed and passed after full investigation implied by requiring that a certain act shall be done within a certain time and it has not been obeyed, but he has not confined himself to taking that stand but has entered very fully into the evidence which warrants the committee in making the recommendation that they did to the House, and which warranted the House in adopting that recommendation and putting this particular clause on the statute-book. I do not think my hon. friend desires to question the bill before the House further than as it respects the Ottawa River. I quite agree with the hon. Minister who introduced this measure that this clause ought not to apply to rivers such as he refers to—international rivers, nor to cases where mills are erected on small streams, in out of the way places that would not effect the public interest and the public health, but it is quite a different thing when it comes to be applied to a great and important river such as the Ottawa. The Act passed last year did not prevent those men carrying on their business. It give them reasonable warning that they would be required to forbear from throwing mill refuse into the river and gave them until the first of May to stop the practice. Moreover, they had in the proceedings of former years to which my hon. friend has referred warning of what was coming. The question came up year after year and was debated in this House and the leaders of the government in this House admitted that great mischief was being done to the rivers that the fish were destroyed and the navigation impaired and that other damage was done. The lumber mill-owners had full warning that some step would be taken to stop the practice and they were given a distinct information that the practice must cease after the first day of May 1895. The first day of May has passed by some 60 days and I do not know whether it has struck the department in which this bill was prepared or my hon. friend who is moving this matter that there has been a violation of the law for the last 60 days. If the mill proprietors have been doing so they are liable to penalties for every day while they continue to violate the conditions that are provided against in the clause of last session. The effect of the bill now introduced is simply to free these gentlemen of six or seven thousand dollars of penalties. There are, I believe, some six mills at the Chaudière, and if the amount of the fines that they are liable to is calculated and put together, I think it would not fall far short of six or seven thousand dollars. That is a very unusual thing. No doubt the mill-owners are very clever men, very prominent men, and they have wonderfully persuasive ways, but I do not think that they ought to receive any consideration other than any man in the community should receive and certainly they receive marvellous consideration in this that the bill proposes to repeal this clause imposing the penalties, and consequently to destroy the foundation on which any action could be built, and its effect will be to free these men from any liability for breach of the law. I do not know whether there is any action pending. If any action has been brought, as there might be for this violation of the provisions of this Act, we might be interfering with the due course of justice. They, the mill-owners, are liable beyond doubt for the time, over 60 days, of direct infringement of the Act. So far as the measure introduced by my hon. friend goes in respect to rivers on the borders of Canada, international rivers and small rivers and mills erected on small streams, I think the bill embodies a necessary provision and I hope in view of all that my hon. friend has stated that the Ottawa River will be exempted or some other step taken to meet the reasonable views of my hon. friend from Rideau to exempt the Ottawa River from the perview of this bill. If that is not the proper mode of doing it some other means should be taken to satisfy the public at large that this nuisance will finally be put an end to. It is all very well to say to these gentlemen who are affected along the borders of this beautiful river, you have the law open to you and you are not confined to the provisions in this statute as the general law is open to you and a principle of the common law is violated that a man must so act that he shall not hurt his neighbour's property—it is all very well to say that to these people but the law is a mighty expensive machine to put in motion and the wheels require to be greased very frequently to keep it in motion and if they proceed by civil action it will involve an enormous expense that few would undertake because it probably would involve a good deal of scientific evidence and that as everybody knows is a very expensive luxury. Under those circumstances I think it is scarcely fair to expect that the people affected should have to proceed to vindicate themselves in the ordinary course of law. I do not see that there would be any use whatever, except some Leonidas should spring up who was willing to sacrifice himself and his fortune for the benefit of all, but the days have passed when people are willing to sacrifice themselves for the benefit of the public and it is scarcely to be expected that there would be any man among those who are so grievously effected by this nuisance caused by the mills who would come forward and take the lead at his own expense. All the hon. gentleman from Rideau has said has appealed very strongly to me, and he has shown, I think, an immense energy in endeavouring to right this great wrong, anyone who looks at it must be perfectly satisfied that a great and grievous wrong is committed, that the fish have been poisoned, the water polluted, that boating for pleasure or business is impeded, and that people are in danger any minute of being blown up, and all because of this nuisance that has been permitted for so many years. The gentlemen who are interested put forward a paper and gave their reasons at length, and no doubt they expected these reasons to commend themselves to the Senate. At all events the paper was very cleverly drawn up. Everything was put forward in the best and most plausible manner, but to my mind that paper gave the finishing touch to any attempt to pass this measure. I look round the county from which I come and I see every important mill has means for burning refuse and I cannot see why these gentlemen on the Ottawa River after all the warnings they had and after been practically required by statute to properly dispose of the refuse should be permitted to throw the saw-dust and the other stuff in the Ottawa River. Their remarks in their pamphlet struck me as rather strange and small coming from grave and respectable men; they as much as say to the people injured, we have been the means of destroying your fishing and preventing many of you from gaining a livelihood by means of fishing, and others fond of sport we have prevented you catching fish in the river, but you have "the slabs." That is calmly brought out as if that should satisfy all—you have the slabs. They say if we have injured the water, if we have injured the navigation our reply to that, practically so in this paper, you have the slabs. That seems to me to be adding insult to injury. It brings to my mind the story of a man who was hunting and failed to find anything to shoot during the whole day. At nightfall he managed to make a little fire, for he was belated in the mountains away from any human being and he was as hungry as a hungry could be. He did not know what to do; he was faint and exhausted, and after building a little fire his dog came along and he looked at his animal, who had a remarkably fine tail, and it struck him that he might supply his necessity for the moment, and he cut the tail off roasted it on the fire and ate every particle of the flesh that was on the tail, and after he had done so threw the bare bones to the dog. Now, it really looks very much as if the gentlemen who say you have the slabs, were as indifferent to the injury they caused as the man throwing the bare bone to the dog. At all events there is a great injury done, and is going on and should be stopped. I really think, however, that it would be a serious matter for the government of the country to say that these men who have for the last eight weeks at all events, been acting in direct violation of the statute ought to be free from fines they are liable to, and their conduct to be condoned by an Act of Parliament. I would be sorry if any course taken by my hon. friend from Rideau would interfere with the bill in its general operation, in its outside operation, but if the hon. Minister of Agriculture could not see his way to so modify it that it would not touch the River Ottawa, although it would go against the grain to vote against a government measure, I should rather vote against a government measure with all the benefits I can see would grow from it, rather than have this injury continue to be perpetrated upon a long suffering people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (116) "An Act to amend the Dominion Lands Act." He said:—This will advance the bill a stage and we can go fully into a discussion of the merits in committee. The bill simply extends the power which was given to the Minister of the Interior by a short Act passed last session, to enable him to dispose of school lands in the North-west Territories, and in Manitoba, that were settled upon by bona fide settlers before they knew that they were school lands. Provision is made to place to the credit of the schools lands of an equal quantity and quality.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 28th June, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (M) "An Act for the settlement of certain questions between the Government of Canada and British Columbia relating to lands in the railway belt of British Columbia."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

SALE OF IMMORAL BOOKS IN QUEBEC.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE inquired :

Whether the Honourable the Minister of Justice, before ordering the release of one Frédéric Desjardins, imprisoned in Quebec jail, at the beginning of the present year, under a conviction, in October last, for having sold immoral books, referred the petition for release to the judge who heard the case and pronounced the sentence?

2. What was the judge's reply?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The information from the Minister of Justice is that this case was referred to the judge, but in all cases the judge's report upon an application of this kind is considered private and confidential for the use of the department.

ST. CATHARINES AND NIAGARA CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD moved the third reading of Bill (60) "An Act respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Niagara, Hamilton and Pacific Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That the bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended by adding the following clause:—

"10. The provisions of the law of the province of Ontario with respect to drainage shall apply to the extension and branches of the company's line authorized by this Act and constructed after its passing, in the same manner as if such extensions and branches were railways within the legislative authority of the said province."

He said :—Since putting this notice on the paper I have received two telegrams and one letter from prominent friends requesting me to allow the notice to drop. I should have been very glad, indeed, to have done what I reasonably could to oblige the gentlemen from whom I received those communications, but, inasmuch as I gave the notice actuated rather by a sense of my duty as a member of the Senate than by any personal feelings whatever, I feel regretfully that I am obliged to go on with the motion. The reasons why this amendment should be made are quite plain. In the first place we made a similar amendment to similar bills which have already passed the House this session, and as a matter of equity we should treat this undertaking in the same way that we have treated other undertakings. That is a reasonable proposition. I know that a point was raised as to the fact that this was not a new corporation—that a corporation already existed—but the point is not whether the corporation is new, but whether the undertaking is new or not. This corporation, under one name or another, has been in existence for about 20 years. Within the last few years, I understand, they have constructed some 12 miles of railway. Under the bill which is now before the House they take power to construct something more than 100 miles of new railway—new branches running to different points and new extensions, and the decision which the committee came to equitably and properly applies to this undertaking. There is no reason on the face of it why the Ontario law with respect to drainage, which is a reasonable law and has not been found fault with by anyone, should not apply to railways as well as to other persons or corporations.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—If the clauses in the Railway Act do not provide a remedy for the grievance complained of, and if the interests of the farmers in any municipality are not sufficiently protected by these clauses, I presume that the government will see that they are made so. It is my opinion that the better course will be to arrive at an understanding as to this, rather than to be adding such a clause—a controversial clause—to bills in their passage through the Senate. If our amendments are not agreed to by the other House, the bills will be returned, which may jeopardize their passing this session.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—They have agreed to such amendments.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—At all events they jeopardize the passage of the bill and it may not be passed this session.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am very indifferent as to whether the amendment is adopted by the House or not, but even if it is adopted by the House I have very grave doubts that it can be effective in any way. I do not think the language of the amendment will bring into operation the Ontario Act, which expressly says it shall refer only to railways within control of the provincial legislature. Therefore my own opinion is that if we add this amendment it will not prove operative or effect the purpose for which it is intended. I have, however, another reason for not desiring to see this amendment adopted, although I shall not divide the House on it. It is this: That this subject came under discussion in the railway committee at one of its meetings, and a sub-committee was appointed for the purpose of considering the whole matter. That committee after careful consideration of the subject, came to a decision which was afterwards ratified by the railway committee and was acted upon, and I think, accepted by this House. The second clause of the report of that committee was to this effect.

Your sub-committee recommend that a similar clause be added to all future bills for the incorporation of railway companies until such time as the Railway Act is so amended so as to make similar provision.

It was perfectly understood in the committee—at least it was understood by two members of the committee because they assured me so, and by myself who was the chairman of that committee, and had the casting vote—that this clause was not to apply to any company already incorporated, but simply to companies to be incorporated in the future. I think the language of the recommendation is very clear, and that was reported to the joint committee and adopted by them. The objection to the course recommended by the hon. member from Halifax is that we would have the same railway, perhaps, under the control of both the Ontario laws and the Dominion laws, and have to go in one case to the Ontario authorities to settle disputes in connection with the railway, and in the other case to the railway committee of the Privy Council. We thought, therefore, that it was just as well not to apply this provision to railways already incorporated, but as it was a wise provision and in harmony with the legislation of the province of Ontario, which was interested in the bill then under the consideration of the railway committee, it was proper that such a precedent should be established in regard to these roads as the sub-committee recommended. Now, as I said, I do not feel any personal interest in this matter whatever, but I think we ought to be bound to some extent by the report of the committee and therefore that we should not apply this amendment to a new act of incorporation. It has been stated that we have already applied this provision to bills which have been before us. I think it will be found, on reference to those bills, that they were new acts of incorporation. I will not speak positively; I speak subject to correction. I think it will be found at any rate on reference to the bill alluded to in the report of the sub-committee that it was a new bill—a company seeking for the first time an act of incorporation. I wish the House to understand how the matter stands, but I shall not divide the House on it, if there appears to be a general impression that it should be added.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The Shore Line Railway Company, in whose bill that amendment was made, was an old company.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We passed a bill through this body some years ago embodying this principle, and it was not ratified by the House of Commons, and the impression of the sub-committee and the general committee on railways was that perhaps by sending a reminder down to the House of Commons we would in the end induce them to accept the legislation we had endeavoured to pass through Parliament two years ago.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not see why we should make fish of one and flesh of another and allow this bill to go through Parliament without adding the proposed amendment. I have taken the trouble to look into the history of this railway company and I find that the first legislation they obtained was in the year 1881. They got then a charter to build a road from St. Catharines to Bismack and then to Smithfield near Caledonia, or some other point on the Grand River near Canfield station on the Grand Trunk Railway. I happen to know a little of the geography of that country and I know just exactly where those roads are located. To that charter they got an amendment in 1882 to give power to build a road to Hamilton and thence to Toronto, and also to build a line to Victoria, in the county of Welland. That is amendment No. 1 to the original charter; amendment No. 2 was in 1885. They got power then to build the road to Thorold, in the county of Welland. The amendment in 1887 was to build a line on the Hamilton and Toronto road, from near Oakville or Port Credit to a place called Cooksville on the Credit Valley Railway. In 1890 they came back again and got power to build a road to the village of Burlington. In 1891 they came back and got power to build a branch line to any railway bridge on the Niagara River to connect with any railway in the state of New York, with power to lease to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canada Southern, the Grand Trunk Railway, or any of its branches. In 1892 they came back here and asked for an extension of time to commence the work on the main line, and in 1894 they came back and asked for a further extension of time. This year they come back again to ask, not only for a further extension of time, but for a spider-like charter with a longer leg to the spider than they ever had before.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—How much more?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—About one hundred miles, and the other would be ninety.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—How many legs would the spider have?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not know how many legs, but there is one long leg to this one. I am not opposing the granting of the charter. I would let them have it. It seems to be a charter for the purpose of speculation. I am convinced that that is at the bottom of it. Let me tell you this, that although they have had that charter for nearly fifteen years, all they have built in ten years is the neck of the spider from St. Catharines to Niagara River bridge, about ten miles. All the rest of the road is there without a shovelful of earth being turned. Now the argument of the hon. gentleman from Richmond would be of course proper and all right if this could be construed into an old charter. But really if you read this bill you will find that the most important part is the extension which they want now to build, which is from Hamilton to Brantford in a westerly direction, and from there to Woodstock and from Woodstock to either Port Dover or Port Burwell, on Lake Erie, and then another branch running from Thorold until they strike the main branch leading from Hamilton to St. Catharines, means about one hundred miles of new railway, and if it is not so expressed in the report of the sub-committee it ought to apply to an old company that would be looking for the privilege of building a railway where the extension is greater than the original line, I must say it is simply the failure of expressing it in so many words. The spirit of that clause in the sub-committee report must certainly mean that an important extension like this ought to come under the operation of that clause. I therefore have pleasure in supporting the amendment, and I think we ought to incorporate the clause in this bill just as well as in other bills, and not make fish of one and flesh of another.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In the committee I voted in favour of the bill without any amendment, which was carried by one vote. Had my hon. friend from Alexandria then presented the fact that he has submitted now, I should have voted in the direction that this amendment takes, which is that the Ontario law with respect to drainage shall apply to the extensions and branches of the company's line authorized by this bill. Although we then agreed upon a principle that should apply to all bills to incorporate new companies, yet it was not considered then that we were bound solely by that. In a case like this, where it is proposed to extend a line to such an extent that the original charter is lost sight of, we should apply the same principle to this that we would to a new company. The only hesitancy that I have about it is the statement of regret made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that he had given the notice previous to receiving those letters, intimating thereby that if he had got those letters before the notice was published he might not have moved it. I should like to see those letters which caused him to hesitate. This being virtually a new company, we are not confined to the principle which was adopted by the committee.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I think we are all very greatly indebted to the hon. gentleman from Glengarry for his exhaustive explanation. If anything could be said more than another to show his perseverance, patient temper and constant effort in well-doing, surely the report would convince us. It is true that this enterprise, like very many others, has been a long time reaching the point which it has reached to-day. We all know that these railway enterprises are frequently entered upon with an understanding, sometimes tacit, sometimes in writing, that certain capitalists will aid them to build the road. This was the explanation at the time that these gentlemen undertook the project. They were some of the most respectable residents of St. Catharines and one or two of them have placed in the railway at the present time some hundreds of thousands of dollars, and have made themselves liable for even larger amounts.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I want the hon. gentleman to understand that I am not opposing the third reading of the bill. I am only supporting the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—They come before you with every assurance that men of large capital are prepared to take up the enterprise and push it forward to completion. It would occur to me that a road with a charter in existence 15 years has certain rights that should be recognized here, and I do not think that we are at liberty to interfere with those rights when doing so involves an increased expenditure. It is true the route has been changed to some extent, but while that is so the mileage is about the same. The most serious objection to the proposed change is that it means delay, and at this stage of the session we should not like to have this bill thrown out. It is too important in the section of the country through which the road is to pass. I hope you will consider this and pass this bill and if there is anything in the Railway Act of the province of Ontario that commends it—self so specially to the members of this honourable House, why not call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the section and have it inserted in the Dominion Railway Act? We would then avoid an immense amount of difficulty and all new bills would be subject to the new legislation.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—I am sorry to differ from friends with whom I have always had great pleasure in acting, nor would I say anything in this case if I did not feel very strongly that my hon. friend from Halifax had made a proposition which is alike anomalous and unconstitutional. He proposes that the provisions of the law of Ontario shall apply to this railway. I know something of the laws relating to drainage—and I entirely approve of them in the main and should very much like to see Parliament adopt laws of a similar character by inserting them in the General Railway Act—but a general clause of this kind adopting laws of an independent legislature is unheard of. I think it is a very grave step and would be very dangerous. We know not the moment an independent legislature may change the law. It would be full of complications and difficulties apart from the inconvenience of putting the corporation under two or more distinct legislatures. Roads incorporated by the Parliament of Canada should be regulated and governed by the creating power alone. I must vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This matter was very fully discussed by the Railway Committee, and a majority (of only one, I admit) decided upon adopting the principle we have laid down. The House will be able to judge whether this bill comes within the category or not. The other day the Canada Southern asked for legislation to build a branch, and that was debated, and it was held that it would not be fair to apply the principle to that line, because it was part of the Canada Southern Railway. The committee had decided that this principle should not be held to apply to existing railways. It would be absurd to have a law applying to part of a railway and not to another portion. This is the clause in the minutes relating to the matter:

Your sub-committee also recommends that a similar clause (that is, the drainage clause, which is proposed to be added to this bill) be added to all future bills for the incorporation of railway companies, until such time as the Railway Act is so amended as to make similar provision.

I think it is clear that this relates only to companies which are applying for incorporation for the first time. That was the interpretation put upon it in the case of the branch of the Canada Southern. An uncontradicted statement has been made that the law of Ontario is fair to the railways. I challenge that statement, and I will give my reasons for doing so. Those questions do not arise when a road is being constructed, for the reason that the company is obliged to open up culverts and ditches for all the waters then existing. That is the law, and I never heard of a railway attempting to contravene it. They invariably, in their own interests, make provision for years to come, but after a time the principle of drainage—a very proper principle to be favoured in every way—spreads and enlarges. Men whose farms do not border on the railway find that they can get the best outlet by running to a railway and have the ditches enlarged. I ask hon. gentlemen now whether the railway company ought to pay for the increased drainage that affects lands that are not even adjacent to the line?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The law of Ontario governing water viewers would only put upon the railway the percentage of expense that it ought to bear, and it might put a portion of it on farms three or four miles off.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The railway law is this, that those lands that are benefited pay for it except in the case of the railway. I will refer to the clause because I do not think it is quite proper that a statement of the kind should go unchallenged. As far as the individual owners of the land are concerned, if a ditch crosses their property and is for the benefit of persons beyond, it is assessed against the persons interested, but not so in the case of a railway. When they come to the railway ditch, the municipality in Ontario can order the ditch to be opened and a new culvert made if the existing one is not sufficiently large. Last session the law relating to ditches and water courses in Ontario was not only amended but consolidated. The section which deals with the matter is section 21, and it would be eminently fair if there were not a rider attached to it, as follows :—

No agreement with a railway company shall be entered into by a municipal council under this section which will impose a special liability on the owners without the consent in writing, filed with the clerk of the municipality, of two-thirds of the owners liable for the construction of the ditch in respect to which work on railway lands is to be undertaken.

I ask hon. gentlemen whether that is a fair subsection? The preceding paragraph is eminently right and proper, but the subsection to it makes it entirely dependent on the railway company getting a requisition from two-thirds of all the people benefited before the council is authorized to divide the costs.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—How will that apply to a charter that is obtained from the Parliament of Canada? They will tell you at once that they have nothing to do with the municipality or with the laws of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but what you claim is that all railways hereafter should come under the Ontario law.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Only as far as that is concerned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As far as this particular question of ditching is concerned, and that is what we are discussing. The idea of those gentlemen who are desirous of adding that as a rider to all bills to be passed in this chamber is that the laws of Ontario are eminently fair to the railway company, and the railway company has a fair show as between the people and the municipality. I ask hon. gentlemen to say whether the railway company has the smallest chance of not being charged with the whole amount.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I had some experience, and I know the railway company succeeded.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have had some experience—quite as much as the hon. gentleman, and perhaps more. The other day I saw one of those notices where the railway company was not any more interested in the proposed drain than the hon. gentleman would be, but a number of individuals intimated that the railway company, for their convenience, must deepen their ditches and make new culverts at a cost of probably six or seven hundred dollars. If that clause existed in this charter, the railway company would be obliged to obey the dictation of those three or four, or eight or ten persons in a municipality who believed that they were going to be benefited by the deepening of railway ditches and enlarging culverts, and the railway company would be utterly powerless.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman has not read what precedes that section.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The agreement with the railway company must be ratified by two-thirds of the people interested.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But if it is not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the railway must bear the costs.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the law say so?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman read the passage where it says so?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do you mean to say that the law lays down that a ditch can be constructed until it reaches a railway and that the railway track may obstruct it?

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Yes, I had a trial of it and the award was made against us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law stands the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has power to deal with all those questions and say what portion the railway company shall contribute and at what point the culvert shall be put in for the public safety, and the whole jurisdiction is here. As I have said before, I challenge anybody to show that it will cost the council any more to write a letter to Ottawa and obtain an opinion from the railway committee here than to decide the question in the locality.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is the second time the hon. gentleman has uttered that challenge and I have answered him already.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As a rule the railway committee hold their meetings when there is any business to be done. However, I am not going to discuss that. I simply rose to read the Ontario law which hon. gentlemen say is eminently fair. It is either valueless or else it is subject to the condition that I have stated, that in order to exempt the railway company from meeting the entire expenses, two-thirds of the people who are beneficially interested must agree to charge the municipality with a proportion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—This only asks to apply the laws of Ontario to the branch asked for by this bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We are told that this is an old charter. I should like to ask the promoter of this bill or anyone else if it is an old charter that covers the line from Brantford to Hamilton, which is at least 20 miles, from Brantford to Woodstock, 20 miles, from Woodstock to Port Dover, 18 miles, and from there to Port Burwell, 20 miles, and so on, until you have got over 100 miles of a railway tacked on, as my hon. friend says, to 10 miles of railway now built. I want hon. gentlemen to consider this fact: if you are to provide for drainage, you can do it much easier when building a road than afterwards, and the understanding with the committee was this—and I appeal to those who were present to confirm what I say—to apply the clause to new undertakings and not to railways which are built. If you are going to split hairs and say this is an old charter, of course the contention of the hon. gentleman from Richmond will apply. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa is very desirous that the farmers should pay the expense. On every occasion when this question is brought before the House, he has fought it from the word “go.” He is always looking after the interests of the railway companies, and he tells you, “here now, all that the municipality has to do is to write a letter to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and get the dispute settled.” I am perfectly satisfied if the farmers of this country could go conveniently before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council they would get justice. But the question is this: are you going to bring the people of this country here from Halifax or from Vancouver when they have any trouble about draining their land? My hon. friend says all you have got to do is to write a letter. At the last meeting of the Railway Committee over here, the reeve of the town of Wainfleet was here: unfortunately we did not reach the case that day. They were asked to pay $300, and what did the railway company do? I was over at the meeting looking after the interests of the people. The company said: “If you will let the thing drop we will take $100,” but before making the offer they had put the people to the trouble of coming all the way here, but did not tell them they wanted to settle for $100. I have no doubt the municipality will pay the money rather than come back to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Now I have tried to get legislation in this matter in the Senate. I brought in a bill twice. The first time it was defeated in the Railway Committee of the House of Commons. Then I sent a copy of that bill to every county council in the province of Ontario. In order to get them to instruct their members to support the measure when it came to the House of Commons. I know many of them were instructed to do so, but the railway interest was so strong that when it came to the House they defeated it. I got a friend who was not controlled by the railways of this country to take it up and he had a division in the House of Commons on the measure. I cannot do better than to read you this bill which went through the Senate twice. My hon. friend from Ottawa is very much alarmed about the danger to life and property if the Drainage Act should apply to railways. I stand here and I say that in all cases the railway company should do the work. I would be very sorry to see the farmers in any municipality allowed to interfere with the railways, but as the law stands to-day, how are we situated? If there is a drain dug and even a culvert under the railway, and you clean out the ditch until you come to the railway, you cannot go on the railway property to clean the culvert, because if you do, you are liable to be taken up and fined for trespass and perhaps imprisoned. My hon. friend from Ottawa is very desirous that the lives of people carried on the railway should be safe. I am with him there, but whenever a question is brought up to grant relief to the farmers, as in the case of this Act, my hon. friend from Ottawa is on hand on behalf of the railways. I want everyone to understand that that is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken on all occasions. Here is the bill that I got through this House in spite of all that the hon. member from Ottawa could do :

AN ACT TO AMEND "THE RAILWAY ACT."

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

1. Notwithstanding anything in section fourteen of "The Railway Act," it shall be the duty of every railway company under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and without any such contribution as is hereinafter referred to, to maintain and keep in repair all necessary drains, ditches, and water-courses in existence at the passing of this Act, in and for lands belonging to or held by such Company.

2. Whenever the municipal council of any county, township, parish, or other municipality in Canada, either of its own motion or on the application of any inhabitant thereof, determines that it is necessary to construct a drain or ditch for the purpose of draining lands in the municipality across the lands and railway of any railway company, such drain or ditch shall, subject to the conditions hereinafter provided, be made and maintained across the line of such railway and lands, and on equitable terms to be settled as hereinafter provided.

3. Such council, hereinafter referred to as the applicant, may serve upon the company, by leaving the same with any agent or other officer in charge of the nearest station, a notice in writing of such decision, together with a description of the lands outside the railway to be benefitted by the proposed drainage, which notice shall be accompanied by plans and specifications prepared and certified by a civil engineer, or Dominion or provincial land surveyor, of that part or portion of the drain or ditch to be constructed across the company's lands and railway, and with an estimate, also prepared and certified, of the cost of constructing the said drain or ditch across its property, and if the estimated cost of such construction does not exceed the sum of eight hundred dollars, the railway company shall, after the expiration of a reasonable time, construct that part or portion of the said drain or ditch across its lands and railway of the same size and dimensions as are specified on the plans and specifications furnished as aforesaid, unless it disputes in the manner hereinafter mentioned the propriety of the proposed work, or the correctness of such notice, plan, specification, or estimate, in which case the dispute shall be inquired into and finally determined in the manner hereinafter provided.

4. If neither the applicant nor the company give notice of dispute as in the next section of this Act provided for, and if the company and the applicant do not agree as to whether the railway is to be benefitted, as to what contribution the applicant should pay towards the construction of the work, and if the whole cost of construction does not exceed the sum of eight hundred dollars as estimated by a civil engineer or Dominion or provincial land surveyor as aforesaid, then the applicant may tender the railway company the sum that the applicant thinks is fair and just as its portion of the said cost of construction and may offer to bear afterwards such proportion of the maintenance as it may think just and fair, and if the railway company does not accept the amount so tendered, or if it disputes that the offer for the proper proportion of future maintenance, then the proportion of the cost of construction and maintenance, or of either as the case may be, that each shall pay or bear, or the question whether it shall be borne altogether by the applicant, shall be decided by arbitration, and any amount or amounts awarded by the arbitrator or arbitrators to be paid to the railway company in respect of such construction or maintenance, shall from time to time be collectable from the applicant as a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction for the amount or amounts so awarded to the company, or if the award determines upon the proportion of the cost of construction or maintenance payable by the applicant, without mentioning the amount, then such proportion shall be recoverable before any court of competent jurisdiction, and the judgment or award of the arbitrator or arbitrators shall have the same force and effect and be as binding and conclusive as if it had been made by arbitrators concerning the expropriation of land under "The Railway Act," and the appointment of an arbitrator or arbitrators and the mode of procedure under this Act as to arbitration, shall be, as nearly as may be, in the same manner as provided in "The Railway Act," from section one hundred and forty-six to section one hundred and sixty-one inclusive.

5. If any dispute, other than concerning the respective proportions of contribution which are to be settled by arbitration as aforesaid, shall arise between the applicant and the company, either in regard to the safety or suitability of the place designated for the work or the sufficiency or correctness of any plans, specifications or estimate, or the propriety of the proposed work, or the manner in which the same is to be maintained, or otherwise, the party disputing may, within thirty days after receipt of such plans, specifications or estimate, give notice in writing of the objections to the other party and to the Minister of Railways, and thereupon the Minister or the Railway Committee of the Privy Council may cause an inspection of the locality to be made by such person as he or they may appoint, and the dispute may be enquired into on the spot by such proceedings as he or they may direct, after which the Railway Committee may make such order in the premises as they shall deem fit and proper, which order shall finally determine such dispute.

6. Every railway company shall be subject to all general municipal regulations, not inconsistent with this Act, respecting the maintenance and repair of drains, ditches and water-courses in any county, parish, township or municipality in Canada through which the railway passes, unless exempted therefrom by the special Act of incorporation: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall authorize any municipality by any rule or regulation to compel the use of the drains of the railway company for the purposes of general drainage other than is authorized by law.

7. Every notice given by the applicant shall contain a post office address within the Dominion of Canada to which notices intended for the applicant may be addressed, and any notice to be given to the applicant shall be sufficiently given if posted by registered letter in any post office of the Dominion of Canada directed to the address so given.

8. The provisions of "The Railway Act" with respect to drainage shall continue to apply to all cases not provided for by this Act, and all provisions of "The Railway Act," not inconsistent with this Act, including those with respect to suits and penalties, shall also apply to all such cases.

Mark you, the railway company is to construct the drain at all times, and that will do away with some of the remarks of my hon. friend from Ottawa. Now this bill was opposed by my hon. friend from Ottawa from the word "go" all the time, and he never ceased his opposition to this day. My hon. friend from Sarnia is very anxious that the government should amend the Railway Act in the same direction, but was not so anxious for the bill that I introduced, because he opposed it then. The principal reason for this amendment is because we want to have disputes settled right on the spot. The trouble is bringing the people here. I have confidence in the government even on the saw-dust question, but I am losing confidence on this matter and why? Because I found they allowed my bill, after passing through the Senate, to be defeated in the House of Commons, and I cannot do better now than put on record the votes on that measure, so that the people may know, on the eve of an election, who are their friends. With due respect to the Senate, I can put the yeas and nays in the debates, because I feel proud that there were enough members in the Senate to carry the bill. It was supported by Sir John Abbott and was sent down to the other House, and by the railway influence was defeated twice in the railway committee. But the votes are on record. The six months' hoist was moved in the Senate the last time my bill was before us. I will read the names of those who voted against it:

Yeas.—Almon, Armand, Baillargeon, Botsford, Cochrans, Girard, Glasier, Guévremont, Howlan, Lacoste, Montgomery, Murphy, O'Donohoe, Ogilvie, Prowse, Scott, Smith, Vidal, —18.

All the rest at the House voted for it, but I am glad to see my hon. friend from Sarnia is coming around to my opinion. He says we ought to have it now, and see what a change it brings about, although he voted against that reasonable proposition when it was supported by Sir John Abbott. I understood him to say the other day that the government ought to amend the Railway Act in this direction so as to give the people relief. I want them to come down and amend this law. I even put a copy of this bill in the hands of the leader of the House to see if he would take action. I did not beg of him to do it, because he is governing this country. I have said that I would put the vote that was taken on my bill in the House of Commons on record in our debates. When I sent copies of the bill to many of the counties, instructions were given to their representatives in the Commons that the amendment should be made the law of this country. Well, did they do it? No; they defeated me twice in the railway committee. I got the bill put on the Orders of the Day in the House of Commons, because I wanted to show who were the friends of justice and who were carried away by the influence of the railways. The six months' hoist was moved in respect to this bill, and those who voted for the motion were the following:

Yeas.—Amyot, Audet, Béchard, Bergeron, Bergein, Borden, Bourassa, Bowell, Cameron, Campbell, Caron (Sir Adolphe), Chapleau, Cimon, Cockburn, Colby, Curran, Daly, Davin, Dawson, Denison, Desjardins, Dewdney, Dickey, Doyon, Dupont, Earle, Edgar, Ferguson (Leeds and Grenville), Ferguson (Welland), Fiset, Freeman, Gauthier, Gigault, Godbout, Grandbois, Guillet, Haggart, Hale, Hall, Hesson, Hickey, Holton, Jones (Digby), Kenny, Labrosse, Lang, Langevin (Sir Hector), LaRivière, Laurie (Lieut.-General), Livingston, Macdonald (Sir John), Macdowall, McDonald (Victoria), McDougall (Cape Breton), McKay, McKeen, McMillan (Vaudreuil), Mara, Masson, Meigs, Mills (Annapolis), Mitchell, Moncreiff, Montague, Patterson (Essex), Perry, Pope, Putnam, Rinfret, Riopel, Robertson, Sriver, Shanly, Small, Taylor, Thérien, Thompson (Sir John), Trow, Vanasse, Weldon (Albert), Wilmot, Wilson, (Elgin), Wood (Brockville), Yeo.—85.

Here are the members who were favourable to my contention, and I want the people of this country to remember them now on the eve of election, and to remember the other members too. If we do not get relief, as far as this old man's voice will extend it will be heard in the province of Ontario on this question. He is not dead yet, but only sleeping. Here are the members who voted with me.

Nays.—Armstrong, Bain (Wentworth), Barron, Blake, Boisvert, Bowman, Boyle, Brien, Cargill, Carpenter, Cartwright (Sir Richard), Casey, Charlton, Choquette, Coughlin, Davies, De St. Georges, Dessaint, Dickinson, Gordon, Innes, Jamieson, Jones (Halifax), Kirk, Landerkin, Laurier, Macdonald (Huron), McCarthy, McCulla, McMillan (Huron), McMullen, McNeill, Mulock, Neveux, O'Brien, Paterson (Brant), Platt, Purcell, Roome, Rowand, Ste. Marie, Semple, Somerville, Tyrwhitt, Wallace, Watson, White (Cardwell).—47.

Those are the gentlemen who stood by the interests of the farmers of this country. Now I ask the government, for the purpose of saving further trouble, to bring in an amendment to the Railway Act as indicated by the bill which I have read to the House. It is in the interest of the country at large and in the interest of the railways themselves. Why should the government of this country persecute the people by compelling them to come to Ottawa to settle a dispute? They say they cannot get justice—that the procedure is too expensive. I would ask the government to put a stop to this whole thing. If the leader will make a declaration that he will amend that law in the direction that I have advocated it will be all right. That is what his predecessor in the Senate sanctioned. Sir John Abbott was a great man, whose death is still lamented by many people in this country. He gave me a promise a year or two before he died that when amending the Railway Act the following year he would bring in an amendment, but he was so much taken up by other work that he did not have time to do it, and I brought in a bill myself. Now I ask the government to seriously consider this matter, and bring in a government measure this session.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They could not get it through the Commons this session.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, it can be done. I have no doubt you will find my hon. friend from Ottawa and the railway interest opposing it, but the bill will pass here all right. I ask a favour of my leader, and in his own interest to do this—because he knows I have the interest of the people of this country at heart, and I am asking nothing unreasonable. I invite his attention particularly to this because if it is not changed now, it will be a factor in the election that we are on the eve of now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can only say in reply to the appeal made by the hon. gentleman from Monck that I am not in a position to give the promise which he endeavours to exact from me. He has pointed out the manner in which I voted on the same question when I occupied a seat in the House of Commons. I have yet to learn the propriety of changing that vote. I am not in accord, I know, with some of my friends on this question, probably not even my colleague on my right, the Minister of Agriculture. This is a matter of such grave importance that it is worthy of the most serious consideration of the government. What I object to, and what I think is laying down an exceedingly dangerous principle, is the embodying in an Act passed by Dominion Parliament the law for the time being of any province. I am not questioning the propriety of the law itself, because I readily conceive that the senator for Monck has a better practical knowledge on this question than I have, but I am of opinion that if the law as it stands upon the statute-book of the province of Ontario to-day is the best law to govern and rule and control the railways in reference to drainage, it should be made a part of the Railway Act of the Dominion and not subject to whatever changes might be suggested by a local legislature. How do we know that if the laws of the local legislature should be made applicable to the Dominion railways that they would be suitable? Even my hon. friend would shudder at the idea of making a law of Quebec or some other province applicable to the Dominion railways of this country. I have had some little experience upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and while I admit the delay and the expenses incidental to an application, I have yet to learn of a single case in which the members of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council have not acceded to every just and legitimate demand made by any municipality or by any individual. The objects of that committee are none other than to protect the interests of the people who are affected by the construction of a railway; and the railway people and those who have invested their money in railways have as good a right to be protected under the law as the people through whose farms the railways pass. I do not say that they should be in a position to deny the right of a farmer, or of a municipality, to insist upon drains being made sufficiently large and deep to accomplish the object for which they are built, but I do know this, and so does every man who has had anything at all to do with municipalities or individuals, that unfortunately every inducement is offered by the municipality, by the county and by the individual to secure a railway. There is no question about that. I have gone through a good deal of this electioneering, if I may so call it, in favour of bonuses and getting from municipalities assistance to railways. I have assisted those municipalities in securing what I believed to be their rights, and while I found the people upon every occasion anxious and willing to secure the benefits which arise from the construction of railways, and before the construction is prepared almost to make any concession, immediately they get it a fixture, they take every advantage they can of a railway. I do not think it is necessary I should tell my hon. friend from Monck that. He knows it as well as I do. I am afraid it is human nature and operates with all of us. The moment you have that within your reach and grasp, and you can exact a little more by any process whatever, you will take it from a corporation. I have made these remarks in justification of the vote which I gave in 1890 in the House of Commons, when my late chief, the Hon. Sir John Macdonald, moved to throw out the bill. While I admit there is much force in the argument of the hon. gentleman, I say if the law is to be amended in that respect it should be made a part of the statute regulating and controlling all Dominion railways, and not tacked on to any private bill or applied to a particular locality in a particular province through which the railway may run. We may have railways running through two or three provinces, and if this amendment is to be in the law, then the law affecting railways in Ontario must apply to the portion of the line in that province; in Quebec, the laws of the province must apply, and so on through the maritime provinces. Let us have one general law. I promise my hon. friend, knowing how earnest he is, that the suggestion he makes shall be considered. I need not refer to the private relations which have existed between us. We have for years acted personally and politically together. I need not refer to that further than to say that he has no more confidence in me personally than I have in him. I know that in acting as he does he is actuated by the very best motives, but at the same time I must be permitted, with my limited knowledge of these matters, to differ from him as to the manner in which those views should be carried out. My impression is that the majority of the Senate is with the hon. gentleman, but ever since I have been in political life I have tried to have some little opinion of my own. I should like very much not to see this principle adopted in the manner in which it is proposed here. The constitutional question I leave my hon. friend from Barrie to discuss. I repeat, I do not like the idea of fastening on the Dominion the legislation of any local legislature which may be changed every year whenever the question comes up.

The Senate then divided on the amendment which was rejected by the following vote:

DOMINION LANDS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill (116) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Lands Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have an amendment to move to extend the power to dispose of certain school lands which are situated within the boundaries of the Cochrane ranch, as follows:—

3. Notwithstanding anything in the Dominion Lands Act, the Governor in Council may on such conditions as he deems proper, sell to the Cochrane Ranch Company the following school lands, namely:—Section 11 in township 3, range 28, west of the fourth principal meridian, and so much of section 29, in township 3, range 27, west of the fourth principal meridian, as lies north of the Belly river: Provided, that such sale shall not take place until the Minister of the Interior has, by notice in the Canada Gazette, set apart as school lands, in lieu thereof other public lands of equal extent and value as nearly as may be.

It is easily understood that some of the school sections that are situated in the centre of tracts owned by ranching companies would be useless for school purposes, now or hereafter, and the object of the amendment which I propose is to enable the Minister of the Interior to dispose of those lands situated in the territory not likely to become settled. The Cochrane Ranching Company have purchased some 16,000 acres of land, and school lands are situated in the centre of their ranch—the object of this clause is to enable the department to dispose of the school sections to the Cochrane Ranching Company, substituting land of equal value and extent in other portions of the territory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought the ranchers held their lands under lease.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—These lands were originally leased to the company with a right to purchase at a certain price. The Cochrane Ranching Company have purchased largely, as have some others.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose the school lands will be selected as nearly as possible in that locality?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the principle. If it is necessary for the sake of settlement, where a ranch is leased—the lease may be cancelled and the land disposed of to settlers. Of course it is a different matter where the land becomes freehold.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The ranching companies, I presume, do not intend to permanently retain the property for ranching purposes; and then, when this large tract of land is settled up, it would be much more convenient to have the school lands in the middle of the settlement than in some comparatively remote place.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It becomes a bona fide freehold in the case of purchase, and they can hold it as long as they please. If they decide hereafter to lay it out and dispose of it for settlement, they would be in the same position as any other private holders of land.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Can you give us any idea of how much has been paid for this land?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One dollar and twenty-five cents per acre is the amount which has been paid, and is still the price regulated by order in council.

The amendment was agreed to.

I have another clause which I propose adding to the bill. It is however but an addition to the present law, it is adopting in the present Act the clause which now forms part of the Dominion Lands Act as amended by chap. 27, 57 Victoria 1889. It reads as follows:

Section three of chapter twenty-seven of the statutes of 1889 is hereby repealed.

As respects every assignment or transfer of a homestead or a pre-emption right hold or acquired under any act relating to Dominion lands, in whole or in part, and every agreement to make any such assignment or transfer, made or entered into before the issue of patent and previous to the date of the passing of this act, no such assignment or transfer or agreement shall be ipso facto null and void, nor shall any forfeiture accrue in respect thereof; but the Minister of the Interior may declare any such assignment or transfer or agreement to be null and void, and such forfeiture to have accrued, or either, and such declaration shall have force and effect as if herein enacted: Provided, that no such declaration shall have force or effect in any case in which a patent for any homestead or pre-emption land has been issued previous to the date of such declaration, unless the patent has issued through fraud, error or improvidence.

Nothing in the next preceding subclause contained shall in any manner have force or effect as respects any lands in relation to which the object matter of the said subclause has already been adjudicated upon, or is in question in any court of competent jurisdiction.

I may say the same clause, almost verbatim, forms the third clause of 52 Victoria, chapter 27, Dominion Lands Act, as amended, 1889. It is only added to the present bill in order to cover cases which have arisen since the law now upon the statute-book was passed. As I understand, parties having homesteads are precluded from giving any securities upon the lands until they have obtained or completed their settlement duties, and obtained the patents therefor. In case of necessity to purchase any article that they would require to carry on their farming, it has been the habit of the parties disposing of these goods to settlers to write on the back of the notes, the location, the number of the lot, the name and concession and everything connected with it. Under the law of Manitoba, that being registered constitutes a lien upon the property. Now that would be valueless under the law as it at present stands, for the reason that the settler has no right to place any lien upon unpatented lands, but it enables him to obtain his supplies, or horses, or machinery, or whatever he may require to carry on operations; this clause is to declare that in certain cases unless there is fraud, or advantage has been taken of the settler, that it shall not operate as against the granting of patents, &c.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It brings them under the provincial law, I suppose?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To that extent, yes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

THE NEW WESTMINSTER PENITENTIARY.

MOTIONS POSTPONED.

The following motions being called :

By the Honourable Mr. McInnes, (B.C.) :—

That he will call the attention of the Senate, to the Report of Judge Drake, a commissioner appointed by the Government of Canada to investigate charges of irregularities in the British Columbia Penitentiary, and the presentment of the grand jury at New Westminster denouncing the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons to the position of deputy warden of said penitentiary as "an insult to the self respecting portion of this community"; also, to the annual reports of J. G. Moylan, late inspector of penitentiaries. And that he will ask if it is the intention of the Government to dismiss the said James Fitzsimmons, and to appoint a royal commission to investigate the official conduct of the said J. G. Moylan?

By the Honourable Mr. McInnes, (B.C.) :—

That the Senate regards the prompt dismissal of James Fitzsimmons, deputy warden of the British Columbia Penitentiary, and the appointment of a royal commission, (similar to that held by Mr. Justice Drake, in 1894, to investigate charges of irregularities in the British Columbia Penitentiary) to investigate charges of official misconduct on the part of J. G. Moylan, while acting as inspector of penitentiaries, as necessary in the interests of the public service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: I have some papers relating to this matter to submit to the House. I only got them about fifteen minutes ago. The reason given me why the copy was not prepared at an earlier date was that they had been taken away by some members of the House of Commons, and the officials were unable to get them back. I now beg to lay upon the Table a copy of the instructions to Mr. Justice Drake relative to the inquiry into the New Westminster Penitentiary, and other papers connected with the investigation.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—As the papers have been at last laid upon the Table of the Senate I ask that these notices be placed on the Order Paper for Monday next, when I hope to be in a position to proceed with them. I trust that every hon. member who has taken the slightest interest in the charges against the management of the New Westminster Penitentiary will read the evidence taken before the commission and the report upon it.

The motions were allowed to stand until Monday next.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the Order in Council transmitting to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, for the information of his government and the legislature of Manitoba, the petition and representations of their Lordships the Canadian Archbishops and Bishops, presented to the Senate during last session, re Manitoba School legislation; the answer of the government of Manitoba to said Order in Council; also, all correspondence respecting the same, between the Dominion Government and the Manitoba Government.

He said:—It has been my privilege within the last two weeks to address this House at some length upon the important question which is now engaging public attention. I may in the near future have to avail myself of the same privilege again. I shall therefore be brief in my remarks on the present occasion. I wish only to point out to this House the not altogether unimportant insight which we can get into the views of the Manitoba Government from their answer to the Order in Council to which this motion of mine refers. As every member of this honourable House must remember, it has been contended in some quarters that the remedial order issued in March last by this government was, in its nature, rather harsh and mandatory. It has been contended that the proper way would have been merely to approach the government of Manitoba with some mild invitation to reconsider their policy, so as to leave them freedom of action. It has been said that their dignity was affronted, that they could not afford to be dictated to in the terms of the remedial order. For my part, I am strongly of the opinion that the remedial order could not have been milder than it was. That opinion is shared, I dare say, by all those who do not regard the government of a country as child's play. But, hon. gentlemen, this view is strengthened by the action of the Manitoba Government on the Order in Council served upon them in July, 1894. That Order in Council was courteous and respectful and considerate of the provincial rights and dignity. It was an appeal to their sense of justice, based upon the earnest and most solemn representations coming from a body of men whose motives, fairness and ability cannot be impeached. That Order in Council had been drafted, issued and transmitted in a spirit of conciliation. There was nothing about it that could be construed as inconsistent with a due regard for the feelings of those to whom it was addressed. That was the hand of peace and harmony. That was the material with which all the difficulties could have been bridged over. The answer of the Manitoba Government, however, has been the reverse of conciliatory. When the papers are brought before this House, it will be seen that no attention whatever was paid to the character of the petitioners or to their just claims. It affirmed in language which, I regret to say, had about it an air of impudence in keeping with the injustice done by the legislation complained of; it reaffirmed the policy of the Government of Manitoba as embodied in their laws of 1890, and expressed their determination to refuse at any time in the future to take into consideration the grievances of the Catholics. That was the substance of the answer. In the meantime, the Catholics of Manitoba themselves approached the local government in the same spirit of conciliation. One day—on the 11th day of September, 1894—they marched up, over 500 in number, silent and with dignity, to the legislative buildings. Then and there a petition, signed by nearly 4,000 people, was presented to the government praying, in unequivocal, but at the same time courteous, terms, for such amendments to their laws as could relieve us from the disabilities we have been labouring under for the last five years. Here is our petition:

To the Honourable

The Premier and Members of the Government of Manitoba.

We, the undersigned Catholics of the province of Manitoba, do respectfully represent:—

1. That we are unable, from motives of conscientious convictions, to participate in, or derive any benefit from a system of education as now carried on under the Public School Act of 1890 and amendments thereto.

2. That the heavy pecuniary sacrifices with which Catholics throughout the province have been burdened in consequence of said laws, for the last four years, even through the financial stringency of the present time, must remove any doubt as to the earnestness of their feelings and convince your Government of the gravity of their grievances.

3. That without sharing your petitioners' religious convictions that the taxation of Catholics for schools acceptable only to Protestants, is most oppressive and unfair, your government must feel that they can no longer, in their own conscience, legitimately carry on the system, the result of which is injustice and oppression.

4. Therefore, your petitioners, as free born British subjects, do enter their firm and solemn protest against this unfair treatment at your hands; and do respectfully and earnestly pray, that your government take into their serious consideration the grievances of the Catholics of this province, and do pass such legislation as may be necessary to remedy such grievances to their full extent, and do assure to the said population the full respect of their rights and conscientious feelings, the use of their school taxes, of their legitimate share of the public money voted for educational purposes in this province, and your petitioners, as a duty bound, will ever pray.

The answer to that petition was the same as the answer to the order in council of the Ottawa Government—a total disregard for the principles of justice and for the feelings of a whole class of the population, an announcement of their determination not to retrace in any way their steps. There should, therefore, be no wonder now at the course taken by this government in their remedial order. The conciliatory course to which they had resorted last year having been disregarded and slighted, the experiment could not be renewed. The second attempt to bring those people to their senses had to be more definite and more stringent in its character. Moreover, it had to be so worded in order to meet the requirements of the constitution and the judgment of the Privy Council, and the government cannot but be congratulated on the firmness they have evinced in carrying out so far their policy of redress. On former occasions I have dealt with many of the points raised by the local government in their answer to the order in council of July, 1894. There is no need to go over that ground again. There is, however, a proposition which calls for some attention :

If the Catholic refuses to take advantage of the public schools, and decides voluntarily to maintain another school, he is exercising his own judgment in the same way as any person who prefers to send his children to a private school, to the support of which he contributes. Neither of such persons, however, by so doing, gains any immunity from the payment of school rates.

This proposition is altogether wrong and deceitful. There is no similarity between the two cases. To be identical they would have to arise from the same conditions of liberty and unrestrained choice. But with the law as it stands now, we have not this free choice. When we undertake to maintain another school, our decision is not a voluntary one. It is not a matter of taste or preference only. It is forced upon us. It is the result of the insurmountable obstacles thrown in the way of the other schools, obstacles which are in their character more insuperable than if they were physical obstructions. The doors of those schools are opened to our children only on condition that they shall be left month after month, and year after year, without any religious education. That is against our honest religious belief ; that is against the doctrines of our church, which has in this country a legal status. Our conscience, and the future happiness of our children, forbid us from sending our children to such schools. The laws of God, and the laws of nature make it a duty to us to retain the control of the education of our children, and to give them such education as is not inconsistent with our religious belief. But in those schools, these sacred principles are disregarded, and they are opened to us only on condition that we should also disregard them. This condition being impossible of acceptance, it constitutes a barrier between such schools and the Roman Catholic parents and their children. It makes those schools truly exclusive, to Catholic consciences, and being exclusive, in matter of religious belief, it cannot be claimed for them that they are free schools. If not free schools, the maintaining of another kind of schools is not a voluntary act on our part. Our decision lacks in that case one of the conditions which the Government of Manitoba itself acknowledges it should have : it is not voluntary ; and the burden imposed upon us by way of taxation, the proceeds of which go for the support of schools which are not available to us, is an injustice, because it is a principle in matters of taxation that all who pay should share in the benefit resulting therefrom. That injustice works against all classes of Roman Catholics, but it works more especially against the poor. The rich, with their money, can in some cases get over it, but the poor cannot, and to them what is offered is nothing but the Hobson's choice. Where there is no such restraint or condition put upon the liberty of the parents, when the public schools do offer a complete and full satisfaction to all the claims of the natural right of the parents and of their religious belief, then any individual, having some special advantage in view, and deciding to send his children to a private institution, does so voluntarily, of his own free-will, unrestrained by any moral, religious or physical obstacles. In that case, for the sake of the present argument, I may concede that he cannot claim any immunity from payment of the school rate. This is not our position, however, and the stand taken by the local government on that ground cannot be sustained.

The motion was agreed to.

GRAND FALLS WATER POWER AND BOOM COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved the third reading of Bill (95) "An Act to incorporate the Grand Falls Water Power and Boom Company."

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will be borne in mind by such members of the House as are members of the Committee on Railways, that there was some discussion with respect to this bill. It proposes to incorporate a company with a title substantially the same as that of a company incorporated by the Legislature of the province of New Brunswick. It occurred to me that when these companies came to do business in a comparatively small place, a good deal of confusion would arise and I had intended to give notice of an amendment to be moved at the third reading. However, I ascertained that an hon. member of this House, who is a member of the company incorporated by the legislature of New Brunswick, and another prominent New Brunswick gentleman who is one of the incorporators of the New Brunswick company, had both expressed their desire that no change should be made in the name, and I consequently gave no notice. I think it is well to give this explanation, as some hon. members may have expected that I would move an amendment.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being read "resuming the further adjourned debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill (67) 'An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act.'"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: Having been a member of a committee appointed some years ago to take evidence on this subject, which so thoroughly investigated the matter, I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Rideau division, and here I desire to say that it is quite unnecessary that he should offer any explanation or apology for the course he has taken. We all feel and recognize that his action was prompted by a desire to serve the public. We all recognize that it would be very much better if all our rivers were left free from pollution, in the primitive state in which they were before civilization entered this land. If I differ from him in the observations that I am about to make, it is because I am obliged to recognize the facts which have evolved in the past few years, and that the legislation before us is entirely based upon expediency. We had all hoped last session, when the rider was added to the government bill, that we would have had an end to this question—that during the twelve months to follow the action of this House, the owners of the saw-mills, more particularly those on the Ottawa River, would have so changed their mills as to render it unnecessary to bring the subject up again. I propose to confine my observations to the mills on the Ottawa, because I do not understand the condition of affairs on other rivers, and, I may add, the evidence given before the committee referred almost completely to the Ottawa River, and, therefore, my remarks are more directly pointed to this particular section, though, no doubt, they are germane to other rivers in Canada as well. I say, we were all very anxious, indeed, that the owners of those mills should have conformed to the law, and I believe they would have done so had it been possible. Had their mills been originally constructed in such a manner as to enable them to consume the saw-dust instead of throwing it into the water, they would not have hesitated, by an expenditure of ten, twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars to conform to the laws of the land. Last year I certainly thought, and it was the general impression of very many others, that no such amount of money would have been necessary in order to so convert the mills that they could consume their saw-dust by means of furnaces. I have not heard it controverted that the evidence since last year shows the inability of the mill men to conform to the law. It is all in one direction—that it was utterly impossible to do so, except by taking down the mills altogether. I may read the statement made by Mr. Edwards in the House of Commons (and he is one who, during the last twelve months, has conformed to the law and to a large extent, as I shall presently show) showing that since this agitation against throwing rubbish into the Ottawa River began there has been a desire and tendency to come within the law. That is, no new mills have been constructed with a view to getting rid of the rubbish by throwing it into the river. The mills erected since 1888 have recognized that the time is limited within which the public opinion of this country would permit mill refuse to be thrown into the river, and that year, by year, the number of mills that would be relieving themselves of rubbish by depositing it in the river would diminish. Mr. Edwards has two mills, at both of which he burns the saw dust. He recently purchased the Maclaren mill, a very large mill at the Rideau Falls within the limits of the city of Ottawa, and in conformity with the law of last year has, at a very considerable expense, put up a burner. He says :

I have had a very long—well no, I will not say a very long, but a very considerable—experience in saw-milling; and I think I understand this question pretty fairly well. Now the position of the other water mills on the river is simply this: They are constructed, just as water mills usually are, in the bed of the stream, in order to get the greatest head of water possible. That being the case, the machinery is all down in the lower part of the mill, and during the high water in the spring of the year, the water actually comes up to the level of the sawing floor, and is only kept out of the machinery by the dam. Now, a great many think that it is possible for gentlemen owning mills so constructed to dispose of the saw-dust just as we are doing. From my experience, I say that it is impossible. In most cases, a very large expenditure, indeed, would be required in order to accumulate the sawdust and elevate it into the burners to be consumed; and, in most cases, in fact in almost every case, I think that reconstruction would have to take place.

That is Mr. Edwards's testimony on the subject. That being the case, I felt we were face to face with a very grave question. If this law is enforced, it means closing up a very considerable number of mills, not alone on the Ottawa, but all over this country, and supposing the millmen were very great offenders, are we justified in taking that course, having in view the magnitude of that trade and the vast number of people who are dependent upon the lumber trade for their living? Because the closing up of the mills under the Act of last session, if arbitrarily carried out at the present time, would mean the throwing out of employment of perhaps 25,000 people in Canada and the stopping of a large amount of shipping. Any one who looks at the figures of the freight that is carried, in the shape of sawn lumber, to the United States markets and deals to the English market and other markets abroad, must realize that the amount of shipping which would at once be deprived of its ordinary freights, would be very large, indeed. It would amount to a serious calamity. The lumber trade of this country is, next to the farming industry, the largest in the Dominion. The export of lumber comes after the export from the farm. We take first our cereals and our cattle, and then comes in the lumber industry, which has averaged from fifteen to twenty-five and thirty million dollars a year for very many years; so that the industry is not an ordinary one, and, therefore, we have to deal with it very tenderly. I am as anxious as any other hon. gentleman can be to see the rivers in the condition that they were in when we found them and commenced to make improvements upon them and to navigate them. But there is the logic of facts that I cannot controvert or fail to recognize. I recognize this fact particularly, that forty or fifty years ago all over this country, a saw-mill was considered a most valuable industry on the river. Taking the Ottawa River particularly, it was by invitation, strong pressure, that men were induced to put their money in mills for the benefit of the people rather than have our timber wealth sent abroad in the shape of logs or square timber, and as a matter of fact, at the instance of the government of this country, many of those valuable lots, for instance, at the Chaudière, were actually given away at a nominal price, on the condition that saw-mills should be erected upon them. There was no word then about any objection to the depositing of sawdust in the river. It was a part of the understanding, and so it went on for thirty-five or forty years until we found very serious injury and damage being done on the river; and public opinion then at once made a demand that it must be stopped. No doubt public opinion was right in the main, but there is such a thing in the country as having regard for vested interests, and certainly if the observation can be applied to any industry it can be applied to the lumber trade, for the condition actually imposed upon the acquisition of a hydraulic lot at Ottawa was the building of a saw-mill—no other mill, because at that particular time that was the industry that public attention was directed to—rather than allow the timber to be sent out of the country with the workmanship that it received in the square state. So that we have, in the consideration of this question, that important feature to bear in mind. Since the meeting of that committee some few years ago, the amount of saw-dust thrown into the river has considerably diminished, very largely diminished. I do not think there is one-half as much to-day as there was then, so that hon. gentlemen will notice that the evil at all events is being diminished. My observation may not apply to other localities. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the rivers and streams in the other parts of the Dominion will know whether that is the case elsewhere. Ever since public attention has been called to the importance of keeping the rivers free from pollution, in the construction of new mills they are being built so that they will not deposit their saw-dust in the river, and it has probably checked the erection of mills. Since that time Mr. Booth's mill has been burned and it has not been rebuilt. The site which that mill occupied, the first hydraulic lots on the left hand side before you come to the Suspension bridge, was probably one of the best in the country. The logs came in at the west end and were converted at the mill into boards and manufactured and shipped at the other end in barges that carried them to Burlington, Albany and other points where ready sales were made. So that particular site was probably the best adapted for the trade that any one could select. That mill has not been rebuilt, and will not be rebuilt, I believe, in view of the change in the law. The last mill that Mr. Booth built was, I believe, one of the best mills in the country and cost in the neighbourhood of $250,000, but unfortunately it went up in smoke.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think they are rebuilding it now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not for a saw-mill.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—They are putting up a foundation without determining what building is to be put on.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In view of the law, I understand that Mr. Booth would not build a saw-mill there. It would be a defiance that Parliament would not protect him in. Where a mill goes out of existence in that way, it would be highly improper to so far defy public opinion as to persist in putting up a mill without providing appliances for consuming the saw-dust, and I do not think there is any chance of a saw-mill ever being put on that site again, unless, perhaps, under such circumstances or conditions that the sawdust could be burned, but even then I think it would be highly improper, considering the inflammable matter that there is in that particular neighbourhood. I have no doubt other purposes will be found in which the hydraulic powers can be utilized to great advantage. Mr. Eddy's mill, also a large one, not very far from Booth's on the north side of the river, has been converted into a pulp mill. There is the Maclaren mill, now the property of Mr. Edwards, which has been converted within the last year. Another large mill that wasted their saw-dust formerly, the Gilmour & Hugsion mill, at the mouth of the Gatineau, I understand now burn their sawdust. They are isolated and away from any building, and therefore they can readily do so. Another very large mill at Hawkesbury, I understand, has been in operation between 60 and 70 years. The third generation is running it. The mill was built originally by a Mr. Hamilton, father of a gentleman who was formerly a senator in this chamber. I think we must recognize the fact that the agitation against dumping rubbish into the river has been productive of very considerable good. The efforts of the committee will not have failed, as some persons may imagine, if this law is allowed to pass and the exemption continued for a limited period longer, because once public opinion has been aroused on the subject no doubt the building of future mills will be so arranged that the saw-dust will be disposed of otherwise than by dumping it in the water. Reference was made to the fact that the influence of the lumbermen was so great that even an injunction could not be obtained in Ontario. The province of Ontario, recognizing the magnitude of the trade and feeling that the closing up of any of these mills would be a public calamity, did pass such an Act. It may be somewhat extraordinary, but they did pass an Act that even for the offences for which legal measures could be taken against the mill-owners, and as to which in the ordinary course of our legal proceedings an injunction might afterwards follow, the power to issue that injunction should be taken from the courts, and I think they acted wisely. They acted on the principle, that so far as private injury was concerned, the millmen were all sufficiently wealthy to compensate the party who professed to be seriously injured by the privilege that the millmen enjoyed of throwing their rubbish into the river, and that therefore there was no necessity for taking out an injunction, that the parties were amply able to pay all compensation. The facts which I shall point out will clearly show that that conclusion was perfectly right. One cannot, therefore, find fault with the action of the legislature, but it is a strange feature that after we passed that statute last year, or rather added a rider to the government bill declaring that the exemption should be withdrawn, there was an extraordinary change in public opinion. The moment the public seemed to feel that we were really going to enforce the law, they all stood aghast and cried out "stay your hand." In the city of Ottawa there were public meetings held upon the subject. The Board of Trade thought it so important that they met and passed resolutions, and I believe very unanimously adopted a memorial to the government—the very men that a few years before had cried out against spoiling the river and the injury to the public and the riparian proprietors, when they saw that the law was going to be enforced, asked the government and Parliament to stay their hand. I will read a clause or two from the memorial which they presented to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries :

Be it therefore resolved that this board is of the opinion that if there be any damage or injury arising from the practice of throwing saw-dust or mill refuse into the Ottawa or its tributaries it has already been done and that the few remaining years the industry is likely to continue will add but little if any to existing conditions, and

That this board strongly protests against any action of Parliament that would tend to drive this industry from its present location, and would earnestly impress on the government our objections to any restrictions that would have this effect.

And it goes on in the same strain saying that the public interests, which seemed a few years ago to demand that Parliament at once should put a stop to the throwing of this rubbish into the river, had changed front entirely. So far as private interests are concerned, I know of only one case where any one has taken proceedings, and that is the case in which we have a petition presented to this House. Strange to say, we have a number of petitions presented by the riparian proprietors, and I have here a very long petition presented to the Parliament of Canada, professing to come from the inhabitants of the Counties of Prescott, Ottawa, Argenteuil, Vaudreuil and Two

Mountains, that is, in the eastern end of Ottawa Valley. It relates more to the mills at Hawkesbury, as to which they pray that the exemption should continue. They take very strong grounds; they say that the fine edgings and saw-dust have been dropped into the river at this place for 90 years, without injury to the inhabitants, and they believe that these edgings and saw-dust do not injure the fish in the river, but that the government dam at Carillon does prevent the ascent of the fish from the Lower Ottawa. If the Act of last session be enforced, it must leave the proprietors of the Hawkesbury mills no alternative but to close them, to the great detriment of the surrounding country. There are seven hundred men employed there, and the annual average cut is about 50,000,000 feet. The petitioners pray that the government exempt the millowners and allow the edgings, saw-dust, etc., to go into the river, and they refer to a petition sent in 17 or 18 years ago. Then there is another petition signed by the riparian proprietors along the Ottawa River in which they say :

We understand that it has been alleged that one reason for such action on the part of the Canadian Parliament was that it was injurious to lands fronting upon the river and to the inhabitants dwelling upon these lands, and we beg respectfully to state that such is not the case. Not only have we suffered no injury from the practice referred to, but it has been a positive benefit to us inasmuch as it brings to our doors a large quantity of material suitable for firewood, and also deposits upon our shores more less sawdust, which we find more very valuable for our clay lands.

Wherefore we humbly pray that you may be pleased to re-enact that provision of the Fisheries Act which provides that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may exempt from the operation of the Fisheries Act, wholly or partially, any stream or streams in respect to which he considers that its enforcement is not requisite in the public interest.

While I do not entirely agree with all that is said in the petition, it is very strange that we desire to protect those whom we are anxious to relieve from the saw-dust filling up the bays in the river in front of the farms, yet those very people come here and ask us to allow the saw-dust to continue. It is rather singular. It is the first instance I have heard of where the general public and Parliament more particularly were mistaken as to what was the best interest of the people. It must be perfectly clear that the effect of the deposit of saw-dust is really to fill up all the bays and to fill up any point along the river where there is dead water. There is no doubt that that is the effect of it. I have heard no complaints about the navigation of the river during the last seven or eight years, nor do I believe the navigation of the river has been seriously affected, because as the stream is confined in a shallower channel, of course the depth of water is really greater. Where it spread out before there are now large deposits of saw-dust the effect of which is to condense the stream into a narrower channel. Those are the petitions in favour of the dumping of the saw-dust into the river. There were also petitions from other parts of the country, which I have not read, in favour of the exemption, one from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but the only petition praying that the millmen be deprived of the privilege of throwing saw-dust into the river is the one from Antoine Ratté, who owns a boat-house here and thinks his business is injured by the continuance of the practice. It is extraordinary that we have no more petitions, if public opinion is in the direction indicated by the hon. member from Rideau. Some years ago Mr. Ratté claimed to have sustained damage to the extent of $4,000, and he brought an action against some of the millmen and recovered $3,500. The hon. senator from Rideau stated that, so far as those private interests were concerned, they were under great disadvantage in having to prosecute the millmen. I do not agree with him at all. The millmen are all very good marks—able to pay any judgment against them, and therefore when damages can be recovered in court there is no fear that even appeals will protect them. Mr. Ratté subsequently brought another action for $30,000, which is pending. It is not necessary now that the question of right should be litigated upon, because in the first action that Mr. Ratté brought, it went all the way up to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the right of riparian proprietors to claim damages was sustained beyond question, and I am told on good authority, that the action now pending for $30,000 is simply referred to an officer of the court to assess the damages. The right that he had to claim that he had sustained damages is on record and he has nothing to do but prove the damages. I understand that Mr. Ratté has been approached more than once to sell out his property, but Mr. Ratté, has declined to sell, and one would think it was rather a good thing to own a property of that kind. Whenever you wanted a few thousand dollars, all you had to do was to go to a lawyer and institute proceedings against wealthy men who had to pay on damages being assessed. There is no trouble in getting a lawyer to take up such a case as that. The right to damages being established, it is simply the amount that has to be proved. Under those conditions, I do not think that Mr. Ratté is entitled to very much of our sympathy. The petition of the mill-owners, addressed to the members of both Houses, sets forth a fact which I need not repeat, as to the right they acquired a long time ago under the belief that they were to be allowed the privilege of disposing of their saw-dust by throwing it into the river, and they go on further to quote the authority of Mr. Fleming, who has made a report on the whole subject. I daresay hon. gentlemen who take any interest in this question have seen Mr. Fleming's report, and whether they agree with the full conclusions at which he has arrived or not, the effect of a report by a gentleman of his standing on one's judgment is, I am bound to say, very considerable. He gives the depth of the river at different points during a long series of years, and shows that, so far as the navigation is concerned, it has not been seriously interfered with. There is one singular feature about it, that the men who navigate the river have not made any complaint of recent years—not within the last four or five years. Of course, a good many of them are engaged in that very traffic, taking the sawn lumber away from the mills, and naturally, they would put up with a great deal of inconvenience rather than grumble with the carrying on of a business in which they are so deeply interested, but there are other steamers on the river and we have had no complaints from the owners of those boats that the navigation has been impeded by the saw-dust. The mill-owners say:—

In view of all the facts, the mill-owners submit that the enforcement of the Act of last session would be to them most unjust and in the public interest an unnecessary and unjustifiable proceeding, established as their mills have been, under a state of the law which permitted the disposing of the saw-dust and mill refuse in a mode which under the Act of last session is made unlawful.

In any event, and at the very least, it is further respectfully submitted that before this prohibition is enforced, full enquiry should be made with regard to the different mills as to whether the representation now made that some of them at least cannot without permanent stoppage and abandonment, or complete reconstruction comply with the law, and that if such is found to be the case, then that the law should not as to these mills be put into operation, whilst as to those if any which can with a moderate expense be rearranged so as to comply with the law, a reasonably long delay should be granted before allowing the Act to go into force as against them.

They seem to recognize fully there that public opinion demands that a law of that kind should be enforced. All they ask is that Parliament stay its hand until it could be fully understood whether the change could be made. They do not seem to object to conform to the change if it is feasible, and if it can be carried out without the absolute destruction of their mills. Therefore I regard this question purely as one of expediency, because I am quite as anxious as anyone can be, that our rivers should be free from pollution. Notwithstanding the statements of riparian proprietors, I think it would have been very much better if there had been no pollution in the stream, but the tendency of modern times, is to get rid of refuse, whether of cities, saw-mills or butcher's shops, by dumping it into the rivers. It may be possible in the future that pollution of all kinds should be kept out of the river, because I cannot but believe that the huge sewage from the city of Ottawa, must have an injurious effect on the water which is drunk by the people to the east of us—the sewage of 60,000 people in this locality must have a very serious effect on the water below us. We know that the bacillus of typhoid originates from that very cause, and the sewage of our cities should be disposed of in some other way, as they dispose of garbage in cities of the old world by burning and otherwise. We could on that point take a lesson from China. In that densely populated country they could not live if they wasted the garbage by dumping it into the ocean. They turn it back into the land, and there is no doubt Providence intended that it should be so disposed of. There is no doubt that some time in the future those who follow us will suffer from the loss of fertilizing material that is now practiced. I have no doubt the time will come when an enlightened legislature will insist on the rivers being kept free from pollution. We know the city of Chicago is actually spending $20,000,000 (it may cost $25,000,000) to get rid of the sewage of that city. They were turning it into Lake Michigan and, vast as that lake is, they were unable to get pure water from the lake for the city. They ran the in-take for miles into the lake, and although there is a large supply of water coming into Lake Michigan and flowing away constantly, yet the people of Chicago find that they are poisoning their water by allowing the sewage of their big city to run into the lake. They are now cutting a canal to send it down to the Gulf of Mexico.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They are going to sail canal boats down too.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, they find in a city, large and growing as Chicago is, that it takes a river to carry the filth and dirt away, and a river with some considerable current, and so, as my hon. friend observes, it is going to be used as a canal. It will be large enough for ordinary boats, and they will have, no doubt, dams and locks at various points. But the main object was to get pure water from Lake Michigan and the only way to do that was to turn the sewage off in another direction.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—What about those places and people where the filth is going to?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why do they not rebel? That is what I cannot understand. They remain quiet until the poisoned stream is passing by their doors, carrying fevers along to the banks of the Mississippi. There the large body of water will probably relieve it of its impurities. I have referred to the case of Chicago as an illustration of the effect of throwing pollution into the water. I do not hesitate to say that Montreal will one day protest against the filth of cities and towns above it being dumped into the water and the practice will be stopped. Not alone sawdust but everything else will have to be excluded from our rivers. We have to deal with things as we find them to-day and the state of the public opinion of the hour. I propose to support the government's bill simply on the ground of expediency, simply because I feel that we are face to face with a serious calamity if we put it in force. However desirous we may be to keep the sawdust out of the rivers, few of us would be willing to see 30 or 40 of the mills of this country closed up to-morrow in view of the large amount of capital invested in them under the belief that they were to be free to dump their saw-dust into the river. No doubt the action of the committee a few years ago, and of the amendment made at the instance of the hon. member from Rideau division, has been productive of a large amount of good. His amendment last year was supported almost universally in this chamber. I know I, myself, was a warm advocate of it; I had hopes that the warning given would have brought about a change. I recognize now that it was utterly impossible, that there were difficulties in the way which could not be overcome, and so I bow to the doctrine of expediency, but I think we have impressed the public mind and the mill-owners with the fact that the time is coming when the nuisance must be stopped. All that is asked for in the bill is a stay for two years. Whether the change will come within that time or not, I cannot say. I cannot say whether it is prudent to say two or more; we must let the future take care of itself. Still I think it is wise to warn the mill-owners that the rivers of the country must be kept free from pollution.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—It may seem presumptuous for anyone who is not personally conversant with all the facts of this knotty saw-dust question to venture to give any opinion of his own upon it. Moreover, since this debate began, so many contradictory statements have been made with respect to the facts that one finds himself more at a loss than ever. However, as one of those who voted for the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Rideau last year, I should like again to state the reasons which moved me to do so, and which have very considerable weight with me still, with regard to the question now before the House. Perhaps my first reason may not be considered of very much weight because it is, to a certain extent, sentimental or esthetical if you choose to call it so, and that is, as a Canadian, I naturally feel very proud of this capital of the Dominion, and every one will agree with me when I say that the position of these buildings on the banks of this magnificent river and the scenery surrounding it are all unique, and we are proud to show it to strangers when they come to this part of Canada; but one can scarcely look down on the river which flows at the foot of the cliff and see it choked up with slabs and saw-dust without feeling very great regret that it should be so disfigured and a strong desire that this state of things should be put an end to. Then, again, the government of this country have spent a great deal of money, and very properly so, in the preservation and development of the fisheries of the Dominion. The time was, when there seemed every prospect that in many of our large rivers—the rivers running into the St. Lawrence especially—salmon fishing was likely to be almost completely destroyed. Since that time the government have, in the most laudable manner, taken every means in their power to protect those fisheries, and not only that, but have gone further and done a most excellent work in every part of the Dominion in stocking the various rivers with the fry of the different fish, thus adding very largely to our resources. Therefore, one would naturally suppose that the preservation of the fisheries on which so much care and expense have been bestowed, would naturally be a very strong reason indeed for preventing the pollution of the streams where those fish are to be found, but we have heard, since this question has been before the House, some statements which I confess rather astounded me. We have been told, in fact, that the saw-dust rather agrees with the fish—that the fish do not dislike it, and so far from the saw-dust in the Ottawa having affected the abundance or quality of the fish, on the contrary the fish have rather increased. As I said before, it is rather presumptuous for anybody who is not personally acquainted with the facts to take exception to such extraordinary statements, but it is contrary to all one's preconceived notions, and all that one has ever read or heard on the subject, or that has hitherto been held necessary to be done on fishing streams to preserve them from pollution. Then, again, with respect to the navigation of the river, we are told positively that it has not been interfered with in any way by the saw-dust deposits. On the contrary, the hon. member from Ottawa has told us that, so far as that goes, the navigation has been rather improved! These deposits have narrowed the channel, and as the water does not extend into the bays on either side as it once did, it is deeper in the channel between the two banks of saw-dust! That is another thing as to which one may feel excused if he is puzzled to decide where the truth really lies. Then, again, we have been told that we have the opinion of Mr. Sandford Fleming, and nobody would give greater weight to the opinion of a gentleman like Mr. Fleming than I should do. On the other hand, I have the very highest confidence in one of the greatest hydraulic engineers of the country, Mr. T. C. Keefer, and his opinions do not at all agree with those of Mr. Fleming. The plans and profiles of the saw-dust deposits in the various parts of the river submitted here last session when this question was before the House, which Mr. Keefer furnished, showed to my mind very conclusively that if this nuisance is to go on, the time must come when the navigation of the Ottawa River may be very seriously affected. Another argument which has been used in defence of the practice has been this, that at all events there is a good deal of fishing of a particular kind—in the river—that all along the banks the inhabitants have the advantage of fishing out slabs and edgings and so furnishing themselves with fire-wood for nothing during the whole course of the year. No doubt that is a very great advantage to those who desire to have fire-wood without any cost to themselves, but I do not think it is altogether a valid argument for continuing the present condition of things. I should be the very last to advocate any measure which would have the effect of destroying the great industry in which not only the city of Ottawa, but the entire Dominion are deeply interested. My hon. friend from Ottawa, who has argued this question so ingeniously that I confess I was sometimes puzzled to know which way his conclusions were going, whether for or against the measure, wound up with a very strong declaration that the time is coming when we must look forward to taking effectual steps to stop the pollution not of the Ottawa only but of other streams, but whether he considered it expedient to take these steps now was not so clear. As regards the mill-owners it seems to me that they have by no means so strong a case as has been stated to the House. Surely they have for years past had warning of what was coming, and they cannot claim to have been taken by surprise. It seems to me, taking all things into consideration, that if this bill in its present shape is to pass, it would be almost better to make the term longer than to fix it at two years rather than have the law set at defiance, as it has been, and then have the government come down to the House at the end of that time and saying "oh, two years was not long enough to enable these gentlemen to make other arrangements," and have the same arguments used over again, and used with great force, as to the destruction of a great industry of the utmost importance to Ottawa. If, with the warning they have had, they are not prepared to make the change at the present time, I hardly think they will be prepared to do it at the end of two years. Another very important consideration involved, too, in the exemption proposed by this bill, is this: that it will be found very difficult in operation to make fish of one and saw-dust of another, and to enforce these regulations on one river and dispense with them on others. It may be remembered that an hon. gentleman, not now in his place, from one of the maritime provinces put that feature of the case very strongly in regard to some of the rivers in New Brunswick, and I am afraid there will be great difficulty if we give this discretionary power in enforcing the law at all. These are the reasons which led me last year to vote for the amendment. I am not prepared to take the responsibility now of voting absolutely against the bill if the government will give us any sort of assurance that we may reasonably expect that at the end of a certain time the law will be enforced and that this is not simply extending the privilege to those millmen for an indefinite length of time. Before the House is asked to vote on this question we ought to have some more positive assurance with regard to that point than we have had as yet.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I concur so fully in the sentiments expressed by the hon. member from Ottawa that it seems hardly necessary to say anything more on the points to which he has referred, but at the same time I think it is very well that attention should be given to some features of the question which have not attracted sufficient attention. In the first place, we must not forget, while so deeply interested in the River Ottawa, that the measure has reference to the whole Dominion of Canada and that, beautiful and grand and interesting as the Ottawa River is, there are other rivers which we have to think of and the circumstances of which are such as to require very careful consideration before an Act such as the one which was passed last session should be really enforced upon them. There are very many rivers throughout Canada where the throwing of slabs and saw-dust into them would not be attended by any of the bad results which it is claimed has been the case here in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Where are they?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Many rivers which are not navigable at all and cannot be made navigable. Many rivers which have no fish in them, unless maybe the few perch and fish which frequent inland waters. It is well to remember also, and our attention has been directed to the fact, that there are large rivers, such as the St. John and St. Clair, on the border, where other rights than Canadian rights exist, and where no such restrictions exist on the other side, and it requires consideration before any severe or drastic legislation should be enacted here. I concur with one sentiment expressed by the hon. member from York, although on quite a different ground, and that is that I am dissatisfied as to the limit of two years. In my opinion there should be no time limit whatever—that this is a matter which should be left to the discretion of the existing government. I believe that any government would be guided by public sentiment and public opinion, and I would quite willingly leave the settlement of such a question to the government's responsibility, to the people and to parliament for any action which they take in exempting any streams. Two years after this the same question may come before the House again, not so much from Ottawa as from other places where the existing law could only be applied to the great disadvantage of the country in general. Of course if we were to accept, without some reservation, the terrible indictment which the hon. member from Rideau brings against this saw-dust dumping into the Ottawa we might well stand appalled. From the earnestness and force with which his views were expressed, one would suppose that some terrible injury has been done—that unlimited destruction of fish has been carried on, the public health jeopardized and the navigation of the Ottawa likely to be entirely stopped. Is it not very extraordinary that, in the face of such a calamity, affecting the country so seriously, and more especially the inhabitants between Ottawa and Grenville, that we have not before us petitions from the people interested in navigation, telling us that the navigation has been injured, causing them serious loss and difficulty and that their rights have been affected? Is it not wonderful that we have not petitions here from fisherman telling us that their business has been destroyed. But there has been nothing of the kind. Should not we expect that the parties living along the banks of the river, whose interest it is said are so injuriously affected, would come here and ask for protection? It is wonderful that we do not find boards of health coming here and protesting against the injurious effects of the nauseous vapour from these saw-dust deposits in the river if the health of the people is being jeopardized by the practice of throwing slabs and sawdust into the river? The city of Ottawa is as healthy to-day as it was 20 years ago, perhaps a little healthier. I do not see any evidence that the injuries so dwelt upon have any real existence.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Has the hon. gentleman read the evidence produced here before the committee appointed by the Senate?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If I have not read it I have heard it—four hours of it.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Have you read it?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Yes, and other evidence too? Does that evidence prove any of the assertions made by those people? I say no.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I say yes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It is a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—There have been several petitions sent in to the government.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman in the four hours that he was speaking.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I merely corrected you.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—You need not correct me. I think the hon. member from Ottawa has made it so plain that it is of little consequence whether I say anything or not, but I have the right to express my opinion and I propose to do it. Speaking of the great difficulty, which the public will be more interested in than any other, the rights of navigation, no person disputes that the saw-dust is deposited in large quantities in the bays and other parts of the river, where the current is not very strong. Does that affect the navigation of the river? Do we hear complaints from the people interested in that navigation? I have heard none. I think that would be a complaint which would receive the attention of the House if there was such a complaint. My hon. friend attaches very little importance to Mr. Sandford Fleming's report. This is one of the cases where I take a decidedly opposite ground from him, for I place the utmost confidence in Mr. Fleming's report. When a man in his position, a man of his character and attainments in engineering, will make any statements over his own signature I consider myself bound to receive them. I am by profession a surveyor and understand something of surveying and engineering. My hon. friend says that Mr. Fleming was never upon the river at all; I do not know whether he is correct in that statement, but at the same time if he were correct it does not affect his report. When I was engaged in making a sounding, I did not take the line in my own hands. I had assistants for the accuracy of whose work I was responsible. And surely we would not say that Mr. Fleming's report was not to be considered because Mr. Fleming did not take the line in his own hands and sound the river. He sent people in whose skill and integrity he could rely, and upon their work he based his report. That is the proceeding which is generally followed, and no one thinks of questioning a report made by a properly qualified person because the information in that report has been gathered through agents and instrumentalities under his control and for which he is responsible. Mr. Fleming admits that in one particular spot, where the canal comes down into the river, there is an impediment of sunken saw-dust which is not carried away by the current, and which has twice during many years required to be dredged and may require dredging again. But, speaking of the navigation of the river generally, with that one exception he contends it is not one whit injured, that it is just as free as it was 40 years ago. It is a curious thing, if this process of obstruction has been going on for 50 or 60 years and in some parts of the river for 90 years, that there is yet no accumulation sufficient to arrest or interfere with navigation. Surely that should be ground enough for us now, under existing circumstances not to be hurried into passing legislation which my hon. friend from Ottawa showed to be so injurious to a very large and important industry in our country. The fact has been referred to that at the present time, and for the last few years, there is nothing like the quantity of saw-dust thrown into the river that there has been in the past. Any mischief which may result has already been accomplished, while they could legally put these things into the river. It has been going on for some 40 years, and now I presume very little beyond some of the saw-dust goes to the bottom at all. Pieces of any size at all—even those broken up pieces of slabs that they send down—are soon picked up, and I do not think any of them are allowed to soak and go to the bottom. We can understand that years ago, when slabs were numerous, they did form an obstruction to dredging. But at the same time, the formation of the bottom of the river is such that this vast accumulation of saw-dust may have occurred in the deep places. There are many places 125 and 150 feet deep, and of course down there the slabs and saw-dust could accumulate without injury, and Mr. Fleming has shown that in the shallower parts of the river, the force of the current is such that it invariably cleans out any sawdust in the spring of the year. We have had it brought before us that beds have been formed of layers of sawdust and sand, showing clearly that it is not the sawdust alone that obstructs the navigation or fills up the bed, but there is a moving of sand and gravel also going on and when we hear an allusion made to the actual stopping of the river—that we are going to lose the river and have no navigation at all—it seems to me really ludicrous. The idea of anything that men could put in the river stopping it—even if they drove piles into it and used all the skill possible to stop the river, the current would sweep everything before it. That current is going on continually during the year with such power and volume as to sweep away anything like saw-dust, leaving the channel clear to meet all requirements of navigation. If it were not so, who would be the parties most interested in maintaining that navigation intact? Would it not be the very men in the lumber trade? I presume nine-tenths of the business that goes down the river is their business; they would be the sufferers if the navigation were interfered with. I do not think the idea of its interfering with navigation is one which merits very serious consideration in this House. Then, with reference to the fishing I would here remark that although we may laugh when people say that saw-dust is good for fish and not injurious, I should like hon. gentlemen to remember this, that we have no scientific or certain statements which we can rely upon that saw-dust is injurious to fish. It has not been shown. You cannot produce any evidence of it. You can say that the experience of this river shows it, but it does not show it. There is very little difference in the fish taken from the river now and the fish taken thirty or forty years ago.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the hon. gentleman know that?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Only from what I read. I do not know it personally, but there are certain things which we know. We know that the Carrillon dam is a greater obstruction to fish coming into the river than any saw-dust. There is a dam there without any fish-ways, and the existence of that dam would diminish the quantity of fish above it, and between that point and Ottawa. As a matter of fact, slabs and saw-dust are thrown into many rivers without injury to fish. For instance, take the state of Michigan. There is no complaint there that it is injurious to the fish or to the health of the people, either. If there is a decrease in the quantity of the fish now in the Ottawa it is due to the fact that we have different appliances for catching them. Nets are used now which were not used many years ago. This may have the effect to a certain extent of diminishing the quantity, but the Ottawa was never what one could call a fish river. It never was a river where a quantity of fish was taken out to be an important article in the market, differing in that respect from the rivers opening out into the ocean, like the Miramichi and Restigouche, and others, as to which the prohibition is admitted to be necessary. I contend that there is no proof whatever given us that the fish in the Ottawa River have been diminished at all by the putting in of the saw-dust, nor is there any scientific proof furnished that saw-dust being put into the river is injurious to the fish. It is an assumption, but not proof.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—What proof do you want?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I want proof of some kind or other. When a man makes a statement he is supposed to furnish proof of the statement, and I say there is no proof of any kind furnished of the truth of the statement, and I think it may be dismissed very much like the other. Then as to the health of the people—that is another point. I do not believe that the putting of saw-dust into the river will produce poisonous effects; perhaps it will be rather the reverse. I do not think it does any damage. When you speak of the explosions taking place, and the water being spoiled, you ignore the fact that the sewage of a large city, Ottawa, all flows into that river. Is not that enough to poison the water? Is not that enough to account for the injury to health which has been urged to have been caused by the saw-dust and slabs? I do not believe it has anything to do with the health of the city; and I suppose most of the water that is drunk in the city comes from above the Chaudière Falls where the saw-dust is thrown in. There are a few mills, perhaps, in that direction, but the water is obtained from away out in the river, and it is free from the pollution which exists in the river nearer the city. I think those explosions are very rare.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—A very valuable officer of this House nearly lost his life in that way in consequence of an explosion. That I am cognizant of. A bank of saw-dust came up through the ice.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—How does he know that it was saw-dust?

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—In the same way you know the fish are not hurt by the saw-dust.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not think there is any case made out by these strong statements as to the injury that is done sufficient to warrant us in not passing the bill. I would like to see the river free from the saw-dust, and I fully sympathize fully with the views entertained as to the injury done to the appearance of the river, and the comfort of going about in boats. but, at the same time, what is urged upon us is that we shall not interfere with vested interests to a large extent and jeopardize the existence of one of the most important branches of productive trade in our country. The evidence given by Mr. Edwards, who may be considered an impartial and experienced millowner, has been read to the House. He himself has put in furnaces at his mills, but tells us he can do it at his place because of the height of his machinery. At the same time, he says it is impossible for the other millowners to put furnaces where their mills are, without taking everything out of them and adopting a new system. The expense of that would be so great that, with diminished trade and the diminished supply of logs, it would not be worth while to continue the business. If the statute of 1894 were immediately enforced I have a strong conviction that it would be the means of driving from Ottawa that important and lucrative business which has been carried on here for so many years with immense advantage to the city. I do not think the injuries which have been sustained are so great as the injury that would be done to the enterprise and well-being of the country at large in forcing the millowners to immediately discontinue their business or to do what they think is impossible—provide appliances to consume the mill refuse. The nuisance is getting less all the time, and surely in two years, with all the reduced supply, will be less than one-half what it used to be. With the desire of everybody to lay hold of all the fragments which are thrown in and broken up, the accumulation would hardly be worth noticing and certainly not to be contrasted with the relief which would be brought to those engaged in the business by the adoption of the measures now before us.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Just one word, the last speaker lays down the doctrine that if you make a statement you must prove it. He made the statement here that putting saw-dust and slabs in the river at Michigan did not injure the fish. I should like him to prove that.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I did not state that as a fact; I stated it as a matter of opinion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very much surprised at the remarks of the hon.

gentleman from Sarnia. I generally pay considerable attention to him, and probably receive profit and information from his remarks, but the position he has taken to-day on this question of saw-dust is to me astonishing, so contrary to all the theories for the protection of fish-life and the system adopted for their preservation. He now asserts the monstrous proposition that it is a doubtful question whether saw-dust or refuse thrown into the river is injurious to fish. We have been going on the principle for the last twenty or thirty years of preventing saw-dust being thrown into rivers, even the smallest streams. We have spent millions of dollars in guarding, protecting and stocking the rivers and streams and imposing heavy penalties on every miller who suffers saw-dust and refuse to drop into the water. These police regulations have been executed with the utmost rigour in Nova Scotia. If the hon. gentleman's view is correct, we spend a large amount of money to harass the poor millowners throughout the country improperly, unreasonably and without any just cause. He says there is no proof that saw-dust and mill refuse are injurious to fish-life. I could name a dozen men who have made protection of fish a life study, whose reports we have in Parliament, who speak from personal knowledge and say that saw-dust does destroy food-fish. I wonder what proof my hon. friend wants. On every stream where a mill stands, in proportion to the quantity of saw-dust going into the stream the fish are ruined, and it is just as important that the saw-dust should not go into these little streams in the country as that it should not go into large rivers. It has been said here that this legislation was intended for Ottawa alone. The hon. Minister of Agriculture refuted that idea; he showed that it was intended for the hundreds of little streams and unnavigable waters throughout the country which might be exempted. If that was the intention of the law, or the policy of the government, the action of the river officers was solely inconsistent therewith, why was not that enforced by the government taking this into consideration long ago? Yes, years ago—before we last year took that power from the government. They had a discretionary power up to last year to exempt every stream they thought proper to exempt. Why did they not take advantage of it then? It is simply now diverting the attention of the public mind from Ottawa and saying that the intention of the government is to apply the law to those little streams as well as navigable rivers in which fish are of little or no value. I think the government has taken upon themselves a task that they cannot fulfil if they are going to listen to petitions and prayers from every part of Canada saying that such and such streams should be exempted from the operation of the law. They will attempt to act in a manner which would be impracticable and very injurious to the preservation of fish life, because it matters not what government is in power, they do not last forever; they are creatures of a day, and we do not know what government will come into power at any time and what streams may be exempted from the operation of the law. Referring to Nova Scotia, I may say that the exemption of the Ottawa has done more to prevent this law being carried out than anything else. The millowners tell us "look at Ottawa and look at the wealthy Americans who come over and made their money in Canada. Their wealth has influenced the government and the government is powerless in their hands." That is the argument we hear all over the country, and it works pretty hard in the province of Nova Scotia to give the Ottawa lumber mill owners two years more time for discharging mill refuse in the Ottawa. If that had been asked for in 1888, no objection would have been raised. The mill owners never, by their petitions, asked that and never will. They talk of vested rights, and never will surrender unless by the strong power of the law. I believe the saw-dust is injurious to the river and that the policy of the government is to temporize. If half a dozen poor settlers in Nova Scotia club together to put up a mill for the benefit of their little settlement, and for their own accommodation, sawing probably only 100 feet of lumber a day, every one of them would be fined cruelly and unjustly for an infraction of this law, yet the large millowners of the country can go free. Why? Because they had power and they exerted that power. They are a terror and they have acted in a tyrannical way. I believe that this measure is simply temporizing with them, I do not believe at the end of two years it is intended to put a stop to this practice. The men engaged in this trade have had notice for eight years. Have they made any effort to comply with the law? Have they asked for any delay in order to comply with the law? No, they have set the law at defiance. In this pamphlet they circulated throughout Parliament they talk about their vested rights and they say that their business is of so much importance. They employ a large number of people it is true, but after all these men are drawing out a miserable existence. A few men make all the wealth and the labourers are just as poor as when they started. I say that this industry is not equal to and can in no way compare with the fishing interests of the country. This mode of disposing of mill refuse has been done in a reckless and extravagant manner and it is sanctioned by the government. It has done a great deal of harm to Canada, and caused damages in many ways. The droughts that we have in the country are owing to the forests being cut down, and the freshets that occur are caused by the forest being cut down. When the fish ascend the streams to spawn, in the cool water, but they are prevented from going up. All the interests of the lumberman have been exercised adversely in the work appliances of the business to the interests of the fisheries. The fish are accustomed to undisturbed water, and they will naturally go up stream as far as they can go. The instincts of nature bring them up to the cool water and gravel beds to deposit their spawn, and any obstruction of the river that prevents them from getting there is injurious to the fisheries. We ought not to consider so much the interests of the lumbermen. If we kept our export duty on logs and retained them in the country, it would be better than allowing them to be towed across and manufactured in the United States. It is supplying their market with raw material which could be profitably manufactured here. If we prevented that being done, it would be much better. Instead of trying to husband the industry we have in the country, we have allowed it to be destroyed by the Americans across the border. I feel strongly in this matter in favour of the protection of the fisheries. Every act of this kind, by which you allow or encourage the throwing of mill refuse and saw-dust into the rivers, has a tendency to destroy the fisheries. Then we have those petitions presented to us. How absurd they are. They say that the refuse stuff going down the river is a benefit to the people. You might as well say that the refuse from your house would be a benefit to the beggars of the town who might pick up something useful, and that therefore you should not destroy your refuse but let it be cast out in the highway so that those poor creatures may pick it up. That argument is absurd. We know the tyranny of the lumber interest on the Ottawa; we know that those petitions are got up under their influence. We understand it perfectly well. There is hardly a man who signs the petition who does not feel that he is obliged to do so. And the representations in those petitions are perfectly absurd. It is absurd to say that it is no injury to riparian rights, and it is quite evident that there is a good deal of tyranny in the treatment of Mr. Ratté. My hon. friend from Ottawa repudiates the tyranny. I think it is a tyranny to any poor man to say "we will drag you to the highest court in the empire." A poor man who has his rights, if he knows that he is to be driven from court to court, cannot compete. How can he carry a case on to the highest court without money? We see what Ratté has done. Some hon. gentlemen have cast ridicule upon his case, but every man has a right to have justice done him and to have his rights preserved. It is a denial of justice when the lumbermen tyrannize over everyone and say that every man who goes into court to get rights shall be driven to the extremity of the law. They say "We do not care how much it costs, but we will financially ruin him before he gets through the courts." My hon. friend speaks of vested rights. It is vested rights in a huge monopoly in a public nuisance, increasing every day in a great river. The Minister of Agriculture shakes his head; nevertheless it is that. If these men were not tyrants, they would not persist in the practice. Then consider the extraordinary concession to be granted by this bill. We are asked to release them from the penalties incurred, or to which they are amenable by their infraction of the statute. It would be a different matter if they showed any desire to conform to the law, and if we were simply giving them a little time to make the change. But their pamphlet shows that they have no idea of changing, they never did and never will conform to the law. The two years will not suffice. This bill itself pretends that after two years they are going to shut down and there will be no more exemptions. I do not believe that in two years the millowners will comply with that law. If they will give us some assurance on the subject, my objections will be removed, but the government have not the power to give us such an assurance. They can only say what they will do themselves. I believe it is simply giving these millmen a new lease of power to exert themselves in the way in which they have been doing to tyrannize over the people and defy the legislature and to act in a way which is very injurious to the fisheries. I would not complain about the Ottawa if it had not been a bad example to the whole of Canada. Everywhere we are told "Look at the Ottawa, right under your eyes; look at the legislation by which you have exempted these men year after year. You have made no effort to stop the nuisance, while every poor millowner in the country has been obliged to change his mill or shut down." That has been the case in my county, I believe in the law and I did not sympathize with those parties when they came to me. I believed the law was in the right direction, and that no saw-dust, where it could possibly be avoided, should go in the river, because it will destroy the river, and this government will make a big mistake if they exempt any river, no matter how small it is, because the small streams help the shores and rivers with fish. We would have no coast fishing if it was not for the rivers. The best fishing is within a few miles from the mouths of the rivers. And why is that? Because the fish from the ocean are attracted by the little fish coming down the river and they are not only a nursery for the fish but they attract the fish along the coast. That is evident. Any man in Nova Scotia who knows anything about fisheries knows it to be a fact, and I have more regard for the small streams than for the navigable rivers. I would rather protect the small streams in Nova Scotia from saw-dust and mill refuse, because they are nursing grounds for fish. It is not in the large rivers where they spawn, but up those little streams, and they will be destroyed unless you interfere to protect them. The hon. Minister says there are hundreds of streams where the fish are of no value. I do not know of any stream in Canada where the fish are not of value. They are all of value. The small streams are the nurseries of all the fish that go into the rivers. Of course the little streams are not navigable waters, and I hope my hon. friend will not do anything to prevent the fish going up those streams. We have spent a good deal of money in protecting the fish and protecting the streams. We do not go along the shore to do it. We go up the little streams and put the fish in, and if you exempt those little streams from the operation of the law, you destroy the sources from which our great fishing industry arises.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The remarks which I should have made have been made almost altogether by the hon. member from York division and the hon. member from Lunenburg, and naturally members of the House may suggest that I have no business to speak under those circumstances; but the question is really a very important one. It is a question between two of the most important industries of Canada, and it is, therefore, one which should be fully and carefully discussed and considered. There was one thing which struck me about the speeches made by the hon. member from Ottawa and the hon. member from Sarnia. I listened to them with pleasure; but it seemed to me they came too late in the day. If parliament were called upon now for the first time to decide as to whether it should protect the rivers of Canada or not, those speeches would have been very appropriate. As I understand it, the speech of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia meant that all the money that has been spent in taking care of our rivers and trying to protect them from pollution was money wasted, and the best way is to go as you please: let everybody put whatever he likes into the rivers, and the rivers will take care of themselves. The hon. gentleman did not go quite as far as that, but that was the line which he took. We began to protect the rivers and lakes a long time ago. It seems to me that all this question about whether saw-dust was a good thing, or whether slabs and refuse were a good thing, was considered by parliament and the government several years ago, and the government and parliament adopted a policy based on the supposition that they were not good things, and they forbade putting those pollutions into the rivers, except in certain cases as to which a discretionary power was given to the Governor in Council. And then I think the speeches of those hon. gentlemen are a little late in another way.

This matter has been before the Senate on more occasions than one. It came up here particularly in the session of 1888, and a committee consisting of a number of the most intelligent and independent members of this House was appointed to consider the question. That committee heard a great deal of evidence from persons who were qualified to know the effect of putting saw-dust and refuse into the Ottawa river. The committee made a report, which I understand was unanimous, to the effect that the putting of mill refuse into the Ottawa was a pernicious thing to the river and should be stopped, and recommending that government and parliament take steps to prevent this pollution in future. When that report was presented to the Senate, there was almost no dissenting voice. Then last session this question came before the House in connection with a bill to amend the Fisheries Act. The government had proposed in that bill, as it came to us, to retain the discretionary power which they had had of exempting certain rivers from the operation of the law against the pollution of rivers, and this House asserted its independence and its dignity and struck out that provision and inserted the provision which the bill before us undertakes to repeal. We have to consider those things and bear in mind that the government have dealt with the matter, and we have dealt with it, and it is not a new question at all. But even if it were a new question, I think that I should not adopt the view taken by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia. Unfortunately, when the people first settled in this country they did not appreciate the value of the gifts which nature had given them. Everybody knows that with regard to trees in the early settlement of Canada, the object of the settler was to cut away all the trees in the neighborhood of his house thus seriously injuring himself, and now people are planting trees where their ancestors cut them down. It was, go as you please, till axe and fire destroyed the woods which were of so much value not only for commercial purposes, but for agricultural and sanitary purposes. It was the same with the rivers and streams and lakes; the early settlers thought those things were to be used or abused just as they pleased, and the idea never seems to have occurred to the people of those days that trees and fish would ever be scarce. However, we find that both fish and lumber are now scarce. In the Republic to the south of us, fish and timber have become, in most parts of the country, almost exterminated, and they are trying to take care of the fish and the trees remaining. We are beginning to do it now in a little better time than they have. What is the position of the lumbermen after all? They get grants from the country of their timber limits at very low figures. They get their raw material for little. They get their power for nothing. The river furnishes them their power, they paying nothing for it; and surely it is not too much for the rest of the population to say, "you are getting your power for nothing, and the least you can do is not to pollute the stream that gives you your power." That is not an unreasonable position for the public generally, speaking through parliament, to take, and that is just the position which I think we ought to take. The lumber interest is a very important one as the hon. gentleman from Ottawa says. Next to the agricultural interest, it is the most important just now—at least, our exports of lumber are of greater value than any other except the agricultural exports, but the fishing industry is one which, if not quite as important now, is one of a more permanent character if taken care of, and will in a short while be of more consequence than lumber; but the truth is we can protect and save both interests, and that is what we ought to do. We ought to see fair play to both. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia made some observations in which I could not at all concur, but with some of which I do not propose to deal. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the fisheries of the Ottawa were of very little consequence, and that there were never any more fish caught here than there are now. The evidence given before the Senate committee was certainly in a totally different direction. Witnesses came there who said they could, at one time, catch fish in great quantities where they cannot catch them now. Then the hon. gentleman intimated that the saw-dust would be all swept out of the river—that it was of so yielding a nature that every speck of saw-dust would be swept away by the current. It is a rather singular thing that the engineers, who were sounding the river here for the purpose of constructing a bridge across from the province of Quebec to the province of Ontario, found very large deposits of saw-dust of a very permanent character, and witnesses came before the committee and testified that certain islands had actually been increased to double their original size by collections of saw-dust—that there were reefs in the river composed of saw-dust. The hon. gentleman, of course, thought very little about the fish, and he thinks still less about people who go on the river for the purpose of pleasure or exercise, but the truth is that in this neighbourhood it requires about half as much more power as would be required in a clean river to propel a canoe or boat. The river here is more like gruel than like water. However, I am not going to discuss the matter very much longer. There is one point which I wish to make, and as to which I have a totally different view from the hon. gentleman from Sarnia. That hon. gentleman thinks it is a desirable thing that this law should be left in the hands of the government—that the government of the day should have the discretion as to where and when and how the law is to be enforced. I think that is highly objectionable. It is not fair to a government to place them in such a position, to say, there is a law which is to operate over all the country, but if you choose to exempt any particular person in this, that or the other part of the country, you can do so. It leaves the government open to be worried and tormented by people in all parts of the Dominion, and it is more in the interest of the government, that is supposing the government to be perfectly honest and impartial, to leave them no such discretion. It is a very objectionable thing for a government, looked at from the government's point of view; and when, as we know, has happened in several cases, different measures have been dealt out to different millers, it becomes still more objectionable. If there are to be certain rivers exempt, then I contend when the House goes into committee on this bill, it should be made clear what the exemptions are to consist of and what persons and rivers are to be exempt. I have not looked into this matter very much but I have looked a little at what has been done in other places. There are certain states of the union where they have little lumber now, but Maine is still a lumbering state. Certain rivers in Maine have not been taken care of, but on the other hand, other rivers have been and there the common law operates. People bring suits against millers when they suffer damage, and the millers have to pay, and the consequence is they do not allow saw-dust to go into those streams. But there are other states, younger than Maine, where something has been done. I give the House a section from the annotated statutes of Colorado. Colorado is a new state, and we might be disposed to think that they would be careless in these matters. The following is the clause to which I have referred :

It shall not be lawful for any person to empty or allow the emptying of saw-dust into any of the waters of this state containing food fish, or to deposit the same within such distance that it may be carried into said waters by natural causes.

The offence is made a misdemeanour, and there is a penalty of from $50 to $300 for each offence. I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia to the fact that this law does not contain any provision that the governor of Colorado may exempt any river or section of a river in the state from the operation of that law. I have not gone over many of the states, but I wish to call the attention of the House to the law of the state of Washington, because that state is one in which the lumbering interest is very powerful. It is one of the greatest lumbering states in the union. I read from chapter 11 of the statutes and codes of Washington, published in 1891, the same year as the Colorado statute which I cited just now. This statute provides :

It shall not be lawful for the proprietor of any saw-mill in this state, or any employee therein, or any other person, to cast saw-dust, planer shavings, or other lumber waste made by any lumber manufacturing concern, or suffer or permit such saw-dust, shavings, or other lumber waste to be thrown or discharged in any manner into the Columbia River and its tributaries, and all other streams and lakes in this state where fish resort to spawn, and any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not less than one hundred nor more than two hundred and fifty dollars.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is one law for all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is one law for all. I now go to the mother country and I turn to the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act of 1876. I commend this to the government, although I suppose it is in vain, because although they profess to follow English precedents, I notice they generally do not. Still I shall read them section 2 of the Act. It provides :

Every person who puts or causes to be put or to fall or knowingly permits to be put or to fall or to be carried into any stream, so as either singly or in combination with other similar acts of the same or any other person to interfere with its due flow, or to pollute its waters, the solid refuse of any manufactory, manufacturing process or quarry, or any rubbish or cinders, or any other waste or any putrid solid matter, shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act.

The penalty for the offence is £50 a day after an order is made on the application of the sanitary authority. There is no power there taken by the Imperial Cabinet to exempt any river. The millers had, you would think, the fullest notice in 1888, and they took no steps whatever to act upon that notice. They had notice last year and as far as we can learn, they took no steps whatever to act on that notice. There is no doubt, they sent out petitions to be signed by riparian owners along the river and sent out petitions amongst their own working men who live on the river, and who would not venture to refuse to sign them, and have brought in those petitions here for the purpose of influencing the government and parliament instead of undertaking to obey the law. I do not know what the hon. member from Rideau proposes to do about this matter, but one thing I think should be done, if no more drastic action is taken when the bill goes into committee of the whole, it should be so amended as to decide clearly that Parliament does not propose at the expiration of two years to grant any further extension. There are just one or two observations, which perhaps, do not bear on the argument at all. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa spoke of the sewage from the city of Ottawa polluting the river further east, and spoke of that as being more injurious than the saw-dust.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, not more injurious.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Recent experiments in England have established the fact that the worst kind of pollution put into the river in the way of sewage has been completely purified after the current has carried it a mile and a-half from the place of entry.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should like to say a few words on this question, because there is a good deal to be said on both sides. I have often walked along this beautiful cliff, to which the hon. member from Toronto has referred, and viewed the river flowing past and regretted very much to see the saw-dust floating down. I thought it a very great evil, and that if it could be prevented, it certainly should be. But my eye did not rest entirely on the river—it took in the piles of lumber on the other side, and I could not help thinking that it was that lumber which had created the saw-dust. Now, that lumber is one of the greatest exports that we have. It is heavily handicapped in the United States by the duty placed on it, and in England and other places to which it is exported it is met by the United States lumber which is not restricted in the way that we restrict ours. We order the millmen to pull down their mills and to reconstruct them at great expense. If they are put to that expense it stands to reason that they cannot sell their lumber at the same remunerative rates, and therefore we are handicapping our own lumber in its competition with the lumber of the United States. I do not look altogether at the lumber. I look a little beyond the lumber piles and I see the city of Hull. Those are the men who are ground down by the haughty millowners, according to the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg; yet, since I have been in this House, that city has been burnt down twice (I understand it has been burnt three times, altogether), and it has been re-built every time. Has it been re-built by the wealthy millowners? No, but by the labourers themselves, and they must have had money to keep their families and a balance over to build their houses. But I go a little further. I see a large building erected to the worship of God; who erected that? Was it erected by the bloated aristocrats? No, but by these poor, oppressed labourers, who, I am told by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, scarcely get enough wages to keep body and soul together. They have erected a temple to God which would shame most of the towns of Nova Scotia that I am acquainted with. Look at what these bloated millowners have done for the city of Ottawa. Walk along the streets of Ottawa and you will see houses that Halifax would be only too proud if it had one-fourth of them. Who have erected those? The millowners, after having paid them enough to re-build Hull twice, and to build a cathedral which would be an ornament to any city in Nova Scotia and to a good many in Quebec and Ontario. Therefore I do not think I should vote for any law that would prevent the owners of the mills obtaining the money by which to beautify the city, after paying their men wages that enabled them to rebuild their town and to build their cathedral. It has been stated that this law should apply to every place alike; how would the people of Ottawa like to have their mills closed? The hon. member from Lunenburg says that the thousands of people in Hull are serfs and bondsmen and the sooner they are released from the tyranny of their masters the better, but I do not think so. You say the same law should apply to all rivers. I know a river in Nova Scotia, and it is only a type of all the rivers that flow into the Bay of Fundy, the Avon River at Windsor, on which at high tide a vessel of 600 tons can go to the wharf. In low tide a man can cross it on horseback without getting his boots wet. Do you think that any saw-dust could do harm to a river of that kind? The tide rises 60 feet and comes with such a rush that the animals feeding on the salt water grass, when they see it coming, clear away for safety. Hon. gentlemen are very much alarmed by the explosions in the river. I am inclined to think that it is caused by fermentation, and that it is carbonic acid gas, which the hon. gentleman from Sarnia takes in his ginger beer and does not object to at all. You need not be afraid of the fermentation underneath. It takes place from the heating of the saw-dust. In the summer the gas comes up in bubbles which are imperceptible. In winter it blows up the ice and it is very alarming to old women and children, but we need not be anxious about it. There are several things that I was about to say, but, an hon. gentleman has remarked, they have been said by others who preceded me.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—It is not at all wonderful that hon. gentlemen in this chamber find it difficult to come to a decision on this question, as between the interests of the lumbermen and the interests of the fishermen, when the governments for the last quarter of a century have failed to discover any solution to the difficulty. I sometimes wonder if the succeeding government, which will no doubt be in power in a few months, will effect a change, or if they will allow the same difficulty to continue. The government with all its expenditure in the way of salaries to officials employed to determine how far the saw-dust affects the fish and how fa rivers are fish rivers, have totally failed to this day to reach definite conclusions, and now we are asked to sanction a bill to extend the option of the government for another two years. So far as this question is being discussed, it is being considered in relation to the Ottawa River, and it certainly is a capital thing, in the interests of the wealthy lumbermen, that the seat of government is at Ottawa. The small rivers in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, where there is no navigation except what the millowners themselves require, and some of which are not fish rivers in any shape or form, have been subjected to this optional law year after year by both governments—because the same thing existed during the time of the Mackenzie government. Why they should be subjected to this annoying measure hanging over their heads is something I could never understand. I remember one case that happened a year ago in my locality. A large millowner wished to charter a ship to carry some deals to England and he spoke to the fishery warden asking if there would be any difficulty about saw-dust. He was told that there would not be while sawing that cargo and he cabled for the vessel. When he had a small part of the cargo sawn, a superior officer of fisheries came along and said "you must stop this ; you cannot throw your saw-dust into the stream." The lumberman was put to a very considerable expense to remove it with wheel-barrows. He had to continue his contract and load his ship, and yet he was subjected to that annoyance without any cause whatever, because afterwards word came along that he could put his sawdust into the river as usual. I have an opinion that those fishery overseers are a little bit too officious in many localities, and I do not quite understand the policy of the government in the public interest exempting some rivers and enforcing the law on others. I should be very much more inclined to support this measure, although it covers a period of two years only,—and the same difficulty will come up again,—if the government were in a position to say what rivers were fish rivers and what were not, or if they would be inclined to extend the exemption, and say that all those rivers upon which the law has not been enforced for the last year or two shall be exempt. If they would do that, it would be a great convenience to many millowners in the maritime provinces, and they would at least know what to depend upon for two years longer. Very much has been said about the Ottawa River. It is a navigable stream, a river in which one would think there is a considerable quantity of fish. There are also the St. John and the St. Croix rivers, which the government exempt from the operation of this law. The St. John is, for a very limited portion comparatively, a boundary between the United States and Canada, but the St. Croix is an international river—it is a boundary. On all those rivers the lumbermen are wealthy, as a rule, especially the lumbermen on the Ottawa. Why? Because their lumber is pine, a valuable lumber compared with the spruce which our lumbermen have to cut and ship. It is a more expensive material, and the apparatus for burning the sawdust and rubbish would not, relatively to the value of the article they are working with, be so great as it is to these small lumbermen who are working with spruce, a cheaper commodity. Therefore, I do not see why such attention should be paid to the larger rivers. One would think they are rivers in which the public have a greater interest, yet the policy is to exempt the large rivers in the interest of the large lumbermen, and to protect the small rivers where the millers operate with a cheaper kind of lumber and where they have great difficulty in making a living, subjecting them to the inconvenience and uncertainties connected with the operation of the law. The government have been paying out enough to ascertain how far the saw-dust may affect the fish, but with little apparent result. We have no means of knowing how different varieties of fish are affected ; some may be injuriously affected, some may not. These rivers I speak of are mostly tidal rivers emptying into the Bay of Fundy. The difficulty now in applying any definite law to them is this : the lumbermen having come to the conclusion that they would not, as a general thing, be compelled to go to the expense of furnishing appliances for burning the refuse, have built their mills in such a way that it would be ruinous in some cases to change them. The Ottawa men are in a better position to provide burning apparatus than the lumbermen on the smaller streams, who are poorer and not so favourably situated. The mills are built so low down that it would necessitate an entirely new structure, and with the small margin of profit they have it would be ruinous to them, yet they are resting all this time under this difficulty to which I have alluded. I have mentioned one instance in which a very great hardship occurred. I hope that the minister, when he comes to consider the matter, will decide in the case of all these mills where the law has not been in reality enforced in the past, that they shall be free from the operation of the law for the coming two years as well as those formally exempted by the government.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—When the hon. Minister of Agriculture introduced this bill in the Senate he said that we had more information this year than we had last session when this subject was under review. Anyone who has listened to the debate as it proceeded, must be convinced that opinions are changed and that we are getting more information, and the speeches of hon. gentlemen during this debate showed that such is the case, and I have in my mind's eye the speech made by the hon. member from Ottawa. While he was delivering his speech I was looking over the record of his utterances of last session, and I find that there has been a complete conversion. His utterances of last year were diametrically opposed to his utterances of the present session, and this is just another example of the fact, with which the hon. Minister of Agriculture set out, that we have more information. In that way, too, the answer is found to the remarks which fell from the senior member from Halifax. He spoke of the dignity of the House being compromised in receding from the position which it had once taken. Surely it is admissible to any man, or any body of men, with better information and light, to change their opinions and actions to suit that light and better information. There can be no question about that in my mind. Last year, when the matter was up, I was in favour of the optional clause. I have not sufficient knowledge to indicate now exactly how the thing should be remedied, but what I had in view was this, that the optional power ought to be vested in somebody. In the original Fisheries Act, I believe, it was vested in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Now I see it is vested in the Governor in Council, which I think is a better arrangement, but there should be some way of distinguishing between rivers, for there are very different circumstances applicable to different rivers. An instance occurred in my own experience which I will relate to show what I mean. During the recess, this session, I went down home. Here I may say that the methods of conducting the lumber business in Nova Scotia are totally different in recent years from those in use formerly. In olden times the lumber was brought either by streams, rivers, or rail, or sled, or some such appliance, to the large stationary mill. Now, as everyone who has anything to do with the lumber business in Nova Scotia knows, that is changed, and now the system obtains of sending portable mills into the woods, into the heart of the timber and logs, and there manufacturing the lumber, and this benefit results: instead of having to transport the logs including slabs and saw-dust, you bring out a manufactured article. In order to carry on the business at all, these portable mills have to be set up on streams for the purpose of supplying water for the boilers, and in the second instance for carrying away the saw-dust. In this particular case the man had placed his portable mill on a mere brook. The Act applies to rivers and streams. While a river is a stream, a stream is not always a river. This was a mere brooklet and nothing else, emptying into the head waters of River John, about thirty miles from Pictou. He had a personal enemy who, for some reason or other, had taken a grudge against him, and he went off to the inspector of fisheries and represented that this man was throwing sawdust, contrary to the provisions of the law into the stream, and the result was that the man was fined. I don't think that one particle of that sawdust ever found its way to the waters of River John, and therefore I say that in some way or other (in what way I do not know how to indicate), provision should be made to meet such cases as that, perhaps by the inclusion of an optional clause, vesting power in the Governor in Council to prevent the recurrence of such cases as I have cited. Then there are the international and other rivers which certainly ought to come in as exceptions. Opinions have been advanced in the House—and I say this in the best possible spirit and do not intend to give offence to anyone—by gentlemen who have not really any practical knowledge whatever of the matter on which they have pronounced with all the dictum of an expert. If I had a matter at law that involved intrinsically a question in regard to law, you would surely think I was a lunatic if I applied to the millmen to direct me in the difficulty; the same thing applies to the other side, when the interests of the lumberman and the construction of his mill and the way in which he should conduct his business are attacked by gentlemen who know nothing practically about the matter. Certainly you cannot attach much value to opinions of that kind. As illustrative of that, I would just say that some of the gentlemen who have spoken said they saw in their travels in the west large mills with immense smoke stacks and a large business going on were they were burning their sawdust. Why cannot the Chaudière men do the same thing? The very answer shows to the practical man that they did not understand the matter at all. Quite without any evil intention these assertions are made, but the difficulty is, these assertions go out to the public with the imprimatur of the members of the Senate, and create a wrong impression in the public mind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is only a question of dollars.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It is a very heavy question of dollars. I do not give my opinion simply on that matter, but I shall back it up with the opinion of others which will be accepted as of some weight. Early this session it was stated that Mr. Edwards had made arrangements for the burning of his sawdust—had in fact put up an incinerator, and the question was asked, why cannot the Chaudière men do the same thing. Allusion has been made to what Mr. Edwards said on that subject, and I wish to cite further from his speech:—

At the last session of parliament an amendment to the Fisheries Act was introduced in the Senate and came over to this House and was passed in the dying days of the session. It was passed through this House, I think, in one day, at a time when the House was holding two or three sittings in the same day. I happened to be absent at the time, or I would have opposed the passage of the bill. I would have opposed it, not because it would affect me individually in any sense, but because I believe in the public interest, the bill should not have become law. Now, there are a great many who believe that the putting of sawdust in the river—I will deal with the Ottawa only, because it is the one with which I am most conversant—is an injury to navigation. Let me say at once that if I had my choice, I would prefer that the saw-dust should not be put in the river, but I think the question ought to be decided upon considerations of whether the putting of saw-dust in the river would be a greater injury to the country than would be involved in the effort to prevent the practice. I am engaged not only in sawing but in navigation upon the river, and I make this statement: That in no place whatever in the Ottawa River, except at the foot of the locks, is any injury done to navigation by the presence of the saw-dust. There is no point, even in the shallow places, where there is a less depth of water than there was twenty or thirty years ago. It is true that some of the bays may fill up to some extent, but, so far as the navigation of the river is concerned, the putting of the saw-dust in the river is no injury at all. Boatmen, pleasure-seekers, may perhaps meet with trifling difficulties; but, so far as navigation is concerned, no injury is done. I think that the great question, so far as the Ottawa River is concerned, is whether a great and important industry is to be very seriously interfered with, or whether a few pleasure-seekers are to suffer some little inconvenience upon some occasions.

Then I had intended to quote what Mr. Scott has already quoted. Further on Mr. Edwards says:

To enforce the law as it now stands would be a very serious infliction to the Ottawa Valley; in fact, it would imperil the whole business of the Ottawa River; and I think every hon. gentleman will agree with me that the lumber business on that river is our greatest business. Now, I sincerely hope, in the interests of the Ottawa River, and in the interests of the country, that the law now proposed by the Minister of Marine will go into effect, and that, within a period of two years, an arrangement may be made whereby this matter will be finally settled. There is, I think, a question of vested rights to be considered. When this business was begun on the Ottawa River, and on all the other rivers where it exists, it was very small, but it gradually grew and attained the great proportion it has to-day. A very large expenditure has been incurred in mill construction, and a large amount of money has been invested in other ways connected with this industry. If this change has to be made all over Canada, it will be a very serious loss, indeed to the country. Now, what I would suggest is this: looking forward two years to the time when it is hoped some arrangement may be made, I would suggest that all mills at present in operation on such rivers as the Ottawa, where no great injury to navigation is done, should be allowed to continue their operations as at present, but the law should provide that any new mills that may be constructed shall be obliged to dispose of their saw-dust and other refuse otherwise than putting it in the river.

Mr. AMYOT. Speak about fish.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, so far as fish is concerned, it is true that some maintain that fishing has been seriously injured by throwing mill refuse into the Ottawa River; but I have lived all my life on the river, and am unable to say whether that is the case or not. My own opinion is that it is not the case. It is true that years ago there were more fish in the river than there are to-day, but it is also true that there are far more fishermen on the river to-day than there were years ago.

Fishing is now carried on for commercial purposes, and, consequently, the fish are being more rapidly taken out. There is another thing. The Carillon dam down at the foot of Long Sault, prevents certain fish coming up the river, and that is, I think, another reason why the quantity of fish may have been lessened. But if the saw-dust were injurious to the fish, I think they would have ceased altogether to exist in that river. Many kinds of fish that existed years ago are still found here, but perhaps in less numbers than formerly. But let me remind the House that the petition presented to this parliament by myself, bore the names of nearly every fisherman on the river; in fact, I think every fisherman signed the petition.

