Again, by extending collective bargaining to professional groups, we could very well be faced with a closed shop for professional people.

The Woods Report, at page 149, reads:

... that, in a unit for which a union is the bargaining agent, a member must pay the regular and reasonable dues of the union whether he takes out a membership or not, as an "agency fee".

This is widely known as an agency shop, and is recognized in the bill. However, the bill goes beyond this to provide legal acceptance of the closed shop, which has been regarded as increasingly indefensible by the Woods Report and has been criticized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Section 161 expressly states that the collective agreements may contain a clause requiring, as a condition of employment, membership in a specified trade union or preference in employment may be given to members of a specified trade union. This section, along with section 125(3), creates the possibility of the very kind of closed shop the Prime Minister has been urging provinces to move against. Taken together, these provisions allow professional employees, doctors, lawyers, engineers, scientists, accountants and so on to establish separate bargaining units and to exclude from employment other professionals who are not members of their union. The government is inviting the kinds of uneconomic and unjust employment restrictions that are far too prevalent at the provincial level at this time. The taxpayers and university graduates need fewer, not more, impediments to employment. I think we should discuss these clauses very carefully in committee and possibly suggest some changes.

I think this bill does not go far enough in another area which I mentioned earlier. In fact you could say that, as written, the bill does very little to promote industrial peace. All of us are concerned about this today. Strikes and lockouts are on the increase. On this side of the House, we feel that it is time the government took remedial action to correct the situation.

Allied with industrial peace is the whole problem of the effect of strikes on the public interest. This aspect has been discussed many times, and the Woods report arrived at some fairly realistic conclusions about it. However, unless and until the government is prepared to offer a solution on how to handle strikes which affect the public interest, the chaos which exists today will continue. Many of the provisions in the bill will serve the public interest by providing machinery to reduce the likelihood of strikes and lockouts, but the bill fails to protect the public in the event of strikes and lockouts in essential services.

One proposal of the Woods task force which was referred to earlier today, and was endorsed in principle by the Progressive Conservative party last year, is as follows:

> A Public Interest Disputes Commission should be established to determine special procedures for resolving industrial disputes for essential services. If the commission is unsuccessful in its efforts it should report to parliament on the situation which would thereby have a more comprehensive and informed basis on which to exercise the power it now has to legislate an end to a strike or lockout.

The question of a public interest disputes commission has been discussed many times. I think it is a logical solution, a sort of court of appeal in labour relations. Certainly, it is worth a trial and possibly such a provision should be included in this legislation. It is not a departure from the principle of free collective bargaining which should remain the cornerstone of industrial relations in Canada. Machinery is provided for finding new ways for collective bargaining compatible with the public interest, as well as assisting parliament in rationally and competently exercising the authority it now has to protect the public interest.

I believe the clauses in the original bill, C-253, which caused the greatest concern and the greatest protest, were those which dealt with technological change. This is a difficult subject. How does one arrive at a tidy balance between the necessity for industry to be competitive by improving its methods, while at the same time ensuring that not too many people suffer loss and deprivation as a result of change? I know the minister is well aware of this, and I was interested to hear him refer to it in his opening statement. He pointed out the necessity for Canadian industry to compete successfully with foreign industry by keeping up with the times, but on the other hand he realises that the result of such changes on workers must be minimized by realistic legislation.

In all this talk of technological change, whenever a company modernizes machinery or introduces new production equipment, we hear the cry that it is all very fine but it is going to throw people out of work. It is the old cry which was heard back in the days of the industrial revolution, the machine would lead to great production but everybody would be out of work. Anyone who has studied economic history would question the veracity of the statement that technological change is necessarily bad. I was interested in a submission by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in which it is stated:

> Contrary to fears expressed by some people some years ago that technological changes would result in a substantial net reduction in the number of jobs, the fact is that advancing technology has created more new jobs than have been rendered redundant because of it. Thus, any impediment to technological change helps restrict new employment opportunities.

I do not accept that statement 100 per cent because it is a grey area. Figures can be produced on either side but, on balance, it would be very difficult to show that technological change has been bad for all industrial nations. I think it would be much easier to show that without technological change the great nations of the world would not have advanced to the position they are in today. Let us not get caught up in emotion and say that technological changes are necessarily bad and must be controlled, otherwise people will be thrown out of work. I suggest to the House that it is not as simple as that. Technological change is not necessarily bad and we should be very careful not to introduce legislation which might discourage companies from making such changes as are necessary if they are to compete in the world today.

The importance of this must be evident to this House in view of the fact that for the past year and a half we have had agitated debate on the difficulties faced by Canada when competing in world markets. We recall what happened last August when the United States took retaliatory measures to correct their adverse balance of trade. We know what is happening in the markets of Japan and Germany, as well as in the rest of the world, with the economic conditions that exist today. In view of the state of world currency, it becomes more and more important for Canadian industry to keep abreast of scientific, modern production methods so that we can sell our goods at a competitive price. The question of gearing up production has become more important in the past few years because of several trends. The rise in value of the Canadian dollar has increased foreign competition and required Canadian industry to search for more efficient and recognized means of production.

On the other hand a high level of unemployment, government initiated and therefore out of control, prevents the re-absorption of displaced semi-skilled and unskilled occupational groups into the Canadian labour force. Where Canadian industries have failed to take advantage of technological advances, as in the pulp and paper industry, labour lay-offs have resulted. Many of the problems we are now experiencing in New Brunswick, with lay-offs in the pulp and paper mills, are largely due to the fact that mills did not keep pace with modern production methods. As a result, they find themselves unable to compete with modern plants which use improved methods of production.

Obviously labour and management are directly concerned and interested in technological change. But it is equally obvious, although not generally recognized and admitted, that the Canadian public has an interest. There are reasons for this. In the first place, the Canadian public has an interest as the beneficiary of an efficient and technologically competitive industry, or as the financial victim of an inefficient industry that is protected by tariffs or bolstered by subsidies. In the second place, the Canadian public is interested as the tax source whose taxes are used to assist industry to make technological changes or to assist employees to weather such changes. In the third place, the Canadian public is interested as the victim inconvenienced by industrial strife arising out of the failure of management and labour to reach agreement on technological change.

This public interest is not one of convenience or inconvenience but of responsibility, for the public is responsible for the economic, fiscal, tax, tariff and trade policies of the government of the day. These policies may encourage or discourage an industry in making technological change, or encourage or discourage labour from cooperating in such change. It is reasonable to conclude that the public has a vested interest in the problems of technological change and, arising out of that interest, a right and a responsibility to be a third presence with management and trade unions in contributing to the solution of such problems.

If I have dwelt over long on that particular aspect of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I have done so deliberately because that is something which needs repeating. Since Bill C-253 was introduced, it seems that all we have heard has been the views of the two opposing sides, one saying that technological changes will put workers out of jobs, and the other upholding management by saying that technological changes must be made in order for industry to stay alive in the business world. The present minister has made an attempt to water down the technological change provisions in this bill in order to make it acceptable to both management and labour. His predecessor absolutely refused to do this. But we on this side do not know if the changes made in this bill are exactly what they seem to be on the surface. How far do they go? This is what we must discuss in committee. With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, the wording is fuzzy and vague. Perhaps we have not had time to sit down and read these provisions closely ten or 12 times, although I doubt that repetitious reading would make the words any clearer.

I question if the bill has been modified to the extent that the newspapers would have us believe. However, I want to approach the matter with an open mind. If the minister can convince me of this in committee then I will say, "More power to you; we are all for it." But it is important that we not be stampeded by one side or the other, by business into saying these changes are bad or by labour into saying these changes must be made. It is time somebody started thinking of the Canadian public caught between the two groups.

Just before sitting down, I would like to refer to another aspect of the bill which disturbs me. I suppose hon. members on the other side of the House become tired hearing me talk about this matter time and time again. When the unemployment insurance bill was before the House I said over and over again that it was too complicated and would be impossible to administer. I said the wording of the clauses was fuzzy and too much was left to be filled in by ministerial regulations. The minister and his officials pooh-poohed my contention. They said anybody could understand the bill. We all know what the result has been. I am afraid that this bill will leave itself open to another administrative mess as bad as or worse than anything we have seen under the Unemployment Insurance Act. Here again, I refer to Professor Peach's remarks in reference to Bill C-253, but which are still valid so far as this bill is concerned because there is no basic change with respect to the administration of this measure. Professor Peach said:

> I have not yet mentioned the administrative difficulties the act presents. What criteria are the government, the Labour Board, or the parties going to use to define just what constitutes a technological change? What is meant by a "significant" number of employees?
> The minister or the Governor in Council can decide this.
> In short, the act is an administrative nightmare.
> The proposed revisions constitute a piece of mischievious legislation, one that can logically cast the government as a latter day Luddite. And to what end? Is the legislation really needed?
> In the aggregate, technological change does not hurt anyone. The substitution of machine power for man power has been a constant factor in man's development. Despite the increasing rate at which change is occurring and despite a number of gloomy prophesies, a full-employment economy can be a reality today.
> Ideally, the government, I think, should limit itself to providing the proper fiscal and monetary policies that will maintain a level of aggregate demand sufficient to provide full employment.
> The government is unlikely to restrict its role in this manner, but if activism is to be the rule of the day, a better alternative exists in the Woods Report recommendations.
> Hopefully, the government will change its mind in regard to this legislation. If not, we can be thankful that the federal jurisdiction is not the only one in Canadian labour relations.
> Business should be aware of the traps that exist in legislation of this kind, and work to keep provincial law free from contamination by this kind of fuzzy thinking.

The professor may have been a little harsh and too critical. I am willing to be convinced. I hope the minister will be able to convince me and my colleagues in the committee that he has made significant changes in this bill. I also hope that some of the other matters I have raised today will be discussed in the committee. If the changes made in this bill prove to be undesirable, I hope that the minister will accept amendments, if not from this side of the House at least from his own side. We accept the fact that the Labour Code needs revision. We are quite prepared to let this bill go to committee where we will examine it carefully. We have reservations with respect to certain clauses, and we hope that in committee the minister will give a frank and full appraisal of how the bill is an improvement over Bill C-253.

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill to amend the Canada Labour Code I will at this stage try to keep my remarks general, and related to the principles of the bill and of labour-management relations.

As I look at labour-management problems in this country, and in many others, I wonder if we are progressing very much by introducing legislative measures such as the one now before us, measures which are designed to solve one or several very particular problems, but in many instances are only adding to the irritants which, to my mind, create the great difficulty in labour negotiations. These irritants seem to be endless in number and make adversaries of the parties involved. It is not really the basic principles which cause the serious controversies between labour and management but, rather, the small items which become so important by virtue of their numbers.

Relations between labour and management are like those between a husband and wife who cannot get along, Mr. Speaker, not because they disagree on their basic responsibilities in marriage, family and such, but because of the constant small peckings of one or the other and the wall that the great number of these minor peckings builds between them. I wonder if measures such as the one we are debating do not add to the irritation and do not just build that wall higher and higher between the two parties. How unfortunate it would be if that were so. Every time we add another law, Mr. Speaker, another regulation and another clause in this area, we restrict the basic principle that the preamble proclaims in this bill, the principle of collective bargaining.

I have to chuckle a little every time I see that phrase, "collective bargaining", which, in theory, represents an ideal vehicle for resolving mutual problems between parties. As the theory is put into practice, it would be more appropriate to refer to it as "collective pressure bargaining", since the major, meaningful factor in these negotiations is simply the pressure that one party can bring to bear upon the other, most often not to obtain a proper and equitable agreement but to obtain for that party whatever that pressure can get. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, a system for solving the problems of two parties under which each party tries to hurt the other party to gain its own advantage, whereas the theory of the system implies mutual participation and co-operation.

I continue to be amazed that, with all the wisdom we have, the technological advances we have made, the advances in the social sciences that have taken place, and so on, we have not yet developed methods for solving problems that are superior to the strikes that are harmful to all, including the always innocent third party, the public. I think it is pure fantasy to say we believe in the collective bargaining process and then place all sorts of restrictions on that process, such as the clauses included in this legislative measure. If we are sincere in saying collective bargaining works, then we should let it work freely, as the principle implies, rather than impose all sorts of restrictions. If we need these restrictions, I think we should have the courage to admit that the system does not work as we feel it should, and governments should have the courage to look at something else.

It is said that the clauses in the bill before us regarding technological changes incorporate a new and important principle. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a new principle. It may be a concept; certainly, it is not a principle. If it were a principle, it would have the same basic importance for all and would have equal meaning to all parties concerned. I submit that it will have no such balance in meaning and justice. The concept is simply another restriction placed on the true principle of collective bargaining. It is another concept that will become, in numerous cases, one further irritant. It will not apply to all parties alike. It will mean different things in different situations and will have different results in different cases. I like to think principles are more universal and more basic than that, and if the government feels compelled to bring in such concepts, why does it not develop measures and standards that will apply to all workers and not just to the organized people who have the power to negotiate their own agreements? I hardly think it akin to good federalism for a federal government to be enacting measures that discriminate between organized and non-organized labour.

Mr. Alexander: That is divisive.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): There is no justifiable criterion for that sort of distinction, especially by a national government. If the preamble to this bill means that we are entrenching a principle in law that does not now work well and if we are saying that its effectiveness is unquestionable, then I am opposed to that preamble; for, obviously, the principle it enunciates is not the be all and end all in this area. If it were, why would we be bending and altering it by such restrictions as we find in this piece of legislation? Why must we so often be looking at legislation which is presented simply to solve specific short term problems and to render administration more efficient and easy, instead of recognizing and applying the principles and policies of right and justice.

If the government, Mr. Speaker, feels it is necessary to initiate measures such as those in this bill, I say there is a long list of practical measures that could be implemented to eliminate the dreadful irritants of labour-management relations. They are not included in this bill and they, I feel, would be more helpful. Why not identify clearly and describe the responsibilities and privileges that are imposed or granted to both parties involved in strikes and lockouts, so that those responsibilities and privileges clearly mean one thing to everybody and not ten different things to ten different people? Why not establish a clear distinction between the private sector, which can use an economic factor as a measure of pressure, and the public sector, which can use no such measure. The public sector is sometimes thought to have available to it a bottomless pit, from which both parties to the negotiation can obtain, or give out, unlimited benefits. Surely, there is a good case to be made for having two different governing principles for these two completely different sectors. Why not include the national interest and the interest of innocent third parties as a recognized and valid factor in all such matters.

When we see the present situation in Quebec caused by the common front of public service employees who are openly recommending an illegal disregard of court injunctions applying to those employees, who are flouting and confronting the legal governmental authority, and therefore the citizens themselves—in all probability for political reasons—we realize, surely, that the bounds of responsibility towards the public are being cast aside for the benefit only of a certain group. Why not do something about preventing the dropping of legal charges as part of a settlement, once these charges, which might involve civil or criminal proceedings, have been laid for acts of violence, illegal strikes or lockouts, or fraud and all other such reasons. Surely, permitting such practices ridicules the laws of the country and encourages the continuation and propagation of such illegal acts.

Why not look at the practical, discriminatory situation which allows organized employers to refuse employment to a non-union member but prevents a non-organized employer from requesting non-union employees from Canada Manpower Centres. Is it not time finally to consider making labour organizations legal entities, with full capacity to sue and be sued? Surely, any labour body which is sincere and honest would not object to accepting its full responsibility in our society. Surely, there is no need to excuse these organizations from legal responsibility in order for them to fulfil properly their function in society. Why not review the ridiculous situation caused by illegal strikes, lockouts or slowdowns that now have become normal practice and for which there seems to be no effective remedy? Surely, there is no justification for such practices and our laws and labour boards should not condone, but condemn these actions very severely. All of these, Mr. Speaker, and there are many more, are irritants in the labour-management process. All of these prevent the co-operation and mutual respect between management and labour that is essential for the smooth, effective relations that are necessary for the development of industry and the recognition of human values which all contribute to the prosperity of this country.

I certainly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the measures in this bill have not been introduced simply as a sop to Mr. MacDonald and his Canadian Labour Congress, since I cannot think of any person or organization whose presentations or opinions would be more biased or tainted with the political clap-trap of the NDP which that organization finances, for which they labour and whose political interests they always promote and reflect in any of their representations.

Mr. Peters: And who, very likely, will defeat you.

[Mr. Roy (Timmins).]

Mr. Roy (Timmins): It is really farcical to see this gentleman come and chastise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and discredit the government year after year. He does that for his own NDP, socialist political self-interest. He is trying to score propaganda points for that party, and is always pretending he reflects the views of the labour movement membership of Canada.

Mr. Alexander: Now, the hon. member is getting mean.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I am of the opinion that Mr. MacDonald's views are not synonymous with those of individual, organized members and when he speaks from his political soap box, he does so to the embarrassment and detriment of many of the members for whom he claims responsibility.

Mr. Alexander: Are you going to vote for or against the bill?

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I, personally, Mr. Speaker, have received many representations regarding this bill since its introduction nearly one year ago.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member does not speak for non-union labour.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): A few of the representations were very shortsighted; however, most of them included some very worth-while comments and recommendations. I am convinced that the minister now responsible for this bill has given full consideration to these representations. I have enough confidence in his objectivity to feel that he will give further consideration to all further recommendations. I also know that the minister will not judge suggestions made by their source but, rather, their merit.

• (1620)

Some observations made about governmental affairs are sometimes very surprising, and especially so when one considers the authors of those observations. For instance, when Mr. McLaughlin, as president of a large Canadian chartered bank says his bank will continue to finance American take-overs of Canadian companies because if it does not some other bank will, he demonstrates a restricted concern for Canadian society and enterprise that is close to being unbelievable. Of course, somebody else will finance such take-overs. I doubt very much if Mr. McLaughlin's bank would finance such deals if they were not sound enough to be attractive to someone else. Canadian bankers are well noted for their conservatism in lending, but surely the point is not who would finance such deals but whether that bank should not be using its funds to provide Canadian industry with the money it needs. Surely, a Canadian Chartered bank has a national and social responsibility which Mr. McLaughlin completely ignores here. Surely, industry, commerce and finance are elements of society and their function is to serve that society, not the other way around. The leaders of industry and commerce have a social responsibility which they cannot ignore, and ignoring it begs governments to step in and impose measures that satisfy that responsibility.

The free enterprise system itself will not endure if the private sector refuses its social responsibilty. Every time a government must initiate another program or regulation to serve the needs of our citizens, a further erosion occurs. We regularly hear the opposition parties and uninformed individuals attribute total responsibility for unemployment, the creating of jobs, the expansion of the economy to the government, but in a free enterprise system it is industry and commerce which create jobs, expand production, and find markets. If industry, with the assistance it can reasonably and rightfully expect from government, does not look after the unemployed, the invalids, the needy, then it should not chastise the government for doing so, thereby fulfilling the responsibility that a society has toward its individual members. Governments set out the goals and aspirations that remain targets for the nation, but flowing from those goals there should be a periodic, clear indentification of the areas of responsibility for government, industry, labour or the general public. Once these are established, all sectors should accept their share of the responsibility for the common good.

Indeed, not only should these responsibilities be accepted, but understood and agreed upon. Such understanding and agreement can only come from meaningful consultation and participation by all, as opposed to tokenism. Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, we ask for representations, discussions and participation, but pay little heed to the observations and recommendations received. Full, sincere consideration must be given to the observations and recommendations presented. It is unworthy to ask for recommendations, receive them, then go around chastising the authors of those recommendations for having expressed their point of view, especially if it differs from our own. In this respect, I have confidence the minister will accept valid and beneficial amendments to the bill at the proper time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in my ten years in this House, I doubt whether I have ever heard such an anti-labour, anti-union and anti-worker speech as that just made by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy). Knowing that constituency, knowing how many workers in that area are organized into unions which they have freely and voluntarily chosen and how they will react to the kind of clap-trap which the hon. member for Timmins has just spouted, I can only assume that the hon. member has no intention of running in the next election. I offer my condolences to the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) because with friends like the hon. member for Timmins, he does not need enemies.

I do not suppose there could be a worse time to discuss a bill dealing with labour-management relations than today. Over 200 thousand people are on strike in the province of Quebec. Civic employees in both Toronto and Vancouver are also on strike. I point out to the hon. member for Timmins that in the province of Quebec, the party which I represent, the New Democratic Party, does not have much support. The hon. member cannot blame us for that strike. I also point out to the hon. member that the Canadian Labour Congress and its affiliated unions are not the main organizations leading the strike in the province of Quebec. The majority of the workers on strike in the province of Quebec are affiliated with unions organized by the Federation of National Trade Unions. This labour federation was for many years led by the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand).

The hon. member for Timmins and all other members should be worried about the strikes in the province of Quebec, Vancouver and Toronto. We should all be asking why these strikes are taking place. For almost 100 years labour unions were comprised almost exclusively of blue collar workers, workers in the manufacturing and transportation fields. Of the strikes which took place, 99 per cent were in industry and transportation, the blue collar field. Why do we suddenly have strikes by groups of workers who were not even organized 10 years ago? Until recently these groups refused to admit they belonged to unions, although they sometimes had large organizations which they called associations. We now have strikes of teachers, hospital employees, baseball players and transportation technicians. Why do we have these strikes?

An hon. member from the official opposition spoke earlier today. He compared the difficulties in Canada with the relative peace in terms of labour-management relations in such countries as Japan. For years we have been told that we ought to look at Sweden. Why are there not many strikes in countries like Japan and Sweden? I am sure the Minister of Labour knows for a fact that one of the reasons they do not have strikes is that they have had almost continuously, at least since the end of World War II, virtually full employment. If a company develops a new process, technology or system of operation and a worker or group of workers will be laid-off, the worker knows that the economy of the country is working in such a way that he will get another job. That worker is not likely to be too concerned. He is not likely to go on strike or to demand guarantees that his particular job will be protected, because he knows the economy is working in such a way as to allow him to get a new job if he is laid-off an old one.

The situation in Canada is unfortunately entirely different. For a dozen years or more we have witnessed large-scale unemployment. Under the present government the number of unemployed has doubled in the last four years as compared with the last four years of the Pearson Liberal administration. For almost two years, with the exception of last month, unemployment has been running at the rate of 6 per cent or more on a seasonally-adjusted basis. As hon. members know, NABET members are in dispute with the CBC. Let me make it clear that I am not at the moment saying they are justified in making all the demands they are putting forward. But these workers know there have been major changes in technology, that a great deal of automation has taken place in the field of television, and that a great deal more will take place in the near future. When they see this happening, and realize that hundreds if not thousands of jobs in their industry will disappear, they say: we do not want to bear the entire brunt of this change; we want some protection, certain guarantees. I cannot blame them for doing so, and I do not think the Minister of Labour will blame them either, particularly since the company, in this case the CBC, has virtually refused to discuss the question. In these circumstances, one cannot blame workers for being upset.

Significant changes are taking place in the field of education. I realize that education is not a federal responsibility, but the illustration I propose to use will make it clear why people are concerned about the basic principle in the bill before us. Year after year, for many years, more and more people have been attending schools. As a result, cities and provinces were hiring more and more teachers. Today, for various reasons, the trend is reversed. I am told, for example, that in my own City of Winnipeg there has been a reduction of 2,000 in the student population in the last two years. And this is just a beginning. Teachers will be unemployed. No labour organization I know of has suggested that any person should have the right to keep a job for the rest of his or her life. But people naturally want an assurance, especially if they have worked in an industry or service for a number of years, that they will receive some measure of protection—that the effects of unemployment will be cushioned by early retirements or by keeping people on until sufficient retirements have taken place to ensure that staff reductions are minimized. This is what concerns the workers. This is one of the main causes of the labour unrest we are experiencing now and which we are likely to experience in the future.

The bill we are discussing today looks good. I want to say that the minister made a very sound presentation in introducing it. However, we, together with a great number of ordinary working people, are concerned about the fact that the measure introduced by the minister's predecessor met with such a hostile response from business interests that changes were accepted and embodied in the legislation we have before us. There is a great deal of concern lest these changes may in fact result in weakening the provisions of the legislation, in particular those which have to do with protecting the rights of workers who are adversely affected by technological innovation. Let me put on record just what the minister had to say when he was referring to what had happened since the bill was introduced last year by his predecessor:

> In the intervening eight months my predecessor and I, and senior departmental officials, have received representations from—and consulted with—most groups in the country representing management and labour.

Well, I do not think the minister received many representations of an adverse nature from labour organizations. He certainly received a host of very strong representations from management. I want to tell him that, though we approve the bill as it appears on the face of things, and though we like the speech he made, those of our members who will sit on the committee entrusted with examining the measure clause by clause will tend to take a very careful look at the detailed provisions in order to make sure that the ostensible aim as outlined by the minister will in fact be reflected in the legislation. The minister made some comments which seemed to imply important reservations. He said, and I quote again from his speech:

> The technological change provisions have been clarified and establish clearly that the collective agreement cannot be re-opened where the employer gives notice of the intended technological change before the agreement was entered into, where the agreement establishes procedures by which the effects of the change may be negotiated and settled, or where there are substantive provisions contained in the agreement that the parties specify are intended to assist the employees affected by the change. Under these circumstances the collective agreement cannot be re-opened. The technological change provisions would not apply to existing collective agreements but only to those made after the bill comes into force.

Mr. Speaker, how many tens of thousands of workers may be faced by the consequences of important technological changes introduced by their companies before this bill comes into effect? Experience in negotiations between labour and management, and more particularly in arbitration and in court cases, clearly shows that many judges and many arbitrators still cling to what I consider to be an out-dated belief that what is not written into an agreement is the sole prerogative of management to decide, because of the inherent management rights of employers. The concern I have expressed up to now arises from what I consider to be a glaring gap between what this bill provides—what the minister said it provided for in his introductory remarks—and what a man who cannot be called partisan or political by anyone in this House or elsewhere said when he made what I believe to be the most serious, the most honest and the most far-reaching study of this whole question of technological change. I refer to the report made by Mr. Justice Samuel Freedman in 1964 entitled The Report of an Industrial Inquiry Commission on Canadian National Railway Run-Throughs.

For the benefit of members who were not here at the time or who have forgotten let me briefly recapitulate what happened. The CNR announced unilaterally that, effective as of a certain date, certain runs of their freight trains would be virtually doubled in length. In view of the very adverse effect that this change of policy would have, there was a work stoppage. It was unauthorized. I suppose the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) would say—probably one of the few times he would say something that is correct—that it was an illegal stoppage. But the railway workers knew what they were doing. They knew that probably such as stoppage was a breach of their existing contract and that it was illegal; but so seized were they of the importance of stopping the company from taking such unilateral action that they were prepared to carry through this illegal stoppage.

In order to get the workers back to work and to get the railways running again, the government of the day proposed the setting up of a one man commission, chaired by Mr. Justice Freedman, to look into the whole question and to make recommendations. On the basis of this proposal by the government, the railway workers went back to work. Mr. Justice Freedman held a number of hearings and looked into the whole question of technological change and its effect upon the work force. He studied the subject in great detail and made a report which I think is a landmark in the history of Canadian labour-management relations. I wish that members of the official opposition, when looking at the record of studies that have been made, would look more to Mr. Justice Freedman's report than to the report made by the Wood commission.

I should like to take a few moments to quote from the section of his report entitled "Technological Change: An Economic and Human Problem". I want to put on the record what Mr. Justice Freedman had to say about the crux of the situation as it affects both management and labour, and the proposals he made which I think are imaginative, far seeing and practical. I hope that when the committee meets to discuss the provisions of this bill, the Minister of Labour and his officials will convince my colleagues on the committee that I am wrong and that the bill really will do the things that Mr. Justice Freedman proposed should be done. We are dealing with perhaps the most fundamental issue dividing workers and management today, an issue that will become more important in the years to come as a result of the tremendous pace at which technological changes are taking place.

If I may just put on the record a few paragraphs from the report by Mr. Justice Freedman, page 132 reads, in part:

> Taking a broad, national, long-range view and looking at employment in its totality the economists may be justified in contending that technology does not cause unemployment.

May I digress for a moment to say that this was the argument put forward by one member of the Conservative opposition who spoke earlier this afternoon. It is true that technology and industrialization have meant more production and more work. But this is little comfort for the worker who is displaced, who loses his job because of technological change. It may be that one month, or six months, or even a year or two from the time he is laid off he will have another job, perhaps a better one; but in the interval his situation is pretty grim.

Returning to what Mr. Justice Freedman was saying:

> Within the total picture, however, technology may bring about individual cases of difficulty and hardship, cases which will be multiplied if the general demand for labour is slack.

Mr. Justice Freedman went on to say this:

> But what happens when a technological change releases a factor of production called labour? Clearly it poses problems not so easily written off or disposed of. The old concept of labour as a commodity simply will not suffice; it is at once wrong and dangerous. Hence there is a responsibility upon the entrepreneur who introduces technological change to see that it is not effected at the expense of his working force. That is the human aspect of the technological challenge, and it must not be ignored.

To digress for a moment, that is precisely what labour unions have been saying, no more, no less. I do not know of a single labour organization that has opposed technological change per se. What the labour organizations have said and are saying is that workers affected must not carry the entire brunt or even the major brunt of technological change all by themselves. Then, Mr. Justice Freedman continues:

> There are responsibilities upon labour as well. Perhaps chief among them is not to use its organized strength in blind and wilful resistance to technological advances. Labour must recognize the constructive role of technology in the general welfare and economic strength of the nation. Nor should it insist upon unreasonably high rewards or excessive safeguards as the price of its acceptance of change. Stubborn opposition to measures of progress can only hurt the nation, labour not least of all.

If I may again digress, there is probably not an industry in Canada that has, since the end of World War II, seen such a sharp reduction in the total labour force as the railway industry. Not so many years ago the railway unions were negotiating for something in the neighbourhood of 125,000 workers. Today they probably negotiate on behalf of less than 80,000 workers. In other words, there has been a reduction of more than one-third in the railway labour force at a time when the railways are moving more tons of goods over more miles than ever before. So, no one can say that the railway unions have held out against technological change. What the railway unions are saying is that the ordinary worker must have a modicum of protection.

Then, Mr. Justice Freedman went on to ask whether the CNR had the right to institute the run-throughs which caused the stoppage, and he concluded that they probably did, both on the basis of residual rights and on the basis of the contract as it existed at the time. Then, he went on to say, and I think this is the question at the heart of the legislation we are dealing with today:

> Should it—

That is the CNR.

> —continue to have that right? The question here raised lies at the heart of this Inquiry. The Commission is satisfied that it must be answered only in one way. The institution of run-throughs should be a matter for negotiation. To treat it as an unfettered management prerogative will only promote unrest, undermine morale, and drive the parties farther and farther apart. In that direction lies disorder and danger.

What was Mr. Justice Freedman's recommendation in this respect? It was a very simple one. It was that where there are major changes in the work force or in working conditions brought on as a result of technological changes, the workers and their unions should have the right to bargain collectively on those changes and have the right to strike, if that is necessary. There is no member of this House who would deny the fact that a strike of railway workers, or of postal workers, or of airline employees, causes difficulties and inconvenience for the whole population. But as Mr. Justice Freedman said so well in his report, surely the workers have the right to protect their own interests, to protect their jobs. In many cases, protecting their jobs means protecting their homes and the communities in which they have lived practically all their lives. That is the crucial issue which supposedly is dealt with in this bill. Mr. Justice Freedman's recommendation was crystal clear; that workers should have the right to bargain collectively when their jobs are seriously affected by changes as a result of technological change and automation brought in by management.

I am sure the minister will agree that this proposal of Mr. Justice Freedman, as well as the one made last year by the former minister when introducing this bill, which would have to some extent implemented the proposals of Mr. Justice Freedman, were met with horror by most employers. They looked at this as another infringement of their God-given right to manage their businesses and plants as they always had, making the major decisions themselves. One cannot blame them for this. As long as this country has existed they have had the right to make major changes without interference from workers, without interference or real question by unions and certainly without interference by government. The employers were horrified and they made their objections clear to the government and, I am sure, to every member of parliament. I do not question their right to their point of view. I should have been amazed had they not taken that view. When this right or privilege has been held as long as the employers have held this privilege of managing their enterprises without question, they begin to regard it as a natural right. If it appears that there is to be interference, it is no wonder we hear a tremendous outcry from the business community.

I hope the provisions of the bill as drafted and presented by the minister will not prove to be a capitulation, even in part, to what I consider to be unwarranted fears on the part of the employers of this country. I hope this bill will do those things it seems to do, and which the minister indicated it would do when he introduced it. I hope when the bill is passed, as I am sure it will be, those workers caught in the trap of management changes, unemployment, short-time work and having to move from one city to another, will have the right as federal employees covered by this legislation to bargain collectively with real power with their employers. I do not make this suggestion with any idea of stopping technological change or automation because, as I have indicated before, I do not know of a union which really believes it can stop technological change or, for that matter, one that really wants to do that. I make the suggestion because the workers have a right not to have to carry the whole burden resulting from the changes.

I do not suppose there is a city in Canada which has a higher percentage of railway workers than the city from which I come. There is not a member of parliament from the metropolitan Winnipeg area, whether an NDP, as three of us are, or a Liberal, as three other members are, who has not met people in Winnipeg who are railroad workers who have lived for 10 or 15 years in northern Ontario towns which were virtually wiped out as a result of the introduction of the diesel engine replacing the steam engine. No one questions the fact that the diesel engine is an improvement, is more efficient and economical and that the railways had to bring them forward, but what happened to the thousands of workers in these northern Ontario towns? Not only did they have to move from Kenora, Rainy River, Nakina and a host of other towns to Winnipeg, Thunder Bay or other major centres, as a result of these changes taking place, they lost their equity in their homes and they received virtually no recompense.

That is the kind of thing these people remember. That is the kind of thing the workers know about today and about which they are so concerned and upset. Unless we pass legislation to give them the right to deal fairly with their employers to blunt the brunt of this kind of dislocation, this is the kind of thing which will lead to illegal strikes, about which the public and members of parliament are equally concerned. I hope when this bill gets to the committee, where it will be discussed in detail clause by clause, the minister will make it clear that the doubts and fears I have expressed on the part of workers in Winnipeg and other cities will be allayed. I hope we will then have a bill giving that kind of protection to workers to which they are entitled in the 1970's.

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), I could not help but recall that in the four years I have been in this House this is the first time I have heard an NDP member approve of a piece of our legislation. I will have to reflect on this for a while before I decide whether it is good or bad.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Before rising to speak on this bill, I realized that one theme was predominant in my thoughts on industrial relations. That theme is the evident conflict between organized labour and management. This conflict is evidently accentuated by the common idea that employers and employees are historically situated at opposite ends of the industrial spectrum.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but pursuant to Standing Order 40 it is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)—Health—Mobilization of resources to combat cardiovascular diseases; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Health—Family planning—Possible consultation with provincial officials; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—National Defence—Rent increase for married quarters—Suggested delay until parity with Public Service achieved.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions for production of papers, private bills and public bills.

• (1700)

[English]

It is the understanding of the Chair that the House will proceed to the item Public Bills. Is it agreed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Jerome: It is the understanding that we would proceed to the item in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA BOAT SAFETY ACT

MEASURE TO REDUCE NUMBER OF CASUALTIES FROM RECREATIONAL BOATING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved that Bill C-14, respecting boating safety, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill I have the honour to bring to the attention of the House this evening is a simple one. I believe it is evident there is both a growing need and ample opportunity for action in this regard. As stated in the explanatory notes, the purpose of the bill is to promote recreational boating safety and reduce the growing number of casualties from recreational boating. The essential clauses of the bill, of which there are two, state, first:

> The Minister of Transport shall establish a Boating Safety Advisory Council composed of one officer of the public service of Canada who shall be chairman and four representatives of boating safety organizations to advise him on matters relating to recreational boating safety.

Then, secondly:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations respecting minimum safety construction standards for boats and associated equipment, and licensing and efficiency standards of pleasure boat operators.

There are two things of which hon. members I believe should be aware if they are not at present. First, there is a continued increase in the use of pleasure boats in many areas of Canada. In the province from which I come, British Columbia, there are thousands upon thousands of people who operate boats for pleasure. It is becoming in some respects as hazardous, or perhaps I should say as responsible, an activity to operate a boat on water as it is to drive a car on the highway. The same is true to a lesser or perhaps greater extent in other parts of the country. The four-day week in industry is not some far-out dream for 20 years from now. The increase in leisure time means more people in more boats and unless there is an increase in the organization of safety procedures and legislation there will be more accidents and more deaths. In the United States, there are 45 million people involved in pleasure boating. The Canadian figure runs into the millions. So, there is a growing need for improved boating safety legislation and organization. I hope hon. members can agree with me on that.

The second point with which we should be familiar is that in the Canadian Safety Council Outdoor Recreation Committee there is to some degree already in existence a boating safety advisory council. The present set-up provides that there be a representative of the ministry of transport who is to attend committee meetings of the Canadian Safety Council Outdoor Recreation Committee as an observer. In my view, this was a good step when it was taken some years ago. But times change. Traffic increases and there is need for such an agency as proposed in the bill before us with more power to protect the public. In my opinion, the public must be more intimately concerned with recreational boating safety legislation. For example, I believe we need better results then have been obtained from the resolutions submitted to the Minister of Transport back in 1965 by the then National Safety League of Canada, which is now a division of the Canada Safety Council. A letter from that body states:

> It is to be regretted that to date, that is to last winter, we understand that little or no progress has been made in discussions between federal and provincial authorities.

There is another body concerned with boating safety. It is the Allied Boating Association of Canada made up of boat manufacturers who have a certification program based on safety standards for power boat design and reliability of equipment. This group also has some contact with the government through the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, regarding certification program promotion. I do not say this with any idea of downgrading the Allied Boating Association which I believe to be a worthy body, but in a way this arrangement would be rather like turning our program for auto safety over to the car manufacturing industry, with some contact with the minister in charge of transport, or in the present case, with the minister in charge of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I think, obviously this is not enough today in Canada.

If I may, I should like to quote from an article which appeared in a number of Canadian newspapers last November. It may bring into sharper focus the goal of public safety at which I am driving or sailing. I shall quote from the article which appeared in the Lethbridge Herald. It reads:

> Barry Mather (NDP Surrey-White Rock) says the tipsy sailor, whether he's in a small rowboat on a lake or a large sailboat or motor vessel in coastal waters, is becoming just as much a menace as the drunken driver on the highways.
> It's time to put a stop to this and other abuses of boat safety, says Mr. Mather, who has just introduced his private members bill on boating safety—in Parliament.
> Not only would the bill lead to strong regulations on drunken sailing, but it could also establish legislation compelling people to put their boats through safety checks and to take special operators' tests to ensure that they are skillful enough to be put in control of a boat.
> Mr. Mather suggests it would be very similar to regulations governing motor vehicle operators now.
> The bill calls for Transport Minister Don Jamieson to set up a boating safety advisory council. The council would be made up of one senior civil servant and four representatives of boating safety organizations. They would advise him on what regulations are needed to promote recreational boating safety.
> It would establish legislation governing minimum safety construction standards for boats and associated equipment and licensing and efficiency standards of pleasure boat operators.

The article continues:

> Mr. Mather admits that there will probably be substantial opposition to his proposals. But he points out there was plenty of opposition when driver testing car safety checks and breathalyzer tests were first introduced.

In a letter from Mr. E. G. Shorter, president of the British Columbia Safety Council, the writer wishes the MP every success in this worthwhile endeavour and points out his own concern about boating safety. Again the article reads:

> Says Mr. Shorter: I consider that operating a boat requires many more skills than are needed to operate an automobile on the highway. It seems desirable that all boat operators should be subject to a test and be licenced.

> The council president says he has been interested in boating for many years. However, because of the lack of training and knowledge of navigation of the "multitude of boat operators" he has given up the activity.
> He also says that he considers alcohol just as much a problem in boating as it is in cars on the highways.

That is the end of the quotation from the article in the Lethbridge Herald of November 6, 1971, Mr. Speaker.

I do not expect this bill to pass but, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would strongly urge hon. members to allow it or the subject matter to go to the appropriate committee of the House for further detailed consideration and, no doubt, improvement. I think the committee would be the Transport and Communications Committee.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have no difficulty in complimenting the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) for proposing a bill of this type. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his remarks relating to it, and to the recreational boating industry. I suppose that the private ownership of all sizes of boats, from the dinghy to the large yacht, has become more popular than any other type of recreation, including sky-diving and some of the later developments.

All across the country, the lakes are filled with boats. Manufacturers have done a great deal of research to develop new types of boats, and the engine and outboard motor manufacturers have designed reliable engines and outboard motors. Some people like to take their boats on a trailer to the lake or river of their choice, while others who own larger boats like to leave them in one place and perhaps live on them. Boating is a big recreational industry in Canada and the United States, as well as many other parts of the world.

I certainly agree that we may not have given sufficient attention to the safety measures relating to the handling of boats, but this does not mean that we have been completely negligent. Ships are probably one of the oldest types of transportation and come in all types and sizes, such as light boats, long boats and canoes, all designed for certain specific purposes. There are many navigational systems. There is the buoy system on the open sea, where one keeps the red buoy to starboard when going toward the sea and the black one to port when coming from the sea. There are various warning devices such as the bell buoys used to direct boats. These all form part of the safety system. In later years came the channel system devised by marine operators and organizations, such as the yacht clubs, who are continually endeavouring to work out safety methods. This type of thing is going on in relation to other types of recreational activity but unquestionably boating is one of the largest recreational activities in the country today, so we should be considering some type of legislation with more teeth than any we have at present.

The Canada Shipping Act is concerned with pollution. Usually we think of pollution of the seas in connection with large freighters but a tremendous amount emanates from small boats. I refer to the spillage of gas, pumping out the bilges and normal domestic waste. These problems are coming to the attention of the authorities and a great deal of interest is being generated by the many organizations involved. There are safety regulations respecting small vessels and these are doing a reasonable job, but one facet we may have neglected is the education of boaters. Anyone can operate a boat under 65 feet in length, but over that length a master's papers are required. Anyone can apply for a licence for a smaller boat and is immediately a boater. Up to now, the people involved with sail boats have been much more cautious than those who operate with the advantage of an engine.

Another point which should be given more consideration is the relationship between the size of the boat and the power of the engine. It seems that once a young fellow gets the thrill of speeding through the water he wants to increase the power, to go faster and get even more thrills. We know what has happened with snowmobiles and the danger from powering a vehicle beyond the ability of the individual to handle it properly. This is a point that should be considered. What I am trying to say is that while this bill is a small start, it does not go nearly far enough in providing the essential safety measures.

The establishment of a safety advisory council, comprised of one official of the Public Service of Canada, shall be chairman, and four public representatives, so far as I am concerned is a satisfactory suggestion. However, I would point out that we have many similar types of organizations in various parts of the country. I just wonder if we have reached the stage where there are four or five people, presumably in Ottawa, who could formulate recommendations to the Governor in Council with respect to boating safety, covering all parts of the country. I suggest that we might appraise the whole safety problem relating to small boats through the use of a task force, that could recommend one piece of legislation, one statute, that would provide the necessary protection for both boat owners and the public.

We must consider the problems associated with search and rescue. We have a continually deplorable situation on the west coast with small boats venturing forth on to seas that are too heavy for them. This has led to many accidents. This has nothing to do with the safety of the boats themselves or their licensing. It may not even relate to the ability of their operators. But it is a fact that when gale warnings have been hoisted, boat operators just do not pay attention to them. Only a week ago we had a very sad accident off Vancouver Island. We should consider providing a penalty for people who venture forth on to high seas after gale warnings have been hoisted.

We must also consider smaller lakes in inland areas where water skiing takes place. Here, there is a danger to swimmers. Municipalities are searching for methods to restrict the possibility of negligence on the part of those people who engage in this sort of recreation. In light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, we certainly need the type of legislation suggested in Bill C-14, but I have difficulty in giving this bill my full support on the basis that it would be sufficient to do the job.

We must realize that various regions of the country will require different types of laws and regulations. To the average person this may seem rather ridiculous, but if one talks to yachting enthusiasts one finds that those who engage in the recreation in Ontario are unable to talk the same language in respect to boat handling as is spoken by those who sail in salt water areas. We must also consider the law of the sea. We should not pass legislation covering small boats that could conflict with the law of the sea.

Another factor that must be considered is the horsepower of the engine used in relation to the type of boat. I find it difficult to believe that this bill would be adequate to cover all these matters. I am concerned that we would be establishing another type of bureaucracy without giving sufficient attention to the whole problem that exists right across the country.

The ministry of transport already has relationships with certain water safety and boating organizations. I know that submissions are being prepared by various yacht clubs. From speaking to these people, I know that they want a minimum of government interference. The Allied Boating Association of Canada, as mentioned by the previous speaker, is an organization of boat builders. Already the ministry assists in the annual testing of new models of pleasure craft, and is also assisting in the formulation of construction standards. These tests form the basis of the calculations from which the recommended maximum load and the horsepower of the engine for each model are obtained.

The Canadian Power Squadrons is an association of yacht clubs which gives correspondence courses and lectures on boat handling, navigation and safety. The ministry vets new and amended examination papers for accuracy. This is an important area where we could certainly lend some assistance. We should help the yachting associations in various areas to run schools where people who own boats could go for some education.

Of course, the Canada Safety Council receives a grant to sponsor boating safety week. This is a very worth-while cause but I do not think the program is sufficient. What the council does cannot be compared with what could be done if a reasonable grant were given to the various yachting associations across the country. Also, Mr. Speaker, there is the Canadian government specifications board, a government body which develops standards with the help of expert committees. One such committee in which DOT is the moving spirit is the life-jacket committee upon which many boating organizations are represented. The Canadian Red Cross, as we all know, has for many years—and I am sure it will continue this work—attempted to teach in every way possible—not only boating safety—but safety in water.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, first may I take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) for again bringing this matter before the House. I say "again" because this type of project was my first project in the House back in 1954 or 1955. I have had the pleasure of bringing it forward on a number of occasions since that time. I am very pleased that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock is pursuing this matter further, because conditions have changed greatly in the coastal waters, Great Lakes and other waters of Canada since I first raised the question.

I think it is necessary to make many more improvements in the regulations. I find it difficult to understand why the previous speaker objects to sending this bill to committee for study, because the very points he raised and the questions he asked could well be investigated and dealt with in committee.

Over the years there have been a number of improvements to the regulations. One always likes to think that one's own efforts are responsible, although I do not flatter myself in that regard. However, after the matter was first raised back in the early 1950s the minister of transport in the St. Laurent government, Mr. Marler, made a number of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. A booklet was produced at that time, a copy of which I have, entitled "Safety Afloat". It set out a great many safety regulations and other matters and greatly increased safety on the navigable waters of Canada.

After Mr. Marler the minister of transport was the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). He made more changes in the law and brought in improved safety measures, navigational measures, and so on. Since the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings ceased to be minister of transport I do not think many changes have been made in this area, although from time to time amendments have been made to the regulations under the Canada Shipping Act. For example, it is now required that life preservers be supplied and worn in boats and certain firefighting equipment is now essential. Those two instances are an example of some of the improvements in safety regulations applying to small boats.

There is one matter I have been curious about. When the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings was minister he arranged for two ships to be constructed for operation on the Great Lakes. They were to be equipped with helicopters and were to be used for search and rescue purposes. I do not know what has happened to those boats since then. One of them may still be in operation on Lake Huron. Perhaps someone on the government side could provide us with information in this regard.

I have already said that despite the many improvements in safety regulations for small boats since 1955 conditions have changed greatly. There has been an enormous increase in the number of small boats not only in our coastal waters but on the Great Lakes. It is with the Great Lakes and connecting waters that I have been concerned in my observations and speeches in this regard over a number of years. It must be self-evident, Mr. Speaker, that in the Great Lakes area, particularly of Ontario and Quebec, and the adjacent waters you will find the largest percentage of the population of Canada. I am speaking not only of the Great Lakes and adjoining waters but of waters in Ontario such as the Muskoka lakes, the Lake Saint Louis area near Montreal and many similar waters. On these there are a great many small boats of all sizes and shapes and all sorts of power.

The summer months are almost here and we will not have the safety regulations and the search and rescue operations that are very necessary. There will be delays in this area. Although I have not had time to check, it seems to me that either in the previous Criminal Code amendments or in those now proposed there is a provision that the careless driving of a speed boat constitutes an offence. For that I commend the government. It is not often I commend the government, but in this case I do. I also commend the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock for bringing forward for discussion a subject that is very important.

There are other steps that I think might be taken in this area and I will offer a few suggestions for further, immediate improvement to the Canada Shipping Act. I do so now because I am sure that if this bill is sent to committee for study, by the time the study is finished another summer will have gone and more lives will have been needlessly lost. I think that regulations should be added to the Canada Shipping Act to make sure that life saving equipment such as life-preservers and firefighting devices are carried on boats. I think, in particular, that life saving devices should be compulsory in boats even as small as rowing boats, canoes and the like.

Certainly there is constitutional authority for this to be done under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. As I recall it, in a discussion two or three years ago a navigable water was described as any body of water, however small, that would float a canoe. That is one improvement that could certainly be made. Another is that operators of power boats of ten horsepower and up should be obliged to undergo an examination and qualify for a licence. There should also be age restrictions regarding the operation of power boats. I also think that on larger bodies of water, which could easily be defined under the regulations to include waters such as the Great Lakes and other inland waters such as the Muskoka lakes, boats of any size should be required to carry flares and other warning devices.

There is another matter, in conclusion, that I think might be helpful. It may be a little too late to do it this year, but better late than never. I am referring to search and rescue operations. I have already said that on the Great Lakes and other inland waters of Canada, not to mention our coastal waters, there are a great many power boats of all shapes and sizes during the summer months which extend from about May, in Ontario and Quebec, until October or even November when the duck shooting season is on. The number of small boats in the area of the Great Lakes is enormous. There are hundreds of thousands of them, and often when an accident takes place it is difficult to inform the organization concerned. In these cases time is of the essence and some way must be found to get word to the proper rescue organization.

At present, Mr. Speaker, we know that the Canadian Air Force provides assistance in search and rescue. In Ontario and in Quebec the provincial police help. As well, various boat clubs, power squadrons and the like perform these operations. If an accident takes place in some of the larger areas, somebody phones the police and there is a certain amount of co-ordination in rescue activities. In any resort areas of Ontario and Quebec, as well as in many other areas, there is no great problem in this regard because you can usually call someone. However, if something happens in one of the smaller places no one seems to know who should be contacted.

In other words, what is wanted is a co-ordinating authority with whom one can get in touch immediately and who can act perhaps in concert with a search and rescue operation whether of the air force, the provincial police, a power squadron—the power squadrons have their names listed—or other appropriate agency. It seems to me that it would be very useful if the government were to employ university students to do this work. Goodness knows, there have been enough complaints in the country about lack of employment for university students. This would be a seasonal job and a two or three-week course would be adequate.

A large number of university students could be provided with a useful occupation. In addition to acting as co-ordinators they could supply information to agents who perform search and rescue work. They could provide meteorological information and put out storm warnings. In very congested areas near large cities they could be supplied with duty boats to constantly patrol beaches in areas near Toronto, Hamilton, parts of Lake Erie and parts of the St. Lawrence River in the Montreal area. Student operators or co-ordinators might be given certain powers with which to prevent small boats going out in very stormy weather or when a storm is impending. They could also be given the power to regulate speeders. They could impose fines on speeders and other motor boat smart alecks who endanger swimmers, children and others.

These are some of the things students could be doing. They would be healthfully and usefully employed, instead of working on projects such as those under the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Incentives Program, sometimes known as LIP, which are given large sums of money to carry out some rather questionable projects. This type of project would be a very useful method of providing summer employment for a large number of students and could save many lives.

I hope these suggestions will be looked into by the appropriate agencies of the government and that the bill will be sent to committee where these points can be reiterated and commented upon by myself and other supporters of the legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to the remarks the hon. members for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) have just made in reply to the proposal of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather).

Mr. Speaker, the sponsor of the bill before the House has suggested that we should be able to set up a Boating Safety Advisory Council. This council would be composed of one officer of the public service who would be chairman, and four representatives of boating safety organizations who would advise him on matters relating to recreational boating safety.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley East mentioned the fact that the Canada Shipping Act already contains provisions that should dispel the fears expressed by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

In fact, clause 7 of the Canada Shipping Act essentially imposes the obligation of registering any boat or yachtes of 10 HP or more; this means that, generally, all those boats are registered.

Once those pleasure boats are registered, their owners are given the guide on boating security that is published and liberally distributed to the interested parties by the federal Department of Transport and in which indications and general rules are given on navigation wherever those small boats may navigate.

In addition, with regard to small boats, their builders will inevitably do what is necessary to ensure their safety if they want to keep a market for their production.

The previous speaker, the hon. member for Oxford, has given us, in my opinion, a true picture of the problems which we have to face when he mentioned that people may, under our navigation legislation, have their boats registered without having an adequate knowledge of the general navigation regulations.

The problem about clause 3, as suggested by the hon. member, is as follows: permits should obviously be issued. I understand my colleague suggesting that permits be required to operate those boats, but then the efficiency of a federal jurisdiction would be questioned with respect to all the pleasure boats which do not operate in Canadian navigable waters, that is which operate only up and down rivers and lakes which in effect come under provincial jurisdiction.

Basically, this proposal reflects the explicit concern caused by the ever increasing risks involved, more specifically in Canadian navigable waters, particularly in areas where pilotage is mandatory.

I know that in my own region, on the St. Lawrence river in the province of Quebec there is a proliferation of pleasure boats being operated and it sometimes really seems that some operators have acquired no prior notions as to security in the operating of these vessels.

This could be achieved within the framework of a well-timed campaign, fully supported by the Department of Transport, arranging for more courses or lessons being offered in navigation in the country's navigable waters and more specifically stressing consequences related to the operation of a pleasure boat, load distribution, reaction on the water, weather forecasts, in short, many elementary details of which not only the owners of pleasure craft, but the population as a whole should be aware. Actually, it often happens, in areas where yachting is practiced, that the operator does not always have the foresight or the time to explain to those on board such vessels—perhaps for the first time—the elementary standards or general rules of navigation.

I believe that such generalized publicity and the teaching in schools of elementary notions can really allay whatever concern the hon. member may now feel as to the risks involved in navigation.

Careful study of the safety guide to boating published by the federal Department of Transport would of course impart all the really necessary data to ensure boating safety.

• (1750)

Of course, I do not really think that at the research level in this field the establishment of an advisory committee could permit a wider distribution of information at present, or prevent pleasure craft accidents, because these are generally caused by negligence or lack of knowledge.

I think that these accidents may quite easily be prevented given a wider distribution of information concerning general standards, the operation of a pleasure boat, and navigation in general.

Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that we should dwelve too long on pleasure crafts with adequate equipment. Today, high-powered yachts operate on major waterways and on the Great Lakes. Their equipment is just about as up-to-date as that of ships providing transoceanic transportation or cruising on all the major waterways of the world.

But I am thinking of the small pleasure crafts that we see almost everywhere, which are readily available, and often enough belong to people who know little about navigation. In my view, those are the boats which may create real problems for navigation, especially when cruising in navigable waters.

There again, I do not see how the federal government could extend its jurisdiction to boating in navigable waters. On the other hand, if the owner operates in navigable waters, the Canada Shipping Act compels him to register and, at the same time, if his boat is registered, the owner has access to all essential information relating to boating in order to prevent any accident liable to endanger the lives of the owner or the passengers.

But one of the essential points to which the attention of the House was particulary drawn is the problem of pollution caused by recreational boating. When one considers, for instance, that in the St. Lawrence, the volume of maritime freight is ever increasing, there is every reason to worry about the movements of some pleasure boats that keep too close to ocean liners or ships coming from the Great Lakes.

There is need for closer supervision in this connection, I think, because even small recreational boats can cause serious maritime disasters.

On this point, Mr. Speaker, I think there should be more patrolling in order to deal with those who disobey the elementary rules of navigation.

But I do not believe yet that the proposal made by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock concerning the establishment of an advisory council could make the existing statutes more efficient. As a matter of fact, when we read the legislation on Canadian navigation, particularly as regards small boats, we find almost everything there. However, it is enough to ensure that the legislation is well enforced and to see that those who break the law lose their boating licence or are subjected to a fine.

Far from me, Mr. Speaker, the idea of wanting to minimize the importance of the problem raised by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, because I agree with him that there are increasingly more people who are cruising in our waters for pleasure. Obviously, we should put more emphasis on publicity and information directed to the young people. As a matter of fact, the provincial education departments have done a lot of good work in this area. We should seriously consider giving young people boating courses similar to the present car driving courses. By simply providing basic information, we would effectively tackle the causes of accidents.

In concluding my remarks, I would say, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley East has pointed out, that there is already a considerable number of associations and yacht clubs. The Allied Boating Association of Canada, the Canadian Power Squadrons and the Boating Safety Council of Canada co-operate to insure better knowledge of navigational hazards.

I acknowledge that the idea behind the hon member's bill is sensible and might attract public attention to the matter of greater safety. Indeed, the questions that are raised would be more appropriately served at the provincial level, particularly in the field of education, and in view of the circumstances, this bill should not be passed since its provisions seem to indicate a lack of effectiveness.

A similar bill has already been tabled in this House. I think the hon. member has again taken advantage of private members' hour to raise a question which should attract the general interest of the public and its attention regarding the serious consequences of the growing popularity of boating. In view of the circumstances and considering all these facts, this bill should be referred to the Standing committee on Transport and Communications.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Honey): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the Chair until 8 o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD, INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSIONS AND CONCILIATION BOARDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Gaétan J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, before private members' hour I had risen to speak on Bill C-183 and I was saying that I realized one theme predominated my thoughts on industrial relations. That theme is the evident conflict between organized labour and management. This conflict is evidently accentuated by the common idea that employers and employees are historically situated at the opposite ends of the spectrum of interests. This diametric opposition could have no other result than an upsurge in the wave of labour unrest and strikes which we witnessed in the mid-sixties and are witnessing now.

[Mr. Laflamme.]

As a representative of an industrial area which prides itself on its strong labour tradition, I hasten to endorse the spirit and content of Bill C-183. In parenthesis may I say that the miners of the Sudbury nickel basin were undoubtedly the first to organize in labour unions. Many of my constituents remember the first years of the labour movement's activities. The two major unions involved in the nickel industry, United Steelworkers of America and the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, represent over 22,000 working men. I would venture to say that some 80 per cent of our work force is represented at the bargaining table by trade unions.

The basin's entire population is conscious of labour-management relations. All are affected by labour disputes, strikes, walkouts or lockouts. It is on that basis that any legislation which improves labour-management relations benefits the nickel basin residents in every walk of life. Both labour and management will profit by these amendments.

Although the labour code as such has not been revised since 1948, the Canadian population and labourers were well protected. It is in the light of our twentieth century economic structure and growth that amendments such as those proposed by this government have become essential. Bill C-253, which was introduced in the Commons last June, 1971, incorporated a substantial number of amendments intended to update the existing legislation. As a result of a great number of representations from both labour unions and management, the present bill contains further revisions which are much more acceptable to both management and labour.

For the record, I would like to go over some of the major modifications introduced in that bill. They involve clarification and recasting of certain sections dealing with technological change, withdrawal of the section that would have restricted an employee's right to picket, and amendment to the section dealing with an employee's voluntary revocable check-off. Also, major amendments were made to the sections dealing with technological change, making it more acceptable and workable to both parties. I must say that this section interests me the most and is of very great interest also to the mining people and railroaders of my area whose lives are being more and more affected as a result of automation and technological change.

Also for the record, I would like to remind everyone that in reference to the section on technological change this bill includes provisions which require an employer to whom the technological change provisions apply to give the bargaining agents concerned 90 days notice of such change where the change affects a significant number of employees. In defined circumstances an agent would be empowered, during the term of an agreement, to negotiate provisions designed to assist employees in adjusting to the effects of technological change, with the ultimate right to strike in the event an agreement could not be reached.

In order to exercise this power the union would have to obtain from the board leave to serve notice to bargain. The board would be authorized to grant such leave only if it were satisfied that the change in question was likely to have substantial and adverse effects on the conditions or security of employment of a significant number of employees.

It is unfortunate, indeed, that Bill C-183 is limited to Crown corporations or employees of the federal government. It is evident that this government is again giving proof of its foresight. If such legislation were in existence at the provincial level, the hardworking miners of the International Nickel Company and Falconbridge Nickel Mines would receive fair warning that technological changes in the mining industry would demand massive layoffs. As a result of the layoff that recently took place in Sudbury, young men and older people, some with young families, now find themselves in the ranks of the unemployed. Without warning they have been forced to seek work in other fields. Many of these workers had left other provinces to become good citizens of our area.

Mining operations are becoming more and more automated and we can expect that a greater number of employees will be either demoted, displaced or laid off in the very near future. I certainly hope that the provincial governments, under whose jurisdiction mining companies fall, will follow suit and introduce legislation very soon. Negotiations for a new contract are presently under way in Sudbury. I hope that the company will adopt similar provisions to those we find in Bill C-183 concerning technological change, even though the present provincial legislation does not require them to do so. This would certainly reduce the great anxiety which now exists among the workers and would help create a better climate of confidence by ensuring economic security in our area.

While I am on the subject of negotiations taking place in Sudbury at the moment, may I be permitted to mention that I fully endorse the request by the union, in particular, that employees be permitted to go on pension after 30 years' service. I feel that an employee in the mining industry, which is so detrimental to the health of its workers, should have the option to retire at least after 30 years' or perhaps after 25 years' service. Such an employee who has worked hard all his life could enjoy a little leisure time while his health still allowed him to do so. He could also find some type of light duty work which would allow him to live a more decent life. This would also leave more room for our younger generation which is now seeking employment. Therefore, I am very much behind an early retirement for the workers of the mines and would strongly urge the company to accept such a request.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Serré: I see I have the approval of my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). These new amendments to the labour code affect directly the employees of Canadian National Railways in my area. As a result of automation, most of the population of Nakina in northern Ontario who were employed directly or indirectly by the CNR were forced to vacate an area in which they had been lifelong residents. This unfortunate situation which took place at Nakina a few years ago played a major role in bringing about revisions to the labour code in respect of technological change. Just last year many office employees who had settled in Capreol were forced to move to Toronto as a result of centralization or automation. This decision was taken unilaterally by CNR management without prior consultation with the employees involved or prior notice to the community. This legislation will prevent such displacement without first conducting proper negotiations and will have the effect of bringing about a more satisfactory solution for all parties concerned.

I feel that this new labour code is long overdue and eagerly awaited by the workers of this country. The provisions dealing with technological change introduced by an employer during the life of a collective agreement is most innovative and important. When the former minister of labour was replaced by the present minister it was immediately speculated that the switch meant the government had given in to big business and manufacturers pressure to kill the controversial clause. Employers hoped that is what had happened and employees feared that it had happened. I am pleased to see that our new and able Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) has kept that clause in the bill, but with a limited right to strike, making it more workable and acceptable to management and labour. At the same time, the right of management to increase efficiency through technological change will be protected by the new code just as much as job security and the continuation of pay cheques for workers affected by such change.

This is sound legislation and it is becoming better understood by chambers of commerce across the country as well as management and unions. I support it because I feel it will give more security to the workers and more stability to the economic and social life of the community, especially communities such as Sudbury in which the workers depend on one major industry for their living.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the age of technology is disquieting for many workers. This bill will give more protection and ease labour-management relations.

That is the reason why I highly commend the Minister of Labour for having so brilliantly introduced this new Labour Code.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-183 I find it very difficult to be as enthusiastic as the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Serré). However, to be fair, I think the bill does represent some improvement over its predecessor. I only wish the new minister had moved a bit further to correct some of the errors and weaknesses which remain untouched. However, in general the bill does represent a constructive improvement. I should say that in addition to its omissions, it is weak and does not really do anything in so far as giving us hope that the incidence of strikes and lockouts will be decreased and their effects on the public diminished.

I think another area of weakness is that the bill does not take advantage of many of the reforms suggested in the Woods report of 1968. The greatest weakness of the bill lies in the fact that only about 530,000 workers in Canada will be affected by it; that is to say, it is limited to industries which fall under federal jurisdiction. When one considers that we are dealing with only 530,000 out of 2.1 million people who belong to labour unions, it is evident that we are actually missing out on the 4.5 million workers who do not belong to labour unions. I think this is a very important point.

Certainly, in regard to the danger inherent in strikes which we face at the present time, the bill does nothing to affect the collective bargaining of federal public servants such as air controllers or the CBC NABET members who are covered by the Public Service Staff Relations Act. So I am concerned about this, because really we are not dealing with a bill that is as comprehensive as it is said to be. I think it is intolerable that in Canada we still suffer many strikes and a tremendous loss of man-days year by year. It is interesting to note that in 1970, the last year for which complete statistics are available, we had 542 strikes with a loss of more than 6,539,560 man-workdays. While this represented a slight decrease from the previous year, the fact remains that the strike situation and loss of man-workdays has been increasing at a very rapid rate.

In 1950 there were 160 strikes and lockouts with a loss of 1,387,500 man-workdays. In 1960 there were 274 strikes or lockouts with a loss of considerably less work days, 738,-700. In 1970 there was the tremendous loss to the economy of 6,539,560 man-workdays. I do not think the economy can stand to lose the tremendous amount of dollars and value that this represents. There ought to be a better way to settle contracts between labour and management. I think the machinery or methods represented in these statistics belong to an age which should have passed a long time ago.

I only wish this bill would go much further to settle some of these problems. I wish it would bring in something new that would really give some hope to both management and labour, not to mention the third party, the public, who suffers and has to pay most of the bills. Surely there ought to be a better way. While tonight it is not my purpose to enlarge on this aspect of the bill, herein I believe is the major weakness in our whole labour structure so far as collective bargaining is concerned. When labour leaders such as George Meany talk out on this very thing perhaps it is an indication that organized labour itself is beginning to understand that the present approach is not the answer. So far as I can see, this is not the situation in Canada, whether on the labour-union side or on the government side.

I think there are a few basic points we should remind ourselves of in dealing with a bill such as this. We must remember we live in a pluralistic society which allows for the expression of more than one ultimate life principle. In our country we are raised from birth in the tradition that it is right and proper for people to march to the sound of different drums, compelled by their respective convictions honestly arrived at. Indeed, the notion that harmony need not be imperilled by diversity is one of the objectives of the Canadian experience. This very principle ought to be more evident in the organized labour situation as we see it today. The tradition is accepted in the areas of politics, education, church affiliation and virtually all other areas of activity, and I can see no reason why the objectives should be different when men and women go to work.

The freedom to work, the freedom of association and the freedom to support the political party of one's choice are of more enduring importance to Canada than a particular set of labour relations statutes or a code of labour relations such as we have in this bill. All freedoms must be viewed in the context of the civil right to freedom of worship which embraces both the right to hold religious convictions and the right to translate those convictions into the fabric of everyday life in the factory or wherever the place of work might be.

In a free society men should not be forced to accept uniform patterns of life and organization. There ought to be a real opportunity provided so that men can freely form those organizations and institutions which give expression to their legitimate aspirations. This does not mean that our society should be divided into unrelated fragments. In diversity, a generous amount of co-operation is possible provided an attitude of true respect and good will is present. If this is true in the very basis of the political structure of the country, why does it not apply also in the area of work?

It seems to me that the Bill of Rights of Canada and the Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations define very clearly that the right to work is one of the basic freedoms of people. The right of association and freedom of association is equally one of the basic freedoms fundamental to our way of life. If freedom of association is a fundamental part of our way of life, then surely freedom to disassociate should also be part of our way of life. It seems to me this bill does nothing to even begin to approach the problem of which I am speaking. I regret that we have not gone further in this regard.

Actually, what is happening today is that we are pitting labour and management against each other. It is the adversary system that is wrong in trying to meet the problem of labour relations. There ought to be a genuinely co-operative area in which the evil spirit of economic conflict will not be the basic reality which exists, as it does today. If we go along in the system and attitude expressed in this bill, management and unions will continue to be deadlocked in bitter disputes which are but the logical result of the tense, warlike atmosphere in which many contract talks are conducted. No one wants to give. Everybody wants to take. It is like a tug-of-war where the strongest wins and the winner takes all.

I say that this bill could meet the problem more realistically than it does. For a variety of reasons, I think in this debate we should be considering whether the present collective bargaining system based on the individualistic employer by employer, trade by trade majority rule concept, including the right to strike and lockout, can cope with the new problems thrust upon the work force, and whether the capitalist-oriented employers organizations and politically-oriented trade unions even try to rise to the challenge of finding a substitute for what the royal commission headed by Ivan C. Rand rightly branded "the crudely developed bargaining, conciliation and strike ritual."

I think the House and the committee which will study this bill would be well advised to look at the collective bargaining system in depth, especially in relation to the alienating effects of today's work situation, and to recommend that the government and all who are responsible for the just development of societal life tackle this mammoth task before we are faced with either a workers' revolt that will make a shambles of our present, wholly inadequate collective bargaining schemes, or the public is forced to take action against this situation in a way that none of us want. I sense that public opinion will not stand for what is going on or for the palliative type of methods that we are trying to express in this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: I do not think that a man's daily work should be considered a mere economic necessity or a commodity like wheat or steel, to be sold to the highest bidder in the marketplace. I believe that work is an integral part of a man's lifelong mission to develop and create. Both organized labour and the efficiency experts should stop repudiating these basic principles which belong as a right to every individual, and they include his right to choose his work. I think it should be recognized that the workers ought to be consulted and should have qualified representation which will have a real, co-deciding voice in regard to the system of work.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that there are certain basic rights which belong to the union worker but which he is not being given today. I think the worker should insist that the machine be tailored to meet the needs of man, instead of our system trying to fit the man to meet the needs of the machine. That is what is happening today. We in this House should demand that something fundamental be done as far as correcting the situation in the whole collective bargaining system. I think it is wrong that labour should be forcing the workingman to be cut to fit the bed instead of the bed being designed to fit the man. They should not just benefit the few but should be universal in application, because when they are not they are repressive and cease to be just. It seems to me that the government has a long road to travel before it can say that Canada is truly a place in which to stand, to choose and to work in freedom.

I think this principle is vital as far as bargaining rights are concerned. Let us go back briefly to the Woods task force report which says at pages 138 to 140 that the bill extends collective bargaining rights to professional employees who do not perform management functions or are employed in a confidential capacity in matters relating to industrial relations. Section 125(4) states that the Canada Labour Relations Board may decide to include in a bargaining unit employees "whose duties include the supervision of other employees." While the extension of bargaining rights to groups previously exempted as supervisory and junior managerial employees has been generally well received, and while there will be wide discretion on the part of the Canada Labour Relations Board, this bill does not improve the definitions that were criticized in its predecessor, Bill C-253.

The government should attempt to sharpen such potentially ambiguous and contradictory definitions such as those contained in section 125(4) which allow collective bargaining for "employees whose duties include the supervision of other employees" and section 107(1)(b) which excludes a person "who performs management functions or is employed in a confidential capacity in matters relating to industrial relations".

One suggestion of the Ontario Relations Institute regarding professional employees has been included in this bill. It allows the CLRB to establish separate collective bargaining units for professional employees. I suppose there has been improvement on some of these points, but we are still just scraping the surface and not getting down to the problem with which we pretend to deal.

Now we come to the closed shop question. The Woods report, at page 149, urges that in a unit for which a union is the bargaining agent a member must pay the regular and reasonable dues of the union, whether he takes out membership or not, as an "agency fee". This is widely known as an agency shop and is recognized in the bill. What I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is a person who does not meet the requirement to belong to a labour union. To say that a person does not have the right to work because he does not carry a certain membership card is to deny that person a right that belongs to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: I am thinking particularly of a nurse who for personal reasons refused to become a member of a union. She was employed in a hospital in St. Catharines and was forced to give up her job because she did not carry a union card. Where is the right or freedom to work for this young woman that is so carefully outlined in both the Bill of Rights and the Declaration of Human Rights? This troubles me.

This bill goes beyond what was recommended in the Woods report and provides for legal acceptance of the closed shop principle which is regarded as increasingly indefensible in the Woods report and has been actively criticized by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Section 161 expressly states that collective agreements may contain an agreement requiring, as a condition of employment, membership in a specified trade union or preference of employment to members of a specified trade union. This section, along with section 125(3), creates the possibility of the very kind of closed shop which the Prime Minister has been urging the provinces to move against. Therefore, it is inconsistent with that which the Prime Minister has been advocating in his speeches.

This bill will allow professional employees—doctors, lawyers, engineers, scientists, accountants, etc.—to establish separate bargaining units and to exclude from employment other professionals who are not members of their union. The government is therefore inviting the kind of uneconomic and unjust employment restriction that is far too prevalent at the provincial level. Taxpayers and university graduates need fewer, not more, impediments to employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: While no action has been taken by the federal government or provincial governments to roll back the present legal support for closed shops or to act on the recommendations of the Woods report—I refer to page 150—that where hiring halls operate in industries as the effective means to employment in those industries they should be operated by the Canada Manpower service with the assistance of employers and unions through a joint labour-management committee, at least section 161 of this bill should be removed.

Mr. Speaker, unless we face up to some of these problems I am afraid that organized labour, management and government that condones this kind of practice will find themselves in a situation which may bring about a change which they will not be happy to accept as an alternative.

In the United States a poll was taken recently and the result was announced on Labour Day, 1971. It was conducted by the Opinion Research Corporation of Princeton, New Jersey, and it clearly showed that a right to work law is favoured by the American public by a two-to-one margin, including a majority of union members' families. The situation is not really different here in Canada.

What is happening as a result of this situation? The country is being put into an economic straitjacket. It could be that the fault lies not with the labour union leaders but with the imbalance of the law that makes the abuse of union power inevitable and the suppression of that abuse by government also inevitable. This is what I am concerned about. Where are we going? The answer is pretty plain. Unions have priced more and more Canadian goods out of international trade, and having made foreign imports economically acceptable are beginning to argue for the necessity of higher protective tariffs and quotas in order to give the uneconomic the necessary assistance. The consumer will not accept this situation indefinitely.

This is what is happening throughout the country today. Wage and price controls are being demanded all across the country, to the extent that I believe if a poll were taken today the majority of the people would express a view in favour of such controls. If this comes to pass it is the end of the free market and of free wage negotiations, the very things we want to preserve but which we do not really have today.

What is the cure? I do not think any organization, union or otherwise, has the right to believe it has the power to compel a worker to join a union he may not want to join in order to hold down a job. This is one of the weaknesses of this bill: it does not deal with that matter.

A short time ago I was surprised to read a report from David Archer, president of the Ontario Federation of Labour, who agrees with this contention of mine but who laments the fact that the government of Ontario does not permit agricultural and other workers to bargain collectively. He thinks it is nonsense to deny that right to any worker and contends, I think rightly so, that the proposed changes in the labour code should guarantee the right of all workers to organize in unions of their choice. I might add that these views of his were reported in "Voice of the People" of July 2 as follows:

> However, until we replace the adversary system by a radically different, genuinely co-operative arrangement, the evil notion of class hatred and conflict will continue to be a reality. Management and union will continue to be deadlocked in bitter disputes that are but the logical result of the tense, warlike atmosphere in which many contract talks are conducted. No one wants to give; everyone wants to take.

There is one exception that I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members. I think it is worth noting. It relates to the recent agreement between the International Longshoremen's Association and the Maritime Employers Association, which produced some startling concessions by union and management. The union agreed to end featherbedding that forced management to use 16 men for jobs which sometimes could be handled by eight men. Management agreed to job security and to provide nearly $4.5 million in pension funds over the life of the three-year contract. Without going into further details of this agreement, I point out that it is significant that it was arrived at quietly, in a setting that is not typical of most of the bargaining processes. Here management and union worked for the benefit of both. They did it in an atmosphere of harmony and co-operation. This bill should provide for that kind of framework and regulations should encourage this type of approach.

This has not been the pattern in the past. The decades of grinding struggle have left their mark on both labour and management. What has happened is that the trenches have been dug very deeply. We find ourselves locked in a seemingly inevitable struggle for power or counterpower. This is survival of the fittest, and it is this concept about which I am concerned.

There is just one other aspect that I would like to mention in regard to the bill. It concerns the Canada Labour Relations Board. I think it is a good thing that this board will no longer be made up of certain individuals who represent specified organizations. This is a step forward. But I believe the bill should be amended to ensure that the representative nature of the board be guaranteed by providing realistic consultative and advisory roles for labour and management in the appointment of some of its members.

It is true that several liberalizing suggestions of the Woods task force have been introduced, such as the secret ballot. The bill also includes provision to recognize bargaining rights acquired by voluntary recognition. Nevertheless, in spite of some of these positive aspects, which also include the provision that a certification ballot include the provision for no union, I believe that in relation to unfair practices the bill should have been further strengthened. Here again, the Woods report made positive recommendations on the civil rights of workers, such as the legislative guarantee of the right of union members to audited statements of union financial affairs.

Furthermore, while the bill does provide for complaints on a range of matters to be made to the CLRB, the limitation of the hearing of such complaints is unreasonable and would seriously discourage many legitimate complaints being made. Clause 187 (3) should be amended at least to read "within two months." There is no reason why a person should have to wait six months to receive justice from his union. Why should there be that kind of delay?

An editorial in the Globe and Mail of April 4 covers the last point that I wish to make regarding the technological change provisions. I quote:

> The new bill establishes three circumstances involving technological change in which the bargaining process with its ultimate possibility of strike or lockout may not be employed.
> First, where the employer has given notice in writing of the proposed change during the open period (at least 90 days) which precedes each new set of negotiations. Here it will be presumed that the technological change, like any other change proposed by either employer or union, can be bargained at the usual negotiating table, with the usual give and take.
> Second, where the collective agreement already sets out procedures by which the effects of a technological change may be negotiated and settled—usually by binding arbitration.
> Third, where provisions are contained in the collective agreement to assist employees affected by technological change, and it is specified—something some unions may be reluctant to do—that the extraordinary procedures for between-normal-bargaining negotiations do not apply.

These changes have two obvious advantages over the previous bill prepared by the former minister of manpower. Again I quote:

> They relieve that part of industry which has conscientiously tried to agree with labour on the proper approach to technological change from the insecurity of not knowing if it may be hit again in the middle of a contract. They will encourage industries to enter into negotiations with unions on the subject—because if they don't do it willingly they may find themselves doing it unwillingly, in unnecessary mid-term negotiations.

This is one area where the bill has been improved. However, in my opinion it must be kept in mind that the technological change provisions must be criticized and assessed in regard to their being a remedy to the problem. The problem is simply this: How do we encourage technological change so that Canadian industries can compete with foreign industries in domestic and foreign markets and, at the same time, minimize the adverse effect of such changes upon members of the Canadian labour force and, as well, protect the public interest and carry out our public responsibility?

The present urgency in seeking a solution to this problem is twofold. The kinds of technological change Canada has experienced in the last decade or so have been introduced at a more rapid rate than in previous years and current technological change has far reaching effects on industry's manpower requirements. In this regard, therefore, the bill we are discussing does not go far enough. The effects of accelerating technological change and a high level of unemployment, such as we have now, upon highly unionized industries have contributed largely to uneasy industrial relations in Canada. I think there needs to be some softening in this area.

Obviously, industry and unionized labour have an interest in technological change. It is equally obvious, although not so generally recognized, that the Canadian public has an interest as well: in the first place, as the beneficiary of an efficient and technologically competitive industry or the financial victim of an inefficient industry that is protected by tariffs or bolstered by subsidies; in the second place, as the tax source whose taxes are variously used to assist industry to make technological changes or to assist employees to weather such changes; and in the third place, as the victim inconvenienced by industrial strife arising out of management's and labour's failure to reach agreement on technological change.

It is reasonable to conclude that the public has a vested interest in the problem of technological change and, arising only from that interest, a right and a responsibility to be a third presence with management and trade unions in contributing to the solution of these problems. So in closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the technological change provisions in Bill C-183 are an example of general legislation directed to a comparatively minor aspect of one of the problems engendered by technological change.

This is no doubt an assertion of the public interest into management-labour union relations. In light of the examples previously mentioned, it might be termed a minimal assertion of the public interest. One can admit the sacredness of private contract while proposing a profane but superior right of parliament to protect the public purse. So what is at issue here is whether the provisions of the bill are an adequate solution to this problem. For that reason I submit that these provisions and any counter proposals should be thoroughly considered in committee, for I regard the committee study to be one of the most important aspects of our work on this bill. I end with the hope that the minister and the government are willing to concede that the bill can be made much better with a few logical amendments.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, most members of parliament come to this place with a perspective on Canadian society which is narrower than the total picture. Region, education, social background, family situation, former job, work environment—these are all factors that influence individual judgment about the national problems we are dealing with here. As my regular hecklers across the floor have often noted for the record, this applies to me as well. Coming to this place and being here gives a man an opportunity to see other points of view and, more important, to learn the reasons for the other points of view. In this process my own views have changed in many ways. One area has been in the field of industrial relations, the subject of the bill before us. I should like to take a few minutes tonight to talk about this subject.

There is no area of the Canadian economy in which the structure is so defective as the area of industrial relations. On a day like today, when about 300,000 members of the Canadian labour force of over eight million are on strike, many in critical jobs, this observation needs no support. The mail that I get, and undoubtedly the mail of most members of this House, is full of criticisms of these structural problems. This criticism is unusual in two ways and is not like the usual sort of criticism one receives in the mail. Firstly, it is unlike most general criticism, which tends to be rather complicated. The criticism regarding industrial relations is clearcut. We hear about good guys and bad guys. For some, it is management that is good and the greedy workingman who is bad; for others, the opposite is true. For some, the government is the principal villain; for others, it is American unions or the NDP which are at fault. The various publics of the Canadian population tend to have a very simple view of the causes of the problem.

The second unusual feature of the public debate on industrial relations is that everyone has a simple solution. Again, not everybody's solution is the same. However, none of my correspondents seems to have much difficulty in delivering to me a clear prescription for solving the problem, and this is unusual when one notes the public reaction in other areas of Canadian life where all our energy seems to be used simply in trying to define problems in a clear way.

People write to me, Mr. Speaker, saying that the time has come to break the power of big unions; that they have outlived their usefulness; that we should consider making strikes illegal because they are a feudal throwback and out of place in today's society; that we should make all strikes by public servants illegal, because they are employed by the bottomless purse; that we should make strikes in essential services illegal, either in the public sector or across the board; that we should establish compulsory and binding arbitration as a substitute for the right to strike; that we should insert a government representative into all arbitrations so that we can avoid sweetheart deals and represent the consumer and public interest in settlements; that we should provide guidelines for fair increases across the board and permit no increases beyond the guidelines; that we should appeal to Canadian nationalism; that we should ask Canadians to tighten their belts, as they did willingly during World War II; that we should limit increases to productivity gains, either in particular industries or across the board; and that we should resort to sectoral bargaining. This last proposal has actually been implemented in Quebec and, partly, in Ontario. This has created problems which I hope to return to before I end my remarks.

Each of these solutions could be described as a proposal for structural change and each is quite different from the others. Each one has been subject to much public discussion. I do not want to repeat tired arguments tonight, but I should like to make a few points. Firstly, let me say a word about the power of big unions. It is currently believed both by the population and by many economists that the price-wage spiral is being stoked by increases demanded by big industrial unions which make outrageous demands in every contract renewal that is negotiated. This, for example, is the premise on which John Kenneth Galbraith works. He thinks that big union contracts should be price controlled. This is also the theory behind phase II of the "Nixonomics" presently in effect in the United States, under which controls apply only to the big or key sectors. However, I have investigated the figures and have concluded that the premise is false both in the United States and in Canada.

In the United States, between 1965 and 1971 unionized hourly wages in the manufacturing sector, the so-called "commanding heights" of capitalism and union strength, increased by 36 per cent. In the same period, the lowly and generally non-unionized service sector experienced wage gains of 43 per cent, and the gains of United States federal public servants in the same six-year period were 51 per cent.

On the Canadian scene, although I have had some difficulty with Statistics Canada's products and, hence, difficulty in getting similar information, it seems that a parallel exists. Between 1965 and 1971, the hourly wages of unionized employees of corporations employing over 500 people rose by 55.8 per cent, but over-all for all industries of all sizes the hourly wage increase was 63.9 per cent. Noting that unionized labour constitutes less than 25 per cent of the total, it would seem that in the Canadian situation the wages of unionized employees in big unions have gone up substantially less than the national average. So much for the so-called monopoly power of the unions.

Second, I would like to say a word about strikes. I used to believe that there was an element of immorality about a strike. Certainly a strike is a waste of time that could be used for production of wanted goods and services; but how immoral is it? In a legal strike a group of employees have fulfilled their contract, working at agreed wages until the contract expires. They then seek a satisfactory contract to continue their work. Often patiently, they may continue on the job at the old rates while negotiations go on. In this area, incidentally, no employees in Canada have been more patient than federal public servants. However, the time comes when they feel negotiation is futile and they stop coming to work. Remember, they never agreed to work at the salary they are being paid. In this situation, who can blame them? So much for the morality of it.

For his part, the employer is not without recourse. He does not have to shut down. He is perfectly free to find other workers who want the jobs at lower rates and are prepared to cross picket lines. In fact, the police will assist any new employees to come to work. However, it is a measure of the extent to which Canadians approve of strikes that the strikebreaker or scab is looked down on. I would, therefore, have difficulty accepting the general principle that strikes should be illegal.

I think that if the employees can agree not to strike as part of the collective agreement, that is fine. In this area no group is more progressive than federal public servants, where out of more than 200 collective agreements to which strikes might have applied all but a dozen contain agreement to arbitrate on the breakdown of negotiations. I cannot accept a general illegalization of strikes.

Let me add, as well, that making strikes illegal does not eliminate strikes. In the United States, where strikes are illegal in the public service, there have been, I believe, two postal strikes in the past three years. In Montreal, where police strikes are illegal, the police have been on virtual or actual strike several times in the past four years. So have the jailers in the province of Quebec. One could ask, what is the solution when laws like that are broken? It is surely not putting people in jail.

In Australia, where arbitration is compulsory, there have been five times as many illegal strikes as there have been legal strikes in Canada in similar periods over recent years. I conclude from this experience and these comparisons that making strikes illegal is no panacea, nor is banning other disruptive kinds of presently legal activities. This applies as well to strikes in so-called essential services. For the argument about essential services, a problem of definition arises. Some people's idea of essentiality is different from that of others. For example, the largest group of complaints I received about recent strikes related to the Saturday night hockey game.

To take another example, we thought the air traffic controllers supplied an essential service, yet Canadians were able to cope with a fairly lengthy strike. For short hauls there were other modes of transportation. For longer hauls there were usually international routes available. I am not saying this is convenient, but it makes the dubious benefit of making strikes illegal a little less compelling. In the final analysis, when a strike proceeds too long and damages the public interest there is always the recourse of special action by Parliament to end the strike. And this special action may well attract compliance from striking workers more easily than a more routine procedure for ordering them back to work.

Mr. Crouse: Would the hon. member permit a question? I was listening carefully to his remarks. Was he implying by his statement that the air traffic controllers were unimportant to the transportation industry of this country? If they had not voluntarily gone back to work, the strike would have continued costing Canadians something like $15 million a day. To my way of thinking this is a very large amount of money. Therefore, does the hon. member not agree these people are very important to the transportation industry in Canada?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, much of what I intend to say applies to that question. The $15 million was the daily cost of continuing the strike. But what would the cost have been to award the 60 per cent increase for which they were asking? What would that have cost the Canadian economy? What would the signal effect be on other negotiations, of having that increase as one of the increases federal public servants were awarded? I will come back to that question at the end of my remarks.

About a year ago I spoke on this subject and stated, as a disadvantage of changing the system, that I believe if strikes were made illegal and compulsory arbitration were substituted in their place, society would have to pay an economic price for it by giving workers higher settlements than they would have obtained by collective bargaining with the strike option. In the interval I have searched for a way of testing this theory. I have some labour statistics from Statistics Canada which tend to support what I said at that time. In 1969, for all provincial employees, contracts settled by arbitration averaged increases of 13.4 per cent. For those settled without arbitration, the increases were only 7.9 per cent. For 1970, the figures are 10.1 per cent and 8.7 per cent. For 1971, the figures are 8.5 per cent and 8.3 per cent. In every case the public got a better deal without the arbitration route and in the absence of arbitration.

For all contracts of government employees at all levels, the comparisons for 1969 were 12.4 per cent under arbitration, and without arbitration only 7.9 per cent. For 1970, the figures were 9.3 per cent and 8.3 per cent. For 1971, there was a slight and explainable shift; the figures were 7.3 per cent and 7.9 per cent. Although these figures apply only to public employees, there were a lot of contracts involved. They prove that a system of compulsory arbitration is more expensive and more inflationary than negotiation with the strike option.

There are other implications of compulsory arbitration of which proponents of that regime may not be aware. Most businessmen who recommend it do not recommend it for themselves but for other industries, usually the big ones. These industries for which they recommend it are in fact the very ones which have enough market power to pass any increases awarded on to their customers. How would these businessmen like to have compulsory arbitration in their own plants, to have some, hopefully and at best, disinterested third party tell them in a binding way what their labour bill will be for production for the next, say, three years? I believe most businessmen would want to reserve the right to hear any award, to take it or leave it but not to be bound by it.

One of the other themes that presents problems is that labour in a sector where there are productivity increases should not be entitled to the whole of that increase but only to the portion that represents the national average productivity gain. The justification for this is obvious. A secretary or line-assembler in an industry which is making productivity gains, computer production for example, is usually no more productive personally than his or her counterpart in a more stagnant industry, a municipal government, for example. To allow the former to receive the whole of the gain is inequitable and will signal less productive sectors to claim equal increases, often through the same union. On the other hand, there is no mechanism for transferring unclaimed gains of the productive industries to other industrial workers across the board, with the result that if the workers in the productive industry do not share the gain, the owners of the industry get what might be seen as a bonanza. I do not see how this dilemma can be resolved. It is usually the activities of the entrepreneurs which have achieved the gain in the first place. The only way I know to settle this is by market forces and this, of course, brings us back to strikes.

Another issue of industrial relations which is over-simplified is the tendency to seek solutions to industrial problems in terms of money. Management believes that an unsatisfactory work situation can be made palatable by offering an increase in pay. Often, labour agrees. But having watched a few years of industrial settlements go by, I observe that industrial peace cannot be bought by means of a money settlement for any reasonable period; the issue inevitably is raised again either during the conterm or later negotiations. Occasionally it involves a particular industrial condition. More often, it is a question of job security. I believe it is unrealistic for either side to try to buy its way out of a difficulty which is, in essence, non-monetary.

Those who criticize the government on the grounds that the bill before us is inadequate, or that it goes too far, would find themselves on more solid ground if there were a country somewhere in the world, or theorists somewhere in the world who had produced a better answer, one which the government was failing to copy either out of ignorance or because of political pressure. But there is no structure elsewhere which is substantially different from ours and which produces better results. Sweden, which seemed to be doing better than us, with a system of nationwide centralized bargaining, has suffered a breakdown as colossal as were the early successes. Japan has fewer strikes, it is true, but wage increases have been much greater, especially in the current period.

As far as the theorists are concerned, I remind hon. members that a task force on industrial relations was commissioned by the government as long ago as 1966 in the hope that some better structure could be found. It returned with a thoughtful package containing no great innovations. The bill before us really is a response to the many legislative proposals contained in that report.

I would suggest that the solution to industrial relations problems does not lie ultimately in structural changes such as making strikes illegal or calling for voluntary or compulsory arbitration. As I ventured to say at the outset, the attitude toward industrial relations which most of us hold is too simplistic; we are inclined to think in terms of good guys and bad guys, moral activities and immoral activities, patriotism and selfishness. To me the situation, like most other situations in Canadian society, is more complex. For example, student unrest in universities is not dealt with by passing laws and creating new structures, by putting people in jail or kicking them out of school. Similarly, drug problems are not settled merely by introducing legal reforms, banning drugs and catching the pushers or legalizing drugs and setting up a government selling agency. Fundamentally, we are dealing with a behavioural question and not, at least in the first instance, with a structural one.

We find in Canada today a massive alienation from traditional institutions and values, a wave of protest challenging institutions to justify themselves to the rebels, usually the young. What other interpretation can one place upon the growing and dangerous unwillingness of the rank and file of the unions to ratify the reasonable settlements obtained by their leaders? Clearly the institution of the union, like other institutions in our society, is increasingly losing touch with the rank and file of its membership, and is less relevant to them. So, for that matter, are the corporations. Does the working man believe that the company or the union has his best interests at heart, or does he regard the union as being just another business pursuing its own goals? Does his small, single voice really mean anything in the vastness of the typical industrial situation? Does his voice mean more when he says no than when he says yes?

Parliament faces this same problem vis-à-vis the voters of Canada. As an institution in an age of alienation from established institutions we have to justify ourselves to our constituents by showing an evident concern with the anxieties which are felt by them. Anyone who believes that participatory democracy is fully meaningful to our constituents or even, for that matter, to all members of parliament, does not really understand the developing alienation which was so well described in the Speech from the Throne.

We have before us a bill with many parts. It is not the ultimate solution but it does provide certain structural changes which could, if accepted by the parties affected, relieve some of the concerns which lead to breakdown of the process. Job insecurity caused by the continuing technological revolution is clearly an important ingredient in industrial disputes. To this extent, the bill is a positive step and I commend it to the House.

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, exactly one hundred years have gone by since parliament passed the Trade Unions Act which established some orderly industrial relations machinery for Canadian trade unions. Shortly after that, representatives of trade unions came into my area, in the early days of the silver boom, and fought for many things besides wages and improved working conditions. It surprised me today to listen to two hon. members whom I consider to be reactionary enough to have belonged to that age of the 1800s rather than to the 1900s or, more particularly, to 1972. One of them was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) with his talk about the right to work.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Peters: To me, the right to work is the right to scab, the right to starve, the right of management to rule.

Mr. Thompson: On a point of order, I should like to ask the hon. member where he got that out of my remarks. To say that kind of thing is unfair and it is not correct.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I have listened over the years to management, chambers of commerce and other organizations violently opposed to unions, who talked about the right to work. To me, the right to work means the right to scab, the right of management to rule. It relates to an act which is still on the statute books of Canada, an act governing the relations between master and servant.

The hon. member for Red Deer quoted a figure which I thought was very interesting. He told us that 700,000 man-days had been lost through strikes. Mr. Speaker, I did a rapid calculation and I find that this year we have lost about 150 million man-days through unemployment. If the hon. member had talked about unemployment being a waste of manpower, if he had talked about the right to work in terms of unemployment, he would have been on better ground. What about the right to work of those half million persons who have been excluded from the active labour force, not because they want to be but because there is no work for them? The right to work—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Is the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that the figure I used, to which he refers, was for 1950. As far as this year is concerned, I was talking of more than seven million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to accept the correction of the hon. member and apologize for misinterpreting him. He has now indicated that the figure is seven million man-days lost through strikes in Canada. But there have still been 150 million man-days lost through unemployment. Anybody who makes the fuss that he made over seven million man-days lost through strikes and at the same time ignores the 150 million man-days lost through unemployment, seems to me reactionary to the extreme.

In similar vein, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy), displaying the bias he has shown for many years in his own business enterprises in the Timmins area, indicated how terrible unions were, how bad the whole union process was and how wrong the minister was in introducing this legislation, which frankly is not that far advanced. I think the minister will agree it is legislation that is necessary now and the need for it is immediate. However, the hon. member for Timmins indicated this is a terrible piece of legislation which gives in to the unions and gives them certain rights under the law. The legislation does not seem to me to be exceptionally generous and it is in keeping with the labour practices in some of the enterprises that he operates.

Other members have, in my opinion, been reasonable about the changes that are necessary in our labour legislation. There is no doubt that everybody in this country is concerned with the question of strikes. Certainly no one in this country has failed to ask himself why 200,000 or more workers, mainly in the public service, in the province of Quebec are now on strike. No one in this country, when trying to catch an aeroplane, did not ask why civil servants in the transport field were on strike. I am sure that those of us from Toronto who have to put our garbage in plastic bags and leave them in our cellars ask the same question. But I think we should look at the question in terms of whether this legislation will solve the problems. I think in many cases it will not.

Personally, I am not in a position to suggest what would solve these specific problems, but I think that the willingness of this government to examine representations made by both management and labour, those in the management and labour fields who are interested in collective bargaining only, will probably provide some of the answers. I suggest that the minister should look very closely, in terms of federal legislation, at fields where the federal government conducts operations and where negotiations are conducted with Treasury Board. It seems to me—I may be wrong, but I think this is something the minister will have to consider—that in all cases where unions negotiate with a Crown corporation or a department of government they are not eyeball to eyeball with those who are going to put up the money to meet the pay increases of improved conditions that are being demanded. For example, we often find that those who are negotiating with civil service organizations, whether it be a union or an association, reach the position where they can make no further offers and the only alternative open to the workers is either to accept the offer or to call a strike.

I was very interested in the remarks made by the previous speaker. I think we owe him a vote of thanks for having done research in this field, because he pointed out that in cases where the union or association saw fit to accept, at the final stage of the negotiations, the decision of an arbitrator, sometimes the arbitrator made a greater award than the amount previously offered. Immediately we should ask ourselves, was it because the arbitrator was more generous than Treasury Board would have been in direct negotiations, or was it because the initial offer resulted from a flexible position taken by the government negotiators because they felt there was a real possibility of binding arbitration? In cases where the government thought a strike would result, were they using their position as a rich employer to influence, in some cases, a fairly weak treasury in the union or association concerned?

If that is the position, then I think the minister will agree with me that he will have to look at the end result of negotiations with Treasury Board in view of the complete lack of satisfaction on the part of the unions who have dealt with the board, in several instances the dispute being referred back to cabinet for their decision.

I am reminded of the days when we used to negotiate with the gold miners. We used to negotiate with the manager and after a period of time he would finally say, "I cannot agree with you, simply because I do not have the authority to do so. Would you grant a half hour's recess while I phone my principals?" Then he phoned someone in New York or Montreal, and a board of directors we did not know about meeting in another area decided whether consideration should be given to the request being made or whether the workers should go on strike. This arrangement was totally unsatisfactory and it is one that I think is being duplicated now in terms of negotiating with the federal government.

Has it ever occurred to the minister to ask why most of the strikes taking place today are in the public service sector rather than in industry? It is true that occasionally there has been a strike in the automotive industry, or in the steel industry, and in recent years there have been a limited number of strikes in the minerals industry. True, most are under provincial jurisdiction. But leaving aside the jurisdictional question, is it not surprising to find that most of the strikes taking place today are against government, Crown corporations or government agencies of one form or another, which result in serious dislocation?

This bill has been endorsed by the labour congress, not so much because it has many good things in it but because it does not have any bad things in it, I presume. But passing these amendments to the labour code is but the first step. Other steps will have to be taken, and I am sure they will not be taken by an appointed labour relations board that is nominated by the government. This problem will not be solved merely by appointing a board composed of representatives of labour, management and interested parties. It will have to be solved, or those reactionaries who say there will be anarchy in the streets, with the workers rising against the government, will be correct. They will be correct only if we do not provide the proper machinery.

The suggested solution would be to eliminate organization, make it weak, do not give it any room in which to operate or allow it any field in which it could truly represent the workers. That is one way. But I suggest if that happens there will be anarchy throughout this country.

The labour leaders of this country have as much responsibility as most employers. It is only the small employer who causes difficulty for the unions. Most large companies have learned to live with unions. This fight has been going on in Canada for a hundred years, and there will never be any end to it because there will always be a desire on the part of the workers to get their share of the spoils of industry. This is only normal. And it will be the responsibility of industry to see that the workers do not get such a large share of the benefits of their labour that there is no longer any industry.

I am sure the minister and his officials will agree that organized labour has been orderly in its operations and that a great deal of responsibility and restraint has been shown by both management and labour. I suggest that Canadians have developed a fairly responsible position in respect of labour relations.

It is true that in respect of relationships with the labour relations board there has been a great deal of trust and respect on the part of both management and labour. There has always been the fly-by-night side to bargaining, and I am sure there are elements of both management and labour which would agree that the labour relations board has not done the kind of job it should have done. In the main there has been favourable reaction, as indicated by the Canadian Labour Congress in its suggestion to retain the old labour relations board rather than adopt a new association.

It has been suggested, I presume mainly because it must be, that ministers—and I say, kindly, not this one—have used patronage in appointments to the labour relations board because it has the jurisdiction of a federal court. The reason some people are fearful about this change is that there might be representatives on that board who understand the problems and know the conditions which exist, and these representatives will present their arguments on the basis of their knowledge of the problems, conditions, requirements and desires of one side or the other, management or labour. When we establish a new board with people not having the backgrounds which both sides have found advantageous, obviously we leave ourselves open to the possibility of having a very aggressive member, as we do with judges, who will be found obnoxious to the management side, or someone who is very reactionary and obnoxious to the labour side.

The argument that the general public has to be protected in this regard does not carry a great deal of weight. However, we await with interest the justification with which the minister will no doubt provide the committee for this particular change. This problem of protecting the public is, I believe, vastly overrated. There have been occasions when the public has obviously been affected. I have heard some of my colleagues complain bitterly about labour in relation to grain movement in Canada. What, really, is the problem in respect of the movement of grain? It is not that there might be a small strike of less than a few days but, rather, the fact that we under-operate the whole transportation system. We operate this system with a minimal margin of safety.

A good indication of this can be found in our experience this winter. We had two or three snowslides, following which members of the House suggested a calamity had developed in Vancouver and on the Prairies. Labour is not so much to blame. The fact is that we operate that particular industry in a manner which does not allow for expected or anticipated eventualities which no doubt occur from time to time when labour relations are involved.

The public often has to be protected, but at what price? If you tell the police they cannot strike, it seems to me you have to be overly generous with them. That has not been the case. Who is it who screams loudest when there is a strike at a hospital? I suggest the people who scream are those who want to get into the hospital. There is not a hospital in this country which does not pay every employee, from head nurses down, a substandard wage. The wages of our hospital employees are often disgraceful. There are many who say hospital staff cannot strike because they perform essential services. If that is so, the government, be it municipal, provincial or federal, has a responsibility to the public.

If a government suggests that garbage on the street must be picked up, then it should be overly generous to these employees. Surely under normal circumstances, if the government is generous with these employees there will be less difficulty in negotiations and less danger of a strike situation developing. When you tell an employee there will be no improvements made or, in some cases where there are negotiations, "If you sign an agreement the employee must accept a reduction in advantages under the present contract," it is inevitable that men and women will strike. In such cases a strike is just, necessary and supported by the public.

The main change in this piece of legislation is in respect of technological advancement. The minister has bowed to pressure from certain groups and has included limitations. Certainly the minister has read the Freedman recommendations, one of which states that when changes affect the livelihood of employees they must be subject to negotiation and normal bargaining procedures, and implemented only after due process of contract negotiation. The minister has made some exceptions in this measure. One hon. member speaking on this bill indicated it was terrible not to let management do what it liked. I suggest that management has always exercised the right to do what it likes. The only time this has been curtailed is when there has been negotiation.

Workers' contracts are worded something like insurance policies. They always include exceptions over which no one has control or responsibility: they include the phrase "the will of God". I have always found that God seemed to be on the side of management and never on the side of the workers. I think this is as true in technological change as it is in any other aspect of a union contract. Those things over which management had no direct control were the responsibility of God. This certainly did not provide much assistance to those who were displaced because of a calamity.

An hon. Member: What about the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Peters: If we could substitute the minister of Labour it would seem to me this would cause the same difficulty, because he would be involved in making decisions Solomon would have had considerable difficulty with. I might refer to such a situation. When a fire or some other condition occurs from which management could not have protected the employer, then in many cases the contractual clause would say that this was beyond the control of management and therefore was not its responsibility.

In the original bill technological changes were all to be negotiated. I think that before this bill passes, the minister will have to give very serious consideration to several changes. First, I believe he will have to give consideration to reopening all existing contracts to allow negotiations, because we will find that many companies will anticipate when this bill might be passed and will be signing three-year contracts for each the exemptions which are included in the bill. They will not be able to reopen until the open period and 90 days' notice from the employer as to the number of changes and number of people affected.

In all fairness, and in order to provide harmony in industrial relations, I believe it will be necessary to treat all contracts after the coming into force of this act in exactly the same way, so that all technological changes which are made will meet the requirements of this act although the contract may have been signed a year or so prior to the passage of the legislation. I say this in the hope that the minister will give consideration to establishing that kind of harmony, because I can see many employers making a contract available to their employees now and anticipating technological changes which will not be covered by this legislation unless it applies to all contracts.

The minister has exempted collective agreements which contain provisions designed to cushion the impact of change. I am not certain what that means. I hope it does not mean what it meant in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act, where we found if severance pay agreements had not been negotiated which cushioned the impact of the shutdown or closure of a particular property, this was taken out of unemployment insurance. I hope this exemption of collective agreements which contain provisions designed to cushion the impact of change does not mean that anyone who has worked out any type of agreement, such as in the automobile industry or in a number of other industries, will not be eligible for the provisions of the act.

Secondly, there is reference to provisions in the collective agreement for the negotiation and settlement of problems arising from technological change. I do not see much difference in the first and second reference. If the collective agreement contains these provisions, I presume they were negotiated and that the problems were settled as they arose. It may be that some of these changes have been anticipated, as in the automobile industry. However, I believe there is a similarity in these two exemptions.

Third, there is reference to notice in writing of the change being given during the open period of the contract. I do not think one of the most difficult jobs the union negotiator would have would be being faced with the proposition of a 90-day clause indicating that an approximate number of people would be affected in a substantial way. I can see in the open period a good deal of digging up of technical changes which might be expected for the next three years, whether real or imaginary.

I am sure the minister will agree that the greatest fear and one of the difficulties which exist in negotiations is that of the person who does not know whether he will have a job tomorrow. It is all right to say we will retrain him and provide him with alternative employment, but when he looks around and sees a lot of people unemployed and knows that the retraining he will be given will fit him for a job for which an unemployed person is already looking, he finds he is in a very serious position. I suggest that when it is indicated there is an approximate number of people who will be substantially affected by a change, this will cause undue fear and reluctance on the part of the worker to accept anything but an immense increase in his wages.

I worked for several years in the mines. When you take out the first ton of ore from a mine, whether the Inco mine in Sudbury or a small mine at the end of the road such as the one I worked for, you are that much closer to the closing of the mine. It is always anticipated that the mine will close. However, you always had the same chance a player has when playing poker. The mine might not close next year or the year after. You know it will close, but you could play the odds that it would not close now or while you needed a job. You would at least have a fair shake. But where in one area it is decided there is to be a technical change which will obliterate a substantial number of jobs without an alternative being provided, I am sure the employees who are affected will be exceedingly agitated and will probably make exorbitant demands to compensate for the fear they have in respect of the insecurity of their employment.

Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to tell us why management felt this provision was going to be advantageous to them. Management is as involved in industrial relations as labour. If they have an unhappy labour force, then obviously management is unhappy. If a technical change occurs in industry, it is often reflected in the front office.

It is interesting to note that in companies where there is a very large turnover in the work force because of technical change, there is also a turnover at the management level. In some of the electronics industries it is said that when the American bosses come to the plant they will almost always end up with new management and new technical people in the front office. I wonder if the minister found any particular warmth in the exemptions he made, and why it was not an advantage to leave technical changes to the normal provisions of the fact so that on 90 days' notice negotiations can commence and go all the way through the process to arbitration or strike if necessary. Would that not be more advantageous than using the open period for this type of award which will obviously get mixed up with all the other changes that are suggested?

Mr. Speaker, as other hon. members have said, the federal government affects only a small portion of the Canadian work force. I would agree that a large part of the Canadian labour force is not going to be involved in any case where there is collaboration between labour and management. I think this is a sad state of affairs. A previous speaker mentioned the right to work, which probably carries a great deal of weight with many of the entrepreneurs of this nation. A lot of people are not covered by collective agreements, but with 530,000 employees under federal jurisdiction we have a responsibility to see that the best possible type of relations are developed.

I should like to say a word about featherbedding, a charge that is always made when there is technical change. It is being said now by CBC officials that NABET is creating a featherbedding situation, that changes have taken place, that more changes are contemplated and that NABET is reacting against these technical changes that will obviously result in the elimination of many jobs.

Mr. Speaker, they know that every time we find a senior official in the CBC who is not competent we use the Peter principle to promote him to the level of his incompetence. He is made a vice-president and put in a little office and soon has a whole string of people under him. Featherbedding can easily be eliminated at the managerial level if the government wishes to look at the situation. Why should they ask this of the little people in NABET, when they know there are at least 25 vice-presidents in the CBC raised to the level of their incompetence on the Peter principle? We know, and I am sure the government knows, that the CBC executive is crowded with incompetents. Why ask the workers to pay the penalty? Why should they be efficient? Why should they not go on strike to maintain their position, when these others cannot be fired?

Mr. Speaker, it is the same all over. The Canadian National Railways has more chiefs than Indians; everybody knows that. In my area there is the Ontario Northland Railway and every time a political figure makes a name for himself he is appointed to run the railroad. No wonder it does not run very well, because they do not have one competent person to run it. It still makes money, but that is because of the area. The CNR is the same, and I presume the CPR is too. Why ask the workers at the bottom? If there are four men sitting writing memos to each other, why not have two men running the engine? At least one could look out one side while the other looked out the other side; they would serve some function. But we try to get rid of the extra worker and do not try to get rid of the vice-presidents.

If we are really interested in facing this matter of change we should be fair to the workers, particularly those in the government, and not talk about featherbedding at the bottom until we get rid of featherbedding at the top. The mandarins are untouchable but it is easy to get rid of the people at the bottom. Mr. Speaker, featherbedding will exist and it is not the answer to technical change. If technical change is in the interest of the public, and it certainly is, then it should be possible for us to provide the worker with alternative employment.

There will always be bigots and reactionaries who oppose this type of legislation which is the minimum that could possibly be passed in the year 1972 to establish labour relations in a country as industrially advanced as Canada. These bigots will flourish when it is impossible to provide alternative employment to those displaced by technical change. It is essential to eliminate strikes, to eliminate the displacement that occurs because of technical change if we are not willing to face the problem of unemployment.

[Mr. Peters.]

The day we solve the problem of unemployment in Canada we will also solve the problem of labour relations. Those who say that today's unemployed are lazy, are wrong. If we could provide employment for the million people looking for work, I think 999,000 would be ready to go to work tomorrow. You would not see the fear of technological change that we now see when a man is told he is no longer employable because a machine is going to replace him, and when he knows there is no alternative employment in any other field.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH—MOBILIZATION OF RESOURCES TO COMBAT CARDIOVASCULAR DISEASES

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, on February 24 I took the opportunity during the question period to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) the results of the alarming epidemiological studies revealing that cardiovascular disease has become in Canada today the greatest public health problem.

In 1971, cardiovascular diseases were the number one killer in Canada. In that year they took the lives of 77,000 people. Last year, heart attacks and strokes together accounted for 50,000 deaths in our country. The increase in life expectancy through the control of infectious diseases in infancy and childhood accounts for the fact that more Canadians live to an age at which they die from the complications of arteriosclerosis. Recent studies by the Canadian Heart Foundation show that today there are 2½ million Canadians suffering some form of cardiovascular disease.

Absenteeism, reduced productivity, loss of wages resulting from sickness, chronic disability and deaths due to cardiovascular disease are staggering in their proportions. The estimated annual economic loss to Canada is over $200 million. The human tragedy and suffering are incalculable. To date, medical research has done a great deal to cope with some forms of these diseases, especially in the field of cardiovascular surgery. But research into these diseases is still inadequate. We need to allocate more money to find the cause, and therefore prevent the occurrence of cardiovascular disease. Only $5 million was spent on research in the field of cardiovascular disease last year, and of that total only $1½ million was contributed by the federal government.

I would like to take advantage of the occasion this evening, Mr. Speaker, to appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to allocate more financial resources in order to increase the amount of research that is being done in this field. We also need to provide more money for health services, to provide adequate care for sudden heart attack cases which are brought to the coronary units in our hospitals. Even today a majority of Canadian hospitals do not have coronary units.

We must also provide trained ambulance services which are monitored so that the coronary unit team in a hospital will be adequately prepared for an emergency case on its way to hospital. We are told that in most hospitals there is lack of medical and paramedical personnel. This means that we need more doctors, more medical students.

How can we have more medical students when medical tuition fees are so high, Mr. Speaker? Only a couple of weeks ago the treasurer of the government of Ontario increased tuition fees still further. Lack of medical personnel constitutes an emergency. I believe that we should provide free education at the university level for all those who are capable of going to university, so that all our students capable of taking a medical degree would be able to go to university whether they come from affluent or poor families.

I appeal once again to the minister to launch a special attack on cardiovascular disease, allocate more financial resources for this attack and, as I mentioned previously, institute an educational campaign to advise the general public on how to deal with medical emergencies in the field of cardiovascular diseases.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we would like at first to thank the hon. member for Parkdale for having called the attention of the House on that important problem.

As we know, it is generally recognized that cardiovascular diseases have several contributive factors. However, it can be stated that physical inactivity, obesity and smoking can lead to cardiovascular diseases. In addition, it can be said that there is an indirect link with pressures, stress and high blood pressure. Other conditions such as diabetes are recognized as being premonitory symptoms of cardiovascular diseases.

However, the increased number of heart conditions—especially heart attacks—in Canada has certainly induced us to pay special attention to programs aimed at preventing that kind of accidents and improving the health of the Canadian people.

[English]

At a meeting of federal-provincial ministers responsible for sport and recreation in December, 1971, the minister announced the formation of a directorate, Recreation Canada, which would be concerned primarily with encouraging greater participation by Canadians in physical recreation activities. This directorate would also have concern for programs designed to encourage the improvement of fitness levels of our citizens both through mass participation programs and by stimulating research in the field of fitness. The department itself initiated the first phase of a comprehensive research program on recreation supply and demand in Canada. The purpose of this study is to provide provinces and municipalities with factual information to enable them to plan more realistically for future recreation needs.

In the area of obesity, a national survey, Nutrition Canada, is being conducted to study, among other conditions, the scope of the problem of obesity in Canada. Studies of the dietary intake of a sample of Canadians are being correlated with physical and biochemical indices associated with this and other conditions. When definite data becomes available, program development for this group is expected.

In addition, cigarette smoking has been variously shown to be associated not only with chronic pulmonary disease but with cardiovascular conditions, particularly coronary artery disease. The department has recently doubled the amount of financial assistance to this program in order to promote an educational campaign to warn the public of the hazards of cigarette smoking.

Further to the resources allocated through various federal research agencies and contributions made through the health resources fund, this department has taken a positive stance in attacking the problem of cardiovascular disease through measures designed to control the known precursors of heart disease and cerebrovascular accidents in the Canadian population.

HEALTH—FAMILY PLANNING—POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, six weeks ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) took an excellent initiative in calling together in Ottawa a Canadawide conference to discuss family planning. He followed it up by the announcement of a grant of $385,000 to the Family Planning Federation of Canada and a much smaller amount to another organization. Those present at the conference expressed satisfaction that the federal government had given a definite lead and voiced the opinion that the major roadblocks to family planning are now at provincial and local levels.

Consequently, on March 2 I asked the minister if he would seek an early meeting with provincial ministers to launch a co-ordinated program of family planning at all government levels. The minister's reply, that there were almost daily ongoing discussions which included family planning, failed to indicate to me the vigorous campaign of federal leadership which I believe is necessary at this time.

Canada is a long way behind most of the advanced countries in this regard. Let me give some figures published by Dr. Michael J. Ball, of the University of Alberta, in the Canadian Medical Association Journal for February 5 of this year. In a recent survey, the Family Planning Federation of Canada identified a total of 66 family planning clinics across the country, divided approximately equally among hospitals, health departments and private organizations including local planning associations. This figure does not include clinics teaching the rhythm method only.

How many birth control clinics does Canada need? A ratio of one clinic to a population of 55,000 has been found to be quite inadequate in Britain and special legislation was passed to encourage hospitals and health departments to open more clinics. If one clinic to a population of 30,000 were made the objective for Canada, including mobile clinics or teams for remote areas, we would need not only the present 66 clinics but 700 clinics for the country as a whole. Newfoundland would need 16 clinics instead of the present one. Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan would have to start from scratch and establish 4 and 32 clinics respectively. Nova Scotia would have to go from 2 to 32, New Brunswick from 1 to 21, Quebec from 13 to 193, Ontario from 17 to 232, Manitoba from 6 to 25, Alberta from 2 to 49, British Columbia from 13 to 62, and the Yukon and Northwest Territories from 1 to 2 plus.

These clinics could be opened without major capital expenditures if general hospitals and health units were to open clinics in existing premises. The cost benefit in Aberdeen, Scotland—that very well known place of saving—has been calculated as a tenfold saving in health and welfare costs over the combined expenditure on contraceptive services and health education over a five-year period. Very few facilities exist in Canada so far for training health professionals and social workers in family planning. The need for them is great.

Should the minister be tempted to reply to me that we cannot afford adequate family facilities at this time, I would remind him of the warning issued a year ago at the University of Toronto by Cope W. Schwenger and published by the Department of National Health and Welfare last September in their brochure on the current status of family planning in Canada. He said:

> —if sufficient family planning services are not made economically and geographically available and reasonably quickly, there is a distinct possibility ... that abortion on request ... may well become not only one of the leading but one of the most acceptable forms of birth control as a first line of defence against unplanned pregnancy, as in Japan and Eastern Europe.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, I need say no more to impress upon the minister the need for his dynamic leadership now in convincing provincial authorities of the need for haste and adequacy in the matter of family planning and birth control programs.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 last, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) concerning the possibility of consulting the provincial ministers with regard to the federal family planning program.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway should keep the House this evening to discuss this matter.

Unless I am mistaken, the hon. member attended some of the meetings of the National Conference on Family Planning at the beginning of March. She took part in the Conference with some other hon. members. The Conference's purpose, among others, was to advise the provincial governments and municipalities of the firm intention of the federal government of putting family planning services at the disposal of all those who want them. Not only did the media widely publicize the event, but all the provinces were informed of the objectives to be achieved in a letter addressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to all premiers and heads of governments of the Territories, inviting them to send representatives to the conference.

Moreover, all provinces and territories were invited to send a high official of their departments of Health, Welfare and Education and most of them made a positive response.

The ten major cities were also invited to send representatives and they were informed of the goals of the conference.

Officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare will continue to maintain liaison with the provinces in order to supply them with advice and assistance in the development of their family planning programs. As the minister put it at the national conference, amounts will be paid to provinces and other agencies in 1972-73 for specific family planning projects and, as he has often repeated, it is possible to obtain credits under the Canada Assistance Plan, federal-provincial cost-sharing schemes, medicare and hospital insurance.

I recognize the interest that the hon. member is bringing to the matter of family planning and I find this attitude very creditable. However, I fail to understand why she should hold us here tonight, for she knows very well the intense activity of the Department of National Health and Welfare in initiating the national family planning program since she witnessed these efforts just a few days ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What has he done since then?

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m. until Monday, April 17, pursuant to Special Order.

ADDRESS
RICHARD M. NIXON
President of the United States of America to Both Houses of Parliament in the
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA on Friday, April 14, 1972

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable P. E. Trudeau, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Lucien Lamoureux, Speaker of the House of Commons.

• (1510)

Hon. Lucien Lamoureux (Speaker of the House of Commons): I now call upon the Right Honourable, the Prime Minister to introduce the President of the United States.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. President of the United States, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the Parliament of Canada:

On behalf of the people of Canada, and of their parliamentary representatives gathered in this chamber, I extend to you, Mr. President, and to Mrs. Nixon, a warm welcome to Ottawa.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: You, Sir, are the fifth holder of your office to honour a joint session of the Parliament of Canada. Because your colleague President Eisenhower visited this place twice, your address will be the sixth such to be heard here.

[Translation]

You see before you, Mr. President, Canadians from every corner of this far-flung land we call Canada. They reflect not just the geography of the country but as well the great mixture of peoples which adds such richness and variety to our national life. The different origins of many of these men and women, and the languages they speak, illustrate the diversity of Canada. Their presence in the Chamber symbolizes our unity of purpose and our devotion to our parliamentary heritage. Part of that tradition was carried from France to England by the Norman conqueror nine centuries ago. It blossomed there and found its way naturally to Canada where it serves us admirably, and distinguishes us from the many countries elsewhere in the hemisphere.

[English]

Your presence here today, Mr. President, is striking evidence of the flexible yet harmonious relationship which has evolved over the years between the United States and Canada. Our two countries and our two peoples have much in common, but they are not identical in their moods nor in their interests, and it is a disservice to a proper understanding of one another if we overlook these distinctions. Our friendship is more dynamic because of our differences, and our relationship deeper and wider. Those differences stem from a past which, parallel to yours, is distinctive; and from governmental institutions which preserve like values but by different means.

In our meetings this morning we spoke a common language, employing familiar idioms, recalling an entwined history, and discussing problems identifiable to each in terms of values we share and respect. What other two countries in the world can offer to their peoples and leaders such a contribution to understanding?

What is the effect on Canada and Canadians of the existence next door to us of the great country of America? Certainly, it is one of stimulation. There is little that the United States does that is not felt or noticed in Canada. Your lofty goals, your good natured hospitality, your successes and your failures, your accomplishments and your shortcomings, your throbbing vitality, are all deeply imprinted in the collective conscience of Canadians. Understandably, there is little that Canadians do which they do not compare with similar activity in the United States.

Our relationship with you is too complex to be described, too involved to be understood fully, too deeply entrenched to be disregarded. We are no more capable of living in isolation from you than we are desirous of doing so. For those reasons, the basic friendship of Canada in the past several decades has been taken for granted by the United States, as we have accepted yours. I assure you that that friendship will continue for it is a permanent feature of our relationship with you. It will adjust to circumstance and be made more articulate in the process, but it is not regarded by us as negotiable.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is that friendship that has contributed immeasurably to the high degree of economic well-being, physical security and general happiness enjoyed by the peoples of both countries.

It is as an expression of that friendship that we welcome you, Sir, to this special session of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lucien Lamoureux (Speaker of the House of Commons): I will call upon the President of the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard M. Nixon (President of the United States): Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Prime Minister, hon. members of the Parliament of Canada, distinguished hosts and friends, I deeply appreciate your kind invitation as well as your cordial welcome.

[English]

To all of you who have welcomed Mrs. Nixon and me so warmly on this occasion, I trust you will make allowance for my attempt to speak in the language I studied 37 years ago. When I tried it today, before I came, on our top linguist in the American government, General Walters, he said, "Go ahead, you speak French with a Canadian accent".

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: I will have to admit that I am not very much at home in the French language but, as a former parliamentarian in my own country, I feel very much at home in this Chamber. I am grateful for the high privilege which your invitation represents. I am grateful, too, for this chance to return to Canada, and for the opportunity of signing here an historic agreement to restore and protect forever the quality of our Great Lakes which we share together. That agreement testifies to the continuing vitality of our unique relationship which has been described so eloquently by the Prime Minister. In discussing that relationship today, I wish to do so in a way that has not always been customary when leaders of our two countries have met. Through the years our speeches on such occasions have often centered on the decades of unbroken friendship we have enjoyed and our four thousand miles of unfortified frontier. In focusing on our peaceful borders and our peaceful history, they have tended to gloss over the fact that there are real problems between us. They have tended to create the false impression that our countries are essentially alike. It is time for Canadians and Americans to move beyond the sentimental rhetoric of the past. It is time for us to recognize that we have very separate identities; that we have significant differences; and that nobody's interests are furthered when these realities are obscured.

• (1520)

Our peaceful borders and our peaceful history are important symbols, to be sure. What they symbolize, however, is the spirit of respect and restraint which allows us to co-operate despite our differences in ways which help us both. American policy toward Canada is rooted in that spirit. Our policy toward Canada reflects the new approach we are taking in all of our foreign relations, an approach which has been called the Nixon Doctrine. That doctrine rests on the premise that mature partners must have autonomous independent policies; each nation must define the nature of its own interests; each nation must decide the requirements of its own security; each nation must determine the path of its own progress. What we seek is a policy which enables us to share international responsibilities in a spirit of international partnership. We believe that the spirit of partnership is strongest when partners are self-reliant. For among nations, as within nations, the soundest unity is that which respects diversity, and the strongest cohesion is that which rejects coercion.

[Mr. Nixon.]

Over the years, the people of Canada have come to understand these concepts particularly well. Within your own borders, you have been working to bring a wide variety of peoples and provinces and points of view into a great national union, a union which honors the integrity of its constituent elements. It was Prime Minister Laurier who said of Canada's differing components: "I want the marble to remain the marble; I want the granite to remain the granite; I want the oak to remain the oak". This has been the Canadian way. As a result, Canadians have helped to teach the world, as Governor General Massey once said, that the "toleration of differences is the measure of civilization".

Today, more than ever before, we need to apply that understanding to the whole range of world affairs. To begin with, we must apply it in our dealings with one another. We must realize that we are friends, not because there have been no problems between us, but because we have trusted one another enough to be candid about our problems and because our candour has nourished our co-operation.

Last December your Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I met in Washington and he asked me if I thought the United States would always want a surplus trade balance with Canada so that we could always export capital here. My answer then, and my answer now, is no. As I said to him at that time, we in the United States saw this same problem from the other side before World War I. We then depended on European capital for our development and we wanted to free ourselves from that dependence. So, we fully understand that Canada is in that same position today.

Canada is the largest trading partner of the United States.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: It is very important that that be noted in Japan, too.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: Our economies have become highly interdependent. But the fact of our mutual interdependence and our mutual desire for independence need not be inconsistent traits. No self-respecting nation can or should accept the proposition that it should always be economically dependent upon any other nation. Let us recognize once and for all that the only basis for a sound and healthy relationship between our two proud peoples is to find a pattern of economic interaction which is beneficial to both our countries and which respects Canada's right to chart its own economic course. We must also build a new spirit of partnership within the western hemisphere that we share together. It has been said that Canada is bounded "on the north by gold, on the west by the East, on the east by history, and on the south by friends".

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: We hope that will always be the case. We hope it will be the case not only with respect to the United States, your immediate neighbour on the south, but with respect to all your southern neighbours, and ours, who are bound by the great forces of geography and history which are distinctive to the New World. But geography and history alone do not make a community. A true community must be a living entity in which the individuality of each member is a source of pride to all members, in which the unity of all is a source of strength to each. And the great community of the Americas cannot be complete without the participation of Canada. That is why we have been encouraged by the recent decisions of Canada to upgrade its participation as an observer in the Organization of American States to ambassadorial status and to apply for membership in the Inter-American Development Bank. For both of these institutions made the abstract concept of community within the Americas a living reality.

A sound concept of community is also important in another international area that we share, the Atlantic Alliance. Just one month after my inauguration as President of the United States, I observed that a new spirit of co-operation within that alliance was essential as we began a new search for co-operation between East and West. The recent agreements concerning Berlin, and the fact, for example, that thousands of families were reunited this Easter for the first time in many years, are among the first fruits of a new era of East-West negotiation.

But, as we seek better relations with our adversaries, it becomes all the more important to strengthen the alliances with our friends. We must never forget that the strength and the unity of the West has been an indispensable element in helping to bring about the new era of negotiation with the East. That is why we began our round of summit talks last December by meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada, and then with the leaders of other close allies. This is why our East-West conversations will always be accompanied by full and genuine consultations within the Atlantic Alliance.

This alliance began as a way of pooling military resources. Today, it is a way of pooling our intellectual and our diplomatic resources as well. Like our federal approaches to nationhood, like our Canadian-American brotherhood, like our inter-American neighbourhood, the Atlantic Alliance has achieved a creative unity in which the individuality of its members is respected and advanced.

Let us now turn to the world as a whole, for this is where the challenge of building a true community will be most difficult and most important. We, in Canada and the United States, have always been proud to live in what is called the New World. Today there is a new world coming for everyone who lives on this globe. It is our responsibility to make this new world a better world than the world we have known. Canadians and Americans have fought and died together in two world wars in this century. We live now in what has been called a post-war era. But mankind has known a long succession of post-war eras. And each one of them has turned out to be a pre-war era as well. The challenge we face today is to build a permanent post-war era, an era of lasting peace.

My visit to Ottawa comes midway between my visits to Peking and Moscow. In many respects these journeys are very different. In the People's Republic of China, we opened a new dialogue after 22 years of virtually no communication. In the Soviet Union, there is an opportunity to bring a continuing dialogue to productive conclusions. But in their central aim these journeys to Peking and Moscow are alike. Neither visit is directed against anyone, adversary or ally. Both are for the betterment of everyone, for the peace of all mankind. However, we must not allow the fact of summit meetings to create any unrealistic euphoria.

The responsibility for building peace rests with special weight upon the great powers. Whether the great powers fulfil that responsibility depends not on the atmospherics of their diplomacy but on the realities of their behavior. Great powers must not treat a period of detente as an interlude between periods of tension. Better relations among all nations require restraint by great nations, both in dealing with each other and in dealing with the rest of the world. We can agree to limit arms. We can declare our peaceful purposes. But neither the limitation of arms nor the declaration of peaceful purposes will bring peace if, directly or indirectly, the aggressive use of existing weapons is encouraged. The great powers have a responsibility for the aggressive actions of those to whom they give the means of embarking on such action. The great powers must use their influence to halt aggression, not to encourage it. The structure of world peace cannot be built unless the great powers join together to build it. Its strength will grow only as all nations, of all political and social systems, come to accept its validity and sustain its vitality. This does not mean the great powers must always agree.

We expect to continue to have profound philosophical and diplomatic differences with the Soviet Union and with the People's Republic of China in a number of areas. But, through opening new lines of communication, we hope to increase the chance that in the future we shall talk about our differences and not fight about them. As we have prepared for both these journeys the experience of Canada has been most helpful. I am grateful to both the Prime Minister and to the Opposition Leader, Mr. Stanfield, for sharing their insights with us as we embarked on these endeavours. As we continue together our common quest for a better world order, let us apply the lessons we have learned so well on this continent: that we can walk our own road in our own way without moving farther apart; that we can grow closer together without growing more alike; that peaceful competition can produce winners without producing losers; that success for some need not mean setbacks for the rest; that a rising tide will lift all of our boats; that to go forward at all is to go forward together; that the enemy of peace is not independence but isolation; that the way to peace is an open world.

And let us remember too, these truths that we have found together, that variety can mean vitality; that diversity can be a force for progress; and that our ultimate destiny is indivisible.

When I spoke at the St. Lawrence seaway ceremonies in 1969, I borrowed some words from the monument there which I had joined Queen Elizabeth in dedicating just ten years before. That monument, as its inscription puts it:

> bears witness to the common purpose of two nations whose frontiers are the frontiers of friendship, whose ways are the ways of freedom, whose works are the works of peace.

The truth to which the inscription testifies is of profound importance to people everywhere in this world.

For the ability of our two nations, Canada and the United States, to preserve the frontiers of friendship, to walk in the ways of freedom, and to pursue the works of peace provides example and encouragement to all who seek these same objectives, wherever they may live.

There is nothing more exciting than a time of new beginnings. A member of this body caught that spirit when he spoke in Parliament about the beginnings of Canadian nationhood 100 years ago. Listen to him:

> Blood pulsed in our veins, new hopes fired our hearts, new horizons lifted and widened, new visions came to us in the night watches.

May that same sense of excitement inspire our two nations as we help lead the world to new beginnings today.

Hon. Lucien Lamoureux (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, it is my responsibility to adjourn this historic meeting. I do so with a feeling of having participated in a most significant occasion in the history of the Parliament of Canada.

You have come to this country, Sir, as the head of state of our closest neighbour. In this capacity you have engaged in discussions with our government. It is the confident hope of all members and senators that these discussions will be fruitful.

It gives us particular pleasure that you have also come to the Parliament of Canada. We Canadians bear many similarities to your great people and one of the most significant lies in the fact that both our countries have free and open legislative bodies where the issues of the day are discussed and decided upon.

• (1540)

Assembled in this chamber are the representatives of all the citizens of Canada. It is on their behalf that I thank you, Mr. President, for the great honour you have paid us by coming with Mrs. Nixon to address us on this day and for the notable speech you have delivered to us.

Mr. President, my colleagues of the Senate and the House of Commons are gratified by the cordial sentiments you have just expressed with such sincerity, vigour and eloquence.

Mr. President, we are honoured by your presence here, and that of Mrs. Nixon. The Senate and the House of Commons therefore unite to express the wish that your visit to Ottawa will strengthen the friendship which already so closely links the United States and Canada.

TABLING OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES ON GREAT LAKES WATER QUALITY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table in the two official languages the text of an agreement between Canada and the United States of America on Great Lakes water quality, signed in Ottawa on April 15, 1972, which came into force on the same day.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—TRAINING CAMPUS

Question No. 9—Mr. Rowland:

1. Has a decision been made to build a complete training campus for the Ministry of Transport and, if so, where will it be located?

2. How much notice will be given to permanent staff at the present schools of the intention to move their location?

3. Will alternative employment be offered to permanent staff at the present schools if they do not wish to change their location?

4. If permanent employees are forced to move to the new location, what arrangements as regards removal expenses will be made?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. N/A

3. N/A

4. N/A

TENDERS FOR PURCHASE OF SPECTACLE FRAMES

Question No. 11—Mr. Marshall:

Under Department of Supply and Services News Release C-495, what tenders were submitted for Special Spectacle Frames GF-10001-1-D350?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): The AOCO Ltd. of Belleville, Ont. and the Defence Research Board have been developing these Combat Spectacle Frames, for wear under gas masks, since 1963. As a consequence the AOCO company was the only one invited to quote on the requirement. AOCO Limited submitted a cost breakdown to support its tendered price of $18,400 for 2,200 pr. of spectacle frames and it was reviewed by the DSS and considered reasonable and acceptable based on examination of the Company's operating costs and production forecasts.

CO-ORDINATION OF INFORMATION BETWEEN MANPOWER COUNSELLORS AND UIC INTERVIEWERS

Question No. 18—Mr. Marshall:

What terms of reference are laid down by the government to co-ordinate information and assistance to the unemployed between Manpower counsellors and UIC skilled, trained interviewers?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): When unemployed workers make application for unemployment insurance benefits, they are referred to a Canada Manpower Centre if they require the services provided by the Centre and have not contacted it prior to applying for benefit. Subsequently, if the Unemployment Insurance Commission interviewers determine that claimants who have not recently contacted a Centre are in need of the services provided by the Centres, appointments are made for the claimants to be interviewed by Manpower Counsellors. Also, Canada Manpower Centres provide Unemployment Insurance Commission interviewers with current labour market information. Canada Manpower Centres and Unemployment Insurance Commission offices provide the public with pamphlets, application forms and other material dealing with the programs and services of the other organization. A committee of officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration has recently been established to investigate further means of co-ordination between the two organizations to provide greater assistance to the unemployed.

PEI—PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Question No. 24—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Did the Dominion Bureau of Statistics report that at the end of September 1971, the number of persons employed by the Prince Edward Island Government was 4,366?

2. Was this figure later amended and, if so, what was the revised figure?

3. If an error occurred, how and by whom was it brought to the attention of Statistics Canada?

4. What other examples of errors in statistics on provincial government employment have been made by Statistics Canada or the Dominion Bureau of Statistics Canada in the past ten years?

Questions

5. If such an error was made in the Prince Edward Island figures, was the reason for same investigated and, if so (a) by whom (b) with what result?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. Yes.

2. The Province of Prince Edward Island was informed of the revised figure. The next issue of the publication concerned, "Provincial Government Employment", (published quarterly), scheduled for release in the latter part of March 1972 (covering the 4th quarter of 1971) will show the revised data for the end of September 1971.

The revised figure is 3,620.

3. Analysis of the data at Statistics Canada brought the error to light, and also, the Prince Edward Island Civil Service Commission brought it to the attention of Statistics Canada.

4. Statistics Canada is not aware of any other errors which may have occurred in the past ten years in its statistics on provincial government employment.

5. (a) Yes. The Government's Division of Statistics Canada investigated. (b) Additional editing checks of employment data have been instituted prior to publication of data by Statistics Canada.

NUMBER OF PERSONS IN RECEIPT OF OLD AGE SECURITY PAYMENTS AND GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 27—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): (Supplementary)

1. How many persons in Canada, by provinces, are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension?

2. Of the recipients of the Old Age Security pension, how many persons in Canada, by provinces, are in receipt of the Guaranteed Income Supplement?

3. Of those receiving the Guaranteed Income Supplement, how many persons in Canada, by provinces are receiving the full amount?

4. What is the average amount, in Canada, and by provinces, being received as a Guaranteed Income Supplement by recipients of the Old Age Security pension?

5. Do the answers to the above questions take into consideration persons living outside of Canada who are in receipt of the Old Age Security pension and, if so, how many of such persons are there, and if they are considered as belonging to the various provinces what is the number for each province?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Newfoundland, 32,692; Prince Edward Island, 12,363; Nova Scotia, 72,932; New Brunswick, 54,797; Quebec, 420,153; Ontario, 646,485; Manitoba, 96,937; Saskatchewan, 94,984; Alberta, 118,655; British Columbia, 205,190; Northwest Territ., 848; Yukon, 512. National, 1,756,548.

2. Newfoundland, 27,471; Prince Edward Island, 9,502; Nova Scotia, 48,854; New Brunswick, 37,001; Quebec, 258,-614; Ontario, 305,093; Manitoba, 57,321; Saskatchewan, 56,715; Alberta, 69,186; British Columbia, 107,255; Northwest Territ., 742; Yukon, 314. National, 978,068.

3. Newfoundland, 19,769; Prince Edward Island, 5,114; Nova Scotia, 26,926; New Brunswick, 21,205; Quebec, 147,-795; Ontario, 128,662; Manitoba, 26,417; Saskatchewan, 25,926; Alberta, 33,122; British Columbia, 48,605; Northwest Territ., 631; Yukon, 222. National, 484,394.

4. Newfoundland, $49; Prince Edward Island, $46; Nova Scotia, $47; New Brunswick, $45; Quebec, $47; Ontario, $42; Manitoba, $44; Saskatchewan, $43; Alberta, $45; British Columbia, $43; Northwest Territories, $55; Yukon, $55; National, $44. N.B.—The figures above are given on a monthly basis.

5. Yes. As of December 31, 1971, the latest month for which figures are available, there were 44,841 persons in receipt of the Old Age Security pension outside of Canada. Some of these pensioners would be absent temporarily, and others on a permanent basis. Some might be receiving a Guaranteed Income Supplement, which is payable for the first six months of absence following departure from Canada, but no figures are available. The breakdown by province of last residence is as follows: Newfoundland, 114; Prince Edward Island, 90; Nova Scotia, 420; New Brunswick, 501; Quebec, 3,516; Ontario, 6,228; Manitoba, 699; Saskatchewan, 617; Alberta, 766; British Columbia, 2,806; Northwest Territories, 2; Yukon, 7. National, 15,766. N.B.—The figures above are as of December 1971.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—NUMBER OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES IN RECEIPT OF PENSIONS

Question No. 37—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many retired employees of the Canadian National Railways are in receipt of pensions of less than $25 per month?

2. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25 per month?

3. How many are in receipt of a pension of $25.01 to $29.99 per month (b) $30 to $39.99 per month (c) $40 to $49.99 per month (d) $50 to $59.99 per month (e) $60 to $69.99 per month (f) $70 to $79.99 per month (g) $80 to $89.99 per month (h) $90 to $99.99 per month (i) $100 to $124.99 per month (j) $125 to $149.99 per month (k) $150 to $199.99 per month (l) $200 to $299.99 per month (m) $300 per month and over?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport: The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The information shown being as of Decembpr 31, 1971. 1. Number of pensioners receiving less than $25 a month, 281.

2. Number of pensioners receiving $25 a month, 248.

3. Number of pensioners in receipt of pensions of: (a) $25.01 to $29.99 a month, 195; (b) $30 to $39.99 a month, 421; (c) $40 to $49.99 a month, 663; (d) $50 to $59.99 a month, 2,303; (e) $60 to $69.99 a month, 858; (f) $70 to $79.99 a month, 691; (g) $80 to $89.99 a month 627; (h) $90 to $99.99 a month 638;(i) $100 to $124.99 a month 1,799; (j) $125 to $149.99 a month, 1,886; (k) $150 to $174.99 a month, 2,033; (l) $175 to $199.99 a month 1,912; (m) $200 to $299.99 a month, 6,441; (n) $300 and over, 5,093. In a number of cases the amounts of pensions paid by Canadian National Railways do not represent the total pensions payable to employees for railway service. Pensions payable by the CNR to international employees (service in both Canada and the United States) relate to their service in Canada only. Such employees also receive annuities payable under the U.S. Railroad Retirement Act or the Social Security Act for service performed in the United States. For example, in the group receiving pensions of under $25 from the CNR, there are 31 former international employees who also receive U.S. Railroad Retirement or Social Security annuities in respect of CNR service rendered in the United States. The balance of this group consists of employees who elected early retirement (before age 65) with reduced basic ($25) pensions, and employees who had very short service and small contributions.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

Question No. 82—Mr. Coates:

Did the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Transportation make a recommendation on May 6, 1970, to the effect that special regulations be made to establish and provide for the payment of special transportation and distribution assistance to shippers and consignees under Section 6 of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and, if so, have such regulations been produced and, if so, when and what has been the total amount of assistance provided to shippers and consignees under these regulations to date?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Transportation made a recommendation on May 6, 1970, to the effect that regulations be made to provide special transportation assistance to users under the terms of Section 6 of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. Order-in-Council P.C. 1970-2015 of November 17, 1970, provided for extra subsidies to common carrier truckers.

TRAINING OF BRITISH SOLDIERS IN CANADA FOR FIGHTING IN IRELAND

Question No. 176—Mr. Caouette:

Does the Canadian government intend to allow or does it allow British soldiers to train in Canada for later fighting in Ireland and, if so, in what manner does the government consider it possible to remain neutral in the conflict between the United Kingdom and Ireland?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Members of the British Armed Forces have trained in Canada on a relatively small scale for the past ten years. In August 1971, an Agreement was signed between the Governments of Canada and of the United Kingdom covering this existing training and providing for increased use of Canadian military training facilities by British soldiers. Under the terms of the Agreement, British training in Canada will involve a range of activities from flying instruction to training in the use of tank guns, artillery and anti-tank weapons. This training is carried out by the British forces within the context of their NATO obligations, and is not designed to enhance their capabilities in support of the civilian authority in Northern Ireland. The Canadian Government has, of course, no control over the subsequent assignment of these or any other British forces outside Canada. This program of training should be viewed in the context of Canadian and British membership in NATO as a part of a long-standing tradition of bilateral co-operation in the defence field.

CFB SUMMERSIDE, PEI—TENDERS FOR INSTALLATION OF FURNACES

Question No. 178—Mr. McQuaid:

2. To whom was the contract for installation awarded and at what price?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes (a) tenders were invited from all firms in the area known to be in a position to carry out the work. Nine firms were invited; (b) three tenders were received; (c) and (d) Johnston's Limited, Summerside, $15,750; D. B. & J. (1971 Inc.) Charlottetown, $23,700; F. Everett Cameron, Summerside, $15,551.50.

2. Contract for $15,551.50 awarded to the lowest tenderer, F. Everett Cameron.

LOUISBURG, N.S.—PROPOSED AERODROME SITE

Question No. 179—Mr. Forrestall:

Has a proposal been made to the government that a small private aerodrome be built in the area near Louisburg, Nova Scotia, to serve industry and to attract tourists who fly their own light aircraft and, if so, what steps will the Minister of Transport take to ensure that all licensing criteria and zoning requirements are met?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No formal proposal has been made to the Department of Transport that a private aerodrome be built near Louisburg. Interest in such a scheme has been expressed to the Department of Transport by the Louisburg District Planning and Development Commission and by the Canadian Owners and Pilots Association. Regional officials of the Transport Department are providing technical assistance in this matter. If or when a formal proposal is received, the Transport Department will inspect the site and advise the applicant if all licensing criteria and zoning requirements would be able to be met.

STRONTIUM-90 LEVEL IN MILK

Question No. 183—Mr. Forrestall:

REDUCED LANDING FEES AT INTERNATIONAL AIRPORTS

Question No. 184—Mr. Forrestall:

1. With respect to the reply to Question No. 132 at page 1277 of Hansard dated November 18, 1970, is the government in a position to indicate the results of the program to determine whether reduced landing fees at international airports would attract trans-oceanic flights for technical stop purposes?

2. Did the results of this program indicate the possibility of including the Halifax International Airport on a trial basis or a permanent basis?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The program of reduced landing fees for technical stop purposes to attract trans-oceanic flights to Canada achieved its objectives at Gander International Airport only.

2. The results of the program indicate little potential for extending the program at this time to Halifax International Airport or any other international airport.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES IN DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION

Question No. 189—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many full-time employees were on the payroll of the Department of Manpower and Immigration (excluding those engaged in immigration activities), as of April 1, 1966 and April 1, 1971, separately for Ottawa headquarters and elsewhere?