That is a strong position to take, and the authority is undoubted. The gentlemen to whom I have referred, who will acknowledge themselves that they are not experts, when it comes to authoritative statements regarding this matter ought surely to admit that the millmen know their own business.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE resumed his speech. He said: When six o'clock was called, I was about to refer to the statements and documents submitted by the Ottawa and Gatineau saw-mill owners on this subject. I think I shall save time by quoting the salient points, as I esteem them, of this pamphlet, in reply to statements which have been made in opposition to the bill. The first is the paper from the millowners, who surely know what the requirements of their business are. They say:

For very many years prior to the passing of the Act of last session saw-dust and other waste material from these saw-mills had been lawfully permitted by the owners of the mills to pass into the Ottawa and Gatineau rivers. Owing to their being water-power mills, and to their location and construction there was no other way of disposing of it. Whilst, perhaps, some of the mills might, with a considerable outlay, be fitted with appliances to dispose otherwise of the saw-dust, &c., as to others of them it would be practically impossible to comply with the provisions of the Act of last session except by a complete reconstruction or total stoppage and abandonment of them. The greater number of the mills were built at a time long prior to there being any legislation in the direction of the prohibition now provided for in the Fisheries Act with reference to the putting of saw-dust, &c., into the streams in question. As to those of them at least which would require to be either wholly rebuilt or reconstructed in order to comply with the law, the enforcement of the prohibition would mean the loss to the owners of the cost of the total reconstruction of their mills and the derangement of their business meantime; and as to those of them who in order to obey the law would find it necessary to wholly abandon their operations it would mean to the owners the loss of the means of carrying on their manufacturing business and of the capital invested in these mills, and to the localities interested it would entail the very serious loss of local employment for a very large number of men.

Such being the position in the session of 1894, without any notice or knowledge on the part of the lumbermen that any such legislation as that of last session was contemplated, and therefore without any opportunity whatever being afforded to the saw-millowners affected, of being heard or of having their side of the question presented to Parliament, the amendment referred to was made law.

Here let me say that I was somewhat astonished last session to find that the information which is contained in this pamphlet was not available, but it seems that the millowners themselves did not know what was going on. Without knowing anything about it, and without being able to bring in any evidence on their side of the question, the bill was passed.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—They appeared before the committee of this House in 1888 and gave evidence.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I now come to the report of Mr. Sandford Fleming, made in 1889. I wish to direct attention to the fact that it was made at a more recent date than any of the reports to which reference has been made in this debate. It indicates in a manner which the other reports do not indicate, the condition of affairs six years ago. It was with some degree of astonishment that I heard this report, I will not say discredited, but something shading in that direction applied to it. Mr. Fleming's reputation is such that anything he should say and assert to be a fact, which he himself had proved to be a fact, would be accepted by most people. Mr. Fleming's professional reputation is too high to be affected by any such criticism. I wish to direct the attention of the House to the clear, concise and direct style of statement which characterizes his report as contrasted with the language of some other reports to which we have listened, such as this: one gentleman who was said to be a mechanical engineer says that he was "under the impression that saw-dust extended down the river." That is hazy, misty and nebulous. There is nothing of the kind about Mr. Fleming's evidence. This mechanical engineer "never made any special soundings," and yet he speaks of the condition of the channel of the river—it was "reported to him," the bays were "filled up" and "the channel will be," he made no special soundings and yet he prophesies. He says there is no mechanical difficulty in destroying the saw-dust. That shows how much the man knew about the matter. You will find nothing of the kind in Mr. Fleming's report. He says:

The object of the examination was to ascertain to what extent the refuse from the various sawmills interferes with public and private rights, and more especially to determine definitely how far the navigation of the river is obstructed from the same cause.

The annual product of manufactured lumber of all sorts at the various mills around the city of Ottawa will probably average fully 300,000,000 feet B. M. If we estimate 10 per cent of the annual output as waste we have 30,000,000 feet B. M. or 92,592 cubic yards of refuse, a large proportion of which passes into the river. Whatever the proportion, it is reasonable to suppose that such a quantity of foreign matter if deposited locally would necessarily produced some marked effect. Much, if not the whole of this waste material is buoyant and it is carried away by the stream to a greater or lesser distance, possibly some portion finds its way to the lower reaches of the river, towards the ocean.

The waste product from the mills is, however, not without advantage to another class of people. There are a large number of families settled along the river banks between Ottawa and Grenville who appear to have selected this site of their habitations on account of the supply of fuel which is annually floated to their doors. During the summer months numbers of women and children may be seen regularly at work in boats and canoes gathering in from the stream their winter's supply of fuel.

There is in reality a considerable population dependent on the mills for their winter's firewood which thus costs them only the trouble of gathering it.

As already indicated, I found large deposits of saw-dust in side channels, sheltered bays, eddies and inlets (but the main channel of the river remains unobstructed for the purposes of navigation.)

I caused soundings to be taken during the past season on lines of cross-sections which were made by the Government engineers the year previous.

These cross-sections extend generally from shore to shore of the Ottawa, across the navigable channel.

Then he enumerates the points, and continues:

An examination clearly shows that the bed of the river has to some extent been changed within the period of twelve months, and that the change is generally in the increase of depth. At one or two points, the bed rock of the river has been laid bare, so that the depth at such spots cannot be further increased from the same natural cause. I can only account for the increase of depth in the channel by a greater scouring effect of the current, and it is just possible that this may be due to the lessening of the depth in the bays and shallows and side inlets, producing a tendency to increase the flow of water in the central portion of the river. Be the reason what it may, it appears that the navigable channel is fully maintained in its integrity, and the increase in depth is confirmed by the statements of old river pilots who allege that the channel is better now than it was thirty or forty years back.

In addition to the new cross-sections referred to, a series of soundings has been made on a continuous line along the entire length of the channel from Ottawa to Grenville, a distance of sixty miles. These soundings reveal a depth of water for the greater part of the distance which is indeed remarkable.

Then he gives every mile of the 60 from Ottawa to Grenville, showing the least depth to be 6 feet and the greatest 142 feet. He sums up as follows:

These soundings establish that when the water<sup>r</sup> is at its lowest the channel between Ottawa and Grenville is for a total length of 59 miles greater in depth than 10 feet; that for one-third of the whole distance the depth exceeds 50 feet; that for about 11 miles it exceeds 75 feet, and that for 5½ miles the water is more than 100 feet, attaining a depth of 142 feet under the lowest recorded level.

Only at five points on the whole distance of 60 miles is the depth of the channel at extreme low water under 10 feet. They are as follows:

1. At the entrance to the Rideau Canal for about 600 feet out from the lower lock.
2. At the head of Kettle Island at the beginning of the fourth mile from Ottawa, near the cross section marked "AA." Here the least depth in the channel is 8½ feet.
3. On the 9th mile below Ottawa, near the light-house, directly east of the cross-section marked "CC." Here the least depth in the channel is 6 feet.
4. Below the mouth of the Blanche River on the 10th mile from Ottawa. Here the least depth in the channel is 7 feet.
5. At Parker's Island on the 31st mile below Ottawa. Here the least depth in the channel is 7 feet.

These places have been examined carefully; the shallow spots are of no great extent, being limited to a few hundred yards in each case, and as already stated there is only an aggregate distance of a mile in the whole 60 miles within which the depth is not greater than 10 feet. Borings have been made by which it is established that in cases 2 and 3 the material in the channel bed is coarse red sand. In cases 4 and 5 the borings indicate a fine sand or silt; the material in all cases being easy of removal. Except in the case of No. 1 the borings did not reveal the presence of saw-dust or mill refuse in any form in any part of the main channel. It is inferred that these points are simply natural shallows such as are found in all rivers.

The evidence goes to show that these shallow portions of the channel have quite as much water over them as when the River Ottawa was first navigated. Only in the case of No. 1 is the navigation in question affected. Here there is a deposit for a distance of about 200 yards outwards, from the entrance to the lower lock. The deposit here is probably for the most part saw-dust, and it is due to the fact that the entrance to the Rideau Canal is in a deep and sheltered bay, where the saw-dust collects and where there is no current sufficient to carry it away. With this exception, it is established beyond all question that no appreciable injury has been done to the navigable channel of the river through the operations of the lumbering manufacturers.

Moreover, it appears that the lumber manufacturing interest would suffer very much more than all other interests from any possible injury to the navigation. This inference is drawn from the volume of river traffic, as shown by government returns. If the tolls collected on tonnage passing the Grenville Canal be taken as a criterion, we may judge of the value of the traffic by the following table, which gives a comparison for a period of ten years.

Then follows the table which I need not read. He continues :

By these returns it is established that the gross revenue from canal tolls in ten years ending 31st December, 1887, was $471,923, of which sawn lumber contributed $412,844, and all other traffic, $59,079.

This does not include timber in rafts, saw-logs, ties, &c., of which he furnishes a statement. He continues :

If the latter tolls be included, it would appear that the lumbering interests contributed $48,522.59 of a total canal revenue of $49,830.11. But taking sawn lumber alone which pays close on 90 per cent of the aggregate tolls collected, there cannot be a doubt that the manufacturers are to a much larger extent concerned in the navigation of the river than all other interests combined.

In connection with the depth of water in the channel my inquiries go to show that the barges used in the transportation of sawn lumber are greater in draught than any other craft now employed or which have at any previous time been employed on the river.

The question arises, are the causes in operation, if continued for a sufficiently long period, likely to damage the Ottawa as a navigable stream? This inquiry is of great importance and demands special attention.

It is not easy to ascertain the exact quantity of solid matter cast into the river from the mills, be the quantity what it may, the material being buoyant is carried forward a greater or lesser distance before it sinks or disappears.

Wherever it may find its way to the bottom, it is seldom found in a compact body. A deposit of saw-dust is easily moved by currents, and as the volume of water in the Ottawa during floods is very large and of great force it may be assumed that no deposit of this loose material can remain in the shallow parts of the main channel, where in fact the currents are always greatest.

It has been satisfactorily established by the recent examination that during the constantly recurring periods of high water any such deposits are moved forward by the currents and carried probably to parts of the river where the water is deep and still.

Taking that portion of the Ottawa between this city and Grenville and dividing the whole distance of 60 miles into subdivisions of 10 miles each, we obtain from the recent measurements the following average depths in the channel at extreme low water.

From these averages we have for the whole 60 miles of the channel taken in subdivisions of 10 miles.

1. A mean minimum depth of 32 feet 9 inches.
2. A mean maximum depth of 58 feet 7 inches.
3. A general mean depth of 45 feet 9 inches.

It will be borne in mind that all these depths mentioned refer to a stage of the water which has only occurred once in the past 17 years, that is to say when the river fell to but 4 ft. 6½ in. over the lock sill of the Rideau Canal, on the 1st of October, 1881.

The large quantity of refuse passing from the mills would in a shallow sluggish river very soon produce objectionable consequences, but the deductions drawn from the recent survey show conclusively that the Ottawa is so exceptional in its character and has depths so profound that the evils to be feared from the filling up of the channel are exceedingly remote.

This clearly establishes the position taken by the millowners, that if anyone is to suffer by interference with the navigation of the Ottawa River, they are the men. That is an argument the force of which this House will be ready to recognize. The prophecy has been made over and over again during this debate, and I am astonished to hear it reiterated as often as it has been, that the channel of the Ottawa is going to be filled up—that it must be—whereas the fact is known to every man of us that this business has been carried on 70 or 80 years or more on this river, and longer on rivers in the United States and to a much larger extent, and the channel in every instance is unobstructed. Mr. Fleming continues :

I have had an estimate prepared to convey some idea of the length of time which would elapse before the deep parts of the river between Ottawa and Grenville would be filled. This estimate is based on the soundings recently made and on other data. According to this estimate it would require 350,000,000 cubic yards of solid material to fill up the deeper parts to a line ten feet under extreme low water. I have already indicated that the quantity of saw-dust and refuse of all kinds passing from the mills cannot on an average be more than 100,000 cubic yards per annum. It is not possible to determine what part of this material remains above Grenville. It is reasonable to suppose that some of it finds its way to the lower reaches of the river, but assuming that no part of it is carried towards the ocean and that its volume is not reduced by pressure or by any natural process, the question resolves itself into one of simple proportion, viz. :—How long will it take to deposit 350,000,000 cubic yards at the rate of 100,000 cubic yards per annum? This whole calculation may be held to be but roughly approximate, yet it will give some idea of the enormous length of time which would elapse before the deep space under the level demanded by a navigable channel could be filled up.

The examination which I have made points to the following conclusion :

1. With respect to private interests, there can be no doubt that riparian owners in some individual cases suffer actual damage from the operations of the lumber manufacturers. While this is the case more especially in the neighbourhood of Ottawa there are many persons living along the river banks between this city and Grenville who are benefited in a manner which to them may be considered material. These persons may indeed be counted by hundreds, and they would feel it to be a great deprivation if through any cause they were cut off from their annual supply of firewood.

2. There has been a deposit of saw-dust directly in front of the Rideau Canal in the city of Ottawa it extends from the lower lock, a short distance into the river. The removal of less than 10,000 cubic yards by dredging at this spot would enable all vessels navigating the canal to enter with ease when the water is at its lowest stage. With this single exception I am unable to see that the navigation of the River Ottawa has been injuriously interfered with to any appreciable extent. Moreover, if the official returns afford a means of judging it appears that the lumbering interests are more deeply concerned in the maintenance of the navigation than all other interests. The official returns of traffic through the Grenville canal showing that the lumber business pays nearly all the tolls collected.

3. With regard to the future it is conclusively established that there is no probability of the navigation between the city of Ottawa and Grenville being irretrievably destroyed or seriously obstructed from the cause assigned for centuries to come.

If any one wishes to know without going to the trouble of making the calculation, how long it would take at that rate to fill up the channel of the Ottawa I may say that it would take a period of about 3,500 years. Some hon. gentlemen laugh, but I should like to hear them controvert that statement. Then comes the report of the Ottawa and Gatineau saw-mill owners to the Minister of Marine, some points of which have been mentioned before. I shall, however, quote from it the following :

1. As to the alleged injury to the navigation.

With regard to the future it is conclusively established that there is no probability of the navigation between the city of Ottawa and Grenville being irretrievably destroyed or seriously obstructed from the cause assigned for centuries to come.

It is quite true that the commission referred to, (that of 1872) and Mr. Fleming also, report deposits in two or three of the bays immediately below the Chaudière Falls, the most important of which is at the foot of the locks of the Rideau Canal. This deposit can easily be removed by dredging, and has been so removed on two separate occasions at long intervals at the expense of the lumbermen, and we are quite prepared, when this particular deposit becomes troublesome again to remove it. The evidence adduced proves conclusively that there is no damage whatever to the navigable channel from saw-dust or mill refuse except at the one point referred to, and as this deposit can very easily be removed, we submit that its existence should in no manner weigh against the interests of such an industry as the lumber trade.

Mr. Fleming shows most conclusively that for centuries to come no danger can be apprehended to the navigation. The correctness of Mr. Fleming's conclusions are fully borne out by the results upon the Hudson River in the state of New York, where the practice of throwing saw-dust and mill refuse into that stream has prevailed without hindrance or restriction for fully a hundred years; with reference to which Mr. D. M. Greene, C. E., in his report upon this question in 1873 states as follows : " Thus it appears that the very question under consideration has been subjected upon the Hudson River to a very severe practical test covering a period of nearly a century, and yet saw-dust obstructions in the navigable channel or in the canals fed from this river have never been known."

2. As to the question of the fisheries.

Permit us to say that the Ottawa River is not and never was what might be called a fish river and there are probably as many fish taken from the stream to-day, having in view the fact that it has been fished for a great number of years, as from any other stream in Canada under similar conditions as to original supply, etc., and we venture the assertion that the material coming from the sawmills and removed from the river as firewood by the settlers along its banks is of far greater value than all the fish that were ever taken from it as will be seen from various petitions from settlers along the river sent in to the Government from time to time, praying that the practice of throwing mill refuse into the river be not discontinued.

Moreover, the Carillon dam, at which no fishways have ever been provided, has been an absolute barrier ever since its construction to the ascent from the lower reaches of the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence of the fish that would doubtless otherwise have found their way as far up as the Chaudière, and would have effectually altered the character of that portion of the river between this city and Grenville as a fish stream.

That the presence of saw-dust and mill refuse in the Ottawa is not injurious to the fish in that river is manifest from the experience of the Commissioners of Fisheries of the state of New York upon the Hudson River into which stream, as has been already said, this material is thrown without restriction or hindrance. In their "Seventeenth Report" published in 1889 they state (page 10 of the report) that "In the increasing number of shad caught yearly in the Hudson, are rapidly growing evidences of the presence of salmon in the same stream * * are sufficient proof of the value of the work of the commission in the past, and the future will show still greater results."

We venture the opinion that the construction of proper fishways at the dams upon the Ottawa, as in the case of the Hudson where these fishways are built past the very dams, in several instances, that establish the head of water for driving the sawmills that throw their saw-dust and mill refuse into the river; and the same well directed efforts towards the re-stocking of the Ottawa with suitable kinds of fish would produce the same results that have been secured upon the Hudson, notwithstanding the presence of saw-dust and mill refuse in that stream.

We respectfully suggest that at all events it is manifestly unfair to cripple so important an industry as the sawn lumber trade upon the bare assumption that, as now conducted, it proves to hurtful the fishery interests upon the Ottawa, so long as the weight of evidence is strongly to the contrary; and so long as the means ordinarily employed for the maintenance of a fish supply, and which are successful elsewhere under practically the same conditions as obtain on the Ottawa, are neglected upon that stream.

4. As to the alleged injurious effect upon the public health of the throwing of saw-dust and other mill refuse into the river.

Upon that point we beg to state that the cities of Bay City and Saginaw, in the state of Michigan, are built largely upon made ground filled in with sawmill refuse. Inquiry made in 1890, when this matter was again under consideration, of the officials of these cities as to whether or not the public health had suffered from the facts referred to, elicited the following replies: Mr. Barber, city recorder of Bay City, writes as follows: "I have not heard of any complaints being made in this city or any other cities along the said stream (the Saginaw River) relative to the injurious effects the said matter would have upon the public health; in fact the vital statistics here compare favourably with any other city or section in the state." William Binder, controller of the city of Saginaw, writes: "I have been living here ever since the first mill started in 1850. A great many low grounds and bayous have been filled with saw-dust and slabs, without endangering the health of the citizens. We have roads which are made of slab filling 6 ft. 8 in. high and saw-dust on top of them; so far they have not endangered the health of the population."

5. As regards the beauty of the landscape. Upon that point we admit that floating saw-dust does not improve the general appearance of the river, but it must be remembered that this is a utilitarian age and that the interests of any important industry, the success of which affects the well being of so many people, are invariably held to be paramount to the gratification of mere aesthetic taste, satisfactory and desirable as that may be under proper conditions.

In considering this question it should be borne in mind that lumber has been manufactured upon the Ottawa for upwards of forty years and upon its tributaries at least ninety-five years, during which time saw-dust and mill refuse have been thrown into the stream. If during that long period of time no substantial injury has resulted to any public or private interest from this practice, which we submit can easily be shown to be the case, there can be no grave danger to such interests from the continuance of this practice. Especially will this be seen to be the case when it is remembered that probably two-thirds, if not more, of the timber of the Ottawa Valley has already been harvested, and that in future the lumber industry must gradually decline.

The official returns of the Crown Lands departments of Ontario and Quebec, from the Ottawa section, and the statements of the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company of logs brought down the Ottawa from year to year, will show that during the past six or eight years the volume of business upon the Ottawa and its tributaries, especially in the Ottawa district has declined nearly or quite fifty per cent. When we couple with this decline the fact that saws of much lighter gauge are used in the manufacture of lumber than were used eight or ten years ago, we are quite safe in saying that the volume of sawdust and mill refuse thrown into the Ottawa is considerably less than one-half what it was say ten years ago.

The present situation of this question then is; that the pine upon the Ottawa has been two-thirds cut; that the annual volume of business has declined nearly or quite fifty per cent, and that the quantity of saw-dust and mill refuse from this greatly decreased volume of business is very much less per thousand feet than was the case several years ago probably not over one-third in the aggregate what it was then. But even assuming that all saw-dust, and what is called 'mill refuse,' were kept out of the river, there would still be a considerable quantity of rubbish composed largely of bark from the logs which cannot be kept out of the river, and the presence of which in the stream must necessarily be an incident of the lumber trade so long as it continues to be exploited upon the Ottawa.

We have no desire that our private interests should be in any way promoted at the expense of those of other private individuals or of the public. This is a question that must be looked at from the standpoint of the greatest good to the greatest number, and we submit that upon the questions as to the effect of this material upon the navigation, upon the fishery interests, upon the purity of the water and upon the public health, no satisfactory evidence has been adduced to prove that any substantial injury arises from the presence of saw-dust or mill refuse in the River Ottawa, but that upon the other hand it is productive of greater good than injury.

It may be deemed superfluous for us to make any statement as to the probable effect upon the business interests of the Ottawa section of the enforcement of the Fisheries Act as amended at the last session of Parliament, but inasmuch as it is a matter in which the people of Ottawa and its vicinity have a very substantial interest, we may be pardoned the statement that such enforcement must have one or other of two results; either that the mills must be removed to some other locality, since Ottawa possesses no advantages as a lumber manufacturing point apart from the unrestricted use of the water power, but on the other hand very many serious disadvantages, or, that burners must be erected for the burning of this material, which will tend to create a smoke nuisance throughout the whole city, and will doubtless be taken advantage of by insurance companies to raise the rates upon all insurable property within the limits of the city. In either case, we submit that the public interests, so far as Ottawa is concerned, would suffer much more than they could by any possibility suffer from the present practice of allowing this material to pass away in the running water of the river.

As some members of this House are aware, the saws used in almost all processes of manufacture now are very much thinner than those which were used in former years.

Especially is this the case with the band-saw, which does a large proportion of the work in the mills. It is very much thinner, and the kerf, that is the part taken out by the operation of the saw, is a half or two-thirds less than it used to be. You can see how materially that effects the situation. Then, with reference to the burning of refuse, I may say that in some places where these incinerators have been started the nuisance has become almost unbearable, not merely to the locality, but for a distance, which would surprise hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is all stopped by having a wire netting over the top.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—But they do not all have wire netting.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They ought to have.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Complaints have been made even where such netting is used. It is a fact that refuse comes from those incinerators and floats over the city and adjacent country to the injury of clothing put out to dry.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have seen them working in lumber yards for many years—right in the middle of the lumber, and no accident has occurred from them. They wire over the top of the smoke-stack.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—These are the representations by the lumbermen. Now, for a statement or two from Mr. Edwards. The facts are put so tersely and succinctly that I am sure I shall be excused for making the quotation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—Is that pamphlet issued by the millowners?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Yes; but I have also quoted from the report of Mr. Fleming. Mr. Edwards says:

We have never heard the settlers along the banks of the river complain or advance in any way the theory that the number of fish has lessened in the stream as a result of putting sawdust in it, but we have frequently heard the assertion made by city people who know nothing whatever of the matter.

There is, we understand, a prevailing idea that our case at Rockland is an example of what can be done generally. But this is a serious error. The most convenient way of disposing of our mill refuse here is to burn it. The appliances for doing so were constructed at a cost of ten thousand dollars.

At our smaller mill at New Edinburg, which is on the side of a cliff, the same can be carried out at small cost, and in the construction of this mill we had this in view, and regardless of any law we are going to build a burner there also, because it is the better means of disposing of our refuse. But there is no parallel case on the Ottawa. The situation with each of the other lumbermen having water mills is this:—The mill is built in the bed of the stream, it is low down; there is no means whatever of getting in carriers to concentrate the sawdust and elevate it into burners. If the mills were high enough and it could be done, the cost for the water mills would be say from $20,000 to $50,000 each for the carriers and burners, saying nothing about the cost of operating it afterwards. But it is our frank opinion that in most, if not in every case, reconstruction would have to take place, in which event no estimate of cost could be ventured.

Finally allow us to say this: We are competing lumbermen, and if we had in view our own selfish interests, we would join the crusade against all lumbermen putting sawdust in the river. But we are unable to join any campaign that has no foundation in truth, and one that if successful will be detrimental to the best interest of the entire Ottawa River.

Last session, when this subject was under discussion, I had the privilege and pleasure of going into Mr. Booth's mill, the one which was afterwards destroyed by fire, and I realize the difficulty which would have been experienced in changing that mill. I suppose it is likely that some hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have not spent a week in a sawmill in all their lives; I have spent years. A very unfair remark was made with regard to Mr. Edwards in the discussion of this matter, that of course he would favour his fellow mill-owners. So far from this being the case, he says: "We are competing lumbermen, &c." I do not think that Mr. Edwards's is built on that plan. I now come to the resolution of the Ottawa Board of Trade. It is as follows:

I am directed by the Board to transmit to you for your consideration a resolution passed at a general meeting of which the following is a copy:

That whereas the amendment of the Fisheries Act passed the last session of Parliament revokes the exemption granted to the sawn lumber manufacturers of the Ottawa Valley and compels them from the first of May next to find other means for the disposal of their sawdust;

Whereas the practice of depositing saw-dust in the Ottawa river and its tributaries has existed for the past forty years; and

Whereas all the water mills on the Ottawa and tributaries have been constructed with a view of thus disposing of their saw-dust; and

Whereas these mills have now and have always been the main industry of the Ottawa Valley, giving employment to thousands of persons at all times of the year; and

Whereas the manufacture of sawn lumber in later years is being largely done in the woods by the erection of steam mills on the limits, thereby greatly curtailing cost of same ;

Be it therefore resolved, that this board is of the opinion that if there be any damage or injury arising from the practice of throwing sawdust or mill refuse into the Ottawa or its tributaries, it has already been done and that the few remaining years the industry is likely to continue will add but little if any to existing conditions : and

That this board strongly protests against any action of Parliament that would tend to drive this industry from its present location, and would earnestly impress on the Government our objections to any restrictions that would have this effect ; and

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries with a request that he will place it before the Government, respectfully asking their careful consideration of this important question.

It will not be assumed that the Board of Trade of Ottawa is entirely under the thumb of the mill-owners. Then comes the statement of the riparian owners, some of whom have been quoted by the hon. member from Ottawa :

5. That pine saw-dust and edgings have been put in the Ottawa River at this place for upwards of 90 years without injury to fish, navigation or otherwise, and your petitioners believe that pine saw-dust or pine edgings do not affect or injure the fish that are now to be found in this part of the Ottawa river, but that the government dam at Carrillon does entirely prevent the ascent of fish of all kinds from the lower St. Lawrence and shad from the sea ; the latter entirely disappeared after the dam was completed.

6. That if the act passed last session is enforced it must leave the proprietors of the Hawkesbury mills no other alternative but to close their mills, to the great injury of the surrounding country.

7. Your petitioners would humbly pray that your Parliament would exempt these mills from the recent Fishery Act, so as to permit of saw-dust and mill edgings being allowed to go into the river as heretofore at Hawkesbury mills, as in like manner the government did at the request of a similar petition sent to the government some 17 or 18 years ago.

We have had a good deal of documentary evidence on this matter extending over a great many hours and I beg to be excused by the hon. members of the House for the use I have made of this pamphlet. It cannot be affirmed of me at all events that I have not "spoken by the book." Reference has been made to one gentleman to whom professedly injuries have been done and who has taken legal proceedings—that is the boatman Antoine Ratté. Several speakers have alluded to him. There is one feature of his experience which attracts my attention and it is this : He professes to have been injured to the extent of $2,000 per annum by this saw-dust accumulating in a place where he has his boathouse and on taking the case to the court he was awarded a sum amounting to $3,500 in all for injury done to him over a period extending from 1879 to 1884, which is a period of five years. The court evidently did not estimate the damage which had accrued to Mr. Ratté at his own valuation. I have been told, although I know nothing personally about the matter, that this gentleman was perhaps unfortunate in the selection of his locality for providing boats for pleasure, etc., where he selected his site there is a very rapid current and also the boats supplied were said to be unsuitable. Before resuming my seat I cannot refrain from giving expression to my views of the language which has been used as applied to these gentlemen, the lumbermen of Ottawa. I cannot characterize it otherwise than as unjust, ungenerous and unjustifiable, and I am prepared to maintain the position that it is so. What evidence is there before this House that these men are tyrants and terrorists, as they have been called in the progress of this debate ; what evidence is there that they are unjust to their men ? If I personally had a case in court I would much rather let the case stand on its own merits, even though I had some doubts about its validity than accept such advocacy as that. I would consider that my case was much more injured than benefited by it by such advocacy. In the discussion of last year the same language was used, and I say it was unjust, ungenerous and unjustifiable. I look upon it in this light, that these are the men, and such are they who make a country great and prosperous, who by sheer force of character have overcome time and again manifold difficulties before which their would-be critics would simply stand appalled. That is the view that I take of it, and if these gentlemen have obtained wealth is it a sin that they have done so ? From what I have heard of the business in the Ottawa Valley it is not everyone of them that have become wealthy. I have been told that many of them have failed and failed repeatedly. I see no crime in being wealthy, the fact that they have become wealthy is a credit to them, because they have not only elevated themselves, but in doing so have brought the people up with them. It is very easy to say of them that they do not afford sufficient wages to their employees. But look, for instance, at the ovation which was tendered the other day to Mr. Edwards by his employees at Rockland, and at what they say concerning the wages paid to them. Odium was cast on Mr. Edwards in regard to this matter in the other House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Because he burns his saw-dust?

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The same applies to the men at the Chaudière—we have no reason to think that they are different. The using of such language in regard to such gentlemen reminds me of the practice at the bar which has become now, I am glad to say, almost obsolete, and that is that when a gentleman at the bar has no other valid argument he resorts to the unwholesome practice of abusing the opposite counsel. That seems to have been the method adopted in this case. There is a grand old Roman maxim the spirit of which I trust will be justified and receive its further exemplification and endorsement at the hands of this honourable House in dealing with this vexed question. It contains just four words: fiat justitia, ruat cælum—"Let justice be done though the heavens should fall," and let me add, though a residuum be left in the Ottawa and some of our other Canadian rivers.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The question has been debated and a great deal of evidence brought forward, but I regard the matter that is now before the House in the light of class legislation. The bill that is now brought down is evidently introduced in the interest of a certain number of lumbermen who control the large lumbering interests. In debating this question it has almost altogether been confined to its probable effect upon the lumbermen of the Ottawa River, and the injury that is being inflicted upon the Ottawa River itself, and, therefore, when I speak of the question in regard to the Ottawa, I speak of a subject which has been the subject of debate in this House during the past four or five years, and has also been the subject of investigation by a committee of the Senate as far back as the session of 1888. In that respect, I say the question before the House is one of class legislation. There are two interests involved: one, the interest of the few lumbermen who control the industry upon the Ottawa; the other, a great public interest, a large portion of which is centered in the question of the fisheries and the navigation, which come under the purview of the Marine and Fisheries Department. I always listen with pleasure to my hon. friend from Pictou, but he has shown on this occasion a very earnest advocacy of class legislation, to which I have a decided objection when it is conceived in that spirit. We are here for the protection of the public interests and to judge honestly what is best for the permanent interests of all. The lumbermen are quite capable of protecting themselves. The hon. member from Rideau has quoted from the evidence taken before a committee of the House in the session of 1888. We have had evidence presented to us by the hon. member from Pictou representing a committee convened by the lumbermen themselves.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—A committee convened by the lumbermen themselves—what do you mean?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The representations advanced by the lumbermen themselves—what the hon. gentleman has been reading. The hon. member has been reading the case desired to be presented to this House by the lumbermen themselves.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Part of it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And part of it is the evidence of Mr. Sandford Fleming, the engineer whom they employed to take soundings and make a report on their behalf. I understand a report was made by an engineer employed by the government on behalf of the public. That report, as I understand, has never made its appearance before this House, although it has been called for. We have never had an opportunity of knowing what report the government engineer made, and we can only suppose that it is opposed to Mr. Sandford Fleming's report and has been withheld in the same interest that this bill is now being brought before Parliament. Now the bill that has been brought before this House is to rescind legislation that was passed last year. It is for the purpose of rescinding legislation which was the culmination of all the reports that has been made upon the floor of the House in regard to this question, commencing with the committee that made its report in 1888, quoted by my hon. friend from Rideau Division, and the efforts that he and others have made continually from time to time in order to give effect to the report of that committee. Last year when the legislation was before this House, the hon. member from Ottawa took an entirely different ground from the ground he has taken to-day. In fact, he would appear to me to be something like the counsel into whose hands a brief was put and got up and made his remarks in regard to the brief; when the attorney looked on with astonishment and said: "Why, you are arguing on the wrong side," and he immediately changed and said, "Yes, that is what my opponent is going to say, now, I will give you the other side." That is the position the hon. gentleman from Ottawa has assumed in this House, and in doing so, he has assumed with the government, to legislate for the class as against the public interest. Both sides of the House are to blame because the influences of the lumbermen are of such a character that they propose to ignore the public interest in the matter, and have advanced reasons why legislation should take place in their particular interest because they control such large interests, and therefore should not be interfered with. They propose to ignore the evidence that has been brought forward before the committee that was appointed, I will just read you one clause from the report in 1888 which says:

Your committee are of opinion that it is established beyond question that extensive deposits of saw-dust and other mill refuse exist in the Ottawa River, from the Chaudière Falls to the head of the Grenville Canal, and that these constitute a very serious and steadily increasing interference with public rights of navigation, which has already become seriously obstructed, and must at no distant period, if immediate measures are not taken to arrest the evil, become irretrievably destroyed.

That is one clause in the report. After a careful discussion of the matter, after evidence of engineers and of the lumbermen themselves, after evidence of a varied character, that was the report of the committee that was brought down at that time. Following up that report, following up the efforts that were made by the hon. gentleman from the Rideau Division, legislation was brought down last year to say that the lumbermen must make some arrangement in order to stop the putting of saw-dust into the river. Now what do we hear the hon.

member from Pictou say? He said: "We have only a few more years of lumbering, and therefore for the few years we have left of lumbering in the Ottawa, you had better let us alone and not hamper us."

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That is not my position.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Those are the words.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I said they had been claiming that this was such a manifest injury that in a very short time the channel would fill up and all the other evils accrue that had been spoken of. Now, for years past the causes have been existent which according to their view of the matter should produce that effect and have not produced it, and these conditions are lessening each year. The trade is less and the saws are thinner, and there is less saw-dust thrown in the river and less chance of all those things coming to pass.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—He says the evil is lessening in consequence of the decrease of the trade. All I can say is, I regret very much indeed to hear that being put forth on behalf of the lumbermen. I think myself, that it is not correct. I have great faith in the lumbering industries of Canada. I am quite aware that a great deal of the lumbering in the past has of necessity been carried on with a good deal of recklessness. There has been a large amount of waste; but because that has taken place in the past, there is no reason why we should sit down and say: "The forest is being cut down. It is being burned over and very soon there will be no more lumbering." I say, if the lumbermen put forward that plea, we should without doubt take some stringent measures in order to try and obviate such a condition of affairs. In European countries, they require that a tree shall be planted for every tree that is cut down; if a tree is cut down another tree shall be put in its place for the use of future generations, and it may not only be necessary for us to impose such restrictions upon the lumbermen of Canada not only in regard to the question of saw-dust that is now before us, but we may be obliged to impose such restrictions as will revive the forests that are now being destroyed by fires and by the recklessness of the lumbermen's axe, in order to preserve the magnificent wealth that has so long helped to sustain the country and that will help to sustain it in the future to a very great extent if ordinary precautions are taken. There is another view that must not be lost sight of and that is the destruction of our forests in its effect upon the rain fall, the watershed of our great lakes is apparently failing to maintain the depth of water in them, it is worth while to inquire how far that is due to the absence of moisture through the denudation of our forests. Now, hon. gentlemen, what are we asking the lumbermen to do in criticising this bill? We are merely asking them to change the condition of their mills so that, instead of letting the saw-dust carelessly and recklessly slide through on top of the wheels, they may change their carriers and carry that saw-dust to where it will be destroyed, or utilized so that it will not be inflicting upon navigation or upon the fishing interest, or upon the safety of the Ottawa River itself. Now, according to the report of the committee, the lumbering on the Ottawa is conducted by Messrs. Bronson & Weston, Mr. Booth, Mr. Eddy, Perley & Pattie, Mr. Hurdman and Mr. Grier—six lumbermen. Between them, according to their report, they manufacture 365,000,000 feet of lumber. At $10 a thousand that represents a value of $3,650,000. That is the receipts of the lumbermen from the manufacture of lumber in the city of Ottawa. Every hon. gentleman who knows anything about lumbering is aware of the fact that at the very least there is a difference of 25 cents between the cost of manufacturing lumber in a water mill and the cost of manufacturing it in a steam mill, and on the 365,000,000 feet of lumber that is manufactured here according to this report, there is a saving of at least $100,000 a year in consequence of its being manufactured by the water power of the Chaudière, and that saving is enormous as compared with the cost that the lumbermen would incur in order to change the condition of their mills to keep the saw-dust out of the river. Now, hon. gentlemen, the question is merely one of cost, merely one of money. The $3,650,000 I put at a low estimate as the receipts of those six firms, and it is a question how far we are justified in calling upon them to apportion a part of their expenditure in order to get rid of this nuisance, or whether we shall allow them to go on and perpetuate the nuisance in the river irrespective of what their receipts are.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You do not mean their net receipts?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, gross receipts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Tell us what it costs to get out the lumber.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The profit of the lumberman has not been in the manufacture; it has gone to the limits. The wealth of the lumbermen is entirely in the limits. I might compare it to the issue of bonds by railway companies, or corporations that receive their corporate powers from Parliament. They add to their wealth by the increase of bonds and stocks which enable them to draw dividends. In the same way the wealth of the lumberman has been in the increase in the value of the limits. The interest, of course, on the value of the limit has to be added to the cost of manufacturing the lumber, but those are the receipts, at $10 a thousand on 365,000,000 feet. Now, could not a small portion of that $3,650,000 be devoted to removing this grievance which hon. gentlemen know has been a grievance year after year coming before Parliament? The question we have to decide is how far we are justified in imposing that restriction. I say, hon. gentlemen, that the bill that is now before us should be modified so that the lumbermen will understand that they have, within a definite period, to make such alterations, and to make such arrangements. I am not speaking of it from any feeling against the lumbermen; but there is the dignity of Parliament to be maintained. Last year we found it necessary to put this law upon the statute-book, and the lumbermen were brought face to face with the fact that they must comply with that condition. Instead of doing so they exert their influence and bring such pressure to bear on the government and the leader of the Opposition in this House that they now propose to relieve them. I say the dignity of Parliament has been interfered with.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Where is the information?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Information is published in this book—it is all published here.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—But the more recent information?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I heard the evidence that the hon. gentleman read, and I do not see that there is anything in it which would justify us in saying, "We will relinquish the Ottawa River to the will and wish of the lumbermen of the Chaudière." We must not resign our position as guardians of the public interest, and we have to consider how far the public interest should be guarded? According to this bill that is now before the House, we are called upon to rescind the legislation of last year and to put in a clause giving the lumbermen two years more. When two years more come round, the same fight will have to be gone over again, and the same reasons will be advanced, the same influence exerted and the public interest will be entirely ignored. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia said, "Where are the petitions? Where are the people asking for this protection?" I acknowledge that where interests are so vast as those of the lumber trade of the Chaudière, where so many men are employed by lumbering firms that it would be a very difficult matter indeed either by the board of trade, with the merchants, with the employees, or anybody else, to get up a petition and present it to Parliament that would necessitate an expenditure of this kind. But we should not be guided by that; we should be guided by our own common sense. Is there an injury being done? Have we evidence before us that that injury is being done? That evidence is put before us in the shape of the report of a committee of the Senate, and I say we should pay attention to what has been presented to us in that report, and modify this bill so far that it will leave no doubt upon the minds of the lumbermen that this state of affairs has to come to a termination at some time or other. As I have already stated they have great advantages. The advantage they possess in manufacturing their lumber by water power instead of steam, is at the very least 25 cents a thousand, if not 50 cents a thousand, and what they have been paying to the government for the use of the water power is merely nominal—$80 a year for a privilege that $75,000 was paid for by the Electric Light Company.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—To whom?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To one of the lumbermen. I am told that it was $75,000 that was paid by the Electric Light Co. for the same privilege that the government has accorded the lumbering firms for $80 per annum. There are 21 water lots, the rental of each being $80 per annum. They have the benefit of manufacturing their lumber at the very lowest possible cost by water power, and I do not think they should come before Parliament and ask to be released from obligations which are really obligations in the public interest. In the River Otonabee where there are large lumbering operations the law is enforced, and at an expense of about $6,000 for each mill, arrangements for the disposal of the saw-dust were made to the great satisfaction of the city of Peterboro' and now to the lumbermen themselves. After the repeated efforts made in this honourable House, since I have been here, to overcome and obviate this difficulty, I think this bill should convey an intimation to the lumbermen of Ottawa that a period must be fixed at which they shall change the condition under which they manufacture their lumber in order to get rid of the grievance which has been brought before this House on so many occasions, and devise some means to utilize the saw-dust for merchantable purposes. I believe a good railway tie prepared in coal tar might be made by hydraulic pressure, possessing great lasting properties, out of this saw-dust.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I do not rise to make a speech at this late hour of the evening, because the question has been so well threshed out already. I myself do not believe that saw-dust is good food for fish, nor do I believe that it is good manure for land, nor do I believe that the navigation of the Ottawa is improved by the saw-dust. Certainly its esthetic appearance, as my hon. friend from York said, is not improved by the saw-dust, but there are countervailing advantages. It appears to me the advantages derived from these saw-mills are very much greater than any of the drawbacks which have been stated here. This bill calls for a discontinuance of the nuisance, or grievance, in two years from the present time. In the meantime, do not think the public interest will suffer in the least if we wait for another couple of years before putting the mill owners to the expense of making changes which will involve the reconstruction of their mills and that cannot well be done short of two years. I do not think it is wise to pass legislation which may be found impracticable, or which may be injurious to private interests. It is perfectly clear that the public interests are not going to suffer by this Bill and I shall vote for it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I agree with the statement that nothing of greater importance than the preservation of our rivers and streams could engage the attention of this House. To maintain them as the great arteries of commerce is worthy even of more consideration than we have given this matter. The question is one largely of a scientific nature. The action of rivers on the country is of two kinds, chemical and mechanical. With the chemical action of rivers in dissolving certain substances in their course to the ocean or the lakes into which they empty, we are not so much concerned; but we are largely interested in their mechanical action. One of these is the transportation of the matters more or less solid which are conveyed by them to different parts. The influence which they exert on the climate of the country in this way is very great, as you will see if you give attention to any of the large rivers of India, or South America, or this country. The velocity or volume of water which passes through the river has a great deal to do with it, so much so that one is not astonished to find the enormous amount of solid material which can be borne along by a current of a certain velocity. I find from observations made in India, and in America that a current flowing at the rate of half a mile an hour will carry a great deal of sand—that it will convey sand as large as linseed, and that a current with a velocity of two miles an hour will carry large pebbles. Now, if you will apply this argument to the velocity of the Ottawa River you can easily understand how light matter, such as saw-dust, can be readily borne beyond even the termination of the river. So much is this the case, that you will remember in the account of the voyage of the "Challenger," when 200 or 300 miles from land they brought up debris and land detritus from a depth of fifteen hundred fathoms. That gives one an idea of the great distance to which this stuff is borne, as well as the enormous quantity of it. Taking the saw-dust, I am not surprised to find that the scientific observations made by probably the greatest engineer in the country, Sandford

Fleming, have borne out this theory. He found that on the bed rock there was no sign of deposit or sawdust, and that is of course the place where, beyond all others, we should find this deposit, if it was any obstruct on. The ice also has a great deal to do with removing this rubbish. The ice formed in the winter, carries it along in the break up in the spring a great distance from the point where it was first deposited. But that, hon. gentlemen, would be of insignificant consequence if these deposits were noxious and capable of polluting the stream and destroying not only fish life, but scattering disease broadcast through this land. Now such is not the case. No one pretends that the decrease of fish is due to saw-dust. Any man may challenge that statement, because proof cannot be furnished. It is true the sawdust may interfere, not with the fish themselves, but with the other fish which they live on. It may have some injurious effect on them, but it cannot be said that the fish have been destroyed by saw-dust. The hon. Premier stated some time before the session opened that he remembered the time, and I did too, when large numbers of fish were taken from the Bay of Quinté and the shore of Lake Ontario, immense numbers of whitefish and other valuable fish, where there are none now. So that I do not think this decrease can be ascribed to the effect of the saw-dust. Another argument that has been used is that explosions occur. What struck me as singular about the explosions is that they occur in winter. If these were due to mephitic or injurious gases generated in the beds of saw-dust, as they are supposed to be—although it is only a statement without any proof—why would they not occur in the heated time?

Hon. Mr. POWER—So they do.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, certainly.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I have been told they occur only in winter. I challenge any one to show that there was any such explosion in summer.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is easily proved.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—At all events, it has nothing to do with gas that would be in any way injurious to the public health. If there were, it would be due to decomposition, and I do not see how it is possible that saw-dust could decompose in such quantity as to cause an explosion. The only rational way to explain that is that the particles of air are entangled in the saw-dust and borne along with them, and being set free with the action of the water may rise at certain intervals. We find these explosions occurring in lakes where the purest water exists, from air being confined underneath and suddenly rending a vast mass of ice into pieces. I think that the grounds which have been taken in opposing this measure are not calculated to weigh. It is not shown that the saw-dust will for a moment obstruct the navigation of the stream, or that it is likely to do so, nor do I think that it pollutes the water. And as to the matter of fish, the suckers, or pike, or cat-fish, or whatever fish could be caught, are but a small measure to put in opposition to the immense disadvantage to which these gentlemen would be exposed by compelling them to destroy their saw-dust. I trust that the time will come when this waste saw-dust will be utilized, as it is by the Messrs. Rathbun, of Desoronto, and we can afford to wait till that time comes, when it can be applied to a more useful purpose. No lumberman has approached me. I have not the honour to be acquainted with any of those gentlemen, but I do not see why they should not approach us to set forth their claim. I have been told that one mill cost $75,000 and another $100,000. It was the book-keeper who gave me the information, and he told me as a positive fact that it would be impossible for them to make any arrangement without destroying their mills altogether and making new ones, thus throwing aside a vast amount of property. And as to the esthetic point, we have not heard any complaints from the people of Ottawa. If they found that injury was done to this noble river, a river which is second only in majesty to the great St. Lawrence and to which I am sure they all have an attachment as the Romans had to the yellow Tiber, do you think they would hesitate to implore the river god to put an end to the nuisance at once? But we do not find any of them making any advance to the Senate. They are not agitated about it, and the only wonder to me is that they would allow men, who have made large fortunes and by their enterprise and ability are lifting Ottawa to a high position, to be thwarted in their enterprise which is scattering money broadcast for the general benefit of the community.

Hon. Mr. WARK.—We are much indebted to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, who gave us some information which no other Senator was possessed of—that is as to the effect of the currents. The currents will bear out the sawdust, but whenever it meets an eddy the sawdust will turn into the eddy and sink there, no doubt. At the same time that does not affect the navigation; it would rather improve it. In some rivers we build wing-dams to confine the current to a narrow space, so as to improve the channel and the navigation, and if the sawdust settles in those eddies around the edges of the river, and narrows the current, it must benefit the navigation instead of injuring it. Now as to fish, there has been no proof in the evidence adduced here to show that fish have ever been killed by sawdust. We know that in some rivers in England the deleterious substances that were allowed to drift into the rivers have killed the fish when they came in contact with them. They were found floating dead in the current. Where has a fish ever been seen in the Ottawa River in that state? Let any man get up a stir here in Ottawa about the sewage that is discharged from the sewers into the river; compare the quantity now discharged with the quantity from Bytown, when there were more fish in the river than there are now. Let him bring witnesses before the committee to show how much stuff of all kinds drifts into the sewers here, bring others to show the quantity that is discharged, bring scientific men to ask them if this will kill fish, and you will get up a stronger case against the sewers discharging into the river than has been got up by those who are opposing the millowners and their industries. I know that if sawdust settles where the fish are in the habit of going to spawn, they will not deposit their spawn there, because they look for a sandy or gravelly beach, and if saw-dust drifts on that beach and covers up the gravel, very soon they will not go to it. I know where the herring are in large numbers and are caught by the people coming in on the bank, if a breeze of wind sets in on the shore they head round and go off to the coast of Prince Edward Island. There is nothing wrong with that, but the wind setting in drives them out of the place where they were preparing to spawn. I am satisfied that the government have done right in deferring the subject, and they should be in possession of positive proof that injury is done before they interfere with such a beneficial industry as these mills are carrying on. We hear of their interests as one thing and the public interests as another thing. Let any one go to the public in Ottawa here and ask them how much injury is done them by the sawdust in the river, how much they are benefited by the expenditure of these public spirited men, and I think you will find that the feeling of a majority of the public will be largely in favour of letting these men prosecute their industries until there is some satisfactory proof that they are doing an injury.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I should like to say a word on one or two questions which I think have not been appreciated by members of this House. A careful estimate has been made by the millowners who claim it will cost them a million and a quarter dollars to change their mills to consume the sawdust. It is all very well to discuss this question on the basis that we can arrange this and can arrange that, but you must realize how severely you are touching the pockets of those men who are at present controlling the largest interests probably in Canada. In addition to this first expenditure, there will be an approximate expenditure of $100,000 annually. Now there is that additional tax on them, and that will cause a reduction of the wages of the men. The hon. gentleman from Shell River has spoken once or twice rather indifferently with reference to those few lumbermen. Does the hon. gentleman remember that there are upwards of eighteen thousand men employed in that industry upon the Ottawa, and that eighteen thousand at an estimate of five to the family, or if we take Sir James Grant's estimate of the powers of sawdust we may make it ten, represents 90,000 mouths that are fed by the industry.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What amount of wages will be lost to the men during the time the mills are idle?

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I could not answer the question.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—You can guess at it?

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—No, I could not make a guess.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—You have made some outrageous guesses already, and you could make another.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I give figures that are handed me by parties that are better acquainted with these matters than my hon. friend, the junior member for Halifax. The probabilities are he is very much more familiar with other things than with the lumber interest. I mention these facts because I presume they are facts which come from a reliable source, and we must not forget that some of these properties have been in the hands of the present owners, or have been in existence, for 50 or 60 years, and naturally they feel that they have vested rights and that they should be considered before calling upon them to meet an expenditure of a million and a quarter. There is one point more I want to call your attention to, and that is this, they contribute towards the income of Ontario and Quebec $650,000 annually in stumpage.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I am perhaps less interested in the bill than any hon. gentleman in the House. There are no saw-mills in our country, and our rivers are not polluted, but I always like to give a fair and intelligent vote on any matter which comes up in this House, and I have listened to the argument advanced by the several gentlemen in support of the bill and they go further than the bill does to my mind. All the arguments so far have been that the sawdust did no damage and that the river was not made shallower by the deposits of mill refuse, and that the saw-dust does not affect the fish. This bill is only asking an extension of two years, and then the saw-dust is to cease. If the argument of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of the bill is of any value at all, I think the time for limitation should be extended or wiped out altogether, and sawdust should be allowed for ever to be deposited in the river or the practice should be stopped. That would be the common sense of it in my mind. And there is another matter; I am not excessively modest, but I declare I would have a little modesty about supporting a bill that would permit the deposit of saw-dust in the Ottawa and other large rivers, when the practice is prohibited on small streams. If it injures the small streams, how much more will it injure the Ottawa, where there are millions of feet of lumber manufactured? I am not interested in the question. I do not care a halfpenny which side prevails, but there is a principle of common sense involved. I do not wish to reflect on the intelligence of hon. gentlemen, but if the saw-dust does not hurt the river why have it limited to two years? Why not have it continue for ever? We have those large lumber mills and lumber yards. There is no doubt they are a credit to the country and to the men who own them, but they are not philanthropists, they are not doing it for my benefit or yours, and they are amassing millions out of the industry. However, I will say this: Just change the bill and let all lumbermen come on the same footing and I am for it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—It applies to them all.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, it embraces them all.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—But as long as you keep it confined to a few rich men I could not conscientiously vote for it and I will not.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That is what the bill is; it applies to all rivers and streams.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—The hon. gentleman from Hamilton has adverted to this matter as one of vested interest. It seems to me that when a government is dealing with a matter of this sort the question of vested interests is paramount to everything else. The government stood by for half a century and more; they saw those people invest their moneys, invest their fortunes in developing that interest. Can the Government of to-day say to those people "We shall cut off the privileges which once were yours"? The question of a vested interest is one peculiarity for the government; it stands by, it sees men invest their fortunes; they know that that was one of the privileges that induced those people to settle as they did on the borders of the Ottawa. Can they to-day go and say to them: "We will divest you of that interest; we will injure the property that we enabled you to build; we will cause you either to pull down your mills, remove them, or spend so much money upon them as will render it unprofitable to maintain them"? It cannot be done; no government could stand by such an act, and when the government comes forward with this measure they are doing all that can be asked of them in reason. Now as to all the evidence of injury to the Ottawa, I have listened to it in all its details and I say, knowing Mr. Sandford Fleming as I do, knowing his disinterestedness and his high reputation, I take his evidence as against ten times as much as that produced before the committee. What can a committee say about the effect of the saw-dust on the river? Mr. Sandford Fleming pledges his professional standing that he has sounded the river from the Chaudière to Grenville, every mile.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He does not say anything of the sort; it was his son who took the soundings.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—He says he did it himself, and that the son did a share of it under his immediate direction, and if he does it by his son, or by another engineer under his direction, that is a sounding by himself just as though he had held the plummet in his hand. We know that. Mile after mile he did his sounding, and he states what he found in the bed of the river. He gives what he found in the whole longitudinal line in which navigation is conducted, and he says in the whole of that there is no obstruction by saw-dust. He brings from the bottom the material he finds there without sawdust, without any debris, nothing but the native earth or clay. He shows the vast depth there is in the great Ottawa, but really when it comes to one point which, he states, is at low water reduced to 7 feet, that is the capacity, for navigation purposes, of the Ottawa. Does any man say that over that 7 feet there is any saw-dust or lumber debris lessening its depth? No man has produced evidence of that kind, and if he does not, the 7 feet is, for navigation purposes, the depth of the Ottawa. Just as the weakest link is the strength of the chain, so is the least depth the sailing capacity of the river. When I speak of the character of Mr. Fleming I had an opportunity of working with him for years. I was chairman of the Wharf and Harbour Committee in Toronto for the corporation, and Mr. Fleming was city engineer at the time, and I am prepared since then, watching his whole career, to say that I do not know a man in any country more thorough and independent or careful of his professional standing. I need not say that, because the country at large is aware of it. He has maintained for himself a reputation which is as dear to him as his own life, and about which there can be no doubt, and when he tells us that mile after mile he sounded that stream, and that no obstruction to navigation has been caused or is caused by the mill refusal, and that if it came as it has been coming into the river for 2,000 years to come there would be no interruption to navigation, and when you put that evidence alongside of the evidence before our committee of men who never dropped a plummet into a stream, who know nothing about it except what somebody told them, and who see the sawdust floating on the surface of the water, believing it must sink sometime and therefore be an obstruction, the evidence of these men is worth nothing compared to the opinion of a professional man like Sandford Fleming. I would therefore say that the government are right in this matter. I have had no member of the government speak to me about it, nor am I too much inclined to give the government its way, except where I see they intend to do what is right. Since the day I entered this House I can put my hand on my breast and say that I never gave a vote in any matter except on the merits of it; whether it came from the government or the opposition makes no difference to me. There is no evidence in opposition to the evidence of Mr. Fleming, and his evidence is clear that there is no obstruction by sawdust in the stream excepting at the mouth of the canal which has been cured more than once by dredging, and can be cured again at the cost of the parties who cause it, and that seems to be quite fair. We should not go madly to work to break up a moneyed interest such as the lumbering business on the Ottawa is. Because capital is fretful and must be guarded, and it is for us, at all events, to see that we would lay not a hand upon it that would hurt it unless upon the clearest evidence that it is doing some injury to the river and to the public interest. On account of its being a vested interest, on the ground of the evidence being clear that there is no obstruction from sawdust, and on the ground that there is only a small matter to be taken out by excavation at the mouth of the canal from time to time, and desiring not to interfere with an interest so large as the lumbering interest, I am quite prepared to go all the length the government want to go, to keep things in the state they are until there is lots of time given to come to a more deliberate and exhaustive opinion upon the whole condition of things than we now have.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF THREE RIVERS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (113) "An Act to amend chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1892, respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Three Rivers." He said: This is a bill of only four lines, and reads as follows:—

Section 6 of chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1892, entitled: "An Act respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Three Rivers," is hereby repealed, and the following substituted therefor.

The substitution is as follows:—

No loan shall be effected and no debentures shall create any lien or charge on the said harbour until the said commissioners have paid to the Government of Canada the sum of $15,000.

The bill is short, but it gives to the commissioners of the harbour of Three Rivers an advantage which they do not possess at present, and consequently is of some importance. The explanation is brief. The change to be made is in section 6 of the Act of 1892. By this Act the harbour commissioners of Three Rivers were authorized to borrow money to the extent of $218,000 for the purpose of purchasing wharf or beach property, or for constructing wharf or other accommodations for vessels in the harbour, and debentures representing the money so borrowed were to take precedence of a sum of $82,000 of debentures then and now held by the Government of Canada; but by section 6 no loan was to be effected and no debentures to create a lien upon the harbour until the commissioners had paid to the Government of Canada the amount of interest then due and unpaid on the $82,000 above referred to. By the Act of 1885, chapter 76, authorizing the loan to the commissioners by the Government of Canada of $82,000, the bonds to be deposited by the commissioners to secure the loan were to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum payable half yearly, such interest to be a first lien on the income of the harbour, and the commissioners were also to pay each half year to the Minister of Finance one-half of 1 per cent as a sinking fund towards the redemption of the debentures. The amount due the Government of Canada on the 30th June, 1892, was making a total indebtedness in 1892 to the government, of interest and sinking fund, of $23,386.67, and the amount which will be due on the 30th June, 1895, will be interest $30,479.24, and sinking fund $8,751.82, making a total indebtedness to the government at the present moment of $39,231.06. This bill provides that the loan is not to be effected and the debentures are not to create any charge or lien on the harbour until the commissioners have paid to the Government of Canada the sum of $15,000. It simply means in plain English that the dues collected on that harbour very little more than pay the current expenses and the improvements and the repairs, or the wear and tear. They come to the government and say in effect: Unless you enable us to issue these bonds which you have in your possession, and which we were precluded and have been precluded from issuing until we paid the government a certain sum of money, the improvements cannot go on, and we shall, in other words, become bankrupt. Under the circumstances, it was deemed advisable to allow them to sell their debentures if they will pay over $15,000 of their indebtedness before doing so.

Interest.....	$17,905 15

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And the other part is cancelled?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The same thing.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Not cancelled.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there any shipping in that port?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may state further that by Order in Council dated 19th November, 1892, the Harbour Commissioners were authorized to raise, by issue of debentures, $40,500, the arrangement being that the debentures so issued were to be deposited with the Minister of Finance, who on receipt of the purchase money agreed upon by the commissioners and the purchaser will deliver the debentures sold and pay over to the commissioners the amount, after deducting the amount due to the government as interest at that time. The debentures so issued were accordingly deposited with the Minister of Finance and are still held in the department. I can give the House, if it desires it, a statement of the receipts and expenditures. It is simply a question as to whether the government will get that $15,000 or, I might say, nothing at all, and I think it is much better we should have the $15,000.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (122) "An Act to amend the General Inspection Act." He said: At present the Inspection Act provides for the appointment of inspectors and for levying of certain fee—one-sixth of a cent for each one hundred pounds of wheat—payable to the inspector. The income of the inspector at certain ports has become so large at, for instance, Fort William and one or two other places, that it has been deemed advisable to change the law fixing salaries instead of allowing them to take the full amount of fees now imposed. The Senate will see the necessity for that when I inform them that last year the receipts at Fort William exceeded $10,000 upon the inspection of wheat and other grains that came to that port and were shipped east. About $3,000 of that the inspector had to pay for assistance, leaving him an actual salary of six or seven thousand dollars per annum.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is not too much, for it is very hard work.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a great deal better than many officers receive in many other parts of the country. However, the government think that that is an unnecessarily large sum for the time that is occupied during the year for the inspection of grain. They propose by this bill to enable them to fix his salary, and when the income exceeds that amount, it passes to the credit of the Receiver General. The only change made by the bill before me in the Act on the statute book is the addition of the following words in section a of subsection 3, "reducing and" so that it will read "reducing and amending the fees." That is, it will enable them to reduce the rate of one-sixth of a cent. Then, in subsection b these words are added, "and the consolidated revenue fund." It enables the government to fix the salaries, and when they exceed the sums fixed, the money then passes to the credit of the Receiver General.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not think this bill meets the purpose stated by the Premier. It still contemplates that they shall be paid by fees, and deals with the apportionment of the fees. If the government desire that the inspector should be placed on a salary it should be expressly stated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not necessary. They can fix the amount of fees he is to receive, and no more. If you compare this bill with the Act which it amends, you will find that it carries out fully the intention. It is drawn by a lawyer and he ought to know.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is one reason why it should be carefully looked to.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—You do not fix the salary of the official now?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do not think it right to have a man paid by fees if he collects enough, and if he collects more than that he gets just a salary. If you are going to put him on a salary you should do that and pay him and let the government take the fees. Now, if he does not collect enough fees to make up that salary he has got to live on the fees, and if he gets more than that the government takes it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is it.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is very much like "heads I win, tails you lose."

Hon. Mr. POWER—He will get more until the Hudson Bay Railway is built and then he will get less.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—The government should put him on a salary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The fairest way is, as stated in the bill, to pay him according to the work he does. If the work is largely in excess of the amount calculated, it brings the salary up to too large a sum. Just as in Ontario, to-day, it was found in many places such as Toronto that the fees of the registrar's office ran up to $10,000 or $15,000. The government very properly interfered and said after the fees exceed $8,000 or $10,000 the balance goes into the county funds. There are only two or three points in Canada where the inspection fees are in excess—Fort William is one—of $5,000 and above that sum it should go into the consolidated revenue fund.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That does not meet my objection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where the work is one-fourth as much, the salary ought not to be more than $1,000.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—How then is a man to live in that way? He has got to stay there the whole year if he only earned $100.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The sliding scale is adopted everywhere.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—If a man has to be there all the season, and the grain is coming in during the winter in cars as well as in summer, and if he earns $8,000 or $10,000 a year, you say it is too much. I say the fair way would be to name a salary, whatever it may be. You will never get a good man to stay there under the system that you propose, and unless you have a first-class man to inspect the wheat there, the loss through damage to the reputation of our wheat, will be ten times greater than the amount of the salary. Our wheat has been well inspected up to this time. Better pay a good salary than get a poor man at a lower figure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is irregular discussing the details of a bill on the second reading, but I may be allowed to explain that there is scarcely a month that wharfingers and harbour masters are not appointed on precisely the same principle. Sometimes it is provided that they shall receive 25 per cent, sometimes more, sometimes less, of the fees received. In other cases, they shall receive a certain percentage, until it reaches a certain sum, and then it stops. The present Act reads: "That the Governor in Council may make regulations, whenever he deems it necessary, for the apportionment of the fees paid under this Act to the inspectors and deputy inspectors, and for providing for the payment of fees to the examiners appointed under the Act by persons who present themselves for examination." The proposition is to give power to the government to reduce the fees for inspection, when they think necessary, and secondly, in the apportionment of the fees, when they exceed what the government thinks an unnecessarily large salary, to the person who performs the duty, to pay the balance into the consolidated revenue fund—in other words, that the revenue of the country shall benefit by the extension of the trade as well as the individual. I fully bear testimony to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the inspector at Fort William. Perhaps he is not excelled in Canada as a judge of wheat of all kinds, and I am quite sure if he gets a salary of $4,000 or $5,000 a year, he will be very glad to remain at Fort William.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (123) "An Act to amend the Public Works Act." He said:—This bill gives power to the public Works Department, under the authority of the Governor in Council, to dispose of property which they may have purchased for any purpose, and which is not required or perhaps not fitted to the purposes for which it was originally intended. As an illustration; some property was purchased in a town on which to construct a public building—a post office and custom-house. It was found afterwards that another location would be much better and more in the interest of those who were to be benefited by it, but on referring the question to the Minister of Justice, it was found that there was no power given to the government to dispose of the property and it was thought better, under the circumstances, that a short bill should be passed giving the power.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE moved

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that

His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all petitions praying for railway extension in Prince Edward Island. Also, the chief engineer's report thereon, showing the estimated cost, working expenses and probable earnings of said proposed branch railway; and also, the estimated increased earnings on the Prince Edward Island Railway which will be effected by the operation of the said proposed branches.

He said: I crave the indulgence of the House for a short time while I refer to some matters which affect the small province of Prince Edward Island. I shall endeavour to make my remarks as short as possible, knowing that the weather is very warm and that the Senate has been treated to a good many pretty long speeches during the present session. It must be remembered that when Prince Edward Island entered into confederation with the rest of Canada in 1873, she entered upon certain terms and conditions. With the financial terms and conditions we have no fault whatever to find. We were admitted with an assumed debt of $50 per head, an actual business transaction which was fair to Prince Edward Island as well as to the rest of Canada. In addition to that, we had a provision made to relieve us of the inconvenience and compensation for our isolation and separation from the rest of Canada during half or nearly half the year. The special clause in the Act of union which refers to this matter I shall read to the House:

The Dominion Government agreed to establish and maintain efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion winter and summer, thus placing the island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion.

That condition has never yet been fulfilled to Prince Edward Island and it is upon that resolution that the island has agitated time and again for the last twenty years for some better provision to give us communication with the rest of Canada. We know that the National Policy was introduced as an inducement for the provinces to deal with each other, and that we should concentrate our trade more within ourselves, consequently we were excluded, to some extent at least, from the markets of the world. By the isolation to which we were subject, owing to the severe winter, we were debarred from dealing with Canada for five or six months a year. To make up for the inconvenience due to our isolation this resolution was embodied in our terms of union. From that time to the present we have, in a moderate and modest way, asked the Dominion Government and Parliament to take this matter into consideration and carry out in good faith the terms of union; they have done so only to a very limited extent, so much so that here a few years ago the question was submitted to one of the most eminent engineers of the world, Sir Douglas Fox, of London, and we were furnished with the report of that gentleman estimating what the cost would be and the possibility of establishing communication by way of a tunnel between the island and the mainland. I may just here refer to Sir Douglas Fox's report to show the reasonable proposition which he suggested, and I believe that the cost of the tunnel is not by any means beyond the resources of Canada. I believe once that communication was established it would be very nearly, if not quite, a paying institution. The great amount of traffic that would be conveyed across the strait through the tunnel would largely meet the interest of the cost to the government. Unfortunately for Prince Edward Island, we have allowed party politics largely to interfere with the prosperity of our country. Had we taken the course that was followed by our friends in British Columbia to enforce the terms of union—had we buried all political considerations and united as one man for the enforcement of the terms of union, I believe we would have had some satisfactory arrangement before now to give us communication with the mainland. We know that the great undertaking, the Canadian Pacific Railway, was part of the terms of union with British Columbia, and when the time came when that undertaking should be going on, the people of that province united as one man, and insisted on representing their case before the British Government, with the result that the building of that magnificent railway from ocean to ocean was undertaken and successfully completed. Unfortunately for Prince Edward Island, politics run at a high rate down there, and if one party advocates some improvement for the benefit of the province there is always a party ready to decry it and ready to represent it as being for the purpose of party advantage and oppose it in every way they possibly can; consequently we have not had, up to the present time, that influence at Ottawa and in the country that we ought to have had on this question. I may say that

Sir Douglas Fox, if he does not stand at the head of the profession throughout the world, is regarded as one of those who stand at the head, especially in matters relating to subaqueous work. He says:—

If it were a question of passage of traffic only, this might probably be quite satisfactorily met by the construction of a tunnel having an internal diameter of 11 ft., (slightly larger in diameter than the electric subway in London which is carrying a heavy passenger traffic) and operated with special rolling stock, which could, however, be so designed as to run over the existing railways of 3 ft. 6 in. gauge in the island, so that passengers would only have one change of carriage at the New Brunswick end of the tunnel, a matter of no great importance. Such a tunnel would also accommodate freight cars of a special design suitable for all classes of ordinary traffic.

A cross section of such a tunnel showing rolling stock is given in appendix G.

I am informed that the transhipment of potatoes, eggs, and fresh fish is objectionable, especially in winter. Exposure to frost could, however, be avoided by running the main line and tunnel cars along side one another in a freight shed at Money Point, properly warmed for the purpose. By suitable arrangements, of which I have had experience elsewhere, the delay and inconvenience of transhipment can be reduced to a minimum. Against this slight inconvenience must be set the large expenditure not only upon the full sized tunnel, but also upon rolling stock of the 4 ft. 8½ in. gauge, if the island traffic is to run through to its destination, without change of car, and such through working would also in all probability involve much empty running in the absence of return freight.

Such a tunnel constructed, as shown in appendix G, in the dry portions of the work of brickwork in cement averaging one-sixth inch thickness (the bricks being of local manufacture) and where feeders occur with cast-iron casing 1¼ in. in thickness with 6-inch flanges laid with permanent way, having steel rails weighing 50 lbs. to the lineal yard, I estimate to cost, subject as hereinbefore mentioned, £66, 10s. nearly per lineal yard, or say £897,500 from shaft to shaft or with the land tunnel and contingencies a total sum of £1,075,200.—(at $5 to the £) $5,376,000. Should it be decided that the tunnel must be of sufficient dimensions for an ordinary railway of the 4 ft. 8½ in. gauge, and that the railways of the island shall be altered to that gauge a tunnel of 16 ft. in diameter would appear to just accommodate passenger and freight cars of the normal Canadian and American type, but not drawing room and sleeping cars, nor some of the cars reported to me as running upon the Intercolonial Railway. This size does not allow of a very satisfactory or permanent way, nor does it provide proper space for the platelayers.

In reference to this matter you are aware that the gauge of the railway at present in existence in Prince Edward Island is 3 feet 6 inches, and not 4 feet 8½ inches, like other Canadian railways, and if you have a tunnel large enough to take the cars across, as you have on this side of the water, you would have to change the whole gauge of the Prince Edward Island Railway. We think the 3 feet 6 inch gauge is sufficiently large and we could manage to transport the produce after it came across the tunnel, and on an 11 foot tunnel—something that would take the ordinary traffic of the island on a 3 feet 6 inch gauge—would be sufficiently large, and thus Sir Douglas Fox estimates the cost at $5,376,000. Now, to prove the statement I made in my opening remarks, that one party on the island has invariably done all they possibly could to upset and thwart the object of building this tunnel, I may refer to a speech made by the gentleman who is styled the leader of the Reform party, from the maritime provinces, in the House of Commons last session. I have already read you the estimate of Douglas Fox of what the tunnel will cost, and I will now read you the estimate of that eminent gentleman to whom I have referred. This is in reply to a very able speech made by Mr. Wood, the gentleman representing Westmoreland in the Commons. Mr. Davies said:

The hon. gentleman has expressed his strong belief in the feasibility of a tunnel between the island and the mainland and he only postpones its accomplishment for some 10 or 12 years. I shall not enter in to any discussion on that subject with the hon. gentleman. I think two or three things are pretty well established: one is that a tunnel to be of any service at all to the people must be of the size that would require the expenditure of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 at least. I do not think that any practical, sensible man, outside of the few who seem to be tunnel mad, are prepared to advise the small toy tunnel which several gentlemen contend could be successfully constructed at a cost of half the sum I mentioned, but which when constructed would be of very little service.

That is the opinion of that hon. gentleman as against the opinion of Sir Douglas Fox, who estimates the cost would only be $5,300,000, and I suppose it is Sir Douglas Fox that he designates as being one of those who are tunnel mad, and who does not know anything about the cost of such a work necessary for the country. Now, my object is not at the present time to dwell particularly on the tunnel. I have said all I wish to say in reference to this matter, but I thought it necessary to say this much, because a remark was made in another place that this matter had been abandoned altogether, and that the island had given up all hope or expectation or intention of prosecuting or advocating this scheme any further. I said that the financial arrangement made with Prince Edward Island was on business principles, that we were admitted into Canada as part of the confederation on a basis of coming in with a debt of $50 per head, which would amount to the same sum per head that the debt of Canada was at that time, when you add to it the proposed debt, or contemplate expenditure that would have to be made on the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the canals up to that time, amounting to some $43,000,000. At that time the subsidizing of railways throughout Canada was not a part of the policy of the government of the day. It was understood, and I think it was embodied in a resolution, or, if not, the terms of union were, that no subsidy would be granted to railways excepting to such as connected two or more provinces together, such as the Intercolonial Railway. Some years passed by and Parliament found it necessary to subsidize railways in different provinces of the Dominion to the amount at first, I think, of something like $3,200 per mile, and afterwards considerably above that sum, and in several cases afterwards the whole cost of the railway was undertaken by the Dominion Government. On this matter, I may say, that I find by a list in my hands, that the cash subsidies to railways, divided into provinces, amount to the following:

Ontario, 43 railways subsidized by the Dominion Government, embracing.....	1,663.34 miles.
Quebec, 46.....	2,136.52 do
New Brunswick, 22.....	646 do
Nova Scotia, 14.....	482.25 do
Manitoba, —.....	100 do
British Columbia, 8.....	328 do
Prince Edward Island, railway of 3 miles, and not one dollar of it accepted or taken up.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The government built your road.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am thankful to my hon. friend who is so much in the habit of interrupting speakers. He has reminded me of the fact that the Government of Canada never built a mile of railway on the island, excepting the short line from Cape Traverse to the Junction. The railway was built before we entered confederation at a cost of three and one-quarter millions of dollars, and that amount was charged against the island and no one knows that better than the hon. member from Halifax. The railway was wholly built by the people of Prince Edward Island themselves. That has been proved over and over again, and particularly so by the hon. gentleman who is now a member of the government from Prince Edward Island. In the case of the three miles provided for here, the vote was passed, but nobody took it up, because no company would take up three miles of road with any expectation of making it pay. The only way the railway can be made to pay in Prince Edward Island is by the owner of the main line building the branches as well. In addition to the railways I have enumerated, which have been aided by subsidies from the Dominion Government, the Dominion having built since confederation in addition to the Intercolonial Railway and the assistance given to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the following roads: The St. Charles Branch, Rivière du Loup Branch, Dalhousie Branch, Indian Town Branch, Oxford and New Glasgow Railway, Pictou Town Branch, Darnmouth Branch, Annapolis and Digby Railway, Cape Breton Railway and Cape Traverse Branch.

This last, eleven miles in length, is in Prince Edward Island and was built for the purpose of attempting to carry out, to some extent, the terms of union so as to give us access to the crossing at Cape Traverse for the winter route. It cost the Dominion Government $120,745. You will remember that the hon. gentleman, who is now a member of the government from Prince Edward Island, last session went very fully into the claims of the island for public works to be constructed there. There is no necessity to go into the figures on this occasion, but he proved our case very conclusively; there is not a member of either branch of Parliament who has undertaken to refute the arguments and statements advanced on that occasion, and we must take it for granted that it is because they cannot be refuted. He showed that if we had our proportionate share, according to population, there would have been $2,000,000 spent for railway extension or other public works in Prince Edward Island to place her on an equal footing with the same number of people in all the rest of Canada. I may say that speech was read from one end of the island to the other, and the hopes and expectations of the people were revived, because this question had been agitated for many years in the island, particularly the project of a railway on the south side of the Hillsboro' River leading from Southport to Murray Harbour. Not long afterwards they were delighted to find that the hon. gentleman who had delivered that speech was admitted to the council board as a member of the government. After that, the people felt themselves justified in calling meetings throughout the different sections of the country to discuss this question, and the hon. gentleman was invited to attend those meetings, as I was also myself, and we did attend them. The hopes and expectations of the people were raised to fever heat, not by those meetings, but from the hope that the fair and reasonable arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman might have weight with the government. I might say that there is an absolute necessity for railway communication in Prince Edward Island. You are aware, as I have already stated, that navigation closes in the month of December. Our harvest takes place in the month of October, and shipping is not commenced to any extent before the middle of October, and we have only two weeks in October and the month of November to ship away all the produce of the island. It is then a wet season and the soil of Prince Edward Island is such that in the fall of the year the roads are almost impassable. The carting of the farmers' produce cuts down to the very axles and it is almost impossible for a horse to take half a load over those roads at that season of the year, and there is a greater necessity for railway accommodation for the benefit of the country than in almost any other section of the Dominion of the same extent. I may say, too, that road making is a much more serious question there than in any other part of Canada. We have no hard stone for macadamizing. The little stone that is there is soft sandstone, which in a short time is ground by the traffic into sand and becomes no better than the ordinary soil. In advocating the building of these branches—and I may say that the demand is a very reasonable and moderate one—we are asking for some seven different branches. They can scarcely be called branches—the run from three to seven miles, the whole together amounting to only 105 miles. This matter has been brought up in the House of Commons and the Chief Engineer, Mr. Schreiber, who is well qualified to give an estimate of the cost (I think he had the contract for building the main line and is well acquainted with the whole country) stated that the 105 miles will not cost more than $1,100,000. He estimates the earnings of these several branches to amount to more than would cover the working expenses and leave something like $5,000 of a surplus over the working expenses towards paying interest on the capital expended. He has given no estimate of the increased traffic upon the Prince Edward Island road as it exists to-day. I am not an engineer, but I can form some opinion of what the increase of traffic will be, and it appears to me not unreasonable to suppose that there will be an increase of traffic on the Prince Edward Island Railway to cover every dollar of the interest on the cost of building the branches. Consequently the burden on the people of Canada will not amount to one cent—it will only amount to the guarantee of the first cost of those branches.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Does the main railway pay?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—If the hon. gentleman does not know that it does not pay, I can give him the answer. It is unfortunate that it does not pay up to the present time, but by building these branches it will have a tendency to make it pay very much better than it does at the present time. These several spurs going out from the main line would touch the coast at various points where very extensive, prosperous and valuable fishing is carried on and through a splendid farming section thickly settled with well-to-do farmers. The fish would be landed at those points and taken to the most important shipping place, Charlottetown, where steamers ply every day, and in that way the increased traffic from these branches to the main line, will largely decrease, in my opinion, the loss upon working the main line.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman said he would explain why the road did not pay.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Because they have not traffic enough.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is it because the traffic is too light or the rates are too low?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—If there was more traffic it would pay better. There is no doubt about that. It has been charged by certain parties that this is merely got up for political effect—that is to have an effect upon the electorate in the forthcoming election, and that there is no intention and no expectation or hope of obtaining these branch railways at the present time or at any future time. I wish to say this—that however anxious I may be to see the present government sustained in office, believing as I do that they are the best men to erry on the affairs of this country, and the policy that they are carrying out to-day is the policy suited to this young country of ours, I am not here neither will I be a party anywhere to misleading and deluding the people for the sake of getting their votes. I want a plain honest declaration from the government, that these public works, required for Prince Edward Island and which Prince Edward Island is justly entitled to, as already proved by the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, will be undertaken by the government, and that these railways will be built in the near future. If I cannot get such an answer as that, I would prefer, rather than be a party to deceiving the people, and deceiving myself, that the government would give me a direct negative reply, and then we would know exactly what to expect. If I get such a reply it will not be because we have not a claim, nor because Prince Edward Island is not entitled to it, but simply because we have not force enough or strength enough with the government to carry out the just claims of Prince Edward Island in this regard. I say my reason for speaking of the government as highly as I do is because I believe in the National Policy introduced and carried out by the party in power to-day. When I say the National Policy, I do not mean a policy simply to encourage and protect the manufacturing industries of this country; I believe it is a policy calculated to protect and encourage not only the manufacturers, but the agriculturists, the labourers, the artisans, the miners and the fishermen. Not only that, but I believe it is a policy calculated and intended to encourage and promote the welfare of every province of the Dominion, small and large. It is true we are the smallest province, but we are not the smallest in population. The largest province in Canada—I speak of British Columbia—is yet in its infancy, as far as the development of its resources is concerned, and the time is coming, I fully believe, when that will be one of the first provinces of this Dominion. It will be the California, at least, of this country, and perhaps it will exceed all others in its wealth and natural resources. The principal branch which has been asked for from the government extends from a point right opposite Charlottetown, going down from Southport through the Belfast district and terminating at a deep water terminus at Murray Harbour South, with a cross section leading from that line to the Prince Edward Island Railway as it exists at present. That will take about 60 miles of railway. The chief engineer has recommended it and believes it will be a serviceable road. Some of our friends in the other House and political opponents say it will be no use unless you build a bridge leading across from Southport to Charlottetown, the capital of the province. I look upon the advocacy of a bridge at the present time as directly intended to defeat the whole project that we have in view. Surely a railway will be of great service that will take us within one mile of the centre of trade, and across that mile a good steam ferry is now in operation and has been in operation for years past, and in winter time the sleighs can travel backward and forward without any inconvenience. It would be unreasonable for us to expect not only these seven branches to be built, but also a bridge costing, perhaps, half a million of money. I know a bridge has been a question that has been agitated in Prince Edward Island for some time past. The people have been agitating for a common highway bridge whereby they can get to the city of Charlottetown with their horses and carriages, but the local government of the day have not felt that the resources of the island would justify them in building a bridge at the present time. At some future day the bridge will be taken up, after the branches are built in conjunction with the local government so a railway bridge and a bridge for ordinary traffic will be constructed on the one foundation; but if we never have a bridge, I say the railway from Southport down to Murray Harbour will be a great benefit to the people of that country. I know what I am speaking of, because I have lived there for thirty-five years and done business there, and I know the great necessity there is for a railway in that locality. Now, to show that even this proposition has been condemned—not exactly condemned, but cold water has been thrown upon it and obstacles have been placed in the way and difficulties have been magnified to induce the government to give a negative answer to our request—the gentleman to whom I have referred as being styled, with a great deal of assurance, the leader of the Reform party in the maritime provinces, spoke as follows on this very question a few days ago in another place :

This kind of humbug does very well among a certain class of people ; but the large mass of the people of Prince Edward Island are beginning to understand that an agitation for the construction of a public work immediately preceding an election is not likely to be genuine. Now, in this matter, for years past, before every election we have had the question of the tunnel dangled before the people's eyes. Millions would be expended on the island. People were asked not to sell their farms, because the brickclay upon them would be used to make brick.

I never heard of any such suggestion on the part of Prince Edward Island until I heard it stated within 100 yards of where I stand. And what is this said for? It is said to bring ridicule and contempt on the whole scheme, so that our claims may be pooh-poohed and laughed at, and that we may be given a negative answer by the government, and why? It is not because this gentleman has not some love for his country, but he hates the Liberal-Conservative party more.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And he would rather see his country suffer than see the benefits derived from these railways given to them by the Conservative party. Then he proceeds :

But, to use a significant expression for a time monopolized by a politician down there, the tunnel scheme has been consigned long since to the tomb of all the Capulets. None now so poor as to do it reverence.

Now, I do not think the tunnel scheme has been abandoned. I believe there are borings going on to ascertain the possibility and feasibility of that great work, and until we get a report from these investigations it would be idle for us to press the matter any further, and the question is not by any means consigned to the "tomb of all the Capulets" :

But the gentlemen from Prince Edward Island who support the government in the Senate—there are hardly any in this House—now laugh at the tunnel, and they tell the people they are going to give them railways. I fear that these petitions—if that was the purpose of those who engineered them—has pretty well squelched the railway project in Prince Edward Island. The idea of proposing a scheme for eight or ten branch railways! Why it reduces the whole thing to a farce. The agitation in Prince Edward Island for years has been the construction of one railway. These other branch roads were subsidiary; they were hoped for in time but not immediately. The only question which these gentlemen would have devoted themselves to, had they been honestly anxious to extend the railroad accommodation in Prince Edward Island was the Belfast and Murray Harbour road.

A good deal of complaint and a good deal of abuse has been heaped upon the head of the Senator from Prince Edward Island for having attended some meetings called by the public in that part of the island. I also attended them, but we find that some other gentlemen had called meetings, and I will read you a notice where this gentleman, whose speech I have read, called a series of meetings through the same locality :

POLITICAL MEETINGS.

RIDINGS OF EAST QUEEN'S AND KING'S.

Mr. L. H. Davies will address political meetings in East Queen's and King's as follows :—

Eldon—Tuesday, 12th March, at 6 p.m.

Murray Harbour South—Wednesday, 13th March at 6 p.m.

Montague Bridge—Thursday, 14th March, at 6.30 p.m.

Dundas—Friday, March 15th, at 2 p.m.

Souris—Monday, 18th March.

Head St. Peter's Bay—Tuesday, 19th March.

Mount Stewart—Wednesday, 20th March.

Some slight alteration may be made in above dates ; if so proper notice will be given.

That is quite a number of meetings, and they are not all in this advertisement. What was done at these meetings? One of them was within a few steps of my own door, and I thought it would not be out of place altogether for me to attend it. I found not only Mr. L. H. Davies, but also the leader of the local government and the two members of the local House there, and he and his colleague there, Mr. Welsh. They all spoke at that meeting, and you can understand that the government of the day did not get very high praise from them, and a good deal was said against the senators particularly. I presume that was intended for me, because I happened to be present. We were told that a whole, live Yankee had to come down to the Senate chamber to know whether we were alive, asleep or dead.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Did you have anything to say to him?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I will tell you directly. After all these hon. gentlemen had spoken and pretty roundly abused the Senate and the government and everything that was Tory, I asked to be allowed to reply. If they had seen their grandmother's ghost there could not have been more consternation in the gang. They did not know which would do most harm, to let me speak or if they objected to it because I was amongst my own neighbours and friends, and although the majority of the meeting was against me in politics they said "if the cause of all these gentlemen is as they say it is, then they should not be afraid of the sleepy old senator being allowed to reply, "but," Mr. Davies said "we have other speakers to address the meeting and it is called by ourselves and we have resolutions to pass." I said "I know it is your meeting, and I do not wish to intrude upon it, but I would like to answer some of the statements made by these gentlemen," and they closed the meeting very quickly. They hurried through one resolution which I will read to you.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Were you allowed to speak?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No. This is the resolution they passed at the meeting, and the meeting broke up without a vote of thanks to the chairman or this great Liberal leader. They gave him no ovation at all, but they passed this resolution, and it is as strong a resolution and quite as much in favour of a railway as any resolution passed at any meeting that I attended. The resolution was published in the Patriot newspaper of the 14th March, 1895, and reads as follows:

The following resolution was moved by John E. Winsloe, seconded by Henry Brehaut, sen.:—

Whereas there have been large expenditures of public money in the other provinces of the Dominion for railways and canals in order to develop the commerce of the Dominion and to open up the North-west for settlers;

And whereas, the people of Belfast and Murray Harbour are badly in need of a branch railway to these important agricultural districts, in order to make it possible for them to ship their produce without so much inconvenience to themselves as at present exists.

And whereas, we are justly entitled to a proportionate share of the money expended in public works, and in view of the fact that the people of these districts are so seriously handicapped in trade, in travel under existing circumstances;

Therefore resolved, that this meeting earnestly solicit the Hon. L. H. Davies and his colleagues in Parliament to urge upon the government the necessity of this very desirable work, viz., a branch road from Southport through Belfast to the deep water terminus at Murray Harbour South, thence to the main line connecting at or near Cardigan.

That is the very road we are asking the government to build. I may say the result of that meeting was simply this: I know more than one or two who were at that meeting who went there strong supporters of this leader of the Liberals of the maritime provinces, and when they found the unfair treatment that their neighbour received, they went away as strong opponents of that Liberal leader, and they will never vote for his party again. So perhaps it is as well that I had no opportunity to speak on that occasion. Now, such is the resolution which Mr. Davies had carried at these meetings, especially at the Murray Harbour South meeting. Contrast that with his speeches in his place in Parliament, and you will see that they do not in any way correspond. Mr. Davies went on to say the other day in reply to Mr. Macdonald, of King's county, as follows:

The hon. gentleman distinctly said that he hoped they would not give the money which was due to the island, to the local government while the Liberal premier was in power, but that they would squander it in public works, the construction of which he would suggest; and I suppose he would suggest, in order to kill the Belfast railway, the construction of eight or ten little branches all over the island. He knows that such a proposition coming from him is well calculated to destroy that which the people of the island have much at heart. If he were sincerely desirous of promoting the construction of that road he would have had the courage to stand up here and to say: the scheme which the hon. member for Queen's suggested in 1890-91 is not large enough, and I propose another scheme. But he does not tell us where the road is to run, he does not hint what his views are upon that subject. When I brought this question before the House in 1890, I thought it was desirable, to put this matter before the government in business-like way.

What was the business-like way he brought it before the government. He was advocating a grant from the government towards the Wood Island breakwater. In his advocacy of that he incidentally brought in this question of the railway which should be built from near Cardigan station. That was the only railway accommodation which he was prepared to recommend the government to build for the people of that section of the country. If that is all that is coming to the Belfast and Murray Harbour district, they do not want it, because it means simply this, to use that railway they would have to pay double mileage every time they want to go to Charlottetown or any locality on that line. But by having it the other way, it would benefit one-sixth of the island while the proposition of Mr. Davies would benefit nobody. That was the proposition made by that hon. gentleman in 1890. Has he ever opened his mouth since then in favour of the railway? Not once. He held a meeting at Caledonia and the member of the government for Prince Edward Island attended that meeting, I was not present myself. They passed a resolution saying that they did not want that proposition of Mr. Davies, that they wanted the railroad from Southport to Murray Harbour, yet that is the contention made by Mr. Davies now. He continues :

I had some consultation with a number of engineers, and I was assured by them that a branch line from Peak's Station might be built which would give the necessary accommodation and do away with the necessity of a bridge across the Hillsboro', which would cost half a million of money. I thought that line could be adopted, and the amount which would be asked for would not be a quarter of a million of money, or anything like it. But the people at large, being led by the politicians to suppose that they can get the larger road, are in favour of the larger road, and I need not say that if such a road can be obtained, it will have my hearty support from the word go. The people here have a right to it, I think. Now, I think myself that even if the construction of this road were asked upon the same grounds as the construction of other roads in different parts of the Dominion, that the Parliament of Canada would be slow to grant it. I think, just now, in view of the financial stringency of the country, with the enormous deficits we have to meet, that Parliament would be very slow to grant a large sum of money for the construction of the railway. We know that the government have already announced their general policy to be not to subsidize or construct any public work during the present year; there are to be no railway subsidies asked for, and no sums voted for for the construction of government roads.

What an advocate of the people he represents! What a brilliant speech in favour of the people who have been contributing to the island railway for the last 25 years and have never received $1 of benefit from it! When they ask for a railway every obstacle and objection which can be raised is brought by Mr. Davies against it. He says further :

From what the Minister said, that estimate does not include a bridge. I may remark that the railway from Southport to Murray Harbour would be useless without the construction of a bridge, and the cost of constructing a railway and foot passenger bridge would not cost over half a million. Without this the railway would be a mockery, a delusion and a snare.

When the main road was built it was hoped that this section would have accommodation in the near future. That was the railway that everybody was thinking about, and the hon. Minister now gets up and reads a list of railway lines all over the island. And for what purpose? For the purpose of killing out this scheme for the construction of the railway from Belfast to Murray Harbour.

He says his advocacy and his plan was to get a branch to the east for less than one-quarter of a million dollars, but now sixty miles of railway from Southport to Murray Harbour south, without a bridge across to Charlottetown, to cost half a million dollars, will be a delusion, a mockery and a snare. There were some other gentlemen in the House of Commons who thought proper to make some remarks in reference to this agitation which has been going on in Prince Edward Island for this branch railway. Mr. Davies' colleague, Mr. Welsh, spoke as follows—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. It is a well understood rule of Parliament that it is improper to quote, or refer in one House to a debate in the other House. I do not ask that the rule be enforced against the hon. gentleman, but he must bear in mind that he is transgressing the rule, and as he has given us already a great portion of Mr. Davies's speech, he might be satisfied with that and let the others go. We will take it for granted that Mr. Davies represents the others.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I may have digressed a little from the rules of the House, but when hon. gentlemen in the other branch of Parliament undertake to name senators and denounce their conduct as public men, we have a right here as senators to defend our position. I met that gentleman on a public platform and was refused by him an opportunity to reply to his remarks. He takes shelter in his own chamber to attack senators here, and we are deprived of the right to reply. I will refer to his statement at all events and the statement of his colleague if the House will permit me.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not object; I only called attention to the fact that it is out of order.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—In 1890 the leader of the Liberals of the maritime provinces—I hope my hon. friend from Halifax does not object to my giving him that title—made a speech in the House of Commons advocating a branch railway, as I have already mentioned, and his colleague, Mr. Welsh, also made a speech on that occasion, following Mr. Davies. He spoke as follows:

My colleague has spoken about a railway branch to Murray Harbour. I think myself it might possibly, in the end, be profitable to the country at large. It is a fact that a large portion of the people in that section are without any railway accommodation.

What he said in favour of the branch railways in 1890 was not a very strong recommendation, and he only transfers that support now to the branch from Southport to Murray Harbour in accordance with the resolution passed at his own meeting, to which I have already referred. I do not intend to quote any more speeches delivered by those gentlemen. I do say this, however, and say it honestly, there is nothing more unjust or dishonest or unfair than to charge us with advocating railway accommodation for the people of Belfast and Murray Harbour and other sections of the island for political purposes. There was no necessity for doing that. We do it honestly; we do it because we think the people require it and are entitled to it, and when we have all the branches built there will be a million dollars still that Prince Edward Island will have a right to have expended in furtherance of the public works of that province to put us on an equal footing with the other provinces of Canada. These figures have been presented to the House before now, especially by the hon. gentleman who is now member of the government for Prince Edward Island. I can only express the hope that the government have given this matter their serious consideration, that we will be assured that ere long something will be done. We do not wish to press them unduly. We would have been delighted to have a sum in the estimates this year, but owing to the unfortunate circumstance that there is a deficit, we do not wish to be unreasonable, but we do ask that the government will give us some assurance that among the very first votes to pass through Parliament for railway subsidies in any part of the Dominion, justice shall be done to Prince Edward Island in building these branches to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. McDONALD (P.E.I.)—I desire to say a word or two in support of the motion which has been made by my hon. colleague, the member for Murray Harbour. He has placed the matter so fully before you, that it is scarcely necessary for me to go into any very detailed statement of the wants of Prince Edward Island, respecting railways. I may say that in so far as his speech referred to the railways required for Prince Edward Island, I entirely concur in all that he said, but in respect to the tunnel, I do not know that it is necessary to mix it up with this question at all, nor do I think that the utterances of members of the other branch of the legislature require the criticism which they sometimes receive from members of this branch. When the Act was passed to sanction the building of a railway in Prince Edward Island, it was contemplated that branches should be extended to various places in the province, in order to be feeders to that railway, and the main trunk line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, extending from Georgetown on the south to Tignish on the west was expected and intended to have branches at the various villages and locations at which trade was carried on in order to be feeders for that main line and to bring the trade of the island on to the main line. That has not been done up to the present time to any extent. We know applications have been made to the Parliament and government of the Dominion at various times for the construction of some of these branches. There was one which was referred to by my hon. colleague, a very short branch extending but three miles from the town of Summerside to the north side of the island. It would appear to hon-gentlemen, who do not know anything about the locality or the trade there, that it would not be necessary to build such a short branch as that in order to bring trade to the railway, but if they knew the circumstances of the place, if they knew the trade which is carried on there, if they knew the vast deposit of oysters and the extensive beds on that coast and the freight which people have to carry in the fall of the year when the roads are bad and it is almost impossible to get to a shipping place, they would see the great necessity for that short branch. It was applied for and the government offered a subsidy towards its construction, but, as my hon. friend has stated, it would be impossible for a private company to undertake the construction of a short branch of that kind, as a feeder to the Prince Edward Island Railway, but if it were constructed by the government it would not only feed the Prince Edward Island Railway, but would bring a great portion of that trade on to the Intercolonial Railway. The freight carried on that branch would be taken charge of by the railway department there and they would give bills of lading for its transfer to whatever place it was intended to go. Then there is another branch which has been applied for and which the government at one time thought of going on with, a short extension from a place called Harmony Station towards the East Point of Prince Edward Island where there is an extensive settlement. The railway would run in the centre towards East Point and afford railway accommodation to a large number of agriculturists on each side of that road, and also to those who are carrying on extensive fisheries along the north coast of Prince Edward Island where they are at very great disadvantage for shipping places, and where they have to carry lobsters of which they put up many hundred cases, besides mackerel, codfish and other productions of the sea at very considerable expense by means of horses and carriages, to the nearest railway station at Souris, a distance of 12 or 15 miles, and sometimes 20 miles. A railway extension of seven miles would afford all the accommodation they require at that point. There are still other branches which are required to complete the railway system of Prince Edward Island. There is one from Emerald, extending northward, which would give accommodation to a large number of people in one of the most flourishing settlements in Prince Edward Island. These small branches could be worked without any additional expense to the railway department, except building the line on which they run. There would be no additional office expenses incurred, because the office staff that transacts the business for 200 miles of road now in Prince Edward Island, would not require to be materially increased, if increased at all, to transact the office business of 300 miles of road. Then the present road staff would be able to serve those short branches without any additional expenditure for the purpose. You can see that this would entail but a very small cost on the government of the Dominion. There is also required a short branch from a station some distance out from Charlottetown towards the flourishing settlement of Crapaud, passing through one of the finest agricultural settlements of the province to the town of Victoria, if it may be called a town. It is an extensive settlement where there is a cheese factory and agricultural operations are carried on to a very great extent. There is also required by the Prince Edward Island Railway another branch extending from the Royal Junction out towards the north side of the island, a distance of about nine miles, leading towards the greatest fishing grounds, probably, existing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, towards the settlements of Cove Head and Rustico. These branches, you can see, must necessarily centre a great portion of the trade on to the Prince Edward Island Railway. These places are not any great distance from Charlottetown, their main shipping point; but if they have to ship their products by water to Charlottetown, they have to take a long and circuitous route around the island in order to reach their destination. If they had those short branches of railway constructed, they would be enabled to convey their produce to the railway or to the principal shipping place for export at Charlottetown, where the steamers from the United States markets, from Nova Scotia, from New Brunswick, and from the upper provinces call, in order to ship them to their destination, wherever it might be. An application has been made for a branch at a place called O'Leary, towards the West Cape. We know gentlemen propose to give us a winter service towards that part of the island, and that we have had applications here from persons who are building a road from Richibucto towards some point there where they expect to make connection with the Island of Prince Edward. At such places as Campbellton and Miminegash very extensive fishing, as well as other operations, are carried on. The whole of these small branches to which I have referred do not exceed in all forty-five miles, but each one of them would contribute greatly to the trade that would be carried over the main line of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and it would greatly increase the receipts of that road by bringing an additional amount of traffic to it. But the main line which is required at present, and for which the greatest agitation has been going on in Prince Edward Island, extends from Southport to Murray Harbour. That has been fully referred to by my hon. friend who comes from that section of the country, but he scarcely went, in advocacy of that line, as far as he might have done. His modesty overcame him at that point, for really that line would pass through the most flourishing district of the whole island, leading towards some important points and passing through a very large portion of the province where at present there is no railway accommodation. That portion of the island comprises about one-fifth of the population and one-fourth of its area, and it has no direct connection or communication with the present line of the Prince Edward Island Railway. The district through which it passes is, without exception, as flourishing as any other part of Prince Edward Island and hon. gentlemen know how thickly that province is populated. We have a population of at least 50 to the square mile taking the province as a whole. Hon. gentlemen will see that with such a population, if the people have sufficient facilities for making use of a railway, it must pay. The reason that it does not pay now is that it is a main trunk line without connection with outer ports of the island where there is a great amount of traffic and where the people now instead of taking advantage of the railway in order to come to the city where their centre of trade is, must take their own horses and carriages for eight or ten miles before coming to the railway and then travel over the road. But when they have their horses and carriages and once get into them, they do not think that it pays them to take advantage of the railway at all, and they make no use of it, whereas if the line went within a reasonable distance of their place of residence, instead of using their own horses and carriages they would make use of the railway and thus increase its receipts. The whole country in the southern section of Kings' and Queen's counties is thickly populated. There are cheese factories and butter factories and the farmers produce large quantities of beef and pork for which they must find a market, and their agricultural products are second to none in any part of Prince Edward Island. With railway communication given them, it is impossible to see why the railway, properly managed, should not pay. The objection has been raised that the Prince Edward Island Railway does not pay, and that, therefore, it should not be extended, but before coming to any such conclusion as that we should take into consideration the reason it does not pay. If people had the proper facilities for making use of the road, it would pay very much better than it does at present anyway. Our railway is a narrow gauge road and it costs some \$15,000 or \$16,000 a mile, probably less than one-third of the Intercolonial Railway. But while the cost of operating the Intercolonial Railway is about 71 cents a train mile, the cost of operating the Prince Edward Island is \$1.02 a mile. Now, by building the branches, the smaller ones can be served by the same rolling stock and without any increase in stock or any material increase of staff or officers, and as these branches must bring an increased amount of traffic to the main line, the construction of them must reduce the cost of operating the main line per mile. The cost of operating the Prince Edward Island Railway Mr. Schreiber has estimated at \$1.02, according to the return made to the other House; the cost of operating the branches will not be 60 cts. a train-mile, and he estimates the construction of these branches would leave a balance of earnings of something near \$5,000 per annum. That would assist in reducing the outlay or the expenditure on the Prince Edward Island Railway over and above the receipts, and besides increasing the receipts and passenger traffic, it would lessen the cost to the government of operating the Prince Edward Island Railway and bring it down to nearly the rate on the Intercolonial Railway per train-mile. When the Prince Edward Island Railway was built, hon. gentlemen must remember, material for the construction of that road was very expensive. Steel rails cost as much as \$90 per ton. Now the best steel rails can be laid down in Prince Edward Island for \$21 per ton. If when the main line was built in Prince Edward Island the rails cost \$90 a ton, but the road can now be built with the rails costing \$21 per ton, and other materials cheaper in proportion, a road of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet gauge can probably be built for nearly half, or say \$9,000 per mile. At that rate for the distance that we require, 105 miles, the cost would be less than \$1,000,000. But even with the necessary buildings and outfits if it should cost up to \$1,100,000 it would be a very small charge on the Government of the Dominion over and above the earnings which we may expect from the road. It is but a very small item in the expenditure of the Dominion. The interest would not amount to \$40,000 a year, and such an expenditure we may reasonably ask for without advertising to those claims which have been several times referred to as necessary to complete the terms of confederation. I trust that the Government of the Dominion will, at the earliest possible moment, undertake the construction of this road in order to complete the railway system of Prince Edward Island and thus show the people of the Dominion that while we contribute to the great public works of the Dominion—works which our own isolated position prevents us deriving benefit from to any extent—our wants will still receive the care and attention of the government and that they will not neglect the interests of the smallest province in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I wish to make a remark in reference to one matter which has not been mentioned. The north shore of the island is deficient in harbours and there is only one place that they can use at all—it is some such name as Cascumpec. They cannot ship from that part of the island. They hardly even have a harbour of refuge on the north shore of the island and, as a matter of necessity, the produce has to be shipped in connection with the present railway system of the island; otherwise, I contend if they have the harbours, there would not be the same claims for railway branches as the produce of that part of the island could far cheaper be carried in schooners. If they cannot ship their produce by water, certainly the only remedy is to ship by the railway, and therefore I think my hon. friend might have made that point if it is the fact. The only facilities for getting the produce of the northern coast of Prince Edward Island over are by the railway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think a few words on this subject are not out of place. I see by the returns that the loss on the Prince Edward Island Railway is $68,000 per annum. That is an interest charge to the Dominion of $2,000,000 capital. If, as the hon. gentleman says, the connection of the main line with the important points on the coast is going to add to the value of the main line, it certainly is worth while to pay out $1,000,000 in order to increase the traffic by these connections. From the accounts which I gathered from the hon. gentleman who addressed the House, my own opinion is that the railway will never be thoroughly successful unless it has a connection with the main line from Nova Scotia, but it is not a very creditable showing for our government railway in Prince Edward Island to be losing about 30 per cent above the gross cost of running the road. We in the North-west Territories have to pay a mileage earning charge of $1.50 per train mile, according to the railway report now before us, while the government railways, both the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway are only earning 70 cents per train mile, the latter costing one dollar per train mile in expenses. We have to bear our share of the cost of running these lines at that reduced rate, while we have to bear our own burden of paying 3 per cent interest on the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway for 6000 miles or whatever proportion we use of it, at a train mileage earning of $1.50. Whether it is in consequence of the scarcity of traffic or the rates being too low, I am not able to say, but there is the broad fact that $68,000 is the annual loss on 210 miles of the Prince Edward Island Railway, which is 3 per cent on a capital of $2,000,000. If the additional capital of $1,000,000 will bring up that $68,000 to make it pay, it is worth while for the government to consider the advisability of constructing the branches referred to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to say a few words in answer to the statements made by the hon. senator who moved the resolution. While I confess that I am not altogether in accord with everything the hon. gentleman stated as to the failure of governments in the past to carry out to the fullest extent the terms of union with that province, I am quite well aware that there have been many complaints, I am also acquainted with the effect of the complaints that were made by British Columbia. The government of that day believed they were acting in the interests of British Columbia in coming to what was known as the Carnarvon terms. If the full terms of the union had not been carried out with Prince Edward Island, I think the hon. gentlemen from that island will at least credit the government with the desire to do all that they could to effect an efficient winter service. If the elements, with which it was impossible to cope, have been against us, they must not attribute that to the government of the country. No one knows better than those gentlemen what the difficulties are that present themselves almost every year in the navigation of the Northumberland Straits; and at present I think they will admit that the government of the day, in the steamer which they have now upon the route, has given them certainly the best service that they have ever had, and as good a service as can well be given considering the fact that the elements are against us. While I make this statement I am not forgetful—neither is the government—of the isolated position of Prince Edward Island; nor have we forgotten the fact that that isolated province cannot reap all the benefits that are reaped by those who live upon the mainland in the matter of railway connection. Hence I think they have very fairly a claim to assistance for the construction of roads through the different parts of the island which will bring trade to the main line. However, that question has been very well put by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and it is unnecessary for me to waste the time of the House in discussing it further. There are, however, advantages which even the Prince Edward Islanders reap from the construction of those main lines, although not to the extent, I admit, that those who live on the main shore had. When we reflect that before the construction of the great railway arteries throughout this Dominion, and the facilities which they now have of crossing the straits, they used to take 7 to 9 days to reach Montreal or Ottawa from the island, a journey which can now be accomplished in 24 or 30 hours. This is saying something in favour of the facilities which have been offered to the people, not only of that island, but of all other parts of the Dominion. I do not readily understand what my hon. friend from the prairie province meant by saying that these roads never could be a success until they had connection with the main line. They have a connection now, as good as can well be established, unless the famous tunnel of which we have heard is constructed; and even then, with that constructed, in order to make a continuous route the lines I mentioned would have to be reduced to the narrow gauge, or the narrow gauge on the island would have to be widened to the standard gauge, in order to enable them to go from one part of the country to the other without breaking bulk. The case has been so well put by the gentlemen who have spoken that I can only call the attention of this House to the policy which has guided the present government since its formation in 1878, and that policy has been to aid to the fullest possible extent of the revenue of the country, not only railway extension within the Dominion, but also connection with foreign countries by steam; and I can assure the hon. gentleman that so long as the government exists—which I hope in the interests of the country, not individually, may be for a very long time to come—that policy will be continued. I do not know that I could say more than was said by my colleague the Minister of Railways when speaking on this subject. I will not transgress the rule to which my hon. friend opposite has called attention, by referring to any remarks that were made in the lower House. I know that it is contrary to the rules of the House, but there is a way, I believe, of reaching questions of that kind without violating the rule of this House or the other House, and that is by stating frankly to those whom he is addressing in the Senate that he observes that a certain person made a certain statement and putting it in that way you can give the information which you desire, at the same time keeping within the strict rules of Parliament. I find my hon. colleague the Minister of Railways made this statement:

From the calculation made by his officers he was of opinion that the construction of these lines and additions to the government railways would involve an annual charge of $33,000 per annum.

That would be the interest on an expenditure of a little over $1,000,000 in the construction of railway branches, supposing they did not pay at all. If, as has been argued by the gentlemen who have spoken, the construction of these branches would bring to the main line a large portion of the trade which is now carried by the small vessels which frequent their harbours, then the deficit would not be so great. The Minister of Railway proceeds :

And he did not think this was more than the province could properly claim. The government would, he was sure, deal justly with Prince Edward Island on the next occasion when government aid was given to railways.

I have no hesitation, on behalf of the government, in reiterating that statement, not only with regard to Prince Edward Island, and extending it to the other provinces of the Dominion, where railway extension is necessary for the proper development of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A wholesale bid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says with his usual courtesy and frankness "a wholesale bid." If it be a wholesale bid, it is a bid that has been made and a policy that has been carried out to the letter ever since this government has been in power, and if it be a bid to the electors to say that we propose to continue this policy, then I make the bid directly. I do not say now that I make that as a bid to the people of Prince Edward Island. I lay that down as the general policy of the government, just the same as we lay down the policy of the government as being incidental and direct protection whenever it is necessary. You may say that it is a bid to the manufacturers, because we say we intend to carry out that policy. If it be a bid, I say we do intend to carry it out. If it be a bid to the maritime provinces, or the province on the Pacific, to say that we intend, as far as the revenues of the country will justify, to develop the trade of the country by steam communication and the mining interests by opening up the country, and to grant liberal subsidies to develop those enterprises, I hesitate not to say that that is the policy of the government. If that is a bid, it is an honest one by the government which this country has, for the last 17 or 18 years, sustained and will sustain I believe in the future.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Free trade.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very sorry I touch a tender spot in the cranium of my hon. friend behind, but I could not help hearing his question "free trade." Well, when that time comes and this country is sufficiently prosperous and in a position to justify my hon. friend's policy, if I am alive at that time and think it is right, I will adopt it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The time will never come.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I agree with you, but I will not be led into a discussion of that question at present. There is a fallacy that prevails throughout the country, and I should not refer to it had it not been for the remarks of the senior member for Halifax, when he said the government aid for the railways of Prince Edward Island. It is generally supposed that that is literally correct. If I understand the terms of union, Prince Edward Island built her own railways, and the Dominion assumed and paid the expenses of running them, but they charged Prince Edward Island in her debt every cent that it cost them to construct the railways, so that in fact it is not correct to state that the Dominion built the railways of that province. If the Dominion had built the railways, then the amount allowed for their debt would have been larger, and consequently they would have received a larger income arising from that source. I have stated generally the policy of the government in reference to this question, and I hope that not only Prince Edward Island, but Nova Scotia and every other part of the Dominion, will in the future as in the past receive what is justly due them. I think I can make out a pretty good case to show that during confederation we have done justice to every part of the Dominion, as rapidly as it could possibly be done. If we have failed, it has been for the want of sufficient revenue to justify us in doing it. We have been denounced from one end of the country to the other as attempting to purchase different parts of the country because we have aided railway enterprises. The same declaration, in not so pointed a manner, was made by my hon. friend opposite a few minutes ago. I say, with all respect to him, I repudiate it. What we do in that respect is done on a well-defined policy which we believe to be in the interests of the Dominion as a whole.

Hon. Mr. POWER—After the three speeches that have been made on the other side, it is not unreasonable to ask that I be allowed to say a few words. The speech made by the hon. leader of the government renders it necessary that something should be said. First, to deal with a matter that is not of very much consequence, as to the question of order, I did not attempt to stop the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour, when he was quoting from speeches made in the other House, I simply called his attention to the fact that he was not in order. Now the first Minister has undertaken to indicate that there is a way of getting out of that difficulty. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the way that he has suggested is not the way that is approved of by authorities on parliamentary procedure. I take Bourinot's work, which is recognized as an authority in this country, and I turn to page 426 and find this language:—

It is a part of the unwritten law of Parliament that no allusion should be made in one House to the debates of the other chamber, a rule always enforced by the Speaker with the utmost strictness. Members frequently attempt to evade this rule by resorting to ambiguous terms of expression—by referring, for instance, to what happened 'in another place'; but all such evasions of a wholesome practice will be stopped by the Speaker, when it is very evident to whom the allusions are made. It is perfectly regular, however, to refer to the official printed records of the other branch of the legislature, even though the document may not have been formally asked for and communicated to the House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend has been a big offender in that way himself

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I am not in the habit of referring to speeches made in the other House at all. If I should offend in that way it is the hon. gentleman's duty to call me to order. When I sin he should condemn me, not now. In the present instance it is particularly to be regretted that so much reference should have been made to speeches delivered in the other chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What I quoted was from a report in the Citizen of this city.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in the habit of raising frivolous points of order. It is a sort of thing I never have believed in, and I simply want to maintain the position which I assumed. In the present case it is particularly unfortunate. It happens that there is not in this House a single gentleman from Prince Edward Island who supports the opposition. In the other chamber there are two gentlemen who represent the government, and it seems to me that those two gentlemen were quite equal to upholding the cause of the government, in that chamber, without calling in the assistance of the able and patriotic gentlemen who represent that island in the Senate. That is my view. Something has been said about the tunnel, and a good deal has been said about the railway to-day. I got the impression that the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour had in his head the idea that your humble servant was opposed to both those schemes. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the discussion on the tunnel question on the last occasion when it was brought up by the hon. gentleman who is now the Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island, he will find that I did not oppose the tunnel scheme, but on the contrary contended that the claims of Prince Edward Island were such, that if the tunnel did not cost more than the hon. gentleman indicated here—that is $5,000,000—it was the duty of the government to go on and construct it. I have an impression, however, speaking from memory, that I did suggest, in a jesting way, that it was barely possible that the tunnel was intended largely for the purpose of making a road from the Senate to Government House at Charlott town; and the result was to a certain extent indicated that what was said in jest was true, because hon. gentlemen will observe that during the last session or two we have not heard very much about the tunnel. I am surprised that we do not have the earnest advocacy of the tunnel now which we had when the hon. gentleman who formerly sat here from Alberton was a member.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What goal did the hon. gentleman of the Opposition expect to reach when he made the promise before the last election?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not responsible for his utterances. I am not speaking of what the government promised, because I do not think the government did make any promise; I am speaking of the gentleman who advocated the claims of Prince Edward Island at that time. I gather from the speeches made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and also from the speech made by the hon. leader of the government to-day, that the tunnel is retired, at least into temporary obscurity.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Permanent obscurity.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We shall not hear of it, I fancy, until the eve of another general election. The hon. gentlemen from Prince Edward Island now advocates the construction of certain branches of the island railway. In this they have my most hearty support. I feel that Prince Edward Island has, perhaps, had less justice done to it since it entered into confederation, than any other province of the Dominion. No province has a stronger claim. I venture to say, that the policy which may have served other portions of the country has, to a great extent, injured Prince Edward Island. That province has got very little in the way of public works, and the only thing which this government can do of much consequence for Prince Edward Island is to construct those branch railways which have been spoken of. I regret that the hopes which were entertained some months ago, when the hon. gentleman from Marshfield was taken into the government, that his entry into the government would mean that something of a substantial character was to be forthwith done for the Prince Edward Island railways have been disappointed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are outbidding me altogether.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not at all. I am not promising anything. I am simply giving my opinions as a private member, and those are the opinions which I expressed years ago on the floor of this House. I say there have been millions of dollars spent in other portions of the country with no substantial benefit either to the country at large or to the sections where the money has been spent, which would have constructed all the branches that are now asked for in Prince Edward Island. Nowadays a million dollars is a small thing. It would not much more than build a lock on one of the large canals. I interrupted (I admit it was not proper) the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour by saying that Canada had built the railway. My reference then was not to the original Prince Edward Island Railway but to the two extensions which have been constructed of late years by Canada.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Only one.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was under the impression that there were two. With respect to the hon. gentleman who is recognized by the liberal party as their leader for the maritime provinces, I do not think he deserves the condemnation bestowed upon him by the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour. That hon. gentleman spoke of him as a man whose hatred for the Liberal-Conservative party exceeded his love for his own island. That is a very strong indictment, and one which I do not think the hon. gentleman was justified in making. If any member of this House will take the trouble to read the speeches of that gentleman in the other chamber he will find that that gentleman is just as much in favour of the construction of branch lines in Prince Edward Island as any member of this House; but, perhaps, having the experience of the tunnel before him, the hon. leader of opposition from Prince Edward Island expressed some natural doubt as to whether those branches were really intended to be constructed or whether they were being used largely to influence the electors at the next general election. I am glad to hear from the first minister that it is the intention of the government—as soon as the finances of the country are in a better condition—I do not know that he qualified his statement—to proceed to construct those branches. Of course, if the statement is made in an unqualified way, it is so much more satisfactory. With those branch railways constructed, Prince Edward Island will have had a reasonable justice done to her, for the time being at any rate.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—After the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend the Premier, and the very able addresses that hon. gentlemen have listened to from two senators from Prince Edward Island, and other gentlemen who have addressed this House, it was not my intention to have offered any observations, but my hon. friend from Halifax was kind enough to say in the course of his few remarks, that the anticipations of the people of Prince Edward Island with regard to my accession to the Cabinet have not been realized. That leads me to say a few words with regard to the treatment of my province by the present government and by their predecessors. I think I am warranted, from the observation which my hon. friend made and to which I have just alluded, in contrasting in a few particulars the treatment which Prince Edward Island has received from the Liberal party, and that which it is receiving from the Liberal-Conservative Party. When the island entered confederation there was a condition in the terms of union to which my hon. friend from Murray Harbour referred, that we were to have efficient steam communication, winter and summer, between the mainland and the Dominion of Canada. The Mackenzie administration came into power immediately after the island entered confederation, and on them devolved the duty of dealing with that question. It is in the recollection of everybody in Prince Edward Island that their dealing with the question was singularly unfortunate. They did not seem, for many years at all events, to have any conception of their duty in the matter. They employed an old steamer known by the name of the "Albert," a wood boat and unfit to carry passengers in any sea or anywhere, and kept her for years on that service, a mockery, delusion and a snare. Later on they put in the "Northern Light," and I have always said, although the "Northern Light" failed in her purpose, it was an honest attempt on the part of that government for which they deserve credit. The Conservatives came into power, and although many of us felt that they did not deal as promptly and efficiently with that service as they should have done, still we have this fact that they have put a steamer on that route that is equal to anything that is to be found in the world to-day for such a service. She is a wonderful boat and accomplishes wonders. She does not effect perfect and efficient communication—that appears to be almost impossible by navigation—but she is an admirable boat and she is doing wonderful work in the way of maintaining communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Was not her immediate predecessor a good boat?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The "Northern Light"?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have already said that she was a failure so far as maintaining communication was concerned. It was a blunder from beginning to end in her construction. The principle on which she was to climb the ice and break it down required that she should have about 15 feet deeper water in her stem than in her stern. She had no weight in her stern and could not break the ice down. The "Stanley" accomplishes this in a wonderful manner. My hon. friend says that the hopes and expectations with regard to my entering the cabinet have not been realized. That leads me to say some thing about the "Stanley." The "Stanley" was put on that route, and the government maintained rates which were almost prohibitory—the rates that had been maintained by the Mackenzie government when the "Northern Light" was running. As soon as I became a member of the government I advised the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to reduce the rates and make them the same in winter as in summer for passengers and freight. My colleague adopted my suggestion, and, I am happy to say, the result has been most satisfactory, developing the trade of the island. The rates have been very reasonable, and the result has been not only satisfactory in developing communication between the island and the mainland, but, I think the returns will show satisfactory in the way of giving better financial returns for the service than years before. I mention this as one thing that the government have been doing for the island in the matter of communication. I must mention another matter which has been referred to by the premier—that is, the facility of communication which Prince Edward Island now enjoys in connection with the rest of the world. Up to the present summer over two days were consumed—I think nearly three days by some routes—in passing from Prince Edward Island to Montreal, the commercial capital, or to Ottawa, the political capital of Canada. Now, a Prince Edward Islander from Tignish or Charlottetown may in the morning take his breakfast at home, step on a train and reach Montreal the following morning and return the next day. A gentleman in Prince Edward Island had occasion to write to me thinking that I was at Ottawa; he posted his letter on Tuesday morning, and it came here and was returned to me in Prince Edward Island on Thursday, having been only sixty hours on the way from the time it left Prince Edward Island until it was returned to me in that province. I mention this to explain why the people of Prince Edward Island are better pleased than they were, and this has been accomplished without any increased expense whatever, but by means of getting better connections. After the Mackenzie government went out of power, in 1882, the government of the day introduced a measure for building a branch railway to Cape Traverse, the only railway built at the expense of Canada in Prince Edward Island, eleven miles of road, and when that amount, $182,000, was being voted by Parliament, the Hon. Mr Mackenzie, then leader of the Opposition, said :

I think we have done very well by the island, and we have carried out the terms of union to the utmost possible extent.

At that day the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the leader of the Liberal party, after having been in the government himself and after having furnished nothing better for the purpose of that communication than the old steamer "Albert," and the "Northern Light," speaking no doubt for his party, declared in Parliament: "We have done very well for Prince Edward Island, and we have carried out the terms of union to the utmost possible extent." The Liberal-Conservative party have been in power since 1878; in the opinion of the people of Prince Edward Island, they have not done all that the province is entitled to. I am free to say that there is a strong feeling in the island in regard to public works which I hope will be recognized in the near future, but the people of Prince Edward Island felt this that whenever they raised any question and approached the Conservative government at Ottawa, that the heart of that party beat true not only to Prince Edward Island, but to every part of Canada, and that from time to time they were ready to give some very important concession to Prince Edward Island such as appeared to be due and when the time appeared to be ripe for it. I refer in this connection to the claim which was put forward on behalf of the island by myself, representing the provincial government, in the year 1886, and I might, if time would permit, read the Order in Council under which the matter was adjusted at that time.

The government of Canada passed an Order in Council setting forth that, owing to the isolation of Prince Edward Island, the province had not reaped much benefit from the railways which had been built in other parts of Canada, and on that account and as the policy for subsidizing railways had not been up to that time extended to Prince Edward Island, they placed $20,000 a year to the credit of the province. It was a fair and reasonable adjustment for the province at that time. Nearly ten years have passed since then and still the policy of railway construction has been going on all over Canada, and Prince Edward Island is still as it was then, and the time has arrived, in the opinion of the people of Prince Edward Island, when the matter should be taken up and considered again. But, while that has been the policy of the Conservative party not only towards Prince Edward Island but towards the rest of Canada, the Liberal party have been setting up as against that, that it is wrong and corrupt on the part of the government to offer subsidies to railways or enter upon the construction of great public works, because it is in effect bribing members or bribing the provinces. That has been the policy of the Liberal party in the past, and I have never heard that they have put themselves on record in any other form. The policy of the Conservative party is a Canadian policy, by building public works in every province to develop and promote the best interests of Canada. I might here, perhaps, be allowed to refer to another matter in which the government have done a very valuable service to the people of Prince Edward Island, and that is in the dairy industry.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What has that to do with railways?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend does not want me to go into this, but he has called for it himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is altogether out of order. He can give notice and go into the dairy question in Prince Edward Island when he pleases, but that has nothing to do with the railways.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman was good enough to say that the hopes which had been entertained with regard to the advantages the province might obtain through my becoming a member of the cabinet have not been realized.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman does not quote me correctly. I said the advantages expected from the construction of these branch railways; I simply dealt with the question of railways.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As my hon. friend now puts his words, and I accept the statement that he makes, and as he did not intend the statement to go any further than the branch railways, I forego what I was about to say with regard to the dairy industry. I will reserve that for some other occasion. It has been alleged that it is wrong and immoral to raise a question with regard to public works immediately on the eve of an election. With regard to that question I must say for myself, and I am sure I may say it for my hon. friend who has made this motion, that we have not raised these questions on the eve of an election. They are not questions of today or of yesterday: they are questions that have been before the people for many years, but the very gentlemen who are good enough to accuse my hon. friend from Murray Harbour they say I did not make promises about railways which is quite correct—but in accusing him they say he has been acting wrongly and that it is dishonourable to advocate the construction of railways or other public works when the elections are pending. This recalls to my recollection that in the year 1890, just before the last general election, in the last session of the last Parliament, a gentleman whose name has been referred to in this debate made a speech in Parliament in which he strongly advocated the construction of a branch railway in Prince Edward Island from a place known as Peakes Station on the main line of the Prince Edward Island railway to Wood Island breakwater. That speech was made before the election and the prominent attention which was called to that speech induced the people to call a meeting at a place called Caledonia in February, 1891, which I was invited to attend as also was Mr. Davies. The meeting was called for the purpose of promoting this railway which Mr. Davies had advocated. The people were strongly opposed to the route proposed. It would not have touched the Murray Harbour section at all, and would have been of little benefit to them. Mr. Davies promised them unequivocally that if he were elected to the House he would support the building of a railway from Southport to Murray Harbour. I was a candidate at that time, and the matter took such a shape that I made a similar promise, that if I were elected to Parliament I would do what I could to advance that project. Mr. Davies was elected and I was not, and yet during the four years that followed he never said one word in Parliament about that railway until the present session. It does not become the friends of gentlemen who have acted in this extraordinary manner with regard to that very question, to accuse gentlemen on this side of the House of bringing up this question on the eve of an election. The people of Prince Edward Island, I believe, are unanimous, from one end of it to the other, in believing that their interests would be best promoted by building those branch lines, and they are equally unanimous on another point, that whatever is due to the Province of Prince Edward Island with regard to branch railways shall be done in that way and not in the way of giving grants or increased subsidies to the provincial government. In 1887, when I was a member of the government, I expressed a somewhat different view. I have learned to know better since that time, although I then impressed the view that the local government should be considered in the matter; for I have found that the $20,000 a year which we then secured to the province was like a drop in the bucket of the extravagance of the Liberal government that is now charged with the administration of the affairs of that province. It is very much better that the government of Canada should deal with Prince Edward Island as they have dealt with other provinces in the matter of public works. I have no doubt the people of Prince Edward Island will leave this matter, as they have left other questions which affect their interests, in the hands of the government of Canada and that they will be fairly dealt with.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (67) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved :

"That this subsection shall not apply until the first day of May, 1897, to any river, part of a river or mill as to which the prohibitory provisions of the second subsection of section fifteen of the Fisheries Act and of the subsection substituted therefor by section six of chapter fifty-one of the Statutes of 1894 had not been enforced prior to the first day of May, 1895, but shall so apply on and after the said first day of May, 1897."

The hon. Minister stated yesterday that what would apply to one mill would apply to another, and I want this to apply in that way in keeping with what I said yesterday. In place of giving power to the Minister to discriminate for the time being, it should be permanent, and this should apply to all mills and all streams alike.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—During two years ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—To all mills where it has not been enforced. I do not mean that it should apply to those where the law is enforced, but where it is not enforced I mean it should apply to all of them.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—A portion of the amendment is in the right direction, but is too general to be accepted. There is no objection to extending the exemption to any river which is not exempted now, provided a case is made before the Governor in Council. I was told by an hon. member of this House, that there were streams which ran into the St. Croix River which had not to-day the exemption, but which were entitled to it owing to the special circumstances that it was not injurious to fishing, and not injurious to navigation, and I told him certainly that the Governor in Council would have no objection to extending the exemption to such cases, but that it should be upon a special request. Now the amendment proposed would apply this exemption to all the rivers of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—Only to those rivers where the law is not enforced.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Without there being any request it would apply. If I am wrong I will hear the explanation.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—To all the rivers not at the present time under the operation of the Act I understood from the remarks made by the hon. gentleman that in two years we will do away with the saw-dust altogether. The argument was that the saw-dust did not hurt the navigation but made the rivers deeper. If that is the case, it compels small millmen to make provision to keep the saw-dust out of the stream when two years hence you will deal with the subject definitely. The amendment only makes the same rule apply to all the mills, the small as well as the great, and there is nothing about it. I understood the hon. Minister stated that this would be satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The delay of two years asked for here, which I explained when I introduced the bill, is for the purpose of classifying the rivers and getting the necessary information. There are hundreds of rivers in the Dominion of Canada where the exemption would be perpetuated, because it does not affect navigation or fish life, and upon those streams the saw-mills should not be put under the obligation of burning the sawdust. That is plain, and I said that when I introduced the bill. The proposed amendment would go in the contrary sense, and I think the proviso in the bill meets the case in a better and fairer manner, leaving the discretion with the government of granting the exemption whenever a case is made out. If you apply it to all rivers, although in your opinion streams of little importance, you may be destroying fish life to a great extent. Let me give you a few instances. Take the case of a tributary of the Cascapedia River, where there is no navigation and where there is very little fish life, but still it runs into the Cascapedia River, the most valuable salmon river in the world. If saw-dust were allowed there, it would be carried into the river and destroy the fishing for which the government is getting a large annual rent. Now would it be right to allow it in that instance? That is a case in point to show that the exemption should not be made in the sense asked for. Let me give you another instance on the opposite side. Take the Chaudière River, in the county of Beauce. It is a river where there is no fish life at all, except pike which is a fish of no value for the table. There are hundreds of small streams with fine water powers flowing into that river where the exemption may be granted and granted for ever without destroying either navigation or fish life. Therefore the House must see that there must be a classification of those rivers and I told the House the other day when introducing the bill, that the government was busy having their commissioner, Mr. Wakeham or Mr. Prince (my impression is it is Mr. Wakeham) investigating all those cases in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Cape Breton, and in Quebec and Ontario, so as to be in a position two years hence to come before Parliament with a classified schedule of all those rivers and show the House where exemption could be granted without doing injury either to navigation or to fish life. Under these circumstances, I think the proviso in the bill should be accepted by the House and that you should leave it to the Government, who hitherto have wisely exercised that discretion to declare when such an exemption should be given till 1897. By that time the Minister of Marine will be in a position to come before the House with a complete measure.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. Minister has completely misapprehended the effect of the amendment which he so lavishly condemns. I shall read it, and if hon. gentlemen have copies of the bill before them they will see the meaning :

"That this subsection shall not apply until the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, to any river, part of a river or mill as to which the prohibitory provisions of the second subsection of section fifteen of the Fisheries Act and of the subsection substituted therefor by section six, of chapter fifty-one of the Statutes of 1894, had not been enforced prior to the first day of May, 1895, but shall so apply on and after the said first day of May, 1897."

Now, hon. gentlemen will notice that this amendment does not propose to exempt all rivers. It proposes to exempt those rivers as to which the law has not been enforced up to the present time—to exempt those rivers for two years more, and then it goes on to say that the law shall apply on and after 1st May, 1897. It gives millers notice that where they have been exempt from the operation of the law they are to continue exempt until the 1st May, 1897, and that then the exemption ceases. I think that is a provision which should commend itself to the good sense of this House. I called attention yesterday to the objectionable nature of this provision that the Governor in Council must be applied to. If the law has not been in force in the past as to any mill or any river why should the party interested be obliged to come to the government now and ask them not to enforce the law during the next two years? Yet, if hon. gentlemen will turn to the next clause in the bill they will see that any exemption granted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries under subsection 2 of section 15 of the Fisheries Act and in force on the 30th day of April, 1895, shall remain in force until the 30th day of June, 1897, unless sooner revoked by the Governor in Council. The amendment would make the law clear. There is no necessity to go to the government to see whether it shall be enforced. Parliament says it shall not be enforced, where it has not heretofore been enforced, until the first of May, 1897. I think it is a statesmanlike and reasonable proposition, and if I were a member of the government I should like to have Parliament take that position instead of saying "let everybody who wishes to have his mill exempted come to the government and get permission." Why should the government, who have other work to do, be tormented with such matters? I think this might be entitled an amendment for the relief of the government.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I cannot comprehend exactly the object of the amendment that my hon. friend is proposing. As I understand it, the two clauses of the bill provide for two totally different cases. If I may take the second section first, it provides than any exemption already granted by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries meaning—I presume those exemptions which are at present in force—shall remain in force until 1897 unless previously revoked by the Governor in Council. Then subsection 2, clause 1, provides in the case of any application which may be made for exemption, where the law has not been enforced that the Governor in Council shall have the power of exempting such streams. They are two different things.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This seems to me about as insidious an amendment as could be prepared. If this amendment is adopted, then you leave all the streams that are not prohibited in the same position as they are at present, and you leave all the streams which it is supposed the law does not apply to at present in the same position that they would be in prior to the passage of this Act. If I understand the law as it stands upon the statute-book, there are no streams exempt from the operation of the law. It is imperative, and no matter where the stream is, whether it be of the character to which my hon. friend on my right (Hon. Mr. Angers) has referred, where there are no fish at all or not, it applies to that just as well as it does to the tributaries that empty into the gulf or the streams that lead into the salmon rivers which are very valuable.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is the law as it stands now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it applies to every stream. The object of this law is to exempt by an order in council any river in which fish life does not exist to any extent, and where the emptying of saw-dust into the river would not injure fish life or navigation, and it enables the Governor in Council to say to the Ottawa mill-owners—because that is really the principal intention—that for two years they can continue throwing the saw-dust in as they have been doing in the past, and after that it will cease. That is really the object of this bill and if you pass this amendment you destroy the bill altogether.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood the purpose of the amendment was to exempt those streams where the law has not been enforced. It appears there are numbers of streams where they have got the exemption; at the same time the fishery inspector has not thought it worth while to enforce the law, as no substantial harm was done. The question was put to the minister whether those mills would be included, and he said: "Yes, all the mills," and I think it was echoed by the premier. I understand the object of the amendment is to include all those streams where the law has not been enforced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You propose to strike out the proviso.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—"That all the words in the first section after the words, 'provided always' in the 22nd and 23rd lines be struck out and the following words substituted therefor." Then you deprive the Governor in Council of the power to exempt any stream to which the law now applies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, no.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But I say yes. You exempt the streams on which the law has not been enforced in the past. Suppose there is a stream in some particular county to which the law has not been applied. You want to exempt that. That is very true, but you leave the Ottawa River just where it was under the law.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the use of saying "No, no."

Hon. Mr. POWER—The law has not been enforced as to the Ottawa River.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But it will be. If the Ottawa River has not been exempt from the operation of the law at any time it is because the law has not been put into force. You might just as well say that if a man steals a horse and is not arrested and put in jail, that therefore, he is exempt from theft, it is precisely the same in this case. I do not object personally, and I do not think my hon. friend does, to amending the bill if the House thinks that the proviso does not cover it. We would not object to the amendment on its merits, but it strikes out one of the principal clauses in this bill which gives power to the government to exempt those very streams.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If we could agree on a principle it would be easy to refer to the law clerk to have a proper amendment made at the next reading of the bill, so that it shall apply to streams where the law has not been enforced in the past, simply because it was not worth while and there was no injury done to the fisheries.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The meaning of the law is that it will apply to the streams where the exemption has been given so far and will cover cases where new exemptions may be asked for. Now, if the amendment which has been drafted by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley was adopted—I must compliment him upon the skill he has shown in the drafting of it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I do not need any compliment. I meant to exclude the Ottawa River.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I know the hon. member is an experimental farmer and very successful in the west, but it strikes me he is also a very skilful draughtsman, and I think the amendment has been drafted with a very great deal of skill. He deserves my compliment if his object was to defeat the bill. If the amendment is accepted, the Governor in Council will have no right to prevent the throwing of saw-dust in the future into a stream where there is no mill to-day. Now that is the point. If you accept the amendment you declare all streams exempt.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, you exempt them all, and allow everybody to throw saw-dust in every stream and you do not provide for a case where a new mill is put on a stream where there is none to-day, and where it would be destructive to the fisheries if you did put a mill there. You make every stream and river exempt under your amendment, whilst it should be left to the discretion of the Governor in Council to declare in reference to such a stream whether the saw-dust shall be thrown in the stream or not. Under the amendment the Governor in Council would have nothing to say until after 1897 in reference to it, and after 1897 nobody would have a right to throw any saw-dust in the stream whether it was contrary to law or not. I think the proviso laid down in the bill should be accepted. I shall read it to the House, because I think the House has forgotten the ground it covers :

Provided always that the Governor in Council may exempt from the operation of this subsection, wholly or partially, any stream or streams with respect to which he considers that its enforcement is not requisite in the public interest ; but no such exemption shall be granted or shall have any force or effect after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven.

Between this and then Parliament will have to deal with the subject, and the government will then be in a position to come here with a classification of rivers so as to declare which should be exempted and which should not.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

The consideration of the bill was resumed in committee of the whole.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—Before the House proceeds with the consideration of the bill, I wish to call attention to a report of yesterday's proceedings which appears in this evening's Journal. I find I am given credit for making a speech in the following words :

Senator Clewov, in renewing the discussion, said that, owing to the change of public opinion in Ottawa on the question, he would favour the present bill, which would exempt the operation of last year's bill for a period of two years.

Now, that is quite the contrary of what I did say. That speech was made by the hon. member from Ottawa, and I do not want to take credit for anything that he has said. I do not want to take credit for being able to change my opinion so greatly from one year to another as the hon. gentleman has done. I want him to have the full credit of it himself.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—Since six o'clock I have been considering the amendments, and while I feel very strongly on the subject of the bill generally and regret very much that this nuisance must be continued, I feel that the measure is for good on the whole and I should be sorry to see it defeated, as it must inevitably be, if this amendment be carried. The amendment is certainly couched in language that requires a good deal of study to understand. I have studied it during the interval and doubt whether I quite understand it yet. I think it was Talleyrand who said that language was given to man to conceal his thoughts. The best consideration that I have given to the amendment induces me to think that it is not one which should be accepted by this House, and although I feel very strongly upon the other point, I think it would be unworthy of me, if I failed to give to the House my conclusion after the best consideration I have been able to bestow upon the point since we last met. The difficulty to ordinary men in understanding provisions of law is over amplified expression—the number of words employed, and it has been suggested by some of those who have given most attention to the construction of law that the best process of arriving at the meaning is by eliminating as many words as possible. I have had before me since six o'clock the amendment to the proposed bill and the section in connection with it. Reducing both to the fewest words, to bring out their meaning, I would say the first section of the bill may be divided into two propositions: 1. It makes certain pollution of rivers and streams a penal offence, and provides for the imposition of penalties for commission of any act prohibited. 2. It enables the Governor in Council, in the public interest, to exempt certain streams from the operation of the law for a period not beyond 30th June, 1897. The amendment proposed does not touch the first proposition—but for the second proposition substitutes a provision, which may be shortly read as follows:—As to streams in which the law has not been enforced prior to the 1st of May last, the prohibition contained in the first prohibition shall not apply. Thus the amendment arbitrarily limits the penal clause to certain streams, and takes away all power from the Governor in Council to make any exemption or modification in respect to the numerous rivers and streams all over Canada—only lying between Canada and a foreign country. By the existing section and that proposed in the bill power is vested in the government (in the public interests)—to be brought into play at any time, and no government having regard to the objects of the enactment could accept such a position as the amendment embodies—it would be an abnegation of its functions. There the suggested amendment presupposes the government have exhausted its duties under the Fisheries Act in this particular, and has not, and cannot have, further information upon which it would be important, in the public interest, to have and exercise further the power of exemption; which is contrary to the fact, according to the statement of the honourable the Minister of Agriculture, and he mentioned several instances. I could not feel free to vote for this amendment. In such matters, we must necessarily confide in governmental discretion, trusting it will be wisely and justly exercised in the spirit, and according to the true intent, of the law—exercised without fear, favour, or affection. I am against the bill only so far as it continues to exempt the Ottawa River, I am not disposed to kill it by this means, and so must vote against the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is pleasant to argue with the hon. gentleman from Barrie, even though one differs from him, because the hon. gentleman appears to understand the effect of the amendment. The hon. gentleman intimated that it was difficult to see the meaning of the amendment, and he gave us to understand that he had taken all the time since 6 o'clock to find out and put down just what it meant. Now, the committee will pardon me if I trespass on their time to indicate that the meaning of the amendment is not so very difficult to ascertain. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in saying that the first portion of the enactment forbids certain things, and that a certain portion of the bill before the House gives power to the government to exempt, at their discretion any river or part of a river that they please, from the operation of the Act, up to the first of July, 1897. Let us take the law as it stands at present—section 6 of chapter 51 of the Acts of 1894, that is the law as it is at present. The first portion of the subsection there provides penalties, just as the first clause of the bill before the House does. Then the Act of last year goes on to provide that the penal provisions of the section shall not apply until on and after the first of May, 1895, to the saw-mill owners and the employees of any saw-mill situated on any stream which is wholly or partially exempted from the operations of the section thereby repealed, so that up to the first of May of the present year all mills which had previously been exempted from the operation of those prohibitory provisions were exempted under the Act of last year. The bill before us, which has come up from the House of Commons, makes this provision: as the law stands at the present moment, all those millers come under the prohibitory provisions of the first portion of this clause. The bill before the House provides that the Governor in Council may except from the operation of this subsection, wholly or partially, any stream or streams with respect to which he considers that its enforcement is not necessary in the public interest, but no such exemption shall have effect after the 30th of June, 1897, so it is left completely to the discretion of the Governor in Council to exempt any mill they please or refuse to exempt any mill at all. The Governor in Council may say to the owners of mills which have been exempted in the past that they shall not be exempted in the future. They can say that any mill-owner who has been obliged to comply with the law in the past shall not be obliged to comply with the law in the future. Is it a dignified position for Parliament to take to place such power in the hands of the Governor in Council? Parliament in its wisdom is supposed to settle the law, and we should settle it. We settled it last year, and this bill proposes to unsettle it again. The amendment strikes out the proviso which is in the bill before the House and says that this subsection shall not apply until the first day of May, 1897, to any river or part of a river or mill as to which the prohibitory provisions of the second subsection of section 15 of the Fisheries Act and the subsection substituted therefor by section 6 of chapter 51 of the Statutes of 1894 have been enforced prior to the 1st of May, 1895, but shall apply on and after the first day of May, 1897. That says distinctly that the prohibitory provisions shall not apply to any river or part of river or any mill as to which the law was not enforced prior to the first of May last. Take the case of the mills on the Ottawa River—the law has not been enforced as to them at any time. They were certainly exempt under the law of last year up to the first day of May, 1895, and they will be exempt under this amendment as clearly as anything can possibly be. Every mill throughout the country which has been exempt from the operation of the law will continue to be exempt; and further than that, it has happened in the case of some small mills in remote places that the law has not been enforced against them, the fisheries officers having either in writing or otherwise authorized the owners of these mills to keep them open. Under this amendment the law could not be enforced against those mill owners up to the first of May, 1897. That is a clear and reasonable proposition, and it avoids trouble for the government and saves those mill owners the necessity of coming to Ottawa, or corresponding with the department here, for the purpose of getting liberty to do what they have been doing in the past. The Minister of Agriculture said that one of the great objections to this amendment was that there might be some mill or river which had not been exempted in the past and which the government would like to exempt during the next two years, and the hon. gentleman said further that there was an officer out inquiring as to the characters of the different rivers, with a view to ascertaining as to which of the streams the law should be enforced, and as to which it should not. The hon. gentleman may have later information than I possess, but I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman's statement is not at the present moment correct. While the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries was in office he employed an officer who went around examining the different rivers in the maritime provinces with a view to doing what the hon. Minister says that Commander Wakeham is doing now, but when the change took place in the headship of the Department of Marine and Fisheries that officer was recalled and the examination discontinued. At any rate we have had this law in force in this form since 1868, and surely 27 years ought to be a long enough period to allow governments of both parties to find out as to what rivers the law should be enforced and as to what rivers it should not. Surely the hon. Minister does not want two years more, in addition to the 27 already expended in this inquiry. With a view to our own consistency, with a view to relieving the government of an embarrassment which must be very painful to them, and with a view of relieving the mill owners of the country from all anxiety, we should pass this amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—While this discussion has been going on I have been endeavouring to catch the drift of the opinion of the House, and I think a very few words would express it and not disturb the government's policy in the slightest particular. The words which I propose to add are as follows :

Provided also that streams in reference to which the law has not heretofore been enforced shall also be exempt from the operation of this subsection up to the 30th June, 1897.

That is, I understand, what the minister said last night.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I expressed a willingness on the part of the government to grant any further exemptions that would be justifiable, but they have to be justified, and I have very serious objection to adding the words that the hon. member from Ottawa has just read to the House, because they would prevent the government forbidding the throwing of saw-dust, in case it should be found objectionable in the case of a new mill established in the future.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The law has not been put in force where there are no mills at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can put mills on streams if you like ?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Yes, but that would be very objectionable. I have given an instance from my own experience and knowledge—I mentioned the Cascapedia, of which the Escuminac River is a tributary. The salmon do not go up that tributary. There is very little fishing in it at all. A few salmon trout, perhaps, go up, which are always objectionable in a salmon river because they feed on the spawn. On the Escuminac River there is a most valuable water power, but there is no mill on it at present. If a mill was put on it to-morrow, under the proviso of the hon. member from Ottawa, the government could not prevent it, and you would be turning saw-dust into the Cascapedia River right where the salmon enter it. I have been there myself, and I know the place. It would be most objectionable, because you would be destroying 40 or 50 miles of the most valuable salmon fishing in the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Escuminac has not been exempted.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, but under that proviso it would be exempt. If a new mill was put up there we could not prevent them throwing in the saw-dust and you would be ruining the salmon river. I think the wording of this proviso, as it is, covers the case fully. The hon. member from Halifax stated that under the late Minister of Marine an officer had been inquiring about the value of the rivers, but that this is not being done now. I refer the hon. member to words uttered by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the Hon. Mr. Costigan, as reported at page 2646 of the Hansard. He will see there that the same inquiry which was being made under Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper is now being continued. Of course, it is not continued from day to day, because Mr. Wakeham has other occupations. He is on the International Commission in relation to the fisheries between the United States and Canada on the Upper Lakes, and his work is not completed from day to day, but he is still vested with his mission, and as circumstances allow, the investigation will be going on. The hon. member can read the statement for himself in the debate on this bill in the other House. I do not see that the House has been offered an acceptable amendment. I quite agree with the hon. member from Barrie, and I must confess that he has acted with a great deal of generosity in this matter. Although opposed to the principle of the bill in itself he confesses that from his own interpretation—and it is my own also—if this amendment was accepted it would be practically a defeat of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have altered the proviso that I proposed so as to make it read as follows :

Provided also that the existing mills on streams in reference to which the law has not heretofore been enforced shall also be exempt from the operations of this subsection up to the 30th June, 1897.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That would not apply to new mills ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course not. They would not have built mills for two years.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I cannot see the advantage of either amendment that has been proposed. As I understand this bill, both in the case of those streams which are exempted and in the case of the Ottawa River, it puts a stop to those exemptions altogether in 1897. Then, with regard to this subsection 2 of clause one, it seems to me those amendments would have just this effect: My hon. friend said no man would put up a mill for two years, that is not altogether so improbable, but apart from that, if any change in circumstances should render it desirable in any way to limit this exemption with regard to any stream running into a salmon river, or in which it might be desirable to preserve the trout fishing it would effectually take out of the hands of the government the power of enforcing the exemption with regard to such streams. That is the effect it would have, and I do not see anything to be gained by it.

The committee divided on the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Perley, which was rejected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I now submit my amendment. I am quite prepared to put it in any shape that will be acceptable. There is this fact which is undeniable—that there are streams now in existence in the maritime provinces where the law has not been enforced, small streams where there has been no exemption because it was not thought worth while. This proposed amendment of mine applies to those cases and those only. The case put by the hon. senator from Toronto does not apply, for the reason that there are a number of mills on streams where exemption has not been applied for, but where from time immemorial the mills have been working with the knowledge of fisheries inspectors, and no action has been taken against them.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—They would go on in the same way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; they would have to apply for an exemption and therefore I thought if the words were added:

And provided also that existing mills on streams in reference to which the law has not been heretofore enforced shall also be exempt from the operation of this section until the 30th June, 1897.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Let them apply for exemption.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman said distinctly that the law would not be made to apply to those small mills.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—My conversation was with the hon. gentleman from Hope-well. I said that the government would have no objection to granting exemption during that period of two years if application was made, but that the government should exercise its discretion in the matter. One may think the mill refuse is not injurious, and the officer of the department may think it is, and it is left to the discretion of the Governor in Council. In the past this discretion has been judiciously and wisely exercised and I think it should be continued for that period.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I am in favour of some such amendment as this for the reason that I gave yesterday. No exemption was applied for in the cases to which I referred. They were small mills. I instanced a case in which a mill-owner was put to a very great expense through the temporary enforcement of the law. In many cases it is quite an inconvenience to mill-owners to go to the expense of making application for exemption. Where there has been no enforcement for years, I am satisfied that there will be no actual enforcement in years to come, and this amendment is simply to provide for those particular establishments that they shall not come under the operation of the law for two years, thus putting every one on an equality. You now propose exempting some ten or fifteen rivers besides those which have heretofore been exempted by Order in Council. Why not include those others which have not been under the operation of the law, because the law has not been enforced? However, the minister has assured me privately, and in his place in the Senate, that the enforcement of the law will not take place and that these people will not be put to the inconvenience that they might otherwise be subjected to by local fisheries officers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—If a thing is worth having it is worth speaking for. My answer is again that if there are such cases as the hon. gentleman points out, where it would not be injurious in the opinion of the Fisheries Department to fish life, let them apply for the exemption. That is plain enough.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There are other things as important as saw-dust

We have had quite enough of that article for the last two or three days. There is another question of some importance, and that is the pollution of the rivers in British Columbia by the throwing in of offal. I suppose the Minister will be able to tell us what is the intention of the government with regard to the Fraser and other rivers, whether they are going to allow this offal to be thrown in?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The hon. member for Victoria drew the attention of the House at the beginning of this debate to the fact that he now refers to a second time. The attention of the House was so much absorbed by the Ottawa River, and this bill has been so entirely discussed from the point of view of the Ottawa interest, that I really forgot to give the hon. member an answer to his question in relation to the throwing of fish offal into the Fraser River. Application had been made, I know indirectly, for the privilege of throwing into the river what is called the offal from the canneries. My present information is that the application has not been sustained, and I may tell the House that I think the practice is most objectionable. Fish offal is more objectionable than saw-dust, from the fact that it poisons the water and destroys the fish. On the Atlantic coast the fishermen who fish for cod are not allowed to cut and throw the offal into the ocean, or near the shore, for the reason that it destroys cod-fishing. On the same principle, I think that the offal should not be thrown into the Fraser River or any of the salmon rivers of British Columbia. My information is that on the Fraser River the offal every day amounts to 200 tons. That is an enormous quantity; it is established that during the good fishing season which lasts about six weeks—

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, six weeks or two months.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—that it amounts to about 200 tons a day. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the valuable industry that could be built up by establishing factories for making artificial manure of this offal. It is spoken of as likely to be used for that purpose. However I shall make it my duty to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine to this subject, and shall be in a position later on to give the hon. gentleman a definite answer, but I give him now my own personal opinion as to the objection to throwing fish offal into the river.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I withdraw the amendment if the sense of the House is not in favour of it.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I have an amendment to propose to subsection 1 which I do not think will meet with any objection; it is simply that the 30th April, 1897, be substituted for the 30th June, 1897. The sawing season only commences on the 30th May, and it is unnecessary to extend so late as June.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Is it worth while to amend the bill for that?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—If there is an amendment is there not a chance, at this late stage of the session, of its not passing through the Commons.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I move that all after the word "council" in the 36th line of subsection 2 be struck out, because it exempts the parties who have been violating the law—whitewashing them. They are to be relieved from the penalties incurred for the acts committed by them within the last two months in direct violation of the law. I do not think it is a correct principle. It is establishing a bad precedent, and I do not want it to be recorded on the statute that the people of this country disregard Acts of Parliament when they are in existence, and particularly so when the principal offender is an adviser of Her Majesty in the Ontario Government. This House should denounce actions of that sort. This House will agree with me that that clause should be stricken out, and whatever penalties the mill-owners have incurred in the past should remain. No actions have been taken yet, but I do not want it to go abroad that this Parliament will countenance outrages of this kind to be perpetrated upon the people with impunity. Our people are law-abiding and support any law in existence, but we find these mill-men deliberately violating the law and now we are asked to pass an Act to relieve them from the consequences of their conduct. I want a vote on this question, and if it is not carried in committee I shall be prepared to move this amendment on the third reading so that we may have a full vote of the Senate on this matter put on record. That is why I move the amendment now. There are legal gentlemen here who will tell me whether I am right or wrong in desiring that, as far as this Act is concerned, there should not be a condonation of those violations of the law.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The object of the clause is to relieve the parties from the penalties. The language of it is clear. There are two reasons for doing this; one I gave the other day, that when the Senate last year introduced an amendment to the Bill from the House of Commons, this House was not supplied with the necessary information; because if they had been they would not have introduced the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a reflection on the action of Parliament and it is very unparliamentary.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—No, it is not a reflection on the action of Parliament last year, because, as I have explained, it came late in the session at a time when a number of the members of this House had gone and the subject did not receive the discussion and attention that it required. That is what I stated, and I give that as a justification for the mistake we made last year. That is one argument. I now invoke the action of the Senate. They have adopted the first clause by a large majority of this House. We have acknowledged that it was right that the exemption should be made. That is the case before us; yesterday we voted it, to-day we have adopted the clause, and that is the second reason. The third reason why the penalty should not be exacted is that previous to the penalties being incurred the Parliament of Canada was seized with this very bill which had been introduced in the House of Commons and which was under discussion there, and under the circumstances, when the people whom this law affects were informed that Parliament was proceeding with a bill to exempt them from the fines, is it reasonable to expect that they would have closed their mills to the great disadvantage of the public from the first of May until to-day? I leave it to the House to say, for those three reasons, whether it is not right that the mill-owners should be exempt from the penalties. That is my reason for supporting the clause of the bill and opposing the amendment.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN—The reason given by the hon. Minister does not commend itself to my mind. As I understand him, he says that parliament had acted hastily and made a mistake, but surely he will not say that the mistake of parliament could in any way excuse the mill-owners from violating a plain law with impunity. The second ground the hon. Minister gives for relieving them of those penalties is that the matter had been early brought up for amendment in the House of Commons, and that therefore the mill-owners might naturally suppose that the law would pass. I cannot see that the mill-owners had any right to conclude, because the matter was introduced in parliament, that it would therefore become law. That would be a very dangerous principle to lay down, and a very dangerous one for people to act upon. There was a law on the statute book and it ought to have been obeyed. I do not think the fact that the matter was introduced in the House forms an excuse for the violation of a plain law. These men have violated the law and now it is proposed to indemnify them for their violation. The amount of the fine is not material to consider. As my hon. friend says, there may be no effort to enforce the collection of these fines but still you establish a precedent. I think that you violate a very sound principle in making a present to these gentlemen, as practically you do, of the amount for which they are liable.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from the Rideau division, in speaking of the improper action of a gentleman who happened to be a mill-owner and member of the Ontario government, omitted a very important circumstance, which I shall supply. Unless I am misinformed—and the Prime Minister or his assistant minister here can correct me if I am wrong—

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—There is no assistant minister here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am credibly informed that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries gave these millers an assurance that the law would not be enforced as to that, and that this measure would be introduced. Adding this circumstance to the circumstances mentioned by the minister, I think it would be an unfair thing to take advantage of the fact that those gentlemen relied upon the Government and Parliament to do this.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The House was virtually seized with the bill previous to their incurring any large portion of the fine, if any at all, as I understand.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—The hon. gentleman said that last year, when the bill was before the House, there was a small attendance. My recollection is that there was a good attendance and it was pretty well discussed. He also says that the action of the Senate was not borne out by facts. The action of the Senate was borne out by facts elicited seven years prior to that. Every act was done with the full approbation of the Senate and the government, and not a step was taken without their concurrence. He speaks of the first clause being passed and that therefore the bill is to become law. It is not a law because we submit to it to-night. It is not a law until it receives the royal assent, and I intend to put a notice on the paper to take the sense of the House on those two points. It has not yet received the Governor's approval and those men are just as much at fault in violating the law now as they were a month ago. I think it is an outrage on this country. I am afraid if we continue legislating in this line, we will get the opprobrium that attached some years ago to the people in the south of Ireland. They say there that money and influence would relieve them from the penalty for any criminal act committed by them. I am sorry to see an act put on the statute book to exonerate men for breaking a law which they understood perfectly well. I know not whether the Minister of Marine gave them an assurance that they would not be interfered with, but I claim that he had no right to do so any more than I would have. Any assurance that he could give was as valueless as waste paper until it received the sanction of Parliament. Under all the circumstances the House will see that my proposition is a fair one, and that these men should remain under the condition in which they are at present, in standing before the public as violators of a law enacted for the protection of the interests of the great majority of the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I would say to the hon. gentleman from Rideau, that I was prepared to vote with him if he had divided the House the other night, but now I am opposed to him entirely. It would be a strange thing if this Senate were to punish the mill-men by taking a little money out of them. Surely we have not come down to that. It is very important to keep the Ottawa river open, but my vote will not be cast to punish these men and take money out of them, because there is no doubt they have been throwing saw-dust into the Ottawa for years, and thought they had a right to do it.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—It is not the money at all; it is the principle that these men have been violating the law, and it is not right for us to relieve them.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—It strikes me that as parliament has decided to adopt the principle of this bill, and as it will certainly be enacted into law, it would be a very strange kind of procedure to have the millmen subject to the penalty, when by passing the bill we acknowledge that last year we made a mistake and put on the statute-book a law which was not a good law, and which, upon further consideration, we now repeal. Surely it would be a necessary and logical deduction from passing this bill that it would be wrong to impose a penalty upon people who broke a law which we acknowledge to be a bad law that should not have been enacted at all. If you take away those words we give a chance to any person so disposed to make trouble with the millowners by taking action against them.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—In principle, I agree with the doctrine laid down by the hon. member for Barrie, that those people have incurred the fine, and it is because of that doctrine that the government come now with this very bill to relieve them. The matter is not new; we have already passed in many instances bills of indemnity. A man through misfortune may infringe the law, but we do not cut his head off. Instead of doing that, we come to Parliament, influenced by considerations of equity and justice, and obtain legislation. As has been pointed out, we made a mistake last year; the language of the bill now justifies me in saying so, and should we subject those men to the spite of one or two people and have them liable to the penalty for ever? If we relieve them from the obligation we should also relieve them from the penalties which might be enforced through the spite and ill-will of others.

The amendment was lost.

The clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY BELT LANDS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (M) "An Act for the settlement of certain questions between the government of Canada and British Columbia, relating to lands in the railway belt, British Columbia." He said: The House will remember that British Columbia granted to the Dominion of Canada a belt of land of 20 miles on each side of the Canadian Pacific Railway to aid in the construction of that line. The terms of union are to be found in extenso on page 88 of the statutes of Canada for 1872. Certain questions have arisen in connection with the handing over of this belt to the Dominion, notably with regard to the delimitation of the belt, the settlement of the title granted by the province and the question of the registration of patents issued by the Dominion Government. Negotiations, having for their object the clearing up of all points of difference, were suspended at the time of the death of the late Sir John Thompson, but have been resumed by the Minister of the Interior. Before proceeding further in the matter it is desirable that the minister should be invested with authority which will enable him to conclude an agreement with the province which shall have the effect of setting at rest all the questions in dispute. I will not weary the House with a statement of what those differences are, but I can explain in a few words the object of the bill. At the union of the provinces, when the Dominion agreed to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was agreed, as part of the aid to be given to that railway, that the British Columbia Government should cede to the Dominion twenty miles of the territory or land on either side of the railway. Great difficulties have arisen in the delimitation of that belt, from the fact that it is so winding and crooked. To take the twenty miles following exactly the course of the road was found to be not only inconvenient but almost impossible. An agreement was entered into between the present government of British Columbia, the Minister of the Interior, myself, and another member of the Cabinet, by which the land to be ceded should be laid out in square blocks; that is, it will run to the north and to the south on either side, and it will be cut off in square blocks or townships as the case may be. In some cases it may not be over ten or twelve or fifteen miles from the line of the railway, while in other cases, perhaps, immediately adjoining that township it will run back to the twenty or twenty-five miles. This was the best and about the only means that could be adopted to come to an amicable settlement upon that question. Then there was another difficulty which has also been amicably arranged. It was the sale by the British Columbia Government of certain lands after the line of the road had been located. Under the terms of union the land lying within the twenty miles belongs to the Dominion. Take Revelstoke as an illustration. Had that place been sold previous to the location of the line, the government of British Columbia would have been entitled to the proceeds arising from these sales. A dispute arose on that question, which was taken to the courts, and the courts decided against the British Columbia Government. The British Columbia Government and the Dominion have come to an arrangement. The Dominion Government does not exact what might be considered the full value of the town lands and other lands, at the present moment, but they have agreed to accept from the British Columbia Government the amount which they received for the property at the time they sold.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the Revelstoke lands?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it applies to all in case there are any others. Another difficulty arose: when the Dominion Government contested this point with the British Columbia Government, they refused to register any titles that were given to the lots in Revelstoke in their registry office. They have agreed now, under this settlement, to treat patents given by the Dominion Government in the same manner as they do their own. The latter clause gives power to settle any other difficulty arising in the settlement of this great question. The third clause provides:

3. Any agreement so entered into may make such provision as may be thought proper for the settlement of controversies and claims arising out of grants made by the government of the province of lands in the railway belt after the line of the said railway had been finally settled.

Then it gives power to the Governor in Council to ratify the provisions of any agreement entered into in pursuance of this act. That is about the principle of the bill and I think the House will recognize the importance of passing a bill of this kind to legalize and put beyond all future dispute any question as to which a settlement may be come to between the parties.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a very important question which I lost track of, and that is the question of the royalty or sovereignty of that belt. If the province gives a grant of land to me, the sovereignty remains in the province, but the province having given a grant of land to the Dominion, where does the royalty lie? I believe this question arises on account of the minerals in Kootenay. Who collects the revenue for the mining license within the railway belt?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I speak under correction in answering that question, but if my recollection serves me right, the law lords of the Privy Council decided that the minerals belong to the province.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The precious metals?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Precious metals only.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The precious metals belong to the province and not to the Dominion, precious metals which may be situated in the 20 miles belt. So far as the Kootenay is concerned, that belongs to the province of British Columbia, because it is beyond the 20 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—So that the royalty of the belt belongs to the province still?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the precious metals only.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the chief thing. Coal does not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The coal and the base metals were held by the Privy Council to be vested in the Federal Government, and the precious metals in the province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the plan adopted is a very good one for laying out the reserve. Of course the line is so full of sinuosities that it would be difficult to have two correct lines through-out.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is only one better way and that is to relinquish the whole belt to the province. That would be the simplest way out of the difficulty. I suppose the administration of those lands costs the government more than they get out of them. It would be a very simple matter to hand over the whole reserve and let the province make their own surveys and arrange other matters. However, I suppose that is something to be thought of hereafter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps we might do in this case as we did on a former occasion, give the 20-mile belt and take in exchange part of the Peace River district which lies east of the Rocky Mountains and is within British Columbia. The hon. gentleman will remember that we did receive two or three million acres of land in that section of the North-west Territories, and the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman might possibly be advisable—we might take the balance of the land that lies east of the Rocky Mountains belonging to British Columbia up to the Peace River district and give British Columbia the rocks.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Yes, that might be done.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

THIRD READINGS.

The following bills passed through Committee of the Whole without amendment, and were read the third time and passed:—

Bill (113) "An Act to amend chapter 10 of the statutes of 1892 respecting the Harbour Commissioners of Three Rivers."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

Bill (122) "An Act further to amend the general Inspection Act."—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (123) "An Act to amend the Public Works Act."

Hon. Mr. PERLEY, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will let the third reading stand until to-morrow, until I ascertain whether the word "works" covers land as well as buildings.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The French edition does not agree with the English version.

The third reading was fixed for to-morrow.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, July 4th, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BANKERS' LIFE ASSOCIATION BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill

(26) "An Act to incorporate the Bankers' Life Association of Canada." He said: It appears from the minutes that the previous report was concurred in with the exception of the name. That was the only reason it was reported back to the committee, and the committee have now substituted the word "Merchants" for "Bankers." If the House approves of that name there is no reason why the report should not be concurred in at once.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the report be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (81) "An Act to incorporate the Ontario Accident Insurance Co."

Bill (90) "An Act respecting the Oshawa Railway Co."—(Mr. Dobson.)

THE MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—In the Gazette of this morning I notice the following:—

THE MONTREAL HARBOUR WORKS.

Messrs. Hy. Bulmer, Andrew Allan and Mayor Villeneuve, of the Montreal Harbour Commission, were to-day in connection with harbor matters. They had an interview with Mr. Ouimet, Minister of Public Works, who is earnestly endeavouring to meet the wishes of the commissioners, as well as with the Finance Minister. It is desired to obtain from the government an advance of $500,000 on harbour 4 per cent bonds for the purpose of prosecuting the plan of harbour improvement now in hand, and an early answer to the request is requested. The report of the engineers who recently examined plan No. 6, although not yet made public, is understood to favour its execution with some slight modifications.

I have been asking for documents lately in relation to this subject, and it is very important that they should be laid before the Senate, so that members can have them when the question comes before the House, as there is a difference of opinion on the question of plan number six, and I should like to know what they will do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I saw Mr. Bulmer in the corridor yesterday, but he did not intimate to me what his reasons were for visiting the city. He might possibly have had an interview with the Finance Minister, perhaps with Mr. Ouimet, but of the result of that interview I have no knowledge. I regret very much that the papers have not been brought down at an earlier date so that my hon. friend could see them in order to enable him the better to discuss this question, but I will make inquiry immediately and try to hurry them up.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS moved the third reading of Bill (67) "An Act further to amend the Fisheries Act."

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—I gave notice yesterday of some amendments which I intended to propose to this bill, but I presume it is unnecessary to continue my opposition any further. I regret that there has been so much discussion on this subject, and I have no desire to prolong it. I only hope that the evidence which has been submitted to the House will have the effect of putting an end to this saw-dust nuisance in the near future. I was compelled, by force of circumstances, to pursue the course that I have followed for some years in relation to this question. The Senate took up the matter some nine years ago and came to a deliberate conclusion that something should be done to relieve the public of a nuisance which was becoming intolerable. I think the Senate will recognize the fact that I have performed a public duty in this matter. I only regret that some action was not taken years before. It is unfortunate that the report of a committee of this House on the question had so little effect. Their views ought to have had considerable force, particularly in the Senate, composed as it is of men who are able to give a calm deliberate judgment on matters affecting the general interests of the country. I hope that the government will take the matter into their consideration and that such arrangements will be made as will put an end to this serious evil. I know from personal experience that this section of the country is suffering very severely by the depositing of saw-dust in the river, and on that account we are perfectly justified in the steps we have taken to remedy the evil. Two years will soon pass over, and then we will see whether those millmen have any idea of meeting the views of parliament. I hope that the government will have sufficient backbone to see that they do, but unless they put on the screws in the meantime, the millmen will make no change and we will find them going on in the same way with a constantly increasing evil. It would be a lamentable thing if, after all the efforts which have been put forth to put a stop to the nuisance, we should find ourselves no better off at the expiration of two years. The government no doubt have faith in the millmen, but I frankly say I have none at all, and my opinion is that they have not the slightest intention of making any change until they are compelled by some power greater than any that exists today. It seems that they can transgress the law with perfect impunity; they will always have influence enough to secure protection from the consequences of their acts. I apologize to the Senate for having taken so much of their time in the discharge of a duty which was an exceedingly disagreeable one to me. I have done my best in the public interest, and while the result may not be satisfactory to me, I hope in the end it will be satisfactory to the country. At all events, I shall take steps to let the public know the facts of the case and the extent of the nuisance, after the close of the session.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I cannot allow the third reading of the bill to take place without an expression of the regret which I feel, and which I am sure is shared by many members of this House, that I have been obliged to take a different view of this question from that of the hon. gentleman from Rideau. I have no doubt he has been influenced by the most conscientious motives. Necessarily he must have made enemies for himself amongst the mill-owners with whom he has social intercourse, and he deserves great credit for the pertinacity with which he has pursued what he thought was the right course. Many of us agree with him that the sawdust in the river is objectionable for many reasons, but we cannot close our eyes to the financial injury which would take place to the owners of the mills, to their employees and to the country generally if this bill were not allowed to become law. I have been obliged to vote against the hon. member, but in doing so I can assure him of the personal regard which I have for him.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (123) "An Act to amend the Public Works Act." He said: I find on reference to the interpretation clause of the Public Works Act that the term "public work" includes work or property under the control of the government. Hence the wording of the bill is correct.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

SECOND READING.

Bill (124) "An Act further to amend the Act to readjust the representation in the House of Commons."—(Mr. Angers.)

BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY BELT LANDS BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (M) "An Act for the settlement of certain questions between the government of Canada and British Columbia relating to lands in the railway belt, British Columbia."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise for the purpose of asking whether there has been any legislation in the past in connection with this matter. It seems to me there must have been. There is no reference in the bill to any such legislation, and if there has been legislation in the Parliament of Canada there should be some mention of it and the bill should be drawn with reference to that legislation. Is it possible that all the agreements have been made on the part of Canada without legislation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under the terms of union, it was necessary for the British Columbia legislature to legislate in order to transfer to the Dominion the 20 miles belt on either side of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That legislation did take place. I referred to that last night when introducing the bill. On reference to the statutes of British Columbia, it will be seen that there was granted to the Dominion of Canada, the 20 mile belt. The terms of union, in which it is provided that the Dominion shall construct the Canadian Pacific Railway through the Rocky Mountains to the coast, provided that this 20 mile belt should be conceded by British Columbia as a bonus, if I may so term it, in aid of the construction of the railway, and the British Columbia legislature granted that belt by an Act of Parliament. This Bill is simply to enable the Government to define the line of the territory which we are to receive on either side of the road and also to provide that they shall register the titles which we may give to lands situated within that belt.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I understood the First Minister, one of the objects of this legislation is to enable the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia to agree that the lands need not be necessarily situated on either side of the railway but may be of different widths in different places. It would be well to have the British Columbian Act before us to see if it contains provisions as to the way the land should be laid out, Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—After this Bill becomes law the British Columbia legislature will pass an Act confirming the bargain and that will settle the whole matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has not been any legislation on the subject, but there has been a vast deal of litigation which has been going on for a great many years. The Federal Government undertook to sell lands and the British Columbia Government desired to save the pre-emptive right of a number of parties who had settled on this land. Unfortunately, the two governments had not had that proper understanding that they should have had on the subject. The British Columbia Government disputed that the railway belt took anything more than the surface of the land. That question had to go to the Privy Council. The British Columbia Government passed an Act at their last sitting, in February, in which they give very similar powers to their Governor in Council and they declare, just as this bill declares, that the agreement made between the Governor in Council and the Governor General in Council shall have the binding effect of an Act of Parliament. It also stipulates that some 45,700 acres that the British Columbia Government had sold shall be exempt from this land, and that an amount pro tanto is to be allotted to the Dominion Government from land outside. I quite approve of the way that it has been settled, because it would have cost more than the thing is worth to make the surveys as the winding character of the railway required, and therefore a very proper limitation is being adopted in making parallelogram blocks on each side. The provisions of the British Columbia Act are similar to those in the bill before us except that there is no reference to the 45,700 acres, which I do not think is necessary, because it was understood that the British Columbia Government were to get a title to that in order to give titles to those in occupation. The Act also provides that the Order in Council of the British Columbia Government shall have the effect of an Act of the provincial legislature.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (91) "An Act to amend the law respecting the Lobster Fishery." (Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

Bill (134) "An Act to legalize payments heretofore made to the general revenue fund of the North-west Territories of certain fines, penalties and forfeitures." (Mr. Angers.)

The Senate then adjourned.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The session is drawing to a close and many members are anxious to know if we are to have any more important legislation, particularly with reference to the Manitoba school question?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I think I shall be enabled to give the House definite information upon the particular point to which the hon. gentleman has called attention at the opening of the session on Monday. I may intimate that there will be no new legislation of any importance that I am aware of in addition to that which is already before the two branches of Parliament this session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do I understand that the government have not yet decided upon the legislation with regard to the school question?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I do not think I gave any intimation as to whether they have decided or not. I said I hoped to be able on Monday to give the House definite information as to what course would be pursued by the government. My reference to other legislation meant to other than that to which the hon. gentleman referred.

LOBSTER FISHERY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (91) "An Act to amend the law respecting the Lobster Fishery." He said:—Before this bill is read the second time, perhaps I had better give a short explanation as to what is proposed by this bill. The changes are not of a very important character in one sense, but they may be important to those engaged in the trade. The license for canning is still maintained in the proposed bill. The law, as it stands now, imposes a uniform fee of $10. The bill proposes to have the fee graduated in this manner: A graduated fee of $2 for 100 cases, each case to contain 48 1-pound cans. A factory putting up 200 cases, $4; 300 cases, $6; 500 cases, $10; 800 cases, $16, and any fraction of 100 cases will pay $2; hence, 250 cases will require a fee of $6. It makes this distinction, instead of charging each factory a fee of $10, the amount is graduated in the manner which I have indicated. The present law provides that lobster traps shall have laths or slats one inch and a half apart. The present bill does away with that restriction as to the size of the slats, for the reason, as I am informed, that it is a matter of no consequence what the size of the slats is, and it is better not to hamper the trade in that respect. At present, the boats and gears must bear the owner's name and number of the boat. The department has found that that regulation is somewhat onerous on the small boats engaged in this trade, and hence there is a clause to repeal that regulation, particularly as we are dealing in this bill with the lobster factories and not the fisheries, except in regard to the placing of the name and number upon each boat that is used in the business. The present law provides that a case must bear the official stamp with the name, address and year of the packing before being removed from the country. The House will remember we had a long discussion upon that question some one or two sessions ago. It has been found that to exact full compliance with this would be detrimental to the trade in foreign countries. The present law provides that the cases must bear official stamps, but without the particulars which I have indicated, of the name of the packers and the year in which it is packed. That portion of the clause is repealed. The department has come to the conclusion that in the interest of the trade a stamp placed on the package indicating that it has been properly packed at the proper season and in good order, is quite sufficient. I do not mean to say that it is fancy, but people purchasing in another market think that lobsters which may have been canned one or two years would not be as good as those which were canned the year in which they are placed upon the market. It is contended, however, that if they are hermetically sealed, so that the air cannot reach the fish and if they have not been exposed to the sun, that the lobsters are just as good as if they had been packed only a month or two before. I believe the department has come to this conclusion, after a good deal of investigation, and upon the recommendation of the scientific men that they have employed in that department. Clause "a" gives power to the Minister to permit cases to be removed from one factory to another before they are stamped, and it is to meet the case of where those engaged in the business have two or three small places in which they do packing, and one large one, they can all be taken to the larger factories and there finally packed and labeled. Number 6 provides that when lobsters are imported from any other country they must bear a special stamp, which is specified, as being imported. Other parts of the bill are the same as the law now upon the statute book. In brief, the special points in the present bill are graduated fees, a stamp sufficient for the purposes of the department, but bearing no name, address or year of packing, which has been found to be objectionable to packers and not necessary in the interests of the trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—From the very hasty examination, I have been able to give the bill, I am inclined to consider it rather an improvement on the present law. The general tendency of the bill is in the direction of less interference with the trade than there has been under previous legislation. There is just one point as to which there may be some question. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when the bill to amend the Fisheries' Act came before this House last year, it contained a provision with respect to the marking of packages of lobsters which was deemed objectionable, and an amendment was made by this House which required that every case or package should be stamped with the name of the packer, and with the year in which the packing took place. Instead of that now, there is to be a stamp—not such a stamp as was required by the bill of last year, but something in the nature of a postage stamp—a stamp which costs two cents, and the packer simply puts one of those stamps on the outside of the case when it is packed. Probably we shall have time to consider this before the bill goes into committee, but there is some doubt as to whether it is a judicious thing to say that the packer shall not be obliged to put his name on the article which he puts up. I dare say it will be more advantageous to the packer not to put his name on, but in the interests of the consumer and the public, I am disposed to think it would be better that the name of the packer should be on the case. A packer will not put his name, as a rule, on inferior fish, and any one who buys canned lobsters would look upon the name of the packer as being a guarantee of the quality of the fish in the package. I see the force of the statement made by the first Minister that there is some objection to putting the year of packing on the package, because where the can is properly sealed the fish will remain good for an indefinite period, and perhaps the putting of the date of the packing on the package might unduly injure the sale of the goods. My present impression is that the name of the packer ought to be on the package. It may be that when we go into committee my view will be changed.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There being packing done within a few miles of where I reside, I know this bill will have the approval not only of the packers, but also of those who catch the fish. It was an inconvenience to many of our fishermen to be required to have their gear and boats and traps marked, named and numbered, and it had no beneficial effect. I have doubts as regards the regulation respecting the date and the name of the packer. My impression is that age does deteriorate the fish in the cans. Some years ago some cans were left in my cellar which were forgotten. They were there five or six years and when they were taken out they were not fit for food. It may have been due to bad defects in the sealing or the quality of the tin, but I think it was rather from age. I am under the impression that cans should be marked with the name of the packer. Every man who packs fish should take a pride in putting up fish of good quality. There are three or four packers in the county of Lunenburg, and I know one especially that I preferred canned lobsters done up to all others. The public, the consumers, will be at a loss hereafter to discriminate between that company's packing and the others, unless they have a registered made work. Therefore, I say that we should have the name of the packer and the date of the packing. In every other way I think the bill is an improvement.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is rather unfortunate that this industry should be legislated for and upon so very often as it has been of late years. Almost every session we have a bill before us making alterations with a view to improve the law in reference to this fishery. Notwithstanding all that, the experience of packers is that the industry is becoming less remunerative every year, and it is only a question of time, and that a very short time, when the industry will become unprofitable altogether. I do not think it is possible that lobster packing will exhaust the fish, but I believe in a short time it will exhaust and ruin the packers. It is not the competition so much as the reduction in size of the lobsters still found in our waters. The lobsters are very productive and have a better instinct in preserving their young in a successful way than any other fish, as they carry about the spawn with them until they become animated from the shell. Their instinct induces them to seek shelter under rocks, where other fish, especially made to live upon the spawn of others, cannot get at them. The large amount of fishing carried on around our coast is using up all the large and profitable lobsters, and there is scarcely anything but the small unremunerative lobster to be canned. These are being canned. One packer says "I may as well carry on the business as my neighbour, as long as I can." I have had some experience of the business having managed lobster canning establishments for some years. The lobsters are smaller in size than they were, and the recommendation is made to try the experiment of fishing in the fall of the year instead of the spring. I have not much faith in this suggestion. I do not think it would be profitable for the packer because the fall storms come on and loss would be incurred by the destruction of traps and ropes and so on. If the traps were put in the water then, it would exhaust the lobsters as rapidly as it would in the spring, or more so. A great mistake has been made by the department in extending the season 10 days. That is calculated to injure the fishery to a large extent—not only that, but to destroy confidence in the markets abroad. I have to refer to another matter which is an injury to the industry, and which no doubt the government has adopted with the best intention. They have established a sort of fisheries department through the provinces to give reports of the extent of the success of the fishing throughout the province, and if you will look at those reports you will see invariably that during the first part of the season lobster fishing is reported very good indeed—very good on the north side of the island, very fair on the west side, middling on the south—on the whole good, but at the end of the season it has been found that the fishing was less remunerative than ever. We sell very little lobster in Canada. Most of it goes to Great Britain and the United States, and these reports go there also and are read, and it has a very bad effect on the speculative markets because when the wholesale buyers, jobbers and speculators see the reports of large quantities of lobsters being taken, it limits the demand and there is no inclination to go into speculation. I think the reports from those departments are doing no good but a great deal of injury to the trade. I believe the remedy—and it is well to express it here in order that it may go to the country and be read—is to close down the lobster packing industries altogether for one year out of every four or one year out of every three. I say this from my experience some years ago when I was managing two lobster factories. In operating one factory there was a loss in the operation during one year of $800. The result was I closed up that factory for one year. The season following it paid very well and continued to pay well for years afterwards. It gave the lobster on that part of the coast a chance to grow and increase. That has been my experience, and I think the suggestion is worthy of consideration, if it is going to benefit the industry, that they shall close down every third or fourth year, but before doing so there should be one year's notice given to the packers, in order that they may use up their cans and material on hand. One remark in reference to what was said by the hon. member from Lunenburg respecting the deterioration of canned lobster and the necessity of putting the names of packers and the date of packing on the cans. I believe that a can of lobster thoroughly and completely hermetically sealed, excluding the air altogether, will remain as good as when it was packed until that can becomes leaky by the can rusting. Then the air has an opportunity of getting into it and it soon becomes bad. The can itself is made of very thin tin. As the can becomes rusty and the air gets to the fish, putrefaction takes place in a short time. The hon. member kept his lobsters in the cellar, which is just the place to produce those conditions. The lobsters may be put up in first class order and become worthless in a short time in the cellar. The length of time it takes depends entirely on the thickness of the tins.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has not temperature something to do with it?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I do not think so. No doubt a damp place has. With reference to putting the name of the packer on each can, the jobbers, speculators and wholesale dealers in lobsters do not depend so much on the name or label on the can as the sampling they have to do, and the rule in most markets that I am acquainted with, especially in the old country, is that one box out of every ten is opened and a can here and there is taken out and examined, and perhaps every tenth box out of 200 or 500 will be served in that way and the deductions made from them will be in proportion to the number found spoiled. You may find one or two out of 100 that are perfectly useless and valueless, not on account of the incapacity of the packer, but simply because of some defect in the tin which nobody could have detected. Nobody can prevent it except by using great care in securing and buying the very best of tin, so that placing the name on the boxes and cans is not guaranteeing that the material is in first class order.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman think that a respectable packer would put his name on a poor article?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—No, I do not think that a respectable packer would put his name upon a poor article at all, but a respectable packer may have his name placed upon a worthless rotten can and not know it, and through no fault of his own, but through the fault of the tin-maker, who is in the old country or wherever the tin is made. It is found from experience that these packers put up from one to two and three thousand cans a day. There is a certain proportion of the cans which are not completely hermetically sealed: they have a small leak in them. They are laid aside, and in a short time you can ascertain whether there is a leak or not by the sound of a nail on the can. If the leak is discovered before the fish begins to deteriorate, the leak can be stopped, and the fish preserved, and it is all right, but there may be some defects in the tin which it is impossible to detect—holes much smaller than the point of a pin, because these very cans after they are packed are subject to a severe test in boiling water, and the air is excluded from them; they are laid aside in a pile for some days and then they are retested carefully again and some leaky cans will be found among them. Those that are found to be good and sound are shipped away. There may be an odd can here and there amongst the rest which it is impossible to detect in time, which would very soon become a worthless article, perfectly unbearable as far as the stench is concerned—an article which no packer, good or bad, would ever think of putting on the market if he knew it.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I should be very sorry indeed to see the practice of having the name of the packer on the lobster cans done away with, or that the date of the packing should be taken off the cans. I am convinced of the necessity of the packer's name being on by the remarks of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. He tells you the care which should be taken, and therefore that makes it more necessary that the name of the packer should be put on. The goods put up by a packer who takes all care with his work, will command a better price in the market and everybody will know that he is more likely to send out a good article to the world than the others. In Halifax I know of a man who used to inspect fish, and salmon was generally given to him to inspect. The salmon which had his brand on commanded higher prices in the United States, and was more easily sold. I do not agree with the senior member for Halifax in thinking that age does not injure the lobster in the cans.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say that

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Well, I disagree with the statement that age does not injure the lobster in the can even though air is excluded. We have frequently seen fatal cases of poisoning from eating lobster in which there is a change. However hermetically sealed the cans may be, the poison may permeate. Those who believe in microbes will understand that the germs of decomposition may get into the fish and it takes some time for them to generate; the fresher the fish, the more valuable it is as an article for food. I remember some remarks made by the Hon. Sir Frank Smith, on the subject of canned articles of other articles but which bear on the case. He explained how necessary it was to have the articles dated properly, and if that was necessary in the case of the article to which he alluded, it is also necessary in the case of fish where there is poison. As long as I have been in the medical profession, I never understood exactly what occasioned the poison; and what was more important to the person who was poisoned, I never understood exactly what would do him any good after taking it. Therefore, I should be sorry to see any alteration in those two directions.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It may be as the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour supposes, and I yield to his practical knowledge, that the fish to which I referred were injured in consequence of defect in the tins; but that is a greater reason why the name of the packer and the year should be on the tins, because then the packer will use a better quality of tin, and if a person cannot judge of the quality of the tin, he can judge from the time it has been packed, and know whether it is safe to purchase such a can. Therefore I think the argument of the hon. member is strongly in favour of the name of the packer and the year in which it was packed being placed on every tin. As regards what he said about having a close season I would approve of it in theory, but we know that along our shore the poorer class of fishermen depend almost entirely for their living on their catch of lobsters and it is a short season. Some of them are aged people, others are young people who are not fitted to go out to sea in their boats, and they occupy themselves with their fish baskets catching lobsters, and it certainly would interfere with their every day living if they were deprived of an entire season's fishing. I would rather see more stringent rules as to the size of the lobsters if that can possibly be done. If you can make our fish wardens or inspectors see that none are caught under the regulation size, then there would be no necessity for the close season, but the trouble is they are caught and will be caught less than the size regulated. The men along the shore who catch lobsters very late in the autumn, send or take them fresh over to the United States and by that means evade detection of the size of the fish. The price is high and the temptation is to catch any and all lobsters and send them over to the United States where they can get a good price for them. Late last autumn a large quantity went over to Boston from the county of Lunenburg, and they were found there to be under the size the regulation requires for the state of Massachusetts. I think they required the lobsters to be one and one-half inches larger and the result was they were confiscated and the penalty was so great that no person would claim to own them, and they were all dumped into the water. That stopped the catching and sending to the States of the small lobsters below the size. So that if the government will see that the regulation as to the name of the packer and the year in which it is packed is enforced and that no lobster is allowed to be taken under the size, our lobster fishery will be protected. We sometimes catch large lobsters. Three pounds is a large sized lobster. I saw in the paper the other day—and it has been verified—that a lobster was caught weighing 13 lbs. That is an extraordinary one, and when my honourable friends come down to Lunenburg I hope to be able to show them the skeleton of it. They shall see the shell if I can get it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I should like to reply to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken and also to the remarks of the junior member for Halifax in reference to poisoning. It will be a pretty serious matter if you create the impression abroad that there is danger of being poisoned with canned lobsters. I do not hesitate to say that in a can of good lobsters there is not the slightest shade of a chance of being poisoned. In my opinion there is more danger when people buy a can of lobsters and take part of it out; as soon as it is exposed to the air, deterioration sets in almost immediately. As soon as a can is opened the lobsters should be used immediately, and if you keep it for a day or two it becomes poisonous. Another method which, in my opinion, may bring on lead poisoning is where the can is dry-heated on the stove. The solder is made of a mixture of tin and lead, and if you want the lobsters cooked, or even warmed, they should be placed in a kettle of boiling water where there is no danger of the lead being fused; but if it is placed upon a hot stove, then the lead may produce an acid in that can which may produce lead poisoning. I have no doubt a doctor can understand that much better than I can explain it, but the can, to be safe, should never be placed on a hot stove to be heated, but in a kettle of boiling water. In reference to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lunenburg, that care should be taken as to the size of the lobsters, that is a suggestion which would never come from a lobster packer. It sounds very well in theory, but it is as impracticable as it is for a man to walk on his head. There is not a lobster factory on the coast of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, or New Brunswick to-day that would adhere to any law, if it was enacted, which restricted them to a nine inch lobster. I can understand the situation of the lobster fishermen along the coast where my hon. friend comes from, bordering on or adjoining the United States. There are, of course, two lobster markets; there is the market abroad, where the canned lobsters are sent, and then there is a local market for fresh lobsters, but the public at large could not take advantage of this local market and get the lobsters in the shell, as they do in Boston and other places. You cannot send them across the Atlantic in that state. You have to preserve them. Fishermen who are so close to the United States market, I can understand very well, if they get large lobsters and send them into the fresh fish market, they will get a handsome price, but to apply that to the ordinary packers would be simply nonsense. It could not be done. Then in reference to the age and the date and the maker's name being placed on those cans, it would be a very great injury to the trade; it would depress the market, because a wholesale dealer or speculator would say: "I must be very careful not to overload myself, because if I carry any over till next year I must sell them for much less money, because they will come into competition with the fresh lobsters coming in." It is all very well from the consumers' standpoint, but I take it we are not the consuming population; we want the market abroad, and it is to encourage and protect the industry, because the amount of lobsters consumed in Canada scarcely amounts to anything compared to the great quantity exported. You might just as well tell the butcher that he must mark on every piece of meat he sells how old the animal was, because everybody knows that a young animal is better than an old one, and so in reference to almost everything else. It is going to injure the market and restrict speculation and business generally if you force them to put on the date and the maker's name. There is no necessity for it, because the purchasers buy their goods from sample, and they will not buy until they open the goods, and see what they are purchasing.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.)—This discussion has taken a very wide range, and a good many of the observations have not a direct bearing on the bill before the House. The label or stamp which it is proposed in this measure to affix to the case has no reference whatever to the quality of the goods, but is merely the departmental stamp, furnished by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. My hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, had an impression that they would be charged for those stamps. That is a mistake; they will be supplied by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and they are simply to indicate the time of the catch, to enable the government to better carry out its regulations with respect to the close season, and also the small fee proposed to be imposed on the lobster packers in addition to the amount collected on the fish they catch. The senior member for Halifax hinted that it would be desirable that the name of the packer should be put upon the case. The name of the packer is usually put upon each can. The stamp that is to be provided for in this bill is to be put on the case which contains quite a number of cans. The label that is put upon the can is altogether a private matter. My hon. friend seems to think it desirable that there should be a provision to require that the name of the person who actually packed the fish should be put upon the can. That would be detrimental to the smaller packers, because they make contracts or sell their fish to the larger packers or larger exporters, and generally the name of the large exporter is put upon the can. Large purchasers on the other side of the Atlantic would not care to buy a lot of cans with a variety of labels of the names of makers upon them, they look to the name of the larger packer rather than a great variety of names of packers on the cans. However, the bill does not propose to deal in any way with the labelling of the can. It is only a provision for the departmental stamp upon the case as a regulation for the industry.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—I have not had the experience of a lobster packer, but I have frequently gone to the factories where the packing has been carried on, and I do not agree with my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island as to the size of the lobster. I believe what deteriorates and injures the lobster is the extremely small size of the lobster that is canned. All kinds of fish go into the fisherman's net, and he does not sell by the number of fish, but by the pound, and the little fish go in to make up the hundred pounds. He is paid by the hundred pounds and not by the number of lobsters he catches.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—You are wrong.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—They take them by the weight. He is paid by the hundred but they calculate the number by the weight. If lobsters are taken in that condition they certainly are inferior. But what injures them very much is taking them in the soft shell season. They totally shed their coats and the lobster crawls out of his shell and he is then what is called a soft shell lobster. The meat is entirely shrunk up, so that it can be drawn from the claws. When the lobster is in that condition it is really not fit for food of any description.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The canners won't pack them.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—I have frequented some factories when they were operating. The fisherman puts his trap in eight or ten fathoms of water and when he takes his trap up there are probably one hundred small lobsters; he throws them all into his boat and takes them to the shore, and when he makes his selection for the packer they are thrown aside and perish. If an arrangement can be made to have good careful inspectors who know what they are doing and know how the fishery ought to be carried on, to oversee operations, much good could be accomplished. I believe a great deal of the injury is caused by the inferior style of the packing, and from the style of lobster that is put in the tin.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—There has been quite a lot of money expended to preserve the lobster fishery. I do not see, from one year to another, that it is improving very much. We have on the coasts of Prince Edward Island an inspector of fisheries who goes round the island in a boat to see if people are fishing illegally. We have fish wardens who go round the shores once or twice a week for the same purpose. Then we have the "Stanley" with a large number of men on board. If they happen to find traps set out at the wrong season they take them up and destroy them. Although it costs quite a lot of money to protect the fishery there is always some illegal fishing done. That is because the fishing season is not the same in all localities. I have heard the department blamed to-day for giving an extension of 10 days to the lobster fishing. I say that extension will be good in some places and no good in other places, because they are done fishing long before the time of the extension begins, where they begin to catch the fish as soon as the ice leaves the shore. They get a thousand and two thousand for each boat in many places every day in May and June. In other localities a boat with two men gets from 200 to 250 a day. Up to this date the largest catches in those localities is 200 to 400. About the 10th of July the lobsters begin to come in, we get a thousand to 1,500 and even 1,800 per boat every day. That is why the extension is allowed to that locality. The coast to which I refer is on the south side of the island, from West Point to near St. Peter's Island at the entrance of Charlottetown Harbour. That is the case every year and has been the same for over 10 years. There is no good fishing done there until the 10th of July. Time and again we have asked to be allowed to begin fishing on the 15th July instead of in May as in other places. We are quite willing to take the same length of time as they take elsewhere; but we want it when the fish are there. If we do not fish after the 15th July we will get no fish at all, and that is why we should get till the 15th August in our locality. At one time, when there were only one or two factories, it paid earlier in the season, but in many cases the fishermen of those days have become packers themselves, and where the fishing is divided up it does not pay anybody at all, because it is not in season, but if we had the season we are asking for we could do something towards paying expenses. That is why this too extension has been given. At first we expected to get 20 days, but others who have had good fishing during May and June, as soon as they heard there were so many days allowed in our place where there had been no fishing before, asked for an extension too. Therefore the department decided to cut down the 20 days and make it ten days and extend it all over the Dominion. A good many places will not avail themselves of this extension, because it is no good to them. They are done fishing long ago. On the 15th June in many places the fishing is over. They have no more lobsters and they go to some other fishing. In the locality that I speak of there is no other fishing—there is no codfish, we have only the lobster, and the herring fishing in the spring. We have been asking to have the season changed, and I hope in the future that we will get the ear of the department and succeed in getting in that locality the season changed from the 15th July to the 1st October, instead of from the 1st May to the 15th July. As to all these regulations, I do not see that there is very much in them. The name of the packer on the case would do no good. As has been said, all those cases are labelled with the labels of the exporter or large packers. The exporters have their labels and send them to the small packers and get them put on the goods. When the name is on the label, I do not see much use in having it on the outside of the case. As to the license fee, I don't see any good or protection in that. Other fishermen can fish all summer, and are getting a bounty for fishing instead of paying for a license, and they are not subject to a fine either. The small lobster packer has to pay for his license, and if he happens to catch a few fish outside of a very short season, he is heavily fined, and in the case of his not having made enough money to live, and to pay the fine, he is sent to jail. I don't think this is fair, and I am sure that the license system is no protection whatever to the fisheries, but only an additional burden to the poor man.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—This annual legislation that we have been going on with is rather detrimental to the lobster fishing than otherwise. It was only a short time ago we made a regulation with respect to the numbering and naming of the different boats engaged in this business. Just as soon as that has taken effect and people have gone to the expense of putting their names and numbers on their boats, we repeal that section as if it was no good at all. Another thing that we change is the regulation with respect to the size of the openings between the slats of the traps. Many packers who got their traps last year had them made under the new regulation. Now that is done away with, and they can again use the old form of traps. Those things lead to dissatisfaction on the part of the people engaged in the fishery. It is the experience of the people who are engaged in the business—and we have two representative men here who have had a good deal of experience in it, the hon. senator from Murray Harbour and the hon. gentleman from Abraham's Village agree in saying that the fishery is becoming less remunerative every year. The cause of that is over-fishing. There are too many people engaged in the fishery. Too many traps are set out, and the consequence is the lobsters are becoming scarcer every year, and if we do not shut down on this business, or make strict regulations with regard to the system of fishing and enforce them the fish will disappear entirely from the coast of the province. It would be much better if the government, when they fix the time during which that fishery is to be carried on, would leave it at that and not extend the time for one day. It is in the interest of people who are engaged in it, who have their traps and material, to carry it on as long as they get a fair supply of lobsters. They want to have the season extended as long as possible, but it is against the interest of the fishery generally to allow it to go on that way—it is much better to have a time and not extend it beyond that on any account. There was a reference made to the deterioration of lobster in the can. In the course of last winter I saw a letter written by a gentleman who is extensively engaged in the purchase of canned lobsters for the British market. He maintained that many of the lobsters received there were in very bad order, and that one cause of it was the inferior quality of the tin used by the smaller packers in putting up their fish, and it was useless to put up lobster in tin packages unless they used the very best quality of tin. There are certain regulations in this bill which I think are in the proper direction, if we are going to make any alteration in the law at all—that is, in respect to the fee that is to be paid by the different packers, reducing it from $10 on every packer, and making it $2 per 100 cases, or fraction of 100 cases. It will be an advantage to those who put up a small number of cases, whereas it will probably tax the large packers to something more than they are paying at present. The regulation with respect to the labels on cases is a very good one. There is one regulation in this bill respecting the preservation of the ova of the lobster. I regret that did not go much further, for while the packer is putting up his lobsters, he should be required to save the ova in a floating box at the end of the stage and when hatched they could be allowed to go and live in the water. That has been done, I believe, in some instances by the packers themselves, and very successfully indeed. It entails very little cost on the packers, and it is a measure that would lead to replenishing the waters with a larger number of lobsters than are taken out. The penalties imposed under this section appear to be such as will enable the department to enforce the various regulations, and I think it is a very good arrangement that a return should be made by each one of the packers, because the department will see the quantity that each one has put up, and be in a position to make better regulations than they can at present.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

LEGALIZATION OF PAYMENTS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (134) "An Act to legalize payments heretofore made to the General Revenue Fund of the North-west Territories of certain fines, penalties and forfeitures."

He said: On the 5th October, 1887, an Order in Council was passed at the instance and request of the North-west Legislature, providing that fines imposed for infraction of the liquor law on the North-west Territories should be paid over to the general revenue fund of the Territories. At the time this Order in Council was passed there was in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor a sum of $4,984, which was stated to be the amount collected up to that date for fines under the Dominion Statutes generally, the greater portion being for fines recovered for violation of the liquor law; and on the authority of the order that sum was handed over by the Lieutenant-Governor to the general revenue fund of the Territories. Two objections were raised by the Auditor General to this disposition of the money—first, that the sum mentioned included moneys which were not collected for infractions of the liquor law, while the Order in Council clearly had reference to such moneys only; and second, that the Order in Council was not retroactive and could only apply to the sums received after it was passed. The bill has for its object the legalizing of the action taken under the Order in Council.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should like to ask whether the leader of the government is in a position to inform the House as to the policy that the government proposes to pursue with reference the Manitoba school question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition I am prepared to state the decision at which the government has arrived on the Manitoba school question. I desire to state that the government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and after careful deliberation has arrived at the following conclusion:—

Though there may be a difference of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature, and the Dominion government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation.

The government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session.

The government has, therefore, decided not to ask parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament.

A session of the present parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If at that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion government will be prepared, at the next session of parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the 21st of March, 1895.

This is clear and sufficiently distinct, indicating the policy of the government upon this very important and intricate question. It must be for Parliament and people of the Dominion to say whether they approve of this policy or not.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY INVESTIGATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) rose to :

Call the attention of the Senate, to the Report of Judge Drake, a commissioner appointed by the Government of Canada to investigate charges of irregularities in the British Columbia penitentiary, and the presentation of the grand jury at New Westminster denouncing the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons to the position of deputy warden of said penitentiary as "an insult to the self-respecting portion of this community"; also, to the annual reports of J. G. Moylan, late inspector of penitentiaries, and ask if it is the intention of the government to dismiss the said James Fitzsimmons, and to appoint a Royal Commission to investigate the official conduct of the said J. G. Moylan?

He said: Before I proceed with the motion that is now before the House, perhaps the first minister will be kind enough to answer two or three questions that have a direct bearing on the question which I am about to discuss. I should like to ask if what I saw in the Toronto Globe of Saturday last, that Mr. Mosby, Governor of New Westminster jail, was appointed warden of the British Columbia penitentiary, that Mr. James Harvey was appointed accountant, and Mr. McBride, ex-warden, was superannuated, is correct. The hon. minister might also inform me if Mr. William Keary, the ex-accountant, has also been superannuated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The item to which the hon. gentleman has referred in the newspapers is substantially correct. Mr. Mosby has been appointed warden and Mr. Harvey has been appointed accountant and I will add to these answers something which might be asked later on, that deputy Burke has been transferred from the Stony Mountain penitentiary to take the place of Mr. Fitzsimmons. Fitzsimmons is now on leave of absence, but it is possible on further investigation that he may be sent to the Manitoba penitentiary; as to that I am not positive. With reference to Mr. McBride, the late warden, I may state that he has been placed on the superannuation list, giving him the full benefit of the services that he has rendered as warden of the penitentiary. Mr. Keary has not been placed on the superannuation list, he has been dismissed absolutely.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Hon. gentlemen for three reasons I will discuss the question of which I have given notice, as briefly as possible. The first reason is that the temperature in this chamber, being over 80 degrees, is uncomfortably warm; in the second place we are now nearing the close of the session, and in the third I am suffering from a cold which I contracted some three weeks ago. In discussing this question I am happy to say it is not one into which politics, religion or race enters. I say that no politics enter this question inasmuch as all the representatives from British Columbia, both in the Commons and in this House, are a unit. There is no religion involved, because the majority of the witnesses, the prominent witnesses who testified against the deputy warden were Roman Catholics. I hold in my hand Judge Drake's report, which I will not trouble the House by reading, but I desire to have it handed in to the reporter so that it will be published. In order to make my remarks as brief as possible, I shall merely refer to a few clauses in that report. I may say, in the first place, that the British Columbia penitentiary was opened in 1878. When the late Inspector Moylan went out to that province, he saw fit to take with him Mr. James Fitzsimmons, who was then a guard in the Kingston penitentiary, under the plea that he had had some experience, and that he would render valuable services in the opening of the penitentiary. I think before I resume my seat I shall be able to satisfy hon. gentlemen that nothing less than a conspiracy was entered into between Inspector Moylan and Fitzsimmons to defraud the government, and that Fitzsimmons should at an early day usurp the authority of the warden and finally become warden himself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I apologize for interrupting the hon. gentleman, but do I understand that he is going to hand the full report of Justice Drake to the reporters?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is establishing an exceedingly dangerous practice in the House. If the hon. gentleman wants it in with the Debates we must bear the infliction of having it read.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I could quite understand the force of the objection if it was extraneous matter, a clipping from a newspaper or some such quotation, but this is a report that was prepared and placed upon the table by the government themselves, and I thought they would not object to having the report handed in and placed in the debates. However, if the hon. gentleman insists, I will read it before I finish. I was remarking, when interrupted by the Premier, that I believe I can establish, to the satisfaction of every hon. gentleman here, that a conspiracy was entered into between Mr. Moylan and Mr. Fitzsimmons by which the Dominion Government would be defrauded and the warden, Mr. McBride, in a very short time supplanted by Fitzsimmons, the guard that was taken from the Kingston penitentiary. Commissioner Drake's report is as follows :—

I have the honour to report that in pursuance of the Royal Commission to me directed, I opened the same at the Court house, New Westminster, on the 22nd June, after due public notice and the subsequent inquiry was held at the penitentiary.

The warden and deputy warden Stewart and guards were all represented by counsel, and I received valuable assistance from Mr. Charles Wilson, who acted for the Crown.

The inquiry took a wide range, as I did not have the advantage of the various complaints and reports, which had been made to your department until I had been engaged for some days, as soon as I had the opportunity of perusing those documents I was able to direct my investigation with better success. The evidence in consequence is more lengthy than it would have otherwise been.

I did not think it necessary to go back beyond 1887 in my investigation, as I considered six years ample time to enable me to ascertain the mode in which the penitentiary has been carried on.

As a result of my investigation I found considerable friction existing between the higher officials and the deputy warden, in consequence of which errors of judgment have been magnified and many complaints made which the exercise of a little tact would have avoided, but with making every allowance for this state of things, it is too patent that the rules and regulations have been in many cases entirely ignored, and in others only partially observed, the responsibility for this rests on all the chief officers, except the surgeon, the chaplain, school master and hospital keeper.

I find that the warden's authority has been little more than nominal. On the first establishment of the penitentiary he states he was informed by the inspector that he was to consult the deputy in all matters as he was a person of experience in the new duties which the warden had to perform. In time this has led to an usurpation by the deputy of the warden's authority, and the warden expressed himself as being only the warden in name. His orders to convicts and officers have in some cases been disobeyed by the express direction of the deputy. The effect has been detrimental to discipline.

I will detail the various rules which have been persistently ignored.

1. No muster roll of convicts has ever been called. (Rule 92).

2. The duty of examining the locks, bolts and bars twice a month with a blacksmith has never been done during the three years the blacksmith has been here. (Rule 98.)

The deputy's explanation is that if it was reported to him that any repairs were required he instructed the blacksmith to do them.

3. The arms were found by Mr. Foster in a neglected condition (Rule 93) and the guards state that their weapons have never been inspected.

4. The deputy repeatedly rebuked the guards and officers in the presence of convicts. (Rule 264).

5. The deputy employed guards and convicts in work on the orphanage and supplied wood work, iron and cement from the workshops, and the orphanage vehicles were repaired by the convicts. No entries of these works or supplies appear in the books. On one occasion only was requisition made for work to be done in the carpenter shop which was for the orphanage and the cost charged to the deputy. The convict labour book contains no entry of any labour performed at the orphanage. The entries made on the days when it was proved certain guards and convicts were at the orphanage shows that they were apparently working in the grounds—Coutts, one of the guards, states that he was employed between thirty and forty times at the orphanage and other officers and convicts on many occasions.

6. One convict, Macdonald, was frequently out at locking up time and on one occasion was outside without an officer at eight p.m.

7. The blacksmith and carpenter instructors were frequently absent whole days from their duties by order of the deputy and without the warden's knowledge to work on the farm, leaving the convicts in the workshops. The warden stated that they were all trusty men but the deputy admits that keys of the corridors and back door were made in the blacksmith shop which he fortunately discovered and got possession of. This fact sufficiently shows the necessity of the rule being strictly enforced (Vide Rules 291 & 292).

As the inquiry progresses specific charges were made against the deputy warden and the accountant.

As regards the deputy, Mr. Keary brings forward a claim for work done in the tailors shops for the deputy, amounting to $60, for which no requisitions were given. It appears that the work done in the tailor shops used to be entered in a rough memorandum book, difficult to decipher. But under rule 124 the accountant of that period (1884 to 1892) should have discovered the account and entered it properly: the deputy says he frequently asked the trade instructor to make out his account, but it was not done because it was contained in books of previous trade instructors, and the accountant was the proper person to apply to, and it was now brought up as a charge against the deputy. In my opinion it is a mere matter of account, and if the deputy was wrong in not obtaining requisitions for the work done, the accountant was wrong in not having discovered the account sooner, and I am afraid che discordant feeling that I have referred to is accountable for this and some minor complaints, but there are other matters of a more serious nature which have not been explained away. The deputy has received at various times from Mr. Justice McCreight for the pasturage and keep of a horse at the penitentiary over $300. Many of these sums were paid in cash, others by cheques, the only entry made in the books is $80 credited to the justice in April, 1893. The amount paid to the deputy if he does not dispute is over $230. The only letters that passed on the subject are marked 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and the cheques "A," "B," "C." With regard to the cheque "B" for $135, only $50 was for pasturage, the $85 balance was paid to the Sisters at Sapperton, at the justice's request. While on this subject, Mr. Justice McCreight received a letter (Exhibit E) from the Rev. Mr. Morgan, acting chaplain. I took an early opportunity to give him an emphatic warning as to the impropriety of his conduct.

The land occupied by the penitentiary buildings and grounds is about 32 acres, part of this is pasture land, part in hay, and in 1887 there were 10 acres in cultivation, now there are about 14 acres. The warden and deputy warden have three cows between them running in the pasture. They also have fowls but none exist now. There were also sheep and pigs belonging to the government and some pigs belonging to the deputy.

No entries appear in any books belonging to the institution of the produce raised on the farm or what has been done with it. Pigs to a considerable number have been killed, hams and bacon have been cured, sheep have been killed. There is some evidence that the ham and bacon were used by the warden and deputy warden. The deputy says that he had pigs in the institution but they had no distinguishing mark and were fed with the general stock. Two penitentiary pigs, however, were sent by the deputy with the warden's sanction to the orphanage—value about $30 each. The deputy had sole management of the farm. Mr. Keary asked frequently for the farm accounts but was always refused and no accounts have ever been kept; the deputy asserts that he had the roots and other crops weighed into the barn, but no entries were produced nor memorandum of any kind.

The annual returns of the farm (which for the years 1888 to 1892 inclusive appear to have been altogether omitted from the parliamentary returns) have been in my opinion merely imaginary: in 1887 the returns shows crops equal to 13 tons to the acre there being in that year only 10 acres in cultivation and a gross return of $350 an acre, in 1893 a gross return of $186 an acre.

These figures are extracted from the annual report and make a wonderful showing as compared with Manitoba which only returned some $15 an acre excluding the hay which I understand is outside the farm, these figures taken in connection with the absence of any data produced to me lead me to the conclusion I have already expressed.

It was also proved that bread, potatoes, fruit, vegetables, coal, cement, and lumber have been at different times taken out of the premises by order of deputy warden. With regard to potatoes he produced receipts for the year 1891 and 1892 and 1893 covering  $3\frac{1}{2}$  tons and says these are the potatoes that went to the orphanage. I am unable to check his figures as the potatoes went out in small quantities and no account was kept.

With regard to coal, the deputy says he sent the orphanage a ton, as they were out of coal in the winter, and he bought another ton to replace it, and produces the receipts from the vendor Rogers (exhibit K). But again, from the want of entries, I am unable to check him. The coal that went to the orphanage is not entered, neither is there any requisition for it, and the coal that replaced it does not appear anywhere.

With regard to the bread, fruit and vegetables, it was proved that various articles of this character were taken away, but as regards the fruit and vegetables the deputy claims that they came out of the garden, which is laid out in front of the building and that as the garden was originally planted by the warden and himself, he considered he was entitled to the produce.

A large number of empty flour sacks (between 3,000 and 4,000) were, it was stated by Jamse Miller, removed by the deputy warden which he denies. I have been unable to trace them.

Some evidence was given of spying by guard Smith on Mr. Keary and there is no doubt that a general impression exists among the officers that this is not a solitary instance but it is hardly possible to establish the fact absolutely.

The deputy excuses himself for non-compliance with the regulations by stating that it was arranged between the warden and himself that he should go out to work with the men and that the warden should do the deputy's duty. This the warden denies. I can see no reason for the deputy going with the convicts to clear land, remove stumps and build fences, any officer of ordinary intelligence could do this work but the deputy says his officers were all incompetent which I see no reason to believe.

I also inquired into the escapes and attempts to escape which amount to 12 since 1882 (see exhibit O) and it was stated by some of the guards that in their opinion the number of convicts sent out in the gang were too many for the number of officers.

Three officers and sometimes two had charge of from 40 to 50 convicts in the ravine—a difficult place to control so large a number. This, however, is a matter on which I cannot express an opinion, the guards employed and the warden all concur in stating that they considered this number of convicts dangerously large to the officers in charge.

I took the opportunity of seeing all the convicts who desired to see me and there was a very general complaint of the food, and the manner in which it was served before Mr. Foster's presence last year. It was alleged to be a common occurrence to have their food placed on the floor near or in their cells and occasionally kicked to them by the guards. The result was that a very large amount of food and bread was wasted, so much so, that there is now a saving of nearly one hundred pounds per day in bread alone by feeding the men in a decent and cleanly manner. There is also a complaint that irons are too frequently used in punishment. The warden admits that when irons were ordered they did not always appear in the punishment book. There is a universally expressed satisfaction by all the convicts I examined at the change wrought by Mr. Foster in the internal discipline and management of the penitentiary.

I made a careful inquiry into the attempted escape of Kennedy on the 14th December, 1893, when he was shot in the leg and the result I arrived at is that the shooting was unnecessary. Kennedy was on a ladder trying to get over the fence. Guard McMasters had hold of him and guard Smyth came up and shot him. From the appearance of the convict's clothes which are burnt with powder, the pistol must have been used at very close quarters. Guard Smyth probably lost his head in the excitement of the moment and I think used his pistol unnecessarily. I examined into the matter because there appears to have been some difference of opinion between the guards as to the fact and contradictory statement forwarded to the Department of Justice.

I have not in the above report dealt in detail with all the numerous matters brought to my notice as they are fully set out in the evidence, but my investigation fully satisfied me that the irregularities which were shown to have existed would have been practically impossible if the regulations had been adhered to. As I stated before the officers did not work well together. The guards complained of favouritism in the appointment of their duties and there is no doubt that the numerous complaints which have been made from time to time have had their origin in a feeling of dissatisfaction which seems to have existed for the last two or three years. Charges were made against Mr. Keary of concealment of some books of the institution which had been kept by a previous account. He admitted the fact—the books were subsequently found and the reason of his action is difficult to discover. He was also charged by Mr. Fitzsimmons with having asked him to store some feed for him and the inference was that the feed was government property. Mr. Keary says it was feed he had bought for his horse and there is no reason to doubt it.

The buildings were not kept in the condition of cleanliness that they ought to be; the medical officers and some of the guards spoke strongly on this subject but this is now being rectified.

The medical officers suggested that the hospital keeper was too frequently taken for other work to the neglect of his hospital duties. At the inquiry both the warden and deputy warden were present the whole time and heard all the evidence and at their request I called any person they desired, and permitted the fullest cross-examination limited to the inquiry. I refused to allow the sisters to give evidence as to what the orphanage had received from the deputy because in my opinion it was not necessary to know where the government property had gone to, if it was shown that any had been taken away from the institution.

The late guard Finnegan desired to give evidence and I allowed him to do so, and he took the opportunity of alleging drunkenness against McInnes, the steward, and guard Robertson, but he never reported them, and also made a charge against Keary of using improper language, but I place very little reliance on the statement of this witness.

In conclusion I may say that the warden has rendered me every facility in making the inquiry, and very frankly admits the existence of dissatisfaction, but says that the deputy was, in his opinion, a first-class officer up to three or four years ago, when he sustained a severe domestic bereavement, from which time he dates the changed tone of his intercourse with the officers, and lack of interest in his duties.

Now the first paragraph that I desire to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to in this report is paragraph 6:—

I find that the warden's authority has been little more than nominal on the first establishment of the penitentiary, he states he was informed by the inspector that he was to consult the deputy in all matters, as he was a person of experience in the new duties which the warden had to perform.

I may state that I was living in New Westminster at the time when Mr. Moylan was sent out there to open that institution, and Mr. McBride, the newly appointed warden, informed me that Moylan gave him specific orders to carry out all instructions given him by Fitzsimmons as to the management of the penitentiary. McBride confirms this statement in the evidence which he gave before the commission. That is 17 years ago next September, and the reason why the inspector insisted upon the appointment of Mr. Fitzsimmons, who was not deputy warden but chief keeper and guard, was that he had had several years' experience in the Kingston penitentiary. Now, as the commissioner very properly states here, that led in a very short time to the usurpation of all the powers and all the authority of the warden. I may mention here that Mr. McBride, as I can show from even Mr. Moylan's own report, had been governor of the Victoria jail as far back as 1864, or 31 years ago. He was there for several years, and was then transferred to the New Westminster jail, the main jail of the province at that time. We had no penitentiary, but it was used as a penitentiary, and, as I will show later on, even Mr. Moylan himself admits that they had life convicts there—men convicted for murder and other offences. He discharged his duties as jailer in New Westminster, to my personal knowledge, for several years before his appointment, in a manner acceptable to everyone. For two years I had the honour of being mayor of New Westminster, and in those days they had no police magistrate and I had to perform the not very pleasant duties of a police magistrate. It was my duty to visit the jail at least three or four times a week; and the statement made here by Mr. McBride, that he had to take all his instructions, notwithstanding he was warden, from the chief keeper, is absolutely true, and is known to a very large number of the best citizens in New Westminster. The next paragraph is as follows:—

The deputy employed guards, and in the work in the orphanage supplied food, wood-work, iron and cement in the work-shop.

I will not comment on that at present, but will do so later on. But just imagine, hon. gentlemen, in view of the rules that I have already read to you, that no muster-roll was ever called in the institution, that the locks were never examined, that the arms were found by Mr. Foster in a neglected condition, and the guards stated that their weapons had never been inspected. Imagine, hon. gentlemen, what discipline could exist in an institution run in that slipshod manner, and also that the deputy, in the presence of the convicts, would rebuke not only guards, but, as I heard myself, rebuke the warden, about one year after the institution was opened. Again, it is proved that a convict by the name of Macdonald, and other convicts, were frequently out after locking up time, and once absolutely alone. Can hon. gentlemen imagine such a state of affairs—a man serving a term of probably four or five years in the penitentiary to be allowed to roam out alone? Again, what will hon. gentlemen think of the management of an institution where the blacksmith and carpenter instructors were taken from the workshops to work a considerable distance away from these workshops clearing land, taking out stumps, building fences, and leaving the convicts there alone absolutely masters of the situation? The deputy warden had to acknowledge that he fortunately discovered that they had made keys to open the locks of the inner and outer doors.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—Did any of the convicts escape?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—No; not upon that occasion, but some ten or twelve escaped previous to that, from 1882 to 1892, and the general impression is that many of them were allowed or given an opportunity to escape. The first witness that was examined before that commission was Justice McCreight, one of the most honourable and respected men that we have in British Columbia. He is now over 70 years of age. He always led the bar in that province, and is a most conscientious and respected citizen. He was the first witness called, and he gave evidence that was rather damaging to Mr. Fitzsimmons. To show the influences that were brought to bear to shield the deputy warden, I will read a letter that was sent to Justice McCreight:—

EXHIBIT E.

ROYAL COMMISSION, BRITISH COLUMBIA PENITENTIARY.

NEW WESTMINSTER, June 22nd, 1894.

Hon. Justice McCreight,

Hon. and dear sir,—I have heard with indescribable pain of all what took place in the court-house this morning. You have already remembered the real circumstances connected with your horse-keep in the penitentiary, and you are likewise aware of the terrible injury you have caused to a perfectly innocent man. The inquiry opens to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, and as an honourable man I need hardly remind you that your duty is to undo as far as possible and as speedily as possible the wrong of what you have been unconsciously the cause. Therefore you ought in conscience to present yourself to-morrow morning at the opening of the commission in the penitentiary, and ask to be allowed to withdraw under oath all that you are not justified in adhering to. Needless to say your statement will be published in all the British Columbia papers, and probably in many all over the Dominion, and the longer the story is allowed to go uncontradicted the greater will be the harm done.

Please think over the whole matter and act according to conscience and not according to your note-book which, on your own admission, has misled you.

Feeling sure that you will be perfectly willing to right the grievous—though on your part, unconscious wrong, I am,

Sincerely yours,

W. M. J. MORGAN, O.M.I.

This clergyman, Father Morgan, was one of the acting chaplains of the penitentiary. Can hon. gentlemen imagine anything more outrageous than to send such a letter to one of the most respected and learned judges in the land, a man of over seventy years of age, asking him to go on the stand again and contradict the evidence that he had given the day before—in other words to take back what he had said and substitute something else for it? I mention this to show that deputy warden Fitzsimmons and his friends had recourse to every means in his power to clear himself from the charges made against him and of which he had been subsequently found guilty. Had Judge McCreight been some poor ignoramus of a witness, we can imagine what the result would be; but what did the hon.

judge do? Like an hon. gentleman he went to the commission, and in the presence of the clergyman handed the letter to the commissioner. Mr. Justice Drake read it and re-read it, and for five or six minutes never said a word. Finally he said, "Mr. McCreight, I have been deliberating whether I should commit Mr. Morgan for contempt of court or give him an emphatic warning never to commit such an offence again." He disposed of the case by severely reprimanding the reverend gentleman. Now, in the 13th paragraph the report says:

No entries appear in any books belonging to the institution of the produce raised on the farm, or what has been done with it.

And then it goes on to enumerate the animals that were slaughtered and the materials that were disposed of. I have also here a copy of the return that has been brought down in the other House in connection with the evidence: one is a report from Mr. Fitzsimmons himself, and this is his explanation of the disposal of the material that went to the orphanage:

As regards the orphanage, when I first came to New Westminster I was instructed to carry on as I had seen done in Kingston. Now, sir, it is customary in the various penitentiaries to assist charitable institutions, and nobody thinks of saying anything about it.

I was not aware until the present that one of the purposes for which penitentiaries were established in this country was to assist charitable institutions. Clause 21 says:

The deputy excuses himself for non-compliance with the regulations by stating that it was arranged between the warden and himself that he should go to work with the men, and that the warden should do the deputy's duties. This the warden denies. I can see no reason for the deputy going with the convicts to clear land, remove stumps, and build fences. Any officer of ordinary intelligence could do this work. But the deputy says his officers were all incompetent, which I see no reason to believe.

As far as intelligence is concerned I am within the mark when I say there was not an officer or guard in connection with that institution who was not a great deal more intelligent than the deputy warden. Certainly one of his virtues or qualifications was not intelligence; so that that portion of the judge's report is strictly correct. In the 24th clause I find:

It was alleged to be a common occurrence to have their food placed on the floor near or in their cells and occasionally kicked to them by the guards. The result was that a very large amount of food and bread was wasted, so much so, that there is now a saving of nearly one hundred pounds per day in bread alone by feeding the men in a decent and cleanly manner. There is also a complaint that irons are too frequently used in punishment; the warden admits that when irons were ordered they do not always appear in the punishment book. There is a universally expressed satisfaction by all the convicts I examined at the change wrought by Mr. Foster in the internal discipline and management of the penitentiary.

If that institution was conducted in an orderly and proper manner, I cannot conceive for a moment what a poorly conducted institution would be. And then further on it says:—

The buildings were not kept in the condition of cleanliness that they ought to be and the medical officers and some of the guards spoke strongly on this subject, but this is now being rectified.

There was not an officer against whom there was a charge but had his counsel. I may also state, for the information of the House, that when the commission opened Mr. Fitzsimmons had as his counsel, Mr. MacPhillips, a co-religionist of his and one of the best lawyers in the province of British Columbia, but so thoroughly disgusted was he with the whole transaction on the second day that he washed his hands of the case altogether. I mention this in order to show there is no foundation whatever for the reports which were made by Mr. Morrison, who subsequently became counsel for Mr. Fitzsimmons and Mr. Moylan himself. I here hold in my hand several reports much longer even than that of Commissioner Drake. The first is from Mr. Morrison, who subsequently became Mr. Fitzsimmons's counsel. It is dated July, 1894. This report contains about 30 or 40 clauses, and it was sent in to the late Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, no doubt to prejudice and poison his mind against Commissioner Drake's report. I think it was very improper for any person to send in such a report long before the commissioner's report was prepared and submitted to the Minister of Justice. I next come to a letter dated Ottawa, 29th October, 1894, addressed to Mr. Fitzsimmons from the Deputy Minister of Justice here. It is as follows:

I am directed to inform you that an Order-in-Council was passed on the 24th inst., retiring you from the penitentiary service and that you will therefore cease to receive any salary from that day.

The Minister of Justice desires me to say, however, that he hopes to have an opportunity shortly of offering you re-employment in the penitentiary service.

That, to my mind, is an extraordinary letter to be sent by the Minister of Justice to this man two or three days after he was dismissed, with the information that his salary would cease from a certain date. It is an unheard of thing, and I must confess, that I do not believe a man of the sterling integrity and unswerving character of Sir John Thompson would in one day dismiss a man, after due deliberation on the report and evidence, and would two or three days afterwards write to that man, whom he had deliberately dismissed, saying that probably in a short time he would give him employment again in the government service. It is a libel on the name of the late Minister of Justice, and I refuse to believe that he ever authorized it. Sir John Thompson's mind was a highly judicial one—he never acted on the impulse of the moment, but on evidence altogether—in this case on evidence which had been accumulating for years, evidence that had been taken before a commission appointed by himself; yet we are asked to believe that he sanctioned such a statement as this letter contains. I have too much respect for the name of the late premier of the country to believe it. The next letter to which I shall call attention of the House, is dated Montreal, 5th January, 1895, and is as follows:

To Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, Minister of Justice.

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES HIBBERT:

I inclose to you a letter just received from the deputy warden of the British Columbia penitentiary at New Westminster. Kindly look into this man's complaints and see what is in them.

Sincerely yours,

MACKENZIE BOWELL.

The next document that I find is dated New Westminster, B.C., Dec. 21st, less than two months after the discharge of Mr. Fitzsimmons. It is his application to be appointed warden. It is directed to the Minister of Justice and is as follows:

As you are no doubt aware, there has been a vacancy in the British Columbia penitentiary. Having served 21 years in Kingston penitentiary, when asked to undertake the forming of the British Columbia one in 1878, I naturally expected that so long a period of service which appeared satisfactory to the department, my claim to the wardenship of this penitentiary in case of a vacancy would not be disputed.

Mr. McBride, the late incumbent of the wardenship here, who was appointed in 1878 through political influence brought to bear at that time, and who, at the recent investigation into the affairs at the penitentiary, showed his incapacity, was the cause of my trouble owing to his incompetence. He had had no previous experience, so the whole responsibility was thrown upon me. When it will be recalled in what condition I found the place, and the amount of work I had to accomplish in order to bring the institution to its present condition, I might say, single-handed, it is no wonder I incurred the displeasure and enmity of guards, officers, and even the wardens—the laxity on the part of the warden and officer had to be continuously checked, which added very much to my work.

The late warden, McBride, had probably twice the practical experience in handling men and governing an institution of that kind that guard Fitzsimmons had in the Kingston penitentiary. He was the governor of Victoria jail in 1864—a jail that often had some 75 to 100 inmates; subsequently, in 1868, he was transferred to New Westminster jail, and was governor there, having charge of from 50 to 75 prisoners in that jail before the penitentiary was opened. As evidence that the man was qualified, and that it is not necessary that a man should be a guard or officer in a penitentiary in order to discharge the duties of warden properly, I shall just refer to the action of the government the other day in appointing Governor Mosby of the New Westminster jail. Mr. Mosby had been sub-governor under Mr. McBride six or seven years before Mr. McBride was appointed warden of the British Columbia penitentiary. I give the government credit for appointing Mr. Mosby, because I do not think a better man could have been selected. I refer to it to show that it is not necessary that a man should have had experience in a penitentiary in order to govern one successfully. I shall give another instance to prove my contention: a few years ago the Stony Mountain penitentiary in Manitoba became so thoroughly demoralized that the department was obliged to send a man there to bring it into order. They sent the chief accountant of penitentiaries from the department here, Mr. George Foster, and I hope that man will get a good appointment. He straightened out matters there, and remained acting warden six or eight months. Who was selected by, when Sir John Thompson found that he had been misled and deceived year after year by the inspector of penitentiaries with regard to the New Westminster penitentiary, who was sent to improve the management of the institution? He selected the trustworthy and competent Mr. George Foster again to right the wrongs of that institution. The warden and the deputy warden were retired and Mr. Foster has that institution now in as complete working order as it is possible for any institution of the kind to be. I mentioned these facts to show that there was no foundation whatever for the plea put forward by the late inspector that it was necessary to have a common guard from some penitentiary to start a new penitentiary and carry it on successfully. In this report of Fitzsimmons to the Minister of Justice further on he delivers himself in this way:

It would appear Mr. Corbould, the member for New Westminster, is at the bottom of the opposition to my either holding office or of being appointed to a post in the institution. And the reason is this. Some years ago Mr. Corbould undertook to engineer a scheme for the removal of the penitentiary to a site on the opposite side of the Fraser River which site is, I am informed, owned by himself, and a syndicate of friends here. I viewed the place and in my opinion I considered it to be entirely unfit for a site for any institution. My opinion has been confirmed since, for last spring during the floods the greater portion of the ground was covered with water to a depth of several feet. Mr. Corbould who had built his hopes of getting this scheme through, has never forgiven me, and I have been put to no end of trouble on account of it. Mr. Foster the accountant of the department at Ottawa came out here in March, 1893, rather mysteriously and as mysteriously departed. Upon his return to Ottawa, some 15 charges were laid against me. All of those I disposed of.

This deputy warden of the penitentiary attacks the member for New Westminster and alleges that he owned a site on the opposite side of the river on which he wished to have the new penitentiary built. I have to inform this House that the Dominion government owns that land. In fact, it was a portion of the land that became theirs when British Columbia first entered the Dominion, and it was a debatable question when the penitentiary was built in 1877 and 1878 whether that site would be taken or the one upon which the penitentiary stands. A very large number of us believe that the site on the opposite side of the river, the one which was rejected, was a very much better site than the one which was selected. The penitentiary is now surrounded by the city of New Westminster. A large portion of the corporation lies east and north of it, and we, who had faith in the growth and future prosperity of that place, saw that it would be only a few years until the town would extend there and far beyond, and we favoured the site on the south side of the Fraser River. The statement that Mr. Corbould owns that is untrue. Mr. Corbould is opposed to me in politics, but he is an honourable gentleman, and I say unhesitatingly that as far as I know and believe that charge against him is false. It is true that there was a small portion of land that would probably have to be acquired in order to get to this government property, but Mr. Corbould was not interested in it. It was seriously considered by the Department of Justice at that time, when New Westminster was growing so fast, and land was held at very high figures, that it might be better to sell the penitentiary grounds, and they could get more for that land than would build a much larger and better penitentiary than the one we have at the present time. But this is the clue to Mr. Fitzsimmons's objection—the people out there say, and I share the belief—that his objection was simply because he would not have the same facilities for pilfering from that institution for charitable purposes. Further on in this document again he appeals to the Minister of Justice to be reappointed:

I think that I ought to be at once reinstated in the British Columbia penitentiary as deputy warden, and I consider that my character being cleared that designing and bad men who got up a conspiracy to ruin me but failed, that I have still a much better right to the wardenship than any one else has.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who cleared his character?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—He cleared his character himself and Mr. Moylan the inspector assisted him with false documents that were placed in the possession of the government. He continues:

My object in writing to you sir, is to request your influence in obtaining what I consider in some as my rights, the wardenship of this penitentiary.

I consider, if not appointed warden of this penitentiary, I will have been most unjustly treated, my friends had already made arrangements to bring my case forcibly before Sir John Thompson immediately on his arrival in Canada, but God willed otherwise.

That is all of that report of Fitzsimmons that I will inflict on the House. The next document is an extraordinary memorandum that was sent in to the Governor in Council by the same individual, but as it contains nothing different from which I have already given, I shall not trouble the House by reading it. I come now to Mr. Moylan's report. The versatile Mr. Moylan delivers himself as follows in a memorandum sent to the Deputy Minister of Justice :

As suggested by you, I beg to state what I know of ex-deputy warden Fitzsimmons. In 1878 I was instructed by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Laflamme, to open the British Columbia penitentiary, who gave me carte blanche to select from the staff of Kingston penitentiary an officer to accompany me, suitable for the post of chief keeper and deputy warden. I consulted warden Creighton, who recommended keeper Fitzsimmons as well fitted to fill the position. My own judgment and knowledge of the man confirmed the choice. He had been 21 years in Kingston penitentiary and was thoroughly practical and experienced in all that related to rules and discipline, both as regards officers and convicts.

Hon. gentlemen will see from Judge Drake's report how thoroughly conversant he was with the rules and with discipline to be serious. He simply violated nearly every rule that it was possible for him to violate.

On my arrival in British Columbia I found that the future warden was a man of limited intelligence and education, who had no other experience of conducting the administration of a penitentiary than what he had acquired as a policeman and jailer in the small town of New Westminster. In fact he told me of his surprise at having been appointed warden, and said he had not expected a higher place than a head turnkey.

Now, in order to show how utterly false that statement made by the inspector is, I will turn over to his own report which will be found in the sessional papers of 1893. In that report the late Inspector Moylan refers to McBride in the following way :

It is very probable that a change in the wardenship will be necessary on account of the ill-health of the present incumbent. Mr. McBride entered the colonial service as governor of the Victoria jail in 1864. This jail answered also the purpose of a penitentiary and a number of convicts having long sentences, one a life man, were transferred from it in 1878 to the penitentiary of New Westminster of which Mr. McBride was appointed warden in June of that year.

Now, contrasting the two statements ; the special plea that he puts in here for the deputy warden in this report of January of this year gives a direct lie to what he wrote coolly and deliberately in 1893. Here he states that Mr. McBride had had no experience except what he had gained as a jailer in the small town of New Westminster, and refers to him as a man of limited intelligence and education. Comparing the warden and the deputy warden, I have only to say that there was no comparison between the two men as to intelligence and education. That is all the remarks I shall make upon that point, but that shows you that it was almost impossible for the late inspector to deal with any subject, to put it very mildly, without exaggerating and misrepresenting facts. Further on he says :

Not to burden this memo with any lengthy details, I beg leave to refer to my annual report to the Minister of Justice for the fiscal year ended the 30th June, 1888, in adequately setting forth what deputy warden Fitzsimmons had accomplished up to that time to justify the choice which had been made of him to fill the place of second officer in the British Columbia penitentiary. From the opening of the prison in 1878, until Mr. Fitzsimmons was relieved from his duties in May, 1894, he performed the duties of warden, because that officer felt himself incompetent to discharge them and he consequently relegated his functions to the deputy.

In order to still further show the inconsistency of this report of Mr. Moylan, he says that the warden stated to him that he would have been satisfied with a place as head turnkey in the penitentiary. Here was a man who was receiving $1,500, as governor of the jail of New Westminster, who, we are told, was ready to abandon that for a position only worth $650 or $700, at the very most. The thing is inconsistent : it bears everything but the truth on the very face of it. Then further on he says :

I find this prison (that is the British Columbia prison) whenever I made an inspection of it a model institution as regards discipline, cleanliness, good order, suitable industries, superior farming operations, and a proper esprit de corps among the staff. This was the character of the establishment from its inauguration up to my last inspection in 1892. For this satisfactory state of affairs the deputy warden was entitled to all the credit.

The evidence taken, and the report of Judge Drake, certainly do not correspond with that statement of Mr. Moylan's, and it would appear that from the time that he opened the penitentiary in 1878 till 1892, when he made his last visit, he used all his ingenuity in misleading the Department of Justice here in respect to that institution. Further on he takes Commissioner Drake to task. He goes after him in this lively fashion :

As to the commission held by Mr. Justice Drake, I beg leave to call attention to the fact appeating on the proceedings that, though instructed to inquire into the administration and affairs of the British Columbia penitentiary, he confined himself almost exclusively to the charges against Fitzsimmons; that while he listened patiently to the statements of the witnesses against Fitzsimmons, as shown in the evidence forwarded by him to the department, yet his demeanour towards Fitzsimmons was not fair, as shown by his unseemly interruptions and sneering remarks when Fitzsimmons was giving evidence, and by his refusal to hear the witnesses in defence of Fitzsimmons, or to allow the receipts which he held from accountant Keary for everything it was sworn he had improperly given away belonging to the penitentiary, to be compared with the prison books.

Now, as far as Judge Drake is concerned, my hon. colleague and every representative from British Columbia knows too well that Justice Drake was incapable of acting in any other than a fair and liberal manner. He is one of the most honourable men on the bench in Canada, and he metes out the law and draws his deductions from evidence and not from any preconceived idea. When he says that he sneered at Mr. Fitzsimmons when giving his evidence, and refused to allow witnesses to testify on his behalf, that statement is not correct. As Commissioner Drake says in his report, he allowed every one that had any connection at all with the institution, and was charged with any wrong-doing, to be represented by counsel and Mr. Fitzsimmons had certainly as able counsel as it was possible for him to get in British Columbia. The statement is unfounded that Justice Drake in any way acted contrary to justice in investigating the charges made against Mr. Fitzsimmons, the warden and accountant. The inspector says:

I refer to these facts as showing that Fitzsimmons was not fairly treated, though he was, so far as my observations for several years extended, one of the most deserving, efficient and faithful officers in the whole penitentiary service.

He cannot find adjectives strong and numerous enough to extol the good qualities of this man Fitzsimmons.

I always believed in the spotless character of Mr. Fitzsimmons in his private and official life, and in his fidelity, zeal and competency as a penitentiary officer, and I entertain the same opinion still.

A great oration, hon. gentlemen. You would imagine that he only lacked wings to float upwards.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He lacked the wings.

Hon. Mr. McINNES, (B.C.)—Yes, largely.

The late minister, on the eve of his departure or England, told me he saw nothing in the evidence or in the report of the commissioner to prejudice Mr. Fitzsimmons, of whose integrity and upright character he said he did not entertain a doubt. He had seen that a plot had been entered into against Fitzsimmons.

All I have to say in regard to that is that the dead cannot speak. I do not believe there is a scintilla of truth in that statement. Sir John Thompson was not a man to make any such rash, unfounded and unfair promises. I will for a short time read a few of Mr. Moylan's annual reports, and I think hon. gentlemen will find them very interesting. You will see that he forgets one year what he had written the previous years. I turn to his annual report of 1888, in which, referring to the British Columbia penitentiary, he says:

I am glad to have it in my power to state that this penitentiary is successfully managed, both as regards the prisoners and discipline. Due regard has been paid to economy in all departments of the prison as the statements accompanying the warden's report will show.

Further on he says:

The testimony which the warden and chaplains bear respecting the management of the school is very gratifying. The teacher, Mr. Keary, is energetic and earnest in his work and his labours are very successful. He is very competent for the position. This is necessary; the schoolmaster of a prison must be prepared to hold his own against men of varied information. His ignorance would not long remain undiscovered; he needs, therefore, to be well taught. In addition, he requires tact, patience and discretion. The prison schoolmaster deserves consideration commensurate with his qualifications and responsibilities. I concur in the warden's recommendation for a more liberal remuneration to Mr. Keary, as schoolmaster.

I refer to that in order to show that in those days Mr. Keary, the accountant and schoolmaster, was a white-haired boy in the estimation of the inspector.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Curly-headed.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, curly-headed, too. In his report in 1889, he says:

The officers performed their duties faithfully and with good-will.

Further on he says:

Both chaplains bear testimony to the successful working of the school under the assiduous management of the accountant, Mr. Keary. The warden also makes special mention of this officer's zeal and efforts in connection with the school and expresses a hope that his services will be more liberally remunerated. In this recommendation I concur.

I now turn to the report of 1890. In March, 1889, when the late inspector, Mr.

Moylan, made a gross—I might say brutal—attack on the hon. member from de Lanau-dière, that hon. gentleman requested me to bring the matter up for him. That was in connection with the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. During the course of my remarks, when advocating the necessity of appointing a royal commission composed of one or more judges of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec to investigate the gross charges of wrong-doing in that institution, I also referred to the British Columbia penitentiary, and stated that if one-half the charges of wrong-doing and irregularities there were true, I asked that a royal commission be appointed to investigate those charges, and that the commission should consist of persons dissociated, in every sense of the word, from politics. I did not want the inspector, because his investigations in St. Vincent de Paul, and other institutions, had proved to be a farce, and I wanted the judges of the Supreme Court to be appointed to investigate affairs out there. That was denied at the time, but Sir John Thompson, three years afterwards, did precisely what I had asked in the interest of that institution. I said that if the officers of that institution were not guilty of the charges alleged, they would be honourably acquitted, but nothing less than that would satisfy the people of my province. That was in April, 1889. In the next report of Mr. Moylan, the inspector, I find the following. He says, referring to the British Columbia penitentiary :

A fly sheet printed in Washington territory containing the vilest slanders and most barefaced falsehoods against the administration of this penitentiary and some of its most deserving officers, was put in circulation in Victoria about 12 months ago. The production was the work of two of the most depraved and hardened criminals that have ever cursed, with their presence, any penitentiary in the Dominion. It was one of them, who coming across from Seattle, distributed in a few hours, the untruthful and libellous publication and made his escape to American territory before his arrest could be effected. Certain individuals who were either credulous or very unfriendly disposed towards the administration, towards the penitentiary made grave charges alleging that serious abuses and irregularities existed. These charges were of the vaguest nature, nothing definite being mentioned and they were advanced in a manner which every one, who appreciates fair play and manliness must stigmatize as dastardly. He is a veritable coward that makes accusations against men, who, by reason of their position, are helpless to defend themselves, and who has not the moral courage or the proper sense of justice to formulate his charges, in view of affording an opportunity to the victim of his malevolence to have the truth or falsity of the allegation duly tested. This is a general proposition without any particular application.

In connection with the remarks made by Senator McInnes on the 24th April last, in the Senate, I addressed with the approval of the Minister the following letter to that person.

This letter addressed to me was written by Mr. Moylan after he had found that I had left with my family for Europe in 1889. He went out to British Columbia, and after his arrival in the town of New Westminster had the impudence to write a letter to me there asking me to be present and make good the charges which I had made on the floor of the Senate, knowing that I was then nine or ten thousand miles away from New Westminster. He also sent a letter to Kennedy Bros. of the British Columbian newspaper, and the reply, made by the Kennedy Bros., I will read a portion of :

Your favour of the 5th instant is hereby acknowledged. A sufficient reply to the proposition therein contained, as well as a correction of the evident misapprehension by yourself, of this journal with regard to the investigation of the British Columbia penitentiary may be found by a perusal of the conclusion of the article published in this paper on the 6th February last, from which you have been pleased to quote and we submit the extracts accordingly beginning with the clause inserted in your letter.

Here is the citation :

If half the stories we are told about our own penitentiary are true, an investigation is urgently demanded. Of course these stories are told by convicts, who bring them to the light of day on the expiration of their sentences, and the word of a convict is not to be taken. Perhaps not, but who would expose abuses in penitentiaries if convicts did not? It is not to be expected that the perpetrators would tell on themselves. It would be well if the Dominion authorities would investigate penitentiaries once in a while and do so by means of a special commission outside of the service altogether. Such a method might lend variety to the reports. Those institutions that are conducted properly would suffer no injustice, while conversely wrong, if it exists, would be discovered and righted. We also cite below Senator McInnes.

In the closing paragraph of Mr. Moylan's report on the British Columbia Penitentiary that year, referring to that investigation, he delivers himself in the following way :

I am more than ever pleased with the manner in which this penitentiary is conducted. The officers are active, efficient and well conducted; they give a good example to the prisoners, they carry out the rules strictly and fairly. The convicts are well treated, they are well disposed to comply with the rules and discipline of the prison, they cheerfully and diligently perform the work allotted to them. Though invited to do so, they make no complaint: in a word, everything goes on smoothly and satisfactorily. If there be any of the abuses and irregularities alleged, the officers must get the credit of not only concealing them to perfection, but also of being in perfect accord in so doing.

They are unanimous in challenging the appointment of a special commission or any other mode of inquiry, then you may at any time consider it your duty to appoint.

Notwithstanding that, after Mr. Moylan had made his inspection, complaints poured in thicker and faster than ever. Sir John Thompson, notwithstanding the inspector's reports calculated to mislead him as to the true condition of affairs in British Columbia, never allowed that man to visit that institution after 1892, and he became convinced that there was grave wrong-doing there, and that the true statement of affairs had not been represented to him. An investigation was had in 1894 in the manner that I had suggested in 1889. Is it possible to conceive that an inspector, with the experience Mr. Moylan must have had with penitentiaries, could go there year after year, for some fourteen or fifteen years, without discovering irregularities, and gross breaches of the rules? Hon. gentlemen will find the explanation of his silence in this fact—when Mr. Moylan went to British Columbia he did not go to a hotel. Notwithstanding that he was getting at that time, and until a few years ago, five dollars a day for living expenses when he was on those visits, he became the guest of the warden and the deputy warden. I know of one visit he made there for nearly six weeks, during which time he was drawing five dollars a day for expenses which he charged to the government, for what did not cost him one cent.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I think it is customary. The same thing is done at Kingston.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The sooner that custom is done away with the better for the management of those institutions. Can hon. gentlemen imagine when a man becomes the guest of another that he will make honest reports, as he would if he was under no obligation? The man who becomes the guest, as he did, of the warden and deputy warden, while drawing $5 a day for expenses that he never incurred, is under obligation to them, and he dare not report the wrongs that might have come under his notice. I repeat, if that is the custom, the quicker it is done away with the better. I now come to his report of 1891:

During my last visit so this prison in August and September of 1889 I had ample and frequent opportunities of examining into and noting its management. Its affairs are conducted with economy, carefulness and the exercise of good common sense and judgment. The discipline was well maintained. The convicts, almost to a man, conducted themselves properly and the work done shows for itself their good will and industry. I found the officers, taking all in all, faithful to their duties, careful, sober and trustworthy.

A model institution, notwithstanding the revelations that were made the following year. I now come to the report of 1892:

My inspection did not extend to this penitentiary last year; a visit having been considered unnecessary, as matters went on smoothly and well, and there was nothing to call for the presence or special action of the inspector. No complaint, official or otherwise, indicating neglect or abuses, has reached the department.

Everything was going on beautifully and smoothly. In 1893 he referred to Mr. Keary, the accountant, again. He was very solicitous for his welfare. As I said before, he was an ideal officer, even to 1893; but he holds a very different opinion of him now. He says in this report:

The school under Mr. Keary, accountant, is conducted with the same careful attention and competency as in former years. The schoolmaster's task is a difficult one, requiring great patience and labour, owing to the mixed races among the pupils. Withal, his success in bringing them on is remarkable. Chinese, Indians and Italians entirely ignorant of English learn to read, write and cipher very well in a wonderfully short time. Of those attending the school, the Catholic chaplain says: "Their patience and assiduous attention to study certainly deserves praise."

I now come to the report for the present year. I must say, in connection with this report, that I was very much surprised indeed that it should come out over the signature of Mr. Moylan, the late inspector. Mr. Moylan, as I understand, was superannuated on the 24th October last, when those other men, Fitzsimmons, the warden, and the accountant, were dismissed from the British Columbia penitentiary. Why Mr. Moylan should be allowed to issue the report for 1895, I am unable to understand, but if hon. gentlemen will look over it and read the report that he makes on the British Columbia penitentiary, they will then see the object that he had in view. From the beginning to the close of the report the references to the British Columbia penitentiary are nothing but an apology and misrepresentation in order to shield his friend Fitzsimmons. I will only read a few passages from his report :

In September, 1878, I opened the British Columbia penitentiary at New Westminster, organized the staff, and placed the institution in good working order. Though the warden was not an efficient officer, yet, owing to the great practical knowledge and experience which the deputy warden had acquired regarding prison management, and to the careful attention with which he discharged his own duties and those not fulfilled by the warden, no interest suffered. As a matter of fact from the inauguration of the institution until March, 1893, the penitentiary at New Westminster was one of the best conducted penal prisons in the Dominion.