2. How many full-time employees were on the payroll of the National Employment Service as of April 1, 1964, separately for Ottawa headquarters and elsewhere?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. April 1, 1966—Ottawa Headquarters, 563; Field Staff, 5,088; April 1, 1971—Ottawa Headquarters, 953; Field Staff 5,947. It should be pointed out that comparisons between these two time periods may be misleading. Organizational changes took place between 1966 and 1971 which resulted in many positions, related to immigration activities, being transferred elsewhere in the Department. For example, in 1968 130 positions comprising the Immigration registry and stenographic pool were transferred to Departmental Administration.

2. It is not possible for this Department from records available to answer this part of the question. In 1964, the staff of the National Employment Service were associated with those administering the Unemployment Insurance Act and provided from Vote 30 of the Department of Labour.

Questions

PEI—FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO CONSTRUCTION OF STARCH FACTORY

Question No. 196—Mr. MacQuarrie:

1. Have any requests been made to the Government of Canada for financial assistance in the construction of a starch factory in Prince Edward Island and, if so, what has been the response?

2. Is the Government of Canada assisting in any way in any plans to erect starch factories in the Maritime Provinces as an aid to the potato industry?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion as follows: 1. No.

2. Not at the present time.

NORTHUMBERLAND FERRY SERVICE—ALTERNATIVE LOADING DOCK AT CARIBOU, N.S.

Question No. 205—Mr. MacLean:

What action, if any, is the Department of Transport taking to provide an alternative loading dock at Caribou, Nova Scotia, for the Northeumberland Ferry service?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): At this time, the Department of Transport is not considering any alternative loading dock at Caribou, Nova Scotia, for the Northumberland Ferry Service. However, an additional facility including a wharf is being built at Caribou for the fishing vessels and pleasure craft that previously used the ferry dock. This will leave the present loading dock for the use of the Northumberland Ferry Service.

DUTIES OF G. W. DOUCET, PARIS, FRANCE

Question No. 213—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What are the duties of G. W. Doucet while in Paris with the Commodity, Trade Policy Branch of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

2. What agricultural background, with particular reference to production, has he?

3. What is his salary?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Mr. Doucet has been seconded from the Commodity Trade Policy Branch of the Department to the Trade Commissioner Service while he is Paris. His duties, therefore are essentially those of a Trade Commissioner and involve the promotion of Canadian agricultural exports in France and reporting on French agricultural developments. In addition, because of his knowledge and experience in agricultural trade policy within the Department, he is also engaged in agricultural trade policy issues arising between Canada and France as well as those relating to the role of France within the European Economic Community.

2. Mr. Doucet has spent several years in the Agriculture Division, Commodity Trade Policy Branch of the Department. During this period, he has dealt with a wide range of problems relating to both domestic and international agricultural policy. Through this work he has familiarized himself with the production and marketing problems and potential of Canadian agriculture.

3. The salary range is $13,434 to $15,725.

[Mr. Perrault.]

TRANS-CANADA COMPUTER COMMUNICATIONS NETWORK

Question No. 217—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. What consideration is being given by the government to develop a Trans-Canada Computer Communications Network?

2. What kind of measures will the government take to assure that the trunk computer communications network will be entirely Canadian owned and controlled?

3. What immediate steps are being considered by the government to prevent future takeovers by foreign companies in the computer/communications field?

4. To date, has the government given research and development grants to (a) Consolidated Computer Ltd. (b) IBM Canada Ltd. (c) Control Data Canada Ltd. (d) Univac Division Sperry Rand Corp. and, if so, what amount in each case?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Communications and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. The Government through the Computer/Communications Task Force has a comprehensive set of studies currently underway. These studies are aimed at the orderly, rational and efficient development of the computer utilities concept in a Canadian setting. (The term "Trans-Canada Computer Communications Network" used by the Science Council in their recent report is an appropriate description for one aspect of what eventually could become an integrated network of Canadian computer utilities.) The final report of this Task Force containing its detailed recommendations is expected by the Government by the end of March 1972, at which point the Government will give it consideration.

2. The report of the Computer/Communications Task Force will contain detailed recommendations concerning the necessity for, and appropriate measures to ensure Canadian ownership and control of the Canadian Computer/Communications Network.

3. Pending the receipt of the Computer/Communications Task Force's report, no special steps are currently planned in the field of computer communications to prevent takeovers by foreign companies in this area.

4. As of April 4, 1972, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has given research and development grants under the PAIT Program to: (a) Consolidated Computer Limited, $929,940; (c) Control Data Canada Limited, $6,624,833. No research and development grants have been provided under the PAIT Program to: (b) IBM Canada Limited; (d) Univac Division—Sperry Rand Corporation. Section 13 of the Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act prohibits the divulgence of information concerning any corporation.

CLOSING OF CANADIAN FORCES BASES

Question No. 229—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

1. What criteria or formula are used by the government in determining its base consolidation policy?

2. What is the final formula used in closing Canadian Forces Bases?

3. Is it part of the procedure, prior to making the final decision, to consult with both municipal and provincial authorities in the immediate, affected localities?

4. Does the government consider that defence spending is an effective way of maintaining economic stability, particularly in designated areas of Canada?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Defence and Regional Economic Expansion as follows: 1. Many factors are taken into consideration in determining base consolidation policy. Some of these are changes in military commitments and international agreements, changes in weapons, availability of resources, reduction in force levels, as well as condition of real property and economy of base operation.

2. When it has been decided that a base should be vacated, a public announcement is made approximately one year in advance of the closure. Operational units are moved to new locations when facilities are available, and military and civilian staffs prepare the base for disposal. If the property is to be declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, the Corporation is alerted to the basic plan. If the base is not disposed of by the closure date, the facilities are placed on a "caretaker status" and a rear party is charged with its security and care after that date. As base activities run down, military personnel excess to requirements are posted to vacancies at other bases and civilian personnel are offered vacancies, if available, elsewhere in the Public Service; and Canada Manpower Centres and the Department of Manpower and Immigration provide assistance for those who do not remain in the public service.

3. Local municipal and provincial officials are advised of the decision before the public announcement is made.

4. Yes, provided the primary purposes of the spending are not jeopardized. Defence spending, like other forms of expenditure can, in principle, be used to help maintain economic stability.

UNITED NATIONS VOTING

Question No. 234—Mr. Robinson:

1. Is there a deadline for submissions to the Secretary-General of the United Nations regarding alternative voting schemes and, if so, what is it?

2. Does the government have any information as to the length of time required for research to determine how alternative voting schemes would affect the results of votes in the General Assembly?

3. Will the federal government advise if research will be carried out to determine the influence Canada would have under an alternative voting scheme and, if so (a) who will carry out the research (b) when will it be commenced?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. During the 25th Session of the United Nations General Assembly, a resolution was passed which requested the Secretary-General to invite Member States to communicate to him, before July 1, 1971, their views and suggestions on the review of the Charter of the United Nations. There was no request for submission of specific proposals concerning Charter review.

2. Because of the great number of factors which could be taken into account in any alternate voting scheme, and the diversity of the United Nations membership, an indefinite length of time would be required for research to determine how such schemes would affect the results of votes in the General Assembly.

3. Alternate voting schemes have been examined by some scholars and institutions interested in suggesting changes in UN voting methods. At present the Government has no plans for additional research in this area.

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Question No. 235—Mr. Robinson:

Has the General Assembly of the United Nations passed a resolution calling on member nations to submit proposals for revision of the United Nations Charter and, if so, will the federal government consider the advisability of making representations to the effect that voting not be based on the one-nation one-vote idea, but rather on the basis of (a) population (b) national wealth (c) standard of living (d) literacy, or some other criteria or combination of these factors?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On December 11, 1970 the United Nations, with Canada casting an assenting vote, passed Resolution 2697 entitled "Need to consider suggestions regarding review of the Charter of the UN." This resolution requested Member States to communicate suggestions on the review of the UN Charter. The Government plans to submit a reply to the Secretary-General, but has not yet decided whether or not comments on an alternative voting scheme will be part of that reply.

UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Question No. 236—Mr. Robinson:

Will the federal government consider the advisability of sponsoring a resolution proposing the revision of the United Nations Charter so that the U.N. response to aggression will be automatic and not the subject of delay through prolonged debate?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The government is not considering sponsoring such a resolution. The UN Special Committee on Defining Aggression has had its mandate extended for a fifth time but an agreement among member states on a definition of aggression does not appear to be forthcoming in the foreseeable future. Until such a definition can be agreed upon it is doubtful if any revision of the UN Charter in this area would be acceptable to the majority of members.

LIBRARY CENTRES

Question No. 247—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many Library Centres has Canada throughout the world for cultural exchange and how many additional Library Centres are contemplated?

2. How many Library Centres do other nations have in Canada and where is each located?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Canada has two library centres abroad, one in Mexico City and one in Paris. All Canadian Embassies and High Commissions have libraries of Canadian books, which in most cases are available to the public for consultation. The Embassy in Washington and the High Commission in London maintain large libraries from which books may be borrowed. No additional library centres are being considered at the present time.

2. The United States Information Service maintains an Information Centre with a library in Ottawa. The Goethe Institute, which is supported by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, maintains cultural centres in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. The Alliance Française, which receives support from the Government of France, has 23 branches in Canada, which all have libraries. Embassies and High Commissions of many other countries in Ottawa have reading rooms in their chancery premises open to the general public.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY FROM MONTMAGNY TO NEW BRUNSWICK BORDER

Question No. 252—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

During the fiscal year 1971-72, did the federal government give financial aid for the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway from Montmagny, Quebec to the New Brunswick border and, if so, under what agreement and in what amount?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Yes. Under the terms of the Trans-Canada Highway Agreement whereby payment of accounts for work completed to December 31, 1970, could be claimed, subject to audit, until May 31, 1971. The amount to date during the 1971-1972 fiscal year is $7,506.82.

FAMILY INCOME DISTRIBUTION

Question No. 263—Mr. Orlikow:

In the years 1957 and 1967, what percentage of the total money income was received by the (a) lowest one-fifth (b) second lowest fifth (c) third lowest fifth (d) fourth lowest fifth (e) highest fifth of all family units?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: If all families and unattached individuals are ranked by the size of their money income and divided into 5 groups of equal number or quintiles, the share of money income received by each one fifth of family units was estimated to be as follows:

Lowest quintile	4.2%	4.2%
Second quintile	11.9%	11.4%
Middle quintile	18.0%	17.8%
Fourth quintile	24.5%	24.6%
Highest quintile	41.4%	42.0%

*Includes farm families who were excluded in the 1957 estimates; their inclusion affects the figures only to the extent of lowering the share of income going to the lower fifths by a few tenths of a percentage point and raising the share of income of the top fifth by thp same figure. It is estimated that if the figures had been completely comparable, the distribution would have been substantially the same.

[Mr. Sharp.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Question No. 267—Mr. Hellyer:

How many persons were drawing Unemployment Insurance benefits as of January 31, 1972?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: Information as requested is not available. However, on January 31, 1972 there were 826,996 claimants registered for unemployment insurance benefits.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION

Question No. 280—Mr. Robinson:

1. How long has Canada been a member of the International Civil Aviation Organization and what are the obligations of membership?

2. How many countries belong to the International Civil Aviation Organization and are individual countries bound by the recommendations of the majority of the membership?

3. Has the ICAO made any recommendations about skyjacking and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The International Civil Aviation Organization, located in Montreal, was created by the Convention on International Civil Aviation (the Chicago Convention of 1944) which was signed by Canada on December 7, 1944. ICAO officially came into existence on April 4, 1947, with Canada as a charter member. The aims and objectives of ICAO are to develop the principles and techniques of international air navigation and to foster the planning and development of international air transport so as to: (a) ensure the safe and orderly growth of international civil aviation throughout the world; (b) encourage the arts of aircraft design and operation for peaceful purposes; (c) encourage the development of airways, airports and air navigation facilities for international civil aviation; (d) meet the needs of the peoples of the world for safe, regular, efficient and economical air transport; (e) prevent economic waste caused by unreasonable competition; (f) ensure that the rights of contracting states are fully respected and that every contracting state has a fair opportunity to operate international airlines; (g) avoid discrimination between contracting states; (h) promote safety of flight in international air navigation; (i) promote generally the development of all aspects of international civil aeronautics.

Membership in ICAO obligates states to comply with the provisions of the Convention on International Civil Aviation. Members are also obliged to finance the operation of the Organization through annual assessments; Canada's 1972 assessment is $US278,959.29. Canada, as host government, also underwrites a substantial part of the costs of the space rented for the ICAO Headquarters Building. ICAO has decided to move into new premises in Montreal in late 1973 or early 1974 and the Canadian Government has agreed to make an annual grant of $1.1 million towards the cost of renting this building.

2. One hundred and twenty-two countries are members of ICAO.

There is no mechanism for ensuring that member states adhere to the recommendations of the ICAO Assembly

(all member states) or the ICAO Council (27 member states). Last April the United States of America and Canada co-sponsored a draft convention providing for the enforcement of international legal obligations relating to unlawful interference with civil aviation but the ICAO Assembly transferred this proposal to its inactive list of subjects because of opposition from a number of member states.

3. ICAO has been actively involved with the question of skyjacking and other related matters affecting the safety of international civil aviation for some time. Under ICAO auspices the Convention on Offences and Certain Other Acts Committed on Board Aircraft was signed in Tokyo on September 14, 1963. Canada ratified this convention on November 7, 1969. The Convention came into effect on December 4, 1969.

The Seventeenth Session (Extraordinary) of the ICAO Assembly, held in Montreal from July 16 to 30, 1970, had for its agenda the single item calling for the "development of adequate security specifications and practices, for application by ICAO States in international civil aviation, aimed at the protection of air passengers, civil aviation personnel and civil aircraft by (a) preventing criminal action of any kind that may endanger the safety of air transport and (b) consideration of arrangements under which those responsible for criminal actions endangering civil air transport can be brought to justice." Two Diplomatic Conferences on matters related to skyjacking followed which resulted in: (a) the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft signed at The Hague on December 16, 1970; (b) the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts against the Safety of Civil Aviation signed at Montreal on September 23, 1971. Canada will ratify The Hague and Montreal Conventions as soon as Parliament approves the necessary amendments to the Criminal Code tabled recently in the House of Commons. Neither of these conventions have beeen ratified by the required number of countries to have it come into effect.

The ICAO Council has also set up a Committee on Unlawful Interference with International Civil Aviation and its Facilities to deal with problems of (1) unalwful seizure of aircraft and (2) sabotage or armed attack directed against aircraft used in international air transport or ground facilities used by international air transport. Canada is not a member of this committee.

MARKET DEVELOPMENT OF GRAINS AND OILSEEDS

Question No. 282—Mr. Robinson:

What increase in sales of grains and oilseeds is anticipated as a result of the new federal financial incentives program during 1972-73?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister Responsible for Canadian Wheat Board): The new Federal Market Development Program for Grains and Oilseeds, of which financial assistance to the private sector of the grains industry is a major element, has the twofold aim of maintaining the level of Canadian sales in present markets as well as locating and developing new opportunities in areas where our commercial sales can be increased.

Activities are being concentrated on those markets in which we believe prospects are best for establishing a solid commercial footing. Because the central thrust of the program is to assist private firms, associations and similar entities to identify and develop viable commercial market opportunities, the increase in sales resulting from the program will be the cumulative total of the results of all the individual projects. Until more experience is gained in the execution of such projects it is not possible to anticipate with any precision what that total will be during 1972-73.

Although in a limited number of cases the impact of projects may be indirect and therefore difficult to measure in terms of increased sales, in most instances the sponsors of projects are required to show convincing evidence that support of their project will yield a very high ratio of benefit (i.e. a sustained increase in Canadian grains and oilseeds sales) in relation to cost.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO CARRY OUT PROGRAM CONCERNING HARD-CORE WELFARE RECIPIENTS

Question No. 283—Mr. Robinson:

1. Will the government consider the advisability of providing municipalities with support funds to carry out a program regarding hard-core welfare recipients who have previously been rejected from employment and are considered unemployable?

2. Will the government consider the advisability of providing incentives to welfare recipients to become gainfully employed?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Under Part III of the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government will share in the cost to provinces and municipalities of undertaking work activity programs to prepare for the entry or the return to employment of persons in need or persons likely to become persons in need who, because of environmental, personal or family reasons, have unusual difficulty in obtaining or retaining employment or in improving, through technical, vocational or rehabilitation programs, their ability to obtain or retain employment.

2. Provincial legislation defines the levels of income and assets permitted welfare recipients, and the trend is to provide larger earning exemptions for recipients who work.

METRIC SYSTEM

Question No. 288—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise if the program for introduction of the metric system will be co-ordinated with that of other countries embarking on the same system and in particular with that of the United States?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Metric Commission is keeping in close touch with the developments in the United States and other countries in regard to the adoption of metric standards and measurements and is studying the extent to which programs of conversion in individual industries will require to be co-ordinated with similar programs in the United States.

Questions

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVIDE LANGUAGE TRAINING OTHER THAN FRENCH AND ENGLISH

Question No. 289—Mr. Robinson:

Under the multicultural policy, will the government allot funds to provide language training in languages other than French and English?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Not at present. This matter is under investigation in a study of a Culture Development Program referred to in the document tabled in the House by the Prime Minister on October 8, 1971, and is being discussed with provincial governments.

[English]

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT ACT

Question No. 290—Mr. Robinson:

Under the Employment Support Act (a) how many applications were made (b) how many were accepted (c) how much money was paid (d) how many jobs were affected and received support?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As of March 10, 1972: (a) 1,021 applications were received by the Employment Support Board; (b) 710 applications were approved; (c) total amount approved: $10,025,728; (d) the number of jobs directly supported by the above grants, 20,055.

COMPULSORY ARBITRATION FOR DISPUTES IN ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Question No. 301—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of providing compulsory arbitration for disputes in essential services?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Compulsory arbitration for disputes in essential services would require an amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. The Government has undertaken a review of that Act, but it has not been decided yet what amendments, if any, will be presented to Parliament for approval.

FOREIGN COINAGE MINTED IN CANADA

Question No. 307—Mr. Robinson:

1. Do any foreign countries have their coinage minted in Canada and, if so (a) how many (b) what was the value to Canada of such minting (c) were the services paid for in the coinage of the realm requiring them?

2. Is all such minting carried out by the Royal Canadian Mint or does private enterprise provide any minting facilities for foreign countries?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Royal Canadian Mint is concerned: 1. (a) In 1970, the Mint produced 20 million 10-cent coin blanks for the Singapore Mint. It also obtained a two-year contract with Brazil for the production of approximately 175 million 50 centavo coin blanks. This contract will be completed in May, 1972.

In 1971, the Mint struck 2.5 million 1 Kroma coins for Iceland and 2 million 5 fils coins for Yemen.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

In 1972, the Royal Canadian Mint is striking the $10 silver and the $20 gold commemorative coins for Jamaica. (b) Income to Mint: Singapore, $43,550; Brazil, $3,930,000 (approximately); Yemen, $18,705; Iceland, $22,750; Jamaica, $600,000 (estimated). (c) Payment required in Canadian or U.S. funds.

2. Private mints may strike foreign coins.

CFB, SUMMERSIDE, PEI—INSTALLATION OF COUNTER TOPS AND SINKS

Question No. 323—Mr. McQuaid:

Were tenders recently called for the installation of counter tops and sinks at the Canadian Forces Base at Summerside, Prince Edward Island and, if so (a) how many tenders were received (b) from whom were they received (c) what was the amount of each tender (d) to whom was the contract awarded (e) in what manner were the tender calls advertised?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes. (a) Three. (b) and (c) Provincial Enterprises Inc., Summerside, $15,852; Northumberland Construction Ltd., Abram's Village, P.E.I., $13,465; Sherman Construction Co., Summerside, $10,394. (d) Contract awarded to the lowest tenderer, Sherman Construction Co. on February 28, 1972. (e) Tenders were invited from all nine firms in the area which were considered to be in a position to carry out the work required.

PURCHASE OF CORRECTION FLUID

1. For the period February 1 to 15, were any contracts awarded for the sale of correction fluid to any departments and, if so (a) were tenders called prior to the awarding of such contracts and, if so (i) how many tenders were submitted (ii) what was the amount of each tender (iii) in what way were they advertised (b) to whom was the contract awarded (c) how many gallons of correction fluid were involved?

2. When was the last contract awarded for the supplying of correction fluid, what was the amount of the contract and how many gallons of fluid were involved?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes. (a) Yes. (i) Three; (ii) $29,970; $30,520 and $31,199; (iii) Tenders were invited from all firms considered to be in a position to supply. (b) Contract awarded to the lowest bidder, Apsco Products (Canada) Ltd., Toronto on February 2, 1972. (c) The contract calls for 67,824 one ounce bottles.

2. The previous contract for 44,064 one ounce bottles of correction fluid was awarded on July 16, 1971 in the amount of $21,150 to the lowest bidder, Dixon Pencil Co., Newmarket, Ont.

PURCHASE OF BALL POINT PENS

Question No. 326—Mr. McQuaid:

1. For the period February 1 to 15, were any contracts awarded for the sale of ball point pens to any departments and, if so (a) were tenders called prior to the awarding of such contracts and, if so (i) how many tenders were submitted (ii) what was the amount of each tender (iii) in what way were they advertised (b) to whom was the contract awarded (c) how many ball point pens were involved?

2. When was the last contract awarded for the supplying of ball point pens, what was the amount of the contract and how many pens were involved?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. Yes. (a) Yes. (i) Three; (ii) $66,594; 69,015; 85,119; (iii) Tenders were requested from all firms considered to be in a position to supply. (b) The contract was awarded on February 3, 1972 to the lowest bidder Eagle North-Rite, Ltd., Montreal for $66,594. (c) 1,452,960 pens.

2. The previous contract for 364,320 ball point pens was awarded on June 25, 1971 in the amount of $18,216 to the lowest bidder, Venus Pencil Co. Ltd., Toronto.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TOWARDS CONSTRUCTION OF OVERHEAD BRIDGE AT GOLDEN, B.C.

Question No. 332—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

Did the government contribute towards the construction of a recently completed overhead bridge at Golden, British Columbia and, if so, in what amount?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: The Railway Transport Committee authorized the construction of two overhead bridges at Golden B.C. at the following locations: Golden Access Road, mileage 35.3 Mountain Subdivision C.P.R.—Order No. R-577 dated November 14, 1967; and, Highway No. 95, mileage 165.6 Windermere Subdivision C.P.R.—Order No. R-1277 dated January 30, 1968 and R-9066 dated June 9, 1970. A contribution from the Railway Grade Crossing Fund in the amount of $500,000 was authorized for each project. However, accounts for these projects have not been submitted and no payments have been made.

INCENTIVE GRANTS FOR FACILITIES IN OKANAGAN, EAST AND WEST KOOTENAY REGIONS

Question No. 334—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

1. How many grants were authorized under the Area Development Incentives Act for facilities in the Okanagan area of British Columbia, and what is the total amount of these grants?

2. Under the Regional Development Incentives Act, how many grants have been authorized by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for facilities in (a) the East Kootenay (b) the West Kootenay regions?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Fifty-seven; $19,244,139 total incentive.

2. (a) eight; (b) nine.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PLAN

Question No. 339—Mr. Hales:

1. How many student loans have been returned to the government from chartered banks as uncollectable for each year from the inception of the Canada Student Loans Plan to March 31, 1971?

2. For what amounts are these loans?

3. For what reasons were they written off as uncollectable?

4. What amount was collected by professional collection agencies and what percentage does the government pay for this professional collection service?

Questions

5. In cases where the borrower cannot be located, what methods were used to try and locate this person?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance) 1 and 2. As of June 30, 1971 the following number of claims, listed according to the year in which they were paid, had been submitted by chartered banks and other lenders in respect of defaulted loans:

Loan Year	No.	$(000)
1965/66	7	7
1966/67	110	109
1967/68	198	210
1968/69	349	396
1969/70	1318	1496
1970/71	3285	4983
Total	5267	7201

3. No defaulted loans have been written off.

4. As of June 30, 1971, $623,844 was collected by the commercial collection agency. The current fee payable is 20 per cent of amounts recovered.

5. The collection agency is responsible for locating missing borrowers. It uses all available facilities at its disposal through its branches located throughout Canada and its affiliations in other countries.

NUMBER OF CLAIMS UNDER CANADA PENSION PLAN SINCE INSTITUTION OF DISABILITY PENSIONS

Question No. 364—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Since the institution of disability pensions under the new Canada Pension Plan of February, 1970, how many claims were received by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

2. How many of these claims were (a) accepted (b) rejected?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Up to the end of February, 1972, 25,100.

2.(a) 13,696; (b) 7,190. Some of the applications rejected had not met the required minimum qualifying period of five years of contribution to the Plan, and thus were not rejected on medical grounds. In addition, 4,214 applications, most of which were received recently, are now being processed. Some are waiting special reports and other information.

ALLOCATION OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

Question No. 369—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider carrying out a study as to the percentage of the Gross National Product that should be allocated to each level of government, federal, provincial and municipal?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Each level of government, federal, provincial and municipal, spends whatever amounts are deemed appropriate and voted by the respective Houses of Parliament, Legislatures or Municipal Councils. The amount of spending voted by these representative bodies is determined independently by the political process in each jurisdiction. The federal government cannot decide what proportion of the Gross National Product should be spent by any level of government.

AUTOMOBILE SAFETY BELTS

Question No. 375—Mr. Robinson:

1. Is any research being carried out to provide a more dependable safety belt for automobiles than the lap or shoulder belt now provided?

2. Do the present lap and shoulder belts installed in automobiles meet the government standards of safety?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. There is no substantial evidence suggesting that seat belts currently provided in new Canadian automobiles require modification to improve dependability. However, there is a continuing surveillance program on seat belt performance in automobile collisions to detect possible design problems requiring attention. Considerable research is being carried out to develop means of encouraging increased seat belt usage through convenience changes and the addition of warning devices.

2. Yes.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL LIBRARY

Question No. 376—Mr. Robinson:

1. What is the number of publications and books of reference material in the National Research Council Library?

2. What is the yearly cost to maintain this service?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In so far as the National Research Council of Canada is concerned the answer is as follows: 1. 875,000 at December 31, 1971.

2. $2,303,310 for fiscal year 1970-1971.

SALE OF HMCS BONAVENTURE

Question No. 383—Mr. MacRae:

What amount was received for HMCS Bonaventure upon its disposal?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): The Crown Assests Disposal Corporation sold the HMCS Bonaventure to the highest bidder for $851,700. Prior to the sale of the Aircraft Carrier, the Department of National Defence removed from the vessel recoverable items with a value of approximately $5,000,000.

LOCATIONS OF PROPOSED ROADS TO BE BUILT UNDER ARDA PROGRAM IN ABITIBI AND TÉMISKAMINGUE CONSTITUENCIES

Question No. 393—Mr. Laprise:

What locations are proposed for roads that are to be built giving access to Crown forests in the constituencies of Abitibi and Témiskamingue under the ARDA program and by whom were the locations selected?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Under the ARDA agreement which has been signed with the Province of Quebec, it is proposed to build the following roads in the constituencies of Abitibi and Témiscaminque: (1) road to Kipawa forest; (2) road to Megiscane forest; (3) road to La Sarre forest; (4) road to Matagami forest. The last two locations are subject to consultations with La Société de Développement de la Baie James, but the locations in each case have been selected by the Province of Quebec.

SASKATCHEWAN—TREATMENT CENTRES

Question No. 399—Mr. Knight:

1. What was the expenditure for the Regina Treatment Centre for veterans in Saskatchewan during the last year of its operation?

2. In the same time period, what was the expenditure by the government for the Saskatoon Treatment Centre for veterans?

3. What was the reason for the closure of the Regina Treatment Centre?

4. Have there been additional expenditures for the Saskatoon Treatment Centre since it began operating for all of Saskatchewan and, if so, in what amount?

5. What was the number of staff in the Regina Treatment Centre?

6. What was the number of staff in the Saskatoon Treatment Centre?

7. Was additional staff hired for the Saskatoon Treatment Centre after the closure of the Regina Treatment Centre and, if so, how many?

8. What provisions have been made to avoid delay and inconvenience to veterans who normally went to the Regina Treatment Centre?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. $750,000.

2. $904,000.

3. The Centre has not been closed.

4. Although the financial administration of the Regina Treatment Services District was transferred to Saskatoon, it was necessary to transfer only one individual at a salary of approximately $7,000. Additional expenditures for the Saskatoon Treatment Centre as a result of the reorganization of the Regina District have therefore been negligible.

5. Prior to reorganization the number of staff at the Regina Treatment Centre was 12. The remaining staff, including the Senior Treatment Medical Officer, is five.

6. The number of staff in the Saskatoon Treatment Centre has remained at 67 in spite of the transfer of one individual from Regina.

7. No.

8. There have been no reports of delay or inconvenience to veterans who continue to be looked after by the DVA staff of the Treatment Services in Regina.

MOTORCYCLE BRAKE SAFETY STANDARD

Question No. 404—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to establishing performance requirements for motorcycle brake systems under motor vehicle safety standards legislation?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Yes.

NEW ARRANGEMENTS FOR BANK EMPLOYEES' PENSIONS

Question No. 411—Mr. Fairweather:

Will the Minister of Finance suggest to Canadian banks that new arrangements appear to be justified to supplement amounts paid to retired bank employees on pension in view of the fact that bank profits have been substantial lately?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It would not be appropriate to make any suggestions to Canadian banks in this matter over which the Minister of Finance has no jurisdiction. It is believed that Canadian banks have taken steps to supplement the pensions paid to former bank employees who have been retired for a considerable period of years.

CONSTRUCTION OF MULTI-PURPOSE EXHIBITION BUILDINGS

Question No. 432—Mr. Gleave:

1. How much of the $10 million for the program for the construction of multi-purpose exhibition buildings announced by the Minister of Finance in the House on October 14, 1971, has been allocated?

2. What is the provincial allocation of money under this program?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. $1,380,000.

2. Nil. Each application is assessed on its own merit, with due consideration given to the needs of the community.

ALLOCATION OF $160 MILLION SPECIAL LOAN PROGRAM

Question No. 447—Mr. Rowland:

1. How much of the $160 million for the special loan program to provinces announced by the Minister of Finance in the House on October 14, 1971, has been allocated?

2. What is the allocation, by province, of money under this program?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. and 2. All of the funds have been allocated to the provinces as detailed in Vote L192 of the Department of Finance in the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, tabled on November 19, 1971.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BROADCAST EMPLOYEES AND TECHNICIANS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the serious damage to the performance and future of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a public institution of vital importance to Canada largely supported by public funds, being caused by the failure of the corporation to reach a settlement with its striking employees despite the fact that negotiations with the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians commenced almost a year ago and that rotating strikes have continued for nearly four months.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has given the Chair due notice of his intention to request leave to move a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing the specific matter stated by him.

There is little doubt that the matter stated by the hon. member is important and of current concern to Canadians and, of course, to members of the House. At the same time, it is suggested that the matter has been raised on a number of occasions during the course of the current session. The hon. gentleman will recall, for example, that he posed a question on it in the sitting of February 21 last. Since that time the same difficulty has been raised in the House in various other ways. For example, on March 16 the matter was discussed during the adjournment proceedings on the initiative of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, and a reply was given by the Secretary of State.

It may be that in due course it will be necessary or desirable to have the House debate the question of this dispute, but it does seem to me that a motion under Standing Order 26 is not, at this moment, a suitable vehicle for such a debate. As this problem has been pending for a period of several months, it does not appear to meet the provisions of Standing Order 26 which requires that a matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration. It might be added that when determining whether a matter shall have urgent consideration Mr. Speaker shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

The decision I make at this time that the motion cannot be granted does not preclude the matter being brought forward again under Standing Order 26 at a later date. I am just making a procedural ruling to the effect that in my estimation the motion at this time does not meet all the requirements of Standing Order 26.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister about the government's policy on foreign investment which was decided upon some months ago, although it has not yet been announced. Was the specific policy discussed by the Prime Minister and the President of the United States during his recent visit, or was it discussed at some less exalted level during the visit of the delegation? If it was discussed, will the Prime Minister very briefly indicate the results of such discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there were no discussions whatsoever on the policy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is now prepared to release its policy which was decided upon a number of months ago? Is the government now prepared to announce its policy with regard to foreign investment?

Mr. Trudeau: Preparations have been continuing, as the Leader of the Opposition suggests, and we hope we will be in a position to release that policy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if I am persistent it is because of the unemployment in the country, the failure of investment to respond and the importance of removing any uncertainties. I would ask the Prime Minister what assurance he is prepared to give the House with regard to a definite time within which the government's policy on this very important subject will be announced.

Mr. Trudeau: No specific assurance as to time, but the policy announcement will come soon.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—REASONS FOR DELAY IN ANNOUNCING POLICY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the delay in announcing the policy on foreign investment is caused by editing of the background paper or is the reason for the delay that legislation and criteria for the screening agency are being prepared?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): A variety of things which, all together, will make up the totality of the government's announcement in this area.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS— DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the meeting of the Prime Minister with the President of the United States may I ask the right hon. gentleman whether there was any discussion of the trade negotiations in view of the statement made by Mr. Ziegler, I believe, that the President and the Prime Minister had agreed to review their positions. Was that statement the result of a discussion between the two heads of government on the specific matters in the trade negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the President and I did discuss trade matters and the matter of imbalance of trade. The President stated publicly his position on a long-term imbalance. He stated to me that he felt the present deadlock between the two countries should be broken out of and both of us agreed to review our positions with a view to resuming negotiations, if possible.

Mr. Lewis: Does the agreement to resume negotiations to break out of the deadlock mean that the Prime Minister informed the President of the United States that the government of Canada is prepared to grant some of the concessions or parts of some of the concessions that the United States negotiators are demanding, and did the President continue to demand that the present imbalance between Canada and the United States must be corrected, disregarding his general statement about the future which of course anyone would have to grant to any country in the world?

Mr. Trudeau: In the short-term, Mr. Speaker, the President did spell out the type of problem the United States is meeting at the present time with its balance of payments and expressed the hope which has been there since last August that various countries would help or would contribute to the United States in its effort to improve its present economic situation. I repeated that it was Canada's intention to contribute in any way we could to the improvement of their position, knowing full well that a healthy economy in the United States is pretty important to Canada. But as to the concrete aspects of what this meant on his side and on our side, we did not enter into any great details. The President showed no desire to go into the details of the negotiations, nor did I. We both agreed it would be important to prevent this non-resolution of the situation from hardening. We both agreed, as I said, that we should each review our own position.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister. During President Nixon's visit did the President advise the Canadian government that the position of the United States government as outlined by Secretary Connally on February 9 in the following words, that "the United States will seek appropriate means of reducing imbalances of trade with Canada", has changed in any way and, if so, in what way has the United States position changed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the President did not refer to this statement by Secretary Connally. As I just said to the leader of the New Democratic Party, we talked of the desire on both sides to resume negotiations. We thought that the best way of doing it was for each of us to tell our people—I assume President Nixon will tell Mr. Connally that he should review the package—that we should review the package, which we will do.

Mr. Hees: Did President Nixon assure the Canadian government that the American government does not intend to take unilateral action to correct the imbalance of trade, such as adding a 7 per cent tax on new Canadian cars entering the United States or cancelling the exemption from the interest equalization tax which Canada now enjoys, as has been widely rumoured?

Mr. Trudeau: The President of the United States made no threats to Canada, Mr. Speaker, nor did I make any threats to the United States.

Mr. Hees: Did the Prime Minister not bring up these very important matters with the President, or did he just indulge in pleasantries meaning nothing but I hope my people will vote for me and I hope I can help you get elected?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Spadina.

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—POSSIBLE REVIEW OF CANADIAN POSITION FOLLOWING PRESIDENT NIXON'S VISIT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. As a result of the talks with President Nixon, is the government now reviewing its position on the auto pact and, if so, can the Prime Minister say when a new position will be defined and made public?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did undertake to look at everything that was in our package to see if it could be changed or modified in some way which would be more acceptable to the United States and no more damaging to Canada. There was no timing set on that and there was no specific mention of what aspects of the package we would look at. I repeat, the agreement was as general as I said in my first answer. It is that we would look at our negotiating positions, and neither the President nor I went into any great detail as to what this meant other than to see if it could be possible to renew negotiations fruitfully.

Mr. Ryan: Has the Prime Minister given any direction to the relevant departments in this respect with regard to the auto pact?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the relevant ministers were informed of the substance of my talks with the President and I assume that this work is being done.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—DATE OF RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Prime Minister has suggested that the total packages are going to be reviewed. Was there an agreed upon date or a tentative date that the discussions should, hopefully, be resumed, or was a date arranged between the Prime Minister and the President at which time they would be able to convey to each other whether or not negotiations would be able to begin again soon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no date was discussed.

DISCUSSION OF UNITED STATES ANTI-TRUST AND TRADING WITH ENEMY LAWS DURING PRESIDENT NIXON'S VISIT

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of President Nixon's speech on Friday and the agreement to review trade positions, has the United States government agreed to review its anti-trust and trading with the enemy laws in view of the intruding effect they have on Canadian economic independence?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not know the question was directed to me but I think I caught the gist of it. There was certainly no agreement along those lines between the President and myself.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Can the Prime Minister indicate whether these important issues were raised—

Mr. Trudeau: What was that?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Can the Prime Minister indicate whether these important issues having to do with trading with the enemy and anti-trust laws that from time to time affect Canada's economic position were raised and whether there will be a vehicle for the resolution of these important problems?

[Mr. Ryan.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is distinguishing between important problems, and they are indeed, which are very frequently discussed between our officials and ministers both in Washington and Ottawa, but I repeat that they were not raised at the level of talks between the President and myself on Thursday or Friday.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ITEMS IN CANADIAN PROPOSALS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal about packages. I wonder whether it would be possible for the Prime Minister to let the House of Commons know what matters were included in the Canadian package, because up to now it has been as silent as Pandora's box until opened?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member is asking me for more than the President asked me. There was no discussion of the detailed contents of the package. However, I think that through a process of questioning certain answers have been obtained from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce as to so-called irritants, both on the American side and on our side. I am afraid I would have to refer the right hon. member to his answers in Hansard with regard to what those were.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I follow Hansard very carefully, I have been in the House, and this has never been revealed. The Prime Minister was talking about exchanging packages and diminishing one claim or another in return for something else, a quid pro quo. Could he not summarize—1, 2, 3, 4, 5—what these items were in this package so that Canadians as a whole would know what kind of package it really is?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think some Canadians have been astute enough to assume, for instance, that the auto pact was one of the items discussed in the package. Perhaps with a further degree of astuteness and a re-reading once again of Hansard, the right hon. member will observe other elements in the package that were mentioned by the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am no mind reader even though the Prime Minister assumes I am.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will return to the hon. member for Calgary North and other hon. members who I gather have supplementaries, but as we are still on the first topic I propose to recognize the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and then a representative of the party to my extreme left.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM WAR—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask about another aspect of the talks. In view of the recent bombing of Haiphong and other events escalating the war in Viet Nam, was there any discussion between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States of the war in Viet Nam and the possibility of bringing it to a conclusion quickly?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the President did discuss the position of his government as regards Viet Nam and he did repeat to me what is public knowledge, that he was committed to a policy of a negotiated settlement in Viet Nam with continued withdrawal of United States troops.

Mr. Lewis: As a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary Centre on a supplementary.

AIR TRANSPORT

RENEGOTIATION OF TREATY WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING ROUTES—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that western Canada, particularly Calgary and Edmonton, is badly in need of more air routes, and as the renegotiation of the bilateral air treaty with the United States which was supposed to take place in 1969 has not been concluded, was this question discussed with President Nixon when he was here last week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It was not discussed with me. I do know that officials have been discussing this problem, but I do not know whether they discussed it at this recent meeting.

Mr. Harkness: Will the Prime Minister look at this situation personally with a view to securing speedy action in view of the long delay in regard to the matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Transport has shown the degree to which he is committed to that very policy, but it is a matter, as the hon. member knows, of trying to get as good a bargain as possible for our country in negotiating these routes.

ENERGY

PROPOSED PIPELINES FROM NORTH—ACCELERATION OF TRADE IN PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS—POLLUTION THREAT—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the Prime Minister's answer to me on Thursday and in light of his answer today to the right hon. member for Prince Albert I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether there were any discussions with the President, or between officials when the President was visiting Ottawa, in reference to pipelines—I will not refer to the two routes because the Prime Minister knows what routes I am talking about—and in particular was there discussion of any policies to accelerate trade in energy products, namely, crude petroleum and natural gas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in a very general sense, yes, the problem was raised. I did raise, in front of the President, the important question of energy and the Canadian policy on energy as we would be trying to develop it. The President also raised the pollution aspect of the transportation of oil and told me that he was well aware of the situation, but at our level we did not go into the problem in any great detail. I do know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs at his level was raising this problem with Secretary Rogers.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a further supplementary dealing particularly with the matter of pollution. Did the Prime Minister make the Canadian position clear on the question of danger of pollution to the west coast and set out, from the study that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources mentioned on Thursday, that if there is to be a transport route Canada prefers a pipeline down the Mackenzie? Was that position made clear to the Americans at that time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the danger of pollution was indeed made very clear to the Americans by the government. I might add that, apart from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was also present at the meeting with Secretary Rogers when this subject was discussed.

TRADE

POSSIBLE EXCHANGE OF UNITED STATES GRAINS FOR RUSSIAN OIL AND GAS—DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, in connection with his talks with President Nixon and arising out of reports from Washington that consideration is being given there to negotiating a deal with Russia whereby the United States would take oil or gas in exchange for U.S. feed or other grains. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether this subject, which is of great importance to Canada, was discussed by himself and the President or at any level during the visit?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to reply to that question, I did raise the subject with Secretary Rogers and I was informed that there was no sort of barter deal contemplated and that if oil or gas were to be purchased from the Soviet Union it would be part of the ordinary trade carried on between the two countries.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM WAR—INQUIRING AS TO REPRESENTATIONS BY PRIME MINISTER TO PRESIDENT NIXON CONCERNING ACCELERATED U.S. BOMBING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the war in Viet Nam. In his answer to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway the Prime Minister informed us that the President had made his position clear, which I need not repeat. Did the Prime Minister raise any protest to the President of the United States about the accelerated bombing of North Viet Nam, particularly that which has gone so deeply into North Viet Nam at Hanoi and Haiphong? Was any opinion expressed by the Prime Minister on that and did he make any appeal to the President of the United States to end the bombings so that meaningful negotiations for peace can resume?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not make any such comments to the President of the United States but I do know that his government and indeed other governments are aware of Canada's well stated position in this regard.

THREAT TO WEST COAST FROM PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I understand from press reports and from what the Prime Minister has just said that the pollution problems that probably will exist on the west coast should the tanker route go through were discussed with the President of the United States and that the suggestion had been made that the matter be referred to the International Joint Commission. Were these press reports true and if they were would the Prime Minister give consideration to having the terms of reference of the International Joint Commission extended to cover this and also the general matter of marine traffic in this part of the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows, I am sure, that he cannot ask the Prime Minister to confirm or deny a press statement. Perhaps we might assume that the question has been asked directly and the Prime Minister might reply to the second part of it.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact we were going to sign on Saturday a treaty which showed the intention of both governments to come to grips with the problem of pollution, during the discussion of that I did raise the question of pollution on the west and indeed on east coasts and suggested that the matter be referred to the IJC, as the hon. member is requesting. I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs also made that suggestion very forcefully. We have implanted it in the minds of the American government and we hope some progress will be made in this respect.

DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS—COST TO TAXPAYERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that disputes in the public service seem to take a mobilized public to resolve them, I wonder if the minister intends to make a statement to the House on the continuing problem between NABET and the CBC so that we can know what progress is being made, if any, to resolve this longstanding labour dispute?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I cannot enter into an unconditional commitment as asked for by the hon. member because that could be very inopportune under the present circumstances. But if such a statement became necessary, I would do so on motions.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I will have to check Hansard but I thought the minister also was going to undertake and/or review the possibility of stating to the House whether there is an extra cost to the CBC because of the strike or whether there has been a saving to the taxpayer, and that he would make a statement so that we could clear up the confusion. As the second part of my question may I ask whether I can assume from the minister's answer that the government at this time plans to take no initiative to bring these two parties together to resolve their dispute collectively and is going to let the matter drag on?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: As to the latter question, Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member probably knows that two mediators of the Department of Labour have been working in that field for at least two or three weeks, if I am not mistaken.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES AND CANADIAN DOLLAR LEVEL—SUGGESTED STATEMENT ON NATURE OF REVIEW AND POSSIBLE ACTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance this afternoon may I direct my question to the Minister of State attached to that department. In light of the statement made last Thursday by the Minister of Finance that interest rates and the level of the Canadian dollar were under constant review with the Bank of Canada, could the minister tell the House whether his senior colleague will be making a statement in the House shortly on the nature of this review and perhaps forecasting what action the government will take with regard to interest rates as well as the value of the international monetary unit?

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): I will bring the question to the attention of the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In obtaining a reply from the minister, would the Minister of State ascertain whether we are to await a budget address to have that position reviewed in the House and if it is to be a budget address, when can we expect it?

Mr. Stanfield: He doesn't know.

HUMAN SCIENCES

PROGRAMS TO INCREASE PUBLIC EXPENDITURE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, without transgressing upon my right hon. and highly regarded friend from Prince Albert and his Pandora's Box may I ask the Secretary of State, who was once regarded as a champion of the humanities, what steps he has in mind in reference to the report of Statistics Canada to the effect that the government of this country expends 15 times more on the natural than on the human sciences, and can he advise if this country has totally committed itself to such technological efforts and, if otherwise, what programs he contemplates to increase public expenditure on the human sciences?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would think that the hon. member's very learned question normally ought to be placed on the order paper. I am not sure whether there is a place on the order paper for questions of this kind. If the hon. member thinks there is an aspect of urgency about the matter he could give the usual notice to the Chair and it would be given preference for consideration at ten o'clock.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN DEPARTMENT AND CREE INDIANS CONCERNING JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister as soon as possible, tomorrow or the next day, make a statement on motions to clarify the position between the Cree Indians in the province of Quebec and his department concerning discussions and reported statements on both sides over the James Bay project? It seems that completely opposing reports are coming from both sides and I think hon. members are entitled to—

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister should be allowed to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement on this matter now. I do not believe there is a disagreement between Quebec Indians and ourselves. The Indians are working on their side and we are having discussions with them. As recently as yesterday I met the secretary of the Indian association, Mr. Gros-Louis. Furthermore, representatives of the association are going up north to meet the Indians of the James Bay area and will report to me on their return. We are co-operating, but I do not intend to conduct discussions in their place; they are able to deal directly with the government of Quebec.

REPORTED INTENTION OF UNITED STATES TO DEPLOY NUCLEAR WEAPONS IN EUROPE—CONCURRENCE OF NATO MEMBERS—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of Defence Secretary Laird's statement that the United States is planning to deploy nuclear tactical weapons in Europe, may I ask whether this proposal has been concurred in by the Canadian government and the other members of NATO, whether there have been any discussions about this matter and what the position of the Canadian government is regarding it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that statement. I will look into the matter. I know that there was no discussion of it by the Canadian government, if that involves myself.

Mr. Douglas: Since the U.S. Bomarc nuclear missiles have been removed from Canadian soil, can the Prime Minister assure the House and country that the government does not intend to have these replaced by any other nuclear devices located on Canadian soil?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think the white paper on defence made that quite clear.

DISCUSSION OF RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT WITH PRESIDENT NIXON DURING VISIT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it is in relation to his talks with the President who was here last week. Did the Prime Minister or any minister discuss the re-establishment of the International Wheat Agreement and seek the co-operation of the United States in that regard?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we talked very briefly of the desirability of improving markets and prices for wheat, but there was no really substantial discussion of the matter between the President and myself.

ACTION ON POSSIBLE PRICE FIXING BY TIRE COMPANIES IN LIGHT OF UNITED STATES ANTI-TRUST SUITS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has his attention been drawn to the fact that five tire companies in the United States are being sued under anti-trust legislation for price fixing? Since all these companies have branch plants in Canada, is the minister looking into the situation and does he intend to take similar action in this regard?

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON RENEWAL OF LEASE COVERING AMERICAN AIR FORCE BASE, GOOSE BAY

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement made in Washington on March 15 last by Major General Joseph R. DeLuca, USAF Budget Director, to the effect that the Goose Bay Air Force Base is to be phased down, and in view of the minister's statement to the House on January 21, 1971, just over one year ago, that it was not the intention of the United States government to phase down that USAF base and that they intended to retain the base, is the minister now in a position to report to the House whether or not the lease between Canada and the United States for Goose Bay Air Force Base, which expires on December 5 of this year, is to be renewed and if, indeed, the American authorities have indicated their intention—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a proper question. The hon. member should try to limit it. According to the rules, the question period should not be used for the purpose of making remarks. I appreciate the importance of the question but perhaps it might be condensed a little. I assume that the hon. member has now asked his question and we might allow the minister an opportunity to reply.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REASONS FOR CHOICE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister who seems to be busy speaking to another parliamentary secretary. As the parliamentary secretary has indicated that the reasons for the choice of the Pickering township site for an airport would be placed before POP—People Over Planes—would he advise the House whether this is so, and will the House be advised as to the reasons?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question like that cannot be directed to the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase the question and direct it to the minister answering on behalf of the Minister of Transport. May I ask the responsible minister whether, pursuant to the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, the reasons for the choice of the Pickering township airport site are to be made public or tabled in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have the commitment before me that the Minister of Transport gave on March 17, as recorded in Hansard. He said:

> ... I am prepared to provide whatever is necessary to support the decision that was made.

Mr. Stanfield: Soon.

Mr. Trudeau: He will be appearing soon before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I am sure the hon. member will at that time want to ask the minister for details and information.

Mr. Alexander: As the parliamentary secretary indicated that the reasons would be proclaimed on or about April 15, at which time, I believe, a meeting was to be held with the concerned group from Pickering township, I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary was talking through his hat or whether the information will be disclosed today or tomorrow?

Mr. Woolliams: What a hat!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question asked in those terms is not in order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me an opportunity to ask the question without the superfluities. Can the Prime Minister advise us whether the reasons for the site will be given in the next couple of days, regardless of the sitting of the committee? I think that was the undertaking given by the parliamentary secretary. I was hoping the Prime Minister could answer that question. Will the reasons be given in the next two or three days?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the parliamentary secretary did not give any commitment as to dates. The date was suggested by the people who wanted to meet and just mentioned. In that sense if do not think the hon. member was talking through his hat. He was talking through the press.

WHEAT—POSSIBLE CHANGES IN FORMULA FOR ALLOCATING BOXCARS TO ENSURE EQUITY AND FREEDOM OF CHOICE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It concerns the allocation of boxcars following the Federal Grain-wheat pool amalgamation and the utilization of the Bracken formula. Since this question has been under consideration by the Wheat Board and by the minister for some time, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman is in a position to report to the House with respect to possible changes in the allocation formula with a view to ensuring equity and freedom of customer choice?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This matter has been discussed in the course of correspondence and at a meeting I had with the Wheat Board and the heads of all the elevator companies. There is general agreement that the allocation of cars to avoid congestion during May, June and July will take care of the situation adequately in the period immediately ahead. Additional steps will be taken to deal with congestion either in this period or in the new crop year if such steps become necessary.

Mr. Mazankowski: Would the minister advise us whether any definitive proposals have been put forward with respect to the future of the Bracken formula? In other words, will there be any permanent changes with respect to allocation under that formula?

Mr. Lang: As far as I can determine, all the elevator companies are in favour of the general principles of the Bracken formula, particularly the principle that every farmer should have the right to deliver to the elevator of his choice. Originally, this formula had in it an anti-congestion device, but it is not working at the moment. Everyone seems agreed that if necessary some such device will be embodied in the formula in future.

BARLEY AND RAPESEED—PROJECTED DECLINE IN ACREAGE—ABILITY TO MEET EXPORT TARGETS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Can the minister inform the House whether the projected decline in barley and rapeseed acreage as reported by Statistics Canada is such as to justify any doubt as to our ability to reach export targets for these grains? Does the minister intend to urge farmers to increase acreages of these grains?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The projected acreages give no reason to doubt that the record targets for which we are aiming will be achieved during the present crop year. There is, however, cause for some concern in connection with potential marketing in the coming crop year. The minister has already been making known to farmers his view that seeding of barley and rapeseed should be emphasized more strongly than the original survey figures showed.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF TRANSPORTATION STUDY

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the transportation of grain, would the minister now make public the study on transportation carried out under his authority in order that farmers, members of parliament and the public generally can examine it and make suggestions for improvement?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): We shall be promoting further discussion of this whole general problem in the fairly near future. The study does not, of course, bear on the problems of the moment, the temporary difficulties in grain haulage which were the consequence of special conditions this winter.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): We are still in consultation and negotiation with the provinces.

Mr. Burton: Can the minister tell us whether his department has proposed that the present boundaries and scope of the programs remain as they are, or has he proposed some changes to existing programs?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We are in negotiation with the provinces, not with the hon. member.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD, INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSIONS AND CONCILIATION BOARDS

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the context of the industrial unrest which prevails in certain sectors in Canada today, and in view of the fact that there is likely some involvement as far as the government itself is concerned—we do not yet know what stage negotiations have reached as between the government and its own employees in resolving difficulties which have always been a fruitful source of strikes in the past, and in the past few years particularly—it is very important that we give this bill searching examination.

Most hon. members of this House, if they listen to their own constituents, will be aware that there is great anxiety in Canada today with regard to the state of labour-management relations, and the fact that we Canadians, as a people, have been victims over the past several years of unnecessary losses, of unnecessary strife, of unnecessary suffering. It must be remembered that the worker is not the only person to be implicated when there is labour strife. Nor is it only the management in the particular sector concerned which may have to suffer loss and inconvenience. At the present time, it seems that certain individuals, when conducting the activities of organized labour, feel they can extend their deadly pall over all concerned and even beyond. Their attitude is: to hell with the public.

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This has been the case all too often. If I used their language it would be much more colourful and earthy. This seems to be the impression.

I am not assessing blame to one side or the other in any particular industrial dispute. Some portion of blame undoubtedly can be attributed to unenlightened management. Some of it is attributable to the leaders of organized labour, particularly to unofficial leaders. In presenting the bill the other day, the minister said the government was asserting its proper role as representing the public interest in the relationship between organized labour and management. These are fine words, but I honestly do not believe the bill actually carries out the intention which has been implied. I have grave reservations. The minister said:

> Our economic performance in the world is of vital importance to all Canadians and it will increasingly be so as the world's economic environment drastically changes through the rest of this decade and, indeed, the rest of this century.

> Good industrial relations will play a vital part in our economic performance and, accordingly, they will be the concern not only of the parties immediately involved but of all the Canadian public. It is with these thoughts in mind, Mr. Speaker, that we have approached the amendments to part V of the Canada Labour Code.

Again, I have some very grave reservations whether the government has actually recognized its role or the purpose, the ultimate objective, of these changes to the Canada Labour Code. It must be remembered that every member of the House must ensure that legislation in the field of industrial relations should promote industrial peace and not lead to a widening of conflict, or areas of conflict, between management and labour. Certainly, it must not lead to a complete or a greater abandonment of the public interest than now exists.

As Canadians, we face a great challenge from many sides in the world today. We have seen declining trade figures in this first quarter with Japan, Britain and the European Common Market, with some very substantial decreases. True, we have had an increase in trade with the United States, but this is only the accentuation of a problem that we have faced for a long time, one that should have highlighted the discussions between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the United States.

One of our biggest problems has been too great a reliance on trade with the United States. If we in this parliament give ill-considered study to the proposals contained in this bill and as a result there is greater industrial strife, then Canada might as well shut shop. Because industrial strife, whatever may be its cause, leads to loss of production, higher costs and more imports. If the Canadian public finds its domestic sources of supply are arrested, then it may well have to buy from abroad, and quite often at higher cost. Some people seem to think that, as in the old days, fleas and bedbugs are a necessary adjunct to man. So, they think that we must have a certain amount of industrial strife each and every year. I deny that this is necessary, Mr. Speaker. This is why I say we must approach this particular bill from the point of view of ensuring that it promotes greater industrial peace than heretofore.

This bill covers only about half a million workers who come under federal jurisdiction, a long way from the bulk of Canada's labour force. But this does not mean that the bill is in any way diminished in importance, not at all. The Canada Labour Code, as the government so claims, should be in the vanguard. It is like a flagship that shows the objective towards which provincial administrations should strive. There are many areas in which labour legislation passed by this parliament has shown the way for the provinces. If this is to be the case, then let us make sure that this bill is one that people can point to as an example of a measure that will promote greater industrial peace.

It is in that light that we must examine the bill. It must not be a bill that results in an indiscriminate abandonment of jurisdiction. The bill must not be merely Pilate-like, that is one who washes his hands of the thing and lets management and organized labour fight it out; that it is a bill that will give each more opportunity to get at the other's throat. I say that that is not the purpose of the bill and must never be its purpose. Therefore, I propose to consider the bill with this particular point of view in mind.

However, if I may say so, Mr. Speaker, we in Canada at both the provincial and federal levels have achieved a certain degree of support from the public generally for social legislation and at no inconsiderable cost. In fact, the cost has been fantastic. One of the budgetary problems of this administration, of its predecessor and of many of the provincial administrations, is that they all face escalating costs for some of the social welfare programs that are on the statute books.

I think that in many areas we in Canada have been too precipitate; we have gone too fast for our ability to pay. Whether through taxes at the municipal level in the form of higher education costs, whether through certain forms of taxation at the provincial level which enter into cost of production, or whether through income tax at the federal level, we have taken far too much out of the Canadian economy at the present time. We have weakened the base of the economy in order to support those programs that ultimately we want to have. We seem to be content, and in many instances more than content, to pile on costs, making our goods less competitive, not only abroad but at home. In some cases costs are unnaturally high. As in the forestry industry and in certain other sectors, taxes and the take of government have now gone up to 80 per cent of net operating revenues. And we ask these industries to be competitive internationally! We ask them to support, in addition, all the programs that we have on our statute books. It is simply impossible, Mr. Speaker, to do so. If by this legislation we impose further costs upon industry, then we will be making those industries even less competitive than they are now. The legislation then becomes self-defeating. To the extent that defective legislation is the cause of the elimination of just employment to any one Canadian, it is deficient legislation. That is what I am afraid of in respect of certain sections of this bill.

This bill does nothing for the protection of the public interest as such. When is it to be deemed that an industrial dispute has reached the point where the public interest is suffering? This bill does not cover the Public Service, for instance. If we look at the extent of the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Standards Code, we find that the following industries are covered: rail, air, road and water transportation; services incidental to water transportation; interprovincial pipeline operations; telephone and cable communications; radio and television; grain elevators and grain milling; banking; hotels; uranium mining and federal Crown corporations, involving in all about 530,000 workers.

The Public Service itself is covered by the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and is excluded from the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I should have thought that, having decided the Public Service of Canada will be granted much the same rights as organized labour elsewhere, they too would be brought under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and where appropriate would be subject to that jurisdiction. Certainly, I should have thought the government would take this opportunity to give itself the necessary tools to deal with the public interest, regardless of the source of the industrial strife.

We know there are many Crown corporations such as Air Canada, for instance, in which there have been a number of debilitating strikes that have caused great loss and great public inconvenience. As a result of the chaos created by numerous unions having labour agreements finish at different times, the whole operation can be undermined and the public interest is absolutely secondary in the consideration of those people who have the dispute in hand. It seems to me that this is and has been quite wrong.

I know there are difficulties in respect of split jurisdictions, and I do not mean by that, joint jurisdictions. For example, what happens if there is a total breakdown in industrial relations of the steel industry and the public interest is being adversely affected? What action could then be taken? I have no ready answer but this is something which might be arranged with the provinces in order to see that strikes do not hold the Canadian public to ransom, because all too often that is the ultimate result. In the case of those strikes against the public sector by the employees of any Crown corporation, and we have had a lot of them, it is the Canadian public that is being held to ransom. It is not management, in the conventional sense, that is being held up, and it is not the shareholders or directors who are hoping to operate a concern at a profit for private benefit; it is the Canadian public at whose head the gun is being held.

If there is any loss as a result of the strike of CBC employees, it is John Q. Public who will have to absorb that loss. If Air Canada suffers a loss, it is John Q. Public who pays. If the CNR suffers a loss as a result of a long and disastrous labour dispute, it is John Q. Public who has to suffer and pay. So, there is no question that there is greater reluctance to strike ultimately against a publicly owned as against a privately owned operation. In my opinion anybody who, as an advocate of nationalization for the sake of achieving greater industrial peace, says this is the case, is going completely against the record.

I wonder why this bill did not provide for some sort of alternative, and in this regard I have to be very careful of my grammar. I wonder why there was not some sort of alternative to that which we now have. It seems to me there should have been provision for a mandatory cooling-off period. Once there has been a breakdown in the normal course of negotiations, and conciliation and mediation have failed, assuming a work stoppage were to be against the general public interest, then in so far as those industries affected by the Canada Labour (Standards) Code are concerned, the executive should have the power to issue a directive declaring the work stoppage in that industry to be against the public interest.

At that time a mandatory cooling-off period of somewhere between 80 and 120 days could be called for during which the parties must resume negotiations and arrive at a satisfactory settlement. This could be some form of mandatory mediation or conciliation, but the answer must come within that definition. Other countries use labour courts, but what is a decision of a labour court other than the mandatory laying down of the terms of the labour agreements? These exist in many countries in the world. In this country, people have shied away from any question of compulsory arbitration. They do not like it, but many other countries have resorted to some form of this as an ultimate sanction by the public.

When the public of Canada, whose interests are paramount, say "That is enough; there must be a settlement", all we have is some sort of ad hoc solution whereby, if the government feels there is an adverse effect on public interest, it will call parliament into session. What has parliament done under the circumstances? The parliament of 1958 or 1959 had to deal with a strike by the employees of the west coast ferries. What was done then but the invoking of a compulsory cooling-off period during which the parties were directed to renegotiate? Certain minimum terms were established by the legislation. But the parties on either side were under no illusion that on the date specified in the bill—and the same thing applied with respect to the Canadian National Railways I believe in 1964 or 1965—there would be a settlement, and if there were no settlement it would be at the peril of the party disagreeing. That is the force of the public interest.

Therefore, I say it is unfortunate that in this bill there is not a provision to obviate the necessity to call in parliament and involve, shall we say, partisan political considerations. The machinery should exist whereby a mandatory cooling-off period could be imposed in appropriate cases. I will admit that in this area most provincial governments have jurisdiction, but in those circumstances this bill could be some sort of a flagship. I know organized labour does not like the legislation in some of the provinces because it goes too far in another way, but it would seem to me that if there were a reasonable course laid out in this bill there could be a rallying to that reasonable point and an example could be shown to other administrations. Much of what the government has done with this bill has resulted in leaving a great void. It has abdicated its responsibility, as I say, in failing to provide for that option. I would be the first person to approve if someone could think of a better or more reasonable alternative. I would welcome it. I say, however, that one must never neglect the public interest as is now being done.

There is another area in which I think this bill is deficient. Here, I am very conscious of the rights as well as the responsibilities of both sides and the experience we in Canada have had over several years. I would say one of the chief reasons there have been excesses on the side of management and excesses on the side of organized labour is the fact that unions are not legal entities. Unions, unfortunately, in order to redress wrongs the members experienced, because they could not sue, have had to resort to other action. After all, they will not remain inactive. If we read any responsible newspaper that comes out of Montreal we know that on the picket lines at the present time there is violence; there are actions which would otherwise be illegal. There are wrongs being perpetrated against the public and against other honest, law abiding and innocent employees. This is all done under the mantle of an industrial dispute. Damage is done, injury is perpetrated and there is no recourse under the Criminal Code. Recourse under the Criminal Code is not the answer. We limit the remedies under the Criminal Code.

All too often after an industrial dispute has been settled, one of the terms of the settlement is that there shall not be any prosecutions or if any charges have been laid that they shall be dropped. But if striking employees in an industrial dispute enter the plant or property of owners with whom they have a dispute and damage or destroy property, why should they be above the law? If I enter my neighbour's property and vandalize it, even though I may have a quarrel with him, have I the right to say that because I had a quarrel, an honest dispute, I should be able to inflict these damages on him? Of course, that would be wrong. Yet, in industrial disputes sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars of damage may be done in a spirit of vengeance, in a spirit of coercion, sometimes by hired thugs and goons. Then, I say such actions should not be above the law nor should it be possible to circumvent the law in respect of that sort of thing.

In the same way if management hires thugs and goons to coerce and victimize its employees with whom it has a dispute then the bargaining unit, the union itself, should be able to sue the owners. But today this cannot be done. It must be the individual who takes action. What chance would one lone worker, two workers or even three workers have to establish a case? What funds would they have with which to fight the case? If the union were a legal entity it could take action on behalf of its members who had been victimized. It seems to me by refusing to recognize a bargaining unit as a legal entity, we have forced both sides to take other courses of action which are not as acceptable as a proper proceeding through a court. It is for that reason I believe there is a serious deficiency in this bill. I do not take this position because I feel if organized unions were legal entities they could be the subject of pot-shots or persecution through the courts. This is not the case any more. It may have been in the days when they were fledgling organizations unable to take care of themselves. Perhaps then they would have been disseminated by the strength of owners dragging them through the courts, but that is not the case today. It seems that far too much reliance has to be placed on other courses of action in order to clear up some of the difficulties that arise as a result of an industrial dispute.

There is another matter on which I think this bill is deficient. The previous minister discussed this with me, and I was hopeful he would include it in the legislation. At least there was some hope and encouragement offered. However, I fail to see it in this particular bill. To that extent, I am sorry, I think the government is again showing a lack of leadership in this particular range. After all, the way has in part been blazed, and I say in part only, by the government of Ontario in its industrial relations legislation. I refer to my bill C-48. Frankly, this bill is popularly known as charity versus closed shop union dues. There are people in this country who have bona fide religious principles which preclude them from paying dues to unions organized in the way they are today. If an individual is working for a concern which has entered into a closed shop or union shop agreement whereby there is a compulsory check-off of union dues, that person, having bona fide religious views which prohibit in conscience that person from belonging to such a group, it should be possible for that person to have an amount equivalent to the union dues deducted from his periodic pay and paid to a charity that is recognized by both the union and the individual, a recognized public charity.

There have been cases in Ontario, and I must say they are to my knowledge limited to Ontario, whereby long term employees in some concerns that have become unionized have been discharged by order of the Ontario Labour Relations Board because of refusal to pay union dues but offering to pay an equal sum to a charity. That was prior to the present Ontario act and, I must say, the present act is far from perfect. It only went part way. However, can there be any justification whatsoever for an individual who has been employed or is qualified to take employment being prohibited, because of his religious views from taking that employment?

We have all sorts of legislation starting from the Bill of Rights down through the piece which states there shall be no discrimination as a result of religious beliefs, yet we have this situation as a result of our industrial codes. This bill does not prohibit it. I think these legislative guarantees are a hollow mockery because, as a result of the demands of the big unions, the individual worker is denied the freedom of his religious beliefs. They say you can believe what you want, but because of your beliefs you cannot work at this particular plant or concern. I suppose the next thing we might have might be a denial of the right to work because of an individual's political beliefs. The shoe would then be on the other foot. There would be screaming to high heaven about denials of the fundamental rights of the individual, yet in the labour code we fail to provide safeguards for those rights.

I say it is totally wrong to victimize those individuals of recognized faiths in this country which object to this sort of thing. But any individual should not be allowed to say casually that he does not believe in this type of organization and that it is against his religion. The proof must be there. Yet all we now say to these objectors is that they can work somewhere else. They do not have to work for that particular concern. I am sorry that the minister or the government did not have the political courage to include such a provision in the bill.

In my bill I do not advocate that an individual have the right to pocket the $5, $10, $15 or $20 per month which he would normally pay in union dues. The dues may be less, but there are many who pay $10 or $15 a month. There would be a transfer to a recognized charity. Surely, to the extent the charities are supported by the people making such a stand, the unions could consider this a valuable contribution to public charity in this country. They are not that poor. What I find even more fundamentally wrong is that this is a back door denial of the freedom of religious belief.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired. He can, of course, continue with the consent of the House. If the hon. member wishes to pursue his remarks, I will inquire whether there is such consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank hon. members. I will not transgress upon their generosity. I will soon bring my remarks to an end.

There is one point in the bill which I find very satisfactory. No doubt there are others. I refer to the change in the composition of the Canada Labour Relations Board. I have objected many times to the composition of conciliation boards and other bodies of a similar type set up to resolve a dispute. The board is usually composed of a representative of one side, a representative of the other side, and a neutral chairman. In 90 per cent of the cases, unless there is unanimity, the judgment that finally comes down is that of the chairman because the other representatives of management and organized labour have vested interests and will not cross that very definite line down the middle.

I have been engaged in this sort of thing under industrial contracts. Many of my colleagues who practice law and with whom I was associated before entering parliament have told me the same story. They said they were appointed with instructions. They were responsible to their clients. Quite often the representative of a particular bargaining unit was some individual from another union, and also had a vested interest. We never got really worthwhile settlements. I am glad to see that the Canadian Labour Relations Board from now on will be composed of individuals who have an intimate knowledge of, or a particular ability to sit in judgment on these matters. They will be independent of any vested interest. This, hopefully is a great step forward.

I fully agreed on this point with the brief of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. I foresee two difficulties. The first is with respect to the extension of bargaining rights to employees who have supervisory duties over other employees. It seems to me that supervision is a managerial function. If there is to be an extension of bargaining rights to supervisory employees, surely this should not be a matter of legislation but of collective bargaining?

The second point I wish to make is in connection with the provision that a representation unit may get certification on the basis of 35 per cent of the membership initially voting favourably on a representation application, not 50 per cent of the totality of the membership, but decertification must be approved by the majority of the membership of a union.

Other hon. members have spoken about the difficulties arising out of the provisions with regard to technological changes. We know that Bill C-183 is much different from Bill C-253. I hope that at committee stage amendments will be accepted that have the purpose of promoting industrial peace, and that will not afford further opportunities for industrial strife. Bill C-253 had provisions that were rife with opportunities for disputes and strikes. I do not know what it would have contributed to industrial peace in Canada.

I have spoken beyond my allotted time, Mr. Speaker. The House has been very kind to allow me to complete my remarks. I hope that most hon. members of the House will speak at this stage. This is a very important bill. I hope that there will be much interest shown by the public at committee stage, so that we can get the best possible legislation and that when the committee reports back to the House we will have an improved bill. I hope that a way will be found to overcome the matters which I have described as failures. I realize there may be some procedural difficulties, but the government could readily overcome them by taking appropriate action. This is one of the most important bills that we will consider this year. I hope I have approached the debate on it with the appropriate sense of responsibility.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate, I speak as one who has been on both sides of the fence. I have spent a good part of my working years as an employee and trade unionist, and for the last 25 years I have had some knowledge of management. Despite the years that I have been associated with management in my own business, I have never forgotten how it feels to be an employee in the shop, and therefore I think I have some perspective in that sense when dealing with a labour bill.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) tended to lose his perspective when making certain comparisons. I was particularly offended by his inference that trade unions and working people were above the law, that they could not be prosecuted because trade unions were not legal entities. I was surprised that he did not know better. All he has to do is pick up any newspaper and he will see that people are prosecuted if they contravene the law in any encounter between labour and management.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And then the charges are dropped.

Mr. Saltsman: By whom? Nobody in this country is above the law, neither a trade unionist nor anyone else. It is wrong for the hon. member for Edmonton West to make that kind of inference because it simply does not stand up to the facts.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Domtar case.

Mr. Saltsman: The hon. member for Edmonton West says the charges are dropped. If the charges are dropped, then somebody wishes to drop them. There may be reasons for that. The charges are dropped by the person who lays them, and not by the hon. member for Edmonton West. It is not his decision to make whether or not the charges are dropped.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You have got it so wrong.

Mr. Saltsman: I think it is wrong to come into the House and make charges of that kind which incite people against labour, which distort the role of working people in this country. That is what is wrong.

I was also interested in the hon. member's analogy in trying to equate a trade union with a corporation. Actually, they are reverse situations. Each member of a trade union is accountable and responsible under the law. To say that the association of which he is voluntarily a member must also be responsible is like saying that if a member of parliament commits a crime inside this House or outside it, then the House of Commons is responsible.

A trade union is not a corporation. It is a group of people who have voluntarily banded together to look after their interests and pursue their objectives. In many cases, people in trade unions are elected to the offices they hold. They are not like corporation officers. Is this worse than a corporation that hides behind its charter, and whose officers say, "We have no responsibility; pick up whatever assets you like."? Today, most corporations have limited liability. You cannot touch the members of a corporation, and in most cases you cannot touch its assets beyond a certain definite amount. Yet, we have agreed to that situation. We have said that limited liability is necessary in our society. We do not throw people in debtors' prisons, as used to happen; we now have the procedure of bankruptcy for discharging debt. We recognize in each instance that there has to be some idea of what the liability of the particular group may be. Each group is different and it is not fair for the hon. member for Edmonton West to make a comparison between a corporation, which is one thing, and a trade union, which is something else. I know this is done continuously when even a cursory examination would show that they are different things.

Let me suggest something else to the hon. member regarding the way society looks at rights. If a person owns a factory and has capital in it, he has absolute rights under the law. Within the law he may do whatever he chooses with that factory. He can walk in one day and shut it down, throwing a thousand people out of work. The law allows him to do that because it is his money that is invested and he is free to do with it whatever he wishes. The havoc that may be created by the shutdown is not his responsibility, according to the law. The man who has worked there for 30 or 40 years giving his loyalty, his energy and brains to the work of that shop has no rights, beyond two months' notice of lay-off in some provinces. Labour has no rights in the eyes of that kind of law. We are still living in a society that says that property has ultimate rights and labour has virtually no rights.

I am surprised that my hon. friend would niggle about the minor rights being conferred upon labour in this bill, and the fact that the Parliament of Canada is moving to redress some of the differences that exist between the rights of ownership and the rights of labour. It is a philosophical question I admit, but a very important one to the man who works in the shop. He has a real sense of grievance if he is thrown out of work after perhaps 30 years of service. Sure, the company has paid him, perhaps even been good to him, but he has worked hard too and the company has not suffered through him. They made a bargain and both worked out the arrangements, but if the company decides to close down or realize a capital gain or move its operation somewhere else, that man who has worked in that shop all his life has no rights. I say, Mr. Speaker, that any rights this parliament can confer upon him, any sympathy or understanding that this parliament can muster on behalf of the working man, is not misplaced and he is entitled to it.

Like everyone else, I would like to find a resolution, a reconciliation, between absolute individual freedoms and social responsibility. I would like to feel that it is possible to maintain social responsibility while everyone does exactly as he pleases. We know, in fact, that this can only be an objective; we know, in fact, that we have to make some kind of compromise between these two objectives and sometimes we have to give up some of our freedoms in order to ensure social responsibility. In this chamber we have heard many debates in which members argued against one type or another of legislation because it infringed upon the right of the individual either not to pay taxes, not to be part of a program or not to be included in the legislation, yet in so far as the whole of society is concerned, some of those rights are infringed upon every time a piece of legislation is passed. I do not think there is any legislation on the books that does not infringe upon those rights in some way.

I make these remarks in connection with the statement of the hon. member for Edmonton West about people who are members of religious groups and who do not want to pay union dues. I wish there were some way of working that out.

Mr. Alexander: We will find a way.

Mr. Saltsman: Very often these things cannot be worked out. Whether a person belongs to a union or not, in a shop he receives the benefits of membership; he may even receive benefit because there are unions in the area. This confers a social responsibility upon that person to make some kind of contribution to that union.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about religious beliefs?

Mr. Saltsman: It is very difficult to deal with religious beliefs and I admit that. The situation is not quite as black and white as the hon. member for Edmonton West would have us believe. It is not that a union wants to force anyone in this way. In my conversations with trade union leaders, they indicate that they wish a formula could be found that would be fair to the trade unions, that would bring justice to all and enable them to give a greater measure of freedom to those with religious beliefs. This is assuming that it is a violation of a person's religion to belong to a trade union. We know it is a difficult problem, but to say that unions are terrible because they cannot resolve that problem is to say that parliament itself or all legislative bodies are terrible because they have never been able to resolve that problem either. In fact, we have difficulty in trying to reconcile the problem of individual rights with social responsibility and collective action.

Mr. Douglas: Can you belong to the law society without paying fees?

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, that is the way it works. I would have been far more impressed if the hon. member for Edmonton West, while he was talking about religious beliefs, had stretched his imagination a little to take in the corporation as well. He talks about the problem of the person whose religious beliefs are offended because he has to pay trade union dues. What about those people who buy shares in a corporation and are offended by the contributions given to political parties or the fact that it may be interfering in the affairs of another country? There is a quizzical look on my hon. friend's face. Apparently, he does not comprehend that kind of comparison.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am trying to catch the analogy.

Mr. Saltsman: You may say, "Do not invest in that corporation if you do not like what it is doing".

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I said religious beliefs.

Mr. Saltsman: It could be my religious belief not to support a corporation that was making bombs to drop on Viet Nam or that was supporting a political party that was doing it.

An hon. Member: What religion is that?

Mr. Osler: You could sell your stock.

Mr. Saltsman: I think that anybody's religion would be offended by that sort of thing. I admit it is rather stretching the point—

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Saltsman: —but my hon. friend's statement is stretched and tends to focus on one aspect of the problem. When it comes to the freedom of stockholders and the way corporations treat stockholders, in some cases they do not know what activities the corporation is engaged in but that does not seem to offend my hon. friends on my right. However, if there are a few examples, and because they are few their importance is not diminished, of some infringement of rights by trade union activities the hollering is beyond belief. Let us be honest and frank on this problem; let us not be one-sided and say that trade unions are the only groups involved in this kind of conflict.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): That is the whole point of the exercise; let us not be one-sided.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I had originally intended to speak on the sections dealing with technological change, but as always it is difficult to follow the hon. member for Edmonton West. It is difficult because he makes such a useful and clear contribution to the debate and difficult because he always manages to say something which antagonizes my sense of fairness.

We have to be very much concerned about industrial peace in this country, Mr. Speaker. We know that very few people benefit from labour strife or strife of any kind. This is not to say that all strife can be eliminated, but certainly where it can be avoided it is important to avoid it. I think one of the best ways of avoiding labour strife would be to incorporate a clause in the labour code that would provide for participation by the worker in the decision making process when technical change is involved. In that sense the bill before us is somewhat worse than the original version, because it permits this matter to be negotiated in the new contract but does not permit the opening of an existing contract for that purpose. I have received a number of letters, as I am sure most hon. members have, which are violently opposed to the inclusion of a technological change provision in the labour code. Many people are far too afraid of the so-called dangers of such changes. I am of the contrary opinion. I think that if you bring the workingman into the picture when you consider making technological change there will be a great deal more labour peace in the country than there has been in the past.

You know, much depends on how one views labour, on the image one has of labour. For some in this country, labour, unfortunately, is some kind of beast that must be restrained and chained. According to those people, any attempt to bring labour into the picture or to rely on the intelligent judgment of labour is bound to meet with failure. If, on the other hand, you feel as I do, that labour is intelligent, concerned, and willing in most cases to reach an agreeable, intelligent settlement based on legitimate positions, you will have a great deal more confidence in the clauses dealing with technological change. This bill is only making suggestions; there are not many improvements in it. What it speaks of is already happening in our society. Therefore, the bill is not breaking new ground. It is not as though management is not consulting with labour. It is my impression, after having visited many plants in my riding, that management recognizes the value of consulting with labour when changes are contemplated. Intelligent management officials have been doing that for a long time. This bill will provide them with additional encouragement. It will encourage others as well to continue the dialogue between management and labour.

The great enemy of the workingman in the plant is fear, fear of the unknown. You must be a workingman to understand that fear. True, the businessman has his own fears, his own problems. He wonders about solvency; and he must compete with others. He has his worries. One tends to forget that the man working in the plant also is beset by worries. He is worried about his job continuing, about being displaced by a machine, about what will happen to him. His worries are genuine. Any effort made by management or by legislatures to allay that fear and bring the two parties together to discuss these problems openly will bring more industrial peace. That, Sir, more than anything, is what is necessary if there is to be true industrial peace in this country. Even if you were to outlaw unions tomorrow and outlaw strikes, there would still be dissent. There is ample evidence to show that there is dissent without unions. There are slowdowns, and things of that kind, where unions do not operate. History shows that unions have brought more industrial peace, rather than less. In countries where strikes are outlawed, there is more industrial strife, more dislocation and more damage to the economy through wildcat strikes, revolts, and disagreements, than has ever been caused through labour-management disputes in countries like Canada where strikes are legal.

Let me talk more about fear, and about how that fear arises. At one time most of the plants in my riding were family owned. Management was paternalistic, that is true. The bosses and the workers went to church together. They knew each other. Sometimes they even came from the same villages in Scotland. Their parents knew each other. The result was that if a man stepped out of line once in a while, if he did not show up for work because of something that happened at his birthday party or at a wedding celebration and he had a big headache on Monday morning and was not perhaps as efficient as he might have been, his boss understood. The boss knew him. He knew the man was sorry he was late for work. The boss knew the man did not drink all the time and that this happened only once in a while. He knew the man had worked in the plant for 20 years, and that his father had worked in the factory before him. There was understanding and communication there. In a plant like that, there was mutual confidence. After all, the worker could say, "I go to church with Mr. So-and-So and our children know each other. He says hello to me." That relationship meant something, and there was a great deal of security in it. That security has gone today.

Today, the workman does not even know who his boss is. Everything is done on orders from a computer. Computers spill out instructions. The guy on the line is set aside from his foreman; the foreman is set aside from the managers. There is a whole new pecking order, a new hierarchy. The corporation is now a big organization. Corporate bureaucracies have developed. Things are done in triplicate and quadruplicate. It is small wonder that men cling to their rights. The workers think that their rights must be guaranteed on some kind of paper, otherwise they are without protection. Even though the guarantee is written on a piece of paper, the worker does not feel secure, because he does not know just how good the guarantee on paper is. In Canada, the situation is even worse because the boss is away in Milwaukee most of the time, or in Vienna, or in California. Faceless ones run the bureaucracy. They do not know the worker's job. In his work, the worker is a little cog in the whole operation. He does one small part. Nobody really knows what his talents are. He might be a fine machinist, yet on the production line, even though he has been trained as a machinist, he must stand there and punch a press and turn out little parts in large quantities. That is the kind of climate you will find in our factories. True, some plants are still run on the old basis; there is some rapport between labour and management, and the workers retain some sense of identity. For most working people, and I am talking about white collar as well as blue collar workers, that identification has largely gone.

If, because of this bill, management consults with labour on technological change, we shall take a small step back in the direction of understanding between the two parties. We are opening the door to some kind of consultation so that the parties can call on each other for advice and assistance, and so that the workers will know what the future holds. If they do that, that will be all to the good. In cases where this fails to take place, rumours fly and fears are generated. Often those fears are worse than the truth. It is better when there is confidence between the parties. I speak from experience.

I am thinking of two specific occasions that involved workers in my riding. One case involved a shoe factory, and the other, Polymer Corporation. Certain changes were to be made; plants were to be phased out, employees were to be let out because of technological and managerial change, and so on. In both cases management was wise enough to call employees together and explain what was to happen to them, what the position of the company was and why those things had to be done. Management did that before rumours circulated. They tried to make arrangement for the re-employment of affected workers in other parts of the corporation or in other parts of the community. The result was that the people who worked in this plant were sympathetic and understanding rather than hostile. They did not like what was happening, and they could not be expected to like it. But they did understand the situation, and these changes were effected with the minimum amount of friction because management had shown sufficient intelligence to take its work force into its confidence. Had this not been the case, a climate of fear and rumour would have been created in which intelligent discussion would have been impossible.

We tend to forget that North America has led in the field of productivity, that despite difficulties in labour-management relations this has been an enormously productive society. We sometimes forget that labour has not, in fact, opposed change or automation. In many instances, labour has been an ally of management particularly when it has been shown that labour, too, will benefit from changes proposed. Perhaps the most obvious example is the case of the coal workers in the United States under John L. Lewis. An agreement was made providing for the most far-reaching technological changes, even to the extent of contemplating the displacement of a large percentage of the miners. The union in question, whatever its other faults, realized that if its members were to receive decent wages the industry needed to be productive. Management has been able to modernize in North America in a way which has astonished the world. This has been made possible largely with the co-operation of the trade union movement. Why is this always forgotten? Why is it forgotten that the trade union movement in North America has never stood in the way of change? There are examples to the contrary, but usually these have arisen in circumstances where a climate of fear and uncertainty existed. This brings me to my final point.

If any labour legislation is to be effective, if technological change is to be accepted, we must, as a prior condition, provide for full employment. It is difficult to expect a man who is to be replaced by a machine to be sympathetic to that machine or to the rational argument of the engineer if he cannot hope to find a new job to replace the one he has lost. The legislation before us will have its value. It is an improvement. But until we live in a society committed to full employment, all the great legislation which comes before this House, all the changes we are making, will not work—I have said this on other occasions, and I say it again, now; I am sure I speak for every member of my party. Given a policy of full employment, given a policy of reasonableness, of trying to understand the frustration felt by men who make their living in factories, men who do not own the shops but who must depend, now, on the government, because they cannot really depend on their employers to understand them, the legislation is likely to prove its value.

I hope I may be able to convince the hon. member for Edmonton West of the reasonableness of the labour position, and I hope that some of the hysteria created in this country and directed against the labour movement will diminish, that the normal Canadian attitude of fair play will reassert itself. Of late there have been many hysterical outbursts against trade unions. Trade unions are not perfect, of course. I am close enough to them to say I have seen things with which I do not agree. But by and large, the trade unions are being attacked in a way they do not deserve. In many quarters there has been a lack of sympathy and understanding of the work they are trying to do.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) on his recent appointment? I believe he is a very kind and considerate minister and, like the former minister, is very interested in providing a sound legal framework for the process of free collective bargaining in the federal jurisdiction.

Bill C-183 updates the industrial relations section found in Part V of the Canada Labour Code. Since this Act has been unchanged since 1948, it is not surprising we should be called upon to change our thinking in the field of labour relations. We have not kept pace with the times; workers are not happy with their lot in life because the cost of homes, rents, clothing and groceries, the basic necessities of life, has far outstripped the capacity of weekly take-home pay to meet them. The old idea that one week's pay was sufficient for one month's rent, or one month's mortgage payment, no longer applies in our society. As a result, workers are not able to provide the necessities of life for themselves and their families on one pay cheque.

Our society has failed to provide workers with the type of home they can afford to buy, largely as a result of red tape and regulations of all kinds applying to building construction. Construction companies have not been able to provide the average Canadian with the type of home he can afford. Consequently, he is obliged to pay high rent, making it impossible for him to save the down payment for a new home.

Many years ago, workers were easily satisfied to receive annual wage raises of 5 per cent or 6 per cent because they knew that out of these annual raises money could be set aside for future emergencies or for saving against retirement. Today, though, our society has changed and in the process the worker, the old age pensioner, the war veterans, have been unable to keep pace, largely because most of them are living in quarters whose cost is not in keeping with their take-home pay or monthly pensions. There seem to be no apartments available for rents which the worker can afford to pay while at the same time accumulating the down payment on a home—the down payment is too high, anyway. Thus, the worker feels that although he is employed, he will never be able to get ahead. New industries choose locations outside town and city boundaries in areas not serviced by vast, economical transportation systems. The worker is therefore forced into purchasing a car to take him to work and back. These are the main complaints of workers as they strive to be successful. At every turn their expenses run ahead of their ability to make the necessary money to survive.

I believe in the process of collective bargaining. If both sides bargain in good faith and if the impact of technological change is fully discussed at the bargaining table, there is no reason for strike action. One does not need to be a well educated person to realize that when a worker cannot supply living quarters and the basic needs of his family on the amount left to him from his monthly pay cheque he will be a hard man to satisfy when it comes to negotiating a raise. This is because he feels he is doing no more than working to keep even, that he cannot save toward his future.

For many years labour and district management of federal companies were able to solve many of their grievances on a local level because regular meetings were held to iron out differences of opinion on small issues. Management personnel were men who had come up the hard way; they were interested in the employees and their families and enjoyed watching the men progress in our society. To me, this was collective bargaining at its best because both sides bargained in good faith, so that small issues were kept under constant revision and did not become big issues at contract time. Years ago, strikes and lockouts were an integral part of free collective bargaining; but the main issues were big, and thus they had a far-reaching effect on all workers.

I believe that today strikes are outdated. Neither side can afford to strike, and if both sides bargain in good faith there is absolutely no need for a strike. Management must make a dollar in order to remain competitive, to pay the bills, replace worn out machinery and keep the plants up to date. At the same time, labour must realize that management has to borrow the money to pay salaries, even if sales are down in slack periods, and to expand plants in order to create more jobs. Both sides must work together if the business is going to be successful.

The former Minister of Labour was correct when he tried out the idea of labour specialists being involved in labour contract discussions. At least 60 days before a contract runs out, the government should force both sides to start meaningful talks on the terms of the new contract. At all these talks, a government labour expert should be in attendance. Sooner or later, regardless of the use of the strike, both sides will sit down and settle their differences, so why not do so before the contract runs out so that there will be no interruption of work? If both sides talk commonsense there is absolutely no need for the strike.

Labour and management both have the same goals, namely to create a successful industry producing goods at the lowest possible cost. We must remember that it is the people who work who buy the majority of the goods produced. If industry had to depend on selling goods produced to management personnel, the same industry would starve to death. It is the little man who makes the wheels of industry turn by his constant buying of the goods produced. Any successful industry has been built on a combination of money and labour. One cannot work without the other; therefore, it is in the interests of all people to have industrial peace.

Is it not correct to say that the worker should share in the fruits of his labour by helping to make an industry successful? Is it not correct to say that he should be consulted when technological change takes place in his industry? All workers in all sections of our economy have a democratic right to expect fair, humane treatment and consideration for the many years of service they have contributed to helping industry become successful. In many cases, these same workers were the men who dropped the tools of industry in wartime and went away to fight for our democratic system so that it would not be destroyed. Surely they deserve every consideration when changes are to be made in industries. It is also correct to say that management has the right to expect a good return on their investment as well as the right to make changes in their plants so that they can remain competitive.

Each year many industries of this nation decide to make changes in their production methods. Some have decided to lock the door and to move to some other part of the world. The rapid pace of technological progress and economic growth can and does have adverse effects on the working population. If employees' resistance to change is to be less harmful, as it must be if Canada is to achieve its full potential as an industrial power, employers, trade unions and government must accept responsibility for the development and implementation of policies to cushion the impact of the change on individual workers. It is certainly not in the best interests of employers and residents of the communities affected to be saddled with the problems of relocating the employees without the help of the industry causing the shift through its technological plans.

When one looks at the railroad industry, one finds that since the introduction of the diesels thousands of once proud workers of the nation's railways have been dumped on the streets with nowhere to go. Today many of these workers have not recovered from the effects of this technological change. Canadian law should not permit this to happen. Many of these railway companies were given financial and other incentives to locate in various districts in Canada. Therefore, they have an obligation to provide service to the district in which they located in order to stabilize employment in the area. All these companies should be made to provide some type of compensation or retraining for their workers who lose their jobs through no fault of their own.

In this period of fast technological change, businessmen must have maximum freedom to employ new ideas and inventions that improve efficiency and keep their industry up-to-date. The workers affected by such change must have reasonable guarantees. When a machine wears out, it is thrown out on the scrap heap; but our human resources—the workers—have a responsibility to help us build a better society for all Canadians. Therefore, their future must be protected in such a way that society is rewarded by the work and ideas of the displaced worker. We must remember that these same new machines that displace workers do not buy homes, cars, furniture or the weekly groceries. They contribute nothing to our way of life other than to make man's labour less. At the same time they take away man's livelihood; also they pay no taxes or union dues.

Time and time again when there is a strike, management of large companies think up ways to eliminate jobs by the introduction of machines. They should have some responsibility to the area in which they locate to make certain that their former employees are retrained or relocated so that they do not wind up on welfare. There are far too many cases where our society as a whole is called upon to pick up man's broken dreams, desires and ambitions and try to piece them together. Surely, we must find some method of cushioning the shock of change.

I sincerely believe that the new Canada Labour Relations Board should be formed from public, labour and management personnel. Its full time members should have years of experience in their various fields, and there should be effective communication between them, the minister and his department, and all parties involved. I believe that, if the board is comprised of good, sound, experienced people, it can and will bring good industrial relations to all our labour problems so that decisions are made in the interests of the nation as a whole. Good industrial relations are based on an understanding of the problems involved. It is very important that the minister give the board the regulations which will help eliminate problems of management and labour and do not allow suspicion and hostility to creep in and slow down new methods of preserving industrial peace. I also believe that the extension of bargaining rights is a step in the right direction. For too long, many people in this group have found themselves in the area of no man's land and had to take what was handed to them with no hope of trying to help themselves.

As we move ahead into the 70's, we all have much to do to try to increase our production in a fiercely competitive world market so that employers can stay in business and give the working people of Canada the benefits of technological change, at the same time maintaining full employment. This is the challenge of the 1970's. Management and labour of this country can and must co-operate to help all Canadians build a greater country in which all of us may live.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, like my friends, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) and the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), I have worked in an industry that has been hard hit by technological change. We have all been affected financially by the results of the change and it is very hard to watch thousands of your fellow workers lose their jobs after many years of long and faithful service and be forced to try to build new lives for themselves and their families.

I sincerely hope that this legislation will help cushion the shock of workers losing their jobs in a fast changing society, so that all workers can be retrained and become productive members of our Canadian way of life and we can have industrial peace in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced at a time when the Canadian people, especially the people of Quebec, can say that labour relations are not peaceful.

The preamble to Bill C-183 could lead us to believe that those who drafted this bill were really inspired by lofty principles. However, we know that given objectives are not always achieved, and the past has proved that though certain principles motivated the introduction of this bill, its application may be entirely different.

The measure introduced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) deals with several points. First of all, it deals with the extension of collective bargaining. It also deals with the creation of labour relations board, with an erroneous definition of unfair practices, with the settlement of labour differences through the intervention of the minister as well as the procedures for the application of collective agreements.

Those are surely issues of current interest.

In addition, Bill C-183 provides a few amendments for the enforcement of the legislation when technological changes are involved.

Hereafter, an employer bound under a collective agreement who intends to make a technological change will have to give to the union a written notice 90 days before making it.

One can wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether a 90-day period will alter the present market for unsold products.

It is true that workers need a certain protection to guarantee their job and to avoid dismissal.

On the other hand, the manufacturer is compelled to make certain changes in his plant and to carry out new ideas, either to maintain his competitive position or to reach a high level of efficiency.

It is a well known fact that workers lie at the employer's mercy.

One must bear in mind that when a company or an industry is created, when industrialists decide to invest somewhere, it is not in order to provide work for people but simply to make money. We know that if it does not pay, it does not take long for them to scram.

We remember the poor work and pay conditions that labour experienced not so many years ago. And it is this situation which, in my view, has incited workers to unite in order to claim better conditions and pay.

In short, unions arose from a requirement. In my view, they will remain in several instances an essential instrument and way of protecting workers, as long as they are directed by leaders who are conscious of their responsibilities and the means used are sensible when it comes to remind some industry heads of their social responsibilities.

There have already been, and there can be more concrete results following negotiations when there is something to negotiate about. However, I see nothing in the bill likely to force a plant to remain open. And precisely because of closing down of operations, whether in the area of Montreal, of Trois-Rivières, of Quebec City or of Saguenay-Lac Saint-Jean, it too often turns out that the worker must accept the status of unemployment.

Everyone is aware, for instance, of negotiations undertaken a few months ago, not to say a few years ago, and pursued by the CNTU on behalf of the "Lapalme boys". Now all the efforts of this union with Mr. Lapalme remained without result for the simple reason that Mr. Laplame, a former post office contractor, had just decided not to renew his contract.

Therefore no law can constrain businessmen to remain in business when it does not suit them.

And even though there is often a tendency to consider the employer as a big bad man, it should not be forgotten that he also has problems.

First he must keep up with technological change which requires considerable investments, and furthermore he must keep up with trends and major changes in the markets.

For the manufacturer, for the employer, another source of trouble is often the income tax. And it is not the least, Mr. Speaker, when one considers the income tax being paid by them.

Frankly, it is rather difficult for us to take a hard stand where the interests of some workers and some employers are concerned.

Industries able to provide work for hundreds of workers and with a turnover of several thousands of dollars are not always free of debt.

And even if powerful trusts do control such strong enterprises, we all know that some medium size industries, which play an important part in our economy, having been launched with very small capital investments, have managed to reach a certain level of prosperity and to obtain a fair share of the Canadian market. If those industries have managed to do that, it is simply through the great skill of their directors and also sustained and titanic efforts.

And it happens that the income tax act provides that such medium size industries shall pay their income tax before paying their debts.

In my opinion, such a procedure is absurd and as unfair as it is dangerous, since the survival of our employers in many cases is directly threatened by that bad tax system.

Under such a tax system, in allegedly prosperous years, our medium size industries can barely make it. It is useless for them to think of expanding or building reserves for bad days.

• (1640)

We all know that turnovers may vary greatly from year to year, especially in manufacturing.

We also know that the profit margin may vary. So, for a given year, the industrialist whose financial statement is fairly good has to pay a large amount in taxes, regardless of what his debts may be. If business changes for the worse he may even have a deficit and be compelled to borrow in order to remain in operation.

During rather good periods, the same person has often had to pay sizeable amounts in taxes. I know personally of the amounts paid by an industrialist who employs 75 people. The turnover increased thanks to the superhuman efforts of the workers under bad conditions. Despite everything, this man had, for three years, paid $25,000 per year in federal taxes.

But with a plant where everything had to be rebuilt, with an extremely small warehouse, he decided to borrow from the Industrial Development Bank in order to expand his undertaking. Today, he faces a changing market with a heavy financial burden and he is now wondering whether he should carry on his business or simply close down.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is not normal that a manufacturer paying $75,000 to the federal government within a three-year period should have to face a $125,000 debt. In short, this man has to pay high interest on money he has already paid to the government. This is ridiculous.

I wonder if the present government, with all its experts, should not contemplate a system keeping in reserve the taxes paid up by manufacturers.

In case of real profits, the government should collect taxes and use that money to administer the affairs of the country. But this money, as I say, could remain the property of industrialists. A special account could be open for them so that they could use it whenever needed.

Thus the businessman who has allowed the government to use several thousands of dollars of his money over a number of years should also have the right to use this money whenever he needs it, and without any interest. Unfortunately, until now the tax has been strictly collected to serve only the government administration. Therefore, it seems to me time has come to think of something else.

The Canadian government, whose wish is to establish a just society, could establish a precedent in allowing industrialists to use this money, interest free; after all it is their own money that they have lent to the government during the years when their business was prosperous.

Mr. Speaker, if there are some bad businessmen, there are also a great many good ones who recognize their responsibilities towards their employees and who are also entitled to reasonable profits. The employee has always the right to live. Personally, as a member of Parliament, the majority of complaints I receive from ill-treated labourers are not coming from people who work in industries, whether small or large, but rather from federal government employees. In my view this is in striking contrast with the fourth paragraph of the preamble which reads as follows:

> And Whereas the Parliament of Canada desires to continue and extend its support to labour and management in their co-operative efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining practices, and deems the development of good industrial relations to be in the best interests of Canada in ensuring a just share of the fruits of progress to all;

Mr. Speaker, this preamble simply states that the Canadian government desires to serve the genuine interests of the people by insuring that everyone gets a just share of the fruits of progress. It is somewhat unusual to read such statements in the preamble of a bill when this government does not hesitate to reclassify some of its workers to avoid paying them a salary increment. At this point, I will take the liberty of reading a letter I have received from the Quebec local of the Canadian Union of Transport Employees. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Roland Godin
> M.P. for Portneuf
> Parliament Buildings
> Ottawa, Ontario.
> Dear Sir:
> Some members of our local, which is a member of the M.D.O. group of the Quebec City airport, have submitted to us their grievances concerning the reclassification decided by the Department of Transport in respect of these employees.

In view of the present circumstances marked by an ever increasing cost of living, you will realize the confusion besetting these employees who are now faced with a salary decrease as a result of that reclassification.

We join them in their emphatic protest against a move we consider both unrealistic and inhumane.

These employees suffer the consequences of this reclassification with their hands tied up and can absolutely do nothing to offset the situation.

To alleviate this inequity, we suggest that section 7 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act be amended to enable the public service to negotiate the classification criteria by which we are now victimized through no fault of our own.

This letter is signed by the secretary of Local No. 10109.

Mr. Speaker, there is a marked difference between the bill preamble and what actually happens. Unfortunately, Department of Transport employees are not the only ones to complain since this juggling with the employees' classification is also taking place in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

For example, before integration in the Department of National Health, family allowances and old age security section in Quebec City, certain employees of the Department of Supply and Services which were working in Quebec City in the transfer unit were classified CR-2 with a yearly salary of $4,900 while those holding the same position in Toronto were classified CR-3 with a salary $1,000 higher.

This enabled the Quebec City office to have an administrative surplus of $107,000 for 1969-70; this amount was transferred to Toronto and allowed this office to pay the salaries I just mentioned.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, but I must point out that this deplorable situation still exists in Quebec.

If the hon. Minister for National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) wants proof that the Quebec employees of his department are underpaid, let him read the duplicate of a grievance at the 4th stage signed by his deputy minister, Mr. Willard, which indicates that all positions in the family allowances units will be classified CR-3, starting June 1970. Even though the grievance settlement provides for a retroactive adjustment to June 1970, nothing has been done as yet.

Moreover, some hourly paid employees of the Quebec offices have not yet been appointed permanently and even after three years are still getting very low salaries and are deprived of all the benefits which they would otherwise enjoy.

As for the permanent employees here is what happened.

The employees held a well determined position, performed specific duties and were classified at level CR 3 whose numerical assessment was 424. One day the department decided to amalgamate all units into a single one, which meant that an employee who worked within a given unit—transfer, Indians, Eskimos, school attendance, maintenance and residence—had from then on to do the job of all those units, not to mention book-keeping. In order to do all this they had to get acquainted with the proceedings of all those units, which logically could only increase those five points used to assess a position: knowledge, complexity, consequences of errors, contact and supervision. According to the national bureau that raised the numerical assessment from 424 to 434. Some time later the assessment of those people was raised from 434 to 441. Since the numerical code of a CR 3 varies between 324 and 450, that gave them the opportunity of reaching a higher level.

Now, what happened was that classification officers probably did their work half way, with their feet up on their desks, and finally assessed the new position at 401. Since the Public Service Alliance of Canada had classification officers who could do that work, employees at the Quebec office asked that the same positions be assessed, and precisely, the Public Service officer came up with a figure of 471, which would have allowed employees to be paid according to the scale and salaries in force in Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, this situation exists in Quebec. This is abnormal, and I think that since members of Parliament receive the same salary no matter what area of the country they live in, whether they come from Halifax, Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal or Quebec City, the Department of National Health and Welfare, which has to concern itself with and look after the welfare of every Canadian, should do its utmost in order to eradicate the difference of $1,000 between salaries paid in Toronto and Quebec City for the same duties.

Mr. Speaker, in this bill they even have the gall to talk of freedom, and clause 110, on page 7, reads as follows:

Every employee is free to join the trade union of his choice and to participate in its lawful activities.

But the word "freedom", Mr. Speaker, is a big word which has several uses. I can tell this House that it is a word which has a hollow ring, for instance, for Canadian National employees. If the individual is really free to do as he likes where unions are concerned, how is it then, that a section which appears in the small brochure on agreements published by the CN provides that unions and railway companies have to unite whenever it is necessary to sue a union member?

If the worker wants to sue his union or the railway, he already knows that he will have to fight both. So, he stands no chance of winning.

It has also been referred to "freedom" but this is a little untrue, as it is well known that today membership in a union is compulsory, at the risk of losing your job. Before the implementation of the Rand formula, this obligation did not exist.

I must say here that this is not true of all unions, because there are still some union leaders who work, but I say once more that in the case of our Canadian railways, the unions do not work so well.

And we have proof of this, for before the Rand formula was first implemented, railway employees were the fifth or sixth best paid Canadian workers. Since the formula became compulsory, as union leaders get their union dues whether they work or not, railway workers who again ranked sixth fell down to twenty-sixth position.

According to a federal government survey whose results were published recently, of $69 million in union dues paid to unions whose central offices are located in the United States, $10 million represent a net profit remaining in that country. How is it, then that railway workers' union dues are increased without prior consu'tation with them and that the railway companies subtract such dues from their pay cheques without asking for their consent? We know that railway employees paid $1 per month in union dues. A little later, in accordance with the Rand formula, those dues rose to $2.50, later still, they were $4.50 and now, in some cases, they are $7.50, $8 or $9. We know also that today the unions may even ask for $50 per month, and no worker can say anything about this.

Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that railwaymen are always told: Ask your unions, they will pay for you. Such Canadian employees are in no position to plead their own case. When they attend an annual meeting for instance, they may be told: There will be a discussion on the internal administration of your local union. If you have complaints make them to the union headquarters in the United States.

In fact, at least 30 CNR employees sent letters of protest to their U.S. union headquarters in 1967 and they are still waiting for an answer. Such behaviour is far from being satisfactory.

I think we should recognize the right of workers to be consulted and to really share in decisions concerning their work and union contributions. I believe they should also be entitled to select their own representatives when negotiation time comes.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are many cases where the trade unionist cannot get the advantage of certain laws. He should also demand that the machine be at the service of man instead the other way around as it is being done nowadays.

Therefore, we should call for a thorough measure and not only a bill like the one now before us. This measure will be of value to very few people; it should be of a more general nature and universal in its application. Otherwise, it will boon be retrograde and will even become unjust before long.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding I should like to emphasize that the Canadian government really has a long way to go if it wants to be able to say that Canada is a place where life is worth living, a place where a worker may still chose his kind of work freely.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in many ways this bill seems to meet with general approval with regard to some aspects and considerations. I should like to confine my remarks largely to technological change which is the one area that has created considerable comment from industry, particularly as applied to the old bill. With the changes in the new bill, certain improvements seem to have been made.

While the bill seems to go a considerable way in meeting the objections of industry, it seems quite obvious that the passage of the bill will in the future create some difficulty in interpretation. It is quite difficult to define technological change. Many others changes occur that are allied to technological changes such as tariffs, delivery, wages, prices, depletion of resources and so on. These create conditions whereby change is necessary and cannot be disregarded, in spite of the situation in which industry or employees find themselves. In relation to technological changes and their effects, there is the very human social element of protecting an employee and his family who may suddenly find himself without a job as a result of technological changes beyond his control. In the new bill consideration has been given to the fact that the provision for a strike occurring during the life of a contract would act as an incentive for parties to include technological change provisions in a collective settlement.

The inclusion of the right to strike during the life of a union agreement, as has been suggested, causes other problems such as using the harrassment technique where the unions would threaten to appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board on technical change provisions in order to get action on some other demand. It has also been suggested that it would cause many more negotiations, that is every innovation would require negotiation unless there were some very elaborate technological change provision in the contract beforehand. The Chamber of Commerce suggested that, in the face of increased industrial conflict, this would be an improved feature in the new bill. It has been suggested that objections to technological change would reduce benefits to everyone. This slower rate of change would be controlled by the labour union rather than by management. As was suggested, this would eventually mean increased costs and perhaps increased prices for consumers and would increase the risk in capital expenditure, ultimately driving up the price of the product in the economy.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—Public Service—Settlement of contracts on regional basis; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Pollution—Great Lakes—United States veto of sewage disposal projects—effect on joint program.

[Translation]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH CENTRE TO CO-ORDINATE STUDIES OF WORLD PROBLEMS

On the order: Private Members Notices of Motions.

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider, in furtherance of the objectives of the United Nations, the establishment and operation in Canada of a world centre to program and administer co-operation between and co-ordination of the efforts of experts and institutions in their studies of compelling world issues respecting (a) international relations and peace (e.g. problems of peace-keeping, arms control and disarmament, human rights and intercultural communications) (b) global problems of development (e.g. the use of natural resources, international trade and problems of developing economies, transfers of science and technology, population problems and concerns of youth) (c) the environment and, in particular, the impact of science and technology on the environment.—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This can only be done by unanimous consent. This motion has already been stood, and it should be dropped unless it is agreed by unanimous consent that it stand.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it agreed that Motion No. 4 stand in its place.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

MARINE RESOURCES

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH PROGRAM FOR RECOVERY AND UTILIZATION OF RESOURCES

On the order: Private Members Notices of Motions.

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the development, encouragement and maintenance of a co-ordinated, comprehensive, and longrange national program for the recovery and use of the resources of Canada's sea-coast waters and continental shelves; and to this end, effectively utilize the scientific and engineering knowledge and skills of the public service and government agencies and co-operate with private investment enterprise in the exploration, technological development and industrial use of the resources of the marine environment of Canada.—Mr. Forrestall.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Le même chose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it unanimously agreed that this motion stand in its present place?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

PENSIONS

PROPOSAL TO AMEND OLD AGE SECURITY ACT AND CANADA PENSION PLAN TO PROVIDE INCREASED AMOUNTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give immediate consideration to the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and are prepared to withdraw from the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and at age 65 for all others, to be increased to $150 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners to keep up with rising living costs and to share in rising living standards, and also for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the years that I have been in the House of Commons I have received many thousands of letters on the subject of pensions, the overwhelming majority of them approving of various proposals I have made. However, I must say that seldom have I had the volume of support that I have received in connection with this motion.

If my mail says anything, it says that the people of Canada are strongly in favour of improving our pension arrangements, and in particular they like and approve the idea of the necessary steps being taken so that those who wish may retire at age 60 and receive sufficient pension to make that retirement possible.

I know, Sir, the usual treatment that is given to private members' motions in this hour. They are usually talked out, sometimes with kindness and approval, but nevertheless they get talked out.

Mr. Francis: You fare no better if they are passed. I had one passed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says he had one passed, and fared no better. I suppose that is true. I have had many motions talked out, but I have had the pleasure of seeing the principles involved accepted a few years later. Even so I would hope that the House might consider this motion today as one that does represent the thinking of members in all parties, and the thinking of many Canadians, and that it might just let it come to a vote, might just let it pass and say to the government that the House of Commons would like the elements proposed in this motion to be given consideration.

There are, as will be clear to anyone who reads the motion, four basic elements to it. In the first place it asks for the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to be amended to make it possible for people to draw their pensions under those two pieces of legislation at age 60 if they leave or are out of the labour market.

The second element in the motion is one that calls for an increase in the amount of the pension to be paid under the Old Age Security Act. My suggestion is one that I have made quite a few times, and I shall stick with it until we win it. It is that the amount ought to be, as of now, not less than $150 a month. I make the point that if we are going to take steps to permit people to retire age 60 then the amount of pension they will receive must have some form of adequacy or it will be meaningless just to give them the right to retire.

The third element in my motion relates to the escalation of pensions. For a while it did look as though we were moving ahead with the principle of escalating all pensions. We do it with respect to the pensions of retired public servants, retired RCMP personnel, retired Armed Forces personnel, retired members of parliament if they are over 60, and a few other groups. We also do it for those who are on the guaranteed income supplement. In their case the legislation still provides for an escalation of up to 2 per cent of the entire amount they are receiving. However, the government in December, 1970, brought in a piece of legislation that took away the escalation of the basic pension, which since that time has been fixed at $80 a month.

But this is a bit of digression which I ask to be regarded as part of my defining the third element in the motion which is to the effect that all pensions ought to have an escalator clause. In fact I think the rule should be established that a pension is not a pension if it is for a fixed amount for all time. There must be provisions for an escalator clause. We must also get to the point where we realize that escalation itself is without value unless it is realistic, unless it enables the pensioners concerned to keep up not only with the rising cost of living—and a two per cent increase when the cost of living goes up by five per cent is not good enough—but also with the rising standard of living. In my motion I put it in those terms by suggesting that there should be an annual escalation "by an amount that will enable pensioners to keep up with rising living costs and to share in rising living standards."

The fourth element in my motion is one that relates to the income, needs or means test that is applied to the guaranteed income supplement, which I feel should not be in the Old Age Security Act at all. I deal with this by asking for, "the elimination of any means or income test from the old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people." Let us pay the full pension universally, and let the income tax take it back from those who do not need it.

Sir, I feel that each of these four points is important. Perhaps in an immediate sense, thinking in terms of the persons who are on the pension at the present time, the most important is that the amount of the old age security pension be increased to $150 a month.

The other points, the escalation, and the removal of the means test are likewise of great importance. But I suppose I must say that if there is a reasonably new element in this motion it is the one that calls for lowering the eligible age. In the long run I think that is the most important one, for those who will be pensioners if this change is accepted, for those who will be pensioners in the future, and for our economy as a whole.

There was a day when work and the volume of work was such that retirement at age 65 was the accepted thing. I recall that many years ago when I started arguing and presenting private members' motions to reduce the eligible age from 70 to 65 some hon. members said that it was impossible. Even so, we finally got it down to age 65 for old age security. In the Canada Pension Plan we have the option that a person may draw benefit at age 65 or keep on working and contributing in the hope that the benefit might be larger by the time he reaches age 70. But, Mr. Speaker, the nature of work has changed and so has the philosophy of life. We have come to the realization that old age should not be just a few years when body and soul are held together until it is time for the graveyard; that it is a period of life in which old people, like young people, should have a chance to pursue their own interests, to do their own thing. If old age is to have any meaning in those terms it has to start while people are still capable of adapting to new ways of life. I suggest that 70 is old for that and so is 65—60 is a better age. If there is any criticism in the letters I receive, it is that retirement should start even younger than age 60, perhaps 55.

An hon. Member: Forty-five.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear one of my 45-year old friends wanting it lower still. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in terms of the philosophy of life it is a sensible proposal to advocate voluntary retirement on pension at age 60. I emphasize the voluntary nature of this. Anyone who examines my motion carefully will see that I am suggesting that the one condition people must meet to come under the terms of the motion in addition to age, residence and so on, is that between the ages of 60 and 65 they are either out of the labour market or prepared to take themselves out of it.

As with the Canada Pension Plan I suggest that other income that one might have between ages 60 and 65, another pension, interest on investments, ownership of a house, and so on, should not count. These do not count now under the Canada Pension Plan between 65 and 70; the only thing that counts there is income from employment. I would like to have it that in both the Canada Pension Plan and under the Old Age Security Act, between the ages of 60 and 65 you can have all the other pension income you can garner, you can have various forms of income but the one thing you cannot have is income from employment and still expect to draw pension from either piece of legislation.

There is a fair amount of opinion to support the idea that there should be provision for a spouse who is under the age of 65 to receive the old age pension. This has been proposed in this House and I have supported it. I suggest this motion would take care of that to a considerable extent; perhaps it is all we need. In the usual case the husband is a little older and if he wants to work to age 65 when his wife is somewhere between 60 and 65, under this provision she could draw the pension without waiting until she reached 65. I think if hon. members will look at the motion as a whole they will realize that it meets the kind of situation that has been set out in this House a number of times and that we feel ought to be dealt with as soon as possible.

The other thing to be said and said very strongly on a proposal of this kind is that it is a way of doing something about the unemployment problem that faces our young people. It seems a bit silly to keep the old man working past 60 and put younger people on grants to do something that can be thought up just to keep them from doing nothing. Why not pension the old man and let the young person have the job? I do not suggest this as a complete solution to the unemployment problem. The statistics I saw today suggest that there are just over 700,000 people in Canada between 60 and 65. I was not able to ascertain how many of those are in the work force, but bearing in mind that most unemployment is amongst the younger people there is a pretty good possibility that 250,000 to 300,000 of the 700,000 people between ages 60 and 65 are employed. I would guess that at least half of them, if they were given the opportunity to retire and draw the full old age security pension, particularly at $150 a month, and to draw their full Canada Pension Plan benefit and any other pension they might be entitled to from industry, would leave the labour force and take advantage of this proposal. I submit that we would create perhaps 150,000 or even 200,000 jobs. That does not completely solve the unemployment problem but it makes a bigger hole in it than I see in some of these press releases that come to our desks about the number of jobs created by certain departments of government.

I also point out that if you increase the purchasing power of the people over age 60, both those not now working and in effect those whom you retire, it would create a demand for more goods and services which in turn would create work and make a significant contribution to the solution of our present unemployment problem.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because this resolution makes such eminent good sense, because it expresses views I have heard expressed by members in all parts of this House, because there is such wide public support for it, I submit it to the House this afternoon in the hope that the House will indicate that it favours the elements of this resolution, particularly a lowering of the eligible age on a voluntary basis, increasing the amount of pension, putting the escalation on a realistic basis, and doing away with a means or income test so that the pensions our people receive when they retire will clearly be theirs as a matter of right.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will accept the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Gladly.

Mr. Francis: I have listened carefully to the hon. member and I have read his resolution. I will quote the last part of the resolution which reads:

—for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

The first part of the resolution reads:

—the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and are prepared to withdraw from the labour market—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

May I ask if the retirement test is clearly to be part of the Old Age Security Act between ages 60 and 65 under the hon. member's resolution?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is correct. The retirement test would be an additional point that would have to be met but only between ages 60 and 65. Over 65 there would be no retirement test, just as at the present time there is no retirement test under the Canada Pension Plan over age 70.

Mr. Francis: Would the hon. member concede that there might be some difficulty "for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act" because there is a fine line between a means or income test and retirement test under many circumstances. Would that not sometimes create difficulties of administration?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the hon. member is asking my opinion, I do not think it would. This business of whether it is a means test, a needs or income test is a matter of definition. I would call what we now have a means test and my hon. friend would call it an income test. As for a retirement test, we already have one in the Canada Pension Plan and the administration of that plan has had plenty of experience in drawing the line between a means or income test and a retirement test. All I am suggesting between age 60 and age 65, in the case of either pension, is the retirement test, namely, that a person is out of the labour market.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon on the notice of motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to increasing pensions for senior citizens. I am especially happy to do so because this matter is of great concern in Metropolitan Toronto, the city I come from, and very important in Scarborough West, an area which has more than its share of senior citizens, being one of the oldest suburban areas of Metropolitan Toronto. Even though the government has considerably improved the lot of senior citizens in recent years, and rightly so, by introducing the guaranteed income supplement, which I believe now is at $137 for the senior single citizen, including old age security pension, and at $260 for senior citizen married couples, that supplement not being taxable as of January 1 this year, and even though the government increased income tax exemptions for single people to $1,500 and to $2,850 for married couples, the government has, for the first time, brought down an additional $650 exemption for senior citizens age 65 and over.

Mr. Gilbert: That is not enough.

Mr. Francis: And the qualifying age was reduced from 70 to 65.

Mr. Weatherhead: As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) rightly observes, the government reduced the qualifying age at what senior citizens may receive the guaranteed income supplement from 70 to 65. These are big improvements. Also, let us not forget the heavy involvement of the federal government in the building of senior citizens homes.

Mr. Alexander: Not enough are being built. The situation is terrible.

Mr. Gilbert: I agree.

Mr. Weatherhead: I am talking about the heavy involvement of the federal government in senior citizens housing. We supply most of the money for building senior citizens homes. We should not forget an area that, until recently, was the subject of much controversy, the area of medicare. Substantial benefits are available to senior citizens under our medicare program, and particularly to those in great need, for senior citizens probably need medicare more than any other group. This program is now fait accompli, and its accomplishment is now passing into history. Yet the medicare legislation was proclaimed less than four years ago.

However, as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as well as others would no doubt say, much remains to be done for senior citizens of this country. They are the ones who made the country what it is. Before most of us were born, they went through the great war, they went through the great depression and, later, some of them went through the second world war. Some of us were around then. Those are the people who, during long decades, earned low and, in many cases, fixed incomes. Only in their later working years could they earn the greater incomes that our younger people have been able to obtain. Therefore, I think there is a good case to be made on their behalf, and the federal government should look on their circumstances with compassion.

I must confess that I am in sympathy with much of what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said about senior citizens. I am in sympathy with many of his philosophical ideas in many areas. Nevertheless, I am surprised that an hon. member who has been here for nearly 30 years can speak about increasing senior citizens' pensions without once mentioning how much those increased pensions would cost us. As I said, I am in sympathy with much the hon. member says. I work with him on committees and appreciate the great deal that he does. I also appreciate his strategy in what he is doing. Yet it seems strange, as I see it, that an hon. member can make a speech advocating substantial increases in pensions to certain senior citizens and advocating that the qualifying age be reduced to 60 for those not in the labour market, a change which might affect perhaps half our senior citizens, and not mention once, as I remember, the cost of this additional increase.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was the government's answer to a $20 pension 50 years ago.

Mr. Weatherhead: I confess I decided to speak about an hour ago and haven't had much chance to research my figures. I am willing to be corrected if my figures are wrong. Speaking from memory, I think there are about 1,700,000 senior citizens in this country at present; and of these about 1 million get either the whole of the guaranteed income supplement or some part of it. About 700,000 senior citizens presently get the basic $80 per month. It seems to me that increasing the pensions of the 700,000 senior citizens who now get the $80 per month basic pension and no GIS to $150 a month would cost us nearly $600 million a year. I am talking about those who get their pension at age 65. Secondly, if you increased the pensions of the one million or so senior citizens who are getting the guaranteed income supplement, and, on average, they get about $120 a month, a figure which is pretty close, the expense would be about $360 million a year. Those are my rough calculation, increasing the pensions of people over 65 in the way the hon. member suggests would cost the taxpayers of this country approximately between $950 million and $1 billion a year. That is an additional cost.

However, that is not the end of the financial calculation, because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has come up with an interesting and worthy idea for getting workers of 60 and 65 out of the work force. I do not think he suggests that this would solve the unemployment problem by any means. His idea I think is that if we could get about 150,000 senior citizens between 60 and 65 out of the work force, there would be more jobs for the younger people, the group with the highest unemployment rate. I think we ought to discuss this theory about whether people between 60 and 65 want to retire, and whether they are better off as retired people or as working people. There really is not much time this afternoon for me to go into this since others wish to speak on the motion.

Coming down to the financial end of it, and that is not the only consideration by any means, one can say several things. The hon. member has spoken about 700,000 people between 60 and 65 who are in the work force. I thought the figure was closer to 1 million; however I will accept the hon. member's figures since he has done some research and I have not had much chance to do any. Let us say that of these 700,000 people, half are out of the work force already. Of course, the half of those between 60 and 65 who are no longer in the work force include married women who once worked but no longer work, men who have retired early through sickness, company options, and that sort of thing. I think at least half of the 700,000 people the hon. member referred to are not in the work force.

If we do not entice any other people to leave the work force between the ages of 60 and 65, I believe the additional cost of giving $150 a month would be roughly $630 million a year. Then, if we were successful in enticing a further 100,000 to leave the work force, the cost to the taxpayers would be an extra $180 million a year. I realize that what senior citizens are entitled to receive and what they deserve to receive is not a matter simply of dollars and cents, but it does seem to me there is need for a measure of financial responsibility even when we are talking about people for who we care so much. Unless hon. members can find some great fault in my admittedly rough arithmetic, I would suggest that the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, which would cost between $1.75 billion and $2 billion a year, would be a difficult burden for taxpayers to bear. I might remind the House that we have recently been discussing the idea of a guaranteed income for all Canadians at a cost of perhaps $2 billion a year. So hon. members can appreciate just how much money we are talking about this afternoon.

As hon. members sometimes do in their own speeches, I should like to express agreement with parts of the hon. member's motion. I agree we have no excuse whatsoever for failing to provide for annual increases in connection with the guaranteed income supplement and the basic old age pension corresponding to the actual increase in the cost of living during the previous year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Weatherhead: The hon. member refers in his motion to the basic amount being escalated each year by an amount which would enable pensioners to keep up with rising living costs and to share in rising living standards. Frankly, I cannot understand why this has not been done. I know there are some who would argue that the guaranteed income supplement has been increased by a large amount and that this increase is going to people who need it the most. It is said we cannot afford to give an annual increase to people drawing basic old age security pensions. I feel that most of the people drawing basic old age security pensions cannot by any means be considered to be wealthy even though they may have a little more than the ceiling established in connection with the guaranteed income supplement regulations.

It is true that there are a few E. P. Taylors about, a few wealthy people—lawyers, doctors, dentists and a few others who have made good investments and are still working in their late sixties and seventies—but these people by and large are paying high taxes anyway. If we gave them an extra 5 per cent or 6 per cent on their pensions, whatever the figure might be, we would get most of that money back by way of income tax in any event. For these reasons I believe it is essentially a phony argument to say that all those who are not receiving the guaranteed income supplement are well off. They may have a little more coming in than the others, income from a few stocks and bonds, but they are not well off. It would be much better, in my view, if we could give them a fair increase every year.

We all receive letters on this subject from retired schoolteachers and others who are now finding it difficult to get along on their pensions. My primary concern, of course, is for the people who have no extra income at all; for the two-thirds of our senior citizens who have no other source of money. At the same time, we should strive to make the old age security plan fair and meaningful and the best way of doing so, while not bankrupting the treasury, is to make provision for reasonable increases each year in line with the actual increase in the cost of living.

One area in which we can increase pensions without placing too great an additional burden upon the treasury is that of the guaranteed income supplement. Senior citizens in receipt of these payments are now getting $137 a month, which is a lot more than they received a couple of years ago. But it is still well below the poverty line. Two senior citizens who are married and living together can possibly get by because their expenses can be shared, but single people especially are being asked to live well below the poverty line. I agree with the hon. member that these senior citizens should be entitled to $150 a month rather than $137 a month as at present. If we were prepared to allow annual increases based on actual increases in the cost of living, we could go a long way toward giving this important part of our population its just due.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, until half an hour or so ago I was not aware that this motion would be discussed today. I do not particularly wish to say anything in rebuttal of the contentions put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) or the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. It seems to me it would be very easy to say that the pension should be raised by a more or less arbitrary figure. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests $150 a month, and the hon. member across the way seems to agree with him. It would be an easy thing to say, "I think it should be $200 a month," but I would still be pulling an arbitrary figure out of the air.

I do not think a member of the opposition, in particular, should be expected to cite an appropriate figure. After all, the government has access to the work of various boards and commissions, including that of the Economic Council of Canada. The government has this expertise at its disposal and it should be able to arrive at a reasonable and practical figure at which the pension should start, tied to the cost of living, of course.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says the Old Age Security Act should be amended in order that people may draw pensions at the age of 60, provided they are willing to retire from the labour force. I see this as a means test in itself; at any rate, it is a string attached to the pension. I might say I am not at all convinced that these pensions should be granted without any strings being attached to them. I am willing to accept the government's word that the state cannot afford to provide a reasonable standard of living for everybody who reaches a certain age. While I agree that that is the ultimate, barring that I think the emphasis should be placed, as indeed it has to some extent, on those who are actually in need. Therefore, I do not agree that $150 is the magic figure, because it might be even more than that; I do not know. However, our pension provisions are due for an overhaul and the government should have those people who are expert in this field produce a reasonable, sensible starting point for a new pension scheme.

I subscribe wholeheartedly to escalation of pensions. I suspect that the reason various governments are not too receptive to this suggestion is that this would remove pension increases from the political arena. With pensions escalated on a regular basis tied to cost of living increases, no government in need of a few extra votes would in an election campaign be able to promise an increase in the old age pension. As I say, I subscribe 100 per cent to this suggestion, knowing that within the next year or so we will be forming the government. Even so, I do not think we would want to be subjected to this kind of temptation and this is why I endorse the proposal to remove it from the political sphere.

With regard to eliminating the means test, as I have indicated I do not think I could subscribe to this in light of present conditions in our country. However, I do think that those with no means of support other than their pensions are entitled to at least a half reasonable living. The Economic Council of Canada has already drawn a poverty line, and although I do not recall the figure at the moment I suggest that this would be a good starting point for paying a pension to those with no other means of livelihood.

Mr. Gilbert: That would be over $150 a month.

Mr. Peddle: If it is over $150 a month, I do not want to be arbitrary but it would seem to me that this is a decent, reasonable starting point without going into specifics. One aspect of pensions on which I welcome the opportunity to support the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre relates to those receiving the old age pension, having reached the age of 65, and supporting a wife. The hon. member referred to bringing a lady of 60 under the plan. I do not think this would go nearly far enough. For example, in my own part of the country terrible situations are caused where the wives of pensioners are aged 53, 54 and 55. There might be a few select areas in the country where a woman of this age can find gainful employment, but there are none in my part of the country and I suspect there are none in most other parts of the country.

If a man of 65 has a wife the same age, then together they draw a combined pension of $255 a month. However, living next door to them may be a male pensioner who has reached his sixty-fifth birthday and receives a pension but who has a wife of 55 who receives nothing, and although he has the same expenses he has to exist on $137 a month. From a common sense point of view, this is neither just nor decent. I think the government is beginning to recognize that when a man reaches this age he should be given the opportunity to live with certain dignity. I contend that the government should also give him the opportunity of discharging any other obligations he may have to his wife or members of the family who live with him. I support 100 per cent the hon. member's proposal in this regard.

To repeat, rather than pulling any arbitrary figure out of the air, I think the government should keep a close watch on this aspect. If the government pays any attention at all to this kind of debate, I think it should zero in on this problem and try to discharge its responsibility with a degree of common sense and justice. The family income security plan bill will be before the House again within a few days. This bill recognizes that the cost of living increases every so often, but even yet it has no escalation clause. At least, I do not think it has. However, when the bill becomes law it will triple family allowance payments in respect of children of some families.

I suggest the government should not only show great concern for one sector of society; it must show concern for all sectors. I think our old age pensioners are long overdue for further consideration and for a complete overhaul of their benefits. I suggest that those in government circles who read these debates should pay attention to the views expressed and give this situation the attention it deserves.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words, during the few minutes remaining before recess, in support of this motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

On many occasions already, the hon. member who has seriously examined this problem has submitted motions or bills for the purpose of either increasing the pension rates or lowering the statutory age for becoming eligible. Once again, I commend him for it.

I was very pleased earlier to hear him say that he favoured the payment of a pension to the spouse of the pensioner, even when the spouse has not yet reached the statutory age. Although the hon. member had not dealt with this problem in his motion, he insisted on saying a few words about it during his comments. I think I was, if not the first, at least one of the first to submit a motion in this respect to this House.

I note also that the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) who spoke before me shares the same view.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest this matter is very important and it should be considered as early as possible.

The hon. parliamentary secretary who spoke after the member for Winnipeg North Centre said that after all the cost of such amendments to the Old Age Security Act would be prohibitive. In the Liberal Party, they think in terms of dollars rather than in terms of goods and services that can be offered to the people of Canada, and particularly to senior citizens.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, thanks to our means of production which are steadily developing, we could enable a great many people aged 60 or more to retire from the work force and still ensure enough production and services to all the Canadian people without depriving anyone.

This morning, I found on my desk a letter from a senior citizen who receives the old age security pension and the Guaranteed Income Supplement, or $137, starting this month. However, two persons have to live on this one pension; besides, both are seriously ill and it is a well known fact that drugs are tremendously expensive. These people have applied to the Quebec government for additional aid to enable them to pay for the drugs they have to buy every month. This was the reply: We are willing to pay any amount in excess of $30 a month for the purchase of drugs.

This situation, Mr. Speaker, is utterly ridiculous. This couple would have to spend $30 a month out of a total monthly allowance of $137 and would have to live on $107 a month. This is an all too frequent and unfortunate situation wherein pensioners have no choice but to live in poverty and misery. As a stopgap, they have to go without drugs in order to provide for other needs that are as essential as those of health.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that—as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicates in his motion—we do not have to pass that measure at once but rather to consider it. By the way, the parliamentary secretary himself thought that it contained very important elements and he deplored that the government has not yet taken the appropriate steps. In fact, it seems to me that the cabinet should consider that situation as soon as possible in order to make the necessary changes.

Much could be said in every respect about the merits of this motion, but I wish to leave it to the House to reach a decision this evening on this bill. To conclude, I will support the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

[English]

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Alexander: Are you for it or against the motion?

Mr. Osler: You will have to wait and listen to my speech; and we would be honoured if you would come into the chamber to do so. I do not think that kind of question really needs to be asked of me, because in the short time I have been in this House I am on record as being in agreement with a great deal of what this motion stands for—and I am, like my colleague, a great admirer of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is just across the street from me as far as ridings are concerned, so perhaps I am on a little more intimate terms with him than my colleague. But that does not mean I am disillusioned with him or am not an admirer of his.

I think the words "give immediate consideration" are the hopeful words of this motion, but I must say my priorities are quite different to those of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not believe in the necessity of going back to the universal concept. I do not think the country could afford that. However, I do believe that basic old age pensions should be tied to the cost of living. I suggested a year and a half ago, when the minister first brought forward his aborted bill, that this was the situation. That bill was later withdrawn.

This matter involves the savings plans of all those who do not have a large income but whose income is enough to disqualify their receiving the benefit of the supplement. They should be paid a pension tied to the cost of living. It is the responsibility of the government to see that the cost of living does not go too high; and if it has to shell out from time to time because of an error, the people as a whole should have to pay, not just those who expect to have their basic retirement plans increased by $80. I am not capable of saying whether the country can afford to go higher than $137, but I think pressure should be maintained to go higher. Therefore, I think the government should be asked to consider, as the motion asks, whether or not we can go to $150 at this time for individuals.

Personally, I would rather see some other glaring errors corrected first. Somebody referred to married couples. I think it is a crime that just because a girl married a man a few years older than herself she should find herself, when she is older, not able to take part in the scheme until she is 65. Her husband may be incapable of bringing in the salary to which they were accustomed. I would like to see these hardship cases considered perhaps before anything else. I think it is a crime that some wives feel they are a drag on their pensioned husbands. Many of them cannot work because of health or lack of training, and it is a terrible thing that they should not be able to participate. My priorities would be different from those of the hon. member.

Having said that and having rejected the principle of universality, I suggest the question is fundamental and it would not do the government any harm to again consider it. Therefore I will sit down now and see what happens.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two.

Mr. Alexander: I knew it would happen.

Mr. Francis: There is a certain game being played in this House.

Mr. Alexander: This is not a game; we are talking about our senior citizens.

Mr. Francis: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to speak. He had an opportunity to speak had he wanted to do so, but did not take that opportunity. We have listened to the speeches of three or four members on the other side of the House and the opportunity should be given to us to say a word or two, as is our parliamentary right.

I want to go on record as stating that I think the government should give serious consideration to the escalation formula for old age pensions which is embodied in part of this motion. Let me support particularly the suggestion that there be an increase in the rate of escalation of pensions, because I think the 2 per cent formula has clearly proved to be inadequate in light of experience. I should like to support 3 per cent as being reasonable and feasible. I hope the government will give serious consideration at the earliest possible time to this kind of change, which I know will have to be implemented not only in relation to the Canada Pension Plan and an increased supplement but to a wide range of retirement pension plans including those of the Public Service, Crown corporations, and so on.

The whole question of pensions is a matter of public debate and the creation of a public image or public awareness. The hon. member in bringing forward this motion today is accomplishing just that. As he said earlier in the debate, he is not here to score debating points. He is not concerned whether the motion or certain parts of it are adopted, but with creating public opinion in Canada in respect of measures directed toward increasing the benefit of those retired from the labour force and supporting themselves on retirement savings and the pension.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD, INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSIONS AND CONCILIATION BOARDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was detailing some of the problems of technological change in respect of this bill. I believe the technological change proposals must be criticized and assessed as a remedy to the problem. The problem is very simple but very difficult to rectify. The problem is to incorporate technological changes into Canadian industries so that they can compete with foreign industries in our domestic and foreign markets. At the same time we must minimize the adverse effects of such change upon members of the Canadian labour force, protect the public interest and carry out our public responsibility.

The present urgency in seeking solutions to this problem is twofold: the kinds of technological change Canada has experienced in the last decade or so have been introduced at a more rapid rate than in earlier years, and current technological change has a far reaching effect on Canada's manpower. The effect of technological change upon manpower requirements is diverse. It is generally associated with a substantial increase in the number of skilled, technical and professional occupations with a slower growth rate for the semi-skilled and unskilled occupational groups as well as among the Metis and Indian populations. I think this can be given as one of the reasons for the difficulty in respect of job placement.

Certain variables in the past few years have accentuated the effects of these trends. The rise in value of the Canadian dollar has made foreign competition more difficult to cope with and has led to a need for increased efficiency in production by Canadian firms. On the other hand, a very high level of unemployment prevents the reabsorption of displaced, semi-skilled and unskilled occupational groups into the labour force. Where Canadian industries have failed to take advantage of technological advance, labour lay-offs have resulted, one example of which is in the pulp and paper industry. Another problem of technological change is that it most often occurs in highly unionized industries.

The effects of accelerating technological change and a high level of unemployment upon highly unionized industries have contributed to uneasy industrial relations in Canada. Obviously, industry and unionized labour have an interest in technological change. It is equally obvious that the Canadian public has an interest. In the first place, the Canadian public is the beneficiary of an efficient and technologically competitive industry, or the financial victim of an inefficient industry that is protected by tariffs or bolstered by government subsidies. In the second place, taxes are variously used to assist industry to make technological changes or to assist employees to weather such changes. In the third place, the public has an interest as the victim inconvenienced by industrial strife arising out of management's and labour's failure to reach agreement on technological change.

The public, through its government, has an interest in technological change and its effects. This public interest is not one of convenience or inconvenience but of responsibility, because the public is responsible for the economic, fiscal, tax, tariff and trade policies of the government of the day. These policies may encourage or discourage an industry from making technological change, or encourage or discourage labour from co-operating in such changes. It is reasonable to assume that the public has a vested interest in the problems of technological change and, arising only from that interest, the right and responsibility to be a third presence, with management and trade unions, in contributing to the solution of such problems.

One area which is clearly difficult to define is what is meant by technological change. It is obvious that where a new machine displaces workers, this will be a technological change. However, there are many other areas where technological change will not be so obvious. Therefore, I think there will be a major problem in defining technological change. There is also the provision that a significant number of employees will be affected. In a large concern there may be quite a number; in a small concern it will be as great in number in relation to the total working force. This in itself is an element of discrimination. It is just as important a matter for one employee who is displaced by technological change as it is for 100 workers who are being displaced. One of the interesting developments that may occur with technological change is whether or not the stability of the long-term collective agreement will be maintained because strikes are possible in mid-contract. There seems to be general agreement that the long-term contract has been beneficial to management, labour and the labour union. These matters will have to be resolved in the future.

Any discussion about the effect of this technological change clause and its actual working mechanism must, I believe, be considered in light of what the country will need in the way of new jobs. In the very interesting survey conducted by the Science Council of Canada, entitled "Technology in a Cold Climate," it appears that we in Canada have promoted and encouraged a large amount of skilled labour and highly trained people but we do not yet have the technological industries to employ them. Canada is faced with the urgent problem of creating a large number of new jobs in the 1970s. However, our industrial production has been disappointing. Canada's index of industrial production rose by 3.1 per cent in 1971, compared with 2.1 per cent in 1970. During the last decade, the sixties, the growth factor was 6.4 per cent. Therefore, the 3.1 per cent figure of last year is disappointing compared with the sixties. Manufacturing production increased, in volume terms, by 2.3 per cent compared with a decline of about 1 per cent in 1970. There has been in recent years relatively slow growth in industrial production, even with the pick-up of industrial and manufacturing production in the 1970s.

In the April 14 edition of the Globe and Mail there is an article headed "Exports to U.S. offset reductions elsewhere". The article points out that the first three months of this year showed a substantial drop compared with Japan, the European Economic Community and Great Britain. Without the increase in exports to the United States our trade position would be in dire straits. What does this mean? Our increase in trade with the United States was composed largely of crude petroleum, natural gas and lumber—both renewable and non-renewable products. We have been questioning whether we should export these materials in large quantities.

This technological change provision will be very important for the balance of the seventies. Statistics indicate that the peak of entry into the labour force has passed. Last year the labour force growth rate was 3.1 per cent, and total population growth was roughly half that. As the projections of the Economic Council show, the role of the labour force will in fact be slowly diminishing in relation to the rate increase. However, it will still be among the fastest of any industrialized country.

The impact of technological change has a dual role. We as a nation desire technological change because, presumably, only in this way will we make any changes to increase our productivity, create new jobs and achieve a sustained standard of living for our citizens. However, as far as the individual worker is concerned, in many cases technological change will mean only disruption of his way of life and he will become understandably unhappy with his situation.

As far as the effect of technological change is concerned, and notwithstanding the clause in this bill, I think it will greatly depend on the situation at the moment. If there is not high unemployment, it is likely that technological change will be accepted with minor effect. Increased employment benefits, severance pay, and so on, should take some of the sting out of these changes, but if unemployment remains high technological change may well become a bone of contention.

The bill affects two important groups of federal employees about whom I am concerned both from the point of view of my constituency and western Canada in general. This bill affects railway and transportation workers employed in grain handling and grain elevators, industries under federal jurisdiction. There are many ways in which changes have affected employees and communities without, perhaps, falling directly into the area of technological change. Technological changes will make a vast difference to grain handling, railroading, the agricultural structure and, ultimately, social and rural life in western Canada.

For a long time there have been rumours and suggestions that wholesale changes in our grain handling system will be necessary. Although the grain transportation committee has made a report, the minister in charge of the wheat board has not yet seen fit to divulge its contents to the public. However, enough seems to be filtering out of the secrecy adopted by the government to indicate that the report will contain a somewhat centralized grain delivery system. This will mean the phasing out of many smaller elevator points throughout western Canada. Those employees under federal jurisdiction will be affected.

With the abandonment of the branch line protection by 1975, many railways in western Canada will be abandoned. Weeds will grow along the tracks. In my own area, the possible abandonment of a whole subdivision between Dauphin and Hudson Bay junction, via Swan River will cause significant changes in the whole agricultural economy. Many of the proposed changes do not seem to make sense. I urge the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to make public the report on grain handling as soon as possible so that we can begin discussion on the merits and demerits of the proposed changes. The technological changes that will be present in the rationalization of grain handling and its effects on railroading and the agricultural economy will be enormous. The value of grain production in western Canada has not changed in the past 20 years. This means that the increased costs of transportation will have to be met out of greatly reduced income. The provisions regarding technological change might well be too hasty or premature in the areas of grain handling and railroading.

If there is any doubt about the effects of technological change that will be forthcoming affecting transportation workers and, in particular, railway workers and other employees involved in grain handling, no clearer indication need be noted than that a senior official of the CNR in western Canada has said that the time will shortly come when present rates for the transportation of grain will not be sufficient to sustain the flow of locomotives and boxcars necessary to meet the needs of the grain industry. I think the request by the CPR that the federal government assist in the leasing of American diesels and boxcars to move grain to the east indicates the future trend. There will be a request for an increase in transportation charges with respect to grain. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we will see an attempt made to have the Crowsnest Pass freight rates set aside.

Coupled with so-called rationalization of the grain transportation industry there will be widespread technological changes which will affect the employment of many railroad workers and of elevator workers both at inland terminals and local elevator systems. How this bill will help with respect to technological changes remains to be seen.

The government seems to have made some reasonable changes compared with the provisions of the original bill. Obviously, it should be an advantage that during negotiation of a new contract an employer will be able to bargain with a union on the laying down of guidelines for technological change. This should go some way toward preventing strikes.

So far as the grain handlers are concerned, I point out that a situation exists in Vancouver where the handlers have been working without a contract since last November 30. Should a strike be called by their union, it could well be disastrous. This bill can have an important effect on transportation and grain handling and in committee I will be interested to hear the views of expert witnesses on this aspect of the problem.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I intend to concentrate my brief remarks on one aspect of this proposed legislation, that part of it which, as the case may be, has to do or has not to do with the fishermen of Canada and, more particularly, their status in regard to collective bargaining. This is a very important issue in the part of the country from which I come, as it is important in other parts of Canada.

My colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), who is our spokesman on these matters has already voiced several of the opinions which I am about to put forward. I am sure that following his return to Ottawa this evening from the west coast, he will again be on his feet either in this chamber or in the committee proposing amendments to improve the legislation.

Last week I was glad to learn from the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) that he is quite willing and indeed would be happy if representatives of the British Columbia fishermen, through their organization the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union of British Columbia, appeared before the committee which will be discussing this legislation in detail. I know, as the minister pointed out, that this is a matter strictly within the purview of the committee; it alone can decide what witnesses to call. But I think Canadian fishermen must be encouraged to know that the minister has no objection to their representations being placed forcefully before the committee. I believe it is important that this be done.

To put the matter briefly, Mr. Speaker, the fishermen in British Columbia contend that the legislation as drafted could deny collective bargaining rights to a majority of the fishermen of the country. Surely this should not be the case. The fishermen of Canada are working people; they should not be denied the rights of working people. As drafted, the bill proposes to include some fishermen within the definition of "employee" in the Canada Labour Code, but unless the present wording is amended it could exclude a great many fishermen, indeed the majority of British Columbia salmon fishermen who have been organized and have bargained collectively since 1893.