All I can say is, may some good power help the other institutions if they were conducted no better than this one.

Thorough discipline was well maintained ; the conduct and the industry of the convicts were above the average ; economy in the expenditure was a marked feature in the administration ; and the improved condition of the reserve, with its yearly profitable products, gave evidence that the prison labour was skilfully utilized. Two thorough and searching inquiries, one at the instance of the late Mr. Justice Gray, made by ex-Governor Trutch, about ten years ago, and the other by the inspector, 1889, did not elicit any facts or circumstances prejudicial to the good government of the penitentiary or to the conduct and character of the staff, individually or collectively. The public, by advertisement, were asked to attend these inquiries, and, any one having information of wrong doing or irregularities was invited to give his evidence. In the autumn of 1892, I made a very careful inspection of this prison. There was nothing to indicate any laxity of discipline or falling off in the general administration. Officers and convicts and outside citizens had free access to the inspector, and full opportunity to make complaint of anything wrong or faulty regarding the institution. None was made. Owing to his state of health and other causes, I found it necessary to tell the warden that I would be obliged to recommend his superannuation, on my return to Ottawa.

He thought the time was ripe to act ; the conspiracy was culminating in the overthrow of the warden who was to be supplanted by Fitzsimmons, and now he was bound to act, and to act with great energy. He says, "the warden expressed himself reconciled"—remember, Mr. MacBride is a man of about 60 years of age to-day, a hale, hearty, strong man, strong and able, mentally and physically as he ever was. He says :

He expressed himself reconciled. In November, 1892, on my arrival in Ottawa, I reported the matter to the Minister who concurred in my view of retiring the warden : at the same time, he signified his intention to appoint the deputy warden in his place. He gave instruction that the warden be asked to send in his resignation at once. In consequence of the medical certificate furnished by him twice, having been irregular and unsatisfactory.

In other words, he could not get a doctor to give a false certificate, and state that the man was incompetent, mentally or physically, to perform his duties. It was unsatisfactory, and it was returned twice. He says :

A delay of some six weeks occurred before the proper documents were received. Meanwhile, rumour of the contemplated appointment of the deputy warden, reached New Westminster, and forthwith a series of charges against that officer, by persons inside and outside the penitentiary, poured in upon the Minister. A scheme to change the site of the prison to a most unsuitable location, on the south side of the Fraser River, had been set on foot in the early part of 1892, and very strongly urged on the late Minister of Justice.

He goes on to describe the site to which I referred a while ago and to handle Mr. Corbould without gloves. He then continues :

The commission which I recommended was appointed to inquire into the affairs of the penitentiary.

I have reason to believe that he fought against the appointment of that commission as long as he could ; in fact, the commission was appointed, and Mr. Foster was on his way to British Columbia, before Mr. Moylan knew anything at all about it.

The late Minister of Justice expressed to me his wish that I should attend the investigation and ask to be examined, if I deemed this necessary. He instructed his deputy to inform the commissioner of this, who, notwithstanding, denied me the opportunity of appearing before him, although there was much sworn to by the warden and others, upon which my evidence as a matter of simple justice and fair play, should have been taken.

If Mr. Moylan was so anxious to give evidence, why did he not attend for that purpose ? The late Minister of Justice was too fair minded to deny him the privilege, but Mr. Moylan took good care never to turn up and give evidence, and that is why I claim it is improper to allow him to make this report after he had ceased to have any connection whatever with the penitentiary or the government, other than drawing his superannuation :

I have carefully read over the evidence taken by the commissioner and his report thereon, and I have no hesitation in stating that the facts were not fully or truly brought forth; that the character and motives of the witnesses were not considered, nor was proper attention paid to the evidence and explanations of the deputy warden, or to the improbability than an upright and efficient officer of many years' standing would be guilty of any dishonesty or impropriety. The subsequent career of many of those witnesses, notably of the accountant and storekeeper (a nephew of Senator McInnes, of British Columbia) and the discovery of their own misconduct show how untrustworthy they were and with what motives they were influenced in trying to get rid of an upright and superior officer. The part the deputy warden took in defeating the scheme for the change of the penitentiary site accounts for the desire of some outside the penitentiary to witness his removal. I have no doubt if the commissioner had been aware of the interests and motives at work against the deputy warden he would have made a different report.

As might be expected this penitentiary has deteriorated the last two years.

In turning over to the last paragraph of this lengthy report on the British Columbia Penitentiary, I find that he forgot what he had written in the early part of the report, and delivers himself in this way:

My inspection of this institution not having been made since October, 1892, I have no information to give regarding its administration.

You can see that no reliance can be placed on any of his reports in connection with that institution, and I suppose the same will hold good with regard to the establishments at St. Vincent de Paul and Kingston. In order to give some idea of how the people of British Columbia resented the reinstatement of Mr. Fitzsimmons as deputy warden, I will read the presentment of the grand jury in New Westminster on the 25th May last. A great deal of weight ought to be given to this presentment, because they were only actuated by a spirit of fairness and justice. The presentment reads as follows:

A sensation was created in the court of assize here to-day when the grand jury made a presentment to Chief Justice Davie, declaring the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons as deputy warden of British Columbia Penitentiary by the Dominion Government was an insult to the self-respecting portion of the community. Fitzsimmons was discharged by the late Sir John Thompson as the result of a finding of the Royal Commission investigating penitentiary affairs, presided over by Judge Drake. Evidence was given against Fitzsimmons, who was shortly after discharged. His reinstatement in March caused intense indignation and the feeling has not yet subsided, as the grand jury presentment indicates.

That will give a pretty clear idea of the unpopularity of the reinstatement of Fitzsimmons, and I may also say, for the information of the House, that instead of that feeling being allayed it is more intense there to-day than it was on the 24th March last. I would also call the attention of the House, before leaving this part of my subject, to Mr. Moylan's attack on my hon. colleague here which was published in the Citizen of the 5th June last.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do not allude to that.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I think it is my duty to do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Because I claim that no man, though a superannuated civil servant, ought to be allowed to abuse and vilify public men who, in the discharge of their duties, may incur his hostility. It is the duty of the government to check that man, or to withhold his pension. My hon. colleague does not wish me to read what he states, and out of deference to his feelings I shall not read the paragraph. But I say that that letter is low and scurrilous, and it is the duty of the Government to protect the members of both Houses, especially of this House, from such impudent and unwarranted attacks in future. Some time ago I asked the leader of the House to give the name of the member from British Columbia who recommended the reinstatement of Mr. Fitzsimmons. The reply, if it can be called a reply, was certainly an extraordinary one. I could not realize it until I saw it in print. I asked the following question:

Was it on the recommendation of a member of Parliament from British Columbia that James Fitzsimmons was appointed deputy warden of the British Columbia penitentiary? If so, what was the name of the member?

To which the Premier replied:

Deputy wardens in Canadian penitentiaries are appointed on the responsibility and on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, and not on the recommendation of a member of Parliament. This course was followed in the case of James Fitzsimmons.

I will not credit that reply to the hon. Premier. I believe it must have been placed in his hands by the Minister of Justice. It is worse than no reply at all. We all know that it is on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice that the appointment is made in Council, but what I wanted to know, and what the hon. gentleman must have known I meant, was on whose recommendation did the Minister of Justice appoint Fitzsimmons? That was the point, and that reply was worse than no answer at all. Now, the hon. gentleman will surely not pretend to tell this House that there was no recommendation made for the reappointment or reinstatement of Fitzsimmons. There was a warden appointed the other day—Mr. Mosby. I believe I am safe in saying that the Minister of Justice never saw the man who has just been appointed warden. He acted on the recommendation of the members from British Columbia. If not, I should like to know if the members from British Columbia have any patronage at their disposal? Are they such unfaithful followers of the government that their recommendations must be thrown in the waste basket, and that outsiders—men who have no direct interest at all, except of a special character, not representative men at all—are to have their recommendations acted upon in preference to those of the elected representatives of the province? It is an extraordinary state of affairs, but that is the only deduction to be drawn from the Premier's reply to my question. I think I can give the House a clue to the person who made the recommendation for the reinstatement of Fitzsimmons. In January last, the discharged deputy-warden, Fitzsimmons, was in the city of Victoria, the guest of the then Attorney-General, the Hon. Mr. Theodore Davie. From there he came to Ottawa to personally urge his claims to reinstatement. On his return to British Columbia Premier Davie hastened to the capital to influence the Minister of Justice in favour of Fitzsimmons. After the then Premier of the province of British Columbia, Mr. Theodore Davie, was appointed Chief Justice of British Columbia, he came here, and the third day after his arrival Mr. Fitzsimmons was reinstated. It is generally believed throughout the province of British Columbia that it was done on his recommendation, or that he was the instrument used in order to get this man reinstated. A little later on, the Minister of Justice here let the cat out of the bag, to use a vulgar expression. I will read a short article from the Victoria Times :

New Westminster, May 25.—A largely attended meeting of the Conservative association was held on Thursday night, at which a letter from Sir Hibbert Tupper was read relating to the reinstatement of James Fitzsimmons as deputy warden of the penitentiary. The letter stated that Fitzsimmons was reinstated on the strength of a statement put in by him alleging that he had not had a fair hearing before the commission, and further that Sir John Thompson before leaving for England had promised Chief Justice Davie to reinstate Fitzsimmons. The association decided that the reply was unsatisfactory and determined to remain firm in its first demand on the government in the matter. It had been the general impression all along that the chief justice was mixed up in the reinstatement, and Sir Hibbert's letter shows the impression was correct. If the demands of the association are not complied with or if any compromise is attempted, the whole Conservative organization of New Westminster district will disband.

There is another document, written after his return, which shows that that deduction is the only natural one. The representatives of British Columbia were ignored in the matter, although they were a unit, and a man that had no claim on the government, who was not a representative of the province in the true sense of the word, had the patronage at his disposal. What does he say on his return, in an interview with the World newspaper—a paper that has been supporting him very strongly for a great number of years? Chief Justice Theodore Davie says :

Regarding the reinstating of Deputy Warden Fitzsimmons, of the New Westminster penitentiary, the chief justice stated that such a course had been decided on by the late Premier and Minister of Justice, Sir John Thompson, and that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper was but carrying out the intentions of his predecessor. It has not yet been decided whether Mr. Fitzsimmons will be permanently located at New Westminster or in some of the other institutions in the Dominion.

He was conversant with everything that was going on; he knew what had been done for his client. Just consider the circumstances! Here we find the Chief Justice of British Columbia, usurping privileges which did not belong to him. He comes here and asks the Department of Justice to throw into the waste basket all the evidence taken by the commission under oath, and accept instead statements, nineteen-twentieths of which are false, made by Fitzsimmons himself in his report to the Minister of Justice. What a travesty of justice! There was a time in Canada—and I hope it will come again—when our judiciary was second to none in the world. But if such acts are sanctioned, we will soon have little reason to boast of our judiciary. I claim that it was improper for Chief Justice Davie to interfere in the matter. I can tell the hon. Premier—and my hon. colleague knows it and every man in British Columbia knows it—that next to the reinstatement of Mr. Fitzsimmons, the appointment of Chief Justice Davie was one of the most unpopular and unsuitable ever made in our province. He is known in that province from one end to the other for three leading traits of character—vindictiveness, unscrupulousness and “gall.” Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but my hon. colleague knows it. The Minister of Justice erred in listening to him; he should have been guided by the advice of the members from that province who were in full sympathy with him and supporting him there. Surely their recommendation should have been taken instead of that of an outsider. I shall now refer to the estimates for this year to show how economically the British Columbia penitentiary has been governed of late. At page 31 of the estimates you will find the items of controllable expenditure in connection with that penitentiary. You will find that for maintenance and other controllable expenditures there is a total deduction of $10,373 from the expenditure of last year, although the staff and number of convicts are larger than ever. That was the institution that was so economically governed, according to Moylan's reports. That condition of affairs was brought about by the present acting warden, Mr. Foster. I have no hesitation in saying that in the last 17 years $100,000 or $125,000 have been improperly taken out of the Dominion treasury in the management of this institution alone. According to the report on that institution, after Mr. Foster took charge, there has been 100 pounds of bread alone, besides other food, saved every day.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—How did you say he saved the bread?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—He mentions it in the report. It has been dealt out to them in a decent and becoming manner, and not kicked to them as it would be to a lot of dogs. The statement is made by the gentleman appointed by the government, and I say his statements should be taken in preference to anything that Moylan or Fitzsimmons or any other outsider may say to the contrary. It is a gross insult not to take his report and deductions from the evidence in preference to those made by men who were directly interested in concealing their own frauds. It is stated, and I believe it is true, that outside of the contracts for the staple articles to supply that institution, from 25 to 100 per cent more was charged for everything that went to that penitentiary than should have been charged. I have been told so on authority that I cannot for a moment doubt. It is stated, too, that from  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{1}{3}$  less in value and in weight than the government paid for was supplied to the institution. True weights were not given; true measure was not given. I have been so informed and I have every reason to believe that the statement is correct. The position that I started out with was this: that a conspiracy had been entered into in order to supplant the warden by Fitzsimmons when Moylan took Fitzsimmons from the Kingston penitentiary in 1878; that the time was ripe for action in 1893, but owing to the delay in getting satisfactory medical certificates to show that McBride, the warden, was incompetent physically or otherwise, it got rumoured abroad that Fitzsimmons, who had no qualifications for the position except his long term of service, was to be appointed warden. As far as I know, on every visit made by Mr. Moylan, all his ingenuity was called into play to cover up wrong-doing and deceive the government. For years he succeeded in deceiving the late Minister of Justice, and in covering up the wrong-doing in the penitentiary, I cannot imagine any man of common sense being in New Westminster for any length of time without noticing that there were grave irregularities in that institution; but instead of mentioning them in his report, Mr. Moylan concealed them and commended the deputy warden, who was responsible for all wrong-doing. I want an investigation to be made into the financial transactions of Mr. Moylan, I tell the hon. gentleman from Kingston that if such an investigation is made, and the facts are brought out, he will discover at his own door in the Kingston penitentiary, a state of rottenness of which he has no idea. I have in my pocket letters from men in the Kingston penitentiary stating that a worse condition of affairs exists there than ever existed in British Columbia, My hon. friend from Delandière endeavoured, year after year, to get an independent commission, apart from the influence of the government and the inspector, to investigate the management of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary. His demand was refused. Things went on year after year from bad to worse until a little rebellion broke out in the penitentiary, a man was killed, and several persons were injured, but no investigation made. In the public interest the management of those institutions should be investigated every five or six years, not by one of the employees or officers of the department, but by some one not interested in politics. It is in the interest of the public service that a commission should be appointed to investigate the conduct of the late inspector of penitentiaries. If he is not guilty he will be acquitted; if he is guilty, he should be punished as a warning to other officials to discharge their duties faithfully. I have a number of other communications that I should like to read, but I have trespassed on the patience of the House longer than I anticipated. I did not expect that the hon. Premier would force me to inflict the House by reading that long report, which might just as well have been handed to the reporters.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that I should be justified in occupying the attention of the Senate for any length of time, had not the hon. gentleman from New Westminster made such a sweeping charge against the Department of Justice, and also against the government generally, for their action in the matter of the New Westminster penitentiary. I think, under the circumstances, I shall be justified in occupying the attention of the Senate for 10 or 15 minutes at least in giving the other side in as succinct a manner as possible. Many difficulties present themselves in dealing with charges made against an official. There are circumstances connected with every case which would justify the government in not exercising the extreme power with which they are vested in dealing with those officers. On the first blush, in reading that evidence, one would come to the conclusion, probably that the hon. gentleman has reached; but on reading it carefully from one end to the other, it seems to me he would conclude that while irregularities did exist in the management of the New Westminster penitentiary, those irregularities were of such a character as would not justify the government in dealing with the officers in the extreme manner that the hon. gentleman has suggested. Having made this preliminary remark I shall confine myself to the statement of the case as viewed by the department which has the management of the penitentiaries of the Dominion. The first allegation regarding the mismanagement of the British Columbia penitentiary, of which the department had any knowledge, was that contained in a fly sheet circulated by an ex-convict in 1889. In April of the same year the hon. gentleman from New Westminster took the responsibility of the statements contained in that fly sheet by stating them from his place in the Senate and demanding an investigation.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I never saw the fly sheet to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and did not make the statements that I made on the floor of this House from anything contained in that fly sheet. It was from the public rumours in New Westminster that I made the statements.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. All I can say is the fly sheet contains precisely the same charges that were made in the statement of the hon. gentleman to the Senate. That he may not have seen the fly-sheet is a matter which of course he knows, and which I do not; I take the facts as they have been furnished to me. The statements were reiterated in New Westminster a few days later. An investigation was ordered, and previous to its being opened invitations were issued to the hon. senator, the proprietors of the Columbian (the newspaper which had repeated the charges) as well as to the ex-convict and the public generally, to appear and substantiate the allegations. No response to these invitations having been received, the investigation proceeded. The hon. gentleman made the statement, not that he was notified, but that the inspector sent a letter to him knowing that he was out of the country at the time. If that be correct, and I have no reason to doubt the hon. gentleman's statement, that is a good reason why he could not well be present at that investigation, but people were uncharitable enough at the time, and are uncharitable enough now, to state that the hon. gentleman knew that this investigation was to take place and that a summons was to be issued, and that, not being able to prove the allegations which he had made, he absented himself purposely.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I never heard that before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not say that it is correct. I am speaking of public rumours stated at the time, and probably there may have been as much truth in that statement as there is in some of the allegations which are circulated against those officers. Every officer of the institution was subjected to examination under oath, and each in turn denied any knowledge of irregularities or mismanagement. A full report of this investigation will be found in the Report of the Inspector of Penitentiaries for 1889. No further allegations of mismanagement were received by the department until 1893, when it became known to the department that friction existed between some of the officers—notably between Deputy Warden Fitzsimmons and Accountant Keary. The accountant of penitentiaries was ordered to proceed to British Columbia and report upon the state of affairs. He did so, with the result that Hon. Mr. Justice Drake was commissioned to hold an investigation into the affairs and management of the institution. Judge Drake held an investigation and reported a summary of the facts; but without making any recommendation regarding changes in the staff. The late Minister of Justice after perusing Judge Drake's report and the evidence on which it was based, recommended the retirement of the warden, "without prejudice to any claim which he may have to superannuation"—recommended the removal of the deputy warden, "without prejudice to his re-employment in the penitentiary service," and recommended the absolute dismissal of the accountant. I may here interpose this remark: The hon. gentleman read a letter which he finds among the papers now before the House, and stated his belief that Sir John Thompson, whom he described as a fair-minded man, possessed of a keen judicial intellect, never could have made any such recommendation. With all the qualities that he attributed to the late Premier of this country, I can assure him that this statement, which I have just read is based upon what occurred in the Department of Justice, and therefore I have good reason to believe that it is true or it would not have been made. As regards deputy warden Fitzsimmons, he expressed to several persons his intention of employing him as deputy warden in one of the eastern penitentiaries and replacing him at British Columbia by another experienced official. That would have been carried out during the lifetime of Sir John Thompson, or immediately afterwards, had he not found a difficulty in making an exchange with an officer who is now in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, who declined to go to the west, but his intention beyond doubt was to make that change. Fitzsimmons applied to be reinstated in British Columbia. He alleged that the investigation was not thorough and he was placed at a disadvantage during its progress, for the following reasons: There was a concerted action on the part of Keary and many other officers to make him responsible for all irregularities. An examination of the evidence tends to confirm this opinion. There was, undoubtedly, several secret meetings of officers at Keary's house. When Fitzsimmons's counsel endeavoured to ascertain the nature of these meetings and their object he was summarily stopped by the commissioner. Mr. McColl (Keary's counsel) publicly stated that he was responsible for those meetings. These facts will be found on the records of the investigation. Fitzsimmons having been suspended, pending the investigation, had not access to the books and papers of the institution, and therefore could not procure documents and receipts which he considered necessary to meet the charges brought against him. The record shows that he and his counsel repeatedly called for the production of books and papers which were not produced. It will be seen, therefore, that Fitzsimmons laboured under the disadvantage of having to employ three separate counsel, none of whom were present continuously. It is alleged that this was an indication that the counsel, which he first employed, were too conscientious to proceed. If the lawyers of British Columbia are too conscientious to defend an accused person in the event of their believing him to be guilty, they have very different ideas of their obligations from those held by counsel in other parts of the world. The counsel who eventually took and prosecuted his case, holds as high a character for probity and honour as is held by those who undertook professional duties which they failed to complete. As to the charge against Fitzsimmons, it is easy to quote extracts which appear condemnatory, but no one but those who have read carefully the whole evidence is in a position to judge whether or not the charges were absolutely proven. A careful perusal of the evidence will show that every dollar charged by the warden for the pasturage of Judge McCreight's horse, was paid by the judge, through Mr. Fitzsimmons. If there be any undercharge the fault is not that of the deputy warden, whose duties do not require him to either authorize or enter debits upon the books of the institution. The pasturage was authorized by the warden who acknowledges the fact in a letter under his own hand which has been filed as an exhibit. He also acknowledges having supplied to the accountant the details of the charges entered on the book. Judge McCreight testified that he never received any account—never was asked for money but what he paid was purely voluntary.

Now read the evidence in connection with that transaction and it amounts to this—and I am not here to defend the irregularities which took place at that time—Judge McCreight was in the habit of pasturing his horse in government grounds. He was in the habit of keeping his horse, as I understand, in the penitentiary stables. If I am not incorrectly informed, the horse was taken care of by one of the convicts. Judge McCreight was scrupulously honest, so far as he was concerned. He insisted on paying for keeping the horse in the stable and for pasturing. Fitzsimmons's answer to him was "I have no authority to take money from you and I refuse to take it." The judge on one occasion paid him $40 or $50, and on another $10. He said "I cannot take this." The judge said, "Yes, take it and give it to the Sisters who have charge of the Orphans' Home, or some hospital." While he should have taken that money—I do not hesitate to say—and paid it into the credit of the Receiver General, he did as Judge McCreight directed—handed it over to the Sisters of Charity in consideration, as he thought, of the services rendered by those ladies in taking care of the sick in the penitentiary. They devoted much time and attention and gave much of their assistance whenever any of the prisoners were ill and made no charge for it. This man who, I understand from my hon. friend from Kingston, is a very devout member of his church, took the money in the manner that he did from Judge McCreight but never appropriated a cent to himself, nor is there a single word in the whole of that evidence, so far as I can ascertain, in which Fitzsimmons is charged with having put any of it into his own pocket. The error that he committed was in taking the money from Judge McCreight and disposing of it as the judge intimated he should. The judge, I believe, is also a Roman Catholic.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Yes, he has been for 14 years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Now as to the system of reciprocal services between the penitentiary and the orphanage, it must be admitted that such should not have existed. Careful perusal of the items, however, fails to show any actual loss on the part of the government by the action of Fitzsimmons. The two small pigs which were given to the Sisters, were given by the authority of the warden, who in his evidence claims that the penitentiary was indebted to the Sisters for services attending a sick female convict for several weeks, and attending to the laundry and the chapel linen for several years. For the latter service alone, we pay $50 a year, at one of the eastern prisons. As to the work done at the drain of the orphanage, it is in evidence that Fitzsimmons tendere<sup>d</sup> payment, and that his money was afterwards handed back to him by the warden with the remark that it was too small a matter to charge for. It is shown that two loads of lumber were taken from the penitentiary wharf to the orphanage; but it is equally clearly shown that the lumber was decayed and useless, and that the prison officials were in the act of throwing it in the river, when they were asked to send it to the orphanage as fuel. The statement of Steward McInnes that a load of coal was sent to the orphanage, is fully met by the statement that it was replaced by Fitzsimmons a few days later. The receipt for the coal which was returned to the institution is now on file in the department. It was alleged that a quantity of bread was sent to the orphanage by order of Fitzsimmons, and the witness testified as to the convict who carried the bread to the sisters. The records of the institution show that the convict, who was named as having taken the bread, and was released from the penitentiary before the orphanage was erected, and has never since been an inmate of the institution. The other favours to the orphanage are in the way of odd jobs of repairing done by the carpenter and blacksmith. The carpenter instructor and blacksmith instructor each admit that a general requisition existed covering all work which might be done for the orphanage in those shops. Such being the case it was neglect on the part of those instructors and the accountant, if debits were not entered on the books. No account was furnished Mr. Fitzsimmons, except those recorded in the records of the investigation. In each case he has filed the receipt of the accountant for the amount of account rendered. These are but a few illustrations of the misapprehension which exists with reference to the conduct of the deputy warden, and it is sufficient to say that both the late Minister of Justice and the present Minister of Justice (neither of whom have ever been accused of condoning wrong-doing on the part of officials) have been fully convinced that Fitzsimmons has been guilty of no dishonesty and that whatever irregularities he permitted were not done wantonly nor through negligence. He has been in the penitentiary service for thirty-seven years, but it is only during the last few years of that service that anything has been alleged against him. It is submitted that no charge of dishonesty or malfeasance of office has been established. His industry, energy and zeal, for the welfare of the penitentiary have never been questioned and it is submitted that under such circumstances, the government would not be justified in depriving him of his position and thereby depriving him of his claims upon the superannuation fund to which he has contributed, without doing him a great injustice. That there were irregularities in the management of the penitentiary, there can be no doubt, but there is no evidence to prove that, in what Fitzsimmons did, he was personally dishonest, or that he personally profited by any of the irregularities. All that the inspector reported in 1889 and other years in favour of Keary, may have been quite correct, so far as he knew, at the time. His crimes having been subsequently discovered, he was dismissed. From what I have read of the evidence myself, I repeat that however irregular his actions may have been, however misled or incorrect he may have been in disposing of the money given to him by Judge McCreight, there is nothing to prove that he personally profited by any of these sums to the amount of one cent. The hon. gentleman spoke of saving effected in the purchase of supplies. From all I can hear he is quite correct in that statement, but he left the impression upon this House, that those supplies were furnished by the deputy warden Fitzsimmons.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Now Fitzsimmons had no more to do with the purchase of supplies than the hon. gentleman himself.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, he had.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is done by the storekeeper and not by the warden.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was by him in that instance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no evidence to show that. Then the hon. gentleman complains that the Governor should never have permitted Inspector Moylan to make a report after he was superannuated. If I understood him correctly, he stated that Mr. Moylan was superannuated in October, 1894. Am I right in that?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, some time about then.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He was not superannuated until the 31st January, 1895, and the report from which the hon. gentleman quoted was a report for the year ending 30th June, 1894. He having been inspector to that time and not having ceased to be inspector until he was superannuated in 1895, nobody could have made that report but Mr. Moylan. Whether that report be correct or not I am not arguing; the charge against the government is that they permitted a superannuated officer to make a report reflecting on the officers of the institution. The facts are that he was not superannuated, as I have already indicated, until the 31st January of this year, while the report which he made and from which the hon. gentleman quoted was for the year ending 30th June, 1894, so I leave the House to judge how fair the hon. gentleman's attack on the government on this particular point is.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was the report ending 30th June, 1895, which I was quoting from.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That report cannot be out yet. The report may have been printed in 1895, but I think the hon. gentleman will find this report is for 1894.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I may be wrong.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend said that Mr. McBride is only 56 years of age, that he is in robust health and fit to do work. Strange to say, the report in the department is that he is over 61 and there are certificates from medical gentlemen stating that his health is such that he is unfitted for duty, and for that reason he is placed upon the superannuation list; so that if the government is deceived it is not their fault.

Hon. Mr. POWER—His medical certificate is in a different direction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope the hon. gentleman will not feel offended if I should say to him that if his certificates are as biassed as his political utterances, there is no person would give much attention to them.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Order, order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If they were given as a medical man, I should be bound to accept them as correct. I do not know who has charge of furnishing the food just now, but I do know this that during the time that the complaints were made in reference to the character of the food and its disposal, it was by a gentleman bearing the same name as my hon. friend. I did not know that he was the steward. I frankly admit so far as my judgment would lead me to calculate from reading these proceedings, that there were irregularities among the whole of the officials in the institution. My hon. friend took umbrage and spoke with a good deal of animation in condemnation of the position which he says the present Chief Justice of British Columbia occupies in connection with the matter. He claims that Mr. Davie had no right to make a recommendation in connection with the reinstating of Mr. Fitzsimmons. I deny that proposition in toto. Any one has a perfect right, in this free country, to recommend the reinstatement of a dismissed official, if he thinks he has been improperly dismissed. That occurs almost every day in the year. Gentlemen make recommendations in connection with matters with which they have nothing whatever to do, but which they believe to be in the general interests of the Dominion; to say that a man has no right to do that is to deny him the rights of a British subject. Whether he was reinstated through the instrumentality of Chief Justice Davie, I know not; but I do know this, that I had a number of hours' conversation, negotiation and deliberation with Judge Davie in connection with matters affecting the interests of British Columbia, in dealing with their Indians, in dealing with the protection of the coast against liquor smugglers, in connection with the issuing of titles to the Revelstoke properties, with reference to the settlement of the question of the limitation of the boundary of the 20-mile belt, and I say this for Chief Justice Davie, he never said a word to me about the British Columbia penitentiary, or Mr. Fitzsimmons or Mr. McBride or any one else connected with it. I do not say that he did not speak to other members of the Cabinet, and to the Minister of Justice on that subject; I take a still further objection to the position occupied by the hon. gentlemen. He has taken advantage of his position to make what I consider an unwarrantable attack upon the character of an eminent gentleman like Judge Davie, who has been the Premier of British Columbia for years and has occupied the most prominent position that the people could give him. I know nothing of how he got there; I do not pretend to speak of that. I judge from the fact that he has been Premier of that province, representing the most intelligent and respectable constituencies in British Columbia, and that he obtained the position of judge from a pledge on the part of the late Premier, which promise I had the pleasure of carrying out myself (because the recommendation of a Chief Justice comes from the Prime Minister and not the Minister of Justice) and I did it because I had such unbounded confidence in the opinion of a gentleman of such a legal mind as Sir John Thompson. I took the recommendation which I found in his office and I remember what he told me himself before he went to England, and I have no hesitation in accepting the responsibility of appointing Mr. Davie to that position. When a senator rises in his place to denounce a man in the position of chief justice as being unscrupulous, vindictive and full of "gall," especially when he is not here to defend himself, he is in no better position than the inspector, whom he denounces with so much virulence, who is out of doors, and who cannot come here to protect himself. I am one of those laymen who have most unbounded confidence in the judiciary of our country, and there is nothing that I dislike so much, even if there be a little failing on the part of a judge, particularly one who occupies so eminent a position as Judge Davie does, as to hear his character assailed and denounced, as I think it has been most unwarrantably in the Senate to-day, and I question very much whether the senator from New Westminster would have dared to attack Judge Davie in his own legislature or in the Senate if he were here to defend himself. It is all very well for a senator to rise here and denounce, traduce and villify a man who is outside the pale of Parliament, who has no means of defending or shielding himself.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I rise to a question of order. The hon. premier has no right to attribute motives to me or any other member in this House.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—It is a fact.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I deny the statement: it is not a fact, and I want to inform the hon. member that any statement I make about Judge Davie—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Order. If I have said anything that is out of order, and unparliamentary, I withdraw every word of it. I have nothing more to say in reference to Judge Davie or the hon. gentleman's position. What little I do know of Mr. Davie is of a character that would not justify the remarks that the hon. gentleman has made. I deny further that I have attributed any motives to the hon. gentleman. I simply dealt with the hon. gentleman's statements to the House, and consequently there was no point of order. If I had said that the hon. gentleman had an object in view, or was doing it out of revenge, or because he did not like the judge, or had attributed any motives at all, then he would have been justified in calling me to order. I tried to keep within the rules of order, and within the bounds of what I believe to be parliamentary procedure and so long as I remain in the position of Premier, or as a private member, if I hear an unwarranted attack made on a high official, and more particularly a judge of the land, no matter what his politics may be, I shall not hesitate to raise my voice against it in as earnest a manner as I can.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—I should like to correct the statement that I made as to the inspector stopping at the penitentiaries. I do not mean to say that they have been in the habit of stopping there, but merely that they have done so occasionally. It might be inferred from what I said that it was a practice. I only know of it having occurred occasionally, and I attribute it to the fact that the penitentiary is two miles distant from the hotel in the centre of the city, and they had to attend to important matters out there at a very early hour, and wished to be there so as to have an opportunity of inspecting the convicts. I might remark that I have very great pleasure in testifying to the character of the man Fitzsimmons, who has been so much traduced. I knew him 25 years, when he was one of the principal guards in the Kingston penitentiary, and no more honourable and upright man could possibly be found than Fitzsimmons. He was selected on that account to perform the duties of deputy warden, being a man possessed of valuable qualities. He was not "born to command," and I presume he did not suit the position there, having complete or nearly complete control, and being a sort of chief adviser to the warden, who was entirely inexperienced, because the management of a jail and the management of a penitentiary—although it has been insinuated that they are the same—are as different as the poles are asunder. There is no officer who requires more peculiar qualifications than the warden of a penitentiary—an institution like that at Kingston, with over 600 convicts and a large body of guards. It is difficult to select a suitable man. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia asked, why did not the Minister take the advice of the members from the British Columbia constituencies in appointing a warden or deputy warden? I am very glad to think that the Minister takes no such advice. I believe that it is so important an office that it is more difficult to fill than a judgeship, and consequently if the Minister does not take advice in appointing judges, he should not take advice in the appointment of a warden. I know very well, from some knowledge of that office, that it is an exceedingly difficult one to fill. With regard to reports of irregularities in the Kingston Penitentiary, I have heard them for the last two or three years; but only as reports. There has been ample time for any one to bring forward evidence, and I think there was an investigation held in the penitentiary, under what circumstances I cannot tell; but I know as a fact there was one held, and I know that the warden of that institution, Dr. Lavelle, has been in his office for a great number of years, and I have never heard any circumstances that would tarnish his character in the slightest degree. I make this remark in passing. I have also a knowledge of Mr. Moylan. He was appointed by the late Sir John Macdonald on account of the peculiar qualities he had for that position, and I believe he has discharged those duties faithfully. I am sorry to see the hon. member for New Westminster depart from the canons of Highland chivalry, which command the generous treatment of a foe, and employ means which are unworthy of the conduct which should characterize gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have very little to say on this occasion. Nothing could be gained by going into the matter, because the British Columbia members have got what they wanted. Mr Drake made a very strong report, and, acting on that, the members thought Fitzsimmons was not a fit man to place in a position of trust where he had misbehaved. It has been proved conclusively that he was guilty of gross irregularities, and it has been proved also by Judge Drake that $300 came into his hands from Judge McCreight, only $80 of which he accounted for. Whether the evidence bears this out or not, I am not prepared to say. I have not gone into the evidence, but Judge McCreight is a man of the highest integrity and honour, and the commissioner on the evidence taken immediately before him, reports that there was that much money unaccounted for. With regard to making charges against people who are not on the floor of this House to defend themselves, I would remind hon. gentlemen that charges are continually made against persons outside this House, and it must be so, if they have been guilty of gross irregularities or malfeasance of office. You cannot have those men on the floor of this House to defend themselves. The charges must be made against them in their absence, and members are right in doing so. I think the hon. gentleman from Victoria has done this country a great service in the course that he has taken in this matter. Through his efforts a commission was appointed to ferret this matter out, and he has stopped gross irregularities in that institution, and for that he deserves a great deal of commendation from the members of this House and the country. He has the satisfaction of knowing to-day that he has carried his point, along with all the other representatives from British Columbia, because we are all in harmony in this matter. Although the hon. member and myself do not always agree in political matters, in this case, owing to Judge Drake's report and other evidence, we are all of one mind, and we have got what we wanted. There is very little use in saying more about it. The unworthy officials are where they ought to be, and I am perfectly satisfied with the condition of things as they are.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We have a right, a license to make what remarks we wish and we are protected here from the legal consequences, yet I shall never deny the right of the press of Canada to comment on what we say here. If any person's veracity is impugned, or his character aspersed, the press is open to him to retaliate upon any member of Parliament and to castigate him as he deserves. No one can stigmatize a man because he is a pensioner. or deprive him of any of his civil rights. Wellington was a pensioner. The highest men in the army and navy and judiciary are pensioners, and because they are pensioners are they unworthy of the honours conferred upon them? And is it right to say in this House that their pensions should be taken away from them when they deal with public men and public questions, and is it right to speak of them contemptuously? Every free man has a right to answer in the press, by his letters, anything said in the House regarding his position, as regards his veracity, or honesty or fidelity. If he is stigmatized the press is open to him, and I hope any man who considers himself unjustly attacked will stand up for himself, his character and reputation, and cast a search-light upon his traducer, and vindicate his honour in the press. It may be that the chief justice and the late inspector of penitentiaries may consider what has been said of them unworthy of notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I believe I did not answer the hon. gentleman's questions. It is not the intention of the government to dismiss Mr. James Fitzsimmons until further investigation, which will take place, I have no doubt, in the suit which he has against the press of New Westminster. If it is then proved that he is a man of the character represented, the government will deal with him. It is not the intention of the government to appoint any commission to investigate the conduct of J. G. Moylan who is now superannuated.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I suppose I will be allowed to make a few remarks in reply to what the Premier has said. The hon. gentleman referred to the investigation that took place in 1889 in New Westminster to inquire into the charges that I had made on the floor of this House, and he stated that it was currently rumoured at that time that I had absented myself from the country in order to avoid being present and give evidence and make good any statements. It is the first time that I have heard of such a rumour. I left home early in May, and Mr. Moylan, the inspector, did not leave Ottawa for British Columbia to make that investigation for several weeks after I had left Canada for England. Notwithstanding that, he went out to New Westminster, a place that had only about 6,000 population, and he could not have been there twenty-four hours without knowing that I was not in the country. Neither myself nor any of my family were in British Columbia, so that the charge of evading that investigation is utterly unfounded. Hon. gentlemen who know me in this House and elsewhere will exonerate me, whatever my faults and failings may be, from the charge of being a coward. If there is anything that I despise in a man it is cowardice. And there is nothing that I have to say in this House that I am not prepared to say to any man outside of it, let the consequences be what they may. As far as taking advantage of my position to attack people here, I deny the charge; this is the first time that I made use of the term "pensioner." I did not make use of it the other day when I rose to a question of privilege. It was my hon. colleague who used the term, but I will say now that no pensioner, or superannuated official, has a right to attack a member of either House of Parliament for having discharged his public duty. I have never attacked any individual in this House or out of this House, without having had some provocation, and Mr. Moylan's attacks on me have been persistent ever since 1889, when I brought up the charge that he had made against Mr. Bellerose. That is the foundation of all the animus of this gentleman, and he has been persistent in attacking me ever since. I am sorry indeed to hear that Mr. Keary, the accountant, has not been superannuated. Any person who reads the voluminous evidence taken before that commission, and Judge Drake's report thereon, must come to the conclusion that of the three officers—the warden, the deputy warden and the accountant—the accountant is the innocent man. The only charge against the accountant for which there is any foundation is that he had in his private possession, books of a previous accountant, and did not produce them at the early part of the investigation. Mr. Keary occupies a very prominent position in New Westminster. He has been for a number of years an alderman and is yet. He is generally respected and has been the accountant in that penitentiary for the last 13 or 14 years. When he was guilty of fewer offences than the warden or Fitzsimmons, I cannot understand the justice of reappointing the deputy warden and superannuating the other, while the accountant is left out. It is unjust and I hope the government will yet change their policy in that particular and place him on the superannuation list. The first minister referred to private meetings that took place at Keary's house. In fact, nearly all the statement that the first minister made here to-day is evidence that did not come out before that investigation. Very little of it is to be found in the evidence submitted to the House. It is not to be found in Judge Drake's report. It is merely the unfounded statements made by Mr. Fitzsimmons's present lawyer, Mr. Morrison, and Mr. Moylan's false reports to the Department of Justice. I do not think that these unsupported statements of men who are interested in misrepresenting the facts ought to weigh for one moment in the balance compared with the impartial statements and careful report of Judge Drake, the commissioner. There was another matter as to which the premier contradicted me, that is the coal. Judge Drake emphatically states in his report that he could find no evidence whatever that that coal was ever refunded. The premier's statement is based altogether on the assertion of Fitzsimmons himself, supported by the assertion of his counsel. The hon. gentleman in his reply never referred once to the utter violation or non-observance of the rules that I read here this afternoon, as mentioned in Judge Drake's report. There was some six or seven of the most important rules in connection with the government of that penitentiary that were completely ignored. That ought to weigh a great deal, and ought to show that Fitzsimmons was not competent to fill the position of deputy warden or any other responsible office. There is another statement which the hon. gentleman made with regard to the supplies. I state here, on my responsibility as a member of this House, that Mr. Fitzsimmons the present deputy warden, alone made all or nearly all the purchases in connection with that institution. I care not what the inspector says to the contrary. I know whereof I speak, and I am not going to follow any statements that may be thrown in as padding here and there in order to let this gentleman down gently. The fact is that he, and he alone, was the purchaser of all the supplies of that institution. Nothing could be done except through Fitzsimmons, and with respect to what I said about Judge Drake,

I will not retract one single syllable. I give the First Minister credit for carrying out a pledge made by his predecessor, the late Sir John Thompson, even if it was not a bad one, but I repeat what I said this afternoon, that the next most unpopular appointment was that of the Honourable Theodore Davie to be chief justice of the province. I think the large majority of the people of British Columbia will sustain me in that statement. I am sorry the hon. gentleman declines to appoint a commission to investigate Moylan's conduct. I suppose it will come in the near future. When I made the charge six years ago against the management of the British Columbia Penitentiary, it was pooh-pooed and hon. gentlemen would not think of it, but the investigation came a few years later. The government had to do it in order to save the reputation of that institution. I hope between now and the first Thursday in January.—I think that is the date that the Premier fixed for the next session of Parliament—that he will be in possession of some facts which will induce him, in the public interest, to grant a commission to investigate the conduct of Mr. Moylan.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One word in explanation. I stated that Mr. Keary was dismissed; I stated further that he was the only officer against whom Judge Drake made a decided report, and the reason that he did it was that he had the books and concealed them, and when Mr. Foster, the accountant from the department, went out to British Columbia to make the investigation, he concealed the books and refused to give them up. He declared first that he kept no ledgers, and subsequently he was compelled to produce the books, and the excuse he gave for not producing them was that they were in such a bad state, that he kept them himself and that he was ashamed of them. I do not know anything about the coal. I stated that there was a receipt in the department showing that the coal which had been given to the Sisters was returned a few days afterwards. I did state, twice I think, that the violation of the rules and regulations to which the hon. gentleman referred indicated the gross irregularities that existed, but if the rules of the penitentiary were not adhered to by the other officials, it was the fault of the warden, whose duty it was to see that they were enforced and that they were obeyed and not disobeyed.

LOBSTER FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (91) "An Act to amend the law respecting the Lobster Fishery."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is a bill of some consequence, and it proposes to repeal section 3 of the Act passed by Parliament last year, and substitute a different provision. I have not given the very minute attention to this bill which it deserves, but I presume the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, who is, perhaps, more interested in it than I am, has done so. Any hon. gentleman who will turn to the Act of last year will find that this subsection 5 of section 3 provides that every case or package containing lobsters preserved, canned or cured in Canada shall, before being removed from the factory or canning establishment, where such lobsters have been preserved, canned or cured, be marked with a label, giving the address of the packer and the year in which the goods were packed. This particular provision was discussed at considerable length last session, and the object which the House had in view in passing that subsection in that form was twofold. One was to give the purchasers of lobsters some guarantee of the articles which they were purchasing, on the ground that the packer who put his name on the article, if he had any respect for himself at all, would not put up an article of inferior quality; and the other object was this, one of the things which the department complained of was that certain very small packers, people who often violate the law, packed lobsters out of season and did it in remote places, and they should not be in a position to put up inferior goods and sell them. Those were the objects which this House had last year in passing this subsection. The provision in the bill now before the House does not meet the difficulty at all. One of the great difficulties which the department has endeavoured to overcome is the fact that small packers put up inferior fish and packed out of season. They should be prevented from carrying on their business in that way, because one effect of that kind of packing is to damage the reputation of Canadian lobsters altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is packing out of season.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then the fish which are packed in those illicit, one might almost call them, canneries are not put up with such care as fish which are packed by men of standing and who have some reputation to lose. Under the Act of last year the public, and the department, and every one has a chance to know who packed the fish, and the fish are sold largely on the names of the packers. Of course they will sell even where the packer is not known—the fact that the name of the packer is on the can helps to sell the goods. That provision is stricken out by this bill, and instead of that, all that is required is that a stamp, which I compare to a postage stamp, shall be put on each case, not on each can. Each case is supposed to contain 48 lbs. of preserved lobster in cans; the bill before us just requires that a stamp—like a postage stamp—more like a postage than inland revenue stamp, because it does not indicate that any considerable revenue has been paid—shall be put on the outside of the case. The fact that a stamp is placed on the outside of a case containing 48 lbs. of canned lobster is no protection to the purchaser. He has no guarantee as to the quality of the article which he is buying, and it tends to leave the door open to people who put up fish that are caught out of season. It gives people who have really no reputation to lose a chance to put up their fish. I think it must strike every hon. gentleman that that is not a desirable condition of things. I do not propose to strike out anything that is here, but I should be disposed to move, as a sort of addendum to subclause 3, a provision of this sort :

(a). Every can containing lobsters preserved or cured in Canada shall, before being removed from the factory or canning establishment where such lobsters have been canned, preserved or cured, be marked, labelled or stamped with the name and address of the proprietor of such factory or establishment and the year in which such lobsters are canned, preserved or cured.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Why not put in the date ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the date, it is a fact that if the fish are properly canned and sealed and kept in a place which is reasonably cool, they will remain fresh for an indefinite period. If the fish are properly cured, and the name of the packer will be a guarantee for that, I should not wish to hamper the trade, if it is hampered by putting on the date. So when we come to sub-clause 3 of this clause I shall move that amendment. There is another circumstance to which I wish to call attention, and that is that this sub-clause 2 provides that a fee of $10 shall be paid for each such license, but on and after the first day of January, 1896, the fee shall be at the rate of $2 per 100 cases. That means a very considerable tax upon the lobster packers if they put up any large number of cases. It is not a very large factory which will not put up 5,000 cases in a season. That would mean that a packer who put up 5,000 cases would have to pay a license fee of $100. That seems to be a very considerable tax. It was stated, when the measure of last year was brought in, that it was not the desire of the government to get a revenue out of the lobster packers, but simply to enable them to supervise the business. If that is the case, I do not see why they should look for this comparatively large license fee from the packers. I may be in error—the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour is probably more familiar with the amount of lobsters packed by a canning establishment than I am, but I think that the average establishment ought to put up about 5,000 cases in a season. That would mean that the license fee would amount to $100, which is a serious tax on a business that is not just now a very profitable one. There are some other provisions omitted from section 3 of the Act of last year—one provision with respect to the laths, or slats and rods of the traps. I understand from gentlemen who profess to know something about it, that the provision in last year's Act was not operative, that an inch and a half was too small a space, and the small lobsters did not get out of the traps. Whether it is as well to drop that provision I cannot say: probably it is just as well. I think the government has done wisely in abandoning those provisions about the marking of the boats and gear of the fishermen. Of course, we cannot alter the fee in this House, but I object to the increase in the fee.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I do not wish to make any amendment, but I desire to draw the attention of the Senate to one fact which appears to be a very anomalous one, and that is that the lobster fisherman is subject to a license fee and he is only allowed to fish from the 1st of May to the 15th July, while all other fishermen, the cod fisherman, the fishermen who catch smelts, herring, hake, haddock and fish of that kind, are given a bounty to encourage them in their business. The man who makes a living for himself and is a benefit to the country around him, and brings in a good valuable manure in the shape of lobster bodies and shells, is taxed to a considerable extent. In many cases they will be subject to a tax of $40 to $50 a year, which in the present condition of the lobster fisheries is not much encouragement to continue the business.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think the tax is very large. It hardly pays for the supervision required to see that the factories are properly conducted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill does not provide for supervision.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is supervision required, and there is an expense attached to it in that way which I am sure is not met by the small tax imposed upon the quantity of fish that a man puts up.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—What are the fishermen to get for this $2? Are their fishing stands to be registered? Are they to have any exclusive right to fish in any place? I come from an important lobster fishing district, and a case occurred this season where one person along the whole coast was getting very good fishing. His neighbours to the east and west were doing little or nothing. As soon as they saw his traps taking a fair amount of fish, they brought their traps and put them right outside and inside of his, and the consequence was that nobody got a paying quantity. If they had left the man alone he would have made something. As it is the whole of them lost their season. While I feel that the lobster fishermen are unable to pay even so slight a tax as $2 per hundred cases, still in this case if the government would give them not only a license but protect them in the district in which they are fishing, and give them exclusive right of the fishing that they occupy, there will be some return for the fee. They should define how far along the coast this fishing should extend. These difficulties have arisen not only in the case to which I have referred, but they occur almost yearly. This season I myself wrote to the inspector, Mr. Chapman, asking him to come on and see what was the trouble among those men and get the matter settled. He replied that he had no jurisdiction. If we have fishery overseers and inspectors and superintendents, and whenever a little difficulty occurs they find that they have no jurisdiction, what are we paying the tax for? I am not going to object to the fee, although I think it is excessive, but some provision should be made to protect the fishermen in the places where they always have fished and that others are not allowed to encroach upon them during the fishing season. Where they set their traps they should have the exclusive right to fish, and should not move without the approval of the inspector.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am sure the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour would not approve of that. All the fishermen have traps. They are set promiscuously and there could be no regulations made, so far as I know around my own shore in Lunenburg, by which any man would have an exclusive right to any part of the shore. They are all free and independent and should and must be so in that respect. Nobody could have an exclusive right. If that were done, a few men would get possession of the whole shore and you would not find the fishermen of Nova Scotia satisfied that any exclusive or proprietary right should be given to any man to catch fish. Such tyranny and monopoly would not be tolerated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This license fee is not paid by the fishermen but by the packers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It seems to me that the first objection made by the hon. gentleman from Halifax is not well founded: the fee is graduated. The poor fisherman, for whom he is so solicitous now, if he has a cannery, has to pay a license of $10. The proposition is to give a license to the smallest fisherman, those to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, for $2 which will enable him to pack 100 cases of 48 one-pound cans.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—"Or 96 half-pound cans" should be added there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then there is the graduated scale.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Yes; for 101 cases the lobster packer has to pay a fee of $4.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, the scale is from 300 to 400 cases $4, from 300 to 500 cases $6, and so on. That really is dividing it so that the poorer man, who lives by the catching of the fish, is able to can them by paying $2 for 100 cases, instead of $10 as now, and the large wealthy factories pay more.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are no wealthy factories.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This is the deliberate judgment come to by the Department of Fisheries. The hon. gentleman takes exception to the repeal of that portion of the Act which deals with the marking and placing of the name and date upon the case. I am informed that when a merchant in a foreign country purchases a large quantity, he will not pay as good a price for them if they are say 100 cases from one factory, 50 from another, 25 from another, and so on. It is said that the placing of the name on the packages is a guarantee of their quality. If I am correctly informed, while there are a few packers who have a reputation, they are constantly and continuously changing, so that the name, except in the case of a very large factory, would be no guarantee whatever. The objection raised by the hon. member from Halifax, that there is no guarantee as to quality on the ground that the fish may be caught out of season, is met in this way. The stamps are sent free from the department, the canning factory is debited with the number applied for. The very moment that the season for fishing closes, a demand is made upon the factory for a return of all the stamps that they may have in their possession. They have to show the number of cans or packages that have been used, and the balance must be returned or accounted for in some way, and if it is shown that the packer has used them out of season, he subjects himself to the penalty of the law. That is the explanation that Mr. Prince, the scientific gentleman connected with the department, gives as the reason why that change was made, and he said, from his long experience, he was quite satisfied it would not only relieve the fishermen of a great amount of unnecessary labour that they performed, but also make the article command a better price in the foreign markets. My hon. friend from Chatham will see, from the intimation that I have given, that it is not so hard on the poor fishermen as he has indicated. There is something in the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, that he cannot understand why the lobster factory should be taxed with a fee, whilst the government pay a bounty to the cod and other fisheries. I am not in a position to give as satisfactory an answer to that as I should like, but I presume it is for the purpose of governing and controlling and keeping a thorough and efficient inspection over this particular trade. I know very little of the lobster fisheries, but it seems to me that they have to be protected in a very different way from the cod or deep sea fisheries. If indiscriminate fishing were allowed the lobster fishery would soon be depleted. With this explanation, I hope my hon. friend will not press the amendment, because the provisions of the bill have been made after one year's experience in which it has been found that it would be most detrimental to the lobster fisheries.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I was in hopes that my hon. friend would confine himself to the clause before the House. I am with my hon. friend from Halifax in his contention with regard to the name of the packer and the date, and that there has been unnecessary tinkering by officials who pretend to be experts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We have not reached that question yet.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—But the Premier has violated the rule by going into the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, and I want to speak as to that and then I am done. I do not think the Premier has met the remarks of the hon. gentleman, because I can name men who are noted for putting up the best fish, in the best order and in the best condition, and they have a trade mark which they put upon every can. By this bill, you just open the door to illicit business by an inferior class of people, in some remote corner. You enable them to put up fish at a time when they should not be put up, and there is no way for protecting the public and the consumers from those people except the way you did last session. I think the amendment should be made, and there should not only be the name of the packer, but the date also on which the canning was done, labelled on every can. I consider it of great importance that the name of the packer should go on each can, and the year also is essential. The hon. member from Murray Harbour, speaking the other day, convinced me that that was necessary, because, he said, the deterioration of the contents of the cans was not the fault of the packing, but was due to the inferiority of the tin used. The packages corrode unless the very best metal is put in. The purchaser cannot tell how long the fish has been put up. There is nothing on the label to tell that, and we know that in two or three years the cans will decay and deteriorate and the fish will be destroyed. The hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour admits, himself, that fish may be put up in inferior tins, and the purchaser has no means of judging for himself, unless he knows how long the lobster has been packed. But without knowing the date the purchaser cannot tell whether he has got a tin put up last year or ten years ago. It may be well for the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour, who is interested in the business, that the tins should have no mark indicating when the fish was put up, but my desire is that the consumer should know the date of the canning. The consumer, the man who buys the fish, is the man we should protect. We should see that he gets a sound article, and the tin in which the lobster is packed has not deteriorated, and that can only be done by putting on the date of packing. We had that matter before us last year and it met with the approval of the Premier himself. I do not think Mr. Prince or any other scientist can change my mind as to the necessity of having the date on the tin. It is necessary that the consumer should know the character of the fish and the risk he runs in buying a can that may be one year old or ten years old.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It appears to me the hon. gentleman is speaking from the consumer's standpoint, and he is anxious that he will not be deceived in buying canned lobsters and will get value for his money. In my opinion the name of the packer on the can, or on the case, will not guarantee him a good article, and no quality of tin will guarantee him a good article. The tin is subject to corrosion, but I will give him an infallible rule by which he can tell whether the lobsters are good or not. If he finds the ends of the can convex it is safe, but if the ends are swelled out or full, it is a bad can. The more compressed the can is at the ends or at the side, the surer he will be of getting a good can of lobsters.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—In reference to the latter part of sub-section 2, the fee shall be at the rate of $2 for 100 cases or fraction of 100 cases; that is not what the hon. gentleman proposes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—One hundred cases would be $2 and 101 cases would be $4.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Each case to contain 48 one pound cans. Now, in some districts lobsters are packed in half pound cans, and I do not think there is any provision made for that in the Act. We should add a provision, I think, as to half pound cans. I have spent my life on the sea coast and have been interested in this business and know something about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are there two pound cans?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Very few.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does not the hon. gentleman think this is rather hard on the packer?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I do, but I was not here in time to make any suggestion. We might say 24 2 lb. cans, or 48 1 lb. cans, or 96  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. cans.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We might let that stand till the third reading and then I will see whether the suggestion is a reasonable one.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Could not we put it 2c. a case?

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—That is what it is now.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this clause 2 is all wrong, and I may mention a circumstance which took place during the recess which goes to show that the hon. the First Minister, is not au fait as to what the meaning of this is. It will be remembered that when the bill was introduced in this House last year, one of the objections which was raised to the clause, the place of which is now taken by subsection 5 of the Act of last year, was that it would necessitate an officer of the department going into every cannery and being present when the fish were put up, and it was felt that that was quite impracticable, and this House struck out that provision. After Parliament had risen some few weeks, an advertisement appeared in the papers in Nova Scotia purporting to be from the Inspector of Fisheries in Pictou, Mr. Hockin, calling upon all lobster packers to bring their fish to be inspected by an officer of the department. There was no law for this—no authority for it under the law—and I wrote a short letter to one of the newspapers, pointing out that Mr. Hockin had no right to call upon packers to bring their fish to be inspected. I ascertained that this notice was not put in the paper by Mr. Hockin, but by one of his subordinates, and I notice that that subordinate spent the early part of this session at Ottawa, and I am satisfied that this enactment which we have now is the result of the visit of that subordinate officer here, whose duty it would be, I think, to see that the stamps are put on those cans. Legislation is provided to give him something to do. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Chatham that requiring $2 for every fraction of 100 cases is very unreasonable. The real intention of this is that there shall be a two cent stamp put on the case. If a man has 100 packages he pays $2 and he gets 100 stamps and he puts one on each package, and each package is worth two cents and it would be much simpler and fairer to say that there shall be upon each package a two-cent stamp.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall look into that.

The clause was allowed to stand.

On subsection 3,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—I wish to say a few words from the consumer's standpoint. I remember last year we had a very exhaustive debate upon this question of whether year by year the contents of the can underwent any change, I fancy we all have had some experience of tin cans, because there are so many kinds of canned goods now put up. We must all acknowledge that year by year there is deterioration, unless the tins are kept in a dry place in a particular temperature, which is quite unlikely. In most of the storehouses, a deterioration will take place. A larger number of cans in each case will spoil, and, therefore I think, in the interests of the Canadian trade for lobsters, it would be highly important that the year should be stamped on. That seemed to be the universal opinion of the House last year after fully discussing it, because if the year is on and the purchaser buys a can of two or three years back, he takes his chance whether he has got a good article or not. If he takes it the current year, or the year after, he knows what the article will be, and I should like to take the sense of the committee as to whether it is not wise to continue the law as it is on the statute-book.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—With the date?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. Last season the year had to be marked. It would come in section 3 after the word "fisheries," "and shall also be stamped with the year in which such lobsters are canned." As to the name I do not profess to express an opinion on that. There are many small men whose names would not be known abroad, and the names would not bear much significance, but the date is an important thing. We know that the fish will deteriorate in years. The tin is thin and if subjected to any sort of damp and heat, it will rust at once and the moment the rust commences the lobsters will spoil.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I do not agree with what is being said about the date. I think it will be very injurious to the packers to put the date on. There is a misapprehension about this whole business. Hon. gentlemen talk about small packers. There are small packers, and there are a great many illicit packers who do not obey the law and do not stop in September or October. The law is grossly violated in some portions of the lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Between there and New Brunswick, and the parties on both sides are equally guilty. They were fishing there in November last year, and although the inspector of fisheries lives in the county and does protect the fishery up north, yet at his very door it is not protected. I consider that the label on the box will protect to some extent. Certainly the country storekeeper could take them out of the box and put them on the shelf, and as the tin is not marked, it cannot be traced, but the retail trade for lobsters in the lower provinces is almost dead. It is an article put up for export, and it is a business that requires large capital. A man cannot go into the business unless he has capital. He has to have four or five good boats and a number of traps with a large amount of line and anchors and a lot of outfit that generally involves an investment of two or three thousand dollars. This outfit is generally supplied by merchants that take the output from a great number of establishments. In the district of Miramichi, I think, there are only three exporters. There are, however, hundreds of packers and to put the name of the packer on the case would be detrimental to the sale of the fish. If I am in the packing business and I make advances to a number of people, it is my interest to see that those fish are properly packed, and when they are sold, they are not sold on the merchant's representation; no one knows anything about the packer. That is the way it is done in that section of the country, and I think these people might be taken as a standard of the character of packers and shippers. Then I in turn contract for these fish in London, which is the great market for them, to deliver so many cases at certain months in the year. When it comes to the end of the season the buyer will say "I am not going to buy any of your fish with '95 put on it; I want '96 pack." If the fish were only retailed among our own people, it would be well enough to mark them, but they are shipped to Europe, Australia and other parts of the world.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You would not send old fish out there?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I just send what I can sell. No, I would not sell old fish or inferior fish out there, but there are certain known labels in our district. One is a deer's head, another a horse's head, and we register those marks in England and have the exclusive right to use them. We register them in England because there is where our general market is, and all try to work up to a good standing. I do not object to put the stamp on, because I think it would be a protection against those people who pack fish out of season. I never saw any man that knew the exact season lobsters should be caught. We know very little about them. We are only allowed to catch lobsters from their first coming to our coast until the 15th July, and I believe that is the very time we should not catch them; but if you prohibit the catching of fish at that season we could not get them at all. They talk about fish loaded with eggs, and you ask the fishermen to save them and hatch the eggs. That is a move in the right direction and if it can be successfully done I believe the government should take the most stringent measures to have it enforced, because I have been engaged in fishing and have had to do with the business in the Maritime Provinces. I was brought up in the neighbourhood of that business and I have kept my eye on it all my life and am now more or less engaged in it, and when I assisted people years ago to go into the lobster business, we despised fish that did not weigh a pound, but we are glad to-day to get six lobsters to fill a one pound can. The fishing is not done by poor men. They may be reasonably poor, but they have to get large advances made to them; and the great body of the fish pass through the hands of two or three recognized dealers, and the original packers would not be known. Their names would be injurious, the date also would be injurious in the European markets, but the label and stamp we put on I think may be of some benefit. Careful dealers examine every can that their label is put on. They have regular inspectors, who go over them and see that every tin is not less than 19 ounces. Every can that goes out of the establishment is tested and the name is put on the tin only after being fully satisfied of the quality. The case is then wire-bound and sent to Europe. For our own reputation we have to do that. It appears to me that the person who got up this bill did not really understand the details of the fish business. With regard to putting the stamp upon the cases, if the government would provide us with them promptly I would not object to it, but I would remind the government that the fishing commences about the 1st of May and the fish do not come on our coast till this date, and sometimes much later, and the first fish on the market are generally worth a shilling or two per case more than later shipments. If any hitch occurred in the stamps not getting there in time, it would be very injurious to the trade.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—We commence in March.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken in reference to the reduction in the size of the lobster of late years and I attribute that very largely to just the course which gentlemen have taken exactly in the same position as my hon. friend Mr. Snowball, men with capital who have induced parties here and there to go into this business and have reduced the fish to the miserable dimensions they are to-day. It is within my recollection when the lobster industry was first started, and it was started by men of means who had considerable capital and who put up substantial buildings, and hired the men, provided the traps and it cost from $5,000 to $10,000 to start a lobster factory in that day before any returns were available, and they exported their fish and they had a good reputation; but of late years speculators and men of means have induced poor men, who never should have gone into the business, to embark in the canning industry and have furnished them with every material they required, and made a commission out of it. My hon. friend from Chatham does not pack lobsters; he makes a commission and he puts the first class label on the best fish he can get, and another label on the second class and a third label on the very doubtful fish.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There are speculators who have three or four labels, and that is one reason why the lobster fishing has gone down as it has to-day. You cannot exhaust the lobsters; but you can reduce the size of lobsters and thereby make the business unprofitable. But the time is fast approaching when the lobster packers will be exhausted and the lobsters will get a chance. I would suggest to the government that the most effectual way is to insist on the close season being rigidly enforced. This season is not observed by the small packers, who are sustained and backed up by the speculators with their money. If the inspectors do their duty this will be remedied.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It would ruin the whole business if a man bought fish that he had any doubt about and sent them into the market; it would injure the trade. If people read in a paper that a family were poisoned by eating bad lobsters the public would not buy lobsters for weeks. We want the government to assist us in having the law carried out. The fishing season on our coast is only about six weeks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I frankly admit that I am not an expert on this question; consequently I have to take the memo. placed in my hands by those who are supposed to understand the business in the department. I am not going to discuss the question as to the proper close season. The same reason would not answer for all sections. There would be a difference between the southern coasts and the northern coasts where the cold waters come down from Hudson Bay. Wherever it is cold it takes a longer time for the fish to mature. The law provides for marking the packages with name and date, and the hon. gentleman thinks that that should be retained. The present bill provides for a simple stamp which is supplied by the department, and the packers are charged a fee for carrying on the trade. The scientific men of the department say that these changes are solely in the interests of the trade itself, and the fishermen and the parties who purchase like my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Snowball). If my hon. friend would allow this clause to go, we will try it. If it is found not to answer well, next year we can do what we did this year—undo the past.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have not heard any substantial reason why the date should not be put on, except that it is in the interest of the exporter to deceive the public. The hon. member gave the illustrations that he did not want the consumer in 1895 to know that it was fish that was packed in 1894. I do not think that is a very good reason. There is a strong presumption that the fish has deteriorated, or else the exporter would not want to deceive the public. Last year we felt it was necessary that the time should be put on the package and we felt it necessary in the cheese business; so much so, that it was insisted that the month should be put on. We find a September cheese will be sold for a June cheese.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the proposition before the Commons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been discussed at the meeting of the cheesemen.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—They do not favour it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose they would like a little opportunity to deceive the public, but there is no one who gives any thought or reflection to it who will not admit that it is a most important consideration, and if we are to maintain the standard the year should be put on. There can be no reason for suppressing it, except to deceive, and I do not hesitate to say that anybody who has any experience will know that after the cans are two or three years old, it is dangerous to buy them. I have gone into a store and said: "When was this put up?" I can tell by the can; it begins to look rusty; it looks larger than it should, and there is fermentation going on inside. It is not right that we should palm off on the public an article which should be destroyed. Those cases of poisoning are due to the fact of the article not being well enough put up to keep for a term of years. Any article well put up will keep for the current season, but owing to the quality of tin used, a very small amount of rust which would not be visible to the naked eye, but would be sufficient to allow the can to decay.

Hon. Mr. Sir FRANK SMITH—I have been in the trade for 40 years, and there was no such thing as the date being put on, and I find no difficulty in disposing of the goods. During my whole career I scarcely could get sufficient lobsters to carry me over, from one season to the other, and we found no difficulty whatever with regard to the date. A purchaser would come in and say "What brands have you on hand? Is it the 'reindeer' or the 'horseshoe' or what is it?" and that is all they would ask. We were legislating in the direction of doing good to all in this country, and by this course you are not doing any harm whatever. I have never found any difficulty as regards the date.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This House, after discussing the matter at considerable length, last year deliberately resolved that it was in the interests of the public that the name of the packer should be put on the can. Hon. gentlemen say that that will interfere with the business. The hon. gentleman from Chatham said it was not necessary to have the packer's name on, and then the hon. gentleman told us that he was particularly careful as to the selection of the fish, and that he put his own brand on the packages and that brand sells them. That is just exactly carrying out our argument that you want to know who has put the fish up; who is responsible for the fish. The hon. gentleman from Toronto, who has just spoken, said he would like to see what the brand was; was it "Reindeer," or "Kingfisher" or what brand. That is exactly our contention, that packers have a reputation which will sell their fish, and we contend that the packer's name should be on the cans. It happens that the business in New Brunswick is a little different from what it is in Nova Scotia. I know of one case that of a packer who does not put up a very large number of fish, but who packs himself, helps in the work and superintends the work; he has been at the business now for some 35 years, and his fish have such a reputation, both in the United States and England that they command anywhere from 10c. to a shilling more per package than the ordinary run of fish, and there was a packer in Newfoundland, Burns, I think, whose fish were sold in the same way.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Those fish are larger and better than ours.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This packer had a good reputation. We passed that law last session, and I think we have no reason to suppose it is not satisfactory. Now, the hon. leader of the government tells us that there is a gentleman with scientific acquirements in the employ of the department, who thinks another plan would be better. I should be quite prepared to defer to the scientific gentleman on the question as to just what time the lobster's spawn, or any question of that sort; but when it comes to a question as to what is the best commercial policy, I do not think the opinion of the scientific gentleman is worth as much as the opinion of the average every day citizen, and particularly if the scientific gentleman happens so come from a foreign country, and not to be familiar with the business as it is carried on here. I contend this bill, as we have it now, does not guarantee anything at all. The putting of a revenue stamp on the outside of a case does not guarantee that the fish are of good quality, or by whom they have been packed, or how they are packed, and we are giving up the guarantees that we did have for good articles, and putting nothing in their place. It was stated by the first minister that each packer bought so many stamps. Now, take the case of a large packer who employs fishermen who put up fish in an inferior way; the large packer buys the stamps and they are put on the cans and he sells them.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—If you get an inferior quality, a good dealer would not pack them with his mark.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That may be a true proposition, apparently, but any one knows that, although you would suppose that honesty was in every case the best policy, it has been found impossible almost in any part of the country, to induce people who put up fruit to pack them honestly. It is the same way with regard to fish. I am surprised that the first minister who concurred in this amendment last year, which I think did credit to the Senate, should be prepared now (to use a familiar expression) to go back on his own record and repeal what we did last year. The hon. gentleman from Chatham said something about having the brand of his concern on the case. I can see no difficulty about this. Suppose the person who actually packs the fish puts his label on the can, the cans are sent to my hon. friend's establishment and he puts his brand on the outside of the case. The buyer has two guarantees, that of the packer and that of the wholesale merchant.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The retailer wants the brand of the dealer himself. The person who buys a pound can of fish is the man you want to deal with.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are several amendments proposed to this bill, and I think we might rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—I believe the hon. Senator for Halifax knows a good deal about law, but he knows very little about lobster packing and marketing. These amendments of his are of no use, and the hon. gentleman should not be wasting the time of the House discussing them. In the first place, each can in a case is labelled. Every exporter has his label with his own name and trade mark on that is put on the can and it is sold by that name and mark. If you are going to put it on the case, whose name are you going to put on? Say Mr. Jones packs fish for me—are you going to put Mr. Jones's label on the cans and mine on the case? That would be of no use and would be misleading. The stamp alone, without the man's name, is what is wanted. It is required to show that the packing has been done in season and that is the only utility of the stamp on the case, but the label shows who is responsible for the fish and no man buys fish without examining the quality. He tests and samples them when he buys. Then he has the guarantee of the exporter. I do not see any use in wasting the whole evening here by people who know nothing at all about fishing or packing. I do not know if they could tell a lobster from any other fish when they see one. As to the license, as has been said before, all other fishermen get a bounty for fishing. The poor lobster packer, if he packs 100 cases of fish, has to pay $2. I do not know why he should be punished and other fishermen rewarded. If such is the law, I am not going to protest against it just now, or offer an amendment; at the same time I do not think it is fair. If packers packed as many lobsters as the hon. gentleman from Halifax mentions they would be doing well. He says a factory will pack 5,000 cases on an average. In our province a packer will pack probably 500 in a season. I do not know two packers that put up 1,000 cases each. They have to contend with many difficulties there that are not experienced in Nova Scotia, and yet I would like to hear of the name of one canning establishment which puts up 5,000 cases in a season in Nova Scotia or in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. If a man puts up 5,000 cases he can afford to pay the tax. I would be willing to pay $500 if I could put up 5,000 cases. But a poor man, who has to go to the expense of packing and puts up only 200 cases and has to pay $4, feels it a good deal more than the man who puts up 5,000 cases and pays $100. I think there has been enough said about the stamp.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I move that this be inserted as paragraph a :

Every can containing lobsters preserved or cured in Canada shall, before being removed from the factory or canning establishment where such lobsters have been canned, preserved or cured, be marked, labelled or stamped with the name and address of the proprietor of such factory or canning establishment, and the year in which such lobsters are canned, preserved or cured.

I might be allowed to make one observation with respect to the remarks made by the hon.

gentleman from Prince Edward Island. I presume the hon. gentleman knows a great deal more about lobster fishing than I do, although I think he overestimates my ignorance. I have caught a good many lobsters and I have seen lobsters packed, and I think I know a little about packing, too, but if the hon. gentleman knows so much more than the rest of us he ought to be a little considerate and not exult over our ignorance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman reminds me of a remark that I heard made some years ago in the old House of Parliament, while I was sitting in the gallery. One gentleman administered a castigation to another on a question of law. Henry Sherwood, who was then Attorney General for Upper Canada, told me he supposed he knew all about the law, because he sat beside the Speaker and rubbed garments with him. I suppose the same remark might be made about my hon. friend and myself on the question of lobsters. The whole object of the department is to simplify the law.

The amendment was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the House rises, will the hon. premier be in a position to inform us whether it is intended to bring down legislation with regard to the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway? I understand it is proposed to bring down some legislation with regard to it.

Hon. Mr. BOWELL—No, I think not. My impression is that the Finance Minister stated there was to be no further legislation of any important character except, of course —he did except at the time—remedial legislation. I am not aware of it.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the business of the House is proceeded with, perhaps the Premier will relieve the tension in Parliament and the country as to the foundation for the uncontradicted statements that have been made that certain resignations have been sent in. Parliament, I suppose, has a right to be informed at the earliest possible moment when the Premier is in a position to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not in a position at the present moment to gratify the laudable curiosity of the hon. gentleman who has put the question. I hope in a very short time that I shall be enabled to relieve the tension of public opinion to which he has referred.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing :—

The names of all persons who have been superannuated or whose superannuation has been decided on by the Government since the first day of November last, with the age, length of service, salary, superannuation allowance, and the ground of superannuation of each person, together with a statement as to each person as to whether the vacancy caused is to be filled or not, and if to be filled, in what way?

He said:—I shall endeavour not to be any longer in addressing the House than my hon. friend from British Columbia was yesterday. I call attention to this matter, not because I have any special interest in any of the persons who have been superannuated in such large numbers recently, but merely as a matter of public interest. I have no information as to the cause of these superannuations, but I imagine that a good many of them will be accounted for as being made under section 11 of the Civil Service Superannuation Act. That section provides that if any person to whom the Act applies is removed in consequence of the abolition of his office or for the purpose of improving the organization of the office to which he belongs, or is removed to promote efficiency and economy in the Civil Service, the Governor General in Council may grant a gratuity in addition to the superannuation allowed. I presume that several of those superannuations will be defended on the ground that they are made under that section. Of course, economy is a very desirable thing, and it should be secured with due regard to efficiency by any fair and reasonable means, but I think there are other considerations also which should be borne in mind in dealing with a question like superannuation. There are questions of justice and questions of policy. I may be in error, but my own view about the matter is this, that when a person qualifies himself for the civil service, when he passes the regular examination, if an examination is necessary, and is received into the service and becomes a permanent employee of the government, there is a contract or quasi contract between the civil servant and the government, to the effect that, while the servant is able to discharge his duties in a satisfactory way, and does so discharge them, and gives no reason for complaint as far as he is concerned, he shall not be removed until the period indicated by the statute when he becomes over age, or when he has served his thirty-five years. Certainly, if hon. gentlemen do not regard that matter just as I do, everyone will feel that, if there is no fault on the part of the employee, at least he should have reasonable notice of the intention of the government to remove him from office. Now I understand, with respect to a number of those gentlemen, the notice of whose superannuation we have recently seen in the press, they were given no notice whatever. In some instances I believe the official notice of dismissal was the first intimation they received of the fact that their services were being dispensed with. What was the position of some of those gentlemen? In one case the official had a salary of about $1,200 a year, and I understand that he has a wife and three or four children. I am not aware that any complaint whatever had been made as to the manner in which he discharged his duties. He receives a superannuation allowance of $350. What is a man who has passed middle life to do when he is cast adrift in this way? He cannot live on $350, and his age and the work of the service disqualify him from going out in the world and starting anew. So that it seems that there are other things to be considered besides economy, however, desirable it may be in itself. There is another objection which I take to this wholesale superannuation, in addition to the one which I have indicated, and that is that it destroys the civil service as a career. If a young man is thinking of what he shall devote his life to, and if he feels an inclination for the public service, the fact that he may be summarily dismissed at any time without any cause on his part, is enough to prevent him from entering the service; and if we are to have a respectable service composed of efficient officers whose hearts are in their work, there must be some feeling in the minds of those servants that their positions are reasonably permanent, that while they are efficient and while they conduct themselves properly they will not be summarily dismissed. That is a proposition which must commend itself to every hon. member. There is another objection to this course. The deductions made from the salaries of civil servants were originally intended to meet the calls made upon the treasury for the allowance given to servants who were retired, but when officers having large salaries are superannuated in this wholesale manner, it must be seen that this fund cannot fulfil its purposes at all, and when we come to look at the figures for the last year we find how this fund has been loaded down. For the year ending the 30th

June, 1894, the expenditure for superannuation was $262,302; the revenue which ought to have met this expenditure was only $63,093. So that the revenue fell short of the expenditure by $196,000. Now, hon. gentlemen, that is a very serious drain—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (Burlington)—It was not intended to be self-sustaining, was it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Pretty nearly. It ought to have been self-sustaining, and at any rate the expenditure was intended to bear only a reasonable proportion to the revenue, but here we have an expenditure four times the amount of the revenue. I wish to direct attention to the manner in which this expenditure is increased. For the year ending the 30th June, 1877, the expenditure was $104,828, about 40 per cent of what it is now.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—What was the revenue then?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The revenue was $40,808, the expenditure was one-third and the revenue about two-thirds what they are now. Now there is a balance against the country of nearly $200,000. As I stated before, it will be claimed that the country will save the salaries of some of these gentlemen, that their places will not be supplied. That is true, but it is probably not true of nearly the whole of them. And this economy is purchased at the expense of justice and sound policy, and the economy is fitful and inconsistent. I understand it is alleged that we shall save $9,000 in the Secretary of State's Department by the dismissals which have taken place there. Now, hon. gentlemen, we could save a great deal more money in that department without any injury to the public service by abolishing the printing bureau and returning to the method of having our printing done by contractors which prevailed in former years. We should save a great deal of money, and as far as the experience of this House is concerned at any rate, get our printing done much more promptly and more satisfactorily than it has been done of late. I do not mean to say that the actual work of printing is not as well done as it was before, but I say the printing is not done as promptly as when it was done by contractors, and I commend to the government the printing bureau as a field where they can exercise their economy to a good purpose and to a considerable extent. But as I stated, this economy is fitful and inconsistent. Let us look at the cost of civil government, which is a very fair test of the economy or the reverse of an administration. I find that in 1878 the total cost of civil government was $823,369.80. For the fiscal year, ending the 30th June, 1894, the expenditure was $1,402,279.40, an increase of seventy per cent. I wish in connection with this matter to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have had on several occasions bills introduced here at the instance of the government for the purpose of paying to the members of this House and more especially perhaps the members of the other House, sums of money to which they were not entitled even under the liberal interpretation given to the indemnity section of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons. Where gentlemen have preferred to go home and attend to their own business rather than attend to the government business, we have had the spectacle of the government introducing, session after session, measures to pay those gentlemen for the time that they were absent from Ottawa as though they had been here attending to their duties; and it will be remembered that last session the attention of the government was called to the construction which had been put on the indemnity clause of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, which I think was admitted by every one was never contemplated by Parliament when that Act was passed. Gentlemen who attended one, two or three days each session drew their mileage and more than one-half of the sessional allowance. Now, the government which is so anxious for economy that it has to dismiss a number of respectable and worthy people, whose appointments were supposed to last during good behaviour and efficiency, finds itself unable to make a considerable saving by a very small amendment in the indemnity section of the Act to which I have referred. I think you must all agree with me in feeling that if the government wish to be economical there are other directions in which they might exert themselves to better effect than in the direction of dismissing almost without any notice, servants against whom, in some cases at any rate, there are no complaints. Of course, if there are well grounded complaints against a civil servant he should be dismissed, not superannuated. If there are no complaints against him and he is doing his duty properly, I do not think he should be superannuated until the proper time has come as contemplated by the Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I have great pleasure in seconding the motion so as to bring it before the House. The hon. gentleman from Halifax has made an excellent speech, one which I think the premier cannot find fault with. He has raised his voice, as every hon. gentleman should, when he sees any case of oppression or injustice: that is one of the functions that specially devolves upon the Senate. I propose to stick closely to my notes in dealing with this question, because I know the eagle eye of the Premier is on me and that he will dissect anything that I may say which is amiss. I have been very much surprised at the recent superannuations of six gentlemen out of the civil service, and the apparently harsh manner in which it was done. Here we find six gentlemen in the midst of their daily routine duty, against whom there is no complaint of any kind—without a note of warning, without preface, without even one hour's notice in which to make any other preparation, have papers placed in their hands, informing them, in the most summary manner, that their services are no longer required. Such treatment I will not trust myself to characterize in language suitable to the occasion, but if there are words in the English vocabulary strong enough to define the treatment of those gentlemen, then those words may be considered as having been applied. This has been done on the score of economy, a very commendable thing in itself, but does this country, which pays the bill—does Parliament approve of this economy, at the cost of inflicting a serious hardship on deserving gentlemen—cutting off suddenly a large portion of their means of living? A minister is to be commended who carefully looks into the working of his department and lops off the useless branches, but it must be done with discretion, and with as little harshness and cruelty as possible, to merit commendation, always remembering that civil servants have the same feeling and are made of the same flesh and blood as ministers are made of. If gentlemen on the permanent civil list, who have served for years, can, without a moment's notice, be reduced and superannuated without proper cause—as to age or inability for duty or misconduct—then what security in office has the most faithful civil servant? If the Act allows this summary power of treatment, it is time the Act were changed so as to afford reasonable protection to public servants. I refuse to believe that the Prime Minister would sanction an act of this kind. I cannot believe that the Prime Minister, an English gentleman, who from his youth has imbibed the noble principles of equity and fair-play—a gentleman whom we admire as much for his honest pluck and courage as for any other quality—can approve of such harsh treatment of all public servants. I understand that frequently in making superannuations several months' notice and warning has been given the parties interested. This is right and proper, and softens the blow to fellow creatures, and eases the pang of suspension. Had reasonable warning been given in these cases I would not have alluded to the subject. I am not commissioned to speak for any one, but having smouldering in my breast some ideas of justice and the fitness of things, I would consider it cowardice not to do what I am now doing. Having told Mr. Morgan that I was going to allude to his case in the House, he handed me some testimonials to present to it. I know a little of the circumstances in his case, but not in that of the others, and the Prime Minister knows much more of his case than I do, and how very capable and efficient he has been in his own line of duty. Mr. Morgan has been punished severely by eight years deprivation of place, pay and good name, for an offence which upon investigation by Sir John Thompson and others was satisfactorily explained, and to some extent the stigma removed. On my arrival here this spring Mr. Morgan informed me that Mr. Patterson, Mr. Costigan and Mr. Dickey, Secretaries of State at different times, had been very fair and considerate to him, and gave assurances to reinstate him to his former position or to one equally good. Our hon. Prime Minister had also promised to help forward his case when it was reported on by the Secretary of State, and all that ends in blighted hopes, bitter heart-burnings, and deprivation of well-earned place, and emoluments. I shall now read the testimonials that Mr. Morgan placed in my hands. The first one is from Judge Harrison who was, at the time he wrote, Deputy Attorney General, before the office of Minister of Justice was created :

TORONTO, 16th April, 1860.

I know Mr. Henry J. Morgan of the office of Hon. Executive Council, and believe him to be not only a most deserving but most trustworthy and painstaking young man. Of late he is much improved in education, solely by his own exertions in spite of adverse circumstances, and is, I think, well fitted for a junior clerkship in a permanent office. His conduct is exemplary and his career so far entitles him to much consideration from anyone entitled to further the interests of a deserving young man who is the support of a widowed mother.

ROBERT A. HARRISON.

I entirely concur in the foregoing testimonial.

(Sgd.) E. A. MEREDITH.

I cheerfully bear testimony to the character above given of H. J. Morgan, having known him for many years.

(Sgd.) W. H. LEE.

Then, we have Mr. Meredith himself, writing as follows to Mr. Morgan :

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE PROVINCES.

3rd May, 1873.

DEAR MR. MORGAN,—In compliance with your request I have much pleasure in stating that I have known you intimately since you became connected with the Civil Service of Canada, many years ago, and that I can testify that by your general good conduct and your persevering efforts to improve yourself, you have earned for yourself the esteem and good opinion generally of your colleagues in the service. Wishing you every success,

Believe me, truly yours,

(Sgd.) E. A. MEREDITH.

Then our respected clerk in this House, while Under Secretary of State, wrote as follows :

OTTAWA, 26th January, 1883.

DEAR MR. MORGAN,—I cannot leave the Department of the Secretary of State without expressing to you my regret that the official intercourse which has existed between us since 1868 should be brought to a close, for I am happy to say it has always been of the most pleasant character.

I must add that during the aforementioned period the duties assigned to you have been performed by you to my entire satisfaction, with promptness, care, accuracy and ability, and in a business-like manner.

Accept my best wishes for your future advancement and prosperity, and believe me,

Sincerely yours,

(Sgd.) EDOUARD J. LANGEVIN.

Our colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa, while Secretary of State in the Mackenzie administration, wrote as follows :

I have much pleasure in bearing testimony to the very efficient manner in which Mr. Morgan has discharged both the duties appertaining to his position (as keeper of records) and those allotted to him as extra w rk.

(Sgd.) R. W. SCOTT.

15th October, 1874.

The next letter is from Sir John Macdonald :

EARNSCLIFFE, OTTAWA, 7th January, 1885.

I have known Mr. Henry J. Morgan for many years. He has risen steadily, in the civil service of Canada from his own exertions, and by a life of usefulness. He has always been found equal to any duties imposed upon him, and given satisfaction to those under whom he has served, including myself. In addition to his official work, he has done good work as a literary man. I take much interest in his welfare which I trust will be as great in the future as it has been in the past.

(Sgd.) JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Then follows a testimonial from Sir Hector Langevin :

OTTAWA, 21st January, 1884.

Mr. Henry J. Morgan, was an officer of the Department of the Secretary of State, when I presided over that department and has continued to be in the same department since. He has risen there in the public service by his good conduct and his fitness for the different offices he has filled.

He has not been satisfied to do merely the office work, but he has tried to improve his mind and to increase his stock of knowledge. He has also endeavoured to be useful to his country by literary and historical works which have received the praise of the press and of eminent literary and other gentlemen.

He deserves great credit for his industry and the marked success he has had, and if he perseveres in the same direction, I have no doubt he will achieve still greater success which I wish for him and which he deserves.

(Sgd.) HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

Hon. Mr. Chapleau, the present Lieutenant Governor of the province of Quebec, writes :

DÉPARTEMENT DU SECRÉTAIRE D'ÉTAT, CABINET DU MINISTRE,
OTTAWA, 4 juillet 1884.

MON CHER M. MORGAN,—A l'occasion de mon départ pour la Colombie, et pour vous accréditer auprès du ministre qui aura charge du département en mon absence, je me fais un devoir de reconnaître l'efficacité des services que vous avez rendu au département (comme premier clerc de la correspondance, et comme assistant du sous-secrétaire d'Etat) depuis le temps que j'y préside.

Les connaissances étendues que vous possédez, les recherches variées que vous avez faites pour les publications dont vous êtes l'auteur, vous signalent tout naturellement à la considération du gouvernement comme une personne d'un mérite reconnu.

Veuillez croire les sentiments distingués avec lesquels je me soucris, Votre très humble,

(Signé) J. A. CHAPLEAU.

The Hon. Wm. Macdougall, who was at one time a member of the government, writes as follows :

Mr. Morgan, for some purpose which he has not disclosed to me, desires to obtain from the several heads of departments under whom he has served in Canada, autographic corroboration of the good opinion they may have held and verbally expressed as to his character and public services.

I willingly accede to his request, but it will be only fair to observe that I must be regarded as a partial witness. For many years Mr. Morgan has been my intimate personal and family friend. I made his acquaintance shortly after I entered parliament in 1858. I believe he received his first permanent appointment in the public service at my hands. I have watched his career for at least a quarter of a century as editor, author, and civil servant. His intelligence, his industry, his fair-mindedness, his loyalty to his country and his official superiors, have been constant and conspicuous from the beginning. As an all round man I do not know his superior in the public service to-day.

If devotion to duty, and painstaking labours to collect and preserve the memorials of his country for the convenience of the present, and instruction of the future generations, can give a Canadian any claim to recognition or promotion, Mr. Morgan's name will not be found at the foot of the roll of honour.

I shall always be glad to hear of his good health and prosperity. Being out of politics, I have no power to aid him, but his merits are so well known to the premier and most of his colleagues that I cannot believe his reasonable claims will be overlooked.

(Sgd.) WM. McDOUGALL.

Bank Street, Ottawa, July 24, '85.

OTTAWA, July 4, 1892.

MY DEAR MORGAN,—In reply to your note of yesterday asking the purport of Sir John A. Macdonald's assurances to me in regard to your position in the Department of State (after an investigation into certain alleged irregularities). I can only repeat my former statement—to wit—that the action of the Government in your case was rather admonitory than primitive and that in due time you would be rehabilitated.

Hoping Sir John's colleagues may see fit to make good the promise in your case,

I remain,
Very truly yours,

(Sgd.) WM. McDOUGALL.

Henry J. Morgan, Esq.,
State Department, Ottawa.

40½

REGINA, Nov. 28, 1891.

MY DEAR MORGAN,—When speaking to Mr. Chapleau respecting your case, I must say I think he expressed himself very nicely about you. He seemed to me to have done all in his power to help you. He told me emphatically that the office could hardly get on without you, for no one in it had your knowledge of official etiquette and official formal language, instancing the manner in which you had dealt with the Macdonald Peerage.

Ever yours,

(Sgd.) N. F. DAVIN.

The next letter is from a respected member of this House, who is in a position, from his experience and ability to sift the evidence and express a judicial opinion upon the case—I refer to the Hon. Mr. Miller, who, I regret to say, is not present to-day. I am sure if he were present he would sustain me on the stand that I am taking in Mr. Morgan's case. Mr. Miller writes :

THE SENATE, Canada,
February 14, 1893.

MY DEAR SIR,—I had an interview to-day with Mr. Costigan relative to your affairs.

The minister expressed himself in very friendly terms towards you and assured me that he considered your case a hard one which he would like to redress.

He said he was not able to make any provision this session to meet your wishes, but that unless your views were met during the recess by promotion, he would next session recommend and promote such legislation as might be necessary to replace you in your former position in the department.

Yours, very truly,

(Sgd.) WM. MILLER.

HENRY J. MORGAN, Esq.,
Department of State,
Ottawa.

Then comes a letter from Sir Donald Smith :

HUDSON'S BAY HOUSE,
MONTREAL, June 16, 1893.

DEAR MR. MORGAN,—Mr. Costigan when I met him in his office a short time before the close of last session, spoke to me in terms of much satisfaction with regard to you, and said that should an opportunity not occur of promoting you during recess he would certainly next session do his utmost to effect such legislation as might permit of your being restored to your proper position in the department.

Believe me, dear Mr. Morgan,
Very truly yours,

(Sgd.) DONALD A. SMITH.

HENRY J. MORGAN, Esq.,
Dept. of Secretary of State,
Ottawa.

Then follows another letter from Senator Miller :

OTTAWA, April 8th, 1895.

MY DEAR SIR MACKENZIE,—If I were not impelled by a sense of duty and justice, I would not write you this letter, which is in relation to the case of Mr. Henry J. Morgan.

Some time ago I was induced to make a thorough examination of the facts connected with Mr. Morgan's alleged misfeasance in connection with his official duties, for which he has suffered severe punishment, with the view of interceding with the late Sir John Thompson in his behalf. The result was that I came to the conclusion, nay was thoroughly convinced, that he was and is innocent of the charges on which he was condemned—through a misunderstanding of the facts. My first expectation was to obtain some grounds sufficient to justify me in asking the late premier to condone Mr. Morgan's offence, as the offences of so many others in the civil service had been condoned ; but my investigations forced me to the conclusion that Mr. Morgan was guilty of no offence, and that he was a wronged and injured man. With this conviction I approached Sir John Thompson, and discussed the subject with him, and found that he was misinformed with regard to one or two vital facts. I then referred him to Mr. Morgan's statutory declaration, which he promised to read carefully, saying that if he found the facts to be as represented they would certainly modify his opinion. He told me afterwards that if the matter were brought before the council by the head of the department Mr. Morgan's case would be settled satisfactorily, so far as he was concerned.

Under these circumstances, and looking at all the peculiar incidents of Mr. Morgan's position, which I cannot here recite in detail, I feel simply impelled, as I stated in the outset, by a sense of duty and justice, to ask you for an early consideration of his case, and to put an end to the existing state of anxiety and worry consequent on so many disappointments, and to me, unaccountable delays.

Yours very truly,

WM. MILLER.

The Honourable Sir Mackenzie Bowell,
Ottawa.

Sir James Grant, a member of the House of Commons, wrote to Sir Mackenzie Bowell on the 25th March last and the Premier replies in the following words :

I have your letter of yesterday respecting Mr. Morgan and when the matter comes up you may rest assured that I shall not forget your report on his behalf.

These are all the papers given to me in this matter. The Premier cannot complain of these letters being brought up and I do not think that he can justify the superannuations.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I wish to make a few remarks with reference to the Superannuation Act itself. Of course I shall not deal with the particular case to which the hon. member who has just spoken has alluded. I think that some system of superannuation in the public service is necessary in every country, and the Superannuation Act of Canada has been criticised from various points of view. In the first place, it is said that it is not self-sustaining. I do not think it was ever intended to be self-sustaining. The question of superannuation is a most difficult one—to make it efficient and fair to all parties. I think the Superannuation Act of the Government has been a fair one. The most severe criticism that could be made against it is that public servants are sometimes superannuated for political reasons ; when they are superannuated for the purpose of making positions for political supporters, there is no way you can get rid of that until you adopt the merit system. The first appointments should be made independent of political considerations and when they are so made you will improve the civil service and will not have this cause of complaint. I shall probably have something more to say later on with reference to the civil service, but in the meantime I have only this to add, that the Superannuation Act, is a fairly good one, but its expense will only increase from year to year as the service gets older. It is perfectly evident in the course of years that you will have more superannuations and the expense must increase. In Great Britain after many investigations and changes of policy the state has fallen back upon the system of dispensing with compulsory contribution and has taken upon itself the charge of granting pensions and retiring allowances on a moderate scale.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I hope the example of the State Department will be followed throughout every department. It is sometimes difficult to get rid of men. They may be incompetent, and in many ways inefficient, and not place themselves in a position to be dismissed, and yet they are actually a drag on the public service. I believe you can hardly go through any department in Ottawa but the place is crowded almost in some departments to suffocation, by people actually unfit for the positions they are in. I have no doubt it is so with all governments. The members of the government and members of parliament have personal friends, and the pressure is so great that no government can resist it. We find in the service people who are unfit for anything else, and who are utterly incompetent to start out in life and earn a living. Their friends think a government office is a good place to put them, and once they are there you cannot get rid of them, they are worse than useless. They are a drag on the service and a bad example to others. Inquired of the Department of Public Works, and I know of men in that service who are doing a gross injustice to the other men. One-third of the men in the department could do the whole work, and the others are just in their way; they had actually to crawl over the others and do the public service, and how to get rid of the useless officials seems to be a grave question.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Do you think the remedy is to do away with political patronage?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who can do that?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The millennium will have to come before that time arrives. Governments, we all know, are flexible to the importunities of their friends. I believe that in the Public Works Department one-third of the employees could do the work and do it faithfully, and I believe it is so in many of the other departments. I hope the example given by the Secretary of State will be carried out by every other head in the service. The useless officials should be got rid of at any price.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What would you do with faithful servants of 30 years?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If a man is a faithful servant, competent and prompt and attentive to duty, he will never be dismissed; he must become a drone, or incompetent, or inefficient; otherwise I do not believe any public servant will be dismissed. As regards Morgan, I esteem him for many good qualities and I believe those testimonials have been honestly given, but I hope some government will devise means by which to weed out the useless rubbish that is in the public service.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—When the hon. gentleman comes to read his speech, and sees the manner in which he has reflected on the civil service, I think he will be ashamed of it. As far as my experience goes, I have had occasion to visit a great many departments—the Public Works, the Interior Department, and the Post Office—and I have found them to be a clever, respectable, and very intelligent class of citizens. In order to go into the civil service to-day, a man has to pass an examination and establish his fitness for the position. The wholesale remarks of the hon. gentleman with reference to the civil service are unbecoming and unjustified according to the circumstances of the case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to the motion made by the hon. gentleman. All I can say, after the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Victoria is that I trust the grounds of superannuation in each case, together with a statement as to whether the vacancy so caused is to be filled—and if filled, in what way—will be brought down as fully as possible, in order that the House and country can judge of the reason which induced the head of the Department of Secretary of State to pursue the course which has been so freely commented on to-day.

The superannuation law, as it stands upon the statute book, has always been a subject for discussion and a matter of complaint to many who oppose the whole system, and that complaint is as to the manner in which it has been administered by all parties. For myself, speaking generally, I have always had grave doubts as to the propriety of placing a superannuation law upon the statute-book. I voted against it when it was first introduced in the House of Commons some 25 or 26 years ago. I gave my reasons then, which it is unnecessary to repeat now. I am also willing to admit that there have been superannuations which probably could not be justified. I do not confine that to any one case more than another, but I would recommend the hon. gentleman who made the motion to consult the records and he will find that between the period from 1874 to 1878 there was a greater abuse of the power placed in the hands of the government than there was before or since. If any one will turn to the list that was published in the Public Accounts, he will find gentlemen superannuated who had been in the service two, three, four and five years, with ten years added in order to compensate them for their loss. I merely instance that to show the manner in which the hon. gentleman's friends dealt with this statute. He is quite right in saying that many of the superannuations which have taken place, particularly in the Secretary of State Department were under section 11 of the Superannuation Act. The Secretary of State, when he took possession of that office, found that he had more clerks than he thought were necessary, and it very often occurs in this way—I know that I had experience particularly in the customs. You find men who have been in the employ of the government for 20 or 30 years, and some of them 40 years. They have become old and do very little work in the department. There is always a sympathy for them and a regret that they have to be placed on the retired list. The result is that as they become old and neglect their work, either from incapacity or disinclination to work, younger men get in and perform the labour, and by that means overload the service, as has been indicated by the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg. Then, when you superannuate a number of them, as I myself did upon one occasion, I was met in very much the same manner as the hon. gentleman from Victoria has met this question to day. That was by the leader of the opposition. The remark he made to me was—and it was very pertinent without knowing the facts—If what the hon. gentleman says is correct why has he not superannuated them before? My answer to that was, if the hon. gentleman occupied my position he would be the last man to turn out of office, or even superannuate, old men who have been faithful in the service, until so compelled from necessity, either for economy or because they were unable to do the work. Now I think that is the failing of most hon. gentlemen, and it is not a pleasant thing for a minister, when he feels himself bound in the interest of the service, or in the interest of economy, to carry out the principle of superannuation and turn an old official out of the service. But I was forcibly reminded of the remarks I heard made, in discussing the question of economy and the reduction of the expenses incurred in one of the large departments, by Sir Charles Tupper in the other House. I have experienced it myself, and every man who has been in public life with responsibility upon his shoulders in attempting to effect any economy. He said that he found it more difficult, when he attempted to save $5,000, than when he proposed to expend half a million. We have had an example of it here to-day. We are continually denounced as an extravagant government, and even some of our friends declare that we spend the public money lavishly, not only in the civil service, but in every other department of the administration; but the moment you attempt to save $10 or $50 you have an avalanche hurled upon you as if you had been sending everybody to the poor-house. When my hon. friends, who are looking with fond anticipation to this side of the House, come over here and have had our experience, I am bound to say they will realize the force and the truth of what I have just been stating. It is quite unfair—and I do not know any man in the House who will admit it in private conversation more readily than my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax—to make a comparison, as he has done, of the expenditure in reference to the superannuation of civil servants. He says it has increased in the last 17 or 18 years, 80 per cent. Does he not know that the Civil Service Act provides for the increase of each clerk's salary to the amount of $50 per annum? Now, take 500 civil servants—there are over that number, but I will take that by way of illustration—and add $50 a year to each clerk's salary and multiply by 17 or 18 years, and what becomes of this 70 or 80 per cent? It is an easy problem for him to solve. That is the law on the statute book, and it is all that the civil service has to look forward to when they enter the service.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I stated that the expenditure on civil government had increased 70 per cent, the other has increased three times that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is taking a still wider range. I do not think the House would justify me in taking time to combat that idea. Does this country occupy the same position to-day as it did in 1878? Has it not grown and expanded to a greater extent than any other country in the world? Does it not stand better to-day financially, and are not the affairs of the country better administered from one end of the country to the other, than in 1878?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
Look at the extent of our North-west Territories ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The country was the same size then as it is now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
Look at the development in British Columbia ; look at the extent of the trade and commerce of the country from one end of it to the other, and then does the hon. gentleman suppose that a country can go on growing in the manner in which Canada has grown and the expenditure not increase ?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Look at the postoffice service alone.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, thousands of miles have been added to it by the extension of the railway system. The hon. gentleman might just as well say that he could live to-day with a family of eight or ten (as I hope he has because, if he has not he is not true to the record of his countrymen) as he could when he was first married and commenced housekeeping. I know I found it more difficult to get along, so far as the pocket is concerned, when I had eight or nine of a family than when I had only my wife and one or two young children. The country is in precisely the same position. It may be a homely illustration, but it is one that every man who has a family will understand. I have not much to complain of in the remarks of my hon. friend who complimented me with the designation of “the Premier with an eagle eye.” There was a time when I had a rather sharp eye, but age has dimmed it to a great extent. I hope, however, it has not diminished my desire to do what is right in the interests of the country. The hon. gentleman told us in his opening remarks that he wished to give a note of warning, but that he was not here to speak on behalf of any one. I was rather surprised, after that declaration, to hear him read a dozen pages of certificates of good character handed to him by a gentleman who had evidently interviewed him.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I said I was not commissioned by any one to act on his behalf. I told Mr. Morgan that I was going to speak on the subject and he said “if you are going to speak I will give you those certificates.”

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never supposed that the hon. gentleman or any other member of the Senate would be commissioned to speak for any one. I have no doubt that what he said he has stated with as much sincerity as I have spoken just now. Mr. Morgan had made threats, because they not only came to my ears but they came to the ears of the other members of the government, that he would have this matter ventilated in the Parliament of Canada. I tell the hon. gentleman that he has not done Mr. Morgan any service in reading those certificates, or referring to his case at all. I shall not state what I know, neither shall I utter a word that would detract from Mr. Morgan's character further than say this, that at the time of his suspension and at the time of his being reduced from a chief clerkship to a first class clerkship, if I had had my way he would have been dismissed without one moment's consideration. I am quite sure that any man in this House after knowing all the facts connected with it—we have heard only one side—would pursue precisely the same course that I have indicated I would have done. The hon. gentleman is quite correct, however, in saying that when he appealed to me to be reinstated, I said I would not oppose it, because I thought he had been punished for a number of years for dereliction of duty—it was considered dereliction of duty by Mr. Chapleau, now governor of the province of Quebec ; at the time he was Secretary of State. I regret that it has been found necessary to superannuate Mr. Morgan, because he is an old man, and he has a family. I do not desire—never have desired, and would not now, had it not been forced on me in deference of the government—to give utterance to one word of censure upon Mr. Morgan. It is said that the matter was placed before Sir John Thompson while he was Minister of Justice. That may be true. I have no doubt the statement made by our honourable colleague from Richmond is literally correct, and it may be equally true that the then Minister of Justice stated that, on looking into the matter, if the declaration which had been made was correct, it would change his opinion ; but one thing I do know, he never attempted to change the decision at which the council had arrived, nor did he make any proposition to reinstate Mr. Morgan in the position which he had held. More than that, the late Chief Justice Richards, who wrote to Sir John Macdonald on this matter, was advised not to press the matter, for if he did the result would have been, in all probability, dismissal instead of a first class clerkship. I am speaking now of matters which came under my own observation, because I had very much to do with them. I cannot help saying that I did then, and do now, feel a sympathy with that gentleman, and if he had attended more strictly to his duty—because the street was his office two-thirds of the time of late years—he might be in his office yet. The papers will disclose why the superannuations have taken place. There is much force in what the hon. gentleman says, that a man of 50 or 60 years of age, who may be quite capable of doing his accustomed work, if he is superannuated on a small pension—it is not altogether a pension because he has contributed to the superannuation fund—it is a hardship upon him; but I have always viewed the question in this light:—I have been fighting my battles all my life, so have we all, and if we have any regard for the future, we try to save a little in order that we may be able to live when the time comes that we cannot work. Why should not a civil servant do the same thing? That is upon the general principle. Whether the present system of superannuation is correct or not, I am not prepared, even with all my experience, to give an opinion just now. I probably would adopt a different system altogether when the time arrives that has been indicated by my hon. friend from Burlington, when politics and the public service shall not be factors in the appointment of civil servants.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—It is so in England.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says it is so in England. If he were behind the scenes and knew what the influences in England are when they desire to get a friend into a permanent position, he would not say that favouritism or politics and the public service had nothing to do with each other.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—It is open competition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That does not interfere in the least with the influences which can be used in the appointment to office. Our young men pass their examinations—all the examinations that the law requires—and they are placed in a position in which they can compete for the offices which become vacant or are created (as my hon. friend from Halifax said last night) for the purpose of making places for hungry hangers-on. The moment an office is created or becomes vacant, influences are put to work in England, whether the position is in the Indian service or in the home service, to get some favoured person appointed. I should like to have a system prevail in reference to the service in which no political influence or any other influence but that of absolute merit would be considered. I should be delighted, and so would my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. McInnes), but when he gets on this side of the House and has a few friends in British Columbia and there are vacancies to fill, I think I am not doing him an injustice if I expect that he would look after the interest of his friends. I certainly say that I have done so, and as long as I am here, other things being equal, I shall continue that policy.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I agree with the premier that if Mr. Morgan is guilty he should be dismissed on the spot. Why did not the government appoint a commission to go into his case and investigate it? He was kept dangling between heaven and earth for eight years. Certain promises were made to him which were never fulfilled. What I complain of chiefly is this fact that no notice has been given. There are five others who were dismissed without a moment's notice; without a warning they were cast adrift and told to go. No one would do that to a servant of his own. If the premier had a servant in his employ for 20 years I am sure he would not dismiss him without some notice and without a retiring gratuity.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I readily admit the truth of the last observation, but I do not admit that a commission should be appointed to investigate every dereliction of duty on the part of a civil servant. If a clerk neglects his duty in my office, I know that without a commission;

if a man forges a paper and obtains money upon it, I know that without appointing a commission to investigate. It is quite unnecessary, unless you lay down as a principle that because a man is in the civil service, if there is any dereliction of duty on his part he must be treated differently from what you would expect for yourself. I am sure the hon. gentleman, when he thinks of it for a moment, will come to the conclusion that the proposition is, I will not say an absurdity, but unreasonable. There was no dangling in Mr. Morgan's case. Mr. Morgan was tried by his superior officer. The Minister reported the facts to the Council, and instead of doing that which I said I would have had the case been in my department, he was simply reduced to a first class clerkship and if to remain there is called dangling, why he dangled until he was superannuated.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He is punished now for an offence which was committed eight years ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, by reduction of salary and by reduction of grade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had no particular person in my mind at all. There had been a number of those superannuations and I called attention to them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman will give me credit for this—that I did not say he had.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIALS TO THE FOUNDERS OF CONFEDERATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE inquired :

Whether it is the intention of the government to erect in the grounds of the parliament buildings, upon the death of each of the delegates from the various provinces to the Quebec conference of 1864, which had for its object the discussion and foundation of a confederation of the provinces, a monument to perpetuate his memory as a founder of confederation ?

He said : It is not my intention to take up much of the time of the House in discussing this subject, but it is only right that I should explain why I am putting the question. On a recent occasion, when the statue of Sir John Macdonald was unveiled, while looking at the beautiful statuary, the work of one of our fellow-subjects, Mr. Hebert, I heard the question asked, What was the principle on which the administration of the day were acting in erecting the monument ? I did not hear any good reason for it. Some thought that the statue would stand there alone—that there was no obligation to go further than that. I heard it stated by some that those two men, whose statues have been erected on Parliament hill, have been so commemorated because they have done a great deal for Canada during 40 years of their lives. To that I remarked that neither Sir George Cartier nor Sir John Macdonald had any right to receive anything at the hands of the confederation for their services before confederation ; that it was Lower Canada and Upper Canada that should give them anything that they might have deserved before the union with the other provinces, and that if anything was due to them for what they had done to bring about confederation it was all right, but that in that case all the delegates from the provinces to the Quebec Conference in February, 1864 should be remembered. Then another gentleman, in reply, said : " Very well, but even then surely those two men have done more than any others." Then I said, then I must be much mistaken, because I consider they are not the two men who did most for the confederation. I said I suppose Sir John Macdonald had been there alone, he was in a minority of 10 in Upper Canada. He could do nothing at all until George Brown united with him and carried the majority in Ontario. Therefore I do not see that Sir John will gain much by that. But even then what could they have done without Cartier, who gave to Sir John Macdonald the majority that he required in the House, so much so that Quebec was accused of governing Ontario. The outcry then was against French domination. Even then, I do not consider that Cartier did more than the leaders of the other provinces. What could he have done without the others ? Not very much. He had to receive help. As far as those three gentlemen go, there is not one of them who could say " I am the man who made the confederation. I am the founder of the great Dominion." The three might say so, as far as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec are concerned, but we have to speak of the confederation of all the provinces, and I said "don't you think Sir Charles Tupper deserves even more credit than our men in Ontario and Quebec, when he had against him nineteen members out of twenty, and fought until he gained his point and got Nova Scotia to become a willing member of the union?" That man deserves to be commemorated more than the others. Then I said if I go to New Brunswick I find the great leader of that province, who did much for his province and afterwards much for the confederation, so much so that he himself was beaten after the delegates had met in Quebec and he fought the battle of union until he regained his position and had a majority at his back and confederation took place. We had no fight in Ontario and Quebec like that. The people accepted Confederation, so I cannot see things in that light. Even those leaders of the four provinces who came into the union, what could they have done if they had not received the assistance of their colleagues in the different administrations of the provinces? I have here the names of the gentlemen who were sent by the provinces to the Quebec Conference in 1864. In old Canada there were twelve ministers of the Crown at the time—Taché, Macdonald, Cartier, MacDougall, Brown, Galt, Campbell, Mowat, Langevin, Cockburn, McGee and Chapais. I find that Nova Scotia sent to the meeting in Quebec, Tupper, Henry, Dickey, McCauley and Archibald, and New Brunswick seven—Tilley, Johnson, Mitchell, Fisher, Chandler, and Grey. Newfoundland sent delegates also, but as Newfoundland did not enter the confederation it is not necessary to refer to them. There were delegates from Prince Edward Island—altogether 30 or 31 at the conference. I know, with the government, it will be a question of pounds, shillings and pence, but, if those gentlemen would take something off the extra expenditure on the Curran bridge at Montreal they will have enough to meet the cost. When they give away money at the rate of $300,000 on a work of that kind, I cannot accept that as an objection. Let the government give me a fair answer, but to say that they have no money is a different matter. I had a note prepared to answer the premier a few minutes ago to show him how wrong he was on this same question of the government having no money to which he alluded some few minutes ago, on a previous question brought up by one of our colleagues, but I thought this was enough for to-day, leaving for another day the remainder of what I had to tell him. If Tilley or Tupper had not been supported by their colleagues, could any hon. gentleman say we have carried confederation; and if so, I ask is it not right that the people of Canada should do something to preserve the memory of all those men and to reward their efforts? The Hon. George Brown fought year after year, throughout his life, for his province against Lower Canada. Nobody opposed separate schools more earnestly than he did, yet when his adversaries proposed to him that he should join with them to bring about a confederation of the provinces, he consented though he knew that he would have to yield some of his views in return for concessions made by others. He carried out the understanding, accepting all the legitimate compromises, even to the extent of agreeing to a system of separate schools for his province. That man will be left in the shade, while his colleagues will be remembered; if that is the way those gentlemen on the Treasury benches are to treat those who have been foremost in the working to bring about the present state of Canada, then I say the quicker they leave their posts the better for the country.

An hon. MEMBER—You are wicked.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—That is not wicked; it is only doing what is right. Now, hon. gentlemen, everyone of those gentlemen I have named are of equal importance. Of course they will not ask it, but it is for us to commemorate their memory. Let the members of the government think a little less of political influence and let them use the public funds less for rewarding their followers and keeping themselves in power. From Prince Edward Island we had seven delegates. Those gentlemen came in later, but, as far as they are concerned they are more worthy of being commemorated than any of the others, and why? Because they worked for seven years to accomplish the great object that was planned in Quebec. If they do not receive more credit they ought to receive at least as much as the others. Sir A. F. Galt and the Hon. George Brown have been dead for some years, yet the government have taken their time. As Sir John Macdonald and Sir George Cartier were more conspicuous in this province, I suppose their statues have been erected first, but that we will come to the others. I have given the government my own opinion, and I want to know whether they intend to continue the work of erecting monuments until there is one for each of the thirty-one delegates—perhaps thirty-three, because there were two from Newfoundland and that colony may join us yet. I ask the government whether they intend stopping with the two statues already erected, or whether they intend in due course of time to proceed with the others? No doubt it will be expensive and it cannot be done at once; I wish to know whether in due time justice will be done to those who are dead and whether it is the intention of the government to also do justice to those who still survive, when they are dead? Among the latter are some who are pretty old now, and very soon they will be among those that are gone.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Will my hon. friend not add to the number the delegates to Prince Edward Island conference for the maritime union which was the basis of the larger union? They should be added to the list because they really initiated the whole matter and the conference for the maritime union induced the two greater provinces in discord to come and unite with the lower province to have a larger union which was determined on at the Quebec conference in 1864. I say those should be among the list if you are to have such a perpetuation of their memories, but I do not approve of such monuments. I believe some of those men who are said to be founders of the union should be called confounders of the union. I do not think they helped very much in the union, and I think that sooner than discriminate we had better drop such an idea. Let us wait until our elder sister is happily in the united family, when one grand monument will do for all of us who helped at its foundation or assisted in its erection or its final consummation, the union of all the British North American colonies. We know all the men who merit acknowledgment and although we have not them in brass and stone they are in the hearts and the memory of the people.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I regret that there is any man in Canada to-day, who would deplore the expenditure for the monuments to Sir George Cartier and Sir John Macdonald. The hon. gentleman thinks every man who took part in the work of confederation should have a monument erected to his memory. The mere confederation on paper did not amount to very much, and there are many who have worked for it since. We are working for it every day. I am surprised to see the hon. gentleman find fault with the government of this country for the expenditure in erecting a monument to Sir George Cartier and Sir John Macdonald. They deserve all the honours they got and the people of this country are willing to pay for it. If there are men prominent amongst all other men who are worthy of a monument to keep their memory green amongst the people of the country, let them have it. My hon. friend might even want a monument erected to his own memory because he is notorious in many respects, and it may be necessary, I do not know but what I would vote for it, but I think myself we would be just as well employed considering something else. If we have any money to expend we can use it in other ways. Those men to whom monuments have been erected here are known from ocean to ocean, and no one regrets the sum it costs to keep their memory before the country.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The hon. gentleman must have been asleep when I spoke, because I never found fault with the government for the expenditure in erecting monuments to Sir George Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald; quite the contrary, but I found fault with the government, who while wasting so much money every day, they say there is no money to erect monuments to the memory of the other founders of this great country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No, I do not sleep. I can hear pretty well, and I did not even lose the hon. gentleman's remark about the Curran bridge. I do not know what the Curran bridge had to do with erecting a monument to Sir John Macdonald or to Sir George Cartier.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am astonished that the hon. member from DeLanaudière should have passed such a slight on Manitoba.

Manitoba has been insulted a good deal of late—the separate schools have been taken away, and the dual language abolished, but to think that no monument should be erected to the memory of any one in that province who induced that country to join the confederation. Why should they not have a monument, as well as the little province of Prince Edward Island, and New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. I think the hon. member left it out inadvertently, and if you will add that all the political men who had anything to do with getting Manitoba into the union should be remembered it would be better. We should also have British Columbia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I do not propose to reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I would just say in the most polite manner possible that I am not aware that I gave him any occasion for that ebullition of feeling in reference to the money matter. The only question I asked him was as to the number, and to show that I have no intention of ridiculing, I was just about dropping a note asking him if he remembered the number. No man holds stronger views than I do myself as to the squandering of the money on the Curran bridge. The question is as to where the blame lies. I will not discuss it, but I do not think it is applicable. I am quite in sympathy with the remarks made by the hon. gentleman with reference to the fathers of confederation. I should like to see a mammoth statue in the centre block here with the whole 31 surrounding the great chieftain. He was the moving spirit in the whole thing. I do not wish to detract in the least from the credit due to Hon. George Brown and to other people belonging to that party who assisted in carrying out confederation. I noticed a few years ago, travelling down the Rhine, a magnificent statue in commemoration of the unification of the German Empire. Perhaps it would be well to adopt a plan of that kind. Instead of having one for each delegate we might have one grand statue in commemoration of the unity of British North America, but I would suggest, before we enter on that expenditure, that we might try and save it in some other way. We will wait until we have attached the remaining outside limb of this great body to the confederation. There was a hint thrown out by a gentleman who spoke a few moments ago, as to whether those who frustrated, as far as they could, the carrying out of confederation, should be treated with the same honour and consideration as those who sunk their individuality, who forgot their party leanings and lent their talent and ability and time to accomplish the great object in view. Now, I think some of my Prince Edward Island friends will have a recollection that some of the gentlemen who agreed to all the terms of that confederation went home and did all they possibly could to frustrate the union of Prince Edward Island with the rest of the confederacy. However, as men grow older they become more sensible, as I hope all of us do. They forgot their objections in the first place and gradually came into the union, and while they have some little complaint, I hope on the whole that they think that they are better off as a part of the great Dominion united in one, than they would be as an isolated island.

VOTERS' LIST OF 1895 BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (69) "An Act respecting the voters' list of 1865." He said:—This bill is very simple in its character and has for its object the postponing of the revision during this year and to legalize by the second clause the acts of certain revising officers. The law provides that there shall be a polling division for a certain number of voters, and in case there are a few more than the 300 that another division should be set apart. In one or two cases the judges omitted to do this; where there were 300 there might now be 320, and under the old law it would compel him to set apart another polling division. That was not done and in order to avoid any difficulty in future the second clause legalizes that want of action.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill (127) 'An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts.'

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can the Premier say what this increase is to certain judges in Montreal? It is placed at $3,000 in this Act? What was the salary previously?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no memoranda as to it, but I might say there were two gentlemen appointed, and they were designated as magistrates, they have been placed in the position of judges of the same courts, and given the same salary they had before, making their position more permanent and certain.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (135) "An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories."

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I ask the minister with respect to this clause if he does not think it well to provide for the case where the speaker might not be available. It says that a member who wishes to resign can do so by addressing or causing to be addressed to the speaker, &c. Supposing the speaker is not within the territories at the time, should there not be some provision for sending in the resignation to the lieutenant governor or some other officer? Paragraph 3 provides that before the Legislative Assembly meets and the speaker is chosen the resignation is to be sent to the lieutenant governor. If the speaker has died, or is absent from the territories, I think the same provision should be made, that the resignation should be sent to the lieutenant governor or any officer to be named.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—

At present members of the Local House elected at the last election were desirous of resigning. There is no provision in the North-west Territory Act providing for a resignation under such circumstances, from the fact there was no speaker, the House not having met, and this simply puts the members elected in the territories in precisely the same position that the members who are elected to the House of Commons are when they desire to retire before the speaker is elected. As a practical illustration, there are one or two now—I believe one on either side of politics—who, when they thought there was an election about taking place for the Dominion Parliament, desired to contest their constituencies for the House of Commons, instead of remaining in the local legislature, and there was no provision by which they could send in their resignations; and it was deemed advisable to give the residents of the territories the same rights and privileges that they have in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not raising any question about the wisdom of the Act at all. I simply suggested that there was a case which was not provided for. You provide for the case where the legislature has not met, and the speaker has not been appointed; but supposing the speaker has died, or is absent from the territory, either of which contingencies may happen, then I suggest that you should put in the same provision as in the case where the speaker is not appointed. In either of these cases the resignation may be sent to the Lieutenant-Governor. I move to insert after the word "time" in line 35, the following words "that in the case of a vacancy in the office of speaker or in the absence from the territory of the speaker."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved amendments to clause 2. He said: These amendments are proposed for the purpose of removing what would be an inconsistency, did the bill go through as it now appears. There was a General Irrigation Act passed by Parliament of last session, in which certain absolute powers are vested in the Dominion Government as against the North-west Assembly, and there was a report prepared by the Department of Justice during the recess as to the exercise of certain powers by the North-west Assembly which, to the Department of Justice, appeared to come in conflict with the powers of the Dominion Government, and to remove this the legislation is proposed, which has been already read. But to make it consistent, it is necessary to have some amendments to the General Irrigation Act, so that some of the clauses will not apply.

The amendments were adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which were concurred in.

LOBSTER FISHERY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

House resumed in Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill (91) "An Act to amend the law respecting the Lobster Fishery."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have made inquiry of the Minister and he thinks it is much better, in the interests of the fishermen and also in the interests of the trade, that the clause should remain as it appears now in the bill. I hope my hon. friend will accept for once the opinion of the Minister. The debate arose on the propriety of continuing the clause as it exists to-day by placing on each package the name and the date of packing. The House has heard the arguments pro and con on this question, and I see no reason to change the views expressed on behalf of the department in reference to the amendment which has been proposed, that is, to leave off the name and the date. The brands are sufficient to indicate the principal packers in the country, as was very well described by the hon. member from Northumberland.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The sense of the House can be taken on this clause if desired,

I am not going to trouble the committee with it. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that there was some discussion when we were in committee on this bill before, with respect to the expression "case or package," and I think the general feeling of the committee was that it would be better to omit the words "or package," because the word "case" is understood and it is defined later on in the sub-clause. After all, the can is a package as well as the case, and the package which contains 48 cans is recognized by the trade as a case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I discussed that also with the officials. There has arisen in the past a dispute as to what is a case and what is a package. Some call them cases and some call them packages, and a package may not be a case. A case is not in all instances a package. I added after the word case "or package" in three places in subsection 2 of section 3. It is more explicit, and I think it is much better to leave it as it is. I have no objection to the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman to put in the words "48 lbs."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—As the bill stood before, it covers the objection completely, because a case of 48 1-lb. cans is a case of lobsters. A package may contain 24, 36, 48 or 96 lb. cans, or whatever the number may be, equivalent to 48 cans of 1 lb. each. My opinion of this matter is that the gentlemen who put up these lobsters know more about their business than we do here. The principal packers put their own names on the packages, and they would put the date if it was to their advantage to do so, but those engaged in the business now have their labels lithographed and registered in the patent office here in Ottawa, and it would be rather difficult to make them change that lithograph plate and require them to put a date on each one of those tins or packages, because they would have to employ a person to put that on specially. Their label is already lithographed and they get a large supply of them to do perhaps for several years to come. I think the bill as introduced originally covers all those cases entirely, and no amendment is required.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments which were concurred in.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (126)—“An Act respecting Commercial Treaties affecting Canada.” He said: I hope the House allow me to take a step with this bill now, and we can have a full discussion upon it before going into Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I want to move against this bill when it comes up. This is the after-birth of the treaty we had last year, and I want to move against it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman can move as well against it before going into committee of the whole, and it will be understood that he does not affirm the principle of the bill by consenting to the second reading now.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 10th July, 1895.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Premier if he is able now to relieve the tension of opinion on this important question —the rumours outside, which are somewhat confirmed by an empty chair. I think Parliament is entitled to some explanation under the circumstances. It is the usual practice in the British Parliament and our Parliament when any crisis arises, that both Houses are taken into the confidence of the Government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite correct as to the parliamentary and constitutional practice on questions of this kind. I am not, I am sorry to say, in a position to relieve the tension of the hon. gentleman's mind at the present moment, but I promise him that there is no doubt I shall be enabled to relieve him of all anxiety as to the matter tomorrow at three o'clock.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (135): “An Act further to amend the Acts respecting the North-west Territories,” as amended.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have just directed the attention of the hon. premier to the fact that the object of some of the amendments has been to confirm practically some legislation, which has already been passed by the North-west Assembly, in regard to the irrigation of certain districts. At the last session of the North-west Legislature an order was passed providing for irrigation. A doubt arose in the mind of the Minister of Justice as to whether that legislation was within the power of the Legislative Assembly, and to remove that difficulty this bill is now before the House, but it has been thought advisable, or it was the desire of those interested in irrigation, that the ordinance should be expressly ratified and confirmed, I therefore beg to move that the Bill be amended by adding these words as clause c:

The Ordinance of the legislative assembly of the North-west Territories No. 6 of the Ordinances of 1894, is hereby ratified and confirmed, and this ratification and confirmation shall have effect as from the passing of the Ordinance of the 7th September, 1894.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill as amended was read the third time and passed.