The exclusion of fishermen who are employed on their own small boats, fishing for large processing companies, contradicts in the first place the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1956 which deemed all fishermen to be employees within the meaning of the act. In the second place, it contradicts the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and section 411 of the Criminal Code which granted all fishermen in British Columbia equal exemption with all other workmen from the anti-combines provisions of the legislation. Thirdly, it contradicts the recommendations of the Woods task force which proposed that all fishermen who are economically dependent for the sale of their product on a very limited market be given collective bargaining rights.

The provinces of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland recently amended their legislation in order to provide collective bargaining rights for fishermen. Formerly their legislation excluded inshore fishermen who used their own small boats. The amended legislation included all fishermen. It is upsetting to find that the legislation which we are discussing tonight has been drafted in such a way that a great number of Canadian fishermen could be denied collective bargaining rights.

Judge Nathan Green, industrial inquiry commissioner, stated in 1970 that the co-adventurer principle is an "unrealistic, outmoded idea which has no relevance in this day and age to this type of operation." The artificial division of fishermen, by legislation, into employee fishermen and self-employed fishermen is unrealistic and outmoded. It deprives thousands of Canadians of basic rights already available to most citizens.

Again, we find indications that the government plans to remove the majority of commercial fishermen from enjoying the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The term "self-employed," if it were applied to all fishermen working on their own small boats could effectively be used to exclude a considerable number of fishermen in British Columbia from UIC protection. All fishermen in Canada were covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am sure they wish to continue to be covered by it. The situation reminds me of an old slogan first used many years ago in a campaign in British Columbia to secure coverage for fishermen under the Workmen's Compensation Act of that province: "Fishermen are workmen in fact. Why not under the Unemployment Insurance Act?" One might add—"and the Canada Labour Code?"

From the point of view of fishermen, probably the most important change they would seek in this bill is one providing basic equality for all fishermen. They need a more adequate and all-inclusive clause defining fishermen as employees. I am not a member of the fisheries and forestry committee nor the labour, manpower and immigration committee, but I suggest a definition along the following lines:

A fisherman shall be deemed to be an employee under this act. Fisherman means a person engaged in commercial fishing in waters under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Fisheries or on the high seas, accepting or receiving payment according to the volume and price of fish caught and delivered to an operator who purchases fish, regardless of whether such fisherman (a) owns and operates his own fishing vessel (provided he as master-owner of a fishing vessel does not employ or engage more than two additional fishermen who share in the proceeds of the fishing voyages); (b) shares in the operation of a fishing vessel owned by another person and receives in payment for his services a share or portion of the proceeds of the fishing voyages; (c) operates a fishing vessel owned by another person under a rental agreement or conditional sale agreement or any other form of oral or written agreement or (d) receives wages for all or part of his employment on a fishing vessel or in fitting out a fishing vessel on which he will be employed.

I think the intention should be to make sure that all fishermen engaged in commercial fishing on smaller boats are included whether or not they be owners of the small boats on which they are employed. At the same time, I would propose to exclude from the category of employee those vessel owners who employ more than two men on their vessels. That would really mean that the master-owner of a fishing vessel who employs three or more crew members would not be classified as an employee.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister and the members of this House, particularly those who are or will be members of the committee to which this legislation will shortly proceed, to harken to the voice of the fishermen and make definite provision for their spokesmen to appear before the committee and explain the difficulties involved in this legislation which will handicap them in their earning capacity through collective bargaining. This will give the spokesmen an opportunity to present the type of amendments, changes or improvements which they seek in the legislation in order to protect themselves.

This is a matter of very grave concern to many thousands of workers on the seas and, incidentally, to their families. The Minister of Labour has so far indicated a fairness of mind and of procedure to a greater extent than some of his predecessors. I am told that the minister believes or has said that the position of the fishermen in this matter is basically unassailable. I, too, believe that it is unassailable and that my few remarks tonight should be taken as some indication of the view of the fishermen, particularly those of British Columbia and, I am sure, of other parts of the country. I conclude by saying that I am sure the committee to which this legislation will be sent will give full consideration to the protection of the workers in one of our basic industries.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to say how gratified I think most members on this side of the House are that both the official opposition and the other opposition parties have expressed support for this measure. I think we have come to the realization in this country that the rate of change in society, the rate of change in industry makes mandatory the introduction of measures to assure that the price of technological change is not going to be borne by the working people with countless tragedies province by province.

We know that there has been substantial change in the nature of industrial development, especially in the last ten years, and that people who up to this time regarded themselves as beyond any possibility of unemployment are now being rendered unemployed, not because of some fault of their own or because they have been found to be inefficient but because new machines have been invented. The revolution of automation and cybernation is sweeping this country as it is many other countries. We are now told that a man will hold at least three different occupations during his working life.

Mr. Alexander: Under this government.

Mr. Perrault: My friend, when your government left office it had one of the most disastrous records of unemployment of any Canadian government, and when the official opposition lectures us on how to create full employment it is like an arsonist giving a fire prevention lecture.

Mr. Alexander: Carry on.

[Mr. Mather.]

Mr. Perrault: I simply want a reasoned approach here tonight and I welcome the support of the official opposition, but we do not want that kind of aside.

Mr. Alexander: Not if you are responsible.

Mr. Perrault: Technology is not only affecting the man who works at the lathe, in the shipyard or the auto assembly plant; it is affecting those in the executive suite. Some people in this country who are today criticizing this measure—and I do not think they fully understand Bill C-183—will perhaps find themselves in an economically insecure position in a few years. We are told by the Economic Council of Canada that at any given time 3.8 per cent of the work force will be seeking employment even during times of technical full employment. This is why since 1968 the government has introduced such a wide range of measures including those designed to provide temporary income support through the new unemployment insurance program, new working opportunities through the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and why this winter, for example, the special employment program will see almost $500 million invested by the government in providing jobs for 150,000 Canadians who would not otherwise have work.

The government is quite properly and deeply concerned with the whole matter of the technological revolution. The present law, which we are really seeking to change, has not been changed since 1948. The section dealing with technological change has been given a great amount of publicity, yet misunderstandings remain.

Mr. Alexander: Then why did you change it?

Mr. Perrault: In recent months I have met with groups in different parts of Canada. I have visited Halifax, Nova Scotia and I have spoken on Vancouver Island, and at points between. There are still some people who believe they are somehow going to be affected by this bill which proposes to provide a measure of protection for those affected adversely by technological change. A funeral director in Ontario contacted the department and said that he felt this proposed measure would cripple his intention to introduce technological change in his operation. But, of course, the profession of mortician is not within federal jurisdiction. This measure applies to industries within federal jurisdiction. There are people who say that may well be true, but when a law like this is brought in at the federal level some provincial government is going to pick it up and bring in a similar measure.

I submit this measure is a good one and we should get it into committee where we can make modifications. If it can be demonstrated that these modifications would improve the legislation, we should make them; and if the legislation is good, it should and will be imitated by the provinces. If it is a bad measure, if this is bad law, then of course it should not be emulated in other jurisdictions.

Surely we in this House day after day receive tragic letters from those who have been displaced in jobs as a result of automation or new technology. We hear of economic tragedies which occur in all provinces from British Columbia to Newfoundland. We have a responsibility, in so far as it lies within our ability to act at the federal level to make sure that these tragedies do not take place.

We propose that the terms of this proposed law shall not apply to collective agreements which contain provisions designed to cushion the impact of change. Happily, progressive companies in this nation have entered into contracts which make provision, in some cases, for the impact of change. In my province, British Columbia—a highly unionized province—many leading companies have brought in the kind of provision in contract agreements that we seek to bring in under federal jurisdiction.

Of course, these clauses of the bill do not apply in cases where there are provisions in the collective agreement for the negotiation and settlement of problems arising from technological change and where notice in writing of the change was given during the open period of a contract. The technological change provisions would not apply to existing collective agreements, but only to those made after the bill comes into force. The pertinent sections have also been modified, so that when an employer gives notice of a change during the open period this notice will not be invalidated because he is unable to give precise information as to the likely effects of the future change.

Hopefully, when the bill is studied in committee we shall hear from various groups of this country. I assure the hon. member who spoke previously that representatives of the fishermen will be invited to come before the committee to submit their case. I have met with them, as has the hon. member. They have raised persuasive arguments in some areas. We should not enter the committee hearings with dogmatic views. We should enter the hearings with the absolute determination and concern that is necessary if the legislation is to meet the needs of the workers of this country.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member should speak for himself.

Mr. Perrault: Some say they are disappointed with this proposed law because we are not to get tough, we are not to bring in compulsory settlement of labour disputes; we will not bring in labour courts. Mr. Speaker, arguments advocating that we do these things always interest me. It seems to me that there is some correlation between our having one of the highest standards of living in the world—

An hon. Member: Despite the government, and not because of it.

Mr. Perrault: —and one of the most productive work forces of the world, and our having lived under free, collective bargaining up to this time. Our present economic difficulties do not lessen my basic confidence in the free collective bargaining process. It is too simplistic to suggest that if we could just get tough with labour, or just get tough with management, we could remove all the inconvenience and hardship that is caused by certain lockouts and strikes. That sort of argument is one of deceptive simplicity because any government that accepted it would soon be resented both by labour and management. If any government bureaucracy were established to bring about compulsory settlements and to take punitive action against those who failed to obey, the government setting up such bureaucracy would soon meet the resentment of both labour and management.

Some people talk in terms of labour courts. Have they really studied that proposition? More work days are lost in Australia, where there are labour courts, than in Canada. For years we have heard about the mature relationship between labour and management in Sweden. I have been to Sweden, as have many in this House, and I think it is a most impressive country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: What happened in Sweden last year? There was inflation of 10 per cent and a breakdown in the so-called mature relationship between labour and management. So far they have been able to negotiate and consult as to how large wage increases should be in Sweden, and they have arrived at a percentage applying to various industries. There appears to be no hard and fast method for conducting labour-management relations and no method whereby difficulties may be totally removed. During recent months, as some hon. members may know, there was a massive walkout of workers in Sweden and the Social Democrat government of that country had to order a return to work through compulsory, government edict. That Social Democrat government did not want to take that action. It had to do so because the situation was such that economic problems far more serious threatened to ensue.

I suggest that free collective bargaining is the best method of conducting labour-management relations in the North American context, Mr. Speaker. It might not be right for other countries. It certainly is right for this country. Since we have achieved so much through the free collective bargaining process down through the years, the government is determined to make the system work better. It is no accident that since the introduction of the industry specialist concept in Canada there has been a dramatic reduction in the number of work days lost through strikes and lockouts in this country. There were 132 man-days lost per 10,000 man-workdays in 1968. For last year the figure way eight days lost.

The whole key to Bill C-183 is this: it seeks to remove all those factors that apart from monetary factors lead to deterioration in labour-management relations. It seeks to remove the bricks of misunderstanding that arise during the life of an agreement—and during the open period labour and management can talk about monetary matters and economic issues. One of the basic causes of labour-management discontent in this country has surely been the festering sores which develop during the life of a contract. Some of this misunderstanding arises from fear of economic insecurity.

With new technology spreading throughout the world and affecting everybody's job, people are concerned. They want to know if they will hold their job next year. That is one of the misunderstandings we must remove if we can. That is why the technological change provision is included in the bill. That is also why, to the disappointment of some Canadians who really have not thought the matter out, the bill does not contain proposals for the arbitrary settlement of labour-management disputes.

There are certain situations in which the public interest is so clearly being affected adversely that governments must act directly. But, Mr. Speaker, these situations must be so extraordinary that we deal with them on an ad hoc basis with the method which appears to be most effective at the time. If through some extraordinary circumstance a government of Canada, be it this or any future government, should decide that the Parliament of Canada here assembled must vote on a certain matter affecting the public interest, that government should take its chances at the polls and let the people decide whether its action was truly in the public interest.

The bill before us, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code, is just one in a series of measures designed to help the Canadian worker. We have had the first major overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act since its inception 30 years ago. We have encountered some problems since the introduction of universality on January 1 but there has been a dramatic decline in the number of complaints received, and members of all parties who voted for this bill are finding their judgment confirmed that they voted well.

The Canada Labour (Standards) Code increased the minimum wage ot $1.75 and gave the governor in council power to enact further increases. It provided for maternity leave, strengthened provisions concerning equal pay for similar work, prohibited dismissal for reason of garnishment, provided for advance notice when employment is terminated and made provision for severance pay. These and other measures are complementary to the measure now before us. Each one is designed to remedy the irritations, the misunderstanding and the economic insecurity which had led to a deterioration of labour-management relations in some jurisdictions of this country.

The transitional benefit program protecting workers affected by the automotive pact has been extended to July 3, 1971, for application and to July 3, 1974, for benefits. We are extending the industry specialist concept in order to promote meaningful communication between employers and employees and to attach more importance to preventive mediation. This initiative has resulted in early settlements of disputes in such industries as railways, airlines, longshoring, and so on.

This is the pattern of government legislation, to make sure that in this highly competitive world not only will companies be encouraged to introduce useful technological change, so that Canada may compete successfully, but to ensure that there is a minimum of misunderstanding and disruption in labour-management relations. I hope this measure will be referred to the committee as quickly as possible. I have appreciated the opportunity to speak tonight. I know that members from all parts of the House will attend those committee meetings in a constructive spirit determined to improve, if possible the bill we have before us.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make some general comments about the bill before us. I wish to refer to a group of people in our society to whom little reference has been made during our discussion as to the effect of Bill C-183. The measure deals mainly with two groups in our society, labour on the one hand and management on the other. Each of these groups is well organized.

The labour unions made their appearance many years ago and gained considerable power during the depression years. They continued to work for the benefit of wage-earners generally and it is undeniable that they have improved their lot over the years. In doing so, they have acted responsibly and by and large have won the respect of Canadians. Today the unions make up one of the most powerful forces in our economic society. Although, as I say, they have won the respect of the majority of the people because in the main their actions have been responsible and just, there are some today who feel that the unions have become too strong and that they are no longer acting responsibly. I suppose it depends which way you look at it, whether this criticism appears justified or not. The fear is expressed, too, that the voice of the small man is no longer being heard in the labour movement; that the small man is being increasingly dictated to by those at the top, often from beyond our borders. So much for one of the groups we are talking about in this debate.

Opposing the unions is, of course, management. Management varies from ownership or control of small businesses employing very few people to the corporate giants, the great companies which have grown to their present position through continued expansion or through amalgamation with other corporations. In any event, they now wield tremendous economic power. Not only can they expect this power as individual companies, but many of them are banded together to form what is known as the Canadian Manufacturers Association. So we find these two great groups confronting one another.

This seems to be an age of confrontation, an age of war. The ultimate weapon used in this confrontation, is, of course, the strike. Strikes sometimes lead to violence, something we deplore and which can certainly bring no benefit in the long run to anyone. In extreme instances the right of the mob takes over. It appears that today any person with a cause or a campaign believes he is entitled to use violence to achieve his ends. Someone said it is the divine right of the mob to use violence. Canadian society deplores this; it can only lead to destruction of property, and so on.

The Canada Labour (Standards) Code, built up through the work of successive parliaments, has served as a means of modifying the effect of clashes between two great forces in our society. It also seeks to devise ways and means to prevent labour disputes reaching the strike stage, much less the violent stage. The bill before us is a further landmark on the road to better labour relations. It is the outcome, as we know, of the Woods task force study and embodies many of the recommendations made by that task force. When we get to the committee stage, we on this side of the House will be suggesting further provisions which we believe should be included in the legislation. As the previous speaker said, there appears to be general agreement on all sides of the House that the major proposals contained in Bill C-183 are acceptable.

The thrust of my remarks this evening, however, is not directed to the two groups I have mentioned, groups which are sufficiently well organized to enable them to look after themselves: I am more concerned with the silent majority—the silent, unorganized majority, as it might be called—within our country; the suffering public, if you like. These are the people who were inconvenienced by the strike of postal workers, a dispute which affected everyone in the land. These are the people who are caught up in the confrontation between government and public service employees in Toronto where garbage collectors have walked off the job. The citizens of Toronto are suffering the effects. At this moment a general strike is gripping the province of Quebec; it is causing untold hardship, much of which is felt by ordinary citizens who have no means of rectifying the situation.

I have called this third group an unorganized majority despite the fact that some people might argue that their interests are represented by the Canadian Association of Consumers. Nevertheless, it appears to me that the consumers association is a somewhat loose and voluntary organization which does not pack sufficient punch to be of real effect when situations of the magnitude I have been describing take place.

It is estimated that the labour force in this country numbers about 8,500,000, of whom only one-third are organized. The total population of the country numbers roughly 21 million. So hon. members will understand what I mean when I say that the vast majority of Canadians are obliged to sit on the sidelines as silent spectators to watch the giants grapple in the ring of labour conflict. And they are the people who are hurt.

Where does responsibility lie to protect the people in general from the damage being done to them? Surely the two antagonists have some responsibility—management and labour both. They must act responsibly and see the consequences of the demands that they make one upon the other. Just as surely, government has a serious responsibility to protect the people whom we in this House of Commons as members of parliament represent. It is our responsibility to speak up and to take the steps that will prevent the silent majority from being hurt in the way they often are. I think we agree that Bill C-183 is an attempt to do this.

There are some suggestions I should like to make to the minister which can be explored in committee during examination of this bill and which will help to mitigate the suffering about which I have been speaking. I suggest that when we come to discuss division II and section 111 which make provision for the new Canada Labour Relations Board the government will be appointing, perhaps an amendment should be moved to provide that one or maybe two representatives on that board be from consumer groups in this country. They should be persons not involved in labour or management organizations on either side but, preferably, persons who have to live on fixed incomes or on a pension. I seriously suggest to the minister that some thought be given to letting these people have a voice on the board so they can bring some sense of perspective to demands being made during negotiations.

How do we avoid labour chaos? The Financial Post has some suggestions on how to avoid labour chaos, and I should like to take an opportunity of putting them on record. The Financial Post for April 1 had this to say:

> This week's general strike by nearly all public servants in Quebec once again underlines the urgency of new moves to stabilize labour relations in the public sector. It should be obvious by now that bargaining in the public service has been working badly and is deteriorating. Federal civil servants each time they are asked, vote in growing numbers to use bargaining machinery that includes the strike rather than alternative machinery that ends in arbitration. What's to be done? Some realistic ideas have been put forward in Quebec by the Conseil du Patronat, a broadly representative employer federation. The conseil would have essential services defined clearly in law and it would have stiff penalties for those who violate this law.

This is always a stumbling block, I submit, Mr. Speaker. What is an essential service? No person in this country can agree on that, so the suggestion here is that it be clearly defined in law, with stiff penalties for those who violate this law. The article continues:

> It would also insist that no strike in the public service take place until the union and the employer have agreed how essential services will be provided. If they cannot agree, some public agency should decide for them.

Perhaps that is something the committee can work out in its study of this bill. Speaking to the Rotary Club in the town of Simcoe not too long ago, a labour relations expert from Hamilton made some suggestions which might be helpful to the committee in regard to trying to reach a peaceful settlement of this thorny problem. Among other things he said this:

> The public must be shown that they will benefit from an industrial climate that is not impeded by long, costly and unjustifiable strikes.
> He expressed opposition to compulsory arbitration, which he said has eroded the decision-making process and led to buck-passing, especially in police, fire and hospital employee disputes.
> Instead, he advocated legislation giving government industrial relations agencies the power to take steps to avert strikes and to act quickly in advance of crises.
> He proposed the new laws should provide for ministerial or legislative intervention, and open the way to a variety of procedures. A fact-finding board appointed by the Minister of Labour would be useful in effecting settlements.

Some of these suggestions are now new, but I think we should take another look at them. What I have been saying is that a great portion of our population gets hurt without having any way to defend itself. Some people have referred to it as a ploy, a jockeying for position and power between labour and management verging on what might be termed brinkmanship. I should like to put on the record a quotation from the Gazette for April 12. The writer of this editorial pretty well sums up what I have been trying to say, in these terms:

> A strike is similar in some respects to war. It may be just, although a just strike is as hard to define as a just war. It is a question of causes, objectives and alternatives.
> In no case does a strike settle the question as to who was right and who was wrong, however these terms may be understood. Reasonable arguments do not decide the issue. In a strike, as in war, superior force and staying power win out.

In other words, it is the little man who suffers. This quotation points out rather dramatically, I think, the crisis in labour-management relations. I hope that when the bill gets to committee in the very near future those who are charged with responsibility for studying it at length, with listening to the evidence that will be presented by various groups in society, will pay heed to what is said. Members of parliament, as representatives of the overwhelming number of innocent people in this land, have a very heavy responsibility in this regard. The bill must be discussed and studied logically. Political expediency should be put into the background. The government side of the House should be ready to listen to reasonable proposals which we of the opposition are ready to present and which we feel are just and fair. Members of parliament must see to it that the majority of the Canadian people are protected from the unfair and unjust effects of prolonged strikes.

Mr. Steven Otto (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I have no particular objection to this bill. It is a nice little bill. I am not going to put too much blame on the minister at the present time, since he took over the bill from his predecessor, but I am wondering whether the government and the bureaucracy which had a great deal to do with the bill are really looking at the facts of today's situation.

Reading the preamble to the bill, it speaks of "promoting the common well-being through the encouragement of free collective bargaining," "labour-management relations," "support to labour and management in their cooperative efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining," and so on. A short while ago I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) speak of this concept of labour-management dispute, and hon. gentlemen opposite in their speeches continue to say what a nice little bill this is and similarly talk about labour-management dispute. If hon. gentlemen were talking about the circumstances that existed 30 or 40 years ago, then I would agree. However, I would suggest that there is no such thing today as labour-management dispute; there is only labour-consumer dispute or, indeed, labour versus labour in another field.

When was the last time an hon. member here obtained evidence of an entrepreneur taking a profit cut because of a strike? An entrepreneur may be in difficulties after a short time, depending upon his contracts, but in the past 15 years or more any increase in wages has been passed on to the consumer. We are talking about the preamble to this bill and the bill itself as though we were dealing with a set of circumstances surrounding a strike by organized labour when it originated 100 years ago, when money was locked into a certain community or nation. Money is not locked in today; it is a fluid thing.

If, indeed, there were such a thing as a labour-management dispute, and if there were some method by which management could be forced into absorbing a demand for an increase in wages, a great deal of investment money would have remained in the United States. Why do you think almost 38 per cent of the European economic market is owned by U.S. interests? That was the place they could get more productivity with cheaper labour. They could get this in Japan, and they put money in Japan. Consequently, for the last number of years there has been no such thing as a labour-management dispute. These disputes have been strictly labour attempting to obtain an advantage for itself at the expense of the consumer and that is the fact.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

Let us consider the question of strikes which is referred to throughout the bill and its preamble. I have no particular objection to the section about technology, because industry will absorb that and has nothing to fear from it. It does not matter how great a problem labour becomes, prices will be increased. Since every segment of industry is organized today, you cannot control this and you cannot say one entrepreneur will be able to do better than another because they are all in the same boat and are faced with the same unions and organizations.

What happens today is that a strike, the principle of which was developed long ago, is of no benefit to the labourer, the union man or the nation. Obviously, a strike is of no benefit to the country. The parliamentary secretary said there was always a .8 per cent loss; in other words, eight days lost per 1,000 days of labour-management dispute. I venture to suggest that those figures are based only on direct strikes. I attempted to find out about the other reactions in respect of people who could not work because of a strike in a certain industry but there was no record of it.

I inquired about the results on productivity per month before and a month after a strike, but found there are no figures. I know from personal knowledge and from what friends have told me that before a strike is entered into when there is no contract, production keeps dropping until about a week before the strike. A firm is lucky to have 10 per cent production at such a time. After a strike is settled no one is really happy. Certainly labour is not happy. Therefore, there is a gradual increase in productivity. It starts very slowly and takes at least a month before reaching maximum productivity. Therefore, everyone loses in the process.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that in reality what happens throughout the nation as a result of a work stoppage is a reduction in productivity which in turn causes an increase in the price of goods. Perhaps the price increase does not occur for four, six or ten months, but it certainly does eventually.

I think it is wrong to suggest that we still have labour-management disputes. These disputes are really between labour segments in different capacities. This is what is disenchanting to our nation today. This is why we have a demand from various centres for wage and price controls.

The hon. gentleman opposite who just concluded his speech spoke about compulsory arbitration. I put it to him that compulsory arbitration will not work, because even when you get the people back to work there is no way you can guarantee productivity. The people can be back at work, drawing wages, while at the same time productivity can be dropping. These people can work to rule, as experience has shown, and productivity is not immediately recovered. It is inconceivable that everyone will be happy with any sort of compulsory arbitration. There will always be those who are dissatisfied. The same thing applies to wage and price controls. I discount these two methods as feasible alternatives to what we now have.

Just for a moment I should like to review what I meant when I said a strike today has really no effect on industry.

A strike is a bad thing for the nation and it is bad for unions and organized labour. Let us consider what happens when there is a strike or a work stoppage. As I indicated to a union meeting I addressed five or six years ago, during the term of that particular strike the employees would lose in the neighbourhood of $1,180 in wages. That was based on a pretty good guess of the length of the strike. I also anticipated the settlement, and I was very close. The strike lasted 42 days. The employees received the increase they wanted, but they had to dig into their savings to make up for the loss of $1,180. It took them 2½ years with the new increase to make up that loss. This sort of thing has occurred over and over again. Labour does not profit from a strike. Indeed, this is what George Meany was talking about. I recall that the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) said exactly the same thing in Montreal two years ago. A work stoppage does not benefit labour at all; it penalizes labour.

This bill should be attempting to solve the problems of today. It should be an adventurous bill facing the realities of strikes and containing methods of putting an end to work stoppage as a means of settling disputes. It is work stoppage that really causes harm. I think one might suggest that work stoppage is the cause of the inflationary spiral we are suffering. If an industry does not produce, it must lose, because it has to pay wages. One of the things this government must face immediately is how we can adopt alternatives to methods we now have to prevent work stoppages.

I disagree with those who suggest that unions have no place in our society. The requirements of the past have not changed; the only purpose of a company is to make money at any price. Having been involved in business, I am the first to admit that business today does not display any sort of social conscience. Perhaps this is because of the general structure of business with its one purpose, that of making money. If it were possible for an enterprise to do so it would operate as a labour baron of 50 years ago, so the unions do have their place.

I should like to see this bill containing provisions requiring every industry to be organized. It is not fair that 60 per cent of the work force should not be organized while 35 per cent or 37 per cent is organized. If we accept the idea that there is nothing wrong with organization—and I accept it—we should all be organized.

The problem we face is the work stoppage. I believe we are mature enough to realize that in business when there is a strike there is a carrying on of expenditures, and so on, and the company does not make much money. Suppose we had a situation where there was no contract or where a contract had come to an end, and in lieu of management and labour taking practical positions and trying to outdo each other the company continued in operation, the employees continued to work and the profits made during the period until there was a new contract went to the government as 100 per cent taxes. The industry could not complain, because it would be better off than if it were on strike. On the other hand, how long would the shareholders support a corporation which declared no profit, because a strike might continue for a long period?

If production continues, the working man is better off because he does not have to dip into his savings, and the government and the nation are better off because there will not be any loss in the gross national product. Business will be better off in reality because at least there will be greater incentive to negotiate a contract. How long can it retain the shareholders' confidence if it does not declare a profit?

Then there is the question of whether or not union dues would be paid to the government. I am not suggesting this is the only way to handle the situation, but the prevailing thought in this government's mind should be how to solve these problems without work stoppages. Every unionized man has the same problem. He has perhaps gone through a strike five or six times and realizes he is no better off today than he was ten years ago. Most people in this country feel there is something wrong with labour-management disputes since they receive no benefit and industry receives no benefit. On the other hand, we lose productivity and ground to other nations which have solved or partially solved this problem.

So I see no great difficulty in accepting the technological change section of this bill. I think industry will absorb it and I do not believe there will be the rash of strikes which has been suggested. If the government is at all aware of this problem, it should know there is something wrong with its whole technology in respect of settling disputes. I suggest this bill should have been as dramatic as the criminal reform legislation in which the government took a position that was audacious and realistic. At that time we had the nerve and guts to put in the Criminal Code amendments which meant something and which the people wanted.

I think the same urgency prevails within the structure of our labour-management or labour-consumer difficulties. The government must face the issue and make up its mind whether it intends to introduce price and wage controls which will not work, introduce arbitrary or compulsory arbitration which is doubtful, or bring in other provisions by which all of us in Canada will be better off and through which we will not have to suffer work stoppages time after time, an old weapon which has become useless. I think this is the issue which should be covered in the bill. I cannot see anything here to indicate that the government has faced the problem which should not be allowed to continue if anyone is to benefit.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, by and large the bill before us deals with people working under federal jurisdiction for whom the basic right of collective bargaining is generally accepted. The bill has certain proposals which the proposer of the bill and indeed many commentators have agreed go some distance toward improving that basic right.

My main purpose in rising to speak is to deal with one group of workers in this country for whom the basic right of collective bargaining has not yet been established and satisfied. I refer to the commercial fishermen. I believe there has been previous discussion of this subject during the debate, but I should like to add a few thoughts. It seems to me that when one considers the situation of the commercial fishermen and working people in this country, one really must go back to something more basic than the existing labour act or the labour code. One must in the federal field think, among other things, of the Combines Investigation Act. Members who are familiar with that legislation will recall it has in it a section which provides that nothing in the act shall be so construed as to deny workmen and employees the right of free association for the purpose of collective bargaining.

In my view that is the Canadian embodiment in statute of something for which workers fought and for which some workers died over the years in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, namely, basic recognition of the fact that when workers get together for purposes of collectively dealing with their basic rights of working, the kind of conditions and remuneration they should receive as a result of their labours, it shall not be construed to be a conspiracy, seditious or otherwise. This principle really has not yet been given statutory recognition in Canada in respect of the commercial fishermen who harvest the resources of our seas, lakes and rivers.

This, I believe, is a basic fact in respect of the situation in Canada which should be stated in connection with the approach we are taking to this bill. It is true there is some reference in the bill to fishermen. I believe I am right in saying this is the first time there has been such reference in federal labour legislation to fishermen per se. Fishermen, in the sense that we ordinarily know them, people who go out and work their own boats and gear to fish, or at least a segment of them are referred to under the definition section of the bill as "dependent contractors". The bill states that a fisherman who is not employed by an employer but who is a party to a contract, oral or in writing, is a dependent contractor if he is engaged in a joint venture with other like persons. The bill does not include a fisherman who goes out as a single person with his own individual tools of work, in his own small vessel and engages in a fishery.

Under the definition of employee, the bill says that a dependent contractor for the purposes of this act is an employee and, therefore, is entitled to the collective bargaining rights that other employees have under the proposed legislation. I suppose one could say, so far so good. But the fact remains that the bill as drafted excludes large segments of people who are really engaged in identical work under identical kinds of contracts, at least in principle, oral or written, who happen to be conducting a solo operation. If the legislation stays in this fashion, I suggest we are simply going to compound an already confused situation.

I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members a definition of "fisherman" for collective bargaining that was proposed in a bill introduced in one of the legislative assemblies of Canada. It was introduced into the House of Assembly of the province of Newfoundland. This matter may already have been referred to by other members. In the definition section of that bill it says that "fisherman" means a self-employed commercial person. It is very simple and straightforward. It goes on to provide:

—(including a sharesman or person agreeing to accept in payment for his services a share or portion of the proceeds or profits of a fishing venture, with or without other remuneration) engaged in fishing for gain, other than for sport—

I quote this legislation to show that there is a very significant contrast between the definition in the bill before us, and in my view a very important question of principle is involved. The bill which was introduced into the House of Assembly of the province of Newfoundland begins as follows:

"Fisherman" means a self-employed commercial fisherman . . . not falling within the definition of employee in the Labour Relations Act—

It specifically makes clear that it also includes a sharesman who is engaged with one or more other persons on a boat. It seems that the deficiency in the definition in the bill placed before us by the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) becomes very apparent when one contrasts the definition section in the legislation of Newfoundland with the proposed clause in Bill C-183. This includes only those who are together in a venture; presumably—I interpret this from my reading of it—two or more persons. I think the ridiculousness of that situation is apparent at once to anyone who has any familiarity with the practices followed in the fishing industry. In some cases there is one person on a boat, in some cases two and in some cases five or six. In other types of operation there may be eight or ten people on a boat, all engaged in essentially the same operation of catching fish and disposing of them.

The question has often been raised whether such people can properly be considered to be employees in any sense of the word. I am sure the Minister of Labour and the former minister of labour, now the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey), who I note is in the House this evening, are aware that there are some organizations in this country which are still arguing that point, stating directly their opposition to the acceptance of the idea.

I understand that a brief was submitted to the former minister of labour by the Fisheries Council of Canada. At least the copy sent to me so suggests. It states quite clearly that in their view they made a mistake when they did not go to court over the issue of fishermen being considered employees for purposes of the Unemployment Insurance Act. We had quite a long debate, at the time, on the question of including fishermen in the act. This was finally included in a government proposal and became operative. That, of course, was the subject matter of another debate not very long ago when we were revising the Unemployment Insurance Act. The suggestion in the brief of the fisheries council that even if a fisherman is an employee, he is not an employee within federal jurisdiction, is another argument. I think that illustrates the complications of the situation in which we are involved.

Hon. members may recall that this matter came up not long ago in relation to certain developments in the province of Nova Scotia. The suggestion was made that if a ruling were to be arrived at as to which jurisdiction fishermen came under, the minister of labour of the federal government and of the province should declare in advance that they would be prepared to introduce the kind of legislation which would ensure proper collective bargaining rights for fishermen. Without attempting to go into all the learned argumentation in that particular case, I think it is sufficient to point out that there appears to be a growing body of evidence that many learned judges in this land believe the concept of fishermen as co-adventurers is outmoded and out of date in this day and age.

Sometimes we are inclined to think that those who sit in high places on the judicial benches of this land are up in the clouds. But from time to time it is most refreshing to see, from the kind of recommendations and suggestions that come from the bench, that some of the judges in the high courts are very much aware of the realities of the developments taking place within our country. One of the realities of the situation in Canada today is that for all practical purposes a commercial fisherman is within the grasp of a large corporation just as much as is a logger, a worker in an automobile plant or a worker in any one of a dozen other industrial activities that one could mention.

It is a fact that in the province of British Columbia the market available to an individual commercial fisherman by and large is in the hands of two large corporations, commonly referred to as the Big Two. To the best of my knowledge one is the wholly-owned subsidiary of an American concern and the other is part of the Weston empire. It may be surprising to some hon. members to learn that the name Weston, usually associated with biscuits, plays a major role in the financial holdings controlling the buying and processing of fish on both the Pacific and the Atlantic coast.

I suggest that since this bill does take a timid step in recognizing the facts of the situation, that fishermen for practical purposes are employees, the minister should go the whole way before the bill proceeds further. I do not know how optimistic one can be about that, but I do know that according to a press release issued by the president of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union in British Columbia on February 25, 1972, it was stated that the Minister of Labour said he believed the union had presented an unassailable case for extending proposed legislative amendments so as to provide bargaining rights for all commercial fishermen. The emphasis there must be on the words "for all commercial fishermen." I hope that before we conclude this stage of the debate the minister will be inclined to make that statement official if indeed he did give that impression, which apparently he did, to the president of that fishermen's union.

However, if the bill passes second reading and is considered by the committee, I am sure the minister must realize that this whole question will be the subject of considerable discussion and debate. Certainly some members of this House are quite determined that that kind of clarification should be made so that all commercial fishermen will be equal in status.

Mr. Speaker, this whole question has been left up in the air so long that I am a bit like the fisherman who when there is a little nibble says, "Let us make it a good, big catch while we are at it." I remember when the whole question of collective bargaining for fish prices in British Columbia was put in jeopardy under the Combines Investigation Act. As I recall it, that was in 1956 or 1957. As the minister well knows, an amendment was made which was passed for one year specifically exempting this process only on the British Columbia coast and not on the Atlantic coast. It was just for the British Columbia fishermen. That happened to be the place where collective bargaining was well established, with a tradition going back for many years.

That particular amendment, which I regard as an extension of the basic provision that is in the Combines Investigation Act, namely, that nothing in that act shall be so construed as to prevent workmen or employees from getting together to bargain in respect of wages and working conditions, covered a small segment of the fishermen of Canada. When I say "small," I do not want to indicate that it was not a very important segment. The decision was made to meet a problem which was faced by a good proportion of the fishermen of British Columbia. But under that umbrella it did not take in fishermen anywhere else in Canada, whether on the Atlantic coast or inland. That particular act was repassed year after year for quite a time, until finally it got into our statute books in its present form and it will remain in effect until it is repealed or a group of ten members introduces a resolution calling for its withdrawal.

This brings me back to the matter of the Newfoundland legislation. I cannot say that I am fully informed on it, but as I understand it the Newfoundland legislation has been passed but not proclaimed. It is suggested that because the limitations of the existing federal exempting sections of the Criminal Code and the Combines Investigation Act apply only to the British Columbia situation, this complication under the Combines Investigation Act potentially still exists for all the fishermen of Atlantic Canada.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion made by a judge in Nova Scotia to my mind really means that the logical thing to do to avoid this mix-up is for this parliament to pass legislation including all of them; and if some of the other provinces take similar steps then hopefully by some rational approach, either by a reference to the Supreme Court or otherwise, the situation can be clarified as to where exactly the constitutional jurisdiction lies.

As far as I am concerned there is no excuse for our sitting back. By and large, it has been a fact of life in Canada—it is certainly true in the province of British Columbia—that the only governmental body that shows active concern for the commercial fishermen is the federal government. A joint commission was set up in British Columbia in 1964 to study price and wage disputes in the fishing industry of that province. A report was made, but nothing has happened as a result of it. I cite that as an example of the fact that if this parliament waits for appropriate action by the provincial government, the position of the fishermen will remain for a long time in its present unhappy state of uncertainty in some parts of the country. They have already endured this unhappy situation for too long; in fact, I have been amazed at their patience.

If it were not for the fact that in some situations the fishermen are being treated as employees, even though under the legislation ordinarily applicable they are not, they might be satisfied to deal, in terms of bargaining collectively, under the umbrella and safeguard of the Combines Act if it were generally applicable. The fact remains, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the Minister of Labour is aware of this, that there has been a long series of court actions in British Columbia, where the nub of the matter is that the fishermen involved have been assessed substantial damages for certain action taken by them in connection with disputes, on the ground that they did not abide by the labour act of that province. In other words, they did not have the right, because they were not a trade union in this situation, to picket. This question has gone all the way to the court of appeal. The voluminous document in my hand is a copy of the argument in that case. This may not be the end of it because in due course it may find its way to the Supreme Court of Canada.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this case makes a strong argument, if we are to have any rationale in the fishing industry and if there is any hope of arriving at a situation where we will not have the unhappy events that surrounded this case which led to court action, for this federal legislation to provide the foundation for collective bargaining rights for all the fishermen of Canada. If it should be challenged in the courts and if the arguments advanced by some parties are correct in the view of the Supreme Court, at least the fishermen will know where they have to go. If they cannot come to this parliament for collective bargaining legislation, they will know it is a matter they will have to deal with through their provincial legislatures. It may well be that a determination will be arrived at which will make it clear that there must be legislation in both the federal and provincial fields in order to protect all commercial fishermen under the umbrella of ordinary labour law.

I would suggest to the minister that no useful purpose will be served by keeping the bill as it is, making workers of some fishermen and something else of others. At least the federal legislation should be clearcut and precise. From my reading of it, I would suggest that the kind of definition section which is in the Newfoundland bill would cover the question as far as making clear that all commercial fishermen are to be deemed to be employees when they are in the kind of relationship that commercial fishermen are in with respect to the buyers of their products.

Before I sit down, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I realize the legislation before us generally represents the work of many people over a period of time. I welcome some of the steps forward that are contained in it and I know some of my colleagues have discussed them in more detail. I should like to say, however, that I am glad we have this opportunity of a full-dress consideration of changes in the Canada Labour Code. It is certainly a much more useful contribution, to put it mildly, than the burden of amendments to labour legislation that we had a few years ago which, in the view of some of us, emasculated the Canada Labour Relations Board. To the extent there has been that kind of change, I should like to offer a word of praise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I call it ten o'clock Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Barnett.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SETTLEMENT OF CONTRACTS ON REGIONAL BASIS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, on March 24 I had an opportunity to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) about settlement of contracts on a regional basis. I recognize that I am not the first member of parliament to raise this issue; it is one that has been accelerating since 1967 when the government led by Right Hon. Lester Pearson established a formula for negotiating settlements of contracts on a regional basis. I think that probably Parliament suffers from all the regionalism that it can stand.

I have tried, in my time here, to eschew adopting a regional stance on every issue. However, this is an issue that affects particularly public servants in the Atlantic provinces and it is my duty to remind the House again of the unfairness of the government's stance in this regard. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), at page 1037 of Hansard raised the issue and questioned the anomaly of the settlement of contracts on a regional basis on the one hand and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion's trying to do its best to equalize conditions of pay, opportunity and so on, across the country on the other hand.

I felt that the parliamentary secretary on that occasion left a good many things unsaid in his answer. He seemed to relate regional pay with the mobility of the public servant involved. I suggest that that surely cannot be the only criterion for regional pay scales. For example, I cannot for a moment imagine the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) accepting the principle that judges of the supreme or district courts of, say, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick or Nova Scotia should receive less pay than those of Ontario. Those learned gentlemen are by no means mobile; they cannot be expected to move from one part of Canada to another.

One finds the problem of regionalism and lower pay scales prevalent in the nursing profession. I am speaking of women who are in the public service, who are serving at Department of Veterans Affairs hospitals across the country and who are receiving different pay for doing exactly the same work. Mr. Speaker, I put it to you, this is manifestly unfair of the government. This practice has been creeping into wage settlements, if I can put it that way, and I think it is time to warn the government that those who represent areas that will be affected particularly by the unevenness of wage settlements will be pressing the government to reverse a policy that can only work hardship on public servants.

I think the government is obligated to set the highest possible standard as an employer, and it fails in its obligation if in the bargaining process it uses the fact that, unhappily, incomes in one part of our country are substantially below the national average. I suggest, with great respect, that it is time the government took another look at this policy. It is not in the national interest to proceed further with settling contracts on a regional basis.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Treasury Board's position with respect to regional rates of pay is certainly not an attempt to institutionalize a dilemma of regional disadvantages and disparities. As indicated by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) when the hon. member first raised this question, the regional pay rate system is in fact "an attempt to bring about, in an orderly way, a greater measure of unity".

As employer, the government is committed to paying rates which are equitable and competitive with rates being paid outside the public service for similar occupations. Where the outside pay data for occupational groups indicate significant variations from the Canadian average and where the area of recruitment and the mobility of employees within the public service is limited, the government as employer considers it appropriate to pay regional and not national rates of pay. Paying national rates of pay in such circumstances would serve only to overpay employees in some regions and to underpay employees in other regions in relation to the rates of pay prevailing in those regions. Neither situation, from the employer's point of view, is desirable or viable. In order to avoid this situation, regional rates are considered more appropriate.

The hon. member expressed the belief that the regional pay system is an attempt to institutionalize regional disparities. As the hon. member is aware, the basic objective of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is precisely to facilitate the access of people to productive employment opportunities. If the effect of regional economic growth is to raise rates of compensation in areas of low pay by comparison with other parts of this country, the government as employer will ensure that its rates reflect those changes, subject of course to collective bargaining provisions in the public service.

POLLUTION—GREAT LAKES—UNITED STATES VETO OF SEWAGE DISPOSAL PROJECTS—EFFECT ON JOINT PROGRAM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, I asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) the following question:

In view of recent reports that the proposed $138 million anti-pollution program for an accelerated clean-up of the Great Lakes has been vetoed by the Nixon administration, I wish to ask the minister what effect this decision will have on the joint Canada-United States program to deal with this problem.

I followed with a supplementary question in which I asked the minister whether the veto by the Nixon administration meant that the target date of 1975 for meeting certain standards would need to be revised. In his reply the minister said he felt Canada and the United States would agree in principle on a clean-up program and that he hoped the date of 1975 need not be revised.

Since I asked that question, the Great Lakes water quality agreement has been signed. I attended the signing ceremony on April 15, 1972, and I must admit, frankly, I feel it is a step forward. I am certain it will be welcomed by most individuals in this House and by interested organizations across the country. I must point out, however, that the terms of previous treaties have not been observed by either country. In particular, I would draw attention to the Boundary Waters Treaty Act which was signed in 1910 by the United States and, at that time, by Great Britain. This treaty prohibited the pollution of the Great Lakes by any means or in any manner. It seems to me it would be much better had the two parties who signed the agreement last Saturday undertaken to carry out the terms of the original treaty, because I believe that treaty to be far more inclusive than the agreement which was signed on Saturday.

Conclusion of the agreement on Saturday does not ensure that adequate standards of water quality will either be made or set. In fact, there is every indication that inadequate standards are already being considered. The governor of one of the states bordering the Great Lakes stated yesterday that the standards being considered with respect to phosphates, fluorides, mercury, etc., would not ensure the success of the clean-up operation required. I agree. There is every indication that a very wide difference of opinion exists between Canada and the United States as to the standards required if an appropriate clean-up job is to be carried out. A good example of this difference is clearly outlined in the approach taken by our two countries to the problem of phosphates. We have sharply curtailed the amount of phosphates allowed in detergents used in Canada. On the other hand, the United States has not done so.

A very interesting article appeared in the Vancouver Sun for April 15 in connection with a statement made by representative Henry S. Reuss of the United States. The article reads as follows:

Henry S. Reuss said today that the U.S.—Canada Great Lakes anti-pollution pact was a victory for the phosphate deterent industry and a potential disaster for Lake Erie—

Canada was put in the position today of signing the agreement, which lacks a ban on heavy phosphate detergents, "or having no agreement at all".

Reuss said a joint U.S.-Canadian study released in February showed that if phosphates continue to be dumped into Lake Erie for the next few years there is the "frightening possibility" of the "irreversible destruction of the lake".

My point is that this agreement talks of a 50 per cent reduction in phosphates, and I say that is not enough. Last August the federal government and the government of the province of Ontario signed an agreement to spend $250 million, I believe it was, on construction of sewage disposal plants. One pollutant they were aiming at was phosphates. We have already on our statute books legislation providing for a sharp curtailment of phosphates used in detergents. Yet we are faced with the possibility of a job being done on one side without a full or proper job being done on the other.

I should also like to point out that this agreement is not a firm commitment or a treaty but merely an executive agreement set out in very broad terms. It does not tie the United States down to any timetable, or Canada either. It is merely an agreement between the two countries which acknowledges that a very undesirable condition exists in the Great Lakes as far as pollution is concerned and that the two countries will do something about it.

I mentioned earlier that I was a little disturbed at the lack of action on the part of the United States over the past three years in regard to cleaning up this great body of water. Only two months ago the Nixon administration vetoed a $138 million program which was to have been the initial start of this clean-up project. It seems to me that we in Canada must push very strongly and do everything we possibly can to persuade our counterparts across the line to get on with the job. I am convinced that high international standards must be set and that these must be policed and enforced by the International Joint Commission if we are to get the job done. This is what I urge upon the minister.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): I should like to amplify the response given on March 17 by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) to a question by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding). The inquiry concerned reports that a decision has been taken within the United States administration not to proceed with a group of particular projects for water quality in the Great Lakes basin costing in total $138 million, the largest item reported as being for studies on programs to overcome pollution from storm sewer overflows.

Naturally, we always like to see additional financial and other resources for sound projects to correct sources of pollution on the United States side of the Great Lakes, particularly where such pollution might have a transboundary effect on Canadian waters. We have made inquiries in Washington about this particular group of projects. We have been assured that the decision taken by the administration in regard to these projects will not have any significant effect on the broader programs to abate and control pollution in the Great Lakes which are incorporated in the agreement signed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and President Nixon on Saturday last, April 15.

In this context I should like to draw the attention of the House to current estimates of the cost of programs to abate municipal pollution on the United States side of the Great Lakes as announced by the responsible agencies of the United States administration. The United States environmental protection agency has recently estimated that to construct the needed improvements to these municipal plants on the United States side will cost about $2 billion in total, over 3½ years. Under agreements for sharing these costs proposed by the United States administration, about one half of this total would be provided in the form of federal grants with the remainder financed by state and local sources.

The flow of United States federal funds to construct municipal sewage treatment plants has recently increased significantly. According to reports issued by the environmental protection agency in Washington, federal United States government grants for the construction of municipal treatment facilities across the country increased from about $215 million in 1969 to $1 billion in 1971. For 1972 and the following two years the President has proposed increasing the flow of these grants to $2 billion annually, or a total of $6 billion for the three years. Of these grants, a substantial portion is expected to be directed toward the construction of needed sewage treatment facilities on the United States side of the Great Lakes basin which, as I have noted, is estimated to require expenditures of about $2 billion in total in order to meet the terms of the new agreement.

I wish to assure the hon. member that it is the intention of this government to carry out the programs envisaged by the recent agreement and we have every reason to believe that our United States counterparts intend to do likewise.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:19 p.m.

Hon. Donald S. YOUTH

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 43 I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move the following motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan):

That in view of the chronic increase in the unemployment rate of Canadians under the age of 24 over the last two years; the inability of government summer employment programs to assist less than 5 per cent of the over-all youth labour force in Canada and the repeated failure of the government to announce any program to adequately respond to what is developing as a major crisis in youth unemployment coming as it is at the end of the school year—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member does not follow the rules the motion should not be put to the House. The hon. member knows the rules and he should abide by them.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I was just coming to the direct motion, Mr. Speaker.

That this House directs the government to immediately convene a federal-provincial commission on human resource planning to develop a short-range program offering incentives to assist the hiring of young Canadians on a seasonal basis, and the development of long-range manpower planning to co-ordinate the output and enrolment of our institutions of higher education with the capacity and expansion of our labour market.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont. The motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL REVENUE

BULLETIN CONCERNING DEDUCTION FROM TAXABLE INCOME OF COST OF SUBSCRIPTION LISTS— REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I seek the consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. Briefly, it relates to an information bulletin issued by the Department of National Revenue one day before the announcement of the sale by the Toronto Telegram of its subscription list to the Toronto Star. The bulletin deals with the purchase of such lists of customers or subscribers and appears to have the effect of making the purchase price paid by the Star deductible for income tax purposes. I therefore move:

That the Standing Committee on Privilege and Elections be empowered to investigate the circumstances surrounding the sale of the Toronto Telegram subscription list to the Toronto Star, particularly, the circumstances involved in the issuing the day before the sale was announced of an interpretation bulletin by the Department of National Revenue which had the effect of saving the Toronto Star $5 million in taxes at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is proposed under Standing Order 43. It requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

YOUTH

ADDITIONAL PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It relates to recent reports from Canadian industry forecasting this summer's student unemployment prospects and the likelihood they will be unable to absorb many students into this summer's labour force. In view of the 1,300,000 students who will be looking for work very shortly and the over one-quarter of a million young people now unemployed, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can indicate what response is being planned by the government beyond the very miniscule response already announced?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think this opinion was expressed by industry last year around this time. It has some basis in the sense that if there is to be a great hiring of young people this summer it will have to be through industry more than by the government itself. But I remind the House that we did last year at this time, or perhaps a little later, announce certain programs for the summer which were met with a great deal of skepticism by the opposition parties and a very few months later they were thankful the thing had gone through. I hope this will be the situation again this year.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, without accepting all of the Prime Minister's answer may I ask this question. In light of the fact that the government programs will utilize less than 5 per cent of the young people seeking employment during the summer months and in view of statements earlier by the Secretary of State that there had been consultation with industry about their being a greater input from industry in meeting this problem, will certain specific plans or programs be announced before the heavy influx of student unemployment which will face us very shortly?

Mr. Trudeau: I can only repeat the same answer. The views of the hon. member are not dissimilar to my own. I said in my answer that the government itself could only absorb a small proportion of the unemployed and the hon. member indicates he agrees with me. That is why last year we had a package of programs; when we have anything to announce this year further to what we have already announced we will do so.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there seems at the very least to be a difficulty in communication as industry itself does not seem to be aware of the plans the government has in mind in respect of the private sector. I wonder whether either the Prime Minister or one of his ministers would be prepared to make a statement on motions shortly giving an indication in some detail of the various programs of assistance or incentives which might be brought forward to alleviate this very serious crisis?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think the hon. member is justified in suggesting that industry is not aware. He may not be aware and perhaps some persons in industry may not be aware, but industry generally is fairly aware.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister has given some thought to rectifying this problem in two ways, by giving employment to a number of these young people during the month of June as enumerators, election clerks and so on and, hopefully, by a new government after the election in June that might be able to deal with the situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker that is one of the problems, but there are so many problems—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ISSUANCE OF INTERPRETATION BULLETIN CONCERNING DEDUCTIBILITY FROM TAXABLE INCOME OF MONEY PAID BY TORONTO "STAR" FOR "TELEGRAM" SUBSCRIPTION LISTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of National Revenue last Thursday, April 13, whether he was aware of an interpretation bulletin issued by his department—I said in October or November; actually, it was issued on September 17, but published in the Canada Gazette on October 9—dealing with the acquisition by anyone of a list of customers or subscribers and, if so, whether he would inform the House of the circumstances under which such an interpretation bulletin dealing with the deductibility for tax purposes of the purchase price of a list of subscribers was issued by his department at that time.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the interpretation bulletin, No. IT-33, a copy of which I would be happy to table with the consent of the House, was issued on September 17, 1971, as part of an ongoing program to make the public aware of the assessing policies of the department. It embodied a practice first set forth in departmental instructions in March, 1963, and in effect ever since. These instructions were based on several decisions of the Income Tax Appeal Board, for example, John Blunt Publications Limited, (1951), appeal No. 292, (1955), and Halliday Fuels Limited, (1960).

Mr. Lewis: May I now ask the minister whether he would tell the House what particular thing happened or was expected to happen, what particular deal had occurred or was expected to occur, what particular purchase was taking place or was expected to take place, to require that this bulletin be issued one day before the purchase of the Telegram list by the Star was announced and two days after the deal had been made?

Mr. Gray: As I think I made clear in my answer to the previous question, this was done as part of an ongoing program of the department. Bulletins on various questions are issued from time to time as work on them is completed, and as far as I am aware there is no connection between the two matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the only thing I admire about the minister's answer is his straight face. I should like to ask the minister a second question which I asked him last Thursday. He has offered to table the interpretation bulletin, which I think would be useful, but would he also be prepared to table a copy of any correspondence between anyone in his department and anyone representing the Toronto Star or speaking on behalf of the Toronto Star, and any memos of conversations that may have taken place between anyone speaking for the Toronto Star and anyone speaking for the department?

Mr. Gray: If such correspondence exists I would have no personal objection to tabling the information, but it is my understanding that I would be precluded from doing so by the provisions of the Income Tax Act passed by this parliament.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, if I may. I am not asking the minister to table correspondence dealing with any tax matter in which any organization may be involved. I am asking him to table correspondence regarding an inquiry, if there was any, from the Toronto Star relating to tax interpretation, which I suggest to him is entirely different, and also any memos there may be of conversations between him and any representative of the Star, Mr. Honderich or the Hon. Walter Gordon, or involving any member of his department on this matter.

YOUTH

SUMMER JOBS—POSSIBILITY OF GRANTING TAX RELIEF TO PRIVATE INDUSTRY EMPLOYING STUDENTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister which is related to other questions put previously concerning the hiring of students during the vacation period.

Since private corporations seem to be somewhat reluctant, as they were last year, to hire students during their vacation, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether the government intends to grant such corporations more tax relief or work out other arrangements with them in order to incite them to hire students during the vacation period?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should expect a reply to such a question to be given in the course of a budget speech rather than during the oral question period.

[English]

NEW POLICIES TO PROVIDE SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is also on the same subject and is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. As the government's own recent cross-Canada survey shows that little change in student employment levels is expected this summer compared with last summer, and even given the expected employment programs of the government, are new policies being prepared for the direct employment of the remainder of these students?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I implied in answer to the first question, Mr. Speaker, if any new policies were to be announced they would be announced in the House in due course.

Mr. Ryan: As the average unemployment rate among returning students last summer was 17.9 per cent, is the government designing policies to eliminate or substantially reduce that level and, if the latter, by how much?

Mr. Trudeau: I think I could only answer that question in the same terms as I just used for the first question, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

MEASURES TO OFFSET DECLINE IN PRODUCTION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As figures released a few days ago by Statistics Canada show that the index of industrial production, with which I feel sure the Prime Minister is thoroughly familiar, has been falling since the first of the year, thereby obviously contributing to rising unemployment in March, is the government planning to introduce new measures in the very near future to change this very serious situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without agreeing with the premise of the question I would say that if any program is to be announced it will be announced in due course in the House—if the House, of course, is sitting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: As the Prime Minister is obviously not familiar with this situation would he make himself familiar with it so that he can give some much needed personal leadership in this very serious matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is not in order. The hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. Hees: In other words, get off your you-know-what.

Mr. Crouse: Watch it, George. My microphone is open.

FISHERIES

DATE OF LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. The third preparatory session of the United Nations Seabed Committee, attended by delegates from 95 countries, recently concluded a month of discussions on the agenda for the next law of the sea conference. Can the minister tell the House whether a date for this conference has been set and whether the Americans are in agreement with our position in view of the importance of this conference in conserving our fishery resources on the Atlantic coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, a date for the conference has not been set. However, in addition to the possible conference of all nations next year in respect of all law of the sea matters, we hope to host a conference here in Canada on fishery matters.

DETERMINATION OF CANADIAN POSITION FOR PRESENTATION TO LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the American government has announced several positions with respect to marine resources and the continental shelf and that a number of other countries, including Iceland, have done so, has Canada finalized its position for presentation to the law of the sea conference and, if so, when can we expect a public statement on it?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we have a good idea as to the policy approach we will be taking. However, we still wish to discuss it with all interested parties including our fishermen, in the interval before the conference.

OIL SPILLS OFF WEST COAST—ENACTMENT AND ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS UNDER CANADA SHIPPING ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Arising out of the many oil spills which have been taking place on the Pacific coast, including the wrecking of the freighter Vanlene, more recently the discharge of bunker fuel into Nanoose Bay, and last Friday the damaging of a barge of the Gulf of Georgia Towing Company Limited carrying 950,000 gallons of oil and gasoline, resulting in the discharge of some 6,000 gallons into the waters of the harbour, I want to ask the minister whether the regulations under the Canada Shipping Act have been passed, and what steps are being taken to tighten up and enforce such regulations with respect to ships carrying oil and petroleum products on the Pacific coast?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would take a very long time to reply in detail to the hon. member's question. I can say to him, however, that a series of regulations have in fact been gazetted and more are now in preparation and will be introduced over a period of perhaps the next two, three or four months, all of which are designed to have the effect to which the hon. member referred, that is, to tighten up the regulations.

SHIPPING

SINKING OF TUGBOAT, "HARO STRAITS"

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a related question with reference to the report which I understand he received some two weeks ago regarding the sinking of the tugboat, Haro Straits. Has he received such a report, does he intend to make it public, and can he tell the House why no attempt was made to raise the tugboat to the surface or recover the bodies of the five men who were drowned?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the last part of the question, no official decision has been made with regard to raising the vessel. I am not disposed against that concept, but we are trying to figure out whether it is in fact feasible to do so. On the matter of the report, an interim report has been received. I am not sure whether I am within the laws of the House in saying it in this way, but I can assure the hon. member that an official inquiry will be held.

FINANCE

STUDENT LOANS—SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF INTEREST-FREE PERIOD BECAUSE OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance which is related to some of the previous questions. In view of the rather bleak prospects for employment for university students and university graduates in many cases and the large increase in the number of students who are classified as defaulting on their student loans, will the minister give consideration to extending the interest-free period on loans to students in cases where students whose loans are now due are unemployed through no fault of their own?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I will take that question and representation into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has a supplementary to an earlier question.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE LEGISLATION RESPECTING USE OF CANADIAN SHIPPING IN OFFSHORE MINERAL EXPLORATION FOLLOWING DARLING REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that the Darling report has been in the hands of the Minister of Transport now for about a year and as it contained some very valuable recommendations as to the engagement of Canadian shipping in offshore mineral exploration, is the minister in a position to tell the House whether these recommendations will find their way into some form of legislation in the near future?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I think I can assure the hon. member that some of them will, Mr. Speaker. I think the difficulty is that some of them are contradictory. While the ones to which the hon. member refers may be beneficial on the east coast and in other coastal areas, there are others that perhaps would not be. It is a question of sorting out the recommendations to come up with a compact package, and that will be done as soon as possible.

[Later:]

REPLACEMENT OF CANADIAN BY FOREIGN VESSEL—REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FOR PURCHASE OF VESSELS IN SWEDEN

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary, is directed to the Minister of Transport and arises out of the question on the Darling report. Would the minister investigate the recent waiver by customs which resulted in a foreign vessel, Traveltol, and its crew, replacing the Canadian vessel, Federal Hudson, and its Canadian crew on the east coast. Would he also look into the circumstances in which Canadian National is reportedly negotiating in Sweden for two vessels for the Newfoundland trade?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into that. I know something about it, but the answer would be much too detailed for now. Perhaps I could give the hon. member a written reply.

ANNOUNCEMENTS OF POLICY FOR ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, my question is associated with the Darling report. The minister indicated to me before the Easter recess that certain announcements would be made regarding transportation policy for the Atlantic provinces by the interdepartmental committee or the federal-provincial committee. Can the minister now be more definite about when these announcements might be made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): As I recall, and it is from memory, Mr. Speaker, I suggested I would make them available at the time of my appearance on estimates before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. If that is inordinately delayed, I will be glad to table them in the House in the interim.

AIR TRANSPORT

RENEGOTIATION OF TREATY WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING ROUTES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): My question is also for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the minister is aware of the urgent need for more air routes in western Canada, particularly for Calgary and Edmonton. Has the minister had any discussions with United States cabinet ministers on the renegotiation of the bilateral air treaty with the United States, and can he give any information about when these negotiations will be concluded and the new treaty signed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the forum for such negotiations is not between ministers but between two agencies of government in the first instance. We have made strong representations to the United States government with a view to getting better access for western Canada and we have indicated that we are prepared at any time to resume negotiations. I understand the next round will be held some time in June but how soon the matter will culminate in an agreement or whether we will get what we want from the United States is, of course, an open question until the negotiations have been completed.

Mr. Harkness: In view of the fact these negotiations have been dragging on for more than three years at the level of officials, would the minister not consider taking the matter up with his opposite number in the United States government so that an agreement could be expedited?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is obviously a representation.

AUTOMOBILES—TYPE OF STUDY INTO DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES PRICES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON FINDINGS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Last Thursday the minister indicated that his department had some ongoing studies into the differential between automobile prices in this country and in the United States. Would he clarify whether he meant that this is a new, specific study, or whether this is a study that was begun some time in the past and was a regular part of his department's work?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in a nutshell I can say that this is a more in-depth analysis than the type which has been continuously made in the department.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the importance of the answers determined by the study, would the minister undertake to provide his findings, not in all detail since part of that information might be confidential, but general, economic information? Would he undertake to provide such information to the House after his studies are completed because of the importance of this question both to the Canadian consumer and to those employed in the industry?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will be thinking about it.

Mr. Baldwin: Careful! That is a damaging admission.

OBSTRUCTION OF MONTREAL BRIDGES BY QUEBEC CIVIL SERVANTS—ALLEGED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL HELP TO CITY POLICE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

In view of the present very difficult situation in Montreal, particularly the systematic and deliberate blocking of Montreal bridges, and of the great difficulty experienced by the police in reestablishing order, can the hon. minister tell us whether there have been requests from the province of Quebec for assistance to Montreal police forces?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY PAYMENT TO QUEBEC EGG PRODUCERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

On March 10 last, the Quebec professional association of millers sent the federal government a resolution requesting financial assistance for the Quebec egg producers. Can the minister tell us what he told the association in reply to its request?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, since then there have been a number of meetings involving the egg producer associations of all the provinces of Canada. Although these meetings have not brought about a final agreement, it has been indicated to me, at least, that the associations are satisfied that a great deal of progress has been made. What I have indicated to them is that as soon as they are in a position to sign an agreement for improving the market structure we will be willing to help financially to improve the situation immediately.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the minister changing his view on the bill?

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR MOVING BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER

Mr. Douglas Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of the very serious shortage of lumber cars in the interior region of British Columbia which is causing orders to be lost and hundreds of people to be laid off? If he is not, will he look into this crisis immediately with a view to getting lumber traffic back to normal forthwith?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation, having made some inquiries this morning. The main problem appears to be with the Canadian National supply of cars. An additional 500 cars have been leased from the United States and as of this morning there were something over 1,300 on the road. The CNR has placed additional orders for 1,000 cars, or will convert 1,000 cars during the current year. Therefore awareness of the problem is very high.

Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response. Will the minister or his officials contact the Association of American Railroads and endeavour to get Canadian boxcars returned to Canadian carriers as quickly as possible?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the Association of American Railroads has been contacted. It does not have any authority to force or require cars to be returned quickly. We are trying to institute a more co-operative arrangement that will get the cars back.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF DOMESTIC FARES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has a decision been reached with respect to reducing domestic air fares? My question is prompted by a statement by the chairman of the board of Air Canada regarding the poor profit showing of the airline last year.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I believe the hon. member knows, any decision with regard to reducing fares would have to be initiated in the first place by Air Canada. I have had discussions with the chairman of the board of Air Canada with a view to having group fares and various packages comparable to those available overseas made available in Canada. I think some moves have been made in that direction.

Mr. McGrath: Can the minister give the House an undertaking that a decision will be made in this respect before implementation of the summer schedules in Canada?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I could not, of course, give any such assurance because the decision on fares, I repeat, is one for Air Canada to make. However, I will be glad to pass along the representation.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES AND CANADIAN DOLLAR LEVEL—SUGGESTED STATEMENT ON NATURE OF REVIEW AND POSSIBLE ACTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of State attached to the Department of Finance concerning the possibility of a statement being made regarding monetary policy. It appears at page 1348 of Hansard. I am sure the Minister of Finance has been made aware of the question. I am wondering whether he can now give an answer, particularly to the supplementary question I put.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to direct my attention to the question. I want to tell the House that I see no immediate need to make a statement on interest rates. As to the supplementary question, I am weighing all the economic and human factors before coming to a decision on whether or not there should be a budget.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF INCENTIVE PAYMENT OR FLOOR PRICE TO ENCOURAGE PRODUCTION TO MEET DEMAND

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It has to do with the very large reduction in the anticipated acreage for rapeseed this year. I think the reduction is of the order of 37 per cent, from 5,450,000 acres to 3,700,000 acres, this being in part due to the uncertainty of price levels. As we have built abroad a very large rapeseed market—indeed, it has been the Cinderella of all grains—would the minister give consideration to providing either an incentive payment, as is provided for barley, or an assured floor price so that the production of rapeseed will keep up with the demands of importers in all parts of the world?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we agree with the right hon. gentleman's contention that the level of production of rapeseed ought to be kept up, even though the market fluctuates from time to time, because the long-term prospects for rapeseed—and rapeseed oil sales appear to be good. We have had a bill before parliament to bring rapeseed under the Canadian Wheat Board Act so that some of the things the right hon. gentleman has alluded to could be done. I do not think we can make the kinds of commitments he has suggested until and unless rapeseed is under the aegis of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Disregarding for the moment the matter of the Canadian Wheat Board, there would be nothing to prevent the government fixing a floor price. I speak as one who comes from an area in northern Saskatchewan that has produced a great deal of rapeseed. Indeed, the motto of the town and district of Tisdale is "the land of rape and Bertha control", following the success last year in beating the Bertha army bug. Would the minister not give consideration to bringing in a floor price for rapeseed so that there would be reasonable certainty of the price being maintained?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, that is something that the government as a whole would have to consider, obviously. I can advise the right hon. gentleman that we have made some financial advances to the rapeseed association to enhance their marketing capabilities during the past few months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That has not helped.

[Later:]

RAPESEED—POSSIBLE INCLUSION UNDER CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture in light of his answer to the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Is it the government's intention to bring forward legislation to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act and, since the legislation is permissive, is it also the government's intention, immediately upon passage of that legislation, to have rapeseed brought under the juisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be proper for me to answer what might be done if and when a bill is passed. What is stated in the bill is rather clear. I think it has already been stated that we intend to present to parliament a bill that deals with these things.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As Canada now has an observer at the Organization of American States, can the Prime Minister enlighten the House as to what the government's plans are concerning that organization? Can he assure us that this is not a step toward membership of our country in the Organization of American States?

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will look back and consider the white paper on foreign policy which was tabled in the House many months ago I think he will find the general stance of the government on Latin America explained there.

MANPOWER

RETRAINING—REDUCTION OF REQUIREMENT OF THREE YEARS IN WORK FORCE—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN ON-JOB TRAINING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration with regard to manpower training. Is the minister in a position to advise the House at this time regarding the requirement of three years in the work force in order to apply for manpower training and obtain the allowance? Is the minister thinking about reducing that time period? If so, when will it come into effect?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, too much applause might destroy my reputation of being rather hard-boiled.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I might have to show some emotion, which would be wrong. The fact of the matter is that I think the suggestion of the hon. member is progressive and it is one we have thought about. The answer is yes. As to when such a move would be implemented, that of course would depend on how long the session continues. That could conceivably mean some time before Christmas.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I, too, welcome the minister. As far as I am concerned, he will still be as fast-footed as he has been in the past. If I may turn to another area, on-the-job training, about which I know the minister is quite concerned in view of the fact it has had relative success, is it the intention of the minister to increase the government's involvement substantially in this area? If so, which Christmas are we talking about if the minister does bring this into effect?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Save your Santa Claus suit.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, on-the-job training was part of a special emergency training program during the winter months. It is my intention to make it a permanent feature of manpower policy. Of course, this could conceivably be at the expense of other programs that have perhaps outlived their usefulness in order that I can remain within my budgetary requirements.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—MEETING WITH PEOPLE OVER PLANES GROUP—PROVISION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As a number of representations have been made by myself and others regarding a meeting between the minister and the People Over Planes group of Pickering township that is to be held here in Ottawa, will the minister indicate when this meeting will in fact be held?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain of the exact date because it is a question of a date that is convenient to all parties, but I assume it will be some time next week.

Mr. Cafik: Is the minister in a position to indicate to the House what information will be made available to this group when the meeting is in fact held?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly stated that, in so far as the ministry is concerned, anything and everything relevant to this project from the first day of its origination is available. It is purely and simply a matter of trying to work out the proper mechanics for making it open to anyone who wishes to see it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are two or three members seeking supplementaries on this subject. There are less than five minutes remaining in the question period. I seek the co-operation of hon. members to try to limit supplementaries, although I appreciate the matter is of importance, so that we can go on to the next subject. The hon. member for Ontario has a supplementary.

Mr. Cafik: The minister has indicated he will make all relevant information available. Does this include information with regard to alternate sites?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have always assumed that the word "all" means exactly what it says. Therefore, if it is alternate sites, yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If we have time we will return to this subject matter in a few minutes.

HARBOURS

CHURCHILL—ESTABLISHMENT OF PORT AUTHORITY—PROVISION OF LOCAL REPRESENTATION

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In reply to a question I directed to the minister several weeks ago, he indicated that he hoped to be announcing shortly the formation of a port authority at Churchill. Can the minister now say when he will be making this announcement?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that letters of invitation have gone out to the various people who have been proposed for membership on the board for the port of Churchill. I do not know how many of these have been returned. The short answer is that as soon as we get the acceptances I will make a public announcement.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may ask a supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, the minister announced that letters have gone out to the expected appointees. Can the minister again assure the House that local representation on this body has been considered?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am not absolutely certain whether in the case of Churchill there was and is a properly incorporated body. As I recall, there is. It would have been asked to nominate someone. Certainly the province of Manitoba has been asked and has put forward a name which we have of course accepted.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—ASSISTANCE TO SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO FARMERS TO RE-ESTABLISH INDUSTRY—LONG-TERM SUGAR POLICY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister state whether the government has made a decision on whether or not it will assist the farmers of southwestern Ontario in re-establishing the sugar beet industry? A submission was made to the minister a short time ago on this matter.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a decision has not been made. As I recall it, and I would like to recheck this, the submission does not necessarily involve a direct assistance program by the federal government. It is far more directly related to such things as longer term marketing and, indeed, the establishment of a refinery that could process the crop.

Mr. McKinley: In view of the minister's answer, is the government giving consideration to the establishment of a long-term sugar policy for Canada so that we can have a viable industry here?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall, I am sure, that we are a party to an international sugar agreement. It is certainly not complete nor perfect, but it is somewhat better than the situation prior to the closing down of the sugar industry in that area.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. I do not see him here but someone opposite could perhaps take notice of it. Is it a fact that consideration is finally being given to restoring Saturday mail delivery service in Canada?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will draw this question to the attention of the Postmaster General.

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM FOR SHIPS—REQUEST FOR DEFERMENT AND REVIEW

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. In view of the fact the government's new insurance program covering ships engaged in the fisheries is causing considerable hardship to small ship owners, will the minister consider deferring the program and giving the whole matter a complete review?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the government's insurance program is probably one of the best things any government of this country has ever done for fishermen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BRUCELLOSIS TESTING OF CATTLE—ALLEGED LOSSES RESULTING FROM TIME OF TESTING—REVISION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises out of a previous question I directed to the minister some time ago with regard to possible revisions in the administration of the brucellosis testing program for cattle. Having regard to the fact that a number of losses have occurred which are directly attributable to the administration of this program carried out in early spring, has the minister had an opportunity to consult with the Health of Animals Division and in so doing come up with a better plan for the administration of these tests in respect of timing?

• (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have had some discussions about this matter. We certainly want to avoid the problem of handling these cattle at the wrong time of the year. If there are any instances where it can be shown that losses were the result of either negligence or some other action on the part of our officers, we would consider an application for compensation in those respects. It is, however, rather difficult to suggest that we change the whole program that has been evolved because the value of these testing programs is very great indeed even in relation to the losses we have had.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have just about reached the end of the question period but perhaps the hon. member might be allowed a supplementary. Then I will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood for the last question.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was not requesting that the total program be changed; I was merely asking for an assurance. Can the Minister of Agriculture assure the House that a better timing program will be instituted in order to avoid testing these cattle in the spring?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we are looking at that very carefully.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC OR COMMITTEE INQUIRY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport and is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario. Would the government give consideration to setting up a full public inquiry, such as the one that was held in London, England, I believe, when a new airport there was planned, so that the public can make representations and the inquiry can examine the evidence as to the need for a new airport and the best possible location for it?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not at all certain that the forum the hon. member is suggesting would be an appropriate one for achieving the objective he has mentioned. So far as making the material available is concerned, I have already said that that will be done. I might also point out that there will be expropriation proceedings at which all interested parties as well as the public at large can be heard.

Mr. Brewin: Would the minister consider as an alternative referring this whole matter to the transport committee of this House so that witnesses can be examined and the need made clear and public?

Mr. Jamieson: Again, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that that is the appropriate forum but I would be glad to consider it.

MOUNT HOPE, ONT.—DETAILS OF EXPANSION

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister soon be in a position to inform the House of the details of the proposed regional airport expansion at Mount Hope, Ontario?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. To the best of my knowledge the drafting is already available; I will look into this and pass the information on to the hon. member.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have further supplementaries on this subject. The question period expired three minutes ago. I think we should call Orders of the Day. I understand the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has a question supplementary to a previous question. A number of hon. members have not had an opportunity to ask their questions and I have tried to make a mental note of them. I apologize to them for the fact that they were not called upon. In view of the fact they are mostly members in the last row to my left, perhaps we might all work together tomorrow to try to give them priority. Orders of the Day.

NATIONAL REVENUE

TABLING OF INTERPRETATION BULLETIN CONCERNING DEDUCTION FROM TAXABLE INCOME OF COST OF SUBSCRIPTION LISTS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Minister of National Revenue rising on a point of order?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether I could have consent of the House to table the interpretation bulletin to which I referred in an answer I gave earlier in the question period.

Mr. Speaker: The minister needs unanimous consent to revert to motions for this purpose. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

The House resumed, from April 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate on the second reading of Bill C-183 briefly and for the purpose of dealing with but one aspect of the legislation. In doing so I shall be reciting a bit of history, and I do so not just because of the interest I have in the story to which I should like to refer but because I think there are one or two points about one change being made to the Canada Labour Code concerning which there should be clarification from the government side.

When I first came to parliament back in 1942, there were still living a large number of employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway who had lost their pension rights as a result of the 1919 general strike in the city of Winnipeg. At that time there were men who were still working for the Canadian Pacific Railway but whose pensions would be less than they would otherwise have been due to the 1919 strike. There were also many retired CPR employees drawing no pensions at all because they had lost their pension rights as result of the 1919 strike.

It is a fact of history that my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the Chair is having some difficulty hearing the hon. member. There are several individual conversations being carried on in the chamber. I wonder whether hon. members would be kind enough to go behind the curtains if they wish to continue their conversations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, my predecessor as the member for the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth, during the years that he was in parliament did his very best to persuade the government to take the necessary steps to restore the pension rights that were lost by those CPR workers. I would point out that employees of other organizations, such as Canadian National Railways, the Manitoba government telephones and certain other groups, who lost their pension rights at the time of the 1919 strike had those rights reinstated, but this was never done for the CPR employees.

When it became my privilege to succeed Mr. Woodsworth, one of the battles that I carried on was the attempt to get those rights reinstated. As a matter of fact, it took only a few more years until most of those who had lost their rights had passed on, so it soon became an issue no longer of concern to living people. However, the grievance that had been suffered was so serious that some of us felt legislation should be enacted to make sure that this kind of thing would not happen again.

Accordingly, in the middle forties I started using the device of private member's hour to present various bills in an effort to do this very thing, namely to protect pension rights against loss as a result of a strike or a lockout. My efforts in private members' hour in those days succeeded just as well as similar efforts in private members' hour succeed today. In other words, our proposals were talked out with kindness and approval.

In 1948, the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, introduced the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This, indeed, is the piece of legislation which, under the revision of the statutes in 1970, became Part V of the Canada Labour Code and, of course, it is Part V of the Labour Code which is being replaced by Bill C-183, now before us.

Accordingly, when the late Humphrey Mitchell brought in the bill to provide for the regulation of labour matters in 1948, I then started trying to move the appropriate amendment to that bill. The bill was referred to the appropriate standing committee, and in that standing committee I moved an amendment which would have had the effect of protecting pension rights against loss resulting from a strike. I regret to say that in the committee we lost. However, there are times when one does not give up, and when that bill came back to the committee of the whole house I tried once again to move an amendment. This time, in addition to such efforts as I made on the floor of the House, I consulted certain people behind the curtains, in their offices and so on, and did all I could to persuade people in high places that the request I was making was a reasonable and legitimate request that ought to be enacted into law.

As a matter of fact, one of the persons I approached was the Prime Minister of the day, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. I pointed out that during his years as Prime Minister he had in fact taken care of a number of grievances that arose during the 1910 labour disputes and the 1919 strike in Winnipeg. He finally expressed agreement that what I was requesting should be made part of the law of the land. Therefore, on June 17, 1948, in committee of the whole, when I moved my amendment that would protect pension rights against loss resulting from strikes, I was met, and I knew by this time this was going to happen, with a counter suggestion made by Mr. Chevrier, who was then Minister of Transport, to the effect that my idea was acceptable, but that the government would like to spell it out in a few more words so it would be clear beyond any doubt.

Actually, the amendment I moved, and this is found at page 5369 of Hansard for June 17, 1948, was as follows:

> That section 4, subsection 2(b) be amended by changing the period after the word "Act" to a comma, and adding thereafter the following words:
> and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, no employer shall deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work as the result of a lockout or strike or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act.

The reason those last few words about dismissal contrary to this act were inserted was that these words were already there in the subclause I was seeking to amend. The pages of Hansard for that day are in themselves interesting, although they do not tell the entire story. In any case, in the middle of that afternoon a point was reached when the then Minister of Transport, the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, got up and suggested that an alternative wording would be acceptable, and that wording was as follows, and I quote from page 5390 of Hansard for that day:

> That section 4, subsection 2(b) be further amended by changing the period after the word "act" to a comma, and adding thereafter the following words:
> "and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, no employer shall deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled by reason only of his ceasing to work after the commencement of this act as the result of a lockout or while taking part in a concerted stoppage of work due to a labour dispute where such lockout or stoppage of work has been enforced by the employer or called by the recognized representative of such employee, as the case may be, after all steps provided or contemplated by law have been taken through negotiation, collective bargaining, conciliation and arbitration to settle such dispute or by reason only of dismissal contrary to this act."

In other words, my simple wording was enlarged upon to make it crystal clear that the protection of pension rights against loss resulting from a strike or lockout was to apply only in the case of a clearly legal strike and, of course, it was to apply only after this act of 1948 came into force.

At the page to which I have referred, page 5390 of Hansard for June 17, 1948, it will be noted that I accepted the alternative wording proposed by Mr. Chevrier, whereupon my amendment was withdrawn, Mr. Chevrier's amendment was put and it was carried. At the next page, 5391, there is an indication that the bill was reported, read a third time and passed. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we won the battle and had a provision written into the federal legislation of this country that from then on workers were not to lose their pension rights only because they took part in a strike or were involved in a lockout, provided in the case of a strike that it was legal in terms of the legislation we passed at that time. The provision we thus won on June 17, 1948, was clearly written into the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and the language I have quoted became part of section 4 of that act. Those words are to be found in subsection (2) of section 4. I need not read the words again because I have already placed them on the record.

My point is that since 1948, the law has been crystal clear that what happened in 1919 cannot happen again; that pension rights are protected against loss resulting from a strike. I may say that within a very few years after that legislation was enacted by this parliament, most of the provincial legislatures copied those very words and put that language into their provincial labour laws. I know in this day and age it may seem unnecessary to think of requiring this kind of protection, but experiences in the early part of this century were very tragic and, as I say, this was an important gain to labour, to have this protection put into the law.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Is he aware of the fact that the matter of protecting pension rights is continued in section 184(3)(d) of this bill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should have thought the hon. parliamentary secretary would have realized that the direction in which I am speaking is such that I will be coming to that very soon.

Mr. Perrault: I am sorry.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was saying before the question was put to me, that one of the beneficial results of getting this kind of legislation into federal law was that most of the provinces adopted it, so it is not now possible for workers in Canada to lose their pension rights because of involvement in a strike.

I want to point out also that when the Statutes of Canada were revised in 1970, this provision was carried forward into Part V of the Labour Code which is chapter L-1 of the Revised Statutes of 1970. Although there was a little rearranging of the words, the same idea is there and the provision is well set down in section 110 of Chapter L-I of Revised Statutes of Canada 1970. So far no change; so far, all is well. Now, as the parliamentary secretary pointed out, this provision does seem to be carried forward in the bill now before us, Bill C-183. He identified the clause, namely clause 184, of the bill now before us. The clause is under the general heading "Unfair Practices". At page 55 of the bill one can read at the top of the page:

No employer and no person acting on behalf of an employer shall . . .

Then, we drop to the bottom of the page and find the following in (d):

. . . deny to any employee any pension rights or benefits to which the employee would be entitled but for

(i) the cessation of work by the employee as the result of a lockout or strike that is not prohibited by this Part, or

(ii) the dismissal of the employee contrary to this Part;

Despite my suspicions being aroused when I see the Liberals making a change, I have read that clause backwards and forwards a dozen times and I think it is all right. There are now only about as many words in that clause as there were in the amendment I moved back in 1948. The Liberals of that day multiplied the number of words about four times. One reason I have entered this debate is that I understand the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) wants to assume his right to close the debate at the end of second reading and I hope he will give us the assurance that the shortening and changing of the language does not detract by one iota from the basic principle, namely, that pension rights cannot be interfered with in any way because of a strike so long as it is a strike that is legal under the provisions of Part V of the Labour Code.

As I say, I have read the language proposed in 1948 that was in the former statute and that is in the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1970, and I have now read the wording in the new bill, but I would like from the minister the assurance that nothing has been lost by the change of the language or by the shortening of the sentence. I am sure he agrees with me, and I am sure this is what he wants, but I think it would be useful to have his clear statement that it is the intention of the government to continue to have in our law the reform which was won in 1948, namely, that pension rights cannot be lost or interfered with because of a strike.

However, one other change has taken place. If my good friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) will continue to follow the legislation that is before us I would ask him to take note of this: The Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act of 1948, in addition to section 4 which provides that pension rights cannot be interfered with because of a strike, contains a section under the heading "Enforcement", section 40, which reads:

Every person, trade union and employers' organization who violates section four or section five of this Act . . .

And Section 4 is the one which dealt with pension rights.

. . . is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction,

(a) if an individual, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars; or

(b) if a corporation, trade union or employers' organization, to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars.

In other words, the Act of 1948 not only provided that pension rights could not be interfered with but also contained a declaration that any employer who did this was guilty of an offence which, on summary conviction, was subject to a fine. That provision for fines, and for treating the offence as one subject to summary conviction, was carried forward in the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1970. For example, I read section 146 of Chapter L-I, which is the Canada Labour Code:

> Every person, trade union and employers' organization who violates section 110 . . .

And that in the Revised Statutes is the section which deals with pension rights.

> . . . or section 111 is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction,
> (a) if an individual, to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or,
> (b) if a corporation, trade union or employers' organization, to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars.

As I say, there was no change from the act of 1948 in the revision made in 1970. But now, when we pick up Bill C-183, the one we are dealing with today, I find there has been a change. May I at the risk of repeating myself make it clear that in the two previous versions to violate that section about pension rights put an employer in the position of being subject to summary conviction and a fine. But under Bill C-183 this seems to have been changed.

I see under the heading "Offences and Penalties" in clause 191 at page 62 of the bill two sub-clauses and it is the second one which is relevant. I shall read clause 191(2):

> Subject to section 190 . . .

That does not do anything because it talks about strikes and lockouts.

> . . . every employer or trade union who violates or fails to comply with any provision of this Part other than section 148, 184 or 185 is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

This is the very striking change to which I call attention. In the case of the act of 1948 and in the case of the Revised Statutes of 1970, it is clearly stated that to violate the section which deals with pension rights is an offence for which there can be a charge and, on summary conviction, a fine. But in the new bill it is clearly stated that clause 184, the clause having to do with pension rights, is excluded from the possibility of being treated as an offence and hence subject to the fines provided.

In my opinion the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration is the kind of lawyer I am. You know, we pick up our knowledge of law around here. There may be other lawyers who can explain this to me. My hunch, from having listened to explanations around this place, is that the change probably would result in a person who suffered any wrong having a civil action because some law had been broken, but what has been taken away is the making of this unlawful act an offence subject to summary conviction. I feel very strongly that this lighter treatment in this kind of provision should not remain as it is. I say again I welcome the fact that the provision we won in 1948 has been carried forward. Try as I can, I cannot see anything wrong with the new wording. I think the protection is just as good in the shorter wording as in the 1948 longer version, but I am disappointed and disturbed over the fact that it was previously an offence for an employer to interfere with pension rights because of involvement in a strike, whereas this bill removes that offence. In that sense, there is that much less protection for the worker involved. I hope that when the Minister of Labour responds at the end of this debate, he will deal with this phase of the matter.

As I said, I rose to take part in this debate to deal just with this one matter. My colleagues have spoken generally on Bill C-183. We in this party welcome this bill. The only substantial change we would like to see would be the one that has been asked for, namely that current contracts should be renegotiable with respect to the technological change provisions. But generally speaking, we like the legislation and we hope that it will soon reach the statute books. However, I appeal to the minister when he responds at the end of this debate to do two things for me; one, to give me the assurance that the shorter wording of the provision protecting pension rights is just as meaningful as the longer version was and, second, to assure me that consideration will be given to keeping it as it was, namely, that interference with pension rights because of involvement with a strike is an offence that should be dealt with severely. We do not want any more incidents which cause suffering of the type which occurred in 1910 and 1919. I remind the minister that the provinces copied the earlier legislation, and if we weaken it in any respect at the federal level, they are likely to weaken it too.

I thank the minister for his attention to this one issue which I regard as very important.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-183 is obviously put forward by the government at this time in an attempt to solve the dilemma in which Canada finds itself as a nation which is highly dependent upon trade for its economic survival. When one considers that this country exports about 30 per cent to 40 per cent of its gross national product, and when one considers that those goods are going into markets where the competition is very severe, one realizes that there must be technological advancement in order to enable producers to compete effectively in these world markets. Competition is essential if we are to maintain the standard of living to which we have become accustomed, and if we are to maintain employment at the desired level in Canada. On the other hand, it is also obvious that as new technology is introduced into industry, whether it be by way of materials or by way of machines, the human factor will be involved increasingly. Men or women are necessarily laid off, sometimes in large numbers, in order to accommodate these technological advances or changes.

This bill, as I see it, is an attempt to solve this problem to get us off the horns of this dilemma. At the outset, I would like to say that in principle I agree wholeheartedly with this bill. When I wrote to the former minister of labour some time ago, I said, among other things, that I supported completely the basic principle underlying the Freedman report, namely, that we should not plunge blindly ahead seeking quantitative changes at the expense of human dignity. I firmly believe we must take steps to ensure that the security of people who are disadvantageously affected by the introduction of technologically innovative devices is protected, and that such people are given the opportunity to adapt to changed conditions and to participate in a meaningful way in Canadian society.

Despite that feeling, I do think that the bill with which we are dealing here must be looked at more closely in committee. In the first place, this bill applies only to members of organized unions. It does not apply to all members of the labour force over which the federal government has jurisdiction. Everyone probably knows that there are in excess of 500,000 people within federal jurisdiction governed by the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, but only half of those belong to trade unions. It would be nice if some sort of minimum standard could be established in this bill or in another bill, which would provide the same type or protection to those members of the work force who are not members of organized unions but who nevertheless may just as easily be affected by the introduction of technological advances by their employers. I know it may be difficult, but I think it is something that the committee should study well and on which possibly it could make recommendations.

There is one other point which is most deserving of study. Under the bill as it is presently constituted, a bone fide union bargaining in good faith and a bona fide company bargaining in good faith may enter into a collective agreement which will provide the machinery for settling problems which might occur as a result of the introduction of technological change in that particular industry. In other words, the union and the company will sit down and negotiate their contract provisions, either spelling out what will be done in the event that a number of employees are displaced or providing the machinery for settling any disputes which might arise in the event of such an occurrence. In all of these cases, those agreements will provide that in the event of disputes between the bargaining agents, the union and the company, the disputes will be handled by way of grievance procedure. If these disputes are not settled by the use of the grievance procedure, they will end up in front of the board of arbitration—whose decision will be binding on all parties. This will be the result if bona fide unions bargain in good faith with bona fide companies who also bargain in good faith.

On the other hand, if a union does not so bargain or if a company does not so bargain with the result that the agreement which is reached between them does not contain any provision which would take care of people who might be displaced in the event of technological change, under the provisions of this act the union would have the right to apply to the Canada Labour Relations Board which would have the power to grant to that union the right to bargain, and eventually even to strike. So, we have this contradiction. The bona fide union and the bona fide company which bargain in the spirit which we all want, end up with an agreement which could lead to binding arbitration in the event of a dispute. On the other hand, those unions or those companies which do not bargain in the way we wish would end up in a situation in which the union really has more power potentially because it can be given the right to strike in the event of disputes arising as a result of the displacement of people resulting from the introduction of technological change.

It seems to me that this is an anomaly which must be corrected, because I do not feel that the bona fide union and the bona fide company should be put in a weaker position or a position which they might find less acceptable than that of a union which, possibly for many reasons, does not wish to bargain on this very important point. We must remember that despite the provisions of this particular bill, especially those dealing with technological change, unions now have the power to bargain on these very points. I, for one, would like to see less governmental interference in this area. I am a firm believer in free collective bargaining, and the freer it is the better. However, I also realize that not all companies are perfect, and not all unions are perfect.

Since each group is composed of human beings, the representatives of companies and unions on occasion tend to display the human frailties which we all possess. As a result, I have come to the conclusion that there should be some governmental intrusion in this area. There should be some incentive given to unions and companies to bargain in this very important area. However, if the bill remains as presently worded, I cannot see how a union would be given any incentive to bargain. If a union knows that if it does not bargain it may end up with the right to strike in the event of a dispute, why should it bargain and end up with nothing better than the right to submit to binding arbitration?

I suggest a compromise, Mr. Speaker. I know it has been suggested before, but I do not think it has been suggested in this context. It is that those companies which we seek to cover under this clause of the bill should be given no more than the unions and companies which bargain in good faith. In other words, we should consider the concept of introducing some type of compulsory arbitration in the event that disputes arise should technological change be introduced and, as a result, a significant number of employees are displaced.

There is one further point I would like to touch on with reference to this bill. It concerns the clause dealing with the inclusion of supervisory personnel in bargaining units. What exactly is meant by this clause is not too clearly spelled out. I hope the committee will examine it closely. I suspect that what is meant is supervisory personnel at the lowest level. If that is the case, a problem arises because it is the supervisory personnel at the lowest level who, so to speak, are given the job of enforcing the rights of the company under a collective agreement.

It is the lower level supervisory people who have the day to day job of meeting with union stewards and members of a union on the job, and who deal with disciplinary matters. It might well be that they could be included in the same bargaining unit, but I wonder what would be the position of an individual if he were asked to discipline one of his own union members, one of his union brethren. His would be a very difficult situation. I do not think he could wear two hats. This provision opens up the possibility of innumerable situations involving conflict of interest. It is something that has not been much discussed one way or the other. I hope the committee will look into this provision closely, to make sure we are not setting up an arrangement under which there will be such a conflict of interest at a very basic level in any plant.

Having made these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the government for the attention it paid to submissions which were made, not only to the present minister but to the previous minister, after the original bill was introduced. The changes that have been made during the last few months have cleared up a number of problems that existed previously. I hope the present minister keeps an equally open mind during the committee discussions.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I want very much to take part in this debate not because I am an expert on labour legislation but because, like most citizens of Canada, I am very much concerned at the labour picture which appears in our country today. At the outset, I wish to commend my colleagues, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), on the stand they have taken in this debate because I believe they reflected the thinking of the majority in our party. They realized, in a sympathetic and sensitive way, that today labour has a major problem.

These hon. members agree with me that the growing confrontation between labour and the management of corporate structures has an ever increasingly serious effect on the whole population of Canada, and not just on those portions of the population directly affected by particular disputes. One thing we tend to forget is that we are dealing with legislation affecting the main trade unions in Canada. I point out that there are a tremendous number of Canadian workers who are not tied into labour unions. Unfortunately, or possibly fortunately, the tremendous ramifications of government legislation also affect these workers seriously.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West, this occasion gives the government a rare opportunity to see if this legislation can be improved in committee, improved so as to provide leadership for the country and for the provinces concerning a problem that has assumed tremendous proportions within the last few years. More and more, the government is being asked by organized labour and the corporate structure of industry to introduce legislation that will strengthen their respective stands, not only in disputes now under way but in the settlement of disputes that may occur in the future.

Through a process of natural evolution, unions and other organized groups of labour have begun banding together in order to present a stronger front. This has caused the banding together of industries in order to present equally strong opposition. This polarization has gradually brought the country into a position in which many Canadians suffer greatly when an industrial dispute or strike takes place. I do not think the harmful effects which follow strikes are intended, but are spinoffs because of the nature of the action taken. I point to some recent results of such actions in a dispute between employer and employee of which you are well aware, Mr. Speaker. Not long ago an entire city was paralyzed by a fall of snow and a strike of snow removal crews. I will not go into the issue of whether these employees were right or wrong, but a tremendous catastrophe could have come about had there been an outbreak of fire or lawlessness because there was no way in which the population of that city could have been protected.

We are finding that the power of labour has continually increased in this evolution to the extent that it is now possible for very small groups in the labour force to walk out and, because they are affiliated with a larger group, to ensure that their picket lines will not be crossed. In this way a very few people can bring severe hardship to the majority of the citizens of Canada. This is only one of the problems we must look at today.

The second problem that has been brought out by all members who have spoken has been that very often a dispute between a trade union and industry causes a breakdown in normal production so that contracts are lost as well as productivity which sometimes are never recovered. It is Canada as a whole, not just the trade unions or industry, that suffers very dramatically in these circumstances. One unfortunate circumstance which results from a prolonged strike is that many small corporations and individual businesses go into bankruptcy. The strike makes it impossible for them to carry on normal business, so, they are forced to discontinue their operation.

These are the problems to which we should direct our attention, the problems which face all Canadians, and they must be solved. This is why, with my colleagues, I look forward to this legislation going to the committee where I am sure very serious consideration will be given to it. I hope that the government will be ready and willing to accept amendments from whichever party they come. The whole problem must be attacked by parliament, Mr. Speaker.

An ugly situation is developing in Canada today. People who are not affected by the financial outcome of a strike are becoming disillusioned with the use of the strike to settle major problems. All across the North American continent there is the realization that, although strikes were necessary to ensure labour a satisfactory return for its efforts in past years, they may have reached the end of their usefulness as a tool. But, Mr. Speaker, we cannot demand that trade unions give up this tool which, after all, is the only major implement they have to obtain what they feel are their just deserts. In all fairness, I do not believe that we can ask them to forgo this right unless we, as representatives of the people, can offer a substitute that is logical and plausible and which will achieve this end.

Perhaps the labour legislation in the United States which provides for a cooling-off period is a start. Labour unions quickly found that they needed legal expertise to survive, and today they employ some of the best legal brains available. The same can be said for the corporation; their legal officers are experts. At the federal and provincial level, there are in the departments of labour men who have dealt with the problem for years and through study and observation have learned a tremendous amount about the problems involved. Surely, it would be possible for the government to take the initiative to get these three groups together to see if the problem can be solved. I am not in any way suggesting that this has not been attempted, but unfortunately most of the effort has been directed toward solving a particular strike rather than to achieve the long range solution that is so necessary.

The government has a tremendous responsibility with regard to this legislation, Mr. Speaker. We in the official opposition, and I think I speak for the majority of our members, hope that this is not just another exercise to put up-to-date legislation on the books, but is rather an honest effort on the part of the government to provide a vehicle that can be used to prevent some of the problems we have encountered in the last three or four years. I think there is no question in the mind of any member of this House but that we are embarked upon a collision course between the trade unions and the corporate structure of this country. Every time there is a confrontation between these two there is no winner. Trade union representatives never achieve all they feel they should have. Industry always feels that it has granted more than it should have granted.

So, looking at it practically, when an agreement is reached and a contract signed, both sides to the dispute are granted time in which to prepare for the next confrontation. These agreements never solve anything. By buying time, both sides are able to prepare immediately for the next round of confrontation, which they each know will take place. Thus we see a polarization taking place between the great colossus representing labour and the great colossus representing industry and management, with labour making ever more demands, the confrontations becoming ever more severe, and ever more Canadians being involved and being hurt. That is why I plead today for the government to make full use of this opportunity and, in committee, not to try to process this bill quickly. Let us consider it honestly and sincerely. Let there be consultation between all parties in this House and those who will be most affected. Let us try to bring in legislation that will begin solving some of these major problems.

The kingpin on which this legislation turns is whether or not technological changes are sufficient grounds for the reopening of a contract once it has been entered into by both parties. This is of vital importance to both sides. As I say, we are dealing with two giants, and not with two individual organizations. Naturally, trade unionists are greatly concerned about whether technological changes mean a loss of jobs. They have learned from experience that most technological changes, either temporary or permanently, lead to loss of jobs. On the other hand, industry says that without technological changes it cannot streamline its enterprises and compete in international markets. These are fixed positions. The issue this bill raises is simply this: is technological change, when introduced during the life of a contract, basis enough for renegotiating the entire contract? Labour says yes and management says no, so there is confrontation. It is in this area that parliament is responsible. We must bring in legislation which will make it possible for parliament to guide both sides, for the good of the citizens of Canada.

Most people in Canada are not thoroughly versed in the fine points of labour law or the fine points of contract settlement. They do not want to be so versed. What they do want is the type of Canada where, day after day, they can earn a living for their families. Most families undertake expenditures or obligations which are paid slowly, on budget plans. Our people do not want their normal earning power interrupted by a strike that may not touch them directly but may affect them indirectly. Such a strike may curtail their opportunity for making a living, or their means of transport, or their means of communication. These are the things in which our people are interested. Think of the service we can render the people of Canada and the workers of the world if we, in this House, can formulate a reasonable way of settling these disputes and so avoid the violent confrontations which have been so costly. I think that is what we are trying to do.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak in the debate on Bill C-183, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code. I have listened with a great deal of interest to spokesmen from both sides of the House and have found that I agree with many of the views expressed. At the same time, I must point out that there are always two sides to every question. I have sometimes felt, over the years, that organized labour has received many black eyes which, frankly, I do not think it has deserved. Without doubt, sometimes criticism could be levied at certain strikes which have taken place. Quite frequently, however, the cause lies much deeper than the dispute itself. Setting proper conditions in the economy would, I believe, bring more benefit to the Canadian nation, especially if we could do so in a manner that would ensure that all groups of Canadian society, whether organized labour, pensioners, those in unions and those not in unions, could share in the increasing prosperity which we enjoy every year. So far we have not in Canada, unfortunately, devised a plan for sharing fairly among all Canadians our annually increasing prosperity which is reflected in terms of the gross national product. That is the end to which parliament and hon. members should be working in their attempt to find solutions for the labour-management problem which seems to be with us currently.

This is an interesting and important bill, Mr. Speaker. It contains some new provisions and some necessary changes to existing legislation. It is my intention to support it. I trust, however, that the minister will incorporate in the legislation some of the proposed changes offered by various hon. members in the debate. May I point out that inadequate legislation and lack of real understanding of labour problems on the part of government and management has led to much labour unrest and to many unnecessary strikes over the years.

The present act governing federal jurisdiction in the labour field was introduced in 1948. A few amendments over the years were made to it; but there is no doubt that it has long been out of date and in need of major revision. That is why organized labour has generally indicated that the proposed legislation is an improvement over the old and should be endorsed, despite some of the rather weak clauses in the bill. Other members of my group have dealt with various aspects of the legislation, so I will not cover those aspects again at this time. It is my wish, however, to deal briefly with several interesting aspects of labour problems. I should like to make a few general comments first on the general labour situation in Canada.

A few weeks ago the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Railway Labour Association made their annual submissions to the federal government. Both briefs called for a number of major changes in the government's economic policy and advocated changes which would greatly improve the living standards of all Canadians. Too few people in our country give credit to organized labour for the job it has done over the years to improve the lot of all Canadians, not merely those who belong to some particular labour union. Labour has led the fight to improve social conditions and living standards all over this nation and the improved lot of the average workingman is testimony to the success of its campaign.

I can recall the struggle of some of the early unions for better conditions. Mr. Speaker, I live in a mining area and I know of miners who were blacklisted in every mining camp for having had the courage to strike for such things as the 8-hour day and the 40-hour week. They were blacklisted for wanting clean sheets in the camps and improved safety conditions in the mines. Those of us who have followed them enjoyed the benefits they won for us, although at the time the general public had little sympathy for them. No one today would suggest that they were not justified in their fight for better conditions at that time. The same arguments were used against labour then as now, namely that industry could not afford to meet the cost, but somehow we have survived as a nation and the living standard of Canadians has improved.

An example of labour interest in the welfare of Canadians generally was shown in the briefs presented to the federal government by the CLC and the CRLA. They called for a number of major social improvements, including such things as the war against poverty, and advocated an all-out attack against the increase in poverty which we are experiencing in this country. The briefs called for a guaranteed annual income and an increase in the old age security pension to $100, payable at 60 years of age. They requested the government to establish a cost of living index which would indicate the actual increases in living costs. The briefs called for a revised policy on Unemployment Insurance which would exclude severance pay and vacation pay from the classification of earnings under the act. They requested that severance pay and vacation pay be looked upon as deferred wages or savings, which they are really.

The briefs of these labour unions dealt with pollution problems. Again they requested the federal government to bring in national standards and to enforce the regulations for the clean-up of our environment. They called for more research on environmental problems. The briefs dealt with tax reform, one of the major problems facing this nation. They requested that adequate tax legislation be introduced by this government and that a tax system be established which would bring equality to all Canadians. They urged the government to take action on housing and trade problems, as well as problems dealing with our native people. This is a clear indication that organized labour is interested in the whole Canadian scene, not only in their own union activities. I believe that this is sometimes overlooked by members of parliament and Canadians generally.

I would like to make just one more point on this general position of labour in this and in other countries. The workman has only one thing to sell, his labour. In my opinion, he should have the right to organize and bargain collectively. This bill retains that right. I certainly endorse this aspect of the legislation which we are being asked to vote upon.

I would now like to get down to one or two points in the legislation. While I intend to endorse the bill when the vote comes, I still feel there are several sections which the minister should look into and, I hope, amend. One deals with a basic industry, fishing. I point out to the minister that for years fishermen have been fighting for the rights which any group of workers should have under the various labour jurisdictions in Canada. The present legislation will not give the same protection to fishermen that other labour groups will enjoy. In my opinion, all workers in the fishing industry are entitled to full protection under the Canada Labour Code. For this reason, the definition of a fisherman in this current bill must be changed. I understand that the present wording of the definition will exclude about 75 per cent of the fishermen. I urge the minister to check this very closely and bring in the necessary change to give this group of workers the protection they should have. I see no reason why any group of workers in Canada, regardless of the occupation they pursue, should be discriminated against.

An excellent brief was presented to members of parliament by the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union some weeks ago. Points in this brief have already been raised by several of my colleagues and others, so I will not repeat them at this time. However, when this bill goes to committee, I urge the minister to invite representatives of this union to present their views. They should be closely questioned on their proposed amendments. I trust that something constructive will come out of this so that this group of workmen will have the coverage they should have under Canada's Labour Code.

There is another point I am going to raise. It is touched upon in the legislation. This deals with discrimination against workmen because of age. I recently had an example in my own area of a man 51 years of age who was denied employment because he was too old. I have taken up this case with the labour department and they are investigating it. This rank discrimination against workmen must stop. We must incorporate in legislation sufficient safeguards to make certain that people in this category are protected against discrimination in any industry in Canada. I am not certain that we have all the necessary safeguards. They certainly ought to be incorporated in a Labour Code because in our industrialized society, we are reaching the stage where industry is more interested in the younger workers than those who are getting on toward retirement age. This is another field where we will run into a great deal of trouble unless discrimination of this type is nipped in the bud. I feel it should be done through legislation.

There is another matter I would like to discuss briefly. I think this is one of the most important items in the whole field of labour-management relations. I am going to talk briefly about conciliation procedures. In my opinion, it is in this area that one of the major weaknesses in labour relations lies. I do not think we have enough skilled labour negotiators. I do not think that governments generally, federal or provincial, have paid sufficient attention to this very important aspect of settling a dispute between labour and management. Much more can be done. One of the worst examples in Canada of this weakness is our own federal government. Time after time, we find that negotiations do not begin until the expiry date of the contract is very close. Sometimes the expiry date of the contract passes before finally, in desperation at the lack of progress being made in the negotiations the workers are driven to strike. This should not be. This is part and parcel of the conciliation procedures which I think should be looked into and updated.

The federal government should be the employer in Canada that sets standards. It should be the employer in Canada that gives guidance to other employers in the treatment of agreements that become due. But in many instances we have seen the sorry spectacle of the federal government being one of the worst offenders as far as labour contracts are concerned. I trust that from now on we will see an improvement in this regard.

We have had a great deal of discussion about technological change, and to me this is the most important aspect of the whole bill. Our group welcomes the inclusion of provisions in the legislation dealing with technological change. There is no point in burying our heads in the sand, because technological change is with us and is increasing in scope. The mere fact that these provisions are included in the legislation is an indication that we are looking to the future.

There is no doubt that we are going to run into trouble in this regard. Workers in some industries are very apprehensive about their jobs and will try to protect them in negotiations with management. This is one other problem facing Canada today. If our economy guaranteed a job to every Canadian who wanted one, and I believe it is the right of every Canadian to have a job if he wishes to work, I am quite certain many of these strikes which currently take place would not arise. I think it is the failure, not only of the government but of the members of the House, to set up an economy that guarantees work for individuals that is often the basic cause of much of the labour-management unrest that we have in this country.

We hear a lot about the loss to the economy through strikes, and I frankly admit that this loss is very serious. But there are other losses that are much more serious. Take, for example, unemployment. There are some 650,000 Canadians who are out of work every day of the month. Over the course of one year, this means about 150 million working days are lost. In the case of workers who for reasons of ill health are forced to lay off work, the number of man days lost is far greater than the man days lost as a result of strikes. I am not trying to say that work days lost through strikes is not a serious matter because it is, and we should try to bring the parties together so that we can lessen the number of strikes taking place in this country. But surely we must look at the situation in perspective and realize that there are other areas in which the loss of work days is far more serious than the loss that is usually attributed to striking unionists.

[Mr. Harding.]

Again may I point out I am certain that the tightening up of our labour procedures will help materially to improve labour-management relations. This is the reason I am so pleased to see the progress that is apparently being made in the field of labour relations through the implementation of this legislation. I shall not say more, Mr. Speaker. When the bill comes back to the House, we shall have an opportunity of seeing any changes that have been made in the committee. Again, I urge the minister to look very carefully at the suggestions that have been made by various groups. I hope that when the bill returns to the House we will see a further tightening up of the legislation which I and most Canadians hope will bring about a better era of labour-management relations in Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I recognize the hon. Minister of Labour, I should advise hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate at this stage of our proceedings.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I want to thank all hon. members who have participated in the debate over the past several days for the contributions they have made. I particularly want to express my gratitude for the general climate of opinion evident from the contributions made by members on both sides, which I take to be an opinion favourable to the principles of the bill. I think this bodes well for the debate that we will be having at the committee stage.

Having listened to the members of various opposition parties and members on this side of the House, I feel that there has been a general endorsement of the basic principles of the bill, though some caution has been expressed. Interest has been shown in specific clauses, and during the committee stage we will have the opportunity of exploring these. I welcome the attendance of members at the committee stage and I assure all hon. members that, so far as the Minister of Labour is concerned, it will be very worthwhile to issue an invitation to any interested groups in the country to come forward and make representations.

I recognize that this bill has come forward at a time when there is very high public interest in labour disputes. Indeed, this interest is not only high but is coloured and sharpened with a certain degree of irritation. It comes at a time when there is a large amount of group militancy, not only in Canada but in many other countries as a result of efforts made to change social, economic and other conditions under which people live. Therefore, we find a bill which is the first attempt to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act in 24 years coming forward at a time when people are far more critical and less passive than they have ever been in the past. This is why I am encouraged to hear there is a general acceptance of the broad approach reflected in this bill through the endorsement of it by members on both sides of the House.

The bill in its broadest sense is designed to put a legal framework around the collective bargaining process and to regulate the relationships between employers and employees in the public interest. I trust that is what we will conclude even when we have been through the committee stages and various members have brought forward their specific criticisms.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) expressed general support. He modified it with some caution and drew particular attention to the recommendation of the Woods task force concerning a public interests disputes commission. Other members have drawn attention to this proposal. I have studied it very carefully, and I have concluded it would not be a contribution to dispute settlement in Canada. I am not going to go into the reasons for that at this stage, but I know it will come forward in committee and I should like us to have a very thorough investigation of that proposal to see exactly what it would mean, particularly for us as parliamentarians. It has very serious implications for the role of government in dispute settlement, and particularly for the role of members of parliament. It will be a good thing to have that out in committee to see every side of it.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) highlighted the technological provisions in the bill, but seemed to be saying that employers should be in the same position whether or not they had provision or procedures to deal with technological change. I may have understood him wrongly, but as I listened I thought he was saying that even though there are provisions or procedures an employer ought to be put into the position of having a contract reopened during its closed season. We have not taken that approach, and because we have not there are exemptions from technological change provisions inserted in the bill. I hope that question, too, will come forward at the committee stage.

The hon. member for Gamelin (Mr. Portelance) made a very interesting contribution in drawing our attention to the New Zealand experience, which is also the experience in another Commonwealth country, Australia, where there are mandatory arbitration procedures and the use of labour courts. He indicated quite clearly that this process has its failures, that the mandatory or compulsory arbitration approach is not likely a successful one because there are strikes that just happen to be illegal. We have turned our backs on that process here in favour of a process that continues the Canadian experience of investigating disputes, going through a conciliation procedure with a mediation procedure following that.

When we look at the figures in respect of federal jurisdiction we have no reason for complacency, but we do have reason to believe it is a basically satisfactory procedure. About 95 per cent of the disputes into which the labour department has been drawn have been settled without strike action. Moreover, some very interesting statistics concerning man-days lost in the federal jurisdiction are available.

For example, in 1966 there were 133 man-days lost out of every 10,000 man-days worked. In 1971, that was down to 9 days lost out of every 10,000 days worked. We will not be able to maintain that level, undoubtedly, but I think it does reflect the building up of mediation procedures in the department under the former Minister of Labour. He is in the House this afternoon and I think we all want to welcome him back after his absence, just as we want to recognize the major contribution he has made to this bill I am now putting before the House. The mediation procedures launched during his time in office had a great deal to do with improving our experience in federal jurisdiction over the past three or four years.

The hon. member for Gamelin once again drew attention to the settlements on the St. Lawrence docks. I hope members will forgive me if I just allude to that again, but it, too, confirms and reinforces our confidence in the mediation procedure which goes into effect as soon as a contract is signed. It should be a constant and permanent feature as it is very helpful where there is a third party; an honest broker, a neutral observer or a person who gains the confidence of both parties to a dispute, works with them constantly and helps bring about an amendment to a contract during a period voluntarily agreed upon. This helps the parties calm down their emotional postures or positions that are adopted psychologically during these relationships, and this is very difficult to improve.

That mediation procedure was used in respect of the complex situation at the docks and the settlement that has emerged there is perhaps a milestone, as much as it is a monument to the previous Minister of Labour, in labour history. The wage settlement is extremely modest, but that is not the important thing at all. The important thing is that the employers, having combined in a council, looked at that situation; the longshoremen looked at their situation and the long-term future of the Montreal, Trois-Rivières and Quebec docks, and came to the view that they could to the benefit of both sides exchange productivity, give up absolute work practices and gain real and effective productivity in exchange for job security and pension changes, and other things that have some real benefit.

As the hon. member for Gamelin mentioned, I think there are many other situations in Canada which can be described as technological laboratories where human relations are involved, where those involved could usefully follow the pattern which was instituted in respect of the docks, with particular relation to job security and the retirement benefits in exchange for the giving up of featherbedding practices and other work rules that really injure the Canadian economy as well as the economy of the local community.

In this bill we are seeking to encourage the parties to bring into their bargaining procedure the whole question of technological change. Many others here have referred to this as a basic element they want to support, regardless of other features of the bill about which they are not too sure at the present time.

All I want to say to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) is that I appreciate the common sense he displayed. He ought to have stuck to his own remarks and omitted all those quotations, which really came from academics, many of which in my opinion were irrelevant to the situation and undermined the very common sense proposals the hon. member was making. He sounded better when he was on his own.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) reinforced his acceptance of the basic Freedman principle, the right to bargain collectively in respect of the effects of technological change. I think he spoke for all of us in this regard. We all know that the labour force of Canada is not against technological change and does not want to retard or prevent it. Our whole future as an effective, modern economy depends on us absorbing that technological change and, in fact, putting it to work for us as a society. We do not want the effects of it to weigh so heavily and perversely on the employees of enterprise.

Many employers are approaching this matter in an intelligent way, recognizing a social and human responsibility, and we want to extend that principle, so far as we can, in the federal jurisdiction by encouraging the extension of this process. That is the basic feature of the bill.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Serré) represents an area with a very high organized labour population. I think he said that 80 per cent of his constituency is involved in the organized labour movement. I was encouraged to hear him say that this bill would not only be good for labour but would be good for management. I do not know that I will be able to comment on the very interesting remarks made by so many members on both sides of the House. I particularly wish to say I appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne). He has a background in labour affairs as a result of his experience in the union movement, and he made a very useful contribution to the debate as it began on its first day. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) suggested the bill should encourage more of the sort of quiet process that was followed on the St. Lawrence docks. If he understood the bill, he would know that is exactly what it is trying to do. He suggested that the process that went on there is the very kind of thing that reduces the adversary approach. All of us know the kind of group militancy that is common in society, not only in the labour-management field. If we think about it for a moment we will see it as part of the social environment today.

We find as the complexity of society increases that the interdependence of all of us on each other increases and it becomes very difficult to effect change and therefore group militancy has become very common. We must contain that. We cannot turn it off entirely because we have a free society, but we must contain it. The kind of quiet activity which went on at the docks was exactly designed to contain it in the sort of framework we have created and are modifying now. What he was appealing for is exactly what we are trying to bring about in this bill.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked for certain assurances concerning clause 184 in the bill. I can give him the assurance that there is no intention to change the provisions respecting pensions, and in our view there has been no change in the protection of pension rights during or as a result of a strike. I think that was the assurance he wished. I want to say with as much clarity as I can that there was no intention to alter that which existed in the previous bill. In our view nothing has been altered from the previous bill with regard to those pension rights which might otherwise be affected by a strike.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question at this point? Would he also comment on the change which appears in the bill in respect of penalties for violating that clause?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes. I was just about to mention that. I believe it was clause 190 to which our attention was drawn.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Clause 191.

Mr. O'Connell: Clause 191, subclause 2, omits the offence to which the hon. member referred going back to clause 184(3)(d). Now, may I refer him to clause 189. It is in that clause that we believe we have coped with it in even a better way by making it an unfair labour practice to be considered by the new Canada Labour Relations Board. In our view a fine may not be the right way in which to approach it. It is far more important to have the unfair labour practice brought before the Canada Labour Relations Board. The clause in question states that the Board may by order require the party to comply with that section and may do certain other things to enforce its order of compliance. We think perhaps the enforced compliance is better than a fine. Once again in the committee we would be glad to have opinions concerning whether we have done the better of two things. However, I do wish to give the assurance that there was no intention to retreat from the positions which existed previously.

I know there are many members who have raised very interesting points concerning arbitration procedures, concerning the supervisory personnel, concerning appointments to the Canadian Labour Relations Board and whether that board should be a representative board as we have understood the existing one to be or whether it should be a public interest board as we believe it ought to be. Interesting points were also raised concerning bargaining rights for professionals and other matters of that kind.

However, one other subject came up so frequently I want to refer to it specifically. It was brought up by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding). Many members have referred to the position of the fishermen. We have taken a step forward with regard to the bargaining rights of certain fishermen. It is true we have not covered all commercial fishermen. We do not want to leave the impression that there is discrimination. We have taken a step further with regard to those who share in the catch as fishermen. This provision is similar to the one which applies to dependent contractors in the trucking industry. We have grave concerns about going any further at this time. We have grave concerns over the legal question of the right of including others as employees under this act who may in fact not be employees. However, I did meet with the representatives of the Allied Fishermen's Council. I had a very good talk with them. I expressed a great deal of sympathy for the case they were making. I advised them we do not feel we can go further at this time than is being proposed but we will have it out again in the committee. So far as I am concerned, they are very welcome to return and I would appreciate it if they would come back and place before the committee the case they are trying to make.

We know there are various provincial governments which are moving in this field, as in other fields, further than industry might like, as in the case of the pulpwood lot people who cut and sell pulpwood to others. There is a special question here and I want to express a great deal of sympathy in respect of the bargaining rights of these people concerning prices and other conditions. At the same time, however, I would of course be frank to say we may not have the jurisdiction and this question has to be settled.

Mr. Speaker, these remarks will conclude those I wish to make in closing this second reading debate. Let me again thank all those who participated. I believe they did so with a great deal of thought in this area and with a high spirit of interest. I look forward to meeting them again in the Standing Committee in the very near future. I hope we can get this bill into law so that its beneficial measures can become operative.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I say that at times one can expect the co-operation of hon. members. As I understood it, there was an understanding in this House among hon. members about the disposition of this bill after second reading. The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) made a speech closing off debate on the second reading stage of the bill. He patted hon. members on the back for their contributions. Nevertheless, the understanding agreed on has been violated by certain government members who have attempted to use this House for their own selfish purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: The government doesn't have the guts to call an election now.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour called for the co-operation of the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I have all the time in the world. I am being serious now. As I say, the Minister of Labour called for co-operation. Let me say this, too. We wish to be responsible; however, so far as I am concerned, I do not want anybody to cross the floor or go behind the curtain in future and seek my co-operation, because I will not give it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Until certain people here can act like gentlemen and arrive at an understanding in the spirit appropriate to gentlemen, and I am afraid certain government members have a long way to go, there will be no co-operation from me in the future.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that is a point of order. I do not think there should be discussion on what is not, to my way of thinking, a point of order.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I see the minister is rising. Perhaps I can raise it after the minister has completed his remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour was drawn into the alleged point of order by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), who complained about some misunderstanding. I declare here that I never went behind the curtain and I did not come to any understanding. I do not want to be associated with going back on any understanding, because I entered into none.

Mr. Jerome: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, although I was not mentioned—

Mr. Alexander: You are the one I am after.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: If I am the one the hon. member is after, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand why he did not say so. I understood from his remarks that he referred to conversations I had had with hon. members opposite about this bill being passed on division by ten o'clock last night. That is what we discussed, and that did not take place. As hon. members know, there were discussions relative to the passage of the bill at nine o'clock, I believe. We talked about the bill being passed on division by ten o'clock. That was the suggestion that was made last night, and what was suggested did not happen. Instead, debate was carried on for some time this afternoon by other hon. members of the House. The understanding not having been carried out, the situation has become entirely different. That is exactly what happened and I do not feel in any way, Mr. Speaker, that any confidence has been broken or any understanding transgressed in any way.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. I do not think, in the first place, that he raised a valid point of order. We have already had a few minutes discussion on the matter. I think we should try to get on with private members business which, too, is important. The hon. member having sought the floor on a question of privilege, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from the remarks made by the Minister of Labour. Of course, my remarks were not directed to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: To any who believe that they were, I must say that they were not. My remarks were directed to the parliamentary secretary and, no matter what he says, I say to him, your observations are incorrect.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: The argument that you just delivered is meaningless.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he should address his remarks to the Chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment this evening are as follows: the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—National Revenue—Issuance of interpretation bulletin concerning deductibility from taxable income of money paid by Toronto "Star" for "Telegram" subscription lists; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—St. Lawrence Seaway— Participation with United States in study on possible year-round operation; the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay)—Industry—Closing of McBean Colliery—Provision of pensions similar to benefits for Devco miners.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed in todays order paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING PUBLICATION OF RESULTS OF OPINION POLLS

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North) moved that Bill C-15, to amend the Canada Elections Act (publication of the result of opinion polls) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

• (1720)

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking on Bill C-15, I would first like to place on the record the explanatory note that outlines the purpose of this bill. It reads as follows:

The purpose of this amendment is to prohibit, and to make punishable as an illegal practice, the publication in any manner before election day of the results of a poll of the political opinions of the electors. The proposed amendment does not prohibit the taking of such a poll for private purposes.

This is not the first time this bill has been debated in this chamber. Each time I have placed it on the order paper, I have found that it has produced a good deal of valuable discussion among the public and the media. I found that if it does nothing else, it at least makes the public aware of some of the dangers associated with opinion polls, especially those used during election campaigns and published by the media, particularly the newspapers of this nation. In my opinion, this practice all too often results in newspaper promotion stories about the polls rather than the merit of political parties' campaigns and the policies that are being proposed.

I first introduced the bill because of what happened in the last provincial election in the province of Quebec. I felt that newspapers used opinion polls to stampede the electorate to vote for the Liberal party of that particular province at that time because of issues that developed around the Parti Quebecois whose object was to separate Quebec from the remainder of Canada. In this regard, I would like to quote some comments that appeared in the press during that election campaign and one that followed in Great Britain which produced a similar result. These results indicate that most of the time opinion polls do more damage than they do good. All too often, the result of such publication is that people involve themselves in discussions about the relative strengths of political parties based on percentages reflected by these polls rather than the relevant strengths of political parties based on whether they have the policies that will be of greatest value to the future of either a province or the nation.

I should like to place on the record some of the comments made by Charles Lynch in an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of May 7, 1970 concerning polls and what transpires when newspapers use them to try to convince the electorate that certain things may or may not happen. Mr. Lynch said in part:

The polls introduced a scare element into the campaign—

He is talking about polls that appeared in newspapers in the province of Quebec during the Quebec provincial election campaign.

—and had they not done so, there is reason to believe that the Parti Quebecois might have run up a larger vote on election day than was actually the case.

The polls led to the celebrated Brink's truck evacuation of Montreal.

Publication of the polls altered the tone of news coverage of the campaign, thrusting the separatist issue to the fore, and leading the CBC to decide that the election merited night-long, nationwide coverage on television.

It can be argued that the polls rendered a national service, if indeed they served to check the separatist surge and swing the undecided vote to the Liberal federalists—but however desirable the results, the fact remains that the polls intruded into the basic democratic process of holding an election.

The poll results became central to almost everything that was written about the Quebec election between April 18 and April 29. And they diluted what otherwise would have been the shock effect, provincial and national, of the size of the separatist vote on election night.

No political commentator is likely to argue for the abolition of advance polls, or straw votes as they used to be called, because they give us so much to write about in the course of a campaign.

They may even keep us from looking more foolish than we usually do, and for an example of that we need only look back to the British Columbia election last August.

Without the help of the polls, most commentators labored under the impression that the NDP would upset the government of Premier W. A. Bennett. When the results were in, the pundits headed for the border with the laughter of the victorious Mr. Bennett echoing in their ears.

The voters had spoken, without benefit of opinion polls, which might or might not have influenced the result had they been legal.

People in my line of work realized how heavily we have come to depend on the polls in our campaign reporting, and we learned a badly-needed lesson about the importance of discussing election issues, rather than forecasting results.

The question is not whether or not the polls are accurate—most of them are remarkably so. Rather, it's whether or not they distort the democratic process and, by depicting the voting pattern in advance, alter it.

It has been my contention that polls are and can be used for the particular benefit of the person or persons producing them. They can be accurate, as Mr. Lynch points out in his article, or they can be completely inaccurate. Their inaccuracy can do great damage by fooling people who do not usually pay much attention to newspapers but depend on them during election campaigns to provide them with the facts as seen by what they have come to believe are political analysts of some repute. Unless we have some type of regulation of opinion polls, they could be misused in a very dangerous manner.

I have pointed out in the past that there are two newspaper chains in this country to which such a large proportion of the reading public subscribes they can pump much information into their homes that may or may not be accurate. It is not good enough to say the people will find out eventually because, during an election campaign, people depend on the accuracy of what they are reading. If it is not accurate, it is too late after an election campaign to make corrections because decisions have been taken on the basis of what the people read. It is no help to say, what is the difference; what we said was inaccurate but has been corrected now.

I wish to give an example of another serious problem, that of the monopoly building up in the newspaper field. Although the figures may have increased now, some time ago Southam News Services had a readership of its various newspapers in Canada of 849,364. FP Publications had a readership across Canada of 858,589. So that between these two there are over 1.5 million readers. The Thomson chain had a readership of 371,006, though this figure may have increased now. This is an indication that the three combined have a readership of about two million daily.

If these newspapers were so inclined—I am not suggesting that they would be—they could join together to perpetuate the dissemination of a great deal of false information by means of polls, especially during the last week of an election campaign. This is why I am concerned at the lack of any regulation today. Any political party could publish a poll, and in such a way that the public would not know that the party concerned was putting out misinformation in order to create a certain impression in the minds of the voting public. This situation concerns not only me but, I am sure, many Canadians.

Many newspapers and individuals across this country are asking whether polls should or should not be allowed. I believe there should be some kind of regulation that would at least ensure they had some authenticity; that there should be some requirement that must be met before they could promote whatever purpose the poll had in mind. I do not know whether this will ever be the case but I do know that we should keep discussing the question if for nothing else than to make the public more aware that there is some doubt about the validity of polls and that they should not place too great a dependence upon them. If we are able to make people better aware that they should not read too much into polls or place too much dependence upon them, that polls can be inaccurate, then during the time that is available to us today we have at least accomplished something. As I see it, this is one of the values of private members' bills.

There will be a general election campaign not too long from now, whether in June, in October or next April or May. I would not like to see in the next general election in Canada a recurrence of what happened in Great Britain during the last general election campaign in that country. In that campaign the people of Great Britain were placed in the position where the political parties were not discussing anything but where they stood in the most recently published poll. They were concerned that the Labour party was ahead by six points, that the Conservative party was catching up and was behind by three points, and so on. Each newspaper had its own poll which it claimed was more accurate than any other. The pages of the newspapers which should have covered the policies being put forward by the two major political parties in that country were, instead, filled with information about what those newspapers were determining to be the public feeling as a result of the polls they were carrying out. This is an unfortunate situation and I should not like to see it repeated in this country during the next election campaign.

What we should see on the pages of newspapers during an election campaign are the issues in the campaign, the policies of the various political parties and views as to the best political party to suit the needs of the country. We should not be told that one political party has 45 per cent of the support of the electorate whereas another political party has only 38 per cent as a result of its present image. Rather, the people should be able to make an educated determination of which political party is best and should be given the responsibility of running the country for the next four or five years.

I should like to conclude my remarks by putting on the record some of the things Peter Dempson, who was an associate editor of the Toronto Telegram prior to its demise, had to say about opinion polls:

Should public opinion polls be banned in Canada prior to a general election?

After the fiasco of the polls in the recent British election, an increasing number of Canadians now believe they should be. Indeed, many people are convinced that political sampling before, and during, an election campaign can do more harm than good.

Their main cricicism is that professional pollsters often confuse, exaggerate, influence and even deceive the public when their findings are published.

That is my opinion, Mr. Speaker. I ask hon. members to support this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested by the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) in connection with a bill to amend the Canada Elections Act passed in this House not more than eighteen months ago. Through his bill, the hon. member is simply seeking to prohibit the publication, before election day, of the results of public opinion polls conducted by various organizations in general or at election time.

This question was rather fully looked into when we considered the Elections Act, more particularly section 105, regarding what should or should not be published. The committee had concluded that to prohibit the publication of such results or polls would serve little purpose, mainly because we are living in a world of intercommunication, and that it would be extremely difficult to prevent any association from conducting polls and publishing the results in another country, and then from sending them back to this country at election time.

In my opinion, too much is made of such polls. In his comments, the hon. member suggested that they are aimed at altering election results.

On that point I cannot agree with him for the main reason that I think the Canadian electorate is a lot more mature when it comes to express its political opinion by vote or to be influenced by a poll.

The example given by the hon. member; namely the effect of a poll in the province of Quebec, with regard to the Parti Québecois during the last provincial election is at least inaccurate. I think we can all recall clearly the case of a poll result that was clearly reversed by public opinion, therefore such a claim cannot be supported on the basis that the result of a poll may alter an elector's vote.

Can advance poll results influence a vote? I would think that they can perhaps to a certain degree, in view of the percentage of credibility given to them by public opinion, since the effect of those results is after all, to inform. But I have seldom seen people who could be influenced by them. On the contrary, as most hon. members, I have seen poll results being in favour of a political party which, on the basis of those results stopped working while its opponents kept up their effort and succeeded in reversing the poll results or in showing that they were false.

I spoke a while ago of what I consider in a way a serious lack of confidence in the maturity of the Canadian electorate if we want the agencies specializing in gallup polls for now on to stop publishing incomplete although very detailed results.

Such results, in my opinion, are meant to inform provided they carry some credibility. If they inform the population as a whole, they may have a beneficial influence on public opinion.

We must realize that during an election campaign, even though our communications are excellent, it can still be interesting and important, strictly from the point of view of information, to know what may be happening in other parts of the country.

But I doubt that this could really change the opinion of the elector. I think the Canada Elections Act, which the mover of this bill intends to amend, cannot go so far in forbidding the outflow of information.

To my mind, publishing the results of a poll is giving out information. A while ago, my colleague mentioned that English newspapers were full of poll results which did not take into account the real political problems. I feel that instead of blaming the organizations which publish these results, he should blame the newspapers and the reporters for their lack of maturity in not giving the electors the required information.

I seriously believe that even if we wish to ensure in some way the secrecy of the vote and to avoid any external influence on the electors, we have just the same to provide him with valid information.

Since those media are now world wide, to forbid under a legislation the publication of polls would give more weight and significance to those polls whose results would anyway appear in foreign publications and would eventually be otherwise communicated. It would be extremely difficult, due to our various media, to prevent the people from getting acquainted with them.

The only thing to do is to explain the results of the polls to the people. In my opinion, the public have already shown that they are not taken by those results, that they accept them as valid information, and the tactics of men as well as politics are such that the political party which seems to be the favourite following a public poll tries to take advantage of it. Obviously! On the other hand, the party which may believe to have been wronged, strives harder to change public opinion.

One can mention the rather striking example of the forecast based on a Gallup poll showing that 3, 4, or 5 per cent of the Canadian voters would vote, for instance, for the Social Credit party at the next general election. In my opinion, no one would be surprised by such a forecast, neither would the Canadian voters as a whole be affected by it. Actually, I think that it would be a mere indication of the general trends, whereas anyone would still be at liberty to try and change public opinion.

I may add that even though the intent may be commendable, I cannot see really how any amendment to clause 105 of the Canada Elections Act, for instance, would entail the elimination of this type of forecasts, which by the way are given far more importance than they actually deserve. In other words, if these Gallup polls are of an informative nature, then I think that the information they supply is worthwhile and should be allowed publication.

I have faith at least more than the sponsor of this bill, in the sound maturity and the discriminating judgment of the Canadian people in regard to information. I do not, therefore, consider the information provided by Gallup polls more important than it actually is.

I fail to see in these circumstances how the proposed amendment to the Canada Elections Act can be effective and, above all, how we could put a stop to this kind of Gallup polls.

In conclusion, I must say that thanks to its maturity the Canadian people are in a position to cope with the problems raised by these Gallup polls or by any abusive interpretation of their findings.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) has had the opportunity of introducing this bill. It is very timely in view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will likely call an election within the next couple of weeks. Whether or not we will be faced with an election very shortly depends to some extent on the result of polls now being conducted. I am very interested in this matter and have a bill on the order paper similar to the bill of the hon. member. I have no objection to the taking of polls but I object to the results being published during an election campaign.

A poll taken recently may have some bearing on whether the Prime Minister will call an election soon. It was conducted by the Gallup poll organization and showed that approximately 40 per cent of the Canadian public was unable to say how it would vote if an election were held immediately. I suppose the result of that poll scares the pants off the government, just as it would if the figure applied to the opposition. This might mean that the Canada First party with some effort would be able to pick up that 40 per cent and form a government. I suppose this means the Prime Minister has been hedging his bets for the last two or three weeks.

We all know that very little is being done in the way of legislation and very little is on the order paper to be done. We are waiting for the completion of a poll being conducted by the Liberals the results of which will, hopefully, indicate to the Prime Minister whether or not to call an election. This in itself is an indication that polls do have some influence on election procedures.

I understand the Conservatives have conducted recently at least three polls with varying successful results, depending upon how you view them. There is a portion of the Canadian public conditioned to reading ads published by soap companies, automobile companies and other entrepreneurs of the nation, many of which suggest that their product is the best. They might say that their product will get a person's teeth whiter than any other toothpaste. They say they have conducted a survey which shows that 99 per cent of the school children who were asked indicated that Crest is the best toothpaste. Another one will say that Close-up ensures the whitest teeth and also freshens your breath. Another poll will indicate that Ultra Brite, to the extent of 99 per cent, has been proven to be the most successful whitener of one's teeth. A large number of people in our nation believe that one must be on the winning side and therefore must use Listerine although it tastes very bad, because tests and surveys have proven it to be the best.

• (1750)

Mr. McCutcheon: What about Scope?

Mr. Peters: Exactly the same claims are made for Scope. This, of course, is where the problem arises. It depends upon who takes the survey and the purpose for which it is taken.

Recently I prepared a questionnaire for the people in my riding concerning a number of problems. I was very careful in that survey not to weight it politically but, rather, to weight it in the direction in which I wanted the person to think. Dealing with the unemployment situation, the results received in several instances were not those I had anticipated; but after taking a second look at them I realized that in many cases I had put something into the question which I really did not intend. It could have been misinterpreted.

One question asked whether people were paying unemployment insurance and there was a follow-up question asking whether they had ever drawn unemployment insurance benefits. I was surprised to find there were people who had paid unemployment insurance for long periods but their answers had no relationship to questions involving the operation of the unemployment insurance fund. I decided the reason for this was that the employer was also paying unemployment insurance. I did not ask that this person concern himself with answering the questionnaire and therefore I did not anticipate the result I obtained.

I believe that much of the result comes from the way in which the question is asked. In many instances the questions asked are never published with the results of the survey, so one is never really sure to what the yes or no answer pertains or what the implication is in the series of questions asked. I believe anyone who has read the results of flamboyant polls which give a great deal of credit on one side or another should seriously consider whether this is not really a form of misadvertising. I suggest it does not always work exactly in the way one would expect.

In the recent election in Ontario a number of polls indicated that the New Democratic Party was in a position to form the government. The government gave a great deal of credit to this position. It is my opinion that the poll worked in the reverse manner because obviously a number of people would have liked to take a chance on a number of New Democrats but were not willing to take a chance on the New Democratic Party forming the government of Ontario. This poll produced a violent reaction which I am sure the pollsters had not contemplated.

The point I am making is that I believe all polls are subject to interpretation. However, I believe the publishing of the results of polls has an effect on an election. It has the effect not only of conveying information but also of producing a positive result. If members do not believe there is such a positive result, then most advertisers in the same field are throwing away their money by conducting polls and publishing the results. With the long experience of some of the companies I have mentioned in this field, I do not think they would be throwing away their money in this regard.

I believe polls should be taken for the purpose of assessing how the attitudes of people are developed. I think any advertising agency which is conducting an advertising campaign, political or otherwise, should be assessing the situation and I agree entirely with the hon. member who said that the results of polls should not be published at the time of an election because they are misleading. If they are effective at all, they are effective in creating a result which has nothing to do with the orderly process upon which we embark when democratically selling the ideas of a particular candidate and a particular political party. I hope the House will divide on this matter and will vote in favour of the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, my interest in this piece of legislation grew as I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) when he talked of the outcome of a provincial election in Quebec, which might have been caused precisely by the publication of the results of a poll taken a few days before the election. Well, I would not like to go over this election in Quebec, which everybody remembers and took place in April 1970.

On the other hand, I would like to be specific and make clear the causes of the defeat of the Parti Québécois which was mentioned earlier. These causes are completely foreign to the results of the poll taken during the days before the election. They have nothing to do with the figures which were reported, and, as somebody was saying very rightly, a political party which cannot overcome the results of such a poll does not deserve to be elected.

The Parti Québécois came up with several reasons to try and justify its defeat. They even claimed that news reports had made light of the inability of those people to form a government. They also said that the electoral map was badly divided in the province of Quebec, and that this favoured some parties against their own.

They also said that the Liberal party had spent ten times as much on its election campaign as had the Parti Québécois. I think that some joker summarized very briefly what happened in April 1970 when he said that the factor which caused the defeat of the Parti Québécois was the fact that too many Quebecers voted Liberal.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, in principle I support Bill C-170. However, I cannot support the "on again, off again" manner of the government in dealing with this legislation. Many moons ago it started out as a white paper, then it became Bill C-264 on September 13 of last year. Bill C-264, the original bill, contained the implementation date of May 1 of this year. I do not see any good reason why the original bill could not have been passed last September and any weaknesses in it or any amendments to it considered at a later date. But no, the government repeatedly refused to bring the bill before us for debate. The House will remember that they allowed it to die on the order paper. Now they have finally brought it back in the form of Bill C-170.

This bill contains no suggestion as to when it might be implemented. It comes back to us as an open-ended package which this "just society" government, this "friend of the poor" government will use as and when it sees fit as part of its noticeably accelerating process of voter manipulation.

Sir, allowing the original Bill C-264 to die on the order paper without being brought forward for debate, despite the pleas of the opposition, represents a new low in what I would call political cowardice, and with a fair degree of conniving too. First, this government became noted for its policy of governing by white paper. We all remember the deluge of white papers that was being spewed forth. Public opinion had to be tested on everything. You would almost swear it was a minority government, because it trod so gingerly, instead of a government that had been given a mammoth mandate in 1968. It had been given a large majority and I contend it was given that majority to govern.

We on this side of the House on many occasions have criticized the government for its cowardly reluctance to use the mandate that was given to it by the people, a mandate to govern by legislation and not by white paper. Somehow, members of the government appear to have taken our advice. But now they have sunk to a new low, not only with this bill but with others such as the competition bill. The government has tended to introduce legislation and then wait for reaction from the people and from the provincial governments. If the reaction is not completely favourable, the government in effect withdraws the legislation, as in the case of the original bill, by allowing it to die on the order paper. It is what is known as chickening-out.

What this country needs is a government with ability and courage. I think this government is lacking in the former and is almost completely devoid of the latter. There comes a point when any self-respecting government, out of common decency alone must realize that it can go only so far in using the people's own money in an attempt to manipulate their political support. I contend that there comes a point when this process becomes obscene, and I think that point has been reached in this particular case.

I wish to make a few specific remarks on a few points in the bill that strike me as making little sense. I have only to take my own riding of Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador to indicate what I mean. There is a stipulated figure at which a family is cut off from receiving any family allowance under the new proposal. Let us take the case of a family in the city of Montreal that has an income of $8,000 a year. For argument's sake, let us say that in that family there are six children, three below the age of 12 and three above the age of 12 but under 17. According to this bill, that family will receive a total family allowance cheque of $85 a month.

Let us take the case of a similar family in Labrador City, Wabush or Goose Bay in my riding. The family has six children, three below the age of 12 and three above the age of 12 but under 17. Let us say that family has an income of $10,000 a year. Compared with the family in Montreal which will receive $85 a month, the family in Labrador City will receive a family allowance cheque of $45 a month. There is a difference in the salaries of the two families, $8,000 in Montreal and $10,000 in Labrador City, but an agency of the government, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, on the basis of its studies agrees that $8,000 in Montreal is equal to the $10,000 income in Labrador City. Yet under the proposed new family allowance scheme the government will pay some $500 less per year to the family in Labrador City.

I contend that the DBS only skimmed the surface in dealing with the differential in the cost of living as between Labrador City and Montreal. In addition to everything else, winters in Labrador City are longer and as a result fuel costs are higher. It costs more to clothe and feed children in Labrador City. I repeat that the government's own agency agrees that $8,000 in Montreal is equal to $10,000 in Labrador City, yet the government says it will pay the family in Labrador City $500 a year less in family allowances than it will pay to the family in Montreal. Surely justice and common sense would dictate that this differential, when it is recognized by an agency of the government, ought to be recognized in the implementation of this bill.

There is another point that should be made. While I agree with the basic theory of the bill, in my opinion the scheme should be based on the income of the principal wage earner of the family. However imperfect the tax reform legislation which we passed, it contains measures to compensate working wives for day-care costs in respect of their children. The new Unemployment Insurance Act provides for maternity benefits to be paid to pregnant women while they are away from work to have their children. In contrast to this positive step, the family income security plan takes a negative step and actually penalizes working wives through its cut-off level which is based on gross family income rather than the income of the principal wage earner.

If a wife goes out to work to supplement the meagre salary of her husband, under the new proposal it is likely that the addition of her income will push the total family income above the cut-off level and she will therefore forfeit part or all of the family allowance. For a middle-class wife this may not be too important, but for families struggling to get out of poverty even the loss of the family allowance cheque will hurt. The family income security plan is a disincentive for working mothers who know that they will lose part or all of their allowance as a result of their initiative.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peddle: Cut-off levels should be based not on income after deductions but, rather, on gross income. In this way personal income tax exemptions and child-care deductions would have full power for working mothers. Cut-off levels could then be scaled to ensure that the less advantaged families benefit most from the family allowance. Speaking of cut-off levels, Mr. Speaker, you do not have to be an expert to observe the inconsistency of many government departments in their assessment of when families need government support. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) took into account the fact that it costs more to raise a child when he reaches the age of 12. I appreciate the wisdom of that. However, in the new Income Tax Act the former minister of finance did not recognize the fact that children are more expensive to raise, until they reach the age of 16.

There is here a breakdown in logic and communication. According to Bill C-170, the Minister of National Health and Welfare believes that a family with one child and a gross income of $4,500 a year or less should receive maximum assistance from his department, while the Department of Finance continues to impose a substantial tax on the same person. I think this points out the serious inconsistency of the government's views.

Mr. Alexander: Lack of communication.

Mr. Peddle: As I said at the outset, basically I agree with the proposal in Bill C-170, but I am going to make a very serious suggestion and I am pleased that the minister is in the House. I have had some unkind things to say about what I believe was the motivation for delaying this bill, but perhaps I have been too harsh. Perhaps I have been wrong.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Peddle: I will be the first to admit it if I am wrong. However, I suggest to the minister and to the government that they prove to the people of Canada that they have acted in good faith. Bill C-264 was read the first time on September 13, 1971, and the government promised that the new legislation would come into effect on May 1, 1972, just a few days from now. Let the government prove their good faith by making these payments due to the people who qualify under this program retroactive to May 1, 1972, no matter how long it will take to pass the legislation. I make that suggestion very seriously, Mr. Speaker. I know there will be objections to it. Government members will say, "What about the people who do not benefit? Will they be asked to pay it back?" But that is the government's problem and they have to live with it.