LOBSTER FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (91) "An Act further to amend the law respecting the Lobster Fishery."

Hon. Mr. POWER—As I intimated yesterday when the House was in committee on this bill, I propose to move an amendment at the third reading. I shall not discuss the bill, because it has been discussed already, perhaps nearly enough, but I propose to move an amendment to reinstate the provision contained in the Act of last year, which was inserted by the Senate, for the protection of the consumer and for the credit of the business of the country that the name of the canner should appear on each can. The substance of the argument used against this amendment made to the bill last year was that it was not favourable to the jobbers. It was not contended that it was injurious to the fishermen, who caught the fish, nor to the packer who actually packed them, and it was admitted that it was in the interest of the consumer who had to use the fish; but it was contended that it might be injurious to the middleman who bought from the packers and who put the article on the market. I think that the interest of the consumer and the reputation of the country are of more consequence than the interests of the middleman; and I really do not see how the middleman is going to suffer from the operation of this provision. He has a sort of guarantee that the fish he is buying is good fish, and he will not be obliged to go to the expense of the inspection and selection described by the hon. gentleman from Chatham. I therefore move that the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be amended by inserting the following paragraph:

(a.) Every can containing lobsters preserved or cured in Canada shall, before being removed from the factory or canning establishment where such lobsters have been canned, preserved or cured, be marked, labelled or stamped with the name and address of the proprietor of such factory or establishment and the year in which such lobsters are canned, preserved or cured.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—As I understand, there is nothing to prevent the packer doing that; if he has got a good name, for his own protection he is sure to put his name on. As far as the date is concerned, of course there is a diversity of opinion on that, but if a man has a reputation as a packer, he will see that his name is put on his own cans.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—This amendment has been changed. In the first place the hon. gentleman from Halifax proposed that the name of the packer should be put on the case. The hon. gentleman saw that was of no use, and now he wants to have the name of the packer put on the label of each can. Such is the case now. These amendments are of no use. No lobster package is sent away without the label of the exporter. An exporter buying fish in five or six different small packing establishments on the shore supplies those men with his labels. He guarantees the fish himself, and he exports them in his own name, and what more do you want? That is the way business is done in Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman never saw a can of lobsters sent to market without a label on it. I can show him some cans here if he will look at them. No lobster can is sent away without the exporter's name on it, and that is a guarantee that the fish is good. I do not see the use of this amendment.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Every time this matter has come before us I have expressed myself as fully as I was able to, and yet I do not seem to have convinced many of the members of this hon. House. I cannot see any objection to this amendment. It is simply keeping the law as it is now on our statute-book and consistent with our judgment of last session. It seems to me that it would be a great protection against illicit canning. If every man is obliged to put his name upon the cans, it is a means of protecting the public against the person who cans illicitly and at an improper time of the year. My hon. friend alongside of me (Mr. Prowse) seems to poohpooh that. We may expect some canners and some middlemen to look only to their present interests. I should have gone further and had the year of canning put on every can, but our legislation on this subject is influenced largely by the packers. The fishermen themselves would prefer this, and I do not see why the canner should make any objection. I am speaking in the interests of the public and the consumer. When I buy a can of lobsters I like to know from what cannery I am getting it and when it was canned. Influence seems to be brought to bear upon the department of Marine and Fisheries every year to get some official of that department to tinker with the lobster law. The lobster men themselves have had ridicule for the changeable policy yearly enacted. They know more about the fisheries and more about the industry and what is right be done than some of those men who are sent through the country and pretend to know something of which they know nothing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Every member of the Senate must admire the pertinacity with which the hon. gentleman pushes whatever idea he may have in connection with this or any other matter. This question has been debated so long and so fully, that I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in discussing it. I think it has been shown conclusively to the House that the label upon the can is a better guarantee than the name. The label is the trade mark and is generally known by every person who deals in this particular article, or in other articles, and as my friend on my left (Sir Frank Smith) who has been in the trade for a number of years says, he never paid attention, in making the very large purchases which his firm made, to the name that might appear upon the can, even if it were there. The question simply was whether it had a certain trade-mark and that was sufficient. It has been proved that the placing of the date upon the package, whilst there is much force in the reasoning of the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg, does, in a great measure, injure the sale of the article, and thereby not only disarranges, but injures the trade of the country. I hope the House will not accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Perhaps I should not interfere in the discussion now, but I would hardly be able to vote on the question unless I should be at liberty to say a few words. The explanation that my hon. friend on my right gave would seem to mean that the dealer, who is the shipper and seller of this article, has a label of his own which he furnishes to those who are canning for him. If that is the case, he is really the canner. He has the superintendence of it and becomes responsible; and I should like to ask is his own name on the can or the name of some firm :

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Does it matter whether the name of the factory is on the can? Supposing a reindeer, or a horse-shoe, or maple leaf is on the can, those are the marks we buy from, and it does not matter what factory puts up the fish.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Don't you think that the man who has his trade-mark upon the can should have his name also?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—He need not.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—So that any one wanting to buy the same article will know whom he is buying from?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—If you buy the maple leaf brand, it is known all over the world. It will be far better for a purchaser to know who comprises the firm that has these cans put up and furnishes the labels. The same canner may put different labels on different lots that he gets canned, just as a miller will put different labels on different brands of flour from his mill. He may have four or five names, but you always know who the maker of that flour is. If this is done upon the same principle, then this would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If I may be allowed to explain, the trade-mark is part of the label; it goes on the label along with the name of the packer. The hon. the First Minister and the other hon. members of the government have contended that the trade-mark is enough, but those hon. gentlemen forget that the trade-mark is on the label along with the name, and if a man puts his name on, the trade-mark goes with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is just the reason why we say the name is not necessary.

The House divided on the amendment, which was lost on the following division:—

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MCKAY moved the adoption of the Second Report of the Standing Committee on the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate. He said: The recommendations which are made in this report are very fully set forth with explanations and references. I do not think it is worth while wasting the time of the House giving explanations further than they appear in the report.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I wish to call the attention of the Internal Economy Committee to the loose manner in which things are allowed to be conducted in the corridors of this House. Strangers and boys are allowed to pass through with their hats on, smoking and spitting, and they are allowed to go into rooms unchecked. Only to-day I found a stranger in my room looking through my books—a man that I had never seen before. I find at all hours strangers walking about with hats on their heads and smoking in the corridors. It should be stopped.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very glad my hon. friend has mentioned this matter, because I was going to make a remark on the subject myself. It is certainly a great nuisance and should be stopped.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some steps should be taken to prevent our restaurant being used as a common tap room. You find at all hours strangers going down there unchecked. The Speaker ought to issue a positive order to stop strangers from going to the restaurant unless they are accompanied by a member of either House.

The SPEAKER—I never heard any complaint of the kind before, but now, after the remarks that have fallen from the hon. gentlemen, I shall be most happy to comply with the wishes of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the adoption of the second report of the joint committee of both Houses on the library of parliament. He said:—The only matter of importance to which I desire to call the attention of the House and which requires any special consideration is that part of the report which embodies the recommendations of the sub-committee on exchanges. The gist of that report is this: that on recent occasions considerable sums were spent on the purchase of copies of certain works of native literature for distribution to Canadian universities and for foreign exchange. Last year a number of copies of Kingsford's History of Canada, and this year a number of copies of other works for distribution or exchange were ordered, and the result of such purchases is that the funds at the disposal of the library committee for the purchase of new works is very much depleted, and therefore the sub-committee thinks that the grant to the library is not large enough to justify the purchase of books for the purpose of encouraging native literature. They recommend, therefore, that the books to be purchased by the library committee shall be confined simply to those which are useful for exchange, and that hereafter when the joint committee is disposed to encourage native literature they should bring such works to the notice of the Government, in order that a sum may be placed in the estimates for the purchase of a certain number of copies. That was the practice in former years, and it was on the recommendation of the committee, in fact, that the Government acted, if they acted at all. It is merely going back to the former practice. There is no doubt that the purchase of books for the purpose of encouraging native literature, if made to any extent, does cut down the amount which is placed at the disposal of the librarian for the purchase of new books so much that it is difficult to keep the library up to its proper standard. Hence the recommendation of the committee that for the future if it is considered desirable to purchase any books of that kind that instead of the purchase money coming out of the library fund, it should be recommended to the Government to put a sum in the estimates for the purchase of such books. That is really the only recommendation of any importance. The rest is merely the report of the sub-committee on accounts which are all set forth here and do not require any comment. If the House thinks that that recommendation is a wise one I trust that the report will be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (127)—“An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Judges of Provincial Courts.”

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I intimated to the Senator for Ottawa that I would let him know whether this was an increase in the salary paid to the two judges in Montreal who were generally known as Magistrates. There is no increase; it is simply fixing the salaries which have been paid to them in the past instead of having to vote it every year, making it the same as all other judges whose salaries are made statutory instead of being subject to a vote of Parliament whenever the estimates come up.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Is that an increase in the number of judges?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is an increase of one.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it intended to be retroactive?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You cannot appoint a man backwards.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is it intended to be retroactive in regard to the salary for the first two years, $2,000 per annum and after that $2,400?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should judge not. Unless it was made retroactive by a certain clause it could not be interpreted in that way.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington), from the committee, reported the bill without amendments.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (126) “An Act respecting Commercial Treaties affecting Canada.” He said: When the House kindly allowed me to take one step yesterday with this bill it was with the understanding that, if it was desired, a full discussion could take place on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, or in the Committee of the Whole, by those who desired to take part in the discussion. The lengthened debate which took place on this question last year, when the treaty was brought before the House by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, relieves me of all necessity to repeat the arguments in its favour or to refer to it at any length. The papers have been before the House and before the country for more than twelve months. It is very well understood that a treaty was entered into between Lord Dufferin, Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in Paris, assisted by Sir Charles Tupper, the High Commissioner for Canada, and Monsieur Hanotaux, on the part of the French nation. An arrangement was arrived at by which certain articles were to be admitted at the minimum rate of duty into France in consideration of certain reductions which were to be made in the tariff of Canada. It would be only repeating what has already been said if I were to occupy the time of the House in referring to those articles in detail. This bill is to bring the treaty into full operation. I may explain one reason why we have been delaying so long in ratifying the treaty by the Parliament of Canada. It was the result of some misunderstanding between the Imperial Government and the Dominion of Canada as to its actual meaning and bearing upon the trade of the country. The question arose as to whether the term "third powers" in the treaty would apply to the colonial possessions of the British Empire; and, if so, whether it would deprive Canada of the right to enter into reciprocal relations with any other British colony without extending the same rights, privileges and advantages to France. England's answer to that query was that it did not, that it was made between Great Britain and France, and that all her possessions formed a part of the empire and that interprovincial or intercolonial trade was not affected in any way; but it was understood, and pledged on behalf of Canada at the time the treaty was entered into between the high contracting powers, that all countries that had treaties with Great Britain in which there was what is known as the favoured-nation clause, should have all the advantages which are given to France in this treaty; that is, those countries having with Great Britain treaties which contain the clause to which I have referred and to which Canada and the colonies were made a party. I have no doubt it is known by hon. members of this House that Canada is not made a party to treaties which have been entered into of late years between Great Britain and other portion of the world—unless she so desires it. Treaties entered into between Great Britain and a foreign power, before being finally ratified, are referred to Canada with the request that Canada should intimate to Great Britain whether she desires to become a party to that treaty. In nearly all the cases which have come under my notice, we have decided not to become a party to the treaty. Sometimes because we thought it would not be in the interests of the country, and sometimes because we did not wish to be bound by the provisions of a treaty which, although it might not injuriously affect us directly, might interfere with our negotiations with other powers or with any of the colonies; but having been bound by the treaties between Great Britain and Germany, Belgium, Austria and other countries which contain those favoured-nation clauses and to which Great Britain made us a party, (that is many years ago before we took exception to being made parties to those treaties) we consented, in the negotiations with them, that they should have whatever advantages were given to France, for the reason that whatever advantages Great Britain has in the foreign market with which she has such treaties, the colonies also have the same advantages. It was also urged by Great Britain, and it has been her policy for a great many years, not to prevent, if she could help it, colonies entering into treaties which affect the trade of the country, without giving whatever advantages might arise from them to the sister colonies. This was done when Jamaica sent a deputation a few years ago to Canada for the purpose of negotiating with this country for the admission of her sugar at a lower rate of duty than was charged other countries in consideration of the lowering of the duty upon certain articles which would be sent from Canada to Jamaica. Great Britain intimated to that colony at once that in any arrangement which she might enter into with Canada, whatever advantages would accrue to Canada therefrom, must be given also to the sister colonies in any portion of the world. Accepting that policy on the part of Great Britain, we consented to extend the operations of this treaty to any of the British colonial possessions. The other clause deprives us of any right to the advantages derivable from the treaties to which I have alluded containing this favoured-nation clause, if those treaties should cease to exist or should be denounced at any time, and it also gives us power to denounce this treaty ourselves on a year's notice whenever we think it is not in the interest of Canada to continue its operation.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is the best clause in the treaty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—These are, in as a short and succinct a manner as I could put them, the provisions of the bill before the House.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I moved against the adoption of the treaty last year, because I believed it to be a one-sided affair and opposed to the interests of the people of this country. In fact, I consider it, more than any other measure that I ever knew, opposed to the prosperity of this country. The party that I have been associated with since my youth, the great Conservative party, long ago adopted the national policy.

During all this time we have told the people that we should keep the Canadian market for Canadians. We have told them that we should collect the revenue necessary to meet the expenditure of this country, as much as possible off the luxuries that come into Canada. What do we find now by this treaty? We take the duty off wine to the extent of 30 per cent, and when we do that we must make up the revenue in some other way. Therefore we must tax the necessities of life in order to make up that revenue. That was the ground I took last year, because by the adoption of this treaty, in order, as some hon. gentlemen said last year, to cultivate a taste for French wine among our people, we will be destroying a very important industry in this country—the grape-growing industry. Grape growing and the manufacture of wine are growing industries. What do we get in return for this treaty, under which we are obliged to give 20 other countries the same terms that we have given France? Reduced rates on 20 articles, and one of them is eels. I call it a wine-and-eels treaty. The National Policy is gone altogether on that point, and how can I appeal to the people of the country on this question? If I understand the treaty, and I think I do, we have got to ship direct to France in order to get the advantage of the minimum tariff. Has France got a line to enable us to take advantage of the treaty? No, it is a one-sided affair. It has been said that the treaty will not go into operation unless we have direct communication with France. I find the following in the Mail and Empire, the organ of the Government, published the 21st March last :

Steps are being taken by the Department of Trade and Commerce to ascertain the terms on which a direct steamship service can be maintained between Canada and France and Belgium. On this side of the Atlantic the ports will be Montreal and Quebec in summer, and Halifax and St. John in winter. With such a service, a great impetus to our trade with the countries named is expected. Besides this, a direct line to France is understood to be necessary before Canada can enjoy the full advantages of the French treaty. Tenders will shortly be asked for the service, and this will enable the government to form a conclusion as to its probable cost.

The hon. gentleman who is at the head of the government now was for a long time Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he be kind enough to tell us what arrangements he has made about that steamship service?

Last session we had an assurance that there was no necessity for direct communication. We have a number of steamship lines subsidized now ; that is all right, no doubt, and in the interests of the country, but are we going to have another subsidized? The organ of the party says that we are. I can see no reason why I should change my mind on this subject. The treaty ties our hands so that we cannot negotiate a treaty with any other power without placing France on the same level with them. My hon. friend says that we have the power of terminating the treaty on one year's notice. I am very glad of it ; it is the only clause in the whole treaty that I approve of, or that the people of this country can approve of. The idea of making a treaty for the purpose of flooding this country with foreign wine when we can make all the wine that we use ourselves ! The effect of the treaty will be to destroy a growing industry in which large numbers of people are engaged to-day. When we went before the public we said we wished to encourage the industries of the country. Are we encouraging them now? We are encouraging the industries of France. There is a good deal of sentiment in this matter. It may be a good and noble sentiment ; but every Frenchman in this House and in the other House voted for that treaty. They must have thought it was beneficial to France, or they would not have voted so unanimously for it. I voted against this treaty last year, and I shall vote against it this year if I stand alone ; and, therefore, I move that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair to go into Committee of the Whole House to-day, but that we go into the Committee of the Whole House on this bill this day six months.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hon. gentlemen, in seconding the motion of my hon. friend from Monck, I do not know that I second it exactly from the same standpoint that he takes in opposing the treaty now before the House. He opposes it on the ground of the National Policy—that it is a free trade measure. In so far as it is a free trade measure I am thoroughly in accord with the principles of the treaty ; but there is an element in the treaty that I protested against last year and I think it is not inconsistent with the principles that I argued for last year that I should enter the same protest now that the treaty has come into the House a second time. Why has the treaty come in the House the second time? It is because the government in bringing down or negotiating the treaty last year did not provide for the legislation that they are now putting upon the statute-book in order to make it effectual so far as our relations with our sister colonies are concerned. I would like to draw the attention of this honourable House to the remarks I made in discussing the treaty last year so far as the favoured nation clauses are concerned. I said:

We have most-favoured nation treaties with the following nations negotiated by Great Britain in which we are included: Argentine Republic, Austria, Corea and Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Chili, Costa Rica, Denmark, Egypt, Germany, Madagascar, Mexico, Montenegro, Morocco, Persia, Russia, Sandwich Islands, Siam, Norway and Sweden, Tunis, Uruguay, Venezuela and Zanzibar. England has favoured-nations treaties with a large number of other nations, but Canada is only included in those I have mentioned, some 31 in number. We have entered into most-favoured nations treaties with the nations I have mentioned here and any concession that we give to France now in our markets carries also with it, of course, the imposition or benefit of most-favoured nation treatment with all those nations.

I pointed that out last year, and I pointed out further in my remarks that it would be absolutely necessary before this treaty went into force that legislation should be put upon the statute-book in order to put Australia and the rest of the British possessions on the same equality or footing in the Canadian markets as we were according to the foreign nations I have mentioned; and I will just read my remarks upon that occasion:

Mr. Foster, in the House of Commons, has told us that under the most favoured nations treatment all the nations in Europe with whom we have most favoured nation treaties will be included; and notwithstanding a conference we held here the other day, for the purpose of negotiating with our sister colonies for better treatment, if this treaty were carried out, and no legislation enacted, France would be sending her wines in here at 50 per cent less tariff than our sister colonies would be allowed to send in from the Cape of Good Hope and Australia.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Oh, no, it does not affect them at all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I beg pardon, at the present moment you have to enact legislation which will enable Australia to send their wine in at the same rate as France now obtains in this treaty.

I simply point this out in order to justify the lengthened remarks that I made upon the introduction of the treaty last year. Hon. gentlemen in this House do not agree with me always in the views that I advance; but at the same time I hope hon. gentlemen will give me credit for having had the foresight to point this difficulty out and it is probably the fact that having pointed the difficulty out it caused the government to delay the passage of the treaty until it had acted fairly and honourably towards the rest of the British possessions. At any rate, whatever the motive was, I have pointed the facts as contained in my remarks last year, which this legislation is now justifying. Now, there is another position that I took in regard to the treaty, and I think that it is necessary that I should enter the same protest that I entered last year in regard to it. We have, as I pointed out, negotiated a commercial treaty with a large foreign nation on our own behalf for the first time, exclusively for the benefit of Canadian interests. I pointed out then that the negotiation had taken a form which I thought was injurious to Canada, that it was a very bad precedent for us to put upon the statute-book a treaty that contains the principle of most favoured nation treatment which this treaty contains, that we should not establish a precedent, but refer it back for the purpose of putting it on what I call equitable grounds. Now what is the position that this treaty puts us in? We have most favoured-nation treaty with France in the twenty articles mentioned in the treaty, but only in the twenty articles mentioned in the treaty have we a right to enter under the minimum tariff that is conceded to other nations. But France has the right to enter Canada upon the lowest tariff that we may give to any nation in all our commerce. We exchange the whole of Canadian commerce under most favoured-nation treatment merely for the benefit of most favoured-nation treatment in twenty articles that go into France from Canada. I think hon. gentlemen that that is an unwise precedent for us to establish in the negotiation of treaties. I am in favour of the treaty. I am in favour of having treaties with France and foreign nations. I believe that the more extended that you can make your commerce the more competition you can invite into your own country, the better position you are going to place our population in, the better articles they will have in consequence of that competition, the lower prices they will have in consequence of that competition, and in consequence of that lower price they enjoy, they will be able to supply themselves with a greater number of the necessaries and comforts of life than they would by enhancing the prices through monopoly and restriction under protection. I welcome treaties of this kind, but when the treaties are passed I say they should be passed on an equitable basis as between nations. As I stated last year the purchasing power of Canada is only equal to its selling power; that we could not sell more to France even if there are 40,000,000 people in that market than the selling power of the 5,000,000 people in Canada, to whose market Canada is to have access, and you could not buy more from France in the same way, and we should enjoy from France the same favoured nation treatment of all the articles we produce for foreign export if we give to France in all of the articles they produce for export. I see by the papers that France has negotiated a treaty with Switzerland, by which she is giving the minimum tariff to Switzerland in several articles. We are not going to enjoy the benefit of the minimum tariff or the most favoured-nations treatment that has been accorded to Switzerland. I see that one of the articles mentioned in the treaty with Switzerland is cheese. We are not going to have the benefit of sending Canadian cheese into France in competition with Switzerland under the minimum tariff. If we had negotiated a treaty in the way I have mentioned namely, equality of commerce, we would be able to send our cheese into France under the minimum tariff, and there would have been so much more advantage to be gained under most favoured-nations treatment by the people of Canada and the treaty would have possessed so much more value. For that reason I say that in order to be consistent in the position I took last year I must enter my protest once more against the negotiation of a treaty on that basis. Not that I am at all hostile to the treaty on the same grounds as my hon. friend. I do not fear at all the entering into Canada of light wines at the 25 per cent duty, because that is quite sufficient protection for the growth of our wines in Canada. The taste for light wines is a healthy taste as compared with the taste for spirits, as compared with the taste for stronger liquor, and in that way I say this treaty is likely to produce a beneficial effect. I should like to see the duty on excise on spirits raised and a taste for light wines cultivated. We can increase immensely the production of light wine greatly to the health of the community and the profit of the country, and for that reason I do not take the same objection, but in seconding the motion my protest is confined to that particular phrase of the treaty in so far as our obtaining only most favoured nation treatment in regard to the twenty articles mentioned in the treaty, whilst giving most favoured nation treatment to France in the whole of Canadian commerce.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I cannot understand my hon. friend's argument, coming from a free trader. His principle is this: that our prosperity depends on the industry, the products of other countries. This doctrine of unrestricted free trade he has propounded in sundry ways and at divers times and places, that we should pursue a policy which would leave our market open to the whole world; every person could come in here and have control of our market without any duties at all. He would give everything away, and now turns round and says in effect that our tariff should not be lowered unless in return for some substantial privilege granted by France, that we do not get an equivalent for this treaty with France, that we should not throw our markets open at all if we do not get an equivalent—that we are giving a great deal away and getting nothing in return. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's idea of consistency. We are not responsible for the treaties with Germany and Belgium and other countries, although I know that in the maritime provinces we have gained from the favoured-nations clauses. When the Spanish West Indies made a treaty with Norway to admit Norwegian fish at a lower rate of duty than was imposed on the fish of other countries, we immediately claimed, under the treaty that England had negotiated with Spain, that we had a right to the same advantages and our claim was granted. We get benefit sometimes from this favoured-nations clause which England has in her treaties with other countries. I am not going into the details of the treaty now. It was fully debated by us last Session. I believe it will be a benefit to us. I can understand the argument of my hon. friend from Monck, who believes as I do that the prosperity of Canada depends on the industry of its people—that our first duty is in fostering the industries of the country; but it is so singular to find an extreme free trader as the hon. member for Marquette seconding his motion. I wonder that they can work together. They are as far as the poles asunder in their views on the tariff question, yet they combine to defeat this measure. I believe this treaty is in the right direction, that it is carrying out our trade policy, in extending our foreign markets when to our interest and that the country will benefit by it. The articles that we admit at a reduced duty are nuts, prunes, castile soap and wine.

Very few other countries produce those articles, or send to us to an extent to affect our markets. The customs returns do not show that we are deluged with wines, fruit, nuts or castile soaps from other countries, and we need not fear that by opening up this trade with France we will be giving advantages to other countries to our own disadvantage. Perhaps my hon. friend from Shell River is going back to his early convictions, his first love, to the policy of protection; certainly he argues that when we give away anything we should get something in return. I am glad that he is going back to his early principles and there is reason to hope that before long we shall find him supporting the government. This treaty does not stand in the way of future trade relations with the United States or other countries. We can give England twelve months' notice of abrogation. But I must repeat that I am at a loss to conceive how those of our opponents who have adopted a policy of free trade as they have it in England, object to this treaty which is designed to make trade freer.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The principle of free trade is to tax luxuries of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this treaty was first being negotiated in February and March, 1893, the general belief in Parliament was that we were negotiating a treaty strictly with France and not with a dozen or two dozen other countries, and even then the treaty was not received with very great favour that year. The Finance Minister in 1893, speaking for the government, said:—

Parliament will not be asked to ratify the treaty this year. I think it is also well to state that one of the chief points which the government have to keep in view, is with respect to the favoured-nations clause. Whatever may have been our understanding with respect to all the other clauses of the treaty, as to articles which were to be allowed to come in, it is perfectly true that by our telegram of the 12th January we assented to these clauses, whether we fully understand them here or not, and are responsible for them. But with respect to the extensions of the most favoured-nation treatment, that was never contemplated by the government, that was not included in our instructions, and, so far as that is concerned, was entirely beyond the wish of the government.

In discussing the treaty that year we were under the impression that it would only involve favoured nations clauses with Belgium and with Austria-Hungary. As the hon. gentleman from Shell River has observed, when the matter was discussed last year it was somewhat broadened by a belief that there were other nations which would be entitled to come in under the favoured nations clause, but it was never thought for a moment that it would be so universal. The present bill is the outcome, I suppose, of the insistence of the British Government that it should be put in the form of a statute, in order that we should not repudiate the agreement. I have the impression that the government, through the Finance Minister, had stated when it became generally known that so many other countries were going to participate in this treaty, that we were to offer no discrimination against any other country. The United States were particularly alluded to. Canada is not included in the favoured nations clause in the treaty between England and the United States. Reference was made particularly to the United States, and my impression is that it was then said that the policy of the government would be, so far as those particular articles were concerned, not to discriminate against any country. However, I may be in error on that. Now, I think we have very properly included all the colonies. The sentiment that the Canadian people have expressed through their representatives in Parliament has been decidedly in favour of having control of trade arrangements with other countries ourselves, and many members have taken a prominent position in discussing the question from that point of view in years past, more particularly Mr. Blake, when he occupied a seat in Parliament. He was very strongly of the opinion that we should take a decided stand on this subject, and should have control of our own treaties.

In 1891, the present government felt so strongly on this subject, that a petition was adopted by Parliament,—I believe by unanimous consent,—calling the attention of the Imperial Government to Canada's position, and to the manner in which Canadian interests would be severely prejudiced in the event of our making treaties of reciprocity with any other country by reason of this favoured-nations clause. In the Senate Journals of 1891 I find the following :

Your memorialists desire, in the first place, to draw attention to certain stipulations in the existing treaties with Belgium and with the German Zollverein, ordinarily referred to as the "most favoured-nation" clauses, which are extended to other countries whose commercial treaties with Great Britain contain a "most favoured-nation" clause, and which apply to British colonies.

At that time we did not thoroughly realize all the countries that would be entitled to trade with Canada under the favoured-nation clause, because of recent years we have not been included in such treaties. In the earlier years all the colonies were included. I have here the imperial return of the different countries which have the most favoured nation clause with Great Britain, and I notice all the earliest treaties—say before 1860—included the colonies. Since confederation, perhaps a year or two before it, certain colonies were exempted. I think the hon. gentleman from Shell River is in error when he mentioned the number that he did. I do not think the number is as large as he said, because, according to my notes, a number of the countries which he mentioned are not entitled to come in, as the treaties were made with them subsequently to the time when Canada made a stand, and was specially excluded. However, I think the number is thirteen or fourteen altogether that would come in, exclusive of the British colonies. This petition to the Parliament of Canada referred only to those treaties with Belgium and the German Zollverein. It says :

Your memorialists earnestly desire to foster and extend the trade of the Dominion with the empire, and its great neighbour, the United States, and with other countries throughout the world, wherever opportunity offers; and believe that by mutual concessions, and the adoption of measures for the rearrangement of trade relations between the various portions of the British empire, and between the empire and foreign nations, important and lasting beneficial results may be obtained, and that to the way of the attainment of these great objects, the continuation of the restrictions imposed upon Canada and other portions of the empire by the so-called favoured-nations clause creates an unnecessary and unjustifiable obstruction.

We asked, so far as Canada is concerned, that Her Majesty's government would denounce those several treaties in order to free Canada from the effect of that clause. That was the universal opinion of Parliament, that that should be done before we entered into any treaty. At the time we entered into this treaty with France, it was not supposed that the favoured-nations clause applied so generally as it does to-day. The consequence is that Canada will be placed at a disadvantage. I am not prepared to say that if we made a treaty of reciprocity with another country we should be obliged to give to France and all other countries having the favoured-nations clause equal privileges in our markets. That, I believe, is a debatable point. I believe it has been held by some authorities that if a reciprocity treaty is made it does not necessarily follow that countries having a treaty containing the favoured-nations clause would be entitled to come in and share the advantages derivable by the country with which the reciprocity treaty was made. In other words, if we made a reciprocity treaty with the United States, it is debatable whether France could come in and claim the advantages, although a clause in this treaty is very strong and would embarrass us seriously. It says :

Any commercial advantages granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

I think it is almost beyond doubt that France would be entitled, if we made a reciprocity treaty with another country, to come in and share all the advantages. That was never contemplated, and I think if it is not too late we should specially exempt from the operation of the treaty with France any negotiations we might make to obtain reciprocal relations with another country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We cannot touch the treaty now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We cannot alter the treaty. We have confirmed it by Act of Parliament, which I suppose is not in force until the treaty is effected, but hon. gentlemen will see that it opens the way to very serious embarrassment, and that we have drifted into a position which may affect us very seriously in the future. If this paragraph can be construed that in the event of our entering into a reciprocity treaty with another country, under this clause France could come in and claim similar advantages, it would affect our revenue very seriously. We get no quid pro quo, because our privileges in France are limited to a very few articles and to the minimum tariff whatever that may be.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Even without that I think France could come in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So much the worse. If we had a treaty with France that was a fair and equitable treaty, and did not necessarily affect our relations with other countries, we would know where we were, but we are at sea now: we do not know where this treaty is going to end. It may affect very seriously the revenue of this country. France gives us no corresponding advantages. No one can pretend to say that our sending articles to France under the minimum tariff will compensate us for throwing open our markets to the articles named here exported from France. I regard the treaty as entirely one-sided, and one which in 1893 we never would have thought of accepting, because the whole spirit of the debate in 1893 was against any such proposition. It was only on the assumption that the favoured-nations clause was not to apply so largely that it was accepted. Great Britain has taken a positive stand on the subject and says you must pass an Act of Parliament because we cannot rely upon Orders in Council for your observance of the treaties that we have made with those countries. Great Britain is exceedingly sensitive with regard to treaties and very properly so, because she is regarded as the most honourable of the nations of the world, and therefore she does not wish to be placed in any false position by leaving this an open question in Canada, and so the British officials have insisted on our having this bill passed. As the hon. gentleman from Monck says, it will destroy the wine industry of Canada. Many of the countries that I have named are large producers of wine, more particularly the Argentine Republic, Australia and Hungary, and therefore in a measure it does destroy the Canadian industry of wine growing. We all know there was a strong protest on that ground from that industry, and one which I think out to have received more attention from Parliament. I presume the matter has gone so far now that it is beyond recall, but it is unfortunate that we should have drifted into that position, because at the time the treaty was first discussed, the public sentiment of Canada was decidedly against it if it entailed the consequences that we now feel must follow on its adoption.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I have at all times taken a deep interest in this subject. Coming from the maritime provinces I naturally look upon it in a different light from that in which it is viewed by that portion of the members of this House coming from the west. Before proceeding further, however, I think an apology is due to a large portion of this House for some remarks that have been made here. While not a Frenchman myself, I am a representative of France, and I, therefore, resent anything that may be derogatory to them. The hon. gentleman from Monck said that this treaty was altogether favourable to France, and he undertook to prove the assertion by saying that every French member of both Houses voted for it, and they did so because they thought that France was most benefited.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I said it was a matter of sentiment a good deal with the French members, because they all voted for it.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I accept the apology.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is no apology about it.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—He intimated that a large portion of this House were French before being Canadians or British. The hon. gentleman from Monck also seems to think that there is no communication between this country and France, and that without a steamboat subsidy and a line of steamers nothing could be done. He imagines there is nothing more bulky than eels and cheese to send to that country. If he would take a trip to the lower provinces, he would see that there is a very large trade carried on between Canada and France. A few years ago a trade was being worked up between the maritime provinces and France.

I have no doubt there was also a large export from Quebec of timber and wood, of which I know nothing, because I do not keep a record of the Quebec exports, but I do keep a record of the exports from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I can speak with some accuracy in reference to it. A few years ago we had succeeded in building up a trade with France by which France took 14 per cent of all the exports of wood from the lower provinces, and I believe it was much larger as the returns I have from Nova Scotia do not give me the destination of all the shipments, but I am speaking within bounds when I say that the export was 14 per cent, but since the differential treaty, our trade dropped down to 4 per cent. There has been an effort made to get our exports to France put on the same footing as the exports from the most favoured nations. This treaty has been under consideration for years and if we were going to make any alteration to it we should have done so before. It has already been agreed to by the French Chambers and Great Britain, and if we make any change now two years may be again wasted. French merchants have been given to understand that there is no doubt in the world but that the treaty will be ratified. The circumstances surrounding the negotiations have justified it. So far as Canada is concerned it was ratified last session, and that was represented to the French buyers. I tell my hon. friend from Monk that although I am one of the small exporters, I have already sent this year to France 194,142 francs worth of property carried by four ships, one steamship and the others sailing vessels. If you want to get more direct communication with France you can go down to the port of Chatham and there you will find a direct trade every week. If you want to send over anything I can get it exported for you to a French port.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When I spoke of a direct trade with France I said we could not take advantage of the Treaty without subsidizing a line of steamers to France. I know the hon. gentleman can send lumber direct, but I understand that we cannot break bulk, but must ship direct. We cannot take advantage of the treaty without subsidizing a line of steamers to go there, and I object to the expense of giving a subsidy to a line of steamers because we are carrying all the indebtedness now that we ought.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—We have no regular line of steamers, but we have steamers plying between the lower province ports and France without any subsidy from the government. We are maintaining a direct trade with that country without any subsidies.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—What steamers are they?

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I cannot tell you—tramp steamers you may call them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Ocean tramps.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not aware of any line.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—There is no regular line. When my own trade has exceeded in two months this season, over $40,000 there must be a considerable trade with that country. Now if the people of France had not distinctly understood that they were going to get their goods in this season under the lowest tariff, I am positive they would not have bought, and it was only with that distinct belief on their part that they did purchase, and it would be doing a great injury to them not to ratify the treaty as it now stands. If we were going to repudiate the treaty we should have done it long ago. I hope the House will see fit to ratify the treaty in its present form, and give us some little advantage in our exports. Canada does not supply Great Britain with 20 per cent of the wood she consumes, and the trade is not as great as people imagine. Norway and Sweden supply her with over 30 per cent and we supply under 20 per cent. The United States come next with about 20 per cent and Germany and other countries also supply large quantities. I repeat the whole of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada do not send to Great Britain more than 20 per cent of the wood import of that country. Our trade is hampered; it is bearing a large portion of the tax of this country. There are other trades besides the trade in wood which will derive great advantages from that treaty by closer trade relations, and we should be allowed to send our wood into a country that is a free buyer of what we produce in this country. I hope the treaty will be quickly ratified so that the owners of the cargoes which left our ports a few days since may get the benefit of the minimum tariff.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I propose to vote for the motion of the hon. member from Monck. We have ratified the French treaty already. I think that we made a mistake in doing so, and I think we shall make a still further mistake in passing this bill, which purports to extend to a number of other countries the advantages that the Act of last year gave to France. There is another point to which sufficient attention has not been called. I did not hear the hon. the first minister make any reference to it at all in discussing the matter. It is this: that those other countries are in a totally different position from France, because France offers us an equivalent. Some of us think that what was offered by France was not a full and satisfactory equivalent for what we gave, but France did give us something in return. Now we propose to confer upon the Australian colonies, upon Germany, upon Belgium and upon Austria-Hungary the same advantages which we gave last year to France, while these countries give us nothing at all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They give us a larger return than France. France gives us favoured-nation treatment in twenty article, and those countries give us favoured-nation treatment in all our commerce.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understood the hon. member from Shell River, or the hon. member from Ottawa, to say that in treaties of recent date Canada was not included. Do I understand that Canada is included in the treaty with Austria-Hungary?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly she is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And under that treaty we are entitled to the same treatment?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, certainly, in all our commerce.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We are entitled to that now without the passage of the bill. I am substantially right; for the concessions we make in this bill we get nothing in return. If we have made the concession, then this bill is not necessary; if we have not made the concession, we ought not to pass the bill, because we are giving something away and getting nothing in return. I think it is to be regretted that while the policy of the government continues to be protection, they should adopt such a measure as this. I am not surprised that my hon. colleague should laugh at the idea that the policy of this government is protection, in the face of such a measure as this—in this House where the leader nailed the protection flag to the mast, but still asks the House to accept a measure of this kind.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am laughing at the hon. gentleman for opposing the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I believe in being consistent and logical, and while the policy of the government is a policy of protection, I think it is highly objectionable that the wine growers of this country should be exposed to the competition of those of France, Australia, Germany, Austria-Hungary and Spain; and, on the other hand, as a free trader, I might tell my hon. colleague that I should be opposed to admitting luxuries into the country free of duty. If we are to have a free trade tariff, then I should rather propose to allow cheap clothing and other necessaries of life to come in free. I do not see what Canada has to gain by the passing of this bill. Let the favoured-nation treaties speak for themselves. I do not see why we should interfere; we do not always show so much regard for the wishes and interests of Great Britain in commercial matters. We did not show the slightest regard for Great Britain when we adopted the National Policy, and I think Canada had better look after her own interest, and I think her interest is adverse to the passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—This treaty was discussed fully last year and if it had not been for the fact that a debate has sprung up just now I think I would hardly be disposed to say anything. However, I cannot allow certain cardinal points argued against this treaty to go abroad without some explanation. The hon. gentleman from Halifax said that this was allowing the luxuries of France to come in duty free. I am not aware that the wine of France is coming in duty free. There is a reduction in the duty that was put on by the National Policy so as to enable this country to make a treaty with foreign countries. I believe we would do the same with the United States if they would give us an equivalent. That being the case, I do not see that there is any substantial argument in the remarks of my hon. friend to my right. The hon. gentleman from Ottawa made some remarks also which I think should be noticed. He said that he thought this would injure us in our trade with any nation we might wish to trade with. It cannot injure us more than one year, because by the conditions of the treaty it can be abrogated in that time; consequently we could only suffer one year. He also claims that this treaty will be the means of reducing our revenue. I take issue with him in that also, because a certain portion of wine comes from France, the duty on which has been raised too high. For instance, sparkling wine pays a duty of some $6 or $8 per dozen and everybody knows that with such a duty that wine will not be consumed by the ordinary citizen. I also raise the point that the admission of champagne and sparkling wines can be no injury at all to the manufacturer of native wines. I wish the hon. gentleman from Monck to pay particular attention to this, because he seems to be under the impression that the introduction of champagne would be injurious to the manufacturer of native wine. We do not manufacture champagne, at all, and consequently it cannot injure this country in that article. In my opinion we are not giving much to France for what we are getting. French wine will be imported; that is, a certain portion will be imported; for really we cannot do without it. We have native wines, it is true, but those who can afford to have French wines will import them, and we can pay for them in the productions of the country. We can send France a very large list of productions, and I deny, in toto, that our exports have to be confined to eels and one or two other things. On the contrary, we can send wood extensively into France. We can also send canned beef, canned fish and food of various kinds. We can also send paving blocks and things that we produce and for which we should be very glad to have an open market in return for the small concessions we are making in taking what we will take, whether we get the market or not. I do not see any necessity to continue the debate longer. Hon. gentlemen will see that after all those who support this treaty have a deeper interest in it than being merely Frenchmen.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—From what was said a few moments ago, it appears that some member has said that the French senators supported the treaty on account of being of French origin.

Several hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are more English than French senators supporting it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I understood from the hon. gentleman from Chatham that it was stated by an hon. member that it was a sentimental affair with those of us who are of French origin.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—But nobody believed it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—My desire is to explain that we are supporting this treaty because it is in accord with the policy of the government adopted long ago. It has been the policy of the government of Canada for many years to increase our trade with other nations, and that policy is a sound one. On that ground we support the treaty, because we think it will afford a considerable increase of our trade. France is a country of immense resources. It is a good market for all nations and Canada should try to secure admission to that market. Our efforts have been directed in that way for many years. Up to the present we have not been successful. Here is an opportunity to open an increasing trade with France, and it seems to me we should not miss the opportunity. That is the principal reason for supporting the treaty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have one explanation to make in reference to the statement made by the hon. senator from Monck in relation to the paragraph which he read referring to a subsidy to a line of steamers between Canada and France. I am quite sure that the correspondent of that paper had no authority for making the statement that the government considered the treaty could not be carried out unless there was a direct line of steamers. If he will refer to a telegram sent by myself on the 12th January, 1893, he will find that I stated on behalf of the government that we could not accept the conditions involved in the clauses regarding the steamship subvention. That referred to a proposition which was made by France during the negotiations that we should establish a line of steamers and grant them a subsidy of half a million dollars per annum. The House will remember that there was a proposition before the Parliament of Canada for the subsidizing of a line of steamers to ply between Canada and France and England, or England to France and then to Canada. We declined to accept that proposition. I may say, however, my own view of this treaty is that it will not be of that advantage to Canada which it should be, unless we have a direct line of steamers running between Canada and France, and vice versa. The government, recognizing the force of the argument, and recognizing the necessity for it, advertised for tenders for a line of steamers between Canada and France and Belgium, and to call on the return voyage from Belgium, at one of the principal ports in France and thence direct to Canada. The advantage to be derived from the establishment of a line of that kind is to relieve the trade of the country from the surtaxe d'entrepot, which is imposed upon all articles that are taken into France that are not imported direct. I freely confess that unless we have that line of steamers we will not derive the advantages that we should derive from the ratification of this treaty. Tenders were called for, and tenders are now in the Trade and Commerce Department for the establishment of a fortnightly line of 10-knot steamers to be subsidized to the amount of $50,000 per annum; and another subsidized to the amount of $125,000, for 13-knot steamers. The question that is really being considered by the government is which line they will subsidize.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is that line to run from Montreal?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From Montreal and Quebec in the summer, and from Halifax or St. John in the winter. One remark made by my hon. friend from Shell River rather staggered me. He stated that the wine coming from France into Canada would be admitted 50 per cent cheaper than from any other country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Than from the colonies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That makes the hon. gentleman's case worse. Because the terms of the treaty are such as to admit the wines from all the British colonies at the same rate imposed on wines imported from France. The distinction between the duties upon wines from different countries only applies to those countries who have not the favoured-nations clause in their treaties with Great Britain. It could not be 50 per cent, because the amount of the reduction is only 30 per cent. The duty upon wines is 25 cents per gallon and 30 per cent ad valorem for a strength of 26 degrees, and three cents for every degree above that. The reduction of the duty upon wines is to apply to all countries with which we have the favoured-nations clause, with the colonies of Great Britain, and with France.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do I understand the leader of the government to say that without this legislation Australian wines would be admitted at as low a rate as French wines?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said nothing of the kind. I said that this treaty, if ratified, would allow wines of no greater strength than 26 degrees to come from France at 25 cents a gallon, and over 26 degrees in strength at 3 cents for each additional degree. That applies to colonies as well under the treaty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Only under this legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Only under this legislation. My hon. friend from Halifax evidently had not been studying the tariff for some years past. There has been a standing paragraph in the tariff ever since 1879, when Sir Leonard Tilley proposed the first tariff under the National Policy, providing for the removal of the 30 per cent duty from any country that would reciprocate in the same way. It is there and it is in the tariff to-day, so that we are only carrying out the policy that was inaugurated by the government of Canada, and to which my hon. friend from St. Boniface refers, ever since the National Policy was established.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has France made any objection to the enlarging of the treaty under this bill?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; my hon. friend from Ottawa read from a speech delivered by the Minister of Finance which I confess took me somewhat by surprise.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Delivered in 1893.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I understand it was in 1893. I am quite sure that that speech cannot have been correctly reported, because he must have known better. Here is a telegram sent by myself, dated 12th January, 1893, long before the speech to which the hon. gentleman refers was made. It reads as follows:
To Sir Chas. Tupper.

Re French negotiation, government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction of duty on French books, but agree to most favoured-nation treatment so far as articles named in treaty are concerned.

Now that is distinct enough.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This may have been at an earlier date.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It cannot have been at an earlier date, because this was during the negotiation of the treaty, while we were corresponding—Sir John Thompson and myself as Minister of Trade and Commerce, with Sir Charles Tupper—as to the nature and character of the treaty in every particular so far as it affected the trade of the country. The balance of the telegram is as follows:

They agree to other conditions in return for minimum tariff on articles named as regards France, St. Pierre and Miquelon. This subject to your views as to effect on proposed Spanish negotiations.

At that time, and just before, Sir Charles Tupper was in negotiation with Spain on this very question of wine, to ascertain whether they would take the produce of Canada at a low rate of duty, providing we put in force that clause of the tariff to which I have referred. I desire to make that explanation, because I am quite sure my colleague, the Minister of Finance, must have been misreported at that time. It will also be borne in mind by those who have read with any attention the debates of the House of Commons, that Sir John Thompson stated during the debate—and it was afterwards repeated by the Finance Minister—that though they did not consider the treaty compelled them to make the concessions to the colonies, yet as it was a part of the policy of Great Britain, they would give the colonies, under the circumstances, the same advantages as they gave to France. I make that explanation to show that Parliament, and every one who read the debates at that time knew, what concession we were making.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was it not only after the convention with the Australian delegates here that we decided to give the colonies the advantage?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not think it was intended at first.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—During the debate upon this question in the House of Commons, the declaration was made by Sir John Thompson, then Minister of Justice, and by the Finance Minister, Mr. Foster. The question did come up, the hon. gentleman will remember, and was discussed during the sittings of the colonial conference. My recollection is that Mr. Foster stated at that time that the colonies would receive the same advantages as France under the treaty. I do not desire to enter into the question of the National Policy as it affects the lumber trade, but if my hon. friend from Chatham will take the trouble, when he has a little leisure, to read the speeches made by our late colleague, Senator Burns, in the lower House, and one by the present speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. White—if he will listen to reason, and will read those speeches carefully, he will come to the conclusion that he is only reiterating an exploded story that we hear so often, that the National Policy has almost ruined the lumber trade. Those gentlemen proved beyond a peradventure that there is not a single article that enters into consumption in their business which is not as cheap or cheaper than before the National Policy was inaugurated, while the price of lumber is better. I can understand my hon. friend's anxiety for this treaty, and I am very glad to know that it is going to recoup him for the great loss which he thinks he has sustained by the national policy, and I can only hope that if this treaty is ratified he may have a fast line of steamers running between his mills and France, and that he can find a market for all he has to sell. Of course, we can forgive the senior member for Halifax for the delight he takes in always picking at the Paternal Policy. He complimented his colleague from Halifax by saying that he liked a joke. Most of us do, but if anybody can fathom the joke that the hon. gentleman perpetrated to-day, I must confess that I am too dull to comprehend it. I could enter into an elaborate argument as to the effect that the treaty will have on the trade of the country, but that was described so fully last year that it is not necessary to repeat it now. One hon. gentleman said that the treaty should be amended. We have no power to amend it; we must accept it as it is, or reject it. We can make no amendment to any of the clauses, because if we change it in the least, it would have to go back to France for a ratification of that change, and they might throw it out altogether. My hon. friend from Monck says "throw it out." I think we had better try this treaty and its effects on the country, and if it is not as advantageous as we expect, or if it is, as the hon. gentleman who opposed it said, one sided, then we can take advantage of the power given us to notify France that we will abrogate it at the end of a year.

The Senate then divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following division :

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the House proceeds to the business of the day, I beg to remind the Premier of the promise he made yesterday that he would announce whether the gentlemen who are reported as having resigned have really resigned or are still members of the Government?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In compliance with the promise made yesterday, I am in a position to answer the question which the hon. gentleman has put. Upon receipt of the answer to the remedial order sent to the Manitoba Legislature, which was received a week ago last Monday, the government, after due consideration, came to the conclusion, as I announced to the House a few days since, not to proceed with remedial legislation during the present session, but in view of what we considered an intimation in that answer from the government of Manitoba that they were prepared to still further consider any representation which might be made by the government of Canada, we thought it best, in the interests of those who had the success of this remedial legislation most at heart, to postpone its consideration until we could communicate with the Manitoba government in order to ascertain how far they were prepared to accede to the terms of the remedial order and the judgment delivered by the Lord Chancellor of the Privy Council of England upon the subject. I refer now to the last decision delivered on the 25th January, 1895. From that decision three of our colleagues, I regret to say, dissented—the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who has the honour of a seat in this House, the hon. Postmaster General, and the hon. Minister of Public Works. They considered that in the interests of the Dominion, and in the interests of those whom they represented and in the interests of the minority of the province of Manitoba, it was the bounden duty of the government of Canada to proceed at once, during the present session, with remedial legislation. I regret to say that we could not come to a unanimous decision upon that point. My hon. friend, who is in this House, I regret to add, still holds the opinion that he first entertained and declines to re-enter the Cabinet, unless we are prepared to concede the points which he had so forcibly and eloquently urged upon his colleagues. The majority of Council, however, deemed it, as I have already stated, more in the interest of peace and the welfare of the Dominion, and more to the benefit of those deeply interested in a final settlement of this very important question, that we should not proceed as they desired. My hon. friend is in the House and will be better able to state his reasons than I possibly can. I may, however, with the permission of the Senate, after he has spoken, if it is thought necessary, make further explanations. These three gentlemen sent in their resignations. I am glad to say, that after mature deliberation and in a firm belief in the honesty of their colleagues, two of them have consented to remain in the Government on the assurance that should Manitoba refuse to grant legislation, restoring to the minority of Manitoba the rights of which they were deprived by the Act of 1890, the present government would risk its position, each individual his own political reputation, and introduce remedial legislation, trusting to the good sense and fairness of the House of Commons and of the Senate to carry it into operation. I may say, and I say it in all sincerity, that I look forward with much fear and with great anxiety to the future peace of this country, if we, without having exhausted every possible means to obtain from the legislature and government of Manitoba redress for the grievance of the minority in that province—I say I look forward with much apprehension to the effect of a policy which would force on an almost independent province, so far as local matters are concerned, a law which would have to be carried out in all its details, should they refuse to do it, by the Dominion Government or by the Dominion Parliament. I ask every well wisher of his country to reflect well upon that point. There are certain local rights which every province has. The difficulties which present themselves, to my mind, in attempting to force upon an unwilling people any kind of legislation will render whatever relief we may grant useless to those whom it is the intention of parliament to aid if they possibly can. My two colleagues—that is the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and the hon. the Postmaster General—have, after much reflection, and having considered the representations which have been made to them from the stand-point which I have given to the House, and with a distinct, and positive understanding that this government will proceed with legislation should it be denied by the legislature of Manitoba, consented to retain their portfolios and remain in the Government until the time arrives when it will be an imperative duty on the government to act in this matter. I sincerely regret, for more reasons than one, that my hon. colleague who sat beside me, has not been able to take that view. I believe he is actuated by the highest patriotic motives in the course that he is taking. I believe that he has but one single object in view and that is, to secure to his fellow countrymen and co-religionists rights of which he knows they have been despoiled and which he desires to restore to them. The only difference of opinion between that hon. gentleman and myself and my colleagues, is as to the best mode of carrying that out. I do not know that at present I need say more upon this question. I have expressed the regret which I feel deeply at severing the personal and political relations which I have had with my colleague who has occupied a seat on my right since we have been in the Senate of Canada, and I hope the time is not far distant when, although he may not agree with us at the present moment, he will at least give us credit for having pursued that course which we believed to be best in the interest of the Dominion and those who have been deprived of their rights in Manitoba.

Hon Mr. ANGERS—Hon. gentlemen, I have to inform this House that I have obtained, through the Prime Minister, permission from His Excellency to state to you the reasons and circumstances of my withdrawal from the Cabinet. On the 8th July inst., I wrote to the Prime Minister the following letter :

I have the honour to inform you in writing, as I have already done verbally, that I cannot accept the responsibility of the declaration you are about to make in the Senate on the Manitoba school question. In consequence, please lay before His Excellency my resignation and obtain for me permission to state in the Senate the causes and reasons of my withdrawal from the Cabinet.

I remain,
Yours truly,
A. R. ANGERS.

Permission to give those explanations I received yesterday, and I agreed to postpone them until to-day. It is unnecessary for me to go through the history of this important question of the separate schools in Manitoba, especially in this House, where every member is fully conversant with all that has been published concerning it ; however, I have to retrace my steps to some time back, but not very distant from the present day. I wish to refer to the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council rendered in January last. It is necessary in justice to myself, that I should lay before the House the main points which have been decided by

Her Majesty in her Judicial Privy Council. the Lords say :—

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teachings. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for those purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890 ? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctly Protestant in their character.

In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education which existed prior to 1890 have not been affected.

Their Lordships also stated :

As a matter of fact the objection of Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Acts of 1890 is conscientious and deeply rooted. If this had not been so, if there had been a system of public education acceptable to Catholics and Protestants alike, the elaborate enactments which have been the subject of so much controversy and consideration would have been unnecessary. It is notorious that there were acute differences of opinion between Catholics and Protestants on the education question prior to 1870. This is recognized and emphasized in almost every line of those enactments. There is no doubt either what the points of difference were, and it is in the light of these that the 22nd section of "The Manitoba Act" of 1870, which was in truth a parliamentary compact, must be read.

And in conclusion their Lordships added :—

For the reasons which have been given, their Lordships are of opinion that the 2nd subsection of 22 of "The Manitoba Act" is the governing enactment and that appeal to the Governor General in Council was admissible by virtue of that enactment, on the grounds set forth in the memorials and petitions, inasmuch as the Acts of 1890 affected rights or privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education within the meaning of that subsection. The further question is submitted whether the Governor General in Council has power to make the declarations or remedial orders asked for in the memorials or petitions or has any other jurisdiction in the premises. Their Lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities, to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act."

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate ground of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

The Lords of the Committee thereupon reported to Her Majesty that the said question hereinbefore set forth ought to be answered as follows:—

1. In answer to the first question: That the appeal referred to in the said memorials and petitions and asserted thereby is such an appeal as is admissible under subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," 33 Victoria (1870) Chapter 3, Canada.

2. In answer to the second question: That grounds are set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under the authority of the subsection of "The Manitoba Act" above referred to.

3. "In answer to the third question: That the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the cases of Barrett vs. The city of Winnipeg and Logan vs. The city of Winnipeg, does not dispose or conclude the application for redress based on the contention that the rights of the Roman Catholic minority which accrued to them after the union under the statutes of the province have been interfered with by the two statutes of 1890, complained of in the said petition and memorials.

4. In answer the 4th question: That subsection 3 of section 93 of "The British North America Act 1867," did not apply to Manitoba.

5. In answer to the 5th question: That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" of 1870.

6. "In answer to the 6th question: That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education passed prior to the session of 1890, did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" which alone applies; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

And Her Majesty at the Court at Osborne House in the Isle of Wight, on the 2nd day of February, 1895, after taking the said report into consideration was pleased by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council to approve of the said report of the Lords of the Committee and to order that "the recommendation and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular, whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being and all other persons whom it may concern, are required to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

The decision granted the minority the following rights and privileges:

(a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c.) The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

Upon this judgment the Privy Council of Canada passed an order and adopted, two days after, what is known as the remedial order, which was sent to the legislature of the province of Manitoba, through his Honour the Lieutenant Governor of that province. The legislature made an answer to that remedial order refusing to obey the injunction contained in the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the Privy Council of Canada. Upon this refusal the doors of Parliament, under the law, were open to do justice to the minority. The answer of Manitoba was received on the 1st of July. From that day devolved upon the government the power, and consequently, the obligation, of relieving the Roman Catholic minority of that province of the enormous grievances they are suffering. For the last five years they have been called upon to contribute to the support of public schools to which they cannot send their children. What I thought to be the duty of the government I could not see accomplished. The government, on Monday last, made the following declaration:

I desire to state that the government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba Legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and after careful deliberation has arrived at the following conclusion:—Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature; and the Dominion government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interputed as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The government has, therefore, decided not to ask parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject with a view to ascertaining whether the government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Tuesday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievances of the minority, the Dominion government will be prepared, at the next session of parliament, to be called as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

To this declaration I was unable to assent, and I sent the letter of resignation which I have read in opening my remarks. I wish to state to the House what were my grounds for being unable to give my assent as a member of the Cabinet, to this declaration. I must read to the House the answer that was made by the legislature of Manitoba to the remedial order, and ascertain whether there is to be found in that answer some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question, on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba government and legislature. In their answer the legislature state this after reciting the remedial order and the Order in Council :

The privileges which by the said order we are commanded to restore to our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens are substantially the same privileges which they enjoyed previously to the year 1890. Compliance with the terms of the order would restore Catholic separate schools with no more satisfactory guarantee for the efficiency than existed prior to the said date.

We are therefore compelled to respectfully state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.

Objections upon principle may be taken to any modification of our educational statutes which would result in the establishment of more sets of separate schools. Apart, however, from the objections upon principle, there are serious objections from a practical educational stand-point.

Is there any man in this House or in the country that can state there is in that paragraph of the answer some hope offered of a satisfactory settlement of the question? Their answer is, on principle we object to the establishment of separate schools.

We labour under great difficulties in maintaining an efficient system of primary education. The school taxes bear heavily upon our people. The large amount of land which is free from school taxes and the great extent of country over which our small population is scattered present obstacles to efficiency and progress. The reforms effected in 1890 have given a strong impetus to educational work, but the difficulties which are inherent in our circumstances have constantly to be met. It will be obvious, that the establishment of a set of Roman Catholic schools followed by a set of Anglican schools and possibly Mennonite, Icelandic and other schools, would so impair our present system that any approach to even our present general standard of efficiency, would be quite impossible. We contemplate the inauguration of such a state of affairs with very grave apprehension. We have no hesitation in saying that there cannot be suggested any measure, which to our minds, would more seriously imperil the development of our province.

Is there here anything justifying us to come to the conclusion mentioned in the first paragraph of the declaration of the government, that therein is foreshadowed the hope of an amicable settlement, and that consequently Parliaments should be most unwilling to interfere. It has been stated that monetary difficulties were the cause of abolition of separate schools. It was necessary, they claim, to tax Roman Catholics in order to support public schools, to which schools the minority could not send their children. Is it quite true that this was the motive the legislature of Manitoba had at the time? The evidence is contradictory on that point. Mr. McCarthy, speaking in the name of the province, when he came before the Privy Council stated the true object of having abolished the separate schools in the province of Manitoba. It was to deprive the French Canadians of their language, to make them English. Then the answer reads :

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not then available to Your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools. We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Was that an olive branch they were offering when they said to the Governor General in Council, you have been dealing with a matter upon which you had no information and you have made a blunder?

Surely that could not be construed as indicating a desire of an amicable settlement.

Being impressed with this view we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall carefully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Again was that offering the olive branch? Was that a step towards restoring to the minority of the province their separate schools? Certainly not.

It is urged most strongly that upon so important a matter, involving as it does, the religious feelings and convictions of different classes of the people of Canada and the educational interests of a province which is expected to become one of the most important in the Dominion, no hasty action should be taken, but that on the contrary, the greatest care and deliberation should be exercised, and a full and thorough investigation made.

That was the advice given to the Privy Council of Canada which does not amount again to a hope of a reasonable or favourable settlement of the grievances of the minority:—

While we do not think it proper to enter upon a legal argument in reference to the memorial, we deem it our duty to briefly call attention to the legal and constitutional difficulties which surround the case. It is held by some authorities that any action taken by the Parliament of Canada upon the subject will be irrevocable.

While this opinion may or may not be held to be sound, it is in our judgment only necessary to point out that there are substantial grounds for entertaining such an opinion in order to emphasize the necessity for acquiring a most ample knowledge of the facts before any suggestion of parliamentary action is made.

It will be admitted that the two essentials of any effective and substantial restoration of Roman Catholic privileges are:—

- (1) The right to levy school taxes:
- (2) The right to participate in the legislative school grant.

Without these privileges the separate schools cannot be properly carried on, and with them, therefore, any professed restoration of privileges would be illusory.

It may be held that the power to collect taxes for school purposes conferred upon school boards by our former educational statutes was conferred by virtue of the provisions of subsection 2 of section 92 of the British North America Act and not by virtue of the provisions of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. If this view be well founded then that portion of the Act of 1890 which abolished the old right to collect taxes is not subject to appeal to Your Excellency in Council, and the remedial order and any subsequent Legislative Act of the parliament of Canada (in so far as they may purport to restore the said right) will be ultra vires.

Now, again it is impossible to find an offer of settlement in that paragraph of the answer. On the contrary it controverts the decision of Her Majesty in Her Privy Council.

As to the legislative grant, we hold that it is entirely within the control of the legislature of the province, and that no part of the public funds of the province could be made available for the support of separate schools without the voluntary action of the legislature. It would appear, therefore, that any action of the parliament of Canada, looking to the restoration of Roman Catholic privileges must, to be of real and substantial benefit, be supplemented by the voluntary action of the provincial legislature.

There again can we say that an offer of a settlement was made? On the contrary it is a positive refusal to obey the remedial order.

If this be the case, nothing could be more unfortunate from the stand-point of the Roman Catholic people themselves, than any hasty or peremptory action on the part of the parliament of Canada, because such action would probably produce strained relations and tend to prevent the possibility of restoring harmony.

I draw your attention to that paragraph of the answer. Instead of finding there the hope of a settlement, I find a threat made to the Parliament of Canada that if we restore to that minority the privileges which the mandate of the Queen said they should get, they shall suffer for it.

We deem it proper also to call attention to the fact that it is only a few months since the latest decision upon the subject was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Previous to that time a majority of the members of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba had either expressly or impliedly given pledges to their constituents which they feel, in honour, bound loyally to fulfill.

It is impossible to find here a hope of an amicable settlement. Therefore upon that very important point I had to refuse my consent. Dealing now with the second part of the declaration made by the government, I have to state that I was also unable to subscribe to it:

The government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session.

Why was Monday last, "the last hours of the session"? You all know that the present session was called this year about thirty days later than last session. We have been here at work about forty days less than last year. It is said the legislation is difficult and intricate. Admitting that it is, when Mr. Ewart argued his case before the Privy Council here, he produced a draft Act that meets the circumstances of the case, and that draft Act has been before the public for the last three months. Taking that Act up and giving it a few days' attention and discussion, with the assistance of the hon. Premier himself who has had a great deal to do with educational matters, of the hon. member from Ottawa who introduced the separate school Act in Ontario, of my hon. friend on the other side of the House, the member for St. Boniface, who was twelve or fifteen years superintendent of education in that province, it would have been quite possible to pass a good bill. I had to decline subscribing to that paragraph of the declaration. Coming to the third paragraph it is stated :

A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba government on the subject, with a view to ascertaining whether the government is disposed to make a settlement of the question which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament.

It is proposed here that the government should enter into negotiations with the government of Manitoba. The law requires that communication upon this subject be made not to the government but to the legislature. The legislature of that province has just been prorogued, it may not meet, and is not obliged to meet before the first or second week of July next. Therefore the government will be unable to approach the legislature of the province before the extreme limit of this Parliament's existence has been attained. They will have to approach the government. True it is a responsible government, but for the purpose, it is an unauthorized body. The legislature of the province has just passed resolutions which are imperative as regards the Manitoba government. Only a few weeks ago they told us that, on principle, they will not grant separate schools. And, moreover, they say :—

Previously to that time the majority of the members of the legislative assembly of Manitoba, have either expressly or impliedly given pledges to their constituents which they feel in honour bound loyally to fulfil.

That pledge is that no separate schools will be given to the minority. What is the use, after the positive refusal of the legislature in every paragraph of its answer, to apply to the government of that province? It cannot do anything effectually. Let me call your attention to this fact, that it was after a promise that those very schools would be continued for ever by Mr. Greenway that those schools were abolished by him. Is it upon a promise of Mr. Greenway, unauthorized, and in the face of a House which is, as he tells you, in honour bound not to grant these schools, that you can expect to obtain them from him? This is the reason why I was again under the painful duty of not being able to subscribe to that portion of the declaration. I read in the Ottawa Citizen :

If the French Canadian ministers must have such haste, they prove themselves so regardless of the sentiments of many English speaking Conservatives as to render regard for Quebec's feelings no longer a matter of much importance to the rest of confederation.

By these words I am charged with having shown an undue haste and with having refused to grant any delay. I must state to the House that when the government came to the conclusion to make their declaration, I requested that it should not be made last Monday, but that the government wait until I had permission to give at the same time explanations to this House. I could not get permission then for reasons that were not dependent upon the government, but it was dependent upon them not to make that declaration on Monday, but they did. This necessitates my stating that in opposition to the proposal of the government, I made in Council by way of compromise a proposal granting a further delay, but objecting to any official negotiations being entered into with the government of Manitoba, on the ground that an evasive, or illusory answer made by them might put the Dominion government in the impossibility of moving Parliament to act. The proposal for which I voted is to this effect :

I desire to state that the government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba government and legislature to the remedial Order of 21st March, 1895, and after very careful deliberation has come to the following conclusion : At this late stage of the session, and seeing that so little time has elapsed since the reception of the answer of the legislature of Manitoba to the remedial order of the 21st March, and in view of the complicated nature of the legislation required to restore to the minority of Manitoba their rights and privileges to separate schools, the government has determined not to introduce such legislation at this present session, but will call a session of this present Parliament during next fall for the purpose of introducing and pressing to a conclusion, the necessary legislation to grant relief to the said minority on the lines of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and of the remedial order of the 21st March last; if the legislature of Manitoba has not before that time taken such steps as to satisfy the minority in that respect which hope every loyal subject of Her Majesty should entertain before believing that the province of Manitoba would ignore the decision of Her Majesty's Privy Council and the remedial order of the Governor General of Canada.

And I wish further to state the government will transmit to the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba a copy of this declaration of Parliament.

Under this proposal the necessary delay to perfect the bill prepared by Mr. Ewart would have been obtained. The minority who have now an acquired right, would not run the risk of seeing the door of Parliament closed upon them by an evasive answer, or by a promise that could not be carried out, or again, by the statement, for instance, that the legislature of Manitoba having just prorogued, it is impossible for them to assemble before the month of July next. What will be the position of the Dominion government if they come before Parliament in January with such a declaration? The minority will have been put out of the fort, it will be standing out again in the open field, and the government will be unable to determine the House to take action. That was my objection to that part of the declaration of the government, and I offered the one which I have just read to you; but it was voted down. The declaration made by the government admits of a doubt as to the actual jurisdiction of Parliament. The one that I offered granted a delay but raised no suspicion as to jurisdiction. I have read that declaration to show that I did not want to be hasty. However, my conviction is that between this day and the day that Parliament meets again, such an excitement will go over the country in opposition to the granting of remedial legislation that if the government hesitates now, it will be then afraid.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Never.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I say to the contrary; I saw them afraid very often.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The minority is told that it should be satisfied with the declaration made by the government, because there is in it a clause binding the government to bring before Parliament remedial legislation. Hon. gentlemen, that minority had just the same promise from the government before. If I refer to the speech of the hon. leader of the House on the address, I find the following words:

I hope sincerely, with the mover and the second-er of the address, that the people of Manitoba may see their way clear to settle this question among themselves, and to relieve the Parliament of Canada from the serious obligation which will devolve upon them otherwise. It is a very serious matter for the government of the Dominion to undertake to deal with a question which affects solely any one section of the country. If the people of Manitoba are patriots they will keep this question out of the arena of Dominion politics, but if they desire to continue flinging firebrands among the electorate of this country (who, I am sure, are desirous of living in peace and harmony)—if they reject all overtures, and act upon the suggestions of those who are leading the opposition throughout the country,—I can only say that when the time comes, if it should come, for action by this government, the people of Canada will find that the present administration are quite prepared to assume the responsibility which may fall upon them, no matter what the results may be.

That was the promise of the government at the opening of the session. Was it necessary to get another declaration of the same kind? In my opinion the first one was good, but the second one is not so good. The second one is embarrassed with procedure which may prevent the future action of the government. The noble voice that we heard at the beginning of the session promising relief when the time would come, and it has come, has been suppressed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
What has been suppressed?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Your promise has been suppressed by an influence which acted like a damper, and new promises had to be made. After recalling to the House the voice of its leader, as he spoke at the beginning of the session, I think it is my duty before closing to recall the echo of another voice upon this very subject. I quote from the second volume of Mr. Pope's book on Sir John Macdonald. At page 248, I read the following, which is an extract from a letter:

You ask me for advice as to the course you should take upon the vexed question of separate schools in your province. There is, it seems to me but one course open to you. By the Manitoba Act, the provisions of the British North America Act (section 93) respecting laws passed for the protection of minorities in educational matters, are, made applicable to Manitoba, and cannot be changed; for by the Imperial Act confirming the establishment of the new provinces, 34 and 35 Victoria chapter 28, section 6, it is provided that it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the Manitoba Act in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba. Obviously therefore the separate school system in Manitoba is beyond the reach of the legislature or of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—To whom is that written?

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I cannot give the name. The name was intentionally suppressed by the author. Mr. Pope commenting on this letter says:

On the kindred question of the dual language his opinions were equally decided and outspoken. He fully sympathized with the French Canadians in their natural attachment to their mother tongue and in the summer immediately preceding his death he carefully noted and put by for use in the session of 1891 the following extract from a speech by Mr. Gladstone which he observed expressed (mutatis mutandis) his own views on the proposal to abolish the official use of the French language in Manitoba:

"There appears to be a desire—I will not say the evidence is demonstrative, but, still, in the manner in which the question is brought forward, there seems to be a desire—to a great extent to substitute the British for the Italian language in Malta. Well, I am opposed to any such substitution. I think, and my mind goes back to the case of Wales, that there is nothing in the world that the Welsh would so vividly resent as any officious attempt to change the language of their country. And, gentlemen, they are perfectly right. The union between a nation and its language, the union between even a small people like Wales and its language is a due and affectionate union; it is bound up with its traditions; and when we went into Malta, we engaged to respect their traditions, and no attempt, no policy, I do not care where it began—I believe it began in some former time—but we have evidence before us now which induces me to say that, in my opinion, the Maltese have been sacredly promised the preservation of their language and institutions, and are entitled to claim among the very first elements of that promise, that we shall pay due respect to the customs established among them and inherited from their forefathers, which are bound up with all their ideas, and which above all they wish to retain."

In holding these views Sir John Macdonald could not be charged with any prejudice in favour of the Roman Catholic religion or the French Canadian race. Rather do I think that to the entire absence of prejudice in his large and liberal mind is to be ascribed the cause which determined his political attitude on these questions.

That same spirit, I think, the Premier of Canada is possessed of, but unfortunately I fear that the opposition made to the execution of the mandate of the Queen and of the remedial order is stronger and greater than his intention. The hon. leader has in his hand the present; no man perhaps in Canada could more effectively have given remedial legislation to the minority than himself this session, but having the present in his hand he has not the future. I am justified in speaking so from an abstract which I will read to the House from the Hamilton Spectator:

The result of the grand tug of war in the Dominion cabinet is that there is to be no remedial legislation introduced this session. It is semi-officially announced that another session of the present Parliament will be held and that a bill to provide remedial legislation will be presented only in that session. We do not think that to be at all likely. The same influence which prevented the introduction of a bill now will be present and intensified then, and the French will not be able to carry their point.

Now that is my fear. In my opinion remedial legislation, by the inaction of the government, has been so imperilled that the minority may never have it, and consequently I cannot accept the responsibility of such a risk. I must thank the House for the attention they have given me in this matter and I hope I have not uttered one word that could be construed as expressing anything harsh to the leader of the government.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—On this occasion I stand in a very peculiar position, for the reason that it has been insinuated outside of this House, within the last few days, that the Irish Catholics were untrue to their principles, untrue to the minority in Manitoba, and opposed to the enactment of remedial legislation for the relief of that minority. I think I shall be enabled to convince the House that I, for one, am neither untrue to the minority in Manitoba nor to the Dominion at large. I have been identified with my friends in religious matters and have been connected with the Roman Catholic church since my childhood—in fact I was born a Roman Catholic. I am sorry that I am an unworthy representative of that church, but the man does not live who can truthfully say that I ever flinch when duty calls me to act. Neither have I done so on this occasion, for the question was to be argued in Council on the 17th March last, and on the 16th March, at 5 o'clock in the evening, I was in my bed ill. Against the protest of my doctor and of all my family, I rose from my bed and came down that night to Ottawa, and risked my life, as the doctor said, for the cause. I want those who are of a different origin from me not to insinuate that I am deserting a cause that I ought to uphold because I ask for a short delay. This question has been before the country five years, and I ask any reasonable man, clergyman or layman, if a further delay of five months is an unreasonable request for the government to make for the purpose of giving time to settle this vexed question amicably, rather than impose the power of the Dominion Parliament upon the province of Manitoba. On this issue I am identified with the government. I have supported the policy of the Prime Minister. I have done so, not to benefit any one creed or race or locality in this country, but to promote peace and harmony in the Dominion at large. I believe now, and I believed, when I was giving my vote in council for delay, that time may lead to an amicable settlement. I have had the honour of serving under four Premiers of this country. I never asked to be reappointed when I handed in my resignation, but I have had the honour to be invited by every one of those different gentlemen—three of them have now gone—to become a member of the Cabinet. I do not go there to force my opinion on the Premier in behalf of any creed or any locality in this Dominion. I go there to give my cool and unbiased opinion for the benefit of the people at large of this country where I have lived since I was a boy of ten years of age. I am told that on this occasion I was the first to vote in favour of delay. I am not going to say whether I did so or not. Any one who says so could only have learned the fact at the council board, and no member of the Cabinet is at liberty to mention how members of the government deal with questions that come before them. It is unfair to divulge the proceedings in the council chamber. It is unbecoming to men of honour, who take a solemn oath and declaration going in there not to divulge anything that takes place in the council, or to blame one member more than another for the decisions of the government. Every man when he walks out of the Cabinet should take the responsibility of the decision of the Cabinet as a body, let it be right or wrong. When a member of the government is not pleased with the decision of the Cabinet he should step out. I do not want to evade my responsibility in any shape or form. I pleaded to the best of my ability with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to remain in the Cabinet and help us who were working for the cause that he has at heart, but we could not agree on the time of putting this legislation before Parliament. There are seven provinces in this Dominion, six of which are not affected in any shape or form by the decision of the government on this question. A large majority in those six provinces want delay. Why should we not take time to consider the matter carefully before we put a large number of people representing those provinces in a false position by forcing a remedial bill on Manitoba until every effort to secure an amicable settlement is exhausted? It may never be necessary to bring such a bill before the House. If the difficulty can be settled amicably, I should be delighted to see it; but if not, I pledge myself before this House and before the country that I will fight for remedial legislation and justice to the minority of the province of Manitoba. I am sorry that my hon. friend, because he cannot get every man to comply with his views in the council, has thrown up the sponge and gone out of the cabinet. He says he is not sure whether the government will ever be able to bring in this legislation or not. I say that that document which was read by the Premier here last Monday was not issued for false purposes. The large majority of the people of this country have confidence in the government and will credit us with being honest in our intentions. If, when the time for action comes, the government shrink from doing what is right and proper, I shall be the first man to declare war on them, and say they are unworthy of administering the affairs of the country. I would under such circumstances vote against the government, but I do not want to be one of those who put the pistol to the breast of the Premier and say "you must bring in remedial legislation this present session; if you do not, we will leave the cabinet and upset the government, and let you go to Jericho."

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That was not said.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—There is something at the bottom of all this. Those gentlemen think that perhaps they can form an alliance that will be more convenient to them than that which they have with us. They should not feel that way. We have refused them nothing. All we ask is a short postponement, and they are not as true representatives of Quebec as we are representatives of Ontario. They should fight for their bill, and when the last effort fails it will be time enough for them to leave the ship. As an Irish Catholic from the province of Ontario I am bound to stand by the minority of Manitoba and ask for what is reasonable, but nothing more. I am bound to do what I think is for the benefit of the Dominion at large. I am bound to wait and not put our colleagues in a false position. Our friends in the other House and in the country should not be driven into a false position. Let all liberal-minded men stand together and the extreme men on all sides must give way. I feel that nine-tenths of the Protestants in this country are to-day in favour of giving the minority in Manitoba what they are entitled to when the time comes. If I had not that feeling I should certainly exert myself to end the matter as soon as possible, but looking back over the past in this country I have seen the Protestant majority has very seldom refused to give the Catholic minority what was reasonable and right, and I am quite sure that they will not refuse to do justice on this occasion. I think that the government have taken the proper course. The honourable gentleman who has last spoken does not share my belief; he has no faith in his colleagues. If he had, he would have stood by them and supported them, and they in return would have supported him in everything that was reasonable and right, but when three gentlemen out of thirteen insist upon having their own way, regardless of consequences, it reminds me of the obstinate juryman who could not understand why the other eleven jurymen could not agree with him. The honourable gentleman tried to persuade us; failing in that he resigned. I say in taking that course he is doing an injustice to the minority of Manitoba and to the people of Quebec who sympathize with them and doing an injustice to me, and others like me, who have to stand and fight their battles. We are asking nothing but what is fair and right from the people of Canada, and the people will support us in bringing in a bill if need be at the next meeting of Parliament, and when we next appeal to the people you will find the Protestant majority of this country will support the government and return them here, because they did not flinch from doing their duty. We have promised to put a remedial bill through if Manitoba fails to do justice to the Roman Catholic minority and then we will appeal to our people and they will give us the verdict and we will come back again. My time is wearing on and I may not be here another session, but those of you who are here will see it, and if God spares me, I will see this legislation granted next session, and that session is to be held before we go to the country. I say you will see our government come back with a sweeping majority, because the extremists on both sides will be set aside. I would not have said much on this occasion if it had not been stated outside that I had deserted the French Canadians. I have done nothing of the kind; but in dealing with public questions we should forget provincial distinctions and work for the good of the whole Dominion. Wherever there is a wrong we should endeavour to right it, and if we cannot agree upon the best means of doing so, let us not get into a huff: do not let us say because we cannot have our own way against the majority, that we will desert our task. It is a pity to see our friend stepping down from that high position that he held as Minister of Agriculture, leaving his other French friends and the Irish Catholics to fight the battle of the minority in Manitoba without him. There will be very little fighting to be done after all. We have decided to grant remedial legislation if necessary, and we will do it, but the hon. gentleman will not be able to claim any share in the victory, because he has shirked his duty. And now, before I sit down I will say this: since the announcement of the policy of the government was made last Monday, there has not been from any quarter of Canada that I have heard of, a single protest against it. The clergy in my part of the country, I am perfectly convinced, are satisfied. So will the clergy in Quebec and Manitoba be; they do not want us to act hastily. They expect us to look coolly and deliberately into this question and do what is right. I am sorry that my hon. friend has deserted the government. I cannot support him in the stand that he has taken simply because he is a French Canadian. I would not support an Irish Catholic because of his creed and origin. There ought to be an end of those differences of race and creed in this country, especially in the Senate, which is called the Upper House. There should be no such thing as a man differing from another because he is a Protestant or because he is of French or Irish origin.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Where do you leave the Scotch?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—If we were all as cool and worked for the benefit of ourselves as the Scotch do, we would be all right. On all occasions the Scotch are able to take care of themselves, and they do so, and I approve of the course they take. I would not have said so much if it had not been asserted outside that I am untrue to the minority of Manitoba and untrue to the French Canadians of this country. Such is not the case. I have faith in the government and in the conservative party, and I believe that the majority of the people of Canada have faith in them. If they have lost confidence in us they will send us home and other gentlemen can take our places, but that time has not come. This is one of the most important questions that was ever brought before the Parliament of Canada involving, as it does, questions of religion and race. We should be very careful how we handle it and not force legislation through in a day. We have waited five years by the advice of our lamented friend, the late Sir John Thompson, when he was at the head of affairs. We never frowned when he asked us to wait: we always accepted his judgment, and why should not these gentlemen accept the decision of the council of the present Prime Minister? If they do, the minority in Manitoba will get their rights and the people of the other provinces will be satisfied. Of course, there are firebrands in all communities who will be satisfied with nothing. We must pay no attention to them, only fill their places and everything will go right. I have said perhaps too much.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Go on.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It is unnecessary for me to go on. You know the course that I have taken on this question. I have done nothing that I am ashamed of, and I am ready to put myself on record on this question. I have confidence in the company that I am in. I have lived amongst them all my life and in the long run I have got a fair share of my rights. During the thirty years that I have been in public life I have not been working for myself, but for my people. I have never directly or indirectly sought any position or honour that I now hold. I am here an independent member—I am independent in the council of this country, because I am not in receipt of any salary or emolument, and I can take whatever course I think is proper. It does not matter to me whether I hold office or not; I am at the council board simply to give my humble advice and assistance in the public interest, and on every occasion I have represented my people to the best of my ability. In conclusion, let me say that the day is not far distant when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Angers) will be sorry for the course he has taken to-day, and his people will find fault with him. I would not be afraid to go on any platform in the province of Quebec and lay this whole case before them, and get the verdict of the people that the government have acted in an equitable and proper manner under all the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—Before my hon. friend resumes his seat, I should like to call upon him for his views on this proposition: suppose before January that your colleagues from Ontario sooner than submit to remedial legislation, and tax the people of Ontario with a measure of remedial legislation, resign their office, in that case where is your remedial legislation? I do not think it is improbable that you will find that your colleagues in the government will abandon their position rather than submit to remedial legislation, and if they do submit to remedial legislation I question very much whether you would ever see them returned to Parliament again.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—In answer to the question that the hon. gentleman from Toronto has asked me, I will say this, that all men are not of the same character and principles. They study what is best for themselves and for the country they represent. If one gentleman steps out and declares that he is no longer a Minister of the Crown, we will fill his place with another; if one more steps out, there are men at the helm who will be true to their country. The present Prime Minister has the courage and pluck—and his followers will stand by him—to fill up every place made vacant by a dissatisfied man. Those gentlemen took their positions with a feeling and a promise that they would support the Conservative Government, and very few of them will desert it now. I know that the hon. gentleman feels aggrieved at me as very few of my countrymen do. I never did him any harm in my life; on the contrary, to the best of my ability I have done him a kindness. I helped him into this House. I have confidence in the word and the honour and good intention of every man that sits in the council and who has voted on this matter.

Individually and collectively they have pledged themselves to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, and I am quite satisfied that they will fulfil their promise, and that is all that anybody can ask. No Conservative Government would ever face this House again without being prepared to carry out that remedial measure.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHUE—That is no answer to my question.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Your question is so broad it would be very hard to answer it. We will fill up the vacancies and will make good our promise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called I have one or two remarks to make in reply to the explanation given by my hon. friend the late Minister of Agriculture. Before I do so, I must be permitted to express my very great regret at the tone exhibited in the latter portion of his statement. His remarks were I consider personal to myself, and as such I resent them. Without going into particulars in reference to this matter, there has not been, I say for myself, a member of the government with whom I have been on more intimate terms, and with whom I have consulted as freely and given my opinion as frankly as I have to the hon. gentleman. That he should have closed his remarks with the statements which he made in reference to myself and the position I hold in the cabinet of this country was a matter of very great surprise to me, and I can only repeat that I deeply regret it. Until to-day the only material difference that I was aware of that existed between that hon. gentleman and his colleagues was as to the particular mode which should be adopted and the course which should be pursued in connection with the carrying out of the judgment of the privy council and of the remedial order based thereon. My hon. friend was always frank in stating that he had grave doubts as to the propriety of a postponement of the question to another session. He gave his reasons for entertaining those doubts. He has given them to you to-day; but to me and to others of my colleagues those were not considered of sufficient weight to justify him in pursuing the course that he has followed. When he states to the Senate that my course was adopted on account of some outside or other influence, I am at a loss to know what he means by that. I would much rather that he had been frank and stated what he really meant without leaving the impression that my position upon this question was the result of outside pressure.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Allow me to interrupt the hon. gentleman there, because I think he misunderstood me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I hope I did.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—I said that there was no man in the country in a better position to carry the remedial legislation at the present time than himself, and I never in any way wished the House to understand that owing to his position in the cabinet he was unable to do it. On the contrary, I contend he is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend, speaking of my declaration in the speech that I made in the debate upon the address, said it was frank and explicit, but that I had changed my views because I had been "suppressed" by some other power. It may be that he meant something other than the interpretation which I placed upon it. My hon. friend should be more frank. He knows that in all matters affecting the state, and all matters which are of grave importance, there is always, among 13 or 14 gentlemen, a divergence of opinion, and he knows from his long connection with parliamentary usages and practice, and from the great experience that he has had, not only as a minister of the Crown but as a governor of one of the great provinces of this country, that when difficulties and divergencies of opinion arise in a cabinet, there must be some concession on either one side or the other. He should have been more explicit and stated that when differences of opinion arose on this question, the policy adopted by the government was at my suggestion in order to bring together the whole of the elements of the cabinet so that we could come down as one man and state our policy, that when we thought the time had arrived to grant to the minority of the province of Manitoba those rights of which I have always stated, in this House and elsewhere, to my own individual friends and publicly, they had been deprived by the Manitoba legislature. I said also here frankly—and there is no misunderstanding of my position—that per se I am not in favour of separate schools. I stated distinctly that I believe that Manitoba came into this Dominion with the distinct and positive promise, implied, and, as it was believed, incorporated in the constitution of the province, that they should have the right of separate school retained to them for ever in the same manner that they are enjoyed by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; and as such, no matter what my individual opinion may be, as a public man I can consider myself bound—and I will take my party with me as far as I can—to carry out to the fullest possible extent the promises that were made to the minority at confederation, and of which, I repeat, I believe the Manitoba legislature has despoiled them. It is true, as my honourable friend says, that it was through the promises made to the church authorities in the province of Manitoba by the liberal party that they succeeded in turning the conservative party out of power, and that the moment they obtained office through the acceptance of their promises by those whom we are now trying to protect in their rights, they violated their pledge and the minority in Manitoba have been suffering from it ever since. It is not the fault of the conservative party, at least, that they find themselves in the position they occupy to-day. I sympathise, as far as any man can, with the minority on account of the delays which have taken place, but have those delays been the fault of the government? It may be said yes, because you might have and could have disallowed the Act when it was passed. The Privy Council of England have decided, contrary to the opinions of the Supreme Court in Canada, that the legislature of that province had the right to pass that Act, and had we disallowed it, we should have been pursuing a course which my hon friends from Lower Canada have objected to, over and over again. If there are any people in this Dominion who are sensitive as to the interference with provincial autonomy, or provincial rights, it is the population of Quebec. Those representatives of Quebec who helped to frame the constitution, took particular pains to protect the minority in each of the provinces, and who are extremely jealous whenever local rights are interfered with.

My reason, as I have stated already, for asking for this delay, was to place ourselves in a position to prevent the charge being made in the future that we had acted precipitately, and that we had thrust upon the province a system of schools without giving them the opportunity of at least saying whether they would come down one step from the position they had taken in order to relieve the Dominion Parliament from inflicting upon them Dominion legislation which might prove of very great danger to provincial autonomy, and at the same time to the peace of this country. Now was I justified in that? If my hon. friend is to take newspaper statements as being correct or expressing the opinions of the ministers of the Crown, I might quote from the papers of the province of Quebec, unfavourable opinions of himself. I do not know another man who resisted them more vigorously or more determinedly than himself. He has taken his traducers into court, and I am very glad that the courts in the province of Quebec have shown that they will crush, as far as they can, vile attacks made upon public men. I am not responsible for what has appeared in the Citizen of this city, neither am I responsible for what has appeared in the Hamilton Spectator. If he has been a constant reader of the Hamilton Spectator, he must know that although it is a strong Conservative paper, it is one of those journals that has always taken a decided position against interference with Manitoba, particularly upon this question. It is a paper perfectly independent of the government and of any but those who support it. Taking that view of it, I find a letter was written by one of the leaders of the Liberal party—whether with the consent of my hon. friend opposite me and consent of his leader in the House I am not prepared to say—written by the hon. member for L'Islet and published in a Quebec newspaper on this very question. We know if there is one man more than another in the province of Quebec who has expressed more frequent and extreme views upon this question than another, it is Mr. Tarte, the first lieutenant of Mr. Laurier in the Lower House. In dealing with this question he uses this language:

There is not in the whole Canadian following a man of any standing who is not aware that it is impossible under the present state of things to force Manitoba to submit to an educational law adopted by the federal power. Such a law can be enacted. It will not be enforced. It cannot be enforced if Manitoba resists, and unfortunately there can be no doubt as to that resistance.

And then the gentleman, in order to cover, I suppose, this bold declaration, tries to throw the responsibility upon the Tory party. He says :

It was so to speak prepared and organized by the Tory party themselves.

That is, he is holding the Tory party responsible for the legislation of Manitoba. If the Tory party are responsible I am somewhat at a loss to know how and in what way. We find to-day the second lieutenant of the leader of the Liberal party making the declaration that it is impossible to carry out any legislation which may be adopted by this Parliament. Is it to be supposed that he gave utterance to such strong opinions upon that question without the consent of his leader? Is it preparing for a fall? Are they preparing to say to the people that they are not prepared to go as far as the Tory party of which he speaks, and of which unfortunately for the party at one time he was a member, and hence not being able to carry out any act of remedial legislation, you should not attempt it? There is no other inference which can be drawn from that, and when you see the trio—the Honourable Wilfrid Laurier on the right, Joseph Martin in the centre, and Israël Tarte on the left, it is a picture you could hand down to posterity as an evidence of political purity and consistency. However, as they do not belong to my party, I do not envy them their combination. Mr. Tarte then goes on (it is not necessary for me to read it), denouncing in no unmeasured terms the letter which was written and published by Bishop Gravelle. However that is a matter I leave with them.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Is it right to refer to that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, not right to refer to members of the other House. That is a practice that I have been deprecating, but in discussing this question I must refer to the opinions held by those occupying positions in public life and who are anticipating in a very short period the pleasure of occupying the place that we now hold. I point it out to show what the gentleman who is so honest, and who desires so earnestly to obtain this legislation, may expect by defeating those who pledge themselves to carry it out if the province of Manitoba will not. What I object to more particularly in the remarks of my hon. friend is his expression of doubt of the sincerity of those with whom he has been associated for some years. In that respect I have to thank the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. O'Donoghue) for the remarks he made, and I have to say this to him : That if my Ontario colleagues think proper through fear as he says—and I can safely say it is a quality they do not possess—to retire from the government on account of this question, if my health remains, I shall try and fill the positions with gentlemen who hold views on this and other important questions in accordance with my own. The hon. gentleman said further—and it is for this that I thank him—that he doubted whether, if they gave remedial legislation, one of them would ever come back to the House or ever be elected. If that be the case—and probably it is—so much greater is the credit that should be accorded to men who take their political life in their hands, with defeat staring them in the face, and come down to Parliament and declare they will do justice to that hon. gentleman's co-religionists in the Dominion while they have the power to do so. In my letter to my hon. friend expressing regret at receiving his resignation—for no one regretted it more than I did for what I considered to be the extreme course he had taken—I used this language :

All your colleagues being pledged to support a remedial measure, to be introduced by the Government securing the minority of Manitoba the rights and privileges of which the Lords of the Imperial Privy Council declared they had been deprived, should I venture to say, have been accepted by you as a guarantee of their sincerity.

I am sorry to find from his language to-day that he has implied no confidence in these pledges. I say for my colleagues—and I reiterate it for myself—that the pledge that we have given as public men will be carried out if we live and are enabled to do it by the majority in the Parliament of Canada. My hon. friend then spoke of the government of Manitoba not being in a position to deal with the question, as by the constitution it is relegated to the legislature. Manitoba has the same form of government as has the Dominion of Canada; we have under the British constitution that which is called responsible government. No government can enforce a law upon the people of the country without the consent, approval and support of their parliament. But we have this advantage, under our system the government can lay down a policy, they can embody it in an order in council, and promulgate it if they please; they can appeal to the legislature for support, and if they are not sustained they go out of power, and another party comes in who hold views different from theirs. So it is with the province of Manitoba. The government of that province can say to us, "we pledge ourselves, as a government, to propose to our legislature certain measures which will grant to the minority of the province the rights to which they are entitled." What they do say in their answer is that they will not grant the full measure of what they consider to be the demands made by the remedial order which they received. I appeal to every man who conscientiously believes that it is his duty to himself, to his children and his God that he should be enabled to teach his children the religion which he himself professes, whether it would not be better that the Roman Catholic minority should have those concessions made by Manitoba than to have them forced upon the province by the Dominion Parliament. If we are obliged to legislate on the subject, the minority in Manitoba will encounter difficulties, annoyances and obstructions, that will be constantly thrown in the way of carrying it out. I shall now, with the permission of the House, give my views of what I consider the answer of the Manitoba Government is. I want to show that an olive branch has been offered us to accept if we will. The order starts out in this way :

The privileges which, by the said order we are commanded to restore to our Roman Catholic fellow citizens, are substantially the same privileges which they enjoyed previously to the year 1890. Compliance with the terms of the order would restore Catholic separate schools, with no more satisfactory guarantee for their efficiency than existed prior to the said date.

That is an incorrect, improper and forced interpretation put upon the language of the remedial order. In passing that order we included the demands made by the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, but there is no demand in the order in council that that shall be carried out to the letter. I am not going to argue the question whether the schools were efficient or not. My hon. friend from St. Boniface dealt with that question very well a short time ago. But I say this, that the Manitoba government, or the Manitoba legislature, in putting that construction upon the remedial order, went far beyond its meaning. I will say more than that: there is not a Catholic with whom I have had any conversation on the subject who has asked to have separate schools established in that province that would be in any way inferior to the public schools, or what some people call Protestant schools. They are quite willing and anxious to have properly certificated teachers, and to have a proper inspection of those schools; wherever they receive public money they accept the principle that the public should know how that money is expended. While the Parliament of Canada has all the authority to go to the full length of restoring the old system of education which existed in Manitoba prior to 1890, there is nothing to prevent the acceptance of a compromise, nor is there anything to prevent those who are urging the re-establishment of separate schools following a medium course providing it meets the wishes of the Roman Catholic minority in the province. I take it for granted that the Roman Catholics who desire to have separate schools demand, first, the right to establish separate schools; secondly, to be relieved from taxation in support of public schools when they support their own schools; thirdly, to have the power and authority to teach morals and religion, as they understand them, in their schools; and that they shall, in addition to that, receive an equitable proportion of the public funds; and the full management of their schools, is all, I take it, that reasonable men, and the most earnest of them, have ever asked Parliament to go; and that far the government, of which I am the head, are prepared to go, if the Parliament of Canada will sustain us, in case the Manitoba Legislature refuses to grant a fair measure of relief. Now, have they held out any prospects of that kind? Basing their objections to the remedial order upon the grounds that I have indicated, they go on further:

We are, therefore, compelled to state to Your Excellency in Council that we cannot accept the responsibility of carrying into effect the terms of the remedial order.

That is the remedial order, as they say they understand it, being a command to re-establish the schools and everything connected with them as they were prior to 1890. Then it says :

Objections upon principle may be taken to any modification of our educational statutes, which would result in the establishment of more sets of separate schools.

But they waive that question ; they decline to discuss it upon the question of principle as to whether separate schools should exist or not. Then we come to the next part, of which I do not take the same view as my hon. friend, perhaps because I do not feel so strongly on the subject as he does. This portion, he thinks, is an insult to our selves, and an insult to the executive and the government :

We believe that when the remedial order was made, there was not then available to your Excellency in Council full and accurate information as to the working of our former system of schools. We also believe that there was lacking the means of forming a correct judgment as to the effect upon the province of changes in the direction indicated in the order.

Then they add :

Being impressed with this view we respectfully submit that it is not yet too late—

To do what ?

— to make a full and deliberate investigation of the whole subject. Should such a course be adopted, we shall cheerfully assist in affording the most complete information available. An investigation of such a kind would furnish a substantial basis of fact upon which conclusions could be formed with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Now, my hon. friend says that that is an insult—that it implies that the whole order is based upon false premises. It is not a question as to whether we should go into an investigation of the position of the schools prior to 1890. I say, on behalf of my government, we have nothing whatever to do with that. That is not a question for us to decide. What we have to decide is whether the minority have been deprived of any rights, and, if so, whether, under the decision of the Privy Council, we should restore those rights and establish such a system of education in that province as will meet the reasonable requirements of those who demand separate schools, providing against any system which might be called "inefficient." That is the position I take. I would reject, and reject at once, any attempt to appoint a commission. It would be utterly useless ; but I would approach the Manitoba legislature with a declaration that we are willing to discuss this matter, and make the simple proposition "Are you prepared to restore separate schools under such a system as will ensure their efficiency and release their supporters from taxation to support other schools?" I do not believe there is a reasonable supporter of separate schools in this country who would object to a proposition of that kind. I am not defending, or attempting to defend, the Manitoba Legislature or the Manitoba Government, but it must be borne in mind that we are of opinion they took an extreme view on this question. A most unstatesmanlike procedure was the act of the Manitoba Government at the opening of the last session of the legislature, to declare in the governor's speech, before they had received the judgment of the Privy Council in England, and before we had received it here, when all they knew about it was what they had read in the newspapers, to declare point blank that they would not accede to any demands. It was unstatesmanlike and unpatriotic, and showed an ebullition of feeling in this matter that no government, having a proper appreciation of its duty, would have manifested.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Do you expect that they will do otherwise now ?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I cannot say, but I do not propose to put myself in a position to have the leader of the opposition, or the people of the province from which I come—the majority of whom may hold different views on this question from those of my hon. friend who asks the question—to declare "You have forced upon those people a system which they abolished, without first accepting that half promise of consideration." That is my position exactly. I do, however, cherish a hope, though it may not be fulfilled, that Manitoba will, upon reflection, pursue a policy of conciliation. I want to put myself, as a public man, in a position to say to people who do not hold the same views as my hon. friend on this question, that we have exhausted every possible means to induce the Manitoba Government to do justice to the minority before undertaking to force upon them a system that may prove detrimental to the peace and harmony of the people.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The responsibility is on Manitoba.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly it is. I ask for a delay for various reasons. The responsibility is thrown on Manitoba to carry on a system which will benefit educationally, religiously and otherwise, those who desire separate schools. If it is done by the Dominion Parliament, I fear that every obstacle will be thrown in the way of carrying out the law, and lawsuits will arise continually. It will be a bone of contention for years to come, and instead of five years litigation, you will have a much longer period. That is the fear that I have. I hope they may not be realized. If I am wrong, I am like an old friend of mine who once was told that he was always astray in something, and he replied, "Well, if I am, I am honest in it at least."

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to occupy the attention of the Senate for any great length of time. There are only one or two other points to which I desire to refer in order to set the government right upon this question, and to show that there is so little difference between the position taken by my hon. friend and late colleague and ourselves, that it was not sufficient to justify his retirement from the government. I was referring to the answer of the Manitoba government to the remedial order which was forwarded to the Dominion government when the Senate rose at 6 o'clock; I was proceeding to interpret their language in a manner diametrically different from the interpretation put upon it by my late colleague. I was endeavouring to show from the wording of that answer, that there was an indirect offer, at least of consultation, on the part of the Manitoba government with the Dominion government with a view to coming to some terms to avoid the necessity of Dominion legislation and I think the language of the answer justifies the interpretation which I put upon it. They wind up in this manner:

We respectfully suggest to your Excellency in Council that all of the above considerations call most strongly for full and careful deliberation and for such a course of action as will avoid irritating complications.

Now, if that language cannot be construed into a request for a consideration of this grave question, in order in their own language to "avoid irritating complications," I am at a loss to know what interpretation to put upon the language. And then, the last portion of the answer reads:

We beg respectfully to place on record our continued loyalty to Her Gracious Majesty and to the laws which the Parliament of Great Britain has, in its wisdom, seen fit to enact for the good government of Canada.

Now, one of the laws which they have enacted for the good government of Canada is the Confederation Act, which contains a clause to secure the rights of the minority in educational matters that they possessed prior to confederation. They consented and approved of the Act incorporating Manitoba in the Dominion of Canada, and that Act contains a clause which was intended at the time, however imperfectly it may have been worded, to guarantee and secure to the minority of Manitoba—which it must be borne in mind were English and Protestant at the time, and not French—the rights that they had enjoyed. Now, if the people of Manitoba and if the legislature of that province mean what that language implies, I do not think it is asking too much to request us to wait a very few months in order to ascertain from them whether they are prepared to acquiesce in the views expressed by the Lord Chancellor of England in delivering judgment on the 25th January last. These are the principal reasons which induced the government to come to the conclusion that they did in reference to asking Parliament to wait for a short time. I should not have referred to the counter proposition of my hon. friend, which was proposed in council, had he not read it himself. I should have confined myself to the position which the government take and their declaration in this House when the policy of the government was affirmed. Even at the risk of occupying a few moments of time, I intend to read the declaration which I made in the Senate affirming the policy of the government, and I will follow it with the counter proposition made by my hon. friend who has left the government, and ask this House to judge for themselves, where the material difference is between us. There is one difference which I will point out after I have read it, but which I venture to say in the opinion of thinking men, of men who desire to have this grave question settled amicably and without further trouble, is not of so grave a character as to justify a member of the government in sending in his resignation and deserting his colleagues. My declaration was, with the consent of my colleagues (less, of course, my hon. friend), as follows :

I desire to state, that the Government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and, after careful deliberation, has arrived at the following conclusion: Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba Government and legislature; and the Dominion Government is most unwilling to take any action which can be interpreted as forestalling or precluding such a desirable consummation. The Government has also considered the difficulties to be met with in preparing and perfecting legislation on so important and intricate a question during the last hours of the session. The government has, therefore, decided not to ask Parliament to deal with remedial legislation during the present session. A communication will be sent immediately to the Manitoba Government on the subject, with a view to ascertaining whether that government is disposed to make a settlement of the question, which will be reasonably satisfactory to the minority of that province, without making it necessary to call into requisition the powers of the Dominion Parliament. A session of the present Parliament will be called together to meet not later than the first Thursday of January next. If by that time the Manitoba Government fails to make a satisfactory arrangement to remedy the grievance of the minority, the Dominion Government will be prepared, at the next session of Parliament, to be called, as above stated, to introduce and press to a conclusion such legislation as will afford an adequate measure of relief to the said minority, based upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council, and the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895.

It has been interpreted to mean other than the language implies—to mean that if the government of that province will hold out certain inducements that Parliament will not be called together.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—Not be able to proceed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not referring to the speech of my hon. friend; I was referring to the statements made out of doors. My hon. friend says :

“Not be able to proceed.” I will accept that interpretation and endeavour to answer it. The intention of the government is simply this: if the Manitoba Government come to a decision to offer a reasonable measure of relief to the Manitoba minority, and so inform this government, we shall call Parliament together, lay those propositions before the representatives of the people and ask them whether they approve of them or not. That is the position we propose to take, and I deny the statement which is made directly and indirectly that we divest ourselves—I speak of the Parliament of Canada—of one iota of power that we now possess, because all communications, whatever they may be, with the Manitoba Government, will be predicated upon the supposition that they will accede to the reasonable request of the minority, taking good care that any communication of that kind is so worded that they cannot, even by implication, infer that the Parliament of Canada divests itself of the power that it now possesses. Now, what is my hon. friend's counter-proposition?

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Is this counter-proposition dated the same day as the proposition of the government?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This counter-proposition was made in council. Of course we have the Governor General's permission to disclose it. If the argument of my hon. friend be a sufficient reason for leaving the government, then he never should have committed himself to this proposition. It reads thus :

I desire to state that the government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba Government and legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and after careful deliberation has come to the conclusion.

That is the same introduction as the other.

At this late stage of the session, and seeing that so little time has elapsed since the reception of the answer of the legislature of Manitoba to the remedial order of the 21st March, and in view of the complicated nature of the legislation required to restore to the minority of Manitoba their rights to separate schools, the government has determined not to introduce such legislation this present session, but will call a session of this present Parliament during next fall for the purpose of introducing and pressing to a conclusion the necessary legislation to grant relief to the said minority on the lines of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and of the remedial order of the 21st March, if the legislature of Manitoba has not, before that time, taken such steps as to satisfy the minority in that respect, which hope every loyal subject of Her Majesty should entertain before believing that the province of Manitoba would ignore the decision of Her Majesty's Privy Council and the remedial order of the Governor General of Canada, and I wish further to state that the government will transmit to the government of Manitoba a copy of this present declaration made to Parliament.

The House will observe that there is just this difference between the two, that in the proposition of the government we affirm that we will send a communication to the Manitoba government to inquire as to the actual meaning of their answer to the remedial order. My hon. friend says "No, I will not humiliate myself by entering into negotiations with a government that has ignored and," according to his interpretation, "insulted the governor in council by declaring that we did not understand the question when we passed it." I say that is a matter of opinion, and when we are dealing with grave questions of a constitutional character of this kind, it is not well to be too particular in putting a strained interpretation upon any language. But my hon. friend, while he adopts the policy of delay, while he admits the intricacy of legislation of that kind and the difficulty of dealing with it on such short notice, says, this being the case, he is willing to wait and willing to consider the subject in the meantime, but he will not communicate with the government of Manitoba because he does not like them, because he has no confidence in them, because they have insulted him, and because he does not believe they have any intention of doing justice to the minority. He says, "Read this to Parliament, make that your declaration and send them a copy of it." They would get a copy of it the moment it was published in the newspapers. Is that the way to proceed? Suppose England had a difficulty with a foreign government upon some matter and they sent a diplomatic letter, telling them, in the interests of the peace of the world and of good to all countries, it was necessary to take such and such a course, and that the reply was, "Oh, no, if you mean so and so, we cannot comply with your wishes, but we are willing to investigate the question and see if we cannot come to some amicable settlement," would England declare war? Would any statesman, worthy of the name, for one moment say that he would not continue negotiations in order to ascertain what that foreign power really meant? In a small way, we are in precisely the same position. How much greater should our anxiety be to have a thorough understanding on a question of this kind, when we are dealing with one of our own family, one of our own provinces, with whom we desire to live in peace and harmony, as a father should desire to live in peace and harmony with his family? That is my view of the matter. Since the announcement of our policy on this question, I am glad to say we have received letters and telegrams from various parts of the country expressing approval of the moderate course that we have adopted. Since I left this House at six o'clock I received a letter from a professional gentleman in Winnipeg, who writes as follows:

MY DEAR SIR MACKENZIE,—The people here approve of the action of the government, satisfied it is the best course that could be adopted.

That is, not the course of abandoning the declaration we had made to grant to the minority of Manitoba a reasonable amount of relief, but to first appeal to Manitoba and then act afterwards if necessary. I have here a letter, received by one of my colleagues, from a judge in Ontario, and I venture to say that he expresses the opinion of nineteen-twentieths of the liberal-minded men of the province from which I come. The letter is as follows:

Just a line to express my satisfaction with and admiration of the government in this school question.

This gentleman is a Protestant, he continues:

I am voicing the sentiments of judges, bankers, labourers and everyone (Conservatives)—

He puts "Conservatives" in parentheses; he could not expect it from the others, I suppose.

—and every one I met and talked with yesterday—

He is on one of his circuits in the western part of Ontario.

—while travelling about this part of the country, when I say that we never felt prouder of our party. The determination not to interfere with Manitoba so long as there is a chance that she can be got to do what is right, and the determination to make her do it in the end if she will not voluntarily do it herself, meets with general approbation. It is statesmanlike and, above all, just and right. Do not fear the result. You cannot be defeated in the end. This is the general opinion here, and if you go down, it can only be to come back in a few months stronger than ever, for you would be beaten by a pack of howling extremists at opposite goals, who could never hold together.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is the duty of the leader to give us the name of the writer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; it is not my duty. There is no authority for the demand. I will give the name of the writer privately to my hon. friend, but not for publication.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It is an extraordinary letter to come from a judge.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I expected that question to be put to me, but if you will consult the authorities you will find that a member is permitted to read a letter in the House and is not obliged to give the name of the writer. I made the same demand myself in the House of Commons once and was well answered by Mr. Blake. He declined to give me the name. I am satisfied that this writer expresses the opinion of a great majority of the moderate men in Canada. I go further; while he speaks for the Conservative party, I believe he echoes the sentiments of a large number of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario—men who desire to see the people of this country live in peace and harmony together and not grappling with each other's throats every day in the week because they may differ on a particular question of theology, or the best way to serve our Maker. It is time that we should learn to unite together on broad principles in this country, each one enjoying his own opinions without let or hindrance, without interfering with his neighbour. We can afford to live together in peace and make this a great country, but we never can succeed if, because you think differently from me upon a question of this kind, we must rend ourselves apart and quarrel because one happens to be French and another English, or because one worships at one altar and another at another. If that is to be the action of the people of the Dominion—I do not say of the politicians of this country—then good-by to Canada as a happy place in which to dwell. I have again to express my very deep regret at the course that my hon. friend has taken in this matter. I repeat what I said when I made my first short explanation, that I never had the slightest idea but that he was actuated by the purest and most patriotic motives in the course that he has taken, believing that in the course he is pursuing he is acting in the interest of the minority of the province of Manitoba; but I warn the extremists of both parties when dealing with a question of this kind, which appeals to the prejudices and passions of the people, that they must reflect on what is to follow. I ask this House, and I ask the country, to go further than that and consider the grave responsibility that this Parliament is taking on itself when it enacts a measure which it will be compelled in future to put in force and work in the face of opposition from the provincial government. The moderate men of this day, who do not take extreme views upon questions of this kind, will see that we are taking not only the most statesmanlike course, but the best course to be pursued in the interest of Manitoba and of the whole Dominion. My hon. friend has strong views on this question; he may believe that it is his bounden duty to sacrifice the position he holds and all it carries with it—I do not say emoluments, because there is nothing in that, but the honour it gives him and his family—but he must not forget that there are other classes of the community who hold as strong views on the opposite side, and if it is our desire to live in peace, we must learn to respect those who differ from us and approach them in an amicable spirit, dealing with them as we would with brothers. I know the hon. gentleman from St. Boniface has no faith in the Manitoba Government; he does not believe there is any truth or sincerity in them. That may be true, or it may not, but I have come to the conclusion, and the cabinet also has come to the conclusion, that it is better to approach them and deal with them as we would deal with a friendly country, and act afterwards. They may be very bad, but I will quote for him a couplet from a hymn composed by a very good man:

“While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return.”

Probably they will return to their senses and act in accordance with the wishes of my hon. friend. I hope they may and save this country the trouble and annoyance which may result from the adoption of remedial legislation by the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to ask some questions of the hon. gentleman. The first paragraph in the declaration that he made last Monday is as follows :

I desire to state, that the government has had under its consideration the reply of the Manitoba legislature to the remedial order of the 21st March, 1895, and, after careful deliberation has arrived at the following conclusion: Though there may be differences of opinion as to the exact meaning of the reply in question, the government believes that it may be interpreted as holding out some hope of an amicable settlement of the Manitoba school question on the basis of possible action by the Manitoba Government and Legislature.

Does that imply that the government is of opinion that the answer of the Manitoba Government to the remedial order is not a sufficient answer to give jurisdiction to this Parliament in the matter of remedial legislation, or does the Government hold that the refusal of the Manitoba Government, as contained and expressed in the answer to the remedial order, is such as to give jurisdiction to this Parliament in matters of remedial legislation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The first portion of this question is as follows: "Is the government of the opinion that the answer of the Manitoba Government to the remedial order not a sufficient answer to give jurisdiction of this Parliament in matters of remedial legislation?" I do not think that the answer of the Manitoba Government is sufficient to justify us in proceeding without ascertaining exactly what they mean. As to giving us power in the matter of remedial legislation, I do not see that the answer of the Manitoba Legislature denies the right of the Parliament of Canada to deal with this question, because it invites consideration of the matter in order to avoid legislation by the Dominion Parliament, with the hope that an amicable or satisfactory arrangement can be arrived at. The question continues: "Or does the Government hold that the refusal of the Manitoba Government as obtained and expressed in the answer to the remedial order is such as to give jurisdiction to this Parliament in matters of remedial legislation?" I am not sure whether it does or not. I have never looked at it from that standpoint, but this much I do say, we do not consider it denies the right of this Parliament, nor does it admit it other than in the manner in which I have answered.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Does the government consider that this Parliament has now full and complete jurisdiction in matters of remedial legislation?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, most decidedly, and so it will, in my opinion and that of the law officers of the Crown, after we have tried to ascertain from the Manitoba government what they mean by their answer.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Well, taking the answer as it is at present, is the government of opinion that this parliament has complete jurisdiction?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I think the Constitutional Act gives the power to the Dominion Parliament to legislate upon the question of education where a province has violated the terms of the constitution.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—On the refusal to act.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or on the refusal to act, one or the other, because the constitution provides that when a decision is given, that a grievance exists, it is the duty of the federal power to notify the local legislature that has so violated the constitution, that they must afford a remedy, and if they do not do it, then the Parliament of Canada is vested with the power to deal with the question.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But the hon. leader does not mean to say that Parliament is obliged to do so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say so; what I said was, they are vested with the power.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Do the Government consider that the communication they intend to send immediately to the Manitoba Government is simply an act of courtesy extended to the latter, so as to leave no excuse whatever for their course, should they be willing to persist in the course they have taken by their answer to the remedial order?

Hon. Mr. MCKAY—I rise to a point of order. These questions are very important and are being answered off hand, and I think the government should have notice of them. I object to their being put off hand.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The hon. member has no right to raise the question; the only members who have the right to complain are the members of the government themselves. If the government asks for delay it should be granted; but if the government does not ask it, no objection can be made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to answer the questions. If there is any that I cannot answer I will ask for delay. If the hon. member had said that this discussion was not in order, he would have been right. It is a duty that devolves upon the Dominion Government to treat the Manitoba Government as if they were in the most friendly alliance in order to obtain as satisfactory an arrangement as possible.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Is the government willing to answer more questions?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—What is the meaning of the term “reasonably satisfactory” which is to be found in one of the paragraphs of the statement of last Monday? Does it mean that to be reasonably satisfactory, the settlement of the question by the Manitoba government, in case they should undertake such a settlement, will have to be upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and of the remedial order of the 21st March last?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What is the meaning of the term “reasonably satisfactory?” Well, I must confess that I shall have to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from Truro before answering this question, and then I do not know if I could answer if I had a month to do it unless the hon. gentleman could first tell me what would be a reasonably satisfactory arrangement to himself. Then after that, I would have to go and ask my late colleague what would satisfy him. Then I should have to ask my hon. friend from Terrebonne. Perhaps something more reasonable would be acceptable to my hon. friend from Toronto (Sir Frank Smith), provided that his co-religionists were properly looked after. I am sure my hon.

friend must have forgotten that the declaration made by myself in the House would answer this last question of his. “Is it to be upon the lines proposed by the Privy Council and the remedial order?” The declaration made by myself on the part of the government uses those very words.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Not in that paragraph.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, it is in another paragraph.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The objection is that in one case you make use of the word “reasonably” and in the other case, when you speak of the Act of the Federal Government, you say not reasonably but on the lines of the remedial order. If you would say: “in the spirit of the remedial order,” it would answer the purpose.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the one case we say if we do not make an arrangement satisfactory to those interested—that is outside of the pale of the Dominion Parliament—we will settle it upon the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council and the remedial order, and go to such a length as should meet the reasonable expectations of my hon. friend.

THIRD READING.

Bill (82) “An Act respecting the Kingston and Pembroke Railway Company.”—(Mr. MacInnes, Burlington.)

MARKLAND MORTGAGE ACT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (136): “An Act respecting the discharge of a mortgage to Her Majesty known as the Markland mortgage.” He said:—This bill asks power to release a mortgage which has been in existence since 1855. Property was mortgaged in Kingston by one Markland, who was a defaulter, and sold at public auction under a wrong description, the party buying it thinking he was buying a larger quantity of land than there really was. It is on the water front. He paid $500 of a deposit, and afterwards applied, having bought it under a misapprehension, to have the money refunded, he had given a mortgage for about $4,000. The Markland mortgage has been standing upon the records of the department as an asset ever since. The Public Accounts Committee investigated the matter two or three years ago, and recommended to Parliament the cancellation of the mortgage, but it never went beyond that except the adoption of the committee's report, and the Justice Department advised that it was necessary to pass an Act in order to enable the government to dispose of the property.

The motion was agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill (68) "An Act to further amend the Dominion Elections Act." He said: The object of the bill is to leave no doubt as to the date of voting in the united counties of Cariboo and Yale. Prior to union the voting in Cariboo, was at a later date than the general election. This bill provides for the vote being taken in the new constituency at the time of the general voting. The amendments to the bill are all made with that object in view. There are others it affects in the same way, Gaspé and Chicoutimi, and to remove some doubt in reference to the districts of Algoma and Nipissing. The House will remember in the redistribution of seats Nipissing was made a new electoral district. This bill is to remove all doubts as to the voting in those different places.

The motion was agreed to.

MANITOBA ROAD ALLOWANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (114) "An Act to amend the Act respecting road allowance in the Province of Manitoba." He said:—This is simply to remove doubts and place certain road allowances within the power of the Local Government of the North-west Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (96) "An Act to incorporate the International Radial Railway Company" without amendment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved the suspension of the 70th Rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved that the bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Before the bill is read a third time I wish to enter my protest against legislation such as this bill carries out, because it entirely sets aside provincial legislation on the same subject and in these days, when we hear so much about provincial rights and provincial autonomy, I think the objection is worthy of some consideration. There is a very strong feeling existing in Ontario against Sunday traffic on railways and Sunday excursion trains, and it resulted finally, owing to the strong representation made on this subject, in a general Act passed at the last session respecting electric railways, by the provincial legislature prohibiting excursion trains. It was expressly provided that no passenger trains should be run on such railways on Sunday except at certain hours in the morning and in the evening for the conveyance of milk from the country, but they prohibited the carrying of passengers by those trains, thereby of course preventing these Sunday excursion trains running. That bill was passed by a very considerable majority and is now the law in respect to electric radial lines incorporated under the Act in Ontario. In order to set that aside, so far as these railways are concerned, the promoters of this bill come to this parliament and by the aid of that fiction set forth in the clause that "the railway is to the general advantage of Canada," they bring in this Dominion bill to incorporate these roads free from any restrictions as to Sunday traffic, and thereby completely override provincial legislation on the subject. I brought up the matter in the committee, but I am bound to say I did not find very much support, but I wish to relieve my own conscience in regard to the matter by making this protest before the bill passes.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed.

Bill (34) "An Act respecting the Toronto and Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company."—(Mr. Loughheed).

TRANSPORTATION ON THE GREAT LAKES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved :

That in the opinion of the Senate of the Parliament of Canada, it is in the interests of the inland transportation of our great lakes to accept the invitation of the Congress of the United States, and appoint three commissioners to meet three commissioners appointed by the government of the United States, to discuss ways and means whereby ocean vessels may have access to the headwaters of our inland navigation, and the marine fleet of large vessels on our upper lakes can have access to the ocean with the view of cheapening the cost of transportation.