As in so many other cases, this government has raised the hopes of a large number of Canadian people. The minister said that some two million families would benefit and he promised that this legislation would be in effect on May 1 this year. I am calling upon the government now to make that promise good, no matter how long it takes to get the bill through the remainder of the legislative process, and to make the payments retroactive to May 1, 1972.

I think the government has vacillated on this program. It started out in May, 1970, with a white paper which was not acceptable: it came back on September 13, 1971, in the form of Bill C-264. Despite the pleas of the opposition, even in that extraordinary session of parliament I believe I am correct in saying that our party pleaded that the House stay and deal with it, but the government obviously did not want it passed. I do not now want to hear any suggestion that the government does not go along with this reasonable proposal that they should prove their good faith, nor do I want to hear any suggestion that the original bill was held up because of obstruction by the opposition. Such is not the fact. I maintain that the government had ulterior motives for holding back this legislation, and I call upon them to prove their good faith and make me a liar by implementing this bill as fast as possible and by making the payments to those who would benefit effective May 1 this year.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this all-important piece of legislation because of its historical basis in the Canadian social system. We in Canada have seen great progress made in the development of our system of social security, a system which is a basic right of Canadians. One need only recall the nineteenth century and its barbaric lack of laws for protecting the ordinary citizen, and compare that century with our society today, to recognize some of the fundamental changes that have been made. These changes did not come easily; some of them were fought hard for. The history of the development of our social security system goes back to 1926 when the Liberal government of the day was forced to introduce old age pensions across the board, mainly because of the pressure of a small minority in this House which forced the government to bring in such legislation.

Mr. Benjamin: They did it to save their necks.

Mr. Knight: At the time there was talk of governments not being able to afford this type of program. I did not hear this, of course, but the debates are recorded. It was argued that this would be too great an expense, that people had no right to such pensions, and so on. Now, Mr. Speaker, the old age pension is paid and it has been increased, although by minimal amounts.

In the developments that have led up to the family income security plan there have been other developments which have recognized the social rights of Canadians as members of productive units. These developments have helped in the productivity of the work force of the Canadian nation. After the Second World War, family allowances were paid to all Canadians with families, regardless of religion, race, creed or colour. The family allowance was paid as of right, as a commitment of the community to the youth of the nation. It was paid because we were committed to the idea of developing a society in which people could live with dignity and justice. The family allowance cheque was particularly significant in my family. I recall how important that cheque was for my mother. It helped her to take care of her children, to provide them with basic necessities as well as provide a little spending money.

Mr. Speaker, it may be said that the family allowance program was a move that enabled women to reach a certain plateau of equal rights in our society. The allowance enabled them to exercise responsibility in financial matters connected with the family. In the neighbourhood in which I grew up, I recall that family allowances meant a great deal to mothers no matter what was the basic income of the family. The cheque was important because it helped in the raising of children and maintaining the well-being of the family structure, because by using that allowance month after month the family taught the child the responsibility of handling money and spending it. I think that was important, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps members of cabinet who deal with major issues may not be very impressed with this argument and may not think it too important, yet it is important in our society because the allowance represents a protection, a social right enjoyed by all Canadian families.

The government has introduced its family income security plan. The name of the program sounds impressive. In the last few years I have learned that whatever legislation this government introduces, the name of the legislation is always impressive. It may be a grain income stabilization bill, an income supplement program for old age pensioners or, as now, the family income security plan. This legislation is based on the principle of selectivity, on the principle of reintroducing the means test as a means of checking on family income. It is not based on any concept of social right in our society. It is based on dividing our society into those who have and those who have not. It is based on an assumption that I call piecemeal Robin Hood-ism on the part of the Liberal government.

Piecemeal Robin Hood-ism may be defined as an attempt to take from the rich to give to the poor. It is like the wife of Louis XVI telling the people to eat cake. It has nothing to do with the productivity of our society and everyone's right to share in it. It is not based on any concept of social right. It is merely a piecemeal program under which the government, following the advice of its bureaucrats and technocrats, is out to sabotage the social security system of the Dominion of Canada. Of course, in the long run, this program will be dropped. This is the first step in that direction. In the meantime, the government wants to cushion the effect of removing the family allowance altogether and a selected group within our society is to remain sheltered.

It is important to consider what the government is doing by adhering to the principle of selectivity. In the neighbourhood in which I grew up, all families were paid the family allowance regardless of family income. The family that lived down the street got the allowance, just as did our family, and our positions were comparable. Under this proposal, the family down the street might get a cheque but my family might not. Clearly, this scheme will create stigmas within our society. It will become a method by which the local grocery store will note your low income by the size of your cheque.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are concerned not only with the means test, for the size of your family allowance cheque will tell everyone that you belong to a low income family. I might say that I am used to that. The amount of the cheque sent to your house will be directly related to the size of your income. It will let people know how much you earn and in that way will be as demeaning as the welfare cheque. Because it adheres to the principle of selectivity, the government will, in neighbourhoods like the one in which I grew up, create among those who receive family allowance cheques the sort of stigma that is attached to any welfare scheme.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member is talking about discrimination and how terrible it is. Is he for it or against it?

Mr. Knight: I hear the comments of the Tory member. His party claims to represent the small people. I remember what members of that party said in the income tax debate. No doubt we will hear from them in this debate. I remember the speeches Tory members have made on the labour code legislation. We shall see what that party does with the legislation before us.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. member should return to his written text and not ad lib.

Mr. Knight: Perhaps we shall also hear from the hon. member later. Mr. Speaker, one cannot overemphasize the basic importance of universality. The principle cannot be ignored. I should like, for a moment, to go beyond the principles involved in this legislation and talk about the principles of the plan itself, for one can see why this government disagrees with the party I represent on matters of principle.

Mr. Alexander: What principle?

Mr. Knight: There are so many differences of principle between us that I could spend the rest of the evening discussing them with the hon. member. I think the details of the plan are well worth examining. If you look at the details, you will find an even more incredible suggestion than the selectivity principle contained in the plan. A payment of $15 a month will be made for a child up to 11 years of age and $20 a month for a child between the age of 12 and 17. An income floor of $4,500 for a family with one child is stipulated. After that, $500 a year is allowed for each additional child in the family. Families with incomes above floor level will receive smaller amounts. With each $100 of income, the benefit decreases by 33 cents.

• (2040)

Let us consider what may well take place. A family with one child under 12 years of age, with a family income of up to $4,500, will receive $20. A family with an income of $6,000 will receive $15.05; $7,000, $11.75; $8,000, $8.45; $9,000, $5.15; and $10,000, $1.85, but it is not payable.

Mr. Alexander: That is the Liberal just society.

Mr. Knight: I quite agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). The figures I have quoted are the benefits received by a family with one child between the 12 and 17 years of age. I earlier stated that it was for a child under 12 years of age.

A family with two children under 12 years of age, with an income of $5,000, will receive a payment of $30; $6,000, $23.40; $7,000, $16.80; $8,000, $10.20; and $9,000, $3.60. A family with five children under 12 years of age, with an income of up to $6,500, will receive $75; $7,000, $66.75; $8,000, $50.25; $9,000, $33.75; $10,000, $17.25; and $11,000, 75 cents. Even that kind of framework will develop a number of weaknesses in the plan. It will take a Philadelphia lawyer, assisted by a number of lawyers such as the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to figure this out and explain it to the people of Assiniboia and the rest of Canada. I warn members of parliament and those who run for office here that they will have to work 24 hours a day for three, six or eight weeks to try and figure out this kind of program for people in their constituencies. I can see all kinds of problems arising strictly on the basis of the detail of the plan and the selectivity principle involved.

I wish to deal with a number of weaknesses in this plan such as applications and the responsibility of the people of Canada. If a person wants to be a beneficiary under this program he must apply, complete all the reports, do the filing, inform the government of changes of income year by year, give the age of the children and inform the government each time the size of the family changes. They must file in order to receive the benefit in the first place, and inform the government of any change of income in the family. For example, if the wife goes to work, this increases the income. If a man loses his job, it reduces the income. If there are two children, which is the size of the average family in Canada, each time their ages change the government must be informed.

What is the government's reasoning behind this? Do they want to get to the point of totally discrediting any kind of social security plan in Canada? Of families receiving partial benefits, 42 per cent will receive less than at present. The question of selectivity permeates this entire plan. It causes untold problems and burdens for the Canadian people. I want to cite three examples of what could happen under this plan as it now stands. A family with one child, living in Toronto or Vancouver with an income of $5,001, will no longer receive the baby bonus. According to the government, this family is rich. A family with two children under the age of ten years, living in Toronto with an income of $9,000, will receive $3.60 per month rather than the present $12 per month. If their income increases by $1, they will be cut off. Talk about the just society, Mr. Speaker! Let me give a third example. A family living in Toronto, with five children under 12 years of age, will receive 75 cents a month if their income is $11,000. If their income is higher, they will not receive anything. An incredible mess is created by this kind of program based on selectivity.

There are other matters that ought to be looked into. I am pleased to see that the rates announced by the minister can be changed. Let us look at those rates in terms of their face value. Based on the Canada standard health rules, the minimum expenses per child under 12 years of age, per month, are as follows: food, skim milk, 24 ounces per day, $20.50; protein, four ounces, hamburger and either two eggs or two ounces of cheese, $8.40; vegetables, carrots and waxed beans, $5; bread and margarine, whole wheat, four slices daily, $3; orange and other vitamin C juices, $3; soap and toothpaste, $1. This totals $27.90. Shelter, on the average, $15; clothing, $7.75; dentist, minimum care, $2.50. That causes one to chuckle. The monthly total is $53.16. These are outlined in the Canada standard health rules as minimum expenses per child under 12 years of age.

The government has introduced a selective program that both initially and in the long run will hurt those in the middle income bracket, people earning between $5,000 and $9,000 per year. Therefore, let us look at what the position will be when this piece of legislation is implemented. Let us look at some of the administrative jungle out of which the Canadian people will have to crawl or even shoot their way.

This legislation may very well have been introduced in an attempt to tackle Canada's unemployment problem. With unemployment running at around 6 per cent of the labour force, the government has decided to double the number of people employed in administering the program compared with the number who administer the present family allowance program. Where the government now employs some 730 people, under this program, according to an answer placed in Hansard on December 27, 1971, the number employed will rise to 1,477. I am willing to predict today that even if this program is implemented by next fall many, many more people will be required to figure out some of the problems created as a result of the selective nature of the program.

The cost to the department of this program alone will be about $13.7 million. This does not include court costs, the cost of the tax appeal board and other government agencies. These costs will mount because the government will ever be searching for those who do not properly fill in their applications for income security. There is one interesting sidelight to this, and it is that in order to get the plan before the public the government will have to undertake a massive advertising campaign from one end of the country to the other. Who will benefit from that? One has only to think of those who show up at Liberal party dinners in Toronto to suspect who will benefit.

Mr. Benjamin: Simpsons and Eatons.

Mr. Knight: Yes, but I do not think they will handle the advertising. That will be a job for Maclaren and Foster. If the government wants competely to botch up the program, they will turn over the advertising campaign to Information Canada. The only good that will come out of this selective program will be the benefits received by friends of the government, friends who are becoming fewer by the day.

There are seven distinct sets of circumstances in which applications under the plan must be filled out. First of all, one has to make an application. Then you must reapply if your income goes either up or down, if the number of your children changes, if there is a change in the age of the children, and so on. This is going to keep people employed continually in the department and I would suggest such complexity will not meet the needs of the Canadian people as a whole.

With this plan, the government is creating an immense bureaucratic and administrative jungle. Those of us who spent the Christmas recess in our ridings know that many people came to our doors to see us about the difficulties they have experienced under the Unemployment Insurance Act, with all the different matters within the act, all the exceptions to the rule, all the difficulties with the cards that the computer would not accept or would not send out. All winter we have handled case after case dealing with claims for unemployment insurance because the government has listened to technocrats and bureaucrats and decided that it had a nice little plan which it could apply selectively and with which the new computer would be able to deal.

As it turned out, Mr. Speaker, the computer was not able to deal with the plan and as a result claimants went for months without payment. Next fall I suspect we will see the same kind of process going on, except that every family in Canada will in one way or another become involved with the problems of this plan.

I should like to put some other matters on the record in relation to administrative difficulties connected with this bill. All applications for family allowance must be checked to determine the eligibility of the applicant. In the case of eligible applicants, benefit payments must be calculated on the family income and age of the children. In the case of non-eligible applicants, appeals and explanations must be handled. Statements disclosing a substantial increase or decrease in income must be processed, with appropriate adjustments made to benefits. Divorces, separations and marriages must be reported if family income is affected, and benefits must be adjusted. Adjustments must be made to benefits where estimated income differs significantly from actual income. Administrative machinery must be set up to recover benefits paid out to ineligible persons. Administrative machinery must be set up to detect frauds, including misrepresentation of income, misrepresentation of the number of children, misrepresentation of the age of children, failure to report income increases, failure to report deaths, marriages, and so on. Administrative machinery for liaison with the provinces will have to be established.

All this means an incredible jungle. I am sure that if the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) viewed this plan with a great deal of seriousness he would join the opposition's stand on this bill and repeat what he said about co-ops and credit unions. Then if this bill still went through, he would resign. I appeal to the commonsense of government members. I appeal to their reason; therefore, I may well fail in my appeal. But I want to tell the House that in view of the selective basis of this bill it will go down as a regressive step that has been taken in an important social welfare program in Canada.

Let me deal with the whole question of income as it is referred to in the bill. I wish to ask a number of questions which I hope the minister will answer. While travelling in my riding during the Easter recess a number of people drew my attention to their difficulties and concern about whether this plan is based on gross income. They were concerned about how it will affect the family farm. If we look at page 6 of Bill C-170, we find that the benefit will be $20 minus 33 cents for each full $100 of income by which the income of the child's family for the base calendar year exceeds $4,500 when the child is the only child in the family, or the aggregate of $4,500 and the amount obtained by multiplying the number of children in that family in excess of one by $500 when that child is not the only child in the family.

In each place reference is made to income without any description as to whether it is taxable, net or gross income. This is an important matter which ought to be explained very clearly during all stages of this bill, because it makes a great deal of difference to every farmer and small businessman in Canada in terms of income definition. Let me refer to page 2 of the bill, clause 2(2)(a) which states that the income of a person for a calendar year is his income for that year computed in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax Act applicable thereto. The clause goes on to provide that this is minus the amount of any death benefit paid to the taxpayer in that year under the Canada Pension Plan or any provincial pension plan as defined in the act. That part of the bill again refers to the Income Tax Act. I quote that paragraph of clause 2 as follows:

> (a) the income of a person for a calendar year is his income for that year computed in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax Act applicable thereto, minus the amount of any death benefit paid to him in that year under the Canada Pension Plan or a provincial pension plan as defined in that Act—

There is reference to the so-called income tax bill, that piece of reform passed last year which will long be remembered for its non-reform. Let us look at this matter in terms of the definition of income. On page 2 in division B, under computation of income we find that the income of a taxpayer for a taxation year for the purpose of this bill is his income for the year determined by the following rules, and then it goes on to provide that you must determine the aggregate of amounts each of which is the taxpayer's income for the year, other than a taxable capital gain from the disposition of a property, from a source inside or outside Canada, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, his income for the year from each office, employment, business and property.

If we turn to page 26 of that reform bill we find the following provision in paragraph (g):

> any amount received by the taxpayer in the year that was dependent upon the use of or production from property whether or not that amount was an instalment of the sale price of the property (except that an instalment of the sale price of agricultural land is not included by virtue of this paragraph)—

That is a further reference to definition of income. I see that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) is in the House. Perhaps he will take the opportunity to explain to the House in some detail the effect of the family income security plan in terms of whether it is based on over-all, net or gross income or taxable income.

We are faced with another difficulty because of the selectivity of this program and its over-all commitment to dividing Canadians into haves and have-nots. There are other aspects of this plan which make it obvious that someone in the government is not up to par. When I look at the plan and realize it is based on income, knowing that the income of people changes from year to year, I begin to wonder whether the government took a member of the task force on agriculture and put him with the group which drafted this income security plan. We have here the creation of selectivity in respect of a group of people, particularly the farmers in the west whose incomes are based on international markets over which they have no control, a transportation system over which they have little or no control, and prices over which they have no control.

The government is now telling these people that under the income security plan they must adjust their incomes for each year that it changes. A farmer's income can change from one year to the next by thousands of dollars, as can the income of a fisherman or a small businessman. I am not sure that this applies to the legal profession.

Mr. Gilbert: Take it from me, it can.

Mr. Knight: My colleague suggests that it can. What I am trying to get at is that there is great complexity in this legislation as a result of a simple matter of selectivity. The government sits idly back and will go to the people during the next federal election and tell them what it is doing for the poor. I suggest all the government is doing is erecting flagpoles in front of their homes and flying flags.

There is one thing about Liberalism in respect of legislation, and anyone who studies history will know this. It is that Liberalism is based on the philosophy of changing things a little bit here when it is too late, and a little bit there when it is too late. Liberals bring in certain kinds of social reform but they never get to the heart of the matter. They never tackle the problems of the minorities in our society and they never tackle the corporate industries in terms of proper taxation. They continue to protect the economic system from any kind of change that might benefit the Canadian people.

This program is intended to be based on a guaranteed income. It should be based on a net income for every citizen, rather than on a type of selectivity which lumps people in the position of haves and have-nots in comparison with that group in our society which has a great deal.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say a few words on Bill C-170. First of all, I must say that I am completely in favour of an increase of family allowances, as I have been for a long time. In fact, I have always wondered, each year, why successive governments did not increase the amount of those allowances or ever ventured to bring them into line with the cost of living.

We have seen all other pensions periodically increaded while governments never stopped to try to adjust these allowances, leaving them still at the same rate.

Today, an increase is being proposed. First we are told that they will be increased to $15 for children under 12 and to $20 for children aged 16 and 17. Upon reading the bill, it is clear that we are losing the very essence of these allowances, their universality. We will again be having selective allowances, to which I am opposed. It is enough that old age pensions be awarded on that basis, which is more costly than granting a $55 pension to all old people.

I believe that if we make the same mistake for family allowances there will be no end to payment of investigators throughout Canada. I suggest that it will cost the government more to finance all this bureaucracy, investigating about each child, in each family, each month about the parents salaries in order to check whether a child is getting the proper amount.

I wonder whether that is not one of the government's devices for creating employment. That is also what I figured when the guaranteed income for old people was brought forward. Everyone is taxed to give all old people $50, but it is evident that only about 40 per cent of the elderly get $55. However, it costs more in salaries to withhold this supplementary income from some 50 percent of the elderly. It would save the government money just to pay out the pension to all old people, even those who do not need it. At the end of the year they would just return it by way of taxes.

We shall have the same situation for family allowances. As in the case of old people, there will be discrimination applied to children.

That selective system which takes away from some people to give to others reminds me of a nursery of 50 children where milk would be taken from the bottle of the fatter baby and given to the leaner one. The measure is as ridiculous as that!

The child, if considered as a human being, is entitled, as a member of society, to social justice. If I want to be fair to ten children, I will not see them as coming from poor or rich families, but as human beings. And if the state wants to exercise justice and grant them an equitable social allowance, it should give to each of them the same amount.

Being rich or poor is the father's problem and not that of the child. As concerns social justice, it applies to the child. If some father is richer, let us forget about it because at the end of the year, the state will catch up with him through his income tax return. Let's not worry. First of all, let us be fair to the child, let us consider him as a full-fledged human being entitled to receive justice personally.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that if the universality factor of family allowances is abolished, this will destroy an undertaking that started several years ago. Since its inception, the present system has applied across the board. Without any consideration being given to the family income, the children under 10 receive $6 per month, and those 10 and over up to 16 receive $8 per month.

In the province of Quebec, the provincial government pays an additional $10 a month for children from 16 to 17 years of age inclusively who attend school. The province gets this amount back from the federal government. Again in the province of Quebec, the government also pays, in bi-yearly payments, the following amounts per year: for the first child, $30; for the second, $35; for the third, $40; for the fifth, $50; and for the sixth, $70. You have to add to those amounts $10 a year for each child from 10 to 16 years of age.

Mr. Speaker, it can be said of family allowances paid in the province of Quebec at present that they are universal, since they are paid for all children, whereas the new legislation provides for a selective method.

I think that many problems will arise in the calculation of allowances to be paid for those children. Moreover, the great number of bureaucrats needed may cost more than would the payment of $15 for each and every child. Besides, we will have to make sure that some family heads pay this amount back to the treasury, as is done at present. At the present time, family allowances are universal, and at the end of the year we pay back in income tax any overpayment received, but at least the child has the comfort of being able to say: I get my allowance. Once again this is the problem of the family head.

In this legislation, as is stipulated in subparagraphs (a), (b), and (c) of clause 6(1), there is a ceiling on family income, and whenever the family income exceeds this ceiling, allowances paid in respect of children are reduced, or sometimes abolished, depending on circumstances. According to the bill under consideration, the amounts of benefits ranging from $15 to $20 will be reduced to 33 cents per each $100 of income. As I said a while ago, it is interesting to examine a table of income to determine what a child will receive in relation to his parents' wages.

I have done some quick figuring in this connection. For example, if a family with one child earns $6,000, from that income will be deducted the maximum income of the mother and father which will make a difference of $1,500, that is a reduced benefit of $4.95. The child will therefore draw an allowance of $15 less $4.95, that is $10.05. If the parents have two children, the maximum amount is $4,500 plus $500, that is $5,000. The total amount of $6,000 less $5,000 gives $1,000 or 10 times a reduction of 33 cents that is $3.30. The child will therefore get $11.70.

In a family with four children, still drawing a $6,000 income, the child will get—I did not figure it out, but in any event it is easy to do so.

Mr. La Salle: It is hard to figure out!

Mr. Gauthier: It may be and it will be even more complicated in a little while.

In the case of a couple who earn $8,000, Mr. Speaker, and have one child the ceiling is $4,500; the allowance is $11.55. When there are two children, if the total salary is $10,000, the ceiling is $5,500 and the benefit is reduced by $18.15. We then realize what the situation is; then the act tells us that when the payment is less than $5, the child gets nothing, not even 15 cents per month.

This of course will be based on the revised salary of the father and mother, the salary made in the last year. If on the other hand the father's salary increases or decreases during the years, of course new inquiries and new calculations will be required to find out what each child will get. In Quebec, there are even families with ten children.

Imagine the calculations and the bureaucracy that will be required solely to control selective family allowances. One would think that the government is looking for Chinese puzzles. I really don't know whether the government is trying to create jobs or increase their number but by multiplying them it is also multiplying the headaches for everyone. It is also multiplying administrative costs, and the injustices towards every Canadian citizen. Without fail, all those inquiries will lead to injustices as is the case year in and year out with the old people.

If only we could have impartial and infallible inspectors. But that is impossible. They are human. We always tend to protect those we love more or punish a little those we love less, and then the tug of war starts. There lies the work of the member of a riding. If only selectivity did not exist, the member would have 50 per cent fewer problems or cases to solve. We should try to connect this with the inspector who has not done his duty, or has not done it properly, or perhaps has done it too well in some instances.

This whole issue stems here again, from those selective allowances that are provided for in this bill. When it was before the committee, I had a chance to read the briefs that were submitted, and I kept thinking: this government will certainly be under pressure and will agree with the recommendations contained in these briefs to the effect that in 80 per cent of cases, people feel that the government should make the allowances universal. That is why I am surprised, after having read so many briefs opposing this bill, that this government has stuck to its guns.

We are then going to keep on with our speeches for perhaps a day or two, but we will necessarily have to vote, and I am sure that this will not change anything in the bill. This bill was drafted by departmental officials who, I fear, do not know how to erase once in a while. They will not change anything in the bill. They stick to selectivity, and this we cannot accept. To give another idea of the protests, I can say that I have received 50 more letters. I wish to quote a few newspaper articles. The minister has probably read what they have to say about this selectivity. I quote:

> Strong opposition to the exclusion of 40 per cent of families from family allowances.
> Taking for granted that the child is a contribution to society much more than to the family, Les Organismes Familiaux Associés du Québec objected, in a statement of position published yesterday, to the elimination of 40 per cent of families from the family allowance plans as proposed respectively by the governments of Quebec and Ottawa.
> Through this statement, this group which represents tens of thousands of families in the province places so to speak the debate on this question in its true perspective, namely, the responsibility of the state to assume with the parents the financial burden of bringing up children tomorrow's adults.
> We must keep in mind that in Quebec two families out of five will be cut off next May 1st from the family allowances because of the selective approach adopted by both government levels; eligibility will be based on family income and on the number of children.
> Now, the family organizations do feel that this cutting off will mean "losing a right gained 25 years ago."

Those remarks were published in the newspaper Le Soleil on January 6, 1972. May I quote from another source which is not the least important one: the farmers' wives of the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area who met to protest against this bill, against the selective feature of this bill. They are not against the principle of the bill, for they approve of the increase, but they also advocate the universality of the allowances. This is the reason why the AFEAS, formerly known as the farmers' wives groups, will hold their convention in Jonquières on May 16. There was a preliminary meeting and I would like to quote from the report of that meeting. Here it is:

> During the past three months, the women of the Urban Committee of the AFEAS have asked the advice of many members in order to learn their views on the family allowances system.
> Most of the women questioned have stated that they did not approve the programs as introduced by the provincial and federal governments. They said that the allowance was withdrawn at a time where a child needed it most that is when he was undertaking higher studies. The women also suggested that an allowance should be granted from five years of age and raised according to the age of the child and the cost of living, because they said that their financial problems increased when the young people were entering high school.

The following was stated about a report on universality:

> A report submitted by the responsible members of the Urban Committee points out that the women questioned were in favour of an universal and taxable allowance on the entire family income. This formula, according to the report, would be the fairest way of giving to those who have little money and to take from those who have too much.
> The report adds that selectivity as applied to family allowances is a step more reminiscent of social welfare than of children's aid.
> The women consulted also opposed the way the government intended to increase the allowances after the fourth child if those 18 or over are excluded. When they reach that age, allowances will no longer be paid for them, although more money is needed for them for clothing, food, school fees and recreation costs, the report goes on to say.

On the subject of the responsibility incumbent on governments, it adds:

> Our governments have some responsibility toward the family. Parents do not bring up children for their own sake but for that of society. The betterment of family life should prevail over political advantage. So, those women believed that the above-mentioned legislation promoted a higher birth-rate among the people not so well off and a sharper fall in the birth-rate among those in the middle income bracket.
> Moreover, those women are asking that a survey be conducted among students aged 18 years or more on their financial assistance. The report suggests that this is inconsistent with the tax allowance for dependents. Those women also point out that governments will have to take income into account in connection with the poverty line.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted the House to be aware of this evidence. Surely the committee has heard quite a few of these representations but we can see that they have changed nothing. We still stand where we stood the day the bill was introduced and I am convinced that this situation will continue. We are going to debate and vote and nobody will dare criticize the government and force it to re-introduce the old family allowances formula and universality even though 80 per cent of the population is asking for it.

Once more, I wonder why the government is repeatedly bringing forward this selectivity concept which nobody wants. This is why I again urge the House to think it over before passing this legislation. As for those still in a position to influence the government, let them speak reason to it and let it be known that universality of family allowances is requested by most of our citizens.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like, in turn, to make some comments on this bill which is definitely deemed to be one of the most important pieces of legislation this Parliament should pass in the near future.

Of course, Bill C-170, providing for an increase of family allowances is accepted in principle by all members of this House and I think that the Canadian people look favourably upon the increase of these allowances.

Surely, it is not sufficient to merely criticize the government for the provisions of this bill. I think it is important to note that the tabling of this legislation has required a considerable period of time while we are well aware that thousands of households have long been awaiting an increase compatible with the cost of bringing up a child.

There is a so-called selectivity principle, but others favour universality. I think that there is a difference of opinion in this respect. It is my understanding that by tabling this legislation, the government has sought to increase the benefits for those who need them most and naturally to reduce those received by household heads who can easily provide for the upkeep of their children.

I listened to several speeches, and I have to respect the opinion of each and everyone. Personally, however, I would be tempted to favour selectivity, unlike others who maintain that the same allowance should be paid all over the country, and for every child.

I think it is a mistake to give too much importance to the payment being made to the child. In all fairness, we should, according to some members, give every child the same allowance. Certainly as far as this goes, this is valid reasoning, but we know very well that in practice it is not really the child who spends the money. The child certainly has a part in his parents' expenses, but we know very well that family allowances are in fact spent or administered by the family head.

I feel that under a selective plan, a low-income family will be able to receive an appreciable, if not sufficient, increase. From there, I think there was an attempt—and this is the way in which I understand this legislation—to narrow the gap between the big man and the little man, as they are commonly called.

For instance, a few years ago, we granted a national across the board salary increase of 6 per cent. On this basis, people said that in a just society you had to grant a 6 per cent increase to all, which, in my opinion, was extremely unfair, since the man who made $3,000 could only receive a $180 increase, while the man who made $20,000 got a $1,000 increase. I think that this widened the gap between the big man and the little man even further.

Now the proposed selective scheme leads me to think that we are heading for a readjustment in favour of the really under-privileged family, at least the family that needs it most.

I surely deplore the fact that a number of families will have to do without family allowances.

When members of a "cercle de fermières", for instance—a group of people who are not considered as high-salaried people—are against a selective program, I am surprised, because the farmers, considering their income, will surely not be at a disadvantage on account of a bill like this one. I rather believe that from $10,000 up, a number of families will have to do without their allowances.

We also know that two families out of five, in the province of Quebec, will lose their family allowances. However, we know full well that three out of five families need it that much more. To my mind, it is really a matter of redistribution amongst the most needy and I sincerely think that we are steadily progressing towards a just society by creating a more acceptable social climate.

I am tempted to support this bill because I believe in selectivity. We should have redistributed those allowances amongst the neediest a long time ago.

I am sorry that 40 per cent of all Canadian families will have to do without family allowances. On the other hand, I feel that the other 60 per cent will derive greater benefit, and they are the ones who need it most.

I am quite convinced that selectivity is better than universality. I think it is appropriate and I for one want to support it.

We know that the administrative costs of such a program will increase. To say that the complexity of these formulas would incite us to refrain from any action is a negative attitude. I realize that this will not be easy, that it will be complicated, but despite the complications we had with the new unemployment insurance benefits, I know also that Canadians were generally in favour of increasing these benefits.

I hope that the experience we had with unemployment insurance will benefit Parliament and that the government will be prepared to apply this formula. And I also think that such an experience will prompt it to make further preparation.

The minister has quoted a while ago figures about the administration costs, which are quite different from those given tonight, suggesting that the increased family allowance would be less than the additional administration costs.

I think the hon. members should not listen to such arguments. But then again, between doing nothing and doing something, even if it entails some difficulties, there is a difference. I know that any new formula raises problems, but I wanted to be positive. I recognize that there are difficulties and I urge the government to eliminate them as soon as possible.

It is understandable that the administration costs will be higher than they are now, due to an important change. But we must also consider the advantages and recognize them.

Nevertheless, I would remind the minister involved to review calculations. I admit that they are highly controversial. For those whose income is under $10,000 a year, taking into account a certain number of children, I believe it would be equitable to review the calculations. In fact, it must be recognized that for an average-size family, an income of $10,000 cannot be considered as excessive. I also feel that, taking the cost of living into consideration, those who have an income of $15,000 can more readily stand this deduction.

However, while remaining very positive, I should like to ask the minister responsible to review calculations. I hope that when we reach the committee stage recommendations will be submitted. I believe agencies will appear to make representations to the minister. I dare hope he will consider reviewing his figures and making the adjustments called for. This bill certainly warrants further amendment.

I suggest that the selectivity principle is quite justifiable and acceptable, and since it will be possible to make representations in committee and it is hoped that the government will reconsider some calculations, I think that the legislation before us has a great deal of merit. I hope that it will be implemented for the benefit of low-income families. We recognize that it is urgent to help them.

Before concluding my remarks, I should like to ask the minister to give substantial assistance to 18-year-olds to enable them to complete their studies. We know that from age 18, children have greater needs, as a high percentage of them are heading for universities or other institutions of higher learning. Should we not think seriously about a scheme to help them until completion of their studies?

We have recognized that at 18, a child attains his majority, but we also know that in fact, he remains a student until he is 22, 23, 24 and sometimes 25.

In fact, I wonder whether the government should not help him financially so that he could further his studies, even under a selective plan.

This would certainly contribute to the establishment of a social climate more appropriate and more encouraging for the children, thereby easing the burden of fathers who have much difficulty making ends meet.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be satisfied with these few remarks, as I hope I shall have the opportunity of rising on third reading to repeat that, although I agree with the spirit of this bill, I dare hope that the government will modify a number of figures in respect of people earning $10,000 or less.

I should also invite the government to consider net instead of gross income because, owing to a number of factors, gross income is often misleading. Therefore, I submit that we should consider net income first. With the co-operation of course of all hon. members, while accepting their very positive comments, we should have the opportunity of adopting this bill as soon as possible for the welfare of the families in distress and of granting them the additional allowances provided for under the bill before us.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate so that tomorrow, on behalf of my colleagues and on my own behalf, when I have completed my remarks or toward the end of my remarks I may move an amendment to the motion before the House. Since the recess for Easter, we have all had an opportunity to study this bill carefully and to appreciate the principles animating it better than we appreciated them before.

In our view, therefore, it is important to deal with the basic principles of the bill and some aspects of it, for what the minister has done in this legislation is to pervert the idea behind the principle of family allowances. He has suggested that he is using family allowances as an anti-poverty measure. This was never the purpose of family allowances when they were first introduced. That is not the philosophy behind payments of this sort. That was not the philosophy behind the idea when it was first presented in 1944-45, and it is the wrong philosophy with which to approach payments that are intended, basically, to assist families in bringing up their children with decency and security. This is not intended to be an anti-poverty measure. I shall in some detail point out tomorrow, when I come to the body of my remarks, that as an anti-poverty measure this is a shameful piece of tokenism which cannot accomplish anything in the field of poverty, either.

All those on the government side, the minister included, have naturally tried to put the best face on this bill while talking about the number of families that will be affected one way or another by it. It is always possible to say, when discussing bills like this, that 1¼ million families, or whatever the number will be, will receive more. When I hear that, the first question I ask myself and which I ask hon. members to ask themselves is, more than what? What the minister tries to get us excited about is that we will no longer pay $6 a month or $8 a month for helping to bring up a child. The payment, it is said, will become $15 or $20 a month, although I submit in most cases it will be $10, $11 or $9 a month. I will go into details tomorrow. At any rate, we are supposed to get excited about that kind of generosity. Well, Mr. Speaker, this bill is not generous, it is not thoughtful, it will not do the job and it is, as I have said, a perversion of the original idea.

What the minister said but was careful not to emphasize was that over one million families will not get anything under his plan. I should like the minister or anyone on the government side of the House to tell the people of Canada that there are one million rich families in this country which do not need any assistance to bring up their children in decency and security. In the minister's statement of March 24 there is a contradiction that I have not been able to figure out. I will mention it now as we approach ten o'clock. Perhaps the minister can enlighten us at some time. On page 1133 of Hansard, the left-hand column, the minister is reported as saying:

> Two and a half million families will receive benefits. Nine hundred thousand families will receive maximum benefits.

> Full benefit under FISP will go to 1,249,000 families—

I do not understand why there is so much difference between those two figures. In one statement the minister said that 900,000 families will receive maximum benefit and in the other that 1,249,000 families will receive the full benefit. The difference of 300,000 families is not a small figure. The differential of one-third as between the figure given on page 1133 and the figure on page 1134 of Hansard is pretty large and important. I do not know which figure is correct.

What the minister did not emphasize, and what I want to emphasize tonight particularly and again tomorrow, is that over one million families will not get any benefit under this bill. As I said, I challenge the minister to tell me and this House that there are one million rich families in this country.

With that, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me to call it ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL REVENUE—ISSUANCE OF INTERPRETATION BULLETIN CONCERNING DEDUCTIBILITY FROM TAXABLE INCOME OF MONEY PAID BY TORONTO "STAR" FOR "TELEGRAM" SUBSCRIPTION LISTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the last few years we have seen in Canada a growing monopoly of newspapers in our major centres. In the last few months we have seen that monopoly extended to one afternoon newspaper in the largest urban area of Canada, metropolitan Toronto. I think parliament and the people of Canada have not only the right but the duty to look carefully at the way in which that kind of monopoly has come about. It seems to me, on the basis of reports I have seen in newspapers and on the basis of the interpretation bulletin to which my questions today and the other day referred, that it is very likely that the public treasury will pay for the establishment of an afternoon newspaper monopoly in metropolitan Toronto. That is not what we ought to be doing; that is not what the government ought to be doing.

The first point that strikes me as odd is the coincidence of dates. According to reports, the deal between the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram was completed on September 15, 1971. It was announced publicly on September 18, 1971. On September 17, 1971, two days after the deal was completed and one day before it was publicly announced, the Department of National Revenue issued a bulletin. This clearly indicates that the Toronto Star will be able to deduct as a business expense the $10 million it paid for the subscribers list of the Toronto Telegram. That coincidence of dates is a very serious matter which I believe this Parliament ought to know about.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) used the adjective "pusillanimous". I say the minister made a less than heroic attempt to hide behind the income tax law in refusing to give information. I have not asked for information about the tax position of the Toronto Star! I am not interested in that. I am asking him to inform the House and the people of Canada about any correspondence between the Toronto Star and his department relating to information with respect to the possible application of the law.

I asked for information regarding conversations that may have been held by the minister and members of his department with anybody representing the Toronto Star, whether it is the publisher, Mr. Honderick, a member of the board of directors, the Hon. Walter Gordon or anybody else on behalf of the Star. That is not information relating to the Star's tax payments or tax liabilities. It is information regarding conversations and correspondence, using the word in the legal sense, by the department as to the application or possible application of laws and what might be done. It goes to the question of whether the department was requested, asked or pleaded with to issue some kind of interpretation bulletin such as was in fact issued on September 17 last.

During the course of the deal between the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram, I read in a newspaper report that the publisher of the Telegram believed that the money he was receiving for the subscribers list was a capital gain; it was payment for goodwill in the subscribers list. If the Department of National Revenue permits Mr. Bassett to have the $10 million as a capital gain, the public treasury will pay it both ways. If this is a capital gain to Mr. Bassett, it cannot be a business expense to the Toronto Star. If it is a business expense to the Toronto Star, it cannot be capital to Mr. Bassett. If the two work out as the newspaper report indicated, the public treasury will pay the part that the publisher of the Telegram would have had to pay if it were income, and will pay the part the Toronto Star would have had to pay if it were not able to deduct the $10 million as a business expense for the year.

What is it we are doing? All this is behaviour that facilitates the establishment of a monopoly in the largest afternoon newspaper market, and facilitates the loss of 1,200 jobs. The government would have been serving the welfare of this country a great deal better if instead of making possible these large tax concessions to powerful newspaper organizations it had used some of the public money to assist the Toronto Telegram to carry on so there would be some competition among newspapers in metropolitan Toronto and so that 1,200 Canadian jobs might have been retained. This would have been a service to this country. That is not in fact what has happened.

A month or two ago I raised in this House the question of the remission of $6 million in sales tax to Canadian Oil Sands Limited of Alberta, a subsidiary of the "poverty stricken", multi-national Sun Oil. We gave them a Christmas gift of $6 million. There is now the possibility that we are going to give a gift to a large, powerful newspaper corporation. Then we present to this House new legislation on family allowances which is meagre and shamefully inadequate. It is this kind of double standard that I object to, as well as the way the government carries on.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the best way I can respond to the hon. member's question is to begin by again placing on the record what I said in the House this afternoon. At that time I said that interpretation bulletin No. IT-33 was issued on September 19, 1971, as part of an ongoing program to make the public aware of the assessing policies of the department. It embodied a practice first set forth in departmental instructions in March, 1963, and in effect ever since. These instructions were based on several decisions of the Income Tax Appeal Board. I mentioned specifically the cases of John Blunt Publications Limited in 1951, appeal No. 292 in 1955, and Halliday Fuels Limited in 1960.

I can now add that since this afternoon I have been informed that work began on the preparation of this bulletin on December 14, 1970. The first draft of the bulletin was completed on January 5, 1971 and it contained in its present form the paragraph in which the word "subscribers" appears. I should also add that the department began issuing interpretation bulletins of this kind in 1970. I have been advised that they are not issued in respect of specific matters which the department may know could be brought to its attention for more formal consideration.

Let me conclude by saying that, as I said earlier, it is my understanding that the provisions of the Income Tax Act prevent me from giving the kind of information that the hon. member seeks. But I think it should be evident from the information that I have provided that the connection he has attempted to establish between the transaction in question and the issuing of the bulletin in question simply does not exist.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—PARTICIPATION WITH UNITED STATES IN STUDY ON POSSIBLE YEAR-ROUND OPERATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, like any maritimer I have a concern for the operations of the St. Lawrence Seaway. And like any Canadian I have a concern about how one can battle, if never successfully, the Canadian winter. Flying to Ottawa from Halifax in recent weeks, I have always watched whether the ice was clearing from the seaway and I gathered that the people operating the seaway are certainly having their problems with this winter.

A few days ago my attention was drawn to an article by Jeff Carruthers which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on March 14 last pointing up some experimentation that was proposed for the St. Lawrence Seaway system. I quote him as follows:

> Originally intended to be called The Year of the Gulf, the program as now envisioned is to stretch from this year through 1976, with peak scientific activity for 18 months between late 1973 and spring of 1975.
> The federal department of the environment, which is co-ordinating the project, is asking the federal treasury board for some $9 million for the project. A similar sum of money is to be obtained from existing budgets in participating government departments.
> Federal officials say that it is almost assured that the project will be approved as proposed.

The question that brings us to the sauce for the goose tonight is one that I directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), though I presume it could also have been directed to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). In any event, it raises some questions as to the amount of money which should be used on such experimentation to keep the seaway open for longer periods in the year.

Parliamentarians are already familiar with the report by the Ottawa firm of D. William Carr and Associates. It is suggested by that group that the debt should be restructured so that it would cover only those expenditures necessary for providing facilities to shipping. The seaway should then be required to repay only the interest on the capital debt, not the debt itself.

The report also says that Canada should move to increase tolls since this country is paying five-sixths of the investment costs of the seaway and covering six-sevenths of the waterway's deficits. It suggests that even with the 5 per cent annual increase over the next five years—and it argues that there should be nothing of a greater nature—the debt-ridden seaway would not become self-sustaining. The report suggests that if tolls were increased by 5 per cent per year for five years, seaway revenues would be kept abreast of the expected increase in costs, but such a toll increase would be insufficient to cover interest, operating and maintenance costs and seaway deficits would continue to mount, though at a slower rate. The report also suggests that if there are no toll increases, by 1985 the debt will have gone up to $1.6 billion, or three times what it is today. These are awesome figures. They are available in the Carr report.

My purpose in speaking this evening is to ask someone to reply on behalf of the minister and to find out just how far the government proposes to go with any experimentation. Will an attempt be made to balance the increased benefits of a longer season with increased tolls? Is that sort of balance to be kept? Perhaps the situation is to be left as much out of joint as it is now.

I come from a part of the country where transportation subsidies are quite common. When looking at transportation as a whole, I have adopted the philosophy that this is something which can never really pay its way. No matter what biased statements are made in this place, I do not think transportation as a whole in Canada will ever pay its way. I do not think it should have to pay its way if it helps to keep the country together or open up new horizons. If it serves the public in this way, then that service is sufficient in itself.

When I hear remarks made about subsidies to maritime transportation, particularly those made by people from central Canada, and knowing the amount of money being funnelled into the St. Lawrence Seaway, I am reminded of that old con game where a fellow makes a great deal about throwing coins into the bowl of a beggar, so much so that people do not notice that with the other hand he is engaged in a modern version of the Brinks robbery.

In any event, I have asked the questions and I hope the ministry will answer by stating exactly what is proposed in respect of experimentation in so far as the St. Lawrence Seaway is concerned.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): In replying to the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) I wish to express my appreciation for having an opportunity to put on the record the participation of Canadian officials in this very important matter.

This evening I can confirm the statement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to the hon. member on March 22. A request has not been received from the United States to contribute to their study concerning the subject of keeping the St. Lawrence Seaway open on a year-round basis. However, a study has been conducted for some time now by various federal officials from both within and without the Department of Transport, together with provincial representatives, to study the technical difficulties as well as the economic and environmental implications of an extended seaway season. United States representatives have attended these meetings as observers and Canadian observers have attended United States meetings.

It is assuring to note the co-operation which exists between our two countries on these important discussions. I have noted a number of items in the hon. member's speech which I will be pleased to bring to the attention of the minister who I am sure will want to consider them seriously.

INDUSTRY—CLOSING OF MCBEAN COLLIERY—PROVISION OF PENSIONS SIMILAR TO BENEFITS FOR DEVCO MINERS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) about his attitude in respect of pensions for the McBean miners in Thorburn, Nova Scotia, I was not trying to single out the minister for any partisan purposes but to take the opportunity once more to bring the issue of the problems involved in the closure of the McBean mine before this House. Had his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald), been in the House I would have questioned him also because he is the one to whom the final appeal was made by a delegation from Nova Scotia consisting of people from the United Mine Workers, the government of Nova Scotia and the miners themselves. However, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion is indirectly involved because the Devco operation is to some extent responsible for some of the administration of the McBean mine at Thorburn.

I am appealing tonight to the government, through the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, to once more consider the plight of the McBean mine and the miners and see if something constructive can be done even at this late date. I sincerely hope the government will take another look at the problem, because the need for coal exists in the area. A market is literally only a few miles away. The Nova Scotia Power Commission thermal plant can more than absorb this mine's total output. There are institutions and people in the area who need coal for heating and they are able to buy it, under the circumstances, at reduced rates. There are also institutions which depend on coal produced at the McBean mine who can ill-afford the cost of making other heating arrangements. However, this is a minor point because the skills of these miners, once they cease to be used, probably cannot be replaced if the mine is not kept in operation.

It is ironic in looking at the annual report of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources of a year ago to see the following statement which appears at page 73 under the heading "Phasing out of coal subventions":

> As a result of the improved economic situation in western Canada and the alternative programs instituted for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick federal subventions have been phased out and will be discontinued in 1970-71.

How ironic! The western coal mining industry is doing well. Therefore, we will conveniently discontinue the subventions and effectively cripple the eastern coal mining industry. I find this very ironic. However, before dealing with this situation any further I should like to raise the main issue I wish to discuss tonight. Assuming that this mine is in fact to be closed, what will be done to make certain that the miners affected will receive the type of retirement pension to which they are entitled? It seems to me it is self-evident that the government would not wish to promote discrimination among miners in one province in the same type of industry. It is bad enough to hear about discrimination in different parts of Canada, but here we have a situation in which the miners who are being administered through the Cape Breton Development Corporation are receiving pre-retirement pensions considerably greater than those scheduled to be given to the miners at the McBean mine.

It would seem to me, again, that the government, in order to be just in this case, must take several steps. It must do so immediately. It must undertake, in co-operation with the government of Nova Scotia, that the McBean colliery workers will receive exactly the same benefits as those received by their brethren in Cape Breton. It must immediately make an effort to see that the eligibility and age for the receipt of benefits is lowered. It must as soon as possible make the very best arrangements possible for high priority in respect of re-employment, with all necessary upgrading and on-the-job training.

This would only be pursuant to the policies undertaken by the then minister of energy, mines and resources some time ago. The former minister, on October 7 of last year, indicated that he would make every effort to assist in the endeavour to rehabilitate the remaining work force. He pointed out at that time that although there was, as he called it, a one time grant of $930,000 given to offset the financial losses incurred, as he said; "to the time when either the financial grant provided by Canada is exhausted or the work force employed at the McBean Mine has declined to the point where further operation of the mine is impractical," the intent of that original grant was to terminate the mining and assist in rehabilitating the work force. This was not completely accomplished and, therefore, he said: "I arranged for a second grant of $750,000."

Coincidentally, this grant came at a time when the Central Nova by-election was being contested approximately a year ago. It seems to me that at that time the government was full of largesse. They were going to do great things for Central Nova in general and for the McBean mine in particular. Unfortunately, we have seen little evidence of their good will since that time.

Without ending on a rancorous note, may I again appeal to the government to take another look at this important situation affecting 200 families and see what can be done, in the first instance, to maintain the working of this significant part of the Nova Scotia coal industry and, secondly, to make absolutely certain that there is no discrimination or unfairness in looking after the needs of the men if indeed their employment is forcibly terminated.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister I wish to say that the McBean mine is in no way connected with Devco. It is entirely a provincial responsibility. However, the minister would be happy to see that the hon. member's point of view is brought to the attention of the provincial government.

GRAIN

LONG-TERM TRANSPORTATION PLANS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the government's failure to make long-term grain transportation plans I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) and with the unanimous consent of the House, the following motion:

This House urges the government to take immediate action and use all powers and any necessary funds to establish and co-ordinate a modern grain-handling system that is capable of moving Canadian grain to export markets so that Canadian farmers can take advantage of world grain market opportunities as they arise.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Lisgar. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING VESSELS OPERATING IN CANADIAN WATERS TO BE EQUIPPED WITH RADIOTELEPHONES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-189, to amend the Canada Shipping Act (vessel bridge-to-bridge radiotelephone).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, this bill is part of a series being put forward by myself and the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos) to amend certain aspects of the Canada Shipping Act. It requires that all vessels in Canadian waters be tuned into and monitor a certain radio frequency to be designated by the Minister of Transport after consultation with his United States counterpart.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING ALL CIGARETTE ADVERTISING TO CONTAIN HEALTH WARNING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-190, to amend the Food and Drugs Act (cigarette advertising).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, which I thank the hon. member for Simcoe North for seconding, is to require by way of an amendment to the Food and Drugs Act that in future all cigarette advertising must contain within its text a health warning against the use of the product advertised.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON THE LAW

Question No. 4—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total cost of the National Conference on the Law, held in Ottawa February 1st to 4th, 1972?

2. How many persons registered to attend the conference?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): 1. While all of the accounts for the Conference have not yet been received, it is estimated that the National Conference on the Law will cost approximately $165,000.

2. Three hundred and sixty.

Questions

COMPARISON OF FUNCTIONS OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION CONSULTANTS AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION INTERVIEWERS

Question No. 19—Mr. Marshall:

What functions are filled by agency relations consultants in the Department of Manpower and Immigration and how do they differ from the functions of the interviewers who will assist claimants in the UIC office under the Claimant Assistance Program?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Agency Relations consultants of the Department of Manpower and Immigration are employed in the Department's Regional Offices, and are engaged in the development and maintainance of working relationships with other Federal and Provincial Departments, with Private Organizations and Professional Groups involved in the provision of vocational rehabilitation services to disadvantaged workers.

They provide advice to these Departments and Agencies on the use of the services and programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and they coordinate plans for the development of cooperative efforts leading to increase employability of disadvantaged clients of Canada Manpower Centres.

These programs and services may be implemented through such instruments as the Canada Assistance Plan, Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Agreements, or in cooperation with private and voluntary organizations such as The Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded, and the Canadian Hearing Society.

These consultants also provide advice and guidance to Canada Manpower Centres in the delivery of Manpower Services to disadvantaged clients. This includes the development of working arrangements with appropriate public or private agencies for the referral of such clients in order to receive rehabilitation services leading to placement in employment.

Under the Claimant Assistance Program of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Guidance Officers at each District Office are required to establish and maintain close liaison with job placement, job training, and social development agencies operated by different levels of government and by public organizations within their respective areas, so that referral of claimants may be made to the appropriate agency based on mutually acceptable criteria.

*PER CAPITA COST OF HEALTH CARE

Question No. 78—Mr. Rynard:

1. What was the per capita cost of health care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

2. What was the per capita cost of hospital care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

3. What was the per capita cost of medical care for each province for the period January 1, 1969, to January 1, 1970?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. The per capita cost of health care for January 1, 1969 to January 1, 1970, includes: mental, tuberculosis and non-shareable hospital care expenditures, non-shareable personal health care, health administration, public health and general health expenditures.

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Speaker, as the answer is rather lengthy I wonder whether the rest of it might appear in Hansard as having been read?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The balance of the answer follows.]

Excludes capital expenditures

Province	Per Capita Cost
Newfoundland	124.31
Prince Edward Island	123.88
Nova Scotia	158.17
New Brunswick	151.05
Quebec	172.87

Manitoba	178.05
Saskatchewan	163.15
Alberta	196.80
British Columbia	185.62
Yukon and Northewest Territories	128.50

2. The current estimated per capita cost of in-patient hospital services for each province for the period January 1, 1969 to January 1, 1970 is as follows:

Province	Per Capita Cost
Newfoundland	58.79
Prince Edward Island	52.12
Nova Scotia	70.41
New Brunswick	73.36
Quebec	88.55

Alberta	81.54
British Columbia	72.81
Yukon Territory	68.66
Northwest Territories	79.38

3. The Medical Care Program operates on a fiscal year basis from April 1 to March 31. As a result, precise per capita cost of insured services are available on a fiscal year basis only. For the fiscal year 1969-70 the medical care per capita cost of insured services by province is as follows:

Province	Per Capita Cost
Newfoundland	28.84
Prince Edward Island	16.69*
Nova Scotia	40.40
New Brunswick	13.65*
Quebec	76.71*
Ontario	60.33
Manitoba	52.87
Saskatchewan	36.95

Alberta	51.46
British Columbia	57.49
Yukon Territory	—
Northwest Territories	—

*As the provinces joined the Medical Care plan during the year, their cost of insured services does not represent a full 12-month per capita cost.

STATISTICS CANADA—NAMES OF EMPLOYEES EMPLOYED IN ABITIBI CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 91—Mr. Laprise:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons employed by Statistics Canada or other government agencies to determine the number of unemployed people in the constituency of Abitibi?

2. How many persons were consulted for each sampling?

3. What salary was paid to each such person?

4. Are any travel expenses paid to such employees apart from the regular salaries paid to employees of Statistics Canada or other government agencies?

[Translation]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. Statistics Canada employs Mr. Denis Veillette, 440 Pioneer Avenue, P.O. Box 2058, Malartic, Quebec, who was hired in April 1965 to interview people for the Labour Force Survey in the constituency of Abitibi.

2. The interviewer's assignment for the Labour Force Survey averages thirty-four households.

3. Mr. Denis Veillette currently receives $1.92 per hour. (February 29, 1972).

4. He is paid thirteen cents per mile for miles travelled in his automobile while completing his assignments. (In accordance with travel regulations, travel expenses are paid when prior authorization has been given.)

BORDEN-CAPE TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE

Question No. 195—Mr. Macquarrie:

Are there any plans for construction of a new ferry or ferries for the Borden-Cape Tormentine service and, if so (a) when is construction to begin (b) what is the cost and capacity of any ship or ships planned for this service?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No, there are no plans for construction of a new ferry for the Borden-Cape Tormentine service at the present time.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Question No. 231—Mr. McCutcheon:

1. For each year since the inception of the Canada Pension Plan (a) how much money has been paid into it (b) how much money has been paid out of it (c) what has been the total cost of administration?

2. How many persons in Canada are in receipt of pensions of less than $20 per month under the Canada Pension Plan and what is the total cost of administration for these pensions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Since the Canada Pension Plan is a partially funded social insurance plan, contributions received together with interest earned, will exceed benefits payment during the early years of the plan. Full retirement benefits are being reached in stages over a ten year transition period. Survivors benefits did not become payable until the third year of the operation of the plan. Disability benefits did not become payable until the fifth year. Income received by the Fund will come into balance with benefit payments sometime in the 1980's after which the Fund will steadily decline.

Year	(A) Contributions paid into C.C.P. and Interests on Investments and other revenue	(B) Cost of Benefit Payments	(C) Cost of Administration
1966.....	$ 536,243,606.78	$ NIL	$ 6,003,805.76
1967.....	661,134,034.97	611,909.03	9,772,151.87
1968.....	765,341,849.79	10,415,176.44	14,201,738.07

1971.....	1,076,403,913.77	128,732,461.32	21,153,239.99

2. (a) As of December 31, 1971: 91,524. (b) Our records do not isolate the specific costs of administration of pensions on the basis of monthly amounts such as those under $20. However, the administration costs outlined above include the costs of administration of all pensions in pay, as well as the cost of determining the non-eligibility of applications submitted by persons who have not met the eligibility requirements to receive a pension and whose applications have not been approved for payment. They also include the costs of collecting contributions from some seven million contributors and maintaining their record of earnings.

AGREEMENTS WITH OTHER COUNTRIES RELATING TO SERVICES SUPPLIED FOR WEATHER REPORTS

Question No. 251—Mr. Robinson:

Are there any agreements between Canada and the United States or any other countries relating to joint services supplied for weather reports, etc., which emanate from Canada and, if so, what amount is paid for such services by (a) the United States (b) other countries?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): There are no formal agreements between Canada and the United States or any other country. However, there is a free exchange of weather data among most countries of the world. This exchange is carried out in conformity with the purposes of the World Meteorological Organization. Canada is one of the 136 member states of WMO.

Questions

OPERATION COMPULEX

Question No. 257—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise which profession or professions will be able to utilize data banks as a result of the pilot study Compulex?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The objective of Operation Compulex is to determine to what extent modern technology can be used to improve a lawyer's information handling capabilities. Any recommendations made by the Study would relate to data banks of legal information. Such banks would be of interest mainly to members of the legal profession.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO DAHOMEY

Question No. 270—Mr. Robinson:

What contribution, if any, has Canada made to Dahomey (a) directly (b) through the African Development Bank and is Canada contemplating any further assistance to Dahomey?

Hon. Question No. 353—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Will the Postmaster General give favourable consideration to taking the necessary steps now to bring about the issuance of a stamp later this year to commemorate the 25th Wedding Anniversary of Her Gracious Majesty The Queen and HRH The Prince Philip?

Questions

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the proposal is under consideration.

FORT AMHERST NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK

Question No. 363—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When was Fort Amherst National Historical Park established?

2. In each of the succeeding fiscal years, what was the amount of money expended upon this Park?

3. What plans are envisaged for restoration of the original fort?

4. What historians, archaeologists, architects or engineers have studied or surveyed the site?

5. Apart from a visitor centre, what other improvements or additions to the park are in contemplation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. February 2, 1967.

2. 1967-68, $38,249; 1968-69, $39,737; 1969-70, $68,612; 1970-71, $40,823; 1971-72 (to Feb. 19, 1972), $59,173.

3. Restoration or any form of reconstruction of the original fort is not possible as the physical remains are scanty and archaeological investigation suggests that the site had been stripped shortly after the fort was abandoned in 1775.

4. Mr. Brock Hornby then a staff historian with this Department and Mr. John Rick, than a staff archaeologist with this Department.

5. Improvements to picnicking facilities, parking areas, installation of an instructive display in the visitors centre, and ground interpretive signs are contemplated.

COST OF HYDROFOIL HMCS BRAS D'OR

Question No. 370—Mr. MacRae:

1. What was the total cost of the hydrofoil HMCS Bras d'Or project?

2. What is the present status of this project?

Mr. J. R. Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. The cost has been $51,722,000.

2. As announced on November 2, 1971, the hydrofoil, HMCS Bras d'Or, has been laid up for a five-year period because a reassessment of Maritime Command's requirements has scaled down its priority. However, research into hydrofoils will be continued by the Defense Department, and the Bras d'Or could be reactivated at any time should circumstances alter. For more detail, see Hansard for Tuesday, November 2, 1971, p. 9239.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): The French version of "Native Trees of Canada" (1970 edition) is still under preparation; the government intends to publish it as soon as possible.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION LOANS

Question No. 402—Mr. Rowland:

1. What percentage of farmers having loans with the Farm Credit Corporation have been unable to meet their obligations to the Corporation during the past two years?

2. Of those farmers who have successfully met their obligations, what percentage have been forced to borrow money from other sources in order to make their payments to the Farm Credit Corporation?

3. If the information requested in part 2 is not now available, is any attempt being made by the Farm Credit Corporation or any other government department or agency to obtain such information?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): The Farm Credit Corporation advises as follows: 1. The percentage of all borrowers in arrears increased from 6.4 per cent in 1968 to 9.9 per cent in 1969 and to 15.1 per cent in 1970.

2. Information not available.

3. No. The Corporation does not believe it should, nor does it have the power to, require borrowers to declare the source of funds with which they make their payments.

PEI—DEVELOPMENT OF SECOND NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 433—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has the Government of Canada received any requests from the Government of Prince Edward Island for the development of a second national park in that Province and, if so (a) what has been the response (b) what share of the cost of land acquisition will the government make to such a park?

2. Is land being added to the existing Prince Edward Island National Park and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what is the location and purpose of each parcel of land to be acquired?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) Joint negotiations between the Governments of Prince Edward Island and Canada are continuing on the proposed East Point National Park. The Government of Canada, represented by the National and Historic Parks Branch is most anxious to see a National Park established in the East Point Area because of its scenic and recreational attraction and biological significance.

(b) Cost sharing arrangements are now the subject of discussion. On previous occasions a fifty-fifty cost sharing has been utilized where lands have abutted on shorelines or coastlines.

2. (a) Land is now being acquired relative to the long term development of Prince Edward Island National Park. Owing to potential land speculation it is not considered to be in the public interest to disclose the land acquisition program in specific terms.

(b) Planning studies are being conducted at the present time by the National and Historic Parks Branch as the basis for a park development concept. Until the concept is completed the specific purposes of each sub-area cannot be indicated. However in keeping with National Park policies the uses will be recreational and conservational in character or geared to serving these priority uses.

ACQUISITION OF TROPICAL PLANTS FOR DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENT BUILDING

Question No. 462—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Were tropical plants acquired for the new Department of the Environment building in Hull and, if so, what was the cost of acquiring these plants?

2. Were any or all of these plants damaged or destroyed due to inadequate heating in the building and, if so, what was the cost of such plants?

3. Have the plants which were damaged or destroyed been replaced or have replacements been ordered and, if so, what will be the cost of replacing such plants?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): 1. Tropical plants have been acquired for the Department of the Environment Building in Hull at a cost of $30,244.50.

2. None of these plants were damaged or destroyed due to inadequate heating in the building.

3. See two above.

OIL EXPLORATION PERMITS

Question No. 322—Mr. Douglas:

1. How many oil exploration permits were issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources during 1971 covering areas of the coastal waters on the Pacific coast?

2. How many oil exploration permits on the Pacific coast were outstanding as of March 1, 1972?

3. What were the names and addresses of the companies granted these permits, on what dates were they issued and what is the area and the location covered by each permit?

4. What permits, if any, have been revoked since January 1, 1972?

Return tabled.

Motions for Papers

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PAY AND ALLOWANCE SCALE FOR ARMED FORCES

Question No. 380—Mr. MacRae:

What is the pay and allowances scale for all ranks of the Armed Forces?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 8, 36, 38 and 41.

COPY OF STUDY BY SUMMEROUR AND ASSOCIATES INC. REGARDING "ANALYSIS OF THE MANPOWER UTILIZATION OF THE MANITOBA GARMENT INDUSTRY"

Motion No. 8—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by Summerour and Associates Inc., Atlanta, Georgia, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis of the Manpower Utilization of the Manitoba Garment Industry".

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as advised in the last session, the material requested is a confidential report prepared by a firm of private consultants on the understanding that it would be available only to the department and the private sponsors. I regret that it cannot be produced and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, since I cannot accept the government's criteria about what should be kept confidential I cannot agree to withdraw the motion.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF REPORT BY GOVERNMENT RELATING TO DEUTERIUM OF CANADA LIMITED

Motion No. 36—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of any report or reports prepared by or for the government recommending that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited assume responsibility for the reconstruction and operation of the Deuterium of Canada Limited heavy water production plant at Glace Bay, N.S.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the reports were of a confidential nature prepared for internal use and not for the purpose of being made public. I would therefore request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Hellyer: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE RECEIVED BY PRIME MINISTER FEBRUARY 21-29, 1972 CONCERNING STRIKE OF MONTREAL WORKERS

Motion No. 38—Mr. Hellyer:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all telegrams or letters received by the Prime Minister or his office from February 21 to February 29, 1972, concerning the strike of outside workers at Montreal or the strike of federal electronic technicians.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, correspondence addressed to the Prime Minister is not readily retrievable by subject only by name of correspondent. However, accurate statistics analysing the mail are available and we could pass those to the hon. member if he is agreeable under the circumstances that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most ridiculous excuses I have heard in 20 years of parliamentary life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously there can be no debate now. Either the motion is transferred for debate or the question is put.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE CREATED TO DEAL WITH PROGRAM TO HELP SMALL FARMS IN CANADA

Motion No. 41—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the final report of the Technical Committee created by the Minister of Agriculture to deal with the development of a national program to help the small farms in Canada as well as any documents, letters or communications related to the Technical Committee.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, in regard to notices of motions Nos. 25 and 26, the first of which has to do with the production of papers concerning the CNR pension plan, in view of the tremendous amount of interest in this subject can the government say whether or not this material will be produced?

Mr. Jerome: I will look into that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order may I say that I have been waiting since we came back from the Easter recess to put an important question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). He was not here last Thursday or on Monday, both of which were his roster days. Again today he is not here. Can we be told whether he will be here and, if not, can we be told who will be speaking for him?

Mr. Hees: Let's have an answer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, doesn't anyone know who the acting minister is?

Mr. Hees: No, they don't know who he is.

Mr. Speaker: I would judge that the matter is in the process of being considered at the moment. For the time being the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Lisgar.

GRAIN

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO INCREASE MOVEMENT FOR EXPORT—PAYMENT OF ADDITIONAL EXPENSE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Since Canada's grain exports are still some 25 million bushels behind our target, what is the exact extent, if any, of the contribution to be made by the federal government in an all-out effort to move the backlog of export grain which, as I said before, still stands at some 25 million bushels below the target?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it would take me a long time to outline all the steps we are taking to improve our export capacity. While we may be behind our target it is, of course, a very large target indeed because we are presently about 70 million bushels ahead of last year's pace when we set an all-time export record.

Mr. Murta: Since the government has done nothing but look at short-term plans for the movement of grain and this, of course, involves money, can the minister tell us what the government is prepared to do about the additional expense that will be incurred ultimately by the prairie farmers in moving grain? I am thinking of the demurrage charges on boats, the extra cost of shipping grain that will be incurred and the use of inland terminals.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, we are prepared to do quite a number of things on those fronts and are discussing the use of the inland terminals, of which use is now being made as railway cars are available. I would remind the hon. member about such things as movement during the winter by unit train of grain from Thunder Bay to the eastern ports so that an additional ten million bushels of grain could be moved into export at the expense of the federal government.

Mr. Murta: In view of the additional expense that will be involved in moving the backlog of grain and trying to catch up on the backlog, can the minister tell the House who in effect will pay? Who is going to foot the bill? Will it be the Canadian farmers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I quarrel with the hon. member's definition of backlog in view of the record movement of grain that is going on.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Lang: Naturally a great number of regular expenditures are involved in expanding our transportation system. Now that we have people gradually believing that we are going to export at these levels with a vigorous export effort in the years to come, we can expect the transportation and handling system to respond.

PAYMENT OF SHIP DEMURRAGE CHARGES BY GOVERNMENT RATHER THAN FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I am not going to ask about backlogs, Mr. Speaker. The demurrage charges on the ships that have been waiting as a result of the government's failure to get the grain moving and amounting to an estimated $7 million to $10 million, is that amount to be paid by the government of Canada rather than being charged to the farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion that the demurrage results from any failure on the part of the government is totally misplaced. If the right hon. member would care to ask the Wheat Board about the matter, for instance, they would tell him very clearly that the kind of winter we had resulted in this problem. We have done a great number of things to see to it that the grain is moving at the present time. There are now only 11 ships waiting in Vancouver—

Mr. Hees: Just answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Even the minister could not memorize that fairy tale, Mr. Speaker, and had to read it. Is that $7 million to $10 million to be charged to the farmers? Who will be responsible? That is what I want to know and the farmers have a right to know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I have made clear many times before, that kind of cost may be considered an ordinary cost and risk of doing business. While we have been spending millions and millions of dollars to improve the lot of the farmer both directly in regard to his income and in the operation of the system, we do not propose to do so for any particular feature of the operation of his farm.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMITMENT OF ADDITIONAL ROLLING STOCK AND MOTIVE POWER BY RAILWAYS FOR MOVEMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister who is quoted in the Free Press as saying that he is very optimistic about the good will and determination of all—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might like to ask the question directly rather than quote the newspaper report to which he has just referred.

Mr. Gleave: Can the minister tell the House whether the railroads have put into effect their undertaking to provide both additional rolling stock and motive power to move grain? Is this now taking place?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the railroads are now acquiring additional capacity and stock to handle our record movement of grain, and all other parts of the system to my knowledge are trying to do their best to react to the challenge which faces us. I do not think it would do any good to comment at any particular point in time on whether I think one person or another in the whole group involved could do better.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They could not do worse than the government has done.

Mr. Gleave: The minister, of course, is entitled to his opinion as to what will or will not do good, but the farmers on the Prairies are entitled to information. Specifically, has the CPR committed rolling stock and motive power for moving grain and, if so, in what quantity?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I will have so see if I can obtain that kind of statistical information or whether my colleague, the Minister of Transport, can obtain it. I know that the railways are in the process of obtaining more of both types of equipment. What exactly they have at this time I do not know.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very large number of foreclosures, involuntary land sales and forced sales by farmers who are being compelled to leave the land because of the bankrupt policies of this government, does the government intend to take steps to relieve against these conditions, either by amendments to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act or in other ways, so that farmers can be allowed to stay on the land until there is a new government to deal with the problems?

SUGGESTED USE OF NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD TERMINAL, VANCOUVER, TO HANDLE SPECIALTY CROPS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Since the National Harbours Board Terminal at Vancouver is still sitting empty after three or more years and since it is in need of repair, can the minister advise what response he has made to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce's telegram urging, on the advice of experts in the trade, that that terminal be immediately used as a specialty terminal to handle specialty crops in order to increase the throughput of wheat and barley in the other, larger terminals?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, that particular elevator is constantly being examined in light of the costs involved and alternative facilities which are available. Further examinations of its possible use are going on at the present time. Naturally the over-all objective is to move the maximum amount of grain but also at the lowest possible cost, and the use of the terminal is being examined in that light.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At least 15 hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries. We would have three question periods to allow all those supplementaries. We will return to this important subject in a moment. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse.

HIGHWAYS

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO CONSTRUCTION OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY BETWEEN MONTMAGNY AND NEW BRUNSWICK BORDER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

While travelling, in 1971, between Montmagny and the New Brunswick border, we saw a few road signs stating that the federal government was contributing to the Trans-Canada Highway development.

May I ask the minister whether the agreement in force until December 31, 1970, was renewed for 1971 and, if so, did the government really contribute to the construction of that road in 1971?

Mr. Speaker: I think that this kind of question should be put on the order paper. However, if the minister has any information available on this matter, he may answer the hon. member.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if this is a federal-provincial agreement on highway development in the province of Quebec, it does not come under the jurisdiction of my department.

Mr. Speaker: It seems the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) would like to ask a supplementary to the question he asked a moment ago.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order.

Further to the answer the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) has just given to the question I asked him, I would merely like to say that my question deals with question No. 252 I put on the order paper and which has been answered on Monday last, in writing, by the Minister of Public Works. Since this answer was dealing precisely with the works I mentioned in the question I just asked, I think the minister did not understand it or else that we were not talking about the same matter. In any event, I would like to get an answer to my question.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I just said. If it is a provincial road being built under a federal-provincial agreement or program, this agreement does not come within the purview of my department. The hon. member should express himself more clearly or else get in touch with me after the question period.

GRAIN

EXPORT MOVEMENT—RAILWAY PROPOSAL RESPECTING COST OF LEASING ROLLING STOCK—ELEVATOR COMPANIES' REQUEST CONCERNING ADDITIONAL COST OF SIX-DAY WORK WEEK

Mr. Stanley Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. At the recent meeting he held with all organizations interested in the movement of grain, did the railways lay a proposal before him involving certain expenditures of money which would be necessary in order to provide rolling stock by way of lease? Also, have the elevator companies requested, because of the proposal that they work a six-day week which would entail additional cost, that the additional cost be borne by the government and not by the elevators and, consequently, the producers themselves?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the latter part of the question is no. The answer to the former part is that there were discussions along these lines concerning additional equipment and whose responsibility it might be.

Mr. Korchinski: In those discussions did the railways assure the minister, even at this late date when there are congested elevators, that they will be sending boxcars to blocked elevators in order that many producers who have rape may take advantage of the increased price and perhaps provide an inducement to them to stay in that crop?

• (1430)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the railways' commitment was in terms of over-all use of equipment to move grain. The actual location of the cars depends on the operation of the block system, the Wheat Board and the elevator companies, but the objective is certainly to place the cars wherever elevators are congested so that the grain may move.

STORAGE OF CLEANED WHEAT FOR SHIPMENT IN JANUARY AND FEBRUARY, 1973

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It relates to the serious problem introduced by the hon. member for Lisgar. In view of the serious difficulties we have had in the past year in moving our grain into market position, is the government making any preparations for next November and December as to the piling in a surge storage of clean, ready to move wheat for shipment in January and February 1973?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the possibility and how to achieve it is among the matters being discussed.

TRANSPORT

SHORTAGE OF RAILWAY CARS FOR MOVING BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, we are sure that the two great national railway systems, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific, are doing their best to move all the grain from the west, but my concern and question are directed to the Minister of Transport. What is the minister going to do about the boxcar situation to move lumber from British Columbia to Ontario where it is greatly needed for housing construction?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for not giving me notice of that question. I answered it in considerable detail yesterday. I believe the statistics are on the record and that some improvement has started as of yesterday and will continue in the weeks immediately ahead.

Some hon. Members: Supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I can assure hon. members that I am not necessarily impressed by the loudness of their calls. I see hon. members standing. It is not necessary for them to try to impress the Chair in this way. The hon. member for Middlesex.

Mr. Lind: Is it true that some of the large manufacturers of plywood have to negotiate with the CNR to supply their own boxcars in order to move their product to the eastern provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

DECISION ON USE OF NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD TERMINAL, VANCOUVER, TO HANDLE SPECIALTY CROPS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact the National Harbours Board terminal, now unused in Vancouver, could be put into operating condition for some $200,000 to handle specialty grains, can the minister indicate when we might expect a decision on this matter which he said he will take under consideration?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that I was taking it under consideration but that it was under consideration and was being looked at from the point of view of cost and benefit. There are other ways of handling additional grain, particularly clean grain, in the existing terminals, and these alternatives have to be balanced against the cost.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT DEBATE ON CNR FINANCING BILL BE RESUMED IN LIGHT OF TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government House leader. In view of the concern expressed by many members with regard to railroad problems, will the government House leader consider bringing the CNR financing bill before the House today or tomorrow so they can be explored and debated in more detail?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if we can make some progress on the items I announced on Thursday last, I will be happy to bring on the CNR bill just after that.

HEALTH

MEDICARE AND HOSPITALIZATION—ACCEPTANCE OF NEW GOVERNMENT COST-SHARING FORMULA BY PROVINCES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It arises out of the cost-sharing formula he has offered to the provinces, which will have the effect of tying the federal government's contribution to hospital insurance and medicare to the growth of the gross national product. May I ask the minister how many provinces have accepted this formula, what provinces have rejected it and, since March 31 was the cut-off date, has it been closed or is the offer of the thrust fund still open to the provinces?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, answering the latter part of the question first, the offer of the thrust fund is still open. As to the first part of the hon. member's question, none has actually accepted and none has rejected. What is going on now is that they are making their views known with reference to the last proposal that was made by the federal government. They are suggesting some changes and we are considering those. It has not really gotten to the point of actual acceptance or rejection.

Mr. Douglas: Since the federal government's offer would undoubtedly place a larger share of the cost of these programs on the provincial governments, is the minister prepared to consider as an interim step continuing the present cost-sharing arrangement until such time as the full effect of the thrust fund in providing lower cost facilities becomes fully operative?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Munro: No, Mr. Speaker. We are not prepared to consider that, although I do not agree with the premise of the hon. member's question; if I understood him correctly, he said that this formula would cast a greater share on the provinces in terms of health expenditures. The whole formula was based on the federal and provincial governments coming to some agreement jointly with regard to controlling the rate of escalation based on an agreement that it be controlled, and it was on this basis this formula was offered.

Mr. Douglas: A final supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope hon. members will attempt to limit their supplementaries because we will be running short of time.

Mr. Douglas: Is it the intention of the minister to introduce legislation to implement this cost-sharing formula and will this be done on the basis of concurrence of all the provinces or a majority of the provinces? Can he assure the House that he will not implement this formula over the objections of the provinces?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we are going to proceed now on the basis of the formula we have talked about. We certainly will not legislate it into existence without having tested the provinces and having considered some of the reactions. It is premature to talk about that matter now. We still want to carry on further discussions with the provinces. I do not anticipate legislation at this time.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister visits Edmonton next week, will he be visiting as leader of the Liberal party or as Prime Minister of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I will not be able to split my personality before next week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: I would like to know because there are not too many Liberals in Edmonton and we want to make sure he gets a proper welcome.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POLLUTION

POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF WATER QUALITY AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING GREAT LAKES TO LAKE SIMCOE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Does the government have any intention of extending to Lake Simcoe the anti-pollution strategy announced last weekend for the Great Lakes with regard to phosphate discharges and waste treatment facilities?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, the Canada Water Act provisions apply all across Canada. They relate to the phosphate content in detergents. However, the specific matter of sewage treatment facilities is a matter for the province of Ontario.

Mr. Rynard: My question is, is the government extending the same facilities and help in the case of Lake Simcoe as it is in respect of the Great Lakes?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, if the government of Ontario wants to enter into an agreement with the federal government to help out in that regard, we will be willing to look at it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—ROLE OF DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR MEDIATORS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State about the NABET strike. Is it the position that the Department of Labour mediators in this strike are engaged in attempts at settlement on a daily basis or are they standing by waiting to be called by either side?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question should be directed to the Minister of Labour.

[English]

Mr. Fairweather: It might save time, Mr. Speaker, if I could redirect my question. If the Minister of Labour would answer it I would be much obliged.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The federal mediators are in constant touch with both parties. They have met with them on a number of occasions jointly and separately. Renewed efforts are being made today in contacting both parties to the dispute.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether the mediators have met with both parties at any time in the last ten or 12 days and whether, in fact, the mediators have met with the union representatives in the last ten days or so? My information is that there has been no such meeting.

Mr. O'Connell: If the hon. member means both parties jointly, the answer is no. He is correct. The two parties have not been together with the mediators for approximately two weeks. In the meantime, the mediators have been in touch with both parties separately and both parties have made some proposals. As I pointed out earlier, renewed contacts are being made today.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether the time has not come for him to be ready to ask the mediators to do what is normally done in such serious negotiations after a long strike, that is, to arrange that the two parties be in the same place with the mediators and that discussions take place continuously instead of over the telephone and over the course of some days, so that the parties can be there to discuss matters with the mediators and with each other? Would the minister undertake to get that done?

Mr. O'Connell: The federal mediators are highly expert in this field, Mr. Speaker. They are the same persons who brought about a settlement of the stoppage on the St. Lawrence docks. They know perfectly well how to handle the situation, and I am sure their efforts in the immediate future will be helpful and bear fruit. The two parties to the dispute must show a willingness to come together.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE RIGHTS CLAIMS PRIOR TO DECISION ON NORTHERN PIPELINE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Bearing in mind the statement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he is considering requesting bids for a pipeline running from the Canadian Arctic, can the hon. gentleman give an assurance that no final decision on this matter will be taken until the outstanding native rights claims are settled?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are now in the process of studying what the formalities will be with regard to allotting a corridor and authorizing the construction of a pipeline. Other instructions will be given, through regulations, to control the situation.

With regard to the Indians and the Eskimos, we are now looking into the problem; we are in constant touch with them. They can contact the Indians claims commissioner and no final decision has yet been made in this connection.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that the Indian brotherhoods have refused to consult with the commissioner dealing with land claims and bearing in mind the long delay in the settlement of treaties 8 and 11, can the minister give an assurance that a definite decision will be reached on these important treaties before any final decision on a pipeline is made?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. We have offered the Indians to solve the problems with regard to treaties 8 and 11; it is now up to them to make proposals. They must take their responsibilities and not wait for us to do so for them.

NORTHERN QUEBEC—DISPUTE OVER ESKIMO SCHOOLS—INTERVENTION OF MINISTER

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Has the minister intervened, or has he been called upon to do so, in the dispute now existing in Eskimo schools of northern Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, nobody has called on me to intervene in this dispute which, if I have not misunderstood, is taking place within schools under provincial jurisdiction.

OIL

TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—PROVISION OF CANADIAN OIL TO UNITED STATES DURING EVALUATION OF ALTERNATIVE ROUTE

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources of which I have given notice to his office. In light of American concern over their supply of oil during the two-year period required to evaluate alternative transportation routes to the trans-Alaska pipeline system, may I ask the minister whether he has made clear to his United States counterpart Canada's willingness to make oil available to the United States during this period so that a proper evaluation of a route can be undertaken free of short-term security considerations?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Both in my discussions with Secretary Morton and other officials of the United States administration in Washington and recently with Secretary Rogers last week, I made it perfectly clear that Canada was prepared to supply additional quantities of oil to the United States not only for a two-year period but a longer period and that this would be facilitated by their lifting their quota system.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): What is the government's present policy on the Mackenzie pipeline? Was the policy made clear during the President's visit?

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Sir, both during the President's visit and in the course of my discussions with White House officials and Secretary Morton. In particular, I would reaffirm in the House the statement I made yesterday in the standing committee that the sooner we see some concrete proposals with respect to the Mackenzie Valley corridor for both oil and gas pipelines the sooner we shall be in a position to evaluate them and resolve the problems they raise.

Mr. Paproski: I should like to know why this information was withheld from parliament. Why did the Prime Minister not give this information a couple of days ago in answer to my hon. friend from Calgary North who asked this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROPOSED NUCLEAR TESTS BY FRANCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that last fall the Canadian government made representations to the United States prior to the Amchitka nuclear tests and in view of the fact that the obscenities of nuclear contamination exist regardless of which nation undertakes such tests, has the Canadian government communicated with the government of France regarding its forthcoming nuclear tests in the Pacific.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not yet, Mr. Speaker, because no definite plans have yet been made for that test.

BROADCASTING

ALLEGED COMPLAINT BY SECRETARY OF STATE TO CALGARY STATION FOLLOWING PARTICIPATION IN OPEN-LINE PROGRAM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It has to do with his appearance on an open-line program over CHQR in Calgary on March 28. I ask the hon. gentleman in his capacity as Secretary of State, having jurisdiction over various areas of broadcasting, whether he complained to the broadcasting company concerning something which took place when he uttered a vocal vulgarity and made a ministerial faux pas?

An hon. Member: Speak to George.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the incident referred to by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Had he been the butt of the nasty trick which was played on me, I should have considered myself as the protector of the right hon. representative's language and would have intervened with the CRTC. As I was the one involved, in effect a much less important and perhaps more tolerant personality, I have lodged no complaint.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, realizing the diffidence the minister always exhibits in treating some of these private stations with contempt, I ask him whether he complained either directly or indirectly to the ownership of the station with the result that the broadcaster was removed from his office for vulgar language used by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I just said I made no complaint and I am surprised that the right hon. representative should so phrase his question since he personally outside the House professed to sympathize with me because I was pushed into resorting over the waves to unbecoming language at a time when I believed microphones had been turned off.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I never deny what I say inside or outside the House. The minister used vile language over the station when he thought the line was not open, and when he found out the line was open he was annoyed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PENSIONS

RATIFICATION BY WEST GERMANY OF RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT WITH CANADA—DATE FOR PAYMENT TO CANADIANS OF GERMAN ORIGIN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the reciprocal agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, respecting the payment of pensions, has been ratified by West Germany, and can he say at what date the payment of pensions to thousands of Canadian citizens of German origin will be put into effect?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what date it will be in effect but I will check and get the information back to the hon. member very soon. I believe ratification by the German parliament is very imminent, indeed. I have forgotten precisely what is the projected date, but it is very soon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to seek the cooperation of hon. members at this point. There is not much more than five minutes remaining before the end of the question period and we might try to limit the number of supplementary questions. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley. Order, please. I did not notice the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stand to ask a supplementary question. I will allow him to ask it now and return immediately to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he will check to ascertain if this agreement has not in fact been ratified, and will he make a statement on this matter in the House, perhaps tomorrow?

Mr. Munro: I will be glad to consider that, Mr. Speaker.

CABLEVISION—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS OF EDUCATION TO DISCUSS JURISDICTION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the remarks of the Ontario Minister of Communications in that legislature yesterday expressing his opinion in respect of cablevision, and in view also of the opinions of the Quebec and Alberta legislatures in this regard, does the federal minister intend to call together the various ministers of education to sort out these conflicting claims of jurisdiction in the cable field so we will not have chaos in the regulation of cablevision?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have already made some attempts in that connection and the hon. member is aware of that.

I have not seen the actual statement made by the Ontario minister yesterday afternoon, but I know—as does the hon. member—that the position of the federal government is quite clearly established at the moment, that we have also stated on several occasions that we were ready to discuss the matter with the provincial authorities when they wished to do so.

I must add that the minister quoted by the hon. member has never approached my department to undertake such discussions.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a short supplementary question. I appreciate the minister's answer to a point, that he is disposed to discuss this matter, but does he intend to take any initiative regarding a joint discussion with all the ministers across the country, or is this going to be done piecemeal with each minister having to come to Ottawa to discuss the subject individually?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has surely missed the first part of my answer where I said that on the initiative of the federal government, all the provinces were visited last year and that I got in touch with all the provincial ministers responsible for communications. On the other hand, nothing has yet been done in the other direction.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY—STATEMENT OF QUEBEC FINANCE MINISTER—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Recently, the Minister of Finance of Quebec, Mr. Garneau stated in Toronto that the government of Quebec would object to any federal policy to limit foreign investment. Can the Prime Minister of Canada tell the House whether he intends to discuss this matter with the government of the Province of Quebec before announcing its policy on foreign investment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I should say, Mr. Speaker, that at the last federal-provincial conference last fall the provincial premiers and myself dealt with the issue of foreign investment and at that time I asked all premiers to indicate their views on that subject during the following months. I am happy to say that some premiers replied with specific suggestions, but I believe that most of them are in the position of the Conservative party, that is to say, they reserve the right to criticize government measures but have nothing to propose.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, I suggest to the Prime Minister that the Conservative party is not in power and that, if it were, it would have made a decision long ago in this respect.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member ask his supplementary?

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is as follows. As the statement of the Minister of Finance of Quebec seems to contradict the Prime Minister's allegations to the effect that he consulted with the provincial premiers, does the Prime Minister intend to obtain a statement from the premier of Quebec on this important matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Quebec Minister of Finance was present when this discussion was held here, at the conference centre. But let's forget the past. When our policy concerning investment has been announced, we intend to consult with the various provinces regarding comments that they would care to make concerning legislative measures which might follow.

FLOODS

RIDEAU RIVER—ACTION TO REMOVE ICE AND MAINTAIN FREE WATER FLOW—SUGGESTED DYKING PROGRAM

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is aware of the present serious problem of flooding on the Rideau River, particularly in the towns of Kemptville, Kars and Manotick in my constituency, and is he satisfied that his officials have taken all necessary steps to clear the river of ice and to maintain the free flow of water?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware of it, and it has been called to my attention by the hon. member and others. I am satisfied that we are taking all necessary steps. As I believe everyone is aware, this has been an extraordinary spring with regard to water runoff.

Mr. Blair: In view of the fact that flooding has become a recurring problem on the Rideau system, is the minister prepared to consider a program of dyking to enable better protection to be given the built-up areas?

Mr. Jamieson: The short answer is obviously yes, Mr. Speaker, we will be glad to look at that suggestion. My recollection is that some work of that nature has been going on, but if there are specific proposals we will be glad to consider them.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ADMINISTRATION OF ACT AND OPERATIONS OF APPEAL BOARD

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Because of the increasing number of complaints concerning the administration of the Immigration Act and other immigration problems, including the delays and procedures with regard to appeals, will the government order an inquiry into the operation of the Immigration Act and the anomalous and often cruel situations created by the Immigration Appeal Board over which the government has no control?

• (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. An inquiry of the nature suggested by the hon. member is not intended nor do we believe it to be necessary, but the government has considered and will consider measures for improving the situation on the immigration front where it is possible.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as a result of representations by the members from that general area and discussions with the Ontario government, some months ago proposals were made to the Ontario government with a view to modernizing this ferry service and my recollection is that at the moment we are awaiting a definitive answer from the government of Ontario.

With reference to the new ground rules which have been announced in relation to world hockey competition and in relation to any part Hockey Canada might play in the promotion of the planned series between Russia and Canada next September, will the minister use his good offices to prevail upon Hockey Canada to recognize the city of Winnipeg as host in order to compensate for the washout of the last world tournament which was to have been played in that city?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and other members on this side of the House have brought this matter to my attention. I will make their views known to Hockey Canada.

HIGHWAYS

POSSIBLE RECOGNITION OF YELLOWHEAD ROUTE AS PART OF NATIONAL SYSTEM—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the expressed desire to establish a second national highway, and having regard to the representations made by the Yellowhead Interprovincial Highway Association to the Prime Minister and the cabinet, is the minister now in a position to indicate whether it is the intention of the government to officially recognize the Yellowhead route as part of the national highway system and will funds be made available for the construction and upgrading of this facility?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really think some of the questions that are being asked, such as the question just posed by the hon. member, should be placed on the order paper. It seems to me that if this kind of question were asked day after day the House could sit all day on the question period. I am sure there is not one member who does not have one question or many questions of this type which could be asked during the question period. I think an effort should be made to limit questions to matters which are of national concern rather than of local interest. I do not say that this matter is not important. I am sure it is. The question has been asked and the minister might reply, but I would hope hon. members would not forget that questions ought normally to be placed on the order paper and it is only in circumstances of urgency and national interest that questions should be asked orally. Having said this, and recognizing the importance of the question asked, the minister might reply very briefly.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met with the Yellowhead group and have communicated with them. The last response I had from them was that what I had indicated to them was quite satisfactory, that is, that the route is in fact being recognized and that every effort will be made to ensure it is given the prominent place it deserves in the Canadian highway network.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to reply directly to my question. Will the federal government be prepared to contribute financial aid for the construction and upgrading of this facility since it is a national problem and a national highway?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I would suspect that any initiative with regard to the upgrading of that or any other highway within the province is clearly within provincial jurisdiction. To my knowledge at the moment there is no specific request from the province in this respect—

An hon. Member: Any province.

Mr. Jamieson: —or from the provinces. I am well aware there are three provinces. What I started to say was we are discussing the question of some form of co-operative effort in this regard. Mr. Speaker, I think the comments clearly indicate the wisdom of your admonition a few minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a point of order. Before calling orders of the day I will recognize the hon. member for Richmond. I think it is only fair that the hon. member should be allowed to ask his question, but the hon. member for Vegreville rises on a point of order.

Family Income Security Plan

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated this is a matter which has not been dealt with and is strictly under the aegis of the provincial government. The Yellowhead Highway Association has met with the minister and requested recognition of the highway as a second national trans-Canada highway. Is the minister prepared to answer my question? Is the government prepared to accept its responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is no longer a point of order. The hon. member for Richmond.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS TO ENABLE APPROVAL OF MORE PROJECTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the statements that the minister has made recently regarding the Opportunities for Youth program, to the effect that there have been about 20,000 applications and that the budget amounted to $85 million, and in view of the fact that it has been recognized that this budget was insufficient, could the Secretary of State say whether this government intends to increase this budget, so that more projects can be approved?

Mr. Speaker: I am under the impression that this question has already been put several times recently, but the minister may answer briefly, if he so desires.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I would simply make a correction, Mr. Speaker: $85 million is the budget for all summer activities. The Opportunities for Youth program gets only $34 million. So, the answer is, as you put it yourself, Mr. Speaker, the one that I gave whenever that question has been put to me over the past 15 days.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as I said during the few minutes I spoke last night, we have had an opportunity since the Easter recess to study the bill before us further and the more one studies it and its effect, the more it becomes clear to us that it is unacceptable in principle. It is a veritable nightmare from an administrative point of view and is indeed a hoax on the poor as well has low and middle income families. My colleagues in the New Democratic Party and I have therefore concluded that we cannot support the bill on second reading and that indeed we must oppose it as vigorously as we can at each of its stages.

Of course, I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in leading off for our party in this debate said that we were prepared to give the bill second reading and send it to the appropriate standing committee. At that time, he said what all of us had concluded. However, throughout his speech the hon. member made clear his criticism of the principle of the bill, and insisted that it would have to be changed before we could be satisfied with it. As we studied the bill further, it became obvious to us, to my friends and colleagues, that even if certain improvements were made in the bill we would still be left with a law which has abandoned universality, that has ignored the basic philosophy underlying payments to help in the upbringing of Canada's children, and which of course threatens to involve families of Canada in an administrative jungle even worse than the one in respect of the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Therefore, we shall vote against the bill on second reading. I want to emphasize that we shall do so precisely because we are strongly in favour of substantially increased family allowances and because we are opposed to the principle of the bill now before the House. Indeed, before I am finished I hope, with your permission, Sir, to move an amendment and, as my amendment will show, we make three simple points: one, that family allowance payments should remain universal as they have been. They should be paid to all mothers in Canada to assist them in bringing up Canada's children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Second, that the family allowance levels should be raised substantially. At the very least, they should be at the level required by the rise in the cost of living since 1945, a rise which is now equal to 230 per cent. This means that the amounts of $15 and $20 proposed in this bill are the minimal amounts that we should countenance because they are just about at the level of the increase in the cost of living since 1945. These benefits should be made universally applicable.

The third point is that we say to the minister and to this government, if they are concerned about making payments to the wealthy, if they are concerned about making payments for children of families that really do not need those payments, then the proper way of doing that is to make the necessary changes to the income tax where that kind of thing can be done on a fair and progressive basis instead of the selective manner now proposed. The fact is that the minister and the government are trying to change the family allowance concept which we have had into an anti-poverty measure. Not only is this a perversion of the idea of family allowances, but as an anti-poverty measure it is disgraceful tokenism. What the government is doing is making the not so poor in Canada provide a few additional dollars to the poor. I want to emphasize, as I will show in a moment, that this bill does not even do that for the poorest of families on social assistance in Canada. It is not a redistribution of income, it is a shameful redistribution of anxiety to the families across this country.

I was not here during much of the debate that has taken place before but I have read most of the speeches. I have studied some of the speeches made by hon. members from Newfoundland and hon. members from the province of Quebec and I wondered whether they had even read this bill. I cannot imagine how any member in this House who has actually read the bill can support it in view of the fact that one of the things which the bill provides is that the children of families on social assistance within the meaning of the Canada Assistance Plan will be entitled only to half the benefits provided under this bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Lewis: Those are the poorest in the land. The minister talks about this being an anti-poverty measure, a redistribution of income, and he provides in the act that children of families on welfare within the meaning of the Canada Assistance Plan shall get half the benefit; in other words, shall get almost nothing above what they get now.

Mr. Munro: Children in institutions.

Mr. Lewis: I expected the minister would say that. Somehow I had a hunch he would say that. I want to tell the minister that he should read the bill which he is piloting through the House. If he reads the bill, he will find in section 3(1)(b) that the person dealt with there is not only a person in an institution but a person under 18 years of age who is wholly or substantially maintained out of moneys administered or provided by a department or agency of the government of Canada or of a province, and the children in institutions are dealt with in a separate subparagraph. The minister should read it. What the bill says is that not only children in institutions will get half the benefit but that children of all families on social welfare in Canada will get only half the benefit.

Mr. Munro: That is not so, even on the basis of the hon. member's own reading.

Mr. Lewis: What a shameful thing to do. Is this a war on poverty? How is this bill directed to such a war, indeed how is it for meanness shown to the poorest children in this land? I ask hon. members to read clauses 3 and 5. I usually try to avoid saying things that are clearly wrong, and that I know are wrong. No matter how many times the minister interrupts, I tell him that he does not know what this bill does. What it does is shameful, and if he read this bill he would see that every word I have said is right.

Mr. Munro: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. member would not want to intentionally mislead the House. If he is using that wording to indicate that all families with children who are receiving social assistance in Canada are going to get half the family allowance, then he is misreading the clause to which he just referred.

Mr. Lewis: I am not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: This is hardly a point of order. It is a point of debate between the minister and the hon. member. The hon. member who has the floor referred to a particular clause of the bill and gave it an interpretation. The minister disagreed with him. That is debate. I do not think that clause can be debated in this form and at this time, so I suggest to hon. members that this is the kind of debate which normally should take place at the committee stage rather than on second reading.

Mr. Lewis: I want to underline that so far as I am concerned the minister is not sliding under. Subclause (2) of clause 6 of the bill which provides for the benefit refers to children with respect to whom I read the subsection, namely, children maintained through public funds, federal or provincial. It says that if these children receive assistance within the meaning of the Canada Assistance Plan, they will receive half the benefits. There is no doubt about the words. There is no doubt in my mind that the words are there deliberately and that the people advising the minister were looking for money in order to give a few more dollars to some of the working poor while taking it from everybody else. They took the money from those on welfare because they say they pay half of it under the Canada Assistance Plan, and they took it from the people in the $7,000 to $11,000 income range which at this time in this country is not the range in which the wealthy families of this country are found.

Mr. Peters: The same as the Unemployment Insurance Fund.

Mr. Lewis: We will have nothing to do with the kind of callous, pennypinching that this clause represents, and which describes the whole of the situation. In fact, I say to the minister and to members of the House that, in addition to the specific provision in the bill, children of families on welfare will not benefit in any way from this legislation because anyone who has had anything to do with welfare agencies and welfare departments—and you can ask any agency in the land—knows perfectly well that changes in welfare payments must be made for one reason or another on some basis of need, and family allowance payments are bound to be taken into consideration in the future as they have been in the past. The result will be that the really poorest people in Canada will benefit not one whit from this measure.

This is not the place for an anti-poverty program. This is not where or how you fight poverty in this country. Family allowances are not intended to serve that purpose, and when you try to make them serve that purpose inevitably you produce inequity, inequality and injustice, as this bill has in fact done. What the minister has done here has been what the government did in the case of old age security pensions when it froze that pension at $80 a month and increased the guaranteed income supplement. The result is that as one travels across this country, as I do, one meets literally thousands of pensioners who cannot quite qualify for the supplement but who still live in squalor, insecurity and unhappiness That is what the government did to old age pensioners by freezing the pension at $80. It is now producing precisely the same results with this measure. It is introducing precisely the same principle into this bill dealing with family allowances.

The philosophy of family allowances was that they were to assist in the upbringing of Canada's children, the most important asset that any country has. Making payments in this area selective destroys that purpose. No one suggests that it is possible to make payments that will totally pay the cost of rearing children, but the intention was to give some meaningful assistance to families with children, although it has not been meaningful thus far, in recognition of the fact that families with children have special needs and that all children should be given at least a modicum of equality of opportunity across this country. And it has been just a bit of equality; that is all it has been. To introduce arbitrary selectivity into this kind of social security program is to ignore this principle and introduce inequalities. Let me deal with this for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The minister in his speech said that over one million Canadian families will get nil benefit out of this bill. I would like to ask any member of this House, any member of our society in Canada, whether he believes that there are more than a million rich families in this country? I would like to ask the minister if he really thinks that paying nothing on behalf of children in over one million families in Canada is a fair thing to do, and whether he really believes there are one million families in Canada that do not need some extra assistance for the upbringing of their children? This, itself, proves the iniquities in this bill.

The minister says that about 1¼ million families will get full benefits, and at one place in his speech he says that 900,000 will get maximum benefits. I think I now understand the difference between maximum and full benefits which I mentioned last night. Now, I believe that the people who wrote the minister's speech did know what they were talking about. The maximum benefits in this case are related to those who get the $15 and $20, and the full benefits are those the minister provides in the bill, including half the benefit that children of social welfare families get, so that of the 1¼ million families there will be 300,000, 400,000, 500,000—who knows the number—families on welfare whose children will not get more than half the benefit the minister provides in the bill.

No one will deny that there are a good many families that will get more under the scheme that the minister proposes. So what, Mr. Speaker? When you have given them $6 and $8 for so many years, with the cost of living going up all the time, and then introduce a bill which gives a little more to some of the families, it is supposed to be acceptable. I say to the minister no, because you have to look at the bill and see what it does to all families in Canada. I will deal with a few examples if I have time, Mr. Speaker.

I want to put on record what a child under 12 will get. If a family consists of one child under 12 years and has an income level of $7,500, that child will get $1 less than it gets now. It will get $5 instead of $6 under the present bill. If the family income is $8,000, the payment to the child will be $3.45 a month. If the family income is $8,500 the payment is $1.80 a month, and if the family income is $9,000 the payment is nil.

Then, look at a family with two children under 12 years. At $8,000 and above they get less than now. At $8,000 the child gets $5.10, 90 cents less than the present $6. At the $9,000 income level, each child will receive $1.80 instead of $6, and at $9,300 the two children will get nil from this bill.

A family with five children under 12 years and having an income of $8,000 will get for each child $10 instead of the present $6, an increase of about two thirds, but we must remember that the cost of living is 230 per cent higher than it was in 1945. A family with five children and total family income of $9,000, under the plan proposed by the minister will get about the same per child as was received before, and at $9,300 will get less than the $6 per child, while at $10,000 income the allowance will be $3.45 a month.

I want to say that this group of families with incomes between $7,000 and $10,000, or $7,500 and $10,500, are not rich. They are not rich in our present society. All these families are usually in debt to finance companies. They are the families of working people, of people who work in factories. They are the families of farmers who are trying to eke out a living. They are the families of salaried people in offices. They are families that are not wealthy, families that need the family allowance, who need a little extra for their children.

In summary what we have is that for families on social assistance there is no improvement or hardly any improvement. Children of families with income from $7,500 to $10,500 will receive substantially less, and a third of the families in Canada are completely cut off from any family allowance. I think that is a correct summary of what the bill proposes. I say to you, Sir, not only for myself but for my entire party that this is a shameful, rotten system to foist on the Canadian people at this time in 1972.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: In my humble and profound opinion, it is an uncivilized act to deal in this way with social security in a country as wealthy as Canada, in a country where the gross national product keeps on growing all the time, in a country where we hand out hundreds of millions of dollars each year to large, poverty-stricken corporations, most of them multinational, to enable them to increase their profits, in a country which will make a $6 million Christmas gift to Great Canadian Oil Sands Limited, a subsidiary of Sun Oil, a country that writes tax laws so that one can obtain a monopoly for a newspaper in the largest English speaking market in the country and make the public pay for it. In such a country, to foist this on the people of Canada is a shameful act for any government, even this government.

Furthermore, the income market I am talking about, those with incomes from $7,500 to $10,500, not only are they not rich, not only are they in trouble all the time, but they are the families that carry the heaviest tax load in this country. All you have to do is study our tax system to see that. To deprive them of the little additional assistance that would have been available under a decent plan is really something we cannot accept. I want to say to the minister that the evil of this kind of thing will surely come out in months to come, just as I am sure that the majority the government now has will push this legislation through. It will result in dividing communities, in humiliating people.

Most families that receive family allowance cheques will cash them somewhere in their own locality. Everybody will be watching everybody. With a little bit of calculation people will know what somebody else's income is by the size of the family allowance cheque which a person cashes in the local grocery store or in the bank on the corner, and everybody will resent it if someone else gets more than they get. It is the kind of thing that divides communities. People who make $7,500 get so much and those who make $8,500 get so much. Nevertheless, people who live in the same neighbourhood are in the same economic and social stratum in society; they live side by side and deal with the same people. Everybody will know exactly what his neighbour's income is and how much he receives in family allowance. That will divide communities into the have and have not segments. A thousand dollars more income or a thousand dollars less income will create the kind of tension that government ought to remove rather than produce in legislation that it brings before parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Those who do not receive benefits because they earn a few dollars more than their neighbour will bitterly resent those who get benefit, especially when they realize that they pay a little bit more tax than their neighbour. One man may earn $6,800 and another $7,200; the first gets benefit but the second pays as much or more taxes and this will be bitterly resented. Those who receive the benefits will be unnecessarily humiliated by the fact that their neighbour, who earns a few dollars more, does not receive them. By definition, they must be in need, Mr. Speaker. These are threats to social harmony in a society. They produce a backlash against the social system, against the welfare system, against the taxation system instead of making people realize that there is a unity in this country, that we are trying to create a Canadian family of harmony and decency. This is another reason this is so unacceptable in my opinion to every sensitive thinking person.

As far as the question of administration is concerned, the plan is a bureaucratic nightmare and this should be obvious to everyone who thinks about it, Mr. Speaker. It certainly must have been obvious to the people who conceived it. Payments are scaled to the number of children and to the precise income. If you earn $100 more, 33 cents a month is dropped from the benefit. The increase has to be in the $500 bracket. This means that every time a family's income increases by $500, every time the husband or wife is laid off during the year, the farmer whose income varies from $3,000 one year to $7,000 or $8,000 the next because he cannot control the market price of his product, every time there is this kind of change in the family income or when a child passes the age of 12 or 18 years or there is a new birth, it is necessary to make a new application supplying the additional information to the department and the bureaucrats who will deal with it. This will create a nightmare, even in comparison with the administrative mess created by the unemployment insurance administration. There are provisions for penalties for infractions. As I read the bill, Mr. Speaker, there will be endless infractions because the ordinary Canadian cannot be expected to follow these bureaucratic instructions. To be acceptable, a social security program ought to be simple in administration, ought to cost as little as possible to administer and ought to be worded in such a way that every Canadian can "read as he runs" as the phrase goes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Instead, this is an administrative jungle, a complex and complicated piece which inflicts a mean-hearted injury to Canadian society.

The minister has admitted that this plan will require double the number of employees to administer it, if I remember correctly, that is from 730 to 1,470 but I could look that up. I know it will be twice as many. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members of this House that from the experience we have all had, we know that if the minister has estimated the number of employees to be double we can be sure that it will be double that by the time Parkinson's law takes effect. Instead of some 1,500 employees administering this plan, we are more likely to have 2,000 or 2,500 and the costs will go up and up.

What is much worse is that families in Canada will be under constant pressure to send in new information and applications and the red tape by which they will be tied will be staggering. This is another reason we cannot accept this bill, Mr. Speaker.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is so fond of saying as he goes across Canada, this is a very great country. We have a great people in Canada, perhaps not greater than any other country but a very great people none the less. Our people have produced great wealth in this country but what has been wrong has been that the wealth with which we have been endowed and that the people have produced, has not been equitably and fairly distributed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We have grown from a country which only a few years ago had a gross national product of $31 billion or $32 billion to a country which today has a gross national product three times that. We have a more educated and skilled people than most other parts of the world. In fact, as I have said on a number of occasions, we have a country where Canadians can realistically dream of greatness because we have the resources for it. It only requires courage and imagination to produce that greatness and to get the Canadian people to work toward it. In order to induce that kind of commitment to our country, all the people of Canada have to be given a sense of involvement in society, a sense of getting their fair share of the wealth and income that they collectively produce, and that ordinary social security programs will adequately take care of the upbringing of the child.

I want to say to the minister that the $15 or $20 does not come anywhere near the cost of raising the child. On the basis of the standard health rules, food is calculated as costing $27; shelter, $15; cloting, $7, minimal; dentistry, $2, making a total of $51 a month to bring up a child. I am doing this from memory, but I am sure I am not wrong. Those figures do not take into account toys, treats, educational material, transportation, games or anything else, so that even the $15 or $20 that is suggested in the bill and in our view should be made universal, does not come anywhere near the cost of raising a child.

If we make the $15 or $20 universal across the country—and I would prefer that it be higher—then we give encouragement to the person who works in a plant and has managed to get up to a wage of $3 an hour. This is all he needs to have in order to get an income, depending on how many children he has, that will take him out of any meaningful contribution on behalf of his child or children. There are now hundreds of thousands of Canadians with those skills, and the person who works in an office or has finished university or college and is able to make $7,000 $8,000 or $9,000 a year and is bringing up a family deserves the assistance of a decent family allowance benefit. If those families are given at least this modicum of assistance for bringing up their children, there will be a new spirit toward the community, toward our society and toward building the great Canada that we all, collectively, can build.

If one considers this bill from every point of view, I suggest that it is wrong. If we consider it from the point of view of social philosophy generally, from the point of view of the idea behind family allowances, from the point of view that it will deprive children now getting social welfare assistance of even the benefits put forward in this bill, from the point of view that large numbers of middle income families will get nothing out of this legislation and from the point of view that the administration of this bill will present an administrative nightmare, I submit to you, Sir, that, if we think about it carefully, all of us in the House ought to tell the minister to go back to his office, convene his mandarins again and tell them to bring forward a sensible and humane family allowance proposal in place of the monstrosity we have before us.

For that reason I move. seconded by the hon. member

That Bill C-170 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act to provide for a substantial increase in the allowances paid thereunder, for continuing the principle of universality, and for related changes in the income tax legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak today on Bill C-170, an Act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children.

It is, I suggest, the privilege and the duty of each member of this House to acquaint the government with the thinking of his constituents about the substance of the bill now before us. I shall therefore call your attention, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of all citizens of Richmond, to the multiple aspects of the family allowances bill.

[Mr. Lewis.]

We all know that the family Allowances Act was passed some 25 years ago and came into force on July 1, 1945.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to point out that at that time all Alberta Creditiste members voted unanimously in favour of the bill, in 1944.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out a few weeks ago, some election-tinged events surrounded the implementation of family allowances. I should like to quote, if I may, a paragraph from what the hon. member said in 1944. I quote:

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Mackenzie King dismissed accusations of electioneering with all his usual skill. That legislative measure was dealt with in the House in June and July 1944. He rose in his place and with his usual solemnity declared: This is not an election promise; I made it clear in this bill that the benefits will take effect only from July 1, 1945 and everybody is aware that an election will have to take place until then, according to the Constitution. Therefore it was not election propaganda. It so happened that the bill was passed in 1944 and that an election took place in June 1945. And the Liberals could say: We succeeded in getting this bill through and you will get the benefits on the 1st of July.

No it really was not election propaganda—definitely not. That's Mackenzie King for you!

Now, we all know that a bill almost similar to the one before us was introduced by the government during the last session. It was Bill C-264. It sank into oblivion at the end of the session and the government would like us now to pass Bill C-170.

Nevertheless, there is something that worries me: in the previous bill, it was clearly stated that Canadian mothers would get the extra family allowances on May 1, 1972. In Bill C-170, no date is mentioned.

I believe the government is considering the possibility of an election taking place at an early date; thus it will not be able to pass the family allowances bill and will use that for exclusively political purposes.

I can see the government members saying to their electors: Elect us and we will see that the family allowances bill goes through.

Mr. Speaker, some members opposite are shaking their heads and one of them even said—

An hon. Member: The people know—

Mr. Beaudoin: —the people know. Perhaps I agree. It is why I say that because each time this bill is delayed the mothers are losing a substantial income.

Mr. Speaker, I admit that I am very much concerned about the constitutional aspect of this bill. I cannot understand why the Quebec government allows this breach of our constitution to perpetuate and waives a genuine right.

I would like now to quote from a speech of my colleague the Creditiste member for Champlain (M. Matte) who said in this House on March 27 last:

They will say: That is once more a very particular opinion which does not reflect reality. But I would like to prove it by reading an editorial from the newspaper La Presse of Thursday, March 16, and I quote:

The former deputy minister for intergovernmental affairs in Quebec—

That is a man who has served under three different regimes in Quebec and who must know quite a bit about such things.

This is an agreement between the prime minister and a provincial premier and not between two governments. Here is what Mr. Morin has to say:

—if the "administrative compromise" proposed by Ottawa were accepted by Quebec and then sanctioned in constitutional legislation, the Province of Quebec would then formally recognize a right to which the federal government is not entitled in the field of allowances. Mr. Morin even voiced the opinion that mere agreement from the premier of Quebec to Ottawa's proposal would be sufficient, in the absence of constitutional legislation, to establish a precedent.

According to Mr. Morin, when all is said, there is more cause for concern than for celebration at the moment if the recent federal proposal is looked at closely. There is a danger that this proposal could annihilate all progress made by Quebec in the constitutional field and postpone for ever the basis of Quebec's claims which is a true sharing of powers.

Mr. Speaker, this is what Quebec wants: an adequate and fair sharing of taxation powers. That is what Quebec wants. As for us, we advocate decentralization in that area so that each region of this country may be allowed to administer itself better.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that Canadian taxpayers are going to take the money which they are given, no matter where it comes from. Nevertheless, we are renewing in this bill a past mistake and infringing upon a provincial jurisdiction.

Once again, these criteria should be reviewed when constitutional conferences convene and I think the time is long overdue for the federal and provincial governments to determine once and for all their respective powers.

• (1550)

I agree of course on the proposal to increase family allowances. I profoundly regret however that the government, if it intends to infringe upon a provincial jurisdiction, has tabled a bill that only raises family allowances by a few miserly dollars and to the benefit of only a few.

Indeed, family allowances have actually decreased since 1945. The cost of living and the average wage are conclusive proof in this regard.

In 1945, the average weekly salary was $32 and it was $132.72 in 1970. So, Mr. Speaker, there has been more than a 300 per cent increase while the average rate of family allowances went up by only 15 per cent. Not only is this unacceptable, but it amounts to a glaring inequity against large families which have to contend with the prospect of an income that is becoming, by the day, more incompatible with the cost of living in Canada in 1972.

Bill C-170 provides for payment of a maximum of $180 per year for children of 12 or under, and $240 per year for those from 12 to 18. This is both laughable and deplorable. I think that if the government stuck to the average salary principle, it should pay a minimum of $257 for the first category, and $334 for children from 12 to 18. This would at least help restore some balance in the family income, taking into account the average income level at present and the cost of living index.

So, the government is just making fun of Canadian families, and does not even offer the rate which it established back in 1945, considering the cost of living index and wage levels. It is giving less and less.

I am aware that we have serious problems in Canada. We are unfortunately the second largest country in the world. Canada has only some 20 million inhabitants, and we face serious problems. Thus, we know that it would be easier to give a list of minerals we do not have than of those we do have. Mines are closing down.

Our land is so productive that western farmers have to stop sowing and are paid for so doing, because grain production is too high.

Here, in eastern Canada, we also face serious problems. We have too much milk, too much butter, too many shoes, too many textiles—too much of everything, really. What is scarce in Canada? Money!

Our fishermen have so much fish available that fishing has become unprofitable, because prices are too low. We even allow other countries to come and catch our surpluses 12 miles off our shores.

Our forest industry is also faced with a serious problem. We have so much hardwood that we have to grant other countries leases which allow them to come and exploit our rich forest for indefinite periods. The same problem arises in connection with our soft wood. We have too much of it. So, mills such as those in Trois-Rivières and elsewhere in Quebec have to close and lay off workers.

Mr. Speaker, I would continue for hours on end in this manner. We have much too much of everything and, because of that, there are thousands of unemployed. And the government will not increase family allowances for fear of increasing too much the buying power. Consequently, goods remain on the shelves in the stores and plants shut down.

The government permits these allowances to be reduced more and more; compared with the average income, the rich get richer and the poor get poorer.

The day is coming when our empoverished people, unable to find employment, will be faced with only one solution: to beget children. This plan is so discouraging that, when one thinks of it, either one laughs or one cries.

And, in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, payment of family allowances will be made on a selective basis, under Bill C-170. With this bill, we are re-enacting the absurd principle of depriving almost 40 p. 100 of all Canadian mothers of the allowances they now receive.

There are several aspects to this selectivity. First, we have the moral aspect. Every Canadian mother considers the family allowance cheque she has now been getting for the past 25 years as her sole personal income. I believe that for most of them, that money is the only one they do not have to wrench from their husbands. They do not have to beg month after month for that cheque which they receive on behalf of their children. To take away that cheque, whatever may be the husband's income, is absolutely unfair. This money represents a small measure of financial independence for them, but now, as I said a while ago, almost 40 per cent of those who do receive this cheque now will be deprived thereof.

The government will undoubtedly maintain that only the rich people will be affected. This is quite untrue, because under the new legislation, the gross income of both spouses will be added to make up the basic family income used for the computation of the allowance. People in Asbestos, Bromptonville, Windsor, Weedon, Disraëli, Richmond or anywhere else who earn $6,000 yearly can hardly make both ends meet with four or five children at home. If one day the wife decides to help her husband by accepting a job in a restaurant which will bring in an additional $4,000 a year, then this family will no longer be entitled to family allowances.

I think that it is unfair. By introducing this selectivity feature, this government is running counter to its own statements. At this stage, I should like to quote the Comments and Recommendations made by the Canadian Council on Social Development on the Family Income Security Plan proposed in the federal government's White Paper of 1970, entitled "Income Security in Canada". This is a statement of policy which was published in 1971. I quote from page iii:

The Council believes that:

(a) (p. 10) Family allowances should be universal, paid to all families with dependent children as a social right thus avoiding divisiveness among families and any element of stigma. The present program—

This concerns the Family Allowances Plan.

—has this feature but F.I.S.P. would eliminate it.

This openly reproves the switch from universality to selectivity involved in this bill.

Further, on page 10 of their same document, one may read, and I quote:

Family allowances should be universal: i.e. paid to all families with dependent children. As such, they would be accepted as a basic social right and would avoid the division of these families into the "haves" and the "have-nots", eliminating any element of stigma in receiving the payments. This result is certainly evident in the present family allowances program in which the entire "community" of such families participates.

Mr. Speaker, in almost the same terms, the statement from the National Welfare Council, published in April 1971, on page 18, reads as follows:

The proposed Family Income Security Plan is very similar to the Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Plan because it suggests that couples with children who are better off will finance the increase in benefits paid to "have not" families. Obviously, this explains why this should not be expected to solve the problem.

It must be noted that the National Welfare Council was established by federal legislation.

• (1600)

The government thus makes a clear distinction between the rich and the poor. Those who will receive the family allowances are the poor and the others the rich. Is that the just society of which we have heard so much? Is that the just society about which it is said that proper legislation will be passed in order to finally set it up?

Mr. Speaker, why was the universality principle done away with? Some might claim that it would have been too expensive to do otherwise. So, instead of forever having to start all over again, why did the government not simply bring in a universal plan regarding the changes we are now considering? And there was no need to worry. Through taxation it would have taken back from the rich what would have allegedly been overpaid. It would have had only to declare that family allowances were taxable income. Mothers would also have been able to keep their cheques and we would have had an appearance of equality in Canada.

I am against this principle of taxation, but as long as we are reasoning about the system, we might as well go the whole way. Here, it should primarily be admitted that the family allowance cheque should be considered as strictly belonging to the mother who gives birth to the child.

Furthermore, it would be well to point out that the bill does not provide for automatic increase in keeping with the cost of living. It would therefore be necessary to repeat every two years the process of adjusting family allowances to the cost of living and there will always be a lag for Canadian mothers regarding the income they receive under the family allowance plan, which is most unfortunate.

It is urgently necessary that family allowances be considerably increased, as the inquiry on poverty in Canada has irrefutably demonstrated. The inquiry established that poverty does exist in Canada, although we have a surplus of everything, as I was saying a few minustes ago. According to the report of the Special Senate Committee on poverty, the total poverty rate in Canada is 25 percent, representing almost five million Canadians who, according to the report, are considered to be living in poverty.

At this stage of my comments, I should like to quote a few extracts from the said report, as follows:

The welfare system, at all levels, costs Canadians more than six billion dollars a year, yet it has not significantly alleviated poverty let alone eliminated it. The problems grow; costs go up and up and will, in time, suffocate the taxpayer. The welfare system is increasingly unable to deal with the needs of its clients. It has failed to achieve its humanitarian goals. It deprives its recipients of dignity and provides no incentive or rewards to escape from poverty. It has become punitive and demeaning. It is a mess—a social wasteland and an economic morass.

And the report states further:

Working Poor

Sixty per cent of the poor are not on welfare. They are active members of the labour force, working for little more, or, in some instances, less than they would receive on welfare. For them, there is not even the semblance of social justice. There can be no good reason for their continued consent to a political, social, and economic system from which they receive so little.

Can we afford to maintain a system where going on welfare is more profitable than going to work?

Mr. Speaker, poverty is certainly an inadmissible curse in Canada.

In La Presse of Tuesday, November 11, 1969, one could read that milk consumption was decreasing in the province of Quebec. Why? Because mothers have no money to buy any. Meanwhile, farmers are penalized for producing too much milk. Every care is taken so that Canadians do not receive too much money. Incomes are definitely insufficient in Canada. All those citizens run into debt and so does Canada.

In La Presse of March 9, 1971, one could read, and I quote:

The indebtedness of Canadians with banks, stores and finance companies has increased by less than 5 per cent for the year 1970 and this raise in consumer credit has occurred only during the later half of that year—

As compared to 1969, when the indebtedness had undergone an increase of 14 per cent—

Personal unwarranted loans from chartered banks, the most common type of borrowing, have increased from $4.1 billion to $4.6 billion during the year—

Unsecured personal loans went from $1 billion to $1.2 billion, whereas loans against insurance policies rose from $660 million to $745 million.

For 1970, total consumer credit would therefore have amounted to about $11.3 billion.

In the same newspaper, under date of June 16, 1971, one could find the following:

28 per cent of the family budget is spent on debt reimbursement.

In Quebec, indebtedness is a virulent social sore. It exceeds the total government budget of $4 billion, for consumer goods only, said Mr. Normand Caron, of the federation of family savings associations at the annual assembly of the Quebec women's co-operative association.

One has no idea of the disasters it engenders for the individual or the community, stressed Mr. Caron, saying that the percentage of the family budget put aside for debt reimbursement rose from 8 per cent in 1955 to 28 per cent in 1969.

According to the speaker, indebtedness puts the individual in a state of insecurity and tension and often leads to family disintegration on account of conflits it brings about between husband and wife.

Mr. Speaker, after such quotations, I do not believe it necessary to be an economist to realize that the Canadian people urgently need money and that the government has none. At least, so are we told. But, what is the government if not all the Canadian people?

In 1961, our gross national product reached $39 billion, or $2,143 per capita. Now, with all the sophisticated production facilities available, and also because the Canadian people work hard to succeed, our gross national product amounted to $84 billion in 1970. This means that our production capacity, which all Canadians should share, has more than doubled in 10 years.

Statistics show that the total income of Canadians, that is their purchasing power, amounted to $29 billion in 1961, a difference of $10 billion with the gross national product for the same year.

In 1970, the total income of Canadians amounted to $66 billion compared to a gross national product of $84 billion. As we can see, the gap is widening from year to year even though unemployment is increasing. How can Canadians manage not to get into debt when they only have $66 billion to purchase a production of $84 billion?

And we are aware of the current problems: unemployment, violence and poverty in the midst of an almost miraculous affluence. What are our problems? First, there is that of wealth distribution. This is a problem of justice and the government should take this opportunity to start once and for all distributing our wealth and helping the Canadian mothers by establishing a just society.

Why is the government so stingy when it comes to enabling Canadians to take advantage of their country's production? This is nonsense in 1972. There is no reason why family allowances should not be doubled and paid to all Canadian mothers. Even then it would not be enough, but it certainly would be a right step towards this just society I mentioned before and which everyone is yearning for.

What does the increase of $150 million that the minister was so proud to announce mean, when compared to a gap of nearly $20 billion of products which our wages and incomes do not allow us to buy?

They say that there would be inflation, that the value of our money would be reduced, that it has never been tried before, and so on. I do not believe so, Mr. Speaker.

My colleague, the honourable member for Bellechasse, proved on March 27 that this had been tried in the United States by Abraham Lincoln, more than a hundred years ago. As we already know, this great president of the United States, born of a humble but respectable family, contributed a great deal to the development of the United States, even though he was not an economist.

If I may, I shall quote a few lines from what my hon. friend had to say in this respect, as attendance was sparse in the House when he made his remarks. I quote:

International finance at that time had taken possession of America as well as Europe, keeping constant watch over its positions. One man dared one day insult it. He had to pay with his life. It was, I believe, the greatest president of the United States.

He was the son of a settler and never had the chance to go to school. But having learned to read from his mother and having studied law at night, after his hard day in the woods or in the fields, Lincoln finally became president of the United States at a critical time when the North and the South were at war.

Gifted with a staunch common sense and led by an unequalled rectitude of mind, Lincoln considered that if private banks make money and have people accept it, while passing it as debts, a sovereign government could make it as well and give it at least the same flexibility. So he asked Treasury Secretary Chase to float successively three issues totalling $450 million in 1862-1863.

In 1938, after a legal fight between financial powers and the government, $346 million were still in circulation, and had the same value as bank money.

Better still, contrary to the bankers' debt money, Lincoln's "greenbacks" did not saddle the United States public debt with one single dollar.

Had this issue come through the ordinary channel of banks, it would have increased the United States public debt from 1863 to 1938 by $10 billion, including compound interest. Were all their money issued by the government in that way, the United States would have no public debt.

The same can be said about Canada. The very existence of a public debt is the evidence of a defective system, of the money being corrupt right from the beginning.

I think that this is a very accurate statement and that we will never bring into effect distributive justice in Canada if we do not alter our indebtedness system by which the rich gets richer and the poor poorer; not the rich man who works, no, but the one who puts his money to work. In the winter, he basks in the sun on the southern beaches and in the summer, he lazes around our lakes fishing now and then, and in the meantime the worker pays exorbitant interests of 8½ or 9 per cent for the fun of it.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like, as soon as this bill is referred to the relevant committee, that it be amended so that family allowances can be paid to mothers according to the cost of living and to the principle of universality.

Mr. Speaker, I greatly enjoy criticizing the government, but I do not like to criticize for critic's sake. I would like here to enlighten my fellow members. We, of the Social Credit party, claim to have imaginative solutions which would not be a cure-all because it is very hard to solve problems, since all money matters are by themselves somewhat difficult to tackle in view of the fact that money or the monetary system is always extolled by men. Since man is not infallible, every monetary system has its problems. I do not give this expression the same meaning as does our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but I suggest that we should have a more just society and we should start, right this minute to reorganize it on a sound basis.

Moreover, I think that this bill is extremely difficult in terms of its administration and accounting system. All benefit scales are variable: the number of children, their age, the couple's income level or even that of single parents, what is and is not an income, and so on.

I believe that all the troubles arising out of the legislation now before us are almost identical to those of the new unemployment bill we have recently passed. Problems arise every day because of the intricacies of this legislation.

I think that we should look upon the new unemployment insurance act as an example and that the difficulties it is causing should warn us against passing another one like it.

We, of the Social Credit party, have the solution, I believe. And it is unfortunate that there are still people like us who are always suggesting worthwhile solutions to the government. But they do not want to understand. They do not want to amend an act which they recognize, which some of them recognize, as being obsolete and because this act was drafted by some officials, no changes are allowed. Even when we point out the flaws of a bill, the government will never want to make any change.

I am sorry for all those Canadians who have to submit to such a system. One of these days, and maybe sooner than the members opposite think, people will realize how irresponsible is the system under which the present government has held them, and will become aware of the quagmire of hardships and injustice in which they are still being kept back.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about this very important measure. I will not indulge in rhetorical repetition because that kind of repetition is no more valuable than most types of repetition.

I listened with great interest to the speeches delivered this afternoon and I support the remarks made on behalf of my party by my predecessors, notably the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) and the honourable and gallant member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I listened carefully to the leader of the NDP who brought forth some very powerful arguments. I found myself less in agreement with the hon. member of the Social Credit party, although I agree totally with what he quoted his colleague as having said about the great Abraham Lincoln. That was not the only part of his speech with which I found myself in agreement. There are parts of this measure which are troublesome. I think every member of this Chamber realizes that something must be done about this sector of our social legislation, if I may call it that. We realize that gross and grave inadequacies have crept into the whole family allowance sector. So, to the extent that something is being done, even though at the eleventh hour, we are naturally in agreement.

It is a shocking thing, as other members have said, that in this country, so well endowed, so much poverty stalks this rich land, and that so many people have great difficulty coping with the day to day economic needs of themselves and their families. I am always struck and pained when I look upon the legislation in this country and use the gauge which the present government always uses in respect of affluence. I am sure that every member of this Chamber knows of countless veterans and old age pensioners who, day to day, are faced with the limits set by legislation. They write to us and ask, "Do you really think we can live with the amount which is listed as the ceiling for income?" I am sure that most of us know in our heart of hearts that they cannot live on those amounts which the cold bureaucracy has assigned to the citizen of Canada, whether he be a war veteran or an old age pensioner. They have so much and, therefore, they cannot get more. It is this definition of affluence that disturbs me.

I am worried, too, about something else. No matter how we camouflage it, no matter how many euphemisms we use, we are back again to the means test. You may call it something else, but we are back to the stage in this legislation where the citizen must go before some emanation of the state and give proof of poverty. I am just old enough, and I am not by any means the oldest man here being the same age as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), according to a revision, to remember when the old age pension was attached to a means test. I remember all the frightful and humiliating arrangements which had to be made, with old people turning over their properties to their children, thinking this was only a token matter and everything would be fine. Many of these poor souls discovered later on that this was not a token matter, and unless they proved their poverty they ended up without their little farms or small holdings.

I am never at ease with any form of means test, and this measure troubles me. I wonder whether in looking at this legislation in general terms, and it has been well examined in all its particularity, we are not obviously here shifting some of the burden of society from one sector to another. It seems to me quite clear that we are increasing the burden on one sector; that sector which we might roughly and loosely call, and I am always leery about sociological definitions, the middle-class sector in economic terms. We are doing a little more than that with this legislation. We are laying an extra burden upon the middle class people with children because those without children do not feel any pinch from this.

Another thing which disturbs me is that while this bill may be presented—there is a certain amount of truth in this which the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) mentioned—as representing a burst of new-found generosity, we all know when we examine it, even in the most perfunctory way, that the family purchasing power today is not what it was in 1940. So, let no one delude himself or the people of this country with the suggestion that we are moving into a great era of generosity. Another thing which troubles me is the growing ad hockery of the whole legislative program of the present government in reference to social welfare. We have this program, that program, and inconsistencies all across the line. In respect of medicare, there was the utmost rigidity of formulae. Then, when we come to other techniques, we have all sorts of flexibilities which are sometimes so inflexible as to be incomprehensible.

My colleagues from all parts of the House, certainly from the opposition parties, have dilated upon the bureaucratic jungle which confronts not only the bureaucracy, which may be more familiar with that sort of thing, but also the victims of that hodge-podge. I am sure the cost of administering such a program will be absolutely enormous. We will have more and more agents of the state dealing with the citizens of society. This is, of itself, surely not a trend which people should recommend. The civil servants perform a fine role in society and most of them who I know are very fine people, but to advance the principle that there should be more and more emanations of the state dealing with the citizens is something I find not altogether welcome. I find, too, that there are areas in which we lack information. We do not know the whole story of the family allowance pattern or what will develop in reference to the new agreements we read about and have not been fully told about with one of the provinces. What does this mean for the future?

Another thing which always troubles me is that the human species fails to learn lessons which have been referred to in this Chamber and in committee each year time after time in respect of the inequities built into our old age security legislation because there is no automotic escalation for cost-of-living. Here we have another piece of legislation which would lead us to believe that this problem had never been brought to anyone's attention. This is another problem which faces us. I was impressed with what the hon. member for Richmond said about this piece of legislation being a callous, insensitive lack of appreciation for the role of motherhood in this society of ours.

I received a very interesting letter from a person who is obviously very intelligent, a mother of three children. She wrote some very cogent comments. I should like to read from this letter and, of course, since I read it, I endorse it:

> One might logically decide to finance our war on poverty by taxing some of the more overpaid professions. But who could possibly believe that motherhood fits that description?
> If there is any proposition which I have considered self-evident, it is that a mother earns every nickel of the family allowance. Yet the family allowance is commonly referred to as a government hand-out. And while in most areas of housework one can argue that a mother is working for herself, child care is the area where her contribution is undeniably to society as a whole.

Surely, if we have not abandoned completely our concept of the home and the mother, we would agree with that. What troubles me about this legislation is that someone has the idea that you take away something from many sectors of society and then you give that to help the others. I could perhaps embrace the idea of making a contribution to those who are clearly in need, but I cannot accept the idea that we should give the existing family allowance to a woman because she is poor and not because she is a mother, a mother of the children of Canada. I do not think it is at all progressive legislation to do otherwise. My correspondent, whose fine arguments I admire very much, goes on to say:

> I am thinking of a friend of mine who has six children living at home, the eldest (age 20) attending university here. She no longer receives youth allowance for him of course but nevertheless she is getting over $400 a year in family and youth allowance, soon to be cut off. They can ill afford an extra bite like that, she counts every nickel.
> The childless couple next door to them, both working, are promised a 3 per cent tax reduction.

If that is the just society, I am Genghis Khan and I do not look like him at all. The Royal Commission on the Status of Women did not recommend this sort of finagling with the family allowance. It recommended that there be a higher universal family allowance. This group of people were commissioned to make a careful—and I believe they did—study of the status of women in our society, and this was the recommendation which issued from that illustrious group. I have heard someone say that the possibility of the system working is highly remote, and that if any citizen, after it got under way, could work his way through it he would deserve an extra bonus of some kind. I do not see that in the legislation. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) spoke about the farmers. Many of my constituents are lobster fishermen. There is no way under Heaven one can predict that 1973 or 1974 or 1975 will be good years. There will be tremendous variations in the income of these people and the burden they will have in this constant calculation to qualify before the state for a certain level of assistance will become, as many people have said, a nightmare, a costly inequitous one and I am sure an unnecessary one.

Legislation should not be designed to be as complex as possible. The law should be as easily comprehended as possible. But, especially under this government, there would seem to be a desire to make the laws as sophisticated as possible. The bills before us are becoming longer and more difficult to comprehend. I do not know, is it McLuhanism? What is happening that we can no longer have a piece of legislation before us which says in more or less clear terms what it means? But I am also troubled about this legislation, and I always feel this about the means test, because it does not leave too much room for incentive.

The Ottawa Journal editorial of September 9, 1971, was a very good one, I thought, and I will quote part of it:

> —But doubling family allowance cheques represents only a little levelling of the valley between rich and poor. The real challenge is to provide greater opportunity for more Canadians in their own land. The very need for larger family allowances and the growth of the unemployment rolls show how far that challenge is from being met.

I feel troubled about the legislation. I think this government and this parliament can do a much better job to cope with a very important problem. I think that in recognizing it as a problem we are not divided. We realize that there is a challenge for something to be done but we are terribly disturbed—certainly, I am disturbed—by the fact that, when action has been decided upon by the government, we have so much diffusion, confusion, and built-in distortions, iniquities and inequities which, I am afraid, will result in a most inadequate response to a clear and present social problem and social challenge. I think that changes are called for and changes are needed. While we know that something must be done, while I do not withdraw from anything which my colleagues have said in speaking for our party, I still think that there is tremendous need to look at this matter and see if we cannot inject into the legislation a little more simplicity and straightforwardness and, much more important than that, a little compassion, a little consideration, a little regard for the families of this country, and that we do not go too recklessly ahead in taking away from one group of citizens in the hope of improving conditions for another. The thing to do is to improve conditions for both, and that is what I invite the government to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Ovide Laflamme (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, in speaking for a few minutes on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), I would simply like to make a few remarks in the light of the speech he made earlier when we proceeded to government orders.

I would like to say how surprised I was to find that in such a proposal coming from the leader of the NDP, some people saw a purely demagogic attempt to try and establish the principle of universality in regard to family allowances.

When, on the one hand, the theory which he expressed earlier tends to show that too many people receive more from the government, and on the other hand, under Bill C-170 introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), we try to give poor people greater assistance, I really fail to see and understand the substance of the amendment proposed by the member for York South, particularly when he tries to establish the principle of universality—which, in my opinion, reflects his complete irresponsibility in matters of social security and administration.

When, as was the case a moment ago, it is contended that the first concern, when passing social security legislation such as that dealing with family allowances, should be the needs of the recipients, I suggest that this is a distortion of the concept of social security. Such legislation was never conceived, and logically cannot be conceived to correspond directly to the needs of recipients, without taking into account the government's disbursement capacity.

As the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) realizes, every dollar added to family allowances for Canadian children would create an extra load of $80 million a year for Canadian taxpayers. It is also understandable that the principle of universal family allowances, established, as suggested by governments, at $15 a month for children under 12 and $20 a month for children up to age 18 would, if applied, represent close to $1 billion more in family allowances than the system recommended by the New Democratic party. And of course there is no mention of increased taxes, no indication as to where the Canadian Treasury could obtain these additional funds.

I sincerely believe that it is unmitigated demagogy to oppose such basic legislation which corrects past inadequacy and attempts to give more to those who most need it, to push an amendment calling for universality of family allowances, to stir up regrets of those who will be losing their family allowances owing to force of circumstances, although the reasons therefor are well explained in the bill and indicated in the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. And I really do not see that anything serious can be added to the suggestions and proposals already brought forward.

Before considering carefully the proposed corrective measures designed to improve the family allowances plan, one must first say that the government intends to spend $150 million more in this area. And how does it go about it? Well, quite simply, by extending the age of eligible children from 16 to 18 years, by increasing the allowance to $15 for children of 12, and to $20 for those between 12 and 18. This will cost $150 million more, since the birth-rate in Canada has dropped sharply and it is the government's duty to promote the birth-rate through an effective family allowances plan.

Of course, some heads of family who earn over $10,000 a year will no longer be eligible for family allowances. Those may be the families which the leader of the New Democratic Party tried to pit against the government, when the latter attempted to fight poverty through social legislation.

In my opinion, instead of fostering the hatred for the government of those who might lose their family allowances the New Democratic Party might have commended the government for having the courage to introduce a measure really designed to help the most needy in our society.

It is all very well, Mr. Speaker, to resort to all means, as the extreme right party is attempting to do. The hon. member said a while ago that they always wanted to double, multiply and remultiply social welfare measures because the money problem never did exist for them. Therefore, they can solve all issues this way.

Now, it seems to me that, before saying they will introduce welfare schemes, people who believe in reasoning, in thinking things over, and specially in making serious-minded people think things over, should be aware of our ability to pay. And if we do not have it, whenever they ask for new welfare measures, they should have the courage to say who will be taxed more in order to pay for those welfare measures, if they do not want to slip into the habit of the extreme right party—take out the "money machine" and print all you need.

There is no other logic than that, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, coming back to that philosophy, it is always the same thing in Parliament: whenever the government introduces a welfare measure, whenever they decide to give another $150 million for the families who need it most, we can see the opposition members rise in their seats. They would like the amounts to be doubled and tripled but they do not say who will have to pay.

Therefore, if we follow the thinking of the New Democratic party, we would have to find from $400 to $500 million more to apply universality to family allowances, unless they actually say that $15 per month for children up to 12 years of age is too much, or else that $20 per month for children from 12 to 18 is still too much.

Now, if those two scales are to remain the same, it would cost from $400 to $500 million more to apply the universality principle to family allowances. I should like the New Democratic party, which in spite of that is proposing an amendment to this important bill, to tell us where it will get the extra $400 million and from whom through taxes. Then it will show that it has courage and stands behind its actions and is not only indulging in the sad demagogy that we witnessed a while ago.

Mr. Beaudoin: You are aware only of the tax machinery.

Mr. Laflamme: I did not understand the remark of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin). I believe that a while ago he read a speech that was prepared by somebody else, but I should like simply to point out to him that I am not very much in the habit of overtaxing the kindness of hon. members, as do the hon. members from the extreme right while taking the floor in and out of season and saying a lot of things that do not get us anywhere.

For instance, while a bill such as this is under consideration this afternoon in the House and irresponsible speeches are made, I think that instead of keeping listening to them, my duty is to tell some of them that they should have enough courage to talk with responsible people in their ridings and at least abide by some logical reasoning if they want the debate to progress.

For once in the whole history of social security legislation, we are going to make a correction by preventing, through adjustments which will take into account the number of children in a family, people with an annual income of over $10,000 from receiving family allowances, which will instead be paid to low-income families and to children who most need them.

This is justice and redistribution. Of course, a party which is preparing an election and wants to please the voters must try to prove that those who will lose their family allowances have cause for complaints and to say, as the NDP leader did earlier, that this will give nothing to the children depending on welfare.

It is a fact that welfare recipients come under the jurisdiction of public agencies. Naturally, whether they get $15, $20, $25 or $30, the public agencies will keep on meeting their needs and paying for their education. In a province such as Quebec, which I know very well, monthly family allowances of $15 or $20, those we are talking about, will be paid to all children. This will have a beneficial effect on the social welfare budget because when $15 will actually be paid instead of $8 as before, or when $20 will be paid instead of $12 to large and needy families, this will substantially reduce the taxpayers' burden.

In this connection, I did not understand the flights of oratory of the hon. member for York South, when he suggested that the children on social welfare will not be getting a cent more. In my opinion, this is playing with words. It is like an old man who is being cared for in an institution. Obviously, even if the old age security pension is increased, he may not get more since part of his needs are provided for in the welfare budget. This does not mean, however, that what is involved is not clearly and in a secure manner—because this is a time to talk of security—the assurance of greater government assistance and of a healthier and fairer redistribution of family allowances, particularly in respect of children who most need them.

I say it again, Mr. Speaker: as long as we take the time, in new social security legislation like the bill we are going to pass, to correct errors and to use government resources to better advantage, the taxpayers' money will go to the children, to the classes in society, who most need it.

Without trying to give a lecture, I would say that this does not meet the vital needs of children. There are two well-defined approaches in this matter: the first whereby, subject to the state's paying ability, the riches are redistributed to the people who need them most; the second, which is unacceptable, whereby we should pay the full amount of the allowance to those who need it most.

Indeed, those who favour the second approach do not hold the responsibility of imposing the necessary taxes, so much so that, in general, the workers are evidently overburdened with taxes.

• (1650)

And if it is intended to earmark—because it is difficult to fall back in such a system—an additional amount of $400 or $500 million, those working sectors of society will, of course, have to sacrifice part of their income.

A disagreement might arise between the New Democratic party and the Liberal party when the enforcement of this measure by the Liberal party will mean that household heads earning in excess of $12,000, perhaps as a result of the number of their children, will cease to receive family allowances.

They will claim that an income of $12,000 a year is insufficient for one's livelihood or maintenance. This is a matter of interpretation, but I think that the people are able to judge by themselves.

I, for one, have convened forums in my riding to discuss this question. Those people earning $12,000 a year, or more, are normally capable of understanding the rationale behind this new legislation and even though they cease to receive family allowances, they are told by those who earn $8,000, $7,000, $6,000 and $5,000 a year: If I earned $12,000 a year, I would not need family allowances since that income would be sufficient.

In concluding my remarks, I would only say that we can go on making speeches and resorting to demogoguery on this question, but we should this once try and point out the correcting element of this bill. This characteristic should also find its way in all other pieces of legislation if we want to avoid reaching a point where the state will rely on individual incomes to try and guarantee complete security and well-being.

I do not think we have reached that economic stage yet. Indeed, we should be honest enough to recognize that if the resources of the state are sufficient to enable it to hand out gifts and donations in the future, the state being now unable to apply the principle of universality extolled by the NDP, has at least brought down essential measures, has seriously rectified the situation, is willing to pay an additional amount of $150 million and is endeavouring to better help needy families. On this basis, Mr. Speaker, the government and the people of Canada will appreciate the merits of this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make on the bill, but before getting into those I should like to deal with some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme). I have not heard this hon. member speak very often in this House, but I must say that he is a very able speaker. I listened carefully to what he had to say and I was impressed with his style. But I do want to say, Mr. Speaker, that he has more brass than I have seen exhibited by any member of this House for a long time. I wish the hon. member spoke oftener because he is very good, but I would have been far more impressed if he had not raised the question of whether or not we can afford this program. I would have been more impressed had he argued during the tax debate for a more equitable taxing system to be applied to the mining companies with the same kind of fervour that I argued for the working people of this country. I would have liked to hear him say we should get the money from that source because that would have evoked far more sympathy than his present argument.

I would have been far more impressed if he had talked about the half million dollars going to Quebec under the DREE program rather than saying we cannot afford family allowances or bilingualism or the many other programs. Mr. Speaker, I say that there are many things we can afford in this country. We can well afford to encourage the people of Quebec in industrial development; we can well afford the bilingualism program but we can also well afford to have a fair and equitable arrangement for every Canadian who needs assistance to raise his family. That means everyone, and that is why the program has to be universal.