He said : I have brought this motion forward in the interests of our transportation from the west to the east. The province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories and the whole of the great west are dependent entirely upon their prosperity and success on the economy with which they can get their heavy produce to the seaboard. They have to pass down through the lakes and through inland transportation in order to reach foreign markets. I do not know that my resolution will meet with any disfavour from the government because I observe in the House of Commons that a question was asked and the government stated it was their intention to appoint three commissioners when the time came and unless they should express themselves as to the inexpediency of this motion I have no doubt it will meet with the approval of this hon. House, and of the government also. It is quite proper when the Congress of the United States had put upon record a resolution favouring such an international conference that we should have something on record also in order to justify the government and to show our sympathy with the movement that has been inaugurated in the Congress of the United States. One of the first things to which I should like to draw the attention of this House is the falling off in our great marine interests as shown by the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. In 1873 there were 6,783 vessels with a tonnage of 1,073,000 tons on the registered books of the Dominion of Canada. They averaged 160 tons per vessel. In 1893, 20 years afterwards, there are 7,113 vessels with 912,000 tons averaging 126 tons. So that you will see, hon. gentlemen, that the average total of our marine has fallen from 160 tons in 1873 to 126 tons in 1893. There is also further evidence in regard to that. In 1894 the comparative statement of new vessels built and registered in the Dominion of Canada was 490 vessels, 183,000 tons, averaging 380 tons. In 1893 the number of vessels built and constructed was 362, averaging 28,000 tons, the falling off averaging 80 tons, so that there has been a falling off in the construction of vessels in Canada between 1874 and 1893 of over 380 tons average tonnage to 80 tons average tonnage, with about 140 less vessels built and constructed; so that not only has the average tonnage of vessels built and constructed fallen off very largely, but the average tonnage of vessels registered, the total registration of all vessels fallen off in Canada. Now that is the report given to us here by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If that is correct, hon. gentlemen, it is wise for us to consider what is the reason for that falling off in our marine. In a country that possesses such magnificent opportunities for the establishment of a marine, that has always had such magnificent opportunities for the constructing of vessels, that has the necessity for sailors qualified to traverse the ocean and our inland navigation, what is the reason that tremendous falling off has occurred in the past twenty years? The increase in the inland transportation has been enormous in those twenty years, but it has mainly been in the increase of United States shipping, and the increase of United States transportation on our inland lakes has been enormous while ours apparently has, comparatively speaking, stood still notwithstanding the progress of twenty years. Now, hon. gentlemen, we have the best means possible of developing inland transportation, or rather ocean transportation reaching the head waters of our inland transportation, that any country can possibly enjoy, and it is not a singular position that the Congress of the United States has taken in moving this resolution in 1892:

Resolved, that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby requested, to invite negotiations with the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure the speedy improvement of the Welland and St. Lawrence canals and St. Lawrence River, so as to make them conform in depth and navigability, so far as practicable, to the standard adopted by the Government of the United States for the improvements now in progress within the United States of the waters connecting the Great Lakes, and to that end the President is hereby authorized, if he deems expedient, to appoint three commissioners to negotiate on behalf of the United States, with the representatives of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, the terms and conditions of any agreement which may be entered into between the two Governments, in pursuance of any proposition submitted in that behalf by the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, the terms of the resolution submitted to congress authorize the President of the United States to appoint commissioners. What have we to justify such international arrangements? Here we have on one side of the great lakes to the south of us the United States territory, and to the north the territory of Canada. Here the people of the United States cannot reach the seaboard unless they co-operate, or Canada co-operates in order to enable them to provide the facilities to reach the seaboard by the construction and improvement of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, which will enable them to do so. Now, in Europe we have the example of the river Danube and the river Rhine, two large navigable rivers that pass through different countries. They are worked under an international agreement. The international improvements necessary to keep that navigation in the highest state of efficiency is managed by a commission. In the case of the Danube it is managed by two commissions, one representing the European powers and the other representing the state interested in the navigation itself. Therefore we have that example before us in that case to justify such an international arrangement as is called for here by the resolution I propose to put to this hon. House similar in terms to the resolution already adopted by Congress. We have further the arrangement that has been proposed with regard to the building of the Nicaragua canal. That is a canal that foreign countries are interested in, and no doubt when it comes to be constructed in order to shorten the transportation between the Pacific and Atlantic, it will, I have no doubt, come under similar international arrangements between Great Britain and the United States. We have the Manchester ship canal which has been built at the expense of $75,000,000, which is open practically to the world, in consequence of the liberal terms upon which Great Britain conducts not only her ocean but her coasting trade—afraid of no competition is her motto. Then we have again the large canal that has been built by Germany, to shorten the navigation between the Baltic and the ocean, just opened, that I have no doubt is open to the world as well. Then we have the Suez canal, which has altered the geographical features of the world so enormously by its construction, and which is, virtually speaking, under the international code, in consequence of its being open for the benefit of all nations. Now, there are these examples, which justify our government in taking up that question, and co-operating in all friendship with the people of the United States, in order to improve our inland navigation,—in order to give not only ourselves greater facilities for the transport of our produce to the seaboard,—but to show it is not our intention to act in the dog-in-the-manger way, but allow the enormous trade and traffic that the United States are developing to the west and on our inland lakes; that they may have the very best opportunity of reaching the ocean through our waterways, through the ports of Montreal and Quebec, or down Lake Champlain to New York, which will also give us the advantage of the shipping that must concentrate and meet on this route, in order to take outward cargoes and return cargoes, backwards and forwards, to the great advantage of all those who are dependent upon cheap transportation for their prosperity. You understand, hon. gentlemen, the great industries of farming, of mining, of lumbering and everything else, must be benefited by the economy that is gained by the cheapening of transportation; the cheapening of production must result beneficially to those who are industriously engaged in producing wealth for the Dominion of Canada from those sources, and therefore anything that will assist the production in Canada of these great industries which we are capable of promoting should receive the encouragement of Parliament in every possible way if it can be shown that such a policy is likely to produce such a result. Now, hon. gentlemen, at this late hour of the session I do not desire to go into this interesting subject—because it is an interesting subject—at as great length as its importance justifies; but I should like to quote to you some statistics in order to show what change has taken place in our transportation and in the rates, and I will quote from the report of the Department of Railways and Canals some of the statistics that are there contained with regard to the carriage and transport of the produce from the east to the west. At page 252 of the report of the Department of Railways and Canals it is shown that the quantity of barley, grain, oats and wheat which arrived at Montreal by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the period of 12 years is as follows:—In 1882 it was 75,000 tons, in 1887 it was 191,000 tons, in 1893 it was 147,000 tons: 1893 was a year possibly of scarcity and it was not so large. The quantity of the same articles which passed down the whole length of the St. Lawrence canals to Montreal for the same period was in 1882 230,000 tons, in 1886 272,000 tons, 1893 532,000 tons. Now you see, hon. gentlemen, that the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific two great corporations that pass almost across the continent—the Canadian Pacific Railway which does pass across the continent, and the Grand Trunk Railway which passes half way across the continent—carried altogether 147,000 tons in 1893 as against 532,000 tons that were carried by water in our inland transportation, so that you can see, hon. gentlemen, the great importance of the proper development of our inland transportation. Then I will quote you again the quantity of grain that passed down the Welland canal in Canadian vessels to Kingston for 10 years. It is as follows: In 1886, 244 cargoes with 143,000 tons, in 1887, 284 cargoes 178,000 tons, in 1893, 146 cargoes with 148,000 tons. That is the quantity that passed down the Welland canal in Canadian vessels to Kingston. In United States vessels there were in 1884, 117 cargoes with an average quantity of 75,000 tons. In 1893 there were 257 United States cargoes with 328,000 tons. This was largely in excess of former years, and is probably accounted for by the large shipments made to Europe in the fall of 1893, taking every route. You will therefore see the exceedingly large proportion of tonnage that passes down the inland transportation of the United States as compared with Canada. Now the next is the total quantity of freight passing eastward and westward by the Welland and St. Lawrence canals from Lake Erie to Montreal during the 13 years as follows: Eastward to Montreal in 1881 it was 169,000 tons; westward from Montreal 37,000 tons. In 1893 eastward to Montreal it was 508,000 tons, and westward from Montreal it was 16,000 tons. So that you see the enormous discrepancy that exists between the east and west bound traffic. 16,000 tons westward and 508,000 tons eastward. Now the total quantity of freight that passed eastward and westward through the Welland canal to United States ports for a period of thirteen years is as follows: in 1882, 110,000 tons coming eastward; westward 172,000 tons. So you see that there was a greater quantity of American goods going westward than there was coming eastward, that is through the Welland canal. In 1893 there was 384,000 tons coming eastward, and going westward there was 247,000 tons. There it has changed somewhat. In the 508,000 tons that I quoted going eastward to Montreal of course is included the 384,000 tons of American traffic that is here quoted, going from United States ports diverted before reaching Montreal. The following statement shows the aggregate number of vessels and the total quantity of freight passing through the Welland canal and the quantity passing between United States ports from 1867 to 1893 inclusive:— In 1867, 5,405 vessels, 933,000 tons, 458,000 passed from United States ports to United States ports; in 1873 there was 6,425 vessels carrying 1,506,600 tons, 748 tons between United States ports; in 1893, 2,843 vessels carried 1,294,000 tons, 631,000 tons passed from United States ports to United States ports. Now you see that in 1867 there were 5,404 vessels to carry nearly 1,000,000 tons; in 1873, 6,425 vessels to 1,506,000 tons, while in 1893 there was only 2,843 vessels to carry the same tonnage as was carried in 1870 by 7,356 vessels. It is self evident that the size of vessels has increased so largely that the same tonnage is hauled with 2,800 now, as it took 7,500 vessels to haul 20 years previously. On reference to the report made by the railways and canals to the state legislature of New York, I find of a total of tonnage of freight carried by the canals and railways, the state canals carried in 1869, 47 per cent and in 1891, 13 per cent. The quantity of freight carried by the canals and railways was greater in 1892 by five millions of tons than the quantity carried in 1891. The quantities carried were as follows: In 1869, twelve million tons were carried by the railways and canals jointly and the proportion carried by the canals was .4705. In 1892 there were 43 millions of tons carried and the proportion carried by the canals .0982, showing that the canals from Lake Erie to the seaboard were inadequate to compete with the railways. The average freight rates on grain from Chicago to Buffalo were in 1878 3.1 cents per bushel. In 1893 the average freight was 1.6 cents per bushel, so that the freight has fallen exactly one-half in the 15 years between 1878 and 1893, that is in consequence of the larger vessels that now ply between Chicago and Buffalo. With regard to the rates I quote here in 1884 the highest rate for wheat in 1884 was 3 cents, the lowest was 1.6 cents. The average for the season was 2.1 cents that is in 1884. That is the average rate of freight for that season. In 1889 the highest rate for wheat was 3.6 cents and the lowest 2 cents, the average for the season was 2.5 cents. In 1893 the highest rate for wheat was 2½ cents, the lowest 1 cent, average for the season, 1.6 cents. Hon. gentlemen will see, according to these statistics, given to us in our report by the Minister of Railways and Canals, that the rate on wheat has fallen between Chicago and Buffalo from 2.1 to 1.6 or very nearly cut in two. The reason of that low rate is the increased facility for transportation and the increased size of the vessels. The vessels have been increasing year by year. Where they carried 5,000 bushels, and it was thought a large cargo a few years ago, now it has increased to 75,000 and 100,000 bushels. With the increase in the size of the vessels down goes the rate. The result of that increase in the transportation from west to east has necessitated the deepening of the Sault Ste. Marie canal to 20 feet, not only by the United States Government but by our own government as well. Mr. J. J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway, is on record as saying:—

The government engineers propose to give us 20 feet of water. We shall accept the 20 feet and use it when we get it, but I promise you when ever they will guarantee me 18 feet I will build a line of boats that will carry 6,000 tons instead of 3,000 tons which is now the limit, and cut the present rate of lake transportation square in two. There are now 300 large steamers which are land locked and idle half the year. The following statement shows the receipts of grain and seed at Buffalo, elevating and storage rates. In 1870, 32,000,000 bushels, average canal freight 11 cents, elevating 1¼ cents. In 1880, 105,000,000 6.5 cents, elevating 1 cent.

In 1893, the total bushels received was 140,000,000 and the average elevating and storage was 7.8 cents, and canal rates 5.6 cents. So you see with the increase of transportation down come the rates on wheat and the elevating charges. All this is to the advantage of the great producers of these enormous quantities of grain and produce, coal, ore, etc., whatever it may be, all to the encouragement of the production of wealth, and the employment of labour in those industries. If it has been necessary and found advantageous to deepen the Sault Ste. Marie canal, do not the same arguments apply in order to justify the question of deepening our canals to the same depth? Is not the money thrown away in Canada upon the deepening of the canals to twenty feet at the Sault Ste. Marie, if we cannot get beyond the Welland canal with a cargo that draws twenty feet of water? The advantage of deepening the canal at Sault Ste. Marie is only for the purpose of encouraging us to transport in large vessels our grain or produce to Buffalo and thereby find its outlet abroad for export to European markets through the Erie canal by way of the state of New York. That is the only advantage it possesses so far as the deepening of the canal is concerned. There has been a demand in the upper lakes—Superior, Huron and Michigan—for an ever-increasing size of vessels. There are vessels there now that carry 5,000 tons cargo, and there is a large fleet of steamers numbering from 300 to 400, most of them, of course, on the United States side. There is this large fleet of steamers which, if they could get to the seaboard through canals drawing twenty feet of water, would go through to the ocean. These vessels are locked up in the winter time, and idle. They cannot be employed during the winter season. If there was a depth of water to enable them to go out into the ocean, these vessels would increase in size, become ocean-going vessels and be employed during the winter season in ocean transport. Then we would have ocean vessels, if they were so inclined, coming in for a share of our inland transportation and competing with our vessels for the freight and traffic developed in that enormous western country. Now is not that to the advantage of those who are producing in that western country, is it not to the advantage of all those who live on the route of those vessels going up to headwaters? Is it not to the advantage of every portion of Canada that, with our power to export to the markets of the world, these magnificent waterways should be utilized to the utmost for the purpose of importing and transporting abroad? Is not that going to offer tremendous facilities for the growth of Canada on lines that will induce the foreign trade of Canada to increase with the markets of the world? I say every port, commencing with Quebec, or going even further down to the maritime provinces, you have an immense advantage in having pass your own door this immense traffic, that is now an impossibility. You see, by the statistics that I have quoted, that the western bound freight in Canada is down to 16,000 tons, while the inland freight is something like 508,000 tons, most of which is diverted to the south. Most of that 508,000 tons goes to Ogdensburg and United States channels from which there is no benefit so far as our inland transportation is concerned. My object in bringing this question before the House is to point out the advantage that will be derived in every part of Canada through the efforts that may be put forth by an international arrangement to deepen our canals so that we can utilize to the very fullest extent the competition that is continually going on in the ocean vessels, the continual improvements being made in ocean transport for the cheapening and encouraging of commerce, and to take advantage of the facilities that Canada has for joining in the commerce. Just to give you some idea of our canal system I will read you a very valuable contribution by a convention called the Deep Waterway Convention, which has taken up this question from an international standpoint. Mr. O. A. Howland, of Toronto, is the president of this convention, and it has contributed some very valuable literature for the public to digest in connection with it. Mr. Thompson, an alderman, of Toronto, read a valuable paper, in which he gave the following information:—

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—That is, the whole canal system cost that?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. The whole canal system cost something over $50,000,000. The distance from Buffalo to Troy by the Erie canal is 350 miles, and from Troy to New York, 150 miles, or a total from Buffalo to New York of 500 miles. Then by the St. Lawrence, we have from Buffalo or Port Colborne to Dalhousie, 28 miles, from Dalhousie to Kingston, 190 miles, from Kingston to Montreal, 170 miles, from Montreal to Quebec, 160 miles, or a total distance from Buffalo, or its counterpart in Canada, to New York, an ocean port, 500 miles, while to Quebec it is 548 miles or to Montreal only 400 miles. Now, hon. gentlemen will see that Montreal is 140 miles nearer the seaboard from the upper lakes than New York is by the Erie canal, which is almost altogether used now as the ocean port. So the advantages are great when you come to see what facilities we possess to draw down through this magnificent inland navigation the transportation from the west to the east. I will now read to you from the same report the enormous production that exists. The production of corn in those states adjacent to our great lakes is 445,000,000 of bushels. The production of wheat is 246,000,000 of bushels, the production of oats 283,000,000 bushels or a total of 1,000,000,000 of bushels. That is from the states adjacent to our great lakes. Then if you add Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska, which are indirectly connected with Chicago and ports open to our inland transportation, you can add 470,000,000 bushels more of the same articles. Then from Ontario, Manitoba and the North West we have 150,000,000 bushels so that we have altogether tributary to that inland navigation 1,600,000,000 bushels of grain a large portion of which requires transportation. I do not say that all that grain is exported, but an enormous quantity of it in the United States has to go to New York to feed the eastern states. It is that grain which has to feed the large manufacturing population of the New England states and has to be transported by our lake system of navigation which at the present moment finds its outlet by the way of the Erie Canal. It is possible to contribute to the prosperity of the country in the carrying of that enormous amount of produce, by deepening our canals, and then opening the Champlain canal to New York, in order to distribute what produce has to go to feed the northeastern states. That which has to go for export to Europe of course would go down the St. Lawrence and find an outlet that way. That produce which has to go to New York for United States consumption would find its way down the Champlain canal, and any incoming commerce from the south for Canadian consumption would come that way. Eminent engineers have reported upon all these questions, and the Champlain route is a very favourable route. The report of engineers is that it can be deepened to 20 feet—I am speaking now of that canal which takes all our lumber from Ottawa down to Troy—for $50,000,000. The cost of deepening the Erie canal to 20 feet depth would be $250,000,000, according to their report. Then the deepening of the St. Lawrence canal, according to their report, to 20 feet would amount to about $27,000,000 or $30,000,000. Then there is the Welland canal, which would cost to deepen to 20 feet according to the engineer's report about $25,000,000, or altogether an expenditure to connect the upper lakes with both New York and Montreal an expenditure of $100,000,000, or in the case of Canada alone an expenditure of something like $50,000,000 to reach the port of Montreal alone with a vessel drawing 20 feet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a mere bagatelle.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman will realize that when you are discussing the freight and carriage on the production of 1,500,000,000 bushels of grain $50,000,000 capital for the purpose of transporting it does not amount to much. It sounds a great deal to you and me in our limited capacity, but when you have to compare it with the enormous facilities necessary for carrying this freight it is not a bagatelle, but an absolute necessity. The capital has to be there expended in railways whose facilities are not one-fourth the capacity of water power; it has to be expended in steamboats and all kinds of facilities in order to move that traffic, and we must not be frightened at the expense where these necessities are forced upon our attention.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Spend the $50,000,000 on the Hudson Bay route.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is not necessary to bring the Hudson Bay question into discussion at the present moment. I think if you will assist us to deepen these canals you will do a great deal towards keeping the transportation of that western produce in these channels. Competition however we must have. The energy of that western country is not going to be cramped. It will find its outlet in some direction or other. There is the city of Chicago, out of its own resources and capital, building a canal from Chicago to connect with the Mississippi. What for? For the purpose of diverting the trade of that inland country to the Gulf of Mexico. The canal is now under construction and will be, I believe, 172 miles long. They are expending I think $75,000,000 in the construction of it. They have the most improved facilities for moving earth, grading and all kinds of purposes for taking out that canal 20 feet deep to connect Chicago and Lake Michigan with the Mississippi river. If we want to be alive, in order to share in that traffic we do not want to see the trade and produce that I have referred to go in another direction altogether down the Mississippi or through the Erie canal. We want to encourage the carriage of it through this natural channel. It is like living on a highway. You have a farm on a high road or adjacent to a station—is it not in a far better position than when you are 20 or 25 miles away from it? So it is with us. You make this a highway, one side belongs to our neighbours, and one to us. Our neighbours join with us and say that we want to utilize this magnificent channel that is being afforded by nature, that requires these facilities and this expenditure. Shall we put our heads together, and join together, to bring this about? Now, hon. gentlemen, there is another very good and very just reason why this channel of which I am speaking offers unusual facilities because it will take a very small expenditure—I am now speaking comparatively—to deepen the St. Lawrence itself. There are very few places where those improvements are necessary to make it a 20-foot channel. I am now quoting what the engineers themselves say; I am not speaking on any chimerical idea of my own, but simply what eminent engineers say, and we have to take it for what it is worth; but they do say that at a comparatively small expenditure the channel of the river can be deepened to 20 feet, and going down the river there is no necessity for any lockage at all—it is only coming up the river that lockage is necessary. Now, if these improvements can be made, it stands to reason the capacity of the canal is exactly doubled by that means. Where there is large traffic passing east and west, of course the up traffic is hampered by the down traffic. I believe there are a large number of vessels now going down the St. Lawrence heavily loaded. I do not know the number of feet they draw; I think it is 12; but all it requires is the removal of certain obstructions at certain points in order to make the channel the requisite depth; then the very moment you deepen those channels and give this improved waterway, those improved facilities for navigation, then it becomes possible for coal from the maritime provinces to find its way up to the west. At the present moment the power of exporting coal is bounded by Montreal; and why? Because they cannot tranship it and send it up profitably in small cargoes. Where the upper lakes have facilities for large cargoes it is carried 1,000 miles for 25 cents a ton as a return freight. From Buffalo to Duluth coal is carried for 25 cents a ton. If our coal had the same facilities and could be transported for 25 cents or 50 cents a ton look at what a magnificent field it opens up for the utilization of United States coal in Canada. Then, they are talking of building smelting works in Kingston. If they build smelting works in Kingston they will have to find fuel for it, and coal from the maritime provinces could be utilized for smelting purposes if those facilities are afforded. It opens out a magnificent field for speculation as to the development that would take place in Canada if the question was taken seriously. Now, the hon. gentleman has spoken of $50,000,000 as being a bagatelle; well, to Canada it is a large sum. It has taken us a great number of years to spend that $50,000,000. Unfortunately we have not shown that wisdom that has generally been displayed in the question of public works when we started in 1874 to deepen our canals 14 feet. And what is the result? We have deepened some to 14 feet but there are three or four links only 9 feet deep; so that the measure of capacity for transport through our canals is the nine feet under the improvements that have been made to 14 feet and it would take 3 or 4 years yet to deepen all those canals to 14 feet. Now it is an utter waste of capital to spend money to deepen the canals to 14 feet if there is one link in the chain 9 feet which utterly precludes you taking the advantage which you would expect to take from the 14 feet. The Gallops Canal and the Williamsburg Canal, and the Cornwall Canal are 9 feet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are to be deepened.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But you commenced to deepen them in 1874—21 years ago, and instead of proceeding pari passu with the whole thing and making it a 14 feet canal in 10 years, it will be 25 years before you accomplish your purpose. Whatever money you have expended in deepening to the 14 feet, until the rest of it is deepened, it is valueless, comparatively speaking. Now, the object of a commission such as I have been speaking of, such as has been mooted to the Congress of the United States is for us to put our heads together in a friendly way to see what international arrangements can be come to, to see how ways and means can be established in order to provide the capital expenditure, in what proportion they should be divided, and what is the mode and method of managing the canals, after they have been done. I do not think that any selfish idea should prevail on our part. I think we should approach it in a broad, international spirit. We have everything to gain by cultivating the most friendly relations with our neighbours to the south of us, and to say that we are going to help ourselves by not affording them the facilities which their extraordinary energy is bound to find in some direction, is a weak position for us to take. I think that we should approach this question in the broadest spirit and recognize that there is a great advantage in having an international arrangement with regard to this inland transportation. From a military point of view there is everything to gain by our having that. Thank God, there is very little probability of anything happening of a warlike character between us and our neighbours, but still no one can tell what may turn up at any time looking into the future, and if our canals were an international work, then the people of the United States would have the same interest to preserve them and to protect them as we in Canada would. It would be the most disastrous thing that could happen to this country if, through any misunderstanding, trouble should arise, and that our canals should be made the first objective point, in order to retaliate and cripple, but if there is an international arrangement and both parties are equally interested in preserving their neutrality intact and preventing them being destroyed in any shape or form, I say it is a great protection to the capital that is invested and great protection to the industry dependent upon them. Then, again, the friendly spirit that is engendered by an international arrangement of that kind must be considered; it should lead, of course, to a different arrangement in regard to our international laws. There should be freedom of commerce so far as our inland transportation is concerned. We should not be tied down as we are at the present moment on both sides. Our western grain at present can be carried from Port Arthur to Buffalo under navigation laws of the United States. Coal can be carried from Buffalo to Port Arthur under Canadian navigation laws, but the Americans cannot carry from one Canadian port to another and Canadians cannot carry from one United States port to another. I think those distinctions under an international arrangement of this kind should disappear and that competition should prevail equally to the advantage of both countries. Under our navigation laws, under our duties we are hampered; most of our grain for export goes from Port Arthur to Buffalo. One of the reasons is that the vessel which carry the grain from Port Arthur to Buffalo and bring back a return cargo, get rid of the duty on coal. The vessel that carries grain from Port Arthur to Midland and to Owen Sound has to pay the duty on coal for the carriage of that grain. Therefore there is a direct bonus of 60c. a ton on all the coal that is necessary to transport our grain for export: there is a direct bonus on the part of Canada shipping from Port Arthur by way of the Erie canal. Just for the reason that they can take on their coal at Buffalo for their return cargo and pay no duty on coal at all. But exporting from Canadian ports they do pay that duty and I say that that is one of the reasons why our grain in the North-west is now finding its outlet to Europe by way of the Erie canal and New York, competition making lower rates. I say that these questions are of very great importance not only to the North-west but to Canada at large, and it is for the purpose of bringing this question to the attention of the government that I have moved this resolution. It is an international resolution and if it should be considered expedient by the government in any sense or form that I should withdraw it, I should be only too happy to do so, but I think that as the resolution has been passed by Congress, it is not at all out of place and that an expression of opinion of the Senate of Canada in the same direction will be a great advantage to the cause I have been discussing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask one question. I would like to know how the proportion of wheat carried by the Erie canal compares with the proportion carried 20 years ago—I mean the proportion carried by the canal as compared with the portion carried by the railway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not know that I have that exact information.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Has it increased or diminished?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The proportion I think has increased.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Carried by the Erie canal?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes; you mean to say the railways carry more than the canal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The railways now carry a larger percentage of the grain which goes from the west to New York than they did formerly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—All I can say is that the carriage of produce by railways according to the interstate commission is nine mills per ton per mile, and the carriage by water is one mill per ton per mile; so that you can see it is only measured by the facilities the water affords. If the water carries it for one mill per mile, it is bound to go that way if the facilities are afforded.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Not when you have frozen waters.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman said "expedition" was important, but the expedition shows that that has no weight, because vessels will go from Montreal down round Cape Horn and take six months to deliver goods to British Columbia and the ports of the United States rather than send them across the continent in ten days by railways.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what is called standard goods.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am now speaking of the harvest produce we have got, coal, iron ore, and all those things which are standard goods. The computation at the present time is that by the Champlain canal and St. Lawrence canals if they were made 20 feet would cost $1 per ton to carry from New York to Chicago, as against $4.88, the present rate by railway.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I had no idea the hon. gentleman was going to bring on this discussion to-day. I understood him to say yesterday that it would be deferred until next year, in consequence of the lateness of the session and the pressure of other business before us; and therefore I am not prepared to meet his contention in a way satisfactory to myself. This much I will concede, that it would be proper and courteous to accept the invitation of the Congress of the United States, due care being exercised as to the commission that it does not involve great expense. We could well confer with them as to greater facilities for western grain carriage to the ocean. I do not wonder at the United States wanting to get control of our waters. We are in a peculiar, yet prominent, advantageous and commanding position. We have spent 50 or 60 millions upon our inland navigation, and I do not wonder that the United States wish to invite us to enter into some arrangement by which they can have the advantage of our expenditure. Certainly they look at it in that light. We have got the St. Lawrence, and, we have got our canals giving us a highway from the Atlantic to the head of Lake Superior independent of the United States. We had to spend some 25 million dollars on the Sault canal to get an independent waterway. When we had a little civil contention in the west, we were not able to use the Sault canal on the Michigan side, and we were put to the expense of 25 millions to construct a canal on our own side. That is the position that the United States took when they had the opportunity, and now they want us to give them greater facilities to extend their trade through our navigable waters and canals all in their interests and not in our own. My hon. friend is a free trader, and as a free trader he would give away our advantages in everything, demanding no compensation in return. He would tax our farmers for the building of these canals, because it would involve a material increase of taxation upon the country to add 50 millions to our debt to improve our canals, deepen them and the St. Lawrence waters, for the United States, when they will not give us the coasting trade. We are ready to embark with them in their coasting trade, but they will not give it to us! They would like to have the free navigation of our great river and inland waters, but not reciprocity in the coasting trade of even the inland waters. I think long ago, before we became a part of confederation, we were desirous of having reciprocity in the coasting trade with the United States along our sea shores, and it was always declined to us, and they will not open it to us, neither will they give it to us on the lakes; but they would like us to give greater facilities for carrying their produce through our channels and our navigation. That is what the United States wants to do, and with no corresponding benefit to us.

My hon. friend cannot say in the interest of the products of the west, because he showed himself that, with the facilities of railways and the facilities given by increasing the depth of our canals, now the rates have come down as low as they possibly can be. Unless my hon. friend thinks we should embark in inland navigation for nothing, to carry the products west for a nominal sum, we cannot adopt this suggestion. I believe my hon. friend knows that we carry now freight from the west, all our wheat and everything else, as cheaply as it can possibly be carried at a profit, and I do not believe that we would gain anything by the proposed project. We would not get the coasting trade with United States. The only thing we would get would be the advantage the United States would have in our inland waters. That is all the benefit I can see that would be derived from it, because they will not give us their coasting trade. They will not give it to us inland and much less will they give it to us along the coast and therefore I do not see that it is in the interests of Canada, to give greater advantages to the United States than they already possess, and I do not think my hon. friend can show any feasible plan by which we can embark on an expenditure of $50,000,000 to increase our inland navigation chiefly for the benefit and interests of the United States. It would not materially cheapen the cost of transportation, and is not at present necessary to the trade of our western country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should not have made any observations on this question if the hon. gentleman from Shell River had confined himself to the matter of which he had given notice. I think it is a very desirable thing that we should extend to the United States the courtesy of joining with them in a commission to inquire as to the best method of improving the transportation facilities between the east and the west. That would be an act of international courtesy which I think we might very well show to our large neighbours. The hon. gentleman devoted the greater part of his speech to a matter which was germane to that, but one which would hardly be expected to come up on a notice of this kind; and he gave utterance to opinions in the course of that portion of his address with which I cannot concur at all. I feel that to a certain extent it is the duty of members of this House, when propositions are laid down involving very important interests and very great expenditure, with which they do not concur, that they should express their want of concurrence. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman said about the Erie canal, I am satisfied, although I have not the statistics at hand, that the proportion of freight which is carried over the Erie canal has become very much less of late years as compared with what is carried by railways. Notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's statement with regard to the cheapness of water transportation, that goes to show that perhaps the canals would not do such an immense business as he thinks they would, even if they were deepened.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I stated that the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific railway hauled 170,000 tons in 1893, and the canals 532,000 tons in the same year.

Hon. Mr. POWER—From where ?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From the west, delivered in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The country at any rate, as far as I am aware, has received very little revenue from the canals. The hon. gentleman seemed to think $50,000,000 was a mere bagatelle.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the United States finds four-fifths of the money the objection disappears, so far as we are concerned. It is proposed that the United States should bear its proportion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Now the hon. gentleman brought up one point which has been very much dwelt upon at various times since confederation—this question of furnishing a waterway by which ocean-going vessels can reach the head of Lake Superior. It would be a very desirable thing, I have no doubt, if one could load a steamer in Liverpool and bring her up to Duluth or Port Arthur, but with respect to the transportation of grain, even supposing that the canal were enlarged to a capacity of 20 feet, it will be found on the whole more advantageous to tranship grain at Montreal than to carry it through to Europe without transshipment. The navigation through the canals, even if they were deepened, and through the lakes, is of a totally different character from ocean navigation, and the great steamers which are used on the ocean would not find it convenient to ascend through the locks and canals; I think the hon. gentleman said that the cost of transshipping grain at Montreal is not more than  $\frac{1}{2}$  cent a bushel. I am informed by the hon. gentleman on my right—who is an authority on that subject—that the transshipping of the grain en route benefits the grain by airing it, and that it reaches England in better condition when transferred from the barge to the ocean-going vessel than if it did not get the air at all. And I am satisfied that the transshipment at Montreal involves less expense on the whole than carrying the grain from the head of Lake Superior in an ocean-going steamer.

The hon. gentleman gave us the cost of deepening the canals, but I do not think he gave us the cost of deepening the river. The cost of deepening the St. Lawrence River to a depth of twenty feet is an unknown quantity. The hon. gentleman's estimate of the cost of deepening the canals is $50,000,000. I understand he bases his figures on estimates made by engineers. Our experience in constructing canals as well as other public works in this country, is that the actual cost has very largely exceeded the original estimates of engineers. I am not a prophet, and I hope that in this matter there will never be any occasion to see whether my prophesy is correct or not, but I should be prepared to prophesy that the deepening of the river and canals to a depth of twenty feet, from Quebec to Lake Superior, would cost $100,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What do you base your calculation upon ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I base my calculation largely upon what actual work has cost. When the hon. gentleman finds how much it has cost to deepen short canals from 9 feet to 14 feet, he can form some estimate of the enormous expense of deepening all the existing canals to 20 feet and the River St. Lawrence besides. I am satisfied that $100,000,000 would not do the work. The hon. gentleman has not shown that the people in the North-west would get their grain carried to England any cheaper under that system than under the present system. The very trifling expense of transshipping from barges to ocean-going vessels would be more than made up by the additional cost of the steamers, and then there is the improvement of the grain besides. I do not propose to go any further into the question. I simply utter a brief protest, having got as deeply into debt as we have, against going into an enormous additional debt for an advantage which is only very problematical.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We have listened to a very interesting speech from the hon. member from Shell River upon the question of the trade of the country and the deepening of the waterways. I shall confine myself to one remark in reference to the decrease of the registered tonnage of the country. I shall not attempt to deal with the figures given to the House, for two reasons: first, I am not prepared to dispute the accuracy of the figures that he has given, and second, because I have not the figures by me. It should be remembered when we speak of the decrease of the registered tonnage of the country, that it is no indication that the trade of the country is in any way falling off. In fact, my hon. friend proved beyond a doubt, from the figures that he gave us, that the trade of the country has increased and is increasing enormously every year. Ships at the present day are built of iron and steel; formerly they were of wood. One vessel will carry to-day as much as 7 or 8 vessels carried 20 or 25 years ago in the way of freight. Again, at the present day all the Allan line of steamers and other great ocean-going vessels are registered in England instead of Canada. Formerly they were registered in Canada and this has lessened the registered tonnage of ships owned in Canada. There are reasons which I could give why this is done, but I am afraid I should be putting another very strong argument in the hands of my hon. friend here when he next addresses the House against the National Policy. I do not propose to furnish him with any more powder than is necessary for him to ignite upon the next occasion when he addresses the House, but I am sure he will admit the force of what I have said in regard to the apparent decline in the registered tonnage of the country. I may inform the House that it is the intention of the government to act in conjunction with the United States in this matter of investigating the waterways of the country, and the best mode of increasing the facilities for the transportation of grain and other articles from the west by water. It is not proposed here, however, as it is in the United States, to appoint three persons independent of the government. Our proposition will be to take two capable engineers now in the employ of the government so that there will be no expense attending it beyond their allowance for travelling while on duty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the first minister think that that would be courteous to the United States? They are appointing men of a different stamp altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not aware that we have engineers on our staff that are not quite as able to deal with a question of this kind as any independent gentleman that may be appointed in the United States. It does not follow, because the United States thinks it proper to employ other than those upon the staff of engineers, that therefore we should follow their example. I was about to say, when the hon. gentleman interrupted me, that it is proposed to appoint some gentleman other than those who are upon the staff as the third person, but not upon a salary. His expenses will be paid, and he will be treated in the same manner as the Americans treat their commissioners. I hope that will be satisfactory to my hon. friend—two of our most eminent engineers, now in the employ of the Government, and an independent gentleman outside of the government service, who has given attention and study to this question. We have a gentleman in view who will be quite capable of filling that position and quite equal, I think to any gentleman who may be appointed by the United States. With that explanation, I hope my hon. friend will withdraw this motion and not ask the Senate to commit itself to its terms, because it might be considered as not strictly within the rules, that is if the motion would involve an expenditure of money. That would rule it out, but I am not so sure, on reading it the second time, whether it would come within that rule. It is a mere expression of opinion, a suggestion, as it were, to the Government that if they thought proper to appoint this commission the Senate would be in accord with them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am very glad to hear from the hon. leader of the government a reason given for the falling off in the average tonnage and the registered tonnage. It is unfortunate that it does not appear in the statistics, because the figures, without the explanation, are misleading. I am very glad that the falling off is more apparent than real. I quite appreciate what the hon. leader of the government says that it is possible, as this involves a question of expenditure, that it would not be wise for the Senate to deal with it, and therefore, with the permission of the House, I shall be very glad indeed to accede to his request and withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the first minister when he thinks Parliament will be prorogued.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It would give me immense pleasure if I were able to inform the hon. gentleman. It will depend altogether on the action of his friends in the other House. If they continue to waste every day in debating motions of want of confidence, it is impossible to tell when we shall be able to prorogue; but at present, I do not see any prospect of it from the fact that they have been giving time and attention to this House, condemning the government for not having filled up the vacancies in the Senate, and at the same time declaring that the Senate was no use. Now they are making an attack, I believe, on the government because we have allowed some of the governors to remain in office longer than they think it advisable. Next day I anticipate a want of confidence motion with reference to the Manitoba school question—in fact, two want of confidence motions, one on each side—so you may have the pleasure of remaining here until a week from Monday. If the hon. gentleman can induce his friends to cry halt, I will guarantee him that the legitimate business of the House will be put through very rapidly and he can go home and enjoy his own fireside.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman knows, from his own experience, that it is not easy for members of this House to influence members of the other House.

MARKLAND MORTGAGE BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (136) "An Act respecting the discharge of a mortgage to Her Majesty known as the Markland Mortgage."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER— This is a rather unusual power given by this bill to the Finance Minister. It enables him to discharge the mortgage

On payment of such part of the purchase money now remaining unpaid as the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General see expedient in the public interest and either with or without interest and on such other terms and conditions as are agreed upon.

I think Parliament should have some idea as to what the terms are, because under this provision the mortgage might be released upon the payment of $5 and I think there is a large sum due.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. member from Ottawa, when I proposed to give the information which is asked for just now, intimated that he was acquainted with the facts, as was also my hon. friend, who is not now in his place, from Kingston, and therefore they said it was not necessary for me to explain it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I only want to know who is the owner of the property now, and about what amount the government proposes to take off the debt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps I had better read an extract from the report of the Committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency on the 13th March, 1895. It will probably give the information that the hon. gentleman seeks :

On a report dated 4th March, 1895, from the Minister of Finance, stating that on the 20th of January, 1862, the crown sold at auction certain property in the city of Kingston vested in the crown under a certain mortgage given by the Hon. George H. Markland, and dated 9th October, 1858.

That the aggregate amount for which the property was sold was $7,480.00 on account of which the sum of $1,245.75 had been received.

The Minister further states that during the session of 1888 the papers in connection with the Markland mortgage were submitted to the select Standing Committee on Public Accounts who reported to the House (copy of such report annexed) recommending that the mortgage should be discharged and the properties conveyed to the persons entitled thereto without further payment on condition that they give a release of all claims arising from erroneous description of property or otherwise.

That such report was concurred in by the House of Commons, but no further action was taken by Parliament. That offers have been received for the payment of a portion of the unpaid balance of the purchase money in discharge of the claim of the Crown, but he (the minister) has been advised that to effect a compromise requires the authority of Parliament.

It is giving power absolutely to the Finance Minister to settle this long outstanding claim, and obtain as much as he can, or what he thinks is equitable and just. No sum of money is mentioned that is to be received.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The name of the purchaser is not mentioned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The report of the Committee on Public Accounts will give you that :

Your Committee have had under consideration certain papers respecting the Markland mortgage, in the assets of the Dominion which form part of the Consolidated Fund Investment Account, referred to on page XII of the said Public Accounts, under the heading "Sundry Investments"; that it appears from the papers produced that in May, 1893, the Hon. George H. Markland being indebted to the Indian department in the sum of £1782 gave a bond for that amount to the trustees for the Six Nation Indians, and in October, 1858, gave a mortgage to the crown on certain properties in the city of Kingston to secure the same amount and in 1862 conveyed to the crown his equity of redemption.

In fact, it is a mortgage given by Markland to cover a deficit of his while he was trustee for the Six Nation Indians. The mortgage has been standing since 1858, and is considered a worthless asset, and it is thought better to get as much out of it as possible and wipe it out.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON, from the Committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (68) "An Act further to amend the Dominion Elections Act."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This bill is simply to correct an error which at present appears in the election law. In the redistribution of the constituencies in British Columbia, Yale and Cariboo were united. Under the old law the election in Cariboo was fixed at a later date than the elections in the other portions of the province. There is no provision, however, made for the addition which has been put to it of Yale. It has been thought, with the present facilities for reaching the different sections of that portion of British Columbia, that it might be placed among the other constituencies where the elections are held on the same day, so that the election for the united electoral district of Yale and Cariboo will be held simultaneously with the other elections. Provision is also made for the nomination and polling days in Gaspé, Chicoutimi and Saguenay. Another clause provides that the Act shall take effect only upon the dissolution of the present Parliament. That is necessary in case there should be a by-election in the electoral district of Cariboo or Yale.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

ROAD ALLOWANCES IN MANITOBA BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole on Bill (114) "An Act to amend the Act respecting roads and road allowances in the province of Manitoba."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I explained to the House last night the purport of this bill. It simply transfers certain road allowances which are now the property of the Dominion where they have been laid out in those sections of the country where the land belongs to the Dominion, instead of to the province and it has been thought better that these road allowances should be transferred to the local government and placed under the management of the municipalities of that province rather than have them under our purview and to be looked after and managed by us. That is really the whole purport of the bill, excepting one clause transferring certain lands in Winnipeg which are now the property of the Dominion to the city of Winnipeg, and giving power also for the closing of roads on the lands transferred and the opening up of colonization roads, and when these roads are opened in the colonization portions of the territory, they are to be transferred to the province and not retained by this government. The province or the municipalities under those circumstances could have to maintain them. The last clause provides that nothing in this Act shall affect any right or claim set up in any action now pending in a court of competent jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Why are the two clauses 4 and 5 almost identical.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—One transfers to the government those trails and roads which have been reported upon; the other refers to trails, roads and bridges which may be reported upon, thereby giving the power to transfer the whole of those trails and roads to the city and to the province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.), from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

SUPERANNUATION OF JUDGES BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (129) "An Act to amend the law respecting the superannuation of Judges of Provincial Courts."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading for to-morrow. He said: This bill provides that the vice-Admiralty and Marine Courts of Ontario shall be deemed Superior Courts in order to bring them within the technical meaning of the law as it stands upon the statute-book at present. There is some doubt as to their status, although it was always intended they should have the same rights and privileges as other judges.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 15th July, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE VACANCY IN THE CABINET.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) rose to

Call attention to the vacancy in the Cabinet, and to inquire of the Premier if it is the intention to fill up the vacancy by appointing a representative from British Columbia?

He said:—It is less than a month ago since we had the subject of representation of British Columbia in the Cabinet discussed in this Chamber, and it will be remembered that the First Minister, in reply to my hon. colleague and myself, gave as his reason for having no such representative in the Government, that there was no vacancy in the Cabinet and no vacancy could be created unless one of his colleagues was turned out. Doubtless when he made that reply he had no idea that it would be only a very few days until, owing to the policy of drift and shilly-shallying that he has pursued, no less than three vacancies occurred in his Cabinet. It is true that two of the seceding members of his Cabinet have returned to the fold, but one of the three has absolutely refused to be lured back by any childish nursery promises of another session and remedial legislation which even the First Minister himself, I believe, must know will result in utter failure and when he must know that those promises and pledges cannot be fulfilled. The course of the ex-Minister of Agriculture must commend itself, I submit, to every unbiassed mind in the land, however much one may differ from him in his views on the question that led to his resignation. Once having resigned, honour and dignity forbade him return and he deserves credit for having refused to return to that discordant and unsavoury combination that he has left. Probably I shall be told that the present vacancy in the Cabinet is a Quebec one, and that it is to be filled by a gentleman from that province. Here I would remind hon. gentlemen of what the First Minister said a few days ago, when he spoke with reference to the selection of Cabinet Ministers. He stated that he hoped the day was near at hand when provincial distinctions would be entirely overlooked or ignored in the selection of Cabinet Ministers, and that other qualifications would be regarded. The qualification that he emphasized was the amount of party service rendered by gentlemen to entitle them to positions in the Cabinet. I submit, and the hon. Premier and every hon. gentleman in this House must know, that, unfortunately, for the best interests of British Columbia, her representatives in Parliament have been most faithful and even slavish supporters of the policy of the present government, and if party services are to be taken as the best qualification for a Cabinet position, according to the First Minister's doctrine laid down a short time ago, then I claim that no representatives from any portion of this Dominion are better qualified than the members from British Columbia other than my two colleagues here and myself. I shall not, at the present time, enter into details showing that British Columbia is entitled to representation in the Cabinet. That has already been done on more than one occasion during the present session of Parliament. I content myself by saying that British Columbia has at the present time a larger population than the island province in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; that she contributes to the Dominion treasury more than eight times the amount that that province does, and contributes more than the province of New Brunswick, or the province of Nova Scotia—in fact, that she stands third among the provinces of this confederation in her contributions to the revenue. Notwithstanding that, the little island province has had no less than three representatives in the Cabinet since she became a member of the confederation about twenty-two years ago. During the Mackenzie regime the Hon. Mr. Laird was her representative in the Cabinet. During the Macdonald regime the late Hon. Mr. Pope occupied a position for many years, and now we have the Hon. Mr. Ferguson in the Bowell Cabinet. More than half the time since that province became a member of confederation she has had a representative in the Cabinet. The province from which I have the honour to come is an older member of the confederation than the province of Prince Edward Island, and never yet has she had that common justice done to her to have a representative in the Cabinet. The province of Nova Scotia has had continuously since confederation two representatives in the Cabinet; New Brunswick has almost continuously been represented by two representatives in the Cabinet; Manitoba, I am happy to say, of late has had a representative; so had the North-west Territories for a short time. I do not grudge Prince Edward Island her representative; I think it is only right and proper she should have one, but I am forced to make the comparison that I have just stated, and say that if she is entitled to a representative in the Cabinet, British Columbia has much stronger and greater claims to such representation. The area of the Pacific province is eight times as great as that of the combined area of the three Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It is all rocks.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Those rocks are not barren rocks; they contain precious metals that probably may be more valuable to this country than broad acres of fertile land.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In the sweet by and by.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—She has twice the area of the province of Quebec and double the area of Ontario, and she has four times that of the province of Manitoba. Moreover, British Columbia is thousands of miles distant from the seat of government, which of itself makes it necessary that she should at all times have a representative here to look after her vast and varied interests. That ought to weigh and weigh very considerably, with the Premier in giving her a representative in the government. The Dominion has about three and a half million square miles, and of all that enormous area, only one-seventh is represented in the Cabinet at the present time. I submit that that is an injustice which should be rectified at as early a day as possible. Let the Government for once give a measure of justice to the Pacific province by filling the vacancy with one of our representatives. Rest assured, hon. gentlemen, that that province will not remain pacific unless her interests are respected in the direction that I have indicated. Of the seven provinces comprising this Dominion, she is the only province for whom the Government has persistently refused to do anything like justice in giving representation in the Cabinet. Why this state of affairs should continue I am unable to understand, but I hope that even at this late hour the Government will take one of our representatives into Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I supposed I may be expected to say a few words on this subject, the matter having been brought to the attention of the House and the Government on this occasion, but my motto is—and I think it is a correct one—that having once dealt with a subject I have nothing more to do with it for the session. I have done my duty to the House and to the country, and I think the House will agree with me in that. I am glad this matter has come up for this reason; it gives me the opportunity of saying that I regret exceedingly Mr. Angers's withdrawal from the Cabinet. He has always been a gentleman who has been courteous to members of the Senate, and we will regret that he is not in his former position. I regret still more the step he has taken, because I do not think it has been a wise one for himself or in the interest of the country. He has not been quite patriotic. He has allowed other than public considerations to influence his judgment. I think the step he has taken is not conducive to the harmony and future peace of the country. It may strengthen the hands of fanatics who fan the flames of discord in this country. My hon. colleague who has asked this question and myself have been in harmony on two subjects this session; on this question of representation in the Cabinet, and on the British Columbia Penitentiary matter. On this occasion the hon. gentleman did not consult me; there is no reason why he should. We have not consulted on any of those questions, but we happened to be in harmony on the two subjects which I have mentioned. I regret that he has brought forward this matter now, because I should not have alluded to it. I think this is not the right time or place to mention a matter which is now occupying the attention of the Premier, who promises to give it his consideration and there I am willing to leave it. With regard to the subject itself, I think I can see in the face of the hon. Premier a great deal of anxiety to answer this question in the affirmative. I think I can see that beaming on the hon. minister's face. Perhaps he will excuse me on this occasion if I take him into my confidence and advise him not to reply in the affirmative, but to wait patiently for the happy time in the future to which he looks forward when provincial boundaries shall be obliterated so far as appointments to cabinet positions are concerned, and men shall be taken into the Government solely because they are fit for the position. I ask him to wait until those times and not do anything hasty now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman who has put this question will, when he has the honour of being sworn of the Privy Council, learn that he must take a solemn oath not to divulge any of the advice which he may deem it his duty, in the interest of the country, to give to His Excellency. Just as soon as I have made up my mind as to the party whom I shall recommend to His Excellency to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of the late Minister of Agriculture, and His Excellency has approved of the choice, I shall have very great pleasure in disclosing the name for the information of the hon. gentleman and of the public generally. Under the circumstances, he will see that his question is highly improper and could not be answered. I do not propose to comment on the flippant manner in which he spoke of the position of the government—its “shilly-shallying,” its “childish and nursery promises” or that “discordant and unsavoury character” which he says pervades the Cabinet of the Dominion. What he means by that last expression I will leave to him to explain. I can only account for the use of such language from the fact that he has been in the habit of smelling the rotten fish on the shores of the Fraser River, and his familiarity with that odour has suggested the expression that he has used. Having said that much, I desire to call attention to a misapprehension which appears to have arisen with regard to some remarks that I made the other day, when I jocularly said that I should be delighted, “and so should my hon. friend from Victoria when he gets on this side of the House and has his friends in British Columbia, etc.” When I used the words “my hon. friend from Victoria” I had no reference whatever to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The party to whom I referred was the Senator, who as I supposed represented New Westminster. I find, however, in looking over the list of Senators that that hon. gentleman claims to be the representative from Victoria. My own impression was that the Hon. William John Macdonald was the Senator from Victoria, and the Hon. Thomas R. McInnes the representative from New Westminster, and they have been so designated in the past. In future I shall be more careful when I refer to either of these gentlemen them to use the word in such way that there can be no possible mistake, because I had no intention of insinuating that the hon. gentleman from Victoria, who, I supposed meant the Hon. Mr. Macdonald, had any such intention as the remark would indicate, nor did I intend the facetious remarks to apply to him. I makethis explanation in justice to that hon. gentleman, because I know a misapprehension exists in the minds of some on that point. I do not know how the parchment that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) holds describes his residence or whether any particular section of country is designated. This is a matter which should be inquired into in order that there may be no mistake when Senators address each other in future as to whom they really mean. I wish it to be distinctly understood that when I refer to the hon. gentleman Mr. McInnes, I shall designate him as the hon. gentleman from New Westminster.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I live in Victoria at present and have lived there for five or six years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman was not in Victoria when he was appointed.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There are no senatorial divisions in our province.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are five or six Senators who live in Toronto, and they never arrogate to themselves the right to be designated "the Senator from Toronto."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman's explanation. If he had spoken of me, I should have treated the remark as a jest, for it is well known that during the 17 years that I have been in this House I have been a steady supporter of the Conservative Government and of the National Policy and I shall continue to support them until I find a better party with a better policy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When I used the expression it was in sarcasm, because I can never contemplate the day when the hon. gentleman shall cross the floor and take our place.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (130) "An Act further to amend the Civil Service Act."

He said: There are not many changes in the proposed bill. The principal changes made by this measure are to simplify the law and in the line of economy in the future. They provide for the abolition of what are termed third class clerkships and the adoption of the system which prevails in England in the different departments, more particularly in those large departments that require a great number of writers. Instead of placing clerks in the third class upon the permanent list, they will employ what are known as writers. The complaint has been in the past—and I think the complaint is well founded—that having too many on the permanent Civil Service list, with the present law in force giving them an annual increment of $50 per annum increases the expenditure of the Civil Service to an extent that is unjustifiable. Hence we propose in this bill to adopt the English system. When a writer is found to be adapted to the work which he has to perform and a vacancy occurs in the second class clerkships, then he can be appointed to the position of a second class clerk, and the salary fixed for the second class is $800 to begin with, instead of $1,100. Having been placed on the permanent list, the annual increment will apply to him as it does to the civil servant at present until he reaches the maximum. The subsequent clauses of the bill are simply changes in order to make the balance of the Act comply with the repeal of the section which gives the power to appoint third class clerks. This is about the principle of the bill. My own impression is that it will result in the long run in a great saving to the country. When the young men or women who are employed can do better than being only writers, they will occupy the same position as a lawyer's clerk, or as an employee in any office or mercantile establishment. Those writers can at any time leave and enter into any other vocations of life for which they think they are fitted and where they can do better, but where they commence as civil servants with $400 per annum they look upon it as a permanency for life and scarcely ever attempt to go outside or enter into other business, but take their chances of promotion as opportunities present themselves and have their increase in salary until it reaches a certain sum. On the whole the principle is one of which I have personally been in favour for some years, and I think it will benefit the service as well as the country.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I am very sorry to see this amendment of the Civil Service Act. I regret also that the Government have not seen their way clear to make more comprehensive changes in the law relating to the Civil Service; moreover, this amendment has a tendency to relax the provisions of the present Act. I have taken a very great interest in the service ever since I was a commissioner for the Government. I am aware that the subject of Civil Service reform is not very acceptable to the majority of the members of Parliament, but I thought a brief résumé of the efforts and attempts which have been made from time to time to introduce the merit system into the Civil Service of Canada might have the effect of awakening a greater interest in a subject which, in my opinion, is of vital importance. We have a most remarkable example of the effect of the merit system on the Civil Service of Great Britain. In 1855 the merit system was adopted in that country. Up to that period the service was a most defective one. It has since been gradually extended and improved to the present time, and the service is now a model of excellence. Other nations are following the example of Great Britain. The United States are adopting it and extending it to various departments of their service. Two commissions have been appointed for the reform of our own service. The first was appointed in 1881, and the second in 1891. It may be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that grave irregularities were discovered in the inside service, which led to the appointment of the commission of 1891. I drew attention to these irregularities by notice of motion, and I think it will not be uninteresting to the House if I read what took place on that occasion. This is the notice of motion which I presented to the House at that time.

Whether in view of the irregularities and violations of the "Civil Service Act" recently discovered, it is the intention of the Government to institute an investigation by commission or otherwise, as may be deemed expedient to serve the better administration of the Civil Service, and prevent the recurrence of similar irregularities to those which have been lately brought under the notice of Parliament.

Speaking on this motion I said: The problem to be solved, then, is how to secure the better administration of the service and to prevent a recurrence of similar irregularities and to increase its efficiency. It may be of some interest to the House, if I refer to the various attempts which have been made since Confederation to improve the organization, efficiency and general administration of the service. An Act was passed in 1868 and a commission appointed, which submitted a scheme for the reorganization of the service, but it was never fully carried out, as the Act did not contain the necessary clauses under which the rules recommended could be enforced. In 1875 a bill was introduced by the Government, which, however, did not become law. In 1877 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the conditions of the service, but no legislation resulted, and the service continued to be administered under this Act of 1868 until 1882, when the Civil Service Act of that year was passed and is the Act under which the service is at present administered. A commission was appointed under an Order in Council dated 16th June, 1880. I was a member of that commission and had the honour of being its chairman, and Mr. Griffin, the present Librarian of Parliament its secretary. The commission issued its report in March, 1881. The recommendations made in that report were not fully carried out or adopted. We recommended the abolition of political patronage; open and competitive examination, promotion by merit, and the appointment of a permanent civil service commission; but these views were then believed to be in advance of public opinion either in or out of Parliament; but I believe the provisions of the Act of 1882 were at the time abreast of public opinion. The Hon. Sir Alexander Campbell, the then Minister of Justice, leader of the Senate, in introducing the bill, said:

In this particular instance, one or two points which the commissioners considered of great importance (and I agree with them as to their importance) have been for a time, and I hope only for a time, as the Government and the other House have considered, at the moment such as, considering all the circumstances, we can reasonably or with advantage to the country seek to give effect to. One of the cardinal points in the commissioner's report is that the Civil Service ought to be taken out of the hands of the Government and Parliament and placed in the complete control of a body of commissioners appointed by the Crown, and holding office during good behavior, which is the case, I believe, in England, Belgium, France and other European countries.

Sir Alexander Campbell was under the misapprehension that our recommendation was to take the control out of the hands of the government and parliament. Our recommendations were based on what we found to be the case in other countries. When I addressed the House on the same occasion, I said :

The bill now before us, and which has been so clearly explained by the leader of the House, must be considered as an instalment in the direction of civil service reform. The hon. Minister of Justice has correctly stated that it has not gone the length of the recommendations made by the commissioners of which I had the honour of being chairman.

Amendments were afterwards made in the Act which did not advance or improve its provisions. The irregularities and violations of the Act which have taken place are evidence of the defects of the present system and organization ; and that it has become necessary to take such steps as will prevent their recurrence. What these steps will be is the problem. It may be instructive to take a glance at the civil service system of other countries which are known to furnish examples of excellence and thoroughness. The civil service of Great Britain furnishes such an example. Until the appointment of the commission composed of Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Charles Trevelyan it was most defective, as ours is at the present time ; but leading men of both sides of politics united in an effort to bring about a reform, and for that purpose the two statesmen I have named, who were on opposite sides of politics, were appointed. The cardinal points of their recommendations were : The abolition of political patronage ; open and competitive examinations ; promotion by merit, and the appointment of a civil service commission. To this commission is deputed, under certain restrictions, the control of all appointments to the Civil Service. These recommendations were adopted and the Civil Service of Great Britain is governed by the rules and regulations recommended by them, and from having been a defective Civil Service has become one of great excellence, furnishing an example to other countries. The civil service of the United States is being modelled on the English system, and of late years has been vastly improved. Their post office department, for example, is a model of excellence. It is within my own recollection when it was a notoriously defective service, but since the adoption of a permanent service commission by which all appointments are made to it, the service has become a model of excellence. The civil service of France and Germany might be cited also as examples. It is my opinion, therefore, that the want of a permanent civil service commission is the cardinal defect in our system, and that the problem would be solved by the appointment of a permanent civil service commission, composed of men selected from both politic parties, to whom would be deputed, under certain restrictions, the control of all appointments to the service, and who would frame rules and regulations from time to time as the needs of the service required and to make annual or semi-annual reports to parliament, as to the condition of all branches of the service, both inside and outside. Should the government deem it necessary to appoint a commission to make a full and painstaking inquiry into the present condition of both the inside and outside services, I would suggest that the members composing that commission should be selected from the best men on both sides of politics, so that whatever recommendations the commission might make would have greater weight and inspire more confidence in the public mind. I have always been of opinion that there should be no politics in appointments to the civil service—that all appointments should be made without reference to politics.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How could the commissioners free themselves from being political ?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That would depend upon the men appointed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who would appoint them ?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Parliament.

There is, I believe, a consensus of opinion, both in England and the United States, amongst those who have made the question a study, in favour of the abolition of political influence in the civil service. I trust, hon. gentlemen, and I have confidence that the government of the Premier, who is also our leader in this House, will adopt such measures for the improvement of the civil service of this Dominion as will make the service an example for other countries to follow.

I will now read you a few extracts from Sir John Abbott's speech in reply to my inquiry :

The question which my hon. friend has proposed is one of vital importance at any time, and is of all the greater interest now, in consequence of the lamentable circumstances which have been disclosed in the committees of both Houses with reference to irregularities and worse than irregularities, in the civil service in the management of public funds.

Of course the attention of the government has been forcibly called to the subject, and it has been felt to be necessary to come to some conclusion as to a mode of remedying these evils, and of preventing their recurrence if possible. They have been more particularly occupied in the meantime, in punishing the delinquents, wherever guilt has been brought home in such a way that no further investigation for that purpose is needed. And, while we are all engaged on both sides in both Houses in investigating and ascertaining to what extent, and in what particulars, dishonest conduct, irregularities and speculation have prevailed in connection with the public service, I hope, in so far as the power lies with us, we shall not be found wanting, as those investigations proceed, in punishing properly those who are found to have offended. But besides doing that I hope we shall be able to adopt a system under which those improprieties although perhaps not absolutely preventable, since human nature must always be human nature, may be reduced to a minimum and checked with greater facility than under the present system.

My hon. friend's question, as I understand it, is directed more to that point; and the attention of the government has been directed largely to the point. Of course, the organization of the Civil Service which must obviously be considered to be defective, since it has resulted in such unfortunate circumstances must be taken up as a whole. It is quite impossible for the government sitting as a Council and dealing through its various departments with all the business of the country, to devote of themselves the requisite time and consideration towards a through study of the system and the construction of a complete plan of reorganization, and they have determined that so soon as the session is over—of course, it would be useless to attempt it during the session—to appoint a royal commission for the purpose. And it is the intention of this government that such a commission shall be so composed as to possess the experience and knowledge necessary for the advantageous exercises of its important functions. For instance, it would probably be composed of three persons, one of whom, it is hoped, we shall be able to select from the Civil Service itself, whose position before the country will be such as will place him practically beyond the suspicion of partizan control; another probably having a judicial character, and a third, probably from among persons having an experience outside of politics, in the management of large numbers of people—a gentleman if possible, who will not have engaged in politics, and will be free from any imputation of partiality on that score; though I do not see why partiality should exist in a matter in which both parties are equally interested. But, if practically, a person will be selected who is independent of politics and party; and who will have had a large experience in the management of men in a business way. I venture to suggest as my view with regard to the business of the country that probably one of our greatest defects hitherto has been, that the public business has not been sufficiently regarded and treated as the business of a private individual would be. If it were possible and I see no reason to doubt that it is possible, the business of the country should be conducted with the same regularity, its servants should work with the same diligence and its business should be carried on the same principle as in the conduct of the business of an individual. I see no reason why that should not; and I know this, that my efforts will be directed towards the adoption of a system in which the business of the country will be conducted on business principles. It will be my ambition so to do my part of the work of the country while I happen to remain here I am, as to have it regulated, by such principles as these; and I hope by the appointment of a commission, such as I have described, we shall be furnished with a description of a system which will enable us to carry on the work of the country on such principles; and I hope that we shall be able to do so by such means and in such a manner that we shall be spared such unfortunate developments as have occurred during the present session.

He winds up in this way:

If we shall succeed in obtaining from the commission we propose to appoint a sensible and practical scheme for conducting the business of the departments, we have in contemplation the appointment of a person who shall occupy a position similar to that of the Auditor General—that is to say, independent to a large degree of the government or of party.

On pursuance of the promise of Sir John Abbott, a commission was appointed and their report—and it was a very able report—was made to Parliament shortly afterwards. It is very much on the same lines as the report of the commission of which I have had the honour to be a member. I will trouble the House by reading a few extracts from the commissioners' report.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will first give us the names of the commissioners who were appointed.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—Mr. George Hague, President of the Merchants' Bank in Montreal, Mr. George W. Burbridge, who is now judge of the Exchequer Court, Mr. E. J. Barbeau, and Mr. J. M. Courtney, the Deputy Minister of Finance. That was in 1891. I will read a few extracts from their report to show what their recommendations were so that hon. gentlemen may be made acquainted with their views. It says:

In 1880 a second commission was appointed to investigate the same subject, and in their report the commissioners recommended the adoption of the essential principles of open competitive examinations and promotion by merit as an effectual remedy for all the important defects of the system then in vogue. Following this report a new Civil Service Act was passed in 1882 which provided for examinations to test the qualification of candidates for positions in the public service, and also for examinations of candidates for promotion. This Act, although not going so far in its provisions as was recommended by the commission, has been amended year by year, with one exception, from the time of its being first placed on the statute-book until the year 1889, and so far as the commission had been able to observe, the amendments in general have tended in the direction of the relaxation of the provisions of the original Act, and the consequent prevention of its intention from being carried out.

It seems proper at this point to refer to the experience of the motherland in regard to the civil service, it being found by experience that the same difficulties which have attended the working of the civil service of Canada have been developed there also. Consequent upon the report of a commission appointed in 1853, recommending the adoption of the principle of open competition as founded upon the principles of justice and favourable to the education of the people, a new system was introduced in 1855 by the appointment of the civil service commission of the United Kingdom, consisting of three, of whom one (the chairman) is a Privy Councillor, appointed during pleasure, and upon this commission were conferred large powers in respect to the examination of candidates to the civil service. Only limited competition was at first introduced, as moderate changes were thought most prudent. After five years, experience of the new order of things a parliamentary investigation into the new system was held in 1860, and the report of that body approved the appointment of the civil service commission, and advised the steady advance towards open competition, a principle which was ultimately adopted in 1870. In the parliamentary and executive investigation of 1873 and 1874, the principle was again approved and its operation extended. The executive commission of 1874, otherwise known as the "Playfair Commission," from the name of its chairman, Sir Lyon Playfair, lasted for several years and had three separate reports. In 1886 another commission was appointed to inquire into the establishment of the different offices of state. The first and second reports of 1887 and 1888 have proved of benefit to your commissioners in their inquiry.

The value of the English system under open competition has been dwelt on fully in an able and exhaustive work on civil service in Great Britain by the Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, first commissioner of the civil service of the neighbouring republic, and from his work the following may be quoted as the opinion of a permanent secretary of the treasury :

"Under competition you have no patronage, and there is, therefore, no motive to increase establishments beyond the strength which is acquired for the work they have to do; on the contrary, there is a very strong motive in the departments themselves to keep the establishments down, so as to have the credit of economical estimates." In speaking of the introduction of open competition in the India Civil Service, Mr. Eaton states that "the explanation of course, is, that British statesmen have long since found that common justice and the exclusion of partisan tests in selecting civil servants are essential for securing those most successful, and they have had patriotism and independence enough to act upon their convictions of duty even in a foreign province. Those declarations appear not to have been mere professions, for in the final order made in 1876 for the permanent establishment of open competition as the sole means of entry to the Indian Civil Service, it is provided that during the two years of special study which are to follow success in the competition, the sum of $750 a year is repaid to each successful competitor, thereby enabling the children of the poor to go on with their preparations for the public service." And of the results of competition his words are: "If I could afford the space I might call attention to particular facts showing that competition has given not merely more bright men of learning, but with physical systems as strong, with characters quite as high, with practical administrative capacity, not less to say the least, than had come into the service under any other system;" and in summing up the results of the merit-system in the great departments, his words are: "The merit-system, therefore, with its tests of character and capacity, and its claims of justice and principle, against favouritism and protestantship, has achieved a victory over patronage."

I will read a brief extract giving their views on the subject of open competition :

With regard to these recommendations your commissioners have thought it advisable on several grounds to embody the principal of them in the shape of the draft of a new Civil Service Act. They have adopted this course rather than make a number of recommendations for amending the various clauses of the Act, now in force, with the conviction that time will be saved by their views being thus more clearly enunciated in that form. Your commissioners are aware that this is a departure from the ordinary course pursued in similar matters to those which have had under consideration, but under the circumstances they deem its adoption justifiable. The principal recommendations contained in the bill are (1) the appointment of a Civil Service commission and (2) the adoption of the principle of appointment by open competition.

As a final conclusion arising out of their investigation, and after full consideration, your commissioners recommended the appointment of a board, to be called "The Civil Service Commissioners of Canada," to consist of one permanent member as chairman, who has had experience in the Civil Service, with an advisory council to consist of four deputy heads, the whole to be appointed in the manner customary with officers of a superior class. In view of the large proportion of the population who are of French origin, and of the intelligence shown in the position occupied by many of them in the public service your commissioners consider it essential that at least one of the five should be a French Canadian.

The tenure of office of the chairman should be similar to that of the Auditor General. He should possess such precedence, position and powers as would enable him to exercise his functions in an independent manner. With regard to this fundamental matter, it is observed that the system has worked admirably in the mother country, where it has long been in operation. It has also worked well in the United States as far as it has been adopted, and has proved efficacious in correcting many long-standing abuses, and supplying the country with a class of intelligent and industrious officers to the great advantage of the service, both in the way of efficiency and economy. The system is too well established to need any detailed advocacy from your commissioners, and they recommend its adoption in the conviction that the same beneficial results will follow in Canada.

It is possible that public sentiment in Canada may not as yet be ripe for open competition generally, and it may not as yet be possible to eliminate altogether the power of politics in making appointments; but if the recommendations of your commissioners be accepted and strictly adhered to, the public service at Ottawa will, they are convinced, in the course of a few years, be better for the change. Intelligence and capacity will meet with their due reward, politics and favouritism will cease to dominate, the service will soon become attractive to many persons who now seek other avenues of employment, and in general the title of public servant will be an honour to be coveted. The doors to appointments and promotions in the service will open only to capacity and honesty, and no man or woman who aspires, as all have a right to aspire, to any such position, will have occasion to seek or use any influence less honourable than his or her own merit and fitness for office.

These were the recommendations made by the civil service commission to the present government in 1891, and the report was accompanied by a draft of an Act of Parliament based upon it, but never placed on the statute book. The recommendations contained in the report of the commission of 1881 were almost exactly on the same lines as those in the report of 1891. The recommendations contained in the report of 1881 were partially embodied in an Act of Parliament which, though not going the whole length recommended, is admitted to have been a great improvement and is the Act under which the present service is administered. Amendments have been made to it from time to time which have not been, as stated in the last commissioners' report, improvements, but have tended to the relaxation of some of its provisions and the consequent prevention of its intention being carried out. The report of the commission of 1891 has been a dead letter, at all events so far as any action on the part of the government is concerned. I believe also that it has remained unread, so far as a great majority of the members of Parliament are concerned, so little interest is taken in this very important subject. I trust, however, that the reforms required in our civil service will ere long be accomplished. If the recommendation cannot be applied to the whole service, why not take a leaf out of our neighbours' book and apply it to some of the departments of the inside service, and then go on and apply it gradually to the service throughout? Give it a fair trial and I am perfectly satisfied that the result will be most beneficial to the country. The amendment contained in the bill now under our consideration has the same tendency as that alluded to by the commissioners in their report of 1891, and from that point of view is most objectionable. A good deal has been said from time to time with reference to the employes of the civil service. They have been very unfairly criticized. Members of Parliament who prefer the flesh pots of a paltry patronage to a real reform of the service indulge in much unmerited abuse of the service. If a greater number are employed and there is a redundancy of employees in the service that is surely not their fault: the fault is in the mode of appointment. The fault must be in the manner of their appointment. If there are three men appointed where two would do the service, surely it is not the fault of the employees. I believe there are at the present moment in some departments three men where two could do the work. In fact, we all know that too many officers and too many servants are a detriment to the prompt and proper performance of the work. The question of the expense of the service has been often dwelt upon; but it must be remembered that, as the country grows in extent and population, the expenditure must increase somewhat. My own opinion is, that the expense ought not to keep pace with the growth of this country. If you can get two men to do the work instead of three, and do it more efficiently, that surely will not increase very much the expense to the country. With reference to the Superannuation Act which has been in vogue for many years for the purpose of providing pensions for civil servants: when they cease to be able to perform their duties the Act has not worked satisfactorily because the original intention has been departed from by reason of partisanship and favouritism, which if the recommendations of the report of the commission were adopted could not occur. In England the government takes upon itself to provide pensions for the servants when they cease to be able to perform their duties. If our government can see its way to follow this example and if the number of employees are reduced in the proportion of 3 for 2 their remuneration might be increased so that they could afford to submit to a compulsory reduction sufficient to provide a fund from which pensions could be paid to themselves and families. A Government Insurance Act was passed I think last session to insure the lives of civil servants and I understand it is being availed of in numerous cases. The Act is a most commendable one, and under it civil servants can make provision for their families. The Superannuation Act only makes provision for payments under it to civil servants during their life-time. It has been stated here, I think, that my recommendation, and the system which I recommended, will not come until the millennium. Well, I am afraid it will not come within the life of the present Parliament, at all events, but I believe that the time will come when the merit system will be applied to the service, and whatever government will first adopt it to the service will deserve, and will gain, the thanks and approbation of the people of this country. Upon an efficient Civil Service the good administration of the government depends, and I hope, therefore, that the time is not far distant when the recommendations which I have so imperfectly made to this House will be adopted. With reference to the bill now before us, as I have already stated, I do not think it is an improvement on the Civil Service Act. You will never improve the Civil Service until you adopt the principles which I recommended in the report. If you adopt those principles, I think probably the reforms or amendments in the bill before us might be of some benefit; but the fact is you simply leave the door open to greater mischief in the way of political and other influences prevailing and appointing people who are not required in the service. Therefore I do not approve of the bill; I wish the Conservative government to get the credit of enacting a comprehensive and proper bill, and let me repeat once more there is no politics in this, as far as I am concerned. I do not believe in politics in the Civil Service; they should be excluded entirely from the service, and I feel myself under the obligation of moving that this bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The hon. gentleman has given so much attention to this matter, I should like to ask him a question. I am sure the matter has not escaped his attention. Has he ever thought there should be some tenure of office, some permanency of civil servants, who have served a certain number of years, or until they came to a certain age, or during their good behaviour; whether there should not be a permanent tenure of office?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—They have it now. They are appointed now, and as long as they perform their duty faithfully, it is a tenure of office which is not likely to be abused in any way. I do not understand what else could be done.

Hon. M. POWER—I presume what the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) refers to is the uncertainty of tenure which is caused by the summary removal of employees from service by the method of superannuation. I am very much pleased, indeed, that the hon. gentleman from Burlington has called the attention of the House to this measure, and to the whole subject of the Civil Service. He has devoted more attention to this question of the public service, looked at from the standpoint of Civil Service reform, than any other gentleman in Parliament, and everything he says is worthy of respect and attention. As the hon. gentleman has very properly said, this is a question which does not possess very much interest for politicians pure and simple. I can readily understand that in the House of Commons, where I believe the patronage of each constituency is practically in the hands of the member representing that constituency, if he happens to support the government one would not find an overwhelming desire on the part of the members to deprive themselves of what they regard as a more or less valuable perquisite; mistakenly, I think, because the position of a member of Parliament would be much more comfortable and satisfactory, as well as more dignified if he had nothing to do with the patronage. Members accumulate more unpopularity in their several constituencies owing to the fact that they have to deal with patronage than from almost any other circumstance. A gentleman who has long been dead, but who was in his day one of the foremost men in this country—the late Hon. Joseph Howe—is reported to have said at one time (before he emerged into the larger sphere of Canada) when he was leader in Nova Scotia, that he would undertake to remain in power for ever if he could only give the patronage to the opposition. It was the dealing with the patronage which gave him all the trouble, and caused all his unpopularity. While that is true of the House of Commons, while we perhaps cannot expect, particularly in such troublous times in a political sense as we are now going through, a great deal of attention to be given to this matter from the point of view of the Civil Service reformer, it does strike me that it ought to be different in this House, where hon. gentlemen are not directly interested in the patronage as a rule, and are, I think, and ought to be interested in the proper administration of the public service. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that the experience of England during the last forty years, and the experience of the United States during the last ten years or so have proved conclusively to any one who has paid attention to those countries that the merit system, the system of non-political appointments to the Civil Service is the best for the country, and not only the best for the country but the best for the representatives and for the people who have to carry on the government. Why should the members of government and of parliament have their minds occupied with contemptible questions about the distribution of small offices, when they ought to be thinking about great measures for the general good of the country? While I regret to say that I have not myself given very much attention to this subject, I have always taken more or less interest in it, and I was pleased when the government, in 1882, introduced a measure dealing with the Civil Service. I was, as the hon. gentleman from Burlington was, very much disappointed that the measure of that year did not include the system of open competitive examination. I am sorry to say that I do not think the government of that day, any more than the government of the present day, were actuated by any great desire to improve the Civil Service. The introduction of a system of qualifying examinations which were not competitive had just this effect, that where the government and the members were pestered by a great number of applicants for a limited number of offices, the system of examination weeded out a great number of applicants and reduced the number very considerably, and made it easier for the government and members to make appointments without creating a great deal of ill will. It was a very convenient thing to be able to say to an applicant, or the father of an applicant, "Well, you have to pass the qualifying examination; we cannot appoint you otherwise, or we cannot appoint your son," and that was about the distance it went. Sometimes a dozen men passed the Civil Service examination for each place that was to be filled, and it might be that the worst candidate who had passed got the appointment. The system was convenient for the government, and it did guarantee that a person who was totally ignorant and unfitted for the position did not get it, but it was not by any means a perfect measure. Then, as the hon. gentleman from Burlington has pointed out, and as the commissioners who were appointed in 1891 point out in their report, the government have been continually tinkering at the Civil Service Act since it was passed in 1882, and the changes have been made in the downward direction, with the view of giving the politicians more control of the service. I look upon the measure which is now before the House as one which takes a very long step in that direction, as I shall try to show. Perhaps it might be well to make an observation with respect to the report of the commission of 1891 before undertaking to deal with this bill at all. The commission of 1891, as has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman from Burlington, was the result of the discoveries made in that year in the Committee of Public Accounts of the House of Commons. Just at that time the government were afraid that very serious consequences were going to follow from the abuses which had grown up in the Civil Service; and, I take it, that that commission in 1891—while I do not say it was issued in a moment of weakness—was issued under the influence of a temporary fit of virtue, a fit of virtue which arose from the fear of punishment for misdoing; and as soon as the threatened danger passed away, which had happened by the time the Parliament met next, the fit of virtue had passed away and the report, as the hon. gentleman from Burlington says, has remained ever since a dead letter. Now that report was one which deserved a good deal of consideration from the government. The gentlemen who composed that commission were, I think, all, with possibly one exception, political supporters of the government. They were men of experience and well qualified to judge as to what the civil service should be. The chairman of the commission was manager of one of the greatest banking institutions in Canada, an institution the business of which is conducted on a method which might form a very good model for the manner in which the government business should be conducted.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who were the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. George Hague, Judge Burbidge, Mr. Barbeau and Mr. Courtney. Now, the hon. gentleman from Victoria wanted to know how the non-political system could be worked here. Well, what has been done in England and the United States, I think could be done here. All that is necessary is to make the examinations open competitive examinations; that removes the political element from the appointment, and it ought not to be difficult to adopt the merit-system in the matter of promotion. The great step is to take the political element from entrance into the service. With respect to this bill, this is not the time to discuss the details. It deals with a matter which was dealt with by the report of the commission of 1891, but not in the line indicated by that report. So far as I am aware, not more than two, possibly only one, of the various deputy heads who were examined by the commission reported in favour of the system which is intended to be carried out under this bill. I think that two out of the large number of deputy-heads who were examined did express the opinion that something like the system of writers that they have in England might be introduced, but with the exception of one witness, none recommended that the third-class clerks should be done away with and that these writers should be substituted for third class clerks. What they did suggest was that the writers may be so substituted to a certain extent—they did not suggest that we sweep away the third-class clerks altogether. This bill proposes to do away with the third-class clerks who hold office in a permanent way and during good behaviour, and substitute temporary writers for them.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—It does not affect the present men.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of the future. This bill proposes to do away with the appointment of third-class clerks for the future, and to substitute for them men who are employed temporarily; although the language of the bill speaks of their being employed at the rate of $400 a year, which would indicate that their employment is not to be temporary but permanent. They would hold office at the beck of the government, and all the lower grades of the service will be completely under the thumbs of the government of the day. The whole object of the Civil Service system was to take the public servants from under the thumbs of the government, to provide that they should be appointed owing to their qualification, and even though when appointed they were all of one shade of politics, still that while they continued to discharge their duties fairly well, they were safe to be retained in office. The object of this measure is to place all the lower grades of the service back into the old political slough in which they were before the first Civil Service Act was passed, or a worse slough, because I think the politics of the day are even worse than they were before 1882. That is the reason why I object to this measure. I have here the report of the Civil Service commissioners of 1891, with the evidence of the different deputy-heads with respect to this question marked, and as I say I think with about two exceptions they all condemn this proposed change. For instance, Mr. John J. McGee, Clerk of the Privy Council, was asked: "Should there be any third class clerks?"

5. Should there be any third-class clerks at all? If so, what should be the limitation as to salary? Is the present maximum ($1,000) too high? Should there be an intermediate class, ranking lower than second and higher than a third?—Yes; there should be a very limited number of third-class clerks in each department. The maximum salary should be $1,000, and upon the adoption of a competitive examination, the minimum should be $500.

23. Should the temporary clerk or writer class be extended, or limited or abolished?—I am in favour of the employment of duly qualified temporary clerks as exists at present. Temporary clerks should not be treated differently from permanent clerks and should be under the same discipline.

24. Have you given any thought as to the desirability of having a junior division or a boy copyist class?—I am opposed to boy copyists or a writer class, as first, no doubt it would have a tendency to make the permanent staff inclined to loaf, if they knew those could be called in to assist; second, it would be altogether inapplicable in this office on account of the peculiar confidential nature of the work. The "permanent" temporary clerks as they exist in this office are the most suitable, because they, as well as the permanent men, know if the work is behind that they will be kept in till six o'clock, or later if necessary, on reasonable grounds.

Substantially that is the character of the testimony right through. With two exceptions they all preferred to leave things as they are with respect to this particular matter. The hon. leader of the government, in introducing the measure said that it was proposed to employ a class of writers such as they have in England, but the bill shows that that is not the intention at all. The bill shows that instead of writers such as are employed in England at so much a week, and paid by the week—persons who are employed as they are required and let go again—the proposal is to employ men who, although called temporary employees, are really permanent, that is, permanent until the government think it desirable, for some reason perhaps not connected with the public service at all, to dismiss them. How can you speak of a temporary writer and speak of his salary as being fixed at $400 a year? It shows that really we are to have practically the old third-class clerk, only holding his position at the whim of the government. One of the arguments used by the hon. first minister rather surprised me, coming from the source from which it did. The hon. gentleman told us that under the system which would be likely to arise under this bill the employees of the government, the men employed as writers, would not look forward to remaining in the service, and would be on the lookout for better positions outside. I cannot understand how any business man could consider that a desirable thing. The point is to make the public service a desirable career, not to discourage the man who comes in and lead him to treat the service as a mere stop gap which he is to hold on to until he can find something better. I appeal to the common sense of hon. gentlemen if you are likely to get a good service in that way. Is it not better that the service should be regarded as a career, and that the gentlemen who come into office, if they do their duty faithfully and well, shall be retained and promoted? Fancy one of the large banks conducting a business in that way—a young man being retained under such conditions that he felt it to his interest to look around and get out of the service of the bank if he could get something that would pay better! That is what this bill is calculated to promote. That argument alone is a sufficient reason why this House should not pass the bill. The provisions of the measure are contrary to the recommendations contained in the report of the government's own commission appointed in 1891, contrary to the recommendations of the deputy-heads who should be qualified to know what is best in the interest of the service, and it tends to destroy the public service as a permanent occupation. It is a measure which this House should not adopt. The House would only do its duty by postponing the consideration of the bill until next session—that is the time indicated by the hon. gentleman's motion. We are to be here again in six months we are told.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The House is greatly indebted to my hon. friend opposite for having so fully called attention to the report of the commission and explained the object of that report. At the same time, I do not fully agree with what he has said. I agree with a great deal of what my hon. friend from Halifax has said. I question very much whether the government themselves really intend to effect a reformation in the appointment and management of the Civil Service, entirely apart from the influence they may exert over their constituents or their constituents over them. Unless they are determined to act in that way, which I cannot learn they have done for a number of years, it is useless almost to pass any bill. On the other hand, I think perhaps it would turn out to be nearly the same way if it were left entirely to a commission. If a commission were created by the government, you may rely upon it the appointments and recommendations for appointment would be such as would suit the views of the government. The commission would be so constituted that it would carry out the views of the government. Human nature is the same now, perhaps, as it has been for thousands of years. When public opinion becomes so strong upon this subject that the government will feel compelled to act upon the principle of demanding proper qualifications for the Civil Service, and limiting the number of appointments to those that are really required, and then carry out what the Premier proposes in this bill—to employ certain writers at times of pressure—I dare say it will be carried out as honestly as other laws but it must be carried out by a government that desires to reform the service.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—If you make it the law, the law must be obeyed; the government cannot break the law any more than an individual can.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It would not carry out the purpose that was intended. People construe the law differently, and all these things must be taken into consideration. However, I am disposed to support the motion to postpone the bill until another session.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—I regret, with the member for Burlington, that the government consider it necessary to introduce this measure. We all know that there is a feeling of unrest in the minds of the civil servants at the present time. Whether they have ground for it or not is not for me to say, but I know that such a feeling exists. The Civil Service is composed of ladies and gentlemen of high standing, who are fully qualified to perform the duties of their respective offices. If there is any fault to be found, it is the result of the system itself. I hold that the Civil Service examination is not what it should be—it is not of a practical character. It would do very well for a school boy just out of school; he can tell you the different rivers and mountains of the world and the cities and towns of the various countries, but the examination is not of that practical nature which I think should commend itself to the approbation of the public. If a man wants to enter the Finance Department, for instance, I should fancy the subjects on which he should undergo an examination should be connected with finance. For each department there should be a special examination. If it is the intention of the government to make a complete change and to abide by the reports made in 1891 and 1892, very well, let them do so, and make their decision that way. I have no doubt there are individuals in the public service who are worn out and probably are not suitable for the positions they occupy. I am satisfied that the government for a good many years would be very glad to get rid of the patronage respecting appointments. The Civil Service Act was passed for that purpose, but you find young men coming up in droves, expecting that at some time they will get a position under the government. Any man who passes an examination and gets a certificate considers that he is qualified for a position somewhere, and I suppose at the present time there must be many persons situated that way. You cannot blame the government for that. The Act is in existence and they are bound to recognize those who pass the Civil Service examination. If you change that and make appointments on the competitive system, I have no doubt the government will be glad to adopt it, but it is impossible for any government to act differently from what the present government have done under the existing law. As long as there is a chance of soothing the feelings of a supporter by making an appointment it will be done. I have no doubt when the Mackenzie Government were in power they exercised the patronage as the present government are doing—that is human nature, but at the present time there is a feeling of unrest in the minds of employees, that there is no permanency such as they desire. So far as substituting writers for third class clerks is concerned I think it is better to retain those men and let them have the feeling that their positions are safe. It is better to retain them and cultivate the feeling that their positions are safe so long as they discharge their duties carefully and that they have a chance of promotion in the course of time. These writers, the Premier has told us, would be merely employed from day to day. In commercial establishments the idea of employers is to get men who will be permanent, and it is made a condition that they shall remain a certain number of years for the purpose of giving their best service in return for the training they receive. That seems to me to be common sense. If you had a sufficient number of men employed permanently and make them do the work, even if it were necessary to detain them sometimes until 8 or 9 or 10 at night, it would be better than giving temporary employment to a larger number. In commercial establishments you never hear of a clerk refusing to remain after hours if necessary, and therefore I believe if the permanent clerks would do their work faithfully and well they ought to be able to discharge all their duties without requiring assistance. I have no doubt there are a great many men who do their work faithfully and well in the Civil Service at the present time, but there are others who do not. On the whole the Civil Service will compare favourably with any other class of people in this country. I suppose they would hail with satisfaction any system by which their position would be made permanent and secure. Permanency is everything. One hon. gentleman has referred to the possibility of establishing a pension fund. I do not know whether that would go down in this country or not. We have a great distaste for that in this country.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—There is a superannation fund.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOU—If carried out in its entirety the system is all right. I did not take up any part of the discussion on that subject the other day, because it was on a motion for papers. I do not think it is proper to discuss such a motion until the papers come down; we could then learn why the government acted as they did. I have no doubt they had ample reason for the course they pursued—that is my impression, and I would not take part in the discussion until the papers are produced. If the Prime Minister would remodel the whole system of the Civil Service on the line laid down by the commission of 1891, I think it would be beneficial to the public service and at the same time ensure satisfaction to the public at large. I have no feeling in this matter: I want to do what is right. I know a great many of the civil servants work indefatigably, and do their work honestly and well. No doubt there are drones, but as a whole I believe they have discharged their duties faithfully. The government appreciate the fact and they bring in this bill with the idea that by doing away with the third-class clerks and employing writers, they will give a chance to the second-class clerks to elevate themselves in a shorter time than they could under the present system. So far as I am concerned I would prefer to ensure permanency in the system. I would not like to employ persons for a week or two; I would rather employ a man permanently, pay him well and let him feel that he must give a substantial return for the money he receives. In that way you would increase the efficiency of the service. Pay your men well, but expect a fair return for the salary you pay them. I am sure that would be satisfactory to the service, and would be hailed with satisfaction by the public at large. It has been said that you have a superabundance of men in the departments, many of whom are doing nothing. I do not think it is so, but I admit the impression is general in the country. The only way to improve the service is to manage it in a business-like way. Let the heads of the departments consult each other; they know who are efficient and who should be retained and, if necessary, paid more. Those who cannot discharge their duties should be dismissed, but I do not believe that a man should be superannuated at the caprice of anybody, but only for a substantial reason, and then let it be done no matter who is hurt. I believe the government have a desire to do what they can for the benefit of the employees themselves, and at the same time to ensure efficiency in the public service. It is a hard task for these gentlemen to perform. We all know that they are so much engaged in other affairs that it is impossible for them to look into trivial matters. The heads of the departments are the men who should look after the service. If they are not competent to look after their subordinates, they are not fit for the positions they hold. Upon their recommendation the government ought to act, and, I believe, they would act. I hope the government will either withdraw this bill or allow its operation to be deferred until they have more time to investigate this very important subject.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I really do not feel in a position to oppose this bill, because I think it is in the line of economy—probably an annual saving of over $100,000; and does not impair the efficiency of the service. Therefore I should give it my support. It is not interfering with any class of employees now. The present employees go on as before, but it will avoid putting persons into the service, in future until they are needed, and there can be selected for the second class on the principle of merit from those writers who have proved most worthy and efficient. We all know that at a certain time in the year and during the sitting of parliament there is a greater demand for writers in the departments than at others. Those writers, so far as I can see by the bill itself, are to be temporarily employed. No doubt a large class of them would be females. They generally are more expert as copyists than the male sex. I cannot see why this bill should not pass. There is a great deal to be said about the Civil Service examinations. I know myself that a great many get on the list have lost most precious years looking for employment which they never get. In that way much disappointment and harm has been done by the Civil Service examinations, because political patronage will come in under the present system. You cannot avoid it. My hon. friend from Burlington talked about the inside service—that it would be well to appoint a commission and make appointments in that way. In the outside service I think it is impossible that a commission of three at Ottawa would be able to deal efficiently with those appointments and appoint the best persons. That patronage for the present would be better left in the hands of the government who would act on the advice of the representatives from the different parts of the country. I fail to agree with my hon. friend from Rideau, when he speaks of the Civil Service as being perfect. My hon. friend must shut his eyes when he goes through the departments. There are many employees who are not qualified, who are utterly unfitted in every way, for the positions which they hold, and this bill is to prevent a continuance of that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not interfere with it.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It prevents such appointments in the future. It will prevent such persons being employed. It restricts the power of government in second class appointments, as Parliament must be asked for the money appropriation. It is economy to employ writers; there will be no superannuation with regard to them. I do not know—I mean just for the present by this bill—how any government could deal better with the Civil Service than the present government are doing. It is a problem which has baffled the skill of every government so far. There is a good deal in what the hon. member from Halifax says, and what the hon. member from Burlington says, but the difficulty is in carrying out and putting into practice what these gentlemen suggest. I am afraid no commission that you could appoint would be free from the taint or suspicion of partiality one way or the other, or free from political bias and the influences which beset human beings.

If it can be tried and put into practice, as my hon. friend from Burlington said, try it on the inside service. There the commission would be better qualified to appoint fit and proper persons, and we would then see whether it had a good effect productive of the good which my hon. friend, who has made this subject a special study, believes it would have.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think the hon. gentleman from Burlington deserves thanks for the information he has given us on this subject, which has taken parliament and governments years to perfect, and which is not perfect yet. The chief point in his argument is that the Civil Service should be chosen by commissioners. My own opinion is that that is very cumbersome, and would not meet the object of keeping the appointments free from political bias, because the commissioners would be appointed by political parties, and they are only human beings. They would have a wish to please the persons who appointed them; and as long as Canada is Canada I believe it is impossible to get people free from political bias and influence. From the very inception of a government system, political influence runs through all the ramifications of every department, from the elector up to the premier. Then, again, appointing commissioners would be a sort of wheel within a wheel, or a power within a power. If the minister wanted extra assistance would he say “please Mr. commissioner I want a clerk or assistant,” and could the commissioner go round to every department and say “well, there should be a man here and a man there.” The commissioners might cram the departments and the minister might say “I do not want all those clerks; you are cumbering the service.” That plan is full of difficulty. The ministers are responsible to the country, and the government must be held responsible for the expense of the Civil Service and the number of civil servants employed. I do not know whether the Premier has read the bill carefully; I do not suppose it is his bill; but I think it is fraught with a good deal of danger. As the hon. gentleman from Lunenburg says, the Civil Service under this bill might be crammed as much as ever. Subsection 7 repeals section 47 and reads as follows:

When from a temporary pressure of work or from any other cause extra assistance is required in any branch of either the first or second division, the Governor in Council may, on the report of the deputy head of the department, concurred in by the head of the department, that such extra assistance is required, authorize the employment of such number of temporary clerks, writers, messengers, porters, packers, or sorters, as are required to carry on the work of the department.

Now, it depends on who the minister is and who the deputy is, the door is open to abuse. There might be an opportunity for clerks to get in who are not necessary. Then clause 8 reads :

Temporary clerks now employed may be continued in such temporary employment, notwithstanding their not having passed any examination, at such rate of pay, not exceeding their present rate of pay, as is fixed by the Governor in Council ; but, except as aforesaid, no person shall be eligible to be employed as a temporary clerk or writer unless he has passed the qualifying examination required by the Civil Service Act, and no person shall be eligible to be employed as a temporary messenger, porter, packer or sorter, unless he has passed the preliminary examination required by the said act.

That is a great hardship. If you take a clerk for the session you cannot take him on unless he has passed the examination. Is it worth while for a clerk to go to the drudgery of a Civil Service examination for six months' work with the risk of being thrown out at any moment? Then section 9 says that any person so employed may be continued in such employment by Order in Council and so on, so there is a degree of permanency in the bill after all. This temporary civil servant may be continued perhaps from year to year, if he was so continued why should he not come under the same category as those entitled to superannuation or some remuneration for services the same as the other servants get? Before this bill is passed, it requires a great deal of remodelling and a great deal of attention, because in trying to economize there will be no economy at all. Why should there not be third-class clerks? It ensures perfection in servants to advance them step by step and guarantee permanency. It stimulates them to greater exertion. It gives them ambition to press forward. Why could not a young man come in who has passed his examination and have some idea of permanency to work his way up? I do not know whether the Premier has thought of permanency of appointment. It is a very important question, and only a matter of fair-play, because there are ministers who might, from caprice, whim, or some insufficient reason, turn a very good servant adrift, and perhaps another minister might take him on. It might be done for political reasons ; and therefore there should be some degree of permanency from the very commencement—from the third class clerk up to the deputy-head.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have very little to say further than to compliment the hon. gentleman from Burlington on the manner in which he has treated this subject. The only part of his speech to which I take any particular objection is the closing motion for the six months hoist. After a little reflection I hope he will think better of it and withdraw the motion. No one can object to a free untrammelled discussion of the subject and, as has been well said by one of the hon. members, it is one of the problems which all countries have been trying to solve for centuries back. I question whether they have arrived at that state of perfection which we should all like to see, even under the system which is spoken of by my hon. friend from Burlington. It seems to me there has been, in the discussion which has taken place, a great deal of misconception as to the real intentions of the government in proposing this bill, and there has been a certain misconstruction placed upon its provisions. In the first place, there is no intention whatever to interfere with the civil servants who have been permanently appointed. The employment of what are termed writers, who would take the place of those who are now appointed third-class clerks, will be just as permanent, if their services are required, as the clerks in the banks and mercantile establishments referred to by the hon. member for Rideau. Why is it that a clerk in a bank, in a mercantile establishment, or in any other vocation in life is willing to work after six o'clock at night, if it is in the interest of his employer, and if he is a good servant is willing to remain till 10, 11 or 12 at night? Simply because he has not a permanency where he can snap his finger at his employer whenever he is asked to do half an hour's extra work. We all know what was the case before the passage of the present law. What was the state of affairs seventeen years ago when I went into the customs department? Look at the public accounts and you will see. Every year the permanent clerks in the departments, whenever asked to do one hour's work after four o'clock, had to be paid extra for it. Fortunately the Civil Service Act as it stands now, makes a provision that you cannot pay for any extra service for work after hours. At first I had a little rebellion in the customs department. I am speaking from personal experience, but I have no doubt it applies to other departments; I have no doubt my hon. friend who sits opposite me and who has had experience in the management of a department will be able to tell the same story. The first difficulty arose through the sickness of one or two of the staff and the unwillingness of one or two others to work as they would do if they did not hold a permanent position. The work was behind, and I could not get a return to lay before Parliament. I said to the commissioner "you will tell these gentleman that they must remain after 4 o'clock until the work is completed in order that I can have the return for Parliament, because I will not be in the position if I can avoid it, of having the opposition say to me that I am delaying the returns so that they could not get the facts." The reply sent to me was that those young gentlemen said: "No, their hours under the regulations end at 4 in the afternoon, and if they have to come back they insist upon being paid extra for it." Well, I did in that case precisely as I think my hon. friend or any business man would; I said "You go and tell these gentlemen to come here and work, if they have to work till 12 o'clock at night to prepare the returns for Parliament, or I will find somebody else to do it." I had no difficulty after that. The next year they were competing with each other to see who would do the extra work. I do not wish to find fault with my predecessor, but I pursued this course: the moment I found these young men willing to keep up the work of the office and apply themselves assiduously to their duty, I recommended their promotion and an increase of salary. I do not say that I was alone in doing that, but I do say that that determination had more effect in producing efficiency on the part of the civil servants than anything previously. Now this bill is really in favour of the permanency of the Civil Service rather than against it. What does it provide? Instead of putting a young man, who may turn out to be almost worthless, upon the permanent list as a third-class clerk, you appoint him temporarily at a salary not higher than that of a third-class clerk. You may pay him more if he has any additional qualification in the way of book-keeping or whatever it may be. Then the provision is that you select from the most efficient of these young men or young women who have been employed as temporary clerks, to fill the vacancies on the permanent list and when you appoint them you appoint them at $800 a year, a living salary to begin with. It will have this effect, that you get a class of men and women who will serve until vacancies occur in the second-class division. Then you select from among them those who are really qualified and who will be looking forward to a permanent position and put them on the permanent list. There is another reason for it—the saving as much as possible of the rapidly increasing expenses that are going on in the Civil Service and for which every government is so roundly abused whenever they go before the electors at an election. In this House we scarcely ever hear a speech, particularly from my hon. friend from Halifax, when it comes to a question of the expense of governing the country, but we are condemned for extra expenditure, but the moment we attempt to affect any economy we are accused of injuring those who are opposed to the government, or of trying to bring under our thumb all those who are in the employ of the government. A moment's reflection will suggest to every member of the Senate that the system which it is proposed to adopt will not place servants of the government any more under their thumb than they are to-day. My own view of dealing with a civil servant is never to attempt to bring him under your thumb either politically or otherwise. The probabilities are that if you appoint a gentleman to the service, you select him from your own party; my hon. friends did precisely the same thing when they were in power. I find no fault with them. That is what I do, and what my hon. friend would do if he was in power. Holding political views in accordance with those of the party, the probabilities are that the gentleman that you appoint would cast his vote in your favour. I do not make pretense to any extraordinary political virtue on this question. It is our system, and I do not say it is improper so long as the person appointed is qualified for the position to which he has been appointed. The report which my hon. friend from Burlington has read is admirable, like many other things, in theory. You can lay down a most perfect system of governing a country either by commission or heads of departments, or in various other ways just in the same way as you can discuss political questions. Take political economy and lay down a principle, and you will work out the problem to a system of almost perfection, but when you come to apply it and try to work it out practically, particularly when human nature as the hon. gentlemen to-day have said, remains as it is and as it has been, and as my hon. friend opposite thinks it will be for some time to come, you will find the same difficulties will crop up and you will have the same trouble. Now, the very principle laid down by the hon. gentleman from Burlington of promotion by merit, is involved in this bill more than in any other, but if you have a number of temporary clerks in your employment and you want to appoint them to the permanent list you make them second-class clerks. If you had any regard for the service to which they were appointed you would be very apt to select by merit from among the temporary men that you had in your employment. If you did not, then you would be doing precisely what we are accused of having done in the past, that is, selecting them for political reasons apart from merit.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. the first minister would, but I do not think his colleagues would.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am obliged for the compliment. My experience with my colleagues has not led me to the opinion he expresses. I say frankly to my hon. friend from Burlington that I will not by any possibility be made a party to adopting a system of pensioning civil servants. I know no reason why a civil servant, who is paid as much and sometimes more than he could possibly obtain in any other employment, should become a pensioner upon the funds of the country.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—His own funds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not his own funds, unless he pays for it.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—He pays for it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Takes it from his salary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I understood him to draw a distinction between the systems of superannuation and pension, and he instanced the English system of pensioning. Now, they do not subtract from a man's salary there; they pay him his salary, and after his term of service ceases then they give him a pension.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—What I meant to say was this: that there are two ways of providing for retiring civil servants—one was by the government paying them a pension, and the other was by reducing the number of clerks in the service, and pro tanto, reducing the cost of the service; and then the compulsory reduction to be made from the salaries to provide for the pension when they retire from the service.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see very little difference between the proposition of my hon. friend and the system which prevails just now. I know it is the practice of governments in most parts of the world to pension their servants, but I have not advanced that far, although I am Tory in my views. Take the Bank of Montreal. If they had a servant in their employ 20, or 30, or 40 years, they give him a retiring allowance when they retire him. That is the system which prevails, but still that does not change my position in the least.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is only the principal men. The ordinary clerks do not get it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is one manager, I believe, in the town where I live. He spent over 40 or 50 years in the service.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—They have adopted a system of insurance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am sure he has been a most faithful servant in the bank, always looking after its interests, and I am quite sure when he retires they will give him a retiring allowance. Speaking of pensions, I am in favour of pensions when they apply to the military service. I am strongly in favour of pensioning the men who are wounded or disabled in the service of their country. I am also in favour of pensioning the families of those who have laid down their lives in the defence of their country. But the civil servants who work daily not half as long as you and I work now, or when we were in the employment of others,—I cannot say that I am in favour of pensioning them. Now, 17 years of experience in the public service has taught me this: there are men as valuable, and who take as much interest in the management of the affairs of the department in which they are occupied, as any clerk or any employee or any master himself. I have had them under me for a number of years and they never hesitated, whether it was six o'clock in the morning or twelve at night, to come and work, and never found fault when work was necessary to be done, and they had to do it. Then there are amongst the number those who come as late as possible, go away as early as possible, do as little as possible, and growl as much as possible. That is my experience and it is very frankly stated. I repeat, I am quite satisfied that the employment of writers in the manner in which it is proposed in this bill will tend to make better clerks and you will select the best men in your employment looking forward, as they will to their appointment at the higher salary which this bill provides in order to give them permanency. The hon. member stated that in the evidence given before the commission, one of the heads of departments, Mr. White, I think, of the Post Office department, gave evidence in favour of this English system of employment. Why? He is the only man in the service at Ottawa that I know of, who had experience in the working of that system, and he was an employe of the Post Office department in London before he came to Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Had not the Deputy Minister of Finance similar experience?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no recollection of his having given any such evidence. I may be in error. I remember reading the report at the time; the Deputy-Minister of Finance was not, so far as I know, a civil servant in England. I know that Mr. White was, and he was brought from the Post Office Department in London, England, to this country on account of his proficiency and knowledge of the working of the post office system there. He lays it down as a principle that the system of writers is the best, that he can get more work out of the staff, and that they are more attentive to their duties. Only this morning, in discussing this question, he gave this view as the result of his experience; we have adopted the system of my hon. friend partially, and we are going towards it as rapidly as possible. A paragraph in his own report will show that we are somewhat in the line of the recommendation which the hon. gentleman from Burlington made, which will be found in the Journals of 1881. In dealing with the question of third-class temporary clerks, extra remuneration, &c., under the head of "temporary clerks," I find this paragraph:

We propose that the wants of the departments from a temporary pressure of work should be supplied with the required numbers from the successful candidate in the Civil Service commissioner's list, and for whom no vacancies for the time being may have been found, the rate of the remuneration for such temporary service not to exceed the pay of third-class clerks, such employment not to be considered as constituting any claim to the permanent clerkship.

That is his recommendation. Now have we departed from that to any material extent? That is nearly the wording of the law as it stands at present. I trust the House will accept the explanation, and I trust it will be satisfactory to my hon. friend from Burlington, when the time comes for reforming the Civil Service so as to attain perfection which the English system and the United States system are said to have—I never heard the United States system extolled before, I never thought it had any political virtue.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It has only been introduced a short time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—However it may apply to the inside service, certainly it does not to the outside service. Take as an illustration the collector of customs in New York, which is a very lucrative office. The collector is changed every administration. If the system is good there is no reason why that should be done. If there is any office in the whole department of the government that requires a cool judicial brain it is in the customs.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—And experience.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And experience, and no changes. Because the complications that are continually arising, the different interpretations which are constantly being put upon the most trivial items in the tariff, are of such a character that unless a man studies, unless he applies himself and will try to act in an equitable and judicial manner, he will be a failure. Experience has taught that. The system in the United States has not arrived at that efficiency to which we all hope the civil service may attain at no distant date.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House in discussing this question. I hope the discussion that we have had will result in the improvement of the service. When we go into committee, perhaps I will have something to say with reference to the different clauses of the bill. In the meantime, I will act on the suggestion of my hon. friend and withdraw the motion with the consent of the House.

The amendment was withdrawn and the Bill was read the second time.

SUPERANNUATION OF JUDGES OF PROVINCIAL COURTS BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (129) "An Act to amend the law respecting the superannuation of judges of provincial courts."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask the reason of this clause? There does not appear to be any substantial difference between it and the old law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. member from Calgary was not in the House when I introduced the bill. It does not change the law as it stands on the statute-book, but simply removes an ambiguity that may exist as to the status of admiralty court judges. The provision for the superannuation of local judges in Admiralty Courts is not new law Under the Revised Statutes judges of the Courts of Vice-Admiralty are entitled to superannation. The local judges in Admiralty appointed under our Admiralty Act of 1891 are really the successors of these, and their districts are, as a matter of fact, the same as the old vice-Admiralty districts. It is quite true that the Governor in Council may constitute new districts: but this has not been done in any case, nor is there any likelihood of its being done on account of the provisions in our Admiralty Act for the local administration of the Act by deputy and surrogate judges, ss. 10 & 11. Some have confused the latter with the local judges in Admiralty, whose tenure is entirely different. They hold office and are removable only in the same manner as a superior court judge (section 6): whereas the surrogate judge holds office during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, and the deputy judge holds office during the pleasure of the local judge who appointed him. Instead, therefore, of making a new provision the bill only makes clear the rights of the Local Judges in Admiralty. It must be remembered that by the Imperial Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 express provision is made for compensating any judge or officer of the Vice-Admiralty Court in a British possession who suffers any pecuniary loss by the abolition of the court; so that if we were to take away the right of these judges to a pension, they would have a claim to compensation. As to the maritime court, the bill makes no change whatever. That court under the Act constituting it (Revised Statutes, Chapter 137) is a superior court, and the Revised Statute with respect to provincial judges already provides that all judges of Superior Courts are entitled to pensions. The provision in the bill was inserted at the request of the present judge of the court, merely for greater caution. The change in the law is to place those judges in the same position as superior court judges and to put the question of their superannuation, when they retire from service, beyond a doubt. That is the whole object of the bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me the object of this bill is to change the status of the county court judges of Ontario, placing some of them in the position of superior court judges, because under the Maritime Court Act power appears to be given to the Governor in Council to appoint county court judges to act as judges of the Maritime Court. The amendment proposes (namely subsec. 2 of sec. 4), to establish and constitute a county court judge a judge of the superior court, provided he was acting as judge of a Maritime Court. I simply ask the question for the purpose of ascertaining if it is the intention of the government that the county court judges should occupy the same status as superior court judges by reason of acting in the Admiralty Court.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Merely with respect to his allowance.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—A county court judge cannot be superannuated until he has served twenty years, whereas a superior court judge can be superannuated after fifteen years' service. It shortens the term by five years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From the reading of this section I should judge that the interpretation placed upon it by my hon. friend from Ottawa is the correct one. I will make inquiries on that point; but it says distinctly:

2. Courts of Vice-Admiralty and the Maritime Court of Ontario shall be deemed to have been superior courts, local judges in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court to be judges of a superior court, and stipendiary magistrates within the North-west territories to have been judges of a superior court, within the meaning of this section.

As I understand it, that is simply to apply to the question of the right of superannuation, declaring them to have a status equal to that of superior court judges, for that purpose and that alone.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The bill then passed through committee of the whole without amendment, and was read the third time and passed.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In moving the adjournment of the House, I desire to make an explanation of the answer that I gave my hon. friend from Ottawa recently when he put the question as to whether there is to be any legislation in reference to the Hudson Bay Railway this session. I understood my hon. friend at that time to refer to legislation in the line of the Order in Council which had been passed and laid on the table, and I said no, and neither is there any intention of proceeding with legislation in that line. The bill, a notice of which was given in the Lower House, in reference to that line was for the purpose of dividing the subsidy which is now granted to that railway running from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan. The House will remember that the aid given under their present charter is 6,400 acres of land per mile and $80,000 as a subsidy on the completion of the whole line, whether it will be gone on with I am not in a position now to say, but it is proposed to divide that into two, so that when they have completed the first 125 miles, they might receive the proportion of land and half the amount of the proposed subsidy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will there be any change of location?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may be a change of location; I am not positive as to details, but, as I understand it, they can proceed from the north-western terminus of the forty miles already built, or begin at Gladstone; and, if they do that, then it parallels no line, but becomes, in other words, a feeder to existing lines.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will that carry the road as far as the Saskatchewan?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; only half-way. The proposition will be, if any legislation takes place at all,—which is now being considered,—simply to divide the subsidy to which they are entitled under their present charter.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—That is the subsidy granted during the time of Sir John Abbott?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. Instead of considering it a disadvantage, I should be inclined to feel more favourable to their beginning, not at the end of their present road, but at Gladstone and then running northward. Hon. gentlemen from the North-west will understand that better than I do.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—They will require to have their charter amended?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is simply to empower the government to give half the subsidy, and grant half the quantity of the land upon the completion of half the length of the road—that is all.

Mr. LOUGHEED—It does not propose extending the time for construction?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not at this moment able to tell the hon. gentleman whether the time for completion provided in the bill is extended or not.

The Senate then adjourned.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (130) "An Act further to amend the Civil Service Act."

(In the Committee),

On clause 1,

Hon. Mr. POWER—This bill, as was pointed out yesterday, proposes to deprive our civil servants of one of the characteristics which, in the past, met with the approval of persons interested in the welfare of the public service. That is, the characteristic of permanency. A person who may be appointed to the public service under the provisions of this bill, if it becomes law, will not have a permanent tenure, but will hold office simply at the discretion of the Ministers of the day. When a change takes place in that ministry, it follows, almost as a matter of course, that those to whom this bill applies, who have been appointed under one administration, will be dismissed by their successors. We are asked to introduce a system which we have not had in Canada at any time since confederation, and I think that is very much to be regretted. There is another feature in connection with this bill which, I believe, one hon. gentleman at any rate who spoke on the subject yesterday had taken into consideration, but as to which he said nothing, and as far as I remember no hon. gentleman said anything. That is, that if this bill becomes law, the persons appointed to the lower grades of the Civil Service in future will not be taken from the various portions of the Dominion, but will, of necessity almost, be persons residing in Ottawa. No young man, or for that matter no young woman, who has any self-respect or any ability would be willing to undergo examinations and come from a distant province, say Nova Scotia or Manitoba, or even from Quebec, to Ottawa for the purpose of entering a service from which he or she may be summarily dismissed at the expiration of a month.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—The examinations are dispensed with under this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Not altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES—Qualifying examinations.

Hon. Mr. POWER—One examination is dispensed with. The result will be, hon. gentlemen, that the only persons to be appointed in the Civil Service will be persons residing in Ottawa, and as a rule, persons who may be described as hangers-on of the Government—a class of persons somewhat inferior, I suppose, to those who become sessional clerks in the House of Commons. It is perfectly clear that the practical effects of this measure will be to degrade the Civil Service and to deprive it of that character of permanency which has characterized it since 1867. I move that the committee rise.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Where does the hon. gentleman find that a servant may be discharged at a month's notice?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The writers are to be employed temporarily. If a new Government came in, it would get rid of those employees of the previous Government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is a stickler for rules. I would suggest to the chairman the propriety of enforcing them on this occasion. If you consult the authorities you will find that discussion must be confined to the clause before the committee for consideration. My hon. friend has discussed the whole principle of the bill which was debated at the second reading. He has a right, however, to do just as he has done—to move that the committee rise at any stage, in order to kill the bill, and that is the object of the hon. gentleman's motion. If the Senate vote for his motion, then the bill is killed, and it is tantamount to a six month's hoist on the first, second or third readings. I shall not indulge in any remarks in reply to the hon. gentleman (because I should then be just as much out of order as he was) except to say that I hope and sincerely trust that the party to which I belong will not adopt in the future, as they have not adopted in the past, the United States system which the hon. gentleman has indicated in this House he would do if he should happen to come into power. Now, I challenge him, or his leader in this House, to point to a single temporary clerk that was dismissed or removed from Sir John Macdonald's Government formed in 1878, or one that they have disposed of by dismissal since that period except for cause, and good cause. I could point out to him, were it necessary to do so, those who were temporarily employed, some in the Secretary of State's office, at the time, who are the bitterest and most vindictive and active opponents of the Conservative government that you could find in this city. They were not turned out; on the contrary, when the time came and vacancies occurred, they were not only put in positions, but they have been retained in them ever since. I say that in defence of the party to which I belong, and the Government of which I have been a member ever since 1878. Having said that much, I do not propose to say anything about the "degradation of the service," or to combat the other ideas that the hon. gentleman advanced. If this Senate thinks proper to vote for the hon. gentleman's amendment there is an end to legislation on this subject during the present session.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Is there anything in this bill which, as my hon. friend from Halifax asserts, would bring about the state of things which obtains in the United States, namely, that when the party in power go out, there may be a thorough change of the employees of the government? Is there any clause of the bill by which the ordinary civil servant would be liable to dismissal on a change of government? I cannot see that there is. As I understand the bill, these temporary appointments are only to be made in certain contingencies; that is to say, if there is a pressure of work. These appointments may be made on the recommendation of the head of any branch of the service. Am I correct in apprehending that those are the provisions of the bill?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite correct. There is no clause in this bill that gives any power or authority to dismiss any servant, whether he be temporary or permanent, other than they have to-day. On the contrary, it takes a certain power from the government which I will point out when we come to the clause. If we have temporary writers, as they are to be termed under the new bill, it is on the same principle that prevails in England in managing the Civil Service, only it abolishes what is termed third-class clerkships. If it is required to fill a second-class clerkship, the clerk would enter at $800, instead of at $400 in the third-class. There is no power in this bill to enable any government to appoint that second-class clerk until it is first laid before Parliament and an appropriation obtained for the purpose. At present you can put as many on as you please, so long as you have funds at your disposal. So that it is really restricting the power of the Government rather than extending it, and my hon. friend from Burlington, who has come to the conclusion that the qualifying examinations, or any examinations, are abolished, has drawn his conclusions from reading the last clause of the bill, which is a re-enactment of a section that has been in the Civil Service Act for eight or ten years, and has been renewed two or three times. It is to enable the Government to put upon the permanent list an officer who had been in the service previous to 1882, and who is reported by his chief, whether it be a collector of customs in a port or whether it be here, as one who can be placed upon the permanent list, at the salary he is then receiving, without examination. That is the only point, and if you will look a little more carefully into the bill, you will find that the writers who can now be appointed, after having passed the preliminary examination, cannot be appointed until they have passed the qualifying examination, thus putting them in a position to be promoted when the time comes and a vacancy occurs in the second class. Since I am on my feet, and the question before us is the destruction of the bill, I want to show the House what the effect of it is. There are now about 300 third-class clerks in the employ of the Government at a maximum salary of $1,000. That is $300,000. When the full effect of this bill comes into operation, by employing these writers at $400 a year, and the third-class clerks cease to exist, you save about $180,000. I made the calculation last night, and made some inquiry after the debate took place here. The object of the bill is to have a better service and not to overload it, and to effect an economy of between $150,000 and $200,000. That is the effect of it. That will be the result of the bill, unless, unfortunately for the country, my hon. friend should come into power, and then he might increase the expense instead of decreasing it. One effect of this bill will be that when unreasonable demands are made to the head of the department, he can appeal to the law, and say, "I cannot do it, because there is the law against me." It might not be a protection against a hard headed and hard hearted creature like myself, but there are others, tender hearted, who cannot resist the appeals of the widow and the orphan, of the needy and the hangers on, of whom my hon. friend speaks. That is what I fear; and we desire to protect the Civil Service against just such tender-hearted people as my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Does the bill enact that, with the exception of temporary clerks now employed, no temporary clerk shall be eligible hereafter unless he passes the qualifying examination?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He must pass the qualifying examination. At present you can appoint those who have passed only the preliminary.

The motion was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—I wish to propose an additional clause to the effect that this Act shall not come into force and take effect until the 1st January next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE, from the committee, reported the bill with amendment, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POWER rose to Call attention to the unsatisfactory return presented on the 31st of May last, to the Address of the Senate, dated the 11th July, 1894, for a statement showing in detail the several sums paid for public printing, for the years ending 30th June, 1883, and the 30th June, 1893, respectively, and ask the Government whether they will not cause a more satisfactory return to be made to the said Address?

He said:—On the 11th July last year I moved for a statement showing in detail the several amounts paid for public printing for the years ending 30th June, 1883, and 30th June, 1893, respectively. In the few remarks with which I accompanied the motion I pointed out that the object in asking for this statement was to enable the Senate and the government to make a comparison between the cost of printing under the old contract system, and the cost under the present at the Printing Bureau. I called attention to the fact that the printing was not being done as promptly as it had been done under the old system, and unless there was a saving by the present mode, it would be desirable to go back to the old system. In fact, without these remarks any one could have seen, from reading the notice, what I wanted. It was intended to make a comparison between the cost of printing in 1882-3 and the cost in 1892-3. The return was brought down on the 31st May this year, and on referring to it I find it is not the return I asked for, and which the Senate require. Perhaps I may as well read a letter from the Queen's Printer which accompanies the return :

In preparing this return, the information for the year 1892-3 is given complete ; but it was not possible to make up anything but a partial return for 1882-3 ; because the department was not created until 1886, and did not begin operations until 1888. That portion of the departmental printing which was done by the contractors is shown in the two volumes sent herewith, and no other details beyond these exist in this department.

These were the two large volumes which the leader of the government laid on the table accompanied by more or less chaff.

These volumes, however, contain but a small portion of the printing really done, for many of the departments got printing done at outside offices and most of the immigration literature was done outside. Nothing of this appears in these books ; for, although the work may have been audited by the Queen's Printer, the bills were at once returned to the respective departments and were paid by them. All this became the subject-matter of a number of suits and large additional sums were paid in damages to the contractors, for which the papers and vouchers are for the most part in the court.

All the parliamentary printing, including the sessional documents and the blue books, were printed under separate contracts, under the exclusive control of officers of parliament. Nothing of this matter appears in these books. The Queen's Printer had nothing to do with this printing until 1889, before that he did not even audit the accounts.

The return for 1882-3, though only a partial return, is all which ever existed in the Queen's Printer's office.

So it would appear that the government, instead of sending to the various departments, or instructing the Queen's Printer to procure from the departments outside his own, the information which was necessary to furnish a complete statement, were satisfied with this sort of a return from the Queen's Printer giving only the information in his own office, while the information was not to be had there because, as appears from the return and as we all knew, previous to 1886, the printing was not all done under the supervision of the Queen's Printer. The return I hold in my hand is most unsatisfactory. There are 387 pages of foolscap of writing apparently in the one handwriting ; so I presume this work has occupied one of those writers, of whom the leader of the House speaks, for the period extending from the time when the motion was adopted by the House until the 30th May of the present year when the return was brought down. This return is of no value for the purpose for which it was required. It does not give the information as to the year 1892-3 because there is not a single column of all these 387 pages of figures added up. This return simply gives the various items. That was not what was required at all. Although the words "giving in detail," were used, they were only intended to indicate that the amount paid in each department for printing was to be given. This return is of no use whatever, and inasmuch as the information which was sought was information that would be valuable to the government and to all members of parliament, I trust that the hon. First Minister will take steps to procure what I had hoped to get as a consequence of this address of the Senate. There is no necessity to give all these details ; what is required is the cost of the printing of each department under the two systems respectively, and that would be very valuable information, I trust inasmuch as it does not involve such work as has been expended on the return before us, the First Minister will be good enough to see that it is procured.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been my desire, as well as that also of the government, upon every occasion where returns have been asked for, to comply with the conditions of the order as near as possible. I am very much afraid that my hon. friend's intentions and desires were altogether different from those which he embodied in his resolution. I have noticed that in bringing down returns that have been asked for by either House of parliament, if you do not adhere as nearly as you can to the form and the wording of the resolution, you are very apt to be found fault with. When I laid that return of 300 odd pages before the Senate, I also produced two very large volumes to show to the House the immense amount of labour that would have to be performed in order to comply literally with the wording of this resolution. If the hon. gentleman's resolution had been of the character which he has explained, there would not have been that difficulty, but when you read the resolution you will see that it calls for details :

That an humble address be presented praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement showing details.

Now, if that means anything, it means that everything that had been printed and the items in each department should be mentioned. Then the motion continues :

Showing in detail the several sums paid for printing for the years ending the 30th June, 1883, and the 30th June, 1893, respectively.

There is no question as to the conclusion that any one reading that would come to, that the hon. gentleman's desire was to make a comparison between the cost of printing in 1883 and the cost of printing in 1893. Had that been asked for it would have been brought down, and I trust in such a form as to have enabled him to make a proper comparison ; but in asking for this return he precedes it with the words "in detail." To do that they had to go through the whole of the printing for the year 1883, and for the year 1893, in order to comply with the terms of this order. The hon. gentleman will remember that when I laid the return before the House, I made that explanation and said that if he desired to have all those items copied we should endeavour to do so. If all the hon. gentleman wants is a statement of the expenditure for printing in 1883 and 1893, that could easily have been obtained, but that would not have enabled him to make a fair comparison, because the question would at once arise as to whether the quantity of printing was greater in 1893 than it was in 1883. Hence, in order to make a proper and correct analysis of the work done and the expenditure upon it, we should have to compare each item of 1893 with that of 1883. For instance, you might compare the cost of printing say 10,000 certificates for customs entries in 1883 with the cost of printing a similar quantity in 1893 ; and by going through the accounts of each department in that way you might reach a correct conclusion as to comparative expenditures under the contract system and under the present system. I made such a comparison when I was Minister of Customs. I told one of my clerks to ascertain, for my own satisfaction, the expenditure under the two systems. We required some 100,000 forms of entries printed on foolscap paper—a blank form on one side and rules and regulations on the other. I told my clerk to ascertain what was charged to the department by the Printing Bureau for the 100,000, and what had been paid to McLean & Roger, under the contract system, for printing a similar quantity. To arrive at anything like a correct conclusion as to the comparative expenditure, you would have to go through every department in that way, taking every item. Any one who knows anything about printing or has had anything to do with that branch of business, will understand precisely what I mean. There is a variety of work continually coming in. This year a return costing $500 may be ordered by a department ; next year there might be nothing of the kind. The only way to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the comparative cost of the two systems would be to take some item and find what it costs under the present system, and what it cost under the contract system. By that method you arrive at some idea as to the propriety of continuing the present system. I can assure my hon. friend that in bringing down that return I did not do it in a chaffing mood, though probably I did smile at the idea of bringing a number of ledgers to parliament, but it was not in the spirit of ridiculing the return which I laid on the table. Let me suggest to the hon. gentleman that when he makes a motion of this character, involving so much work and expense he should be as explicit as possible and not leave it to the imagination of those to whom it is sent, to decide what should be done to comply with the order. Otherwise, when he gets it he may know no more than when he moved for it. I am speaking very frankly and I think the hon. gentleman will understand me. I have no doubt that one of those writers to whom he refers had to do the work, and I hope that will be a lesson to him in the future not to put the country to such unnecessary expense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think I can be accused of doing much in that way. I am not in the habit of moving for returns. I hardly ever do it. Perhaps the motion was not in the very best form, but I explained to the House at the time that I made the motion—and I think the hon. the First Minister himself was in charge of the House at the time and understood perfectly—what was desired and what the object was; and the return which came down does not carry out the object in any way. This return gives simply the items, and the columns are not added up. So it is perfectly useless for purposes of comparisons, and inasmuch as we have the corresponding returns for 1882 and 1883, it is clear that, for the purpose for which it was asked, and which was clearly and fully explained at the time the address was adopted, the intention of the House, at any rate, has been defeated.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adoption of the second report of the Standing Committee on the reporting of the Debates and Proceedings of the Senate. He said: The report contains two recommendations. The previous report of the committee suggested that Mr. Smith be employed to prepare reports for the press at a salary of $30 a week. This report is to order the clerk to pay the $30 a week during the whole session from the beginning. The second part suggests to the House that Mr. Smith be employed next year at the same rate of pay, with the understanding, however, that his services may be dispensed with at any time during the session on one week's notice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Smith, I understand, had been employed some time before the adoption of the report, and he has been paid only since the adoption of the report, the first paragraph provides that he is to be paid for the earlier time for which he was not paid under the former report.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (140) "An Act further to amend the Customs Act."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the bill. He said: It is a short bill, and I will read it to the House:

There shall be a Board of Customs which shall consist of the commissioner of customs or any officer for the time being acting as such. The Dominion customs appraisers and the assistant Dominion customs appraisers referred to in any Act respecting the Customs, and such other duly qualified officer or officers of customs as the Governor in Council from time to time appoints, and the said board shall have such powers and perform such duties as are assigned to it by any Act of Parliament of Canada, or by the Governor in Council, and three members of such Board shall form a quorum and be competent to transact the business of the Board at any meeting thereof, whether regular, upon fixed days or dates or specially called by the chairman, of which quorum one member shall be either the commissioner of customs, or the officer for the time being acting as commissioner of customs and then the office of assistant commissioner of customs is hereby abolished.

The object of the bill is simply to rectify an error that has existed in the Customs Act, appointing a board of appraisers, ever since the Act has been upon the statute book. There is no provision in the Act for a quorum. It might be argued that it was necessary to notify all the appraisers throughout the Dominion at every meeting of the board in order to make each meeting a legally constituted board. Notwithstanding that, the Controller of late, or the Minister when there was a Minister at the head of affairs, used to have the commissioner call a meeting of the board once a week and sometimes two or three times a week, to decide questions constantly coming before them. I pointed out some time ago the lack of power which is conferred, and it was decided, after full consideration, that it was necessary in order to legalize the decisions of the board that this amendment should be made. I might mention that it has been a grave question; it has been not only a mooted question but a question which has been agitated by different boards of trade and merchants throughout the country as to the utility of this board, and whether it would not be better to adopt the system now in vogue in the United States under the McKinley and Wilson Bills—that is, the appointing of a board of appraisers composed of representatives of different sections of the trade and have them meet in New York, to decide the differences that are constantly arising at the various ports. That board has been in existence between two and three years, and in watching the operations of the board and the decisions of the board of appraisers, I fail to find that it has been an improvement even upon the old system. There are constantly points referred to them as to the proper interpretation of the United States tariff, upon which they give decisions; and it happens just as frequently, more so than in this country—necessarily so, being larger—they go into the courts and the courts set them aside. As an illustration, there is an item in the tariff providing for the admission free into the United States of certain kinds and qualities of timber. One item reads: “Cedar and other cabinets.” Query: does the word “cedar” there mean cedar pure and simple of any kind or quality, or does it mean cedar which must be a cabinet wood, because it reads “Cedar and other cabinet woods.” By adding the conjunction and the word “other” the courts have decided, contrary to the decision of the board of appraisers, that the cedar must be a cabinet wood, or it is free the same as other timber. There is thirty days to appeal. I do not know that the thirty days have expired.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I see by the British Columbia papers recently that it was decided it should be admitted free.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know the courts have decided that unless it is cabinet wood subject to a high polish, it was to be admitted free. My point is this—whether that is decided finally yet or not: If the thirty days have elapsed during which the appraisers, on behalf of the government of the United States, can appeal that is the law; if it has not expired, the case may go to the Supreme Court of the United States for aught we know. The proposal that has been made by the boards of trade, and particularly by the Montreal Board of Trade, has been re-echoed by the boards of the different sections of the country. Some boards in small towns, where they have little or no importations, have simply adopted the petition because it was sent to them from the metropolitan commercial city of the Dominion. In a conversation not long ago with the president and some other gentlemen of that board of trade, I think I convinced them that their proposition, if carried out, would not accomplish the object they had in view. In the discussion of this bill in the other House, a motion was made by one gentleman affirming the principle of appointing a board somewhat similar to that which exists in New York, and he went on to say that you should have one man representing hardware, another representing dry goods and fancy goods, another representing oils and paints, and so on until you get five or six of them. Let us suppose that a difficulty arises in Montreal or in Toronto as to the proper ruling and classification of a piece of cloth. You all know the complication of our tariff which makes provision for different duties on the various kinds of cloth. If you refer a question of that kind to this board of experts, who is to decide it? A gentleman who has spent his life in the hardware business is not likely to know anything about such a question; neither is the man who is an expert in chemistry, nor is the man who is dealing in paints, so that in fact you would have a reference, as to the classification of that cloth and the duty to be paid upon it, simply to one man; and that would apply to every other branch of industry. I have my own views upon this question and I explained them to the president of the board of trade. I propose during the recess to see if we cannot adopt a system by which the board, which we are now legally constituting, cannot be relieved of all its duties, but, where questions arise as to the proper meaning of the tariff, be enabled to refer them to an independent court which has no feeling one way or the other and let the merchant, who is fighting his battle, go there and fight it in the same manner that he would before the Controller of Customs and this board, and there have it settled. It would have this effect also: it would relieve the head of the department and the government from charges of partiality which constantly are thrown at their heads, when they really never think of being partial. I believe the present system—perhaps I am a little wedded to it because I proposed it myself—where you have men like the commissioner of customs, the general appraiser, and the assistant commissioner, who have been for years studying questions of this kind are better fitted to give a correct interpretation of the law and to give a more correct decision as to the classification of goods than any other authority; but difficulties arise continually, and importers have become dissatisfied. The government must treat every man alike and impartially. If they could relegate the whole question to some authority independent of the political head of the department, my own impression is that while it might not be better for the merchant, it certainly would relieve the government from any imputation of partiality. I make this statement because there has been some misapprehension as to the conversation to which I have referred, and which has been interpreted into an implied promise. When I had this conversation, I mentioned what I thought would be a remedy, not a remedy in full, but probably one which would give more satisfaction than any board of appraisers, which would be an expensive one, to say the least of it. The bill before this House is very simple, and for the purpose solely of placing the Controller of Customs in a position by which he can have a legally constituted board of appraisers, whose decisions should have full force and effect, unless set aside by a court.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Of whom will the court be composed?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL— I did not say there would be one. That is an idea of my own that I threw out. It is a matter that would have to be very fully considered—to so change the law as to enable the head of the department, whoever he might be, to send the question for dispute over to a certain judge. I will make myself a little more clear, because it is a question that hon. gentlemen may better consider: at present say a dispute arises and seizure is made of goods, whether it be for smuggling or under-valuation. That is sent by the seizing officer, through the collector, to the department. The department then notifies the party from whom the goods were seized, giving him a month's time to put in his defence. The sections of the law which cover questions of seizures and penalties are printed on the back of this notice. At the end of a month, unless previously settled—they are very often settled amicably, sometimes when it is a flagrant case the man says he has no defence—the head of the department makes his decision and the party interested is informed of that decision. If he accepts this, well and good; if he does not, then he can appeal to another court to set that aside. Now, supposing a system of this kind were adopted: as soon as the seizure report is received by the department from the collector or the seizing officer, he might pursue the same course of notifying the party interested and at the same time telling him that he had one month to put in his defence, but he must put it into a court presided over by a certain judge instead of back to the department. That would relieve the department and give a judicial decision which, when given by the head of a department, is very often disputed. That is an outline of what I propose to think about during the coming recess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This bill does not make very much difference in the law as it exists at present. It removes the assistant commissioner. The present board consists of the commissioner of customs, the assistant commissioner, the Dominion customs appraiser and the assistant Dominion customs appraisers. As the leader of the government has stated, the statute did not provide for the number that would form a quorum, but I do not suppose that that has been any practical difficulty in the working of the law. I have not heard that it has been an element that has been at all considered. The board have acted, from time to time, as their own discretion prompted. The bill does not in any way deal with the resolutions which have been adopted by the various boards of trade of Canada calling for some change of the law by which greater uniformity shall prevail in the appraisement of the various imports. It is well known that the same article has, in the past, paid different duties at different ports of entry. I have had, myself, personal experience of it, and brought it up before the department and never been able to get a remedy. I have brought up cases where an article, entered by the same importers, at one port was admitted at a nominal rate of duty while at another port it was charged a high rate. I can mention the case if the hon. gentleman wishes it. Such cases occur constantly. That has induced the Boards of Trade of Toronto, Montreal and other cities, to ask that some other system be adopted. Hon. gentlemen must recognize and it is only human nature that the board of customs appraisers being appointees of the Crown, their whole effort is to increase the rate of duty. From their stand-point it may be a very laudable motive, but it is not a fair board because it is all one sided. It leaves the decision of the case to an interested party, and we know that appeals from decisions are rarely taken. A merchant doing a large business is afraid to contest a case, because he knows very well that it brings on him the anger and indignation of the customs authorities, and they hit him in another way. What ought to be provided, and what I have always advocated, is a quick appeal—some short method of appeal by which an independent judgment can be obtained. The Premier takes that view himself. Naturally the head of the department is anxious to save his own officials. If they feel they are to be over-ruled from time to time, they are not so zealous, and therefore the tendency of the head of the department is to sustain those who are under him. I hope if he wants to serve the commercial life of this community, he will propose next session, some short method by which an independent appeal can be made to a judge without involving any serious costs. Judges have to interpret cases of a similar character every day. There is no reason why a judge should not be able to draw a proper conclusion from the Customs Act. The parties interested would necessarily call in expert witnesses, and he would be guided entirely by independent testimony of that kind. It is perfectly clear there is a great deal of dissatisfaction at present existing. The moment the duties went up to a high figure the dissatisfaction became all the greater, and it was all the more marked when it was known that the ruling at one port was not the same as the ruling at another port. It was that feeling that prompted the boards of trade of the various cities to send forward the resolutions, which have been submitted recently, calling for a change of some kind in the mode of appraisal. This bill does not meet what is desired by the boards of trade of Canada. It drops the assistant commissioner out of the list; that is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is there to be an assistant commissioner at all?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know whether the post of assistant commissioner has been filled since Mr. Watters ceased to fill it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, it has not been.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In that respect it differs from the existing law, and it also makes it clear that three shall form a quorum, but it must be quite obvious that those three are subordinate officers of the department, and they naturally desire to have their judgment conform to that of the superior officer. They are not an independent authority in any sense. Our experience tells us so, and it has been the experience of the mercantile community of Canada, and it is for that reason that it is thought desirable to have some change. The only change that I see which is likely to be acceptable is the one that prevails in the United States, where, by a very short and easy process, you can take an appeal to a local judge to interpret the law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the system in the States.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is an appeal to the courts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is an appeal, in the United States, from the decision of the appraisers.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—While we have petitions from the boards of trade in Montreal and other places, I would not have either the government or this House understand that the petition from the board of trade in Montreal was anything like unanimous. I have heard the statement made by many prominent merchants in Montreal that they did not approve of it in any way. I was asked to present the petition here, and I consented, but I said that I was not in accord with it, and that is the view of a great many of our merchants, as well as merchants in other places, about the matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope the hon. Minister will carry out his promise, or something in the nature of a promise, of providing for an appeal from the decision of the appraisers.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—It has been stated that when a seizure has been made for the infringement of the tariff, this seizure is followed by a delay of thirty days, so as to afford the party interested some opportunity of either acquiescing with it or of settling. Now, instead of an appeal, my suggestion would be that such a seizure, after thirty days, should be submitted for the ratification of a judge, who should have power to inquire and investigate and decide whether the seizure was legally made or whether it should be released.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That suggestion is possibly a very good one, but to carry it out literally would prolong rather than expedite the settlement of the seizure. I wish to be distinctly understood as to what fell from my lips in the shape of a promise—I said I would consider the matter from that standpoint; whether I can get my colleagues to agree with me is another thing. My hon. friend who has just spoken has made a very good suggestion, provided you did not have the delays which would occur after it was referred to the courts. My suggestion was this, that the moment the seizure papers are received the parties upon whom the seizure has been made would be notified and the papers at once sent to the judge. Then let them put in their defence to the judge at the earliest moment they pleased. The only difficulty which presents itself to me is that very question of delay, and a prompt decision is highly important to the merchant, because a merchant may bring in his spring goods and if a question as to the proper duty to be levied on them is raised, and if he is delayed a month or two before the case is decided, the season is over and he may sustain a serious loss. If the decision should happen to be in favour of the lower duty, and he had sold them subject to the decision of the court, he would make something. If on the contrary he had to pay a higher duty, then he would lose that amount. It is not an easy matter to deal with, as those who have had experience will testify. My object is to make it as simple as possible. We all know that in law there are great delays; if matters get into the hands of the lawyers the delay will be more than in the departments. I realize the truth of the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa that differences occur in the ratings of duty for goods at the different ports. It arises many times in such a way that while the difference of the rating may appear to the outside world as being erroneous and absurd, they may be strictly correct. Sometimes you will get goods that bear a certain rate of duty. They are imported, say, at Montreal, and admitted at a certain rate of duty. Then you go to Toronto and in less than a month the class of goods bearing the same name is so changed as to bring it under another item of the tariff and subject to a different duty. You may call the article wincey; real wincey is made in a certain way and that is rated 20 per cent in one port. Then it would be imported in another port, and known as wincey in the trade, but made of such a mixture of material as to bear a higher rate of duty. The merchant might say "in Montreal they only pay 20 per cent and why do you rate it at 25 per cent here." Until you can put the two articles together, no one can tell whether the officer at Toronto is right or not. Another fact is this: the tariff of to-day may be changed next week. The moment it is changed the manufacturers begin to produce goods that are used for precisely the same purpose in such a way as to bring them under the lower rate. That is going on continually, and just as long as you have different rates of duty upon different articles, and different qualities of goods, and human nature remains as it is—until it arrives at a state of perfection which I do not expect to live long enough to see, more particularly in dealing with custom matters—these differences will arise. The hon. gentleman knows they arose during his own administration. I can produce scores of books of decisions given by my predecessor, the Honourable Mr. Burpee. I find that he had just the same difficulties before this "complicated" tariff of ours existed at all. Difficulties arise so long as you have men all over the country to appraise these goods, and just so long as you have importers who are not scrupulously honest. I suppose they are as bad as politicians in some cases; they try to get an advantage where they can, and that will continue to be the case as long as we have a tariff of different rates of duties. I think I had quite a battle with my hon.

friend on a question that he brought under my notice, when he said he had to pay more duties than he ought to have paid. I have a good defence, but I do not think it is worth while to enter into a discussion on the subject just now.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I read over the petitions, and I am convinced, with the First Minister, that the employment of customs experts would not meet the objects of the trade generally. It would be an expensive board, without securing any adequate benefit, or remove the causes of the alleged grievances, and you could not appoint a board with sufficient knowledge of every branch of commerce. The present board, as constituted, is as good as any we can have. The only question in my mind is with regard to the appeal from any decision of the board. That should be as summary and as prompt as possible and should be to a judge.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—For a ratification of a seizure?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Yes. I consider that it is all that is necessary to meet the objections to the present system.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The objection made to this proposal is the long delay which might take place, and which might be dangerous to trade. If the hon. Minister decides upon bringing in a measure of this kind, I would suggest that provision should be made to allow the merchant to give a bond, pending the decision, so that he could get his goods meanwhile, and not incur the risk of losing the sale.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The moment you take a bond, you would have the political pressure brought to bear to release that bond. Such pressure not only exists to-day but has existed from time immemorial, and will continue to exist.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The only way is to deposit the duty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a practical suggestion, which might be accepted.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I beg to ask the hon. Minister of Customs whether the regulation of his department continues the same, namely, to rate the duties without regard to the value of the goods, providing they come under a certain head? For instance, suppose canned fish or canned fruits are being imported; the duty on certain canned fruits being very high, of a very superior class, they would put on a certain valuation in Toronto. Then, there are other goods of an inferior quality, being made of an inferior class of goods. Take canned apples, canned pumpkins, canned peaches, canned apricots—there is a great difference in value. I remember importing goods of that kind, although not as a merchant. A debt was owing to me in the United States; I found the party had failed, and I went over, and was obliged to accept such goods as he had on hand. I got an inferior lot of goods, of course, at a low price, and I offered the duty, as specified in the statutes, of 25 per cent of the cost of the goods at the place where they had been manufactured and canned, and where I got them. I could not get them passed in Toronto at those rates. They wanted to put on the highest rate that was put upon a higher class of goods, because they said the cans were got up in the same manner, and they could not tell anything of the value of the contents of the can. They said I might apply to Ottawa, and get a reduction there. I happened to come to Ottawa in the course of a month or two, and I applied to my hon. friend before me. He took me into his office, and sent for the first officer, I suppose, and consulted him. I thought that because a little delay had occurred after the goods came over they might not be so good, and might be inferior, and I wanted the duties reduced on that account, but the department would not do it. I asked my hon. friend, if I brought evidence to prove the value, or had evidence taken in Toronto as to the real value of the goods, whether he would accept that, but he said no. The consequence was the duty they wanted me to pay was all that the goods were worth, and I made up my mind that I would not pay the duty and the freight in addition, so the goods remain where they were. If I had gone into court and got experts to prove what the goods cost I might have obtained them, but the goods did not realize as much as I offered to pay in duties. They realized a very small sum. These things are very annoying to a man who under any circumstances has to import goods. It is very annoying to have to pay a second value or lose the goods, or go to expense before you can get them. I have never imported goods of that kind since.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Where they imitations of a better class of goods?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—No, I do not think so. There was the name of the article on the can. It was canned fruit, but very inferior cheap goods. The duties they asked would amount to more than the goods were worth, and more than I had paid for them. I wish to ask whether the regulations are still the same?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The regulations in reference to the rate of duty are precisely the same as they have been since Confederation. There has been no change at all. The law provides strictly and positively how articles shall be rated for duty. If the goods bore a specific duty, the quality of the goods would have nothing whatever to do with the rate of duty which the importer would have to pay. They might be valueless, or they might be very good. If canned fruit bore two cents per can, the quality would have nothing whatever to do with the rate of duty to be imposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman said the duty was 25 per cent.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes I know, but if they bore an ad valorem duty of 25 or 20 per cent that rate of duty would be levied upon the value of the goods in the market where purchased, and not what they were worth in Canada. You might bring 100 cans of peaches from the United States and pay 10 cents a can for them, or 20 cents, and when you got them in Canada you might find they were worthless. That would not make any difference, as far as the law is concerned. That would be an incident of which you would have to bear the results of loss or profit, as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I offered the duty of 25 per cent upon what the articles cost, and I thought what they cost me at the place of production was the value.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; you are wrong. You might go to a fruit market in the United States and buy one thousand cans of fruit and the man might say to you, "Mr. Reesor, where are you going to sell these?" You would say, "I am going to take them to Canada." Then he might say, "Well, if you take them to Canada I will give them to you at 20 per cent less than I would sell to my neighbour who deals in them in my market"; you could not have the advantage of that 20 per cent when you came back to Toronto, you would have to pay the duty on the fair market value of the goods in the market where they were purchased at the time of the purchase. Supposing you went to that market and they gave you 1,000 cans, would you have under the law, or would it be right equitable or just that you should bring that 1,000 cans that you got for nothing and compete with my hon. friend on my left or any one else on the market? The law recognizes nothing of that kind. You may get them as cheaply as you please, but the law lays down the principle that, as far as Canada is concerned, we impose the same rate of duty upon you, who obtained the articles cheap as, we do on the man who pays the full market value.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I understand that, but this is not the case of that kind at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know nothing of your case.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I want an answer to my question as to my case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If you would give me the papers and give me an opportunity to examine the value of the goods in the market whence they were exported, and give me time to ascertain the price at which they were sold, I will give you an answer, but otherwise I cannot.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I cannot do that now.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The probability is that it was a job lot, or you may have got them cheaper for exportation than they would sell them for home consumption.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If I could have sold them for the money I paid for them, I would have been satisfied and would not have imported them at all; but I was willing to pay duty on them on the price I paid and I doubted whether they were worth it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You may have been right or you may have been wrong. If you bought them cheaper than their market price at the time you would have to pay duty on the value of the goods in the market from whence exported.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I did not buy them cheaper than the market value. How is a man to prove the market value? Must he go and bring over the people from whom he purchased them?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I might go to New York for a few days and see goods sold at auction, and purchase, bonâ fide, a certain quantity at lower rates than they would be sold by the wholesale merchant. Now, I claim that I should only pay the ad valorem duty on what I gave for the goods. I should be allowed to import the goods and simply pay the duty on the price that I honestly paid for them at auction or otherwise? Why should I be handicapped because I happened to get a bargain, because I was fortunate enough to be there and had cash to pay for the goods? Why should I be put on a level with the man who purchases through agents and who may have to pay more than the real market value? Certainly merchants should get all the advantages they can for their wisdom and experience in business, and not be placed on the same level with men who have not had experience. I have always held that view, but I know it is not the view held in the Customs Department. It is a hardship to men who know how to look after their business, to be put on a level with men who do not understand their business. There is no advantage in being clever and capable of buying at the cheapest rates, when you compel a man to pay duty on the same value that is paid by inexperienced men. It is an arbitrary law and should be changed.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The law ought to be amended.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time.

The bill was referred to the Committee of Whole and reported without amendment, and was then read a third time and passed.

PENITENTIARIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (131) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting Penitentiaries."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the bill. He said: I will explain the details to-morrow at the committee stage. The general principle of the bill is to create uniformity in the payment of salaries to the different wardens and officers of penitentiaries, in order that there may be no difficulty in making changes between the wardens and deputy wardens of the different penitentiaries. It also provides for the classification of the chaplains as well. So that, when a difficulty arises, or dissatisfaction exists, it may be possible to remove a warden from one penitentiary to another, or where you require an experienced man you can send him to a penitentiary where such a man is required.

Hon. Mr. POWER—While there may be a good deal of force in the argument of the Minister with respect to the desirability of uniformity of salaries in the case of the wardens, I do not think that that extends to the surgeons and chaplains. As a rule, the surgeon is some one who lives at the place where the penitentiary is situated, and the chaplain is in the same position. In looking at the schedules of the bill, I find that the salary of the surgeon is to be $1,500 and the salary of the chaplain $800. Those salaries appear to be reasonable enough for large penitentiaries, like those of St. Vincent de Paul and Kingston, but take the case of a comparatively small penitentiary, like that at Moncton, or the penitentiary in British Columbia or the one in Manitoba; there is no reason why $800 should be paid to the chaplain, or $1,500 to the surgeon at any of those places. A medical man residing at Moncton, or New Westminster, or Winnipeg can very well attend to the local penitentiary—there are comparatively few criminals kept in any of them. It is a great mistake to confine chaplains and surgeons to the penitentiary service with practically almost nothing to do. That is one point to which I propose to direct attention when the bill is referred to committee of the whole. Of course, there is something in what the First Minister has said with respect to the wardens, but why uniformity should go down to all the other offices I do not see. In a penitentiary where there are 400 prisoners, the surgeon, the chaplain, the schoolmaster, the hospital overseer, the steward and other officials have all a great deal more to do than in a little penitentiary where there may be only 40 prisoners. The net result of this will be to increase the expenditure on penitentiaries.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If a chaplain's duties are to be confined solely to the penitentiary, if he is not to be allowed to perform any service outside of the penitentiary, then I cannot see why the salaries should not be uniform, and the same remark applies to every officer whose time is solely occupied by his duty. In case a change should be necessary from one to another of the institutions, there would be no difficulty in making the change if the salaries were uniform. An officer would have a disinclination to change to another penitentiary if his salary would, by that change, be reduced. In the interests of the service generally, I think the salaries should be uniform especially if the duties and services are to be confined to the institution, so that those objections would not arise, as they have arisen with regard to the penitentiary in British Columbia, I believe the salaries there are not equal to those in other penitentiaries, and improvements, which were desirable, could not be made in consequence of officers being unwilling to change at a pecuniary loss.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 19th July, 1895.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

FIFTH REPORT.

Hon. Mr. READ, from the Joint Committee on the printing of Parliament, presented their fifth report. He said: The two reports which this report amends provide for an increase of pay to a Mr. Chamberlain, which has been objected to, and it also recommends that an increase to another person whose name I do not recollect, should commence in 1892. This report recommends that the increase should commence the 1st of July this year instead. The other reports recommends that a certain man, by the name of Meehan, be employed in the distribution department at $400 a year. This report recommends that he be paid for this session, as he has been employed this session at the same rate as a sessional clerk. The former report recommends that three copies of a certain map be sent to each member of the House of Commons and each Senator. This report amends the former report by providing that only one be sent to each member of the House of Commons and each Senator. I may say that this is an economical government; they do not wish to increase the expense. I believe the Finance Minister objected to these recommendations of the committee, whose members perhaps did not feel that they had to furnish the money themselves. I move that this report, in conjunction with the two other reports to which it refers, be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTRA SITTINGS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That for the remainder of the session there be two distinct sittings of the Senate upon each day of the session, the first of such sittings to begin today at three o'clock in the afternoon, and to continue until six o'clock in the afternoon, unless the Senate be sooner adjourned, the second of such sittings to begin at eight o'clock in the evening, and to continue until such time as the Senate adjourns, each of such sittings to be considered as a distinct sitting.

The motion was agreed to.

MONTREAL HARBOUR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DESJARDINS—I wish to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that the documents relating to the harbour of Montreal, which he has laid on the table, are not complete. The most important document is missing—the report of the three engineers appointed to make a complete investigation of the question. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be able to inform the House whether he has received any official notice with reference to the removal of the embargo from Canadian cattle. This morning's Citizen contains the following item:

It is reported that the Belgian government is about to authorize the importation of several shipments of Canadian cattle and if they prove satisfactory the embargo will be removed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, I had an intimation from a Belgian gentleman, unofficially, however, that the Belgian government were prepared to remove the embargo upon certain conditions. Just before coming to the Senate I received the following cable from Sir Charles Tupper :

Am informed by Van Bruyssel that Belgian Government instructing Consul at Ottawa by mail that they will permit experimental shipments of Canadian cattle to Belgian ports, October, November and December, and will remove the embargo altogether if no pleuro-pneumonia is discovered.

It is very satisfactory, and as I have every reason to believe that there is no such disease in Canada, we may at least look forward to have the embargo removed entirely so far as Belgian ports are concerned. The moment I got this I sent a copy of it to the leader of the other House in order that he might give the same information to the Commons.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (143) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved that the 41st rule be suspended with respect to this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I object to the suspension of the rule. This is a bill which should not be passed at all, and under the circumstances the rule should not be suspended.

The second reading of the bill was fixed for the next sitting of the House.

SOUTH SHORE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (88) "An Act respecting the South Shore Railway Company, (Limited)."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved the suspension of the 41st rule of the House with reference to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved the second reading of the bill. He said: There has been a conflict between two companies which I believe has been amicably arranged in the other House. All the debts of the old company are to be liquidated. The costs of litigation are assured, and the charter of the old company is not to be revived. It will be thoroughly discussed in committee.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

DOMINION OF CANADA TRUSTS COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (100) "An Act to incorporate the Dominion Trusts Company."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW moved the suspension of the 41st rule with respect to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW moved the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I have received a telegram that there is another company with very nearly the same name, and it is desirable that we should not have two companies doing the same kind of business under similar names. I suppose the proper place to have the name of this company changed will be in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which it is to be referred.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORESTERS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (84) "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Supreme Court of the Order of Foresters.

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW moved the suspension of the 41st rule with respect to this bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is an opposed bill. There has been a very considerable expression of opinion against the policy of allowing this legislation to go. The gentleman who is the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee regretted that he was obliged to leave before the bill could be considered, and therefore I think it should not be pushed on till the copies of the bill are in the possession of hon. gentlemen. The chief objection to it is that they propose that the beneficiaries shall receive hereafter $5,000 instead of $3,000, and the last amendment in the House of Commons Bill contained a very extraordinary clause which allowed any member of the order to leave at any time and join at a subsequent period; in the meantime he did not forfeit his position, except that during the time he was in arrears he would not receive any benefits, but the amounts that were due from him were not collectable. It became merely optional whether he should pay them or not. I then had the curiosity to turn up their last return and found that the society last year received from all sources $700,000 odd.

Those are the receipts of every kind; and the expense of management was $136,000 which was rather an extraordinary condition of things, showing that the society was rather run for the officers. The actuaries and insurance companies in Ontario, and, I believe, in Ottawa, declared that it was a very dangerous permission to give the society. It means that the society would become in a very short time insolvent if permitted to obtain the amendments proposed.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—There are other grave objections to the bill besides those mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa. While they are a benefit society, so-called, it is all very well; but if they are going to make it an insurance company, then they had better come under the insurance laws. The life insurance companies have to submit to all the directions of the inspector of insurance here. We are dictated as to how we shall invest our money, and how we are to keep what amount we have on hand to meet the policies of those who may become claimants upon the company, so that they may be perfectly safe. While these were benefit companies for amounts ranging from $500 to $1,000 or even up to $3,000, there was nothing said about them, but if life insurance companies have to undergo all those restrictions and this society wants to take the place of life insurance companies, there is no objection to their doing that at all, but let them come under the life insurance laws just the same as life insurance companies do, and then there can be no objection, except the one spoken of by the hon. member for Ottawa—that is, that they are not generally so well managed as a good life insurance company is. Life insurance companies have the very best men to manage their affairs. We know that the men who have charge of this society do not possess the same ability, because they are not paid as well to look after their affairs; and I am afraid that as years go on many of those who have been paying their monthly dues will find that their money is lost. The society now want $5,000, and in that same circular they say that it should be $10,000. There is no doubt if they get $5,000 now they will want $10,000 soon, and those who have been paying in their dues I am afraid in many cases will find that the society will go to pieces and there will be nothing to pay claims against them. Our good and paternal government, who have passed laws to make insurance companies good and secure, should be just as particular about making the societies safe for the public. There are three or four reasons why this society should not be allowed to increase beyond the present amount. They have already reached the limit to which they should be allowed to go. Even in the other House, the chairman of the committee was satisfied that I was right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the bill before me now, and the clause to which I made reference reads in this way :

No person who is, or who has been, or hereafter becomes a member of the order shall be liable for any assessment, dues or fines to the order or for any debts or liabilities of the order, but all payment of assessments, dues or fines shall be voluntary on the part of the member: provided always that during the time any member is in default with respect to any assessments, dues or fines such member shall not, nor shall his beneficiaries, be entitled to any pecuniary benefits of the order.

In the case of an epidemic, the members may drop out and decline to pay their calls. You are interfering with the law of the land. They have entered into a compact with the company to pay those dues, and here we declare that they shall be exonerated and it shall be perfectly voluntary. We have not authority to disturb civil contracts. That is a question purely within the jurisdiction of the province. Civil rights are, we all know, an adjunct of provincial power and this parliament has no right or authority to deal with the subject. We cannot cancel those contracts already made under the law of the province. I shall object to the passage of the bill and take a vote on the second reading.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That amendment was proposed in the House and adopted. The association now has a reserve fund to the amount of $1,500,000, and a very large number of the parties interested in this association are men of considerable means and good standing in society, and will be able to meet any obligations they incur. As I understand, the whole point involved is whether they should be allowed to issue policies for $5,000 instead of $3,000. The original bill gave them power to issue policies for $3,000. The principle is affirmed, and all they want is that the amount shall be increased to $5,000.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—What is the annual payment?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—About one-half of what is charged by insurance companies, or less, but they are satisfied. The society is well managed, and is perfectly willing to come under the provisions of the Dominion Insurance Act, I believe perfectly willing to pay the $100,000, and to be subject to the inspection of the government inspector of insurance. They are willing to comply with all those conditions. I have nothing to do with the bill, but was simply asked to take charge of it. They went into a searching inquiry in the other House and decided to grant the society the privilege conferred by the amendment read by the hon. member from Ottawa. There are parties who think that $5,000 is little enough to give to any family in case of death. If they can do that, it affects no person but themselves, and in the event of the company becoming insolvent, these original parties are still liable to be called upon for the assessments. In that case they would pay everything due to parties sustaining loss. However, these matters can be better discussed in committee. I think we will satisfy the committee that they are acting in a becoming manner and deserve to obtain the concession they ask at the present time.

Hon. Mr. KAULAACH—I do not know what the bill is, but if it comes under the superintendence of the inspector of insurance—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it does not.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Then, I think we should not grant them this extended power. We should place some guard on them and provide some means by which supervision should be had of the financial condition of the company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The suggestion made by the hon. member from Lunenburg seems to me to have a good deal of force, and if I might also make a suggestion, I think as this principle of insurance is not as well and fully understood as what is termed "old line policies of life insurance," it would be well if my hon. friend would not push his opposition to the extent of a vote upon the second reading, but would allow it to go to committee where those who are interested in the measure could make the full explanations that are necessary in order to arrive at a proper understanding of the whole question. The bill has objectionable features, but this society I believe is surrounded—I am speaking now subject to correction—by protection which does not exist in many societies of a similar character. That is why I suggested the propriety of allowing the second reading to take place, and then have a full discussion in committee by those who understand it better than any one here, and who would give us all the information required. I cannot see that the objection used by the hon. gentleman from Ottawa should have any particular force. If my recollection serves me right, the expense attending the management of the vast and extensive business of this society is much less than that of the general life insurance companies of the country. According to the statement of the hon. gentleman, it is some 15 per cent. If you look at the returns of the expenditures connected with a large insurance company, you will find the expenses are a good deal more than 15 per cent. Then the other objection as to what might occur in an epidemic, I think should not be considered. That would be just the time the parties would not withdraw. If there were an epidemic, and likely to be sickness and death, that is the time I would try and scrape up money to keep my policy good, so that my family might receive some money in case the epidemic seized me. The danger that the hon. gentleman suggests as being an objection to this bill is, to my mind, the strongest possible argument that could be advanced in its favour. It is true that if an epidemic were so extensive that the demands upon the funds of the assured were so great that they could not be met, there might be some force in the objection; but that would apply to all insurance companies existing.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And particularly to mutuals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. Under the circumstances I think it would be as well if my hon. friend would allow the bill to receive its second reading and go to committee without a vote.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The inspector of insurance companies was before the committee in the other House and objected to the bill as being against the whole policy with respect to insurance companies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nevertheless the House of Commons passed it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I insist on my objection.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Inasmuch as the bill gives the society the right to issue larger policies than they have the right to issue now, it should be placed in such a shape that the policies would be equally safe with those of the regular insurance companies; otherwise their own members would be the sufferers. The great mass of the people are not in a position to look into such affairs for themselves. They take them on trust. While the society might get on very well as a beneficiary organization to secure small amounts to their members, they may not so manage their business as to secure larger amounts.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—In view of the objection, I move that the bill be read the second time at the next meeting of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (105) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Land and Security Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

SHORE LINE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

A Message was received from the House of Commons to return Bill (H) "An Act respecting the Shore Line Railway Company," and to acquaint the Senate that they had made certain amendments thereto.

Hon Mr. POWER—The Bill which we sent down from this House left the legislation of the province of New Brunswick in operation. In the House of Commons they thought that it was better that this company should be altogether under the authority of the Dominion Parliament, and they have inserted in this bill the clauses of the model railway bill which we have adopted here, so as to bring this road, and the company which manages it, completely under the control of the Dominion Parliament. The amendments have been examined by the law clerk and are accepted by the promoters, and I therefore move that they be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

PENITENTIARIES' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on Bill (131.) "An Act to amend the Act respecting Penitentiaries."

(In the Committee.)

On the third clause :

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think that clause should be stricken out. The Penitentiaries' Act, very wisely I think, provided that the surgeons and the chaplains might do other business than attending to the penitentiaries. This amendment proposes to alter that and to provide that the surgeon and chaplain shall not be allowed to do anything beyond attending to their duties in the penitentiary. If we refer to the last report of the Minister of Justice on the penitentiaries, we shall see how much work some of those officers will have. I take the case of the British Columbia penitentiary. I find that the Protestant chaplain on the 30th June, 1894, had under his care 76 convicts, and that the Roman Catholic chaplain had at the same time under his care 32 convicts—108 convicts in all. The penitentiary is situated in a rather healthy place, judging from the surgeon's report. It surely does not require all the time of the surgeon, or one-tenth of his time, to look after the physical health of 108 convicts, and it certainly does not require all the time of the two chaplains to look after the spiritual health of the same convicts. I think the old system should be adhered to. The number of convicts in Dorchester penitentiary is a little greater than in the British Columbia penitentiary. At Stony Mountain, in Manitoba, there are only 75 altogether, and it is perfectly absurd that there should be two chaplains and a surgeon attached to each institution who are not allowed to do anything else than attend to the convicts. We know that idleness is the mother of nearly all evil, and if the chaplains have nothing to do, as will be the case most of the time, they may get into mischief. Then the effect on the surgeons will be even worse. I appeal to the hon. gentleman from Kingston, although I know how desirous he is of supporting every measure introduced by the government, if he does not think that the surgeon who has nothing else to do but to attend to 100 healthy men is not likely, in the course of a few years, to become unable to properly discharge his professional duties. No matter how well a man may be up in his profession, if he goes out of it altogether, as he would in this case, for five years, he ceases to be qualified. We have got along very well under the present system for 28 years. I presume the hon. First Minister will say that it is high and dry Toryism to say that, but there is this to be said about it, we are not aware that any very serious abuse has arisen. As I understand, the whole change is the result of the trouble in connection with the British Columbia penitentiary. We have had several Ministers of Justice; I do not say that they all had as much ability as the hon. gentleman who now fills the position, but they were men of considerable wisdom and prudence, and all those Ministers of Justice during the 28 years did not think it necessary to make this change, which has been deemed necessary within the first six months' incumbency of his office by the present inspector of penitentiaries. While I am not opposing the bill, I think this particular provision should be stricken out, and that we should allow those convicts to have the services of a practicing medical man who will be up in his business, and that we should not tie up so many clergymen, of whom the supply is rather limited, in those small institutions. It is right enough in Kingston and St. Vincent de Paul, where there are a large number of criminals, that the services of those officers should be given exclusively to the criminals. I doubt if it be wise; still it is not very objectionable, but it is objectionable in the extreme in the smaller institutions, and I move that this clause of the bill be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—As the hon. gentleman has appealed to me, I may just remark that I do not think the chaplain and the surgeon should be linked together, because we can understand it will take as much labour for the chaplain to minister to five as to 500. Supposing he had to read prayers twice a day, as I think they are required to do, it is immaterial how many you read prayers before. Therefore the Protestant chaplain would have the same labour in one institution that he would have in another; a Catholic chaplain would probably have a little more labour in the larger institution. With regard to the surgeon, there is a good deal of force in what the hon. gentleman has said, and I do not think that the salaries ought to be uniform at all. There is no comparison between the amount of labour which the surgeon would have in attending the Kingston penitentiary and the labour in an institution with say 40, 50, 100, or 150 people. I do not think it would be wise in a smaller penitentiary not to allow the surgeon to practice outside, because such practice would help him to keep up in his profession. There is nothing in which a man will go behind faster or more thoroughly than in the practice of surgery. Therefore I think it would be wise to make a gradation. The surgeon in any of the large penitentiaries, where there are 700 or 800 convicts, has to attend to all the officers of the prison and their families also, I think; that would give him abundance of work and keep him occupied, but in a smaller penitentiary I think there should be less salary, and we should allow the surgeon to practice outside. His experience in the prison would be of some value, and it would be well to promote him. I do not know what the intention of the government is as to that. I presume they have taken the opinion of all the officials of the institutions and of men who have had experience, and therefore I would hesitate very much to interfere with any of their views as embodied in this bill, backed as it is by experience and by an uncommon degree of intelligence. The only objection that I see is that the salaries of the surgeons are made uniform in all the prisons. I do not see any possible similarity between the penitentiary in Kingston and the one at Stony Mountain, or the one in British Columbia, and I think that if a change could be made in that respect without mutilating the bill, it would be for the better.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One cannot discuss the clause without reference to the schedule of salaries and I fail to see what prompted the government to place the salaries all on the same level where the work is of so different a character. I find, in looking at the returns of the Stony Mountain penitentiary that the whole number of convicts under the Protestant chaplain was 49, and the whole number under the Catholic chaplain was 22. It is proposed to give $800 to each clergyman, although the services of the two must be very much less than of one at Kingston or St. Vincent de Paul. At Kingston there are, on an average, 500 convicts. The difference is so marked that one fails to see the reason for making the salaries uniform. The services are altogether out of proportion. Kingston penitentiary has an average of 500 convicts, St. Vincent de Paul, 400.

Hon. Mr. CLEMON—Kingston about 600.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Dorchester, 175, and Manitoba about 75; the disproportion of convicts is so very large that it would seem an unwise proposal to put the salaries on the same basis where the services are so very different.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not think the quantity of services rendered should make any difference in the salary as long as the officer is not permitted to do any work outside. The clergymen are zealous in their work, and do all the good they can. The same may be said of the surgeons: in the large institutions, such as Kingston, they have officials under them. If the intention is that there should be no work done outside the penitentiary by the surgeon or clergyman, their salaries should be equal, but if they are allowed to go outside and practice, then there might be a difference in the salary. Sometimes there are frictions in some of the institutions, and it is desirable to change officials from one institution to another, and there has been a great difficulty I understand in getting some officers to make that change when they would not get the privileges in one that they enter that they enjoyed in the one they leave. I approve of the change. I believe it will be advantageous to the institution, and therefore the salaries should be made equal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—

One of the principal objects in establishing a system of uniformity is to enable the penitentiaries to be governed on one general principle, and to enable the government to move an official, at any time they deem it desirable, from one institution to another. Hence the regulation of the salaries, which, apparently, are unequal. There is some force in the statement that a penitentiary with 500 or 600 convicts should have a man who understands his business, and might very properly be said, if it were confined to that statement, that his duties would be more responsible and greater than in a smaller penitentiary, until you come to look at it from its practical working and practical operation. Kingston penitentiary has 500 or 600 convicts. The warden in that penitentiary has a number of officials under him to assist him in the management of the institution. The physician, instead of having to do all the work himself, has a laboratory presided over by chemists and those who can render the assistance necessary in the proper discharge of his duties. So that while, apparently, the work and the responsibility are greater, it is not so. The man who has the management of a smaller penitentiary requires to be a man of as much energy and knowledge of the work which he has to perform as the man who occupies a similar position in a larger institution. The salaries, bear it in mind, apply only to the future and not to the present incumbents. If a physician seeks employment in a penitentiary, and is prepared to accept it at the $1,500 per annum, which is a larger salary than is now paid, with the understanding that he is to give his whole time and attention to the duties of his office, to look continuously after the work of the penitentiary, he knows what he is doing and he need not accept the position unless he pleases. The same remark applies to the other occupations. If you require the full service of a physician and he knows when he is appointed that he is precluded from earning money by practising his profession round the country, why should you object to his accepting the position upon those terms? If he does not like it, all he has to say is "I do not want it." All I can say is, that with the prospect of a vacancy in the Kingston penitentiary to-day I can show a large pile of papers of applicants for that position, all from good men in Kingston and outside of Kingston. I had a visit from my hon. friend, who accompanied an applicant who was quite willing to take that place—a physician who occupies a prominent position in Kingston. There is no difficulty in filling those positions, and why should outsiders be so solicitous about men seeking employment under government for fear they will not get enough remuneration? That applies with the same force to chaplains. There are some chaplains, both Catholic and Protestant, who attend to their duties with a great deal of assiduity and devote their time, energy and ability to promoting the welfare of the convicts. There are others, again, both Protestant and Catholics, who devote their whole time to their parish, paying very little attention to their duty in the penitentiary, making it in fact a secondary consideration altogether. As long as they know they can get $800, they devote their time and attention to outside work rather than to that for which they receive government pay. A full investigation into the salaries paid in Anglican churches and Roman Catholic churches shows that $800 is a higher average than is paid to the whole of the clergymen of the Dominion. That may seem strange, but it is the fact. It only proves that men of education, who devote their whole time and attention, to the welfare of their fellowmen, do it at a salary which is scarcely more than is paid to an ordinary clerk. It is believed, after thorough investigation, that it is much better that there should be a fixed salary, and that the person who attends the prison should give his undivided attention to it. Mark you, I say again, it does not apply to those who now hold positions, it only applies to future appointments. I have a memorandum in my hand made by the inspector, which is the result of an investigation into the subject, and as this clause which applies to surgeons and chaplains, appears to be the most objectionable, I take the liberty of occupying the attention of the Senate by reading portions of it. I may say, parenthetically, that I differ from my hon. friend behind me who thinks that chaplains and surgeons should not go hand in hand. One attends to the needs of the present life; the other tries to fit them for a future life. So that while the surgeon is performing his duties, certainly he ought to allow a clergyman to be present to prepare the convict for the future. In the paper before me it is stated that, from the very best information that can be gained, the average salary of clergymen in Canada in charge of parishes is about $700. This may be surprising to some, I know it was to me when I saw it, because I thought it was much larger. He adds:

The average salary of clergymen in some of the non-episcopal churches is slightly above that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think any-one questioned the amount of the salary at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think it is too much. On the contrary I scarcely think it is enough. Where you appoint a man to perform such duties I should not object if it was made $1,000 instead of $800—

The duties of a prison chaplain are responsible, but not nearly so onerous as of those engaged in parish work. No travel is required and therefore no expense for horses, carriages, &c., which is an important item, especially in country congregations and parishes. Several of the chaplains at present employed are excellent and industrious men, but it cannot be said that the average ability of prison chaplains is above that of other clergymen.

The Canadian system of dual chaplaincy is almost unique—only one or two other countries having adopted it. The almost universal system is the appointment of one clergyman who acts as “moral instructor,” and who engages, from time to time, such gratuitous help from the various denominations as he is able to secure. The Canadian system is much more expensive, but is more consistent with the acknowledged intention of the Canadian constitution, which recognizes the two distinct lines of religious thought in the country.

That is in justification of the appointment of Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen to attend to the spiritual wants of the convict:

As to the principle of making the chaplains exclusively prison officers, it is necessary to point out that at present many of the chaplains do not regard their prison duty as their more important one. The Government is responsible for supplying adequate means of religious instruction to its wards, and it is submitted that the Government—and not the several denominations represented—should be the judge in this matter. There would seem to be a poor justification for the expenditure as at present for salaries (at least fifty per cent above the average salary of clergymen) while the Government receives but an undefined moiety of the clergyman's services.

He then gives reasons why the Parliament of Canada adopted the present system instead of adopting that of European countries. With reference to the surgeons, I find a memorandum in which the inspector says that the intention of the Government is, in this respect, to secure the whole services of the officers:

No government can afford to ignore its responsibility in connection with the health and lives of its wards, and the present system, by which surgeons are permitted to augment their salaries by outside practice, makes it more than probable that in cases of accident or other emergency, the surgeon will not be available.

It is very natural. If you have a physician who can carry on his practice in a large city like Kingston, or in a city like New-westminster, or Winnipeg (although Stony Mountain is some little distance from the city) and there is a case of a serious character in the city, and the physician happens to be an eminent man in his profession, he would be sent for and during his absence there would be no physician to take care of the convicts or officials in case of sickness or an accident. Experience has led the inspector, after a thorough examination and a good deal of assiduity in studying this question, to the conclusion that the system proposed in this bill is the best to be adopted, and that the difference in the responsibilities, which apparently rests on the shoulders of a warden and the officers of the different departments, are not so great as appear at first sight for the reasons that I have already given—that is, that in a penitentiary with a large number of convicts the warden has a large number of officers under him to assist in the work, while in a small penitentiary the warden has to do a great deal of the work personally.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Will they not have the same assistance in the small penitentiaries?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly not, because the work in a small penitentiary is done by the one man. In a large penitentiary the warden has a staff under him, just as the manager has in any other large establishment. In a small establishment you may have a foreman to take charge of a department and he does it thoroughly without assistance. In a large establishment, in which a corresponding department is four or five times as large, the foreman must have an assistant under him, so that in fact the responsibility in the one case is as great as in the other. This whole question was thoroughly discussed in the House of Commons, and the system now proposed was thought to be the best that could possibly be devised, and the House of Commons were quite willing to give it a fair trial. I hope the Senate will not frustrate the object which the government has in view. I congratulate my hon. friend opposite—no, I cannot do that, I must withdraw the congratulation—with reference to his Toryism. He is altogether too much of a Tory for me. I have a reputation for being pretty fixed in my views as to what are termed vested rights, but I confess I am sufficiently liberal to accept reforms, though a system may have been in existence for a quarter of a century, and that is the true principle of Liberal-Conservatism.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I agree with the hon. gentleman who moved to strike out this clause, that the law as it stands is better than it would be if this bill were to become law. If we look at the bill that is now before us in an impartial manner, we shall find that it is not at all in the interest of economy in the administration of justice in this country. But we will, perhaps unconsciously, make a great mistake if we strike out this clause, because it would leave the law as it now stands, and the person who may be appointed hereafter will not only receive the increase of salary, but will also be at liberty to practice outside the asylum. Therefore, my hon. friend's views would not be carried out. They are views which I certainly concur in, but they can only be carried out by reducing the salaries specified in the bill. Then the constitutional question would come in. We would be interfering with affairs which are assigned to the lower house exclusively. We talk of the promotion of officers from small penitentiaries to large penitentiaries, but we should hardly think of placing the whole of the officers attached to those different penitentiaries on the same footing as regards salary; we should rather lead them to look at a change as an opportunity for improvement in position and an increase in salary. This is a bill originating in the other House, and I feel it would be perfectly futile to adopt the amendment. We should only make the bill worse than it is now. We should then be giving $1,500 to each surgeon and permitting him to practice outside of the institution. We should be giving a chaplain $800 leaving him at liberty to pursue his vocation outside. This bill is open to the objection of increasing the salaries unnecessarily, because it is quite apparent that any medical man would be quite willing to take two-thirds of his salary, instead of the salary mentioned in the bill, and be at liberty to practice outside. You would save in that item $500. Similarly the chaplain could be a chaplain residing in the locality, who could attend to the penitentiary in addition to his regular duties for much less than this amount. I do not intend to take part in this discussion; I simply rose to show what the effect would be if the amendment were carried.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—At first sight it does appear an anomaly to pay a warden of a large penitentiary the same salary that you would pay to the warden of a small penitentiary. Of course it is stated that this is done for the purpose of equalizing the salary, so as to make it easier to transfer the officials from one place to another. How will it be in those small institutions? The official receiving in a small institution the same salary that he would get in a corresponding position in a large institution, would be quite willing to remain where he is. I presume in most penitentiaries two chaplains are required, one Protestant and one Roman Catholic, but one may have a large number of convicts to look after, while the other may have but a small number. So far as the surgeons are concerned, in the smaller places they are paid very well, and they can always have the assistance, I suppose, of some of the convicts. I presume that is part of the duties of the convicts. Are those parties entitled to anything else—free lodging, free lighting, or anything of that kind?

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—When the government have them they give those privileges; when they have not, they do not.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It seems extraordinary that the warden in the Kingston penitentiary, with a large number of convicts, having a very great responsibility upon him, shall receive only the same remuneration that is paid to the man in charge at Stony Mountain.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—He gives his time.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—He may give his time, but he has not the same responsibility. There ought to be a schedule of rates, and the officials should be paid in proportion to the services they render. I suppose this bill has been well considered by the department, and they have come to the conclusion that these changes are desirable; but the Penitentiaries Act has worked well in the past. The government have reduced the salaries in the larger institutions, and increased the salaries in the others. I cannot understand the principle on which the bill is based. What were they paid before in the smaller institutions?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They averaged at Kingston from a minimum of $2,600 to a maximum of $3,000;—that is for the warden. The present proposition is to give him $2,000, with house rent, fuel and light free. They are not entitled to fuel and light now, so that when you come to take the difference between that and $3,000, you will find that it is very trifling.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—What is the smallest one?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In British Columbia the maximum is $2,400.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—What does the surgeon get at Kingston now?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—$1,400. At New Westminster he gets $600. At Kingston the minimum for a surgeon is $1,400; the maximum, $1,800.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—All the criminal lunatics are in the Kingston penitentiary, and the surgeon gets an additional amount on account of that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In Kingston the warden has the deputy and he has a chief keeper—there are two assistants.

In the smaller penitentiaries the warden has only one assistant.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—It looked to me rather strange to pay the same rate in all the institutions. I presume, according to this, there will be a saving on the whole, and that is probably what has actuated the government, but I should much rather have seen a scale commensurate with the services performed. Of course the gentlemen who have investigated the matter understand the necessity of the change much better than we can.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The first Minister has discussed this question to some extent as though we were now considering the whole bill. The motion before the committee is to strike out clause 3 of the bill. The effect of that clause is to prevent the surgeon and the chaplain from attending to any duties outside of the penitentiary. It should be borne in mind that when we talk about experience, on which the hon. gentleman from Rideau dwelt a good deal, that we have not only a new Minister of Justice but also a new inspector of penitentiaries. No doubt he is a capable officer, but I think, with a little more experience he will be better. The conclusion to which he would arrive after two or three years' experience would probably be a good deal more valuable than those which he has arrived at after six months experience. I think that would be true of anyone in any office. The First Minister also seems to think that I took it for granted that the chaplains under this bill were not getting enough pay. On the contrary, I think for the services which those chaplains are expected to render in the small penitentiaries they are being paid too much, and the same with the surgeons. The First Minister stated that the reason why the department put these officers on the same footing was that they wanted to be in a position to transfer them from one penitentiary to another. That might be true of the warden, the deputy warden, or even of some of the inferior officers, but it is not true of the surgeon and the chaplain. You do not want to move the chaplain from St. Vincent de Paul, to New Westminster penitentiary, or vice versa. The first Minister seemed to think that I was speaking altogether in the interests of the chaplains and the surgeons. I was speaking in their interest to this extent—if you give them enough to do they will be better and happier men than they will be in the small penitentiaries under this measure. But I was thinking also of the interest of the inmates of the penitentiaries. The hon. gentleman from Kingston had to admit, as any professional man must admit, that where a medical man is tied down to a small institution and has nothing to do outside—where his duties are confined to looking after fifty or sixty robust men—that man will, in the course of time, become disqualified for his position, so it is in the interests of the inmates of the penitentiary as well as in the interest of the surgeon that he should not be prevented from practising outside. We propose under this bill to pay a surgeon, who has to attend to the physical welfare of seventy-six convicts in the Manitoba penitentiary, a salary of $1,500 a year. The thing is perfectly absurd. To look after the spiritual interests of these seventy-six convicts we are to pay $1,600 to two chaplains. That needs only to be stated to show its absurdity. If the hon. First Minister were in opposition to a government which was to propose such a measure he would make the welkin ring in denunciation of the extravagance of the government. These chaplains will have very little to do, and they will cease to be as well qualified as they would be if they had enough to do.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think the objections made by the hon. member from Halifax are not very strong. It must be borne in mind that this bill only applies to new appointments. It has no bearing whatever on the officials employed at present in the penitentiaries of the country. The contention that in the small penitentiaries a smaller salary ought to be paid, implies that an inferior man would answer in those penitentiaries. I contend that even where there are only a few convicts they require as good a warden, as good a surgeon and as good a chaplain as in the larger penitentiaries. The principle is a decidedly bad one of allowing a surgeon, at all events, to do any outside practice. He should be confined to the duties of the public institution with which he is connected, and should not be allowed to follow any outside practice whatever. It will be found universal wherever that principle prevails, that business which brings him remuneration in addition to his salary, will receive a greater amount of attention, and on the other hand, the business for which he receives a stated salary, whether he attends to it closely or not, will not receive the same attention. I am not of the opinion at all, that because a smaller number of convicts are under the surgeon, that on that account he becomes disqualified. If he does not practice much, he will read up more. During the time that a student is qualifying himself for his profession he cannot have any practice at all; he is reading up and improving himself, and the same will hold good of the surgeons in penitentiaries. There is a very good reason in favour of having the salaries equal all round; it will greatly facilitate the administration. Reason may arise why even the chaplain should be removed from one penitentiary to another, and in the case of other officials those reasons are more likely to come into existence, rendering it necessary, for the better administration of the service, that they should be removed from a penitentiary in which they are employed, to some other penitentiary in another part of the Dominion. Where the salaries are unequal it becomes almost impossible to make such changes in the interests of the service. I do not think anything at all of the objection of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that because the Minister of Justice has not been long in his position, and the inspector of penitentiaries has been but recently appointed, that we are on that account to reject the recommendations that they have made. No doubt they are acting on information which the department, as a whole, has in its possession, and which is the result of experience of past years. Therefore I think this House would be justified in accepting, with a great deal of respect, the recommendations of the department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Halifax spoke of the Minister of Justice being a new man, and of the inspector of penitentiaries being recently appointed. The present inspector has been intimately and immediately associated with the management of all the penitentiaries for nine years. He has been the private secretary of the Minister of Justice, through whom all the work, nearly, that pertains to the management of the penitentiaries has passed, so that really in selecting Mr. Stewart for the position—

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not object to Mr. Stewart.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one objects to Mr. Stewart—I am aware of that. The objection made to his suggestion was that he was a new man. What I wish to show is, that he is not a new man in one sense of the word. He has had nine years experience in the management of the penitentiaries, and has been most intimately connected with them. All the reports have passed through his hands, all the amendments and changes in the Penitentiary Act have been before him, and he is a man who is likely to appreciate the importance of the position to which he has been appointed. Now in reference to the horror which the hon. gentleman thinks I would have exhibited, were I on the other side, at the enormous extravagance of the government in having suggested the payment of $1,600 to the two chaplains who look after the spiritual welfare of the prisoners in the Manitoba penitentiary, I would ask the hon. gentleman if he knows what we are paying to-day? We are paying more than $1,800 and this is a reduction instead of an increase of the salaries. Whether it is too much or not, I am not going to argue; I am simply pointing out that, it is actually an instance in which the government are effecting an economy.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—To whom are you paying $1,600 now?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are not paying it now to anyone.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the government are paying more now than they propose to pay under this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman from Halifax accuses us of extravagance because we propose, under the new bill, to pay $1,600 for the spiritual instruction of the prisoners in Manitoba penitentiary. What I say is, we are paying $1,800 now for the same services in the same penitentiary, so that instead of this being a proposition to increase the expenditure, it is a proposition to make a reduction. It is putting the Catholic chaplain on exactly the same basis as the Protestant chaplain. At present we pay the Protestant chaplain $1,000 per annum, with a residence, while the Catholic chaplain receives $800, whether with a residence or not, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—The Catholic chaplain in Kingston has no residence.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the Manitoba penitentiary. This memo shows that the Protestant chaplain receives $1,000 and a residence, and the Roman Catholic chaplain receives $800. Perhaps my hon. friend from St. Boniface can tell us if the Roman Catholic chaplain has a residence.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No; he lives at St. Boniface. He has to travel 12 miles to perform his duties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The Stony Mountain is about twenty miles out in the country, and St. Boniface is opposite Winnipeg. Hence he has to travel twenty miles, and there is the greater necessity why the chaplain should live at the penitentiary.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am in full accord with the views expressed by my hon. colleague from Halifax with respect to the Manitoba and British Columbia penitentiaries. It is proposed to give to the surgeon of the New Westminster penitentiary $1,500 a year, and exclude him from general practice. No man can live, in anything like a respectable manner, in New Westminster for $1,500 a year. I claim if this bill becomes law, and the surgeon has to give all his attention to 100 convicts, hale, hearty men, you are doing that surgeon a great wrong. I can understand why it should be adopted if it were an asylum or hospital where patients were sent to be treated medicinally, but to restrict the surgeon to looking after the physical wants of some 75 or 100 healthy convicts is out of the question altogether. I can assure this House they will do a great injustice to that surgeon, Dr. de Wolfe Smith.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It does not apply to the present officials at all; it cannot do him any injustice.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There have been two surgeons in the penitentiary since it was opened. The first one received only $400 a year. He was succeeded by the present surgeon, Dr. Smith. He is a man who is not blessed with the very best health in the world, and you are liable to have a vacancy at any time, though I hope he may long be spared to discharge the duties of his position. If you compel a new surgeon going in there to attend to the convicts exclusively, not allowing him to have any outside practice, he cannot live on the salary, and it will be a detriment to him not only pecuniarily but professionally.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no compulsion; he need not take the position unless he likes.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There is no compulsion it is true, but at the same time I think there is no person suffering there in consequence of the surgeon having outside practice; and no injustice or suffering can be inflicted upon the convicts by allowing the surgeon to have outside practice as well. As far as the chaplains are concerned, until five or six years ago I think they received $400 a year, and were very thankful to get it. I think I am right as to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman is quite right in the statement he makes, except where he says they were satisfied.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—They were satisfied until they found out that, by appealing to the good Liberal Government, they could get more. They made an application for an increase and $600 is the sum they receive now. I claim that these chaplains are amply paid for all the services they render. There are many hard-working clergymen in our country belonging to all denominations—Roman Catholic priests, Episcopalian clergymen, Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists—who are not receiving more than $300 or $400 a year, who do ten or twenty times the amount of labour that these chaplains will be required to do in connection with this penitentiary in British Columbia and the one at Stony Mountain, Manitoba. I may say, with reference to putting them on an equality, so that they can be changed from one penitentiary to another, our experience in British Columbia is that you had better keep your eastern men east of the Rocky Mountains. We have men out there who understand their business and who will conduct the institution as well as any of the experts, or so-called experts, who are sent out there—perhaps a little better. The hon. gentleman laughs; but all the trouble in connection with the British Columbia penitentiary arose from the fact that one of those qualified experts was taken out from Ontario. As far as Manitoba penitentiary is concerned, it is differently situated from that in New Westminster. The latter is right in the city of New Westminster, and the one in Manitoba is out at Stony Mountain, about 12 or 13 miles from Winnipeg. There is some force in the argument, that the increase should be greater to the surgeons than to the chaplains, because they will have very little to do, either the clergy or the surgeons, beyond the penitentiary work itself. It would be very much better, therefore, to strike out clause 3. I shall have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax. Some hon. gentlemen may think I am speaking against the interests of the chaplain and the surgeon in New Westminster, but I am not; I am discharging my duty here fearlessly and honestly, and it does not matter whether it suits them or not. As far as the surgeon is concerned, at all events, you should strike that clause out whatever you do with the clergyman, though in my opinion the provision as to the clergyman should be struck out as well.

The amendment was lost on a division.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the committee rises I wish to make one observation which may as well be made now as at any other time. This argument that the Commons considered it, and the department considered it, is an argument for the abolition of the Senate. If the members of this House are to forego the right of using their own independent judgment on the measures which come to them, simply because they came through the Commons, and have been adopted by the government, then we do not need the Senate at all, and had better get rid of it. That was not the view taken in the Senate when other hon. gentlemen led it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think that is an imputation on the members of the Senate which is altogether unjustified. No one, either of the government or of the individual members has attempted to influence or coerce the Senate. The hon. gentleman has had full opportunity to express his opinions. The Senate has not thought proper to adopt his amendment or to agree with his views, and hence he says "unless you think with me, unless you are prepared to amend a bill which comes from the Commons simply because it comes from the Commons, because it is not in accordance with my individual opinion, there is no necessity for the Senate." That is the hon. gentleman's argument.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Excuse me, that is not the argument at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know the high estimation in which he holds the Senate, and I am astonished that he should cast such a reflection on the members of this House, unless indeed he lays down the principle that no man has any right to have any opinion of his own other than that which the hon. gentleman thinks proper to dictate. No member of this House has a right, because he cannot amend a bill from the Commons in any way he pleases, to say that the members of the Senate are either subservient to the government or subservient to the House of Commons. I hope the day is far distant when the gentlemen who compose this Senate will be prepared, upon a great question or upon a small matter, where they have individual opinions, to surrender them to the government or to the House of Commons; but it may be just possible that in an amendment to a bill of this character, the majority of the Senate are in accord not only with the suggestions of the government, which is responsible to the people for its actions, but in accord also with the opinion that has been expressed by the vote of the majority in the House of Commons. Since I have been in the Senate I have known government measures to be thrown out; I have known important amendments to which the government were directly and positively opposed, to be made to bills. That did not show any subserviency. If it were necessary to go into a defence of the Senate, I could mention an instance in which the government having undertaken to carry out great improvements, both under the Mackenzie administration and under that of Sir John Macdonald, sent their measures from the Commons to the Senate, but the good sense of this House—I think it was the good sense after all—led them to look upon those projects in a different light and they threw out the bills. Well, what did the government say? They said precisely what my hon. friend has said—"what are you here for but to confirm all that we do?" This House is independent and I hope it will be always independent, and I trust that my hon. friend—for whose opinions I have great respect—will never again allow his temper to get the better of him, because he can not carry a small amendment to a bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. First Minister appears to fail to grasp the point of my remarks. I am not in the habit of losing my temper. In that respect perhaps I compare favourably with the hon. gentleman himself. I am as cool as the hon. First Minister.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I can see that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What I called attention to was this fact, that the hon. the First Minister used as an argument why the Senate should adopt this amendment that the Commons had considered it carefully, and he said the department had considered it, and another hon. member said that as long as the department had considered it we had no more to say about it, and I simply animadverted on that line of argument. We should discuss these matters on their merits, as I think we usually do, and not accept measures simply because the department has considered them. If we are not to consider measures on their merits but are to take things because they pass the Commons or because the government, or some department of the government has thought well of them, it follows that our functions are at an end. I spoke in perfect good temper.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I accept the explanation and apologize for anything I said. I propose to substitute the following in place of clause 7, which is not complete enough:—

"Sections 1, 3 and 6 shall apply only to persons hereafter appointed or promoted to any office or employment in the penitentiary service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL, moved the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read the third time under a suspension of rule and passed.

The Senate then adjourned.

Second Sitting.

The Speaker took the Chair at 8 p.m.

Routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

The following bills were read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rule :—

Bill (88) "An Act respecting the South Shore Railway Company, Limited."—(Mr. Kaulbach.)

Bill (75) "An Act to revive and amend the Act respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (155) "An Act to incorporate the Ottawa Land and Security Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (46) "An Act to incorporate the Trans-Canadian Railway Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (100) "An Act to incorporate the Dominion of Canada Trusts Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

QUEBEC, MONTMORENCY AND CHARLEVOIX RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (98) "An Act respecting the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company" with amendments. He said: The changes can scarcely be called amendments, except in a technical sense, because they are really rectifying an omission. The amendments are in the ninth section of the bill. The first amendment reads that "for the uses and purposes aforesaid, these words are added"; and the reason of that was that in the original bill section 8 and section 9 were one section, and they were separated in the copying, and it became necessary, in order to make sense of the ninth section, to use these words. The other amendment follows in the same section, and explains that the powers given by the section were only to be used in a certain event. The very words that are reported here as the amendment were agreed to in the House, but, by some strange omission, were not copied into the record of the bill as it came up to us; and therefore it was necessary to supply that omission. It was agreed by all the parties that these words had to be supplied. I wish the House to understand distinctly that it makes no change in the bill, although technically an amendment, and the bill has to be sent down to the House for approval.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW moved concurrence in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was then read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rule.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (144) "An Act further to amend the Winding-up Act." He said: The object of this bill is to make the practice prevailing in the several provinces for the discovery of assets of judgment debtors applicable to the discovery of assets of persons against whom orders are made under the Act for the payment of money. Section 78 of this Act now provides that every such order under the Act shall be deemed a judgment of the court, and may be enforced against the person and property of the person ordered to pay in the same manner as judgments in the province. It has been held in Manitoba that under this section the practice of examining a judgment debtor, as to his property and liabilities, did not apply to proceedings under the Winding-up Act. It is most desirable that this practice should apply, and the bill is intended to make it applicable. Section 78 is repealed and re-enacted with a few verbal changes, and a subsection is added provided expressly that the practice relating to the discovery of assets shall apply in such cases. The change, as the Senate will observe, is not of a very radical character. It is to make it applicable to both the cases cited, to which I have referred, and to make it uniform in all the provinces.

The motion was agreed to and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (145) "An Act to authorize the Treasury Board to exempt certain societies from the operation of the Insurance Act." He said: In moving the second reading of this bill I might explain that, although not very long, it is somewhat important to those who are most interested in its working. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen have amongst themselves a system of insurance by which, on payment of a small fee, in the event of total disability or death of one of its members, a sum is paid to the wife of the deceased, or, if the wife be dead, then to his children. The policy is a combination of life, accident and disability insurance. It is limited in practice to the small sum of $1,200. Up to two or three months ago the association have been doing business unmolested, upon the supposition on the part of the members that the Insurance Act did not apply to them. There are some 37 lodges of the Brotherhood of Trainmen in Ontario. Recently, however, an informer commenced prosecutions against some of the members upon the ground that they were not protected by section 43 of the act, as they supposed they were. Prosecutions in Toronto and, I believe in Parkdale, were dismissed, upon what precise grounds I am not informed. The informer, having failed to obtain convictions in Toronto and Parkdale, transferred his operations to the city of Hamilton, where a couple of prosecutions have taken place and convictions obtained on the ground that section 43 of the Insurance Act did not protect them, and fines have been imposed. It is understood that the convictions have been appealed against but the cases have not as yet been argued and the result will probably not be known for some time to come. In the meantime the persons interested are asking a change in the law which will free them from all liability to prosecution under the statute. This they propose to do by making section 43 apply in express terms to both life and accident insurance. As it is now interpreted it applies only to life insurance. To make this change it is not deemed advisable, as such a change would have the effect of letting in some very undesirable associations which are at present excluded. There is no doubt however of the merit in the claim of the trainmen to be relieved from the provisions of the statute, and while it would be well if possible not to make any change at present, until more careful consideration could be given to the question, it is clearly not objectionable to exempt them from the provisions of the Act upon the terms stated in the bill. There are several kindred organizations whose claims are also deserving of consideration. Their claim for exemption is well founded as far as can be judged, upon the simple ground that it is all but impossible for men employed as locomotive engineers and like occupations on account of their hazardous nature to obtain insurance elsewhere. If this bill is approved it will meet the case as a temporary provision only and until the whole question of friendly society insurance is taken up and considered as it must be at an early date. I may add that the organizations in question are exempted from the provisions of the Ontario Insurance Corporations' Act, 1892, in the same manner as it is now proposed to exempt them from the Insurance Act. The reason for this, the House will readily understand, is in order to legalize the operations of the societies which would be protected under this bill in the case of the trainmen who may be running on a line which extends beyond the limits of the province, so that in case a death by accident were to occur in Quebec, the heirs of the deceased member in Ontario may be able to establish their claim under the act to the gratuity, or whatever sum may be coming to them, on account of the membership of the deceased in this society. I think the House will recognize the importance of so amending the bill as to enable men who are engaged in these hazardous employments, such as trainmen, brakemen and engineers, to make some provision for their wives and families and, particularly, in view of the fact that the hazardous nature of their occupation prevents them from obtaining protection in the ordinary insurance companies except at a very high rate of premium.

The motion was agreed to and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P.E.I.) moved the second reading of Bill (143) "An Act further to amend the act respecting the Senate and House of Commons." He said: This bill is not a very long one, and I do not think it requires any words of mine to recommend it to the members of this House. Indeed I would have thought—had it not been for a little opposition on the part of the hon. Senator from Halifax at a previous stage—that there would have been no difference of opinion in regard to the bill. It provides that in computing the sessional indemnity, the deduction shall not be made for 12 days in the case of a member who has been absent at any time during the session. It has been usual for some years to pass an act of this kind, and in this bill the allowance is restricted to the number of days allowed in any previous bill. This session has not been a very long one (a little over three months), but it has been held at a rather inconvenient season of the year, and it is only right to allow members of parliament the privilege which this bill gives them. I cannot think there is anything wrong in this. Perhaps some professional gentleman, to whom one of the three months is the same as another, may not have a very strong claim for this allowance, but to those who are engaged in industrial pursuits, a summer session is very injurious; and similar bills have been passed in previous sessions.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Just this day twelve months a similar bill was before the Senate, and on that occasion I took the opportunity of expressing my dissent, and also took occasion to call the attention of the government to the necessity for some amendments in the section of the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons which dealt with the mode of deducting from the indemnity and the mode of calculating the days of attendance. It was pointed out in the discussion last session that a gentleman might come to this House, stay here for a day or two and then go home and attend to his own business, and at the expiration of the last session, which was of about the same length as the present session, he could draw, in addition to his mileage, between $500 and $600. The same is true to-day, and the consequence is, looking at the matter from a pecuniary standpoint, it would pay hon. gentlemen in this House and members of the other House better to simply come and be present at the opening of Parliament and then return home to attend to their own affairs. The hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading of this bill told us that the introduction of a bill of this nature was usual. The truth is, if I am not under a misapprehension, we never had a bill of this nature introduced in this House until the present Parliament. It was never introduced before 1891. The hon. gentleman will search the records of either House of Parliament in vain for any measure of this character before that date. It is a highly objectionable measure. There are different ways of dealing with the question of indemnity. In some countries, England for instance, there is no indemnity; members of parliament are paid nothing for their attendance. In other countries, I think in the United States, the members are paid so much a year, and I am not aware whether there is any deduction for absence or not. In some of the Australian colonies the members are paid so much a year and are not paid by the session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are paid monthly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A yearly salary, paid monthly. What I mean is that the pay does not appear to depend upon their attendance. If the government find the present system objectionable—and it appears they do—the better way would be to adopt the system in operation in Australia and the United States and say that members shall receive whatever indemnity the government think they ought to receive, whether they attend to their duty in parliament or not. That is a sensible provision. But to provide, as we do in the revised statutes, that $8 shall be deducted for each day a member is absent, with the object of providing that members shall be present and attend to the business of parliament, and then to say that we shall allow members to remain 12 days away without making any deduction, is a position which is not logically defensible at all.

Adopting the principle of our Act, members of parliament have the right to choose whether they shall remain here and attend to the business of the country, or whether they shall go home and attend to their business at a sacrifice of $8 a day, which sacrifice, I presume, is more than made up by attending to their own business. I think there can be nothing more undignified than for parliament to be called upon year after year to pass a measure of this sort. My theory is that we should adopt the Australian and United States system if it be deemed to be better than ours, but if we were going to stand by our own system, let us stick to it. There are certain practical results from the adoption of the system introduced by the present government in 1891 which deserve consideration. We know, as a matter of fact, that a great deal of the most important business of Parliament comes to us during the last few days of the session, and the same thing is true of the House of Commons in a very large measure. Now, what is the result of this practice of allowing gentlemen to be absent for twelve days? It is just this: that at the time when their services are most required in Parliament they go away. We know how it is; the majority of our members have gone away with the feeling that they will receive their full indemnity even though they are absent. The country has a right to the presence of the members here, and the government are altogether wrong in introducing this measure, which has, amongst other evil effects, the effect of thinning out the Houses at the close of the session. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island gave as a reason why we should pass this measure that although this has not been a very long session—there might be some excuse for it if it had been a six months' session, as we have had on several occasions—the members have attended very regularly to their duties. Well, if they have attended regularly, they do not need the allowance. That brings us to another point, that gentlemen who come from very remote provinces, like my hon. friend on my right, and like myself, to a certain extent, and other gentlemen who come from far away, are placed at a great disadvantage as compared with gentlemen who live within easy distance of the Capital and who can go home every Friday and come back on Monday or Tuesday; and if that practice were discouraged the effect would be that the session would be considerably shortened. All hon. members would be anxious to get the session through as quickly as possible, and the business would not be delayed because members were absent. I have spoken on this question without any preparation, but I feel it my duty to put on record my strong objection to this kind of legislation. If the indemnity is not considered large enough, let the government increase it. If this requirement, that we shall be present, and that unless we are present we shall not be paid, is found to be objectionable—and it appears to be—then let the government introduce a measure providing that whether members are here or not they shall be paid, but do not let us have, year after year, this measure brought down which publishes to the world the fact that the members of both Houses want to be paid as though they had been serving the public when really they have been attending to other affairs.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I do not want to combat anything that my hon. friend has said. I agree with very much that he has stated. If this bill applied to the Senate alone, I should certainly be with him in voting against it, as my experience has shown me that we can scarcely get a quorum at the end of the session by reason of this exemption, but I look to the other House, whose duties are more onerous than ours, and many of whom have to go and attend to their own affairs at home and often accept candidatures against their own private interest, purely to support principle. Therefore, I do not feel disposed to help to defeat this bill, but what I think most of is that we senators, when we come here, take upon ourselves a trust to attend to public duties, and in the case of those gentlemen who come here simply to hold their seats, and then go away, this bill gives them a bonus of $96, besides what they get—about $500 or $600—by staying away without performing their duties. I do not think it is fair. If hon. gentlemen do not care to come here and attend to their duties they should give up their seats. It is not fair for a man to hold the position of a senator of the Dominion if he does not attend to the duties devolving upon him. But, in addition to that, you give him by this bill a bonus for staying away and attending to his own business. To my mind it is highly objectionable, but for the reason that I have mentioned, I do not feel disposed to interfere with the other branch of the legislature, whose members have more onerous duties than we have and who attend to their business. I hope the Indemnity Act will be changed so that hon. gentlemen will not have the inducements offered them to remain at home and pocket $500 or $600 for doing nothing, and prevent others who could and would attend to their public duties from occupying the important position of senators of the Dominion.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

SILVER LEAD SMELTING ACT.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the second reading of the Bill (142) "An Act to encourage silver-lead smelting." He said: This bill as its name indicates, is for the purpose of encouraging silver-lead smelting. It provides for a bounty of 50 cents per ton to be paid for the ore smelted, and that the amount to be paid under the provisions of this bill shall not, on the whole, exceed $150,000, nor $30,000 in any one year, but it provides that any unexpended portion of that $30,000, or sums that may not be called for by way of bounty in any particular year, may be carried from year to year and expended in the years that may follow. The operation of the bill is to extend to five years. If in any one year a greater quantity of ore is smelted than could be provided for out of the $30,000 a year, then the rate per ton is to be reduced in order to bring it within the amount for which provision is made. It also provides that the payment of bounty of smelting works shall be made regarding establishments that shall be put into operation before the first of January, 1897, and that the payment and the management of those bounties shall be placed under the control of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and that the Governor in Council may make regulations governing the payment of those bounties, to prevent fraud and for the proper carrying out of the work, and that these regulations shall be laid before parliament in each year fifteen days after the opening of the session. This will apply to silver mining altogether, I think, in the province of British Columbia. It is well known to hon. gentlemen that those mines are very valuable. They have not been developed to any great extent in the past, owing to the want of railway communication, and largely to the absence of proper smelting works. Within the last year a railway has opened up access to some of the most valuable mining districts, and the result has been most gratifying in the development of those industries. I have in my hand a paper published in British Columbia called the Slocan Prospector, in which these facts are given:

The total shipments from September 13th, 1894, until March 1st, 1895, aggregated 5,991 tons, of which 3,369 tons were shipped via Nakusp and 622 tons to Kaslo. The grand total estimated value being $718,920. Daily shipments are still being made and will now continue indefinitely as the country has the advantage of of railway communication.

The construction of this railway has tended to develop those works, but a very large proportion of the ore is found to be of such a nature that it will not bear railway transportation to smelting works in the United States. It is ascertained that out of every nine tons of ore there is only one ton that is of sufficient value to bear transportation such a long distance, and it is indispensable to the carrying on of the silver industry in British Columbia that large smelting works should be encouraged in that country. It is proposed that it shall be done by means of a bounty of 50c. per ton, as provided for in this bill. There is another feature in connection with this that is of some importance. Hitherto there has been only one kind of ore prospected for in that country, just for the want of smelting works. On the establishment of smelting works, there is another ore called dry silicious ore that will be sought for, and which is necessary in order to fix in the smelting process along with the lead ore, that has hitherto been worked. It is known from the experience of other countries that smelting will lead to extensive mining of other ores besides those that are now mined. When it is borne in mind that eight out of nine tons of the lead ores themselves that now come within the reach of the miner in that part of the country are useless for want of smelting works, and in addition to that, the fact that the dry siliceous ores are not now useful at all, though they are known to exist there, hon. gentlemen will see at once the very great importance of giving some encouragement to silver mining in that part of the country. The importance of smelting the silver-lead ores is well known in the United States. Owing to the existence of these works, the central western section of the great republic has become rich to an extraordinary extent. Some figures have been put in my hands which show the very great importance of these smelting works. It is stated that for every 150 tons of ore, 500 tons of coal or its equivalent of wood will be used in the process of smelting, 1,200 tons of coke will be required, and 500 tons of limestone. It is well known that there is abundance of limestone in that part of the country, and coal both in the Rockies or on the Pacific coast, within easy distance of those smelting works and the employment that will be given to men, to the railways and to other means of transportation, will be very great indeed. The advantage to the agriculturists of that part of the Dominion will also be very great, because those who are engaged in mining produce nothing in the way of food or clothing, and the profits which they make, and the employment they obtain, will benefit all who are carrying on agricultural and other productive work in the neighbourhood. As an instance of the extraordinary value of smelting works in a rich mining district such as that part of British Columbia undoubtedly is—perhaps one of the richest in the world—I might mention that in the town of Butte, in the state of Montana, alone, a city of 20,000 people, the output of silver is equal to the entire exports of Canada from the forest, the mine, and the fisheries. That is an extraordinary statement, but I have it on excellent authority that such is the case. Smelting works will be established to have an output of 150 tons of ore a day, and that would turn out each year 60,000 tons which would represent the value of $3,000,000 a year. Half of that amount would be represented by the earnings of the prospectors and smelters, and the other the profits in connection with the mining. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more in regard to this matter. Of course, within the last 3 or 4 years the silver industry has been considerably depressed in the United States, but that depression is not to last forever. Capitalists are now turning their attention to our west, which, as I have said before, is known to be rich in silver ore, and we have reason to believe that under the operation of this bill and the small bounty that it is proposed to pay—only $150,000 in all for five years—there will be a very considerable development of the mining industry in our western country which will be of great advantage, not only to British Columbia, but to all Canada.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—This bill receives my unqualified support, and I congratulate the government on bringing it in. One observation made by the hon. gentleman who introduced it I can scarcely accept. In fact I do not know where he got his information. He said that in the Kootenay district there is only about one ton out of nine that would bear transportation to the smelters in the United States, at Butte, at Seattle and at Omaha. He did not mention those points, but those are the different places to which the ores are shipped. My information is that there is not a ton of ore shipped from the main mines there but what produced from 100 to 1,000 ounces of silver per ton.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that that is just the point I make. Only these valuable ores are shipped, but there is a large quantity mined, and accessible to be mined, which is of a quality that will not bear shipment.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I thought he mentioned that the average that was produced there would only yield a small percentage. What he mentions now is correct. A very large percentage of the ores will not bear transportation for three, four, five and in some instances 1,200 miles to the smelters. If a smelter were established either at Slocan, or up in the Kaslo district, the state of affairs would be vastly different. That is one of the richest silver districts in the world, and will prove itself to be so within the next few years. It is also rich in gold-bearing quartz, to say nothing of the large amount of gold taken from the streams in the alluvial washings. I saw a few days ago that it is proposed to open a large smelter in Vancouver. Whether that smelter will be eligible to receive this bonus or not, I am not prepared to say, but I scarcely think that it would be. I think the smelter, if it is to be established, should be located in the very centre of that mining district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are two smelters in British Columbia already, are there not?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There is a small one at Pilot Bay.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very glad to see that my hon. friend who is, on general grounds, such a strong opponent of the national policy, when he finds something which affects the district in which he resides becomes a zealous advocate of protection. You find that the case in every instance. When it comes to the encouragement of industries in their own district the free-traders change about very quickly. This is protection in an extreme form, and I am glad to find my hon. friend, like all the other free traders, as strong a protectionist as we are ourselves when it comes to the development of home industries.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the suspension of Rule 41 in regard to this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. POWER—With reference to section 1 of the bill, I suppose that persons who smelt gold, for instance in Nova Scotia, would get the bonus.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Any smelting of gold done in Canada comes under the bill.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES REPRESENTATION BILL

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved the second reading of Bill (121) "An Act further to amend the North-west Territories Representation Act." He said: This bill contains only two provisions—the first of which is to the effect that in voting in federal elections in the North-west Territories only three months' residence in the electoral district shall be required instead of twelve months as provided by the act as it stands at present. Under the law governing elections of members of the Territorial Legislature, only twelve months' residence in the Territories and three months in the electoral district is required. It is proposed by this bill to make the term of residence in the electoral district necessary to qualify an elector in a federal election the same as the term which is required to qualify a man to vote for the election of a representative in the Territorial legislature. Hon. members will bear in mind that the act for the regulation of Territorial elections is an act of the Federal Parliament, not a local statute. It is a law of our own, and we are simply providing that the qualification for electors shall be the same, whether the election is for a Territorial representative or for a representative in the Dominion Parliament. It has been considered desirable that the same qualification should apply in both cases. The other provision of the bill is simply to correct an oversight in the legislation of last session. The Act of last year provided that any elector who finds that his name is not on the voters' list may apply to the enumerator within two days of the date of polling and have his name put on the list. That provision was incorporated in the Act but through an oversight the form of oath in the schedule of the Act was not made to correspond with the main provision. Previous to that it was possible at any time before the election to have the name added to the list, but last year it was decided that the name could not be added later than two days before the election. The form of oath has now been altered to correspond with the main provision in last year's Act, and this is merely to make the schedule and the oath correspond with the main provision of the bill. I think these amendments are so simple and necessary, that I need not make any further explanation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not rise to oppose this bill, but to call attention to an amendment that I should like to propose when the House goes into Committee on the bill. As the law stood before the Act of last session, when a person's name had been accidentally omitted he was permitted, at the time he came up to vote, to have his name added by taking the oath prescribed in the statute. Last session, when the bill was before this House, an amendment was made which struck out that particular clause. I am informed by a member from the Northwest that the members representing the constituencies in the Territories were not aware of this change at the time, and that it operates very prejudicially because, owing to the electors of the North-west being spread over a very wide extent of country, they are not likely to hear of this legislation or to appear before the enumerator, and it would be scarcely fair to deprive them of their votes if their names happen to be omitted and they failed to appear before an enumerator before coming up to the polls. I propose to strike out the clause repealing section 44 when the House is in Committee on the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into committee of the whole on the bill.

On clause 2,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have read the clause and the law as it stood up to last year. The amendments made in this House last year appear in section 14 which repeals a number of sections of the act in the revised statutes, including 44, and the explanation given to me by a member of the House of Commons was that when the bill went back to the House of Commons, after being amended here, the schedule appeared to be the last part of the bill, and so this section 14, which was the repealing clause of section 44, was overlooked, and at least one or two members there from the North-west thought that the effect would be rather serious, inasmuch as the voters whose names had been omitted from the list might not be advised of the passing of this act, and that therefore they might be disfranchised at the next election unless they were permitted to take the oath, as in former years, as provided in the statute. I have looked over the Debates of last year and I do not know whether attention has been called to it in this chamber; but it does not appear that any comment is made upon it. An effort has been made to repeal section 44, but no comments were made upon it. It did not seem to evoke any criticism one way or the other, and it was wholly unexplained. The amendment that I propose is:

Section 14, of chapter 15, of the Statutes of 1894, is hereby amended by striking out the word 44 in the first line thereof.

It would revive the law as it stood in reference to that particular point.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I cannot agree with my hon. friend that it is desirable to restore this feature of the old law which was repealed last year. Of course there is not as perfect a system of preparation of voters' lists in the North-west Territories as in the other provinces, but a voters list is prepared which seems to answer the purpose very well and is what they desire. If it should be found two days before an election that any voter's name has been omitted from that list he can himself have his name placed upon the list, if he is entitled to have it, by applying to the enumerator, and it is not necessary to make that journey in person. Any credible witness, cognizant of the facts, can have the name placed on the lists.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not say that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The polling districts are reduced in the North-west to a very small compass, and even there the extent of travel is not very great, and the inconvenience is not very much. At all events, a voter can, up to within two days of the election, if his name is omitted from any cause whatever, either through himself or a credible person, have his name placed on the list. That is all that is desirable. In my own province we have had experience of the system permitting a voter on election days to swear to his vote; and I have not the slightest doubt that the experience of the North-west, up to a year or two ago, was just the same as ours, that it leads to a great deal of false swearing and a large number of bad votes being polled. In the excitement of the polling day, and often under the influence of intoxicating liquors, it is extraordinary the number of men who will take oaths that are not right, to establish their right to vote, who would not do it in cooler moments a few days before the election. Under this bill, we provide means by which every man who is entitled to vote can have his name placed on the lists to within two days of voting. That is a greater privilege in this matter than is extended under the Dominion Franchise Act or any other Act; and I think the facility is so great that this House should not for one moment go further and allow a man to come up in the excitement of election day and get his vote recorded by swearing to his qualification on that day. That should be arranged before the election, as was provided last year, and therefore I could not agree to the amendment of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My hon. friend is rather too emphatic in condemnation of the law which his own government has passed, and which has been in operation a great number of years in the North-west Territories. Is the House to draw, from the observations of the hon. gentleman, the conclusion that the voters' lists in the past have been made up in this way, and that the hon. gentlemen who represent the North-west have been elected by persons who came in the heat of passion and swore themselves on the lists when they had no right to be there? That is the natural conclusion which one would draw from the speech of the hon. gentleman, that this system, which has been introduced by his own government and has been in operation for a number of years, has been perfectly unbearable. What is the fact? The hon. gentleman thinks it is an atrocious thing that a voter should be allowed to go up and swear himself on the list on polling day. He compares the condition of Prince Edward Island with that of the North-west Territories. Who makes up the list in the North-west? Is it carefully prepared by municipal officers as in other provinces? Not at all. The lists are made up by an employee of the government, and the elector who claims the right to vote deserves as much consideration as the officer, who is possibly a man of no weight or consequence at all, and probably a very strong partisan. The point is this, that notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman, the polling districts in the North-west Territories are very large. Anyone can see that by looking at the map, and anyone living 10 or 15 miles away from a polling booth may not see the list at all. He comes in to poll his vote, thinking that the law now on the statute book is still in operation, and when he comes in, he finds his name is not on the list, and the privilege that he did enjoy on former occasions has been taken away. That is a very serious position of matters. There is no provision, apparently, for getting men off the lists in the North-west Territories. The returning officer, or enumerator, puts anyone he pleases on the list and there is no way of getting the name off; and now the man who claims the right to vote cannot swear himself on. The old law was much better than the law as proposed by this bill, and until you get proper machinery for making the voters' list, such as exists in the provinces, we had better stick to the plan which allowed the honest voter to get his name on if it had been improperly left off.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend seems to think that there is no provision in the North-west Territories Act for striking names off the list. Look at section 31 of the revised statutes, chapter 7, and you will find there is not only provision for putting names on, but also for removing names:

If any enumerator, at any time after posting up any voters list, and two days before the polling day, is fully satisfied upon representations made to him by any credible person, that the name of any qualified voter has been omitted from the voters list of the polling division to which such voter belongs, he shall add such name, &c.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The whole thing is left to the enumerator; he is a government officer.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It has to be left to somebody. My hon. friend seems to think it an undesirable thing for this government to admit that there is anything wrong in its past legislation. We do not claim any such infallibility at all. Occasionally it will be found, in the laws of all legislatures, that some things are not altogether right. This parliament thought that the old law was wrong, and corrected it last year, and now my hon. friend wishes us to go back to a vicious system that this parliament, in its wisdom, last year wiped out. I do not say, and I did not say that great abuses had sprung up in the North-west with regard to people coming forward on election day and swearing to votes that they had not a right to give, but I inferred, from the fact that the amendment was made to the law last year by both Houses of parliament, that abuses possibly did creep in there such as I know have arisen under a similar system in Prince Edward Island. The country is growing and my information is that the polling districts in the Territories are not excessively large. No information with regard to this can be gathered from a map. I never saw a map of any country yet in which the polling districts are shown. My opinion is that the facilities for travelling are fairly good in the North-west, and there is every opportunity afforded of getting the names on the lists up to two days before the polling takes place. That is all that we should give.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand from the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, that before he entered the government they did make mistakes. Now, I suppose, since he is in the government, they do not. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, who has had a good deal of experience in electioneering, whether down in Prince Edward Island to which he has referred so often, he would like to have this system in operation, that the voters' lists should be made up by enumerators, one enumerator in each polling district, who is a supporter of the Liberal party? Would the hon. gentleman feel comfortable in having to bring his voters up under those circumstances, and if the voter had no chance of getting his name on the list? I think the hon. gentleman begins to realize the unfairness of this system. It simply means that one party to a contest is allowed practically to appoint the court which is to try it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the hon. gentleman is attacking another feature of the law from that which is to be amended. This bill is simply to amend the time in which the voters can have their names put on the lists. They can do it two days before voting day. The principle on which the lists are made up is not a question at all.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir MACKINZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (51) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892." He said: If the Senators would prefer to accept this bill without a long explanation I have no objection to relieve myself of the necessity which would otherwise devolve upon me of explaining each of the clauses.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, under a suspension of the rules.

(In the Committee.)

On section 673,

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may mention, with respect to the Criminal Code, that in the session of 1892 the Senate devoted two sittings to it and made some thirty amendments to the bill, so that we have a precedent for what I propose to do. The amendment which I wish to offer is to the section which relates to the jury. I move to amend section 727 of the Act by adding the following subsection thereto:

3. It shall not be necessary that a jury shall be unanimous, but after four hours deliberation eleven jurors out of twelve may return a verdict, which shall, for all purposes, have the effect of a verdict concurred in by all the jurors.

When the joint committee of the two Houses dealt with the Criminal Code in 1892, they recommended an amendment similar to this, only a little more sweeping in its character. The recommendation was practically that five-sixths of the jury could find a verdict, so that 10 out of a jury of 12, or 5 out of a jury of 6 in the North-west, could find a verdict. The present Minister of Justice was of opinion that it was rather too radical a change to allow 10 out of 12, or 5 out of 6, to find a verdict. The amendment which is now proposed is one which does not go as far as the amendment recommended by the joint committee in 1892. This proposes that the dissent of a single juror out of 12 shall not defeat the ends of justice. I do not propose to trouble the House at any considerable length with respect to this matter, but I wish to say a very few words showing why this amendment should be made. The real objection to making this amendment is a spirit of conservatism. Conservatism, in its true sense, is that spirit which will not make a change unless it is a change for the better. Toryism is a spirit which will not make a change at all, which is opposed to change on principle.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad to hear that a majority in this House are Liberal Conservatives. They are sometimes better than Conservatives. In civil cases it was for a long time required that the jury should be unanimous, and it was considered that there was some magic virtue in the decision of 12 jurors which, if lost, justice would be lost, but in the province of Nova Scotia a great many years ago the jury in civil cases was reduced to 9, and 7 were allowed to find a verdict. I do not think there is a man in Nova Scotia who would wish to go back to the old system, when the jury consisted of 12 and the 12 were required to be unanimous. In Ontario, where they are perhaps a little slower than we are, they passed, during the last session of the legislature, an Act providing that in civil cases 10 out of 12 jurors may find a verdict, and when that law comes into operation the people of Ontario will wonder how it is they remained so long without adopting this desirable improvement. Consider that the requirement that the jury shall be unanimous dates back to the time when there were about 150 capital offences, and when, in the interest of humanity, it was desirable that the number of persons found guilty should be minimized as far as possible. When a man was hanged for stealing a sheep, it was a good thing that the dissent of one juror should save his life. In old times a prisoner was allowed no counsel, the jury were often fined by arbitrary judges if they did not bring in a verdict against the accused, and the whole tendency of the proceedings was against the accused. In those days it was a perfectly reasonable and proper thing, looking at this pressure against the accused, that the jury should be required to be unanimous. It is not so now. The prisoner has counsel, he is allowed to give evidence on his own behalf, the judge always holds the balance fairly and evenly, never makes any unreasonable or undue attempt to secure a conviction, and the chances are at least even between the prisoner and justice as regards the trial. How are the chances otherwise? The chances are all against justice. In the first place, the offender has to be arrested, and that is a thing which very often does not happen; then, when he is arrested, he is brought before a magistrate, and that magistrate often seems to think that unless the case against the accused is overwhelmingly strong, he is not justified in committing him for trial. We have seen instances of that quite recently. After the magistrate, before whom the prisoner is brought for preliminary examination, is satisfied that he should be committed for trial, the prisoner goes before a grand jury. I cannot say how grand jurors are in other provinces, but I know that in the province of Nova Scotia very often the clearest evidence of guilt will not satisfy the grand jury that they should bring in a bill, and as a rule they will not bring in a bill unless the evidence is very clear and convincing. Having run the gauntlet of the committing magistrate and the grand jury, the prisoner goes before the petit jury and if it happens that there is on that jury a single crank, or criminal, or a near friend of the accused, all the trouble which justice has taken and all the expense which has been gone to, is utterly wasted. The jury disagrees, and that is very often the end of the matter. If not, the country has to go to the expense of a further trial, which may or may not result in the conviction of a criminal who is clearly guilty. Every hon. gentleman recognizes that that is the real condition of things. I may mention one case which was described to me by a gentleman who acted as counsel for the accused in a trial which took place some distance, but not a very great distance from where we are. The evidence against the prisoner was most conclusive, and my friend said that he did not see that there was the slightest chance of acquittal. When the judge had concluded his charge, he did not expect to see the jury leave the box, but they did so, and remained out for a considerable time. The judge, who had no doubt about the matter, caused the jury to be called in and asked them if they had agreed upon a verdict. They had not and retired again. After they had been out for several hours, they reported that they could not agree; and I may say that my friend, the counsel for the prisoner, was as much surprised as the judge was. He made inquiry afterwards as to the secret of their non-agreement and it turned out that there was one man on that jury who had a short time before served a long term in the penitentiary for an offence similar to that for which the accused was brought to trial. Now, I think if we require a verdict by eleven jurors after four hours deliberation that is as much as we ought to ask. We ought to give justice some little fair-play in the race with crime. I therefore move the amendment.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The question which has come up is of great importance, involving as it does one of the fundamental principles underlying our system of criminal jurisprudence. If this had come up at an earlier stage of the session, I think it would fairly have been a matter for consideration, but at this late stage I do not think we should hastily adopt the principle which my hon. friend proposes. I am very much with him in his opinion on the subject, I have had long experience in criminal courts, and I think the tendency of public opinion, generally, is very much in the direction of the amendment which he has suggested. However, for the reason I have stated, and because of the fact that there is no opportunity for the other branch of the legislature to give the matter the consideration it deserves, we ought not to take up an amendment of so much importance, affecting the liberty of the subject. I hesitate to express my opinion as fully and deliberately as I should like to have done if the question had fairly come up and we had full time to consider its effect on the present system. I do not think it can be said that magistrates generally are prone not to commit when offences of this kind are brought before them. In my experience I have generally found the tendency to be the other way. The magistrate who gets hold of a case is sure to bring it up in order to get his fees. He is generally more likely to get his fees if he brings it to a trial than he otherwise would do. Grand juries may be dispensed with and a better system adopted, although I am not very strong on that point; but without going into the argument, I think at this late stage of the session we should not interfere with this question of criminal jurisdiction and the rights of juries or the liberty of the subject in criminal matters.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman must remember that he took part in the discussion on the Code in 1892, just at this stage of the session, when we made thirty amendments to the Criminal Code, and he did not think that it was too late then, though he does now.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There we had discussed the subject; here it is sprung upon us at the last moment, and we are not in a position to give a calm and deliberate judgment upon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think on reflection the hon. gentleman will not push his amendment at this stage. I would not dare to refer to the action of the other House as a reason why we should adopt anything sent us. But when we reflect that this bill is the result of numerous sittings of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons, we may fairly refer to the action of that committee without entering into any discussion as to what they really did. The old-time theory that a man is not guilty until he is found guilty by 12 honest jurymen may be an old fogy idea, but it is one that is held by a large number of people. I should judge, from the conclusion at which this committee arrived, after a full consideration, that it is thought better to leave the law as it is at present. The hon. gentleman having put his views on record, I trust will be satisfied at the present time and prepare himself, perhaps, to attack the whole system next session, or at some future session when the question comes before the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I may be dead next session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, the country cannot afford to lose the hon. gentleman yet. He is young and vigorous and exceedingly industrious, and whether we agree with him or not, I am sure we all appreciate his work. He is one of the most industrious and indefatigable members of the Senate, and I should like very much to have pursued his explanation of what Tory and Liberal-Conservatives are to a definition of what constitutes Reformers, Grits and Radicals. My hon. friend seems to be a combination of all. We have had an evidence here to day of what I would call love and veneration for old usages. He proposed with all the vigour that characterizes every one of his actions, some amendments and reforms that he desired to place upon record. To-night he goes the length of the other class, the Radicals, who are desirous of uprooting everything that is old and good. The hon. gentleman will have to join the class to which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House belong, and when he reaches that stage of perfection he has no idea how he will be appreciated by those who listen to him.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt the force of the arguments brought forward by the hon. member from Halifax are unanswerable. The feeling that there should be a unanimity of twelve men is an old time idea. No one who is familiar with courts of justice recognizes that as other than a failure, because year after year juries are dismissed in consequence of one man holding out. He says that there are eleven obstinate men in the jury, and the case goes over to another court. It is done constantly. What is there in the number twelve any more than ten or fourteen? Why should twelve be the exact number to control and govern? For years and years we thought there must be twelve grand jurors who should agree before a man should be put on his trial, and year after year it was discussed, and it was said it was absurd to insist upon twelve men finding an indictment. It took many years to remove that idle prejudice. Now, when seven men can bring in a bill, we think the existence of the old rule was very absurd; and so it will be when we make the change in reference to the petit jury. It is perfectly absurd to say that twelve men should agree, any more than five or seven men. Of course the larger the number the more difficulty there is in securing a unanimous verdict; and the case goes over court after court simply because one obstinate man gets on the jury. One man gets an idea in his head, and sets himself up against the judge and all; everybody is powerless, and the criminals lie in jail another six months. Of course the change will come in time, and the more agitation we have the sooner it will come. In 1892 the question was before the joint committee, which was a much larger one than the present committee, and it was then agreed in that committee almost unanimously that a verdict of ten would be quite sufficient. All that the hon. gentleman proposes is to reduce the number by one. This year I do not think the committee divided upon it. There was considerable discussion on the subject at one of the sittings, and my recollection is that there was a very generally expressed opinion as to its wisdom and propriety; but no action was taken upon it, and the matter was allowed to drop.

The amendment was lost.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

THE FORESTERS' BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the second reading of Bill (84) "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This society was incorporated in 1889. One of the clauses limited the amount they were permitted to pay to beneficiaries to $3,000. That is the law of Ontario. The society is established in Ontario; its headquarters are in Toronto, and according to the law of Ontario the limit is $3,000 for friendly societies. That society now asks to extend the amount it should be permitted to pay to a beneficiary, or the representatives of one of its members on death, to $5,000. The objection to the bill is that it is contrary to the law of Ontario. Another power that they ask is that the members shall be free to pay their dues or not to pay them—that their dues shall be voluntary. They enter into a contract, when they join the society, to pay certain dues, and the proposition is to relieve them from that obligation, and to that extent to interfere with the law of contracts under provincial authority. Civil rights we know is an adjunct to the provincial power, and this Parliament has no right to interfere in this matter. The society has only been established since 1889, and I hold in my hand the return for the last year: the contracts that they had in force on the 31st December, 1892—this is the last return—was $52,484,000; and the contracts entered into in 1893 were $19,603,000, making a total of $72,000,000. This society, whose whole assets were $924,000, are subject to a possible liability of $72,000,000. That is one extraordinary inequality that I point out. Another is that while the cash receipts for the year are only $700,000, the cost of management is $136,000. That is nearly 20 per cent of the total receipts taken up in the cost of management.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that include simply management, or does it not include the amounts paid to the sick?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, expenses of management, law costs, registration fees, investigation of names, managing officers' salary, clerk hire, printing and advertising. The Inspector of Insurance, who is the guardian and representative to whom all those societies report, in Toronto, writes in this way:—

It is not only in direct conflict with the law of Ontario governing such societies, which limits the maximum of $3,000, but it is throwing a burden upon the society, which will certainly and speedily bring it to the ground, and will cause incalculable suffering and misery upon the tens of thousands of dependent persons whose protectors are now paying their premiums to the society.

Another extract, from a letter from the Inspector of Insurance in the Province of Ontario, reads:—

I stand in the relation of official guardian to the estate of a friendly society, which, being within the jurisdiction of Ontario, was wound up under this law; and as such I have had lately much to do with insolvent societies. Anyone who has ever been brought into immediate contact with the facts can form an idea of the aggregate of suffering occasioned by the collapse of a life insurance company.

I understand the head of the insurance branch here, Mr. Fitzgerald, appeared before the committee, and gave very strong reasons why he thought it was not prudent or politic to pass the bill. However, it was passed against his judgment. In view of those facts, I think the House ought to use a little more caution in passing this bill, with the small number present now, and with the few opportunities we have to really enter into the merits of this question, because the society ought to exhibit its books, and they ought to be approved of by some actuary. To say that a society that only receives $700,000 may have liabilities amounting to $72,000,000 seems rather an extraordinary condition of things, and seems altogether different from what is required in reference to all other societies. I am informed, also, that the society has really issued policies for a larger sum than the $3,000 that is permitted now under the law. That is another evidence that the society has not been conducted on those prudent principles that ought to govern such associations. I make these observations because the chairman of the Banking and Commerce Committee is absent. He left some papers with me, and asked me to call the attention of the House to the character of the bill when it came before us for consideration; and I have discharged my duty in laying a very brief statement of facts before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—The statement given by the hon. gentleman includes other expenses besides those of management. That is not the cost of management at all. However, the details can be attended to in committee where we can get all the facts. I have a great deal of information here which was before the House of Commons. I shall now move the second reading, and refer the bill to the Banking and Commerce Committee, which is to meet tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH-WEST IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (120) "An Act to amend the North-west Irrigation Act."

He said: There are two changes in this bill. It has been found necessary to change the wording of the section which vests all rights to the use of water in the Crown. The other is the addition of a provision, section 5, which will simplify the procedure necessary to procure licenses for small private ditches, it being found that the present provisions of the law are too cumbersome and expensive. The present law regulating irrigation in the North-west provides that every person must take out a license before using the water in any of the rivers and lakes, even though it may be on his own property. The present bill proposes to relieve settlers from the necessity of asking for a license, going to the expense and trouble of procuring a license; that is when the water is used for culinary or household purposes or for stock. The Senate, no doubt is aware that the water in the North-west is not conveyed with the land. In that portion of the country, the water is considered of more value than the land. If you buy a property in Ontario, or any of the old provinces, and there is a lake or pond or river upon it, you have a right exclusively to the water. In Manitoba and the North-west Territories in conveying the lands the Crown reserves the water, and very wisely, in order that it may be utilized for the purpose of irrigation. One important change is to relieve the settlers of the trouble and expense attending the securing a license, allowing him to take whatever water is necessary for culinary and household purposes, and for the purposes of watering stock, and the other is to relieve them of the expenses attending it. Going a long distance, and surveys and obtaining a license costs between twenty and forty dollars.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Before the motion for adjournment is put, I beg to offer some remarks upon the subject which is causing at present so much anxiety in the public mind. The session is drawing to its close, and it is my duty not to let this opportunity, the last during the present session, to pass without offering the remarks which I am about to make. It had been a cherished hope on the part of the minority that this session would see the redress of their grievances. It is now over five years since the minority has been deprived of its rights; it is now over five years since we have been dispossessed of our legitimate share of the financial advantages which the laws of the province bestow upon the other sections of the population; for over five years we have been assessed for the support of schools which are not available to us. After a protracted contest in the courts, the justice and the fairness of our claims have been recognized by the highest court of the Empire. During all that time, the minority and its representatives in Parliament have been considerate in their acts and in their words; they have acted like men deeply imbued with the lawfulness of their rights, but at the same time desirous of hurting in no way the interests of the country and the rights of their fellow-citizens. And it may not be entirely out of place to state here again what has been stated several times before, namely: that the Catholics of Manitoba do not want and never wanted any interference in what is called the public schools; let them exist as they are for non-catholic people; let the province do what she likes with that system and those schools. All that we want is the right to control the education of our own children. There is nothing illegitimate in that, and it cannot do any harm to others. We do not want to go further than the finding of the judgment of the Privy Council. Is not this the course of a law-abiding people? What more can be asked from us? But we hold to our rights to that extent, and now that the lawfulness of our claims has been put beyond a doubt, nobody, it seems to me, can take offence or even wonder if we state our honest conviction that the time has come at last when we should be relieved. To be told that because we have been suffering for five years, we ought not to object to continue to suffer for some time longer, is a poor consolation to those who are subject to that disability. Yet, if by that sacrifice, peace and harmony could be restored, if the institutions under which we live could be strengthened, if the prosperity and the happiness of this Dominion could be enhanced, neither we, nor our friends, would regret the continuance of that trial for a few months. But, hon. gentlemen, unless justice, full justice is done, nobody can expect such beneficial results from the postponement of the settlement of the school question. Justice is promised to us in the announcement made by the government last week and in the speeches of the ministers. By the same announcement, and in the same speeches, the existence of our grievances is again affirmed; our right to a remedy is also affirmed, and the most solemn pledges have been given us that remedial legislation of a definite character will take place within a fixed period, unless the province of Manitoba itself grant the remedy we are looking for. Whether willingly or unwillingly, the minority has to accept the situation; notwithstanding its disappointment, it has no choice. This, however, does not relieve me from the obligation of expressly freeing myself from all responsibility as to the postponement of the remedial legislation and as to the possible complications that may arise therefrom. The representatives of the minority in Parliament have, up to the last moment, insisted upon immediate action. I still believe that it was our duty to do so. Now that my wishes in that respect have vanished, I cannot help expressing my regret and my great disappointment at this new delay, however short it may appear to some. Nobody can deny that our cause is thereby committed again to future contingencies which may be stronger than the will of the government, and hence, my grave apprehensions and my regret. As I have already said, it is not within our power to alter the present situation, but we can hold to the pledge given and we do it, and we will look for its full redemption, living in the meantime in expectancy, throwing no obstacles in the way of a satisfactory settlement, even willing to give a helping hand to it, asking our friends to do the same, but reserving our liberty for future action, equally ready to give credit to whom credit shall be due, and to recall to all the responsibility they have placed upon their shoulders. If those repeated pledges are not redeemed, the sad disappointment which is felt at present will still increase. A feeling of distrust in our political institutions will grow up in the minds of a large portion of the people. It will be considered as a failure of justice, as a departure from the principles laid down at the foundation of our confederation regime which could only come into existence by mutual trust in each other, and it will be a dark page in Canadian history. However, such is my desire to see this confederation of ours consolidate itself, so confident have I been always that under this regime our common country would prosper and its people become a great Canadian nation, that I prefer to refrain from giving vent any more to my apprehensions and to lend a listening ear to the hopes that have been expressed here and elsewhere that nothing will happen to prevent the government and parliament from discharging their respective duties and redeeming the pledges given in their behalf. I fully recognize the difficulty of the situation, but I believe Lord Salisbury has voiced the soundest policy to be adopted under such circumstances, when, speaking on this very subject at Preston, in 1893, he said that we Will only meet the danger by marching straight up to it and by declaring that the prerogative of the parent, unless he be convicted of criminality, must not be taken away by the state.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Saturday, July 20th, 1895.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 10 A.M.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (147) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act."

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the Bill. He said: This bill affects the excise duty and makes arrangements with reference to the manufacture of spirit from grain, barley and molasses.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

BEET-ROOT SUGAR BOUNTY BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (148) "An Act respecting the bounty on Beet-root Sugar."

The bill was read the first and second times under a suspension of the rule.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before we go into committee on the bill perhaps the leader of the House might give us some information as to this beet root sugar business. Every little while we pass an act providing for a bounty on beet-root sugar. It is some 10 years since the first act was passed, and Parliament is entitled to some information as to the success which has attended the efforts to stimulate the production of beet-root sugar in this country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The information asked for is quite proper. I regret to say I have not the figures with me now. If the House will permit, we will go into committee and pass the bill, and I shall endeavour to get the information for the third reading of the bill when we meet in the afternoon. The bill is very short in its character and is simply an extension of the bounty system in aid of this industry. It enables the Governor General, under such regulations and restrictions as are made by order in council, to pay to the manufacturers of raw beet sugar, which is produced in Canada wholly from beets grown therein between the 1st July, 1895, and the 1st July, 1897, the bounty mentioned in the bill, such bounty in no case, however, to exceed one cent per pound, or $1 per hundred. The additional provision in this bill is that the cost of supervision in connection with the carrying out of the provisions are to be paid by the producer. I will endeavour to get the information asked for by the hon. gentleman. I may mention that this is a reduction of 50 per cent on the bounty formerly paid. Those engaged in the industry are quite prepared to accept this amount in consideration of the duty which is proposed on the raw material.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill.

Hon. Mr. DEVER, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (146) "An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, 1894."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of the bill. He said: The Senate will not require any explanation as to the tariff changes. They are principally affecting the duty on spirits imported into the country. On nearly all the different kinds and varieties of spirits that duty has been raised from $2.12½ to $2.25, and the duty of 1½ cents a pound which has been imposed on raw sugar does not apply under 16. The House will remember that under the old law it was restricted to 14, so that it gives the importer an extra two degrees. The duty imposed on the raw material upto 16 is ½ cent a pound and upon the refined sugars ¼ hundredths being a proportionate increase upon the refined to that which is imposed upon the raw. That is in figures, but it really is not as high protection to the manufacturers as they had under the old law by 14 per cent, by reason of the loss sustained in the manufacture of the raw sugar into the refined. Still it was considered sufficiently high to give that protection which is necessary to continue the carrying on of the industry in this country. Since these tariff items passed the Commons, an additional clause has been added to the two items within the last two days. One was to cover the case of the free importation of fresh salmon into the country, in order to meet the interpretation which has been given to the present Tariff Act in the United States. It affects the Pacific coast probably more than it will the provinces on the Atlantic. They have decided that fresh salmon can be admitted into the United States free and we have so amended our law as to permit the salmon which is caught at the mouth of the Columbia River, or below the Fraser in United States waters, to be brought into Canada. As was indicated a couple of days ago, they have given an interpretation to the clause which provides for the admission into the United States of lumber or Canadian boards which are planed, grooved and tongued. They put it on the dutiable list. We propose to reciprocate in that item, in the same manner as we have in the other, by taking power to the Governor General by proclamation to place grooved and tongued and planed lumber on the free list whenever we are met in the same way by the United States. In the meantime, planed, grooved and tongued lumber will, when imported into Canada, bear the same duty as is imposed upon similar lumber by the United States when sent to that country. In other words, it is purely reciprocal. It has met with the unanimous consent and approval of the House of Commons, and I have no doubt it will receive the sanction of this House also.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I consider those great privileges, certainly, though the hon. premier said he thought it would affect the fish trade in British Columbia more than in the lower provinces. I rather differ from him in that. I think we have an extensive market for our fresh salmon. The only fear I have is that it will advance the price so much that we will hardly have any salmon on our own market, because in the face of a high duty we did ship large quantities of fish to Boston, New York, and other cities in the United States. I think this will enhance the price of fish, and will be a great boon to the fishermen of the country; and if you can succeed in getting tongued and grooved lumber into the United States, it will be another advantage.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the United States let them in, we are not succeeding in getting them in. Give the United States credit for being a little liberal.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Have the United States Government made any suggestion of letting manufactured boards, planed, grooved and tongued, into their market?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No; the United States have not given any intimation of that kind. It was supposed that when the United States tariff item passed Congress that it included all that character of lumber, and, upon that presumption, we placed grooved and tongued lumber upon the free list. Now they have ruled it dutiable, and we reciprocate; but the moment that they give any indication of making it free in the United States, we will reciprocate by order in council.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is, put the duty on and take it off if they take it off

The motion was agreed to, and the bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rules.

THE WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the orders of the day are called, perhaps the hon. leader of the House will be able to give us some information as to when we may expect proration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am in hopes that we will be able to prorogue this afternoon. There are only two bills to come up from the other House. One of them may give rise to some debate, but I am in hopes that the business can be completed in time to enable us to prorogue this afternoon. I may, in order to save time, explain the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Bill, although it is not before us yet. At present the company have a subsidy for what is known as the Hudson Bay Railway, running from Winnipeg northward to Hudson Bay. Forty miles of that road has been built, and it never having been completed, the subsidy was not granted. They had proposed, and did obtain permission a year or two ago, to change the route and go southward and pass through the narrows of Lake Manitoba and on northward through the Dauphin Lake country until they reach the Saskatchewan. At present the charter allows them to abandon the road at the terminus of the 40 miles, and permits them to start from any portion of that 40 miles running westward almost parallel with the Canadian Pacific Railway until it reaches Portage la Prairie, then proceeding north-westward on the line almost, not altogether, but in some places parallel, to the Manitoba and North Western Railway until it reaches Gladstone. The intention is to give them permission to start from Portage la Prairie or from Gladstone. That would avoid the paralleling of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, and certain powers are reserved to compel them to commence their road at Gladstone. By that means they will not parallel any road, but from Gladstone will run directly north-west, opening up the Dauphin Lake country and not interfering with any other railway interest or enterprise. Of course, arrangements would have to be made at Gladstone with the Manitoba and North-western road for running powers to Portage la Prairie, and then arrangements would have to be made for running powers with the Canadian Pacific Railway to Winnipeg, or with the Northern Railway, which is a line running from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie. I am strongly of the opinion that the road should not be permitted to be built where it would parallel either of these other roads. In building 100 or 110 miles from Gladstone northward, it would open up one of the very best portions of the Canadian North-west—I use that expression from the fact that it is now being quickly settled, and from the fact that it has been in the past proven that in that section of the country, although considerably to the north of Winnipeg, they have not been troubled with summer or early frosts. The reason given for that is that it lies in the valley between Lake Dauphin and Lake Winnipegosis. Whether the road will ever be continued to Hudson Bay, I am not prepared to say, nor am I prepared to say that I would be in favour of any extension beyond the Saskatchewan. If it reaches the Saskatchewan, it reaches navigable water northward and eastward and passes through a country which is rapidly settling up and which will be one of the most important sections of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is settling up faster, a great deal, than any other section of the North-west and has been doing so for two years, and there is hardly a settler there but is perfectly delighted with the country. I believe it is one of the best sections of country that we have in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The present contract does not involve any money grant, I suppose?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All that the government do is to divide the subsidies which have already been granted. The company is now entitled under its charter to $80,000 per annum for performing certain services to the country and 6,400 acres per mile for each mile constructed. What we propose to do is to divide that subsidy, allowing them to build half the way, about 110 miles, paying them $40,000 during the running of the road, and half the land grant, and upon the completion of the other portion, they would receive the balance of it. The bill involves no additional cost to the country.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very glad to hear that, and I am also very glad that the line is to go through the Dauphin Lake country. I have always been in favour of the Hudson Bay Railway, and any line which runs in that direction, I must favour. I do not think the line from Gladstone, north to Dauphin Lake, would be such a diversion as some people think. It seems to me there is a lovely country in the Dauphin Valley, and as many persons went there years ago under the assurance that that country would be opened up by railway, we should have a railway there to carry out some of the pledges made in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is nothing, strictly speaking, before the House, but we may save time by expressing an opinion now. I have not seen the measure yet and it is not easy to discuss it until we have it before us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The resolution embodying the principle of the bill is in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I see the resolution, but the resolution perhaps does not cover all the ground.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, it covers all the ground.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand then that there is nothing in the bill except just what is in the resolution?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not the original act here, but a point to which I wish to direct attention is this: it has been stated, we shall be better able to judge, whether correctly or not when the bill comes before this House, that the intention was, that the bonds to be issued by the company on this new road are to be a first lien. Now this company, as I understand, issued bonds some years ago, and £80,000 of those bonds are held by the contractors who built the forty miles of road running north from Winnipeg, and another amount of bonds is held by the parties in England who supplied the rails for the road.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Sixty thousand pounds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In addition to this?

Hon. Mr. POWER—In addition to the £80,000—the company raised money on those bonds and the company have paid neither the contractors nor the persons who supplied the rails. As a consequence of the default of the company to pay for the rails, the company in England who supplied them have become insolvent. I am informed—it may be that my informant was incorrect—that the company will be in a position, under the legislation which they are asking for—whether they are getting it or not, I do not know—to completely wipe out that indebtedness. These bonds were made a first lien on the road, and upon all property present and future of the company, and of course if the bonds for the new road are made a first lien on that road, then the old bonds will be completely worthless, because the old road is being abandoned. It is to be hoped there is no intention on the part of the parliament or the government of Canada to become a party to what is nothing but a complete and barefaced swindle. Further, I do not think there are any merits in this bill at all. The amount which the government proposes to pay for 125 miles of road through what is practically a prairie country, will come to about $8,000 a mile. I think it would be a great deal better for the country to build the road and own it. They could build it for $8,000, and that would be better than handing it over to such a body as we know the Hudson Bay Railway Company to be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—To put myself in order, I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned till 2.30 p.m. I do not object to the discussion; in fact I introduced the subject for the purpose of getting an expression of opinion, to ascertain whether we could dispose of the business in time to pro-ogue at 5 o'clock. I have heard something of this £80,000 of bonds, but not of the additional £60,000. It is an extraordinary statement that English capitalists should supply rails to the extent of about £60,000 sterling on such security for forty miles of road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not mention the figure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend behind me did. It amounts to $7,500 per mile for iron alone. How in the world they got into debt to the extent of £80,000 to the contractors and £60,000 for rails, I cannot understand. What use the forty miles of road is to them now, I cannot well comprehend. It is there and the grass has grown over it, and nothing has been done. My hon. friend from St. Boniface, perhaps, would be able to tell us better about it. The security that these bondholders have now, is something to my mind which is chimerical. They cannot have any, and how this is going to affect their interests is a question that requires further investigation. If the company is authorized to change the route by which they can make it more profitable, it must affect the liabilities which are now upon the enterprise as far as it has been carried, favourably. I cannot conceive it possible that any person would advance another dollar on the road, unless, as the hon. gentleman says, they are to be preferential bonds which would have the effect of wiping out the existing liabilities.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—Hon. gentlemen are all aware that forty miles of this line was completed from Winnipeg to a point north-west of Winnipeg. The contractors who built the line were paid by those bonds for work done, and the rails were purchased in England with bonds also. Neither of these debts has ever been paid. Under this bill the forty miles will be entirely abandoned, as the road will begin at Gladstone. The premier says there cannot be any possible security in that section of forty miles. There will not be if this bill passes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any now?