Let us not forget what the family allowance program is all about. The Liberal party is taking every sensible program that has been brought into being in this country and turning it into a welfare program. Family allowance is not welfare; it is, in a sense, the community saying that the market system distorts the allocation of resources, that our market system is not fair because it does not take into account a man's needs. The system does not care whether he has ten children or no children at all. The purpose of the family allowance is to redress that inequity in the market system, and that redress has to be applied at every income level in our view. The place for taxation is in the income tax scheme. That is the scheme you use to take from those who have more, by which you decide at what level you are going to tax. But you do not take away the family allowance or the old age pension and make people pay into an unemployment insurance fund. If we continue in this path, Mr. Speaker, a new revolt will take place in our society led by the man in the middle income bracket who is being squeezed to pieces.

The greatest enemies of poverty are the people who bring in inequitable programs of this kind. If we are to solve the problem of poverty in Canada, we must enlist the support of those in the middle income groups, those who pay the bulk of the taxes. If they become disenchanted at any stage with the programs designed to combat poverty and feel they are being unfairly treated, that will be the end of any sensible approach to a war on poverty. We are on the edge of that, Mr. Speaker. We cannot say to a man with an income of $8,000 or $9,000 a year and a couple of children that he is not entitled to any adjustment. His own income may only be about $5,000 a year, the remainder coming from his wife who works the night shift in a textile mill in order to meet the payments on the house. Is he to be told that the family allowance does not apply to him? The minister had only so much money, but he had to make this program look as attractive as possible so he took money from one pocket and put it into another.

We feel that if plans of this type are continued, they will destroy the sympathy of the Canadian people who have always been sympathetic to the need for social legislation. A sense of alienation will be created in our society. Just look around and see what is happening. The group that has to pay the cost is becoming smaller; it is no longer a pyramid. The people who are paying the shot are the middle group. They have to support the young who are staying in school much longer and it is costing more to keep them there. They also have to support the old who, fortunately, are living longer. Also, people want to retire earlier with some sort of decent income so that they can live the last few years of their lives in comfort. The group in the middle is being asked to pay for all this; they are willing to pay and have paid.

I am very proud of the people of this country, not because we win wars and other things, but because we introduced the old age pension and the family allowance. This is the greatness of Canada, the fact that there are people in this country who are willing to take from their own resources in order to help others not much worse off than themselves. We must not destroy that willingness; we must not destroy the cohesion of our society.

When my leader was speaking, I looked at the minister and detected genuine surprise on his face. He seemed really surprised because we would not support this bill. I have known the minister for a long time, and have always regarded him highly. I do not like to see him surprised. Probably, he wants to know what happened. I can tell him. Time after time, the members of this party have gone along with measures of which they have not entirely approved. We have gone along with them because we thought it was best. The same can be said for the members of other parties. Even members of the Liberal party have arrived at some kind of compromise on some pieces of legislation. We are now reaching the point where we cannot continue that course; we must take a stand. If we do not take a stand, there is a great danger that what I have alluded to will happen. The ordinary people of our society may no longer be willing to meet the needs of the poor and disadvantaged.

May I now refer to some other debates. When the government froze the old age pension and brought in the guaranteed income supplement, we went along with the bill, even though we were not entirely happy with it. True, in one way it destroyed the principle of universality; however, many in my party were divided on it. Many felt that even though the bill abandoned in large part the principle of universality, we should support it because, after all, it would give something more to the poor. Some kind of universality was preserved and the poor were to get additional benefits. Those arguments prevailed and we supported that bill. In a sense, that bill preserved some kind of universality.

What has been our experience with old age pensions. Has the principle of universality actually been retained; no, it has not. True, everyone is entitled to the old age pension of $80, but the pension is frozen at that level. Every year, the benefits to old age pensioners provided by that pension are being eroded. Every old age pensioner who does not get the supplement is being cheated. Trouble is brewing in that area. I think we all get letters from old age pensioners who cannot keep up with costs. Such letters are full of bitterness. For instance, some say, "just because I saved a few dollars, why should I be penalized." Others say, "merely because I get a small pension, does that mean that I must fall further and further behind?" That is what these people are saying, and that is happening. Before long such voices will become more strident. Those people will insist on justice being done.

We made a mistake by not insisting that some escalator provision be included in the basic old age pension. That mistake resulted in a basic denial of justice to old age pensioners of this country. I do not want the same sort of mistake to be made with this plan. For some, the escalation of benefits under this plan will be zero. It is interesting to note that the socialist government of Manitoba recently brought down a budget that made provision for a system of educational tax credits. These were geared to income. What is particularly interesting is that there were minimum benefits for all, regardless of income. That plan recognized that we have an obligation to all. People of all income brackets, including people in the lower brackets, were given benefits under the plan. Mr. Speaker, if you want to reduce inequities, the proper way is not by doing it indirectly through old age pensions, family allowances or unemployment insurance, but through the Income Tax Act.

The government's arguments about not being able to raise the necessary money, and similar arguments, do not impress me. After all, the government brought in what it called a progressive tax system which, nevertheless, left wide loopholes open for those who support that party. I am not saying this was done intentionally; nevertheless, it worries me to see that certain taxpayers are provided with benefits that are not available to others. In light of that, one can become pretty cynical about such cries from the other side as, "where are we to get the money?" I would have been far more impressed with what the hon. member for Montmorency said if, when high unemployment figures were mentioned in the House—I am speaking of times when unemployment reached astronomical heights—he had risen in his place and said to the government, "this is wrong; you should not create unemployment in an effort to fight inflation." If he had said that, I would have been impressed. I did not hear him say that.

Since we are talking about costs and where the money will be found, let me mention some figures relating to unemployment. Mr. Speaker, for every one per cent of unemployment in this country, we lose over $1 billion in gross national product, one third of which would become government revenue. As a result of unemployment levels prevalent during the past few years of Liberal rule, it can be said that government revenues have declined by over $1 billion. Mr. Speaker, we kicked away $1 billion. How much money would it take to establish the kind of program we talk about? An equitable program of family allowances for all families in Canada would cost far less than that. This government has been willing to waste people and waste resources. It has created unemployment to fight inflation, and hardly a dissenting voice was raised from the government's back benches; yet, when we want to establish a fair family allowances program, the old cry is heard: "where will the money come from." Oh yes, they say "the NDP wants this; those great spendthrifts over there, they want to establish this kind of program. They want to give money away." I say the government has not been giving it away; it has been throwing it down the drain and no one has benefited.

What the government has been doing we find unsatisfactory. It is dismantling all those programs of which we have become proud. I am not speaking only for members of my party; I think members of all parties are proud of what we have achieved; and, certainly, many Canadians are, too. You know, at one time you could brag to other people by saying, "although your buildings may be taller than ours and although there may be more smog in Los Angeles than in Canadian towns, every old age pensioner of Canada is entitled to a certain pension." That pension was not paid as charity; it was paid as of right. Those people had worked to build up this country. Our older people made contributions to the tax system and through the sales tax. They were entitled to a pension, and their right was our source of pride. We felt the same way about family allowances, and we felt the same pride. Now, that pride has gone. These have all become welfare programs.

I might understand the government's attitude if these injustices perpetrated against people in the middle income group were to be matched by substantial improvements in the lot of the poor. Yet, I am afraid that they are not to be so matched by substantial improvements. What my leader said is only too true. To the extent that you place people on welfare, the welfare system will accommodate them. To the extent that certain payments which come out of the family allowances pocket, so to speak, are to be increased, the payments which come out of the Canada Assistance Plan pocket are to be reduced. When the former minister of labour introduced the amended Unemployment Insurance Act, he said, "Oh yes, we will take people off welfare, because those now on welfare will collect unemployment insurance." He was not wrong. We took people off the welfare rolls as a result of passing that amended Unemployment Insurance Act. What he said was not far from the truth, because that amended act, instead of adhering to the principle of insurance as the previous unemployment insurance act had, became to a large extent a welfare program. This sort of thing goes on and on but there is a limit to how much people are willing to take in this field. Perhaps they are close to that limit now.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with changes in the family allowances structure, as proposed under Bill C-170, it might be reasonable to consider the whole question of poverty in Canada and our method of dealing with it. I think we are all aware of the fact that over the past six years the budget of the federal government for welfare has doubled from somewhere around $2.4 billion to $5 billion. We are aware also there have been many programs of one type or another which were originally designed to deal with one phase or another of the poverty situation in Canada. In general, what we have seen has been a piecemeal approach which has failed to come to grips with the real issues and fundamental problems that people below the poverty line face. As a result of this piecemeal approach, we have not reached any kind of a reasonable solution to this whole question of poverty.

I am a little amazed at this particular government which came in with a slogan of which we are all aware, but which they would rather forget. They have been resistant to taking a new and bold initiative in this area of combating poverty, a new approach to the welfare problem and a general re-assessment of whether the old programs have been of any real value in dealing with this whole question of poverty. What we have seen in the past four years have been marginal modifications of this or that old program, little adjustments here and there and tinkering with things that have been ineffective in the past. Under the present circumstances, such actions will continue to be ineffective in the general area of overcoming poverty in this country. As examples of this kind of tinkering, adjustments were made in the old age security program, the unemployment insurance program and adjustments are now being proposed in the family allowance and youth allowance program. In fact, this bill is just further tinkering. It does not really come to grips with the problems that face the country. It is a continuation of a traditional approach which has proven itself to be inadequate in dealing with the problem with which we are faced, namely the eradication of poverty on a permanent basis.

I do not deny that some of these modifications of old programs have, in small ways, had some beneficial effects for some people, but I do not deny that they have had any real significant effect from the point of view of eradicating poverty from that one fifth of our population that is unable to do it on their own. We must consider some bold new approaches. We must take a more progressive look at what really needs to be done to solve this problem or at least give the impression of seriously wanting to solve the problem. I am not saying it will ever be possible to completely eradicate poverty, but it has been shown that piecemeal approaches in the past have failed. Continuation of piecemeal approaches in the future will not likely be any more successful. We need to look at the development of a co-ordinated approach to the whole problem. There should be a co-ordination and consolidation of the various types of programs which we now have. The whole structure should be a more efficient and less costly proposition, certainly from the administrative point of view.

One of my major criticisms of this bill is that it does not come to grips with the problem of an incentive to become self-sufficient, more productive and more capable of looking after one's self and one's own dependents. It is simply a little larger hand-out to a certain group. It is nothing more than that. It would be reasonable to suggest amendments accordingly. I also want to say that, realizing we have to deal with the bill which is before the House rather than the general question of overcoming poverty in this country, I have ambivalent feelings about the bill. I support about half of it and disagree with the other half. This is a problem I have faced in this House on many occasions in the past. You come to the situation of what to do. You cannot vote for each half separately. You have to decide whether or not to vote for the whole package.

We have heard a lot of talk today about the question of universality and selectivity. In general terms, my tendency is to support selectivity. However, I think this bill covers more than the question of whether you support selectivity or universality in the family allowance program. This bill also touches a part of life which I would place in the category of established rights of Canadians, something Canadians have enjoyed for more than 20 years. For this reason, Canadians have come to feel there are established rights. When we talked about the language bill, we talked about certain Canadians who had certain language rights in certain areas. It was felt they should not be deprived of these because they fell into the category of established rights. I think that the family allowance program, as it has existed, quite easily fits into this category of established rights.

I agree that people with a high personal income do not expect a continuation of the allowance because they need it for economic reasons, but they probably consider it to be an established right which they have enjoyed for many years. What have these people done with the allowance they have been receiving? I think in the lower income group it is fair to say they have spent it in the direction that it was intended, for the purchase of clothing, possibly school books and contributing to shelter as well as the other basic needs that Canadian children in their growing years require.

We know that in the middle or higher income groups, this allowance was not particularly used for these purposes. In many cases, investment plans were established for the children involved. When the time came for a secondary education, a fund existed to assist these children to continue their education. For that reason, it will probably upset the parents in this category substantially. What has been a savings plan contributed to through the receipt of a cheque from the government will now have to be continued by a contribution from their own income.

I want to deal briefly with the fact there was a substantial increase in income tax last September for most Canadians. I recall the then Minister of Finance saying that the income tax bill would remove from the income tax rolls somewhere in the vicinity of 3/4 of a million Canadians. That, of course, was a great fallacy. I have in my possession a letter from an official of the Department of Finance. The true figure is more like 30,000 or 40,000 who will be removed from the income tax rolls. Those in the middle or higher income group will experience a very marked increase in their taxation. For this reason, I object to removing the family allowance payments from the middle income group. These people have already been imposed upon very strenuously by the income tax legislation which was rammed through the House last December by the use of that very democratic principle known as closure. Removal of the established right which these people have come to enjoy has the same effect as increasing their income tax that much more.

While I do not support the idea of universality in all areas of social welfare, I do not think it is contradictory to say that I cannot approve the removal of family allowances from the middle income group. Bearing in mind the measures recently taken to increase taxation, I believe that if these allowances are removed from the middle income group a corresponding reduction should be made in the income tax to compensate for the change. We have heard some members ask: Where will the money come from? I shall comment on this aspect in a few moments. To elaborate further on my point, we might draw a comparison at this point between family allowance and the old age security pension. Here, provision is made for a basic pension which everyone receives as an established right, if you like—a contribution by the state to senior citizens who have contributed throughout their lives to the productivity, growth and development of this country. They receive this benefit even though they may not need a pension. They are still entitled to it as a reward for their efforts on behalf of the country in the past. I would be inclined to say that the family allowance which is now distributed to Canadians across the board should continue for the same reasons. I recognize, though, that the allowance as it presently stands is nowhere near sufficient to meet the needs of those who live below the poverty line. For these people, I would suggest a plan somewhat similar to the guaranteed income supplement granted in certain cases to old age pensioners, a supplement which would be based on need and which would be more realistic in terms of meeting the basic needs of the children of poverty-stricken families.

Where will the money come from? Hon. members will gather that I am suggesting not necessarily a redistribution at this time but an additional expenditure which will prove of assistance to a particular segment of our population. In the first place, it could come from the revenue produced by the massive increase in income tax which was imposed last December. There is no question that this increased taxation will produce a very substantial return to the federal treasury by way of general revenue. Then again, large amounts of money might be saved by abolishing useless structures such as Information Canada which in my view is an unforgiveable waste of the taxpayers' money, established basically for the propaganda purposes of the Liberal party. No one, I think, doubts that this particular institution is of little value and cannot justify its existence in terms of its present cost. There are other areas in which money could be saved for the purposes I have indicated, areas of expenditure which the Auditor General has characterized as wasteful and inefficient. Large sums could be saved by more efficient planning, by more realistic projection of the cost of new structures. I have in mind, for example, the National Arts Centre, the final cost of which was more than double the original estimate; I think of the money wasted on the Bonaventure and on the hydrofoil project, of huge sums spent on the purchase of aircraft which, in fact, the defence department did not need. One need only glance at the report of the Auditor General to find examples of millions of dollars wasted in this way.

I will summarize briefly, Mr. Speaker. In my view, we should not deprive the middle income group of an established right, although I realize that people in the lower income group need a greater measure of assistance. We should do something about this. The bill is, really, a useless tool in the general endeavour we ought to be making to combat poverty among one-fifth of our population. We should be looking toward something much more progressive and much broader in scope, including incentives to individuals to increase their productivity through seeking methods of improving their skills and earning capacity. A massive co-ordinated effort should be made to combine all the existing piecemeal programs into one, thereby making the administration less expensive, and putting together all the forces which are presently working separately into one combined operation which would offer a much greater possibility of success in dealing with the poverty which now exists in our country.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated some of the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk), particularly his suggestions as to the way in which more money could be raised for programs such as this. Certainly, I think some of it might be recovered from what the government misspends, for which we receive no adequate reward.

During a visit to Newfoundland, I heard someone say that many of the housewives of that province gave Joey Smallwood the credit for the baby bonus. This individual said Joey Smallwood did nothing to discourage these women from thinking that way. It is true that the baby bonus was started, as far as Newfoundland is concerned, when it joined Confederation and obviously these women appreciated receiving this money. Certainly, they needed it and it did much for the poor people of that day.

I am a bachelor so I do not receive any baby bonus, and I was too old for my parents to get it. We live in an age during which a man who has a way with a woman will get a bonus from the government in the sense that his wife receives a cheque from the government to help raise the children. If anybody in this country is discriminated against, I suggest it is the bachelor. Unlike the minister, I can make no claim to having a way with women. I should like to find out from him something about his attitude toward this bill. I have asked housewives what they think about it in order that I might be able to make some comments on what they believe should be included in a bill of this kind. I have found that wives who feel they might lose this baby bonus cheque are very indignant. If the minister does not think this is the fact, I suggest he go out in the country and talk to these people.

I have often suggested to these women that their husbands are making good money, and have asked what difference the change in this measure would make to their income position. I have been told that these women consider this money as theirs, in comparison with family money. They budget on the basis of receiving it. I suggest that once you establish a precedent by allowing a wife a separate form of income, she will be very unhappy if you take it away. Perhaps this is a social problem, but if the minister is going to take away the baby bonus he better pass a law requiring husbands to give allowances to their wives to replace this lost income. I heard one woman, in the presence of her husband, suggest that if she was not going to get the baby bonus he would have to give her so much money. Perhaps the minister would consider some appropriate change in the legislation to this effect if he intends to remove this particular income from the pocketbooks of these women.

Let me talk for a moment about the universality of legislation we have before us, or the lack of it in this particular case. The question is selectivity versus universality. The government is not being consistent in its approach to this particular problem. The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) and the Minister of Manpower (Mr. Mackasey) are both involved in this field and they insist on universality, yet the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) emphasizes selectivity. There is inconsistency here, and I cannot understand why, if universality is good in respect of unemployment insurance, it should not be good in respect of the baby bonus. The minister should discuss this matter with the Minister of Manpower. Perhaps the other ministers would come into this Chamber and discuss this particular aspect of the legislation. We have heard the minister of health arguing in favour of selectivity. I should like to hear what the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower have to say with regard to their preference for universality. If one can argue in favour of universality on the one hand, why could the same argument not be applied on the other? This is a reasonable request. We should have some consistent approach by government in these various measures.

The cost of living has increased by leaps and bounds and we are only now getting around to increasing the baby bonus for some people. We are going to take it away from others. I do not know whether you have children, Mr. Speaker, but I certainly do not. However, I am sure you can appreciate the problems of a housewife in clothing and feeding children. I have been asked on many occasions by housewives how much I thought it cost for children's clothes, and how much it cost to pay a babysitter to look after the children while the housewife went out to work to increase the family income. I was frankly horrified when I was told of these costs. These people do not have grandmothers who will take care of the children for nothing as used to be the case; they now pay for such services. The fees charged by babysitters are often high enough that these people have to pay income tax on their earnings. I suggest the cost of raising a family is tremendous, and often even too much for those with better than average incomes or two incomes in a family.

I was discussing this matter with a young couple in my constituency. The young chap said he would rather have an increase in his exemptions for children than a grant or increase in the baby bonus. I suggested that might be alright for him because he had a fairly adequate income but would not be suitable for those whose income is not adequate, and that a baby bonus increase would be more realistic. There is a great deal of interest among the people of my constituency in this bill. As a bachelor, I naturally did not pay as much attention as I might otherwise have to this particular measure, but when the news reports about it came out, and after wives had a chance to consider them, I know they became very concerned. They are particularly concerned as to how this measure will affect them. Naturally, those in lower income brackets who will receive an increased grant are happy about this measure. I suggest they need that additional money and I commend the minister in this regard. However, those who will receive less or nothing at all will not be happy and some awkward political problems may develop for the minister. I should like to listen to a number of women asking him questions about this particular legislation, and I should like to hear the answers he might give.

Let me refer to the administrative problems involved in such a measure as this. The government will have to decide which people in which income brackets will receive money and which will not. This reminds me of the story about a farmer back in my part of the world who had a hired man. One day he went to town and gave the hired man a job of sorting potatoes into three different groups according to quality. The hired man, who normally is an excellent hard-working individual, was all played out when the farmer returned. The farmer asked him why he was all played out and the hired man replied that it was because of all the decisions. I suggest that the administrative cost in respect of a situation of this nature will outweigh some of the advantages derived from the money saved by not paying those who have larger incomes.

It seems to me a plan should be quite simple in its construction so that everybody can understand it. Anyone looking at the different clauses in this bill, trying to determine what they mean and how they will affect him, will find difficulty. For instance, farmers ask me whether it is gross income that is involved and I tell them that, logically, it should be the net income. Some of the confusion I believe comes from what I would call the administrative problem in respect of different levels of income. There would not be this problem if we had the universality concept because every one would receive the benefit. The point has been made today that awkward social problems are involved in a community where people have to prove income. I think this is unpleasant to all of us. One does not always like his neighbour to know what his income is, although it might be evident in some cases. I like to think we are moving toward a classless society. It would seem that the reverse is the case. When we do things of this nature, we introduce an old concept about those who have and those who have not. This is something from which I believe we would be wiser to move away.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) on the motion for second reading on March 24, the thought crossed my mind that I was listening to the best condemnation of the policies of the present administration I had heard in quite a long time. Last night as I listened to the debate and observed the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the former Minister of National Health and Welfare, now the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), shall I say skulking around the vicinity of the Chamber, I thought that perhaps the minister, along with his colleague, was realizing the mistake he made in introducing this bill. I have had a good deal of affection and respect for both these ministers to whom I have listened and whom I have watched in this House over a period of years. However, I have been wondering just what has been going on in the back of their minds. I am convinced both of them realize this bill is a very basic mistake.

I would say frankly to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is here, and to the President of the Privy Council if he were here at the present time, that my respect for each of them would increase very substantially if either or both of them were to resign from the government of which they are members on this very issue. I think they realize this bill is a step backward, a step not in keeping with the best traditions of the Liberal Party. Indeed, so far as I am concerned, the action which has been taken by the government in introducing this bill confirms something which has been growing in my mind during most of the years I have been in this House, that is, that actually the real Liberals are becoming fewer and fewer within the ranks of a party which calls itself the Liberal party of Canada. Over the years, the party to which I belong and its predecessor have been associated in the minds of a great many of the people of Canada with what is often referred to as a welfare state. That term, in the minds of some people, at least in this country, has rather an unpleasant connotation. Actually, it has been difficult for those of us who belong to the party to which I belong, those of us who consider ourselves to be democratic socialists, to make clear to the people of Canada that we are the party which is unalterably opposed to the welfare state.

Many spokesmen of this party over a long term, and I cite such members who are sitting here in front of me as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), have made many eloquent speeches and have fought many battles on the question of the level of poverty which exists in this country. They have argued that effective measures should be taken to deal with it. Many people have tended to equate that concern for poverty and that concern for the things which happen to people who are poor, particularly when they suffer from accidents or ill health or other misadventures, with an advocacy of the welfare state. I think this one particular step taken by the present government drives home the difference between the position we take in this party and the position of the government. It is now becoming abundantly clear that the advocates of the welfare state, with all its unpleasant connotations, are the people who sit on the government side of the House. They believe in welfare for the rich as well as for the poor, and they want the rest of us to shoulder the burden.

I believe that point was made very well a short time ago by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), when he dealt very effectively in my opinion with some of the nonsense that was being peddled by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme). It is quite true, as the hon. member for Waterloo said, that the hon. member for Montmorency is an eloquent speaker even when one has to listen to a good part of what he has to say through an interpreter. I did listen to that speech, and despite its eloquence, I have to say it sounded like a worn-out phonograph record. I have listened to it time after time from people who supported the present government and some of its predecessors when welfare measures of this type were introduced.

I listened to speeches of this type, for example, during the great fanfare when the Liberal administration under Mr. St. Laurent introduced such acts as the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act. After studying the fine print, we found these welfare measures meant, as someone said, that one had to be confined to a stretcher, so far as disabled persons allowances were concerned, and unable to lift more than one finger.

We have listened to this kind of debate when we have had arguments about the levels of benefit that should be paid under the War Veterans Allowances Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, under the Canada Assistance Plan, and indeed to a certain extent under such measures as the Canada Pension Plan which was introduced with fanfare as something which would provide a pension as a matter of right as a result of contributions paid into it. It is only now beginning to register on some of the people who thought they had accumulated pension rights under the Canada Pension Plan that it, too, has its social welfare aspects. If anyone accepts a casual job and earns more than $75 in any one month, his pension is reduced accordingly.

It does not matter where one turns in the record of legislation brought in under governments calling themselves Liberal, we have this building of what many people describe as a welfare state. In distinction to that, there have been one or two measures introduced which, in my view, did not have welfare state implications. One of them was the universal Old Age Pension Plan and the other was the family and youth allowances plans.

When the minister introduced the bill, he said, and I quote from page 1133 of Hansard of March 24:

> With this bill, two universal payment plans are being replaced by a family income security plan based on the guaranteed income concept.

One could argue whether what is in this bill could be equated with a guaranteed income concept, but I do not intend to launch upon that particular argument at this time. What I am trying to emphasize is that in this bill as well as an earlier bill with which we dealt in respect of the freezing of old age pensions and the introduction of what the government called the guaranteed income supplement, we have abandoned the trend which some of us hoped might be expanded by the present government toward universality. Because of the way this measure has been developed, we have moved further in the direction of providing, under the auspices of the present government, welfare for the rich and welfare for the poor with the mass of people in between footing the bill. I suggested that the minister, in his speech, had really condemned the general policy of the government to which he belongs. I think one of the figures in his speech which, to me at least underlines this, is the statement that he made in regard to what he refers to as the impact of the FISP proposal. On page 1134 he is recorded as saying:

> Full benefit under FISP will go to 1,249,000 families, or 35.5 per cent.

That is a straightforward statement from a minister of the government indicating that 35.5 per cent of the families in Canada are at the income level of $4,500, with perhaps a little above that for those who have large families. That is an admission of the general results of the policies of the government which have left 35.5 per cent of the families in Canada able to qualify for full benefits under this plan. That is an indication of the tacit acceptance of the government of the perpetuation of this welfare state concept, and an indication that apparently they are satisfied that from those in the middle income brackets they will have to take funds to support 35.5 per cent of the families in Canada.

I am trying to assess this in relation to the impact it will have on many of the people in my constituency who go out into our mountainous wooded hills and harvest the products of our forests, who process those products through the converting plants into lumber, plywood, shingles, or pulp and paper. These people work hard and, it might be suggested, earn good money, at least by the yardstick that is set as the income level at which it is appropriate that family allowances should be paid under this bill. Those are the people who are going to realize suddenly, when this bill becomes law, if it does, the real difference between those of us who believe in a state that is a place where people have an opportunity to make a full contribution toward increasing the wealth under arrangements which will equitably distribute that wealth and the members of this government who offer no leadership in ensuring that all people have opportunities for employment at decent levels of income. This government is content simply to take away benefits from the children of those people in order to pass them on to others who are either unemployed, under-employed or employed at low levels of wage in other parts of the country.

I believe you are indicating that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

NORTHERN ELECTRIC, MONTREAL—LAY-OFFS AND JOB TRANSFERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday, Northern Electric in Montreal announced extensive lay-offs at its Laurentian Boulevard plant, including the transfer of 300 to 600 jobs to Ontario and other locations. With these lay-offs the total number of lay-offs during the past year by Northern Electric amounts to approximately 2,000 jobs. Consequently I move:

That the entire question of Northern Electric lay-offs in Montreal be referred to the Standing Committee of Labour, Manpower and Immigration for investigation and report.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimity.

Mr. Bell: The Liberals are against it.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and therefore the motion cannot be put.

CERTIFICATION OF MASTERS BILL

REGULATION OF CERTIFICATION OF MASTERS OF FOREIGN VESSELS USING CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. David Anderson (for Mr. Groos) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-192, respecting the certification of masters of foreign vessels.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN VESSELS CONSTRUCTION STANDARDS BILL

MEASURE RESPECTING CONSTRUCTION STANDARDS FOR FOREIGN VESSELS USING CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. David Anderson (for Mr. Groos) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-193, respecting construction standards for foreign vessels.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Victoria who is presently attending a meeting of ships' pilots, may I say that the purpose of this bill is to ensure that foreign vessels using Canadian waters are subjected to the same construction standards as apply to Canadian-built vessels.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

• (1410)

MARINE TRAFFIC CONTROL (WEST COAST) BILL

MEASURE TO REGULATE AND CONTROL MARINE TRAFFIC ON WEST COAST

Mr. David Anderson (for Mr. Groos) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-194, to control marine traffic on the west coast.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, like the previous bills, this one is to regulate and control marine traffic operating within the zone adjacent to the Canadian shore on the west coast, and whose destination is a port or anchorage on the west coast of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO BUDGET AND SPECIFIC MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who I had hoped would be a very frank and open minister in the House in answering questions.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Oh, you're back!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. member's preliminary comments are relevant to the question he proposes to ask.

Mr. Stanfield: I was just reminding the minister of his reputation in the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: Think of your own.

Mr. Stanfield: I would like to ask the minister, now that we are well into the new fiscal year, whether he can yet tell us when we can expect a budget statement and financial accounting such as we are used to receiving in this parliament?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that question two days ago when the hon. member's colleague from Edmonton put the same question to me.

Mr. Stanfield: I had hoped the minister might have received some enlightenment over the weekend. I would like to ask the minister, particularly in view of unemployment remaining at 6 per cent and in view of the recent report that the rate of growth in the economy may very well slow down in the first quarter, whether he is now prepared to present to the house measures designed specifically to create jobs in this country?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman can count on me to present the appropriate measures at the appropriate time, and he will receive advance notice of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Judging from the minister's answer, is the country then in the position that action on these matters will depend more on the date and decision relating to an election rather than on the economic needs of the country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is fair comment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The response to the hon. member's question is an indication that it was argument rather than a question.

MEASURES TO PROVIDE JOBS FOR PERSONS NOW EMPLOYED ON WINTER WORKS PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Is he planning any measures at all to deal with the thousands of people currently employed on winter works programs which are due to be completed by the end of May? Has he any concrete measures to present to the House in the near future that will provide employment in the summer months for these people?

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, those employment programs are being reviewed with the provinces, and if and when the government has something to say it will say it in the House.

ASSURANCE OF USUAL PERIOD OF DEBATE IF BUDGET INTRODUCED

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, can the minister assure the House that when and if a budget is introduced the usual time will be given to the House to debate the budget and for the people of the country to become aware of its contents before the government is called to account by the people of the country in a general election?

Mr. Trudeau: What are you so nervous about?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if that were to happen I would want to assure the House that the opposition would have all the time it needed to debate a budget, if that were to come before the House, but judging from some performances the opposition may not need too much time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member on a supplementary, but obviously this is not a very productive exchange of questions and answers. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South immediately after we have heard the hon. member's supplementary.

Mr. Baldwin: It is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister what I thought was a very simple question but all we got was a bad commercial. I hope he will answer my question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I were convinced that some of the questions were devoid of political motive I would answer them in the terms they deserve.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. minister cannot impute motives.

COMBINES

INVESTIGATION OF CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" AND PURCHASE OF SUBSCRIPTION LIST BY "STAR" —NECESSITY FOR FORMAL INQUIRY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Some time ago Mr. Henry, the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act, was reported as having said in Toronto that his division was looking into the closing down of the Toronto

Telegram and the purchase by the Toronto Star of the Telegram subscription list to see whether or not a formal inquiry was required. May I ask the minister if he can inform the House whether Mr. Henry has concluded his preliminary inquiry and whether he has decided that it is necessary to go forward with something else?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding, and I should like to have an opportunity within the next day or two to doublecheck this, that the investigation indicated that there was no justification or need to pursue the matter further.

INVESTIGATION OF CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" AND PURCHASE OF SUBSCRIPTION LIST BY "STAR" —INVOLVEMENT OF RCMP

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General on the same subject, Mr. Speaker. Some months ago I asked the minister whether he could inform the House if the RCMP were involved in this investigation and he was good enough to say that he would look into the matter. Can the minister now tell the House whether the RCMP were involved?

An hon. Member: He didn't hear you.

An hon. Member: The same as yesterday.

Mr. Stanfield: The same answer as last week.

[Translation]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I trust that the minister is reading something interesting.

I asked him, a few months ago, whether the RCMP had investigated the purchase by the Toronto Star, of the Telegram subscribers' list. He then told me he would look into it and advise me. Can he do so now?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot do so now, but I shall Monday.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DELAY IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS—EFFECT OF STRIKE BY QUEBEC GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—ASSURANCE THAT CHEQUES WILL BE DELIVERED

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put a question to the Minister of Labour but in his absence and that of his parliamentary secretary, I shall put it to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

My question deals with the problems of some of the unemployed who have been waiting for their unemployment insurance cheques for three months. As several unemployed in Quebec have had to go to the welfare offices for assistance and as these offices are now closed because of the strike of the Quebec civil servants, can the minister promise that the unemployed will soon receive the money coming to them?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INDUSTRY

PULP AND PAPER—CLOSING OF MILLS—POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH INDUSTRY TO OVERCOME PROBLEM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. In view of the continuing shutdown of pulp and paper mills across Canada, accentuated by the closing of Ocean Falls in western Canada, will the minister indicate to the House what progress is being made in his discussions with the pulp and paper industry to overcome this serious situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The studies and analyses to which I referred previously in the House are continuing. We have met once again with the leaders in this industry and we are supposed to meet again.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SHORT-TERM MEASURES TO CORRECT DECLINE IN RATE OF GROWTH OF REAL OUTPUT—LONG-TERM MEASURES TO ENSURE CONTINUED GROWTH

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. The minister spoke about the possibility of a budget and other matters a few moments ago. Bearing in mind the report of Statistics Canada about the actual decline in the rate of growth of real output in Canada, and combining that with the high level of unemployment and continuing inflation, would the minister advise the House whether he has considered short-term measures, which will correct this trend and, in addition, what long-term measures does he have in mind to make sure that the economy continues to grow? He has a problem in light of his prophecy about dealing with unemployment.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the answer to that kind of question should normally be given by way of a statement on motions. If the minister thinks he can reply briefly to the hon. member's question, he will be recognized for that purpose. Otherwise, if it is to be a lengthy statement it ought to be made on motions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It should be made in a budget address.

INDUSTRY

AUTO PARTS AND ACCESSORIES—ALLEGED DECLINE IN ORDERS FROM U.S. CUSTOMERS—STEPS TO OFFSET EFFECTS OF DISC PROGRAM

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a related question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce dealing with the drop in production. Since there are now concrete indications that some Canadian suppliers of auto parts and accessories are now receiving either smaller orders or no orders at all from their normal United States customers, is the government now convinced that the DISC program is working against our industries and are any steps being taken to curb our losses of production as a result of this program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is inviting an opinion from the minister responsible. He is asking whether the minister is convinced of something or other. That is certainly not a proper form of question.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in this fashion. Since there is a drop in trade between our automobile suppliers and their normal United States customers that is attributed to the DISC program, is the minister taking any concrete steps to provide policies to counteracting this situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, what the hon. member posits is wrong. We have conducted an inquiry into the auto parts industry very recently and the inquiry demonstrates that the level of auto part exports at the moment is as high as it was last year and that it is expected to be even better next year if the present trend in automobile buying continues.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ALLEGED INTENTION TO REPLACE CORPS OF COMMISSIONAIRES BY PRIVATE DETECTIVE AGENCY PERSONNEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government about to demobilize the Corps of Commissionaires in so far as service with government departments is concerned under his jurisdiction as Minister of Public Works and replace them with personnel of a private detective agency to be appointed?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. I am not aware of any such intention on the part of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask who the minister in charge is? I do not know who the minister in charge is. Is it the Minister of Public Works? Is he the one who is in charge of this?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of any demotion of the Corps of Commissionaires. That is all I can say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, possibly I could direct my question to the Solicitor General. Has he any information on this subject?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of it for the federal buildings.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this game of shuffleboard on the part of ministers is not in keeping with the dignity of the House of Commons. Does the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I merely want to apologize to the hon. member for Greenwood whom I recognized a moment ago. Perhaps we might allow the right hon. gentleman to ask his supplementary question first.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want an answer. Are the Commissionaires, 150 of these old soldiers—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to be removed and replaced by a private agency now being advertised for to fill positions of a supervisory nature now filled by the Commissionaires?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion in the course of the past three and a half years to show my respect for the old soldiers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dubé: We have shown our respect in concrete terms and we are certainly not about to demote them in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But that does not answer my question completely.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF FINAL REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON LOW-INCOME HOUSING

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in charge of housing. Will the minister table in the House or publish the final report of the task force on low-income housing headed by Professor Michael Dennis, which I believe was presented to him recently, so that the public can be aware of what is contained in the report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Professor Dennis is still working on his editing.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTHERN ELECTRIC, MONTREAL—EMPLOYEE LAY-OFFS—REPRESENTATIONS TO COMPANY OFFICIALS RESPECTING EFFECTS—ASSISTANCE IN MARKETING PROBLEMS

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Considering the lay-offs announced yesterday by Northern Electric in Montreal, which are part of a continuing series of lay-offs, will the minister contact the authorities of Northern Electric to see if the effects of these lay-offs can be minimized and the men can be placed in other work?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that has already been done in view of the particular location in which Northern Electric is situated. There has been maximum co-operation between management, labour and the Department of Manpower to minimize the lay-offs. I am sure that Northern Electric should be or are conscious of the moral obligation they have to remain as much as possible in the province of Quebec, because little is to be gained by transferring that company and its operations out of that province to another part of Canada.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has his department any measures to assist the electronics industry in Canada and, in particular, to assist Northern Electric with its marketing problems?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, we have, Mr. Speaker. We are helping and will continue to help. We are going to help even more if possible than we have helped in the past.

NORTHERN ELECTRIC, MONTREAL—LETTER FROM UNION PRESIDENT—POSSIBLE MEETING WITH UNION REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the minister received a letter from Gordon P. Meehan, President of the Canadian Union of Communication Workers, concerning Northern Electric lay-offs and transfers of jobs to Ontario? If so, has the minister met with union representatives and does he intend to make a statement to the House in this regard?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from this gentleman and I am answering it. In a previous answer to the House I indicated that my information was that the company did not have any intention of moving from Quebec to Ontario. However, it is obvious that companies like this have to readjust and adapt to the market demands, irrespective of provincial borders. This is what the company is now doing. According to the figures I have, Northern Electric had more employees in Quebec in 1971 than in 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We should try to move on. As hon. members will notice from looking around, there are many hon. members who for one reason or another are anxious to ask questions at this time.

Mr. Pepin: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I indicate that I was giving a percentage. I meant that the percentage of employees of that company in Quebec is higher now than it was in 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has just given information which contradicts the statement he made in this House last week. When I asked him what were the intentions of the heads of Northern Electric and what he was planning to do in order to ensure the employment of the people who work for that company, the minister answered that there was nothing wrong with the situation at Northern Electric.

I would therefore ask the minister, since he gave misleading information to the House last week, to say whether he has talked with the union of Northern Electric employees in order to find out whether the 2,200 employees who have been laid off will be provided with—

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is evidently no point of order. The hon. member is putting a supplementary question. The minister may reply and we shall then go on to another subject.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a serious matter of privilege. Knowing my hon. friend, I took due precautions and if he will consult page 884 of Hansard—unfortunately I have only the English text here—he will see that I said none of the things he accuses me of having said at that time. And if I may quote in English, here is what I replied at the time—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. minister and to the hon. member as well that there is neither a point of order nor a question of privilege involved. We could spend the whole question period discussing what the minister said or did not say. It seems to me that such is not the purpose of the question period and it might be possible for the minister and the hon. member concerned to meet later and determine what really was said, but I do not believe there are grounds here for a question of privilege.

[English]

If hon. members wish to debate for 40 minutes what the minister has said or has not said, I shall hear the hon. member for Sainte-Marie and then I shall give the minister every opportunity to reply.

[Translation]

I now recognize the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I feel compelled to rise on a question of privilege, since the hon. minister has said that I had accused him of saying things that he had not said.

I simply spoke on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When hon. members ask the minister a question and he answers evasively and erroneously, we have a duty to ask him to put the information back into context and my point of order as well as my question of privilege are related, as the hon. minister accuses me of misquoting him with respect to a question that I asked him.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. minister to specify whether he has had contacts with the union representing the employees of Northern Electric, as in a letter that the union has sent us, it accuses the minister of having never contacted the employees of Northern Electric—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I intend to recognize the minister, as I said a moment ago, and we shall spend another five or ten minutes on this, but I suggest it is highly unfair to other hon. members.

[Translation]

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I feel your remarks are justified and I resumed my seat.

PENSIONS

RATIFICATION BY WEST GERMANY OF RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT WITH CANADA—DATE FOR PAYMENT TO CANADIANS OF GERMAN ORIGIN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister now in a position to answer my question of yesterday as to whether the reciprocal agreement between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany respecting the payment of pensions has been ratified by West Germany? Can the minister also tell us on what date the payment of these pensions will be put into effect in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): There are certain details I should like to fill in before making a full statement. With the hon. member's permission, I should like to make it next Monday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister undertake to make the statement in the House?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Are there any funds available at present under the local initiatives program because some groups or municipalities were unable to carry out approved projects?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the funds available for the local initiatives program to determine whether any money is still available for projects which for climatic or other reasons were begun a little later than normal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the minister that it is just about impossible to hear him because of the conversation going on next to him over the same microphone.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the funds that were placed at the disposal of the local initiatives program, particularly as far as municipalities are concerned, to determine, in cases where projects may have been delayed for reasons beyond their control—weather conditions, for instance—whether it would be beneficial to extend the termination date presently fixed for the end of May, provided, of course, that this does not involve the provision of additional money but merely the exhaustion of funds already allocated.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Champlain wish to ask a supplementary question in connection with the one he put earlier?

Mr. Matte: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us whether he discussed with the Quebec Department of Municipal Affairs the difficulties experienced by municipalities with that department in obtaining the funds required to carry out their projects?

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: There have not been meetings at the ministerial level but it is quite possible there have been meetings at the senior official level. I shall inquire.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR ISSUANCE OF TEMPORARY EXPORT PERMITS FOR ALBERTA NATURAL GAS

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister consider granting temporary export permits in view of the 500 million cubic feet per day of natural gas presently available in Alberta wells but remaining unused?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will take notice of this question and refer it to my colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who will, I am certain, bring it to the attention of the National Energy Board.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—ACTION TO IMPLEMENT SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AND IMPROVE MARKET POSITION OF CERTAIN PRODUCERS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpèque): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has anything new to report with regard to expediting and integrating the small farm assistance program of this government and the government of Prince Edward Island? I ask this question in light of the fact that farm cash receipts for that province dropped, it is estimated, by more than $5 million in 1971.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The small farms development program is, of course, not designed to resolve the very real problem that the hon. member has mentioned. There are discussions due to take place, I think, on Monday or Tuesday of next week with at least one or two of the provinces to work out the administrative details. I am as anxious as the hon. member to make this program operative as soon as possible.

Mr. MacLean: May I ask the minister whether any discussions of programs are in train for the purpose of improving the market position of growers of tobacco, potatoes and hogs, whose difficulties have given rise to this general problem in both Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker—not any specific program at the moment, but the hon. member will recall we have taken action on a number of occasions in the past few months to improve the situation.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ENSURE THAT FOODS FOR HUMANS ARE AVAILABLE ON NUTRITIONAL BASIS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the statement by the national co-ordinator of Canada's nutrition survey that the only foods now sold on the basis of their nutritional value are pet foods, will the minister take action to investigate this situation with the object of ensuring that foods for humans are also available on a nutritional basis?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): That is an excellent suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. MacInnis: Pending the carrying out of that suggestion, would the minister consider reclassifying human beings as pets who require nutritional food?

FINANCE

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF UNITED STATES TREASURY SECRETARY TO ATTEND INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE TO BE HELD IN MONTREAL

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister been in touch with the United States Secretary of the Treasury, John Connally, with respect to his announced refusal to appear with him at the international monetary conference sponsored by the American Bankers' Association to be held in Montreal from May 9 to 12 next?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): The host of that conference is the International Bankers' Association. On the agenda I received my name appears as one who will attend, and so does the name of the United States Secretary of the Treasury. I have no further information.

Mr. Ryan: Apparently it came out yesterday that Mr. Connally will not be there. As this is the first occasion since 1950 that a United States Secretary of the Treasury has refused to attend such an annual meeting, may I ask whether the government has received any assurance or indication from the United States Treasury Department that President Nixon has altered the intransigent position of Mr. Connally with respect to current trade difficulties between Canada and the United States?

• (1440)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hosts of the conference in Montreal are the international bankers, not the Canadian government. At the moment I am acting on the basis that I will be there, and the agenda shows that Mr. Connally will be there.

MANPOWER

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF THOSE TAKING TRAINING UNDER UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COVERAGE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and is in regard to a discussion at another time and in another place. What consideration is the minister giving to the inclusion of those who are taking manpower training under unemployment insurance coverage?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Perhaps I may be forgiven, Mr. Speaker; the answer would be a detailed one. Since the other place to which the hon. gentleman alluded is a very hospitable one, perhaps we should renew the meeting there and I shall provide an answer under the same circumstances and in the same surroundings.

Mr. Muir: I am very agreeable, as everyone knows. In the event that the minister's answer is in the negative, in view of the fact that allowances under manpower training are taxable as income, in view of the fact that cadets at the Canadian Coastguard College who are taking training are covered by unemployment insurance, and in view of the fact that those who take training cannot find jobs after they have completed their courses, would the minister give further consideration to this problem?

Mr. Mackasey: I certainly will, Mr. Speaker. To be quite honest, I do not know the answer to the question. I will try to find out and answer tomorrow.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. The question was asked in his absence and was to be relayed to him. As six-day mail delivery was maintained in rural areas at the insistence of many members of the House, is the minister now going to grant the same privilege to urban Canadians and reinstate six-day mail delivery to speed up mail delivery in these areas?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, what I said and I say it again, is that even if the mail delivery has greatly improved these last few years, there are still problems regarding the mail posted on week-ends. We must find a solution, and if the only one is to resume mail delivery on Saturdays, we will do so.

[English]

Mr. McKinley: How soon does the minister plan to make an announcement on this matter, and is it being investigated now?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I cannot announce a decision which has yet to be taken.

[English]

POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY—REPRESENTATIONS FROM POSTAL UNIONS—RELATIONSHIP TO CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the same subject. In view of the continuing delay in mail delivery, have representations been received from the postal unions on this matter, and is this a vital part of the current negotiations now going on for a new settlement?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is the question of restoration of six-day mail delivery part of the negotiations going on with the postal unions, has the minister received representations from the postal unions in this respect, and is it vital to a satisfactory settlement?

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No, Mr. Speaker, I don't think that the problem of mail delivery on Saturday is being negotiated at the present time. According to the first impressions gathered, some union officials were in favour of it but reports in this morning's newspapers reveal that interest was fading.

[English]

DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MAIL FROM SCOTLAND

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister look into the problem respecting mail coming from Scotland? I am in receipt of several letters which indicate that delivery is taking five to six months. Would the minister at his earliest opportunity look into this matter in order that he can make a statement to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, this problem is not one for which the Post Office Department is responsible; it is simply due to the fact that strikes in American ports have delayed the unloading of a number of postal bags.

I think that most of these bags were returned to us and have now been delivered.

[English]

POSSIBLE RESTORATION OF OTHER SERVICES IN ADDITION TO SATURDAY MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In addition to consideration being given to restoring Saturday delivery, would the minister indicate whether the department is considering restoring other services which have been affected by the policy the department has followed, I think adversely, in recent times?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): Which ones, Mr. Speaker?

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—DISCUSSION BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC RESPECTING POLICY IN HIRING WORKERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed at the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Would the minister indicate whether there have been talks at the ministers' level between Quebec and Ottawa concerning the policy to be followed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Bellechasse could ask his question.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, can I very peacefully ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether there have been talks at the ministers' level between Ottawa and Quebec concerning the policy to be followed in manpower centres in Quebec and the rest of Canada with regard to the hiring of workers for the James Bay project?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there have been informal discussions between various ministries in Quebec and Ottawa on the James Bay project. There have been no specific discussions between the ministers of manpower of Quebec and Ottawa about the possible employment policy when the project gets under way.

SUGGESTED INVITATION TO UNITED STATES TREASURY SECRETARY TO VISIT OTTAWA TO DISCUSS TRADE AND MONETARY POLICIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance which is actually supplementary to the one asked a while ago by the hon. member for Spadina. In view of the refusal by the United States Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. John Connally, to attend the international monetary conference of the American Bankers Association in Montreal, has the Minister of Finance taken any steps to invite Mr. Connally to Ottawa for a mini-conference on trade and monetary policies as they affect relations between Canada and the United States?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I have no direct information that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has either accepted or refused the invitation to the international bankers' meeting this year in Montreal. As to the second part of his question, no, I have no immediate plans at the moment to invite Secretary Connally to Ottawa.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSALS TO COMBAT ESCALATING CARE COSTS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's statement on the galloping increase in health care costs which is threatening the whole field of health care, would the minister make a statement to the House on motions outlining his proposals to correct the situation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to consider making a statement, but I think the hon. member is aware—indeed I know he is—of the quite explicit proposals that the federal government made at the last two federal-provincial conferences of health ministers regarding what we think should be considered in order to achieve the end of reducing the escalating cost of health care.

Mr. Rynard: There is a great deal of alarm abroad about the statement the minister has made, and I feel a statement should be made to the House on motions. If he would do this—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This, of course, is a representation to the minister.

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS ON POSSIBLE EFFECTS ON CANADIAN DOLLAR OF EXTERNAL BORROWING BY PROVINCES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the heavy deficit financing of provincial governments and the consequent necessity for these governments to borrow funds, possibly in foreign markets, has the minister consulted or does he intend to consult his provincial counterparts on the possible effects of heavy external borrowings on the Canadian dollar at this time?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I first met the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance in Jasper I reiterated the request of my predecessor, that wherever possible the provinces should seek to satisfy their borrowing requirements on Canadian capital markets. In the ordinary course of dealings with the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario lately, I have been apprised of the intentions of both these provinces regarding their borrowing requirements and how much they anticipate they may have to seek outside Canadian markets. I have received good co-operation from those two provinces in particular.

REQUESTED CHANGE IN INCOME TAX TREATMENT OF SALE OF MARKETING QUOTAS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In his preparations for a budgetary statement, whenever that might be, can he assure the House he is giving consideration to the representations of farm organizations for a change in the income tax treatment of the sale of marketing quotas.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to treat the preamble to the question as a hypothesis, but in answer may I say I assured the Canadian Federation of Agriculture when they met with cabinet that I had set up, in conjunction with my colleague the Minister of State from Calgary, a joint interdepartmental committee—agriculture, finance and national revenue—to review the effect of the Income Tax Act upon agriculture and farmers generally, and that subject of course, will be one of those that will be reviewed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have at this time to remind hon. members that there are two minutes left before the end of the question period. The hon. member for Regina East on a supplementary.

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON SOFT DRINKS AND CHANGE IN CUSTOMS TARIFF ON TELEPHONE ACCESSORIES FOR DEAF

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Finance indicate whether he is giving consideration to requests for the implementation of the recommendation in the Carter report that the sales tax on soft drinks be removed, and could he also indicate whether he is giving consideration to changing the customs tariff as it affects telephone accessories for deaf people?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first part of the question I think I have received representations from virtually every member of the House about the soft drink manufacturers and the sales tax. I am meeting with a delegation from that industry later this week or the beginning of next week. In answer to the second part of the question that is one of a variety of issues of this kind that I am considering.

INTERLAKE AREA, MANITOBA—POSSIBLE ENLARGEMENT OF PROGRAMS TO PROVIDE SEWER AND WATER SERVICES IN TOWNS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In relation to the ARDA and FRED programs which are being carried on in the Interlake area of Manitoba, can the minister say whether consideration is being given or has been given to enlarging the programs in order to give financial assistance to the number one priority of the area, namely, sewer and water services in the towns that do not have these services?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member must be aware that priorities concerning ARDA programs are decided by the provinces, not by the federal government. It all depends, therefore, on whether the province itself asked that such works be done.

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION AND PROVINCES INVOLVED

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture related to a question asked previously in connection with the small farms policy. How long will it be before the small farms policy which has been proposed by the government will be in operation and to what provinces will the initial impact of the program be directed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as soon as possible. The only delay at the moment is in working out with the provinces the administrative responsibilities between the two levels of government. In so far as I am concerned I hope the result will be that the benefits will be available uniformly and equally in all provinces across Canada.

SHEEP—INQUIRY AS TO WINTERING ALLOWANCE PAID TO QUEBEC PRODUCERS

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Was a wintering allowance paid by the federal government to the sheep producers of Quebec and, if so, why was such an allowance not paid in Saskatchewan?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): There was no such program paid by the federal government.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALBERTA—POSSIBLE CHANGES IN DESIGNATED AREA BOUNDARIES FOLLOWING EXPIRY OF PRESENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact the agreement between his department and the government of Alberta is about to expire in respect of the designated areas, can the minister indicate whether there is a plan to change the boundaries of these designated areas or whether they will be continued as they are now?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I said, I think yesterday or the day before, that we are in the process of consultation with the provinces concerning the designated areas.

Mr. Speaker: We have just about run out of time. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might be allowed a question before I call orders of the day.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICIES TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance arising out of his suggestion that he suspected political motivation behind certain questions asked him about a budget. Having just come from a part of Canada where unemployment is even more serious than it was at this time last year, I should like to ask the minister in all earnestness, no matter what he may suspect about my motives, whether he will tell the House and the country when he will be prepared to announce his policies and his position?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I share the hon. gentleman's concern about unemployment in this country and I want to assure him I will respond to his question at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government House leader about the business for this week and, if he is sufficiently informed, he might like to go on to next week as well.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today we will continue with the family income security plan, followed by the Criminal Code amendments, hijacking and privacy, followed by the Farm Credit Act, followed by the Explosives Act, an act respecting wildlife in Canada and the CNR financing bill. I hope to call an opposition day for Monday. I would like to mention that it may not be possible to call these items in the order given, but if that becomes the case there will be advance consultation. In so far as tomorrow is concerned I should like to have some consultation later in the day as to what item might be suitable for discussion tomorrow.

Mr. Yewchuk: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order concerns the insufficient number of copies of the bill dealing with the Explosives Act. There are not sufficient numbers. There is great interest in this legislation in the country and we are unable to obtain sufficient copies to provide them to interested citizens in order that they may make representations on this matter before it comes before the House. I wonder whether more copies of the bill might be provided to members of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume this is a question which normally ought to be directed to the officials of the House, but I am advised that at this moment additional copies are being prepared for distribution to hon. members.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed, from Wednesday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and the amendment (Mr. Lewis) p. 1448.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, yesterday while the Leader of the New Democratic Party was speaking to the second reading of this bill he said it was a veritable nightmare from an administrative point of view. I should like to spend a little time today documenting the statement made yesterday by my leader. In the remarks I made yesterday afternoon, I hope I made clear that this administrative nightmare is really inherent in the deficiencies of principle in the bill which are pointed out by the amendment under consideration at the present time.

I suggest very few Canadian people have any real inkling of just what lies before them if and when this bill becomes law. Not all people in Canada will read Hansard, but more people will read it than will read the fine print in the bill that is before us for consideration. I intend to spend part of my time in documenting this statement about an administrative nightmare by indicating through some actual references to the text of the bill just what form the nightmare may take. I suggest that if one considers the high number of applicants there have been for unemployment insurance this past winter, and the administrative nightmare that resulted from the operation of that act, one realizes that that was a very mild foretaste of what lies ahead for a great many Canadians if this bill is passed. Indeed, in my view, the two are interrelated.

I would like to suggest also that while my main concern is for the general citizenry of Canada, I do have some feeling for the employees of the government of Canada who, if this bill becomes operative, will have the responsibility of trying to deal with irate and perplexed citizens. In fact, I would go so far as to suggest that what we should be considering, if we are going to pass this kind of bill, is the doubling or tripling of the number of members in this House, because if many of us had to spend a good deal of our time during this past winter trying to unravel some of the difficulties caused by the new unemployment insurance plan, we can be sure that sort of activity on our part will be trebled under this plan.

I suppose one should start with the clause which determines the amount of benefit paid under the bill. I suppose this might be described as the simplest part. It reads:

The amount of a benefit in respect of a child for any month in a benefit year is,

(a) in the case of a child who is less than twelve years of age, $15, and

(b) in the case of a child who is twelve or more years of age but less than eighteen years of age, $20, minus 33 cents for each full $100 of income by which the income of that child's family for the base calendar year exceeds

(c) $4,500 when that child is the only child in the family,

I suppose it is fair to say that that involves a calculation which is relatively simple, so that part of the bill may be comprehensible to large numbers of people. However, the calculations involved become increasingly complicated as one starts deducting 33 cents for each additional full $100 of income. If a person has an income of $4,599.99, and a child who is 11 years old, that child will get $15; but if the income is $4,600, he would only get $14.67. That is perhaps the simplest part of the bill.

However, we then come to the part which is headed "Statement of Estimate of Income". Here we see a close relationship to the kind of calculation that is required of people who apply for the guaranteed income supplement. This section of the bill provides for the filing of a statement of income, otherwise the benefit cannot be approved. There have been complications in the dealings that people in receipt of the guaranteed income supplement have had with the government. Many members are fully aware of the difficulties connected with the adjustment of income and the reclaiming of benefits paid. Those are problems which come to the attention of members and problems with which the administrative officials have to deal. But let us remember that when we are speaking of people who are getting the guaranteed income supplement, by and large we are speaking of people who are receiving retirement benefits or who are in receipt of the basic old age security pension. These considerations do not apply when we are talking about benefits payable to or on behalf of children of parents who are earning an income.

In documenting what I consider to be a complete administrative nightmare, I should like to refer to those parts of the bill that deal with occasions when a family's income is reduced or increased, just to give some idea of the kind of gobbledygook with which an individual citizen is faced. Let me make reference to that part of the bill which reads:

(2) Where at any time during the base calendar year or during the fourth month of a current benefit year a parent

(a) ceases to hold an office or employment previously held by him or ceases to carry on a business previously carried on by him, or

(b) for any other reason suffers a loss or reduction of income, as a result of which event or occurrence it is reasonable to expect that the income of the family for the calendar year next following the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place will be substantially reduced, the parents may, in such manner and within such time as are prescribed, file a statement of the estimated income of the family for that next following calendar year, in which case the income of the family for that calendar year shall be deemed to be the income of the family for the base calendar year.

(3) Where at any time during the first eleven months of a benefit year, other than the fourth month, or during the eight-month period next before that benefit year a parent

[Mr. Barnett.]

(a) ceases to hold an office or employment previously held by him or ceases to carry on a business previously carried on by him, or

(b) for any other reason suffers a loss or reduction of income

as a result of which event or occurrence it is reasonable to expect that the income for the family for the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place or for the next following calendar year will be substantially reduced, the parents may, in such manner and within such time as are prescribed, file a statement of the estimated income of the family for the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place, in which case the income of the family received during that part of the calendar year after the month in which the event or occurrence took place divided by the number of months in that part of that calendar year and multiplied by twelve shall be deemed to be the income of the family for the base calendar year.

Then the bill repeats that exercise in semantics in dealing with the situation when the family income is increased. If anything is going to cause confusion and misunderstanding, is going to leave people not knowing where they stand from one month to the next in relation to the receipt of family allowance benefits, I suggest it is that formula set out in the bill. If one puts that provision together with the new and much more complex provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the result will be that each time somebody files a claim for unemployment insurance benefit he will probably have to file a statement showing what adjustment should be made in the family allowance payments to his children.

I notice that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) is in the chamber. I know he is well aware of some of the complexities faced by people who made application for unemployment insurance benefits last winter. I ask him to visualize the situation, if he continues to hold that office next winter, when people will not only be in turmoil over whether they get their unemployment insurance or not, but will be in turmoil over whether their family allowance cheques are to be cut off, increased or reduced.

People will be in a turmoil over what to do if they are laid off and their family income is reduced. They will need to know what to do if they are called back to work. I can just imagine what will happen in the case of some of the loggers on Vancouver Island who have been having problems with unemployment insurance. I can just imagine what will happen when they are called back to work again and their income is increased. They will have to go all through this exercise again. They will feel apprehension about their family allowance cheques in addition to worrying about whether their unemployment insurance cheques will catch up with them after they return to work. When the leader of my party suggested that this bill would lead to an administrative nightmare he was not exaggerating the impact of the bill.

In other parts of the bill, there are provisions to extract information respecting claimants from other departments of government. We have had a tradition in Canada that our incomes are known only to the Department of National Revenue. Now, the Department of National Health and Welfare will have access to income information. In addition to that, income information may be given to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of Supply and Services, the Unemployment Insurance Commission and to an officer employed in Statistics Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It might as well be in the newspaper.

Mr. Barnett: I hesitate to use this word, Mr. Speaker, but to check on this information we will create, under the terms of the bill, what can only be described as a government Gestapo service. If somebody makes a mistake in supplying income information, and somebody also takes the notion that he made the mistake knowingly, that person is liable to imprisonment. According to the terms of the bill:

> Every person who knowingly makes a false or misleading statement in any application or statement required or permitted by this Act or makes any such application or statement that by reason of any non-disclosure of facts is false or misleading, > provides any person employed in the administration or enforcement of this Act or appointed to make an inquiry under this Act with any statement or information that is false in any material part—

The clause then refers to cashing cheques, and so on.

> —is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to both.

Parents who make application under this legislation and who make a mistake in their applications, are liable to imprisonment for six months and fines of up to $1,000 if someone believes they made such mistake knowingly.

We have come to accept the fact that the Department of National Revenue is the body which polices our income returns to determine the accuracy of them. This may be necessary in order to ensure that all people carry their fair share of the tax burden. But if one starts multiplying that kind of authority and extending it to other government departments, then the ordinary citizen will feel so overwhelmed by this supervision of every move he makes, each time he is laid off, each time he goes back to work for a week or a month, and makes some mistake in reporting his income, that the scientists of Canada should be put to work developing a portable computer for all citizens which could be supplied with the family allowance cheques to help him avoid running afoul of the law. These illustrations support the statement made yesterday by the leader of the New Democratic Party when he moved the amendment opposing the principle of this bill, and suggested that the citizens of Canada had an administrative nightmare ahead of them.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly my duty to speak to the motion for second reading of Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children.

This legislation, sponsored by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) will turn into a nightmare for Canadian families, instead of an assistance measure. The government, I suggest, seeks by this legislation to replace the present family allowance plan which, as is generally known, is a universal plan applying to all children—those under 10 now receive $6 a month, those between 10 and 16 receive $8.

The bill before us purports to abolish the principle of universality instead of merely increasing family allowances. The government, on the one hand, will grant a very slight increase of these family allowances, giving $15 to children under 12, and $20 to children between 12 and 18.

On the other hand, however, while giving this slightly increased amount, the government will be establishing a nightmarish system for families which will end up by disgusting them rather than helping them.

• (1520)

As some hon. members have done before me, I will refer to certain clauses of the bill in order to clarify this point. In the government bill now before us, and according to paragraphs (a) (b) and (c) of subclause 1 of clause 6, a ceiling has been set on family income which, if exceeded, will entail a decrease in family allowances in respect of children and, under some circumstances, their eventual disappearance.

This bill provides that benefits of $15 and $20 will be reduced by 33 cents for each full $100 of excess family income. And as I said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to read these figures.

My colleagues of the Social Credit party and myself have made some calculations in this respect to see where we were heading.

For example, if the parents of an only child earn a yearly income of $6,000, the maximum allowable income of those parents will be deducted from this amount thus making a difference of $1,500 resulting in an allowance decrease of $4.95. The benefit in respect of the child will therefore amount to $15 less $4.95, or $10.05.

If the parents have two children, the income ceiling, according to the provisions of the bill, is set at $4,500 plus $500, making a total of $5,000. This amount is deducted from the gross income of $6,000, leaving an excess of $1,000 entailing a reduction of 10 times 33 cents, or $3.30. A child will be entitled in this particular case to $11.70.

This is all very intricate, Mr. Speaker. This is the system which is being foisted on every Canadian family.

For a couple with one child and an income of $8,000, the ceiling is set at $4,500 and the benefit at $11.55. For a family with two children and a gross income of $10,000, the ceiling would therefore be $5,500 and the benefit would decrease by $18.15. Thus we have the picture. And the bill says that the child will not even get 15 cents a month when the allowance is less than $5.

Such a bill has been introduced by the government, Mr. Speaker. How will it be enforced? In the recommendation that goes with the bill it is said that this measure tends not only to provide for the benefits but also to provide for the calculation of such benefits and the determination of the persons or institutions to whom they are payable and the times at which they are payable.

That is very precise, Mr. Speaker. This means that in this measure the government provides for a whole administrative and technical system of red tape to get people into line, to determine whether the children of a given family will receive benefits or not.

To do that, through this legislation, the government provides for a selective approach. Instead of sending family allowances to all children, on a universal basis, as it is doing now, the government removes this principle, which has been taken for granted, and wants to adopt the selective approach. In other words, we are going to give allowances to certain children, on the basis of extraordinary complex calculations to which I referred a while ago.

How will such data be used to determine whether a family is to be assisted or not? A host of civil servants will make the decisions on the basis of increases or decreases in the number of children in each family, as well as on the basis of increases or decreases in family income. This is precisely the point on which I should like to elaborate.

In clause 8, for instance, we read that a statement of income must be submitted with the application. This means that if a family wants to receive family allowances, it will not get them until it has submitted a statement of income each year, somewhat in the same way as for an income tax return.

This legislation also provides that whenever some change occurs in the family income—be it the father's or the mother's—the family has to make a new statement of income. This, according to a very serious study made by technocrats, will have the effect of reducing the amount of allowances by 5, 10, 15 cents, $1, or more.

And if for some reason or other a person goes on strike or becomes ill, which would bring a change in his income, he must, in order to avoid making a false statement, being sued and having to pay a fine, make a statement to inform the government of the new circumstances.

I want to say straight out that I am going to oppose categorically the principle of this legislation which is only going to increase bureaucracy in Canada and to create more annoyances for Canadians. In short, this legislation, far from serving the population, will just increase its problems.

Mr. Speaker, needy families in Canada are already bothered no end because of all the welfare measures—both provincial and federal. A number of investigators go from home to home asking: Do you have any money in the bank? Do you have any money hidden in the house? Have you bought a new fridge or stove lately? Do you have any lodgers here, and, if so, how much money do you get from them, and how long have they been staying here?

Such investigations are being made constantly, and people are being bothered by governments which spend most of their revenues on paying bureaucrats, instead of giving the money to families who need it.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is another measure enacted by the government to help families. It is good in itself, since it provides a worker who is temporarily unemployed with up to $100 per week in benefits. But in order to get it, he must deal with a whole army of bureaucrats, which is a terrible headache, no matter what the minister may say, regardless of the numerous delays. Why? Because the administration has been centralized and the number of officials unduly increased.

I shall give only one example to make the minister responsible for this bill realize what is involved here. There is a provision in this new Unemployment Insurance Act under which illness is covered, provided the patient submits a medical certificate.

But there is nothing in the act about the part to be played by the physician. In fact, the worker who becomes unemployed due to illness has to wait in line to obtain a medical certificate, and until he submits it, he is not entitled to any benefits.

And when he finally gets to see the doctor and to take up his time with that request, the latter issues a certificate between two appointments and sends it to the regional office. The public servant is then entitled, under the law, to decide whether this is a serious illness or not. The public servant reaches that decision on his own. I wonder what sort of ability he has to diagnose people's illnesses. He decides that that person will not be eligible to unemployment insurance benefits because his medical statement is incomplete or inaccurate. The claimant then gets the following answer: You are not eligible, for your medical certificate is incomplete. Therefore he must go through the whole process again, aware that the end result might be the same as the first time.

This shows how ridiculous the unemployment insurance legislation is. Indeed, the government is giving some public servants, who hardly know how to add or to substract, the authority to decide whether people are ill or not. Finally, this legislation is more of a nuisance than anything else.

Now, what are we doing, at this time, with family allowances? Exactly the same thing. But there, the intrusion into people's privacy is even more obvious.

• (1530)

Instead of quite simply giving everyone, with a minimum of bureaucracy, the same right to receive allowances, the government prefers to "divide" the population into two segments, stating that those whose incomes are above $8,000 will no longer receive these allowances and those whose incomes are below $8,000 will be entitled to them, providing they report their income and what they expect to receive during the year and advise the government of any change in their income, failing which their allowances will be discontinued.

What will happen, Mr. Speaker? It is quite simple. Mr. X's family, living on Y street in Victoriaville, will apply for family allowances. Mr. X will produce a statement of income which will be sent to a public servant. The public servant will compare the statement with the same family's income tax return, checking for possible false statements, and then if all these requirements have been met, and all the complicated calculations mentioned at the very start of my remarks have been carried out, the civil servant may send the family allowance right away. If he finds any details lacking, what will he do? He will say the decision on your family allowance will remain pending unless you supply such and such data, tell us for whom you worked, at what date, how much you earned, whether another member of your family besides yourself is working, etc., etc. The report will then come back to the civil servant who will work out the calculations and it will be months before the individual receives anything.

Mr. Speaker, it might be said: Yes, but there will be retroactivity. But what is the philosophy behind the government's introduction of legislation which, instead of just assisting the people, will strictly contribute to aggravate them? Here is an example of the ridiculous nature of the legislation. In case of a decrease in income, the family will have to file a statement with the government, otherwise the statement will automatically be false, and the family will probably be liable to a fine. These civil servants are experts on fines. What should the family do if the family income is reduced? Here is what the bill says at page 8:

(2) Where at any time during the base calendar year—

This means that the family will have to file a statement five, four, three, ten or twelve times a year, or as often as there is a change in the family income.

I resume the quotation:

Where at any time during the base calendar year or during the fourth month of a current benefit year, a parent

(a) ceases to hold an office or employment previously held by him or ceases to carry on a business previously carried on by him, or

(b) for any other reason suffers a loss or reduction of income,

Whatever this reduction of income may be.

I continue the quotation:

—as a result of which event or occurrence it is reasonable to expect that the income of the family for the calendar year next following the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place will be substantially reduced, the parents may, in such manner and within such time as are prescribed file a statement of the estimated income of the family for that next following calendar year;

There again, Mr. Speaker, what bureaucratic nonsense. Obviously, the family cannot estimate to the last cent the income it will be getting. Therefore, a statement of an estimated income will have to be filed. If this family makes a mistake, if it cannot anticipate everything, it will be accused of making a false statement, and, consequently will have to pay a fine.

I continue the quotation:

—in which case the income of the family for that calendar year shall be deemed to be the income of the family for the base calendar year.

And so on.

Subsection (4) provides the following:

—that the income of the family—will be substantially increased—

Then, line 39 reads as follows:

—file a statement of the estimated income of the family for the next following calendar year—

And so on, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, this bill is absolutely revolting. It will only add to the dissatisfaction amongst the people, the division between them. For instance, a family with one or two children receives $30 a month, the neighbour will ask how much they get in family allowances? He will be told $30. He can then obviously know exactly what the income of that family is because the same calculation will apply in all cases.

Before, a person's or a family's income was a personal thing which did not concern the whole town or country. Now, because of the system, the government will help to spread that much more dissension among people. That is exactly what the government seems to be looking for. Before, filling out your income tax form was relatively simple. With the tax reform, it has become so complicated a procedure that people must go to an accountant and pay his fee. Now, we will have to make a statement on income with regard to family allowances every time the financial situation changes. Is there anything more ridiculous, more revolting?

I shall give you an example to show what thinking lies behind this, the thinking that inspires the government. When a man becomes entitled to the old age security pension and his income is not adequate, he applies for the guaranteed income supplement. What is such person to do? Another income statement with a check of bank accounts, etc.

Mr. Speaker, why continue to bother the people, to socialize the individual, to control strictly all his activities? Why continue to do so and act in such a way that Canadians are increasingly becoming mere numbers in their country instead of builders? This is the aim of this government. On the contrary, the members of the Social Credit of Canada suggest that we stop bothering the people.

What will be the administrative costs of the family allowances program? It will cost millions of dollars merely for comptrollers, scientists, technocrats, investigators, etc. The remnants or the remainder will be paid as family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, why not establish a realistic social security system in Canada instead of being always negative, always bothering people, always making them dance a few steps before giving them a penny, doling out 42 cents a month in assistance as was the case with the old age pension? Let us stop this tomfoolery if we are really serious in this House and start a social security program tailored to the needs of the individual. Let us give every Canadian family and every Canadian citizen the possibility of living decently in this country instead of constantly pestering them and giving them nothing but the crumbs left over once the bureaucrats have helped themselves.

Mr. Speaker, if we are intelligent enough to land on the moon, if we are clever enough to ensure that technology and progress keep on growing in Canada, we should be at least brilliant enough to create a financial system that will provide positive social security for Canadians.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that they will find it odd, in this House, that social credit is again referred to concerning this bill, but nevertheless this bill is in complete contradiction with the creditiste philosophy advocating for all a guaranteed minimum income so that they may live decently, an income paid automatically without any difficulty and investigation so that they may then keep on improving their lot without stumbling over officials.

I shall give you but one example. You will say: Yes, but this is expensive. But it does not cost more, on the contrary. If administration costs are reduced, there will be more money to give to people and less to bureaucrats.

Mr. Speaker, some of our colleagues say that the situation is not rosy out west. Why? Because the people from that area have too much wheat, too much of everything.

In Quebec things are going bad because there is too much wood, too much milk, in short too much of everything.

In the Maritimes conditions are also bad because there is too much of everything. So, the government clamps down on production.

At the same time, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) grants millions of dollars to create employment and boost production. One man says produce more, the other argues against higher production.

I am thinking about the Canadian policy on milk, wheat, fisheries, etc.

• (1540)

The problem in Canada is that we have a sector called the production sector of which the Canadian people should be proud. Instead, three families out of five in Canada are literally starving. The Croll report on poverty changes nothing to the fact that we have over a million unemployed. Indeed, unemployment and welfare have become our main industries in Canada. We let people live in poverty, despite the high volume of production. This is a scandal in Canada: riches and poverty live side by side. And in order to solve the problem of minimum security, the government contrives all sorts of civil service gimmicks to go on irking people who, while they get entangled in all those investigations, will go on starving in their own country.

Yet Canada is the second largest country in the world. It is situated between two oceans and draws its wealth from unlimited sources, but there is poverty nevertheless. But at the same time Denmark, a small country which can rely only on its mineral resources, enjoys a standard of living comparable with ours.

Japan, which has 122 million inhabitants living on twelve small islands, now ranks third among trading countries in the world. As for us, with a lot of mineral resources and an overflow in every field—minerals, wood products and all kinds of other resources—we give away our hardwood by granting timber concessions without doing anything to ensure forestation. As for softwood, we have so much that our factories, like Domtar, in Trois-Rivières, must close down and dismiss their employees because they cannot transform all the wood. It is the same picture in fisheries.

In this country which is overflowing with wealth, there are people dying of starvation. This administration insists that there must be no inflation, that inflation is at the root of all our problems. Can anyone imagine such inconsistencies!

So, for the past three or four years, this administration fought mercilessly against inflation. To end up with what? Unemployment. And now that we are fighting this new enemy, prices are going up again. This is complete chaos.

And this bill has been given the same slant as those on unemployment insurance, social welfare and all the other plans which this government has introduced and which contributed directly to the growth of bureaucracy and the reduction of the real assistance which families need.

Mr. Speaker, since when does a Canadian government have the power to decide who has the right to live to discriminate between the children of families whose, income is $8,000 per year or less and those which earn in excess of $8,000? On whose authority does it exercise the power of deciding someone's fate while subordinating this right to the hypothetical results of various inquiries?

Hon. members realize that the control of the situation has shifted from the government to an all powerful bureaucracy that gobbles up millions of dollars collected through taxation to administer programs, while the Canadian people are only given bits and pieces.

I would be most interested to know what Canadians had to pay to officials to enable them to increase senior citizens' pensions by 42 cents a month and I would be greatly indebted to the minister who fights for this bill as if it were the apple of his eyes if he could tell us the estimated costs earmarked for the administration of the family allowance plan.

I would like to know what benefits will acrrue to the Canadian people and what will be the administrative costs of this program. But I am sure the hon. minister does not know the answer, because he does not care. He does not care to know how much the bill will cost. What matters is to shore up his control over each Canadian citizen, to increase the rub-a-dub for the Canadian people instead of helping them.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people of Lotbinière are thirsting for economic security and freedom. They do not want to be bothered any more. On the contrary, they want to be helped and encouraged to progress in life instead of being discouraged.

Did you ever notice that whenever someone is trying to make headway in Canada there is a government to hamper his efforts?

In the House, I have previously brought forward this fact. If the father of a family is working hard to get a decent income and succeeds in earning over $8,000, he will automatically lose his family allowances. Is it the way a hard-working man is being rewarded for his efforts? This is certainly not the proper way to encourage Canadians to have the interest of their country at heart.

Let us take the case of a student. He does not work during summer but, on the other hand, he will be granted the maximum grant available when he returns to school.

On the other hand, if he worked all summer, he will not be entitled to any bursaries from either government, federal or provincial. As a matter of fact, he will be told: "Considering your earnings of last summer, we cannot grant you a bursary. Therefore, the student who had nothing to do all summer long will get a bursary whereas the one who worked will not get anything. This is surely not a way to encourage people to help build their own country.

What afflicts me is that in spite of past experiences, in spite of the noisy display thrusted upon this House by the government, this same government is still following the way of control, which amounts to dominating the individual and assigning him "ceilings". The work and energies of the individual are subject to a never-ending control.

The same may be said of the farmers. Whenever one of them exceeds his milk quota, not only is he deprived of any encouragement on the part of the government, but he also has to pay a tax, or a fine for having worked too hard. That is most economical!

Mr. Chairman, conditions have become unbearable. Our economy will never progress if it feeds only on the eloquence of our ministers. The Canadian economy will never work that way. Indeed, it will only work inasmuch as Canadians will play the game, inasmuch as the government will stop pestering them. Instead, let us give them whatever encouragement we can so they may co-operate in the building of a nation of their own.

Mr. Speaker, there is no other way. We must stop—and that is urgent—passing legislation that will merely help divide our people, to emphasize class struggles and discourage the individual.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have to tell the House such things. I am really sorry to see the Canadian people in their present situation, due mainly to their having a majority government. The government claimed that with a majority, it could settle all problems, that a majority government was absolutely necessary to prevent disorder in Canada, to build up a sound economy and check unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, we have a majority government. What is it doing? It introduces measures designed to discourage initiative. More and more I have the impression that there are fewer and fewer people working in Canada and that it is the working people who provide for the increasing number of those who remain idle.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, this is not true!

Mr. Fortin: The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion says it is not true.

Mr. Speaker, I invite him to visit my riding again, where he is always welcome, and not to keep to Liberal circles. Then, I will introduce him to the people of Lotbinière and he will find out that I am telling the truth.

On my street, Mr. Speaker, a father of eight children is working 14 or 15 hours a day. Because of that, he will be deprived of his family allowances, since he is earning over $8,000 a year. His neighbour, another man with a family, is on welfare and can support three children. That one will get the maximum allowance.

Perhaps the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will tell me that this is all normal. As for me, I would tell him that I find it awkward to tell a worker to keep on working with all his heart, his energy, his life and his health and that whever he will earn over the ceiling will be given to someone else!

Mr. Speaker, I maintain that Canadians are entitled to live in their country and unless this government recognizes the right of Canadians to build their country, disagreement, the current conflicts in Quebec, social troubles which hurt us so much, and economic slowdown will prevail. This is due to the fact that everybody's problem is a money problem, and not a constitutional problem; it is not a problem of language, economic expansion or regional differences. We have reached the point where the whole country should be considered a designated area.

Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude by saying that the government has a choice to make and that it should make it now because the people are going to make it soon. Either we go on adopting gimmicks such as the one before us today, which only serves the purpose of irking the people and increasing the powers of technocrats, or in other words we go on treading the way of extreme socialism, or else we change our course and deal with the true problem in Canada, which is financial in character, we give each human person his freedom and security. and we recognize the right of each human being to life and security.

Mr. Speaker, I often ask two questions to which I have never been able to get an answer. Perhaps the minister could tell me how it is that we make reforms in all fields—it would take me longer than this day to list them all—except in the one monetary field.

I ask the minister why we can discuss any matter, except something which is taken in the House, the banking or financial reform. This golden calf is so sacred that we must hide to speak about it.

Mr. Speaker, the minister tells me that it is normal, because everything is okay. I strongly urge him to come and explain that to the Canadian people. It is urgent!

Reforms have been made in every field, except in the monetary field. When we refer to family allowances, etc. we hear not a word. All's well. When we mention the constitution, we hear not a word. All's well. When we refer to languages, we hear not a word. All's well. Discussions are sometimes held between Ottawa and the provinces, but they always boil down to the same problem, to wit who is going to tax: Ottawa or the provinces. Finally, everybody is speaking about financial matters, but instead of dealing with the monetary problem, the debate is carried on.

Mr. Speaker if the minister prefers to keep with those people who talk, good for him. As for me I would rather be with those who do things.

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, after the speech we have just heard, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words in defence of this bill. The measure now before parliament proposes a new family income security plan which will directly benefit two and a half million Canadian families. One half of those families, that is, 1,250,000 Canadian families, will receive the maximum benefit under this plan, which is $15 per month per child under the age of 12 and $20 per month per child between the ages of 12 and 17. And these are non-taxable benefits.

The effect of this plan is to redistribute income, to place additional buying power in the hands of those who need it most. That is the basic principle of the bill and it is one which must be emphasized in the course of this debate. Although it is almost impossible to define in an objective way exactly what is meant by social justice, I am satisfied that the plan before us at least approaches such an ideal. It is true there are those who will cease to receive the family and youth allowances. But a wiser man than I once pointed out that social justice is not a single and simple ideal of society but that it is an essential part of a great complex of social change, and that to achieve it some things may have to be sacrificed. In this case, those with greater earning power in our society will have to sacrifice the monetary pittance which they now receive from the family and youth allowance plan.

No one pretends that the new family income security plan will of itself eradicate poverty within our borders. But it is an essential part of an evolving federal program designed to bring about total income security. It coordinates with the old age security plan, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan, unemployment insurance and the Canada Assistance Plan, all of which are designed to help ensure that needy families keep a roof over their heads, bread on the table—with perhaps some meat as well—and the bill collector away from the door.

It may be that those who succeed us in this chamber in years to come, will regard these various plans and programs as merely timid steps toward a full scale guaranteed annual income. Such a massive extension and intensification of social justice as this may well be enacted in due course along with an amendment to the Bill of Rights stating that all Canadians have a democratic right to consume at least a basic minimum of the goods and services produced by a high-geared technological society such as our own.

Some Canadians, including some members of this House, have expressed concern about the complexity of the family income security plan, despite assurances as to the efficiency of operation of this plan thanks to computer programming.

An hon. Member: Like the unemployment insurance plan?

Mr. Penner: I am coming to that; just be patient. Many citizens envisage arguments and disputes with bureaucrats about their benefits. They see themselves engaged in exchanges of correspondence with officials, appeals to members of parliament and general fuss and bother such as one hon. member just mentioned has gone on in connection with the unemployment insurance plan. We all know there were difficulties with that plan for all concerned, most particularly for the beneficiaries. But it seems to me it should not be beyond our skill to work out a system under which those who qualify for benefits under the new plan will be spared the agony of having to make a case for what is due to them under the law. I really think the minister should assure the House that his officials are, in fact, making all the necessary arrangements and that a computer programming system has been developed which will make the administration of the program as simple and convenient as possible. I am confident that this can be done.

The family income security plan does not come cheaply. It is estimated that it will cost approximately $800 million a year, which is $150 million more than the present expenditure on family and youth allowances. If the government were to retain the existing universal scheme while doubling the amount of the benefits, the cost would rise by an additional $560 million per year. The family income security plan, costing much less, puts more dollars in the places where they are most required. I agree with the minister that it is a more efficient use of the tax dollar.

Opposition spokesmen have been critical of the selective nature of the plan, arguing that the move to selectivity makes it a welfare program, something which universal payments avoided. Do they also argue that selective payments or subsidies to various sections of the agriculture industry are similarly welfare schemes? In northwestern Ontario, where the forest products industry is king, we would dearly love to benefit from something similar to the Prairie Lift program, or from a two-price system for our products. But the need for selectivity has ruled us out. While we do not like it, we realize it is a necessity of life. By the same token, it seems to me that thousands of Canadian families need help, also on a selective basis, in meeting their obligations as parents.

This is something that will not only benefit them but help the economy because the money they will spend will be mainly on essential items, thus helping to bring about an acceptable level of family living.

Returning for a moment to that difficult concept of social justice, it seems apparent that justice requires that all shall have the chance to follow the natural human instinct to make for themselves a reasonably happy and satisfactory life. In so far as income redistribution can help achieve that end, governments have a clear and unambiguous obligation to act. To have an equal concern for the good lives of its members requires that society treat people differently, selectively. The unemployed and the sick receive certain benefits. The old receive pensions. Those with families and small incomes receive income supplements, and all of this on a selective basis. The principle of selectivity is fair, it is equitable and it is logical.

I see the family income security plan as an investment, a social investment in families and persons, an investment in which there is almost certain to be a return in human values. If we do not have this plan, or one similar to it, then other and possibly less acceptable means must be found to assist those families with a greater need. Going cap in hand to some agency or another is not the answer, because it humbles our citizens and spawns an attitude of bitterness and resentment.

I see the family income security plan as being an enrichment of the concrete substance of civilized life. If there is to be an enrichment, then it follows almost as an axiom that there must be selectivity. Why fertilize soil that is already rich and producing strong, healthy plants? Some political writers have contended that maintaining a minimum standard of living within a society has less to do with justice and more to do with basic humanity. They have said that the maintenance of minimum standards is a requirement of humanity rather than of justice. All of this is merely semantics. Whether the family income security plan is an example of social justice or whether it is just plain humanity does not matter very much. What does matter, it seems to me, is that this bill receives the support of all hon. members so that it can be passed quickly into law in order to provide financial assistance to so many in this country who are, and will be, dependent upon it.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, when you read this bill, and it is not a simple bill, you begin to wonder what actually is the basis upon which the government has introduced it. Is it because the young families of this nation have pressured the government to introduce a new measure? Is it because, for economic reasons, they need more money to raise their families? Is it because the government and its provincial counterparts have come to the conclusion that the normal annual increases in these payments are growing at such a rate there is not enough money to go round? Was this bill drafted in an honest effort to give more money to those who need it and less to those who perhaps need it less? Was it designed to create actual savings in tax moneys so that less tax dollars would be flowing out? What was the basis for the bill?

When you analyse this bill, Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to find any real basis for the introduction of the measure in its present form. In the present election climate that we are facing, politicians are asking themselves whether this bill was delayed and designed to be one of the last bills in a dying parliament in order to influence voters at election time. Was that the basic reason for the bill?

When you try to answer these questions as honestly and earnestly as you can, you begin to feel that, whatever your doubts, you have sound reasons for those doubts. It seems that during its tenure of office the government has sought to make changes, one after another, to many of our basic laws and basic establishments in the land. Although the reasons for such changes appeared logical at the time, the results under this government's administration, unfortunately for the people of Canada, have in many instances been almost chaotic. Though the government tends to shift the blame for some of its maladministration to the civil service, many of us in this House believe the fault lies in the way these new policies have been introduced. The way they have been drawn up makes it almost impossible to have practical administration.

May I point out some concrete examples of what I mean—and I am not being facetious, Mr. Speaker. I think something is drastically wrong. We changed the basic concept of the postal service in Canada on the premise that we were going to introduce new electronic devices and computers, that we were facing a new age with new methods. Is it not really shameful that we must now face the fact that under this new administration, this new and polished system, it takes as long to send a piece of mail across a street as it took to send it from coast to coast under the old method?

We were told that we were going to have a brand new Unemployment Insurance Commission with a brand new approach to this very complicated subject. We were going to close down all the little local offices and concentrate operations in large computerized centres so that in seconds we could provide a service which perhaps took days before. But what has happened? The story is known nationwide. There has been utter chaos. Instead of reducing the time period within which cheques were issued from days to seconds, in many instances the time has been increased from days to weeks and months.

Then, the government brought in its tax bill, which was introduced as a measure of reform, as a method to simplify tax returns for those who must pay taxes. This bill, it was suggested would make it easier for people to compile the tax they owed the government and would make collection easier. Again, what has happened? The new tax bill is so complicated and complex that even those who produced it say privately and publicly that they do not understand the full ramifications of the measure.

In the case of the armed services, we joined the three branches together. That was another change made by the government. What happened in that case? We have far more chiefs in the armed services than we have Indians. We had mass dismissals of air force personnel and army officers who were deemed to be superfluous. Only a few months later, we were offering advance pension plans and bonuses to these people to rejoin the armed services.

After all this experience with the problems which have evolved through lack of proper planning and proper consideration of change, we are now being asked to change the family allowance plan. I was very interested to hear the member who preceded me say that our doubt about the complications of administration could be put at ease because through the use of computers the administration would be simplified. I will use his figures. He spoke about 2½ million families receiving these family allowance benefits. I have taken the liberty of referring this problem to a firm which deals with computations and computation machinery. Based on the provisions of this bill, it is their estimate that a single family in a normal lifetime could have as many as 400 different calculations of their family income. When we use the figures given to us and multiply them by 2½ million families, we come up with a substantial figure in respect of administering this one segment of the bill. This provision will require as many as 900 million to 1,000 million different compilations and calculations if made annually, but in the bill there is provision for making it, in certain circumstances, every four months.

In respect of the computations the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be required to make, it is estimated that an additional 8,000 civil servants will be required in various capacities to administer this single piece of legislation. This is the type of thing with which we are dealing. What is the basis for these changes? Is it that we will spend less money on the new family allowance plan? If we save any money as a result of the changes made by the bill in respect of payments to families, we will spend those savings and even more in the administration of this piece of legislation. I say parliament is making a tremendous mistake in trying to change a principle without enough background knowledge and investigation into the very services that are necessary to administer it.

I should like to deal with some of the complications. We are told, first of all, that payments are to be based on income. Many speakers who have preceded me have dwelt on this particular subject, but I am seriously concerned because there are a tremendous number of small family farmers who, under the present legislation, receive family allowances. I suggest that family allowances form a very important part of the over-all income of the small family farmers. Unfortunately, as a result of the economic position of farmers today, it is necessary for many of them to have this type of additional income. What will happen? Some of these farmers will find that in order to receive any family allowance payments under this legislation, they will have to file a very complicated income tax return every year. There is nothing more variable today than a farmer's income. If every 4 months he has to inform the department of a variation in his income in order to qualify for family allowance payments, this will create a tremendous hardship and a lot of confusion. I feel many of these people will throw up their hands in disgust because they will be unable to cope with it. This is the type of thing the government is asking us to substitute for what we have. The preceding speaker said that if we kept the principle of universality and doubled the payments it would cost perhaps an additional $500 million. He said, also that as a result of the provisions of this bill, the cost would increase by $150 million, so we are talking about a difference of $350 million.

I venture to say that if we adopt this type of legislation there will be very little of that saving of $350 million left, because I am of the opinion that most of it will go towards providing new branch offices, new inspectors, new computers, new buildings, and new departments. There will be a tremendous new list of workers in the public service; that is what will happen. Anyone who feels that this new plan will save a lot of tax dollars has only to study some of the ramifications of this bill. It becomes more and more complicated. When we look at the provisions of this bill, one of the first things which strikes us is this: Perhaps 30 per cent of the present recipients of family allowances will no longer receive them; another roughly 30 per cent will receive less money, and the remaining third will perhaps receive more money. The whole basis of the plea the government has made on this particular point is that this one third will receive more money, and that this is the third which really needs it the most. I wonder if this is true.

I was impressed by a particular point made by the speaker for the Social Credit party because it had not occurred to me. He said what we are doing is taking away the incentive of the heads of Canadian families to provide an ever-better living for them because, under this plan, the man who works the hardest to earn the most income will receive the least amount of family allowances. He will be taxed two ways. This will destroy his incentive. He will be taxed to provide some additional money for family allowances if he is in the higher income bracket, and he will have the family allowance taken away from him when we destroy the universality of the plan. So, it is all right for the government to say that some of those in the lower strata will receive more money, but why does the government not say as well that many families which today receive family allowances will be paying double taxation under this legislation. This is what bothers me. These are some of the things I must look at when I am being asked to deal with this legislation. It is, in effect, another proposal by this government which, although the principle may appear to be sound, because of the manner of its application will be almost impossible to administer and the people who are supposed to benefit will be the very people who will suffer.

I am wondering about another point. The legislation provides that in order to qualify a person will have to file a statement of his income, and that there may be an exchange of this information between departments. This is serious. Does this mean that if an individual who feels he qualifies for family allowance under the new regulations files his statement of income, this information will be compared with his income tax return filed with the Department of National Revenue? Is this the comparison that will be made? Is this how it will be checked? Will the incomes of the citizens of this country become public property and public knowledge? Do we have to make public all the income and business returns of a family; is this what will happen? This is what the situation appears to be under the terms of this legislation.

I hope the minister will explain some of these things to me in order that I might understand them more fully and in order that the people whom I represent may have an opportunity to understand them. This would be a change in the policy which has existed for a great many years. It is amazing, indeed, when one realizes that over the years many families have used their family allowances for specific purposes, such as the college tuition of the child involved, pension or a trust, special wardrobes or any of the other special expenses which families have to meet. What will happen when this bill is passed? Many families have counted on this money for years and suddenly it will be stopped. What will happen to a family which has been counting on this money to send the children to college? The family has had to live from day to day on earnings, and this little extra every month has been set aside for a specific purpose? What will happen when it is cut off? This is the type of hardship that the cold clauses of a bill often fail to take into consideration.

We who deal with this type of legislation sometimes become so involved in the legal phraseology that we forget the human element. After all, this is the important element and we must consider what we are doing for people. I feel that this legislation will cause an emotional disruption, as has been pointed out by so many people. It will cause an emotional disruption when there are two neighbours on a street who are placed in a different category and who receive different rates of family allowance for children of the same age, when we have people in different regions who, because of the normal economic returns for families, receive far less than people in other regions, or when we have people who have an excess of income one year and who are faced with scarcity the next year. As a result of four months of plenty when they do not need it, they will be registering for the four months of scarcity when they cannot get it. So, we will have hardship after hardship.

Although the principle may be sound, I feel that we will not satisfy the people of Canada because those who will be struck off the rolls of recipients of family allowances will feel that they have been discriminated against and those whose family allowances will be reduced will feel they have been treated as second class citizens. I venture to say that the very few people whom this government is desperately trying to help, those who are in poverty and on welfare, will be directly helped by increases in family allowances. However, they will be just as dissatisfied because they will feel that under the changed plan the family allowances they will receive will not be high enough to improve their standard of living.

These are the reasons I am very much concerned about this legislation. First of all, I do not think we are solving a basic problem. Second, I think we are interfering with an established practice and changing it in such a way as to cause chaos. Third, I feel that we are bringing in just one more piece of legislation, the administration of which will be almost impossible. Fourth, I am definitely of the opinion that if we do pass this legislation we will not satisfy the people of Canada, and we will not satisfy those who will be called upon to pay. This is the group of people whom we sometimes forget. We are certainly humanely concerned with those who do not have enough, but I wonder if we ever stop to think about those people who have enough but on whom every year we impose a greater and greater financial burden. When will this stop?

These people have rights and they are concerned, and justly so. Perhaps they do not need family allowances as desperately as other families but they will feel discriminated against. Certainly, they pay taxes to pay for the present program, and in receiving family allowances they are on the same footing as every other family in Canada, but their level of income makes them subject to greater taxation. They were prepared to accept this program and through the years there has been very little criticism of it, but now they are being told that not only will they be called upon once more to pay for this program but they will be written out of the contract entirely; they will no longer be eligible for family allowances. This is how double taxation is imposed.

There is one other feature of this legislation to which I should like to refer before concluding. Have we not reached a strange state of affairs in the administration of economic justice in this country when we find ourselves ready to reduce the payments for any child in any family to 42 cents a month? This figure has been bandied around because it is the same amount by which the old age pension was increased. When I appealed to my friends to compile as fairly as possible, the cost of administering a 42 cent cheque, I discovered—and I would like to have this checked—that we will be paying $3 in administrative costs every time we send out a 42 cent cheque. This is what the government is trying to tell us will be the Utopia when we are under a computer system and pay people according to their needs. I wonder if anybody will profit under such a measure.

• (1630)

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on this bill at an earlier stage I likened it to an umbrella that was full of holes, and said we had no choice but to accept it in view of the heavy rain shower that we were suffering. In the interim, I and a number of my colleagues have had a chance to study the measure more closely. Now, I find that the leaky umbrella, full of holes, has collapsed into a mass of metal ribs and torn cloth. It is completely useless to do the job of providing family allowances for people across the country.

Had there been any doubt in my mind about this, I feel sure the debate during the last few days would have removed it. Member after member has brought up points regarding this complicated way of dealing with family allowances, indicating that it is an impossibility, and is an unjust and unworkable measure. As a result, I feel we have no choice at this stage but to abandon the project entirely and introduce a better one in its place. The faults in the bill have been enumerated. I will simply mention them again because they have been thoroughly discussed. The biggest one is the departure from the principle of universality, a principle which was established years ago and which has worked well. What was really required was an increase in the amount of the allowance to bring it more closely into line with today's cost of living.

The second fault is the distortion of the family allowance system from one of ensuring a little more well being for families into one of welfare, to be used exclusively as a social assistance measure.

The third bad feature of the legislation is that it will increase the division of the Canadian people into the have's and have-not's, particularly at a time when it is being borne in upon us at every hand that what we need is much greater cohesion and co-operation among the different sections of our people. At such a time it is most deplorable to divide them still further by such a measure.

The fourth bad feature is the administrative nightmare that the bill will bring about. This is something that has been dealt with thoroughly. When the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) was speaking, I remembered what one of his colleagues had said earlier in this debate that it had been calculated with respect to measures of this type that only about nine cents out of every dollar reached the people for whom the money was intended. I am not at all enamoured of the way in which computers, armies of bureaucrats, yards and yards of red tape and oceans of paper are supposed to be saving the taxpayers money. I believe that the system of family allowances that we have had, with its universality, is an infinitely better, simpler and fairer method than what is proposed here.

The fifth bad feature of the bill is the costs it will place upon taxpayers who are already over-burdened and who will not share any more in family allowances. One thing we ought to have learned on this continent is that taxpayers do not forgive governments when they are taxed without receiving any share of the benefits. This is exactly what this measure proposes for at least a third of the families in Canada.

The sixth bad feature I would mention, and it is something that has not yet been successfully contradicted, is that the children of social assistance families will get only half the benefits. I am still waiting for a successful refutation of that statement, and the fact it is so slow in coming indicates there is doubt about the way the bill has been drafted. I will put my faith in my party leader, who is a very competent legal person. He tells us that according to his reading of the measure children in families that are on social assistance will receive only one half of the benefits of the family allowance.

But more than all these things, what brought me to change my mind with regard to the bill was my realization that this is part of a pattern whereby the government is singling out a group of taxpayers, those in the lower middle and lower income brackets, and telling them, "Look, there is only so much money available for family allowances, for old age pensions, or for whatever social measure is under discussion." The government is telling these people, "If you do not want to be crushed into the ground with taxation we must modify the scheme to make sure that instead of universality the money is given to those who need it the most. This is the only way in which you people can be saved from being completely crushed into the ground." It is this pattern, which is completely dishonest and ruinous, that has made me decide that the time has come to make a stand and say we want no more of this deceptive way of slipping things over on the Canadian people. This is the method which the government uses to slip over basically unfair and unjust legislation on the people of the country.

The government tells these over-burdened taxpayers, "We cannot afford to keep this universal system any more. We regret it." As the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) said a little while ago, "We are building the edifice of social justice, and in the process of building, something has to go." What is going is social justice. It is regarded as a crime in Canada to be poor. In the view of many people that is the most evil crime in the country. I repeat that the government tells these over-burdened taxpayers, "We have to limit the family allowance to the people who need it most. We have no more money." Why didn't the government think about that last fall when the tax reform bill was under discussion, when these same lower-middle and lower income groups were saddled with a tax structure which took far more than their share from them, and did not equalize their burden as the incomes of rich people and of corporations rose higher on the scale? Why did this government not say, "We want to readjust our family allowance scheme, to modernize it; we must put in a fair tax system so that those people who are able to pay for family allowance can be taxed when the time comes to make the payments under the scheme." Why did they not do it then?

Let me give some evidence, Mr. Speaker. Recently, a seminar sponsored by the Nuffield Foundation of England under the auspices of the Canadian Council for Social Development, was held in the Laurentians, not far from here. A number of eminent people attended, amongst them Professor S. M. Miller of New York University and Professor Martin Rein of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The latter informed the gathering that if Canadians are ranked according to income, the lowest 40 per cent of the population earned 15 per cent of the country's total income in 1969. The top 40 per cent earned two-thirds of this group. Professor Miller said:

> This means that more people are getting rich than are moving out of the most intense level of poverty—this means that those in the lowest group have become relatively worse off, farther below a standard of living which has shifted upwards.

It is these lower levels who are losing out on the rising standard of living in this country, yet they are bearing the burden of the cost of the social welfare schemes.

We are told there is no money for family allowances. But we hear estimates of up to $10 billion for the Mackenzie Valley pipeline and $10 billion for the James Bay hydro and other projects. On Sunday last on CTV the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) forecast that $50 billion will be needed for resource and energy development in Canada over an unspecified period. We know that $1 billion has been spent by DREE since it was founded. There is plenty of money for pipelines and things like that, but no money for people and the needs of people. This is why I believe this bill should be scrapped. We hear talk about the various kinds of evils in government, but I believe there are few evils more insidious and dangerous than those which crusade under the clichés of the just society while pulling the rug from under that group of taxpayers that is hit the hardest. People talk about the increase in the gross national product, but what is the use of that if the GNP continues to be distributed unfairly to the people of this country? That is what is happening now. I cannot get excited about the growth because I know that the more gross national product there is, the more unfair will be the distribution to the people.

The Royal Commission on the Status of Women made a number of suggestions and outlined a number of measures to protect family life in this country. They recommended child care allowances over and above the present system of family allowances. All across Canada, women have been waiting for action to be taken on the recommendations of the commission. The report was tabled around Christmas, 1970. It had 167 recommendations but so far only two of those of any substance have been implemented, both by the minister of labour last session when he brought in legislation under the Unemployment Insurance Act to look after the confinement period of pregnant women, and legislation for the Public Service of Canada which guaranteed that women could have pregnancy leave without injury to seniority and other benefits. These are the only recommendations of substance affecting women that this government has implemented so far.

How long do the women of Canada have to wait for some guarantee or indication of interest on the part of this government? I know all about the task forces that have divided up the recommendations and are studying them, but I also know that task forces, commissions, boards, white papers, and all the rest are used as a means of putting off the evil day of action. I regret to say that is what appears to be happening in this case. In the Speech from the Throne on February 17, 1972, there appeared this sentence:

> Another step and long overdue, consists of policies to ensure the equality of women in Canadian society. These will be announced this session.

The only announcement that this government has made so far this session relative to that sentence is to the effect that one million mothers will be deprived of family allowances and that the children of mothers on social assistance will get only half of the new family allowance. This is a blow and an insult to the mothers of this country and they are not going to overlook it.

Time and again my colleagues in my own and other parties have pointed out what those family allowance cheques have meant to the mothers of this country. Often the lowest income people have had to use the cheque for food, clothing and the necessities of life, while families a little higher up on the income scale have used it for things like school supplies or have put it aside so that the children may have the advantages of higher schooling later on or other things that are deemed necessary. Now, with one stroke of the pen, this family allowance cheque is to be taken from a million mothers on the ground that they are wealthy and do not need it. The government will not get away with this. People will realize, as some of them do already, that it is just plain dishonest presentation and deceptive packaging to say to those mothers "You do not need it and you will have to sacrifice in order to give the lower income families a little bit of a family allowance cheque." They know about the machinery of giving the cheques out and then taking them back again through taxation from those who do not need them. But they won't use this basically fair method.

Just the other day the minister asked me "What is the difference if you give it out and take it all back?" If he only knew about the psychology of women, he would know that often the family allowance cheque is the only money they have to call their own, that they can rely on at all times. It makes a tremendous difference when they know that they can always have that cheque at their disposal instead of having to go to sometimes stingy husbands and ask for an allowance—present company is always excepted, of course. However, there are a great many stingy husbands in this country. Some women have to beg, and they are not going to forget it.

I tell you, this legislation will sharpen people's vision very considerably. They will watch money being poured out like water in the hiring of hordes of public servants who will administer this legislation. They will read the little pamphlets sent out by the government and learn how to keep on the right side of the law, how to avoid being sent to jail if there are fewer children in the family than previously reported, or if certain children become too old for benefits, or if there are changes and improvements in the family's income. People will be pestered to death with administrative details, and they are already being pestered almost to death in many such ways. Talk about computers! Some on the government side have so much faith in computers that they have begun to lose all sense and reason through not using their own brains.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: Computers are taking the place of brains. I must speak strongly. It is high time the government opposite looked at the homes of this country and considered the mothers who, under difficult conditions, have tried to keep the homes of this country intact. They have tried to keep the home in good order during these difficult days when many forces are working to tear it apart. These women appreciated that small piece of evidence which indicated the government recognized they existed, the family allowance cheque.

A few years ago I tried without success to get the government to pass legislation to provide a salary to mothers who wanted to stay home and look after their young children. I wanted that salary paid to mothers, so that they could stay home instead of having to get a job in a factory. And would the government do that? Oh, no. The government would not go for that. Now, it is going much further. Now, that family allowance cheque which has meant so much, and which has enabled mothers to buy small amenities for the family, is to be taken away from a great number of families. The government is not satisfied with insulting women; it is not satisfied with neglecting to do anything with the report of the royal commission; it is prepared to snatch away the only bit of money that is paid directly to women and which women have a right to expect.

Mr. Rynard: Shame!

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, this is not a war on poverty that the government is conducting; it is a war on women. It is a war against the family.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: (Winnipeg North Centre): And they cannot win it.

Mrs. MacInnis: They cannot win it, that is right. That is a war the government cannot win.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: If some hon. members enjoy my putting it this way, I hope they will laugh heartily now. The laugh will be on the other side once it becomes necessary to administer this measure.

My party has made a counter proposal. May I repeat its three main features. First, we have asked for a substantial increase in family allowances. Let no one tell me that there is not enough money, because I will tell any hon. member who suggests that the things on which the government is spending money. I will read excerpts to show what is being done with pipelines and all kinds of other developments, while the homes of this country are being shamefully neglected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: The second feature of our proposal is the recommendation that this program be universal in application. I say to the government, for goodness sake, even though it has alienated many sections of the Canadian public, so much so that it is scared to go to the country in June, let it not alienate the mothers of this country further. Let the members of the party opposite not do that if they have any regard for their future, either in government or in opposition. Third, we want to see related changes in income tax laws. We are not a bit happy about what was done last fall. We said so then and we will continue saying so. Again, I say to the members of the government, when they are outside this House talking about the goodness of their own legislation and the badness of the opposition, for goodness sake keep your guard up. Do not go near any mothers of this country for I warn you, hell hath no fury like 100 million mothers who have been scorned and whose social assistance has been cut off.

An hon. Member: Should that not be one million?

Mrs. MacInnis: I meant one million. If I said 100 million, I must have said it to make the government realize just what it is up against. I wanted to warn the government thoroughly. One million angry mothers represent trouble for the government. Let it take that into account and consider the mistake it is about to make while there is still time to change this measure.

What the government is trying to do is dangerous. It is dangerous for the homes of this country and dangerous for the government, if it wants to survive. It is also dangerous for this country where people still cherish the idea that parliament is where you can get social justice, if not actually, at least potentially.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—Oil—Inquiry as to revoking of drilling permits for British Columbia coastal waters; the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—National Defence—Rent increases for married quarters—Suggested delay until parity with public service achieved; the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett)—Pollution—Wrecking of freighter "Vanlene" near Pacific rim park—Steps to supply adequate equipment for clean-ups and strengthen navigational rules.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and the amendment (Mr. Lewis) p. 1448.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) who, quite logically, stated that the government was prepared to spend billions of dollars in any area except in that of family allowances.

Needless to say, we did not wait for the opinion or proposals of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and for years we have been asking that family allowances be increased and related to the cost of living. I think the créditistes have been the first to say in this House that family allowances should increase with the cost of life.

However, family allowances have not been increased for many years. Nevertheless millions and even billions of dollars have been spent in many areas except to improve the living conditions of young Canadians.

The hon. member stated earlier that the James Bay project, the building of a pipeline, and so on, would cost $10 billion. Recently the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) I think mentioned $50 billion. No restrictions is mentioned for this project and still the government has no time to help Canadian children.

Just two weeks ago I was informed that the offices of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have been completely renovated at a cost of $28,000 for carpets and armchairs.

• (1700)

The Prime Minister has never said that Canada did not have enough money to put down new carpets or replace arm chairs when existing ones were still serviceable.

The taxpayers' money is being spent by the millions and we do not find the means to effectively help needy Canadians. This administration is said to be honest, rational, progressive and fair. I believe that social justice exists within the Prime Minister's office. But I do not believe that social justice exists for Canadian children. A member of the New Democratic Party has tabled the following amendment, and I quote:

That Bill C-170 be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the government should give consideration to the introduction of legislation amending the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act to provide for a substantial increase in the allowances paid thereunder, for continuing the principle of universality, and for related changes in the income tax legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the principle of universality in respect of family allowances should be adhered to, otherwise the enforcement of this legislation will require, all over Canada, a frightening bureaucracy in order to determine who is entitled or not to an allowance of $4.55 or $5.85.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

As no private bills are listed on today's order paper, the House will proceed forthwith to the consideration of notices of motions (papers).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR COPY OF STUDY OF MANPOWER UTILIZATION OF THE MANITOBA GARMENT INDUSTRY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by Summerour and Associates Inc., Atlanta, Georgia, undertaken for the Department of Manpower and Immigration regarding the "Analysis of the Manpower Utilization of the Manitoba Garment Industry".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I raise this question for two reasons. First, I think it is important that this material be made public because of the problems which confront the garment industry and, indeed, the whole clothing and textile industry in Canada. These industries have traditionally been and still are to a very large extent labour intensive. There has been very little mechanization in the garment industry. A very high percentage of the cost of producing the garments which are produced and sold in Canada and worn by Canadians goes into the payment of wages for the workers in this industry.

This industry is going through a period of great upheaval. It is buffeted on all sides from the importation of competitive goods from countries which have traditionally paid substantially lower wages than those Canadian workers receive. Countries such as Taiwan, Mainland China, Japan and areas such as Hong Kong, where the wage rates are fantastically lower than in Canada, are in competition with Canadian industry. Therefore, the industry has had difficulty trying to meet the competition of products imported into Canada from those countries.

I am not an expert, but I have been told that one cannot buy a shirt now that retails for less than $10, except for those imported from the countries I have mentioned. This is because the cost of labour in Canada is too high to compete with the cost of shirts produced in those countries to which I referred.

In addition to the Canadian garment industry finding it difficult to compete with these countries, it is becoming increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to attract labour into their industry. They must compete with industries in Canada which are not labour intensive, as is the garment industry, but are in fact capital intensive. To give one example, in my own city of Winnipeg, a person who begins work in a packing plant with no experience, training or skill receives a starting wage of substantially more than $3 an hour because these plants are very highly automated and equipment oriented rather than labour oriented. The hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) is in the chamber. He can confirm what I say. The garment industry finds it difficult to pay more than 25 cents, 35 cents or 50 cents above the minimum wage which, in Manitoba, as in all other provinces, is less than $2 an hour. Therefore, it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to recruit well educated, skilled, trained workers.

I submit that when a study is carried out on manpower needs or manpower utilization of the garment industry in Winnipeg or anywhere else, it is important that the information obtained not be kept secret, locked in the vaults of the government department which commissioned the study. It should be made available to the industry, the unions, and workers concerned and, indeed, all the people of Canada.

I want to spend a few moments talking about the general question of making information available to the people of Canada. As our society becomes more complex, mechanized and automated, governments play a much more active role than in earlier years. It does not matter whether it is the government of Canada, the United States or any other country, nor does it matter which political party happens to form the government. The governments are playing a much more active role than ever before. Canada is no exception.

In this country, we know from government reports and independent sources that the government requirements for information have grown at a fantastic rate. There have been tremendous increases in the number of highly skilled, trained and highly qualified government employees, such as economists and scientists. I am not being critical. I think this is necessary. Maybe we have not done enough of this. They have been given the job of researching many of the basic problems which face the people of this country and with which governments will have to deal. It is not only the civil service which has increased, but to a very large extent many of the problems with which governments have to deal have increased. Various government departments and agents will have to come up with answers in the next one, two or five years. Private groups, companies and individuals, who are supposedly expert in the field, will have to provide information which is required.

There have been commissions, a host of studies, task forces, special reports, or call them what you may, in every field which affects the people of Canada. We have had a task force on social security. We debated that bill for some time. We have also had task forces on ecology and pollution. There have been studies on scientific research; there have been studies on industrial strategy for Canada. Most of these are, perhaps, required. I am certain that members of parliament who are not cabinet ministers could make worthwhile suggestions to the government concerning other studies which need to be carried out.

The point I am trying to make is really a very simple one. I believe that the overwhelming bulk of the studies which have been commissioned contain information which ought not to remain virtually the private property of the minister or of the department concerned. If the people of Canada are to understand what governments are doing, we must arrange our system in such a way as to provide them with the necessary information upon which to reach valid opinions. Especially is this true as the problems facing our people become more complex.

Let me refer to the debate which has been going on in this House during the last few days, the debate on the family income security plan. I suggest that had members of this House, members of the press gallery and media workers generally as well as members of the public been given access to the white paper on social security prepared under direction of the Deputy Minister of the Department of National Health and Welfare, several desirable consequences would have ensued. All concerned would have been in possession of information conducive to arriving at a consensus about the kind of legislation required to meet the needs of Canada's poorer families and we should not now be conducting a highly partisan debate such as we have heard for the past several days and, no doubt, will be hearing for a number of days yet to come. As it is, members of parliament as well as members of the public generally are not in possession of all the facts involved, facts as researched by a committee under the leadership of the Deputy Minister and incorporated into a report which has since been locked in the files of the government.

I am not suggesting for a moment that there are not some reports which should remain unpublished, for example reports having to do with national security or financial matters, cases where a government is trying to decide whether one company or another is receiving a particular contract. A report of that kind ought not to be made public because the information contained in it might give an unfair advantage to one group or another. But, Mr. Speaker, when we are talking about family allowances or a projected multi-million dollar transportation corridor down the Mackenzie Valley, the people should surely be told all the relevant information. Surely, it is essential that they should be in possession of all the facts. In the case of the Mackenzie Valley project, for example, they should know the estimated cost in dollars, the probable effects upon the ecology, including the damage which would be done to wildlife, the consequences for the indiginous people, and so on. And yet 99 per cent of all these studies conducted in all these various fields are being kept locked in the files of ministers and when hon. members from either side of the House ask for the publication of these reports, they are told this would not be in the public interest because the documents requested are interdepartmental documents. Or some other equally stupid reason is put forward. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talks frequently and eloquently about participatory democracy, about inviting the public to let parliament and the government know how they feel about various issues. I suggest the public cannot really tell the government how it feels about any of these issues unless it has access to the necessary information. And the only way in which the public can get access to these facts is for the government to publish, as a matter of course, the reports and findings of the studies it has commissioned.

I do not question the right of the government to say, apropos of any particular report, that it does not agree with that report or that it accepts only part of it. That is what governments have to do. I am saying that if the government really believes in the kind of participatory democracy about which the Prime Minister has spoken of so often, it should make available to the people in Canada most of the reports on studies which it has commissioned. So, I urge the government to agree to my motion that this particular report having to do with the analysis of the manpower ultization of the Manitoba garment industry be tabled and made available to members of parliament and to the people.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given a few minutes in which to speak on this subject. After listening to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) one would be led to believe that he and his hon. friends purposely put down these motions to give them an opportunity to moan and groan and spread doom and gloom on this five o'clock show almost on a daily basis. On many occasions, when we reply from this side, expressing other opinions or making a rebuttal, we are told we are not sticking with the subject of the motion. But, Mr. Speaker, you yourself heard the last speaker bringing the subject of family allowances into his speech, as well as everything else he could think of, and still dragging bottom, not making good sense of what he was saying.

May I tell the hon. members why I am interested in speaking on this matter? It is because the garment industry in Manitoba, where I come from, traces its origin to the Winnipeg Shirt and Overall Company established many years ago in 1899. I shall make a few remarks about its history, but I assure you I intend to return to the question on the production of papers in a few moments. The industry provides about 40 per cent of the manufacturing employment in downtown Winnipeg. Its early history was one of producing work clothes, primarily for the prairie market, in small facilities scattered across Winnipeg. The success of these firms depended on the personalities of the owners—the Freeds, Stalls, Steinbergs, Jacobs, Berkowitz and others —who were instrumental in establishing the foundations of the industry in the province.

Today, many men continue in the traditions of their fathers, with new personalities extending the fashion industry into its current dimensions. There are some 200 firms and production includes children's wear, coats, headwear, sportswear, rainwear, pants, blouses, gloves, leather apparel, suits, sweaters, uniforms and skirts, to mention a few. A significant export market has been developed in the United States and Europe and its value of exports per employee is believed to be higher than that of the industry elsewhere in Canada. I should like to return to this point in a moment. The industry early centralized in the warehouse district of downtown Winnipeg, where approximately 90 per cent of the firms are still located today, and where most employees prefer to work. Many of these are from my constituency.

I said a while ago that exports are very important to this industry. On January 22, 1971, as reported at page 2685 of Hansard, I had this to say:

> The shipments to date of these 126 companies amount to $79.1 million, and the companies employ 6,300 workers... I think these figures prove the point I have endeavoured to make.
> In light of these figures, it is fair to say that the Canadian clothing industry is one of demonstrated capability. It is in fact competitive with clothing industries of other developed countries from the point of view of style, quality and price.

In fact, to prove this I went on to quote an article that appeared in Maclean's magazine for June, 1970 praising the style and quality of Canadian made garments. The article was entitled "You mean all that stuff is Canadian!" and I pointed out that it was an article that all Canadians should read. It describes what articles Canadiens are making, exporting and wearing. An article also appeared in Men's Wear magazine in October, 1969 and I should like to quote it again because it is important:

> Merchants say the reasons for more imports from Canada are rising prices of the European market, better deliveries, cooperative manufacturers and good quality and fashion... we like English fabrics, but the cost was getting too high. Now, we get the same fabrics from Canada... at a much lower price—
> Two stores in the Atlanta area carry Canadian merchandise: Rich's and Rogue Specialty Shop. Rich's clothing is store labelled and purchased through the AMC buying group. The Rogue carries a line of leather goods and suits from Canada. Gerry Underwood, Rogue owner, reports the suits are one of his most advanced lines and bring a premium price—
> The merchandise manager for another major men's wear outlet spoke well of a Montreal clothing resource which supplied suits for his firm under a private label.

The reason I quote that again is to let the House know the capabilities of this industry in Winnipeg, and I quite agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North said about it.

In addition to this clothing industry we have a textile industry in this area. There are two firms. One of them is the only textile women's hosiery plant west of Toronto, located in my province at Tevlon, in the Interlake region north of Winnipeg. The company employs 85 people. There is also a fabric knitting textile plant located in Selkirk which knits the only yard material and is the only plant west of Toronto. It employs 110 people.

The report made by the consulting firm of Summerour and Associates is one of which many of us would like to know the outcome. At the same time, other studies have been made so I think we can say that the industry knows what is it all about. The eventual findings of the study were communicated to the industry, so if the hon. member for Winnipeg North wants to know about it, all he need do is communicate with any of the owners of plants and they will tell him.

While the findings of this study were made available to the industry, it was made clear that the greatest efforts by the department would be made on behalf of those firms adopting the ensuing recommendations. These were aimed at developing management and personnel policies—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North seeks the floor. Is it on a point of order?

Mr. Orlikow: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I will gladly, as soon as I have finished my remarks.

Mr. Burton: You have finished.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Just wait till I get to my notes. I do not want to interrupt their conversation, but I am pleased to hear from them occasionally.

Mr. Osler: You would think they would know something about it with two plants in their own member's riding.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): These recommendations were aimed at developing management and personnel policies that would improve working conditions, stabilize employment, and improve productivity.

In the last few years the industry has responded well. Productivity has been greatly increased, which has contributed to the improved material welfare of the workers. Further, their job contentment has increased through such things as improved working accommodation and staff relations of all kinds. Our local officers are now enthusiastic about the industry as a source of employment and an officer from headquarters, with considerable knowledge of this industry, recently visited Winnipeg and confirmed our local officers' reports.

It will be seen that this study was in reality an assessment of conditions and needs within an industry. Such assessments are continually being made by our officers to enable us to make the best possible allocation of manpower funds in the face of our numerous demands. In this instance, the operation was more complex than usual because the problem was a complex one, but it was essentially an operational undertaking and the results are expressed in what are essentially operational departmental papers. This is not a consultant's report in the usual sense; you do not get one on a major industry for $7,000. The consultants simply provided the framework within which the study should be made and assisted in the analysis of data.

However, the department conducts many such studies without consulting assistance. All require the full and free co-operation of employers and workers in the industries involved and none could be conducted if it was thought for a moment that the word of manpower and immigration officers could not be accepted. More than this, we could close the doors of every Canada Manpower Centre, for neither employer nor worker would have confidence in us.

• (1730)

The simple fact is that many employers of an important industry and a provincial government department undertook a joint effort with a federal department on the word of its officers that any findings would not be made public unless all consented. That is the crux of the matter. The provincial government is involved. First, I believe we should have the permission of the province before these findings are released. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) knows this. This is the reason I made the comments I did today. He knows this as well as I do. The industry in the province has specifically declined to ask for this consent.

I should like to mention that many items have been introduced in the textile industry magazine. In fact, I have prepared these comments from that magazine and would like to say a few words on it. The year 1971 was an eventful year for Canada's textile manufacturing industry. In fact, it might well go down in history as a year in which more solid progress was made in several directions than at any other time in the past decade. The federal government has recognized that the industry is well managed, efficiently operated, has a remarkable degree of flexibility and indeed is important to the national economy. Proof of this lies in the fact that in 1970 the government announced its national textile policy and set up the Textile and Clothing Board. Actually, this board commenced functioning in November 1970, before Bill C-215 to establish it was passed into law last May.

Establishment of a national textile policy has been advocated by industry for some time and when this became a reality, industry, through the Canadian Textile Institute moved into high gear to provide full co-operation to the federal government through its Textile and Clothing Board agency in an all-out effort to right the many serious wrongs with which industry has been afflicted for so long. In addition, and in accordance with the policy terms of reference, industry set about putting its own house in order. Restructuring programs have been undertaken and it is safe to say that as a result of a much closer working arrangement between government and industry vis-à-vis adoption of a textile policy and the setting up of the Textile and Clothing Board to study and recommend government action, the over-all position of industry is gradually improving.

Certain it is that the T and CB has been exceptionally active throughout the past year or so, with five reviews conducted. This activity has been and continues to be matched by the CTI with the provision of voluminous briefs and other pertinent data essential for presentation at board hearings. And, while hearings will continue, it is encouraging to note that T and CB rulings on completed hearings have not been countermanded by government and have been, by and large, encouraging to industry. I am not saying these things; it is the people of the textile industry who have said this in their own magazine.

I continue my compilation of the comments in the magazine. Year-end statements by senior executives appear to bear out this assumption. As one executive put it:

The textile industry for the first time in several years is giving every indication of being able to build from a firm base. This is largely the consequence of the government's implementation of a national textile policy which has assured industry of a continuing reasonable share of the domestic market—

And again:

Canadians have been through some difficult economic time and have developed both a flexibility and a ruggedness... and there is, perhaps, a wider acknowledgement that greater employment will depend largely on encouraging the increase of our own manufacturing industry—Reflection of this in the textile industry has been the adoption of a federal textile policy with the textile and Clothing Board to study and recomend government action where needed to sustain efficient Canadian enterprises... Application of such recommendations in keeping with national goals is the key to halting the loss of jobs and retaining a reasonable share of the market for Canadian mills—

There are other slightly less positive statements, but in perspective the views expressed weigh heavily in favour of what has been done in concert between government and industry and will continue to be done to preserve the textile manufacturing industry as a thoroughly viable operation well able to make a generous contribution to the improvement of Canadian manufacturing as a whole. Again as I say these are not my words. They are the words of the textile industry. I am very pleased indeed that they are taking it this way because they appreciate the help the federal government has given them.

Naturally, the gains made during 1971 and those projected for 1973 are not sufficient to put industry on easy street. The struggle against imports, particularly from low-cost areas of the world, continues unabated. Economic moves by the United States which commenced August 13, 1971, continue to erect obstacles in the path of industry, some of which are formidable. Attendant problems are numerous and no easy solution is apparent. One industry executive put it in these words:

I view 1972 as being a potentially favourable year. However, this judgment must be tempered against serious over-all threats to the economy, not the least of which is the instability and irrationality of the U.S.A. in dealing with its problems—

And again:

Canada's fortunes in 1972 will be closely tied to the effectiveness of the new United States economic policy on the domestic side.

I mention these things because they have been said by the industry. The industry knows very well what is going on and has heard of the report the hon. member for Winnipeg North is talking about. The industry made no comment about it in the article to which I am referring. If any member of the industry, particularly in my area of Winnipeg, had any comment to make on this, certainly the hon. member did not mention it in his speech. I feel that if the industry has any reason to be concerned, surely to goodness it would communicate with its representatives here in Ottawa because I believe this is the proper way in which it should be done.

Surely, also, we would be proud to stand up and speak on its behalf and find out what this study is all about. The industry has not indicated this desire to any of us. I certainly have received no letter saying that they wish to discuss the matter and outlining the various problems they have in mind. Such representations have not been made, and if they had I am sure we would be glad to make the representations on their behalf. In such an event I am sure the minister would be pleased to grant them the appropriate hearing. I suggest the textile industry has not made such a request because it is aware of the contents of the report in question and is satisfied with the report. That is why nothing has been said.

I shall continue my comments in respect of the textile industry's magazine. In spite of real obstacles, the Canadian economy continues the forward progress commenced early last year. It is apparent, therefore, that a restructured and rationalized textile manufacturing industry should participate in any over-all improvement in the national economy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) indicated he would like to ask the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) a question and the hon. member for St. Boniface said he would receive it, but there would have to be unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous consent?

Mr. Osler: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Orlikow: You are afraid.

• (1740)

Mr. Osler: I am not afraid of a thing.

Mr. Orlikow: Then why did you not permit a question?

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): I do not know much about the rules of the House because I have not been here that long, but I know we are not talking about the time of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay); we are talking about my time, and I am not willing to lend him my time in order that he may lend it to the hon. member. It is as simple as that. I am afraid of nothing. If we are going to have any games around here, let us have them with my consent on my time, or with his consent on his time. I do not think we should any longer play games around here this afternoon, because I want to talk on this motion. It is one of the most trumped-up bits of garbage that I have ever seen. I hope the hon. member takes my words and circulates them among his constituents and mine, because I am sure he will say I am being arrogant and all this sort of jazz.

Mr. Orlikow: You are not arrogant; you are stupid and ignorant, as usual.

Mr. Osler: I just want to tell you a few things. This study that the hon. member wants was commissioned in 1968 with the joint agreement of the industry, the provincial government of the time and the federal government which is in office today. I should like to quote two key sentences from that report as follows:

> The consulting firm of Summerour and Associates will work under the control and direction of the clothing committee. All work carried out, including the final report, will be confidential to the members of the clothing committee and will not be available to Summerour and Associates for publication and promotion.

I presume the hon. member knows that as well as I do. If he does not, all he has to do is to turn around and ask the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) who was executive assistant to the Premier of Manitoba. The Premier and the new government of Manitoba assumed that agreement from the previous government and will not back away from it. If he has a stiff neck or sciatica, he can go to his office and telephone free, as any member of parliament can, the Premier of Manitoba and ask him whether he will release this document. And if the Premier says yes, then he can ask the federal government if they will release it.

Mr. Orlikow: Who paid for the report?

Mr. Osler: I am not answering your questions at the moment.

Mr. Orlikow: Because you cannot.

Mr. Osler: If he gets the consent of the Premier of Manitoba, then he will have the right to come to this chamber with his request. If he does not receive this consent, then he must know as well as I do that he is wasting our time today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Osler: The Premier of Manitoba is a very reasonable man.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor indicated that he would not, but I will ask him whether he will permit a question.

Mr. Osler: Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. I will permit no questions until I have finished my speech.

Mr. Orlikow: You are afraid, as usual. You have no guts, as usual.

Mr. Osler: I am afraid you do not want to hear the truth. It will be very interesting to see your reaction when you hear it.

Mr. Orlikow: You do not know what the truth is.

Mr. Osler: You New Democrats should be democratic and listen to the other side of the story. I know it is easy to reach the Premier of Manitoba, because he has done me the honour of speaking to me on the telephone and I am not even a member of his party. The hon. member should telephone him and then come to the House with this request. If he does not get that permission, he will be wasting our time. This report was paid for by the three parties concerned: the province of Manitoba paid for some, the government of Canada paid for some, and the industry paid for some. The hon. member probably knows that. If you cannot get the permission of the province of Manitoba—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would point out, with respect, to the hon. member that he should address his remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Osler: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I am very glad to be reminded of it. It is always best to keep one's cool when one is giving facts, instead of trying to cloud the issue as some people sometimes do.

Mr. Skoberg: You have repeated yourself ten times.

Mr. Osler: If I do, you might get it into your head. This report is not available even if the hon. member telephoned the Premier. I suggest that the Premier will tell him it will not be made available. It is not available for a good reason. These gentlemen who are so interested in the working people and in the poor should know that the report is not available for a good reason, because over 200 working people said in good faith what they did about conditions in the industry. They said things they would not dare to have said had they known it was not going to remain confidential.

Some of the people who are still in the industry could be hurt if the report were released. I submit that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) probably knows that as well as I do. They were given the assurance that confidentiality would be maintained. The Premier of Manitoba is gentleman enough to have taken over that assurance from the previous government and to have maintained it. To come to this chamber and play these kinds of games seems to me to be a complete waste of time.

I cannot help remarking, before going on to the other portion of my remarks, that it comes particularly badly from a member of a party who knows very well he can get the answers without wasting a whole hour of the time of the House. He is a member of the party which repeatedly, and nauseam say that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is in contempt of the House and wastes the time of the House. The hon. member is wasting our time. I do not know what the overhead of this House is per hour, but it is very high. Better things could be done and said than to play these kinds of tricky games.

If the hon. member really wanted to carry the burning torch to get rid of confidentiality in government, I would join him because I think it is a good principle. But I, like him, would start in my own province of Manitoba and I would do my very best to get the answers to all sorts of questions that are worrying the people of Manitoba today and to which they cannot get a single murmur of response from the government which is formed from a majority of his party.

It is good to practice preaching at home in the confines of your own caucus, in the councils of the party where one has some influence and where one can take some responsibility for the results. But to come here and waste our time is merely a game. This member is not unintelligent; he knows as well as I do that this is a stupid game to play and a terrible waste of time when more important things could be done. He could have spoken on another topic regarding the production of papers, the lack of secrecy or the decline in secrecy which he would like to see in government dealings, and some of us would join him. But to take a trumped-up case like this—

Mr. Orlikow: I will not see the day when you support that.

Mr. Osler: You will not see it in here.

Mr. Orlikow: You will not be around very long.

Mr. Osler: When you get down to the guts of the question you find that the hon. member lives completely in the past. He ignores completely the fact that the industry was in such circumstances as to provoke this kind of study but these circumstances do not prevail now. Had he been in Winnipeg last night he would have seen the CBC proudly present a long feature on the industry, what has happened in the industry and how it has been improved to the point where approximately 20 per cent of Canada's fashion exports come from Winnipeg. They go to the United States, to the highly competitive market there and they are doing very well. The reason is twofold. The results of this report provoked much needed improvements in the industry. It is not perfect yet, by any means; there is a great deal to improve.

The state of the industry provoked management into becoming realistic. They now have an aggressive, market-oriented management that is achieving results. There are close to 10,000 people employed in Winnipeg and Manitoba generally in this highly competitive, quickly modernizing and adapting industry which is doing exactly what the government of Manitoba and the government of Canada are trying to do, namely, provide jobs.

Instead of knocking this thing on the basis of ancient history, the hon. member might have informed himself a little better on the subject. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, I think some of the people in Winnipeg who saw last night the program to which I have referred will be wondering why their member of parliament is wasting our time today on this motion.

I am told that it was an unbiased report. This is an industry which is improving drastically in Manitoba. It is not a sexy industry, like computers or the aerospace industry, but it is providing many jobs. I am assured, on the basis of a quote from the program last night, even though I got it second hand, that the wages share of the production bill of the industry has been steadily increasing and is still increasing. This is a quotation from Peter Nygard, manager of Tanjay, who said it on the CBC program last night.

The situation is not all gloom and doom. If there are any corners in which people are trying to be secretive, those corners are equally to be found in the Manitoba legislature. I would think that the hon. member for Winnipeg North, instead of knocking the industry could have taken a little time to build it up. I think that in Manitoba we can sell all the clothes we manufacture if we go out and try. That is certainly what is happening in the United States. It is too bad if the hon. member left the impression in Ottawa with the wives of members and of newspapermen that they should not be buying Winnipeg clothing because conditions there are still those of the sweatshop.

Mr. Orlikow: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I do not expect the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) to agree with me—indeed, he has a right to disagree with me—but he has no right to misquote me or to imply that I said things which I did not say. I said not one word which was critical of the industry, its management, the employees or anything else. I simply said that this was an industry which had difficulties because of the kind of industry it was, and asked that the report be tabled. I made no attack on or criticism of the industry in Winnipeg or anywhere else. I would not want this debate to be completed and my silence to indicate that I agreed for one moment with what the hon. member has said in reference to my remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) of course has the right to clarify the statements he made in debate. This, in effect, is a matter of opinion. Hansard will show the words he used, and hon. members can draw their own conclusions.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not want to impute motives to my colleague from Winnipeg North. I am sorry if he thinks I have done so. I do know that he said it is increasingly difficult to attract labour to the industry, and he went on to speak about low wages and competitive wage situations elsewhere. It probably was injudicious of me to jump in and use words in reference to sweated labour, but I think the hon. member made it clear that wages were pretty low and that labour was finding it very difficult to stay on the job. That is not the case. I know that other hon. members may wish to speak in this debate and, even though I could continue for a long time, I will now sit down.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, during the past hour a number of hon. members have evinced considerable interest in the garment industry in Manitoba. They are to be commended for this interest. It is an important industry so far as Canada is concerned. It is not only important to Manitoba, but to all of Canada.

Since its inception, the Department of Manpower and Immigration has concerned itself with the critical shortage of staff which has been characteristic of the garment industry in Manitoba. Understandably, the department has made special efforts, both through immigration and training in industry, to attempt to meet the employment demands of the industry in Manitoba. Between April 1, 1967, and June 1, 1969, the cost of such special measures approached $300,000.

In 1969—this matter has been covered by previous speakers—the department felt that additional efforts were warranted. In that year the department invited the industry and the Manitoba department of industry and commerce to join with it in a study to determine the extent and causes of the labour turnover. It was the view of the government that the relatively high labour turnover and the chronic labour shortage should be made the subject of a probe, so a committee was formed representing the two levels of government and the industry. Co-operation was extended not only by the previous provincial government of Manitoba but by the present provincial government. That committee was known as the clothing committee.

The garment industry itself arranged for some 20 firms to participate in the study, with their officers, and over 200 present and former employees agreed to be interviewed in depth. They were given an assurance that anything they said—and some of it, I must be frank with the House, approached the defamatory stage—would be held in absolute confidence. Those were the terms and conditions. Surely this is the source of the difference which appears to exist between the mover of the motion and the government. I choose to believe that the mover of the motion does not fully understand the background or he might have hesitated to bring forward the motion.

With that guarantee, the workers and employers provided full, frank and in some cases subjective opinions on matters of staff training and working conditions. Most of the interviewing was carried out by officers of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The firm of Summerour and Associates, highly experienced in the field, was retained to provide technical advice on the structure of the study. It was a condition of the contract that all results would be confidential to the clothing committee and its corporate members. This position is still supported by the government of the province of Manitoba, which acted in good faith. That government should be commended for its willingness to carry out a commitment given to the working people of the province by a previous government.

A number of recommendations were made to enable the industry to reduce turnover through improved training and personnel policies and many firms are reported to have implemented them. Indicators show that as a result of these improvements in the Manitoba clothing industry, its outlook is excellent. I can tell the House that it is anticipated that shipments will rise to $110 million by 1976 and the number of employees will increase very greatly. Not only is this important for Manitoba and the working people of that province, but it is important for Canada as a whole because the Manitoba clothing industry, the firms making it up and the skills of the workers of Manitoba are providing Canada with major foreign earnings today. They are not doing it because they enjoy any natural advantage over some other parts of the country; they are doing it through entrepreneurial skill, the skill of the workers, imagination and design ability.

[Mr. Perrault.]

The formation of the clothing committee and the job that was undertaken, the co-operation between two levels of government, the industry and the working people, must go down as a successful enterprise which is bringing great results in terms of higher wages for the working people of Manitoba and greater benefits for all of Canada. I want hon. members to be assured that if the House were to approve this motion it would result in the government breaching a contractual agreement with a provincial government and a major Canadian industry. This we refuse to do. It would violate a promise to the workers who participated in the study and might well cause some of them embarrassment. We refuse to do this disservice to the working people of Manitoba. It would destroy the usefulness of an effective economic tool that could conceivably be used to improve the lot of other Canadian workers in the future.

This was a successful technique initiated by the federal government through the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Because of the nature of the study, the type of information sought and received and the commitment made to participants, neither the industrial nor the provincial representatives on the clothing committee will agree to the publication of this report. We concur in this stand. We stand with the other members of this tripartite arrangement, the clothing committee, and we do not believe that approval should be given to this motion which would result in the government breaching a contractual agreement with a provincial government and a major Canadian industry. Some facts were given—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lewis (p. 1448).

• (2010)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate on Bill C-170, I was dealing with the tremendous bureaucracy that the new legislation would organize, create and control throughout Canada, as it happened with the Canada Pension Plan, which we accepted in principle, while being against its terms of application. We maintain that Bill C-170 will create a bureaucracy that will be very costly to the Canadian taxpayer.

As an example, I have just mentioned the Canada Pension Plan. In today's edition of the Montreal newspaper, La Presse, one can read the following:

Administration costs of the pension plan have tripled.

That is not what we were told when the bill was introduced in the House, but today we find that the plan's administration costs have tripled the paper adds:

Administration costs of the Canada Pension Plan have more than tripled in the last six years increasing from $6,003,805 to $21,153,238.

On the other hand, benefits paid to retired Canadians reached a total of $128,732,461 in 1971, which is almost $51 million more than the preceding year.

—But to come to that, administration costs had to be tripled. I quote further:

As of last December 31, 91,524 pensioners were receiving a monthly pension of less than $20 under the plan.

Mr. Speaker, such administration cost to pay out pensions of less than $20 to the majority of pensioners are high indeed.

There is more to quote:

The amount contributed to the plan, including the interest and other income resulting from the investment of contributions, reached a total of $1,076 million in 1971.

And with that amount of $1,076 million in 1971, we paid pensions of less than $20 to almost a majority of the pensioners under that plan. The government keeps on saying it was generous because it paid out so many millions of dollars but they are not distributed among the Canadian citizens receiving a pension.

This is why, in my opinion, Bill C-170 constitutes discrimination towards the majority of Canadians.

The bill under study deals, as its title indicates, with payments to be made in respect of children—i.e., to those who have children in their custody. Clause I really defines the whole purpose of the bill—it reads as follows:

Family Income Security Plan.

Clause 2 contains the definitions. This is an important clause, because you constantly have to refer to it as you study the bill. For instance, the base calendar year, as regards family income, is the basis for granting allowances applied for.

Clause 2(2) defines the income of a person for a calendar year—which is his income computed in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax Act, minus any death benefit paid to him under a pension plan.

It is to be noted that, under this bill, family income is calculated by adding together the incomes of both parents—the father's and the mother's—on which the formulation of the new family allowance proposals is based.

Payments are made from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for any child under 18 years of age in the custody of a citizen residing in Canada. However, if a province makes payment to youths between 16 and 18 years of age, as is the practice in the province of Quebec, no payment is made to children from 16 to 18 years of age by the government of Canada if the latter grants tax abatements in this connection to the said province. This is pure and simple discrimination towards a province--in this case, Quebec—and no account whatsoever is taken of the decisions or positions of provincial authorities.

Clause 6 of the bill is without question the most important and the most complex. It is perhaps more complex than important. Monthly benefits of $15 in respect of children under 12 and of $20 for children from 12 to 18 will be paid.

As indicated in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 1 of clause 6, a ceiling has been placed on family incomes so that when this ceiling is reached or exceeded, allowances in respect of children decrease and sometimes disappear according to income or to the number of children.

Mr. Speaker, since the bill now before us is unjust and unacceptable, my colleagues of the Social Credit party will support the amendment moved by the New Democratic party in favour of the universality of family allowances.

We do not want to take away from the haves to give to the have nots. That would be unadultered socialism or communism. This is evident in the USSR, in Czechoslovakia and other socialist countries. This does not surprise us at all from a Canadian Prime Minister with a socialist and even communist bend!

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I hear an interjection from an hon. member whose riding I do not recall, an hon. member I know very well—

Mr. Deachman: Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. Caouette: I will give some examples.

A general strike is now taking place in the province of Quebec involving 210,000 employees of public and related services. Anyway, I intend to speak on television, next Saturday, in Sherbrooke, Quebec, Rouyn-Noranda and Jonquière to explain that these public servants are asking for a better treatment and rightly so. However, salary increases will not enable us to improve living conditions since salary increases go hand in hand with price increases. Then, it is the workers who bear all the consequences. In those broadcasts, I shall refer to such labour leaders as Marcel Pepin, Louis Laberge and Yvon Charbonneau.

Mr. Speaker, I mention those three Montreal birds and say they have invented nothing under the sun. They did not invent the kind of strikes we are now having in Quebec to improve people's lot.

Some years ago, actually in 1949, there was a strike in the province of Quebec. And at that time, with my own eyes, I saw in Asbestos the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), together with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), former president of the CNTU, in the picket line, throwing stones at those in charge of maintaining order. Blood was shed in the streets, we all remember that, especially those my age.

The present leaders of the Quebec unions follow the example given by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in 1949.

Some will tell me today, Mr. Speaker, that those individuals may have been irresponsible in 1949, but if they feel responsible in 1972, they are as responsible as Messrs. Pepin, Laberge and Charbonneau.

Mr. Dupras: Are you not a little confused?

Mr. Caouette: No, I think that my hon. friend is. He would need some care, not in a wheel-chair, but in a psychiatric institution. He knows quite well what happened then. Because a man was foisted as the leader of the Liberal party, he stupidly accepted him.

Mr. Speaker, as far as family allowances and the welfare of Canadians are concerned, not too long ago I received letters from various provinces and in February last, to answer the Prime Minister, I put a question about Premier Bennett of British Columbia who was accused of being a bigot because he advocated payments to individuals, even children, which would include family allowances.

• (2020)

Mr. Prud'homme: That was not the reason.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) tells me that was not the reason.

I have just received a letter from the Prime Minister—that is, from the leader of the hon. member for Saint-Denis—dated April 19, and today is the 20th—"signed in his own hand". I am convinced the member for Saint-Denis has never received a letter signed by his leader, the Prime Minister of Canada. Well, I have one!

Some hon. Members: That is true.

Mr. Caouette: It is a fact. Two hon. members say I am right.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Caouette: All right. I am asked to read it. I received it today, this afternoon, and it was signed "P. E. Trudeau".

Mr. Prud'homme: It is in English.

Mr. Caouette: It is signed in his own hand.

[English]

In ink. In his own hand. You should rise, because it comes from his own hand.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, following my speech of February 22, the Prime Minister wrote to me. My speech offended him. He wrote: "Ottawa K1A 0A2." This must be the code of Mr. Lalonde, his private secretary.

An hon. Member: His social insurance number!

Mr. Caouette: "My dear Caouette". He no longer calls me "My dear Réal", but "My dear Caouette". Mr. Speaker, it is probably more intimate.

The Prime Minister says, and I quote:

I was surprised to hear you say in the House of Commons, on February 22 last—

He was not even in the House!

—that you were not aware of the statement made by the premier of British Columbia concerning the Quebec people; and even more surprised to read in that day's Hansard (on page 115) that, according to you, I was the one trying to stir up linguistic and ethnic quarrels.

I thought that the enclosed clippings might somewhat enlighten you on the subject.

I remain, my dear Caouette,—

—He does not say "Réal", but "Caouette"—

Yours sincerely,

P. E. Trudeau

Mr. Speaker, in fact, he sent me all the clippings saying that the premier of British Columbia was not blaming the province of Quebec for asking for higher family allowances or social measures benefiting all the Canadian provinces. The premier of British Columbia in fact found fault with three fellows now sitting in the House: the Prime Minister, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Secretary of State.

An hon. Member: The three doves.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, the three doves.

Mr. Speaker,—

An hon. Member: Do you love him?

Mr. Caouette: I think so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How much is that?

Mr. Caouette: Not too much.

Mr. Speaker, I said this afternoon that for a long time we have advocated this increase in family allowances.

• (2030)

One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe), has been fighting for over 10 years to have family allowances pegged to the cost of living.

Mr. Prud'homme: Ah, ah!

Mr. Caouette: The member for Saint-Denis finds this funny. In fact, he is laughing at his colleague.

In the fields of family allowances and pensions, as in any other areas, we have been suggesting for months that all these plans should be replaced by a program of economic and social security for everybody.

In February, I suggested that we should establish a guaranteed annual income whether it be called that or vital minimum as we have been calling it for 35 years. That has never been accepted.

Let us call it the right to live! This is what the people need now!

Saturday on television—and I am talking about the 210,000 public, para-public, "extra-parapublic" or "intra-parapublic" civil servants, never mind how they are called, who are on strike in Quebec and are seeking job security—they said that not money but job security was at stake. I, for one, would tell them that what we are asking for—let's be honest—is pay and income security. Jobs do not matter but income does. And this is related to family allowances. This is why with our economic and social security plan, without taking anything from those who have to give to those who have not—

Mr. Prud'homme: This is magic.

Mr. Gauthier: Once more he did not understand.

Mr. Caouette: —there lies the magic.

Recently I said that once I asked that a per capita allowance of $100 be granted as a test, which would cost $2 billion. I was only saying that we should try and see the result after a six month period, and then if we were not satisfied, we should abandon the project, but if it proved to be useful, we should go on with it. They found that funny, saying it was crazy.

Let us consider the interest, for this year only, not the debt but the interest on the public debt, which amounts to $1,235 million. What does that mean? An amount of $106 per capita in Canada, which is paid to financiers. But this is normal, according to the government; this makes sense. This is the miracle I have just been told about. This is possible and no one laughs about it: $106 per capita in Canada for big finance, that is alright. But $100 for each Canadian, that is crazy, that means inflation, that is dangerous, that will make lazy people. This is exactly what we find among members of the government: lazy intellectuals, people who are sick in the head, and we put up with that!

When we talk of an economic and social income or security of $1,200 for every Canadian citizen aged 18 and over, it means that all our students would draw at least $100 per month. That is odd but we spend more than that to deal with strikes, to mobilize the army and to subdue the terrorists in Montreal. But when it comes to helping a young man continue his studies, that is dangerous! We would rather pay to subdue the terrorists whose very reason for turning like this is that there are social inequities.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis is well aware of this, because he used to be a student and he knows about these problems.

Mr. Speaker, we are calling for family allowances of $250 annually per child, up to age 18, whether there are 8, 10, or 12 children in a family, which means $20 per month. Is there one father, one hon. member or anybody who can raise a child with less than $20 per month? That is impossible.

If war broke out tomorrow, all young students aged 18 or over would be mobilized and the government would not lack any money.

The Prime Minister of Canada would not lack any money. We would find the required amounts to enlist them and pay for their education in any university in Canada. In wartime, this is normal. Why is it not so in peacetime?

Mr. Speaker, let us use our brains. We call for this basic security without infringing on the right to work, which is a basic guarantee for any Canadian citizen, leaving him free to go and work where he wants.

This bill is a near sighted measure which takes away from the man who earns $10,000 to give to the man who earns $4,500. Then the taxpayer who earns $10,000 is frustrated and he is told: "My friend, for the sake of fair distribution, you will have to suffer a little more." All are frustrated and rightly blame the government.

This is why we suggest the establishment of an economic and social program which would not take the income into account. Even hon. members who earn $26,000 a year would enjoy an annual guaranteed income, guaranteed social and economic security, or a guaranteed social minimum, that is a bare minimum.

Then the personal initiative of a citizen would not be restricted or frustrated; all Canadians would be allowed to have ideas, to advocate and carry out plans, which could not be done with Bill C-170 which is, I repeat, sheer frustration, confiscation of the income of a man earning over $7,000, $8,000 or $9,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, the Creditistes are right to make their claims, whether the government members accept them or not, the facts are there.

After visiting many countries faced with similar problems, where there is not enough money for living but where some is available for killing, we have come to the conclusion, my colleagues and myself, that the monetary system is faulty, that in order to grant adequate family allowances, to insure security with personal freedom and not security alone, it is time to bring in a monetary reform.

I know that on the government side, many people have studied the Social Credit doctrine and understand it, but they are muzzled by the governing party and are therefore unable to express themselves, to say what they think openly and strongly.

Mr. Speaker, the Creditistes will go on fighting, not only in the House, but elsewhere, so that Canada may have an improved family allowance system as well as an economic system guaranteeing for each and every one a decent well-being, security and freedom.

• (2040)

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member whose humour, incidentally, I much admire, allow me one question?

Mr. Caouette: The rest of the evening, if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. Prud'homme: Could the hon. member, to whom I have listened very attentively, tell me that he can really compare the political action of the present prime minister during the Asbestos strike and the absolutely incredible situation of the workers of that time with the action of today's labour leaders? Can the hon. member truly, in all honesty—and I know he is very honest—can he really compare that action—if my colleague from Laval (M. Roy) would kindly keep quiet for a moment. I could finish my question—can he honestly compare the action of the prime minister in Asbestos with the current strike which no one can approve?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I reply?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Go ahead.

Mr. Caouette: The comparison is quite simple, Mr. Speaker.

I saw the hon. member's leader on the picket line at Asbestos, with his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and they were throwing stones at the policemen. I don't know if the hon. member was born then, but I know very well that the Asbestos workers were being stirred up in exactly the same manner as Messrs. Pepin, Laberge and Charbonneau are doing now, in saying to the workers: Don't pay any attention to injunctions: Disobey the laws, and laugh at the government: In those days, the hon. member's leader was doing exactly the same thing. There is my comparison.

An hon. Member: It is false.

Mr. Caouette: Who said that it is false?

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): He has not answered the question.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member will have to wait to raise his question of privilege because the Chair has to reach a decision on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but it seems to me that according to the Standing Orders the question of privilege comes before all others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Chair has recognized the point of order and it seems to me that the hon. member will agree that his question of privilege can be considered later on.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I understand from the debate that Bill C-170 is in contention tonight. I do not know what that bill has to do with an asbestos firm in Quebec or other problems that we have been hearing about. We are dealing with a family income security plan for all Canadians and I believe we should deal with that problem under Bill C-170.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member is well taken. Because the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) referred to this question in the course of his remarks, the Chair thought the question could be allowed. However, I do not think the Chair can allow debate on the question.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a question of privilege.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my question of privilege, but not without saying that in my opinion the leader of the Ralliement did not answer my question at all—

Mr. Caouette: —of the Social Credit Party of Canada.

Mr. Prud'homme: —of the Social Credit Party of Canada did not answer my question at all, but I withdrew it in order to co-operate with the Chair.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member says that he withdraws his question of privilege.

A few minutes ago I was asked to make a comparison. between what happened in 1949 and what is happening now in Quebec.

Mr. Béchard: The conditions of workers in those days were different from what they are today.

Mr. Caouette: Workers today are in the same situation as they were then.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair can hardly allow the question of privilege which actually is not a question of privilege but rather a matter for debate, and the time allotted to the hon. member for Témiscamingue has expired.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of disappointing the two Social Credit members from Saint-Denis and Témiscamingue, I will not speak of the asbestos strike but will address myself to Bill C-170 dealing with the family income security plan.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to raise a question of privilege.

[English]

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Prud'homme: Listen to the question of privilege first and then decide whether it is a question of privilege.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: For the benefit of my friend in the New Democratic Party, I wish to dissociate myself from the suggestion that I am a member of the Social Credit party. He is a socialist and I would like him also, before he makes any comment, to dissociate himself from the comments made by Social Credit of Canada concerning the conditions of the workers in Asbestos in 1949—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I am sure that the hon. member will, in due time, be able to express his views and bring forth the points that he considers worthwhile. However, for the time being, I recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I wondered whether the member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) might be one of those on the secret list of 20. At any rate, I assure him I definitely dissociate myself from the remarks of the leader of the Social Credit party: I think it is obvious that we do not share his philosophy regarding that particular incident.

The bill before us deals with the family income security plan to replace the Family Allowances Act which has been in effect since 1945. The leader of our party, when speaking to the House yesterday, said that our party finds the bill completely unacceptable. I share that point of view for a number of reasons, but primarily for two basic reasons which I think will come back to haunt the government. First, the question of universality has been discontinued in this bill and replaced by the principle of selectivity. Second, it will become a bureaucratic nightmare which I believe will make the crisis we had in respect of unemployment insurance during the past winter look like child's play when we begin dealing with all the regulations under the bill.

I would also like to make it clear that our party believes we should have in this country substantially increased basic family allowance rates. Our party has made that clear from the beginning. However, this is not the reason we are opposing the bill on second reading and have moved an amendment. Our party wants this bill to be universal rather than selective which I believe is a bad principle which pits neighbour against neighbour, friend against friend and indeed family against family in certain communities. Our party also believes that if we are to have equity in this country's social programs, there must be drastic changes to the Income Tax Act and our taxation laws.

The family allowances program was first introduced in this country on July 1, 1945. At that time I believe the government made a number of assumptions which basically were very good but which they are abandoning in Bill C-170. First of all, they gave recognition to the fact that families with children have special needs in our society. They recognized the fact that when a family has children it has needs which are basically different, special and extra to those of people who do not have children.

Secondly, under the legislation enacted in 1945 the government recognized that to ensure a greater measure of equality of opportunity for all children, such a measure was needed. These are two principles that I believe are being thrown out of the window either in total or in part under Bill C-170. The program as originally introduced in 1945 was not a welfare program; it was not a poverty program: it was money set aside to assist the mothers of Canada to raise their children and to provide them with some of the basic necessities of life. This is the principle that is being abandoned in the plan before us. It is becoming part of a welfare plan, and when you have selectivity such as this you attach to it a stigma that divides people.

As I have said, the need for such a plan in 1945 was to make up for some of the deficiencies in our system and our way of life. We wanted to provide something extra for families with children because I think everybody realized that when a person gets a job, whether he be a labourer, a teacher or a farmer, he is not paid according to the size of his family but according to his ability or the special status of the job. The family allowances program was one of the many ways in which we hoped to overcome this type of inequity in our society.

The old legislation recognized the importance of children to our country and the fact that they have special rights. It stipulated that the expenditure of the money from this fund should be used to help our children. I come from a family which was by no means affluent. My family was relatively poor, and I knew as a child growing up that the family allowance was of great assistance to my mother.

This principle will be lost in the new Family Income Security Plan, and it is a principle that should not be lost. Under the old Family Allowances Act the payment for children under the age of six was $5, for children aged six to nine it was $6, for children 10 to 12 it was $7, and for children aged 13 to 15 it was $8. In 1957 these payments were adjusted upward. In 1964 we introduced in the House a youth allowance for those aged 16 and 17. We now find that many of these principles which existed in the old family allowance plan are no longer part of the plan which is before us.

The new plan is not universal; universality has gone out of the window and we have adopted the principle of selectivity. The new plan is very much like the guaranteed income supplement for our senior citizens. They receive a basic $80 a month and if they are really poor they may receive a supplement of about $57.70 a month. There is a graduated scale under which if you make a small amount of money the guaranteed income supplement is reduced.

I know, from travelling in my constituency which contains thousands of old age pensioners, that this is one of the complaints about which I hear perhaps most often except for farm problems. I refer to the frustrations which people have with this type of system, with the means test—frustrations which they have vis-à-vis their own families and others in the community. Despite this plan we know that hundreds of thousands of old people in this country are living in poverty, in conditions of which members of this House should be ashamed. We know, also, that this type of plan under the Old Age Security Act has created a needless amount of bureaucracy. It means the disclosure of a person's income. It creates a stigma. It causes a means test. These are matters which I do not think the Canadian people appreciate.

The new plan introduced in Bill C-170 is based primarily on three things. First, and most important, it is based upon the income of the family. Second, it is based upon the number of children in a family, and third it is based upon the age of the children. The amounts to be paid out under the bill are $15 for children under the age of 12 and $20 for children between the ages of 12 and 17. We find in the regulations that a family with one child, with an income of $4,500 a year, will not benefit from the plan. In other words a family with one child, earning less than $4,500, will qualify for the maximum payment. For each additional child the family income is allowed to escalate by $500.

According to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), the number of families who will benefit to the maximum will be fewer than one million. We find that for each $100 of additional income, the monthly benefit will decrease by 33 cents. If you add all these figures together you get the following result: 25 per cent of the Canadian families will be better off under the new plan than they were under the old one. We know that even this was questioned in the House the other day.

We find that some of the people under the plan will qualify for only one-half of the benefits. We know also that some of the provinces in this country might see this program as a means of paying less welfare as welfare amounts are adjusted and set according to family income. So perhaps not all the people who qualify on paper for the allowance will actually be better off a year or two from now.

We find that under the new plan, 42 per cent of the people will receive partial payments; they will not receive the maximum. Of this 42 per cent, about half will receive less than they are receiving now, and half will receive more than under the present legislation. We find that roughly one-third of Canadian families, or 33 per cent of one million mothers, will not receive any assistance under this legislation. I think that many of this 33 per cent are not very well off.

Many people will not receive any assistance at all are in the income bracket of $5,000 to $10,000 a year, and you certainly cannot consider them to be wealthy. Many of them are farm people in our constituencies. They are working people, unionized people, and some professionals such as teachers. Indeed, many of these people are average Canadian citizens. They will be subsidizing those who will receive benefits under this plan. In the long run it will create a great deal of misunderstanding in our society when one group of people who are not making very much have to subsidize those who are making slightly less. This is a way of turning one group in our society against another. It will divide our society and build up resentment. I will give one or two examples of what I mean. Let us consider a family, with one child, living in Toronto or Ottawa and making $5,001 a year. Under this plan they will not receive any benefits. Such a family is not, by any stretch of the imagination, wealthy. This situation will develop resentment in our country.

We find that a family with two children, both under the age of ten, with an income of $9,000 will receive a monthly payment of $3.60, which is less than they are receiving now. And the poor themselves, as I was saying earlier, do not get a much better deal. They are given a few crumbs, a bit of tokenism, a little bit more money, but that is all. A family with four children all under age ten, earning less than $6,000, will get $1,720 a year in payments, but under our archaic income tax laws such a family will lose $400. That is some deal for the people of Canada who need help!

The answer to the question before us today is obvious. We need a plan that first of all is universal. We need a plan that does not have a means test. We need a plan that has a higher basic rate of payment. And we need a fair taxation system. If we do not get these things and this bill goes through without amendment, then the new plan will create more resentment in communities and families than we have now.

I want to say a word about a subject dealt with eloquently this afternoon by my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). It concerns the fact that under this bill many women feel they are discriminated against. Here I am thinking of hundreds of thousands of women who will no longer be receiving family allowance cheques. This is a point the government should keep in mind. It should not be too surprised if it finds that by next fall many of these women are very angry. The second major concern I have about the bill is that it will become an administrative, bureaucratic nightmare. I said earlier that it will make the unemployment insurance crisis look like child's play. The costs of administration will skyrocket. We already know, from an answer given by the government, that the present staff of 730 will have to be doubled to 1,477 as a result of this bill.

The new plan will cause a great deal of confusion in the minds of applicants. It will create a lot more paperwork for bureaucrats, a lot of needless expense that not only frustrates people but turns them against governments and government plans, including many of the better plans which we have in this country. It will create among people hostility to a family allowance plan that could be good if we followed a few of the basic principles and philosophies advocated by many citizens.

Now I want to spend a few minutes considering some of the bureaucratic hang-ups and difficulties that we can get into with a plan of this sort. All applications for family allowance must be checked to determine the eligibility of the applicants. This is obvious under the type of regulations we have. We could get away from many of these difficulties if we had a universal program for all families according to the number of children in the family. Secondly, in the case of eligible applicants payment is based on family income and the age of the children. One gets into a great deal of paperwork if the family income changes and as the ages of the children change.

In the case of non-eligible applicants, appeals and explanations must be handled. We will have people applying who do not qualify. This will cause more bureaucratic hang-up than is necessary. Abuses of the plan must be handled. We all remember the unemployment insurance program and the Lift program with which western members in particular are familiar. You cause a great deal of resentment among people through the appeal procedure. Cases involving a substantial increase or decrease in income must be processed, with appropriate adjustments made to benefits. There may be an overpayment for some reason, or an underpayment. Again, adjustments must be made, causing great difficulty.

What about divorces and the effect they will have on the regulations? We have separations; we have marriages. These must be reported if the family income is affected and the benefits must be adjusted. When you have marriages, separations and divorces—and there are tens of thousands of them every year—it throws more bugs into the plan. Adjustments must also be made to benefits when estimated income differs substantially from actual income. We may find that some people halfway through the year will take a second job, driving a taxi or doing night work. The wife may start teaching in high school or in the local elementary school. As a result, the family income will increase.

Administrative machinery must be set up to recover payments made to ineligible persons. Here again, western members know the difficulties we had with Lift when the administration tried to recover overpayments that had been made. Expert administrative machinery must be set up to detect frauds such as misrepresentation of income, misrepresentation of the ages of children, misrepresentations as to the number of children, failure to report income and failure to report deaths, marriages and separations. This is the type of bureaucratic jungle that we will get into with this bill. Finally, administrative machinery for liaison with the provinces will have to be established. The courts will probably be burdened with new offences and people who are guilty will be liable to fines and, in some cases, jail terms.

These are some of the problems that our party is concerned about. We could avoid many of these unnecessary bureaucratic hang-ups if we had a plan that was universal, that made payments regardless of income, and if we had a fair taxation system that did not allow payments to be made to the very wealthy. The position of our party is supported by the Social Development Council. I wish to quote briefly from a brief presented by that council:

> Family allowances should be universal, paid to all families with dependent children as a social right thus avoiding divisiveness among families and any element of stigma. The present program has this feature but FISP would eliminate it.

This is precisely what we are trying to get across to the minister.

> There should be the maximum feasible simplicity and efficiency in administration. These features are virtues of the present family allowances program but FISP would undoubtedly be considerably more complicated and costly to administer.
>
> The program should be as fully compatible as possible with long-term social and fiscal policies. This is not evident in the FISP proposals.
> The program should have a built in escalation clause to meet the full amount of annual rises in the cost of living. This feature is not included in either the present program or FISP.

These are some of the things the Social Development Council is concerned about and that our party is concerned about. These are some of the reasons we are trying to get the government to make important changes in the legislation. As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, basically we want three things. We want payments to be larger, we want them to be universal and we want the tax system to be reformed so that it is equitable and just. To me it seems very contradictory that we have so much money in this country for unnecessary things but when it comes to dealing with the average citizen we do not have enough money. I become very angry when I see some of the large tax loopholes that are available to the very wealthy and to large resource companies. During the last ten years, on average the gas and oil companies paid taxes on only 5.7 per cent of their profits.

What do we have for the poor people, the average worker, the farmer and the small businessman in our country? Basically, we have nothing but a government program that is so bureaucratic, so complicated that it will alienate half the people and do nothing for the other half.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the family income security plan one could become really concerned or look at it light-heartedly and say that perhaps it is a step in the right direction and all will be well once it is established. I think this question touches upon some of the deep-rooted philosophies that must be engendered, endured and borne by those in government. It touches upon the question of whether to be a pragmatist in government, operating on a day to day basis, solving the crisis of today tomorrow and the crisis of tomorrow the day after. But, Mr. Speaker, I think we have in Canada used this type of approach too long in government and it is time we decided upon our goals.

I have been involved in politics for 14 years, and when I compare society in Canada today with what it was when I became involved I realize that the country has changed a great deal. Fourteen years ago I was a young man coming to Ottawa.

An hon. Member: You are still pretty young.

Mr. Horner: Thank you. Fourteen years ago I had a fixed concept of what made Canada tick and what made me proud of it. I was proud because I looked upon Canada as a society of middle income people with a low proportion of people who might be termed the exalted rich or the desperately poor.

An hon. member suggests that I might be blind, I wonder how old he was 14 years ago, and how well he had travelled Canada. I recognize him as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight). I think he was elected at 24 years of age, so 14 years ago he would have been ten years old, and probably had not travelled far from the town of Weyburn, Saskatchewan, and had no real information as to what made Canada tick.

Mr. Alexander: And still does not.

Mr. Horner: Nor had he any idea of what classes there were in our society.

Mr. Borrie: Just the middle class.

Mr. Horner: I was proud to be a Canadian in those days. We managed our economy and our society better than the United States, better than Great Britain, and we did not get into all the problems of Europe, East and West Germany, and so on. As Canadians, we had a lot to be proud of. As I measure success in the management of our society and the economy, I can only reach the conclusion that the situation has deteriorated.

We have seen a tremendous increase in the number of exalted rich, a tremendous increase in those who feel they should be classified as the desperately poor, and a shrinking of the middle-class society. The people in the middle class must carry the load in our society and pay taxes to support the desperately poor. They must also carry the load so that the exalted rich may escape paying taxes. Some hon. members may wonder how this can be, but there is a great machine called regional economic expansion which will hand out money to anybody and give all kinds of credit and relief in the form of grants. Many of the wealthy international and foreign companies located in Canada pay very little taxes because of the grants they receive. Indeed, sometimes the grants far exceed the amount they pay in income tax. We hand it back to them saying it is their duty to provide the jobs we desperately need—so much money for so many jobs. This is the criteria and concept we are involved in. I think it is time we paused to examine the cause of the problem, Mr. Speaker. It is partly due to the fact we have developed schemes which undermine the hard working wage earner, the person in the middle class category.

According to Statistics Canada, the average wage is in the area of $135 a week, roughly $7,000 a year. This is about the middle category. Under this new program, 30 per cent of the people now receiving family allowance will not receive it any longer; the next 18 per cent will receive less; the next 17 per cent will receive about the same amount and the next 35 per cent will receive more. The $7,000 a year wage earner will find himself in the position of asking whether he should try to earn more and declare his earnings, only to receive less because the universality of the family allowance program has been removed.

I have philosophized, Mr. Speaker, in order to indicate why I think this program is leading us in the wrong direction. I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), is this the only program on the statute books? I think I read in the Toronto Star that the minister said it is unrealistic to think that we can support present welfare and health care costs. Those may not be his exact words but he said something like that.

What does this program do, Mr. Speaker? It destroys the universality of the family allowance program. The old age pension is universal. I ask the minister if this is next to go. He shakes his head in a negative manner; I want that to appear in Hansard. I wish the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) were in the House to shake his head in a negative manner too. We would be so much wiser and so would the minister. The old age pension and the hospitalization programs are universal. Anyone who is a citizen receives provincial hospitalization coverage. The millionaire can enjoy medicare as much as the desperately poor.

Then we introduced unemployment insurance. It doesn't matter how great your assets might be as an individual. You might, if you wanted to, sell your business or your farm and put $2 million in the bank and go to work for an average kind of income. After working for 180 days you might quit and collect unemployment insurance. A man might have even $3 million in the bank or $3 million worth of stocks and bonds: he would still collect unemployment insurance if he had paid into the fund. There is a universal concept in the unemployment insurance program.

Mr. Flemming: Do not forget medicare.

Mr. Horner: I mentioned medicare, hospitalization, the old age pension and unemployment insurance. There may be other areas I could deal with but they do not come to mind. Is the government's action in approaching this program on a selective basis the beginning of an attempt to destroy the universal application of a number of programs which have been passed and which reflect some degree of credit on this House? One might ask why I, a Conservative, am speaking this way, why I am concerned about universality. If you destroy the concept of universality, you will cut off from benefit not only the exalted rich but the people in the middle. Today, most people in Canada are in the middle. At least, it can be said that most were in the middle a few years ago: I do not think most people are in the middle today.

At the top end of the scale are the exalted rich and then you come to where most middle-class people were, or are. Those people will be asking themselves this question: "Shall I duck a little? Shall I quit working this month and perhaps not earn too much? Shall I moonlight a bit so that my apparent income will stay the same? After all, I will get free hospitalization and medicare benefits and I will qualify for the old age pension next year when I retire. Is it worth while working so hard?"

Do you see what I am getting at, Mr. Speaker? Destroying the universality of these programs will eventually erode the will of some Canadians. I think hon. members know what I am getting at and where my argument is leading. Most Canadians frown on the suggestion that people really do not want to work. For example, why cannot I hire a man? Why must I work 16 hours a day at a filling station in Calgary or wherever it may be, simply because I cannot hire a man to operate the pumps? After all, it is not a hard job; all he has to do is put the hose into the tank of a car.

Mr. Mahoney: Perhaps that is why the hon. member is never in Ottawa.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) says that is why I am never in Ottawa. I want to make it clear that I do not own a filling station. I was saying that merely to illustrate my point. If the hon. member thinks I am never in Ottawa, let him consider this: why have many Liberals been coming to Crowfoot and saying, "That terrible member for Crowfoot is a thorn in our sides. He holds up legislation," and does this and that. How can one who is never in Ottawa do that, I ask?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I return to my argument. Many people running small businesses find it difficult to hire people. Why, Mr. Speaker? I say our society is turning industrious, serious and conscientious people off. It is destroying their incentive to work. Let me give another example involving income tax. Some say, "If you earn extra money you will go up into the next bracket and they will hit you with a 40 per cent rate." People do not want that. A hired man who has worked for me for many years said, "Can I earn more money now without increasing my taxable income?" I said, "Yes, you can earn more money and more of your income will be exempt from tax because of your increased exemptions. However, the money you earn will be taxed as a higher rate and you will pay a higher rate as a bachelor once you start making substantial amounts of money." He said "I will have to watch that." There you have a prime example of how a seriously minded person can be turned off, so to speak. Similarly, the proposed family allowances program which is to be part of our social security legislation will have a tendency to turn people off.

I am reminded of a poem I read a long time ago entitled, "Lifters and Leaners". The author is unknown. What it says is true of the direction in which our society is going today. The poem is as follows:

There are two kinds of people on earth today,
Just two kinds of people, no more I say.
Not the saint and the sinner, for 'tis well understood,
The good are half bad, and the bad are half good.
Not the rich and the poor, for to count a man's wealth,
You must first know the state of his conscience and health
Not the happy and sad, for the swift flying years,
Brings each man his laughter and also his tears;
No, the two kinds of people on earth that I mean,
Are the people who lift, and the people who lean.

I fear that is the direction in which Canadian society is going. We are dividing Canada, not into a society of the exalted rich, the middle-class and the desperately poor but into those who lift and those who lean. This piece of legislation will penalize those who are lifting and encourage growth in the number of leaners.

Mr. Borrie: There are those who lift and those who lean.

Mr. Horner: Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. Borrie: Those are the two kinds of people on earth.

Mr. Horner: The poem reads, "There are two kinds of people on earth today...the people who lift and the people who lean." I think that is true.

Mr. Borrie: And there are those who refuse to lift or lean.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, at one time we had an industrious middle class in Canada, willing to work and earn and contribute to Canadian society. We had a few exalted rich and a few desperately poor, yet most were in the middle. Today the middle-class is shrinking. In other words, there is a different sort of division in our society today. Government have encouraged growth in the number of those willing to lean. An increasing number of people say, "To heck with lifting." I was going to use a stronger adjective but thought better of it. People are fed up with contributing to a society that does not appreciate them and overtaxes them. Basically, this bill will tax them.

Mr. Borrie: The hon. member is selling Canadians pretty short.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member, who is rarely seen here and who seldom speaks in the House, says I am selling Canadians short. I want Canadians to be strong. I want to be vigorous. I want them to buck right in there and hit the collar, as we say in western Canada. As legislators, we are not encouraging them to do that. I am not saying all people are fed up with working. I am not saying all people are not prepared to do their bit. I am saying that we as legislators are encouraging many of them not to work. We are encouraging many to become leaners. This whole concept is wrong.

• (2130)

One of the greatest evils in our society today—I say this without hesitation—is the politician in this House who can swallow himself whole on a day to day basis. There are too many persons of that kind in this House. They hope that at the end of next week or next month, through some great undercurrent they will again rise to the top, float and be able to say "I was okay. Nothing really hurt me. That is what the folks wanted and that is what we gave them. They do not know it will hurt them in six months." This is the kind of politician I despise. If all the people in their constituencies wanted candy tomorrow, they would give it to them. However, they will not be back here after the election this fall.

Mr. Borrie: It is the 14-year politician who does that.

Mr. Horner: I have often wondered about the age of the Prime Minister. I did not know whether he was 14 or 16. It seemed to me it had something to do with even numbers. I did not know whether he was 16, 18, 36, 38, 46, 48 or 52. I knew his age was on even number.

Mr. Borrie: You forgot the opening remarks of your speech.

Mr. Horner: I never forgot them.

Mr. Borrie: You thought Canada was great 14 years ago.

Mr. Horner: I thought Canada was great 14 years ago, and I still think there is potential for Canadian greatness. However, we as politicians must recognize our evil and wayward ways.

Mr. Borrie: Quit selling us short.

Mr. Horner: We must correct the situation and quit being guided on a day to day basis by politicians who believe they can swallow themselves today. They give the people what they want today and hope it will not catch up with them tomorrow.

Mr. Skoberg: Are you supporting the bill?

Mr. Horner: I am supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis), or the fellow who sits next to him. I am referring to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). I thought he was still the leader because he and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) are always advising the present leader, who is going nowhere in the NDP. While I agree with and am supporting the amendment for absolutely different reasons than he, I believe there is some merit in the concept of universality for many of the social welfare or social justice programs that are on today's legislative books. For that and other reasons which I have expressed, I wholeheartedly support the amendment.

I see the Minister of National Health and Welfare has returned to the chamber. I wish to direct a question to him.

Mr. Skoberg: How about Bill C-170?

Mr. Horner: It is a dangerous thing to get Jack Horner involved in—Bill C-176, did you say?

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Mazankowski: What is Bill C-176?

Mr. Horner: Bill C-176 was a further erosion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I think the Chair has been very generous to the hon. member who has the floor, but he should address himself to the Chair and stay with the amendment before us.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I will do my best but the House seems to be in a mood to heckle. Normally I am not distracted by idle remarks made by members to my left and members opposite, but it appears that I was bothered this evening. I apologize to Your Honour and hon. members for allowing myself to be bothered.

I wish to direct a simple question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope that before this legislation is passed the minister will explain the statement I read in the Toronto Star yesterday, that it was unbelievable or unrealistic to expect that Canadians can stand the welfare or health costs of today and then bring forward a piece of legislation which will increase the basic cost from $640 million a year to $800 million for the coming year. We all know that after a few years these costs build up and proliferate. How does the minister explain that concept? Is this the kind of system that will repay itself, such as the old age security pension plan? No, it is not. It is a direct drain upon the taxpayer. The exalted rich escape paying taxes and the desperately poor are not in a position to pay them. This is an increase in tax for the shrinking middle-class. That is my first question.

Second, in destroying the universality of the family income security plan or, as it is commonly called, the family allowances plan, is this the first step toward destroying the universality of many other social justice programs?

Mr. Borrie: Socialistic?

Mr. Horner: I said social justice. You treat it any way you like. It means different things to different people. To us it means fair play for Canadians. To the Liberals it means fair play for the Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Excuse me, Your Honour; I am being sidetracked again. Is this the beginning of destroying the universality of the hospitalization program, the medicare system and the unemployment insurance system, which does not come under this minister's department? Before I was interrupted by the catcalls I had referred to the old age security program. While I do not place much credence in the minister's remarks, because we know the Prime Minister rules all his ministers, with the upcoming election the minister's remarks should be on the record. Under the new cabinet system of evolving policy, the Prime Minister rules everything, the cabinet and a couple of other important people. Some people have referred to them as the three wise men, and the minister is not one of them.

Mr. Borrie: I am not one of them.

Mr. Horner: Even though the minister may be overruled by the inner cabinet, to use a polite expression, with the upcoming election he should place his views on record. As the leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba asked about another piece of legislation, is this the tip of the iceberg? I ask this question with regard to the concept of universality in social justice programs that has been long established in this House and the Canadian system. If it is, it amounts to a re-enaction of the means test. The means test draws a line down the middle, and this is where we find the man who carries the lunch-pail, the man who is earning $135 a week. In effect, we are telling him, "Duck below the line and you will get certain services provided free by the government. Do not stick your head above that line, whatever you do." That is the curse of a means test. A means test may be all right in the case of persons over 70, but is the House aware that 67.4 per cent of those over 70 are living below the poverty level? I do not think it is. Yet this is a fact attested to by Statistics Canada.

• (2140)

Are we taking a retrograde step today? Are we returning to an all-inclusive means test which will affect every worker? I have told hon. members what this proposal means. It means that 30 per cent will get no benefits, that 18 per cent will get less, that 17 per cent will get the same, and 35 per cent will get more. Seventeen and 35 make 52. We are right on the halfway line. A person earning less than $7,000 is wise to continue to earn less than $7,000. A person earning more than $7,000 is wise to get below that figure somehow or other. Don't work for two months; go moonlighting where the people in the inland revenue cannot catch up to you. The minister smiles. If he only knew how many people are doing that in today's society. If he only knew how many teachers, how many farmers, how many lawyers—

Mr. Gilbert: Lawyers?

Mr. Mahoney: Doctors?

Mr. Horner: Yes, lawyers. I said that because the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a law degree. I heard the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) throw in the word "doctors". Yes, doctors, teachers, dentists—you name it! We are all human.

An hon. Member: And ranchers.

Mr. Horner: And ranchers and farmers. We are all human. Draw the line. Recreate the cruel means test. It will apply to the working person and you have caught the guy who carries the lunch-pail, who goes to work every day. Is there not some reward for him in this society? I was about to use a bunch of adjectives such as the average working man would use, but I thought better of it. This will strike at the man who carries the lunch-pail, who eats baloney sandwiches or peanut butter sandwiches, or whatever it is, every day and goes back home for a hot dinner at night. If a man earns more than $10,000 he will get nothing at all. And his wife will say, "What are you doing with my money? Give me some money. You are taking the pin money; you are taking the cream cheque money, the egg money." My mother used to get the cream cheque; we boys milked the cows.

An hon. Member: Don't forget the cookie jar, Jack.

Mr. Horner: The cookie jar was always empty; I had a sweet tooth. But this is removing the money which the average wage earner's housewife really felt was hers. She spent it on the children. She bought little Susie a new dress. She bought little Peter a new pair of shoes.

Mr. Mahoney: Or a Barbie doll.

Mr. Horner: Or a Barbie doll. She bought milk for the children or maybe she got a hairdo one week out of 17. There was no need to ask her husband for the money; it was her money and she spent it on the family.

The average housewife will be right on the line. Is her husband earning more than $7,000? If he is, she gets less. If he is earning more than $10,000, she gets nothing. Ten thousand dollars is not a lot of money today in the cities, although it is a lot of money to the farmers and to many other people. Thank the Lord, as far as the farmer is concerned it is net income, it is taxable income and it may therefore not affect very many farmers. But it will affect a great many housewives in the cities. We are told that by 1980 two-thirds of the Canadian people will be living in our major population centres.

Then there is the likelihood of inflation. I do not wish to go into the subject very deeply, but with an increase of more than 30 per cent in the money supply experienced this year, and a 21 per cent increase last year, by next fall, when this legislation really hits home, inflation will be running wild. The Liberals say, "We hope the election will be over by then, and everything will be great." But a year from now, with wages increasing in line with the rate of inflation allowed by the government, the $7,000 limit will not suffice and an increasing number of average wage earners will be disqualified from benefit under this measure. So the average housewife will have less money to spend on her family, the family she treasures, the family she tries to encourage and raise.

For these reasons, I believe the legislation to be a retrograde step and I support the amendment now before the House. I hope, should the amendment be defeated, that a worthy colleague of mine will move an amendment warranting the support of the most vocal heckler I have encountered this evening and, also, the support of the triumvirate sitting in the front row of the NDP benches. I sometimes wonder which one is the leader, but they all make a fair stab at it and I would like to think that they would support a further amendment.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Maybe there is not too much left to say, but I will say this, Mr. Speaker. For those on the other side of the House, for those who are the government tonight, there is a great deal left to say. Before this bill is dead, buried and forgotten they are going to hear it said. I suggest to those on the other side of the House that they think a little more and remember why and under what circumstances this legislation was placed on the statute books of Canada. It was placed there by a man who for a number of years was one of the most consummate politicians to grace the scene, Mackenzie King. He brought in the legislation at an appropriate time, as well as bringing in certain other legislation. He did so, not because he was a progressive reformer but because he was a politician and the CCF party was breathing down his neck.

An hon. Member: Who are they?

Mr. Gleave: If the people to my right do not remember who they were, we will refresh their memories during the next election campaign. And that goes for hon. members opposite too. The legislation we are talking about tonight was brought in for these reasons. Let us give the man who at that time was head of the Liberal party credit that he was enough of an economist to understand that we have to find ways and means of distributing income to those who are disadvantaged. I do not think he would have brought the legislation in except for that, and for the fact he was being threatened by members of the CCF who were offering the Canadian people an alternative to poverty and hardship and the Canadian people were beginning to believe them.

Therefore the family allowance legislation was brought in, as was unemployment insurance. These were two basic programs that were introduced, both of which are now being sabotaged by this government led by a technocrat with ice water in his veins, a man with no basic concept of what this country is all about, who cannot bring to bear an understanding of how to use the wealth we produce. Since he and his party cannot conceive how to use the wealth of this country, they must bring in programs that share poverty around. The options are either to use the wealth that society can produce or to ensure the existence of the privileged few who sit at the top, while sharing the balance of the poverty around.

Look what has been done to the unemployment insurance legislation. Members on the back benches as well as on the front benches—though the latter have some expert help available to them—are trying to solve the problems that the unemployment insurance bill has created in an endeavour to relieve the misery visited on those who cannot quite conform to the new circumstances.

The government is now going to turn the family allowance legislation around and we shall be doing the same thing again—trying to correct the injustices, inequities and unworkable situations that will be created. Can the government tell me how it is going to administer an act that bases the right of an individual to claim payments on the income that he declares, when his income may vary anywhere from $3,000 to $8,000 from one year to the next? Certainly this will be the case with fishermen, farmers, people in urban areas where the wife may work for five months of the year, or for 12 months, or not at all if she is bringing a child into the family.

[Mr. Gleave.]

How in the world will the government even things out? The previous speaker mentioned that you will be pretty well able to tell a person's level of income by seeing whether he claims a family allowance cheque or not.

What baffles me is why we need this legislation in the first place. It would be far simpler to use the taxation system and tax back surplus income in the higher income levels. But instead of that, the government are increasing the amount of family allowance cheques. They are devising a way to get their fingers on an individual to whom they think they are giving some money, but secretly think that they and their family do not deserve it at all. Their real wish would be to take the money away entirely, but they cannot quite get away with that and know it, so they have to fiddle around and half clobber it. That is the objective of those on that side of the House; that is what they are after.

Led by a technocrat, advised by people in high finance who if they had to run their own business would have been broke yesterday, the government is continuing its folly. Hopefully, before this debate is concluded the government will recant, change its mind and back away from this folly that they now propose to visit upon the Canadian people.

May I call it ten o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I know the minister wishes to speak to a matter, but could I ask about the business of the House? Unless an election is called during the night, will we be starting with the CN financing bill tomorrow?

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the probability of an election being called during the night is somewhat remote. The chances are that we can survive until the beginning of the week. In that event we will deal with the CNR bill tomorrow. Then, if we are allowed to proceed we will have an opposition day on Monday, and following that we will be back to—if you will excuse the lisp—FISP.

COMBINES

INVESTIGATION OF CLOSING OF TORONTO "TELEGRAM" AND PURCHASE OF SUBSCRIPTION LIST BY "STAR" —CORRECTION OF ANSWER GIVEN DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to request unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions to correct a statement that I made during the question period today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: After he has made the correction.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, my correction is to an answer that I gave to a question put by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who asked me about a transaction involving the Toronto Star and Toronto Telegram. As I indicated I would, since I had some hesitation in the answer I gave today, I double-checked with the director under the Combines Investigation Act and he has advised me that he still has the matter before him. In the process I have satisfied myself that he is giving it his proper attention. However, in accordance with well established practice, no further information can be given with regard to a formal inquiry in progress unless or until the proceedings are published or until proceedings are commenced in the courts.

• (2200)

Mr. Lewis: Perhaps the minister would be good enough to inform the House that what the director has before him he has in fact had before him since last October. Does the minister know whether that is so?

Mr. Andras: I believe that is the correct date.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO REVOKING OF DRILLING PERMITS FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL WATERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 8 as recorded at page 635 of Hansard, and on Tuesday, March 14 as recorded at page 798 of Hansard, I asked certain questions of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) seeking to ascertain whether or not the government had issued oil drilling permits to Petrotar Development Limited of Calgary covering 2.7 million acres of coastal waters of British Columbia. The answers to those questions were so inconclusive and evasive that I decided to put this matter up for debate on an adjournment motion.

I want to point out that the revelation that these permits had been granted came in the British Columbia legislature from a statement made by resources minister Ray Williston which accused the government of Canada of talking out of both sides of its mouth by agreeing to any exploration in Queen Charlotte sound while publicly agonizing about offshore oil pollution.

When these facts came to light, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) immediately rushed to the press to assure the public that no such permits would be issued for exploration of offshore areas without the approval of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). According to the Fisherman of February 9, the Minister of the Environment himself described the federal permits as an error which would not be repeated. On February 4 he was reported as saying that he had discussed this politically sensitive issue with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of the Environment is quoted as saying he was assured there would be action to recover the permits.

Consequently, I have been trying to find out, first, whether these permits were issued and, second, whether or not they have been rescinded. I therefore placed a question on the order paper, question No. 322 of March 16 of this year. It was passed as an order for return yesterday, April 19. Here are the questions:

1. How many oil exploration permits were issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources during 1971 covering areas of the coastal waters on the Pacific coast?

This is the answer:

1. 40 oil and gas exploration permits.

The second question is as follows:

2. How many oil exploration permits on the Pacific coast were outstanding as of March 1, 1972?

The answer is:

2. 237 oil and gas exploration permits.

I will skip question No. 3 and come back to it later. Question No. 4:

4. What permits, if any, have been revoked since January 1, 1972?

The answer is that there were none. Question No. 3 reads:

3. What were the names and addresses of the companies granted these permits, on what dates were they issued and what is the area and the location covered by each permit?

The following is the answer:

3. A list of the oustanding permits, their dates of issue and area covered by each permit is attached as Schedule A, together with a permit map.

A list of the companies holding these permits and their addresses is attached as schedule B.

I have that map. It is rather interesting that the oil permits granted cover practically all of the west coast of Vancouver Island and practically all of the coast of the mainland with the exception of the Strait of Georgia. For from the statement which was attributed to the Minister of the Environment that these 40 permits granted to Petrotar Development Limited of Calgary would be rescinded, we find that they are still in existence, that they have not been revoked.

The Minister of the Environment himself seems to have had a change of heart. I have here a copy of the speech which he delivered on Monday, March 13 to the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union in Vancouver. In that speech he said:

The likelihood of serious damage occurring of course varies from place to place. Out on the big bank off Tofino, we don't have the same urgent problem as we would have were the same spill to occur off Saturna for example.

It is interesting, with the Pacific Rim Park located in that area, and with Long Beach in that area, that the minister did not think it is a sensitive area. He went on to say in the same speech:

Let me make my own position quite clear. I am opposed to the drilling for oil in Georgia Strait. But I am not opposed to drilling for oil everywhere on our big continental shelf. I am not opposed to it 400 miles out on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. I am not opposed to it 40 miles west of Victoria either.

The minister may not be opposed to it, but the people in my constituency are opposed to it because this would bring drilling down to areas such as Port Renfrew, Jordan River, Sooke and Metchosin. Not many people in that area are aware of the fact that a present there are five drilling permits granted in the Strait of Juan de Fuca, covering 161,450 acres. We want a clear statement from the government as its policy. Who is going to grant these permits? Is the Minister of the Environment going to have the final say, or are we going to get the same sort of thing we had in 1968 and that we have had again this winter, of one minister granting permits and another saying they will be revoked, but the permits stay and the drilling continues and the coastal waters of B.C. can be polluted by oil spills?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member has indicated, we provided him with a tremendous amount of information and material so that he could research the address which he has made tonight. With the concurrence of my minister, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) announced in Vancouver on March 13 that exploration and drilling for oil would be excluded from sensitive offshore zones. Our departments will work together on the definition of these offshore zones. The total west coast acreage is 16,272,694 acres, covered by 239 permits outstanding. On the Atlantic coast, 4,259 permits cover 315,714,483 acres, and in Hudson Bay and the Hudson Strait region 70,592,807 acres are held under 1,152 permits.

If any of Petrotar's permits should fall within environmentally sensitive zones, then we will be discussing with that company the kinds and conditions of work which will not be allowed. I should like to confirm the government's position that subject to this zoning, exploration and drilling will be encouraged in the offshore frontier in strict adherence to regulations currently enforced by my department and judged to be among the most stringent anywhere in the world.

• (2210)

Permit acreage may revert to the Crown by reason of surrender of a permit or half permit by the permittee, cancellation of a permit by the minister, expiration of a permit, surrender of a portion—50 per cent or more—of the acreage within a permit area upon conversion of the permit acreage to lease form. Voluntary surrender accounts for a considerable proportion of the permit acreage reverting to the Crown. Last year, some 42 million permit acres in Hudson Bay were surrendered back to the Crown. A permittee may decide to surrender a permit for any of a great variety of reasons, but basically what it boils down to is that the permittee cannot meet the obligations involved in holding the permit or he decides that the prospective benefits of holding the permit are outweighed by the obligations involved.

[Mr. Douglas.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE—RENT INCREASES FOR MARRIED QUARTERS—SUGGESTED DELAY UNTIL PARITY WITH PUBLIC SERVICE ACHIEVED

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my presence here this evening arises from questions that I asked on St. Patrick's day, March 17, recorded at page 919 of Hansard. These were in connection with the attitude of the government with respect to its decision on rental rates for married quarters at Canadian Armed Forces bases.

On that date I put essentially two propositions to the minister. First, I asked whether or not it was right that the government's decision, to change the basis on which the rents are assessed for married quarters, was based on the decision to proceed to parity, so-called, between the Canadian Armed Forces and parallel positions in the public service and, if that in fact were true, whether the government would not admit that it would take at least a full year before this came about. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) replied:

Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting suggestion. I think, however, that the hon. member is quite correct that the eradication of inequalities is done in two stages and will not be completed until next year.

I then asked, if it is in fact based on parity, would the government not consider delaying implementation for a full year. The new rental systems, while relieving to some degree the rents being paid by about 7,000 or 8,000 families, impose in some cases substantially higher rents on about 16,000 or 17,000 families. If the principle of eradication of the inequalities between the Canadian Armed Forces and parallel positions in the public service is a valid one, why is it that the government will not even give consideration to this particular request?

Secondly, when will the government get around to recognizing the difference in relationships between veterans, Canadian Armed Forces personnel who served during war and personnel who have not had that opportunity, because of their age and the accident of their particular period in the Canadian Armed Forces, who are not qualified veterans in the sense that they are eligible for reasonable percentage rates, if you will, or funds for the purpose of buying a home, building a home, and major rennovations to existing properties? And will the government now give some consideration to a major review, not only of the rental situation that exists with respect to Canadian Armed Forces married quarters but of the whole way in which we treat present day serving members of the Canadian Armed Forces?

I made a suggestion in the question I put to the President of the Treasury Board on that day. The question appears at page 919 of Hansard as follows:

I wonder whether he would initiate discussions within the cabinet with respect to a system which would permit Canadian forces personnel who are compelled to a major degree to live in rented quarters during their careers—

Mr. Speaker, an opportunity to build equity would be a method by which a percentage of their rent could be set aside against their retirement so that they would have the funds with which to establish themselves more readily in the civilian community. These are two reasonable requests. They have some urgency and the government has an obligation to its armed forces personnel to be aware of their social needs and the difficulties they face on retirement. They should be aware, as well, of the difficulties faced by young families with growing children which have the usual commitments of most families today.

I have not seen the minister for a couple of months and I wonder whether he comes to the House of Commons any more, but perhaps whoever is to speak on his behalf could give us some thoughts on these two or three points which are minor in a way though major in consequence to Canadian armed forces personnel.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board): Mr. President, before replying to the second question put by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestal), if I have understood his last remark, he has not seen the president of the Treasury Board in the House for some time. I feel I should clarify the matter and say that the President of the Treasury Board is present in the house in keeping with the established roster whenever his presence is required.

As I mentioned, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: I was talking about the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson).

Mr. Clermont: I am sorry if I did not properly understand the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. Forrestall: Had he come into the House I would not have directed the question to your minister.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, I shall reply to the second request. It is assumed that this proposal does not relate to superannuation entitlements but that it envisages the accumulation of a capital fund on behalf of the individual which would be made available to him on his retirement, when he would have to leave his military quarters, to assist him in securing other accommodation.

A similar idea has been put forward in another forum. The Treasury Board has initiated a review of its policies relating to the provision of public service living accommodation. There have also been consultations about these policies within the National Joint Council and representatives of the staff associations have made a similar proposal for the development of an equity on behalf of public servants who occupy and pay rent for government-provided accommodation. This general idea will be examined during the course of the policy review, and the proposal related to armed forces personnel can be studied within that context.

It might be observed that while the idea may seem attractive at first sight, there are difficulties associated with it. In particular, the question of equitable treatment will arise. If it is clear that our employees are being charged a fair rate of rental for their accommodation—and we believe this to be the case—then the dedication of part of this rental for their own future use would, in effect, imply an increase in the compensation paid to them for their services. This increase in compensation would not be shared by other employees who do not occupy government-provided housing, nor would it be shared, of course, by those who are not in the public service. Considerations such as these will have to be taken into account when this proposal is examined.

POLLUTION—WRECKING OF FREIGHTER "VANLENE" NEAR PACIFIC RIM PARK—STEPS TO SUPPLY ADEQUATE EQUIPMENT FOR CLEAN-UPS AND STRENGTHEN NAVIGATIONAL RULES

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, on the first occasion on which I could secure the floor during the question period following the visit to the ill-fated Vanlene which grounded on a rock near Pacific Rim Park off the west coast of Vancouver island, I raised a question which I hoped to address to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) with regard to what steps were to be taken to prevent similar, blundering types of disaster in the future. I suggested that it was more by good luck than good management that we avoided a major ecological disaster.

In particular, I wanted to know what had been done under regulations coming under the new part XIX of the Canada Shipping Act. I also raised some questions about improving methods of clean-up. I intend to raise the question of the shipping regulations tonight. I think it is much more important to consider prevention than to attempt to arrive at a cure after a disaster has happened. In this connection, may I refresh the memory of the House with regard to what part XIX of the Canada Shipping Act provides. Section 739(1) of the Canada Shipping Act provides that the governor in council may make regulations among other things:

> (g) requiring ships in waters to which this part applies and with respect to which the regulations are made applicable to have on board, maintain and use appropriate charts, tide tables, lists of lights and other nautical publications;
> (h) respecting the number and qualifications of navigation and engine room personnel, including pilots and lookouts, required to be on duty on ships of any class designated in the regulations in any waters to which this part applies and with respect to which such regulations are made applicable;
> (i) prescribing procedures and practices to be followed by persons on board ships in order to ensure safe navigation in waters to which this part applies; ...
> (o) establishing compulsory traffic routes and other shipping traffic controls considered necessary for safe navigation in waters to which this part applies and with respect to which those regulations are made applicable;

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, those regulations were not effected in this case. I suggest to the House that even if they had been effected, they would have been ineffective to the extent that the act up to now has applied only to Canadian waters, that is, within the 12-mile zones and within the fishing zones of Canada. I wish to draw to the attention of the House the fact that just over one year ago, on March 1, 1971, I moved a report stage amendment to that legislation which would have provided that the act would apply to waters outside our fishing zones and territorial zones to a distance of 100 nautical miles seaward.

I am glad to see that some hon. members of the House have become interested in the subject since the recent disaster. I wish the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) had seen fit to support my effort to have that kind of additional safeguard written into the legislation at the time it was being considered by the House. If those additional provisions had been in effect, and if the regulations had been in force, obviously the Vanlene could not have run into the rock off Austin Island. Imagining he was still eight or ten hours steaming distance from the nearest land, the master, according to preliminary news reports, thought he was in a position that was somewhere opposite the shore of the state of Washington.

I suggest it is not much use our going through the long and painful exercise, as we do in the House and committee, in enacting legislation if that legislation is merely to gather dust on the shelves around Parliament Hill. Rather, these regulations ought to have been in effect. The kinds of controls that are suggested in the legislation should have made this particular shipwreck unnecessary and should have prevented it. It is one that could easily have been avoided if the regulations, in conjunction with the provisions of the Pilotage Act which we also passed in the previous session, had been in effect.

May I point out that the Pilotage Act provides that the pilotage authority may, with the approval of the governor in council, establish compulsory pilotage areas and prescribe the ships or classes of ships that are subject to compulsory pilotage. In the interpretation section, the act reads:

> (d) "compulsory pilotage" means, in respect of a ship, the requirement that the ship be under the conduct of a licensed pilot or the holder of a pilotage certificate;
> (e) "compulsory pilotage area" means an area of water in which ships are subject to compulsory pilotage;

While I am very happy about the fact that the Vanlene did not cause any major ecological disaster despite the fact that the long-term damage of the oil that did escape has not been fully assessed, nevertheless if it had been carrying a cargo of oil instead of a cargo of motor cars manufactured in Japan bound for the port of Vancouver, we could have had a disaster on the west coast of Vancouver Island equal to or greater than the one that occurred in Chedabucto Bay some time ago.

In raising this question I hope I will get an affirmative answer from the government that the regulations under the two acts to which I have referred will become effective immediately and a full assessment will be made of the inadequacies that have been revealed in the clean-up efforts which took place in connection with the Vanlene wreck.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, limited as I am in my time, I cannot reply in a precise way to the hon. member, certainly not in the manner that I would wish. I think the hon. member from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) will find that he has the full support of all members of this House in the desire to see the greatest possible degree of marine safety employed in Canadian coastal waters.

I understand that the hon. member and my colleague from Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) visited the wreckage site of the Vanlene and saw first-hand the work being administered by federal authorities in an attempt to minimize the pollution threat from that vessel. I am informed that a great deal of progress has been achieved in setting up our national contingency plans for this type of pollution, and that millions of dollars are being spent to provide the necessary tools to cope with major oil spills. The Department of Transport has an extensive equipment program under way. Contracts have been let for the construction of specialized equipment and other types of anti-pollution devices are being procured.

Hon. members may recall the success of the Great Lakes contingency planning structures with the U.S. authorities. That plan went into effect last summer. There now are similar plans for the east and west coasts which will provide for joint response and support in areas which are of mutual concern to our country and the United States.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) indicated to the House on Tuesday, April 18, the progress which is being achieved with respect to the enactment of regulations under part XIX of the Canada Shipping Act. These include oil pollution prevention regulations, ships' garbage regulations and traffic routing regulations. In the final stages of planning are additional regulations which will affect ships' navigational appliances, charts, publications and deck watch. The shipping industry has, of course, been consulted on these matters and it is anticipated that they will be gazetted in the next three or four months.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

PROPOSED BAN ON COMMERCIAL SALMON FISHING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I move that Canada's unilateral proposal to ban commercial salmon fishing on the Atlantic coast for ten years be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry so that various points of view may be heard and considered before a final policy announcement is made by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal. This motion, presented to the House under Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—PUBLICATION OF INFORMATION ON SELECTION OF SITE AND DECISION THAT ADDITIONAL FACILITY NEEDED—COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had some questions for the Minister of the Environment who was supposed to be here today but no doubt he is unable to be present. I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can tell the House in what form the information and data that he intends to make public with regard to the proposed Pickering airport will be made available and when it will be made public?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a group of experts, I suppose one could call them, is now in the process of distilling the volumes of information that led to the decision. Some of that material has already been produced and additional material will be available early next week. On Wednesday morning, I believe, at nine a.m. I am to meet with one of the groups interested in this particular project. I have also indicated that I would be prepared to meet with any other groups. These preliminary meetings will be for the purpose of indicating to them just exactly what information is available and to try to work out some formula or format so that they can have an opportunity to examine all of it in detail. In other words, it will be a question of getting a response from them on what they feel is the best technique to employ that will be meaningful and give them all the facts that led to the decision.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the minister intend to make available to these groups and to the public generally the relevant reports and documents and the reasons for the decision taken a number of years ago in favour of an additional airport in the area? I am not referring to the decision on the location.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As far as the government and myself are concerned, all the work that has been done dating back in fact to 1966 will certainly be opened to anybody who wishes to see it. By that I do not mean on an individual basis, with many thousands of people wandering in and looking at individual documents, but the record in its totality is available. What we have done as a first step is to take these many thousands of documents and attempt to distil the information so that we can indicate to the groups what is available. It will then be for them to decide how much further they want to go and whether the distilled versions we have prepared and are in the process of preparing are adequate. If they want to go deeper into it, it will then be strictly a mechanical question of the best way of arriving at that kind of arrangement.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention of the minister to make arrangements to appear before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications? I think this was suggested by the Prime Minister at one time as a probable course. Does the minister intend to appear before that committee with all the documentation and subject himself and his officials to such examination as the committee may care to make into the question of need for an additional airport quite apart from the actual choice of location?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in two forms if hon. members so desire. I might remind the Leader of the Opposition that my main estimates are being examined at the present time. I have not yet appeared personally before the committee, but this would be one opportunity. If the committee were to decide that it wished to have a special session with regard to the matter of airport development, I would certainly be more than pleased to attend. It goes without saying, of course, that the information to which I referred earlier will also be available to all members of the House.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—POSSIBLE RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION FOLLOWING COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION—REPRESENTATIONS BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO PRIME MINISTER Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary arising out of the questions that have been asked and regarding which I raised a number of questions several weeks ago. Following examination of the documents by the committee, would the government be prepared to reconsider the whole question and not finally determine, as apparently is now the case, that Pickering township will be chosen as the area for the airport? Second, would the minister make available the representations made by the hon. member for York North, Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, revealing in detail his opposition to the choice of this area for the airport and the sound and appropriate reasons that he gave in opposition thereto?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the right hon. gentleman's question, I think it would be premature for me to anticipate what the conclusions of the committee or of any other group would be. I might remind him that a very large number of people support this decision and it is conceivable and, indeed, likely, that hon. members and others will see that we have made a wise decision. Therefore I have no idea as to what will flow from the discussions. I might simply say in conclusion that, of course, much of the work was done on the basis of very strong representations from members on both sides of the House who, indeed, had been accusing me for a very long time of dragging my feet with regard to establishing a second airport for Toronto.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister, who has a fabulous memory, has forgotten the second question I asked. Would he say that there is as yet no finality in the determination of the location of this airport?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member is the living example showing that there is no finality to anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the minister is referring to longevity. I have already said on other occasions, when I received the award from the Jewish people, the Tree of Life, that I still have many years to go before I will have equalled Moses' record of 120 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister tell the House first, what were the representations of the hon. member for York North, potent and powerful as they were, against this area being chosen and, second, will the minister say whether the decision regarding the Pickering area is as yet tentative, that the matter has not been finally decided by the government and that the decision is subject to change?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in so far as representations have been made, I think the hon. member for York North has been a most efficient spokesman for his constituents and he has also been very farsighted in the various proposals that he advanced. He advanced them prior to the decision that was made in this case. The hon. member for Ontario has done the same thing, as have other hon. members. On the second part of the question, I have no wish to hedge in answering the right hon. gentleman. All I am saying is that the decision of the government with regard to this site and our plans for it is, in my judgment, a good one. I want to make the fullest case for that, and I think I am perfectly justified in saying that I will leave my options open until there has been time for such reactions as come to me to be examined.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER PRESENT REASONS JUSTIFYING NEED IN APPEARANCE BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister, when he appears before the committee, deal not only with the question of the location of the new international airport but present a summary of the reasons for any need for such a new international airport, which seems to be the primary consideration in this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I think that is the No. 1 question which perhaps should precede any other examination, the question of need. For my own part, I am perfectly satisfied that this can be demonstrated without qualification, and I will undertake to do that.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West on a last supplementary on this subject, to which we might return later, and then recognize the hon. member for York South.

• (1120)

MOUNT HOPE, ONT.—POSITION OF EXPANSION COMMITMENT—OPPORTUNITY FOR REPRESENTATIONS BY INTERESTED GROUPS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport in light of the answers to the questions just raised. Can the minister now assure the House and the people of Hamilton that the commitment of $25 million for the expansion of Mount Hope airport is in fact a definite commitment, or is it also something that is up in the air at the present time?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question illustrates the nature of the quandary. Of course it is a definite commitment and we are prepared to proceed with it immediately. But in an issue of this kind it can be seen from the line of questions directed my way this morning that there are differences of opinion on some of these matters, on the government side, indeed, and within the country as a whole. In so far as the expansion of Mount Hope airport is concerned, provided always that I can meet the requirements of the council and the various municipal authorities in that area, which I believe I can, I think it would proceed regardless of any other developments that might occur in the Toronto area.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact it is my understanding that there has not been any definite arrangement for the minister to meet not only the council but other concerned citizens groups who, rightly so, would have objections in some small part to the expansion, can the minister advise whether in fact a date has been set for a meeting with these groups so he can obtain their ideas regarding expansion?

Mr. Jamieson: Perhaps the hon. member will forgive me for not knowing the exact name—I am not certain whether it is the township of Hamilton or the council of Hamilton. In amy event, I have been in touch with them and have indicated my willingness to hold a meeting with them. The problem is that while it may be possible to expand airports it is impossible to expand time, and if I should not be in the House in the near future to answer hon. members' questions it will be because I am trying to meet all the requests for meetings that have come to me, all of which I am prepared to attend.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE ORDERING OF TWIN OTTER PLANES FROM DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT COMPANY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he give the House any information on whether or not the government is contemplating ordering 50 twin Otter aircraft from de Havilland in Toronto, whether any discussions are taking place or have taken place and what the situation is in this respect?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, discussion is indeed going on in the government on this matter of the situation at de Havilland in Toronto, centred on a research development project called DHC-7. This project would include some purchases of the type mentioned by my hon. friend. An announcement will be made rather soon on that subject, hopefully.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear what the minister has said because this involves the jobs of a good many people in that area. May I ask the minister when he thinks he will be in a position to make an announcement concerning the aircraft he mentioned and other developments in relation to aircraft—technically I am not very knowledgeable in the field—as well as whether discussions are taking place regarding the manufacture and the production of more Buffalo airplanes at that plant?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I chose my words very carefully. I said "rather soon" which is sooner than soon.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO CONSTRUCTION OF DHC-7 PLANES—PROPOSED USE

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell us in what way the government has contributed in the construction of a hundred or so DHC-7 aircraft, nearly half of which will be in service in Canada?

Will this fleet of 50 planes be added to those already in regular service for Air Canada, or will they be used by the Armed Forces?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I would need to take that question as notice. I am not sure of the details and I will get an answer for the hon. member as soon as I can.

FISHERIES

REPORTED BAN ON COMMERCIAL SALMON FISHING ON ATLANTIC COAST FOR TEN YEARS—REACTION OF DENMARK RESPECTING POSSIBLE INTERNATIONAL CONTROL TREATY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Fisheries. Although members of parliament are conscious of the need for conservation measures, how does the government anticipate that a policy decision to ban commercial salmon fishing on the Atlantic coast for ten years will make Denmark or any other fishing country anymore amenable to an international treaty to control the fishing?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The question put by the hon. member is apparently based upon a press report of an interview and it is inaccurate in several respects. The Minister of the Environment and Fisheries will be making a statement in the House, but I can reassure the hon. member on two points. The policy does not contemplate a complete ban, and it is not for ten years.

Mr. Fairweather: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries is on the roster to be here today. Whether or not the press report is accurate is, of course, for the government to say, but the press report was based on an announcement or interview outside the House which the minister must have known would raise serious questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might like to ask his supplementary. I have the impression—is the hon. member rising on a point of order? I did not appreciate that. I thought he was seeking the floor for the purpose of a supplementary.

Mr. Fairweather: No, Mr. Speaker. It was a point of order arising from the absence of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. I suggest, with great respect, that the government can do a great deal better than this. It really means that the minister and the government are treating us with great contempt when a situation is allowed to arise which will seriously affect the livelihood of a great number of Canadians.

PROPOSED BAN ON COMMERCIAL SALMON FISHING ON ATLANTIC COAST—SUGGESTED DEFERMENT UNTIL CONSULTATIONS HELD WITH FISHERMEN AND PROVINCES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a very simple question involving the Atlantic salmon fishery. In view of the fact that almost every fisherman in the Atlantic area is involved in one way or another in the salmon fishery and that on the Newfoundland scene there is scarcely a fishing boat that is not involved in that fishery, and as the minister has proposed to buy all the boats engaged in the Atlantic salmon fishery, which would put an end to the fishery in that area, will the minister give an assurance to the House and to the fishermen of the Atlantic region that no steps will be taken, even in a prepared statement on motions, until there has been complete consultation with representatives of the fishermen, the fishermen themselves, and the provincial governments of that region to make sure that no steps will be taken, born out of ignorance—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he is making a representation. Perhaps the first part of the hon. member's speech was a question and we might allow the minister to reply to that part of the hon. member's statement which was a question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is my understanding that the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries intends to consult with all interested parties.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact the directors of the federal Department of Fisheries are not even today in possession of copies of the last six fisheries treaties which were signed and are not even aware of them, can we have a guaranteed assurance that the Minister of Fisheries, who has made several very serious moves to hurt the Atlantic fishery—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is not in order. The hon. member is obviously making a speech and presenting an argument. In those terms the question cannot be acceptable.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I rephrase my question?

Mr. Speaker: That is highly irregular. The hon. member should know he cannot ask a question using that approach, making representations and accusations, and then request permission to rephrase the question. It should have been phrased correctly in the first instance. However, having said this, I will allow the hon. member to rephrase the question.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will rephrase my question, though I should like to debate some of the points which have been raised in the last few minutes. Will the minister assure members from the Atlantic region and all our people that no moves will be made until there has been thorough consultation?

Mr. Sharp: As I have said, the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries consults with all interested parties in all these respects. Therefore I do not accept the presumption that he does not. He will consult with all the interested parties, and I am sure his policies will continue to be as popular and as desirable as they are now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is an element of argument and debate, both in the answer and in the question, that is irregular in both instances.

CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES FOLLOWING AGREEMENT BETWEEN THAT COUNTRY AND DENMARK TO CURTAIL SALMON FISHING OFF GREENLAND

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. On February 22 of this year the United States Department of State announced that an agreement had been reached between the United States and Denmark to curtail salmon fishing off west Greenland. Has the minister consulted with his United States counterpart concerning the U.S.-Danish agreement, and has he recently made any attempt to secure a similar agreement with Norway as well as Denmark?

• (1130)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation with the United States government, particularly by my colleague the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. We are now engaged in what we hope will be successful efforts to persuade the Danish government that the harvesting of fish like salmon, which spawn in coastal states, should be the responsibility and the right of the coastal states.

POSSIBLE ACTION TO BAN IMPORT OF FISH FROM COUNTRIES REFUSING TO ADOPT CONSERVATION MEASURES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): The United States Congress has recently passed legislation enabling that country to impose a prohibition against the importation of fish and fish products from any nation that refuses to accept and to carry out fisheries conservation measures as approved by ICNAF, the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries. Is this government considering taking similar action in the event that agreement cannot be reached with these two nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our experience in these matters is that these kinds of measures are not particularly successful and that it is better to reach agreement by negotiation, not by blackmail.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are a number of members, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, the hon. member for St. John's West and others, seeking to ask supplementaries. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition for his supplementary, then recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and return immediately afterwards to other hon. members who have supplementaries.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Acting Prime Minister. When can we expect the statement from the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries? Will it be soon, or very soon, and how long is soon?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if I may define these terms, "soon" means next week.

POLLUTION

THREAT TO WEST COAST FROM PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—FORMAL PROPOSAL TO UNITED STATES FOR REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of an answer the Prime Minister gave on April 17, reported at page 1348 of Hansard, in which he said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had expressed to Secretary of State Rogers of the United States the advisability of referring the matter of oil tankers coming down the Pacific coast from Alaska to the International Joint Commission. Has the minister made any formal proposal to the government of the United States for such a joint reference to the International Joint Commission regarding the shipment of oil from Valdez to Cherry Point down the Pacific coast?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has already said, I did raise the question with Secretary Rogers who said he would take the matter into consideration. Until I have a reply I do not think it would be advisable for me to make formal representations because, as the hon. member knows, references must be joint references and therefore we should get the prior agreement of the United States.

Mr. Douglas: Can the minister assure the House that any reference to the International Joint Commission on this question, unlike the reference on the Skagit Valley, will not deal merely with how to militate against the worst effects of possible oil spills but will deal with whether or not, on the basis of all available information, the trans-Alaska pipeline project should be proceeded with at all?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I very much doubt the wisdom of extending the reference in that way. The Canadian government would, of course, have no objection if oil from the trans-Alaska pipeline were to be carried from Alaska to California without coming into the narrow waters of the Strait of Juan de Fuca and Georgia Strait and ships, for example, were to move 300 miles offshore. It would not be a proper subject for the International Joint Commission to consider.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that a refinery has been built at Cherry Point and therefore ships will have to go through the Strait of Juan de Fuca, may I ask the minister what terms of reference the Canadian government has in mind in the event that the United States government is agreeable to a joint reference to the International Joint Commission?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the assumption contained in the question. I do not think ships would have to go into Cherry Point. That refinery could be served from the interior.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—POSSIBILITY OF BAN ON FISHING DURING FORTHCOMING SEASON

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister that is supplementary to questions asked previously by other members. Is it the government's intention to impose a ban during the forthcoming salmon season? I ask the question because there is a lot of confusion and the salmon fishing season will open shortly.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I did not quite catch the question. Could it be repeated?

Mr. Carter: Will the proposed ban announced by the Minister of Fisheries take effect this year?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the House should await the statement of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries which will deal with all these matters.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATLANTIC SALMON—PROPOSALS TO DENMARK RESPECTING CONSERVATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that Denmark is the worst offender in reducing salmon stocks on the high seas, can the minister indicate what specific proposals the government has made to Denmark and what their answers were?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in our view a system that would meet the criteria both of conservation and of equity would require the delegation to coastal states of the sole right to harvest the salmon bred in their own rivers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

POSSIBLE CHANGE IN ACT TO MAKE CADET CORPS CO-EDUCATIONAL

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the interest by females in the cadet movement in Canada, and in view of the women's liberation discrimination movement, will the minister consider changes in the National Defence Act to make the sea, army and air cadets co-educational?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of co-education. We have had representations from the army cadets and we will be hearing from the naval and air cadet associations. If there is unanimous agreement among all three I would be glad at some future date to propose a change to the National Defence Act.

PURCHASE OF SCORPION ARMOURED FIGHTING VEHICLES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the government decided to purchase Scorpion armoured fighting vehicles for the use of the Canadian forces? If so, how many of these vehicles are to be secured?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): First of all, Mr. Speaker, this is the vehicle which is favoured by the armed forces. A contract has not yet been negotiated. We are dealing with the manufacturers and I would not like to indicate quantities or amounts until such contract is negotiated, if the negotiations are successful.

Mr. Harkness: Would the minister tell the House what units are to be supplied with these armoured fighting vehicles? Will it be merely forces overseas or also armoured units in Canada?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, without getting too close to saying exactly how many, it would be both.

[Mr. Sharp.]

POSSIBLE INCREASE IN NUMBER OF ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact General Sharp recently commented that the 82,000 figure for the Canadian forces might be too low, would the minister indicate to the House whether he has any intention of increasing the number of personnel in the Canadian armed forces?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Not at this time, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

SMALL CRAFT FACILITIES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FUTURE ADMINISTRATION AND STEPS TO COPE WITH POLLUTION ON DOCKS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister agree to make a statement to the House on motions clarifying the various rumours floating around about the future of the administration of small vessel harbours? Would he also clarify in such statement what is going to be done to cope with the pollution crisis on docks which has been created as a result of the proclamation of regulations forbidding the dumping of garbage at sea?

• (1140)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will consider both of these matters. The first one is probably easier to deal with in the form of a statement on motions or otherwise. The other question might be better dealt with in committee where officials who are concerned with these matters could be present to give the necessary details.

POWER

JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—POSSIBLE ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POSITION FOLLOWING PRELIMINARY CONCLUSIONS ON ENVIRONMENTAL FACTORS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Prime Minister regarding the James Bay hydroelectric project but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Minister of Transport. In view of evidence given to the parliamentary committee on national resources that preliminary conclusions have been reached on environmental factors, will the government shortly be in a position to announce its stand on the whole James Bay project? I ask the minister this question in his capacity as the minister responsible for the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a rather tenuous peg on which to hang that kind of question to me. Nevertheless, I would have to take the question as notice. I think I have answered all the questions that have been asked in respect of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, but we will try to find out something more for the hon. member.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask the question of the Minister of the Environment or, in his absence, the Prime Minister, and in looking at the front benches I could not see anybody else who might possibly answer the question.

HARBOURS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF FREE PORT IN ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of recent speculation about a free port policy, can he say, in so far as he has responsibility in this matter, whether it is under consideration, and would he be prepared to receive briefs from organizations such as the Canadian Importers Association on the need for a free port in Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to receive such a brief as well as briefs from anyone else. This matter is not merely under consideration; but is a matter of discussion with, I think I can now say, at least two of the four Atlantic province premiers. Any representations I receive will be looked at very sympathetically. It sounds like a pretty good idea.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister give every assurance that all ports are starting off on equal terms in respect of such a policy and that the port of Saint John particularly will be ahead of all others?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That appears to be a representation.

SPORTS

PLANS FOR HONOURING RICHMOND HILL DYNES, WORLD CHAMPIONSHIP SOFTBALL TEAM

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. I should like to ask him what plans the government has to honour the Richmond Hill Dynes, world championship softball team, which won the world championship title for Canada recently in Manilla and whose members are in the gallery at the present time with Mayor Lazenby of that great city?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member that the government recognizes the great honour this team has done Canada and intends to entertain them this evening and make a presentation which they so richly deserve.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED NUCLEAR TESTS BY FRANCE—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he say whether a reply has been received from the French government in regard to Canada's representations about the planned nuclear tests by France in the Pacific and, if so, what is the nature of the reply?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question the other day on this subject I said we had not yet made representations because the French government has not yet indicated when it intends to make this test. I do not think it would be appropriate for us to protest or make representations until we know for sure they are going to go ahead with the test. As soon as we know the date we will be making our representations and I will inform the hon. gentleman of the response, if any.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, would it not be better if we made the protest before rather than after?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that question is a submission.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is on the same point. Will he check with Australia and New Zealand to find out what prompted them to make their protests already and perhaps ascertain when we should make ours?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we shall be making our representations, but our experience is that if you make them too soon you have to repeat them when the date is fixed and in that way you weaken the credibility of our representations.

NUCLEAR TESTS—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will place this problem of nuclear testing before the United Nations? Will he indicate to the Canadian delegation that they approach the United Nations about this particular test and urge that all nuclear testing by every country in the world be stopped?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this has been the position of the Canadian government over a period of years. I regret to say our representations have not been accepted, but Canada is the leading advocate in the world of the ending of all nuclear testing whether in the atmosphere or underground.

AGRICULTURE

FROST DAMAGE TO ONTARIO FRUIT—REPLY TO REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has replied to the request by the tender fruit industry of Canada, specifically Ontario, in respect of the frost damage done to their crops, and will he give some indication of what this reply might be?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have not replied in respect of any assistance because, quite obviously, the people who have expertise in these matters from having observed such situations in the past admit they cannot assess the crop loss at this point in time. Obviously there has been some damage to the blossoms and buds, but the level of damage done to the volume of production is unknown at this point.

DATE OF OPENING OF LIVESTOCK QUARANTINE STATION AT EDMONTON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—PROCESSING OF CATTLE IMPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture but relates to a different subject. Has the government now been given a definite date for the opening of the incoming quarantine station at Edmonton International Airport and, if so, have the applications now been processed and granted for the importation of cattle from Australia and Tasmania?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have a tentative date from the Department of Public Works, which is building the station, as to when it will be ready to receive these animals. We are now in the process of reviewing the applications that have come in with a view to allocating permits to some of the applicants. Obviously there is not room for all of them in view of the number of animals that would be coming in. I do not believe we have reached the stage where we are ready to set a positive date on which the applications will be approved.

HOCKEY—PROPOSED CANADA-RUSSIA GAMES—REPRESENTATIONS TO NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE RESPECTING USE OF PLAYERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare perhaps I might direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since there is considerable interest across the land in the proposed series between NHL players and a Russian team, and in view of the fact there is some evidence that certain United States based teams are reluctant to allow their Canadian players to participate, is the government considering making representations to the NHL headquarters in Montreal, expressing official Canadian support for this series?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it will be necessary to make any such representations, but I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian government is very much in favour of games between the Russians and the Canadians to see who really is the best in the world.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DESIGNATED AREAS—EXTENSION BEYOND JUNE 30, 1972

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the special designation of areas, such as Renfrew County, by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is to expire as of June 30, 1972, and in view of the great importance of this program, will the minister advise the House when he will be in a position to announce whether or not an extension of these designations is to be granted?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we are in consultation with the provinces on this matter. As soon as we have completed these consultations I will announce the new designations. The word "soon" as I have used it is not the same as the word "soon" as used by another minister.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED HOG PRODUCTION AND PROCESSING COMPLEX IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA—ASSESSMENT OF IMPACT ON OTHER PRODUCERS—APPLICATION FOR INCENTIVE GRANT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. It arises from the proposed establishment of a huge hog production and processing complex in southern Alberta by North American Integrated Food Processing Limited. Have the minister and his officials had an opportunity of assessing the impact such an operation will have on other established production and processsing enterprises in other parts of Alberta and elsewhere in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure it would be appropriate for the Department of Agriculture or in fact any branch of the federal government to make that assessment except that the promoter of this plan has indicated it is dependent on whether or not a regional economic expansion grant is given. When an application comes forward in that regard, a thorough examination will certainly be made on that basis.

• (1150)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Since the location of this plant will be in a designated region in southern Alberta, can the minister advise the House whether an application for an incentive grant for this facility has been received by his department?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will take this question as notice and give an answer next week, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about reached the end of the question period. I hope that some of the questions hon. members have may wait until Monday, although hon. members might allow the Chair to recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia who has been trying to ask a question for the past few days.

TRANSPORT

LEASING OF UNITED STATES BOXCARS TO MOVE GRAIN—PURCHASE OF ADDITIONAL HOPPER CARS BY RAILWAYS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of his announcement this week of the leasing of cars from the United States to move lumber products in northern British Columbia, can the minister inform the House whether any action has been taken to lease United States boxcars for grain handling?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the Thursday before Easter, about two or three weeks ago, I had a lengthy meeting with Mr. MacMillan, chairman of the board and president of CNR. At that time he advised me that a considerable number of both cars and locomotives had in fact been leased and were either in Canada or en route to Canada. I can get the actual totals for the hon. member within a day or two. This morning I sought to reach the president of the CPR but was unable to do so because he is in Calgary. I hope to meet him next week and one of the topics we will be discussing will be this matter.

Mr. Knight: In view of the announcement by the CNR of a $4 million order for the building of flatcars by a firm in Montreal, can the minister inform me whether there has been any move by the railways to have more hopper cars built for the carrying of western grain?

Mr. Jamieson: My recollection is that my colleague, the Minister of Justice, referred to this matter yesterday or some time during the past few days. This whole question of the construction of additional hopper cars is now very much under active consideration, and the meeting with the head of the CNR to which I referred dealt with that subject as well.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member seeks to ask a supplementary question but we have gone three or four minutes beyond the question period. There are other hon. members who are seeking an opportunity to ask questions and they have been asked to wait until Monday. We will have to do the same thing with the hon. member for Regina East.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS AND AIR CANADA

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEEING OF SECURITIES AND DEBENTURES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-4, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system and Air Canada for the period from January 1, 1971 to June 30, 1972, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways Company, and certain debentures to be issued by Air Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and the amendment (Mr. Thomson) p. 823.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to complete the remarks which I started on a previous occasion when this bill was before the House. I would like to set forth some of the considerations and concerns that exist, certainly in my constituency and in the prairie region, regarding railroad conditions, particularly in relation to the CNR. As I started to say the other evening, there is considerable concern among the men who work on the railroads about safety factors, such as the condition of the roadbed over which they have to handle trains, often at the risk of their own safety. All of us, no matter what our occupation in life, take a certain amount of risk, but it has become accepted practice in modern times that the risk in all gainful occupations should be minimized. Even in self-employed occupations such as farming, we find the safety councils of the provinces advising farmers to take certain precautions to avoid being injured.

Concern is even expressed about the use of safety belts in privately owned and operated automobiles, as well as about the manner in which the automobile is operated. Concern is expressed about the number of deaths on our highways. In industrial occupations, there is even greater concern regarding the safety of the employees who operate the machines which keep our industrial society going. I have received letters from the brotherhood, and from the workers in my constituency, in which they complain rather bitterly about the conditions to which they are subjected when they work on branch line trains in Saskatchewan. I have put those complaints before the Committee on Transport, as well as before the Transport Commission, and have documented them. It surprised me a little when, with regard to certain derailments on some of the branch lines, the charge was made that the trains were travelling above the speed limit which had been imposed on those tracks. I asked where the report was of the official investigation which had been made which indicated that was the case. If you are going to lay the cause of a derailment or any type of train accident at the door of some individual or group of individuals, the proof should be obtained before the charge is made. I have not seen it yet.

• (1200)

I have here a report from the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, dealing with its investigation into three specific accidents. Among the duties imposed upon the Railway Transport Committee by the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act is the obligation of ensuring that all railway operations in Canada are carried out in maximum safety. According to the information which I have, Mr. Speaker, I do not think this obligation is being carried out. Indeed, I have here a statement made by the railway, as the result of an investigation carried out by an investigator of the Railway Transport Committee, in which it is admitted that the railbed is in poor and unsatisfactory condition.

In addition, I have here a statement made by the local Chairman of the Brotherhood of Enginemen in Biggar in which he states that, in his opinion, three railway subdivisions running out of that town are in such poor condition that safe train operation can not be carried out, and that their condition is a hazard to employees. This is a very serious charge.

Again, quoting from a letter signed by C. W. Rump, Secretary of the Railway Transport Committee, referring to these same divisions, I read:

> Our District Engineer's report indicates that there is no doubt that the three subdivisions are not being maintained to a very high standard due to the possibility of abandonment; however, if speed restrictions are adhered to, and the length of trains on the Dodsland Subdivision limited, no abnormal hazard to train operation would exist.

I question the second part of that sentence in view of the first part which indicates that the three subdivisons are not being maintained to a very high standard. The letter went on to say:

> The present level of maintenance work being done on the subdivisions, is not, in our engineer's opinion, sufficient to maintain present conditions; however, as track conditions continue to deteriorate, the railways should further reduce speeds.

Further on in the letter, he said that it had been pointed out to the representative of the railroad that in some cases trains had exceeded authorized speeds.

The point I wish to make again is that to my knowledge no in-depth investigation has been carried out which would entitle anyone to lay the blame at the door of those people who operate the trains. I think there should be an in-depth investigation. I do not think workmen should be required to operate trains under conditions and in circumstances that we know endanger their safety.

As I said when I started to speak, Mr. Speaker, there are times when all of us carry out undertakings that are hazardous, such as getting in a car and driving out of Ottawa on a winter's day when the roads are icy. We know the roads are icy and hazardous, but we choose to run the risk. But I question very much whether as a society we have a right to ask a crew of men to take out a train, which has a thrust of thousands of tons, under conditions which are known to be hazardous, which the Transport Committee knows are hazardous, and which the railroad, which is owned by the people of this country, is aware are hazardous. I do not see how we can justify that. These are matters that must be given consideration.

As well as that, there is the problem of moving goods over those branch lines. But even this is secondary to the safety of the men who operate the trains. To put it brutally, Mr. Speaker, if a man is injured the cost is too much. And, as shown in this report of the inquiry into three accidents in which one man was killed, we run the risk of killing men. When a man is killed, he is a long time dead. It is a pretty final act. So, I say that the ability to move goods surely must be secondary to the safety of the individuals who are responsible for operating the trains.

When it comes to the question of moving our wheat whether by the CNR or CPR, and in this case we are dealing with the CNR, we must look at the total movement from that little branch line on the Dodsland subdivision right through to Thunder Bay, or Vancouver or Prince Rupert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: When I mention the names of these places there is an immediate reaction. You know, Mr. Speaker, the humour of my colleagues sometimes kills me. I don't know if it does anything for the government, but as Wellington said of his soldiers, "I don't know what they do to the enemy but they sure scare hell out of me."

• (1210)

Mr. Drury: With justification.

Mr. Gleave: I think it is very kind of my friends to enliven proceedings. I am probably making a very dull speech; I would not be surprised if that were the case.

We have to look at the total picture of what is involved, Mr. Speaker. I think that the CNR and the government are suffering from an attitude toward rail transportation that had its origins in the MacPherson commission. The report of that commission was essentially negative. It recommended a cutback in rail transportation suggesting that the railroads be given an amount of money while phasing out parts of their operation in order to rationalize the whole system. Since then, we have been rationalizing so effectively that the safety of the men who work on the railroads is in jeopardy. We have rationalized to the extent that we cannot move a crop of grain from the prairies to the tidewater where ships are waiting. We have rationalized so well that Ontario complains it cannot get lumber from British Columbia and we have rationalized so well that the people of Newfoundland claim their transportation system is chaotic. That has been the effect of rationalization in the past, and now there is a proposal before us for more money so that the system can be rationalized even more. I think the government has a nerve to ask this House for more money without presenting a plan to develop a transportation system which will serve the country.

In reply to a question asked from this side of the House today, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) said that he had met with the representatives of the CNR and they were going to provide some more cars and locomotives. I believe they were to be leased from the United States. He said that he was also to meet with the CPR and that he hoped they were going to do the same thing. Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport or the government has to approach our railway companies periodically to ask them if they are going to provide enough equipment to do a job, it indicates how badly our transportation system is organized. Time is lost when it is necessary for the minister or the grain companies or the Canadian Wheat Board to go to the CPR and CNR in order to get action. In the meantime 21 or 22 ships are sitting in English Bay waiting to load and the opportunity for effective action is lost.

What we need without further delay, Mr. Speaker, is an effective program for communication and transportation. A study of grain transportation and handling has been submitted to the Minister in charge of the Wheat Board, but apparently he is afraid to make it public. I suspect it says that if some more branch lines and grain elevators on the prairies were knocked out that would effectively assist in the further deterioration of the facilities and so the whole thing would work better! I suspect there was no consideration at all given to the whole package, and that it will be a long time before this study will see the light of day. This matter requires consideration and the government and the ministers involved should look at the total picture instead of picking out pieces here and there to be patched up when they can no longer be ignored.

When the estimates were before the Standing Committee on Agriculture I asked what research had been done into the facilities for the transportation of grain. The answer was, none. I feel that we could usefully examine in depth the type of carriers and so on that are available. There should be an objective study of the needs of the country, and how rail transportation fits in with highway transportation. Storage and handling facilities should also be examined. For example, how can we get a balanced handling at Prince Rupert in relation to the rail and port facilities and the storage available. The same question arises at Churchill. The question of the movement and storage of grain in relation to ice conditions and getting it out to the Atlantic coast should also be examined. In that way we shall obtain a total package, total understanding and real co-operation.

The people who actually operate these trains will have confidence in this system, as will those who use this service, whether they are farmers or lumbermen, to move their products to market. They will be confident that the job will be well done and that the resources of Canada will be available for getting that job done. That is the kind of approach we need. If we adopt that kind of approach, we will have a far better transport system. We will probably need to spend money and put people to work, if the system is to be improved. Yet, why not do that, Mr. Speaker? Would it not be better to put people to work in the areas where they are needed than tolerate a 6 per cent unemployment level and not do those jobs which need to be done? I urge the government to give consideration to an over-all approach to this problem and to say to the CNR, as well as the CPR, "Bring forward a program which will meet the needs of Canadians in Canada." On the day that is done, we shall be able to act effectively in the area of transportation.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I do not imagine anybody pays too much attention to what is said about Bill C-4. However, under our parliamentary system I can still reserve the right to try to make an impression by directing attention to problems that are evident in my part of Canada. I am talking about problems that should be the concern of the government which has a responsibility to provide rail, air and water transportation and associated services, including telecommunications services. I have looked through Hansard to see what has been said about this bill. In my perusal, it has become evident to me that no one, as yet, has mentioned the recommendation accompanying this bill. I therefore feel that it might be worth while mentioning what is contained in the recommendation.

It is recommended by the Governor General to the House of Commons that authorization be given to the CNR to make capital expenditures including investment securities of affiliated companies, in the calendar year 1971, not exceeding $220 million; to make capital expenditures in the first six months of 1972 of some $83 million for discharging obligations incurred prior to January 1, 1972; to further enter into contracts prior to July, 1972, for equipment, additions and conversions requiring payments not exceeding $162 million. It is further recommended that authorization be given to borrow an amount not exceeding $27 million for the construction of branch lines—this is a joke; to make loans and guarantee issues of securities of Air Canada in the amount of $114 million, and even to guarantee debentures in English currency. Without going into too many details, let me say we are even extending the limits to the magic figure of $1 billion, which probably puts this agency into a special category so far as government expenditures are concerned.

However, the most important part of the recommendation is the part which recommends that this parliament give carte blanche authority for meeting deficiencies in operating revenue, regardless of cost. This is where the hypocrisy lies in all the operations of the Canadian National Railways company. This parliament is expected to give that company permission to write its own cheques up to the sum of $1 billion and we, as protectors of the public money, have no control over that spending. Not only are we to give the company unlimited amounts of money, but this government does not seem to have any control over how the company operates. I wonder if anyone has ever looked carefully at the CN annual report and seen the two pages listing the executives of CNR. On page 30, anyone who wants to look will see listed no less than 30 vice-presidents and assistant vice-presidents as well as another 50 general managers, directors and executive assistants. Mr. Speaker, do you know that all I have ever heard from any of them in my limited dealings with them have been tales of woe as to which railway line they were going to close down or how many employees they were going to lay off or how many stations they would have to close.

I do not know why we complain about the poor Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and all the staff he is gathering around him to try to run the country. I think that all he is trying to do is keep up with the CNR. I have not bothered looking at the executive staff of Air Canada. Frankly, I would hate to look, because I am sure that company must be equally overloaded with executive staff who are quickly learning the way to downgrade service, because they cannot manage a business which has a clearcut monopoly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marshall: At any rate, I hope they do not mechanize their executive staff, because we could expect a big run on manpower offices and we would experience a bigger unemployment crisis than we have now.

Many of my colleagues have expressed themselves quite forcibly on the continuing trend towards the closing down of railway lines which started back in 1968 in Newfoundland. This operation ought to go down in history as the most calculated railroading job that Canada will ever experience. These rail line abandonments have to be about the most ridiculous piece of action you will ever see since, for no reason that sane people can think of, the supposedly responsible authorities stripped my province of the fundamental, basic mode of transport which any country or province must have if it is to build an economy. Without regard for the people who were served by the Newfoundland passenger service and who continue to experience the discomfort and danger inherent in the new method of transportation, these supposedly responsible Canadians, saddled with the responsibility of acting in the best interests of the people, pulled off an act that ought to bother their consciences for the rest of their lives.

I am sure all hon. members will recall the plea that my Newfoundland colleagues made in this House in 1968 when we were stripped of our main transportation service. Hon. members criticised us for making our plea and for continuing to make it. What do they think now, those people who are now losing their rail passenger services in the same way as we lost ours? What do those people now think, when the web is closing in on every province of Canada? What did we get in Newfoundland in place of that rail service, Mr. Speaker? We got a bus service. Yes, we got a bus service that was introduced on the basis of a designed strategy and it was introduced before anyone realized the implications of this strategy. The bus service was established without the least bit of consideration of human needs and with no appreciation of the purpose it would serve. That is how the service was established in the province. The service does not suit the climatic conditions of the province and does not fill the needs of the people it was supposed to serve.

Notwithstanding all the expertise that the CN people professed to have, and I mentioned this earlier, it became obvious they did not have a clue as to how to run a bus system, because they started the service without even a basic shelter or station for passengers awaiting the arrival of a bus on the Trans-Canada Highway. People have so stand on the highway in the middle of winter waiting for a bus which is often hours late. There was absolutely no provision for the carrying of invalids who have to travel hundreds of miles sitting up in the bus, or for the carrying of stretcher cases. There was no provision for passengers who had to stand for miles with children in their arms because they could not reserve space in advance or because they lost their seats at station stops when they got off for a bite to eat. Mr. Speaker, there was no planning whatsoever; and then the CNR bragged about their cheap prices and oversold tickets. Now, the company is applying to the appropriate provincial agency for a 30 per cent increase in bus fares. Let me tell you that some passengers had to hire taxis to follow the bus. There have been cases where people had to get to the hospital, and they hired a taxi to follow a bus in the hope that a passenger would get off at a stop and make a seat available.

Let me tell you about one of the communities served by this Canadian dream bus system in my district of Newfoundland. There is at the community of Howley, which is some 30 miles from Deer Lake, a station stop for buses. Anyone travelling from Grand Falls to Howley has to go 30 miles beyond Howley to Deer Lake because the bus will not stop at the junction, and then hire a taxi to travel that same 30 miles back home. That is the system presently set up. About three years ago when the president of CNR appeared before a committee, I asked him if the company had had any experience with providing bus services. He said they had not had such experience. I then asked why the company had not approached a bus company like Greyhound, or some similar company, for advice on how to set up a bus service. Now, after an interval of four years, CNR is going to Greyhound and asking that company to tell them what is wrong with the bus service presently provided in Newfoundland.

This is the system they set up. These expert executives are listed in the CN report as corporate planners, as vice-presidents of express and highway services, as marketing specialists, as experts in passenger sales and service and as experts in research and development. These are the people who planned and provided this bus system which should be the laughing stock of Canada. I could tell you about the people living in small communities which are away from the main highway. These people have to hire taxis to get to the bus because the CNR does not provide a feeder service. This same company, the CNR, keeps feeding monthly figures through the press about all the passengers they carry and the increase in the passenger load. What else can one expect when there is no other way to travel. They give a service alright, so long as people live on the trans-Canada highway.

Let me tell you what else they are doing in Newfoundland for the Canadian dream. For years, private individuals have provided a bus service under provincial licence by the Board of Commissioners of Public Utilities, an arm of the provincial government. This commission is almost a part of the Jessie James bargain, imposed when the agreement was made to eliminate the rail passenger service. These private bus companies provided a service under the worst road conditions before the advent of the trans-Canada highway. They eked out a bare living. Now, what has happened? As soon as the CN was ready, it obliterated the small businessmen. It will continue to do so as road conditions improve. It will not serve communities which are not on paved highways. However, as soon as the roads leading to these communities are paved, the CN will move in and put the small operator out of business. We talk about unfair competition under the Competition Act. I hope the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) will look into this matter. Every small bus operator will be out of business in the next few years as the octopus CNR closes its tentacles around the rest of the province. We in Newfoundland demand the return of our railway service because it is vital to our economy. We demand the return of the railway system because its continuance was guaranteed under the terms of confederation. There is no reason this cannot be done, because all that is required is improvement of the rails, the cutting out of some of the curves, which should have been done in years past.

Although I doubt it, I hope that someone will listen and this will come about. We demand a rail passenger service because of the repeated promises by this government that every Canadian will be accorded equality of opportunity, regardless of where he lives. We demand it because of the stated objective of the Canadian Transport Commission just last year, the development of a basic transcontinental passenger service which will justify whatever cost there may be to the federal treasury and which will satisfy the needs of the travelling public. This has to be done for all Canadians from coast to coast. If the commission cannot fulfil this promise they should resign, and the government should resort to its usual procrastinating task force concept to find out why the rail service is not being provided. It may not be too long before they will no longer have any control over it. Probably, however, I am being a little too insular in my attitude towards the Canadian transportation scene as a whole. We have all become aware that the automobile is one of the major sources of pollution, as is the supersonic transport in the skies.

CNR and Air Canada

Let us look for a moment at a booklet issued by The United Transportation Union. Under the heading "Does Government Care?" we find this:

> But the question remains: Who's going to save the passenger train in Canada? Certainly not the railways. They continue the systematic process of dismantling their passenger services, with the blessing of the federal government and its agency, the CTC.
>
> It is ironic to recall that the CPR once promised that it would "forever efficiently maintain, work and run the Canadian Pacific Railway," in exchange for vast grants of land and cash and generous tax concessions from its friends in government.

Further down on the same page there is this:

> If the government were seriously concerned with the kind of transportation services Canadians are getting, it would force the CPR to change its priorities.

Then another part of the booklet reads:

> The history of the CNR is evidence enough that nationalization alone is no guarantee of good service. At any rate, the government seems to have no objection at all to the CPR's priorities, and neither does the Canadian Transport Commission, which under the National Transportation Act administers transportation policy.
> The Act is largely responsible for the uncertain future of passenger service in this country. Its passage was Jack Pickersgill's crowning achievement as transport minister, and it seems to be deliberately designed to encourage the railways to get rid of their passenger trains. If a railway wishes to abandon a service, it must first prove that it is losing money on it to the satisfaction of the CTC. Then the Commission, after considering "all matters that in its opinion are relevant to the public interest," rules on whether the railway can go ahead with the abandonment. If it says no, the railway must keep it going and the government will subsidize its losses on the service to the extent of 80 per cent.

This provision came into effect just after the rail passenger service in Newfoundland was eliminated. Nobody told the CN they could continue the service and apply for the 80 per cent subsidy. They cut out the service on the assumption that it was costing $900,000 a year. This is ridiculous.

Moving on for a moment to other responsibilities of the CNR, I wish to bring into question again, as I have on other occasions, the ferry service between the Island of Newfoundland and Labrador. St. Barbe North, which is in my district of northern Newfoundland and which everybody seems to forget, is in northern Canada. In spite of all the policies and millions of dollars being poured into northern Canada, and in spite of all the need for the movement of goods and services between Newfoundland and Labrador over a distance of 10 or 15 miles, we cannot seem to get the government to realize the need for a proper wharf so that the ferry can dock and so that the service may operate in a modern way. Many papers come across my desk indicating what the Canadian government intends to do about the north. I must say that it would seem that the northern part of Canada in my riding of northern Newfoundland gets little or nothing. I demand that this ferry service be looked into, and I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will do so.

There are many weaknesses in Air Canada's service and I hesitate to go into them, but it is obvious that the transportation system, particularly in my province, leaves much to be desired. It is difficult to understand why the government, on the one hand, spends many millions of dollars creating new agencies like Information Canada and, on the other hand, cannot provide a service in the province of Newfoundland. This seems to be beyond comprehension. I can only ask that the government take another look at the situation or even speak to me, because I am willing to meet with them and discuss the matter. This might allow me to get over my frustration because I feel the province of Newfoundland should be considered as a part of the Canadian dream.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the CNR financing bill before us brings to the attention of hon. members a potpourri of problems relating to transportation across the country.

But there are four main areas of concern—financing, pensions for employees, passenger transportation services in relation both to rail and air transport, and the involvement of the government in future planned development. If two ministers should be here today, they should be the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). The only official person I see here today, however, is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Buchanan). Well do I recall his speech when he introduced the legislation on behalf of the government. I believe it lasted for no more than ten minutes, probably for about seven minutes. It was the type of speech one would make to a Kiwanis Club or to a Kinsmen's Club or to a Chamber of Commerce. It was innocuous. It was anaemic. It was a nothing speech. Yet here we are, considering areas of concern which affect all Canadians. One would think the government would make a determined attempt to be persuasive and put forward a convincing defence of the position it has taken.

This has not happened. When I think of the Minister of Transport, I remember the late "Satchmo" Armstrong. "Satchmo" Armstrong was a man who was all smiles. His gravel voice put out a multiplicity of words. What he performed on the trumpet was really sweet music. The Minister of Transport is all smiles and he is all sweet talk. The difference is that he blows nothing on his trumpet. Nothing comes out. He is all puff, but there is no performance. It is a sad note that he is not here today. It is sad to think he has not been here during the debate to listen to the representations made by various members of the House concerning the troubles they have encountered in the field of transportation.

I appreciate that the areas of responsibility which the minister must assume in the railway and transportation fields are wide. But it seems to me, from his performance so far, that he has been a captive of his officials, that he has become the yo-yo of their policies and decisions. Substantially, they have no policies and, in fact, they make very few decisions unless those decisions are dictated to them or influenced by CNR officials.

I notice, now, that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is presently in the House. I hope he will bring to the attention of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, that he has been compared with "Satchmo" Armstrong. I compare the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with Maurice Chevalier.

Mr. Pepin: It is usually Fernandel.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. Gilbert: The late Maurice Chevalier is usually thought of as a man who was all song and dance and it seems to me that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is all song and dance. I hope he will bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport that the latter has been compared with "Satchmo" Armstrong. "Satchmo" played sweet music and put up a tremendous performance. The Minister of Transport is all smiles, all sweet talk, but there is no performance.

Mr. Pepin: That is not very appreciative.

Mr. Gilbert: These are words I must use in reference to the Minister of Transport. Sometimes I have to say certain things about the Minister of Industry, Trade and commerce. I well recall that when 600 men were laid off at the Dunlop plant in Toronto, he adopted a soothing approach and said everything would be done. In the event, little or nothing was done about the jobs of these 600 people. Yesterday, when I heard the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grâce (Mr. Allmand) talk about unemployment at the Northern Electric Plant in Montreal the idea which crossed my mind was this: I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will not treat the employees of Northern Electric in the same way as the employees of the Dunlop plant were treated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member who has the floor would return to the motion before us. I am anxious to hear him move on to another minister.

Mr. Gilbert: It is unfortunate there is a time limitation, otherwise I could spend the afternoon moving from one minister to the next.

May I say that the Minister of Transport has really contributed nothing new, nothing dynamic, nothing constructive to the solution of the main problems facing us today in the transportation field. Your Honour will recall that I said there were four areas which were of particular concern. The first concerns finance. The CNR has been the recipient of the financial burdens of railways which were operated by private enterprise in the past and which failed. When reorganization took place around 1920, the CNR assumed those responsibilities. From that time until today it has continued to bear this burden in the form of bonds and liability for interest payment. These liabilities have proved to be an albatross around the neck of the CNR and have, indirectly, been the cause of a great deal of unfair criticism directed toward a public enterprise. Critics of public enterprise point a finger at the CNR and say: This is an example of what happens when an enterprise is taken over by the government. They do not go back into history and remember that the CNR was saddled from the beginning with an almost impossible task.

I would imagine that the main question we should be asking ourselves is this: How can we best approach the rationalization of this financial position? How can we set up a financial structure which would give the CNR an opportunity to succeed? I hasten to add that the CNR has shown a profit on its yearly operations in terms of the profit and loss sheet. The difficulty has arisen with regard to the repayment of the bond holders in connection with the debt the railway assumed around 1920. One would think, therefore, that the government would consider taking the initiative by paying past debts of the company and setting up a new financial structure.

It appears to me that the financial problem to which I have referred could repeat itself in the area of air transportation. Air Canada has in the past had the exclusive right to provide air transport, but from the time it was set up to the present day there has been a whittling away of the monopoly that Air Canada should have in the provision of air transport. The CPR entered the air transport field and has taken away some of the routes Air Canada served in the past. We now have other air transport companies entering the field, again trying to fragment and to whittle away the monopoly that Air Canada should have. The small companies, with their so-called feeder services, are attempting to encroach upon the operations of Air Canada. Need I mention the recent application of Trans-Air, which now wants to provide passenger service from Toronto to Winnipeg, thereby again cutting in on the service of Air Canada.

• (1250)

Surely, the day will be reached when the operations of Air Canada will be so fragmented by the encroachment and intrusion of private air companies that we may find a repetition of what happened to the railway services in 1918, where finally the private companies failed and were merged into the CNR. I suggest you may find Air Canada failing in the future as a result of the intrusion and encroachment of private companies. Then, the logical result would be that the private air companies would fail, and then the business people would look to Air Canada to assume their debts and also to acquire their routes.

One of the things that worries me is that, with the setting up of the Canada Development Corporation, there has been a great deal of talk about such companies as Air Canada and Polymer being purchased by the Canada Development Corporation, then shares being issued which would be made available to the public. I can almost anticipate what would happen, Mr. Speaker. I do not think one has to be an old testament prophet or a Jeanne Dixon, a woman we hear about in the United States who forecasts the future, to see what might happen. We will find the CDC, by assuming the assets and operations of Air Canada and Polymer and making shares available to the public, stressing the profit aspect of their business operations and forgetting the service aspect.

In that situation the corporation would be concentrating on profit rather than on service, and it may get into the same hoary mess that the CNR has got itself into in the field of transportation. I hope that this does not happen. I hope that the parliamentary secretary will take the message back to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and have him spend a weekend in retreat thinking through some of the problems that have been presented to him by all members of this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is seeking the floor.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, might I have the floor to ask permission to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blair: As I understood the remarks of the hon. member, he said that Air Canada was going to be sold to the Canada Development Corporation. I wonder where and when that was announced.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I have great admiration for the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), and I appreciate his fears regarding the forthcoming election in view of the high calibre of candidates who will be facing him.

Mr. Blair: What about answering the question?

Mr. Gilbert: I would have hoped that he had listened to me, because I did not say that the Canada Development Corporation were going to acquire these corporations. I said they may acquire Air Canada and Polymer. I am sure that now he has heard the answer he will be persuaded that what I have said has not only strength but soundness.

Mr. Blair: I am just as confused now as the hon. member's constituents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. Gilbert: I can just picture the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton practising law full time within a few months.

The second area of concern for most Canadians is the question of CNR pensions. I am sure the parliamentary secretary heard the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who has raised this matter over the many years he has been here and has commented on the unfairness and the discrimination being experienced by employees of the CNR. I think that the CNR operates on the principle of divide and rule, much like the British government did during its tenure in India.

Mr. Brewin: The rule of all empires.

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) says, this has been the rule all empires in the past have operated under.

Mr. Brewin: It started with the Romans.

Mr. Gilbert: As the hon. member says, it started with the Roman empire. I thank him for his historical note on the subject.

The main issue on the subject of pensions, which I think all members should be apprised of, is that CNR employees receive 1½ per cent per year of service calculated on their best five years salary. For example, if an employee works for 20 years, at 1½ per cent he would receive 30 per cent of the average of his best five years salary. May I remind all hon. members of the House that federal civil servants receive 2 per cent of their salary, or half a per cent more. I suggest this represents a great disparity and I would be delighted to tell my colleagues about that following the recess, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

• (1410)

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, prior to the luncheon adjournment you will remember that I said there were four main areas of criticism with regard to the performance of this government in the transportation field, both in its railway service and its airport service. You will recall that I said that first, the criticism related to financing, second, to pensions, third, to passenger service, and fourth, to the involvement of the government in land development. I underlined, in my usual low key style, that the performance of both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has been very bad, not only so far as their lack of attendance to hear the representations of the different members of the opposition is concerned but also as regards the performance of the officials of the Department of Transport.

With regard to pensions, I said that the government was applying the divide and rule theory to CNR employees so far as their pensions are concerned, according to which the government pays only 1½ per cent of the salary of the employee during his years of service and the calculation is based on his best five years of service. The example that I gave was that if an employee worked for 20 years he would receive 1½ per cent per year of service which would make 30 per cent of his best five year average salary, whereas the federal civil servants obtain 2 per cent per year under the same formula. Therefore, the federal civil servants receive 40 per cent of their salary while the CNR employees receive 30 per cent which, in my opinion and that of many others, is rank discrimination and unfairness. Not only that, there is also the question of the recent catch-up payment made by the government to meet some of the shortages that railway employees were experiencing in the country. I think the government gave them a one-shot payment to make up the difference, whereas the federal civil servants have a continuing formula. Therefore, again there is discrimination with regard to the railway employees.

This indicates the callous, indifferent and political attitude of this government concerning pensions of CNR employees. This divide and rule theory has been applied not only to CNR employees but to the senior citizens of this country. The government has used the same technique with regard to cost of living payments to people who only recieve old age security payments and to those who receive old age security plus the supplement. The people who receive old age security and who have contributed a great deal to this country are thereby denied any cost of living bonus. This principle is being applied to the CNR employees, and many of us look on it as a double standard used by the government. We think it is distasteful and disdainful.

The third area of criticism that we in the opposition have relates to the passenger service performance of the CNR. Over the years I have heard many people refer to the great performance of Mussolini in Italy who made the trains run on time. I have also heard comments regarding the fantastic railway service in Japan, as well as the fast, efficient and well administered railway service in certain European countries. The question arises, why are these tributes paid to these countries but when it comes to the transportation in Canada people are dismayed and disgusted. Some say that it is because of the public ownership principle in countries such as Japan, Italy and other European countries where the public demands efficiency. Here, we have historical facts which run against us, where we have one railway line operated under public ownership and the other, the CPR, under private ownership. This conflict does not produce an efficient type of service which people want and expect.

The tragedy with regard to the railway service is that the CPR dominates the transportation scene in Canada. When they decide, for example, to abandon the passenger service, the government says "yes, sir, we will assist you to do so". So they abandon rail lines and services while the government stands idly by and the minister takes no active part to protect the people of this country. When the CPR says that they will discontinue the passenger service because it brings no profit but they will continue freight service because it brings profit, then it is high time for the government to take the initiative and set down a transportation policy which would meet the needs of all Canadians. Surely, the time has come when the CPR should be confronted with the situation which exists in transportation, and if they have ideas regarding the discontinuing of passenger service then I hope we will not make the same mistake as was made by the CNR back in 1918 when private companies failed and their debts were assumed by the CNR. I hope that if any compensation is given it will be minimal, because what we need across the country is an integrated service which will meet the needs of all Canadians and which will use up-to-date transportation techniques, not only with regard to passengers but with regard to products.

When one reads of track air cushion vehicles and yet find we have had no real research and development by the CNR in this area, one wonders what they have in mind with regard to future development in this field. This also brings to question the cummuter train service which to date has been haphazard and very inefficient. I hope that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Buchanan) will bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport some of the failings that we have experienced in the transportation service.

With regard to our air service, lately we have had the problem of the new airport in Toronto. You will recall that a few years ago when air transport needs were very pressing in Toronto, the government recommended the expanded use of the Toronto international airport at Malton. You will recall also that the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Beer), and other hon. members who were directly affected raised such a furore with the government that it backed down and changed its decision with regard to any future expansion of the Malton airport. I notice that the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe is present this afternoon.

I think I should say to him that I am not being unduly critical of him, or the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Chappell) with regard to the opposition from their constituencies concerning expansion of the Malton airport. But what I am saying is that this would indicate a lack of planning with regard to an expanded airport at Malton. To permit builders to build homes so close to Malton airport, when the government should have had the foresight to know the area would be required for expansion, makes me believe the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has been negligent in the performance of his duties.

What happened? The hon. member for Peel, and possibly the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe—

Mr. Beer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the hon. member would get my constituency right. I represent the riding of Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. Gilbert: I apologize to the hon. member for not naming his constituency correctly. Mr. Speaker, I was sad to read the news that he is about to retire from his constituency. I hope he enjoys the full benefits of his pension. As I was saying, the representations made by the members representing these constituencies were so valid and strong that the government backed down with regard to expanding the Malton airport. As a result we had a continuation of the problem of transport in Toronto.

Then, the government brought forth the second suggestion, that the airport should be located at Pickering, and for the last while we have had discussions with regard to the new location. It would be fair to say that the Liberals are incomplete disarray concerning it. Here I mention the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). When I think of him. Mr. Speaker, I think of Charlie McCarthy because he appears to be speaking out of both sides of his mouth. He appears to be saying yes to some, and no to others. It will be interesting to see which side he comes down on with regard to the site.

I also think of the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) who, when the motion concerning CNR financing came up, did not touch on the airport at Pickering but said he would prefer the new airport to be located at Peterborough. Actually, he indicated he was in favour of the airport at Pickering, but when the flack reached his ears from constituents who found that the flight pattern would be right over their property he had to take the position that many people take when trade unions become involved in organizing. It is known as the mug-rump position. They have their mug on one side of the fence and their rump on the other. He reminds me of the fellow who goes to the old swimming hole, takes off his clothes, goes in for a swim, comes out, finds his clothes missing, and runs around screaming, wondering where they are. The hon. member for York North is running around screaming trying to find out what position he should take.

What do we need with regard to a new airport in Toronto? First of all, Mr. Speaker, we must establish that there is a need for a new airport. Secondly, if there is a need, we must establish what is the best location. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) sent a letter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on this matter, and in it touched on two problems that exist. In it he wrote:

> First of all, I do not believe that any convincing case has been made out for the need for a new international airport in the Toronto area. If such a need exists it should be shown to the public to exist. Secondly, assuming the need, I do not believe that a case has been made out for the site now chosen as the best possible site.

Then, he pointed out a precedent in England which most of us should know about. I quote:

> I note that in the United Kingdom when in the planning stages of developing a third London airport, a commission of inquiry, the Roskill commission, was created to advise the British government as to its timing and location. The commission engaged a research team and a number of outside consultants. Public hearings were held to establish the facts and a further public hearing was held in London following publication of a cost benefit analysis. The commission made its report and it was submitted to the government.
> The public was invited to present its arguments in favour or contrary to the proposed plan. Witnesses were cross-examined to ensure that the strengths and weaknesses of the evidence would be made apparent.

I think this should be the approach with regard to the new site at Pickering. I am not alone in this belief because I notice that the Ontario Liberal leader, Robert Nixon said recently that the province might as well hold public hearings immediately on the proposed Pickering airport. He is attempting to say that the onus is on the Ontario government with regard to public hearings. In light of the new expropriation laws that have been passed, I think the government will take the position that there must be public hearings, and will have them held under the provisions of that act. That is not adequate, because under the Expropriation Act there is no requirement on the person holding a hearing to delve into all the pros and cons. His jurisdiction is too narrow for that.

What we need is a public inquiry along the same lines as they had in England, where a commission was set up which made a detailed study. A report was submitted to the government and then the government submitted that report to a public inquiry to determine the pros and cons. This would be a fine example of participatory democracy. At the moment, we have only the Minister of Transport acting in a very cute and shy, concealing way with regard to the government's plans.

My final point deals with the participation of the government in land development. The example I have in mind is Metro Centre in Toronto, a development of the southern part of the city towards the lake, extending roughly from Yonge Street to Bathurst, and embracing a good number of acres. This venture has required the joint participation of the CNR and the CPR. Very little public information has been given out by the CNR or by the minister with regard to the government's involvement in Metro Centre. I would like the parliamentary secretary, and possibly the officials in the gallery to make note of some of the questions I have received concerning Metro Centre. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I note that you are keeping your eye on the clock. I would like to remind you that we did not start until 12 minutes after two o'clock and so I have another five minutes to go.

These are some of the questions that I have received: one, what happens when a public corporation, the CNR, and a private corporation get together and produce an offspring, namely, Metro Centre Development? Surely, the legitimacy of the results of such a union should be questioned? Two, what has the CNR contributed to this union? How is it being financed? Three, what reason does CNR give for tearing down Union Station and building a new terminal just south of the present Union Station site?

Four, how much land within the Metro Centre area does CNR hold title to, and approximately where is it located? Five, what guarantees can CNR give that in the event a new terminal is built, passengers will not be inconvenienced by longer walking distances between subway, GO-trains and mainland trains?

• (1430)

What guarantee can the Canadian National provide to GO-train passengers that the new terminal will be located no further from the center of the city than the present Union Station? Has the Canadian National investigated the possibility of retaining the present post office terminal 'A' building for an air terminal and, later, bus terminal? Has Air Canada shown any interest in retaining the post office downtown for an air terminal where outgoing passengers can be ticketed and transferred to Malton by rail, thereby bypassing the passenger terminal at Malton? Is the Canadian National engaged in any studies to provide additional commuter passenger train service, in co-operation with the province of Ontario? Is the Canadian National engaged in research, or is it sponsoring research with regard to track air cushion vehicles? Those are some of the questions submitted to me with regard to the Metro Centre, and I hope we get answers to them. As I said at the beginning of my speech, four main areas have been covered but we have had little or no response and the only conclusion must be that the government feels "the public be damned, long live private enterprise". I am ashamed if that is their position.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-4, to finance and guarantee funds to the CNR and Air Canada provides the annual opportunity for members of this House to discuss transportation problems. These two companies service most of Canada, along with the CPR and CPA and so transportation problems in Canada in general may be touched upon as well as any specific cases. The lack of a viable transportation policy affects people from one coast to the other and the economic problems involved concern all members.

In commenting upon this bill this afternoon, I should like to be as objective as possible. I certainly do not intend to mention political parties because this problem affects all of us. However, in Atlantic Canada Transportation has always been a problem and, in fact, the basis of our entry into Confederation was access to the central Canadian markets. In fact, the Maritime Freight Rates Act was supposed to guarantee that Atlantic Canada would have equal access to the central Canadian markets, but regardless of what party was in power, problems have existed.

On March 14, when the minister introduced the bill he outlined the problem. While some of his speech was interesting and philosophic, I felt that he tended to ignore the historic right of equal access given in the Maritime Freight Rates Act. He mentioned that our freight rate increases are under the national average, notwithstanding the fact that we have had eight increases in the past 29 months. I should like to illustrate how these increases affect a manufacturer in my area. Ironically, two years ago this manufacturer received assistance through a DREE grant in order to expand his plant so that he could compete in Canada. His ability to do this is seriously impaired by these freight rate increases in such a short period.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act was designed to give goods manufactured in the Atlantic provinces access to the central Canadian market. When there is a freight rate increase across the board of, say, 10 per cent, that has less impact on the short-haul shipment from Ottawa to Toronto or Montreal than it has on the long-haul shipment from Halifax to Montreal or Vancouver. This has been recognized by various transportation commissions and they have attempted to resolve it. The formula in the Maritime Freight Rates Act represented an attempt to solve the problem, but now that act has been superseded. It is not good enough for the minister to say that our freight rate increases are still under the national average. Because of the distance involved, any increase hits us harder than it hits the shipper in central Canada.

The MacPherson Royal Commission stated in volume one of its report at page 18 as follows:

> It is the regions of Canada where competition to the railways is less intense upon which the present freight rate structure bears most heavily. Although monopoly no longer characterizes the transportation system as a whole in Canada, there are still vestiges of it in areas which, because of inadequate highway facilities, distance from markets, or other factors which have inhibited the development of competition, continue to be dependent to varying degrees on railway transport. While it is true that the number of competitive rates and agreed charges is growing in both the Atlantic provinces and western Canada, the indications are that they are comparable neither in quantity nor quality to those applicable within central Canada.

And here is the important part, Mr. Speaker:

> The end result appears to be that the uneven impact of competition, transmitted through the freigh rate structure, tends to produce a greater relative increase in the price of moving goods by rail for the Atlantic and western shipper than that experienced by shippers in Central Canada. This effect is particularly noticeable on long-haul shipments to the markets of central Canada. For example, the marketing consequences of a 20 per cent increase to a long-haul shipper who has been paying $500 a carload to get his product to the Toronto market and will now pay an additional $100 are obviously more serious than those upon his short-haul competitor who has been paying $50 a carload to get to the same market and will now pay only $10 more.

In Atlantic Canada, there are not too many viable companies manufacturing the basic necessities, but I should like to illustrate the impact of this freight rate increase on a company in my riding, the Canadian Keyes Fibre Company, Limited. As a result of the last freight rate increase, and there have been eight over the last 29 months the last talking place on February 14, 1972, the transportation manager of the company wrote to the minister and pointed out in graphic terms how these freight rate increases, one piled on top of the other, are pushing this company to the brink of survival, since most of its customers are in the west and central parts of Canada. He wrote:

> On February 14, industry in Nova Scotia, and across Atlantic Canada will be faced with an increase in most rail rates, ranging from 4-8 per cent. Some people may say "so what, a rate increase of 4-8 per cent in many industries would not be considered unrealistic." The startling thing about this increase is that it is the eighth time in the past 29 months that rail rates have increased!
> Canadian Keyes Fibre Company Limited, located in Hantsport, Nova Scotia, manufactures a variety of molded wood pulp products such as Egg Cartons, Berry Boxes, trays for packing eggs, meats, produce, etc., Pie Plates for bakeries and disposable tableware. We presently employ approximately 325 people.

Most of our products are made from raw materials produced in Nova Scotia, utilizing the natural wood resources of our Province. These finished goods are sold in all major markets across Canada. We are, therefore, a "resource" industry that makes a major contribution to the real wealth of our Province. A very minor portion of our production is exported outside of Canada.

He went on to say:

We feel sure that if a manufacturer as vital to the economy as rail transportation were to apply increases at the rate of 8 times in 29 months, and a cumulative total of some 35-68 per cent, government action would very likely be considered.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that when the St. Lawrence Seaway workers were given a 30 per cent pay increase over a two-year period, there were objections. Some members in this House as well as people around the country, say that our present inflationary spiral can be traced back to that fantastically large increase, in percentage terms, which was granted to those workers. People have criticized that increase bitterly. As the writer points out, cumulative increases of between 35 and 68 per cent in other areas would bring cries of outrage from the members of this House. He illustrates how these increases have affected the transfer of goods from Hantsport, where the company exists, to the various shipping points where the customers are. I will not read the entire list. It is interesting to note that the rate from Hantsport to Cornerbrook was $1.13 on January 1, and now it is $1.81. From Hantsport to Montreal, the rate on January 1, 1969, was 93 cents; on February 14, after the last increase, it rose to $1.37. I might mention that these are increases on class 45 carload rates to these various points.

The rate to Toronto went up from $1.30, on January 1, 1969, to $1.84, after the last increase. To Winnipeg, the rate was $2.99 in January, 1969, and went up to $4.13 after the last increase in February. To Calgary, the rate went from $4.65 in January to $6.08, and to Vancouver it increased from $5.65 to $7.39. In view of these increases, one wonders how the company can continue competing in the markets of Canada. Instead of philosophizing about the national average of rate structures and saying that perhaps we are not far above or below that national average, the minister should consider how any across the board increase adversely affects the long-haul shipper, be he in the east or in the west.

These increases constitute real discrimination against relatively depressed areas of the economy and make it difficult for companies in those areas to compete. Apparently the minister either does not acknowledge the problem or has underplayed its seriousness. Certainly, the point at issue is not any national average for rate increases. That is not the point at all. The point we must consider is the history behind the maritimes freight rates legislation. That legislation was originally introduced to guarantee our producers access to the markets of central Canada. A subsidy was paid. That is no longer the case under the National Transportation Act. Consequently, the long-haul shipper, whether in the east or in the west, is much harder hit now with across-the-board increases.

I think the traffic manager of the company was most moderate in suggesting to the minister that such action should not be taken again without further study, and that the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission ought to be involved in any study before there are any increases. In his letter he spoke about the impact of these freight rate increases and suggested that their impact be assessed before further increases are piled on top of the ones already imposed during the last 29 months. He suggested, further, that the minister obtain a progress report from the federal-provincial committee which was set up to examine the recommendations made by the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces in March, 1969. These actually have not been fully implemented. Only one or two of those recommendations have been implemented, most of the others are gathering dust.

The former minister of transport who is now the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) requested concrete suggestions on how to resolve these fundamental problems. We waited for two years while four Atlantic premiers of different political stripes set up a joint study. Federal funding was involved. In the end, the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Committee made recommendations that were unanimous. They were adopted by the Atlantic premiers, who adopted them regardless of political stripe. For the first time we had a report from the four Atlantic premiers, and it set out clearly positive steps that should be followed if the perennial problem of transportation was to be resolved. Since then, another minister of transport from eastern Canada has been appointed. Certainly, he is aware of these recommendations and is as vitally concerned about them as we are. Unfortunately, the mechanism that the premiers wanted to establish for resolving these problems is not in operation. The federal-provincial committee set up to continue the work begun by the four Atlantic premiers has not followed the recommendations of the four premiers.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Also, the minister has ignored the committee report which endorsed the recommendations of the premiers.

Mr. Nowlan: As my friend from Moncton has reminded me, the minister ignored the unanimous report of the transport committee that had travelled through Atlantic Canada. Ironically, it was tabled in the House on the very day when the minister brought in the most recent transportation bill, the Atlantic transportation fiscal arrangements act, or something like that, in 1969. We went to all the trouble of travelling around the various areas of Atlantic Canada. I was a member of the committee, as was my good friend from Moncton. This commitee heard all the government groups, the boards of trade, the manufacturers groups and the farm groups. The committee came back here and prepared a unanimous report which was not a political partisan document.

• (1450)

The great irony is that the report was tabled in the House of Commons on the very day the Transport Minister brought in the Atlantic transportation fiscal arrangements bill, as I believe it was called, a piecemeal transportation bill to help solve part of the Atlantic transportation problems. At that time, the minister said that other bills would follow after the transportation committee report was evaluated, and after the Atlantic premiers report was assessed. That was in 1969, and we still have not had further items dealing specifically with Atlantic transportation. One might leave out the criticism I have made in respect of these eight increases over a period of 29 months and say I am being parochial in talking about Atlantic Canada. Of course I am, because I have the honour to represent a riding in that part of Canada.

Let us leave the question of the lack of Atlantic policies and talk about the general transportation policy in Canada or the lack of one. The National Transportation Act was supposed to be the great blueprint for all time. This is the act which created the Canadian Transport Commission. The Minister of Transport who piloted the bill through this House became the first chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission. I refer of course to Mr. Pickersgill who is now Chairman of the CTC. Even since 1969, there have been so many changes that some of the underlying premises of the National Transportation Act as we have seen it implemented should be challenged. I think the compensatory rates for competitive modes of transport must be seriously considered. I wonder whether they are really valid. As I wonder this, I should like to draw attention to what the Canadian Railway Labour Association thinks about a national transportation policy, or the lack of one. This organization made the following submission to the government on March 6, 1972:

> We agree with the general principles of the 'National Transportation Policy' but suggest that it does not go far enough towards meeting the needs of the Canadian public. For example, the national transportation policy should be directed towards the fullest use possible of Canadian transportation facilities in the movement of our natural resources to export positions. We have in mind such cases as the exporting of coal from the Kootenay region of British Columbia to the Roberts Bank superport which was constructed partially with Federal funds. Our contention is that the movement of such Canadian natural resources should be restricted to Canadian modes of transport using Canadian routes. We further contend that such issues should be dealt with on a national level, that there should be a national policy for dealing with these issues, and that they should not be left with a provincial regulatory body or a provincial government. In addition in the application of the policy to date vis-à-vis the rail passenger situation, too much emphasis has been placed on the narrow concept of economic viability.
> We have emphasized throughout this Brief the existence of change and the many ways in which change should affect policy in Canada. One dominant reason why change should bring about new and different policies is because, with the passage of time, the assumptions upon which existing policies are based become less valid, if not erroneous.

That is what I say has happened in respect of the National Transportation Act. The brief continues:

> A case in point, and one which is of great importance to us is the National Transportation Act. Many of the basic assumptions upon which this Act is based date back to the MacPherson Royal Commission in the 1950s. We are very strongly of the view that many of the conclusions of the studies done for that Royal Commission are not consistent with contemporary views. The Act contains a built-in bias towards using economic viability as the over-riding criterion for determining railway passenger transportation needs. We suggest that the assumptions upon which the Act was based are not a sufficient basis for contemporary policy and that these assumptions are in contradiction with many of the Government's other policies.
> The assumptions of the Act are insufficient today because the Canadian people and their Government have increasingly realized that while economic criteria are important, perhaps the most important criteria, they should not be the overriding consideration in all cases. This is especially true when one considers the long-term results of any given action. We have realized that while the gross national product may be a reasonably satisfactory aggregate measure of the Canadian people's well-being, it is a poor measure of the quality of life.
> Increasingly also economics and the other social sciences have placed renewed emphasis upon a vastly broadened concept of cost, realizing that public costs and benefits can, and frequently do, outweigh private costs and benefits. To consider only costs and benefits in a narrow sense is to accept a short-term and unrealistic framework for policy. It is not sufficient for the Canadian Transport Commission to look at the costs and revenues as submitted by the railways for such a service and merely weigh those arguments against the views of the public at a hearing.
> This Government has increasingly demonstrated its willingness to view problems on a long-term basis and to do so within the framework of a broadened concept of costs and benefits, especially with respect to environmental questions. But your willingness to be farsighted on some environmental issues contrasts sharply with the underlying assumptions of the National Transportation Act, which is the basic element in Canada's transportation policy.
>
> There are numerous ways in which the National Transportation Act conflicts with current policy. We wish to mention only two. With the elimination of rail passenger service the public's ability to choose among different modes of transportation is being restricted. This would not be such a serious situation if the various methods of transportation were perfect substitutes. They are not. They are in many ways complementary but not substitutive. Therefore the mobility of the public is being lessened and the cost of maintaining the same amount of mobility is being increased.
> Secondly, the elimination of rail passenger service is promoting the increased use of automobiles at the same time as the public and various levels of Government are becoming concerned about the increasing costs of pollution, congestion, etc. The current policy is encouraging the elimination of rail passenger service despite the knowledge that such service is the most acceptable means of moving large numbers of people on an urban, interurban and national basis. We submit that the aims of the present policy of the National Transportation Act are outdated, inadequate, and inappropriate and should therefore be immediately revised.

I could read much more, because I certainly concur with a good part of it. In terms of Atlantic Canada, not only have we not moved ahead to implement the firm recommendations of the four Atlantic premiers or of the Atlantic transportation committee, but on a national basis there is a question whether we should review some of the underlying principles of the national transportation policy.

In the few minutes I have remaining, I should like to mention the question of re-financing in a very general way because it is a very complicated subject. It appears that the minister's statement can be taken at face value and we will have another opportunity in another session, if and when there is another session, to discuss other features of the Canadian National Railways or Air Canada. The minister said there will be a bill to separate Air Canada from the CNR and also that there will be, I believe he said, a new CNR revision act. I think members should take note now that in any so-called revision act we should not continue to perpetuate the myth about the debt structure of the CNR, notwithstanding the debt structure it assumed many years ago in respect of all the other railways. I do not have the time or expertise today to go into this in any great detail, but in 1952 there was a recapitulation of the CNR debt structure which involved hundreds of millions of dollars. At that time, and through that bill, as a result of the buying of shares and the low interest placed on some of the loans, the CNR was supposed to be put on a position to compete with any other railway. It was felt then, that the CNR would not need to come back perpetually to the Parliament of Canada to be bailed out.

It will be very interesting when the new bill is introduced to see just what explanation will be given concerning why the taxpayers of Canada will again have to bail out the CNR because of the very heavy debt structure that has been criticized since 1952. This question has a real impact upon anyone involved in the trucking industry, because as we all know both CP and CNR carry on very large trucking operations. In the case of CP it is through Smith's Transport, and in the case of CN it is through CNCL and a host of similar companies which carry out the motor transportation operation.

• (1500)

The CN has not differentiated between these two aspects of its operations to the point where we can ascertain what costs are charged against rail and what costs are charged against motor transportation. This is a situation we should check into when the recapitalization bill comes before the House.

The measure before us will, if passed, perpetuate a situation in which motive transport is subsidized from the public purse despite the fact that this section of the railway company's operation is in direct competition with private trucking companies. It is one thing for CN or CP to be in the trucking business. That may be fine. But there are many other companies in the trucking business across Canada, and we are giving CN an unfair advantage if we enable it to get money from the public purse either by means of an annual financing bill such as is before us, or by way of the recapitalization bill which the minister talked about.

I hope that before the bill comes to a vote on second reading, steps will be taken to refer this matter to the transport committee in order that the proposals of the CNR can be examined by that body in a context which would allow representatives of the trucking industry and others concerned to cross-examine the railway company on its proposals. We might as well admit that members of the transport committee of this House do not possess the expertise necessary to carry out an effective cross-examination of the company officials in this area or to become involved in the complex financial operations of the CN. Nor can this be expected of hon. members, bearing in mind all the other claims on their time in discharging their various duties.

Even the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would, I am sure, admit his inadequacy when it comes to following through the maze of CN financing, beginning with the fact that it is not possible to distinguish between expenditures chargeable to the trucking side of the enterprise and those chargeable to the rail operation. It is too complex for ordinary people to understand.

Mr. Pepin: My father was a CN employee, and I know a lot.

Mr. Nowlan: I am glad to hear that. Perhaps the minister will be in a position, when the recapitalization bill is being dealt with, to attend meetings of the committee, not as a cabinet minister but as a private member and give us the benefit of some of the insight he learned at his father's knee.

Mr. Pepin: Lots of steam!

Mr. Nowlan: I want to move on. I am being very nonpartisan this afternoon.

Mr. Pepin: I can hardly believe it.

Mr. Nowlan: This is too serious a matter to be approached in a partisan way. This is a problem which has affected governments of all political stripes. I believe that before any recapitalization bill is considered by the transport committee we should have the benefit of a public hearing before the CTC where people more knowledgeable than we are can form an opinion as to the need for any such refinancing measure. After all, the CN was refinanced in 1952 and at that time the then president, Donald Gordon, took the view that there would be no need for the company to return to parliament in the hope that once again the taxpayers would bail out the company.

I should now like to say one or two things about Air Canada. First, I do not believe that we in Atlantic Canada have complained sufficiently about the plan to remove freight service personnel out of Halifax and locate them in Montreal, assisted by a computer service to advise them as to the vagaries of weather. We who live in Atlantic Canada know that one place can be in bright sunshine while another just a mile down the road is in thick fog. I suggest that Air Canada will find out to its embarrassment that no matter where it may locate these service personnel and no matter what computers are used, the service will not be as good as if it were provided on the spot, particularly when we are talking about coastal weather conditions, the strangest weather conditions of all to predict.

Everyone in Ottawa knows about the difficulties which arise when trying to get a reservation on an airplane after a certain hour. I have been trying today to get a reservation for a flight to Halifax. I was informed of the prerecorded signal from the computer located in Montreal, or wherever it is, but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the reservations service is still not as good as it was when the office was here in Ottawa. And this is a relatively mechanical, administrative process. What will happen when an attempt is made to predict weather conditions? A few days ago I left my riding in bright sunshine. When I got to Halifax airport, 60 miles away, I found that the airport was fogbound and that no traffic was moving. On one occasion I telephoned Air Canada to ask about the weather situation in Halifax and was told that planes were flying, that everything was all right. After a four-hour drive in foul conditons, I arrived at the airport to find the runways fogbound and no traffic moving.

Nowadays, when I want information about weather conditions I telephone the airport directly. In light of this and similar experiences I believe it is a retrograde step to move service personnel to another location, as Air Canada proposes to do. I believe the travelling public will be far worse served after this change than it is at present.

CNR and Air Canada

Though my time is limited I should like to say a word or two about freight. I will tell hon. members a little story to illustrate in a personal way the problems with which shippers are confronted. For more than three months I had been trying to ship a box of books from my office to Halifax. The consignment is now somewhere between Ottawa and Halifax. I have spoken to people in Montreal in CN and in CP. They tell me there is no rail service into my area. I have asked my secretary to get me the names of the people who are telling me this garbage, in order that an appropriate letter can be written to higher officials in an attempt to ensure that something as simple as shipping a box of books to my area can be accomplished. I might add that it is a moderately progressive area, with mail service. I am trying to find out what all this hocus pocus is about.

Then, again, while I was in my constituency during the Easter recess I heard a complaint from a businessman that instead of being able to get deliveries by express within two or three days from Montreal he has to wait up to four weeks for shipments which are vital to his business as a user of aluminum products which are sent to him in broken lots. Regardless of what grand proposals the minister may have in mind, it is questions like these which deserve prompt consideration. In addition, of course, there is the question of increases in rates. The question of rate increases must be studied so we can maintain access to central Canadian markets.

Secondly, I think the minister could do what was done in the west when we were worried about supplying boxcars to carry grain and there was pressure to get the grain to the coast. At certain times they had what was called a controller at Winnipeg, or wherever these men work, to expedite or co-ordinate the movement of boxcars so that the demand for grain could be met. I do not know whether to call such a person a co-ordinator or an expediter, but as a matter of service by the government to the people of Atlantic Canada we should have express shipments made in less than the two to four weeks that they presently take. My area is serviced by the DAR—the Dominion Atlantic Railway—a subsidiary of the CPR. There is a problem in obtaining transfers from the CN to the DAR, which is why it became known as the "Dangerous And Rotten". This is where the tie-ups occurred.

I notice my time has just about expired, but I hope the minister will seriously study the proposals of the Atlantic premiers which have not so far been implemented. Secondly, I hope he will follow the recommendations of the transport committee which have found blessing on all sides of the House. Thirdly, I hope the minister will set up a co-ordinator or expediter so that when a man pays for express service he gets it, thus being able to maintain his operation. Certainly this is difficult enough under the present trying conditions.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the chance to speak on this motion before the House because it gives me the opportunity to bring to its attention a very serious situation in the area generally north of Toronto. I refer to the complete lack of sensitivity of the Canadian National, so far demonstrated, in regard to providing what is so badly needed in that area, namely, an efficient system of commuter transportation. This is an area where Canadian National Railways has singularly failed to meet its responsibility to the public and, more particularly, to the citizens of my area. Perhaps it would be useful to give some indication of the background to this problem to show the need and the desire for this service which so far the Canadian National has signally failed to provide.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

I am talking of the area north of Toronto up as far as Lake Simcoe which north of the boundaries of metropolitan Toronto comprises well over 140,000 people. If we take into consideration those Canadians who are living within the boundaries of metropolitan Toronto but who could equally be served by such a commuter service, then we are talking of a population of roughly a quarter of a million people who have expressed for the last ten years, through every elected official at every level of government, no matter of which political persuasion, unanimous support for the provision of a commuter service. As I say, this support has been echoed by every community, village and social organization. So I suggest there is not much doubt about the desire of this population pool to use such a service. Nor is there much doubt about the facilities. There are, in fact, Canadian National Railways' lines operating through this area which are capable of providing a commuter service if only the railway itself were prepared to provide it. Even back as far as 1964 the metropolitan Toronto and region transportation study, through its researches, indicated a definite travel potential for such a service and, as well, a strong desire on the part of those in the area to use the service.

Over the past ten years the public demonstration of the need and desire to have such a service has been extremely clear. But what has been the reaction of the railways to this need? The reaction has been to try to shift responsibility. Every time the railways are asked to provide a service, they look over their shoulder and try to find somebody else to do it for them. First of all they shifted the responsibility onto the provincial government of Ontario. When we think of the eastern and western commuter services in and around Toronto, the Ontario government was prepared to take up this burden. Indeed, the provincial government committed itself to providing commuter service north of Toronto. When the province retracted from this commitment, the federal government at that stage became involved and took the initiative in promoting a tripartite study of commuter problems, a study involving the co-operation of the regional, provincial and federal governments.

Of course, this study takes time to complete. It also has implications not only for the Toronto area but for other areas of Canada. It will establish precedents regarding federal involvement in the provision of commuter services as well as for co-operation between provincial and federal governments and it will take all levels of government some time fully to consider these precedents. But this, Mr. Speaker, lies in the future.

What concerns me particularly is not future need and how it is to be serviced; what I am talking about is the need of the present population living in the area which for well over a decade has indicated its desire for an improved service, for a commuter service. These people have waited a long time and with patience, perhaps too much patience. The result has been the ignoring of their need by Canadian National Railways—a lack, if you like, of social responsibility on the part of the CNR.

Faced with a magnificent opportunity to provide profitable services that would be useful to the citizens of the area, the CNR has done nothing. I am sure we have all known some people who, when they stumble across opportunity, immediately pick themselves up, brush themselves off and hurry on as quickly as they can, pretending that they never stumbled at all. That is exactly what the railways, particularly the CNR, have been doing in relation to providing commuter services—picking themselves up, avoiding the opportunity, hustling on and doing other things that they would prefer to do. Just what is the view of the railway? It seems to me that the CNR is just trying to make money, or perhaps you might say just trying to lose as little money as possible. It finds it more convenient to ship goods, or to run hotels—even if it has the Hilton hotel chain run them for them—than to meet the needs of the people, needs that the railways were established to meet.

I think it is woefully wrong for the CNR to pretend that it is just another commercial institution, as if it were making hula-hoops or bobby-pins. If it finds a more profitable area of activity than the provision of commuter transportation services, then it just ignores the need for those transportation services. I suggest that the CNR exists not just to make money but to provide a service to the people of Canada. Certainly that is what it was chartered by parliament to do.

What has been the reaction of the CNR? What are its motives? It is hard to deal with motives as distinct from looking at what in fact has happened. The CNR has not been concerned with the provision of services that might be needed; and if any evidence were required in order to show they are needed I might cite the example of the Markham service which passes close to my constituency. The CNR resisted for a long time the provision of passenger services to the people in that area. Then when the Canadian Transportation Commission required them to do so, the railway found it had more business than it was prepared for. The CN were surprised at the number of passengers who wanted the service, which I suggest is a demonstration of real need and user potential.

Recently we have heard reports that the CNR is planning to close down the station at Stouffville, which would be vitally needed for a commuter service. Fortunately, yesterday in our discussion of the estimates before the committee on transportation it was made fairly clear by Mr. Pickersgill that there will be no reduction or closing of facilities at Stouffville which would in any way harm the passenger service.

We are not asking the CNR to do something unique, unheard of or never done anywhere else in Canada. There is a commuter service provided in the Montreal area. That service has been provided for well over 50 years. I suspect this service is provided at a profit, otherwise surely the CNR would get rid of it since commuter services are not imposed on the railway by the transportation acts. If they can make money on commuter services around Montreal, or break even, why can they not provide similar services at the break-even point in and around Toronto?

The lack of desire on the part of the CNR to meet its responsibilities in relation to commuter passengers is one of the reasons I presented Bill C-24 to the House. That bill would establish a commuter passenger authority in and around the province of Ontario. It is because the CNR has not been conscious of its social responsibility that I have taken what is to some extent the drastic step of suggesting to the House of Commons that a new authority be established which would take into account, more effectively than is now being done, the need for commuter services in the Toronto area.

The tendency of the CNR has been constantly to hide behind the railway and transportation acts by saying that what is described there as the responsibility of the railways will be interpreted by them as the maximum of what they will do. It is true that when those acts were written it was not foreseen as strongly as it is today that there would be such a need for commuter services in and around urban areas of this country. These acts concentrate more on passenger service and place restrictions and limitations on the ability of the railways to get out of existing services, rather than concentrating upon the need for provision of new services.

I suggest as strongly as I can that it is wrong for the railways to say that what is the minimum required by law is the most they will do. That was hardly the kind of adventurous spirit that motivated the original railwaymen of this country to develop our country through the provision of an adequate transportation system. It is not even a businesslike attitude for any company, when given the opportunity, to resolutely refuse to take advantage of it because it is not required to do so by existing acts.

There is no doubt the CNR has the power to provide these services if it wishes to do so. My belief is that it would be profitable for it to do so. One would like to see the CNR much more forthcoming in meeting the legitimate needs of the population rather than concentrating too strongly simply on those things which are most convenient and profitable to it.

I hope that later in this session I will have the chance to discuss much more fully than I can this afternoon the needs I have described today and how they can be met effectively by Bill C-24. My purpose in speaking this afternoon is to bring attention to the House, as forcefully as I can, and to Canadian National Railways, the railway's responsibility to the commuter passengers—a need they are not now meeting but which I believe is a requirement this House should place upon them.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, two great transportation companies, Air Canada and the Canadian National Railways, are once again trying to obtain the authorization to use respectively $219,800,000 and 114 million dollars for their financial operations in various areas: transactions, development, payment of bonds and new investment, including reserves for any deficiency in operating revenues until June 30, 1972.

I quite realize that corporations of the size of Air Canada and the Canadian National Railways are prepared to proceed with financial transactions from time to time, and I hope that this use of capital will be beneficial. Transportation in all its forms will always be with us.

Presently, we see that railway companies are testing various administrative procedures, and their officials claim that the objective is to show a profit. Unfortunately, that so-called modernization has resulted until now in massive lay-offs. Forecasts create a climate of insecurity among numerous workers who have given regular and valuable services to railway companies during many years.

As for results, I can point out certain facts of which the Canadian people are aware anyway, for instance, the increase in derailments, the downgrading of the passenger service through the removal of stops in convenient places. And I might even add the complete removal of train runs which would have been profit-earning, had the authorities been wise enough to take the advice of conductors before setting time-tables.

In our area, for instance, when the question of abolishing trains nos. 122 and 123, in the Chaleurs area, came up, the fact that our area was under a social and economic development program in which the population had been invited to take part, was ignored. Now, an important company like the CNR is negating every effort made over the past several years to bring together the different partners: governments, private decision making centres, and the population, refusing to take part in development projects and admitting casually that it has made a unilateral decision that could have consequences on the present experiment.