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—There is now, because it is part of the line and entitled to receive the land grant and whatever subsidy has been paid on this bill. I think it is legislation, when looked into, which cannot for a moment be allowed to pass in this House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No subsidy can be paid under this bill except for work performed, carrying mails, etc. If that work is not performed they will not be paid any.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—My remarks were not directed to that particular part. They were directed to the forty miles already built, which under this bill would be entirely isolated and the bonds issued on it would be utterly worthless. If you change the route, you destroy the security. Is that an act which the Parliament of Canada ought to countenance?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have very little security now.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—They have the bonds. Why pass a law under which the holders of these securities will be deprived of any security whatever? These forty miles will be isolated. The original intention was to carry the road from the end of that forty miles on to the Saskatchewan. Now you abandon the forty miles altogether, and therefore you destroy the security of the bondholders.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no doubt the point is well taken by my hon. friend, because we first chartered a road from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay. The petitions and papers which were filed in support of that application I cannot lay my hands on. We can see there what prompted Parliament to grant this large subsidy of $80,000 a year. The petition set forth that it was going to be a great advantage to the people of the North-west to have a rival freight line, and that is what induced Parliament to give a subsidy of $80,000 a year. In 1891, when the company came forward for a change, we renewed that grant and we used these words :—

A sum of $80,000 to be paid annually on the construction of the railway from the end of the forty miles of the railway now built to a point on the Saskatchewan.

This is perfectly plain : there is the law. At the instance of the company, we allowed a change to be made. They were to build to the Saskatchewan and this $80,000 a year was to be paid, but it was to be paid for a line constructed from the end of the forty miles. The forty miles was then in existence, and parliament thought it would be a proper thing to aid them with the construction of the road from that extension. Now the proposition before us is an entirely new one ; it has nothing to do with this forty miles. The road is to be in a different section of country, and is not in the same direction even. They start from Gladstone, on the line of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. I am told there is a settlement for the first twenty-five miles, but that beyond that it is a level, swampy country where it is easy to build a railway, but where there are no settlers and where it can never be settled. The settlers of the Dauphin Lake region are on the west side of the lake, while this railway goes on the east side of the lake.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—That was the original route.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I saw the plans an hour ago, and they indicated that the line was to go on the east side of Dauphin Lake. If not, they have been changed within an hour. But there is nothing to bind them. It was stated that they were to select the best country, but they will select the easiest country to build in, and the road built there will be abandoned, just like the forty miles, and only built for the purpose of making money for a few interested people. There never was a greater fraud than the proposition to aid this line. We know there has been pressure on the government for a considerable time to get some deviation from the original route that would enable the contractors to get out of it and recoup themselves for some advances. It is not proposed to pay the people who hold liens on the forty miles, as I understand it. I speak now subject to correction. From the latest information I have had, and the papers that I have read over, the original contractors protested against this contract going except under certain conditions, when they should have a right to be paid a portion of it. The English company that furnished the steel rails have had to go into liquidation. They did not get any money out of it. Somebody must have got the money. It appears the people who built the road were paid $400,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does that form part of the £80,000 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection is that the contractors claim that there was $400,000 due to them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that a portion of the £80,000 ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know how that is. I wish to get the papers. Some gentleman has got them and they cannot be found. It is very important that we should have the papers here when we are discussing the subject in order that we might refer to them. There is the fact, patent to every hon. gentleman, that this is a new departure. It has no connection with the original intention under which Parliament decided to vote this large subsidy to the railway ; it is not even in accordance with the Act passed in 1891, but it is to be built in an entirely new country and under different circumstances and conditions, and is not really going to help settlement in the North-west. If it were to go on the west side of Lake Dauphin, there is a considerable settlement there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON (P. E. I.)—I understood the hon. gentleman to say, Lake Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, Lake Dauphin. I understand this railway is designated to pass east of Lake Dauphin, and not through the Lake Dauphin district.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not pretended that it is to go west of Lake Dauphin.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is partially right and partially wrong. If the 110 miles that it is proposed to subsidize now reaches Lake Dauphin, the other 110 or 120 miles to the Saskatchewan runs through a portion of country similar to that which he has described. Those who have been in that section of the country, and who have any knowledge of it, will say that that 110 miles is running through new country; and, if that 110 miles is built, it is really a colonization road, although it may form part of the Hudson Bay road; and the difference would be that it would be running from Winnipeg, as near as possible on the west side of Lake Winnipeg, and through the narrows of Lake Winnipegosis, until it reaches the Saskatchewan. On the other hand, it begins at Gladstone, ending in the same place, and if it ever goes further it will be on the route of the Hudson Bay road now under charter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think in a matter of this kind, we should have the fullest and most reliable information. They have plans in the department of a good deal of this section of the country, and a large amount of it is surveyed, and the best and latest information I have been able to obtain is that when you get 25 miles north of Gladstone you pass through the poor country that I have described, and that the good country is in the district west of Lake Dauphin. The road does not propose to go there. But we are discussing a hypothetical question; there is no order in council defining the road; it is a perfect blank. Ought not Parliament to be favoured with a plan of the road?

Hon. Mr. MacINNES (Burlington)—We passed a charter last night for a railway through that district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Here is a company getting authority to build from a point which Parliament never contemplated, getting permission to abandon the forty miles constructed, and given a charter under which they can vary 100 miles one way or the other. Before we are asked to vote, I think the government should pass an order in council defining the road. This matter has been four months under consideration and debate since the order in council was passed in March last under which they were to get the loan. Since that time the matter has been discussed in the press, and it would be only fair and proper that the government should insist on having the parties file a plan, and have it approved by the Minister of Railways, because, when the late Sir

John Abbott was Premier in 1891, when this bill was under consideration, he formed a very pronounced opinion in this Chamber against the wisdom of Parliament aiding to that large extent a road of this character. The bill was withdrawn and it remained in abeyance for about a fortnight, and then we had the proposition, that the road should be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. That was in 1891, and surely in four years the Governor in Council should have defined the line of this railway and given Parliament and the country the fullest information on the subject, because it does not seem reasonable or proper that for the next twenty years we should saddle the finances of the country with this huge item of $40,000 a year, or may be $80,000. We have been cheese-paring, cutting down the salaries of our officials, and starving other enterprises all over the Dominion that would have benefited materially the sections of the country directly interested in them, and here we are launching into a huge expenditure and one involving a large sum, where it will not serve any good purpose. If it were going through a fertile country, I would not object to it; but here there is no provision for running it after it is built. They will build it and abandon it, as they did the forty miles. With those experiences before us, can we honestly commit the country to the payment of such an enormous sum for a myth of this kind? Anybody who will look at the past history of the road will see that it is open to the gravest suspicion. The charter was granted in 1880 to the Winnipeg Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company. The road was then to be built to the mouth of Nelson River on the Hudson Bay. In 1894 they were authorized to construct a branch line to Winnipegosis, and to build fifty miles a year. In 1886 they had an amending act and then a consolidation with another road, and in 1887 they came forward for more legislation. The name was changed to the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Co., and they were to build from Winnipeg northerly to the Hudson Bay. In 1891 they had influence enough to get Parliament to give this large subsidy of $80,000 a year. The hon. gentleman behind me says that there was a disposition to throw out the bill, and not renew it at all; there was a majority against it in this Chamber, and it was only under personal pressure that it was allowed to go, and then only to the Saskatchewan. But the project has grown and a number of people have got involved. I think it would be much better and I would really rather see $50,000 taken out of the public exchequer, and divided up among those sharks. That is the common-sense way of looking at it. Take $50,000 out of the exchequer, and, if it will keep out those sharks for the next few years, give it to them, because the bill is an outrage on all propriety and statesmanship. Here we have this bill brought into Parliament within a few hours of prorogation, with many chairs vacant, though it was announced, over and over again, that there was no more important legislation to be brought down, and this bill in particular was referred to. There must be some extraordinary pressure; and I think it would relieve the government very considerably if this House were to throw out the bill. They would be doing a service not only to the country, but to the government, because I cannot conceive that men of prudence and common sense would allow their judgment to be carried away by a myth of this kind, when we have this experience before us of the abandonment of the forty miles. What security have you that they are going to keep the other road open? No greater security than you had about keeping open the forty miles, and to say that you will allow all that money to be wasted, to allow those creditors to go unpaid, I think is wrong. I do not know the details of the bill, and I speak subject to correction, but I know when I read the papers last there was a protest by the contractors that this subsidy should not be granted unless it was subject to the payment of the first claims. If they had bonds on the forty miles it would not be honest to let the legislation go unless the bonds were to be secured. If you are to call it the same road it must be saddled with the same liabilities and responsibilities. If we grant this aid, we will be derelict in our duty if we do not make provision that the subsidy shall be stopped if the road is not operated. It must only be given on the understanding that they will keep the road open and run one or two trains a day. With the experience we have had of the abandonment of that forty miles, it is an unsafe thing to trust the company with any discretionary power. In the first place there should be laid on the table an order in council by the government approving of the line in a certain direction, so that we should not be deceived as to where this line was to be built. One gentleman says it is to be in one place, and another gentleman speaks of another place. We know very well that a concern which has been able to bring influence to bear on the government cannot be trusted with discretionary power, and Parliament ought to know whether this road is to be kept open, or whether the contractors are merely to make a certain sum of money out of it. At the time the experimental surveys were being made on the road two years ago they were then looking out for an easy road to build and were not consulting the best interests of the country. They were endeavouring to ascertain what section of the country was the smoothest and most level and where the construction could be attended to with the least expenditure. The people up there are not interested in the road, because there is no population to support it, and this House will deserve well of the country and will score a point in the estimation of Canada if they save the country from this atrocious swindle that is being imposed upon the country.

The motion was agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (51) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code."

Hon. Mr. POWER—On referring to the minutes of our proceedings of yesterday I find the amendment which I moved in committee has been incorrectly reported altogether. It makes my amendment to provide that seven jurors out of twelve might return a verdict, whereas my motion was that eleven might return a verdict. And with a view of getting my motion properly on record I propose to move the amendment on the third reading. I do not propose to make a long speech on it, but if the House will permit, I shall quote a few extracts from the standard work of "Trial by Jury" by William Forsyth. At page 197 of the library edition, I find the following with respect to the requirement of unanimity:—

"The origin of the rule as to unanimity may, I think, be explained as follows:—

In the assize as instituted in the reign of Henry II, it was necessary that twelve jurors should agree in order to determine the question of disseizin; but this unanimity was not then secured by any process which tended to make the agreement compulsory. The mode adopted was called, indeed, an enforcement of the jury; but this term did not imply that any violence was done to the conscientious opinions of the minority. It merely meant that a sufficient number were to be added to the panel until twelve were at last found to agree in the same conclusion; and this became the verdict of the assize. It might perhaps be unreasonable to require that so large a number as twelve should be the minimum without whose agreement no valid decision could be made; but this is entirely a question of degree, and must depend very much upon the state of society, the amount of intelligence amongst the jurors, and other circumstances of a varying nature. We can easily understand that it would have been improper at that time to allow a single juror, who after all, as has been already fully explained, was nothing more than a witness, to determine a disputed right of possession; and in proportion to the magnitude of the question at issue would the concurrence of several testimonies be felt to be necessary, in order to arrive at a safe conclusion. The civil law required two witnesses at least, and in some cases a greater number, to establish a fact in dispute; as, for instance, where a debt was secured by a written instrument, five witnesses were necessary to prove payment. These would have been called by our ancestors a jurata of five. At the present day, with us no will is valid which is not attested by at least two witnesses. In all countries the policy of the law determines what it will accept as the minimum of proof.

And the writer goes on to point out that those jurors were not regarded as triers at all, were simply witnesses, and he compares the requirements of the twelve witnesses to the requirements of the civil law that there shall be two witnesses in any case and in certain cases five witnesses. At the present time no will is valid without at least two witnesses. Then he proceeds:—

Bearing then in mind that the jury system was in its inception nothing but the testimony of witnesses informing the court of facts supposed to lie within their own knowledge, we see at once that to require that twelve men should be unanimous was simply to fix the amount of evidence which the law deemed to be conclusive of a matter in dispute.

There is a good deal more, but I shall not read it. On page 199 he says:—

But in old times a verdict was sometimes taken from eleven, if they agreed, and in that case the refractory juror was committed to prison.

Then on the next page we find:—

But it was decided in the reign of Edward III, that the verdict of less than twelve was a nullity, and the court said, that the judges of assize ought to carry the jury about with them in a cart until they agreed.

Then there is no higher authority on constitutional questions, no one whose opinion is regarded as of more value than Hallam. On page 203 he says:—

“In a valuable note to his ‘Middle Ages,’ Mr. Hallam, speaking of ‘the grand principle of the Saxon polity, the trial of facts by the country,’ says, ‘From this principle (except as to that preposterous relic of barbarism, the requirement of unanimity) may we never swerve—may we never be compelled, in wish, to swerve—by a contempt of their oaths in jurors, and a disregard of the just limits of their trust!’ This is a stern judgment against the policy of the law which requires that a jury, if it delivers a verdict at all, should be unanimous.”

And then the writer goes on to consider and agrees with Hallam that it is not a reason. At page 207 the writer quotes a report made by the commissioners appointed in 1830 to report upon the courts of law:—

“It is difficult to defend the justice or wisdom of the latter principle. It seems absurd that the rights of a party, in question of a doubtful or complicated nature, should depend upon his being able to satisfy twelve persons that one particular state of facts is the true one.”

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That refers to civil cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, that particular paragraph. At page 209 he says:—

It seems impossible to answer or evade the force of this reasoning. And yet, although twenty years have elapsed since the above recommendation was made in a report to the crown, signed by some of the most distinguished lawyers of the day, so slow is the march of improvement in the law, that it has never been carried into effect, and the rule as to the unanimity remains in all its rigid necessity at the present day. In this case, however, let it be observed that lawyers proposed the change, and that, so far, the profession is not answerable for the continuance of a mischief which, in the words of the report, is injurious to the interests of justice. Why should the perverseness of knavery of a single juror be allowed to invalidate the verdict which eleven others are agreed to give? Many years ago Professor Christian expressed his opinion “that the unanimity of twelve men, so repugnant to all experience of human conduct, passions and understandings, could hardly in any age have been introduced into practice by a deliberate act of legislature;” and it remains to be seen whether the legislature will much longer tolerate such an anomaly.

Well, the argument there applies, the logic applies just as well to criminal cases as to civil. In Scotland they require the jury to be unanimous in civil cases and allow them to differ in criminal cases. The majority can give a verdict in a criminal case.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—For a capital offence?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know about capital cases.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think not.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall just quote what the writer says :

In Scotland, however, exactly the reverse has happened. There juries in civil trials, under the system recently introduced, must be unanimous, while the verdict in criminal is determined by the majority.

In France and in Germany the juries are not required to be unanimous in criminal cases. That you will find set out at page 213 of this work. I simply call attention to these facts in order to show that what I propose is not an unreasonable thing, and to show further how this requirement of unanimity came to exist :

The time is fast approaching, if it has not already come when trial by jury, like every other part of our legal fabric, will become the subject of public criticism, and I feel persuaded that then it will be found impossible to justify or retain a rule which is opposed to both justice and expediency.

I therefore move that the bill be not now read the third time, but that the first clause be amended as follows :—

Section 727. By adding the following subsection thereto :—

3. It shall not be necessary that a jury shall be unanimous, but after four hours' deliberation seven jurors out of twelve may return a verdict which shall for all purposes have the same effect as a verdict concurred in by all the jurors.

Section 728. By inserting after “ agree ” in the second line the words “ as provided in the next preceding section.”

The amendment was lost on division.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

BEET-ROOT SUGAR BOUNTY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (148) “ An Act respecting the bounty on Beet-root Sugar.” He said : I have the figures now in reference to the bounty paid for beet root sugar from 1891 to 1895, and with the consent of the House, I will give the facts. We paid in 1891-2, $23,756.56 ; 1892-3, $20,568.00 ; 1893-4, $7,765.97 ; 1894-5, $27,135.76.

So that for the four years we have paid, as a bounty upon beet root sugar produced in this country, $79,236.29, showing that when it was first granted in 1892 the bounty paid was as high $23,766. It then fell, owing to the failure of the company that had been engaged in the enterprise in 1893-4, to $7,765, showing that either there was a failure in the production of the beet or a failure in the management of the business. The principal reason, I am inclined to think, was, that they found it difficult to induce the habitants of that section of the country to go into the growing of the beet to the extent that they anticipated ; but for the year 1894-5 they induced the farmers to take up this enterprise through the bounty which they received from the Quebec government, and the extra price they were able to get on account of the bounty which we gave, and they produced raw sugar to a quantity sufficiently great to enable them to claim $27,135 from the government. The present rate will not be higher than a cent a pound, which would be a dollar per hundred for two years longer, when it is hoped the full test will be made and the bounty will cease, and that the duty which we have placed upon the raw material will be sufficient to warrant those engaged in the enterprise in continuing. If not, it will have to be stopped.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF FORRESTERS BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOV—We endeavoured to have a meeting of the committee this morning but failed. There were three courses open to us ; one was to submit it to a committee of the whole, another was to reduce the quorum of the committee, and another to withdraw the bill. The promoters of the bill desire to take the last course and the bill will be withdrawn for this session. They presented their bill in time, but it was impossible to get it through. Of course it is the fault of the system. Before another session something should be done to prevent a repetition of this occurrence. It is unfortunate that people who seek for legislation should be thwarted in this way. The bill was retarded in the other House, and comes to us too late in the session. It is withdrawn at the present time, but will come up next session, and I hope it will meet a different fate. I now move for the remission of the fee, less the expense of printing.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—This will teach those who have bills the propriety of introducing them in this House first. We can deal with the business of the country while they are discussing politics below.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

SECOND SITTING.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at 2.30 p.m.

Routine proceedings.

WINNIPEG AND HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—As I am about to leave for home and the Hudson Bay Railway bill may not come up from the other House before my departure, I want to say a few words in favour of the measure. That railway is needed by a large portion of the people in Manitoba. The Dauphin district is a fine country, and is settling very rapidly, but it would settle still more rapidly if that railway were built. We do not see any other means of constructing that road than by passing this bill. I do not know what can be done about the forty miles which have been referred to here to-day. It is called a railway, but it is not a railway at present, and is of no consequence to the bondholders. It would not change their position whether this bill is passed or is rejected. What they call their security is no security at all if it is left as it is at present, and it will be left as it stands whether this bill passes or not. The rejection of the bill will not at all improve the position of the bondholders, so far as the forty miles is concerned, and therefore I think that objection is not valid. For the rapid development of that part of the North-west the bill should receive the support of this House.

The Senate was adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House was resumed.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (149) "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 30th June, 1896, and for other purposes relating to the public service."

The bill passed through all its stages under a suspension of the rule.

The Senate was adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the House was resumed.

WINNIPEG GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

FIRST READING.

A Message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (150) "An Act respecting the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the bill be read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—I move that the said bill be not now read the first time, but that it be read the first time this day three months.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is scarcely fair to the Senate that we are called upon to consider a Bill of this important character without the possession of the bill itself. There is only in this Chamber now a single copy of this bill; and the Bill, as I know from being present in another place, has been changed materially since it was introduced this morning; so that I think it is manifestly unfair and improper that this Senate, if it has any respect for its dignity and position, should take up an important measure of this kind within 45 minutes of the time His Excellency has arranged to come down and prorogue Parliament. The bill is, perhaps, the most important measure that has been introduced during the present session. It seeks to impose a tax upon the people of this country of $80,000 a year. I believe it is modified, that if they build half the road—I speak subject to correction, because I have not the Bill and do not know the contents of it—the government will be authorized to extend the payments of $40,000 a year. The main features of the Bill are to ratify and confirm the grant of $80,000 to this road. There is not even a provision in the Bill that the road shall be kept open. The road may, as was the case with the forty miles from Winnipeg, be constructed and this subsidy sold to credulous investors, and the money pocketed by the parties who are interested in this scheme and the line may never be operated, all to the detriment of the people of Canada. It is well known that the original Company was granted very large subsidies; a subsidy of $250,000 was granted by the Provincial government, and subsidies in the way of land by the Federal government, large grants of 6,400 acres per mile for a part of the distance, and 12,000 for another part of the distance; and even with all that assistance, the $250,000, the bonding of the road for so many thousand dollars a mile, there the forty miles has remained for the last few years without a single car running over it. There is the patent fact, which on its face shows that the whole scheme is a deliberate fraud. It has been a fraud from the beginning; it goes all the way back to 1880, when the charter was granted to the Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company. There is not a clause in the bill which compels the company to keep that road open. They can, as a mere matter of speculation, sell this subsidy of $80,000 a year; and the people of Canada will for the next twenty years have to pay $80,000 in order that a certain number of persons may make a speculation and recoup themselves. As the bill stood originally, and as it now stands, I think it attacks private interests. The government of Manitoba advanced the sum of $250,000 to this road. Under the contract with the government the company were to give the government of Manitoba an acre for every dollar advanced. That is 250,000 acres. That contract has never been carried out. The company issued bonds on this road for $20,000 a mile and they gave a portion of these bonds to the contractors and another portion to an English iron firm, and it is needless to say that not one dollar of interest has been paid on the bonds; they have been in default. So there are the original creditors of the road, the sub-contractors under the present company, who have a large claim (I do not know what the amount is—I think about $400,000); and there is the claim of the company in England that advanced the steel. Well, hon. gentlemen, are you going, by an act of Parliament, to approve of a swindle of that kind? Are you going to say here, deliberately, by the passage of this bill, that you approve of the policy and course adopted by this company? If you do, I say we place Canada in a very unenviable position in the British market. The Parliament of Canada, in order to serve the purposes of those people who have already been guilty of a gross fraud, is going to enable them to continue the fraud if they can find people credulous enough to advance money upon the bonds. The effect of the bill may be, as I am advised,—I have not time to analyse it myself, because it is quite impossible to do so in this hasty way—to defraud those creditors of the company. In order that those creditors might have had an opportunity of appearing here to oppose the bill, ample notice should have been given under the rules of Parliament to all persons interested in the construction of the railway, inasmuch as there are large private interests and rights affected. We ought to be exceedingly sensitive, exceedingly careful, that interests of that character should not be prejudiced or disturbed by our legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
They are not by this bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says they are not by this bill. I cannot take that on trust. This bill has been changed so often, and changed within the last few hours, that it is quite impossible to understand its provisions, and I do not think it is fair for the hon. minister to ask us to take up a measure of this character without having an opportunity of reading it. I have had no opportunity to do so. I tried to get it. I went half a dozen times to the distribution office to ask if they had a copy of it. They said they had not. I made them telephone to the printing office, and they said they knew nothing about the bill. I do not know where the bill has been printed; it must have been at a private office. I said to the official in the distribution office, "This bill has been printed in the government office." He telephoned to the Bureau, and they said no, it had not been printed there. I thought it very extraordinary. I said, "I believe there are copies of it in existence, because I was told a gentleman had a copy of it." The official replied that the printing office knew nothing about it. So I concluded it must have been printed somewhere else.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not matter where it was printed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Except that I would have got a copy of it, if I had known where it was printed, because I thought it most important that I should have had a copy at an early period. But that is the position. It must have been practically stolen into the Chamber within the last 45 minutes in a most improper manner. In all my experience in Parliament, I never knew of an instance of this kind, where a bill of such importance and of this character was held back until the very last day, and brought on at the eleventh hour to be run through the Senate, when it is very well known that the people outside are very much excited over this matter. There is a very considerable difference of opinion about it outside and a very large public opinion that it is not proper legislation, that it is not serving anybody, that it is not even serving the section of the country through which it is proposed to build this road, because I presume if the road is to be continued from the end of the forty miles that the enterprise cannot possibly pay; that the only object in building it would be to earn the government subsidy. There could not be any other reason for it. I maintain that if that amendment is introduced, authorizing the government to subsidize a company building from Gladstone, it is an evasion of the charter of the company. It is a fraud on the creditors of this company, because it would be an entirely new road. It is not such a road as the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company were authorized to build under their charter, and until they come into Parliament and get a charter to build from Gladstone, this line from Gladstone north is not their road, and the bonds that were issued by the Winnipeg Great Northern road will not be a lien upon it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman would not consider it an impertinence on my part to interrupt him—I do not desire to be impertinent—I would remind him that he is talking now on matters not contained in the bill at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg pardon, I am.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, you are discussing a question of changing the route and giving the company an opportunity of building it as I explained this morning. That has all been eliminated by the ruling of the Speaker in the Commons on account of it being considered part of a private bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will read the bill if you will let me have it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, and then you will save yourself all the trouble of talking.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In order to know what is repealed, we will take up that act and read that clause. The bill reads as follows:—

In order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company to construct so much of their railway as reaches from the city of Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan River, the Governor in Council may enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and may pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, in manner following, that is to say: the sum of eighty thousand dollars to be paid annually on the construction of the railway from the end of the forty miles of the railway now built to a point on the Saskatchewan River,—such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the railway between the city of Winnipeg and a point on the Saskatchewan River: Provided that the Governor General in Council may order such sums to be paid in semi-annual instalments, and may permit the company to assign the same by way of security for any bonds or securities issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking.

Now there is no doubt about that. This bill proposed to change that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not do anything of the kind except to change the mode of payment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg pardon; it authorizes a change. That clause is absolutely repealed:

1. Clause one of the Aid Act is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted as follows: In order to enable the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company, formerly the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, to construct so much of their railway to Hudson Bay as reaches from the city of Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River, the Governor General in Council may enter into a contract with the company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for a term of twenty years, and may pay to the company for such services during the said term $80,000 per annum in the manner following: One-half of the aforesaid sum of $80,000 to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion by the company of one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River, the remaining one-half of the said sum of $80,000 to be paid annually commencing from the date of the completion of the remaining one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River, provided that such sums shall be paid in semi-annual instalments, and the company may sell the same or may assign the same by way of security for any bonds or other securities issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking.

2. The Governor General in Council is hereby authorized and empowered to alter and to modify the said contract in accordance with the terms of the Aid Act and of this act.

3. In the event of the contract not being entered into with the company in compliance with the terms of this act, in so far as the same relates to the construction of the first half of the company's railway, the Governor General in Council may, subject to the terms of the said Aid Act and of this act, transfer the amount applicable to such first half of the company's railway, namely, $40,000 a year for twenty years, to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone, to Lake Dauphin or thereabouts.

Who is right about that? Is it not perfectly clear that authority is here taken to grant a new charter to a new company or to amend the charter of this company? Nothing could be plainer. It is granting a charter for a different section of the country, hundreds of miles away from that section and not running in the same direction—running on the other side of Lake Manitoba. That is perfectly plain. In building a line from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, it was not supposed that you went west of Lake Manitoba. The very fact that the line is laid off between Lake Winnipeg and Lake Manitoba is the best evidence of that. Why did the promoters of the bill construct the forty miles of road if they did not regard that as in the line running northerly to Hudson Bay? That was the point that they took, which was east of Lake Manitoba. Gladstone is west of Lake Manitoba, through a different section altogether. You might as well contend that you could grant a charter to build on one side of Lake Superior and then say that you might build on the other. It is precisely the same. The very fact of their building that forty miles is the best proof that that was the understanding and the only construction that the charter was capable of bearing. So that I am perfectly right in my contention that there is an evasion at present.

In the event of the contract not being entered into with the company in compliance with the terms of this act, in so far as the same relates to the construction of the first half of the company's railway, the Governor General in Council may, subject to the terms of the said Aid Act and of this act, transfer the amount applicable to such first half of the company's railway, namely, $40,000 a year for twenty years, to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone, to Lake Dauphin or thereabouts.

Is not that perfectly clear? There is a new charter and a new company, and by granting that you destroy the vested interests of creditors to the extent of considerably over half a million dollars. There is the subsidy granted by the province of Manitoba, over a quarter of a million, and there are the bondholders and sub-contractors who hold half a million between them. I endeavoured to get the file connected with this, but it has been kept somewhere in the other Chamber. The House of Commons has it apparently, and I have been unable to get it. I should like to have given the House the details of these claims that are set forth in this correspondence. The contractors protest against the contract going as it did. If they were satisfied with it, or if it were not going to interfere with their liens they would have been only too glad to see that large sum of money expended to improve their security. On the contrary, they protested against the government granting a charter of this kind, because it is perfectly notorious that the company does not propose to build from the end of the forty miles. They have no idea of doing it. If the hon. gentleman says there is no intention to deviate, and will strike out the last lines that I have read, I shall be glad to withdraw my opposition, but certainly I am not going to consent to chartering a company to construct the line through a new section of country without giving notice to the parties interested. In cases of that kind, the rules of Parliament require that two months notice shall be given before the bill is introduced, in order that all persons who have any interest in the enterprise may be apprised of their position and may appear before the Committee of Parliament and have an opportunity to take exception to any clauses of the bill. That is the practice of Parliament; that is the rule in both Houses, and it is a rule that we ought not to break, because it is a rule in the interest of equity and common interests. Otherwise, at the last moment, a new charter may be sprung upon Parliament. The liens already existing on the forty miles are not worth the paper they are written on. The only value about them is the rails that are lying there, and they have only the value of old iron, because they have been lying there a great many years. My contention, therefore, is perfectly right, that this is a grant of a new charter to a new company, or to the old company if they wish to take it up, and, therefore, contrary to the rules of Parliament. The whole history of the scheme shows that it was born in iniquity, and has grown up in fraud and discredit. Time after time the attention of Parliament has been called to its character, and but for the good nature of Senators on several occasions this charter would have been allowed to expire, but not supposing that any improper uses were to be made of it, the usual courtesy was extended to the bill, and it was allowed to prolong its life. The company was first chartered in 1880, and it was known as the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway and Steamship Company; the object was to build a road to the Nelson River or some port on Hudson Bay. It is needless to say they failed entirely; they made no attempt whatever to carry out that charter. They came to Parliament in 1884 and were authorized to construct a branch from the main line; they were to build under that charter fifty miles. That was in 1884. Needless to say, they never built a mile of it. They were to run from a point at or near Selkirk, or Winnipeg, to Nelson, Churchill or some other points on Hudson Bay, and to amalgamate with the Nelson Valley Transportation Company, which was also a myth. In 1886 they came to Parliament again for an amendment to their charter and an amendment was granted in accordance with their wishes. In 1887 they came to Parliament and asked to change their name to the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, and they were then to build from Winnipeg northerly to Hudson Bay. That charter very nearly expired. It is the existing charter, practically. Under that charter the company was to start from Winnipeg, and run in a northerly direction to Port Nelson or Port Churchill. I shall just read the clause showing that I am quite right:—

The company shall have full power and authority to lay out, construct and complete a double or single iron or steel railway of a gauge of four feet eight and a half inches in width from the city of Winnipeg northerly to Port Nelson or Churchill or some other point on the shore of Hudson Bay, and to construct a branch from any point on its main line at or near the crossing of the Saskatchewan River to a point on the Canadian Pacific Railway west of Lake Winnipegosis; and the same together with such other branch lines as shall be hereafter constructed by the said company, shall constitute the line of railway hereinafter called the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway.

I should like to have had the file of papers here, and I ought to have had them here. I asked that all the information before the House of Commons should be given here, and the Premier promised that we should have the plans which had been brought down to the House of Commons to illustrate this matter. I had access to the file two or three days ago, but returned it to the clerk—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—
What file?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The file moved for in the House of Commons last May. I have sent for it two or three times. The file of papers will show the motive which prompted Parliament to give this large sum of money. It was for the purpose of making connection with Hudson Bay, not for the purpose of building a local road, not with a view of colonizing the Lake Dauphin district, or the Riding Mountain district, or any other district of the North-west, but simply for the purpose of building a road to Hudson Bay, and the intention was obvious. There were a great many people in this country, and there are still people who believe that the Hudson Bay scheme is a feasible one. I do not. The subject was pretty well threshed out in this Chamber some years ago, and it was pretty well decided, by a majority of this Senate, that the Hudson Bay route was not feasible, that the bay was closed for the greater part of the year, and that therefore it was folly to subsidize a railway to such an enormous extent to build to a port where it could be of no earthly use. It is very well known that there is no settlement in that country, that the land is of such an inferior character that it would not warrant immigration going in there. On the forty miles running from Winnipeg the existence of the rails has not prompted people to settle there.

Under ordinary conditions if you build a railway the effect is to draw a population and the section of country is filled up. That is the object in building a road, to afford facilities to people who are there and to increase the settlement. Why did we build the Canadian Pacific Railway if it was not to bring people to the North-west? We built it, as we supposed, through that portion of the country which would attract settlement in the most marked degree.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is where the hon. gentlemen made a mistake.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps we did. It was a mistake of the hon. gentleman and his friends. Had the Canadian Pacific Railway been built on the line advocated by the Liberal party, it would have been constructed much more slowly, and the best section of the country would have been selected. However, that is apart from the subject. The best evidence of the folly of any extension of the road northward is the fact that, although the enormous sum of $1,000,000 has been expended on forty miles running north from Winnipeg, yet you have not got a population there. With the railway in existence, it would not pay to run a train over it. Is there any similar condition in any other part of Canada? There may be a road or two that the government have subsidized lately—I need not mention names, but I have one in my mind's eye, one that has been closed up. We ought to stop that folly; it should not be continued. We should show more sense and judgment. The expenditure of $80,000 a year would be wise and judicious in many parts of Canada. There are portions of the Dominion where you have a chance of promoting settlement. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has been advocating the building of additional railways in his island, where the population is more dense than anywhere else in Canada. There are some grounds of justification for the construction of those roads, because the people are there to sustain them. They would have the effect of improving the business of that section of the country; but here you have no settlers, nothing to carry over the road, and you are going to perpetrate that folly by adding one hundred and twenty-five miles of road where the forty miles do not pay. There is not a white settler within ten miles, perhaps, of the route, until you come to the Hudson Bay post on the Saskatchewan. That is the information which has been obtained since this measure was before Parliament on the last occasion. Hon. gentlemen know that the Senate of Canada is frequently attacked. It is said that we are here to register the judgments of the House of Commons, that we are subservient to the government of the day, that all measures coming up to the Senate, in which the government have an interest, are perfectly safe in this House. Now, this Chamber is independent. This Chamber ought to be governed by a higher principle than favouritism to any government. The Senate have a responsibility to the country, and on the present occasion they should rise to the importance of it and gather some éclat from the independent course they could take on this bill. Is there one member in this Chamber who will say that it is justifiable, on any other principle than because the government favour the scheme, to construct this road? I would not do any hon. gentleman the injustice to suppose for one moment that he was so bereft of common sense as to say it was justifiable to expend $80,000 a year for the next twenty years on such a scheme, a scheme originated in fraud and propagated and supported because a number of people are creditors of this road. It is notorious that on former occasions, when this bill was before Parliament, below that lobby there were gentlemen buttonholing members, saying, "My firm is a creditor of this road to the extent of $5,000," and another, "My firm is a creditor of the company to the extent of $25,000." A legal firm in Winnipeg, it is notorious, canvassed Senator after Senator, in order that their account of $25,000 might be paid out of the treasury of this country. If the contractors and the men who are behind this scheme have got the government of this country by the throat, I am willing, if it is to relieve the government, to say, Put your hand in the public treasury, steal $50,000, but let us have an end of it; do not ask us to saddle $80,000 a year on the country for twenty years to come. No grosser or more disgraceful measure was ever brought forward within the halls of Parliament, and if the Senate desire to place themselves in a true position before the people of Canada, they will on the present occasion rise to the importance of it and vote against this bill.

The scheme has not a single redeeming feature to commend it, and the worst of it is, when the government were asked to put in a clause, enacting that the people of this country should not be called upon to pay this $80,000 a year unless the road were kept open, they voted it down. Does that show an honest intention? Is there a railway company that can be named, in any other part of Canada, which if offered a subsidy of $80,000 a year, would hesitate in agreeing to a proposition that if they failed to keep the road open the subsidy should cease? Let me put this position: Supposing that the government, at the time they brought in this measure, had said: this aid shall be granted pro rata for the mileage built. The company built forty miles; what would you think now if we were paying an annual subsidy on that forty miles already constructed? Would you say it was honest, just or right?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No one asks us to do it. Do not get up hypothetical cases: they might as well ask us to pay $40,000 for ten miles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You propose to us that if the company build half the road half the subsidy shall be paid. I say, put in an amendment to provide that if they fail to keep the road open and run trains, then the annual payment shall cease. What is the annual payment granted for? The words in the statute are that they shall render value for it. The $80,000 was not to be given to waste it on a road in the wilderness. It would be much better to give it to them to spend elsewhere. The $80,000 was given to pay for transporting men, supplies, mails and material. When the proposition is made, "granted we give you $80,000, will you continue to transport the mails and the supplies for the Indian Department and perform the other services named in the statute," they say, "no, we will not; we will not undertake any conditions." They say "we want the $80,000 and if we leave the road there, the $80,000 has to be paid to us for twenty years." Is that honest or just? Will any member say that he would be justified or warranted in taking out of the public treasury that enormous sum in order that those sharks may be enabled to waste a certain amount of money? I do not think that the good sense of this House is gone. I am sorry to see so many empty chairs. It is very much to be regretted that a proposition of this kind is discussed with only about one-fifth—perhaps not so many—of the members of the House present. This Bill cannot go through to-day, because it has to be opposed at every stage. The hon. gentleman may just as well withdraw it. A greater outrage was never attempted to be perpetrated on the people. The government deliberately bring down a bill of this importance in the last hours of the session.

Hon. Mr. McINNIS (B.C.)—The very last hour.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Actually the bill did not come to us until within an hour of the time when prorogation was to take place. No member of Parliament can point to a case in which the government have dared to so insult the representatives of the people as to submit such a measure at the eleventh hour. Is the Senate not to be consulted in legislation of this kind? Is the Senate to be asked to pass a bill of this nature, coming up 45 minutes before His Excellency is expected to appear to prorogue the House, and to pass it without recording a vote, without having a copy of the bill before us, without understanding the amendments made to it elsewhere, without being in a position to look at the amendments or to modify the great evil that is likely to ensue? The Premier, who is the leader of this House, is asking too much—demanding more than has ever been asked by any government of Canada. The foundation of the bill goes back to last November. The correspondence that ought to have been on the table this morning would have shown to hon. members that the government have been preparing a measure to assist the contractors so far back as last October. The correspondence would have shown that communications were passing between the Minister of Railways and the other members of the government and the promoters of this measure so far back as November; and we know, as a matter of fact, because the order in council has been published, that on the 5th March last, the government proposed to hand over from the exchequer of this country $2,500,000 as a loan to a company that had no assets. But they say we have given them a subsidy in land and money.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the hon. gentleman is discussing everything but the provisions in the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am dealing with the foundation of this bill, and I have a perfect right to go back. The hon. gentleman does not pretend to say that I am compelled to confine myself to the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The bill is one of wide proportions. It has been changed half a dozen times. Is it not a fact that the government were going to lend this company $2,500,000, and because public opinion was so pronounced they did not dare to do it? At the time they proposed to give $2,500,000 they intended to have a general election. Some people are wicked enough to say—of course I would not join in that—that the government had an interest in it—that they were to share the spoil with the promoters.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I call the hon. gentleman to order. He should not impute motives of that kind to the government. If he were not here the paid agent of some other persons he would not dare to use such language.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not paid by any one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman ought not to have the audacity and impudence to accuse the government of taking part in a swindle. It is only men who would enter into a corrupt bargain of that kind themselves who would accuse others of such conduct.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—The government is not made of that material that the hon. gentleman insinuates, he had better take care!

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said it was rumoured outside.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Rumour says that the hon. gentleman is paid for what he is doing here.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not true.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is truer than the other statement, and it is a piece of audacity to make such accusation against men who are more honourable than he is himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can go back to my speeches for the last ten years and all are in the same key in reference to this scheme. Go back to the introduction of this project and you will find that on every occasion I pointed out the absurdity of the scheme. I contended that the proposition to navigate Hudson Bay was not a feasible one, that it was a folly of the largest magnitude and that it was improper for this Parliament to favour such a project.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a very fair argument. The hon. gentleman should not, however, throw out insinuations against men who are more honest than he is himself. I could give a short history of the hon. gentleman that would be interesting.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have a perfect right to talk in the public interest here. That is what I am doing. The public have a right to be protected in this matter, and I say that my course from the very first stage of this measure has been consistent. I have denounced it on every occasion, and have condemned the government time and again for favouring the scheme. It would have been well if the government had taken my advice and not proposed to grant this enormous subsidy. I repeat what I said before: the hon. gentleman cannot point to a single instance where a bill of this magnitude has been introduced, not alone in Canada, but anywhere in the British dominions—a bill that has evoked such public opposition, such strong criticism in the public press. Even the hon. gentleman's friends are not unanimous on the subject. Many of them are opposed to this bill. The Montreal Gazette has called attention time and again to the impropriety of Parliament passing a measure of this kind.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not this measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Montreal Gazette has never been in favour of this railway. I have read the bill to the House and it is perfectly plain that it is proposed to transfer the subsidy from the original line to a road to extend from Gladstone to a point north, that it is not the original road at all, and it is a mere subterfuge to say that it is renewing the original vote in 1891 offering to the Hudson Bay Railway Company that subsidy of $80,000 a mile. I am quite sure there is not a British statesman who would for one moment think of introducing at the last moment of the session a measure that had evoked such opposition from the press of the country. What would have been thought of Lord Rosebery if, before the dissolution of Parliament recently, on the very last day, he had introduced some measure imposing a liability on the tax-payers of England to the amount of £100,000, which would be about the relative proportion as compared with the burden imposed by this bill on the people of Canada? Public opinion would not have tolerated it: you could not find a British statesman who would do it. British statesmen take a higher view of subjects of that kind. They keep their skirts clean. They do not propose to pass measures for a scaly concern such as this is—a concern which, as I have shown, has endeavoured to cheat its creditors of a large amount by getting the government of the day to change the line to a new route. I am surprised that this House should for one moment think of passing a bill of this nature. It is perfectly manifest that the feeling of the House is against it and always has been against it. On the present occasion the bill will have to be opposed at every stage—there is no question about that. Besides, I think out of courtesy to the House the hon. Premier should see that a bill of this character was distributed among the members before we are asked to pass it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not propose to follow the hon. member from Ottawa in the line of argument or rather statements that he has followed in opposing this bill. He has taken what I should term a most extraordinary course, considering the fact that the bill is not of the character that he has represented it to be. Before doing so, however, I have to repudiate, in about as explicit terms as I can, what I consider base and unwarranted insinuations upon the honour, character and reputation of the individual members of this government. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the members of the government are just as incapable of being party to the hoodling to which he has reference and the division of the spoils which he very discourteously (I will not use a harsher term) insinuated was the rumour out of doors—just as incapable of becoming a party to a fraud of that kind as the hon. gentleman is of adhering strictly to the truth when he argues a question of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not make the accusation; I said the report was to that effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, the hon. gentleman took a mean manner of insinuating against the reputation and character of gentlemen quite his equal, if not a good deal better. The hon. gentleman has argued that from the beginning we were about to impose upon this country an indebtedness of $1,000,000—or $80,000 a year. He knows as well as any man in the community, and as well as any member of this House, that that has been a liability of this country for years past, and that the only proposition that is now made to the bill is to divide the subsidy, conditional that half the road is built, and yet we have been told over and over again and with a coolness that is characteristic of the hon. gentleman, that we are about fastening on this country an indebtedness which the tax-payers hereafter will be compelled to pay. The very Acts that he has quoted show that we are bound to a certain course, whether rightly or wrongly I am not now arguing, under charters granted in former sessions for the construction of this railway, and when it is completed they will be entitled to the $80,000 whether the road has ever run a day or not. The hon. gentleman is arguing that we are proposing now to fasten that on the community. I say that has been on the statute-book for years, and the hon. gentleman knows it as well as I do, yet he is trying to persuade the community, and every member of this House who has not given the question the consideration and study that he has, that we are about to impose upon the tax-payers of this country a liability that never existed before. It is an insinuation that is not correct, and it is a principle that is not contained in the bill. What this bill proposes to do, is to enable this company to proceed with the construction of the road from their present terminus.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or from Gladstone.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not say anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg your pardon, I will read it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I will do the reading if you please. The hon. gentleman read the clause which is repealed by this Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I did not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In the commencement of his remarks he read the clause which this Bill proposes to repeal, and which is found in the statute before him, but he did not inform the Senate that in repealing that clause, the whole of it with a slight exception is re-enacted in this Bill. The only difference between the clause as it stands in the proposed Bill and the act from which he read is the following—the clause provides for the construction of the road and for the payment of $80,000 a year for twenty years. The amendment to that clause is this:

One-half of the said sum of $80,000 to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion of the remaining one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River, and the remaining half of the said sum of $80,000 to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion of the remaining half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River.

Now, that is the amendment which is made to the clause which the hon. gentleman tried to impress on this House had been repealed, and thereby that we were about re-enacting an act imposing upon the taxpayers of this country $80,000 a year for twenty years. I cannot for one moment fancy that the hon. gentleman did not know what he was talking about, and knowing what he was talking about, he should have had honesty enough to inform the Senate of the facts as they are. The other proposition to which the hon. gentleman took exception, was the government taking power that, in case the present company is not able to construct the road, this subsidy may be transferred to another company and that they may commence either from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone, but does it not say that:—

So far as the same relates to the construction of the first half of the company's railway, the Governor General in Council may, subject to the terms of the said Aid Act and of this act, transfer the amount applicable to such first half of the company's railway, namely, $40,000 a year for twenty years, to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone, to Lake Dauphin or thereabouts.

How does that interfere, I should like to know, with the present bondholders? If the present bondholders have a security, such as it is, upon forty miles of road, and there is no probability of that being extended, and they should think proper to organize a company and assume the responsibility for the construction of that road and thereby receive $40,000, would not that be to their advantage rather than robbery and stealing as the hon. gentleman has defined it to be? Now, that is the simple proposition of this bill, nothing more, nothing less. We are not discussing the propriety or impropriety of the order in council which was passed a short time ago on which the hon. gentleman dwelt so largely. We frankly admit that we are not proceeding on the lines of that order in council, but we are desirous as the country has been in the past, of having this road constructed if possible, and if it can be constructed through the most fertile portion of the country, which we do now know the Dauphin country to be, so much the better in the interest of the North-west and of Canada generally. I repeat the only proposition in this bill is to extend the time for the completion of the road for two years, to divide the subsidy payable when half the road is built, and to enable the government to transfer the subsidy to another company for the construction of the road in case this company should fail in doing so. That is the proposition before the House, and not the old Hudson Bay Railway or the conduct of the old Hudson Bay Railway Company. Even reading it as the hon. gentleman does himself, it does not relieve the company of one single cent of their present liability, but if they fail to go on with the road, then the proposition is to allow another company to construct it. These are simply the propositions in the bill, without entering into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the old Hudson Bay scheme, or the failures or successes of those who have been interested in the raising of the money to construct the road. This proposition certainly is in the interest of the bondholders and not to their detriment; if the existing company do not construct the road, subject to all the provisions of the act, of which this is an amendment, and of this bill also, another company may be authorized to do the work. That is really the position of the government in this matter. This bill may be defeated by taking advantage of points of order, but there is such a thing possible as having to remain here three or four days. If the majority of the House is opposed to the bill, let us have a vote and throw it out; that would be the fairest and best way to dispose of the measure.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If hon. gentlemen of this House had been left to the exercise of their own individual opinions, and if there had been no effort made on the part of the government to induce hon. gentlemen, who habitually support them, to abandon their views to a certain extent and to come to the assistance of the government with respect to this bill, I think those who are opposed to the bill would be disposed to accept the proposition just made by the hon. gentleman, but as the hon. First Minister is probably aware, that is not the position of things. When there is a proposition to make practically an expenditure of about $1,000,000, and when no good cause has been shown why that expenditure should take place, it is the duty of every member of this House who wishes to act in the interests of the public, to use all legitimate means to defeat such a measure. What are the rules of Parliament for? They are intended ultimately to protect the public interest, and I do not know how we could more meritoriously use the rules of Parliament than to defeat a measure of this kind. The hon. First Minister used some very vigorous language with respect to the hon. member from Ottawa.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does not the hon. gentleman think it was justified?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is not my business to defend the hon. member from Ottawa; but the hon. First Minister attributed to that hon. gentleman interested motives.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps I should not have said anything now—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I merely repeated what was said about him—what was rumoured.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. First Minister was very emphatic in making the statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No question about that; I am always emphatic.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in a position in which motives can be attributed to me; I have not the slightest interest in any corporation, or company, or body, who have anything at all to do with this railway, or with the country in that neighbourhood. I may say with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway that I have consistently voted against all the measures which they have introduced into this Parliament in the days when they did introduce measures looking for assistance; but it is only reasonable, when a measure of this importance is introduced, no matter what time it comes down, that we should take time, at any rate, to examine it carefully, when it is a question of voting $40,000 a year, which is about the equivalent of $1,000,000. I think the government—particularly the government who have shown their great desire for economy during the session in certain small matters—should rather hail with pleasure any attempt on the part of members of this House to assist them in their desire to promote economy. If we can save $40,000 a year, even for a little while, that is a good thing. I presume the government will, if the measure does not pass now, introduce it at the next session, and probably pass it; but, meanwhile, it is our duty to see that it does not pass now if we can prevent it. The best way to find out what this bill proposes to do is to calmly and deliberately read it. The preamble reads:—

Whereas the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company, formerly the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, hereinafter called the company, is empowered by chapter 81 of 50-51 Vic., hereinafter called the Special Act, to build a railway from Winnipeg to Hudson Bay, and whereas an act was passed in the 54th and 55th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 61, hereinafter called the Aid Act, granting certain aid to the company, and whereas in pursuance of the said Act a contract was entered into between the Governor General in Council and the company, which bears the date the 16th day of September, 1891, and whereas it is expedient to amend the Aid Act and to authorize and empower the Governor General in Council to alter and amend said contract as hereinafter provided; therefore Her Majesty, by and with the consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

There is just one little circumstance in connection with the history of this measure to which I think it well to call attention. Hon. gentlemen who were here in the session of 1890 will remember that a measure was introduced on behalf of this company, extending the time given them by law for the completion of their road. A majority of the Senate were opposed to the construction of this road, and I remember that the hon. gentleman from Quinté division—whom I do not see here just now—raised a question of order with respect to the bill, and the measure would have been defeated, and this company would have been dead (which would have been a great blessing to the country at large) if the hon. gentleman had not yielded, and allowed the bill to pass in modified form, giving the company power to build to the Saskatchewan River. I ask the deliberate attention of hon. gentlemen to the first clause of this bill: "Section 1 of the said Act is repealed," that is the Act of 1891. Perhaps I had better read the section of the Act of 1891 first to see what we are dealing with:

In order to enable the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company to construct so much of their railway as reaches from the city of Winnipeg to a point on the Saskatchewan River, the Governor in Council may enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and may pay for such services during the said term eighty thousand dollars per annum, in manner following, that is to say: the sum of eighty thousand dollars to be paid annually on the construction of the railway from the end of the 40 miles of the railway now built to a point on the Saskatchewan River—such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the railway between the city of Winnipeg and a point on the Saskatchewan River; provided that the Governor General in Council may order such sums to be paid in semi-annual instalments, and may permit the company to assign the same by way of security for any bonds or securities issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking.

There are two circumstances which are noteworthy in connection with this section of the Act of 1891. One is that that sum of $80,000, which was not supposed to be a present made to the company, but was supposed to be paid to the company for value received—that is, for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years—this payment of $80,000 is not, by the first section of chapter 81 of the Acts of 1891, made to depend upon the performance of work by the company. As soon as the company had finished the road to the Saskatchewan River, even though they did not run a train over the line, and although they did not carry a single mail bag, under that section they would be able to claim that subsidy of $80,000 a year, and one of the ideas which Parliament had in aiding the railway company in that manner—that is by giving them a yearly subsidy for work supposed to be done, rather than paying them so much a mile—was the guarantee that the road should be constructed before the company could get anything. It was generally understood, and correctly understood, that the company could not complete that road, and could not earn this subsidy. Further, this section contains this, as I think, unusual provision: it authorizes the company to go to the money market and to use this proposed subsidy to finance their undertaking. It is provided that the Governor General in Council may permit the company to assign the subsidy "by way of security for any bonds or other securities issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking." That is, the company could get out of the undertaking at any time. If they finished the road they need not run a train over it. The company could meanwhile, before completing the road, have assigned this undertaking of the government to pay $80,000 a year to persons who bought their bonds.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Exactly the same condition as in the Act of 1881 as regards assigning the bonds.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware that I am reading from the Act of 1891. He is not paying the strict attention to my remarks that he should.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I was paying the closest attention, and the hon. gentleman gave as a reason why it should not be passed that it contained that provision.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, I said the Act of 1891 contained that remarkable provision. The country has had some experience of this railway company. We know they built forty miles of their road on the line from Winnipeg to the mouth of the Saskatchewan.

I believe the whole distance is about 250 miles. The company succeeded in getting forty miles built—those forty miles running north from Winnipeg, and the people who put their money into that road were not the company; certain contractors graded the road and took bonds in payment. A firm in England who manufacture steel rails, took bonds in payment for the rails which were forwarded to Winnipeg. The road was graded for some sixty miles, I believe, and the rails were laid on forty miles of it. The contractors were not paid. The company in England who supplied the rails were not paid. The government of Manitoba advanced this company, in the way of subsidy, something like $240,000, and this company, who must have got a very considerable sum of money out of the bonds which they disposed of, got nearly a quarter of a million from the Manitoba government, for which they have given nothing in return. The disposition of this money is a most mysterious matter indeed. No one appears to be able to tell what has come of the immense sum which these people received. They did not use the money for the purpose of paying the men who did the work on the road, or the men who supplied the material. What did they do with it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Allow me to make a statement. We have decided, on the part of the government, more particularly after insinuations of the character that were thrown out with reference to the members of the government being interested in this scheme, to advise His Excellency not to prorogue Parliament until this Bill is either defeated or carried, so the method of talking against time will not prevail.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not talking against time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the leader of the Opposition had discussed the matter in a fair and argumentative manner we should have taken no objection. The whole discussion in the other House, where it is supposed to deal with matters more passionately than they do here, was conducted in a manner that was creditable to both sides. The Opposition there proposed and the government accepted many amendments made to the bill. We did not suppose, in bringing the measure before the Senate, that we would be met in the factious spirit that has been exhibited here to-day. Under the circumstances, I must ask the Senators—and I do so with very great reluctance—to remain in the city until we can assert the dignity of this House. We want to know whether the majority approve of this Bill or are prepared to reject it. I have already made the suggestion to my hon. friends to allow a vote to be taken, and if the sense of the House is against the bill, well and good; we must submit and we shall do so gracefully, but we do not propose to have the grossest and basest insinuations thrown out against the members of this House and the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I had the floor and I object to this statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I give the reasons for the course that we propose to take. We shall come back at half-past seven, and if necessary adjourn at midnight till Monday and proceed on Tuesday or Wednesday if necessary. I make this statement so that those ladies and gentlemen who are here to attend the prorogation of Parliament may not be detained needlessly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. First Minister is wrong when he says that I insinuated that the government had any interest whatever in this bill. What I did say was that at the time the order in council was passed, there were rumours outside that this bill was being passed to enable friends of the government to make contributions to elections, but I said that I did not believe them. I acquitted the government of any such intention. I simply quoted a newspaper report, and I did not endorse it. If the hon. gentleman thinks that I intended to make the statement on my own responsibility, I withdraw the remark. The expression was made simply in connection with newspaper rumours published in the month of March. I never for one moment insinuated, in the slightest degree, that the government had any interest in the scheme, and if the hon. gentleman so understood me I am very sorry.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—The leader of the opposition is well aware that if the government wish they can postpone prorogation until this bill is either passed or rejected. If the hon. gentleman wishes to waive technical objections we will soon be enabled to decide the matter and go home peaceably. Let the voice of the Senate be taken and we are willing to abide by the decision. We all want to get away, but we must complete the business of the session, and we will stay here as long as it is necessary to do that, if it takes a week.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think I had just been pointing out, when I was interrupted, that it was very remarkable that this bill contains no provision to oblige the company to run a train over the road or to operate the road in any way, and that the company were placed in the position of being able to assign this contract which the government made with them to persons from whom they got money; and I think I had gone on then to give a little of the history of this company, and to point out what we might expect from a company which had already received a very large sum of money—$400,000 at any rate—which has vanished as completely as if the earth had swallowed it up. No one can tell where that money has gone to. There was the $240,000 granted by the province of Manitoba; there was the money raised on bonds, representing a value of £140,000; and no one can say what has become of any of that money. Now, the government come here, and propose to deal, not with a new and respectable company, but with this company whose record has been so bad, and to put them in a position to handle about $1,000,000 more. I stated at an earlier stage, when the hon. First Minister made some explanations with respect to this bill, at the first sitting to-day, that if it is desirable to have a colonization road in this particular neighbourhood, and if the government think that it will be in the public interest that they should build the road as a government work, then I should be quite prepared to support the measure.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire, after reflection, to apologize, and I do it most sincerely, to the members of the Senate as well as to His Honour the Speaker, for the little ebullition of temper exhibited by myself to-day. I have no objections whatever to any public man attacking my political career, whether it be right or wrong. I occupy a public position, and am subject to that, and have no right to find fault; but when anyone makes an assertion which I think is a reflection upon my personal character and my reputation for straightforward honesty, whether in my public or my private life, I must confess that I cannot refrain from resenting it in language which, perhaps, is heated and out of harmony with the dignity of this House. On reflection, I deem it my duty to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and to my fellow Senators to make this explanation and to apologize for having used language which, under other circumstances, would have been unjustifiable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry if any language of mine led the Premier into the position for which he now expresses regret. I can bear testimony to his suavity of manner and courtesy, and I have known him a great many years. I did not think of reflecting on him or on the government. Perhaps I should not have mentioned the rumour. I am sorry if I offended anybody. I made no reflection upon the members of the government. I simply adverted to rumours outside, and took care to state that I did not believe them. Had I known that the statement would have created any ill-feeling I should not have referred to it. The Premier can feel assured that I had not the slightest intention of reflecting on him personally or on the members of the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As far as I can remember, at the time when the Speaker left the Chair, I had read the first section of the act of 1891, that is the Aid Act, and had read, I think, the first section of the bill before the House and called attention to the record of the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, as they were called up to 1891, and the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company, as they have been called during the past two or three years. I showed that their past record was not such as would inspire confidence, that that was not the sort of company in whose control Parliament should place the large sum which is involved in this measure. Practically the sum of $40,000 a year amounts to about one million dollars, and I said I thought that the government and Parliament should be very careful into whose hands they put the disposition of so large a sum as that. The difference between the first section of the act of 1891 and the first clause of the bill before the House is indicated in the latter part of the bill before the House :

One-half of the aforesaid sum of $80,000 to be paid annually commencing from the date of the completion by the company of one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River, the remaining one-half of the said sum of $80,000 to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion of the remaining one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River, provided that such sums shall be paid in semi-annual instalments, and the company may sell the same or may assign the same by way of security for any bonds or other securities issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking.

In the first place the country have no such security under this bill as they had under the act of 1891. It would require a much stronger company to build a railway of 250 miles from Winnipeg to the mouth of the Saskatchewan than it will to build a line of 125 miles from Winnipeg to a point midway between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan. That must be clear to any business man. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this company, under the terms of this Bill, would not have to build a very large piece of road for the purpose of enabling them to claim this $40,000 a year. If hon. gentlemen look they will see that they can claim the $40,000 a year when they have half the road from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River completed. Half of that road is 125 miles. The company have already built 40 miles; deducting 40 from 125 you get 85 miles of comparatively cheap road that the company would have to build and then they would be entitled to claim this $40,000 a year. Hon. gentlemen will see that the position would be this: if the company succeed in building this 85 miles of additional road, they will be entitled to claim this yearly grant of $40,000. The bill does not contain any provision that they shall operate the line, and the company after building this 85 miles of additional road, can drop out and treat it as they have treated the 40 miles already built. They need not operate it at all, and the government are bound to pay them $40,000 a year. I ask the House if that is not a most unwise course for the government and Parliament to take. If this first clause were amended in such a way as to provide that the company shall operate the road, or that at any time when the road was not operated the $40,000 a year should not be paid, a very large proportion of the objection to this measure would be removed. The second clause in the bill provides that the Governor in Council is empowered to alter the contract. The third is as follows:—

In the event of the contract not being entered into with the company in compliance with the terms of this Act,—

I do not see anything to prevent the government entering into a contract with the company unless the government insists upon such safeguards as will guarantee that the work will be done, and the bill does not contain any provision of that sort and the original Act cannot contain any provision, because we know the company did begin work and did not complete it.

In the event of the contract not being entered into with the company in compliance with the terms of this act, in so far as the same relates to the construction of the first half of the company's railway, the Governor General in Council may, subject to the terms of the said Aid Act and of this act, transfer the amount applicable to such first half of the company's railway, namely, $40,000 a year for twenty years, to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie to Gladstone, to Lake Dauphin or thereabouts.

I may say I think the sum of $40,000 a year, which, as I pointed out before, would amount to about $3,000 a mile, is a considerable subsidy to pay towards the construction of a colonization road, and if the government think it desirable to have this colonization road built I think it would be wiser, if they are going to pay for the road, that they should own it. I should sooner see them own it themselves under the circumstances. However, that is a matter of opinion. There is just this point: If the word "incorporated" were inserted before "company," this clause would be improved. It would prevent any possibility of the gentlemen who compose the Winnipeg and Great Northern Railway Company from agreeing to form themselves into a company under another name and applying to the government for power to build another road and take the subsidy. I do not mean to say that under this legislation they could do so, but still if you were to say "incorporate" a company, that should make it perfectly clear that it would not be in the power of the government to throw the road so far constructed completely out of the question and start a new road upon which the bonds of the company would not operate. The fifth clause is one to which I desire to call the attention of His Honour the Speaker more particularly :—

The section substituted by section 1 of chapter 94 of the statutes of 1894 for section 32 of chapter 81 of the statutes of 1887, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor : '92. The main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River by the 31st day of December, 1898, otherwise the powers granted with respect to said construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

I hold that that clause is completely out of order. It is an enactment which we have no right to pass. It is just in the same position as the 4th clause and a portion of the 3rd clause which were ruled by His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons to be out of order. It is really a private bill. This is an exact transcript of a section of the Act of 1894 which was part of a private bill. The original provision with respect to time contained in the Act of 1887 was similar. Clearly there was no notice whatever given of this private measure, and this is open to exactly the same objection as the portions of the bill which were stricken out in deference to the opinion of His Honour the Speaker of the House of Commons. Further, there is the less objection to striking this out because the company's powers with respect to this line of railway do not, under the Act of last year, expire until the 31st day of December, 1896. They have a year and a half to come and go upon yet, so there is no necessity for this clause. I have no doubt His Honour the Speaker will see that that clause should be stricken out as well as the portions of the bill already stricken out in the House of Commons. I gather from a remark made by the First Minister that the contractors, who who are out of pocket by the construction of the 40 miles from Winnipeg northerly, might take up this project and build the road themselves. But the contractors are not the company. They are not, as I understand, members of the company. They are not in a position to do this work until they have an act of incorporation. If they are in a position to do it, then the members of the present company are in a position to call themselves by another name and do this work on the western road. I think, properly speaking, the contractors cannot undertake to build this road, and the present company could not undertake to build the road to Lake Dauphin. The point has already been made that there is no notice whatever of the change in the portion of the bill which is, strictly speaking, part of a private bill—no notice whatever given to the bondholders and other parties interested, and Parliament would not be guilty of the injustice of passing private legislation for the benefit of this company without notice to the parties interested. The bill, now that one comes to read it, is not quite as objectionable as it was when first introduced in the other House, but it is open to the objections which I have indicated. I think that in the first clause there should be some provision for the working of the road by the company, and the 5th clause should be stricken out on the ground that it is out of order.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The course which our friends of the Opposition have pursued with regard to this bill has been most extraordinary. When the bill came first before the Senate to-day, a very great deal of time was not open for its discussion before the hour at which it had been intimated that this House should be prorogued, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition took possession of the floor evidently determined to hold it until that time had expired. I do not think it was altogether fair to the members of this House or the government that my hon. friend should have taken that course; but if he had confined himself during his address to the provisions of the bill before us, had he dealt fairly with the conditions of the bill there would not have been so much to complain of. But we do complain that during that address the hon. gentleman wandered beyond the bounds of the bill, that he misrepresented its contents—not, perhaps, intentionally, he had not it very long in his hands—but certainly the effect was the same, and the statements which my hon. friend made with regard to the contents of the bill were very misleading and very inaccurate. Now it has been complained that the government have not dealt fairly with this Parliament in bringing down this bill at so late a stage, as an intimation had been given in an earlier part of the session that no important measure involving any new liability for railways or other public works would be introduced this session. Now, hon. gentlemen, it is quite evident from an examination of this bill that it does not provide for any new liability whatever. In fact when you come to examine the bill closely you will find that, comparing it with existing statutes, the differences which it contains are very slight indeed, and that not one dollar of new liability is incurred or involved in any way in this bill. Now, what are the changes from existing legislation that are proposed in this bill? There are only small particulars involved in this bill as compared with the laws already on the statute-book, and only two of them relate to the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company. Only two changes as far as that company could possibly be concerned are involved in the bill which is now before the House. One of these is that the payment of the subsidy of $80,000 a year is to be divided, $40,000 of it to become due and payable to the company when they have constructed one-half of the road and the balance to be due and payable to them when they have constructed the whole line to the Saskatchewan River. It is not to incur a liability, but it makes this $40,000, or one-half of the $80,000 already voted by Parliament to become due and payable when they have built half the road. That is one point in which the bill differs from the law already on the statute-book, and as far as the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway is concerned, there is only one other point in which any difference exists and that is that there is an extension of two years from the time given for the completion of the road from the 31st December, 1896, to the 31st December, 1898. As far, then, as this much abused Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company is concerned, which has been so roundly denounced by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in this House, this legislation only involves these two points of difference which I have named—the one that the subsidy would be paid in two separate halves according to the construction of the road, instead of in a lump sum yearly when the whole road is finished, and that they shall have two years longer to finish it. The route of the railway is not changed as far as this company is concerned. Originally they had the power of building the railway to the Saskatchewan and they were not bound to take either the east or west side of Lake

Manitoba. That is the law already existing. This bill does not change it. It is now intended that they shall go on the west side of Lake Manitoba, and it was open to them to take that route according to existing legislation. But there is a difference in this bill, which, as far as I am able to understand it, does not at all affect the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company, which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition appeared to be particularly incensed against, and that is, that failing to make a contract with this company—the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company—on the terms contained in this bill and the Aid Act of 1891 and the special act of 1887—the government could then make a contract with any company authorized to build a railway from Gladstone or Portage la Prairie to the Saskatchewan. There is no authority in this bill or in any Act of this Parliament by which the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company could build a road from these points to the Saskatchewan, and therefore it cannot be in their interest, at all events, that this bill differs in this respect from acts already on the statute-book. Now my hon. friends on the other side of the House have laid a great deal of stress upon the alleged fact that there is no security for the running of this road, and I understood my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax to say before recess that there was, to some extent, security in the bills already passed by this Parliament inasmuch as provision was made for contracts for carrying the mails for 20 years. A contract for the mails could be entered into by the government with the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company, they paying them $80,000 a year for carrying the mails and other services, and the hon. gentleman contended that such a provision was not in this bill. My hon. friend must have again spoken without an accurate knowledge of the matter he was discussing, because the same provision is in this bill with regard to making contracts for the carrying of the mails, and that is all the security that the government and the country had for the running of the road under the laws which are now on the statute-book, and it might be implemented at any time and it is just the same security as is provided under this bill. Now, looking at all these facts, I think the House will wonder how it was that such a tempest should have been created here over this question and that my genial friend the leader of the Opposition, who is generally so courteous and so mild, should have forgotten himself, as he appears to have done this afternoon, and indulged in language which, I think, very properly excited my hon. friend the First Minister to make some warm observation in reply. The hon. gentleman charged that this bill contained fraud and he made the strongest and the grossest charges not only against this bill, which of course, incidentally was made against the government, but also against the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company. My hon. friend started in his first speech as the champion of the bondholders of the Hudson Bay road. Now, hon. gentlemen, if you look into this bill and the previous legislation which still remains the law of the land, you will find that the bondholders are not imperilled or injured in the slightest degree by this bill; but that if any action is taken under it, the standing of the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company will be very much improved over what it was before, and the first mortgage bonds that had been issued and which are held by some of the creditors of the road so many years, so soon as ever this company builds railways under this bill, these railways and the lands will become subject to the bonds; the bonds will become a lien upon them, and the position of the bondholders will be greatly improved. Now there is only one contingency in which the bondholders should fail to improve their position. They have no position under present circumstances. Until this company builds railways and earns lands and cash subsidies their bonds are of no use as security; but as soon as ever this company builds railways and earns lands and subsidies, these bonds will obtain a position that otherwise they never could. There is only one contingency in which these bondholders should not gain; and in that case the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company should suffer as well as the bondholders. Should the company not be able to make a contract with the government for the construction of a railway from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan under this bill, then there is a section in the bill which enables the government to make a contract with another company for the building of a road from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone to the Saskatchewan River, and should such a contract be entered into, that is after the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company fail to make a contract under this bill, and the government were obliged then to make a contract with another company chartered the other day, and which has power which the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company has not—or will not have under this bill,—that is to build a railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone to the Saskatchewan—in that case the bondholders' security will not be improved. It will not be very much worse, or any worse than it is at the present day. While the Winnipeg Great Northern Company does not enter upon railway work and earn lands and subsidy it will not become any better off than it is; but it is more than likely that under the provisions of this bill the company will construct a railway that will, in a very short time, earn this $40,000 a year and will earn valuable lands and the bondholders' interests will become infinitely better protected than they have been before. Therefore I was astonished when I heard my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition in this House, speak as he did, alleging that there was a fraud being practiced imperilling the interests of the bondholders in the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and another hon. gentleman also made very strong observations adverse to the character of the country through which the railway is proposed to pass. On that subject, although a native and resident of one of the eastern provinces I profess to have some knowledge; I travelled over a good deal of that country and I have examined the surveys very carefully of almost every section of it, and the conclusion I came to some years ago was that the Lake Dauphin country is one of the very best portions of the North-west. The question of altitude, the shelter of mountains, and the presence of the lakes have a good deal to do with keeping off the summer frosts in that country. The altitude, like that of Portage la Prairie, is very low. It is sheltered by the mountains, and all that combines to give it immunity from early frosts, perhaps better than any other part of the North-west. The soil is wonderfully fertile and settlers are within easy access of timber of all kinds, and this applies to the point of juncture with any country from the railway which has been constructed for a distance of 145 miles, which would be half the line.

The first half of the proposed line runs through good country. Under the bill the distance would amount, from the point of intersection or junction of the new line with the already constructed line, to 145 miles. That is 65 miles to Gladstone, which would leave 81 to be built northerly into the northern country. That would be altogether 146 miles, which would constitute about one-half of the line of road from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River, adopting the route west of Lake Manitoba. I know there is a shorter route on the east side of Lake Manitoba, but I am dealing with the route it is proposed the road should traverse; and I say again that that 146 miles is altogether a good country and that if the road should never go any further than half of the 293 miles of the distance, it is in the interests of the people of that country, in the interests of the people that will in the future go in and settle that excellent country, and in the interest of the people of Canada as a whole that that road should be built. Now I have gone over these points and my surprise is, when I examine this bill closely and compare it with the laws which have been already passed by this Parliament, and which might be implemented at any time, and when I reflect that the points of difference from existing legislation are so very small and so harmless, I wonder very much how it was that our friends did not look before they leapt—that they did not inquire into this legislation a little more carefully before they made such extravagant statements as they have made in opposition to it. I find my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, before resuming his seat tried to let himself down a little gently and he said he found now the bill was not quite as bad as when it was submitted to the House of Commons. I am not aware of the changes made in the House of Commons. I am aware that the Speaker ruled out some provisions which belonged to private legislation, and my hon. friend seems to think that the last section or clause of this bill should be ruled out in the same way, but, as he himself remarked, there is already on the statute-book an extension of time for nearly two years to build this road, and if the Speaker should find on inquiry that the point was the same as taken by the Speaker of the House of Commons and he agrees with that ruling, no inconvenience will occur from that, because there still remains nearly two years and the Parliament might, during that time, if good reason were given, extend the time. In that case the only point of difference, as far as the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company is concerned, between existing acts and the bill that we are now asked to pass is, that the subsidy of $80,000 a year is divided into two moieties to be paid in the one case when half of the railroad is built, and the other on the completion of the whole, whereas under existing legislation no part of the subsidy would be earned until the railroad was completed.

Hon. Mr. CLEW—A great deal of this difficulty and discussion would have been saved had the members of this House been in possession of the bill. Some misapprehension has been occasioned from want of information. In 1891, it is true, an act was passed whereby this company were given a subsidy of $80,000 a year, to aid them building their road to the Saskatchewan. It was a fair matter of discussion whether the consideration for building the road was equivalent in every respect and fully equal to the amount of $80,000 a year. It depends upon a variety of circumstances, and it was a matter that was fairly open to discussion. It was stated that the rights and privileges of the parties interested in this road were being interfered with by this legislation. It appears now that such is not the case. This 40 miles that was supposed to be shunted off as not part of the main line, according to the bill, is to be made available, and therefore no rights are to be interfered with in any respect. It is a great pity that this bill had not been understood; had it been understood this difficulty would not have occurred. But we must take things as they are and protect the public interest as well as we can. It is said there is no provision made that this road should be run after its construction. I do not think there is much difficulty on that point. The subsidy is not to be paid until the road is in active operation, and only when they earn money from postal and other services. The government will not be liable, as I understand, to pay one dollar of that $40,000 a year until the road is in working order and until the company earns the money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh yes, they will.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The bill does not say that.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Is not that the correct interpretation of the clause? If not, I do not know what it means. It says that this money must be earned by postal and other services. However, be that as it may, if the contractors of this road are now in a position to build half of the road, and it is determined that they shall receive one-half of the subsidy when it is built, I do not know that a very great deal of injury will occur, unless it is supposed that $40,000 is proportionately more for the half than $80,000 would be for the whole. That is a matter that is open for discussion, and very legitimately so. Some provision should be made to protect the general interests of the country, that when this road is in operation the parties will see that it is run, and if it is not run the whole distance, that a proportionate amount shall be deducted from time to time until it is operated the full mileage. That would be perfectly fair under all the circumstances, and I do not think the House will dissent from that. But if such is the case, I should propose an amendment at the proper time for the purpose of enabling the government to make such alteration in the subsidy as will meet the exigencies of the case in the way that I have mentioned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are quite right about the earning of the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Then that difficulty is overcome. The whole thing to be considered is whether the government has made a judicious arrangement, whether the interests of all parties have been protected as much as they can be, and whether any great injury will be done by this legislation to anyone. I was induced to second the resolution of the hon. member from Burlington with a view of eliciting all these facts and showing the government and the House of Commons that this Senate must be treated in a proper manner, that bills must be sent here in due form and in good time to give us an opportunity of considering them properly. If that had been done, a great deal of this difficulty would not have occurred. I protest against bills being placed in our hands at the last hour of the session, as this has been. We have a responsibility to the public, the same as the House of Commons has, and we should be treated in a fair manner. We cannot do our duty properly unless bills are placed before us in a way that we can understand their import in every particular. I have no doubt the government will take every precaution to prevent frauds, but we are bound to provide every safeguard, as far as possible, to protect the public interest. I do not think the government will dissent from that opinion unless it has the effect of sending the bill back to the House of Commons, but when I move the resolution which I intend to offer, it will be found so reasonable and place the power so completely in the hands of the government, that they will not object to it. This discussion has given us more information about the road than we possessed. We are told that the original contractors have done nothing. They have had the contract four or five years and yet they have done nothing up to the present time. It may be owing to circumstances beyond their control, but if they have not been able to do anything for so many years, are they likely to do anything now? They had the same subsidy and the same means at their disposal all these years. The government should take the precaution to provide that if this company cannot carry out the agreement, the contract shall be taken out of their hands and given to somebody else. That is a reasonable proposition, and I have no doubt the government will act upon it. Every opportunity should be given to the original men, but precaution should be taken to prevent further delays in the completion of the road. The railway is very much required by the people of that section of the country and the sooner it is built the better. A bill to incorporate the Winnipeg and Lake Manitoba Railway Company was passed here yesterday. Their road, when built, will supply the needs of a portion of that country. The contractors are now given an opportunity to do something, and I hope by this extension they will be able to construct the road. If they do not, I hope that the government will take it out of their hands and place it in the hands of responsible men who will carry out their engagements. If that is done, and reasonable precautions are taken, there will be no cause of complaint. This discussion will have one good effect. It will show, at any rate, that the Senate have done their very best to protect the interests of all concerned, and we have the proud satisfaction of knowing that we have done our duty, though under some disadvantage for which the government are, to some extent, blameable. This legislation came here too late. That is the great difficulty. How can any one here be expected to know the amendments that have been made in the House of Commons fifteen or twenty minutes before the bill is brought to us? It is impossible. I hope that in future bills will be circulated in time, so that members can study them carefully and be prepared to deal with them on their merits.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman seems to have some misapprehension as to the payment of this subsidy. The contract into which the government has entered with the company is to pay them $80,000 per annum in consideration of carrying the mails, Indian supplies, police supplies, policemen, and performing any other services that the government may require, and in case they do not perform sufficient service during the year to cover the amount of $80,000, then one-third of the land grant is to be held in security for the balance. It is not in this bill, but it is in the original charter. This is simply an amendment which does not affect any of the liabilities or responsibilities attached to the company under the old charter.

Hon. Mr. CLEWOW—It still remains.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The $80,000 is to be paid notwithstanding.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what I say—if in any year they do not earn the full amount, one-third of the land grant is to be held as security until it is earned.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—The explanations that we have heard from the government and the light which has been thrown on this bill by the discussion, have removed from my mind two of the first objections that were made. One is a doubt whether this money would be available in the event of the road not being worked. I think the language of the bill is perfectly plain, that it is a contract for services, for the transport of men, supplies and mails, and consequently the service must be rendered to entitle the company to the $80,000 a year, or $40,000 a year, according to whether the whole or half the road is built. The main objection, however, made by the hon. member from Halifax, is the question of order—whether the last clause of this bill is not of a private nature, and whether it should not be struck out in the same way that the Speaker of the other House struck out one of the clauses. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in coming to the conclusion that this clause is of the nature of private legislation, and I shall state to the House briefly my reason for differing from him. It is provided in this bill that in case the old company do not take advantage of the bill, or enter into a contract sufficient to satisfy the government, that they shall perform the work and earn the $40,000 a year, or $80,000, as the case may be, that the government may contract with another company. Therefore, it becomes necessary that some limit should be put in this bill during which the $40,000 or the $80,000 should be available. The country is not going to remain forever under the obligation of paying $80,000 a year, or $40,000 a year, according to circumstances, to another company without some term being fixed during which this company shall be bound to fulfil their contract. Under these conditions, therefore, it has become absolutely necessary that some limit should be put in the bill, and for that object this clause has been introduced :

The main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River by the 31st day of December, 1898 ; otherwise the powers granted with respect to said construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That applies only to the Winnipeg Great Northern.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—That applies to the portion of the road to be built under this bill. The way I read it is, it was necessary to put some limit to the time during which this company would be entitled to the subsidy. Otherwise, they might take ten years to build their road and the country at the end of ten years would be called upon to pay them the $40,000, or the $80,000, according to the circumstances. If the contract be made with the old company, the law provides that they shall have until 1897, but this clause will cover the case of a contract being entered into with a new company. Therefore, I am of opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—As the mover of the three months' hoist, it has occurred to me that perhaps it would not be uninteresting to the House if I give an epitome of the history of the railway from the time it was commenced, about eight years ago, down to the present time. About eight years ago forty miles of it were built to a point called St. Lawrent, and there it has remained and never operated. In 1887 the company came to Parliament to ask for a further extension of time and for such assistance as might enable them to build their line. They applied for a subsidy of $80,000 a year for twenty years. It was discussed in this House, I took part in the discussion. It has been stated here that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have always been opposed to this road. At the time I was a director of the road, and I advocated that the $80,000 a year should be given to the company and voted for it, and Parliament voted the $80,000 a year for twenty years. That was in 1887. There has not been a mile added to the first forty miles from that day to this. It has remained unused ever since, and I believe at the present time is overgrown with weeds. This act has been on the statute-books; they have had an opportunity of making their financial arrangements to continue the line in accordance with the contract, but not a mile has been built up to the present time. We must bear in mind that these opportunities having been given them, and they not having done anything, it certainly does not tend to promote confidence in the people at the head of the enterprise that they will construct it. In discussing this bill, a great deal of surprise has been expressed that there should have been any opposition to it. The first thing that came before the Senate was the resolution presented in the House of Commons. Under that resolution, as it was submitted to us, the company had a sort of roving commission to build their line wherever they pleased, either from the end of the first forty miles or anywhere else. That is the nature of the resolution which was placed before us. I thought that that was a most extraordinary thing to ask; that, along with the history of the company previously, induced me to move the three months' hoist. I thought the company not worthy of confidence. Subsequently we had this amended bill placed before us, which certainly makes the legislation much more acceptable, and if we had had this amended bill before us at first possibly the disagreeable discussion which took place here to-day would have been avoided.

Now, I have a map of the railway here before me. The original route to which this Parliament had voted the $80,000 a year passes from the end of the first 40 miles to the Saskatchewan to the west of Lake Winnipeg. Under this amendment the original route must be adhered to. One of my reasons for moving the three months' hoist was that the interest of the bondholders was not protected, in fact that the interest of the bondholders would be sacrificed, and that without due and proper notice. Hon. gentlemen will see my point if they consider that the line, instead of being continued from the end of the 40 miles on to the Saskatchewan River, as originally intended under the bill which we had first before us, the company had authority to jump from there to Gladstone, leaving the 40 miles entirely isolated, and hon. gentlemen can easily understand that the security of the bondholders and of the bonds for the first 40 miles would be made almost valueless. I think that the amendments which have been made to the bill in the House of Commons are a great improvement on the bill which we had before us in the morning, and therefore not subject to the same objections which then existed. I do not know whether the public interest will be protected under the amended act or not, but it appears to me there ought to be some clause under which the public interest would be protected by inserting a clause which would compel the railway company to continue to operate the line under any circumstances after it is constructed. There is another point: it has been stated here that the country is already under an obligation to the extent of the subsidy voted to the company. There is no obligation until the subsidy is earned. The company has not earned a dollar of it. It is true there is an Act of Parliament giving $80,000 a year to the company when the road is built, but nothing has been yet earned, and the point is to see that the road is completed, and when it is completed, that it is kept in operation. It is extremely objectionable that important legislation such as this should come down to the Senate just as the session is expiring and after a majority of the members of the House have left for their homes. It is one of the functions of the Senate to oppose any legislation which it may deem contrary to the public interests. This is an occasion when it ought to exercise its functions and justify its existence.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Supposing that this bill were passed, and supposing that the company raised a large sum of money on the security of the prospects and the advantages conferred by this bill, what guarantee have we that that money would not slip away just as the money that has been spent already? They have had bonds for a large amount from Winnipeg, and other bonds which have been issued to the amount of $20,000 a mile, and where has the money gone to? They can only account for 40 miles being built, not worth $1,000 a mile, and even that not paid for. Why should we be induced deliberately to grant to the company these additional advantages after the experience we have had with them? It seems to me to be a preposterous thing, and then to do that without the members of this House having a copy of the bill before us, and but a limited time to study it. From what has been admitted, and what we have read in the bill, I think it would be one of the wildest things that the Senate could be guilty of, to pass the measure, and it would be an injury to the Government and to my hon. friend who leads the Government. If he wants his name to stand well with the country, as heretofore, he should by all means keep clear of this bill unless it is greatly improved, and unless proof should be furnished that there is some security that the road will be built and the money not squandered and that the bondholders do not lose their security, and in that way damage the credit of the country and injure us when we want to have legitimate contracts entered into for the building of railroads. In addition to all that, what prospect is there that the road will ever pay? It seems to me to be one of the wildest projects ever proposed to Parliament. The examinations made from year to year in Hudson Bay, authentic reports, show us that there is only about an average of two months in a year in which boats could navigate the straits with anything like safety. At any time the insurance would be much higher there than from Halifax or Montreal to Liverpool. Even the Hudson Bay Company bring out most of their goods and send home their furs as far as possible by the St. Lawrence route. Of course a boat may pass in and out of the bay once a year, if it does not carry a large amount of freight and is not obliged to make very rapid time, but a large portion of the freight that the Hudson Bay Company send to the North-west and bring to the North-west I understand goes by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I apprehend that it will be so always. Supposing the road were built within a year, if such a thing were possible, the people of Manitoba and the North-west would find a short time would elapse between the arrival of a vessel at Port Churchill and the return to Liverpool, and the trip could be made only once in the year. It would not be possible for the settlers to get their grain up to Port Churchill to be loaded and taken away the same year that it was harvested. If they have to store grain at Port Churchill for a whole year the interest on the money would be a great deal, and as has been stated before, all those things have to be charged back against the farmers. Between the time the grain was harvested and its shipment to Liverpool, so much time would elapse that they would lose any opportunity of taking advantage of fluctuations in prices of grain such as we have had this year. Those fluctuations would be worth far more than any saving that could possibly be effected by using the Hudson Bay route. It would be expensive at the beginning and a risky route to ship by, and the chances of getting valuable returns would be far less than by the route that we have already at a large expense provided. Canada has expended immense sums of money to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. The company have shown great energy in carrying out their work. They are men of substance and they have made money since the construction of the road. Nearly every one of the men who entered into the contract with the government to build that road as a syndicate is a millionaire. Some of them are many times millionaires. Are we to go to work and subsidize largely a wild-cat scheme which, if it ever did amount to anything, would be in opposition to the road that we have provided already? It certainly could not accomplish anything in the public interest. Every effort they might make to carry the goods cheaper by way of Hudson Bay would be superseded by what the Canadian Pacific Railway could do, and they would cut down rates to such an extent that they could not make enough to pay running expenses, not enough to get a line of ships to run into Hudson Bay. We are entitled to have plenty of time to consider this bill without the government feeling affronted at all, because it is a matter of large importance. If the opinion of the Senate is of no use on a matter of this kind, and if they dare not exercise their judgment and put some check upon the vast expenditure that is proposed, there is no use of a Senate at all. I am not in favour of doing away with the Senate, but I should like to be placed in such a position that we could discharge our duties, so that this House would be a benefit to the country and show some degree of independence of thought, and act as though we had learned something by past experience in granting charters. I understand that all the bonds that have been issued have been sold and there is nothing to show for the money that the company raised upon them. That is an extraordinary thing, yet we are asked to give them an opportunity to raise more money. They may dispose of that also and leave us without any security, and the effect of it will be to injure the credit of Canada in the money markets of the world.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not a railway bill has passed the House that has not contained power to issue bonds. What security has been placed in any of those railway bills to ensure that the money raised on the bonds will be legitimately expended upon the road? None that I know of, any more than there is in this bill.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote :

The bill was then read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is impossible to proceed further to-night with this bill, unless the House consents, after the vote that has been taken, to suspend the 41st rule. It is in the power of any member, I know, to object to the motion. However, I shall ask the Senate to consent to the suspension of the rule, and I therefore move that rule 41 be suspended so far as it relates to this bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is my duty to object to that motion. I may be allowed to explain why I do so. There has been a good deal of obloquy cast upon the opposition for exercising their undoubted right. On a former occasion—I think it was the case of the Georgian Bay Railway bill—the Senate kept Parliament here for several days after the business of the House of Commons was finished, and no one questioned their right to do that. It was an important measure and they had a right to consider it, as we have a right to consider this measure. It is only now that the members of the Senate are beginning to understand the measure that is before us. Further, the hon. gentleman from Rideau division has suggested an amendment which seems to be a reasonable and proper one and which deserves the serious consideration of the government. In addition, the attention of the Speaker and members of the House has been called to the nature of the last clause of this bill, a clause which keeps alive this Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company for two years additional. The influence of Sunday will be probably beneficial to the government and put them in a frame of mind to consider these amendments in a christian, and perhaps a conciliatory spirit, and between this and Monday the government and the Speaker will have time to consider the question and deal with the bill in a proper and christianlike spirit.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. gentleman scarcely treat the members on this side of the House fairly. There has been no obloquy cast on the members of the Opposition for opposing the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman's colleague from Prince Edward Island did.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I recognized that right at the beginning of the discussion. What I said was—and I am sure that the hon. gentleman cannot forget it—that the sense of the House ought to be taken at as early a period as possible in the debate, and if the feeling of the House was against the bill it would be dropped at once and we could go on with the prorogation as intimated. The amendment which my hon. friend from Rideau suggested was one which was moved by Mr. Laurier in the other House, and there it was rejected without a division, because it was known that it would destroy the effect of the bill. However, if my hon. friend persists in his objection, there is an end to any progress being made to-night. I move that when the House adjourns to-night it stand adjourned until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE WINNIPEG GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (150) "An Act respecting the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to bring a point of order to the notice of the House. I called attention to the fact, at an early stage of the bill, that I should, at the proper time, ask the decision of His Honour the Speaker on the 4th clause of the bill as to whether that clause was in order in a public bill of this kind, and I rise for the purpose of doing that now. I have not the official report of what took place in the House of Commons on Saturday with respect to this bill, but I may be allowed to read a newspaper report of it, which I presume is substantially correct :

The third reading of the bill having been moved in the afternoon, Mr. Mills (Bothwell) raised the objection that it should have been introduced by petition as required in all cases of private bills.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper pointed out that the bill merely provided for a re-arrangement of subsidies, and was thus a measure which a private member could not introduce.

Mr. Laurier urged that the bill authorized the company to utilize another route than that provided in the original act. In this way the rights of the bondholders would be affected.

Precedents were quoted in support of the proposal to pass the bill as it stood, but after a long debate the Speaker ruled that the objection to the change of location as constituting the bill a private measure, was well taken.

As this was dealt with in the third clause, the offending section was dropped and the bill as amended passed through its final stage in the Commons.

This fourth clause is in just the same position as the third clause in the original bill. This fourth clause amends the Act to incorporate the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company. It extends the time given that company for completing their work by two years. It is unnecessary, because the company have now a year and a half to complete their work, and if they undertake to complete their work in a businesslike way, there is no doubt Parliament will extend the time next session. The measure is unnecessary now. There are two other companies interested in this matter, one of which had to abandon, during the present session, a provision in their proposed charter giving them a right to build a branch to Hudson Bay. It is not desirable that this company should be allowed to block the way for nearly four years without doing anything. Consequently, it is not merely a point of order but a matter of considerable importance. I do not think I am violating any confidence when I state that in conversation with the Speaker of the other House with respect to this point, when I called his attention to this 4th clause he said that his own attention had not been directed to it, but it was, in his judgment, open to the same objections as the portions of the bill which had been stricken out, and a member of the House of Commons who had called attention to this matter told me that he had overlooked this clause and that it was open to just the same objection as those which were stricken out by the Speaker of the House of Commons. I therefore think that the bill should not proceed in its present shape, but that this, which is a clause that should not appear in a public bill, according to our rules and the rules of the House of Commons, should be first ruled out by the Speaker.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not understand the hon. gentleman to take objection to any portion of this bill except the fourth clause. That is on the point of order. Well, that being the case, is this the proper time to raise the point?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If we take the second reading of the bill and go into committee of the whole until we get to that fourth clause, then I think it is quite proper and legitimate that the hon. gentleman should take his objection and if we cannot meet his objection by an amendment which we think would bring it within the purview of Parliament, then he can appeal to the Speaker for a ruling and the Speaker can take the Chair and rule upon the point raised. Supposing the Speaker should rule in accordance with the objection which he has taken, it would only apply to the fourth clause, and we can only deal with that when we reach it. I throw out that suggestion to the hon. member and I think that we may try and meet his views as far as practicable. If the Speaker should rule that as it stands it is out of order, then probably we might bring it within the rules.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite manifest that the chairman of the committee would have no power to deal with the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could not the Speaker take the Chair and rule?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why go into committee? The clause is open to objection at any stage, and the objection should be taken before the Speaker, when the matter could be discussed. If the hon. gentleman declines to discuss it now, he could do so at another stage, but I do not think the committee is the proper stage.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is where it was discussed in the other House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Speaker was in the Chair at the time. Section 4 reads:—

The section substituted by section 1 of chapter 94 of the statutes of 1894 for section 33 of chapter 81 of the statutes of 1887 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor.

Now that repealed a clause in a private act. There is no doubt about that fact. The company's private act of 1887, section 33, reads:—

The said main line of railway shall be completed within four years from the 21st day of June, 1887.

Now in 1894, under a private bill introduced by the company and going through all its stages, and after notice had been given according to the rules of Parliament, this section appears:—

The section substituted by section 1 of chapter 80 of the statutes of 1890 for section 33 of chapter 81 of the statutes of 1887 is hereby repealed and the following substituted.

This clause repeals a former clause in the company's charter:—

The main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River by the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, otherwise the powers granted with respect to such construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted.

That is the law to-day in a private bill, the act respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway. If we want the time extended it is necessary to give notice in the Canada Gazette and the local papers, and that the bill be referred to the Standing Orders Committee and then go before the Railway Committee and be discussed there as to whether it was in the public interest the charter should be continued to this company, which had practically held it since 1880, if there were other companies—and I am advised that there are other companies—desirous of occupying that territory. Then it would be within the discretion of the government, subject, of course, to the approval of Parliament, to say whether the charter is to be renewed year after year and term after term as the company asks. It is manifestly contrary to all parliamentary practice that the great power of the government should be used to override the private interests of the promoters of all other railways who desire to construct lines in that section of the country, and to declare that this particular company should have the favour and the power of the government to introduce a clause of that kind in a public bill. The authorities on the subject are very clear. It has been brought up frequently; not only in the Parliament of Canada but in the Parliament of Great Britain, and I shall just advert to one or two cases, as reported in Bourinot:

In the English House of Commons there is a class of quasi private bills, distinguished as "hybrid bills." They are brought in, by order, as public bills, but as they affect private rights "their future progress is subject to the proof of compliance with the standing orders before the examiner, and to the payment of fees."

Here is a clear attempt made to evade the rules of parliament. This bill pays no fees, because it is a government measure amending a public bill. Then I read further:—

They are generally "bills for carrying out national works, or relating to crown property, or other public works in which the government is concerned," or they sometimes deal with matters affecting the metropolis. They are committed to a select committee, when the committee on standing orders has reported favourably.

Now if we were in a position to do so, the proper course would be to commit this bill to the Standing Orders Committee to ascertain whether private interests were affected. Then I read further:—

"The Toronto Esplanade Bill, just mentioned, would probably belong to this class, since the House found it necessary to refer it to a select committee with a view to protect the private interests involved."

"In other cases, where bills have affected both public and private interests, a different course has been followed. In the session of 1875, the premier (Mr. Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce a public bill to rearrange the 'capital of the Northern Railway Company, Canada, to enable the said company to change the gauge of its railway, and to provide for the release of the government lien on the road on certain conditions.' Objection having been taken that some of the provisions affected private interests and altered the powers of the company in very material points, the Speaker decided that the bill ought to be withdrawn. Separate bills were subsequently passed by the House—one, relating to the government lien, was treated as a public bill, and the other, relating to the gauge and capital, as a private bill."

That is exactly an analogous case where, in order to arrange the future policy of the Northern Railway, which I think was then ballasted, the government were desirous of releasing them from a portion of their liens upon the road. It was considered under difficult financial circumstances at the time. There was this mixed bill that came in, and it was found absolutely necessary to divide the bill and to allow the portions of it which affected the interests of the railway to go before the committee as a private bill. The bill had to be divided. There are a number of other authorities which I did not read because what I have read is perfectly clear. It is the case of a railway which the government were dealing with in the interests of the railway itself. The authorities will be found in Bourinot's work on Parliamentary Practice, between pages 690 and 693. It does not seem to me that there is any difference in the case given there and this bill. The better way would be simply to strike those two clauses out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I quite agree with the remarks of the First Minister that the proper place to deal with this is after we go into committee. It will then be found whether this clause which has been objected to can be brought within the rules. I now give notice that when we do go into committee I shall move an amendment which I think will effect that object. My hon. friend ought to be satisfied to allow the bill to go into committee and then we will find whether it cannot be amended to conform with the other clauses of the bill and with the rules of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is quite open to amend the bill when we go into committee. The simple way is to get the Speaker's ruling. If he rules against the proposal, that is the end of it. If he does not, it will be for the committee to make the changes in the bill.

The SPEAKER—Will the hon. member state the point of order?

Hon. Mr. POWER—My point of order is that the fourth clause of the bill is contrary to the rules of this House, on the ground that it deals with a matter which should be dealt with solely in a private bill, and should not appear in a public bill, no notice having been given of this proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER—If I understand the point of order it is this : that we should not in a public bill interfere with private legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, that is substantially the point of order.

The SPEAKER—I am of opinion that the point of order is well taken. I believe that we shou'd not in a private measure interfere with private legislation, where private interests are at stake, and I believe that on this occasion the fourth clause interferes with another clause of private legislation which took place some time ago. Under the circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that, although it might not affect very materially private interests in this instance, the principle ought to prevail, and this clause should be stricken out of the bill. I therefore hope that this principle will be maintained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While accepting the ruling of the Chair, I do not understand it to mean that this clause cannot be amended in committee so as to bring it within the rules of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Any clause can be proposed in committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are other points that the hon. gentleman may take, from his knowledge of parliamentary procedure, which I wish to provide against before we reach the committee stage. It might be said that, no notice being given of an amendment, none can be made.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—While accepting the ruling of the Chair, that ought not to preclude us from so amending the clause as to bring it within the rules of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—You can add a new clause.

Hon. Mr. ANGERS—You can add it without notice.

The SPEAKER—I can cite authorities, if necessary, for the ruling that I have given, but I do not wish to take the time of the House, as some have been cited already.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to further discuss this bill, it having been pretty well ventilated and discussed on Saturday. I wish to propose an amendment, and I shall take the sense of the House on it at the third reading of the bill, to save time. I merely give notice of it now : it is in the direction of making the subsidy payable only on condition of keeping the road open.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the 41st rule of the House be suspended so far as it relates to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the bill.

On the first clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the government do not feel that they can make an amendment to this clause, they should make a statement with respect to it. Here is a provision for paying a very large sum of money, amounting to about $1,000,000, to a company as to whose record the less, perhaps, said the better. This company is allowed to go on and finance on this measure. It is quite true, as the First Minister has said, that the government might insist upon the company carrying the mail, but the government cannot compel that work to be done. They cannot compel the company to operate the road, and this money, which is intended to be paid for services rendered by the company, will, under the terms of this measure, be paid whether the company do the work or not. The company can issue bonds and assign the benefits of this act to the bondholders, as they are allowed to do by the closing words of this clause, and the government have to pay the $80,000 a year, or the $40,000 a year as the case may be, to the assignees of this company even though the road is not working at all. It is barely possible that we have not the right in this House to amend this clause. I think we have, but it may be that we have not, and there should be some declaration from the government to the effect that they will see that the public interests are protected. Under the next clause the Governor in Council have the right to alter the contract with the company. In the interests of the public there should be a provision in the contract that unless this $40,000 or $80,000 is earned it shall not be paid when the road is not operated. That is common sense; it appeals to the plainest sense of justice of every one. We should have some declaration from the government with respect to that.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—An incorporated company, you mean.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am speaking of this company.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The arguments of the hon. gentleman would be pertinent and much stronger if they had been urged when the bill of 1891 was passed. The only conclusion that we can arrive at from the arguments of the gentlemen opposed to this bill is that they are under the impression that we are granting an additional sum to this enterprise. That is not a fact. The liability of the country is not increased one single dollar. We are now under an obligation to grant certain lands towards the construction of this road, and a payment of $80,000 per annum for certain services to be rendered by the company when the road is completed. If the service is not rendered, then one-third of the land grant to the company is to be held in security for the full performance of that duty; and as the road has to be built and the land grant is to extend five miles on either side of the road, it is a self-evident fact that the moment the road is completed the land becomes enhanced in value, and just in proportion to the enhanced value of the land is the security to the government increased for the fulfilment of that contract. All the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman might with force have been urged four years ago when the bill was before Parliament. At present we desire to facilitate the construction of a road running for nearly a hundred miles through a portion of the country that is tolerably well settled at present, and in order to do that we propose to divide the subsidy, both in land and money, and pay in proportion after the road is built for the length of the line constructed and operated. That is really the whole provision of the bill. The hon. gentleman says that there ought to be a provision that the payment should stop in case the line should cease to be operated. I confess there is much force in the argument, but that is a provision that does not exist, nor is it provided for in the law on the statute-book. It would be so hampering this company, or any other company with which the government might enter into a contract for the construction of the line for the first hundred miles at least, as to render their bonds useless in the market. In future legislation of this kind, I am not prepared to say that I would not be ready, unless I see it in another light, to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman; but we have no right to do so now, particularly as those opposed to the bill have taken such strong grounds against any interference directly or indirectly with the rights of private individuals. How ineffective is their argument when you apply it to this case. They tell us that the bondholders have a lien on the road as it exists for a very large sum of money, yet they propose to incorporate in this bill a provision which would render it impossible for them to raise money and go on and complete it, and thereby make their securities of some value. I question whether we have a right, as the hon. gentleman suggests, under the rules of the Senate, to make the alteration which he proposes, but whether we have or not, at this stage of the proceedings, and considering those private interests for which my hon. friend is so solicitous, I do not think the Senate should accept a proposition which would certainly render, under the present circumstances, their security not only unavailable, but useless.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In reference to the first part of the hon. gentleman's argument, that it would increase the value of the land, it is very well known that the forty miles already constructed have not enhanced the value of any property along the road, inasmuch as, from the best information that we have, no settlement has gone in there. In reference to our present course, if the Premier had enjoyed a seat in this Chamber, as many of us have, for the last fifteen or twenty years he would have learned the feeling of the Senate in regard to this bill. He must not suppose that this is sprung upon the government to-day or recently. When changes were made in this bill in 1891, it was introduced on the 15th July and was not permitted to be read at that time, because it was not printed. When it was brought up for a second reading, there was a strong feeling in this House against it, not only amongst the small opposition, but amongst the warmest supporters of the government. The bill was debated on a second reading nearly every day from the 16th July to the 10th August, and that feeling in reference to this has been manifest for years back. Every time the company came for a charter it met with great opposition, and the members of the Senate felt they were consistent with their former course when they were offering every objection to the bill. Every time it has come up they have endeavoured to clip it of its most objectionable features. They failed, however, to do so, and the fact that it took from the 16th July to the 10th August to get it through shows that the bill has excited in this Chamber a great deal of feeling and opposition, and therefore it naturally aroused suspicion, perhaps not properly well founded. In the absence of the bill itself, and in the absence of the file of papers that I thought would have been on the Table, and which I had made many ineffectual efforts to discover, an anxious doubt was created as to what was sought by this bill. It was only after the Premier sent me the copy of the bill which I read yesterday that I knew all about it. Some of the clauses are very much confused.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement which the hon. gentleman makes only intensifies the argument. The fact that it took from July to September to put it through shows the great care and thought given to its provisions, since it took all that time to discuss it. I know that a great many of my political friends are opposed to the whole principle of the bill. The fact that it took two months to consider it—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One month.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, one month, and the fact that the House adopted it with this provision in it, only adds force to the position which I have taken. I am quite aware of the opposition that he has offered, but I wish to take the opportunity to disabuse the hon. gentleman's mind of some misapprehensions in reference to this bill. It will be remembered that in his speech on Saturday the hon. gentleman stated that he had tried to obtain a copy of the bill, that he could not find it at the government printing office, that they knew nothing at all about it, and that it must have been smuggled through some private printing office.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say "smuggled."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the word.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not mean any dishonesty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The inference was that it was sent to a private printing office and printed so as to be kept from the view of the members of the House of Commons. Well, that is not correct. The bill was printed at the government printing office in the usual way. The best evidence of that is the paper on which it is printed and the printing. I admit it was introduced in the Commons at a very late period, and consequently the hon. gentleman may not have been able to obtain a copy from the printing office as soon as he should have had it. It was printed in the usual way, and there was no smuggling, directly or indirectly, in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite accept the hon. gentleman's explanation. But I may say I went to Mr. Botterell's office repeatedly and had him telephone down to the printing office. I said I knew there was a printed copy in the Speaker's hands, and the authorities to whom he was telephoning stated it was not printed at the Bureau. I went back and said, "I am told by other gentlemen there are printed copies of it; they did not print one copy merely." And he said, "The printing office disown any knowledge of the bill."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never saw a copy of it before.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to make three or four observations with reference to the business aspect of my suggestion. The hon. First Minister said it would be an improper interference with private rights if any such amendment were made to the bill, or if the government were to express any such intention. I think I can relieve his mind of the dread of interfering with their proper rights. If this bill does not pass at present the company is practically dead. They cannot build the whole road. Everybody knows that; and they come here and ask for power under this bill to build half of the road, and then to get half of the subsidy. The government passed this measure with the effect, perhaps, of enabling this company to go on with their work, which they cannot do now, and then, in order further to show that the hon. First Minister's qualms of conscience are not called for, I find under the second clause that there is a provision made, which reads:

The Governor in Council is hereby authorized and empowered to alter and to modify the said contract in accordance with the terms of the Aid Act and of this act.

And I think, considering we are going to let them have the money for building 85 miles in addition to the 40 miles which they have already built——

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington)—No, not 85 miles, but half the road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are 40 miles built, and 85 more would make half the road. The line which is provided for under this clause is the route to the Saskatchewan, which is 250 miles. Half of 250 is 125, and they have to build 85 miles more, and then they are entitled to get this $40,000 a year to finance on. I think, in consideration of the fact that the government is doing that, it is the duty of the government to the people who are paying the money to see that some protection is offered to the people of the country. Just consider the First Minister coming here and telling us, "Here it is true we are asking for this large amount of money, but we do not propose to put any safeguard in the contract. We will let them do as they did in the past; we will let them build this line as they did the 40 miles, and let them issue their bonds, and get their money on it, and we shall not compel them to operate the road at all, and we will have this road just the same as the 40 miles, two parallel streaks of rust on the prairie north of Winnipeg." I am surprised at the attitude of the government in this matter; and I am sure, whatever the House thinks, the people of the country will condemn such an attitude.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Only twenty miles of the forty already constructed will form a part of the intended route, and from that point of junction to the Saskatchewan is 293 miles. Under the bill they have to build half of that 293 miles before they have earned the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is 250 miles, and not 293,

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is misinformed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the statement you made on Saturday.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, it is not the statement that I made. You were not paying attention or you would not have said it. The old route east of Lake Manitoba is 250 miles, and the route on the west is 293 miles.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This clause does not refer to that route at all.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I say that under this bill and under the previous act it was open to them to have either the eastern or western route. There is no change whatever in the bill, as far as that is concerned, and, therefore, my hon. friend is entirely wrong with regard to what the company will have to do before they earn the $40,000. My hon. friend made a very important statement a few moments ago; I do not think he felt the importance of it at the moment. A very great deal of time was spent on Saturday talking of the interests of bondholders, and showing it was the duty of Parliament to protect the bondholders above every other consideration, and my hon. friend from Ottawa took the same ground to-day; yet the gentlemen are doing all they can to defeat this bill and to prevent it being passed. At the same time my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, says if this bill is not passed by this House, that this Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company will cease to exist. Now, what will happen the bondholders in that case? Is it in the interests of the bondholders that our friends opposite are working? The interests of the bondholders must go with the company. I have the figures before me. The distance from Winnipeg to Saskatchewan via Gladstone is 293 miles. That was the statement I made on Saturday. The distance from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan, taking the old proposed route of the Hudson Bay Company, is 250 miles; and I now repeat what I said a few moments ago, that after using twenty miles of the old line already built, the company will have to build 137 miles more before they earn the $40,000 as half of the $80,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is if they take the western route.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And my hon. friend is wrong as to the statement he makes as to the number of miles of railway they will have to construct when they will be in a position to claim the $40,000. There is another statement to which I wish to direct the attention of the House: when this matter came up on Saturday my hon. friends on the other side seemed to contend that it contained every principle of evil that their minds could possibly imagine. They talked about things which were not in it, more particularly the provisions of the old statute, which are not in this at all. We had to explain that there was very little departure from the old statute in the bill. In fact, as far as the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway was concerned, it only differed in one particular, and that was the division of the subsidy, and now our friends want to introduce some other changes in the bill, which Parliament in its wisdom did not think it necessary to have incorporated in the bill when they legislated upon the subject in previous years. The bill is but a small departure from the existing statutes. The only important point in which it differs from those is simply the division of the subsidy. It does not change the route of the road. It is quite competent for them to go east or west under the existing statutes. It does not oblige them to take a new route. It simply decides this point, that on the completion of half of the road they will be in a position to claim and be paid one-half of the subsidy.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the hon. gentleman from Marshfield is in error. We are dealing now with the first clause of the bill, and what does that say? It says that the government may pay one-half of the said sum of $80,000, to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion by the company of one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and Saskatchewan River. As I understand it, that is not the line via Gladstone. Further, the hon. gentleman has admitted that it is only 250 miles from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On the west side?

Hon. Mr. POWER—On the east side. The hon. gentleman may shake his head. My statement is perfectly true. It is only 250 miles from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River, and this company, by building 85 miles in addition to the 40 already constructed, will have built half the road from Winnipeg to the Saskatchewan River and can draw the subsidy of $40,000 a year. The hon. gentleman undertook to contradict me when I stated that, but it is perfectly true. The hon. gentleman assumed that the company were going to build west of the lake. I did not assume that; if they wanted to get the money for the least possible work they would build east of the lake. I was under the impression that the wording of this was a little different from what it is. Take the 3rd clause:—

3. In the event of a contract not being entered into with the company in compliance with the terms of this Act in so far as it relates to the construction of the first half of the company's railway, the Governor in Council may, subject to the terms of the said Aid Act and of this Act, transfer the amount applicable to such first half of the company's railway, namely, forty thousand dollars per annum for twenty years, to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone, to Lake Dauphin or thereabouts.

That clause provides for the construction of the road west of the lake, but I do not think it probable that the company would build 293 miles when they might get off with 250 miles, particularly if they are building the road simply in order to get money. With respect to the bondholders, the hon. gentleman apparently took the ground that the hon. gentleman from Ottawa and myself had opposed this legislation in the interest of the bondholders. Speaking for myself, I opposed it in the public interest. If you are going to act in behalf of any private interest, then the interest of the bondholders should be consulted. I cannot understand the line taken by the government here. It indicates that they do not expect that this company are going to operate the road, or that the road will be operated. Do they propose to give $1,000,000 away as a present to this company? That is just what it looks like, because otherwise should they not be most anxious in the contract they make with the company to see that some value is given to the country for the money that is to be granted?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is talking ancient history. I think every hon. member of this House is aware—it has been announced publicly again and again, in fact it has been published for months past—that the company have abandoned their intention of building east of Lake Manitoba and that their proposition is entirely now confined to the line west of Lake Manitoba to run through the Dauphin country. Therefore, all the figures that I have been discussing in this House have been in reference to the route that it is now proposed the company shall take. I repeat what I said a few minutes ago, that from the plans in our possession and from information that I have on the subject, 20 miles of the line already located and constructed is common to either route, the one west or the one east of Lake Manitoba, that from that point a new line, altogether different from that proposed to be taken from Lake Manitoba, will be followed. All that line is through an excellent country, and my hon. friend must be oblivious of the fact that this was the company's proposition and is what we have been discussing a few days back, a line running west of Lake Manitoba. The objection that is offered as to paralleling other lines could only come in with respect to that line. The objection to that route is that it will parallel the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to some extent the Manitoba and North-western Railway. The figures that I gave yesterday are correct—that the company, in addition to the 20 miles of line already constructed, will have to build about 140 miles of railway before they will earn this $40,000 a year as a subsidy. I have to say in connection with that—and the statement is fully corroborated by every one who has studied the country—that the first half of the road to the Saskatchewan by the west side of Lake Manitoba runs through a good fertile country, and there need not be the slightest apprehension in the minds of hon. members about the line running through that country being operated after it is constructed. There are about 10,000 inhabitants in that country already. All the homestead lands are taken up, and as soon as this railway goes through, the remaining part of these lands, which are among the best in the North-west, will be settled, and there is no doubt that the road will be operated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this road has to be built west of the lake?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Let the hon. gentleman speak for himself. He stated that it would.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I say that that is the proposition of the company. That is very plain, but neither this bill nor the existing act renders it necessary to build on one side or the other.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was stated in another place by the Minister of Railways that the company could build east of the lake as well.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is what I said. What is the hon. gentleman making the row about? I say if they can build east of the lake they can earn the money by building eighty-five miles.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They are not such fools as to do that.

The CHAIRMAN—Do I understand that the aid now proposed to be given to the line is to apply on the forty miles already built?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We cannot take verbal statements. What does the bill say?

One-half of the said sum of eighty thousand dollars to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion by the company of one-half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River; and the remaining one-half of the said sum of eighty thousand dollars to be paid annually, commencing from the date of the completion of the remaining half of their line to be constructed between Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River.

The clause was agreed to on a division

On the 3rd clause,

Hon. Mr. POWER—In order to make the meaning of that clause perfectly clear, we should say: "To an incorporated company."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the government proposed to get up, by order in council, some sort of a company to do this work, I could understand the hon. gentleman's "Oh, no," but if the intention is to deal fairly, and, in case the company are not in a position to do the work, to let some other incorporated company do it, then I think it should be, "Oh, yes." I move that the words "an incorporated" be inserted in line 7, before the word "company."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It says now: "To a company authorized to construct a line." It must be an incorporated company if it has any authority to build a line. There is no necessity for the word "incorporated," because it is fully covered by the words "to a company authorized to construct a line of railway from Portage la Prairie or Gladstone to Lake Dauphin." It is fully provided for.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that it is just as easy for the government to pass an order in council constituting a company for the purpose of doing this work as it was for them to pass an order in council handing $2,500,000 to the company. Both things seem to require the authority of Parliament, but an order in council has great virtue under the present administration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has, but no government has power to pass an order in council to incorporate a company or grant them money. The hon. gentleman knows that as well as I do.

The amendment was declared lost, and the clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I propose to add a clause to the bill. The objection to the clause which has been struck out and which the hon. Speaker has ruled out, is that it amends a private bill. The provision itself is a general one. There ought to be a general provision in this bill, because hon. gentleman are well aware that this bill deals with more than the Winnipeg Great Northern Company. The clause which we have been discussing proposed that the government, in the event of the company not making a contract for the construction of this road, can make a contract with another company authorized for the purpose of constructing the railway. The provision that I want to have inserted in the bill will be a general one, which is not submitted as an amendment to any private bill, but as a general provision that will affect the contract that the government may make with any other company for the construction of the road:—

The main line of the railway shall be completed to the Saskatchewan River, by thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, otherwise the powers granted with respect to such construction shall be null and void as respects so much of the railway as then remains uncompleted."

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is the same clause.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is, but it does not apply to any company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is simply stating the provision which has been ruled out. The hon. gentleman's pretext for this change is still more remarkable, because he says that another company may be authorized to build the road. Well, the other company are only authorized to build a road from Portage la Prairie to Lake Dauphin, and the hon. gentleman's amendment to limit the time in which the work shall be completed to the mouth of the Saskatchewan is made to apply to a line only to Lake Dauphin. This is the same enactment in other words. It cannot apply to the Lake Dauphin road, because they have nothing to do with it to the Saskatchewan. It is clearly open to the same objection as the original clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope the hon. gentleman is not serious in proposing this amendment. If you cut off the repealing paragraph this is the clause that the Speaker has ruled out—the same clause. Surely the hon. gentleman is not serious. I think the committee are entitled to a little serious action on the part of the government in this matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am quite serious in the matter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not know that the hon. gentleman appeared as a humourist

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In order to prevent* any difficulty in this matter, and in order to get this through without sending it to the House of Commons, I ask my hon. friend to withdraw the amendment and let the fourth clause drop.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Of course, the proposed 4th clause would have been ruled out by the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MacINNES, from the committee, reported the bill with an amendment, which was concurred in.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the suspension of the 41st rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will not make any observation in proposing the amendment of which I gave notice. It is as follows:—

That the bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to a committee of the whole House with instruction to insert the following clause as subsection a to section one of the said bill: " Provided further that the annual subsidy of $80,000 for the transport of men, supplies and mails up to the Saskatchewan River, or the payment of the annual subsidy of $40,000 for the construction of one-half of the company's line shall not be paid if the company at any time cease or fail to operate the entire line or one-half of the said line if only one-half the line be built, and the subsidy for the entire line, or for one-half the line, as the case may be, shall only be payable during such years as the railway is maintained and operated to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council."

I have left it to the government to say whether the line is to be operated to earn the subsidy.

The Senate divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to say a few words on a subject which has not been discussed for some little time, although it has been before the House on various occasions—the Manitoba School question. I made a few observations with respect to that subject when the address in reply to His Excellency's speech was under consideration, and since that time the question has not been discussed at large in this House. Observations were made by several hon. gentlemen then. I should not make any observations on the subject now, were it not that a number of articles have appeared in a leading Liberal newspaper published in Toronto which lay down views and propound a policy with respect to this Manitoba School question of which I altogether disapprove. Those views and the policy which is propounded in the articles in that paper, are not the views of the Liberal party at large and they do not indicate the policy of the liberal party. It might be said that it would be quite unnecessary that this statement should be made, because the newspaper, the sheet I refer to, the Toronto Globe, itself states that it is not the organ of any party, that it is an independent newspaper; but notwithstanding that, I have found that in the province from which I come the party with which I am associated is very often held responsible for those things which appear in the Toronto Globe. In the same way, even in this Chamber I have heard the Liberal party held responsible by gentlemen speaking on behalf of the Government, for the views of the Toronto Globe. The Globe is a very able newspaper. As a general thing, its views are those of a large proportion of the Liberal party; but on this particular question, as on a great many other questions, its views are simply those of an independent newspaper, and they do not represent the views of the Liberal party as a whole. In fact, I know that on this particular question, the views expressed by the Globe are not the views entertained by a majority of the parliamentary members of the Liberal party, nor, I presume, of the majority of the party outside of Parliament. The doctrine laid down in the newspaper is, that this matter of the Manitoba schools is purely and exclusively a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Although the Liberal party have, as compared with the Conservative party, advocated provincial rights, they have advocated those rights as set forth in the constitution; and it is perfectly clear, and is laid down as distinctly as possible in the constitution, that under certain circumstances, with respect to matters of education, the Federal Parliament have a right to interfere. There is no question whatever about that, and consequently the theory of the Globe newspaper that this is purely a matter of provincial rights is not tenable at all. These views, which I have expressed, are the views entertained by a majority of the Liberal party. With respect to my individual views, which perhaps do not concern hon. gentlemen much, I may say they are these: I do not say they are the views that I have entertained all along; but after due consideration and reflection, the opinion I have formed is this: that when the government received the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—mind, I do not wish to be understood as blaming the government seriously for what they have done—I think now, looking at the thing in the light of our experience, the wisest course would have been for the government not to have immediately met and formulated a formidable remedial order, but to have communicated the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the Manitoba government in a friendly way, accompanied with some friendly communication to the effect that they had better try and settle this matter in a satisfactory way. The fact that the remedial order was issued after the hearing of the case here put the Manitoba government and legislature, to a certain extent, on their dignity, and it is much more difficult to settle the matter now than it might have been before. At the same time the government and Parliament have given—they have done late what I think they should have done early—they have given to the Manitoba government and legislature time for consideration and time to remove the reasonable grievances of the minority of Manitoba, and I feel that what the hon. First Minister says with respect to the practical difficulties in the way of the interference of Parliament is perfectly true. And I hope that in order to avoid these difficulties the Manitoba government and legislature will settle the matter as has been suggested by the government here. I trust that when we meet again we shall hear that Manitoba has settled her own difficulties, and I may venture to go this much further—and I think that I express the sentiments, I do not say of the majority, but certainly of a very large proportion of the denomination to which I belong—and say that any arrangement which satisfies the reasonable requirements of the minority ought to be accepted, even though that settlement is not in the exact line of the remedial order.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am glad to hear my hon. friend's remarks upon this matter, but it is all very well for a man to be wise after events happen.

Hon. Mr. POWER—You should not say that.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My hon. friend admits that he was in harmony with the order on the Manitoba government, but after the events which have occurred, he thinks it would have been better if we had been more conciliatory. I think the feeling of the country is that the government merely did its duty in forwarding to the Manitoba government what the Privy Council had ordered. Now, with regard to the Globe, my hon. friend may say it does not express the opinion of the Reform party, and he may be right; but in their pronouncements upon this very question they voice the strong sentiments of the majority of the party.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is not correct. I made a statement which was made authoritively.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think my hon. friend should not interrupt me. He has said quite enough this session. I have just as much right to my opinion as my hon. friend. The reason why it has said so is that the leader of the Opposition never took a stand upon this question. We do not know what stand he will adopt. We do not know whether he is in favour of provincial rights or not. He is waiting to be governed by the circumstances that may occur.

The Senate then adjourned.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following bill :—

“An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial year ending 30th June, 1896, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service,” to which bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this bill the Royal assent was signified in the following words :—

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the Fifth Session of the Seventh Parliament of the Dominion with the following Speech :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In bringing this Session of Parliament to a conclusion, I have to congratulate you on the industry and zeal which have marked your labours.

The necessary legislation having been passed, the Treaty of Commerce with France, from which favourable commercial results may be expected, will, as soon as ratified, be put into force by proclamation.

The negotiations with Newfoundland to which reference was made at the opening of the Session, I regret to say have not resulted in any agreement for the present.

The reply of the Provincial Legislature of Manitoba to the Remedial Order issued by my Government on the 21st March last was considered of such a character as to justify postponement of further action until next Session.

I am pleased to observe the grant of Parliament in aid of the fund contributed by the Canadian people for the benefit of the family of the late Right Honourable Sir John Thompson.

The amendments which have been made to the law relating to the Civil Service, will, it is believed, result in increased efficiency and economy.

The legislation of the Session will, I trust, lead to an improved administration of criminal law, to the advancement of commerce and the extension of railway and telegraphic communication.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you for the liberal provision which you have made for the services of the current year.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In relieving you from your duties, I venture to express the hope that you will find among the people you represent a continuance of that prosperity which marked the opening year.

The Speaker of the Senate then said :

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Saturday, the 31st day of August next, to be here held, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until the 31st day of August next.