Yet, had its schedule been better balanced, the train could have run again during the holidays; and if some cared enough, it could be done immediately. If efforts are made to improve the service, there is no reason why it could not be profitable.

At this stage in my remarks, I want to point out one thing because derailments are increasing and the situation is becoming serious. Let us recall, for instance, that of the Rapido which occurred in early March, at Mile 33.3 near Joly in the riding of Lotbinière, and caused the death of a family head. That accident was caused by the negligence of the authorities whose responsibility it was to make decisions about snow removal on that track. It is easy to conclude that the accident was caused by bad weather, but any serious observer will admit that a snowplough should have been used to remove the snow from the track before the train went through.

The maintenance staff is kept to a minimum in a misguided attempt to save money, and we have to mourn the death of an assistant engineer leaving a wife and three children.

The government sits back and waits. The situation is gradually deteriorating in the rail passenger service. The government is apparently ready to authorize them to make various transactions, without making the necessary investigations which would undoubtedly reveal administrative mistakes which should be corrected. It might even be possible to find out one day what is the cause of those difficulties.

I have asked for a thorough investigation respecting the CNR's administrative procedures and I have not been the only one to do so. That is why I do not want to miss this opportunity to point out to the Minister of Transport and to the other members that it would be time to put some order in that bureaucratic organization.

Orders coming from management multiply, sometimes with prejudicial results. Here are some examples. In early February 1972, that is not long ago, about 350 mail bags of a total of 500 shipped to Lévis, Quebec City and the area failed to be delivered because the employees assigned to that type of job were short of time. Orders issued by management set the train departure, with the result that the mail delivery suffered considerable delays. Those mail bags were carried clear across the province then back again and in some cases the delays greatly inconvenienced the addressees.

According to the information I got from reliable sources, such orders from management are no longer considered as errors but as a bad habit with disastrous consequences.

As for decisions to close down stations, most of the time they are based on an automatic command system whose efficiency has yet to be proven. This modern information system no doubt entails various inconveniences. One would not imagine that computers can replace men in all fields. Quite often, we are victimized by delays and errors though our era is one of mechanized robots. Fortunately, they are not hurt by the communicable fevers or the epidemic strikes that we are experiencing.

Among the reasons justifying a real inquiry, I have already mentioned the derailments that are multiplying at an alarming rate. A short survey of the statistics on this area is convincing. If we are to prevent accidents, strict control and regulations should be established for railways.

It happens too often that railway management is quite astonishingly ignoring railway operations. Economic matters are given priority over security with the results we all know.

Without saying that derailments are due to administrative inefficiency, since various factors sometimes create unforeseeable situations, I maintain that a fair number of them are attributable to exaggerated reductions in maintenance personnel.

The railway representatives say that this reduction was made essential because of technology and that the rails which used to be 39 feet long are now welded over 1,200 to 1,500 feet. Consequently, the rail joints may be checked much faster. Sleepers are made of hardwood processed to last 30 to 40 years, embankments have been widened by a few feet, gravel has been replaced by crushed stone and these are so many factors which should ensure better safety provided the maintenance and surveillance personnel is adequate and judiciously posted and thus in a position to make the required verifications.

No sensible observer will be easily convinced that railway maintenance may be carried out by a team of truckers however well-intentioned.

In order to provide some public explanations regarding the problem of derailments, I would say that they are the result of a lack of co-ordination between locomotive and railway car manufacturers and the companies which use this rolling stock. It is acknowledged that there is an imbalance somewhere. This is a valid reason for the representatives of various areas of the country to point out what they deem to be administrative mistakes that should be rectified prior to the adoption of legislation authorizing the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system.

Another important item which cannot be ignored when we speak of the administrative services of the CN is the question of indebtedness. Any firm which has to set aside $75 million of its annual operating income for servicing its debts, should admittedly be allowed a certain period of time "to juggle" with figures.

Under the heading of "General", on page 4 of the Canadian National Railways annual report for 1970, it is said that the Canadian National handled a larger volume of business in 1970 than in the previous year and was able to produce increased revenues from nearly all major services. However, the cost of doing business continued to mount as a result of higher wage rates and higher prices for materials and services. Some freight rate increases—applied within the price restraint guidelines set by the Prices and Incomes Commission—plus effective control of expenses and improved productivity enabled CN to offset part of the higher costs.

Following the table showing the revenue increase or decrease as compared with that of 1969, the report continues, and I quote:

The net income before interest on debt—that is, the "operating profit" of the Company—was $45.8 million in 1970. This was lower than in 1969. But it can be considered a good achievement in a year characterized by a slowdown in the economy, strikes in the automobile and pulp and paper industries, and a slackening in demand for automobiles and for lumber and other construction materials, as well as the annual reduction in payments related to the National Transportation Act.

Gross revenues from railway and other CN operations reached $1,167.7 million, the highest in the history of the Company.

On page 6, there is a statement of the amounts of interest due on the debt, and I quote:

Net interest on debt amounted to $75.5 million, an increase of $1.3 million over 1969.

This is rather serious!

As I suggested, following an investigation into the various CN administrative services, it might be possible to find a way to consolidate this debt through long-term loans with as low a rate of interest as possible—something along the lines of loan terms granted to underdeveloped countries.

In Canada, we had the advantage of experiencing several forms of development. Unfortunately, the financial system which creates debts has become an obstacle to our development, with the consequence that many enterprises—our country for one—are faced with the problem of unpaid and unpayable debts.

Even some of our so-called expert administrators feel they are doing quite well when they manage to pay nothing but the interest on the huge debts that are getting bigger. One can easily imagine what would happen if all the citizens had the same approach.

Taking into account the situation and the need to provide passenger service, the Transport Department should look more closely into the decisions made by the management of transportation companies and give the people adequate service.

In closing my remarks, I should like to read from an article that is much to the point, which contains a great deal of facts that sometimes agree and sometimes disagree with the approach taken by the management of our railways. I shall quote an article by Mr. Marice Huot published in Montréal-Matin on February 15, 1972.

—the service has alarmingly deteriorated. Does that mean that it could not be improved? We suggest that it can be, if we use our imagination in order to provide passengers with the service they are entitled to expect. In the United States, the passenger transportation service has been put into operation again for some time. Many old outmoded cars were restored, their inside decorated, children playrooms were made out of freight cars which can be coupled on to ordinary trains, such as trains of people going on holiday, thus enabling some families to travel with their children in a more human and more comfortable way. Tracks are improved thanks to more careful maintenance. They changed their staff's uniforms, hired smiling stewardesses like on planes, provided for entertainment such as movies and TV near large centres. Those trains also carry cars of people who appreciate not having to drive over long distances but who use their car once they are arrived. In other words, it is a whole new rail philosophy which has been started in order to make rail travel more competitive, instead of always speaking of abadoning lines, not because they could not be profitable, but because they were made unprofitable through remissness. Henceforth, we should attract the travelling public with pleasure trains. We should make travelling by train a pleasant experience and not a sort of punishment. Let us put as much effort into restoring passenger lines as we do for freight traffic and railway transportation will gain new lustre and activity. In sea transportation the trend is towards cruises; railways also could plan cruises on wheels if they got organized accordingly.

So, I think that Department of Transport officials should keep a close watch on how CNR management plans schedules and makes decisions without consultations, which is far from beneficial to Canadian residents who would sometimes wish to use railway services.

Besides , I was told recently again, "Try to inquire whether there are not people in the management of the CNR who have interests in bus or other means of transportations, as it would seem, from their attitude, that they are interested in people giving up the railway and using other modes of transportation.

I therefore hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) will look after the matter and that we can be assured of having a passenger transport service suitable for the population which has already paid a great deal for it.

[English]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the measure before us this afternoon, Bill C-4, authorizes the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the CNR system and Air Canada. I would like to say a few words today about the problem of strikes in regard to Air Canada and our airports and some of the conclusions to which I have come, very reluctantly, but which nevertheless I am sure are shared by many Canadians.

It has been a principle with me, as with many Canadians, that the right to strike is a basic right of a democratic society. The right to withhold one's services from the labour market is one that has been built, by our law and customs, into a right which has been respected by all Canadians. There have been problems in connection with the development of this policy: it has not been developed very easily. Resistance to this approach has been very strongly allied to the concept that the right to strike is a fundamental right. But like many rights, it also has responsibilities.

At this stage I want to say a few words about some of the problems that are raised by strikes which have taken place. Whether it is an airline pilots' strike, an air traffic controllers' strike, or the radar technicians who provide service to airports, and whether the employer happens to be with the Department of Transport or Air Canada is really incidental to the purposes for which I want to speak today.

I wish to quote from two letters I received from constituents. The first one is from L. A. McKeown who resides at 473 Mayfair Avenue, in this city. I have chosen this letter because I think it is typical and because I believe the opinions expressed in it are shared by many. It reads:

> I would like to suggest that you re-examine the whole question of the right to strike. In extending this right to strike to essential services you have built the premise on false grounds. The right to strike is not a prime right. There are other rights which have higher priority. When a low priority right runs counter to a high priority right then the lower priority right has to give way.
> For instance, national safety has a higher priority than the right of free speech. In the same way private rights have to be tempered when they run contrary to the public good. The freedom to act in any way by any two parties is limited only to the extent that they carry out this liberty in their own back yard and do not impede the liberty of others to carry out their normal and rightful duties. In other words, it has been considered so far permissible for a disagreement to exist between a private employer and employees of that company. The rights of disinterested third parties are usually not greatly inconvenienced too much in such a dispute. For instance, the General Motors strike about 15 months ago meant that I had to buy a Chrysler or Ford product rather than a General Motors product. However, when you give a monopoly to some group then you no longer have the choice of getting a Chrysler or a Ford. One of the responsibilities that a monopoly carries with it is that the monopoly guarantees to provide some particular product or service according to specification and that this security from competition is in return for the contracted monopoly.

The problem here relates to specific groups, in many cases small in number, and the amount of damage they are able to inflict on the public generally. I would also like to quote from a letter which I received from H. Lee Briggs, 2070 Dovercourt Avenue, in the city of Ottawa, as follows:

> Perhaps the issues are most readily identified in the recent strike by the Air Traffic controllers union. In this connection let us try to establish some kind of a financial balance, in the knowledge that dollars are far from everything.

[Mr. Francis.]

> Two years ago there were about a thousand air controllers. On last January 17, 1,750 controllers went on strike. They had largely been trained at the expense of Canadian taxpayers for 14½ months during which training time they received pay at rates between $4,900 and $5,500 per year. Their school training cost the government $4,700 per graduate.

He cites his source of this information.

> Prior to strike, pay rates ranged AI-1, min. $6,962, to AI-9, max. $18,460. I am guessing the average rate of pay on January 17 to be $14,000. DOT payroll (including 23 per cent benefits?) would be some $3 million.
>
> Strike demands were for a 60 per cent increase . . . plus a work week reduction from 35 down to 30 hours. This is $1,800,000 more pay to existing controllers, plus $260,000 for more people. Their demands, then, are $2,060,000. But let us say that they could be willing to finally settle for a mere $1 million. So we have 1,750 DOT employees, $3 million payroll, $1 million minimum demand to go back to work.
> Now, Mr. Francis, look what has happened to Canada. Absolutely all commercial flights in or to Canada shut down. Air Canada net loss alone $2 million. Air Canada laid off 10,000 ticket agents, clerficals and related employees at the outset. Air Canada then laid off, 1,000 more of the same. Air Canada cut pay of 3,200 management level employees by 40 per cent . . .
>
> One estimate of Air Canada pay cut off, $2,500,000.

Then he sums it up rather concisely, Mr. Speaker.

> I, a mild mannered conformist from your constituency—

I think he is modest in his description of himself.

> —am constrained to ask the Members of the Parliament of Canada, how does each one of you justify this bloody nonsense:
>
> 1,750 DOT employees. Payroll $3 million. Strike demands initially $1.8 million. vs. A loss to the Canadian economy of $60 to $100 million, untold massive inconveniences, tremendous waste of time and effort, layoffs everywhere, pay stoppages, business thwarted except at higher cost, Canada chopped into small segments in midwinter.

• (1550)

My colleague, the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), described the great hardship suffered by the outlying parts of Canada in the exercise of this so-called right to strike which up to this point I have supported in my public life almost without qualification.

In the Globe and Mail this morning a former premier of the province of Ontario was quoted regarding exactly the same subject. He talked in terms of the right to strike of teachers and asked the fundamental question of whether our society is such that teachers can go on strike and say that our children will not be educated until their demands are met. Where does this concept fit into a civilized society? I am not a simplistic person, Mr. Speaker. I have been head of a staff association in the public service and I believe that the right to strike is essential in democratic society in certain circumstances. But I say that in this forum—I know I say it with the agreement of a large number of people in this country—the right to strike by a small number of employees in certain critical areas has to be reconsidered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: There is no question in my mind that an air traffic controllers' strike, followed by a radar technicians' strike, followed by somebody else in a series of rotating strikes by people given strategic bargaining positions in the economy, to hold the rest of us to ransom is not to be tolerated. I am aware that in periods of inflation strikes are more numerous than at other times. I am aware that in many cases there have been problems regarding the right to organize in many sections of Canada. But we have come a long way down that path.

It is with great reluctance but with a great deal of conviction that I say to hon. members of this House that the right to strike in certain key areas affecting the national health, safety and well-being of Canadians has to be re-examined when it is abused. And in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it has been abused in the circumstances described.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I see that only a few minutes are left before private members' hour and this will not permit me to deal with all the matters I would like to discuss in the debate on the CN financing bill. Some people may wonder why, when the CN financing bill is presented to the House each year, a fairly lengthy debate takes place. I think this happens because of the importance of railways to Canada and the widespread operations of Canadian National Railways in particular. Railways have played an important part in the development of this country since confederation.

During this debate many suggestions have been made for improvement in the operation of the CNR. Hon. members have voiced complaints about its inadequacies. We cannot discuss CN operations and financing, however, unless we look at the over-all operation of railways in Canada, which brings us to consideration of the operations of CPR. It is my view that many of the basic problems of railway transportation in Canada cannot be solved until we have a government with the courage and wisdom to nationalize the CPR and the industrial empire which has resulted from generous grants made when its operations commenced. I think this is the basic step which must be taken, and I think the Canadian people are ready for it. But we need a government with the courage to take such a step which would be in the interest of all Canadians.

One other aspect of railway transportation must be considered during a debate such as this. That is the importance of developing a policy to equalize transportation rates across the country. This matter is of increasing importance because of the development taking place in our economy. A great deal has been said about regional disparities. In my opinion, one of the major contributing factors to this problem is the inequity in transportation costs. It is high time that the National Transportation Act and its concept adopted over the years was scrapped and we developed a policy to equalize transportation costs.

I see that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is in his seat. On a number of occasions he has stated that the government is working on an industrial strategy, whatever that might be. A good deal has been said about it, but I shall not go into that matter in detail. However, I think there is general agreement that we need a greater degree of strategy and focus on priorities of industrial development and growth in Canada in the future. We cannot deal with this question, however, unless we also deal with the problem of inequities in transportation costs in Canada.

If we allow the present structure of transportation costs to remain while we develop a new industrial strategy, those regions which already face higher transportation costs than others will still be discriminated against. I suggest that some regions of Canada will suffer under any industrial strategy that is developed unless at the same time there is a change in our transportation policy which will result in equalized transportation costs across the country. This is an important matter which should be noted by the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

PROVISION TO DISTINGUISH FISHING ZONE FROM TERRITORIAL SEA OR INTERNAL WATERS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to come to the House today to discuss Bill C-11. I have presented this bill on a number of occasions. It was introduced in the first session of this parliament, shortly after I was elected, as Bill C-189, in the second session as Bill C-91, and in the third session as Bill C-195—and now it is Bill C-11. My reason for presenting it every session since this parliament began is that despite certain developments which have taken place since 1968, of which hon. members are aware, there is still need to improve our fisheries legislation and to define the limits which constitute Canada's fishing zones.

• (1600)

Before proceeding further I wish to thank two members of the Pacific Trollermen's Association, Dick Williams of the vessel Seabeam and his former deckhand, Mr. Meadows, who assisted me over the years with this bill and who took me out on the commercial fishing bank so that I might better understand the point of view and problems of the fishermen. I also wish to thank the fishermen of the west coast for circulating a petition which I presented to parliament two years ago in support of Bill C-91, which is the same bill as the one before us today. That petition, with 33,000 names appended, was the largest petition, I believe, ever to be presented to this parliament. These fishermen played an important part in persuading the government to bring in legislation in this area, specifically the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1970, which has improved the situation over what it was previously although not to the point that my friends who fish off the west coast of Canada would wish.

I might also mention that the bill has the full support of the Fisheries Association of Canada which, at its annual meeting in 1971, went on record and resolved that Canada, at the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference, should maintain the position that anadromous species of fish are the property of the country of origin and that——the ownership of the creatures on and over the continental shelf and slope is vested in the coastal state which is responsible for establishing the regime for conservation and management of those stocks and the fisheries thereon.

That is the point of my bill, namely, extending our present limits for exclusive fishing zones, or exclusive fisheries management zones, from the limit presently set out to the end of the continental shelf. There are difficulties because international law recognizes many definitions of the term "continental shelf." One definition suggests that you can go out until you reach the 200-fathom mark; the second—again artificial—that you go out to the 1,000-fathom mark. A third definition suggests that you should go out until the continental shelf drops off at a certain angle, a number of degrees. Still another definition is that you must consider actual differences in the quality of the seabed and thus determine where the continental shelf ends; that you can tell from the seabed when you come to the edge of the continental shelf and slope. Whatever is decided ultimately, I think that for the purposes of this bill we can safely say that we will go for the limit that is most realistic, which is 1,000 fathoms. We think that is where the continental slope incline increases and that is where the actual limit of the continental shelf ought to be.

The government, two years after I first introduced my bill, brought down the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1970. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) made interesting comments in that debate which I should like to quote. On April 17, 1970, he said, as reported at page 6015 of Hansard:

I have made clear, as has the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that we will not back down one inch from our basic position on sovereignty but there is no interest on the part of the Canadian government in the exercise of chauvinism.

I agree completely with the minister's approach. This bill is not intended to be chauvinistic and is not directed against any nation or group of nations. I feel, however, that this is perhaps the only way in which the resources of the continental shelf and slope, and in particular the anadromous species such as salmon and sea-going trout, or steelhead, can be properly protected. The Secretary of State for External Affairs also said, as reported at page 6016:

—the bill would, in keeping with the government's approach to the question, enable us to separate fisheries jurisdiction from the complete sovereignty which states exercise in their territorial sea and internal waters.

This bill is specifically directed to solving some of our difficulties off the west coast. There are some serious problems that have arisen in connection with fishing on the big bank just off Vancouver Island. Hon. members will recall that on a number of occasions Canadian fishermen were harassed by Russian vessels and prevented from fishing in that area. Furthermore, our fishermen were endangered by what I consider to be reckless practices on the part of the Russians. The upshot was that the Canadian government eventually made an agreement with the Russian government limiting the use by Russian vessels in the waters off the west coast. The Russians agreed not to fish in a certain area. Although that agreement was not of major importance, at least it established a precedent. An agreement was reached with the Soviet government for limiting the activities of Russian fishing vessels off the coast of Vancouver Island beyond the 12-mile limit; in other words, outside the limits established by the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1970. That agreement is particularly important from the point of view of conservation, and has been greatly discussed.

I will not discuss all the problems of the east which are associated with preserving Atlantic salmon. Today, hon. members opposite from the Maritimes asked questions on that very point. I think the situation in the Maritimes is potentially the same as that which exists on the west coast. Our salmon, too, spawn in Canadian and American streams. They, too, go to sea and perhaps join, we do not know where, with other salmon of Siberian and Japanese rivers. We do not know where they go; perhaps, one day, that will be discovered, just as it has been discovered that Atlantic salmon go off the coast of Greenland.

Perhaps when that discovery occurs, on the west coast we will have to consider the same sort of problem that is now being considered on the east coast, because perhaps then our resources will be damaged in the same way by high seas fishing outside our control. We feel that it is important, therefore, that we get going in Canada and establish the right of controlling, for conservation purposes, the species of our continental shelf areas before that happens. This, I know, will be a subject that will concern the Canadian delegation which will be taking part in the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference.

I was rather disappointed to read the article which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), whom I see sitting opposite, wrote for a west coast fisheries magazine in which he declared that the Canadian position was detrimental to the interests of west coast fishermen. I ought to point out that while there is reason for concern, the minister is aware of the difficulty of the troll fishery off Vancouver Island and has made public statements on the subject. I quote from a press release in which the minister said:

It is fully recognized that a substantial part of the troll fishery off Vancouver Island takes place immediately outside the 12-mile territorial limit (within the outer limits of the continental slope)—

He went on to talk about the Atlantic salmon and pointed out that we must bear in mind that a substantial part of the Danish high seas fishery fishes just outside the 12-mile limit off Greenland. The minister's position is perfectly clear. I should like to read a letter which the minister sent to me. It is dated April 18, 1972, and reads in part:

• (1610)

Dear David:

This will acknowledge your letter of March 17, 1972, concerning offshore salmon fishing.

Canada's position at the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference is still under development. For your information, I am enclosing a copy of a brief statement on the subject.

Yours sincerely,
Jack Davis

I believe it is important for people on the west coast to know that Canada's position is not firm, as has been erroneously reported, and that the minister is looking for ways to take into account the troll fishery which he mentioned in his press release and letter. I think that if we were able to accept the principle of my bill, which extends the limit for conservation purposes to the edge of the continental shelf, rather than fisheries closing lines plus the 12-mile limit which is in our present legislation, and if we accepted the extension of the principle that outside the present limits there may be areas of the continental shelf which should also be included, we could perhaps solve the difficulty which faces the minister in his attempt to reconcile Canada's position on the east and west coasts.

The bill before us, as I have said, is a proposal that the subject matter be sent to committee, because this is the best that can be hoped for from a private member's bill. I feel that this is a worth-while step toward achieving some sort of reconciliation of position which would be satisfactory to both east and west coast fishermen and would at the same time meet the very real needs of Canada to have a consistent position at the Law of the Sea Conference in 1973.

I believe the difficulties we have faced over the past four years on the west coast and on the east coast underline the need for Canada to continue toward progressive legislation in an effort to increase the area of its jurisdiction. I feel it would be quite fair to claim on behalf of the troll fishermen on the west coast, with their excellent petition to the House which I mentioned earlier, that they have had a large part in achieving the advances of the 1970 legislation. There has been a closure of many areas which formerly were open to people of all nations and which now are restricted to Canadians. I think this is a positive rather than a negative point, that is, that this extension of jurisdiction has allowed us to preserve resources in a way which I believe has been most beneficial to the species concerned.

Even if we extend our jurisdiction further, as I suggest in this bill, we can always permit the fishermen of other nations to come into our area under licence. It may be that they could fish certain species in which we are not interested. Hake is a good example on the west coast. It may be that we could work out co-operative arrangements with these fishermen to take a certain species in which they are more interested than us. The herring fishery is an example where the Japanese are involved. Japanese experts say when conditions are right, and they indeed suggest when the fishermen should set their nets because they know full well the use to which the product will be put in Japan and when the fish are in the best condition for catching.

When I speak of extending exclusive Canadian jurisdiction I do not necessarily mean exclusively for our Canadian fishermen. It may be a good idea to have others come in and help harvest the resources of the sea. If this were done properly, I can see no problem. However, it is necessary to have someone responsible for jurisdiction, regulation and licensing as well as for conservation and the scientific work which must be carried out prior to licensing or regulation.

At present we are in the unfortunate position on the high seas where what belongs to everybody belongs to nobody. No one is interested in doing the scientific work and in spending money, because the people who would benefit might be of another state. If we can extend our jurisdiction to take in our major producing areas, we can perhaps persuade the government to increase the amount of scientific effort. I am sure the government could be persuaded to do so. I feel that when considering this bill—I know I am repeating a point I made earlier—it is not necessary to be too concerned about whether or not at this stage we can define the continental limits. I do not believe it is important at this stage to get too tied up in how this could create other difficulties in respect of our fisheries. I do not believe that it would. However, I feel it is important at this stage to proceed on a principle which the minister himself is on record as favouring, which other parties are on record as favouring and which I have been putting forward in the House frequently over the past four years.

I believe this is a bill which is modest in scope. I believe if we proceed as suggested we can achieve the objective without causing too much difficulty in terms of international retaliation. I agree that it does break new ground. It has certain risks in particular risk to our markets, which I do not wish to minimize; but I feel that in general it is a good idea at this stage to proceed with this legislation, send it to committee and thrash out all the details which, unfortunately, during private members' hour at the end of a week, and perhaps at the end of a parliament, may be difficult to cover. I trust and hope it will be possible for all members to agree with the proposal I have made.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, frequently when members of parliament rise in this House of Commons to speak on an issue which involves the fisheries not all members become as excited about it as I do. Perhaps this is good. Judging from the exchange we have had today and the motivation behind it, we could be taking up all the time of the House of Commons on this issue.

With regard to this bill and the remarks of the hon. member who introduced it, we are involved in an issue which is very fundamental. Although the fishery was a primary industry of what was to become Canada, for a number of years people in the House of Commons have treated the word "fish" as some kind of a dirty, four-letter word which has no relevance and no place in the House of Commons of Canada. We have begun to realize the risk we run in the involvement of other nations in this resource, and that unless urgency is given to the matter we will lose one of the most important and precious resources of the Canadian nation.

The bill introduced by my friend from the most western part of the country hits at one of the most fundamental problems faced by Canada. We stand in this House of Commons day after day, and we stand in committee day after day discussing issues which scratch the surface of such problems as this, and it always bothers me that we do not have more response in a practical way, not only in this government of 1972 but governments of the past couple of decades. I do not say this because the present government is in power.

We have never received from Canada a full response on this very vital issue. I talk to a large number of young people from all across this nation as they visit this House, and also as I travel around the various parts of Canada. They are asking us to see that government responds to the real needs of the Canadian people. I am saying, for the record, that five years from now this government, which is in a position to do something about these problems, as well as the government which succeeds it, will be held responsible by the Canadian people unless we can get a more fundamental response to the major problems of the renewable marine resources of Canada.

The hon. member who preceded me was talking about extending the area of the fishing zones to include the extremities of the continental shelf. On the west coast, Mr. Speaker, the area of the continental shelf is rather small when compared with that of the continental shelf on the east coast. On the east coast it extends as far as 400 miles, and going back to 1944, I believe it was, various countries of the world—from that year until 1958—began to negotiate the rights of the coastal states with respect to the continental shelf.

It was agreed in 1958, in international law, that the continental shelf, as it was defined in the agreement of that year, would belong to the coastal state. So we have a unique situation where Canada owns the ocean floor out to the extremities of the continental shelf, as well as the air space above the water, yet we cannot establish any permanent claim to the resource between the water level and the bottom of the ocean. The result is that we have on the east coast almost every major nation in the world with a large fishing fleet daily harvesting our marine resources.

As hon. members listen to the east coast members from day to day they will learn a little about the problems facing this country. We have the Russian fishing fleet which is the largest fisheries predator on the east coast. A few weeks ago they were present with 75 large vessels. With their very sophisticated equipment, capable of detecting the exact movement of various marine species, they inhabit a fishing area and launch what we on the east coast call gang-fishing. To do this they lie abreast of each other, drop their very sophisticated fishing gear, and in a matter of weeks they clean out a whole area, including the spawning mud and the sands on the bottom of the ocean floor, thereby destroying the resources which should be there forever. This is what is happening on the east coast of Canada today, Mr. Speaker.

There is no need to talk to biologists to see what the results of these actions will be: one can talk to any fisherman. In January and February of 1972 the landings of fish by all the Newfoundland fishermen, with all their fishing gear—this includes the offshore fishermen with their dragging operation as well as the inshore fishermen with their longliners, their $50,000 boats, and the real inshore fishermen with their small boats—was exactly 50 per cent of what it was for the same period in 1971. If that is not of major concern to the Canadian people, then I think we are in the wrong country. I say that as a Newfoundlander.

Day after day we get up in the House of Commons to raise the question of Canada exercising some of the rights it has as a coastal state. One of the rights Canada has which I should like to repeat for the record is that in 1958 at the Law of the Sea Conference at Geneva, the coastal state was given a particular right which stated that if the coastal state, after six months of negotiation with the nations fishing the resources on its continental shelf, could not arrive at a multilateral agreement on conservation and management, then that state had the right to unilaterally impose certain conservation measures.

The condition of exercising such a right was that first of all the state had to indicate there was serious depletion of various species. We know, for example, that on Georges Bank the haddock have disappeared to the extent that even the fisheries people themselves claim they do not expect the species to be replenished by natural process. This is an example of the total destruction of a species. It is a crime against our resources, yet we have the spectre of the Canadian government willing to stand by, despite all its talk about nationalism and foreign involvement in our country, and allow other nations to move in on our shores with sophisticated fishing gear and equipment and devastate our resources.

As a coastal state, Mr. Speaker, we have the right to impose certain conservation measures and we have the right to say to other nations that there are areas which shall not be fished during certain times of the year. We have the right to say there are certain species of fish which are not allowed to be touched because of the threat of depletion. We have the right to say there are certain areas in which we shall impose quotas and allow only certain catches of fish to be taken off our shores. Canada is not threatening to launch a naval war against these countries by merely exercising these rights. We are not forcing them from our coasts altogether. We are only, as a nation, saying that we are not willing to see our fisherman who settled this country back in 1497 placed in a position where their livelihood is completely destroyed.

Perhaps, more important, Canadians who understand the issue, particularly young Canadians, will not be willing to allow nations of the world, including Canada, to destroy for ever various species of fish off our shores. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) has got to his feet day after day and has indicated that all these difficulties should await the Law of the Sea Conference. In 1968, when this government first took office, the minister said that a couple of years from now we would hold a Law of the Sea Conference and we would get to the bottom of the problem. We were later told it would be 1972; then 1973. We learned today, Mr. Speaker, there is a very good chance that the Law of the Sea Conference will not be held until 1975; that Canada and the various countries concerned have not even agreed on an agenda and that Canada has not yet settled the position it will present at the Law of the Sea Conference even though a little country like Iceland has already printed in detailed form from its parliament the position they will take at the next Law of the Sea Conference.

There is another matter which ought to be realized. Even if we held the Law of the Sea Conference tomorrow morning, the matter of fisheries and renewable resources would find itself at the bottom of the totem pole because other areas of concern, such as the problems arising from jurisdiction—the rights of coastal states in these areas—matters of pollution, matters of the disposition of weaponry, and so on, in the coastal areas would find themselves in a position of top priority. We are saying to the Minister of Fisheries and to the people of Canada that this matter has to receive more attention than is now paid to it.

We are also very much aware that the matter of fisheries is not a political issue in this country. We have seven members of parliament from the province of Newfoundland, which I represent, four from Prince Edward Island, 11 from Nova Scotia and ten, I believe, from New Brunswick. We have 37 members from the Atlantic region and six or seven from the province of Quebec—perhaps more than that—and the Gaspé area. The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) might put the number on record. So we have about 40 members directly concerned with the fisheries.

We are having trouble in the House of Commons and in Canada generally in attracting national attention to a matter which vitally affects the issue of our territorial sovereignty. Unless we can get the Canadian people, particularly members of the government, to respond more readily we shall never get action this year despite the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) is aware of the problem and is concerned about it. In spite of this awareness and concern, he is still not willing to place this question in a position of priority. The Minister of the Environment is not willing to place it in a position of priority. It doesn't have political sex appeal across the Canadian nation; it is not the sort of thing which will "turn on" people in Toronto.

This is a sad story, because regardless of how relevant the issue is—and the Minister of the Environment knows well the consequences of letting this issue go unresolved—we are not going to get action because we have been unable to sell the issue as a major national problem. We cannot get the House of Commons to pay full attention to it because the issue is not one which lends itself to this type of forum. We cannot go into great detail about the type of problems we face because there are so many other issues.

The members of the press, I say with respect, perhaps do not understand the depth or the breadth of the issues and the details involved. We could get up and talk for weeks about these matters, yet we would not get a sentence in the Globe and Mail, simply because this issue doesn't have the appeal to the readership of that newspaper. The sad story is that five or ten years from now Canadians will hang their heads in shame when they realize that the original great resource upon which Canada relied at its beginning has been so depleted that it has been crossed off as an economic issue in Canada.

It is shameful that we should stay here day after day and refuse to grapple with the problem. Today we had a typical response from the minister. We have had three examples over the last year which adequately demonstrate the lack of responsiveness of the minister to the Atlantic region. Let me say for the record that, despite the fact that this problem is so critical, the Minister of Fisheries has continually made changes in fisheries policy without any consultation with the Atlantic provinces or reference to his directors and officials in federal offices in the Atlantic region.

Last year the minister was prepared to sign a treaty with the Norwegians which would have allowed them to harvest our resources of seals nine miles inside the 12-mile territorial limit. The minister indicated that this was a trade-off in order to get them out of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. A few weeks ago he introduced several treaties which had the effect of phasing out the operations of several other nations in the gulf. By as late as 1986 the French are to be out of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Here again there has been no consultation with the provinces or reference to the officials in the Atlantic region.

If the minister were in the House this afternoon he would brag that this is an achievement. The fact is that by 1986 when the French leave the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the gulf will be as dead as the Sea of Gallilee as far as fish are concerned: there will be absolutely no fish left in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Today we had an example of the sort of response we get from the minister who has publicly stated that he will eliminate the Atlantic fishery. We know that the Danes have been harvesting salmon on the high seas since 1965, when the famous incident, which has been well quoted both in this House and in recent articles in the press, occurred regarding the discovery of the feeding ground of the Atlantic salmon. Ever since that time we have brought this matter to the attention of the government almost daily, but we cannot get any proof at all that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has laid any material of a substantial nature before the Danes to convince them of our concern.

The minister says that the problem must be resolved through negotiation. We recognize that we are not going to declare war on Denmark, but has the minister on behalf of the government forcefully told the Danes that we are not satisfied with their actions and will adopt certain procedures against them if they will not toe the line? It is Denmark that is the guilty party here. That is the country that is sick, yet the minister is deciding to perform surgery on Canada to cure the illness. We all know there is something rotten in Denmark, but we do not have to amputate the salmon fishery in the Atlantic region to prove the point.

The contention of the minister is that if we cut off salmon fishing in the Atlantic region we will prove to the Danes that we are interested in conservation. Let me tell the Minister of Fisheries, through you, Mr. Speaker, that it will be a frosty Sunday in the Atlantic region when the minister gets our approval of that policy. We will not go along with any such insidious recommendation, one that is born out of an abominable ignorance of the fisheries in our region. We need the support of the Canadian people for our problems.

Several weeks ago there was an incident of intimidation off our coast. I am glad to say that the people of British Columbia did the Canadian people proud last year when they responded to intimidation by a Russian vessel that attempted to ram, or perhaps did even ram one of our vessels. The people of the area and the fisherman came together and proved that together they were a force to be reckoned with. Unfortunately, our people did not respond recently in the same way. However, we have brought to the House accounts of several incidents in the last few weeks involving Russian fishing vessels off the east coast of Canada intimidating our fishing vessels. One vessel, the Zonnemaire—I forget the name of the captain—narrowly escaped being rammed and chopped in two by one of these great Russian fishing vessels off the southeast coast of Newfoundland.

We asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) if they would be prepared to make official representations to the Soviet Union, and I do not know whether anything has been done since. The only thing done of which we do have proof is that the director of fisheries for the Newfoundland area went out in the small boat, that is considered to be a patrol boat but would not survive the Rideau canal on a breezy day, and hove alongside the Russian vessel for three days in an attempt to board the vessel to make an official protest, but the Russians would not even allow the official on board.

Then the vessel had to return and a wire was sent to the Russian vessel stating, "We protest". The director of fisheries indicated that we were protesting their aggression and the Russians wired back, "We have received your telegram," full stop. To me, Mr. Speaker, this is a disgrace. If this incident had occurred anywhere else in the world there would have been a manifestation of grave concern against the aggressor nation. In our case, the director of fisheries at the local level manifests his concern. This is why the people of the Atlantic region are absolutely fed-up.

I am sure that if the Canadian people understood the magnitude and seriousness of the problem and how critical it is to the Atlantic region, they would support any government that showed a little muscle and exercised some control over our resources. The bill presented by the hon. member from British Columbia is a good one. We would like to see something similar along these lines for the east coast of Canada presented by the government. Unless we do, as a governing group we will be held guilty over the next four or five years for the continuing destruction of this very vital resource.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson). I might say in passing, and in a kindly way, that if he should find himself introducing this bill again in another session I hope he will do something to update the explanatory notes and put them in line with the amendments made to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1970. The principle of the bill is a very simple one, as the hon. member said when introducing it, namely, that we should establish the principle that our fishing zones extend to the outer edge of the continental shelf.

I should also like to say a few words of congratulation to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) who has just given us one of his usual vigorous speeches. My observation of him is that he has added a good deal of backbone to the position of the official opposition when it comes to fishery matters since he has been in the House.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

I recall that in 1964, when the territorial seas and fishing zones bill was introduced, some of us were finding that we had a government which appeared to be nothing but a jellyfish when it came to speaking up on such matters. Unfortunately, we discovered at that time that the spokesmen for the official opposition were very much like jellyfish too. This has always been a matter of great regret to me, because I think that if those of us in this party had had the kind of vigorous support for the point of view just outlined by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate at that time, we might have been able to convince the government to go a bit further than it did in 1964.

However, I can say at once that I have a very obvious reason for indicating my support for the bill introduced by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. I placed an almost identical proposal before this House in the form of a report stage amendment to the government bill of 1970. In order to clarify its content, may I refer to Hansard for June 4, 1970, where as reported at page 7744 I moved an amendment to the bill which would have substituted for section 4 of the fishing zones act the following:

> The fishing zones of Canada comprise all waters adjacent to the coasts of Canada, the natural resources of whose subjacent submarine areas Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit, and such other areas of the sea adjacent to the coasts of Canada as may be prescribed by the governor in council pursuant to subsection (1) of section 5A.

• (1640)

The somewhat elaborate wording of my motion at that time was based on my desire that there should not be any deficiency in the form of my amendment. I used words which were parallel to those drafted for the use of the government bill on the Arctic waters pollution prevention measure which we had considered at about the same time. The response by the government to my amendment was made by the then Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer. In beginning his remarks he said, as recorded at page 7749 of Hansard for June 4, 1970:

> Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendment to the bill to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act would in effect extend the fishing zones of Canada to the outer limit of the continental margins adjacent to our coasts.

This pointed out, of course, that my proposal was identical in principle to the one that is now before us. I should like to add a few words to the statement made by the parliamentary secretary at that time. In closing his statement he said:

> —the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is premature and incompatible with the imperatives of the present situation.

Unfortunately, so far as I have been able to ascertain the position of the government on this subject has not really altered since that time. Therefore, I am perhaps a little concerned that the bill of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich may suffer the same fate as my amendment in that it will not receive the blessing of the majority of members who support the government.

I am, however, very encouraged that there is an inclination on the part of some members who sit on the same side of the House as those who occupy the treasury benches to bring forward definitive proposals such as this, from time to time, for the consideration of the House. This is a practice that should be encouraged, because it tends to put real zest and verve into the discussions in this chamber when members put forward ideas which may not necessarily receive the immediate and full blessing of the government.

In his comments earlier, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich made reference to a statement he apparently read in Western Fisheries. If I correctly understood the reference he was making, it was based on a release I made on this subject. Let me point out to the hon. member, in view of what he said about my statement, that this release was based on a very careful reading of the text of a statement made by Dr. Needler, who is head of the Canadian delegation in preparatory meetings of the forthcoming Law of the Sea Conference. I do not know whether the hon. member has read that statement, but if he has he will recognize that as far as the statement made by the official spokesman for Canada is concerned it was very clear that in so far as Canada is concerned our position is that there will be no fishing for salmon outside the territorial seas.

That was a matter of very great concern to the salmon troll fishermen on the west coast of Canada. If that was to be the Canadian position, it meant that a very substantial area, including the one to which the hon. member referred, where the Soviet Union has agreed to refrain from fishing, would be out of bounds so far as Canadian salmon fishermen are concerned. I made my comments on the basis of that statement.

Since that time, as the hon. member has quite correctly pointed out, some statements have been made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) which indicate there has been some modification or elaboration of the position stated by Dr. Needler. I will not say this is directly the result of the public position I took on the matter, but I am sure the hon. member would not quarrel with me were I to suggest that the position I tried to put forward then was one that expressed the feeling of west coast salmon fishermen. They could see a very large part of their fishing area going down the drain if Canada took the position in advance that there should be no high seas fishing for salmon bound for our coasts.

I tried to make it clear—and I think this is equally as applicable to the Atlantic as to the Pacific—that none of us in Canada wanted to see this mid-ocean or high seas fishing for salmon taking immature fish. We take the position which is stated in the hon. member's bill and motions I have moved in this House, that species of fish such as salmon which migrate into the oceans of the world to feed and grow are the property of the coastal states in which they spawn and in which the young are reared. This is a compatible position both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, and if I understood rightly what the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) was saying in respect of his concern, which I share, about the imminent prospect of depletion, if not the extinction of Atlantic salmon, this is a position with which he would agree.

There must be recognition of the need, under some circumstances, for us to harvest our fish beyond the 12-mile zone, particularly species such as salmon. This may have reference only to the west coast, Pacific troll salmon fishery, but the proposal that the waters above the continental shelf and the resources in them should be considered the property of Canada, subject to management and control of marine life and the preservation of the quality of those waters, is so apparent and necessary that I think the Canadian government is foolish in hesitating to state it as the declared position of this country.

The fact that we have, apparently without opposition, a right to the resources lying below these waters makes it an anachronism that what lies above the seabed is not equally our responsibility to conserve and harvest. There may be some circumstances, for historic or other reasons, in which we may have to agree to work out reciprocal arrangements for intermingling our fisheries with those of the United States. I think this is true certainly as between ourselves and the United States on the Pacific coast because of the way our fishing stocks intermingle along the north American continental shelf. With that sort of exception, we must recognize that unless we and other nations are prepared to accept responsibility and assume this jurisdiction, the long-term prospects for the preservation of the living resources of the sea are indeed bleak.

I think I have said all that time permits me to say during this debate. In closing I should like to emphasize that I am happy to support the bill introduced by the hon. member. I concur in his suggestion that it should receive passage and be sent to the appropriate committee for study.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to say a few words about this extremely interesting bill which the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) has introduced.

In my opinion, it might seem curious that a member from the national capital area should be interested in problems which have little to do with his own constituency. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for British Columbia who introduced this very valuable bill, the importance of which is recognized by all those who are concerned by this matter of fishing zones and by the Territorial Sea Act.

I also suggest, as the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) stated, that it may not be practical, as proposed in the bill, to establish the continental shelf as a fishing zone. If, in theory, this is feasible, it is very difficult to put this proposal into practice by establishing this sort of fishing zone.

It is also important to remember—and this is the objection which was put forward—that we must take all necessary steps in order to achieve true Canadian independence. We must also remember, however, that we are living in the international community, and that we should never make any unilateral statements nor pass any unilateral legislation on this important matter.

And this is so true, Mr. Speaker, that for many years, the government's foreign policy has always rejected unilateral statements, in order not to raise a general outcry in other countries, because as I mentioned earlier, one must have consultations especially about such an important matter as the one before us. And this is why Canada has such a good reputation in foreign countries: we have never made, during the last 25 or 30 years, any unilateral statements.

Also, when we discussed this important matter in the House, last year or in 1970, I think, at the time when we passed the bill concerning fishing zone limits, we had had consultations with about 15 countries which we were sure would give us their approval—which, incidentally, reinforced our position. In fact, those countries had told us: Go ahead and pass legislation, then we will discuss the other details relating to this important matter, for we have wanted for a long time the continental shelf to constitute the real limit of fishing zones.

The essential thing, in my opinion, is control of the resources which lie between the continental shelf and the water above it. It is far more important for us to control those resources than to adopt the principle according to which we would consider the continental shelf as the limit. This is a very important matter. In fact, it is only following consultation that Canada recently entered into agreements with France and England. Denmark has also been mentioned. I feel that at the Law of the Sea Conference in 1973, we will be able to reach conclusions which will allow us to discuss this important problem and find answers without offending the countries which come to fish in our waters.

Anybody who is a nationalist wishes Canada always to be able to make its own decisions. We wish it indeed. However, as I said, you cannot, in an international community, act unilaterally and pass legislation which normally would suit this country but which might cause prejudice to the countries which deal with Canada.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): You would do better to stick to your profession, doctor.

Mr. Isabelle: Those are the remarks I wanted to make. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has just alluded to medicine; I think he should understand. I know that he understands, as I do, that what he said may apply to problems of territorial zones, but that we cannot do as he advocates, as this would jeopardize our country's external policy.

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF THIRD REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the third report of the Clerk of Petitions.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FISHERIES

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CLOSURES IN ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I regret to announce the closure of the commercial fishery dependent on salmon runs returning to a number of the famous producing rivers in the maritime provinces. This course of action has been forced upon us by a serious decline in the number of salmon returning to the Saint John, Miramichi and Restigouche Rivers.

Mr. Bell: Shame!

Mr. Davis: Because much of the salmon fishery in the Port aux Basques area of Newfoundland is also dependent on these runs destined for mainland streams, it, too, will be closed beginning in May of this year.

While the situation will be reviewed annually, it is expected that at least one full cycle, namely six years, will elapse before the stocks in these rivers will be rebuilt to the point where large-scale commercial operations can commence once more.

The advice of existing river management committees on which the fishermen themselves serve will be sought not only in respect of the duration of these closures but also as to the manner in which the runs can best be rehabilitated.

Compensation will be paid to commercial fishermen whose earnings are affected by these river closures. Payments will be negotiated on an individual basis and the formula which will be employed will be worked out in close consultation with the fishermen themselves.

These closures will not apply to salmon returning to the streams in Newfoundland and Labrador. They do not apply, also, to salmon returning to the rivers in Nova Scotia.

Historically, the total mainland take accounted for approximately one-half of the over-all catch of Atlantic salmon by Canadians. This volume has been sharply reduced. It has fallen by more than 80 per cent since 1967. On the Miramichi, where escapements formerly were measured in the tens of thousands of large fish, they are now measured in the hundreds.

There are several reasons why our stock of large mainland salmon has become seriously depleted. They are: first, heavy fishing by foreign nations on the high seas; second, heavy fishing by our own commercial fishermen; and third, pollution in some of our own main salmon rivers themselves.

We are moving quickly to deal with pollution. There has been a significant improvement in water quality on the Miramichi, for example. But commercial fishing, especially on the high seas, is another story. In spite of agreements to the contrary, the catch by Denmark alone was four times that of all of our own mainland fishermen last year.

• (1410)

The estimated cost of this program for the current fiscal year, 1972-1973, is in the order of $2 million. Over 900 commercial fishermen are involved. This announcement is being made now in order to avoid unnecessary expenditures by our fishermen in preparing for the Atlantic salmon fishery in 1972.

Mr. Bell: It comes too late. They have already spent their money.

Mr. Davis: I have already made arrangements, Mr. Speaker, to meet with fishermen from the affected areas in Chatham, New Brunswick, on Thursday of this week.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I feel certain that all members of the House who have an interest in preserving the stocks of Atlantic salmon listened with interest to the statement just made by the Minister of Fisheries, which outlines in detail the present government's method of dealing with this problem. We also deplore the fact that this statement has only now been made in the House. The announcement has already appeared in the press and was made known on Friday night's television news. This shows complete disregard for this House, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crouse: Quite frankly, all of us who represent ridings in Atlantic Canada are keenly aware of the need for carrying out salmon conservation policies. However, we in the opposition are deeply concerned about the hamhanded, halfhearted, slipshod restrictions imposed from year to year by this government not only on our salmon fishermen but also on Canadian fishermen in general. We have seen the removal of the sick mariners' benefits, the salt subsidy and the fishing bounty, and restrictions have been placed on our haddock fishery, our seal fishery, our swordfishing industry and, now, on our salmon fishery.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Crouse: The minister has said that this drastic action is forced upon us by the serious decline in the salmon fishery and especially by the heavy fishing by foreign nations on the high seas. This raises the question, Mr. Speaker: When did information concerning Danish fishing for salmon on the high seas first become available? According to an article which appeared in the Saint John Times-Globe of June 10, 1965, Mr. Larry Guptill, then the vice-president of the Nova Scotia Salmon Anglers Association, told a meeting in Halifax that the discovery of the Atlantic salmon feeding grounds by Danish seiner fishermen off the coast of Greenland in 1964 would before long do irreparable harm to the Atlantic salmon fishery. This warning was repeated over and over again by representatives of our party from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, but no action was taken. Even in 1969, Mr. Speaker, when the delegate from Denmark with brutal frankness told the conference of nations that fish for the North Atlantic salmon, "When the salmon are gone, we'll fish for something else", our two Rip Van Winkles, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries, did nothing.

Denmark has no salmon rivers and the Danes are overkilling salmon which originate in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and other countries. This problem, therefore, is an international problem. But owing to blind greed on the part of the Danes, inadequate international law, and a disinterested, lackadaisical Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Atlantic salmon, the king of fish, is threatened with extinction.

Mr. Baldwin: There are too many sardines in the government.

Mr. Crouse: Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Fisheries taken the time to point out to the Danes that without Canadian, American, British, Irish or Scottish rivers and without the enormous cost that is being paid to protect and improve these rivers, there would be no salmon? Salmon that originate from other countries simply would not be sufficient to maintain world stocks.

The minister has told us that the principal country now, and for some time past taking Atlantic salmon on the high seas is Denmark. However, there are also considerable catches by Norway and by Sweden. Both Denmark and Norway are members of the 15-nation commission known as ICNAF, or the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries. Under ICNAF and NEAFC, the North East Atlantic Fisheries Convention, the North Atlantic fishing nations are pledged to co-operate in protecting and conserving the fish stocks of the North Atlantic. With the facts fully documenting the actual decline of the Atlantic salmon population and with Canada urging a total ban on fishing for salmon on the high seas, are we to take it that ICNAF and NEAFC are no longer operating, or that these countries sign these agreements only as windowdressing while continuing to pillage, plunder and rape our fisheries resources until nothing is left? In fact, the Danes are calling the tune but we are paying the piper.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Once again this government is engaged in one of its familiar tactics—confrontation with the Canadian fishermen. Being law-abiding citizens they will do as the law dictates, but there is little satisfaction in purchasing salmon fishing gear and in getting a ship ready for the salmon fishing season only to learn that the government has unilaterally decided to close down the salmon fishery and buy up the fisherman's equipment. This action only replaces his capital outlay. It leaves him asking the question, "Where can I go, what can I do now, how will I provide for my own and my family's needs?"

Before this drastic action was taken by the government I believe that a commission should have been established in Atlantic Canada to look into the fisheries problems of that area, with special attention being given to the problems of our salmon fishermen. I also believe that the salmon fishermen concerned should have had an opportunity to be heard and make their wants known, not as the minister stated on Thursday after this fait accompli, but before this action was taken.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member has in mind the provision of Standing Order 15(3) which specifies that a member may comment briefly. The hon. member's interpretation of the word "briefly" may be different from mine, but certainly he should keep that in mind as he brings his remarks to a close.

Mr. Crouse: I thank you for your comment, Mr. Speaker. I have almost concluded my remarks. This government was elected on the promise that it would practice participatory democracy. I think it is high time it started practicing what it preached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it was rather surprising to find the minister rising in his place today to make a statement on motions on a decision which we all understood was a fait accompli. However, I presume he decided the matter was of sufficient importance to formally announce it in the House, even though belatedly. As one who has some interest in and concern for the welfare of the fisheries of Canada, it crosses my mind immediately that this announcement may be a foretaste of similar action on the Pacific coast of Canada. I hope that is not so.

The minister has announced action that can only be described as drastic. It may be necessary. One cannot argue that. It seems to me there are two basic positions that can be taken in light of the continued exploitation of this fishery by the Danes. I expressed one of them in a conversation with an ardent conservationist in the United States when I visited there last fall. He suggested that we have no fishery for Atlantic salmon. I noted that as an American he was part of the people who destroyed their own salmon fishery and perhaps they should not take it too much amiss if Canadians decided what we should do with ours. In light of the situation that exists I told him that one of the courses Canada could follow would be to take our share while the salmon lasted. This, of course, would be a very difficult decision for us to make. However, I am inclined to say to the minister and the government that unless our action shames the Danes into taking reciprocal action, the only course left to us may be to alter this decision and take what there is left of the salmon while we can get them.

• (1420)

I am somewhat puzzled, in view of the decline in the spawning runs to streams such as the Miramichi disclosed in the minister's statement, that the minister should have made no reference to what is to happen to the sports fishery in those streams. It seems to me his statement is similar to others I have heard the minister make in connection with salmon fishing on the Pacific coast. The only restrictions he seems interested in imposing there are on commercial salmon fishermen. He seems to be of the view that sports fishermen should be allowed to run wild. I should have thought it appropriate for the minister to have referred to what will happen to those salmon which will hopefully still escape to spawn after they are in the streams themselves. To me this is as important as what will happen to them on the high seas.

I know I cannot attribute blame for this situation to this minister.

An hon. Member: Go ahead!

Mr. Barnett: I would remind the House, though, that some of us have been trying to warn those concerned for a long time that this sort of thing would happen unless effective action were taken. When the original North Atlantic Fisheries Commission was established some of us pointed out that its terms of reference were basically inadequate. From my point of view, ever since action was taken to ratify that treaty Canadian governments have been most remiss in pursuing the development of that commission to the point where it would be able to exercise effective control over the catch on the high seas. Listening to the vigorous statement made today by the spokesman for the official opposition, I wished he could have taken the same vigorous approach in 1964 when some of us were trying to prod the government into taking effective action which might have helped to forestall the situation described in the minister's statement.

Mr. Crouse: We did.

Mr. Barnett: There is not much more I need to add. I hope that consequent upon the measures taken by the Minister of Fisheries vigorous action will be taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the government as a whole to place before the forums of the world the actual facts of what is happening to the marine resources of the oceans and to indicate that Canadians simply cannot tolerate this kind of improvidence and that we are prepared to use any and every means at our disposal to ensure not only in our own interest but in the long-term interests of the human race that the despoilation of the resources of the sea does not continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say a few words on this subject. The minister's statement greatly surprised me and I suppose he had serious reasons for making such a major announcement today. I believe the fishermen affected by the decision are far from happy, even with a promise of compensation. Nevertheless, according to the minister's statement, more than 900 commercial fishermen will be involved, which means that roughly 1,500 to 200 wage earners will need retraining because six years is quite a long period and I believe the families affected by the decision will be in a rather critical situation.

I hope the reasons leading the minister to take such a serious, rigorous decisions are important. I am not sure the minister has given us the exact reasons for his decision, or at least I did not understand them. In fact, there were reports in last week's papers which greatly surprised me. Apparently there are reasons external to the situation and foreign elements have tampered with the spawning sites of salmon.

I therefore urge the minister once more to take whatever steps are necessary and to use his present experience in this region in order to prevent the same thing from happening elsewhere.

SOCIAL SECURITY

TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table, in the two official languages, copies of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the Federal Republic of Germany on social security.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the terms of the convention, on March 30 in Bonn our ambassador exchanged our instrument of ratification—

Mr. Baldwin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member rises on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: I am just wondering whether the minister is making a statement in addition to tabling the document under Standing Order 41(2).

Mr. MacInnis: We will find out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The suggestion made by one of our colleagues is that we will have to find out. I suppose it would be for hon. members and the Chair to determine whether the minister is making a statement under the appropriate Standing Order, but it might enlighten the House if the minister would now indicate whether he is making a statement.

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a statement. I must say it is a very short one indeed, just explaining the agreement in very general terms; it is a couple of paragraphs long. In view of the shortness of the statement and the fact that there is nothing controversial about it I did not distribute copies of the statement.

In accordance with the terms of the Convention, on March 30 in Bonn our ambassador exchanged our instrument of ratification with the German authorities. As a result, the agreement enters into force on May 1, 1972. Under this agreement many Canadian citizens of German origin will for the first time be able to enjoy benefits they earned under German social security schemes before they came to Canada.

The German pension programs to which the convention applies are the wage earners', salaried employees', miners', and the steelworkers' supplementary insurance. The Canadian programs to which the convention has application include the Canada Pension Plan, the old age security plan and the Quebec pension plan. Generally speaking, these plans now provide for the payment of benefits abroad.

The primary responsibility for the administration of the convention has been given to the Canada pension plan branch of my department. In Quebec, the corresponding responsibility for administration has been given to the Quebec pension plan. Advertisements and other public announcements will appear shortly.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for the statement though I regret I did not see a copy of it before it was made. My only comment is that while we welcome the agreement with the federal Republic of Germany it would certainly be helpful for many people resident in Canada if we could have a similar deal with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as one who has been pressing for this agreement for a considerable period of time I should like to say that we welcome the fact it has been entered into and that the minister has now been able to table copies of the agreement in the House.

As the minister pointed out, the purpose of this reciprocal agreement is to make it possible for pensions that were earned in Germany to be received by Canadians of German origin who have now become Canadian citizens, and for the opposite to happen if Canadians who earn pensions here move to that country. A great many former Germans who have become Canadian citizens will benefit from the provisions of this treaty, and on their behalf we welcome its coming into force.

I note that the effective date, as indicated by the minister, is May 1, 1972. Many of those who are affected by this arrangement will be sorry the date was not much farther back. Some of them have lost many years of pension rights. Of course, in negotiations there are two sides and I can only assume that the Canadians who did the negotiating got the best deal they could.

Like the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, I express the hope that this reciprocal agreement in the field of pensions, which has now been made between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, will be the forerunner of reciprocal agreements with the United Kingdom, France, the United States, Italy and perhaps a number of other countries. I congratulate the minister for having established in his department a division which deals with international social security. This is a field that could become even more important as the years go on. We welcome this announcement today and on behalf of those who will benefit from it we express appreciation that this agreement has been concluded.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR RETRAINING AND TRAINING COURSES TO ADULTS IN ABITIBI CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 51—Mr. Laprise:

During the years 1969-70 and 1970-71, what was the amount paid by the Department of Manpower and Immigration for retraining and training courses given to adults in the constituency of Abitibi?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Departmental statistics are collected according to the area served by each Canada Manpower Centre. The constituency of Abitibi covers a part of the territory of four Canada Manpower Centres: Rouyn, Val-d'Or, Roberval and Dolbeau; consequently, it is not possible to supply precise figures on the implementation of the Canada Manpower Training Program in this constituency.

The following table sets out the training expenses incurred and the allowances paid out under the Canada Manpower Training Program. These expenses were met by the federal government for the financial years 1969-70 and 1970-71 in the territories served by the four aforesaid Canada Manpower Centres. The training expenses are estimated and do not include final adjustments and provincial administration costs.

CMC	1969-70 $	1970-71 $
Rouyn
(a) training expenses	621,935	707,746
(b) allowances	430,152	665,656

OTTAWA—INSTALLATION OF VIDEOTAPE FACILITIES IN BROOKE CLAXTON BUILDING

Question No. 55—Mr. Barnett:

1. Are there facilities in a basement level floor of the Brooke Claxton Building in Ottawa which may be described as a television studio and, if so, when were these facilities installed?

2. For each of the years since the facilities were installed, what has been the annual capital cost?

3. For what purposes have these facilities been used?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Public Works as follows: 1. Yes. These facilities for 1-inch videotape recording were installed in the Summer of 1971.

2. No capital costs since installation.

3. The facilities have been used for the following purposes: departmental staff training; recording of scientific research and experiments; recording of briefing seminars and messages to departmental staff in distant locations; production of videotape programs on department's activities for cablevision broadcast use; production of videotaped programs on behalf of other departments and for Information Canada.

PUBLIC WORKS—LEASE OF SPACE IN TOWER "C"

Question No. 131—Mr. Coates:

1. Does the government lease space in Tower "C" in Ottawa and, if so (a) what is the total amount of space leased (b) from whom was it leased (c) for what period of time and at what cost per square foot was such space leased (d) what is the annual rental fee?

2. What departments are presently located in Tower "C", and how much space does each require?

3. (a) Of the space leased, how much is carpeted and how much is tiled (b) of the carpeted space, was it carpeted over the tile or was the carpet in place at the time of rental and in either instance, who was responsible for the cost of the carpet and the laying of same (c) what was the cost of (i) the carpet (ii) laying the carpet?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. (a) 486,911 square feet, i.e. 478,911 square feet office space 8,000 square feet storage space. (b) Campeau Corporation Limited. (c) 10 years. $5.77 per square foot for office space, $2.00 per square foot for storage space. (d) $2,763,316.47.

2. Ministry of Transport, 486,911 square feet.

3. (a) 443,259 square feet carpeted; 35,652 square feet tiled; 8,000 square feet concrete flooring. (b) It was carpeted over tile which was already installed before leasing. The cost of carpeting was $428,866.75. Campeau Corporation paid $348,036.20 and the Crown paid the remaining $80,830.55. (c) There is no cost available which separates the purchase price from the laying charges of the carpet.

NOVA SCOTIA—LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Question No. 141—Mr. Muir:

1. How many projects have been approved for the Province of Nova Scotia under the Local Initiatives Programme, to date?

2. What is the total value of the projects approved and the total number of jobs provided, to date?

3. Of the total number approved, what is the breakdown by federal constituency in Nova Scotia and what is the total value of the projects in each constituency?

4. Of the total number of applications received from the Province of Nova Scotia, how many have been rejected and what is the number of rejections by federal constituency in Nova Scotia?

5. How many additional applications are on hand at the present time from the Province of Nova Scotia, what is the total estimated value of these projects and what is the total number of jobs that would be provided if all were approved?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. The number of projects approved for the province of Nova Scotia under the Local Initiatives Program was 429.

2 and 3.

Constituency	Jobs	Federal Contribution $

Cape Breton-Highlands-Canso	1,557	2,483,775
Total	6,889	10,362,959

4. The number of applications rejected, withdrawn and cancelled was 574.

5. Nil.

Note: The above values are the amounts approved for the projects. It is probable that during the contractual negotiations slight variations will have occurred.

PRAIRIE GRAINS STABILIZATION LEGISLATION

Question No. 239—Mr. Southam:

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce in the House, at the earliest date possible, a more acceptable form of the Prairie Grains Stabilization legislation?

2. Before introducing any such legislation, will the government seek the advice of Western farm organizations and Western elected representatives of the people?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Further government action with regard to the Prairie Grains Stabilization Bill which will be made known to the House at the appropriate time, will be considered in the light of the government's over-all legislative program and will take cognizance of the views presented to government by western farm organizations and elected representatives.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO WORLD FOOD PROGRAM

Question No. 281—Mr. Robinson:

1. What products are purchased from Canadian producers by the Canadian Government for contribution to the World Food Program?

2. Does the government use the World Food Program to provide a subsidy to any producers of commodities or products used in the program?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Wheat (bulk and bagged), oats, barley, flour, beans, peas, skim milk powder, cheese, canned fish, evaporated milk, canned turkey, dry egg powder, dry potato flakes.

2. No.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—INCREASE IN WAGES AS RESULT OF STRIKE

Question No. 300—Mr. Robinson:

1. How much of an increase in wages (a) did the air traffic controllers want (b) were they offered?

2. What was the settlement wage to the air traffic controllers?

3. What was the difference in dollars between the amount offered and the amount accepted in the settlement?

4. How much did the average air controller (a) lose as a result of the strike (b) gain as a result of the increase received over and above the amount offered before the strike began?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1. (a) The original wage demand of the air traffic controllers was for an increase of 46 per cent on July 1, 1971 and 14.5 per cent on July 1, 1972, for a new contract extending from September 30, 1971 to September 30, 1972. (b) Treasury Board offered the recommendation of the majority report of the Conciliation Board which was as follows: 5 per cent October 1, 1971, 5 per cent July 1, 1972, 5 per cent, April 1, 1973. The union rejected it.

2. On January 22, 1972, both sides agreed to the following settlement: 6 per cent October 1, 1971, 5.5 per cent July 1, 1972, 5 per cent April 1, 1973, which the union said they would recommend to their membership. The membership rejected it. The issue was referred to binding arbitration and the arbitrator's award was the same as the January 22 settlement namely, 6 per cent October 1, 1971, 5.5 per cent July 1, 1972, 5 per cent April 1, 1973. There was, therefore, no difference in the percentage increase but the arbitrator added two additional steps to the salary scales.

3. There was no difference in dollars between the amount offered and the amount accepted in the settlement other than the two additional steps which provide for individual, not general, increases on or after October 1, 1973, for employees at the maximum of their salary scale. In 1973 an estimated 1.2 per cent will be added to payroll costs by the implementation of the new increments.

[Mr. Lang.]

4. (a) The average Controller at the AI-5 working level lost an average of eight working days during the 11-day strike. Based on the old maximum rate of AI-5 of $14,613 this amounts to $499.20 ($62.40x8). (b) Based on the maximum rate of AI-5 on October 1, 1971, July 1, 1972 and April 1, 1973, and calculated on the difference in rate on these dates between 6 per cent, 5.5 per cent, 5 per cent and 5 per cent, 5 per cent, 5 per cent respectively, the average Controller at this level gains $462.25 over the 27-month period of the agreement. Since he lost $499.20 and gained $462.25 he net loss was $36.95.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF SINGLE TELEPHONE SYSTEM FOR CANADA

Question No. 365—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of providing a single telephone system for Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): No, the government is not now thinking of considering the possibility of providing a single telephone system for Canada.

[English]

NUMBER OF TELEPHONE SYSTEMS IN CANADA

Question No. 366—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many telephone systems are there in Canada?

2. Where is each telephone system located?

3. How many subscribers are there for each telephone system?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): 1. As of December 31, 1970, there were 1,716 telephone systems in Canada.

2 and 3. Here is a list providing, by provinces and territories, the main available data on these systems, as it is explained in the notes that follow:

Location	Number of Systems	Number of Telephones
Newfoundland	2	135,251
Prince Edward Island	2	34,143
Nova Scotia	66	284,259
New Brunswick	4	225,852
Quebec	43	2,616,323
Ontario	61	3,847,480
Manitoba	2	436,063
Saskatchewan	865	366,510
Alberta	327	742,231
British Columbia	4	1,046,394
Yukon	—	6,833
Northwest Territories	—	8,672

Notes: (a) The above excludes 340 very small co-operatives and independents operating mainly in the province of Alberta. (b) The number of subscribers per system is not available, but the number of telephones per system provides a very close approximation. (c) Where a system operates in more than one province, the location of the head office determines the province in which the system is counted, but the number of telephones are included under the province in which the telephones are located. (d) The Yukon and Northwest Territories are serviced by Canadian National Telecommunications and by Bell Canada. These systems are reported by their Head Office locations, (Ontario in the case of CNT and Quebec in the case of Bell Canada).

CANADIAN BOOK CENTRES ABROAD

Question No. 374—Mr. Robinson:

Will the book centres being established in trade fairs contain only books of Canadian origin in French and English or will Canadian works be translated into other languages as well and, if so, what languages?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Under terms of the recently announced government policy on export promotion of books, it is the intention that book centres will offer for sale any book produced by a legally-constituted publisher who publishes Canadian works which are written or composed by Canadian citizens or persons with landed-immigrant status and the printing and fabrication of which are carried out in Canada.

The Canadian translation of such works shall be carried out by Canadian citizens or persons with landed-immigrant status.

Provided these criteria are met, a book in any language will be admissible. At the present time, it is not known what books are available in various languages or what books will be offered from time to time.

NUMBER OF BUSHELS OF WHEAT IN COMMERCIAL STORAGE, 1962 TO 1972

Question No. 385—Mr. Horner:

What was the total amount in bushels of wheat in commercial storage in Canada for each of the years from 1962 to 1972?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice):

Crop year	Number of Bushels in Commercial Storage in Canada at August 1 (Thousands of Bushels)
1961-62	437,391
1962-63	331,888
1963-64	422,547
1964-65	338,800
1965-66	403,924
1966-67	320,122
1967-68	371,751
1968-69	429,510
1969-70	479,628
1970-71	465,990
1971-72	337,766

INSTALLATION OF ALARM SIRENS

Question No. 412—Mr. Godin:

During the last war, did the Canadian Government install alarm sirens in various major cities and, if so (a) how many sirens were installed (b) how many are still in operation (c) what is the annual maintenance cost of these devices and who is in charge of them (d) does the government have to pay a rental fee for the places where these devices are installed?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There is no record of purchase or installation responsibility for alarm sirens during the last war. However, the Department of National Defence was responsible for the following activities: (a) Ordering the evacuation of an area in the event of actual or apprehended attack; (b) Prohibition of public assemblies if the situation indicated such action was necessary; (c) Ordering the restriction of lighting, flames, etc., or noise which may be of aid or give information to the enemy.

IMPLEMENTATION OF SMALL FARMS DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Question No. 420—Mr. Robinson:

1. What is the estimated cost to implement a small farms development program on a national basis?

2. Will such a program be carried out by the government and, if so (a) in which provinces (b) what is the proposed allotment of funds to each province?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. The estimated cost of the small farm development program to be implemented by the government is $150 million over seven years.

2. Yes. (a) All provinces; (b) Dependent upon farmer participation.

IDB CONSULTATIVE SERVICE

Question No. 421—Mr. Robinson:

Does the Industrial Development Bank provide a consultation service when no loan is given?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): In the course of considering an approach for financing and in processing a loan application, the experience and skills of the IDB staff are available to the potential borrower who often avails himself thereof. Thus, even when an application is declined the Industrial Development Bank may have been of some assistance. Not infrequently the IDB is able to suggest how a weakness in a loan proposal may be overcome.

Recently, the IDB established an advisory services directorate at its general manager's office in Montreal. It is producing a series of pamphlets entitled "Minding Your Own Business", the first of which was a bibliographic reference list for small business and the second discussed the extension of customer credit. Based on the IDB's extensive experience, succeeding pamphlets will deal with other problems encountered by the small businessman in starting up or expanding a business. Response to and demand for the new information booklets has been very encouraging. In addition, seminars on business management, conducted by the IDB, are commencing in smaller centres across Canada where such a service is not now available.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO WORLD FOOD PROGRAM

Question No. 303—Mr. Robinson:

1. How much has Canada provided to the World Food Program in each year since its inception?

2. What other countries have contributed to the World Food Program and in what amount since the program was instituted?

3. What are the names of the countries now receiving food aid and how much in dollar value is each receiving?

4. What control, if any, does Canada have over the spending of funds in the World Food Program?

5. Are contributions to the World Food Program made in accordance with (a) Gross National Product (b) population and, if not, what criteria are used to determine the amount of the contribution?

6. What is the ratio of Canada's participation to that of the United States in the World Food Program?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—POSSIBLE MODIFICATION OF UNITED STATES POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since we are not very certain how much longer this session will last, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question regarding trade with the United States. Has the government been in touch with the government of the United States or its officials to ascertain to what extent, if any, the United States government is prepared to modify its position with reference to Canada on trade matters?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this stage we are still following up on the decision which was taken when the President visited Canada a week ago. United States officials are doing this at their end and we are doing it at our end. I have discussed the problem with the two or three ministers involved.

STEPS TO ESTABLISH WITH EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET RELATIONS SIMILAR TO THOSE WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question arises from the position taken by him that the government wishes to set up the same sort of relations with the European Common Market that we now have with the United States. What steps does the government propose to take to establish these relations, whatever they are?

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, more than a year ago we made proposals to the European Economic Commission to establish consultative arrangements such as we have with the United States and Japan. They have taken this matter under consideration and have had a number of meetings about it. I am hoping to have Mr. Dahrendorf, who is the member of the commission concerned with these matters, here in Canada very soon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN INVESTMENT—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question which I hope will not lead to the same confusion. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can tell us when he proposes to announce the long overdue position of the government in respect of foreign investment? Can he now give us a firm date for this announcement and indicate what form it will take?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will come sooner and clearer than anything the opposition has said on this subject.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask this supplementary question arising from the Prime Minister's answer. May I ask whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was stating government plans when he is reported to have said on Saturday to an audience at Elliott Lake that the government policy on foreign ownership would be announced in seven weeks? Was he stating government plans on this matter when he said that?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that the minister made no mention of seven weeks.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister felt free to make some suggestion as to time, and without arguing about the seven weeks, despite the answer just given by the Prime Minister will he now inform this House when we may expect that announcement in parliament or outside, whichever the case may be?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is reiterating or repeating the question which was asked in the first instance by the Leader of the Opposition.

TRADE

MEASURES TO CORRECT REPORTED DECLINE IN MERCHANDISE TRADE SURPLUS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Come on, George. Watch your language.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as one member of the club to another, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the statement last week by Information Canada in its report to the government that "strong import demand in Canada and a relatively sluggish export growth rate have cut the merchandise trade surplus for the first quarter to $175 million from last year's $637 million", is the government planning to initiate any new trade measures in the very near future to correct this very serious situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, every time the hon. member has prefaced his questions with that type of figure and I have looked it up I have found that he was generally misinformed. This afternoon during the debate the hon. member for Calgary South will put some figures on the record which will certainly show that the misinformation of the hon. member is blatant on economic matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would simply ask the Prime Minister to refer to the issue of Statistics Canada of last Monday, April 17. He will see that what I have said is exactly what is reproduced there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: May I now ask a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. Hees: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of what I have said, will the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to get the lead out and give us a little less personality and a little more performance in order that we can have more export trade?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are obviously reaching the area of debate. I will recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough for the moment and then recognize the hon. member for York South on the next subject.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if and when the government plans to appoint or designate a full-time ambassador exclusively to the European Economic Community as other countries have done?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the appointment of such an ambassador is now under consideration.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—ACTION BY UNITED STATES RESPECTING MODIFICATION OF POSITION—POSSIBLE FURTHER CONCESSIONS BY BOTH COUNTRIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, this question also relates to something with which the Prime Minister dealt earlier. He stated that Canadian officials are discussing how to go about the agreement reached between himself and the President of the United States in regard to trade and that United States officials are doing the same thing. In view of the report on Saturday from Washington that treasury officials have not yet been informed of or asked to consider the agreement reached between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States, will the Prime Minister inform the House whether his statement earlier was merely an assumption that this is being done in Washington or whether there is any actual evidence that discussions are going on?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, it was more than an assumption. Of course, when I said "officials" I did not mention the level of officialdom to which I was referring. I do know there has been communication between the President and his highest advisers on this matter.

• (1440)

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in that case can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the discussions have proceeded to the point where meetings are being arranged between Canada and the United States at any level?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe I answered that when replying to the question of the Leader of the Opposition. I remind the hon. member and the House that there was no agreement between the President and myself that there would necessarily be meetings. The agreement was that each side would look at its package, its propositions, with a view to seeing if each side thought meetings could be held and negotiations resumed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in that case can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the discussions in Ottawa by the departments, ministers or officials have reached the point that he can tell us whether a decision has been made as to further concessions Canada might make and also whether he has any information concerning whether the discussions in Washington among United States officials have reached any point of decision on that line?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I of course have no means of knowing what point has been reached at the Washington end, and if I have no cause to believe an agreement is possible with them I have certainly no advantage in saying that the government is prepared to make any modification in its package.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADA-EUROPE—EFFECT OF CANADIAN DECISION TO EQUIP ARMED FORCES WITH SCORPION ARMOURED VEHICLES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on the question of trade which has been discussed I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the deterioration of our trade with European countries, including NATO and ECC countries, will the minister discuss with his colleague the Minister of National Defence, who is also a recycled minister of finance, the situation posed by the Canadian decision to re-equip Canadian forces with lightweight Scorpion armoured vehicles, which is causing some apprehension in Europe as an indication of our physical withdrawal from that area? Will he reassure our friends and partners in NATO that this is not the case?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure my friend the Minister of National Defence will read this little speech with the greatest interest.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION TO EXPEDITE PROCESSING OF CLAIMS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration in charge of unemployment insurance?

As many claimants have much difficulty establishing their right to benefits which are often long overdue, could the hon. minister agree to appoint a board to facilitate contacts between claimants and unemployment insurance officers in regional offices to accelerate the settlement of unemployment insurance claims?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is a very complicated question. Tomorrow morning the appropriate officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission will appear before the standing committee of the House and this will provide the hon. gentleman with an opportunity to cross-examine the officials directly.

FINANCE

PORTION OF EXCHANGE FUND HELD IN NON-NEGOTIABLE UNITED STATES SECURITIES UNDER 1968 AGREEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In light of the continued inflow of United States dollars at an increasing rate because of higher interest rates in Canada, would the minister advise whether the 1968 agreement by which the United States portion of foreign exchange funds was desensitized or immobilized in the form of non-negotiable United States securities is still applicable and, if so, what proportion of our exchange funds does this represent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, without accepting fully the preamble to the hon. gentleman's question, may I say that the agreement reached with the United States in March of 1968 as to our holdings of U.S. dollar reserves is still in force and applicable. I am advised that as of December 31, 1971, we held $2.8 billion of these special issues in United States dollars and they comprised about 51 per cent of our total reserves at that time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Without going into the figures, has there been an upward revision of that figure and has the minister been able to use this point in discussing the situation with our United States friends?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There has not been any appreciable change but I would want to assure the hon. gentleman that these holdings are redeemable and that there have been adequate safeguards attached to Canada's freedom to reduce these holdings in the event Canada's level of reserves should alter appreciably.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISPUTE WITH NABET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It involves the continuing problems of the CBC. Would the minister undertake to make a statement in the House tomorrow on the results of the mediation of the Department of Labour between the two parties which apparently is going on today?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I know that direct negotiations between the two parties took place today in Montreal in the presence of mediators.

I doubt very much, however, that I shall be in a position to make a statement on this tomorrow or even Wednesday, and I cannot make any commitment to that effect.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that anything the minister gives might be doubtful, but could he please make some type of statement in the House and thus to the country so that we will know whether this continuing problem is costing the taxpayers of Canada more money than it was estimated they would pay for the CBC, or is the CBC saving money and thus the union's back will be broken? At least let us have some demarcation of the interest of the government in this problem affecting the largest Crown corporation in Canada and involving taxpayers' dollars?

An hon. Member: And the hockey games.

Mr. Nowlan: And the hockey games.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I think that what the government has endeavoured has been to promote a settlement of this labour conflict through the action of the Department of Labour and I suggest that this is what the government should be doing.

[English]

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us whether, in the mediation that is taking place, the government is making any new offer over and above what has been previously made in an effort to settle this strike?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: First of all, the government does not make offers, Mr. Speaker; the CBC does, just as the union accepts or turns down offers on behalf of its members. All I can tell the House is that there seems to be some progress and that this time the two parties seem to be willing to compromise, which is what we have hoped for all along.

[English]

REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF LATE EVENING TELEVISION SERVICE IN NORTHERWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Secretary of State. Can the minister report whether or not there is any progress at this time concerning the longstanding request for late evening television service by the CBC network in northwestern Ontario?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the many representations made by the hon. members who represent that area, the CBC has decided to extend viewing time in northwestern Ontario, as from May 1.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE BY MINISTER TO JAMES BAY AREA INDIANS IN OPPOSING HYDROELECTRIC POWER PROJECT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he received representations from the Indians living in the James Bay area recording their opposition to the proposed power development at James Bay and has he been asked by them to help them develop their opposition to the proposal?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have met on several occasions the officials of the Quebec Indian Association who advised me that they were now having discussions with the Quebec government. I offered them my assistance, when requested, and up to now they have not asked me to intervene in the negotiations or consultations. However, whenever they ask me to intervene, I will gladly help them to draw up their position.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Would the minister look into the claims being made that the discussions being held between the Indians of the James Bay area and the government of Quebec are dealing with a whole host of other questions and not with the problems that will arise out of the James Bay development?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not have to establish Indian priorities in Quebec. I know that they discuss other problems than the James Bay development and as I have already stated, I am well acquainted with their discussions. I have met them on several occasions during the past months and if they ask me, I will readily intervene to help them.

POST OFFICE

SALE OF PRESTAMPED SCENIC POSTCARDS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Can the hon. gentleman inform the House whether the Post Office Department has decided to go into the business of printing and marketing prestamped scenic postcards and, if so, will all merchants engaged in this business have an opportunity to become a part of the process?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): That requires a long answer, Mr. Speaker. I do not know if it is the Post Office itself that will be doing the printing but we will issue some postcards that will be sold in post offices with the stamps on them. I do not know if these will be printed by the Post Office. I would like to check on that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, now that the Post Office has decided to go into this aspect of small business, will the hon. gentleman give an assurance that it will not extend these activities to sundries such as sunglasses and also to ice cream?

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURES—STEPS TO SECURE AGREEMENT WITH DENMARK TO ABSTAIN FROM HIGH SEAS CATCHES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Now that we have imposed restrictions on Canadian salmon fishermen, what immediate steps is the government taking to secure an agreement with Denmark to abstain from catching deep-sea Atlantic salmon?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have made representations continuously along the lines put forward by the hon. member in his statement earlier when he accused us of not having done so. We have made most vigorous representations and we intend to continue to do so. We are not satisfied with the United States-Denmark agreement. What we want is the exclusive right to harvest the salmon that spawn in our streams. This is the position we have taken and will continue to take. Sometimes I do not understand how the Danish government, which on so many occasions has shown an understanding of environmental problems and so on, cannot accept our position, but I hope our example will inspire it to do so.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURES—REASON FOR OMISSION OF NOVA SCOTIA, NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC RIVERS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries on the statement he delivered earlier today. Admitting that the salmon rivers of New Brunswick are the largest spawning rivers or, as the minister says, the largest salmon return rivers, will the minister say why there is an outright closure of these rivers and not the slightest restriction, except in one case, on the salmon rivers of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Quebec?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): First, Mr. Speaker, in respect of Quebec the administration of the Fisheries Act, as the hon. member knows, is delegated to that province.

Mr. Bell: That is not a bad idea.

Mr. Davis: Quebec is taking parallel action in respect to that which we have announced today. With respect to Newfoundland and Labrador, most of the rivers discharging into the North Atlantic are in better shape than the rivers in New Brunswick which are now being closed.

Mr. Bell: Does the minister realize that by this act he has accomplished what the right hon. member for Prince Albert could not do in 1958? He has wiped out every Liberal seat in New Brunswick!

Mr. Speaker: Obviously a number of supplementaries are sought on this subject. I will recognize for the moment the hon. member for Fundy-Royal.

SUGGESTED UNANIMOUS RESOLUTION OF HOUSE ON CONSERVATION OF ATLANTIC SALMON PRIOR TO MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister welcome an unanimous resolution of this House, rather like the one passed at the time of Amchitka, about conservation measures for the Atlantic salmon fishery before he goes to the meetings in Washington in May of the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries?

[Mr. Crouse.]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I certainly would welcome such a resolution and I believe the government would, too. I hope its effect would be more convincing, however.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Again there are a number of hon. members with supplementaries on this subject. Before returning to the hon. member for St. John's East, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PLANT LAY-OFFS AND SHUTDOWNS—ONTARIO STUDY ALLEGING INCENTIVE GRANTS AS CAUSE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON REASONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he aware of a study conducted by the Ontario Department of Labour concerning the causes of lay-offs and plant shutdowns in Ontario which reveals that one of the main causes has been the provision of grants to industries by the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion and by the Ontario government, made for the purpose of establishing new plants in designated regions? If he is not so aware, would he consider asking the Ontario Minister of Labour for a copy of that study so the House could be informed of its contents?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will ask for a copy, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister consider reviewing all the reports prepared by his manpower and consultative service and report to the House on the discovered reasons for lay-offs and plant shutdowns in Ontario and elsewhere?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows how much reading that would entail. No doubt it would discover and bring forth many other reasons for plant shutdowns, including low productivity in certain plants where it should be much higher.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what the minister has just said, would he at least consider providing the standing committee on this subject in the very near future with information relevant to the causes of the shutdowns?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, any information that would help the hon. member become more intelligent on this subject I would be very happy to provide.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—SUGGESTED ECONOMIC SANCTIONS AGAINST DENMARK FAILING AGREEMENT TO ABSTAIN FROM HIGH SEAS FISHING

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs following upon a previous question put to him. Is he prepared, in the course of his negotiations with and representations to the Danish government, to threaten to impose economic sanctions against that country if it fails to comply with a ban on salmon fishing on the high seas?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, these kinds of methods may be approved by the opposition but my experience is that thay do not work. All they do is create resentment and reduce our bargaining power in the world.

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURES—ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO PREVENT POACHING AND POLLUTION OF OTHER RIVERS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. In light of the regulations prohibiting commercial salmon fishing, is he now prepared to ask Treasury Board to increase the funds whereby we can have proper surveillance of the remaining salmon river in the Atlantic provinces to prevent poaching and pollution which are still a great threat to the existence of Atlantic salmon?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Yes, Mr. Speaker. These requests have been made and we do have additional funds available now for that purpose.

ATLANTIC SALMON—COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN AFFECTED BY NEW LICENSING PROCEDURES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and hopefully it will give him an opportunity to correct the record. In view of the recent licensing procedures announced by his department, can he indicate whether there will be a substantial percentage of Newfoundland fishermen put out of work this year, and whether negotiations have taken place with the province to compensate these people for the loss of their fishing gear, their boats and their livelihood?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the only Newfoundland salmon fishermen affected by today's announcement, will be those in the Port aux Basques area. Meetings have already been held with fishermen's representatives and with the Premier of Newfoundland on this subject.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the questions put by my colleague from Saint John-Lancaster and the response from the minister I think I have a legitimate point of order. Hundreds of our Newfoundland fishermen have just received notices that they will not be allowed to participate in the Atlantic salmon fishery this year as a result of the minister's new licensing program. Hundreds of these people have been put out of work. Their boats and gear are lying idle. I contend that on page 2 of his statement the minister without intent, has misled the House, as he did in his answer to the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. I ask him whether in fact a considerable number of fishermen have been put out of work by his new licensing program, aside from the effect of his statement today, and have there been any discussions to compensate these people for the loss of their gear and livelihood?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there is room for some misunderstanding here. The additional fishermen the hon. member has in mind are those who have full-time employment in other occupations. I assume by that definition they are not put out of work or do not lack an opportunity for other employment. My answer a few minutes ago was tied into my announcement today, that is, in respect of 60 drift net fishermen in the Port aux Basques area.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary then go to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and return to this subject for further supplementaries later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF UNITED STATES POSITION ON CANADIAN CLAIM RESPECTING CONTINENTAL SHELF

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps a little broader question and relates to a serious problem. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether the American government has taken a position which, if accepted in international law, would seriously jeopardize the claim of Canada over its continental shelf, especially as it pertains to the depth of water which is accepted as our continental shelf, and has the Canadian position been made clear so that we will not lose our claim over that very valuable resource?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have stated our claim very clearly and have not altered our position. Therefore I think that is the complete answer to the question.

Mr. McGrath: What about St. Pierre?

MANPOWER

TRAINING PROGRAMS—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN REGULATIONS TO INCLUDE HOUSEWIVES AND YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the high level of unemployment in the country, can the minister inform the House whether it is his intention to revise manpower training regulations to permit young people and housewives to take advantage of training and training allowances through that department?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think this would be a desirable step forward and I have asked for a study along these lines by the department. This would require a minor change in the present act, and if later in the session I were to get some indication of speedy passage I would be inclined to advance such a proposal.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister assure the House that his department will be in charge of revising these regulations rather than the office of the Prime Minister, in view of reports that Mr. Lalonde is now consulting with some of the provinces—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for St. John's West has a supplementary to the previous question.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURES—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to one asked earlier of the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the serious effect that the ban on salmon fishery will have on a large number of Canadian fishermen, would the minister consider referring the matter to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Definitely, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY CLOSURES—APPLICATION TO QUEBEC—INDEMNITY PAYMENTS TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Fisheries.

Since fishermen from Port aux Basques have overfished the Gaspé salmon for the past 10 years, would the minister say whether, in his talks with the Quebec government, it has been agreed that the same bans would apply to certain rivers in Quebec?

Concerning the Atlantic salmon, will fishermen also get some compensation?

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been discussed thoroughly with the minister and officials of the government of Quebec. Identical regulations are being invoked but, in so far as compensation is concerned, the initiative would have to come from that province.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall return to this subject in a short while, but perhaps we should recognize other members who have questions first.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

RECENT APPOINTMENT OF SCOTSMAN TO JOB IN CAPE BRETON—SUGGESTED REPLACEMENT BY CANADIAN

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the high rate of unemployment in Cape Breton and the rest of Canada, will the Prime Minister take steps to make vacant the job recently filled by a Scotsman in Cape Breton and make it available by way of application or otherwise to a Cape Bretoner or another Canadian rather than bringing in this import from Scotland when somebody in Canada could do the job?

I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: Lay it on, Don.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the attitude of the Prime Minister in not giving any attention to this question, which is detrimentally affecting Canadian citizens. As a result of a personal contact at a party in Scotland a government agency has recently brought a man into this country to fill a job, thereby displacing some qualified Canadian citizen. I think it is time we put a stop to this kind of nonsense. This man should be allowed to go back to his own country and not take a job that a Canadian could fill.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be interested to know if that applies to all new Canadians or just to Scotsmen.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wants a serious answer I suggest that he speak to his colleague on the left. I suggest also that a contact made by a minister of the Crown at a party while overseas should not result in a Scotsman getting a job in Cape Breton.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether that is the policy of his party—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kent-Essex.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—ASSISTANCE TO SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO FARMERS TO RE-ESTABLISH INDUSTRY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the reported government grant of $665,000 toward the construction of a sugar refinery in Ontario to process imported cane sugar, can the minister indicate whether the government is prepared to support to the same degree the request made by sugar beet growers in southwestern Ontario for the production of Canadian sugar?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult for the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to approve a grant before an application has been made, and no application has been made. The brief that was presented to the government asked for consideration of a long-term international policy or national sugar policy that would maintain the viability of that kind of processing. I have suggested that it has improved substantially since the shutdown in Chatham.

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR FURTHER CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES—POSSIBLE PARTICIPATION OF MINISTER IN DISCUSSIONS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the letter the minister received from the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, will he reconsider the rather rigid and unilateral approach being followed by the federal government in the small farm development plan and will he hold further consultation with the ministers of the provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the approach taken by the federal government is neither unilateral nor rigid. I am concerned that the provinces have not been willing to negotiate seriously on the division of administrative responsibility, and I think the farmers of Canada are getting tired of it.

Mr. Gleave: If and when the provinces are ready to co-operate and discuss this matter with the federal government, will the minister take part in these discussions and work out a co-operative approach?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I wrote to each of the provincial ministers more than eight weeks ago inviting them again to send representatives to enter into discussions, Only two have positively replied. I can say that the door will always be open, but in the meantime it appears that the federal government will have to go ahead and administer this program because the farmers have waited long enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SMALL FARM ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—EXTENT OF PROVISIONS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister advise the House what provisions there will be in the small farm development program other than an extension of ARDA services through the provinces and an extension of the Farm Credit Corporation services?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is so much in there that I am sure you would not permit me to answer the question now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will have to try to limit supplementaries. Only four minutes are left before the end of the question period and some colleagues around the hon. member for Huron are getting impatient.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I wonder when the minister is going to tell us about that.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, a pamphlet has already been sent to the hon. member, about 12 months ago, I think.

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in that pamphlet. I have read it many times and there is nothing in it other than what I have asked the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

ESTABLISHMENT OF CRITERIA FOR IMPORTATION OF MURRAY GREY CATTLE

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a non-controversial question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister tell the House what criteria the government will use in processing applications for the importation of Murray Grey cattle from Australia and Tasmania?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, only in the last few days have we confirmed the date when the quarantine station can be occupied, so we have been working during the last two or three days to set down the criteria. Certainly, some consideration has to be given to those people who express interest and who have done a great deal of work in Canada and in Australia to bring the program to the place where we are now ready to approve applications.

• (1510)

Mr. Moore: What proportion of imported animals will be retained either by the federal or provincial governments for experimental purposes?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, at the moment we do not have any plans for this because, of course, there are some Murray Grey cattle in Canada already with which experiments have been performed.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CHARNEY REPORT ON LOW-INCOME HOUSING—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs responsible for housing. Since segments of the Charney report indicate weaknesses in the direction of housing programs affecting low income people in Canada, would the minister table the Charney report in the near future?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is part of a much bigger report which was asked about in the House the other day and on which the editing has not been completed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Marshall: Since it has been indicated that there are 50 copies of the report, containing 90 pages, sitting in CMHC offices, would the minister reconsider his position? Could the minister also indicate when he will introduce legislation in the field of housing arising out of the priorities listed in the Speech from the Throne, since this is a very serious problem for Canadians?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of aspects having to do with housing on which we are consulting the provinces at the moment. As soon as those consultations have been completed, we will begin drafting legislation.

HEALTH

PORTABLE X-RAY MACHINES—INVESTIGATION OF POSSIBLE DANGER FROM RADIATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am sure the minister is aware of reports today from the United States to the effect that the government has been advised to discourage or prohibit the use of portable X-ray machines for tuberculosis detection in view of information that these machines are apparently emitting unsafe amounts of radiation. What steps have been taken by the minister or the department to examine the Canadian situation and ascertain whether a similar danger or hazard may exist in this country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the Radiation Emitting Devices Act we have already passed regulations to control these devices. I realize that in the United States they are imposing all-out bans in some cases. We have an expert advisory committee examining this area and looking at what is happening in the United States and elsewhere. It will be making further recommendations very shortly and, depending on what those recommendations are, we may act. We have the legislative power to act under regulations.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

NATURE OF EXTENSION OF WORK ACTIVITY PROJECTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding the announcement he made outside the House last Friday indicating that the work activity projects under the Canada Assistance Plan will be extended so that the federal government will contribute to or will share in the cost of equipment, material and supplies as well as of labour. Can the minister give us some information regarding this extension of the program? Is any set sum being set aside? How much will be allowed to each province? Will this cover provincial and municipal projects, and will it cover capital works projects?

[Mr. Basford.]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is under the Canada Assistance Plan and in that sense it is a statutory matter, as the hon. member is aware. It is an open-ended program, so that it is hard to make precise estimates. The amount of expenditure to be incurred at the federal level on a 50-50 sharing basis will depend on the number of projects submitted by provinces over the course of the months. As far as municipalities are concerned, if they want to share in work activity projects and have them covered on a 50-50 basis, they must process their applications through the provinces to us for sharing.

Mr. Douglas: Has the minister in mind any limitation as to amounts per province, or am I to understand that provincial governments may send in a number of projects either on their own behalf or from municipalities and share 50-50 in the cost of projects provided they are putting unemployed persons on welfare to work?

Mr. Munro: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. Provided the applications are processed in accordance with the criteria laid down under the Canada Assistance Plan, we would respond to each of them just as has been the case for several years now, only under somewhat less favourable sharing arrangements.

STATUS OF WOMEN

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO IMPROVE

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the great concern by the women of Canada, can the Prime Minister say what he has done for the status of women, with the one notable exception, since he came to office?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am being neither facetious nor political. I am sure the Prime Minister could answer my question with just one simple word—nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member was neither, but he was certainly out of order. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO INTRODUCE MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE INVESTMENT AND CREATE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That because the Government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry, and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its economic programs, this House lacks confidence in the ability of the Government to meet the needs and challenges of the seventies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion gives us an opportunity to look at the performance of the government and, hopefully, to provoke some constructive response and constructive action from the government. It gives us a chance to examine how the performance of the government stands up in the light of its mandate which, of course, was a wide ranging mandate given to it by the people of Canada.

The government has spoken of the concept of the just society. Speaking in terms of the economy may I say that, surely, the mandate and responsibility given by the people of Canada to this government involved at least the provision of a reasonable degree of economic opportunity for the people of this country, associated, of course, with a reasonable degree of stability. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the government was given the responsibility to manage the economy, to develop it and to continue the development of the Canadian economy for the good of all Canadians. That mandate, that responsibility, was a broad one. It certainly included the effective and informed management of our economy, together with concern for social justice in Canada which, of course, includes such matters as regional disparity which, by the agreement of all, continues unabated; and this failure is one of the most marked failures of this government.

Of course, the promise went much further. It offered visions of the just society and of a united Canada. The government hinted that it had some secret for getting the economy of the country moving in a way that no other government had ever succeeded in doing. There was to be a new dimension of greatness that the government knew how to tap, if only we could be patient and trusting. Several times since then, of course, the government has told us that we were on the verge of greatness in this country. Somehow, this greatness seems to have escaped us. In view of this falling down on responsibilities, and in view of continuing high unemployment, I think it is kinder to draw a veil over some of these visions. This government has tapped no new veins; it has certainly taken us in no new directions—at least, it has not taken us in any direction in which anyone in his senses would wish to go.

This afternoon I want to look at what the government has accomplished in terms of plain effectiveness, which is a smaller but still very important area, in terms of economic management and in terms of the minimum degree of foresight that one would expect from the government. I have touched upon some of the mandates and responsibilities that the government was given. However, there were other responsibilities, other mandates, other directions, that the government was not given. Certainly, it was not given the mandate to create and maintain, month after month, the most serious unemployment, that this country has seen over a decade.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1520)

Mr. Stanfield: Four years after this government took office following the election, we have seasonally adjusted unemployment at 6 per cent. We have 43 per cent of the massive number of unemployed under the age of 25, although they constitute about 23 per cent of the work force. That in itself would shock any government, except a government as complacent as this one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Forty per cent of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are out of work have been so for more than three months. The government did not have a mandate to create and maintain these conditions. It did not have a mandate to use one part of its responsibility, that is to control inflation, as an excuse to slow down the whole process of economic growth in Canada for a substantial period of time with savage consequences for the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: This government did not have a mandate to confront, confuse and harass Canadians in sector after sector of our economy and section after section of our country, discouraging investment and slowing down the rate of investment until, from indications for the first quarter of this year, it now seems that the impulse behind the recovery that was taking place is slowing down while unemployment remains high. Already, the more optimistic forecasts that were made about the real growth of our economy in 1972 are being modified, principally as the result of the failure of investors in this country to respond. This government certainly did not have a mandate to do this. It has done it to the detriment of the Canadian economy and the misfortune of all the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Of course, the crux of the matter is the existence of massive unemployment in this country where it ought not to exist.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): That's not true.

Mr. Stanfield: I am glad my great benefactor and colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), is here. I was about to do a little reviewing as far back as the summer of 1970.

I found it necessary to call the attention of this government to the serious extent to which unemployment had climbed at that time as a result of the slowdown adopted in 1969. After the budget in the fall of 1970, we expressed keen disappointment over the fact that the government was so complacent and was doing so little to stimulate the economy.

At the beginning of 1971, I felt it necessary to warn the government that unless it took urgent steps to get the economy moving, and we gave some details as to what steps should be taken, including substantial tax reductions, seasonally adjusted unemployment in this country would not fall below 6 per cent in the year 1971. That prediction was based simply upon the application of common sense to independent forecasts of growth in relation to forecasts of growth in the labour force made by the Economic Council of Canada. Those forecasts were greeted with ridicule by the then Minister of Finance and the government. The complacency exhibited by this government during 1971 was probably without parallel, at least in living memory.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: They said they were willing to put their jobs on the line that the situation would improve steadily, and that the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment would fall steadily throughout 1971. They saw no need to change their policies. If we were told once, we were told five times that the corner was being turned or that the corner had been turned. As it turned out, it was not a corner at all. It was simply a vicious circle on which the government had been taking the country round and round.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The prediction which I felt necessary to make is, unfortunately, still true today. Unemployment, seasonally adjusted, is still 6 per cent. The government's refusal to do anything adequate last year to fight unemployment was inexcusable. However, in light of its record, I do not suppose it could be called unexpected. For years the Economic Council of Canada had been warning the people and the government of Canada about the growth that would take place in the work force in 1965 and through the years. These predictions turned out to be true. The growth that took place in the work force in 1970-71 was in line with what had been usually taking place each year in this country since 1965.

The decision of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government to slow down the economy, and thereby create massive unemployment, was especially tragic in Canada in view of the forecast increase in the work force. The increase in the work force makes it much more difficult to catch upon the unemployment once it has been created. This makes it doubly hard for me to understand the complacency with which this government created unemployment in the first place, and then set out to stubbornly resist doing anything about it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stanfield: The government must have known in advance what was going to happen, but it took no effective measures. Therefore, could we really expect this same government to take effective measures once unemployment had risen to the massive proportions that it did? I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that would be like expecting a turtle to fly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It was much more in character for this government to whine, complain and use the labour force figures for its own political ends and that is what it tried to do. What is it doing now? What has this government been doing recently with regard to the unemployment that has persisted at such high levels? The Prime Minister keeps talking about the thousands and thousands of jobs that are available, if people would only take them. He talks vaguely in terms of a leisure society which is supposedly in the process of being created, almost as if he were admitting that massive unemployment in this country is something planned, something that is associated in some way with progressive development in this country. That is the way the Prime Minister feels. I leave that opinion to be shared only by himself. As for me, his government, it is obviously lost.

It is not only the Prime Minister who is making these aimless statements. It is the government as a whole. There is fairly good evidence of aimlessness in the increasing insistence by various ministers, including the Prime Minister, I think, that we now need year round programs of the sort suggested by LIP, seasonal programs which, at least in principle, have great merit on a seasonal basis. It is now being increasingly suggested that we are going to have these kinds of programs on a year round basis. This is certainly an admission of defeat by the government in its quest for policies to provide jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: On the basis of the information that has been made public, I think it is clear in Canada today that the sector of the economy that is weakest is the sector of investment. According to the government's own surveys, investment is expected to amount to about the same in 1972 as it was in 1971. It is clear that if there were to be a substantial increase in investment there would be a substantial increase in jobs. To me, it is also clear that the failure of the government to increase investment commitments is a reflection of the lack of confidence by the people of this country in the government of this country; it is a consequence of uncertainties, some of which the government has created and others of which it has deliberately allowed to continue. For the government to say there is a need for year round programs of an improvised type such as LIP is, I contend, an admission of defeat. Not only is it an admission of defeat by the government, it is a herald of ever-larger government expenditures—not expenditures to encourage economic growth and restore a larger measure of confidence, but expenditures brought about merely to prevent the governmental system, or, at least, the system of this government, from collapsing around its head. And, of course, this kind of expenditure to support year round programs of the kind I have mentioned inevitably means higher taxes for the already hard-pressed Canadian taxpayer to bear.

• (1530)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Even when its ministers are talking about a year round LIP program, community programs and so on, the government cannot change its bureaucratic spots. Even in this area the big brother attitude remains predominant. If the government feels there are local programs which are desirable and which cannot be adequately financed on a local basis, the sensible thing would be to meet with the provinces and with the municipal governments with a view to enabling those governments to finance such programs rather than sitting around in Ottawa like a group of big brothers deciding what is good for various local communities. Even in putting forward what the government likes to think is an imaginative, humane program, its members cannot escape from their own tradition of centralization.

The main point remains. The government seems to have virtually given up its attempt, if it ever really made one, to achieve anything like full employment. This is bad enough, but I am afraid there is worse to come. Incredible as it may seem, the government does not even learn from its own mistakes. At least this is true in the case of the Prime Minister who, a few weeks ago, refused to rule out the possibility of following again the same economic policies as he applied back in 1969, if he thought they were warranted. There could be no better example of the crying need for a new governmental approach. There is a crying need for new government leadership. Not only has the Prime Minister and his administration failed to provide positive leadership in encouraging an upward movement of the economy and the creation of jobs, but they are dragging the country deeper and deeper into a morass of uncertainty and confusion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: So far, the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) have refused to tell members of this House or the Canadian public whether or not a budget will be presented this spring. It should be a full employment budget, if one is brought down at all. I want to be frank about it. I have seen enough budgets presented by this government to know better than to expect that anything of any great value will ever come from a budget presented by them. But the government unquestionably has a responsibility to parliament, and to the people, to present in this House an accounting of its financial expectations for the year in which we are now living, the year 1972-1973, as well as an explanation of its plans for this year, if indeed it has any plans.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It should be a full employment budget, if one is brought down at all. Then again, despite repeated promises, monotonous promises, we have yet to see the government policy on foreign investment, yet the Prime Minister keeps telling us it was decided last December. Third, we still do not know where we stand with regard to trade relations with the United States, though the President has made it very clear that substantial differences exist between the two countries.

Mr. Hees: And Mr. Connally.

Mr. Stanfield: My hon. friend mentioned Mr. Connally. But Mr. Connally stayed home, undoubtedly knowing what friendship really means in Canada in view of the Prime Minister's comment on Mr. Connally a couple of weeks ago.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Connally has this government scared to death.

Mr. Trudeau: Don't heckle your leader.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister does not even know who is being heckled.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister is talking again. I thought he might have been reading. We are apparently re-opening negotiations with the United States, or at least we are thinking about it. We are told studies are being made. But from then on, a wall of secrecy comes between us and the facts. At least, it looks like a wall of secrecy from the outside. But I suppose if one were really inside the government it would look more like a swamp than a wall. There have certainly been no indications otherwise, and in the meantime the Canadian economy faces continued uncertainty in this area. This is coupled with uncertainty about the budget and uncertainty about foreign investment.

Next, there is the famous, or rather the notorious, tax reform bill which was passed by the use of closure last year. It was one of the first times a major bill has been passed before it was even ready and we are still waiting for the regulations; we are still waiting for the amendments which the then minister of finance promised would be placed before parliament. Where are those amendments? Rumour has it that there are 100 amendments being considered by the government. The lawyers and the chartered accountants made a presentation which I think involved 300 amendments to that bill. Have these, too, been put away in some pre-electoral limbo where the government would like to keep them safely out of sight while it does its magic tricks during the campaign?

Then, there is the competition bill which is vanishing and re-appearing from time to time. Where does that bill stand now? What are the changes that are going to be made? I think the Canadian people as well as Canadian business have a right to know. Is the bill somehow or other being sawn in two by the government? Are we going to hear a scream one of these days from behind the curtains, so to speak, or is the plan to bring it back some day at the convenience of the government, uncut, to dazzle some and perhaps bedevil others? We can joke about these things, Mr. Speaker, but these are sources of great uncertainty in this country.

• (1540)

I do not want the Prime Minister to think that I am bringing these things up to dissuade him from calling an election, because I think—

Mr. Hees: That would be the best thing that could ever happen to this country.

Mr. Stanfield: I accept what the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) says. I am bringing these things forward to show how little can be expected from this government in the future. It has drifted, it is drifting now, and it will continue to drift as long as it is able to cling to power. Instead of performing its duty of removing the uncertainties that exist, the government has been adding to them.

Of course, the Prime Minister has done something. He has moved some of his ministers around. He has given us a very personable Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner). But I must say that while I used to be pretty critical of the former Minister of Finance, I sometimes regret that he is not still in that portfolio. Because, after all—

Mr. Hees: He would give us some answers.

Mr. Stanfield: No, he would not necessarily give us answers, but he sometimes did admit that he didn't have the slightest idea what was happening. That kind of refreshing candour has completely disappeared. I do not want to accuse the present Minister of Finance of being intentionally devious in his replies, but I have to say to him very bluntly that it is not good enough to go around giving general assurances about full employment and whatnot, while at the same time doing absolutely nothing about it. Any time he finds two or three businessmen gathered together, he joins them to tell them that they are really very fine fellows and to assure them that the government has their best interests at heart.

It is not the personality of this minister or of that one which is really basically at issue. What is basically at issue is the existence of a government whose only consistency is lack of effectiveness and whose only direction is the way in which a ship goes without a rudder. The rudder that is missing is not only personal; we need a commitment to action in the immediate future. We need a commitment to the restoration of confidence and the elimination of uncertainty. In the longer haul we need a real commitment to the development of a long-term strategy; one, for example, which will do something effective to fight regional disparity in this country. After some four years in office, some members of the present government are finally beginning to talk about industrial strategy. They find the phrase apparently popular in some quarters. But what we need is a real commitment, a commitment involving consultation with the various sectors of the economy and with the provinces. We have not had it; indeed, we have seen no sign of it from this government.

Such a strategy must involve several things. I have mentioned regional disparity. It must also include the whole pattern of our trade relations in the future. This involves looking outwards to see that there are prospects in terms of trading and trading blocs. We want something more than the "guff"—if you will excuse me for saying so, Mr. Speaker—that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has been getting off when he speaks about institutionalizing our relations with the Common Market. When he is questioned about what this means, he says it means establishing the same kind of relations that we have with the United States. We do not need any more of that kind of confusion.

Such a strategy also involves looking inwards at ourselves, at our own potential for specialization and excellence with regard to goods and services. It involves our whole educational system as well, of course, as foreign investment policies. It includes other things too, things relating to our quality of life and the environment. We need a strategy for harmonizing the diversity of the people of this country. It has to include our plans for our north and middle north and the Canadians who want to inhabit those regions, not something that the Prime Minister throws out casually from time to time about some vision of the north. Such a strategy includes all these things, which is why I blame the government for its past and present aimlessness and say that this country can no longer wait for the government to rise out of its lethargy.

Some people say that you cannot do anything about the unemployment which exists in this country, and I am afraid that is the attitude of this government. I sometimes feel the government regards the unemployment that exists as simply something relating to statistics. The government must be completely incapable of imagining the feelings of heads of families who are out of work and of young Canadians suffering frustration. All this has to come to an end. We have to create a climate of confidence in this country. We have to establish a relationship with meaningful consultation between the federal and provincial governments and between the government and various sectors of the economy and society. That condition alone cuts out any possibility of the present government ever achieving anything worth while in this area. It has alienated too many people. This government has sown too much distrust in this country at too many levels.

There are a good many kinds of non-confidence motions, Mr. Speaker, but the one I am presenting today—and I will be just a minute, Sir—is something special. It is not merely a parliamentary motion of non-confidence. The motion that I am presenting represents non-confidence in this government for its past policies and for its future prospects. It also represents non-confidence, lack of confidence, not only on the part of members of this House but also on the part of labour, agriculture, business, all the people of this country who gain their living or are trying to gain it. It represents a lack of confidence on the part of the provinces and regions of this country. It represents a lack of confidence in this government on the part of all the people in this country.

I started today by speaking of the mandate under which this government took power. This government has not only failed to fulfil that mandate; it has broken it by its mismanagement of the economy and by its total lack of sensitivity, its total lack of purpose throughout its life since 1968. The government has broken its mandate and has broken its faith with the Canadian people and, Sir, it is high time it went.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about the needs and challenges of the seventies to which the motion refers, and to try to measure the performance of the government, and indeed of the official opposition, in the light of those considerations. The issues raised in this motion underline the differences in social philosophy and approach between my party and both the government and the official opposition. Like the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), we have no confidence in the government's ability to meet the needs and challenges of the 1970's. But I want to make it clear that neither have we the slightest confidence that the Conservatives could possibly do any better.

• (1550)

Indeed, Sir, I remind you and the Leader of the Official Opposition that when you look for a comparable period of unemployment in the post-war period you find it in the years of the Conservative government between 1958 and 1962, so there is nothing in the record to show that the people who produced that mismanagement of the economy and that unemployment then are capable now of acting differently. I look around the leader of the opposition for the wizards of that party who would change the kind of thing it did during 1958 to 1962 and I cannot find them. Despite the charming smile of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), there are no such beings.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There isn't even a Wizard of Oz.

Mr. Lewis: Precisely because the Leader of the Opposition emphasized that his motion, since it is moved at this time in this parliament, is not merely an expression of the lack of confidence in this government by members of this House but of the people of Canada, I want to say as clearly as I can that I am no more impressed by the promises of a phony incentive society than I was by the promises of a phony just society which I heard in 1968. We are all for justice and all for incentives, but I ask the same question: Justice for whom and incentives for whom?

It is clear that the Leader of the Opposition is preparing to appeal to the Canadian people for a chance to do exactly the same thing as the government has done, to start on a program of incentives for private corporations, and of that we have had enough. Every year the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, (Mr. Marchand) the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson), other ministers and heads of other departments hand out to the corporations of Canada, most of them foreign owned, literally hundreds of millions of dollars; I am certain if it were added up, more than 1,000 millions of dollars each year, with very little result in jobs or welfare.

Indeed, what we have in Canada today in my view is a corporate welfare program which has produced few jobs and even greater inequality in our society. What we have both from the government and the Conservative side is a promise of more of the same; more concessions to those corporations in the tax field and in other fields. My colleagues and I have no use for that kind of program, whether it comes from one side or the other. If I may, Mr. Speaker, let me put it to you this way. In my view, Canadians have watched the same play for over a century. We have learned that merely changing the cast of characters does not improve the play. Whether the lines are read with Liberal arrogance or Tory incompetence, it still remains a bad play for the life and the people of Canada.

I said during the debate on the Speech from the Throne that the Trudeau years have been wasted years, characterized by complacency, unconcern and cynical statements about the availability of jobs when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), should have known, if he did not, that for every available job, even if it was available for people out of work, there were 10 or 12 unemployed people looking for work. The reason I have on occasion been bitter and certainly sharp in my criticisms of the government and the Prime Minister, and I admit it, is that it seemed to me there was a complete lack of appreciation of what unemployment means in the lives of people. Tragedy of unemployment, especially for the young, is not only the loss of income, which can be compensated partly by unemployment insurance benefits, welfare payments and the like, it is the loss of status as human beings which enforced idleness produces. I have in mind enforced idleness as distinct from the leisure time about which the Prime Minister talks and cynically equates with unemployment.

Enforced idleness means loss of self-reliance and loss of self-respect. It means loss of meaning and direction in the life of the person out of work. This is the tragedy that this government has deliberately created for hundreds of thousands of Canadians or, if our calculations are correct, for about 2 million Canadians in 1970 and 1971, because about 2 million Canadians were in fact out of employment for one period or another during each of these years. Today, we find that the secondary economic indicators, which originally promised to go up and hold out some hope for a real improvement in the economy, are down, showing that we have not even begun seriously to climb out of the difficulty into which this government deliberately placed us in its futile fight against something it called inflation without, in my view, realizing what the modern society is all about.

What are the needs and challenges of the 1970's? Because time will not permit me to deal with so large a subject fully, I want to suggest to you several obvious and very basic things our Canadian people have to turn to in the years ahead. These are not in any order of priority. First, we must face the fact that the children of the post-war baby boom have reached adulthood and put additional pressures on the labour market and on social needs such as housing, urban transportation and health care.

Second, we have technological developments in our society, increasing automation and cybernation in industry and all services, which affect not only the question of jobs for our people but also the life style of Canadians. They affect the equitable and appropriate division of work and perhaps the reduction of the work day, week or year and, therefore, the need for the creative development of programs for leisure caused by automation and cybernation in present and future years.

Third, we have increasing problems in our urban society; overcrowding, pollution, traffic jams, the lack of urban transportation, the lack of adequate parks and playgrounds for our children, the lack of day care centres for mothers who wish to go on the labour market and the lack of centres for our senior citizens in which they could not only live in decency but also in which they could fulfil themselves through some useful activity in our society. We have the entire complex of oppressive, modern factors endangering life in our increasingly difficult urban centres.

Fourth, we have also the threat to Canadian rural life and rural communities by the growth of corporate farming and by policies, both private by these corporations, and public by this government. These policies are deliberately aimed at reducing our already low farm population, making farming a kind of conveyor belt operation, instead of being concerned with the lives of farming people and the life style of farming communities, which are an integral part of Canada.

• (1600)

Fifth, we have the growing difficulties and dangers of pollution of our air and water caused, I emphasize, not only by industry and not only by vehicles that we may use, but caused also by our failure as a country, a failure mainly due to the inactivity of federal governments, to build the necessary recycling and treatment plants in the communities across this country. In the result, our rivers and lakes, like the Ottawa River next door, are polluted not only by industry but by the very life of the community because we dump our garbage and refuse into the waters which surround our cities and smaller towns.

Sixth, we have the immense problem of the increasing alienation of people in our society as a result of the bigness of our society: big government, big corporations, big unions, big universities, huge cities and the overwhelming and oppressive bigness which modern technological development has produced in our society. To this I add, the failure of governments oriented toward corporations instead of toward the people seriously to look for ways and means in which the people might break through the huge bureaucracy in every walk of life in our present society.

Seventh, we have a continuing problem in holding our country together, not only through new constitutional arrangements because constitutions are not things which hold people together. They are merely a framework which may or may not help. What we need in order to hold our country and people together is an effective attack on regional disparity, an effective attack on inequality across this country and a determined and committed attack on poverty throughout Canada. It is only when we have begun to solve these economic problems that any constitutional rearrangement can serve a useful purpose in holding our country and our people together.

Finally, in the 70's we face the urgent need to end the domination of Canada's economy by foreign corporations, mainly from the United States. This domination endangers not only our economic future, takes from us not only the capacity to shape our own priorities and our own investment direction, but also endangers our political independence if the present continentalist policies of the Liberal party and the Conservative party continue to sell our Canada to the foreign corporations.

It is my belief that these needs and challenges, and many more that I do not have time to enumerate, cannot be met by old methods and old approaches. They cannot be met by the 95 large corporations in this country which finance political parties, as is the situation in respect of this government at least, and probably also of those who face them in the Conservative party. They cannot be met by failure to plan. They cannot be met by a Minister of Finance who says he is not prepared to make any forecasts about what will happen to the economy and unemployment. No one in a modern economy has a right to sit in the seat of the Minister of Finance unless he is prepared precisely to plan the economy of the country and attempt to forecast what will happen as a result of the policies he or his predecessor have introduced. This kind of need and challenge cannot be met by the ad hoc policies of LIP or by the Opportunities for Youth program. It cannot be met by an attitude of government that every time there is a problem the solution is to spend more hundreds of millions of dollars and give those hundreds of millions of dollars to the corporations which failed before and whose hope of succeeding now has no basis except the friendliness which the Liberal party has for the 95 corporations.

[Mr. Lewis.]

These needs and challenges cannot be met unless governments are prepared to plan the economy, have the courage to curb the power of the corporations in the land and have the determination to equalize the opportunities for Canadians across Canada. These needs and challenges cannot be met unless governments have the moral initiative to reform the tax system so that the tax burden on the low and middle income groups is removed or at least reduced; unless governments are ready to see that in a modern economy the fate of the country and the fate of the people, the priorities of the country and the priorities of the people and the problems of the country and the problems of the people are not left to private corporations which are answerable only to their shareholders and themselves and not to the people of Canada and the people of the world.

Therefore, I suggest that if we are to have a policy of full employment in this country, a policy to which my party has been committed from the first day, the governments, both federal and provincial, must become more heavily involved in economic planning by using their powers to direct investment and resources to meet social needs instead of the way investment is now being made. That planning must also seek to make Canada competitive in international markets so that job-creating industries may prosper and create jobs for Canadian workers.

Second, if we are to have a full employment policy, manpower and regional expansion policies must be aimed at long-term development rather than being used as a statistical band-aid to cover up the failures of economic policy by getting people temporarily off the unemployment rolls without giving them real jobs and training them for jobs which are not there. Third, we need to have policies to bring about a substantial reduction in interest rates, particularly for housing and other developments. To expect a wage or salary earner to take a mortgage at over 9 per cent interest I say, as I have said outside the House is criminal in a country as rich as this country is.

We have in this country, finally, immense unfilled needs in the urban centres of Canada which must be met if we are to start reducing the unemployment problem to manageable proportions. Therefore, one of the major components of a full employment policy is a program of low-income housing, urban renewal, municipal infrastructure, urban transportation, anti-pollution and purification plants across the country, centres for the aged in Canada, day-care centres for parents who need a place in which to leave their children while they work, more hospital beds and, even more urgently, chronic care units so that the hospital beds may be released for those who need them, and facilities to assist the disturbed and retarded children, facilities which are now shamefully inadequate for the hundreds of thousands of children who do not have an opportunity.

There should be immediate large-scale tax cuts for middle and low-income families to bring about a significant increase in demand for goods and services. In order to make up for the loss in revenue by necessary tax cuts to lower-income families, the anti-social tax concessions and depletion allowances given to petroleum and mining corporations should be abolished. They have received enough of this kind of treatment for too many years. They have reaped huge profits at the expense of the Canadian people. The time has come to think of the people of Canada instead.

• (1610)

Because the question of taxes is not mentioned in the motion of the Leader of the Opposition I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "Canadian industry," the following words:

"has failed to introduce real reform of the tax system so as to redistribute income and reduce the tax burden on low and middle income groups,"

so, the motion as amended would read:

That because the government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry, has failed to introduce real reform of the tax system so as to redistribute income and reduce the tax burden on low and middle income groups and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its economic programs, this House lacks confidence in the ability of the government to meet the needs and challenges of the seventies.

We have had four years of the complacency and failures of the government following, as I said at another time in this House, the year of the centennial of the creation of Canada as a country, following the hopes and the buoyancy of 1967. I say with broken heart rather than with any glee that the government has failed to live up to the opportunities which were created by 1967, the opportunities which the Prime Minister fooled the Canadian people into thinking the government would be capable of realizing. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the government has failed the people of Canada. I merely add that so has the Conservative party throughout its history in this country.

Mr. Speaker: Unless there are any procedural objections taken to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) it will be put to the House at this time. It is moved by Mr. Lewis, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the words "Canadian industry," the following words:

"has failed to introduce real reform of the tax system so as to redistribute income and reduce the tax burden on low and middle income groups,"

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since I represent a constituency with the lowest per capita income throughout Canada, I believe it is my duty to take part in the debate on the motion before us in order not only to criticize the government but also to give it helpful suggestions to improve the situation, especially in my area.

The motion blames the government for having failed to produce measures to create employment, failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry and caused widespread uncertainty.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine very objectively our production possibilities in Canada and let us see whether in the industrial field, it is possible under our present system, to create employment without affecting another field concerning those same industries, namely the flow of production, so as to generate new demand to renew such production and provide steady employment to the labour force.

Mr. Speaker, I should not like to quote figures because it is never interesting for listeners, but I shall refer to the words spoken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) praising the efficiency of our economic system in the production field, when he stated, during a television program in December, that our gross national product was increasing every year in an extraordinary way. He was then quoting the figures published by Statistics Canada and he was perfectly right.

Therefore, all Canadians—industrialists, farmers, businessmen, shopkeepers—manage every year in spite of unemployment, to increase that production which is obviously intended for human consumption. But such consumption is subject to the condition that consumers have the money, the purchasing power needed to buy the things produced for them.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there was a time in the history of production when one could rightfully say that production was financing consumption. In those days, the production process was not as modern as it is today, it was not mechanized, and man's muscular strength was used to a greater extent to make the things which were needed. Since then, however, man has put his brain to use and invented machines. There have been improvements in all kinds of areas.

In all sectors of economic activity, manufacturers do not hesitate to dismiss workers when they finally realize that they can obtain absolutely the same results changing something in their production process, whether it be by introducing nothing but a six-inch steel piece in the machine, provided it has been invented. Why? To increase their production, reduce their costs, and market their production on a more competitive basis. You cannot blame them for that!

Progress is here to stay and we should take the necessary steps so that our people and mankind may take advantage of it rather than being victimized by progress.

On a number of occasions, we have suggested in this House various programs to improve our faulty system of production distribution. Such arguments may be laughed at but you should read advertisements in the newspapers. For example, in the first issue of La Presse after the strike, there were 70 pages of advertisements. All kinds of products were advertised and offered to Canadians. They were told: they are all for you at reduced prices, at cut prices, etc. And many Canadian women could admire in shop windows products offered at reduced prices. But since their pocket-books did not say they could buy, they could only gaze upon those products and go back home sighing and thinking they could use all those things.

Alleged Failure to Alleviate Unemployment

Mr. Speaker, if the Canadian people could buy from a store or a company that needs to improve such or such an area of its production, this would also help the manufacturer who could, as I said earlier, get new orders and have his industry work at full capacity.

Even if all Canadian companies were dependent on social welfare or received all kinds of grants to produce more and more cheaply, the problem would not be solved. We should take the bull by the horns and organize consumption.

So, if the consumer level is inadequate, measures to finance it must necessarily be taken. I don't know when efficient and realistic action will be taken in this field.

The government is now acting, but only in a piecemeal fashion. For instance, the Local Initiatives Program, involving expenditures of $150 to $200 million is a mere drop of water in the ocean. Many municipalities have proved that they had prepared worthwile projects.

A short while ago, the hon. member who spoke before me mentioned all kinds of public works which the public has been requesting for years. He is right and I believe that carrying out public works brings about automatic distribution of buying power, making purchase of consumer goods possible, whereas public works are not consumer goods. They can be used, but not consumed. Therefore, through an increase in the volume of our public works we would be distributing more money by way of salaries, buying power, thus ensuring a greater input of orders to industries, and our economy would expand anew.

In fact, many applications submitted by municipalities or local agencies under the Local Initiatives Program have been rejected.

• (1620)

I have here a letter dated March 14, 1972, from Mr. Chevrier, the assistant in the minister's cabinet, in which he simply replied as follows:

This replies to your letter of February 25 concerning project 212-788—Corporation of the Village of Saint-Anselme. We are sorry to inform you that the project has not been accepted by our department.

As you certainly know, this program aroused great interest throughout the country, and we received over 13,000 applications.

They received 13,000 applications because there were 13,000 areas of need. All 13,000 applications were not answered. I go on quoting:

Among the great number of valid applications, we had to choose carefully, taking into account the criteria you know of—

—I surely know them—

—and the budget allocated to us.

I do not approve of this too much. If we have to submit to the will of those who control the nation's credit in order to grant permission and to execute certain projects, I do not agree. The letter goes on:

For those same reasons, a number of valid projects like yours will not receive financial assistance from our department.

Like several other members of this House, I talked on several occasions to the various ministers concerned to ask them to give the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey), who is responsible for this program, additional funds which would allow him to accept a greater number of valid projects from municipalities, such as the building of sewage systems, culverts, municipal parking lots, or community halls. All those projects are stalled through lack of funds.

Mr. Speaker, if we get a little closer to the immediate, we see that they are now considering applications under another Opportunities for Youth program, and in a communiqué that the minister has sent us, it is said that 19,000 have been received. This means that young people are prepared to stop, think and prepare projects enabling them not only to earn a few dollars during the summer holidays, in order to get back to college next fall, but to get involved with community life; they are prepared to assume responsibilities, to prove to us that we did not bring them into the world for nothing, in short, they are ready to undertake something.

But concerning these 19,000 applications, to my great surprise, I received recently a communiqué saying that about 3,000 will be accepted; so, 16,000 will remain. This number, in my view, is far too high. If 16,000 were accepted and 3,000 discarded, I would then say that at least considerable efforts have been made. But in view of the figures that we have been given and because they say that they lack money, I do not agree. I cannot believe in such reasoning because, in a way, such credits are nothing more than figures. When you look for these credits elsewhere, you only bring back figures. Then they will make us the following reproach: those well-known Social Credit party members do talk a lot about credit, they do talk often about money. Mr. Speaker, who does not talk about them?

Everyday in the private sector we can see banks welcoming customers who want short or long term credit. They borrow from a caisse populaire thus they get credit. Then, everyone talks about credit, but it is rather a debt credit. This is acceptable in the private sector because if you lend to a Canadian some of the money you earned you only lend him the product of your work.

But when it comes to Canada being compelled to kowtow to those who forge figures, who demonstrate the credit in Canada, who happen to mint the credit, the products and the work of Canadians, there I do not agree.

It is this credit indebtedness that we are opposing and we would like, at last, to see in Canada a credit system that would be of effective service to the people. This is why Major Douglas in his reform philosophy spoke of social credit since that sort of credit would benefit society.

Mr. Speaker, I have perused several reports in the last few weeks. I am going to comment on what I am conversant with and not on something I do not know. I have noted that in Quebec, the forest industry is in a sad state. Trees are chopped down as if we were the last generation, as if none would follow us, as if the world would end there and then, when it is a fact that the end is not yet in sight and that we should develop our national resources in such a way as to ensure not only their permanence but their increase.

I had then suggested that during the summer holidays young and willing people should be sent to work and make the forests grow. This would create jobs they could fill and come to like; they would live in harmony with nature and discover what our natural resources are. And instead of only sowing the seeds of discontent in their hearts, we would teach them to love their country.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see how we fail sometimes to shoulder our responsibilities and that some of our leaders behave irresponsibly, availing themselves of a difficult situation to exploit violence and train the young to bring down our institutions.

I once met a group of young people and told them that instead of bringing down everything, they should find out where the deficiency lies and the reason why they are unable to develop in a normal way.

I also gave them the following comparison: Suppose we are in a house in which the temperature is only 55 degrees, while it is 30 degrees outside; 55 degrees inside is not particularly comfortable—it makes us shiver. So we first notice that we are not comfortable because the heating is defective. Well, somebody decides to stir up all the people there, to convince them to demonstrate and break the windows. Do you think it is going to be warmer in that room afterwards? They answered: No. It is not by demonstrating or breaking windows that we can solve the problem; we have to get to the bottom of things.

So I told them this: Let us go down to the basement and have a look at the heating installation so we can find out where the defect lies, and once we have discovered whether there is power to activate the fan, to activate the pump, we may discover that the furnace is in good condition, but the oil only comes drop by drop—and the furnace can only burn whatever oil it gets. So let us check the oil pipe to find out where the defect is.

Through checking this, we end up in our neighbor's basement, and there, we inquire from him and learn that he is in the same situation. We follow up along the oil pipe which feeds the furnaces in the third and fourth houses, and find that the situation is the same everywhere.

At one point, we discover that an invisible control regulates the oil supply to all the furnaces, and that there lies the cause of the trouble.

So I told them that instead of breaking windows they should air their grievance against the invisible hand preventing oil from reaching burners which would enable furnaces to function and to satisfy everybody.

Mr. Speaker, these young people understood me very well. I wanted them to get to the core of things so as to speak against what prevents us from living a normal life, not to destroy the social structure, the society which our forefathers have succeeded in erecting but in improving the structure by adding another story which would give them room to have their place within security and freedom.

• (1630)

[English]

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to listen to some of the doom and gloom from the other side of the House, one would assume that all is lost.

Mr. Stanfield: It is, for the government.

Alleged Failure to Alleviate Unemployment

Mr. Perrault: One would assume that Canada is a depressed area in a world of abundance, prosperity and full employment. If one were to believe all these emotionally charged and highly inaccurate statements, one could only conclude that Canada, since 1968, has been one of the great disaster areas of the world of all times.

Mr. Stanfield: The hon. member's dates are wrong. He should have said, since 1963.

Mr. Perrault: Today we have heard the same old theme. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) seems to take special pleasure in picking through the entrails of every statistical report produced by the government or any other source, to see if he can discover any portents of a cataclysm to come.

Mr. Baldwin: He does not need to do that. He can smell it.

Mr. Perrault: Every effort is made to place the worst possible construction on every statistical analysis. A few minutes after beginning his speech, after having talked about gloom and disaster of the kind that would send most Canadians, if they were not true optimists, to the top of the next hill to await the end of the world, the hon. gentleman called for the restoration of the spirit of confidence in Canada. He must know, surely, from experience that, in order to create a climate of confidence in Canada, we must create the psychology of confidence, and this psychology involves all levels of government, the private sector and even opposition leaders. These irresponsible opposition attacks reflect either malicious mischief, or they reflect an abysmal ignorance of what has been happening in Canada and a lack of comprehension of the problems facing Canada.

The fact is that Canada is held in enormous respect abroad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: The Leader of the Official Opposition knows this, and Canadians know it. Happily, the people of this country have confidence in Canada, to a considerably greater degree than has the opposition. We are regarded as a nation which, despite very serious world economic conditions in the past five years or so, has weathered the storm better than almost any other country. Those who engage in a non-stop attack on the Canadian government for its failure to solve all of our economic problems should explain to the people of Canada why, just a few weeks ago, the Financial Times of London awarded Canada its economic Oscar for the world's best economic performance in 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Perrault: Yet, you know, Mr. Speaker, the opposition hawks calamity in every speech and every statement in this House.

Those critics who seem to believe that the government and the Prime Minister are fair game for any kind of irresponsible comment should be reminded that the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development rated Canada's economic growth in 1971 as one of the greatest in the world, at a time when the principal markets for Canadian products experienced a slowing in growth, if one includes Britain, West Germany, Italy, Sweden, Belgium and the Netherlands as well as Japan.

An hon. Member: There is lots of work in Japan.

Mr. Perrault: Canada, as the world's fifth largest exporting nation, depends for much of its prosperity and employment on the state of world markets. Everyone knows this; yet opposition critics talk as if the state of the world is the government's fault. This is utter nonsense. The fact is that this world of ours has been through an extremely difficult period in the past five or six years. Perhaps not since the great depression have there been so many economic challenges for the nations of the world to meet. Yet, as the Financial Times of London says:

Canada's industrial output has risen faster and prices have risen slower than in any other democratic country on the face of the earth.

Yet, the opposition tells us that it is ashamed of this kind of economic performance. It is to the credit of the Canadian people that, despite the attacks we have heard from the other side, this goal has been reached. The barrage of criticism continues. They said, "Why haven't you solved unemployment," and, "Why does inflation continue?"

I should like to say something about unemployment. The Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition spoke about a plan for more employment. However, that is a plan which he carefully concealed from the people of Nova Scotia during the years when he was prime minister of that province. The present record of job creation in this country makes his Nova Scotia statistics look abysmal in comparison. There are questions asked about unemployment and inflation which cannot be answered by the Government of Canada alone. The Government of Canada, as the Leader of the Opposition well knows, possesses no bank of levers which can be pulled in some sort of miraculous sequence and achieve, simultaneously, full employment, stable prices and unbounded industrial expansion. That can come about only through co-operation between governments at all levels and with the private sector.

We know that provincial governments, in conjunction with their municipalities, collect more money and spend more money than does the federal government. Only through co-operative efforts by governments at all levels, the private sector, trade unions, agriculture and so on, can we meet our economic goals. While we still have some distance to travel toward those goals, and other speakers will deal with the economic aspects of this resolution later, this country of ours, despite the blue ruin gang, has been doing much better than anyone thought we could. In fact, our economy has been growing at a fantastic clip. It has been growing at a rate twice as fast as that of the United States. In fact, it has been outstripping the United States ever since the present Prime Minister assumed office in 1968. In March, 8,016,000 Canadians were working. Between 97 and 98 per cent of heads of families were working. Unfortunately, some are not working. For them, this represents a real tragedy. We have to work together co-operatively in our society to provide opportunities for them. There are 336,000 more Canadians working than one year ago. This is the highest growth rate of any industrial country in the western world.

We face some unique challenges. In its fourth annual report, the Economic Council of Canada told us that in the 15 year period beginning in 1965 and ending in 1980, the Canadian labour force would grow by 50 per cent. This is an incredible growth rate, a growth rate entirely unique in the western world. The need to provide this number of jobs is the challenge and the opportunity which all of us have, whether we work in government at the local, provincial or federal level, or whether we are associated with private industry, trade unions or the agricultural community.

Let us compare the growth in our work force with that of other countries. The United States labour force is to grow by 30 per cent against our 50 per cent for Canada; the United Kingdom 4.5 per cent in the same 15 years; Sweden a zero growth rate and France, a 13.5 per cent increase by 1980. In Germany, the predicted growth rate of the labour force in this period is 5.5 per cent. In Italy, the rate is 2.5 per cent. In Canada, I repeat, it is 50 per cent. It has been said before that this is an historic, non-recurring opportunity and challenge for the people of this country, because if we can get an economy that will put these people to work, and they are mostly young people, relatively well educated, we are going to have in this country an economic base for a more just society and those greater opportunities that we all want in areas other than the economic area.

What is this rate in real terms? In real terms, the challenge is quite staggering. We will be adding three million people to the labour force in that 15 year period. In the first five year period from 1965 to 1970, one million new jobs were created in Canada. That is a remarkably good record. The three million people who will come into the Canadian labour force by 1980 will equal the absolute additions of people to the labour forces of Great Britain, West Germany and Italy combined in that period. With our population based on 22 million people, we have to find as many jobs as those three countries combined. That is a very significant challenge.

Despite these facts, the opposition thrashes about trying to convert every sign of progress into evidence of impending catastrophe. These Jeremiahs among us carefully conceal these facts from the Canadian public; in the first five years of the period about which the Economic Council advised us, over 1.2 million new jobs were created in Canada. This total of more than one million equals the new jobs created in seven European countries; Great Britain, France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Sweden and the Netherlands. There are 22 million people in Canada and 200 million in Europe, yet the critics blast ahead—we heard them again today—and suggest that somehow Canada's economic performance has been inadequate or suffers in comparison with some of the other countries of the world.

While the growth rate of Canada's labour force is six times that of western European countries and twice as fast as that of the United States, we continue to hear criticism in this House. I would like the members of the opposition to call the following statements to mind. Perhaps they would like to explain them to the Canadian people. We have heard accusations in this House that the government is responsible for the rate of inflation, despite the fact it is the lowest of 22 nations in the western world. The socialist leader who today calls for full employment in a more candid moment, when speaking to an NDP council meeting in Ottawa on September 21, 1970, said and I quote:

It is politically impossible for the NDP in its present position to say full employment and we don't care where prices go!

That is an admission by the leader of the New Democratic Party that a price has to be paid for inflation, whatever that price may be. The official opposition has expressed similar concerns. Today, they lecture us about our alleged sins of omission and commission. Yet, the official finance spokesman for that party stated before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on November 4, 1969, and I quote:

I am just as concerned as you are—I think all members of the House are—about the problem of inflation, and I think our chief concern is not so much to suggest that what you are doing is wrong, but that we fear that some of the things you may be doing are wrong, so that we miss the boat.

That is what the Conservative party told parliament and Canada in 1969. The official spokesman continued:

If the national effort results in an underkill on this score it will be far worse than the overkill; because if we have a national underkill in this fight against inflation we will have to start all over, and I think the square of zero is going to be much further back again. This is what bothers me.

Those were the words of the official spokesman for the official opposition concurring in the fight against inflation. But now, when these opposition parties discover there is some political fallout, that a price is being paid because of a failure of segments of the Canadian society to heed the request of the Prime Minister of this country for voluntary restraints, they say, "there is nobody in this economic chicken house but us chickens". They refuse to acknowledge any previous attitude at all which would have supported that fight against inflation. It is difficult to believe today that these two masters of hindsight would ever have uttered words which admitted that a price had been paid for inflation. Let the House and the Canadian people know that the government shares a real concern for inflation and the danger of pricing Canadian goods out of international markets. Despite these difficult months, Canadians have every right to feel proud of what has been done, and more remains.

What does the challenge to create more jobs mean for government? It means that in addition to normal fiscal and monetary measures designed to stimulate employment, we must adopt measures of an extraordinary kind to provide employment opportunities, especially for the thousands of people coming into the work force. The Department of Manpower and Immigration is deeply concerned about this challenge to provide more jobs. The resolution suggests current programs and services do not go far enough in meeting the needs of Canadians, particularly the working poor, displaced people and young people in search of employment. The facts do not support the allegations in the resolution.

The services of the Department of Manpower and Immigration have included extensive and well financed programs to provide labour market information and analysis, employment counselling and career guidance, job matching and placement services, adult training programs which include "in-industry" and "on-the-job" training programs, manpower adjustment services in cases of technological and industrial change and special programs for certain groups in the labour force, especially the disadvantaged.

Certain opposition spokesmen made reference to the challenge involved in finding employment for students and young people, yet opposition representatives must be aware of the fact that a summer employment program for students has been operated for some years by our Canada Manpower Centres. During the last four summers, the department initiated special efforts and programs to help students find summer jobs. Based on the experience of the past few years, it is estimated that 1,306,000 students will be seeking employment this summer; 434,000 post-secondary and 872,000 secondary. This represents an increase of 114,000 over 1970; 41,000 post secondary and 73,000 secondary.

In 1972, the Department of Manpower and Immigration will generally conduct the same activities as in 1971, with the following changes: one, the number of CM Centres for students will be increased from 119 to 137; two, an interregional, student summer employment program will be introduced whereby up to 2,000 post-secondary students will be provided with an opportunity to obtain employment during the summer months in regions or provinces other than the ones in which they reside and would normally work.

In October, 1971, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration was given responsibility for the execution of the special employment plan. This is a direct expenditure and loan program in the amount of $465 million, concentrated, to the extent possible, in the period October, 1971, to May 31, 1972. It consists of an employment loan program providing $160 million to the provinces, a $10 million loan program for exhibitions and fairs, a local initiatives program of $150 million, and an additional manpower retraining program of $65 million.

The local initiatives program was designed to provide the greatest possible good to Canadian communities while putting the largest number of people to work. It enabled municipalities, community organizations and private groups to submit labour-intensive projects for approval and funding. Of the $150 million allotted to the program, $50 million was made available to municipalities across Canada in consultation with provincial governments. The balance was available for projects submitted by community organizations and private groups. Over 5,600 projects were approved under this program, creating 90,000 jobs. So much for the prediction of the opposition that no more than 50,000 jobs would be created.

The Canadian manpower training-on-the-job program was introduced as one of the 1971-72 winter special employment programs. It was designed to stimulate employers to prepare for future economic expansion and permit persons who would otherwise be unemployed to learn on-the-job skills which will be of continuous value to them by increasing their employability or earning capacity and by preparing them to take advantage of future employment opportunities. The department has entered into approximately 12,000 contracts with employers to the value of $50 million to train some 41,000 trainees at an average cost of $1200 for an average training period of 17 weeks. Yet the leader of the socialist party stands in his place and attacks this program as one which does not train people for jobs which are available. It was a ridiculous and unworthy statement by a man who aspires to be prime minister of this country.

An hon. Member: Never.

Mr. Perrault: Since the inception of the program in 1964, 274 manpower assessment incentive agreements and 92 manpower mobility incentive agreements have been entered into. The total number of workers affected by the assessment studies total 232,298.

I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker, describing what has been done to provide jobs for Canadians at decent salaries and wages but I am afraid my words would be wasted on an opposition which seems determined to destroy every government program or to place the worst construction on them because of their quest for political advantage. Other speakers will deal with further aspects of the motion in the course of debate today. I suggest to hon. members on the other side that the Canadian people, led by the government of the right hon. Prime Minister, have more faith in their country than do they and their advisers. Most Canadians want to be on the construction crew rather than on the wrecking gang. The resolution before us, and the statement by the Leader of the Official Opposition, are unworthy of the support of the House, as is the amendment in the name of the leader of the minor opposition group, and in my view they are unworthy of any party which aspires to be the government of the country.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this government, together with the administration which held office during the Pearson years, has had nine years in which to plan and produce in the interests of all the citizens in our country. It is now clear that these Liberal years have been poor ones for the many and lucrative ones for the few, particularly for Liberals who are Liberal in name only and who are hogging the benefits of power for themselves and their 'in' clique.

Today, after four years of gross mismanagement of the economy and chaos in practically every government department, we charge and can prove that the government has failed to provide measures to create sufficient employment. We can, with even greater force, charge and prove that it knew there would be a great influx of young people on the labour market in the 'sixties—the post-war crop—and that it has utterly failed to plan and provide jobs in their interest. They have been neglected while over-emphasis was placed, and time and money were wasted on constitutional vagaries, rule changes, international intrigue, government shuffles, Information Canada and trips abroad.

Our young people have been ignored while the ceiling on interest rates was lifted and an 11 per cent tax placed on building materials to make their entry into their life work-pattern even more difficult. Mr. Speaker, if we are to solve our problems of unemployment and inflation, the present mismanagement of our economy by this government must be brought to a halt. The statement that our economy has been mismanaged is an indisputable fact which can easily be verified by glancing at a few statistics.

The rate of capital investment is down from 11 per cent last year to a projected 5 per cent this year. During the years 1968-71 the annual average seasonally-adjusted unemployment rate was 5.5 per cent per year. This stands in sharp contrast to the years 1964-67 when the rate was 4.1 per cent. And now, ominously, in March of this year it reached 6 per cent. Furthermore, since 1967 the gap between the actual and potential levels of the gross national product in constant dollars has widened considerably, reaching around 4 per cent in 1970. This represents a gap of approximately $3 billion in 1970. The rate of real economic growth last year dropped to 3.3 per cent from 5.1 per cent in 1969, in comparison to the potential growth rate of 5.5 per cent. In other words, Mr. Speaker, our levels of output and income would have been considerably greater with reasonably full use of Canada's labour force and other productive resources. Therefore, changes must be made. Perhaps the most beneficial of the possible changes would be the introduction of full employment budgeting techniques.

The Ontario budget plan for 1971-72 used the full-employment budgeting approach for the first time by any government in Canada in the design of fiscal policy. Full-employment budgeting is now being used by the United States federal government. Full-employment budgeting is particularly relevant to the current economic situation and the problem of fiscal policy co-ordination in the Canadian federal system. Budgetary deficits are commonly understood to be expansionary. However, the full-employment budget adds a new dimension to this conventional approach to fiscal policy formulation. It emphasizes the way in which revenues increase as economic activity revives and exert a "tax drag", thereby slowing down economic expansion possibly before full employment has been achieved. The intention in such budgeting procedures is to offset any slack in the economy, and counteract the government's loss of tax revenue by cutting taxes in such a way that the growth potential of the economy is restored. On balance, these changes should reduce the expansionary impact of the tax cuts and discretionary expenditure increases.

• (1700)

Thus, in comparison with federal fiscal policy in 1971-72, three features of Ontario policy stand out. First, it was based on an objective "full employment budgeting" assessment of the impact of current policy. Second, it included more emphasis on tax cuts rather than expenditure increases. We must bear in mind that the expenditure of the federal government this year is being increased by 23 per cent. In addition, those increases in expenditures that occurred were mainly direct, rather than arm's length. Third, the major policy incentives—tax credits and cuts, and winter employment expenditure programs—preceded similar federal action.

I should like now to say something about the problems of designing and implementing short-term economic stabilization policy. The task of short-term economic stabilization is demonstrably very difficult. It is, however, even more complicated in a federal state such as Canada. Nevertheless, in light of the obvious failure of federal policies to maintain high levels of employment, and in view of the absence of new federal initiatives with respect to federal-provincial fiscal policy co-ordination, it seems important to consider briefly those problems revealed. These are the problems of lags in the implementation of policy changes, the balance of policy mix between expenditure changes and tax changes, and the problem of estimating the direction and degree of fiscal impact.

Even so, the full employment budget estimates show that—on a national accounts basis—the federal fiscal impact was expansionary in 1970, though nowhere nearly sufficient completely to reverse 1969's restrictive impact. In 1971-72, the planned federal expansionary swing is more pronounced, partly because of a carry-over into the current fiscal year of unrealized 1970-71 spending intentions. Some carry-over of this year's program into next year appears inevitable, and it is thus unlikely that the full planned impact will materialize in 1971-72. However, the tax reductions in this year's program give it more flexibility than last year's and there seems to be no reason to doubt that this combined expansionary fiscal impact of 1970-71 and 1971-72 is greater than the restrictive impact of 1969.

Ontario fiscal policy for 1970-71 was, in contrast to federal policy, designed from the outset to be expansionary, albeit moderately so. It showed the same adaptability as federal policy, undergoing substantial in-year changes intended to reinforce its expansionary thrust. Ontario fiscal policy was more flexible than federal policy because in-year changes in expenditures were concentrated in direct rather than arm's length categories. Direct expenditures offer a greater degree of short-term flexibility.

In the past two years the fiscal impact of the Ontario government on the provincial economy has been almost as pronounced, in relative terms, as that of the federal government on the Canadian economy. Accordingly, the Ontario budget has become a key economic document in so far as the short-term economic stabilization of the Ontario economy is concerned. This recent evolution of an independent provincial fiscal policy in Ontario underscores the importance of federal-provincial fiscal policy co-ordination. Over the past two years the direction of thrust in federal and Ontario fiscal policies has, fortunately, been the same. However, independent pursuit of contrary policies is a possibility in the future, given existing evidence of lack of co-ordination.

This year, for example, in the absence of federal plans for dealing with winter employment problems the Ontario government went ahead with its own program. Subsequently, the federal government instituted its program which overlaps the Ontario program in certain areas. Such duplication limits the efficiency and flexibility of fiscal policy in Ontario. There is little doubt that the utilization of federal-provincial fiscal resources could be made more efficient through co-ordinated policies.

The finance committee in the other place has also supported the concept of full employment budgeting in one of its recent reports in these words:

> The Minister of Finance told us that he discerned some important practical difficulties in applying a high employment budgeting rule to the Canadian federal government and he questioned whether the concept would be particularly illuminating to the public or otherwise useful.
>
> We took careful account of the minister's views on this point. But we could not help observing also that the Ontario government, as well as the United States federal government, has seen virtue in the concept, and that both have found ways of adapting it to their needs. It seems to us that some reasonably flexible adaptation of the concept to the budgeting of the federal government in Canada would also be helpful.
> We therefore recommend that the federal government adopt the concept of high employment budgeting, at least to the extent of always estimating, in budget presentations, what the budgetary position would be at high employment and of analyzing reasons for changes in the estimated figures since the previous presentations.

The needs and challenges of the seventies require new methods of approaching and solving problems. We must not allow our economy to be hamstrung by a government that believes in exercising with dumbbells. We must seek a government that will pay full attention to the main concerns of the Canadian people, particularly in the economic and technological fields.

As I have already shown, the use of full employment budgeting techniques would greatly benefit Canada. Its use would disperse much of the confusion and uncertainty felt in the business community towards the government's economic programs. However, it will still be necessary for this government to stop harassing Canadian commerce and industry with unworkable tax changes. When will we know what amendments are proposed to the 1971 Domesday book? Surely, this uncertainty cannot be permitted to go on and on, to the detriment of investment in Canadian industry and confidence in Canada.

The sudden ad hoc introductions of the Opportunities for Youth program and the local initiatives program are evidence of the government's failure to create sufficient employment through the stimulation of the private sector of the Canadian economy and particularly Canadian industry. Canadian job-creating enterprises in the private sector must be developed, encouraged and assisted by government so that Canadian taxpayers' dollars will no longer be used on hastily conceived programs that yield little or no long-term benefits. I am thinking particularly, of course, of our experience with much of the hot and cold LIP program which is now apparently going to be entrenched and run year round by this incompetent, welfare-state government.

• (1710)

Because the government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its economic program and, indeed, has failed to introduce real reform in the tax system so as to redistribute income and reduce the tax burden on the low and middle income groups, this House lacks confidence or certainly should in the ability of the government to meet the needs and challenges of the 1970's. What we have experienced in the sixties we certainly must not put up with in the seventies.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed this debate today, if only because it has become familiar. Things familiar sometimes become enjoyable. I have heard what was said today so many times before I know the lines before they are spoken. I read recently that a California newspaper had tried to stay in business by reporting only the happy events that occurred in the world, but the newspaper went broke. Many other newspapers in the world have illustrated the fact that you cannot make a living by reporting only good news. The fellows who are competing with you are busy reporting all the bad news in the country, because they think they can make a living this way. That is the way the opposition are trying to make a living.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) goes around the country ringing his hands over and over again. He is gaining the reputation as being the man who makes people in Canada sad. We have people in Canada, such as Wayne and Shuster, who make a good living as comedians. For the first time in history, we have a man going around the country making people sad, and making a living very well by doing that.

I was interested in some of the statistics given so far during this debate, particularly those given a minute ago by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Ryan). I realize his speech was prepared by the Conservative party research staff, but I think that even they should use correct figures. The hon. member mentioned, for instance, real growth last year. As he wrung his hands he said real growth last year dropped to 3.1 per cent in Canada. Let me give you the correct figures. Real growth in Canada rose from 3.3 per cent in 1970 to 5.4 per cent last year. I suppose if one wrings his hands long enough he can turn the figures around, get them backwards, and make the picture look bad. I think it is encumbent upon spokesmen for the Conservative party in this House to use the correct figures, and it is encumbent upon the leader of the opposition party to hire a staff capable of securing the correct figures.

What about figures in respect of unemployment? These were very adequately stated by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), who talked about the real growth in employment in Canada. We have an outstanding record in Canada in job creation in that some 330,000 new jobs were developed in Canada last year. This is a much better record than that of Italy, France and West Germany combined. Our employment growth rate was twice that of the United States, and six times the rate of those European countries I mentioned. Is that a record of which to be ashamed? I am not ashamed of that record. It is the greatest record of job production in any country of the world. There is a saying in the stock markets that bad money drives out good money. I know the Leader of the Opposition will drive out good news. We have to correct these statements over and over again in Canada in order to contradict the doom and pessimism given out day after day by the Conservative party in Canada. That party is trying to destroy the confidence of Canadians in their country.

We have an outstanding record in many fields, including the field of inflation fighting in Canada. Let me refer to figures to which the doom and gloom boys fail to pay attention. The figures issued by the international monetary fund, not by us, show that last year in Canada the amount of inflation was 3.5 per cent, as compared to 9.9 per cent in Britain, 5.5 per cent in France, 5.7 per cent in Germany, 5.3 per cent in Norway, 4.2 per cent in the United States and 9.7 per cent in Japan. Canada's record is 3.5 per cent, the best in the world. Tell me any country which can do better than that.

We have the highest rate of employment in the world. The reason Canadians have trouble finding jobs is that we have more people coming into the labour force than any other country in the world. That is not a record of which we should be ashamed. We have a great and growing nation. We will have problems for a good many years to come because there are so many Canadians coming into the labour market, but we should be very grateful for this growth rate. We will not help the problem by expressing lack of confidence day after day as has been done by the Leader of the Opposition.

The hon. member for Spadina referred to the rate of capital investment as being 5 per cent this year. He read us a long treatise on economics. He mentioned the lag factor, but he needs to know more about the lag factor and the rate of capital investment. This is exactly what took place in respect of the 5 per cent figure last year. The long-term average is about 6 per cent in Canada, and the indications are that our long-term average has in fact been far above the 5 per cent figure in recent years. Canada has a very commendable record in respect of the rate of capital investment.

Let me refer to something said by the leader of the NDP. He referred to secondary indicators in Canada as being down, but he did not quote his sources. I could quote them for him because this story has appeared recently in newspaper articles all across the country. This newspaper article was wrong, so the source of the leader of the NDP was wrong, as usual.

The suggestion has been made that manufacturing shipments declined in February after advancing in January. Manufacturing shipments were down in February but this followed an unusually rapid advance in January. The trend of any statistical series fluctuates from month to month. Manufacturing shipments have been rising strongly for more than a year. Manufacturing shipments in February 1972 were nearly 12 per cent higher than in the same month in 1971. The doom and gloom boys on the other side will not pay attention to the good figures. They look under as many rocks as they can to see what they can find to show that things are not good in Canada.

A comment was made about manufacturers' inventories, suggesting that they grew in relation to shipments of newly finished goods. I suggest that is just boloney. The comment in respect of the increase of manufacturers' inventories in relation to shipments is simply not justified. The stock to shipments ratio in 1972 was 1.9, the same as in the last three months, and this ratio is lower than in any three month period during the last three years. In fact, the stock to shipments ratio is usually low by historic standards, but the doom and gloom boys will not pay any attention to these figures.

• (1720)

Then, we have another one. Figures released a few days ago by Statistics Canada showed that the index of industrial production, which increased slightly in January, has been falling since the first of the year. This statement is in error, because the truth is that the index of industrial production, which represents about one third of the total output of the Canadian economy, rose at a seasonally adjusted rate of about 4 per cent as at January, 1972, following an exceptionally rapid increase of more than 10 per cent in December, 1971. Those are the figures the people on the other side should be quoting. There is a practice in Canada that a speaker is sometimes led into a meeting by the bagpipes. Sometimes he is led in to the tune of a spritely march. I am told now that when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is led in by the bagpipes, the piper plays a lament.

I wish to say something about the claim made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party that this government deliberately created unemployment. That has been said over and over again by the gloom boys on the other side.

Mr. Orlikow: The Prime Minister said it.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan-Boundary): The suggestion has been made that unemployment is something to trade off for cost of living increases.

Mr. Orlikow: That is what you said. That is what the government said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I believe the member should be allowed to complete his remarks without being disturbed. The hon. member knows the rules and is known as a real gentleman, so I believe he should give the hon. member an opportunity to continue his speech.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan-Boundary): It is a well known fact that increases in inflation are a greater cause of unemployment than anything else the government could allow. One is not traded for the other. You have one with the other. The fact that this government has made a record fight against inflation is the reason we have been able to control unemployment the way it has been controlled. If we had not been able to control inflation, in view of the employment problem in Canada and in view of the increasing number of people available for work, the problem would have been much more serious. The text of the motion we have before us indicates that the government has caused widespread uncertainty as a result of its economic programs. It is not the government that is causing widespread uncertainty in Canada but rather the opposition, and the Leader of the Opposition, who goes about Canada spreading gloom and doom.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), and the other member also, spoke of the Conservative gloom and doom, I thought I should let them know I have seen gloom and doom in my riding. I wish the Liberal workers in my riding in the last election had been here to hear these gentlemen opposite who have spoken, because quite a number of them today are on welfare as a result of the policies of this Liberal government. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour spoke about what will happen 15 years from now. This statement is similar to one made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Toronto a few weeks ago when he referred to what would happen a decade from now in the north. It is a well known fact that his speech was a re-hash of the speech he heard from a former Conservative Prime Minister concerning visions of the north. Instead of mentioning what will happen in the next decade, members opposite should be telling us what will happen now. I think they should take a lesson from the slogan of Manpower—do it now, and not 10 or 15 years from now.

In 1965, unemployment was as low as 3.6 per cent. In 1968 when this government came to power, unemployment ran between 4 and 5 per cent and hence to 8.1 per cent in February of 1971. There were 675,000 Canadians out of work and about 100,000 undergoing manpower training, which actually meant 775,000 were out of work. This government diddled with they called a seasonally adjusted formula to make the figures look lower than they actually were. This high unemployment was deliberately caused by a government policy to curb inflation. The Liberals called it an all-out war on inflation. This war caused many to go on welfare. The people of Canada demanded wage and price controls. This is substantiated by various questionnaires sent out by members of parliament, including myself. The government chose to cause unemployment as a cure for inflation, and at the same time caused more inflation by allowing bank interest rates to go up to 11 and 12 per cent. While the Liberal government ran on a ticket of Canadian unity, the just society, and a prosperous economy, it has done more to divide and to segregate than any other government, through a planned deliberate policy to create unemployment, the root of all evil.

This government has given fuel to such activists as Mel Watkins and Jim Laxer and their communist manifesto, and to those who agree on Quebec separating as long as Quebec would become a socialistic state. It has also provided fuel for Pierre Bourgeault, Chartrand, Laberge and Rene Levesque, who have now reinforced their manifesto for separation. In the 1960's Jean Lesage's "Maitre chez Nous" slogan created a situation in which the Bourgeaults, the Chartrands, Laberges and the Levesques, who are determined to make a separate state of Quebec, perpetuated slogans such as: anti-federalism, anti-the Queen, anti-Americanism, anti-establishment, anti-free enterprise, anti-Viet Nam, anti-management, anti-Anglais and so on. And now we have the Levesque manifesto, a formula to separate the province of Quebec and make it a socialistic, sovereign state. Men like Levesque, Bourgeault, Laberge, Chartrand, Laxer and Watkins scare the hell out of the industrialists who want to expand their industries in Canada and scare the hell out of those who want to create new ones, whether they are foreign owned, American or even Canadian, and add to the causes of unemployment.

Alleged Failure to Alleviate Unemployment

In the past four years, instead of going in the direction of unity the Liberals and NDP have created a situation in which Canadian nationalism has become anti-American and anti-foreign investment. This is now part and parcel of a Canadian form of patriotism, a form of Canadian maître chez nous. They felt that a strong sense of federal nationalism would lessen the centrifugal tendencies in the country and would tear down provincialism. Such negation is a somewhat weak basis for national sentiment to focus upon and Canadians have become concerned about the varying shades of nationalism which have been advanced over the past few years. John Deutsch, former chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, feels that there is no country where the blind furies of nationalism could be more dangerous than Canada in the 1970s. He contends that exploitation of this sentiment could destroy Canada. The Liberal party is just doing that, and this is one of the main reasons why I could not follow them.

The government has no information as to how many Canadians own property in the U.S.A., no information as to how many own businesses in the U.S.A., and no information as to how many own stock in the U.S.A. and its worth. The government has no decisive evidence about the costs and benefits of foreign investment in the Canadian economy. The story is told of a Canadian computer company that was unable to find risk capital in Canada. It is now 70 per cent owned in the U.S.A. Would it have been better for Canada if that firm had been allowed to fail—better dead than American? Whatever the origin of capital, such a firm provides employment and income for Canadians the same as all other businesses.

President Nixon, in his statement to the House on April 14, gave an assurance that he will not stand in the way when Canada charts its on own economic course. The point is, what economic course are we taking? In what direction are we going? No policy has been announced by the government. If it is to be a policy of anti-American ownership and investment, the President will be happy because he will have an opportunity to retain that capital in the U.S.A. and expand industry and employment in his own country while we look for capital—where?

Canadians are not oriented to investing directly in corporate stock, nor has the CDC any intention of so orienting them. I point out that I asked the former minister of finance that this be done by the CDC in order to orient Canadians to invest in Canadian industry from childhood through adult life. Is the government going to continue to create an atmosphere of anti-American, anti-foreign investment and at the same time bribe industry to establish in designated areas and bribe youth to do their own thing because the government has failed to restore confidence in the country, has failed to expand our economy and create jobs and has deliberately created this mess?

I will definitely vote for the motion of no-confidence proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) which reads as follows:

> That because the government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry, and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its economic programs, this House lacks confidence in the ability of the government to meet the needs and challenges of the seventies.

[Mr. Rock.]

In 1968, Mr. Speaker, as a Liberal I campaigned for a working majority in parliament. In the next election, as a Conservative I will campaign for a majority working.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the latest public opinion poll taken by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion shows that 41 per cent of the people polled believe that unemployment is Canada's most serious problem. Just a few years ago, in 1966, when the same question was asked only 7 per cent of the Canadian people thought unemployment was the most serious problem.

I listened to the two parliamentary secretaries who have spoken on behalf of the government and heard them say that there is really no problem about unemployment, that the Canadian people really are not upset about unemployment, that things are really going well in this country and that the only trouble is that members of the opposition parties are using spurious arguments to excite the Canadian people about the dangers of unemployment. I say to the parliamentary secretaries that they give a great deal more credit than can be given to any group when they suggest that members of the opposition parties have been whipping up the present feeling about unemployment. That feeling is not based on the speeches of members of the opposition; it is based on the cold hard realities of what is taking place.

It will do little good for parliamentary secretaries, or for the minister who is going to speak tonight on behalf of the government, to tell us about how good they think things are, that many more people are working in Canada than ever before and all the rest of the goodies. For the more than 600,000 who are unemployed it is cold comfort to be told that somebody else never had it better than it is at present.

What are the facts? It is the facts we should be examining, not the fables we get from the government side. Last month there were 642,000 people out of work, an increase of 15,000 over February. The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment stood at exactly 6 per cent. Mr. Speaker, in the last 22 or 23 months, in only one month has the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment been less than 6 per cent. I want to put on record again that the average number of people unemployed in every month during the four years in which the Trudeau government has been in office is exactly twice as many as in all the months in the four years in which the Pearson government was in office. That is the record of the Trudeau government.

If you look at it region by region, the situation is even more grim. In the Atlantic region, the actual rate of unemployment in March stood at 12.1 per cent, up from 11.1 per cent in February and 10.9 per cent in March of last year. In British Columbia, one of our wealthiest provinces, the actual unemployment rate jumped from 7.6 per cent in February to 8.6 per cent in March. I do not know why the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) is so happy about things when the situation in British Columbia shows such a large number of unemployed.

Mr. Perrault: Find out where they come from.

Mr. Orlikow: Find out where the people came from? Mr. Speaker, that comment by the parliamentary secretary is typical of his lack of concern for people. He says, find out where the people who are unemployed in British Columbia came from. Let us assume that they all came from other provinces. What difference does that make to their plight? The fact is that they are living in wealthy British Columbia, that they are unemployed, that they are existing on unemployment insurance or on welfare. Does that make it easier for them? Does it make it better for them?

Mr. Perrault: I never said anything like that. Stick to the facts and don't distort the record.

• (1740)

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, the figures which I have quoted were produced by Statistics Canada. The parliamentary secretary interjects that I should stick to the facts. In so doing he is casting a slur on Statistics Canada, not on me. I think he should be careful how he talks about the public service of this country.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege. I have at no time adopted a callous attitude with respect to unemployed people in this country. This is the type of tactic typical of that party on the other side which is always posing as being so self-righteous about the plight of the unemployed.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I hope you noted that that was not a point of personal privilege at all, and I hope you will not deduct from my time the time taken up by the intemperate remarks of the parliamentary secretary.

As I pointed out, the fact is, according to Statistics Canada, that in March 8.6 per cent of the labour force in British Columbia was out of work. Let us look at this in terms of groups of people. Young people are in an even more serious situation than the general population. In the under 24 age group, 12.6 per cent were out of work in March compared with 12.4 per cent in February of this year. That is why people are concerned.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) said that members of the opposition have consistently pointed out that to a large extent the level of unemployment is a result of deliberate policy promoted and fostered by this government. Let us look at the record again, not the fable spun by the parliamentary secretary. I should like him to look at the report of the press conference held by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in 1969 when he announced that the government's number one objective was to halt inflation.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that this country has had the lowest increase in the cost of living of any industrialized country. That is true, and we have never questioned that this would be the result of the government's policy. But we predicted then, and events have proven us correct, that the inevitable result of the government's policy would be a sharp increase in the number of unemployed. While we have the lowest increase in the cost of living, we also have the highest rate of unemployment of any industrialized country. In December, 1969, when asked by the press how serious he was about dealing with inflation, the Prime Minister said, "Just watch us. We will follow these policies to curb inflation even if they result in an unemployment rate of 6 per cent."

Well, Mr. Speaker, he was right on target. For almost two years we have had an unemployment rate of more than 6 per cent. Is it any wonder that members of the opposition, the public, the academic economists and those who work with people on welfare say that this government is callous, that it is indifferent and that it does not care about people who are unemployed? That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, and it is no use members of the government trying to hide the fact that their policies have accelerated our rate of unemployment, which is now the highest of any western industrialized country.

Members of the government tell us that we are wrong when we speak of economic indicators pointing to the fact that things are not going to get better. Today we get the same answer that we have been getting for the last two years. We heard it from the former minister of finance for almost two years, and we heard it from the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) just last month. It is, "Things are going to get better in the next two months, when the rate of unemployment will go down". When we raise these problems, the two parliamentary secretaries who have spoken accuse us of doing it for political advantage.

Today's Toronto Star, which is not a Conservative nor an NDP newspaper—

Mr. Walker: It is not a Liberal newspaper.

Mr. Orlikow: Well, today is not the time to talk about the $5 million gift that the Toronto Star got from the government of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member meant that to be spelled with a small "l".

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says that the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker) meant it is not a liberal paper with a small "l", which means that it is a Liberal paper with a large "L". It is a small "l" liberal paper between elections, and at election time it becomes a Liberal paper with a large "L", supporting the government. Today's Toronto Star contains a column by one of the best economic writers in Canada, Dian Cohen, who analyses the state of the economy in Canada. Let me put on the record some of the economic indicators she mentions:

Item: Shipments of goods from manufacturers to retailers declined in February after advancing in January. Newly finished goods stacked on manufacturers' shelves grew in relation to what they shipped. Both these facts indicate that retailers aren't buying merchandise to the extent it was hoped they would in order to give the economy the boost it needs.

Item: The index of industrial production, which measures a wider area of economic activity than manufacturers' shipments, showed no growth in February, and only insignificant growth in January.

Item: The lastest job vacancy survey reports that at the end of 1971 there were about 35,000 jobs waiting to be filled, an insignificant change from the previous three months. People looking for work during that time averaged 575,000, that means that for every 16 people available to work, there was one job open.

Alleged Failure to Alleviate Unemployment

Mr. Speaker, let me digress from Mrs. Cohen's article for a moment in order to remind members of the House that the figures collected by Statistics Canada and the Department of Manpower and Immigration make a mockery of the statement which the Prime Minister has made a number of times, that people who want work can get work. These figures show that there are 16 people unemployed for every job that is open. The article continues:

item: A special study produced by Statistics Canada says that discouraging moonlighters, shortening the work week, or penalizing overtime work in an effort to open up new jobs for the unemployed, would have only a minimal effect on reducing unemployment.

All of these items taken together add up to a lot of bad news for our economy. The economic "expansion" of 1971 which the Ottawa establishment touted so highly as foreshadowing a boom in 1972 shows signs of pooping out in the first quarter of this year. A few of us have higher incomes, all of us have higher prices, but none of us has any growth of real output to show for it.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Orlikow: Certainly.

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. member be good enough to inform the House what other newspapers in Canada carry Mrs. Cohen's syndicated article?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell the hon. member that, and I do not know that it has any bearing on her argument. If she is wrong, it does not matter whether the article appears in one newspaper or 20; and if she is right, she is just as right in one newspaper as she would be in 20. As I think she has indicated, the facts are very, very serious. I do not mind answering the hon. member's question except that, as he knows, we are on limited time.

Let me say to him, however, that the forecast prepared for the government of Manitoba which has been made public by its chief economic adviser, the former head of the department of economics at McGill University who, as I was told by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), is the finest economist in Canada, indicates that while there will be some reduction in the percentage of unemployment in the first half of 1972, the situation will worsen in the last half of the year. I say to the hon. member for York Centre, who I know is concerned about unemployment, that that economist has been much more on target than the government's economists up until now.

Let me spend a few moments talking about the second matter dealt with in the amendment moved by the leader of our party (Mr. Lewis). The amendment says that the government "has failed to introduce real reform of the tax system so as to redistribute income and reduce the tax burden on low and middle income groups." I do not want today to go over the mass of material prepared by the hon. member for Duvernay, which shows that certain industries, oil and gas for example, and the mining industry are paying taxes on only 10 per cent of earned income, that other industries pay more and that individuals pay tax usually on their whole income.

The Prime Minister has repeatedly made speeches in which he has put forward the argument that the objective of the government is to narrow the gap between Canadians in the lower income bracket and those in the upper income bracket. Again and again the Prime Minister has said that the government is succeeding in its objective. The facts prove differently. Hon. members may have seen, in the Financial Times, a report of speeches made at a conference organized by the Canadian Council for Social Development by two United States economists. The speeches deal with Canada and use figures prepared by Statistics Canada and the Department of National Revenue. These are the same as the figures which I obtained in answer to questions I recently put on the order paper.

The figures show that between 1957 and 1967, the lowest 40 per cent of families and individuals in Canada who paid taxes earned under 16 per cent of the total income. In other words, the lowest 40 per cent got less than 16 per cent of total income. Actually, Mr. Speaker, the percentage of total income earned by the lowest 40 per cent, instead of going up as the Prime Minister seems to have indicated in a number of speeches, has gone down. At the same time, the percentage earned by the top 40 per cent has gone up slightly. The top 40 per cent of income earners in this country in 1967, the last year for which there are figures, earned 66.6 per cent of the total income. In other words, the top 40 per cent got two-thirds of the income earned by Canadians. The answer to another question which I asked shows what has happened in this area. Hon. members can see the answer to this question in Hansard of March 29.

I want to make it clear that I cannot put all the figures on record. The number of taxpayers increased between 1961 and 1969 by about 60 per cent. However, if you look at the number of people earning income of over $200,000 a year, you will see that the number doubled from 95 to 190. The minister from Calgary smiles; he does not think that is very many. Those who are unemployed or who earn an income of less than $5,000 a year, which includes almost half the people of this country, think if anybody is earning over $200,000 a year it is a lot of people.

In the period 1961-69, the number of people earning between $100,000 and $200,000 tripled from 507 to 1,553. The number of people earning between $25,000 and $100,000 increased by 3½ times, from 18,730 to 68,570. So, Mr. Speaker, one can see that under this Liberal government which has introduced a certain tax system but has refused to implement a truly equitable tax system, those who have most are getting more than ever before. Not only is the income growing of those in the top earnings bracket, but the number receiving a large income is also growing. At the same time, almost half the population still earns less than $5,000 per year.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that I would not be speaking until after ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): After ten o'clock?

Mr. Mahoney: I beg your pardon: until after eight o'clock. Therefore, in the couple of minutes that are available before I call it six o'clock, I should like to deal briefly with the NDP amendment which has added yet another brick of unsubstantiated speculation and false assumption to the structure on which this rather sad confidence motion rests.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

Mr. Mahoney: The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has added, as a stipulation, that the government has failed to introduce real reform of the tax system and has failed to redistribute, among other things, the tax burden. The fact is that the tax reform measure adopted in the previous session of this parliament has resulted in all married status taxpayers paying less income tax this year than they paid last year, and all single status taxpayers with incomes of up to $8,000 paying less tax this year than last year. It has taken off the tax rolls one million Canadians who were on the tax rolls last year. It has reduced taxes for five million more people, and even when one includes the capital gains tax in the tax base two out of every three Canadian taxpayers will pay less income tax under the new system. Those reductions, Mr. Speaker, are at the low end of the scale.

The members of the NDP have been shouting the canard around the country that the tax credit system can do things that the exemption system cannot do, which of course is utterly false; the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) has admitted this. However, members of the NDP have misled the country into thinking that while they are talking about tax credits, they are in fact talking about negative income tax.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock, I had just a few moments to deal with the premise on which the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South is based, that is, the suggestion that we as a government have not introduced tax reform and that the effect of whatever we have done has not been of assistance to the lower and middle income groups. This is a subject on which I could spend the whole of my allotted time. However, I do not propose to get trapped into doing that.

I have dealt with the fact that a great number of taxpayers in Canada have been relieved, either wholly or in part, of taxation as a result of Bill C-259 that was dealt with in the last session of this parliament. I could mention such things as the employment expense allowance and the child-care allowance that are of primary interest and benefit to lower and middle income wage earners in Canada. I could dwell at length on the additional exemption that our senior citizens receive, the change that resulted in the increase from $500 to $650 and the age for qualification being reduced from 70 to 65. These are all things that are well recognized in Canada. Lower and middle income Canadians know that today they are paying less tax under the reformed Income Tax Act than before, because since the first of the year the deductions from their pay envelopes have been smaller.

The hon. member said we have not reformed the tax system. He may not like the reform: that is beside the point. How he can deny it is reform escapes me completely. It altered fundamentally the basis on which small Canadian corporations are assisted through the tax system. It changed significantly the way corporations and their shareholders are taxed. It permitted and encouraged Canadians to set aside substantially more tax free and tax deferred dollars for their retirement. It increased both the number and effectiveness of incentives for Canadians to invest in and own Canadian enterprise. It attached very definite and positive conditions to the tax incentives available to the extractive industries. It instituted for the first time the inclusion of capital gains in the tax base and abolished federal gift and estate taxes.

That may not be reform by the standards of the socialists who feel that not only is a buck a buck but it is the government's buck. It is, and was, reform by any rational standard of definition. It was founded on an unprecedented process of participation, a process of good democracy, good politics and good government. The tax reform which this government introduced and saw carried through the House of Commons in the last session was responsible reform.

Those who were present in the House just before six o'clock when I started my address will appreciate that I was feeling something in the position of making my maiden speech. I blew my opening lines beautifully. This is the first occasion I have had as a member of the ministry to take part in a debate on behalf of the government. After listening to the speech of the leader of the opposition when introducing his motion today, I felt like a Conservative, at least as I understand many Conservatives feel: I was let down and disappointed.

Most Canadians are well aware of the fact that in our parliamentary system opposition parties have a vitally important role to play. The opposition has a responsibility to oppose, but it also has an obligation to the Canadian people to oppose constructively and in a way that bears at least some relation to the realities of the complex world in which we live. Perhaps nothing better indicates the political and intellectual bankruptcy of the official opposition than the empty and mindless criticism of government economic policies contained in the motion put before the House today by the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: Not only are his criticisms unsupported by the facts; they are flatly denied by the facts. Once again the Leader of the Opposition has failed to put forward comprehensive alternatives of his own by which the Canadian people could judge the policies that would be adopted by a Conservative government. It is quite remarkable, Mr. Speaker, what a close resemblance the Leader of the Opposition bears to a mythical Canadian political figure, conjured up recently by one of the country's eminent financial writers, whom he called Bob Er

Umm. It seems he decided on that name because every time he was asked what he would do differently than the government in power which he so strongly criticized, he replied, "Er umm."

In his motion the Conservative leader alleges that the House lacks confidence in the ability of the government to meet the needs and challenges of the seventies because of its failure to produce measures to create employment, to encourage investment in Canadian industry and because of widespread uncertainty caused by its economic programs. It is, I think, useful and instructive to take a hard look at those allegations which the Conservative leader advanced in his motion and elaborated in his speech even though he advanced no alternatives or suggestions.

Over the past two years the government has introduced a broad series of measures aimed at creating both directly and indirectly new jobs for Canadians. In a report issued late last year the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development in fact estimated that the Canadian government had injected substantially greater fiscal stimulus to promote the expansion of the economy than any major industrial nation. I do not think there is much room for doubt that these fiscal measures, together with the expansion of monetary policy, played a more important part in spurring a greater increase in Canada's real national output last year than those of any industrial country except Japan. Our increase was twice that of the United States and Germany.

I will not burden the House with a recital of all the measures which were brought forward in the form of tax cuts, increased federal spending and lending programs during this two-year period to promote increased production and employment in Canada. As an illustration of the magnitude of these measures, however, I would point out that the direct employment-related programs introduced in the House last October, such as the Local Initiatives Program, on-the-job training programs and the special loan and grant program to help finance capital projects by the provinces and municipalities this winter have involved federal expenditures alone of more than half a billion dollars.

The hon. member for York South arrogates to himself and to his party a monopoly of concern for the human aspects of unemployment. This hard-nosed, hard-bitten, high-priced union lawyer will find as much difficulty in maintaining that stance as he and his party are finding in convincing prairie farmers that the NDP has the interests of prairie farmers at heart.

To avoid being misunderstood or misconstrued by members of the opposition, let me hasten to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that I am well aware, and the government is well aware, that there are still too many Canadians without jobs who want to work. Certainly we on our side are not trying to hide the fact. Developing the means to create jobs for all Canadians who want to work continues to be the first priority of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: At the outset of my remarks I referred to the need in this country to face up to the realities of the world in which we live. One of the hard realities confronting us, one which is no less real because the opposition chooses to ignore it, is that we in Canada are confronted by a unique and far reaching problem because our labour force is growing very much faster than that of any other industrial nation.

Over the past several years we have on the whole made tremendous strides in dealing with this problem. During the 1960's, the rate at which now jobs were created in Canada grew nine times faster than that in West Germany, nearly six times faster than that in Britain and four times faster than that in France. During the same period, the relative increase in employment in Canada was also 50 per cent greater than that in either the United States or Japan. During the first two years of the 1970's, employment increased three times more rapidly in Canada than it did south of the border.

The steady expansion of our economy, together with the direct job-creating measures adopted by the government, have helped to accelerate the growth of employment over the past several months. In March, the last month for which figures are available, there were 88,000 more Canadians with jobs than in February, an increase for that month which was exceeded only in the boom year of 1967. Total employment in March was up by 330,000, or 4.3 per cent, over the level a year ago which, as the Financial Times pointed out recently, represents a greater increase over the 12-month period than that which took place in any year in the booming 1960s. Nor is this just a one-month fluke. As the Financial Times also noted, the growth in employment over the period since last September has been at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of almost 6 per cent, which is extraordinarily high.

To claim, as the Leader of the Official Opposition has in his motion, that the government has failed to produce measures to create employment is completely contrary to the facts. The most charitable view it is possible to take is that at the very least the Conservative leader's allegation represents an exercise in self-deception. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is a case of the wish being father to the thought. And what of the claim by the Leader of the Opposition that the government has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry? Much the same may be said of this second allegation as of the first.

The fact is that the greatest source of encouragement to Canadian industry to step up its capital investment is a rapidly growing economy, which leads in turn to a rapid expansion of demand for its goods and services. As I have already pointed out, just such an expansion of the economy has been in progress now for a period of many months as a result of the fiscal and monetary stimulus injected by the federal government.

It is, of course, true that in the early stages of accelerated economic growth companies tend to make use of the existing, unused capacity of their plants and equipment to fill expanding demand for their goods and services, rather than to invest in new facilities. As the output of these facilities begins to get stretched to the limit, however, industry begins to step up its capital investment in order to increase its productive capacity.

Quite apart from the impetus to capital investment resulting from the healthy growth of the economy, there have been a number of particular measures introduced over an extended period that were aimed directly at bolstering Canadian industry by strengthening its competitive position and facilitating expansion of capital investment. Just by way of example I might remind the House that in December, 1970, the government took steps to permit Canadian manufacturers and processors to write off depreciation on new capital investment at the rate of 115 per cent of actual cost. In the budget last June, the 3 per cent corporate surtax was abolished, along with that on personal incomes. In October, the total income tax payable by corporations was reduced by a further 7 per cent during the period from July 1, 1971, to the end of this year. Together with the abolition of the surtax, this represented a very substantial reduction in corporate taxes of 10 per cent.

During 1971, total capital investment in Canada increased by 11 per cent, which is well above the long-term average, although for the reasons I have already mentioned, by increase in business capital investment was more moderate. It is quite true that the initial survey of capital spending investment intentions for 1972 indicates a significant slowing down in the rate at which total capital investment will increase this year. But because this survey was taken around the turn of the year when there was still a high degree of uncertainty as a result of the international monetary crisis, there is every reason to believe that actual investment spending in 1972 will be considerably higher than forecast. Certainly conditions are ripe for an upward surge in capital investment by business to get under way in Canada to match that already anticipated in the United States.

Let me deal now with the third allegation by the leader of the opposition, namely, that the government has caused widespread uncertainty regarding its economic programs, which supposedly has also contributed to a lack of confidence in the ability of the government to meet the needs and challenges of the 1970s. With this allegation, the Conservative leader has outdone himself.

There is an old saying, Mr. Speaker, which I think has some application in this situation. It is that you cannot scramble an egg without breaking it. By the same token, you cannot change policies without creating some uncertainty. We live in a world of very rapid and far reaching changes. If we are to be able to meet the needs and challenges of the seventies we must respond to those changes which are occurring all about us, and nowhere more so than in the economic field. There are many conservatively minded people in this and other countries who refuse to recognize the need for change, who cling to the status quo and the conventional wisdom of the past.

There is plenty of room for argument among reasonable men about how we should respond to change, but in my view there is none whatever about the need to respond. During the period when new policies and programs are in the process of being formulated and debated, it is inevitable that there will be considerable controversy and uncertainty. I say that controversy and uncertainty are often inevitable, but perhaps on second thought I am mistaken. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will let us know if he has found a way of reshaping government policies and programs to meet the needs of today and tomorrow without creating a measure of uncertainty in the process. Perhaps while he is at it he will also tell us how to scramble an egg without breaking it. And after that perhaps he will tell this House and the Canadian people just what policies and programs his party proposes to meet the challenges of the seventies.

I suppose that when the Conservative leader refers to widespread uncertainty regarding the government's economic programs, he is echoing the misgivings voiced within the business community over some of the measures introduced or being considered by the government to respond to the changing economic circumstances which confront us as a nation. In this connection I was much interested in a statement placed as an advertisement in the New York Times a few days ago by a very large United States corporation, Mobil Oil Company, under the heading, "Business is bound to change". I would like to read some excerpts from that statement because I think it is highly relevant. It provides more than sufficient answers to the Leader of the Opposition, and indeed to those in the business community itself who have criticized us for causing uncertainty. The statement begins:

> Change upsets people. Always has. Disrupts routine and habit patterns. Demands constant adaptation.
> But change is inevitable. And essential. Inability to change can be fatal.
>
> Unfortunately, most of man's institutions are highly resistant to change.
>
> This, as much as anything else, underlies the explosive reaction of many people in our country in the past few years. They took a fresh and uncluttered look at the world around them, and found many institutions archaic. Higher education. Government. Religion, business.
>
> These institutions have begun to respond to the need for change, even if not always with breathtaking speed.
> Among these institutions, business is by the nature of things compelled to change more rapidly—and perhaps more realistically—if it is to survive. Companies that cannot foresee change and adapt to it quickly enough die. There is seldom anybody to subsidize business inefficiency for any length of time.
>
> One reason business—especially big business—can respond to change quickly is that basically it is in the business of change. Business depends heavily on forward planning, and planning is the orderly management of change.
>
> Another reason—

If I could, I would heavily underline this passage, Mr. Speaker.

> —is that business itself produces more change, probably, than any other institution. Through its research and development programs. Through new technology it develops and applies. Through new plants it builds. Through its need to be a good employer. Because its own long-term self-interest dictates a better life for people everywhere. Because it must face facts and think rationally about what may appear to be unthinkable.

If there is a measure of uncertainty, it is precisely because this government has moved to respond to change for the very purpose of meeting the needs and challenges of the 1970s. The leader of the Conservative party may rejoice in the belief that neither he nor his party has to face facts or to think rationally about what may be unthinkable, but I am convinced the Canadian people have enough plain, ordinary common sense to know that they cannot indulge in the same luxury if they hope to deal in a sensible way with the problems of today and tomorrow.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of following the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), who referred to his comments as his maiden speech in his new ministry. After listening to him very carefully I would suggest that his speech sounded a bit to me like the demented ravings of an old lady rather than a maiden. As the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said today, this gives us an opportunity to make a few kindly remarks about the government and its activities and also its lack of activity.

The non-confidence motion reads in part:

> That because the government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry, and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its programs—

And so on. I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault), a very jovial gentleman, throw some figures around this afternoon like a drunken sailor.

Mr. Perrault: They were all accurate.

Mr. Muir: I do not know whether the hon. member would know that they were accurate; he was reading them and they were probably prepared for him. Then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) likewise threw all kinds of figures around. We then had the great member from Calgary South, the minister of something—I do not know what it is, but whatever it is he is not doing a very good job—throw around a lot of figures.

Let me tell the House that no matter how many figures these members throw around, it does not change the fact that according to the latest figures on unemployment published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics there are 642,000 people out of work in Canada today, an increase of 15,000 over the previous month at a time when normally the figure should be going down.

I can be corrected if I am in error, but surely there must be close to 100,000 people in training across the country. I do not suppose they would be classified as unemployed. Then, again, I would think there are another 100,000 in Canada, if not more, who have become weary and disgusted at the futility of going to Canada Manpower offices in search of work, who cannot find it not because of the ineffectiveness of the public servants in the Manpower offices but because these people have no employment to offer.

The previous speaker referred to the fact that the leader of the opposition did not suggest measures to remedy many of these situations. I do not know where the hon. member has been. Time and time again the Leader of the Opposition has proposed in this House, as well as outside it and on radio and television, many measures that could be taken to improve the economy. But the hon. member opposite just does not want to listen.

An hon. Member: None today!

[Mr. Mahoney.]

Mr. Muir: I do not think the hon. member was listening today. But does it have to be right now, or five minutes ago? Does his memory not go back one, two, three months or even a year? The Leader of the Opposition was telling hon. members opposite how wrong they were when the then minister of finance, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Benson), was playing around with the budget and the income tax bill. It has all come to pass. The leader of the opposition was correct in many of his assumptions; he has been proven correct.

In any event, let me talk about unemployment in the Atlantic provinces. The unemployment rate, seasonally adjusted, is 6 per cent across Canada but 12.1 per cent in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Perrault: Lower than it was last spring.

Mr. Muir: That is completely incorrect. With regard to the island of Cape Breton—these are not my estimates but those of action groups and welfare officials in Sydney and other areas—there is an unemployment rate of anywhere from 20 to 25 per cent, despite LIP and the Opportunities for Youth program. I suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that these are temporary measures, providing employment for a short period of time. This is all well and good and we are very glad that those taking part thought of something. The government was bankrupt of ideas and could not think of anything to provide employment so it said, "Okay, you fellows; provide something and we will give you the money." I am glad the government has done this, but what permanency is there in these programs so far as employment is concerned? I suggest these jobs last only a few weeks or a few months.

• (2030)

Then we had the holus-bolus idea of throwing grants out in various areas to people who are wasting the money. I have discussed this matter with members of the government. There must be some way of checking more carefully on the use of this money. Other people have had extremely good ideas which have been rejected because they are not unique. I will not go into that question now because we will have more time later on to do so.

Let me say this to those hon. gentlemen who say we have made no suggestions. They have allowed freight rates in the Atlantic provinces to increase time and time again under this administration. They have done nothing about this. As a result, businessmen as well as labour in the area are concerned. One businessman told me the other day that he sent to Guelph for a small piece of equipment which cost $3.90, and it cost $4.20 to ship it to him.

No matter how often members of the government side stand in this chamber and say there are many thousands more working now than a month ago, six months ago or ten years ago, this does nothing for the 800,000 who are not working. I am looking at some Ontario members who perhaps do not face this situation, but in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia and throughout the Atlantic provinces we come in contact with people who are well trained and willing to take any type of job but cannot find employment.

There was a man in my office when I was at home over the weekend who is a well trained cement finisher. I worked with him in the coal mines some years ago. He has a wife in the hospital, and a very sick child. He has tried everywhere to obtain employment. I have contacted Manpower on his behalf, but he cannot get employment. I finally said that we would have to get welfare for him, and he blew his top. He said he was not going on welfare; he wanted to work. He then said he was sorry for blowing up at me and realized that I was trying to do something for him. He said he had not been on welfare ever during his lifetime and did not want to go on welfare now. This is the heartbreaking type of case involving people who cannot find employment that we become aware of every day. There are thousands of cases like this. We can mention all the figures we want in this House, but that will not help the situation.

The government and this man who is part-time Prime Minister have created a climate of uncertainty in the public service, uncertainty in the ranks of organized and unorganized labour, uncertainty in the business world and uncertainty in the armed forces. These people do not know where they will be tomorrow, and even senior officers in the service are speaking out about the situation. The government has created a climate of uncertainty in the fishing industry and in almost every area one could mention.

This government and our part-time Prime Minister have created a climate of uncertainty all across the land. What do they intend to do about unemployment? When are they going to put people back to work? Let me quote from a memorandum presented to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government of Canada on March 6, 1972. These are the remarks of a Cape Bretoner. I am not referring to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) but to Donald MacDonald, president of the Canadian Labour Congress. He states in this brief:

> When we appeared before you a year ago, we said that never before had we felt such a profound sense of concern about the affairs of our nation.

He went on to say:

> High unemployment, which has long afflicted Canada, continues to be the number one national problem. Not only was there no let-up, no relief from this scourge in 1971, but, on the contrary, the unemployment rate rose to its highest level in ten years.

He went on to say that when he appeared before the Prime Minister a year earlier he expressed considerable pessimism, which was called unjustified, about the prospect of any significant dent being made in unemployment for the year ahead. He said:

> But we are not in a mood to say that "we told you so". We are not in a mood to score debating points over an issue involving the plight of hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers and their families. Furthermore, as pessimistic as we were on that occasion, we could be properly chastised today for not having foreseen more clearly the degree to which unemployment would accelerate in 1971. The sorry fact is that the official unemployment data indicate only too clearly that 1971 was a year of disaster.

This was a year of disaster under a part-time Prime Minister who in the last few months has shown his great interest in the House and in the monarchy! Even today he sat in the House while the Leader of the Opposition made a speech. We have seen this under the Pearson government, the St. Laurent government, the Diefenbaker government and the Mackenzie King government, but we have not seen it often under this Prime Minister: he will not even take the time to listen to the Leader of the Opposition or the leader of the NDP. He might get some good ideas, but he will not listen. The Prime Minister can say many things in the comfort of his Cadillac, but not here.

We heard the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce say that the Leader of the Opposition was spreading doom and gloom. He is a great comedian but he did not get any laughs. He did receive a little bit of applause from two nuts on the government side who had nothing else to do, but he received no applause from his other colleagues. He accused the Leader of the Opposition of spreading doom and gloom. No one has to spread doom and gloom today; it is an actual fact. The people of Canada are fed up with the arrogance and complacency of someone who does not realize, does not know and has never experienced unemployment. He has never had the feeling of having to meet the rent or the grocery bill with his pockets empty.

Liberal members say this government did not create unemployment. This government certainly did create unemployment, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). The Prime Minister said in December, 1969, that we should watch the government because it was going to defeat inflation no matter what happened. He said that unemployment could go up to 6 per cent or even higher and he would not worry about it. Those were his words. I can understand his lack of concern. This is a man who does not worry about unemployment.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) are willing to give consideration to many things but they are always overruled. They are not among the top echelon of this government. They are not part of the troika or the three or four who run this country. They do not have the opportunity to do something about unemployment.

He did not suggest to the Lapalme workers that they should eat cake. Whether the Lapalme workers were right or wrong, do you in reality and good sense, Mr. Speaker, think the Prime Minister should push a button in his air conditioned, bullet-proof car and yell out the window at people who are demonstrating? This is the man who talked about participatory democracy. He did not tell them to eat cake, but something far worse. This is the attitude of our so-called Prime Minister. What was said to one hon. member when he asked the Prime Minister a question about unemployment? What the Prime Minister said, later turned out to be "fuddle-duddle". Those of us who were here know what he said.

On another occasion an hon. member from Newfoundland was speaking on behalf of his constituents who needed employment. But this great man sits over there, looks across at the Conservatives, the NDP and Social Credit members and says, "These peasants, what are they questioning me about? I know what is good for the people". We know how much time he spends in this House. For three years he roamed all around the world, and finally this year he sticks a lot closer to home. Is he looking after the unemployed, or is he planning an election? He even spends more time in this House which he treats with arrogance.

• (2040)

This is the kind of man we have for Prime Minister. What is he doing for the unemployed except putting up just two or three speakers who say there are so many thousands of people doing this and that. One can use statistics and computers, but this will not put bread on the tables of the unemployed. How long must we put up with this climate of uncertainty?

Now I will get closer to questions concerning my constituency. The Cape Breton Development Corporation took over, from the Department of Transport, the Point Edward industrial park two years ago. The union there cannot negotiate. The operation was taken over but was not legally transferred from the Department of Transport. Time and time again we attempted to have something done about this. On june 10 the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) wrote a letter to me saying:

> I am sorry to have been slow to reply to your letter of March 18. I have been waiting for what I hoped would be Devco's finalization of arrangements about the Point Edward industrial park.
> While these have not yet been completed, there is no question of the men concerned losing benefits that they had when they were employees of the Department of Transport. That was a commitment.

These men are losing benefits, so apparently it was not a firm commitment. There is a climate of uncertainty in the public service. I supported and voted for the official languages bill and I believe it is a wonderful thing but, like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair), I have concerns and worries about it for the simple reason that an eligibility list that was set up in Cape Breton some months ago, and which should have been good to June 15, 1972, is to be changed. It was established on December 20, 1971, and dealt with the positions of five customs officers in North Sydney and Sydney. As of June they are going to do away with the eligibility list and thereby deprive the people who have written the exam of the opportunity of employment. They are to use a list under which bilingualism is a prerequisite. Like the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton I do not think we should move so fast on these matters. However, I voted for the languages bill and I still believe it is a good bill. I believe in B and B, but are we to destroy the bread and butter features of this whole situation?

We talk about unemployment. The Minister of Labour is on record as saying that it takes a lot of courage to create unemployment. This government created unemployment. It slowed down the economy. It cooled it off so badly that it is frozen and the government cannot get it moving. Then the Prime Minister said, "Like it or lump it. If you don't like what I do, throw me out". The arrogance is there. This man is destroying our country not only economically but morally and in every other way. The sooner he is out of office, the better—and the better it will be for the unemployed.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to put into ordinary language the thrust of the motion we are discussing today, I would suggest that the thought which comes out of it is: Where are we headed? I believe this is the question which today is uppermost in the minds of the Canadian population. What is the direction, what is the hope in the future for the individual? What is the hope in the future for business? Really this is what we are talking about in this House today.

As I have said, the question which today seems uppermost in the minds of many people is that we in Canada seem to have lost a sense of direction. No one seems to know where we are headed. Business does not know. We have the example of the tremendous decrease in capital outlay in the first quarter of this year, and we have the statement made a few moments ago by the Minister of State (Mr. Mahoney) that all is well and that we should hang on a little longer because we will see a tremendous upsurge in the economy. This reminds me of some of the famous last words of the former minister of finance who had unemployment licked. He said we should just wait until the next report came out and then it would be seen that we had turned the corner. He was completely off the track because we had more unemployment and more inflation.

Agriculture does not know where it is headed. We have had all types of proposals for the agricultural industry. We have had announcements about farm enlargement. We have had task forces recommending that inefficient small farmers be moved off the farms, retrained and placed in other occupations. Then we have had the latest one, the family farm enlargement program which the minister announced several months ago. This created a lot of interest and enthusiasm among the younger farmers in this country who were preparing to enlarge their holdings. This is the program under which the older farmer could remain in the house on the farm and would not be uprooted while the young fellow took over. The minister knows all about it but the head office of the Farm Credit Corporation does not know anything about it. They do not know when it is to come into effect. The minister, however, grabbed all the publicity he possibly could from a very nebulous type of program which has not yet been implemented. There is always hope that it may come about.

Labour leaders, business leaders, teachers, brokers, firemen, bootmakers and even the proverbial candlestick-maker—no one knows what way to turn. But what does emerge from all of this is that we have one absolutely concrete thrust: this government, aided by its computers, academics and associated eggheads and its power-hungry adherents, seems to feel it has a God-given right that it is better qualified to spend the citizen's money and to order his life than he himself. That is the only genuine thrust.

Let us take an example. We have heard talk in this chamber, over lo these many years, about the CDC, the Canada Development Corporation. Now, at long last, this worthy organization through its chairman has offered to take Polymer Corporation and the Northern Navigation Company off the hands of the Canadian public. It has offered to take over these well-run, efficient Crown corporations. I say to the CDC that if it wants a challenge, it should be interested in taking over the CBC or the CNR. I question the value of this organization except to build up more government bureaucracy.

It is my humble opinion that some reasonable income tax incentives directed toward investment in Canadian industry and development would be far more practical and effective. Further, there would be no necessity for more empire building. Surely somebody, some organization could come up with a list of projects including resource development, manufacturing and services—investment in which one could enjoy tax incentives. If individuals were helped in this way, I believe it would do more in one year to get ownership of our resources into Canadian hands than the CDC will accomplish in its lifetime. But instead of giving reasonable incentives we establish another bureaucracy. The thrust is still there, Mr. Speaker. Under government supervision we are to invest in the Canada Development Corporation. And if you do invest, be prepared to pay capital gains tax. Again we have Big Brother looking over our shoulder and telling us what it is best to do.

I do not think there is need for me to dwell on the so-called tax reform measures that we had before us in the House last year except to ask, where are the 100 or so amendments promised by the former minister of finance as he slowly pulled away and sank into the sunset, buried forever in the Department of National Defence, the place where we have three, or is it five non-commissioned officers for every private? Is this the stuff of which confidence is built?

What about the great improvements to the Post Office promised by that fearless administrator from Duvernay? He accomplished one thing, and that was higher taxes. Here I refer to postage as a tax. The tax is away up and services are away down. Now once more we have the possibility of six-day service. There is an interesting little piece in today's Ottawa Journal about that matter:

> Around the world with Liberal efficiency! To save money, the five-day mail week. To save more money, back to the six-day system.
> What does the government take us for? Perhaps Mr. Côté thought that confession would make him seem a refreshingly different kind of politician, or would at least be good for his soul.
>
> Well, maybe. But it is an open admission that the Post Office has not known what it was doing, that the vaunted business efficiency and reforms which Eric Kierans was supposed to have introduced were pure myth—
> What Canadians do feel strongly about is being gulled by cabinet ministers who have been trying to sell higher mail rates and poorer service at the same time.

That is the whole thrust of this debate. Where are we going? What are we getting for our money? A few years ago the government presided over the death of an industry in southwestern Ontario. It paid $1 million to farmers in southwestern Ontario not to grow sugar beet. Of course, that was during an election period. All that was needed to save the industry at that time was a little government direction, a statement to the effect that we should have a national sugar policy, that we as Canadians must produce a percentage of our own needs. Instead, the industry was allowed to die. The result has been depression among the farmers in that area.

That decision took 20,000 or 30,000 acres of land out of production. Yet this afternoon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) had the temerity to say—I think I quote him fairly accurately—that the situation is better now than when the industry was closed. He was replying to a question by my colleague from Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) who was referring to an article in the Globe and Mail of April 22 which stated that Austin Sugar Refineries Ltd. of Montreal plans to build a refinery in Cornwall. I think it is great that Cornwall should have a refinery. That company will receive a $665,000 incentive grant which will produce 100 to 110 jobs. But all this will be, in effect, is a bagging operation. Cane sugar is to be imported, refined a little and bagged at Cornwall.

A little money invested in re-establishing a whole industry in southwestern Ontario could provide 200 or 300 jobs, plus added income from diversification by hundreds of farmers in the area. We are not a designated area and that may have some bearing on the situation. But we are not receiving direction from government on how to establish a genuine, made-in-Canada sugar policy. That is what is wrong and that is what we are missing.

When the sugar industry in southern Ontario was phased out, the farmers had to diversify. But they did not receive any direction from this government. In Essex, Kent, Middlesex, Lambton—all over the southern part of Ontario farmers tell me that it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to get a contract today to grow tomatoes. They are anxious to get into the business. The Department of Agriculture must know that, and if the minister were on his toes he would pass the information along to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). It does not seem to me that he has bothered to do this. If he had, why would this government give a grant of over half a million dollars to Catelli Foods, which I understand is a subsidiary of General Foods in the United States, to establish a plant in the St. Lawrence area? The sole purpose of this plant is to process tomato paste imported from Portugal, Spain, Italy, Yugoslavia or wherever it can be bought cheaply. This goes on whilst Canadian farmers cannot obtain contracts to grow tomatoes because there are not enough contracts to go round.

No wonder people are asking where we are going. Mr. Speaker, I say it is time that we in Canada established our priorities and a common sense of purpose, which we have not been doing in the past. Leacock's description of the horseman who mounted and then rode off in all directions is a classic example of this government. On January 1, 1972, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), with great fanfare announced that there would be no more cigarette advertising on radio and television—down with tar and nicotine! Virtually on the same day that $200,000 was spent on an anti-smoking campaign, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion made the following announcement:

> Dominion Cigarette Tube Company Limited of Montreal will receive an incentive of approximately $48,000 for a new plant to produce cigarette paper tubes which will employ an estimated 67 persons. The development incentive is based on a rate of 5 per cent of the approved capital costs, estimated at $300,000, plus $500 for each new job created.

Alleged Failure to Alleviate Unemployment

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must do so to advise him that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the no-confidence motion tabled by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) reads and I quote:

> That because the Government has failed to produce measures to create employment, has failed to encourage investment in Canadian industry, and has caused widespread uncertainty as to its economic programmes—

My colleagues, the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Perrault) recalled this afternoon certain measures which the government had taken to promote employment. The Minister of State (Mr. Mahoney) also mentioned tonight the incentives and other measures to which the government had resorted.

I would like to speak at this point about our exports which are of great importance for the maintenance and creation of jobs in Canada.

This is why the government, through the federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, offers our national industry a very large choice of tools in order either to help Canadian exporters break into new foreign markets, or consolidate and develop their position on already existing ones.

The department has also initiated commercial negotiations, particularly to improve the conditions of access of Canadian products to foreign markets. Our trade commissioners have granted 80 stations in 57 countries a financial assistance similar to that recently accorded to facilitate the establishment of submissions concerned with investment projects abroad, to prospect new markets and adjust marketing.

For some years past, commercial and departmental delegations have increasingly served as instruments for commercial promotion. They play a very important role in the endeavours of Canada to diversify her trade and increase her exports to markets other than the United States.

This does not mean, Mr. Speaker, to transfer our exports from the American market to other markets, but rather to keep and strengthen our position in relation to the United States, and do better elsewhere.

Here are a few economic and ministerial missions which have done their task in 1971 and early 1972. From April 14 to 22, 1971, a Canadian trade and industrial mission visited the Federal Republic of Germany in order to establish stronger commercial bounds between that country and Canada. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) headed this mission which included 28 Canadian businessmen and industrialists, as well as representatives of the federal and provincial governments. The delegates visited major trade and industrial centres in Germany, including Bonn, Dusseldorf, Cologne, Frankfurt, Hanover and Wolfsburg.

• (2110)

Canada established diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China on October 13, 1970. In order to promote Sino-Canadian relations in all areas, an economic and trade mission led by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) visited China from June 28 to July 4, 1971. This mission was composed of representatives of various federal departments, namely Industry, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, National Revenue, Energy, Mines and Ressources, and External Affairs. There were also representatives of various trade and industrial organizations in Canada, of groups connected with agriculture, forestry, pulp and paper, mining, manufacture, chemicals, industry, trade, banking, engineering, exports and imports. Those people had friendly and constructive talks with Prime Minister Chou En-Lai, with the ministers of external trade, of agriculture, of forestry, and of light industry, as well as with the deputy ministers responsible for the metallurgic industry, the fuel industry, and the chemical industry.

From November 17 to 24, 1972, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was in Rome, and when he left the Italian capital, he went to Algeria, where he led a trade mission composed of 17 Canadian businessmen and a group of public servants and Crown corporation officers.

From December 6 to 18, 1971, a group of 12 Canadian agriculture experts led by Mr. R. P. Poirier, Assistant Deputy Minister of the Department of Agriculture, took part in an agriculture and trade mission to the U.S.S.R. The purpose of this mission was to explore opportunities for information and technology exchanges, with a view to reaching licensing agreements, and eventually to increasing trade between our two countries in the agricultural and commercial fields.

In December 1971, a trade and economic mission headed by the Minister of Industry and Commerce went to Morocco in search of ways and means of developing closer trade and economic ties with that North African country.

With a view to increasing our efforts to sell manufactured good on the Japanese market, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce headed a trade mission which visited Japan from January 21 to 29, 1972; 31 business and industrial representatives accompanied him. This was the largest Canadian delegation of its type ever to go to that country. During the same period, economic and ministerial missions came to Canada from various countries including the USSR and Japan.

Mr. Speaker, other means, including participation in industrial exhibitions and fairs and others, both national and international, were used to stimulate our sales promotion. This promotion is being pursued in close co-operation with the private sector of industry, the federal government and, in some cases, with provincial authorities.

There has been Canadian participation to a certain number of fairs and exhibitions. During the first week of March 1971, 15 Canadian corporations took part in the New England Boat Show in Boston. At the 52th National Conference and Educational Exhibition of Restaurants, Hotels and Motels held in Chicago from May 22 to May 26 1971, 26 Canadian corporations exhibited goods such as equipment, kitchen furniture and food products for the restaurant, hotel and motel industry. For the second year, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce was sponsoring Canadian participation to that event. Canadian editors, English-speaking as well as French-speaking, for the first time shared a stand at the 61st International Book Exhibition held in Dallas (Texas) from June 20 to June 24 1971.

At the beginning of December 1971, ten Canadian textile manufacturers who had exhibited at the Interstoff Show held in Frankfurt (Germany) obtained orders for some $6 million. Canadian sales of $6 million almost doubled compared with those of the previous show.

For the first time, Canadian products will be shown at an exclusively Canadian commercial exhibition in Peking from August 21 to September 2, 1972. The exhibition, which will occupy an area of 140,000 square feet, will comprise a wide range of equipment and industrial products. It will be the largest Canadian exhibition ever organized—over 200 Canadian companies will show their products; the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will be responsible for this project and its organization. The participation of Canadian companies in such fairs and exhibitions has undoubtedly resulted in millions of dollars of orders placed at the exhibitions and for considerably larger amounts as a result of re-orders.

On August 15, 1971, the United States imposed a 10 per cent surcharge on imports, which has been discontinued as from December 20, 1971. As early as September 7, 1971, the Canadian government introduced an Employment Support Bill to offset the United States surcharge. On February 18, 1972, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced that on December 31, 1971, a total of $3,311,703 had been awarded as grants to 178 firms by the Employment Support Board to protect 7,727 jobs.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue to look for new incentives, new ways and new methods of increasing our exports which, in 1971, represented $17.847 billion compared with $16.910 billion in 1970.

In closing, I would like to point out that the Leader of the Opposition stated this afternoon that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) should present a budget. But I must tell him that he is a member of the party that was in power from 1958 to 1962 under the direction of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). Now, during that period, the Canadian government did not present any budget for a period of 16 months, that is from December 20, 1960 to April 10, 1962.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: The country is a lot worse off now, with the mess the government has created. Conditions are terrible.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the leader of my party moved the motion which is a searing indictment of the performance of this government in relation to the needs of the country at this time and in the years to come. We have been presenting motions during budget debates, Throne Speech debates and on various other occasions throughout the past three years, all to do with the same theme, namely, this administration's total inability to deal with the problems of inflation and employment and some of the problems of taxation.

Oh, yes, they have brought in tax changes. The same author who put on paper what the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) said tonight must have written what went into the white paper on taxation back in 1970. In both cases there was the same prose by the flacks. There was hardly any change. Strangely enough, the hon. member's words seemed to be inspired by the sort of attitude that is often demonstrated by hon. members opposite, that is, that theirs is the inspiration of more than mortal men, that it is almost divinely inspired.

In their opinion, since they have been elected to this House, even though sometimes the people were deceived in electing them, they may assume the mantle of omniscience. Well, I listened to the former parliamentary secretary—I am sorry; he was the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance but now he is the Minister of State attached to the Minister of Finance: perhaps we should call him the minister from Calgary South and leave it at that.

Mr. Baldwin: He will not keep that position for long.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He insistently called for alternative programs to be brought forward. Mr. Speaker, that hon. member has been here for four years. He delivered somebody else's speech tonight. He charged that the opposition, in presenting this motion, was critical of the government and suggested that although the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) disclosed a number of alternatives in certain fields, the alternatives did not constitute a totally alternative program. When his party was in opposition, did he think they presented a program of alternatives?

• (2120)

Mr. Béchard: Sure.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member was not even here in those years. He was not here from 1958 to 1962, so he cannot tell. In any event, it is not part of the program. Many members opposite, including the Minister of State, have had their nominations. They are expecting an election. However, we will not get the government's program. We have not heard of it. We have not heard of the program from members to my left. The program of this party will be disclosed. An election campaign is the time for disclosure of programs and the choice to be made is for the people. But what does he think when the Leader of the Opposition talks about tax cuts on building materials? What about tax measures with regard to corporations? What about credits for capital gains paid on death as against succession duties? They are specific fiscal measures.

What does the Minister of State want? If he wants more, there are the recommendations of the joint committee of the Canadian Bar and Canadian Chartered Accountants with regard to the tax measures planned which the Minister of State spent so much time lauding this afternoon. All he did was sit stolidly for three or four months last fall while members of the opposition and some members on the government side tried to get improvements made to the bill. The minister received his recompense for sitting there stonewalling.

The then Minister of Finance did not dare face this House to put through his bill; he had to get someone else to do it. We know he went to the Senate. It would be hard to say he bribed the Senate, but I will say that he certainly conned the majority of the members of the Senate with promises of early tax changes before they became completely and utterly bound up in the web of the economy and our taxation system. What happened? We have not heard one iota about those tax changes.

We asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to give us a budget. He must give a financial accounting of what has happened since last June. He could tell us that he intends to present a budget in the early part of May and what measures the government is going to take. Is there going to be a budget, or is this House going to be dismissed for an election and the Canadian electorate told to lump it, so that the government will not have to disclose the financial state of the nation until perhaps September? Is that what is going to happen?

Is the Minister of Finance afraid to disclose that the budgetary deficit may be between $1 billion and $1,200 million? Is the government afraid to disclose its foreign ownership policy? Is this going to be leaked, or will it come out in a way in which it cannot be debated? The hon. member says it will be debated during an election campaign. That is not a debate that is subject to the searching scrutiny of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): How many meetings does the hon. member think he is going to address in his constituency in order to explain foreign ownership? How many people does he think he can get together in the spring of the year? There is no way the government can explain that policy to the people. It is only as a result of continuous debate in this House that the weaknesses in any program can be exposed to the public.

We will see how bankrupt of ideas this government is with regard to foreign ownership. What is the government prepared to do? Are they going to be a party of repression? Is this to be a program of repressive regulations, thou shalt nots, or are we to go out and ask people to have faith in Canada and encourage them to invest in their industry? That is something that can be done. That is part of our program in so far as incentives may be offered.

The government talks about uncertainty. The greatest uncertainty has been in the field of business ownership in this country. In 1968 this government brought forward the most savage Estate Tax Act one could contemplate. It is absolutely punitive in its levies. It was disguised under public legislation but it is a system of legalized plunder and piracy by people motivated by desire for the have-nots to take from the haves. This is an antiquated tool that has no place in the Canadian economy. The estate tax was eliminated in 1971 by Bill C-259. However, some of the provinces rushed in to increase or impose succession duties. Also, the Canadian public is still faced with a capital gains tax. All this creates uncertainty. The regulations for capital gains were not published until the other day. The same thing applies to corporations. There was a great rush to have the act effective January 1. For months Canadians did not know the bulk of the tax regulations. They are not even out yet in respect of partnerships.

This is supposed to be an administration that talks of certainty. Certainty? What a mockery they have made of the word. It is uncertainty with regard to foreign ownership and it is uncertainty with regard to the activities of the Canada Development Corporation, another supposed jewel in the crown of this administration. All they have done is name a president and a few directors. Nothing has happened with regard to the Canada Development Corporation. They have decided to do something only for a few milk cows in the form of Crown corporations, those that are paying returns. If a Crown corporation is not paying any dividends and is not in a profit position, it will not be taken over by the Canada Development Corporation. The transparency of that move should be apparent to the blindest member of this House.

I am pleased to see that in many ways the province of Quebec, in the budget delivered the other night, saw that going after succession duties, as has been done by so many provincial administrations, was self-defeating and that they are moving ultimately to eliminate them. I am glad the province of Ontario is trying to get out of that field. I hope some of the other provinces follow the example which was set by my own province in this respect. Alberta did not even get into succession duties, because succession duties and the heavy level of death duties has been one of the greatest contributors to foreign ownership of Canadian industry. This has been the cause of great uncertainty over the years.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has been charing about the country disposing of grants here, there and everywhere, unworried whether the operation in connection with which the largesse is being dispensed would be closed in a couple of years or that maybe a plant 50 miles away would be closed as a result. It is all a matter of the amount of money involved. The big question is: where has the bulk of money been spent, and what has been the result? This is what we want to know. After all, it is money from British Columbia too. I can see that the hon. member for Vancouver South, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing), knows how much money—

Mr. Laing: I resent paying $13 million to Alberta.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Alberta contributed a great deal more. This illustrates some of the difficulties. I know that one plan in Alberta is entitled to get up to $15 million, but the net result is that the pulp mill in Ocean Falls will be closed as a result of the operation of a new plant such as the one in Alberta.

Mr. Laing: There is no connection.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is all part of an industrial pattern. The province of British Columbia has not benefited from it; the province of Alberta has not benefited. We have seen more industries close. The minister from Calgary South frowns. Let him ask the minister of economic development of the province of Alberta, or he could ask the deputy minister or the ex-deputy minister. They could tell him how many industries have closed in Alberta because they could not compete or get enough capital for necessary development because it was being given to other regions of the country. This is part of the price one has to pay.

Last year when we were examining the estimates of the Economic Council of Canada I moved a motion that the Economic Council, which has plenty of authority to do this work, should conduct an objective assessment of the policies and programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Authority to do this is specifically mentioned in the act setting up the council. But no: government members were too frightened of it and the motion was thrown out. But the motion was right. This is the sort of thing the Economic Council was designed to do.

The present administration is creating more uncertainty by putting pressure on people in the Economic Council to change its attitude so that it might be more amenable to government wishes. We remember the criticism the deputy minister of finance directed toward the Economic Council. He does not feel he has an amenable tool under his control. It is all very well to discourage the chairman from continuing, and to have the vice-chairman transferred to another position. If this administration were to continue, we would see what would happen to the Economic Council. The council was not telling the government the things it wanted to hear; this is why changes were proposed and why changes are being made in the council.

The limit of my time is now approaching, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to make two further comments. With regard to the relationship between the government of Canada and the provincial administrations I would say this: the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) allegedly made his national reputation on television because of the way he dealt with the late premier of the province of Quebec. He was to be the man who would save national unity.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) said this was to be the great issue. Ask the Secretary of State what he thinks now about the relationship between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of British Columbia, after the statement made by the Prime Minister. What does he think about the relationship between the Premier of Alberta and the Prime Minister? Has he read the speeches of the Premier of Alberta in recent days? What about Ontario? What about Quebec? We see there is a change in pattern. Is there a relationship on all hands which tends to unify Canada? Oh, no; the Prime Minister is setting about the ears of the premiers of the provinces. Does he get more co-operation from them now than he did in 1968 when he took office? If he believes so, he is the only one who is under that illusion. He is under an illusion and to that extent there is greater uncertainty.

The amendment to our motion moved by the New Democratic Party calls for a tax system which would ensure a fairer distribution of wealth. Well, income tax as it now exists is a means of redistributing wealth. There is nothing specific in the amendment. We would certainly like to see greater changes in the Income Tax Act, including much greater incentives. There would be a more equal distribution of income to all Canadians as a result of such changes. To this extent we are prepared to accept their amendment. Anyway, it is another indictment of this administration and it is very difficult to restrain oneself from making such indictments. This government have worn out their time and they should go.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have worn out their time and they should go, but the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has done very much the same thing to me.

I listened with great interest, as I always do, to the speech of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney). While I was listening, I was trying to make up my mind which of two things was happening. Had they elevated the hon. member for Calgary South to such an exalted position that he could speak on behalf of the government in this important debate, or was the government so contemptuous of the arguments which the opposition was putting forward, and so unfeeling about unemployment, that they did not feel called upon to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to speak in this instance?

When we examine the argument which the Minister of State put up, it becomes obvious why the government sent a boy to do the job. The arguments fall apart. What the government is saying, in effect, is this: We have created more jobs than have been created in other countries; our labour force is larger. It is therefore not our fault there is so much unemployment; it is the fault of the people who decided to snuggle up to each other in this country about 20 years ago.

In fact, the government has known for 20 years that this situation would arise. That is not their fault; they simply ignored the problem, hoping that it would go away. But it did not go away and so we are faced with this shameful situation. The Liberal government stands indicted for its lack of foresight and its inability to solve the problems that face this nation.

I was particularly upset when the hon. member for Calgary South spoke with such feeling about tax reform in Canada. There has been no tax reform in this country and he, better than most, should know that. The government has backtracked on every single measure it has brought in; it has not stuck with anything. One of the reasons we have so much unemployment in this country is the failure of the taxation system to move us away from resource development to manufacturing industry.

The Liberal party, as it relates its activities to the businessmen of this country, might draw some inspiration from Shakespeare. It seems as though they are deserting the Liberal party and have found a new favourite in the Conservatives. I understand the Conservative party are loaded with money and are as proud as punch of it. They have all kinds of money because the traditional friends of the Liberals have deserted them. This reminds me of the speech of Cardinal Wolsey, who turns and with great sadness says:

O Cromwell, Cromwell!
Had I but served my God with half the zeal

Division

I served my king, he would not in mine age

Have left me naked to mine enemies.

Had the Liberal party paid as much attention to the ordinary things in this country as it has to backtracking and meeting the objections of the businessmen, then I do not think they would face the rather desperate situation they will face in the coming election. Having given everything away, they have the nerve to say that they brought in tax reform in Canada. Admittedly, there were some changes made to exemption levels. Indeed, no measure can be totally bad. But tax reform it was not.

Despite the fact that there has been no capital gains tax for years, when the Liberal party finally decided to institute such a tax it was only half a tax. The oil industry still retains its privileges. The government of Alberta, the province from which the hon. member for Calgary South comes, is having difficulty with the oil industry at the moment. They are shafting Alberta as they have been shafting others. I read in the newspapers that industry is moving into Alberta but that the oil industry financed all its exploration work by tax concessions received from the United States government.

This oil industry has now found a new love. It is in the north, with the Eskimos and the bears, polluting the environment. It is in an area that is nice and clean and has hitherto been untouched. It is now getting money from the people of Canada to move into the north.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 58 (9), to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Lewis) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At 10.15 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 25, 1972

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CARTER—ALLEGED MISLEADING ANSWER BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES RESPECTING ATLANTIC SALMON REGULATIONS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege arising out of information given to the House by the Minister of Fisheries on a matter within the administrative responsibilities of the government. The facts are these: On April 13, 1972, as recorded in Hansard, pages 1294 and 1295, I asked the minister if he could tell the House whether it was his intention to announce new salmon fishing regulations to become effective during the forthcoming salmon season. The minister replied that no new regulations were to be announced. The government would, he said, be repeating those made last year to make sure that the fishermen fully understood the announcement made in 1971 with regard to 1972 and future years.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, ten days later, the minister announced the closure of the commercial salmon fishery dependent on salmon runs returning to the Saint John, Miramichi and Restigouche rivers and to the south coast of Newfoundland. This closure is to commence next month and continue for about six years. This statement was made to the House on motions.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the scheme proposed at great length by the minister was not thought up instantaneously. It must have preceded, in its formation, his answer to my question of ten days before. It would have been quite simple for him to reply then that he preferred not to answer my question as he expected to make an important announcement respecting the salmon fishery in a few days. Instead, Sir, he chose to mislead the House.

With your approval, Sir, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections forthwith inquire into and report upon the matter of the information given by the Minister of Fisheries upon behalf of the government relating to the salmon fishing regulations in the Atlantic provinces on the 13 April, 1972, to the House and the announcement made by the minister in the House on the 24 April, 1972, respecting the closure of certain salmon runs in the Atlantic provinces to commercial fishing over a period of years.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West has given the required notice under the Standing Orders. I am sure that the hon. member, as a member of long standing in the House of Commons, knows the rules. He knows, as all hon. members do, that a dispute arising between two members as to allegations of fact does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege. I refer the hon. member to citation 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. If the hon. member is making a charge against another hon. member, citation 127(2) would apply. Briefly, it reads in part as follows:

> Unless discussion is based upon a substantive motion drawn in proper terms, reflections must not be cast in debate upon the conduct of . . .

I drop down a few lines.

> . . . members of either House of Parliament—

In other words, if the hon. member wants to make a charge against another hon. member of the House he must do so in the usual way by drafting a motion which may be the subject of a discussion and vote. The hon. member knows what the usual implications are for the member who is making a charge. The motion as proposed at the present time cannot qualify as privilege and cannot be put.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCE

TABLING OF ECONOMIC REVIEW

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I hereby propose to lay upon the table of the House an economic review, being a general review of recent economic developments.

Mr. Baldwin: It should be edged in black.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE FOR DEALING WITH MOTION OF MEMBER FOR FUNDY-ROYAL RESPECTING ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I think it has been agreed that the motion I wish to propose under Standing Order 43 will be discussed as the first item of business after the question period has expired.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would indicate for the guidance of the Chair and of other hon. members what the motion is. Perhaps it might be put now under the terms of Standing Order 43. It would be helpful if the hon. member were to indicate the content of his motion.

Mr. Fairweather: The motion proposes that the Canadian House of Commons speak to the International Commission for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries which is meeting in Washington in May. It was my hope, and I think I have the agreement of House leaders and others, that there could be a unanimous declaration by the House of Commons of Canada.

• (1410)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to state that the hon. member was good enough to circulate his proposed motion. Certainly the government is agreeable to having the motion put. It is suggested that when the motion is put after the question period a spokesman for each party might be permitted to speak to the motion for a maximum of ten minutes. Under those conditions we would be happy to have the motion put at that time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is in conformity with what has been agreed to among us.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

RESPONSE OF PROVINCES TO PROPOSED CHANGES IN NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—REHABILITATION GRANTS—ASSISTANCE TO MIDDLE-INCOME GROUP

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. He is not in the House, even though he is on the roster to be here today.

An hon. Member: Here he comes.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize what power I have in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: See what you can do with your own members.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to ask the minister who has just arrived what response he or the government has received from the provincial governments to the changes he has proposed in the National Housing Act, and can he state when these amendments will be introduced in the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is too early to indicate any response. A little while ago I indicated to the provinces some general proposals we have for the development of a housing policy and asked for their comments. That process of consultation, which I believe the Leader of the Opposition is committed to as we are, is still going on. Therefore it is really too early for me to indicate any response. As to when the legislation will be introduced, this to some extent will also be determined by the nature of that response.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Stanfield: It sounds as though the minister has received some response but is not prepared to indicate what it is. In the field of rehabilitation grants which the minister is suggesting and which are to be matched by the provinces, can the minister say what specific response he has received to this proposal, particularly from some of the less well-to-do provinces which might have difficulty in matching these proposed grants and thereby be unable to get the benefit of this rehabilitation program?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, there has been no response at all on any of the proposals because the process of sending teams to talk to the provinces is a process that is going on right now. When we receive that response we will be introducing legislation which I am sure will be the most progressive and reformative housing legislation ever introduced in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I wish the minister would not indulge in this kind of understatement, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask him whether he is considering giving a somewhat better deal to families in the middle-income group whose incomes are such that they cannot qualify for low-income housing and yet are not high enough to enable them to take advantage of CMHC loans? Has the minister any plans for families within this gap? Is he, for example, proposing to take any action with regard to land banks? Does he contemplate measures to reduce the price of serviced land which seems to be in very short supply in many areas?

Mr. Basford: Last year, of course, we produced houses in record numbers and the record will again be broken this year. The government is familiar with the problems the Leader of the Opposition mentions and we are certainly endeavouring to introduce policies and legislation aimed at correcting some of them.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS FOR HOUSING FOR INDIANS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Bearing in mind the interest taken in low-income groups as far as housing is concerned, I should like to ask the member of the government who is replying for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether it is intended to increase government assistance toward the funding of housing for Indians. I ask this question in light of the article by Mr. Stan Bailey in the Globe and Mail last Saturday calling attention to the frustratingly limited resources available for Indian housing at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member a supplementary question to ask?

Mr. Rose: Since no one is speaking on behalf of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take note of the question on behalf of the minister who I am sure will be glad to look into it.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON LOW-INCOME HOUSING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): In view of the fact that the Charney report contradicts the glamorous statements being made on the direction of moneys to low-income housing, and since the minister said yesterday that it is part of a larger report, would he table that larger report so that we can ascertain what the difficulties and weaknesses are?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): As I indicated the other day, Professor Dennis is still working on the editing of all of these reports.

CHANGES IN NATIONAL HOUSING ACT PROPOSED TO PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in charge of the most expensive housing in the world. Since the proposed amendments to the National Housing Act have been communicated to the provinces and to the housing authorities of the provinces as a basis for consultation and possible legislative changes, would the minister make the same proposals available to the general public, more especially to municipal governments and citizens groups, and would he refer the subject matter to a committee of the House so that we might study the ideas put forward and call on experts to give evidence relating to this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am following the course which was proposed by the leader of the hon. member's party when we last discussed housing. He indicated that before any amendments to the National Housing Act were introduced they should be submitted to the provinces for discussion and comment, and that is the course of action we are following. I have indicated to the municipalities that they are free, within the terms of their relationship with the provinces, to be consulted by the provinces on any proposals we shall be making or have made. I understand that some of the provinces are arranging to consult with municipalities accordingly.

Mr. Gilbert: Will the minister assure hon. members that the intended legislation will constitute a comprehensive housing program embracing a wide range of income groups rather than a program which will segregate people into ghettos whose occupants are to be determined on an income basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

Inquiries of the Ministry

STEPS TO REDUCE COST OF SERVICED LAND AND RELAX NHA MORTGAGE CONDITIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the minister tell us what steps the government proposes to take to reduce the cost of serviced land, especially for people in the middle income bracket? What steps is the government prepared to take to relax the conditions of NHA mortgages, again for the benefit of people in the middle-income group?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the minister can reply briefly to this question which is of a very general nature and normally should be replied to by way of a statement on motions. The minister will be recognized for the purpose of making a brief reply.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I have received representations from the housing industry in connection with some of these problems and they are being considered. I hope to indicate my response very shortly. Also, other steps will be taken in the legislation which will be introduced in the House.

ACTION TO INCREASE ACCOMMODATION FOR SENIOR CITIZENS AND MODERNIZE BUILDING CODE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister advise whether the lack of accommodation for senior citizens, which seems to be becoming widespread across the country, has been taken into consideration, whether it is high on the minister's priority list, and what steps he is about to take to alleviate the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Again I think this is a very general question, but the minister might be allowed to reply briefly.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is very high on the government's list of things that need improvement, though the record of accomplishment is very high. This is one of the areas in which legislation will be introduced.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will have to recognize the hon. member for Abitibi in a moment. Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West might be allowed his supplementary, then the hon. member for Greenwood, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, on the subject of housing I would ask the minister whether the government is going to take any action in this session to reform and modernize the building code to take into account climatic and other differences between various regions of the country? If so, will legislation in this regard be introduced shortly?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, this is not a legislative matter. A great deal of work is being done on modernizing and keeping modern the building code, and co-ordinating it between the different jurisdictions, but this is not a matter of legislation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSAL TO PROVINCES RESPECTING REHABILITATION GRANTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the minister in charge of housing. In light of the fact that the proposals made by the government to the provinces emphasized the importance of loans and grants for the rehabilitation of the existing housing stock, would the government reconsider its proposal to make this conditional upon matching grants from the provinces, some of which may not be able to afford to enter into this program?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all of these proposals—I am not sure to which ones the hon. member is referring—are in the process of consultation and deliberation with the provinces for the purpose of the formation of legislative policy. We are asking the provinces to comment on the various proposals that have been put to them.

MANPOWER

PURCHASE OF TRAINING AND FARM MANAGEMENT COURSES FOR FARMERS AND WIVES—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell us if training and farm management courses are still being offered to farmers for next year and if any negotiations are being carried out with the province of Quebec concerning the purchase of these courses?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of courses held by the provinces, including the province of Quebec, is now under review by the appropriate officials, and I shall probably be able to make a more meaningful statement in a few weeks' time.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In order to allow the farmers' wives to contribute more to the success of the farm business, would the Minister of Manpower and Immigration try and negotiate with the province of Quebec the purchase of these courses for them?

[English]

Mr. Mackasey: I will certainly take that suggestion under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Basford.]

HOUSING

UNIT MASONRY AWARDS—REASON FOR NON-PARTICIPATION OF DEPARTMENT AND CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister explain why his department or Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not involved in the recent national program of awards in the use of unit masonry sponsored by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the National Design Council, a technique which might cut building costs for homes?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Because the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is involved, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCleave: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since this program has the title of BEAM within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, would the minister direct some of that beam in the direction of his colleague?

FINANCE

NATURE OF TABLED ECONOMIC REVIEW—EFFECT ON TRADITIONAL METHOD OF PRESENTING BUDGET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. With the tabling of the document called "Economic Review", has the minister decided in his short period in office to change the traditional method of budget presentation in this House? Since this document is not yet available to hon. members, will the minister tell us whether this is the equivalent of the financial accounting as was part I of the economic papers?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a decision was taken some months ago in the Department of Finance, which I confirmed shortly after taking office, to replace the economic white paper which for many years has been tabled at the time of the budget. It was decided to replace the white paper with a new annual publication which is entitled "Economic Review". It will be issued regularly and independent of any budget. The publication of this first issue today is the result of that decision last fall and has nothing to do with when the next budget may be presented to parliament. That date will be announced to the House in due course.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, removing this operation from certain local smokescreens that are prevalent at this time, will the minister advise the House whether this document is now an in-house document of the Department of Finance to compete with the annual review of the Economic Council of Canada, to which certain officials of his department have taken exception when it has been critical of the policies of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, Sir, it is not. It deals with an economic review of the past fiscal year and some prospects as to the next fiscal year. In no way would it impinge upon the authority of the Economic Council of Canada to deal with medium and long-term economic prospects.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask a last supplementary question. Will the minister advise the House why the notice that this document would be released at twelve o'clock today to the press gallery was withdrawn summarily, with the indication that the document was not to be published today?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I can answer that question quite easily, Mr. Speaker. I believe a document ought to be tabled in the House before it is published anywhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS TO INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister of Finance is backing gently into a budget, will he advise the House whether it is his intention to table in the House those amendments to the tax reform bill which his predecessor guaranteed to the Senate would be brought in at the time he pressured that body into rapid passage of that bill, in order that we may decide whether they are clarifying or only cosmetic?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I consider myself bound by the commitments of my predecessor and I hope I will be able to fulfil them at the appropriate opportunity.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

WIRE ROPE INDUSTRIES STRIKE—ELIGIBILITY OF CERTAIN WORKERS FOR BENEFITS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is in charge of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It relates to a legal strike at Wire Rope Industries of Canada Limited, where steelworkers refused to cross a picket line. Yesterday a Supreme Court injunction in the province of British Columbia sent them back to work. Now they are being laid off by the company. Will the minister give an assurance that these people will not be declared ineligible for unemployment insurance? They have obeyed the law and gone back to work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now arguing the case. The minister should be allowed to reply to the question itself.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady makes a very eloquent advocate. She knows I cannot give her such assurance and she knows there is a procedure whereby we do not supply unemployment insurance to people who are on strike. The question of when a picket line interferes with a person's legitimate right to work is one that has often been referred to the board of referees. It is quite possible and conceivable that this would happen in this case, and I would not want to jeopardize the outcome by anything I might say in the House.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, will the minister investigate this matter himself with a view to seeing that fair procedures are followed?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, fair procedures are always followed in these matters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AGRICULTURE

OUTBREAK OF TAPEWORM INFECTION IN CATTLE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is he aware of the apparent outbreak of tapeworm infection in herds of cattle in southwestern Ontario?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and we have taken action to try to resolve this problem quickly.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, will the minister make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity, informing the House of the nature, the danger and extent of the disease, and the compensation to be paid owners of condemned animals?

• (1430)

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if that appears to be an appropriate thing to do. I should advise you, Sir, that we have to deal with outbreak of disease problems all over the country that are extremely important to the locality, and it has not been the practice to make a statement on motions as to how we have dealt with them.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF EXPROPRIATION NOTICES—PROVISION OF ADEQUATE TIME TO THOSE WISHING TO INTERVENE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport which is related to the proposed new airport in Pickering Township. As many of those who wish to appear before the hearing officers under the provisions of the Expropriation Act are anxious to know the time frame available to them for preparation, is the minister able to inform the House when notice of expropriation will be published in the Canada Gazette, which marks the first day of the 120-day expropriation period?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the specific date, but as for assuring there will be adequate time for intervention of any sort by any interested party I think I can assure the hon. member that we will certainly bear that in mind.

Mr. Cafik: I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the time frame at the moment could extend to as much as two or three months and considering the fact that this is causing uneasiness on the part of people in my riding, would it be possible for the minister to check this matter out with the Minister of Public Works, under whose responsibility the preliminary investigations are taking place, with a view to giving us an announcement at least indicating—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked the question and perhaps he might allow the minister an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think I got the gist of the question. The answer is yes. I will consult with the Minister of Public Works and we will try to get a specific date as quickly as possible.

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister, together with the hon. member for Ontario and the hon. member for York North, is meeting a deputation tomorrow morning from the neighbourhood of the proposed side of the new international airport and in view of the fact that the project eventually will cost several billions of dollars and will affect the whole region and indeed the whole of Canada, will the minister make sure that the information provided by him to the delegation tomorrow is made available to all hon. members as soon as possible?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member would suggest anything to the contrary. If I recall my words of Friday last, they certainly indicated that it is my intention to make it available, of course, to all members.

INQUIRY AS TO RAILWAY APPLICATION FOR GRAIN FREIGHT RATE INCREASE TO COVER COST OF ROLLING STOCK

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has there been any application, or does he have any knowledge of an application, by the railways for an increase in grain haulage charges in view of statements by senior railway officials that tariffs on grain haulage are not large enough to cover the cost of rolling stock?

Mr. Speaker: While the question is being considered by the government—the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Cafik.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member meant the Minister of Transport and he turned off when he heard my name mentioned. Perhaps the hon. member would repeat the question.

An hon. Member: He has been turned off for a long time.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. Has there been any application, or does he have any knowledge of an application, by the railways for an increase in grain haulage charges in view of statements by senior railway officials that tariffs on grain shipments are not large enough to cover the cost of rolling stock?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that claim was first made about 1890 something in respect of rolling stock and the cost of carrying grain. To my knowledge no such formal application has been made, but I will take a look and find out for the hon. member.

OIL

UNITED STATES POSITION REGARDING CANADA AS SOURCE OF SUPPLY

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When he was in Washington recently consulting with the United States Secretary of the Interior, was he informed that the United States administration did not regard Canada as being nearly as bright a prospect for oil imported by the United States as it did two or three years ago, as announced by Secretary Connally last week? If so, what reasons were given?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. Secretary Morton did not have the viewpoint of his colleague.

AIR CANADA

REASON FOR REDUCTION IN NUMBER OF FLIGHTS FROM WINNIPEG TO EUROPE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House and his deskmate why Air Canada has reduced the number of flights departing for Europe from the port of Winnipeg from two to one per week, thus inconveniencing western Canadians and increasing the congestion at the already overcrowded facilities at the ports of Toronto and Montreal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a question of this sort I have to take as notice and get a reply from Air Canada.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

NEW POLICY RESPECTING FOREIGN INVESTMENT—POSSIBLE LIMITATION OF BORROWING BY PROVINCES OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, replying to a question about investment policy, he said that announcement of this policy would come sooner and clearer than anything said in this House so far. Well, can the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House whether his government intends to restrict powers of provinces wishing to contract certain loans outside Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is something we cannot do without changing the constitution itself, but it is common knowledge that the previous Minister of Finance had suggested that the provinces, in so far as possible, restrict their external loans because of their effect on the rate of the Canadian dollar. By and large, the minister, I believe, reported to the House that the provinces were being co-operative in this field. The government has no intention of forcing the provinces into any action whatsoever in an area which comes under both provincial and federal jurisdiction.

UTILIZATION OF BANK OF CANADA TO ASSURE DEVELOPMENT —DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

In view of what he has just said concerning the financial problems of the provinces and increasing provincial and federal debts, I would like to ask him whether he intends to consider before long with provincial authorities the eventual recourse to the credit of the Bank of Canada to ensure the normal development of the country and reduce our rising foreign debt?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this question has already been asked and, if I am not mistaken, no constructive and relevant solution has been put forward even from Créditiste provincial premiers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POSSIBILITY OF PROVINCES BORROWING FROM BANK OF CANADA

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

Does the Prime Minister mean that if the provinces asked to be allowed to borrow from the Bank of Canada, the government would agree?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just said that that theory, of which we only have a glimpse here, is not even applied by the government elected to apply it. I therefore cannot answer about a hypothesis as remote from reality as is that of the member.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Social Credit provinces have already asked, and the federal government stated the possibility was ultra vires, that the provinces have their own credit to ensure their own development.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a debate between the hon. member and other hon. members.

TRADE

SUGGESTED REVAMPING OF EXHIBIT IN JAPAN TO PROMOTE CANADIAN EXPORTS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the prime importance of expanding Canadian trade with Japan, can the minister inform the House whether, after the dismal performance of Can Ten in Japan, the whole program will be revamped to emphasize Canadian business opportunities rather than pop art figurines and psychedelic art?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubts regarding the form of the question, but the minister seems anxious to reply and perhaps he should be allowed to do so.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am trying to reconcile the different parts of the question and to answer the constructive ones and not the others. With respect to the exhibit in Japan, the question should be addressed to another minister. I am not passing the buck. The buck has already been passed because the Exhibition Commission is no longer under the jurisdiction of my department; it has been under Information Canada for a couple of years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: I do not know about the exhibit because I have not seen it. It was not a trade exhibit but a cultural exhibit, I understand.

On the subject of trade with Japan, I think we are experiencing difficulties now with our exports to Japan because production in Japan is undergoing a slowdown. It is expected that things will pick up in Japan in the coming months and that consequently our exports should too.

Mr. Danforth: In view of the prime importance of demonstrating in Japan every availability of business opportunities for Canadians and for industrial output to Japan, will the minister, since his department is involved financially, look into the matter to see whether this exhibit cannot be used for more useful purposes?

Mr. Pepin: Since my department is not involved financially, I will have to pass the buck to whoever is responsible—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ASSISTANCE TO COMMISSION TO RETAIN RIDEAU STREET CONVENT AS HISTORIC SITE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in connection with his responsibility for matters relating to the national capital. In view of the interest of the National Capital Commission in preserving at least a part of the Rideau Street Convent as an historic site, is the minister taking steps to assist the National Capital Commission in achieving this goal?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): There was an attempt to work with the owner of the property for the preservation of the building and that failed. That is where the matter stands now, except that I understand there have been some discussions with the Historic Sites and Monuments Board.

OFFER OF GOOD OFFICES BY UNITED NATIONS SECRETARY GENERAL RESPECTING VIET NAM WAR—CANADIAN POSITION—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): My question is directed to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister. In light of the initiative taken by the Secretary General of the United Nations in making available his good offices in the settlement of the regrettably escalating conflict in Viet Nam, can the minister advise the House whether the Canadian government was consulted on this matter and whether it is lending its support and encouragement to the Secretary General in his efforts toward bringing to an end this tragic and long continued conflict and, if so, have the views of this government been conveyed to the government of the United States?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I will take notice of that question on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

POLICY RESPECTING MAINTENANCE OF FREE FLOATING CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the upward movement of the Canadian dollar with respect to the United States dollar despite the assurances given to the contrary by the previous minister of finance—

Mr. Benson: Be careful.

Mr. Baldwin: He heard you.

Mr. Stanfield: —I should like to ask the present Minister of Finance whether it is his policy to continue to maintain a free floating dollar, to maintain the clean float followed by the previous minister?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the policy followed by my prodecessor was clean and it remains a clean float.

THREAT FROM PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—REQUEST FOR RENEWED REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES, INCLUDING LIMITATION OF TANKER CAPACITY

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that I have not given him notice of it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Groos: Observing that operations were commenced yesterday by United States authorities to survey the waters in the approaches to Bellingham, Washington, and off the Cherry Point refinery to a depth of 90 feet to allow for the safe passage of 500,000 ton oil tankers, and observing that these tankers would be four times as large as those now being built for the possible servicing of the Cherry Point refinery from Valdez, Alaska, will the Prime Minister make known once again to the United States government the Canadian government's increasing concern and apprehension over the possible use of the Juan de Fuca route for massive shipments of oil and at the same time—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that a question such as this one is so long as to qualify more as a speech than a question. I would invite the hon. member and others who ask questions which in my estimation are too long to attempt to shorten them to reasonable limits.

Mr. Groos: I apologize for the length of the question but I felt that perhaps some explanation was necessary. The nub of the question is whether the Prime Minister would make known our concern over this matter, and in particular would do his utmost to persuade the United States government to set a maximum limit on the capacity of tankers permitted to use this route?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for drawing this very important matter to my attention. He might be relieved to know, and so would his constituents, that in the meetings I had with President Nixon a couple of weeks ago we did discuss this matter of shipping on the Pacific and indeed on the Atlantic coasts, and the desirability of referring that subject to the International Joint Commission. The Secretary of State for External Affairs also discussed the matter at some length with his opposite number, Mr. Rogers, and I am sure these considerations will be percolating down from the top of the American administration to other levels of government.

VIET NAM WAR—PLANS FOR POSSIBLE EVACUATION OF CANADIANS IN VIEW OF INCREASED HOSTILITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister in view of the absence today of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the increased hostilities in Viet Nam, is any effort being made to assess the situation of Canadians in Viet Nam and the possible need for an evacuation program, and more specifically the situation with regard to Canadian aid projects such as hospitals and the like in Viet Nam? I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be in a position shortly to give a detailed report on this question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will be happy to take notice of this important question on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

POLLUTION

THREAT FROM PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Victoria and I wish to direct it to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether as a result of his meeting with President Nixon the International Joint Commission will be instructed to expand its role to deal with pollution problems on both coasts and whether it will be dealing with the possible pollution danger from the TAPS tanker route should it proceed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Some parts of the question may have escaped me but I think I got the gist of it. What I said was that I had discussed the subject with the President and made the suggestion from the Canadian side about the International Joint Commission. There was no American response to that particular suggestion beyond the one that they would look at the matter. On the general subject of pollution, I repeat that the President shared the concern that we have and indicated that his own government was looking into all these matters. Indeed, this was demonstrated the next day by the signing by the President himself of the agreement concerning pollution in the Great Lakes.

Mr. Speaker: We will be running short of time in a few moments. The hon. member for Athabasca will be recognized on a supplementary, and then we will move on to the hon. member for Brant.

THREAT FROM PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—APPROVAL OF POSSIBLE APPLICATION TO BUILD PIPELINE DOWN MACKENZIE VALLEY

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the Canadian government has indicated a preference for the Mackenzie Valley route, can the minister indicate whether, on the basis of the research information that has been collected, he is now in a position to approve an application for the construction of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley and, if not, how soon he expects to be in a position to do so?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Under our system, application for a pipeline approval is made not to me but to the National Energy Board. The chairman has been responding to questions on this point in the standing committee dealing with my departmental estimates. I have indicated in previous statements that as soon as this season's field studies have been completed in the north we would anticipate that by about the end of 1972 the board would be in a position to entertain applications. That is to say, we will have been able to put the board in possession of all the requisite information. I would refer the hon. member to the details of the over 30 studies which are now being carried on into the various aspects of the pipeline, which were tabled in the House several weeks ago.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF RESOURCE INDUSTRIES—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact the minister is reported between quotes in the Globe and Mail as having said last Saturday in Elliott Lake that the government policy on foreign ownership of resource industries will be announced "in about seven weeks", and in view of the fact the Prime Minister yesterday informed the House that the minister made no mention of seven weeks, would the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources care to search his memory and clarify this issue for the House?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have done so and I can confirm that the report was mistaken.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What did you say?

Mr. Blackburn: Whatever date might have been mentioned by the minister, would he care to inform the House whether the policy on foreign ownership of resource industries will be a part of the over-all government policy on foreign ownership?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I made no reference to a policy on the foreign ownership of resource industries. I made reference to a policy which has already been announced in the House several times with respect to both an energy policy to come forward later this year and also a mineral policy. I also made reference in the same interview to the fact that my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, will undoubtedly be bringing documents before the House in the near future on the question of foreign ownership. My surmise is that the reporter put the two statements together.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and then the hon. member for Bellechasse.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that a month has passed since the expiration of the contract with the postal unions, will the hon. gentleman be making a progress statement to the House on the matter in order to ease the tension referred to by the president of the Letter Carriers' Union recently?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Postmaster General): A report on the negotiations?

Mr. Dinsdale: That is my question—in view of the growing tension referred to by the president of the Letter Carriers' Union recently.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: Has the government yet made a specific offer on job security and wages to the postal unions in the negotiations?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I think it was the desire of the postal unions that this problem not be discussed in the House.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED INSUFFICIENCY OF MILK PRODUCTION—SUGGESTED MODIFICATION OF QUOTA STANDARDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since milk production will be inadequate for the requirements of this country during the next season, will the minister recommend to the CDC some changes in the standards governing the allocation of subsidy quotas?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have already announced that later this year, when we get into the heavy production season, if the demand level and the production level are such that it would be possible, we will consider re-introducing the 10 per cent over-quota threshhold before applying the holdback.

AIR TRANSPORT

COMPULSORY INSTALLATION OF CRASH POSITION INDICATORS IN PLANES

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Several months ago the minister indicated he was going to establish in Canada a list of criteria and regulations for the compulsory installation of crash position indicators. We never heard any more of this and I would like to know whether the minister is ready to table that list of regulations at this time?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Not the regulations, Mr. Speaker. I met last week with the Canadian owners and pilots association who undertook within a matter of a few days to give me a statement on how this might practically be advanced. I would hope to have that information fairly soon.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling orders of the day the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST FOR ACTION FOLLOWING REMARK BY JUDGE CONCERNING INDIANS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is really for the Minister of Justice but as he is not here and because of its importance I would refer it to the Prime Minister. I refer to the press release by the Native Council of Canada who are quite perturbed at how quickly the provincial government moved regarding a Justice of the Peace and how slowly the federal government is moving regarding Judge George Collins who apparently has insulted the entire native population of Canada with his description, "just another stupid Indian"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, who I am sure is aware of the peculiar anomaly that exists, if he would advise the Minister of Justice to deal with this matter immediately so that we can be informed of the government's thinking regarding Judge Collins and the statement that he made, particularly in view of how quickly the province of Ontario moved in similar circumstances?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to comment on the circumstances described by the hon. member but I shall be glad to remind the Minister of Justice about this matter and have him pursue it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal will now propose a motion.

SPECIAL ORDER

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—MOTION REQUESTING INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES TO ADOPT MEASURES TO ENSURE SURVIVAL OF SPECIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, as provided by Standing Order 43, I move:

Whereas the Atlantic salmon is the most threatened fish in the North Atlantic,

And whereas only by a concerted international effort can an agreement be reached to protect salmon from being over-fished,

And whereas it is the position of the government of Canada that Canada has the exclusive right to harvest salmon that spawn in Canadian rivers,

This Canadian House of Commons calls on all the nations participating in the International Commission for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Meeting in Washington, D.C. in May, 1972 to agree that the survival of the Atlantic salmon as a species is of paramount concern and to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure such survival.

Mr. Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for South Shore, and without getting involved in any way in the procedural difficulties, I think I ought to point out to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) that the "whereas" clause in the motion should not properly be part of the motion itself. The motion should begin with the word "that" and that would be the last paragraph. The hon. member's motion would be "that this Canadian House of Commons etc." I do not mention this in order to cause any difficulty but merely by way of guidance in the drafting of motions.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in support of the resolution moved by my colleague the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather). As stated yesterday, many of us on this side of the House were surprised and concerned at the announcement made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) which outlined the unilateral action being taken by this government to close the commercial salmon fishery in parts of Atlantic Canada. I say we were surprised, Mr. Speaker, because this action can only create further unemployment in Atlantic Canada, an area which has already suffered greatly as a result of the actions of this government.

This action, which will affect, according to the minister, some 900 commercial fishermen in Atlantic Canada certainly leaves them in grave doubt concerning their financial future. Quite frankly, I am concerned over the timing of the minister's announcement. I say this because he is well aware of the meeting to be held by ICNAF, the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries in Washington in May. At this meeting there will or should be delegates from Canada, from Denmark, France, Germany, Iceland, Italy, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Spain, the U.S.S.R., Great Britain, the U.S.A. and Japan, the 15 nations who are members of the international commission.

These countries are all members of ICNAF or the Northeastern Atlantic Fisheries Convention known as NEAFC and should all be there. Under these conventions, the North Atlantic fishing nations are pledged to co-operate in protecting and conserving the fish stocks of the North Atlantic. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the representations which have been made by Canada, by the United States of America and by other concerned countries, should have served notice on all ICNAF members that not only were our own salmon stocks in danger of extinction but that this danger applied to haddock, sole, cod, herring and many other species as well. However, today, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a motion concerning our salmon and salmon fishermen, and I cannot help but wonder why this government and this minister took unilateral action against our own Canadian salmon fishermen when we are so close to the date of the international meeting in Washington. Hopefully, at that meeting we can obtain an international agreement leading to the use of common sense in conserving one of our basic resources.

As was said in the House yesterday and as is well known, the Danes are the worst offenders with regard to overfishing, followed by the Norwegians and the Swedes. Ever since the whereabouts at sea of our Atlantic salmon became known in the late 1950's and the early 1960's, because United States atomic submarines went under the ice in Davis Strait between Greenland and Baffin Island, on their way to the North Pole and saw millions of salmons suspended like icicles on the bottom of icebergs and iceflows, feeding on small shrimp, the fate of the Atlantic salmon has been sealed.

In 1965, the first year of the deep sea fishery, a total of 50 metric tons was caught in Davis Strait. By 1971, the catch had risen to 2,050 metric tons, or more than 4 million pounds. The impact of this excessive fishery on Canada is great. Our angling catch is down by 50 per cent.

Between 1966 and 1971 it declined by 50 per cent. Of great importance is the fact that between 1967 and 1971, Canadian commercial fishing, which accounts for almost 94 per cent of the total catch, has gone down by 60 per cent. The Danes claim that this is due to normal fluctuations; however, the constant decline in this resource would indicate otherwise. The development of the northern fishery and the steady decline of salmon stocks should indicate to Canadians and to other countries that this decline is simply not a coincidence.

We, as Canadians, have suffered in other ways, Mr. Speaker. We have suffered from the overfishing by the Danes, which has led to a loss in our own commercial fishery. This has lowered the incomes of our own commercial salmon fishermen. We have lost in yet other ways. In Atlantic Canada, we can no longer hold out the hope to tourists, whether they come from the United States or central Canada, that in Atlantic Canada they can catch salmon, the king of North Atlantic fish. The salmon was a great tourist attraction in our area, and the government's failure to act ever since the whereabouts at sea of the salmon became known in 1964-65 has cost us quite a penny in more ways than one, Mr. Speaker.

As the situation continues to deteriorate, another problem has come strongly into focus. Obviously, the Canadian taxpayer is subsidizing the Danish fishing fleet, at a time when other tax dollars are being spent to overcome threats to salmon while they are in Canadian waters. We are spending our tax dollars on pollution abatement, dam removal, surveillance and on the installation of fish ladders around natural and man-made obstacles. In addition, large amounts are being spent on continuing salmon research facilities. Since the Danes have no salmon rivers of their own, it is obvious that they are catching our salmon because without the enormous cost that is being paid to protect and improve our rivers, there would simply be no salmon.

This government must recognize that the Atlantic salmon is a very valuable natural resource. It must point out to all nations fishing in the North Atlantic that this fish is unique. It is entirely dependent on its river of origin for survival. This, Mr. Speaker, is a characteristic that is found in very few species of fish. We should—actually, we must—take the stand, unilaterally if necessary, that anadromous species such as salmon belong to the country of origin. We plead with the government to take that stand and we recommend that the minister make that position known forcefully when he attends the conference, which I hope is his intention, which is to be convened in May.

It is my understanding that a ban on high seas salmon fishing has been thoroughly examined by all the governments represented in ICNAF since Canada first raised the proposition in ICNAF during the 1967 meeting. A two-thirds majority of ICNAF and NEAFC members found the ban to be justifiable in terms of the powers of the two conventions, and the ban has been in legal effect for 12 members of ICNAF since early 1970. A few governments, namely, the Danish, the Norwegian and I believe the Swedish, continue to oppose the ban. This brings into question the over-all effectiveness of these two commissions and their ability to protect adequately our declining fishing resources.

[Mr. Crouse.]

It simply does not make sense for a few nations to make virtually all of the investment required to conserve and protect the Atlantic salmon while others reap a harvest from this fishery to which they have made no significant investment. In my opinion, if the Danes or any other country continue to fish our salmon on the high seas, we shall have to consider making a charge against them on a tonnage basis for salmon resource development as long as that resource lasts. It is my understanding that the Danish government has already given Canada a token contribution to help in salmon research, which indicates that their actions are already weighing heavily on their consciences. However, we have passed the stage at which we can talk of international quotas on our salmon. Only a total ban on international salmon fishing is acceptable to Canada. Only with the co-operation of Canadian anglers, anglers from other countries, the commercial fishing industry and all other users of our rivers can the king of fish be saved.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I feel the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has given an excellent summary of our position regarding the Atlantic salmon situation today. I am happy to join him in saying a few words in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

Perhaps I should preface my remarks, particularly for the benefit of those who live on the Pacific coast of Canada where the salmon fishery is also of very great importance, by saying that when we talk about the Atlantic salmon we are talking about a different kind of fish than that usually referred to as salmon in British Columbia. I remind hon. members of the House that the fish on the Pacific coast that is most like the Atlantic salmon is the one we call steelhead, or the Pacific steelhead trout.

The question we are discussing today has been brought forward in a unique way. I hope the significance of this motion, after it has been passed unanimously by this House, as I hope it will be, will not escape the international community of nations that is concerned about the North Atlantic fishery. According to my recollection, what we are doing today in dealing with fisheries matters constitutes a "first". The things that are happening in the oceans of the world are coming more to the fore. I hope that responsible ministers and representatives of Canada who will attend the forthcoming meeting of the International Commission in Washington will not only draw attention to this resolution but draw to the attention of the other members of the commission everything said on this subject in this House yesterday and today.

In my hand I hold the most recent issue of International Wildlife, published by the National Wildlife Federation of the United States. In it there is an article by Thor Heyerdahl which, although not referring specifically to salmon as such, is pertinent. Referring to the Atlantic ocean and his impressions on crossing, the author says:

> Crossing the Atlantic on a papyrus boat, one is impressed not so much with the vastness of the ocean as by the fact that it is so very much smaller than we usually think it is . . .
> Although we are living in the era of moon travel, we cling to the pre-Columbian concept of an endless ocean running into the blue space of the universe. We do not admit to ourselves that the oceans are "landlocked" with all the sewers and all the refuse of the world constantly running into them, without any outlet. We have almost destroyed Lake Erie and Lake Michigan, yet the Indians who lived on its shores centuries ago would have believed this impossible.

• (1510)

We hold political discussions on whether we should be permitted to dump waste inside or outside territorial waters. But there is no "territorial water" in an ocean; it is constantly rotating like a boiling pot.

As I said, that quotation does not directly refer to the situation of the Atlantic salmon, but it at least gives some picture of the body of water we are discussing when talking about a ban on the high seas fishing of salmon in the Atlantic.

The International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries is in many ways a rather unique organization, particularly as far as fisheries international organizations are concerned, because of the number of nations that are participating in it. I hope that the crisis which has developed in Canada with regard to the salmon fishery as a result of the minister's announcement yesterday, will impress the members of the commission with not only its uniqueness but its weakness. I suggest that very pertinent to the forthcoming meetings in Washington to discuss the salmon question may be an analysis of the weaknesses in the operation of the commission.

While the number of nations participating in some fishing conventions for the Pacific is smaller, nevertheless in actual practice they are in some ways much more effective because of the agreement on the actual take of fish. If one has any familiarity with the operation of the International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission and its work in restoring very severely damaged runs of Fraser river salmon, and any knowledge of the fact that at one time the North Pacific halibut was being fished almost to the point of extinction, both of which were brought back to fisheries that yielded major sources of food, he can understand the basic weaknesses of the North Atlantic set-up which has sparked the situation which is the subject matter of this motion.

I hope that as a result of the passage of this motion, which involves agreement that the survival of the Atlantic salmon as a species is of paramount concern and refers, to taking whatever steps are necessary to ensure such survival, there will be, some real down-to-earth discussion by members of the commission meeting in Washington that will lead to the kind of revision of the North Atlantic Fisheries Convention that is necessary if it is to be an effective operating vehicle for the preservation of the resources of the North Atlantic.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) announced yesterday the radical decision which he made unilaterally regarding commercial salmon fishing in the great Saint John, Miramichi and Restigouche rivers.

In fact, the minister has banned salmon fishing for a six-year period to be determined with the fishermen themselves. This is fine and it provides enough time for a complete cycle in order sufficiently to replenish stocks in rivers so that commercial fishing may be resumed.

Over 900 fishermen will thus lose their employment and their income. The problem is extremely serious.

Mr. Speaker, the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries (ICNAF), of which Canada and Denmark are members, was to watch the situation. But nothing has been done and this commission has been an utter failure; meanwhile, the federal government has failed to intervene to assure the conservation of marine resources under a short- and long-term planning policy. It has done nothing essentially, although it was aware of the situation. The minister himself admitted it yesterday when he said, and I quote:

Historically, the total mainland take accounted for approximately one-half of the over-all catch of Atlantic salmon by Canadians. This volume has been sharply reduced. It has fallen by more than 80 per cent since 1967. On the Miramichi, where escapements formerly were measured in the tens of thousands of large fish, they are now measured in the hundreds.

Why then did the minister not foresee this, since he was aware of the situation, and why did he not act for the conservation of our resources? Why also did he not propose a sensible policy to ensure the development of those resources?

On the other hand, Danish fishermen are operating in our fishing grounds. What is the government doing? Nothing. Has it protested? Not to our knowledge. What does it intend to do? It is taking a unilateral decision and saying to the fishermen: "Commercial fishing will no longer be allowed in our waters, but compensation will be paid to you."

Mr. Speaker, a meeting will be held in Washington in May 1972 about that problem. My colleagues from the Social Credit party of Canada and myself strongly support the resolution introduced today and we encourage the minister to take an extremely firm and clear stand at the meetings of that Commission.

It is time that foreigners learn that the Canadian people believe in natural resources and intend by all possible means to protect them, especially the huge marine resources which are wasted, due to our lack of a conservation or development policy.

Mr. Speaker, Canada must again protect the runs and the minister knows it. Indeed, I would like to hear the minister, as the situation is serious, state the means which he intends to take to assure the future protection of runs.

We must, on the other hand, compensate adequately fishermen whose income is now almost wiped out.

Third, we must in Canada, in view of the length of this period during which fishing will be banned, provide assistance and retraining for these 900 fishermen, namely the breadwinners, so as to enable them to provide for their own needs. To sum it up, this new measure will create 900 more unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, this question is too important to become a matter of partisan politics. I will conclude my remarks by urging strongly the minister to take a firm stand at the meetings to be held in Washington in May, so that foreigners will realize that Canadians intend to take every possible means at their disposal to ensure the respect of international agreements.

Denmark had signed this treaty, but did not respect it. And salmon fishing on the high seas has contributed directly to a loss of employment for 900 individuals in the Maritimes, which is extremely serious.

I would therefore urge the minister to take an extremely firm stand in Washington in order to create awareness of what Canadians want, what they need. I ask him to see that studies are set aside and that a very explicit policy is adopted for the preservation of our resources. First of all, they must be assessed, after which a policy of short and long-term preservation and adequate operation should be adopted so that future generations do not face the same problems we have today.

If the minister and his precedessors and the government had taken the necessary action as soon as it became known that the existence of salmon was at stake, and if at that time they had insisted on observance of the treaty, we probably should not be faced with the present problem.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that the minister will take a firm stand in Washington so that, once and for all, foreigners may become aware that Canada possesses immense resources. There is no reason why in Canada, with such vast resources, some of our citizens should suffer unemployment or poverty just because of our failure to preserve our resources by adequate operation.

[English]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to second the motion put forward by the member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) which, in effect, condemns the harvesting of salmon on the high seas. Canada's position for 20 years, has been that the harvesting of species like salmon, which return home to spawn, should take place in or near the rivers themselves. Unless a policy of that kind is followed there is no incentive to maintain the stock, to keep the species alive, and to keep it alive and in a healthy state.

The Atlantic salmon, in marked contrast to the Pacific salmon, is now in the category of an endangered species. This is true particularly of the large Atlantic salmon which spawns in our mainland rivers, in the Maritimes and in Quebec. At one time the Atlantic salmon ran in great numbers in all of the rivers of Europe. Now, few streams see salmon returning to their numbers diminish every year. Salmon used to run in the rivers of New England, including the Hudson. They used to run up the St. Lawrence, up the Ottawa past Parliament Hill, up into Lake Ontario. They vanished from those areas decades ago.

The remaining rivers to which the large Atlantic salmon return in quantity are those of New Brunswick and Quebec. We have taken an important step in recent days by closing these fisheries. The main purpose is to ensure that the endangered species survives, and that these rivers are brought back into a condition as near as possible to that of their original state. It is possible for this to be done. It has been done with respect to rivers on the west coast of Canada. I might add that on the west coast we have been able to maintain salmon runs at or about the level of the 1920s. Now, they are actually increasing, despite heavy fishing and industrialization. Clearly, it is possible to bring our runs back in the Atlantic region as well.

For the benefit of the hon. members from Newfoundland, most of the salmon that return to the streams of Newfoundland and Labrador are one year fish. They don't go to Greenland. The ones that do go to Greenland are two year fish from the mainland. There, they are fished in large numbers by the Scandinavians, the Danes, the Norwegians and the Faroese. The big mainland salmon are the ones which concern us most. This is why we are concentrating on the Saint John, the Miramichi and the Restigouche. This is why the Province of Quebec will have to take similar measures on some of its big rivers as well.

There has been a dramatic decline in the return of large salmon to those mainland rivers, a drop of more than 80 per cent since 1967. This cannot be allowed to continue.

There are two reasons for this decline. First, there is the greed of Scandinavian countries, principally the Danes, but also latterly the Norwegians and to some extent the Faroese. They must stop fishing on the high seas. And after they stop, we still have the problem of bringing the stocks back. We will have to interrupt our own commercial fishery at the mouths of our rivers. There is no way in which we can allow dozens of boats, each dragging a half a mile of netting behind it, to cruise backward and forward across the mouths of those rivers, and still expect these runs to come back quickly. This is why we have taken the decision, one which was discussed with the ministers of fisheries from the maritimes and Newfoundland, and with fishermen's representatives over recent weeks, to close the fishery for a period of years. We are going to pay compensation. We are going to make funds available in an amount which is greater than the recent annual earnings of commercial fishermen to those who are affected by our ban. We shall be establishing committees of fishermen and river management committees to help us bring back these stocks. We shall employ fishermen who want jobs as river guardians in the policing of the waters. We shall pay others for their gear, or make cash settlements. We will help all fishermen to participate in other fisheries as long as the ban lasts.

The main note I wish to strike is one of optimism with regard to the long term future. We intend to get these salmon runs back, and this is the only way to do it. Had we simply curtailed the length of the season, we should merely have cut the income of fishermen. Their incomes would have been cut back without compensation. Actually, the compensation which we are offering will offset the loss of income of the fishermen during the period in which they are not allowed to fish, and when the runs revive, these men will have the opportunity to go back and fish a new, much larger run of large salmon. This is an approach which the fishermen themselves prefer because they will be much better off in the short term and long term, than they would be if they were allowed to fish the salmon to extinction.

I think the behaviour of Denmark is reprehensible. We have had meetings with the Danes both within the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries and bilaterally. In 1970, in the ICNAF meetings, an agreement was reached with the Danes that they should hold the 1971 catch at their 1969 level. They were not to put more gear into the water, for example. In 1971 their catch went up by approximately 30 per cent. There are a number of reasons why this was so. My officials tell me that they used more gear and they fished more frequently. The mesh they used was finer, they improved their fishing methods. They changed over to monofilament yarn in the nets and were better informed last year—they knew more about the fishery. These are the reasons their catch went up by 30 per cent. The Danes landed more of these large salmon than all our mainland commercial fishermen combined. Obviously, we have to stop the Danes from fishing on this scale. We have to stop Norway getting into this fishery as it has done in the last few years.

I might tell the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) that Sweden is not in this fishery. The Faroese are. Through ICNAF we must convince them, through the pressure of public opinion we must prevent them—

Mr. Lundrigan: In what year?

Mr. Davis: This year, 1972. From now on. The United States has, for some inexplicable reason, decided to enter into an agreement with Denmark for the Danes to phase out by December 31, 1975. Well, four years is three years too many. They have got to stop now.

• (1530)

As hon. members know, our next opportunity to sit across the table from the Danes is in Washington toward the end of next month. At that time 14 nations assemble, all of them nations that fish the North Atlantic. At that time, we will be talking to the Danes. Last time round the vote was 12 to 2 in our favour, but the Danes, supported by West Germany, decided to go against our resolution, the traditional Canadian resolution, to ban salmon fishing on the high seas; in other words, to limit the catching of salmon to those countries that look after their rivers. We were proposing to look after those countries that clean up and police their salmon streams, that build hatcheries and ensure their spawning grounds are kept in good condition. This has been our policy for many years; all hon. members know that. But we have not yet managed to convince the greedier nations of the world to go along with the protection of what is really an endangered species.

To give some idea of the decline of the salmon fishery, the total salmon fishery on the east coast is only about one-twentieth the size of the salmon fishery on the west coast. It has reached that condition because of man's greed, yet there are still greedy people around who want to eliminate the species altogether. At least, that is the likely effect of their actions if they are allowed to continue their current practices.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, we will be meeting the Danes in Washington along with the representatives from another dozen countries. We hope that we will be able to convince them to stop fishing this summer, not next summer or the following summer, but this summer. We have managed through FAO to arrange an international meeting, a meeting of all the world's fishing nations, in Vancouver next February. We will be talking primarily about the management of the world's fishing resources, and we will be talking about salmon again. We will be underlining our case for salmon to be fished only by those countries that look after their own rivers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize the fact that we have been in touch with the fishermen, and the fishermen agree with our approach. It is the only approach that will save the Atlantic salmon, and I hope that the Danes, the Norwegians and the Faroese get the message spelled out in this unanimous resolution of the House of Commons of Canada.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The order of the House was that 10 minutes would be allowed each member to speak on behalf of his political group. This time has now expired.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: That could be done with the unanimous consent of the House, otherwise we would be contravening the order made by the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I listened with interest to the minister's statement, and I am wondering whether he will put on the record the three countries in ICNAF who have not followed the request of the entire convention to desist from fishing salmon on the North Atlantic.

Mr. Davis: In actual voting, Mr. Speaker, only Denmark and West Germany opposed Canada's resolution last year and the year before. Of the two, only Denmark is fishing for salmon. The West Germans say that there should be freedom to fish on the high seas as a matter of principle, so they voted with the Danes though they do not fish for salmon. The Norwegians voted with us, even though they fish for salmon.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it my understanding that the motion proposed by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal was to be seconded by the Minister of Fisheries? Is that the agreement among hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, and the amendment (Mr. Lewis) p. 1448.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, when I was discussing this particular motion the other night, I was pointing out to the House that there were two important considerations here. One was that universality—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has the floor. It is my understanding that we have completed the previous debate and that we are now on a new item of business.

Mr. Gleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the concerns of the members of this party is the loss of universality under the provisions of this bill. The second concern we have is the unworkability of the proposals before us. We realize we are in the computer age, and that calculations can be made today that a few years ago would never have been undertaken on a mass scale affecting 20 million Canadians. But even with this change, it is very probable that the bill will be unworkable because of the calculations that will have to be made in connection with the incomes of Canadian families. Incomes vary a great deal from family to family, from one year to the next year, and even within the course of one year.

A matter that gives me great concern is this: We have recently been experiencing the repercussions of the new Unemployment Insurance Act which introduced some new concepts. One was the provision of sickness benefits, while another related to the taking into account of holiday pay and severance pay. When one realizes how badly these provisions fouled up procedures and settlements that were due to people who had paid their insurance, one understands what can result from a bill such as this.

Those individuals who apply for unemployment insurance are people who have paid money into the fund. They are not asking for charity; rather they go to the unemployment insurance office to claim benefits that are due to them. I have at different times received reports from people who have made a claim for benefits but have run into difficulty, either because those administering the system have not adjusted to the changes, or because there is real difficulty in calculating benefits in certain areas. In addition, those who apply for benefits sometimes find themselves treated as mendicants, as people who are asking for a grant or a gift from the state. This should not be, but the proposals in this bill could very well put a number of people in the same position.

[Mr. Speaker.]

• (1540)

There is no question about it, all families will have to establish what their income was in any year in order to collect, and the responsibility will fall on them to do so. The bill reads, in part:

> Where at any time during the first eleven months of a benefit year, other than the fourth month, or during the eighth month period next before that benefit year a parent
> (a) ceases to hold an office or employment previously held by him or ceases to carry on a business previously carried on by him, or
> (b) for any other reason suffers a loss or reduction of income,
> as a result of which event or occurrence it is reasonable to expect that the income of the family for the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place or for the next following calendar year will be substantially reduced, the parents may, in such manner and within such time as are prescribed, file a statement of the estimated income of the family for the calendar year in which the event or occurrence took place, in which case the income of the family received during that part of the calendar year after the month in which the event or occurrence took place divided by the number of months in that part of that calendar year and multiplied by twelve shall be deemed to be the income of the family for the base calendar year.

If anybody was able to follow the sense of that section after the first sentence, he should stand up and take a bow. The clause provides that parents may, in such case, file a statement, but what happens if they do not? When they ask for their payments will some clerk or other person in the department say, "you did not file a statement"? Is this compulsory or is it not? Will the individual have to establish what his income may have been or is going to be? He is supposed to file a statement outlining what the reasonable expectations are for the family income for the calendar year. There are many people who have no basis upon which to make a forecast of their income. This is just not possible for many people who are self-employed or farming, about which I know something. You cannot reasonably expect them to forecast their incomes within close enough limits to serve the purposes of this bill, yet this is what they will be asked to do. Somebody must have drafted this bill. Did that person or the minister not realize it would not be possible for these people to forecast their incomes within reasonable limits?

I had been in this House for only a year and a half when the minister responsible for the post office adopted a policy of closing a number of rural post offices and a five-day work-week. I spent the better part of two years, off and on, fighting to keep open certain rural post offices in my constituency, which in my opinion, and the opinion of those people who lived there, were essential to the needs of the people. My batting average was about 25 per cent. For every one I persuaded the postmaster and those concerned at that time to keep open, probably two or three were closed. Now, the minister says this was a very bad mistake. The department should not have closed so many rural post offices, and should not have gone to a five-day week. He says some action will have to be taken to correct this mistake. Let me suggest to the government that the injustices it visited upon those people will not be corrected by this government. The injustices done to those people who received as little as $2,500 or $3,000 annually for running a post office in a community, and who were let out will not be corrected.

It is about time the government became aware of human factors, that it is not dealing with statistics but with flesh and blood people, who think, run, walk, sit and eat. They are not puppets that which, when the strings are pulled, bob up and down. It does not matter how many times you jerk the string of a puppet, it will bob up and down. However, if you are dealing with people and you jerk them around, it hurts. You might hurt them to the extent that the injury cannot easily be remedied. This might be the effect of the legislation now before the House.

Let me read you another part of this bill:

Where payment of a benefit is approved in respect of a benefit year, the benefit is payable for each month in that year commencing with the month following the month in which the application therefor is received, but if a benefit would have been payable before that month if an application therefor had been made, then the benefit is payable for each month commencing with the latter of

(a) the 11th month preceding the month in which the application was received; and

(b) the month in which a benefit would first have been payable if an application therefor had been made.

If hon. members were able to follow the sense of this bill, they must be pretty good. I have seen similar provisions in other bills proposed in respect of agricultural matters. As a result, we get programs like Lift. After these programs are in operation for a little while, we see a repetition of the post office scheme. A farmer or businessman operating a farm will say that the program is not working and ask that something be done about it. The government then begins to work its way through a tangle of bureaucracy to straighten out the program.

Let me say in all honesty to the minister that this is an unworkable proposition. I would be much better for Canadians if we continued to use the method we are now using. We should have universal payments which are tied to the cost of living in order that family allowances can keep pace with whatever degree of inflation occurs. If it is thought that this is a good method of supplementing income, two principles should be observed. Universality and the rate of inflation should be taken into account in respect of family allowances and old age pensions. The government should, when setting the tax rate, keep these principles in mind in order to take back the surplus at the upper end as well as look after the needs at the lower end.

I do not understand why there is such great concern to limit payments of this kind. The people who get them spend the money in any event. It goes into the stream. They are taxed on the money they receive. These payments are not like the dividends and earnings of corporations which go to Washington, London or Paris. This money stays in Canada and keeps working around through the stores, the service stations and the garment manufacturers. It goes the whole circle, and the tax collector, the wholesaler, retailer and the service station operator grab off their 5 per cent, 7 per cent or 10 per cent. This keeps the economy running. I think that instead of this miserly, penny-pinching attitude which has become so prevalent with this government in respect of our low income people, our senior citizens and so on, the government should adopt an attitude which would put some purchasing power in the community. Perhaps then the government would not be plagued as it is now by the unemployment problem.

If the government would get the economy rolling so the people would have some purchasing power, we would not have the extremely high rate of unemployment we have now. One of the real problems is that we are getting fewer and fewer people with purchasing power and more and more people at the barest subsistence level which makes it necessary to pinch every penny. If someone could persuade the financial thinkers on the other side to turn their thoughts around a little bit and change their approach, then I believe perhaps we would do better. But, in closing, I suggest the only thing I can do is plead with the minister to withdraw this bill before he does irreparable harm to the total Canadian community.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak again on Bill C-170 by virtue of the NDP amendment. It has now been 17 months since the government revealed its intention to improve the family allowance system in Canada. For each month that passes $14.2 million is withheld from the poverty-stricken people of Canada. The delay has already been too long; to delay any longer would be intolerable. Poverty in Canada affects about a quarter of our population, and increased family allowance cheques will be of great value to them. Adjustment to the payment levels of family allowances has not been made since 1957 and is therefore long overdue. For these reasons, the Progressive Conservative members in the House of Commons will support the Liberal government's FISP bill at second reading.

This is not to say that we are satisfied with the bill as it stands. We are not. There are gross inequities, ambiguous clauses and costly provisions contained in Bill C-170 and our party is determined to make every effort to have Bill C-170 greatly improved during the committee stage.

In the first place, we dislike the fact that it is no longer stipulated in the legislation that family allowances are to be paid to the mother for the care and education of her children. The principle of Bill C-170 is not the principle of the Family Allowances Act, it is not the principle of the Youth Allowances Act and it is not the principle of the predecessor Bill C-264 of last session which was introduced in the House in September, 1971. Between that date and 15 March, 1972, when Bill C-170 was introduced, an entirely different principle, a totally different philosophy, a distinct legal concept, has been silently substituted.

The Family Allowances Act, the Youth Allowances Act and Bill C-264, all have one principle in common. That principle is that the benefits are established, paid and administered on the basis of a right that is vested in our children. The people of Canada, acting through their government, are the donors; the parents are the trustees, and the children have been and are the beneficiaries. Through Bill C-170, the government proposes to take away that right. Nowhere in his explanation of the bill on second reading did the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) confess to the purpose of Bill C-170. Indeed, he implied that the rights of Canadian children, as established by parliament, will be maintained and even enhanced. As can be seen from a reading of page 1133, first column, of Hansard for March 24, 1972 he said:

> FISP benefits will provide a basic income for each child upon which can be built additional supports as deemed appropriate by provincial or municipal authorities. We know that unemployment insurance does not make any special provision for children. Neither do old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan retirement pension or war veterans allowances.

He might have added that neither does FISP. Section 5 of the Family Allowances Act, as enacted by this parliament, provides that the allowance shall be applied by the person receiving it exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child.

Section 5(1) of the Youth Allowances Act, as enacted by parliament provides:

> An allowance payable to a parent in respect of a dependent youth shall be applied exclusively for the care, maintenance, education or advancement of such youth.

Clause 5(2) of Bill C-264, the Family Income Security Plan of last session provided:

> That a benefit shall be applied:
> a) in the case of a child referred to in paragraph 3(1)(a) exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the child in respect of whom it was paid, and
> b) in the case of a person referred to in paragraph 3(1)b) exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the person in respect of whom it was paid in such manner as prescribed by the regulations.

Those trust provisions for the benefit of the children of Canada do not appear in Bill C-170. Instead, that bill takes away the vested right of the children, a right which the minister said was the only right they possessed. And what does Bill C-170 propose to substitute? It proposes outright grants to adults. The children become part of a formula upon which the right of the adult is based and calculated. I hope the minister might be able to clarify this.

Clause 5 provides that the recipient of the allowance shall be the parent or other authorized person. The definitions of "family" and "parent" mention the child as being in the custody and control of such person. Clause 3(1), page 3 and Clause 4(3)(a) and (b) on page 4 mention that such person must be wholly or substantially maintained by such person. No mention is made of the fact that the child must be cared for, trained, educated or advanced. The child is merely a hook upon which to hang a grant.

Another weakness in the bill, Mr. Speaker, is the cut-off levels. There is certainly an obvious inconsistency among government departments in their assessment of when families need government support. The Minister of National Health and Welfare takes into account the fact that it costs more to raise a child once he reaches the age of 12 years, whereas the Minister of Finance in his new Income Tax Act, did not recognize that children are more expensive until they reach age 16. Similarly, the Minister of National Health and Welfare believes that any family with one child and a gross income of $4,500. or less should get maximum assistance from his department, yet the recycled Minister of Finance continues to impose a substantial tax on the same person.

In fact, there is a wide range of problems associated with Bill C-170's treatment of cut-off levels. Family income security penalizes working wives, particularly in the lower and middle income classes, through its cut-off levels being based on gross family income. If a wife goes out to work to supplement her husband's meagre salary, it is quite likely that her added income will push total family income above the cut-off level, and she will therefore forfeit part or all of her family allowance cheques as a result. For a family struggling to make ends meet, the loss of a baby bonus cheque hurts. Consequently, FISP has a built-in provision which discourages working mothers because they know they will probably lose part or all of their family allowance cheque as a result.

• (1600)

The importance of this to middle income earners cannot be underestimated. A March 23, 1972 publication by Statistics Canada on the indebtedness of Canadians showed that in the income group from $7,000 to $10,000 per year, only 37 per cent had no debt, and the average debt of debtors was a whopping $1,668. Cut-off levels should be based on net income after deductions rather than on gross income. In this way, personal income tax exemptions and child care deductions will have their full effect for working wives. Benefit cut-off levels can then still be scaled to ensure that poverty stricken families benefit most from family allowances.

Because of the provision that family allowance payments made under the authority of this piece of legislation are based on gross rather than net income with no automatic cost of living escalator, more and more lower and middle class Canadians will find themselves progressively cut off from family allowance payments over the years as their incomes rise, even though inflation may increase proportionately. Although Bill C-170, unlike its predecessor Bill C-264, has a clause providing for an increase in benefit levels and payments because of cost of living increases, the procedure involved is not automatic but is left to the whim of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for proposing the increase to the cabinet. Then, at the whim of the cabinet, the proposal may or may not be accepted. It is subject also to delays in the House of Commons, where a resolution is necessary to approve the order of the Governor in Council. The lack of an automatic cost of living escalator clause in FISP means that neither benefit levels nor benefit payments are scaled to take into account the erosion effect that inflation will have in the future.

Since 1961, personal income per capita has almost doubled, rising from $1,613 to $3,092. This does not mean that many fewer people are living in poverty as inflation has considerably eroded the relative buying power of the dollar in the interim. While personal incomes are rising, though, cut-off lines for both maximum and partial FISP benefit payments are stationary. Consequently, if personal incomes double again over the next ten years, for example, more and more people would find themselves disqualified to FISP payments because their incomes had risen above the stationary cut-off lines. Yet, many of these disqualified people may still be defined by Statistics Canada as living near the poverty line.

There should, therefore, be an automatic cost of living escalator clause, not just a discretionary cost of living escalator clause as there is in Bill C-170. Use or non-use of this clause can be subject to political abuse. This escalator provision in Bill C-170 is out of step with other federal legislation, such as the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act which guarantee some, even if too little, increases each year in line with cost of living increases. Therefore, it is wise to insist now before the FISP bill is first enacted, that benefit levels be automatically subject each year to a cost of living increase commensurate with the rise in the consumer price index.

With regard to the gross income levels provision in Bill C-170, I ask the minister to clarify the criteria for establishing the gross or net income for the farmer, the fisherman, the sawmill operator or the independent trucker. If their family allowance payments are based on their gross income, then the government is being grossly unfair since these people have necessary capital expenditures to maintain the equipment essential for their livelihood.

In addition to all these problems connected with the gross income provisions in Bill C-170, there is another glaring weakness which has been noted more than once by many speakers. I refer to the administrative load that will occur as a result of some sections of the bill. Changes in income of families who work seasonally are going to cause utter confusion, since they are required to submit periodically increases or decreases in their earnings. Let us take for example the family with one child earning $4,500 a year and receiving the maximum benefit. The wife might go to work and earn enough in a few months to put the family beyond that income ceiling. According to the experts, even if the combined family income reaches beyond that level, the family will continue to draw the maximum benefit for that year. However, if their income is above that ceiling again the next year, even though they continue to draw the maximum benefits, they will have to repay 33 cents for every $100 they earned over the basic income ceiling in the previous year.

It has been estimated by the Department of National Health and Welfare that administrative costs during the first year of FISP's operation will rise to about $13.5 million, and when FISP is fully operational, it is likely that administrative costs will escalate very rapidly. The Liberal government anticipates that when FISP has been fully implemented, the staff involved in processing FISP will number 1,477, more than twice the current staff of 730. Undoubtedly, this will push annual administrative costs much higher in the future.

There are many who argue, quite justifiably, that the combined administrative costs of many income security programs represent a sizeable total sum, and that this sum would be more effective given directly into the hands of the poor. According to this argument, the consolidation and rationalization of our welfare structures could significantly reduce the costs currently involved in administering a profusion of welfare programs. The money recouped from such a streamlining of the welfare structure could then provide additional money for actual welfare work. An income security scheme administered entirely through the income tax structure would accomplish this end by decreasing the number of administrative bureaucracies for welfare now scattered through several federal departments. The question is: can we therefore justify the increased administrative costs of Bill C-170 over the present plan, when such costs may be unnecessary?

A further problem connected with the present bill concerns the provision that children in institutions across the country will receive only half of the maximum FISP benefit payments. This is contrary both to the old family allowance plan, Bill C-264, and the Quebec provincial family allowance scheme announced in 1971. Just today, the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) passed me a telegram which came from the Hon. Mrs. Brenda Robertson, minister of welfare for New Brunswick. This telegram is worth reading in full. It reads:

> In reviewing Bill C-170 as proposed by the government of Canada it has been noted that subsection 2 of section 6 makes provision to restrict by 50 per cent the amount of FISP benefits payable to children whose maintenance costs are shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. My government expresses strong opposition to this provision and urgently requests that it be reconsidered. If FISP were to be paid solely on the basis of family size with the payments of benefits commencing with the third or fourth child, then it might be logical to state that children who are the responsibility of government departments are not affected. However, this is not the basis of FISP benefits. The concept that FISP is income related and therefore provincial governments require less financial assistance to maintain children in care is hardly valid in relation to the Atlantic provinces. The current provision in Bill C-170 will mean that children who are in care will receive virtually no increase in the amount of money available for their maintenance while children in their own homes will be significantly better off. I believe this is very unfair. My government urges you to reconsider the implications of subsection 2 of section 6 of Bill C-170. As it stands it is discriminatory to a large number of children.

Another fault with Bill C-170 as it is presently constituted—and I will end my recital of the bill's errors here, although I could continue indefinitely—concerns the Trudeau government's failure to include a date on which the new scheme would become effective and benefits be paid. The government's family income security bill of last session, C-264, was to come into effect this May 1, a date a few days away. That provision has been removed. The government has adopted instead a drafting gimmick to delude the public. Clause 2(1) defines benefit year as "any period after August 1972, consisting of twelve consecutive months commencing with the first day of September". How many families awaiting these increased benefits promised under the bill have assumed they will get them as of September 1, 1972? In fact, that provision means only that no benefits can be paid before that date. Again, Bill C-170 will become effective on Royal Assent. This is only another gimmick to give the appearance of action by the government to pay out benefits as quickly as possible, presumably in September of this year.

Although this bill will become law on Royal Assent, that assent will be subject to section 3(4) which provides that no benefit is payable under the act for any month in a benefit year for which an allowance is payable under the Family Allowances Act. Section 24 will provide that the Family Allowances Act will only be repealed at the discretion of the government. When will that discretion be exercised? The Minister of National Welfare has remained mum on this aspect. Is he afraid that this measure will join the Hazardous Products Act and other acts, of which only parts were put into effect?

I have elaborated at length on the faults of Bill C-170, Mr. Speaker, for a very important reason. That reason is that the Progressive Conservatives consider the bill to be loose and sloppy in its conception and in its drafting. Although we have agreed to support the bill on second reading, for reasons on which I have already elaborated, we make no commitment to support any further stage of the bill unless substantial changes correcting these faults are agreed to by the government. We reserve the right on third reading to take action as we see fit, depending on how the bill comes out of committee.

One of the ways in which the inadequacies and faults of the family allowance plan of Bill C-170 could be rectified is through the formula offered in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). Our party is supporting the principle of the NDP amendment because it is an umbrella under which substantial improvements can be made such as increased payments, a better break for middle income earners, less administrative costs, etc. However, we believe that the drafting of the amendment is quite as loose as the drafting of the bill. We can assure the House that our amendments on the family allowance plan, to be submitted in committee, will improve the bill and not be merely vague, meaningless phrases.

The reasoned amendment put forward by the leader of the NDP is so general and broad in scope as to encompass any scheme of increased family allowances, provided only that the principle of universality of payment is retained. I say "universality of payment" because the "universality of benefit" is in doubt. It is quite possible to grant "substantial" payments under the scheme and yet tax every cent of those benefits away by making related changes, as the amendment calls for, in the Income Tax Act. On the other hand, it is equally possible, within the terms of the amendment, to establish a plan of family benefits that is far preferable to the government plan proposed in Bill C-170. It is for that reason we propose to vote for this amendment. In spite of our agreement to support this amendment, however, we do not support many of the ill-advised statements that the hon. member for York South made in introducing the amendment to the House.

The first thing that I have to take issue with, and that I find difficult to understand, is why he should deliberately alarm the low income and "no income" earners of the country. He intimated that his reading of the act is the only way in which it can be read, when he stated very emphatically that all citizens of this country who are receiving social assistance will only receive half the benefits provided under this bill.

He used these exact words, Mr. Speaker, and I quote from page 1445 of Hansard:

> What the bill says is that not only children in institutions will get half the benefit but that children of all families on social welfare will get only half the benefit.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

[Mr. Marshall.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Hon. members seem to be disposed to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks but this can only be done by consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does the hon. member not have 40 minutes? This is an amendment to a second reading motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The Chair understood that the hon. member had taken his 40 minutes, unless I was given the wrong advice. The hon. member commenced his speech at 25 minutes to four o'clock. I guess the simplest thing would be for the hon. member to obtain unanimous consent. This might clarify the situation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marshall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Many of the clauses referred to by the hon. member for York South are ambiguous, I agree, and even ridiculous. This fact was pointed out very clearly by George Bain of the Globe and Mail in one of his columns. But it is irresponsible for the member for York South, merely for the sake of political advantage, to read these clauses as he wants to read them and, again I say, to deliberately alarm the people of Canada who have been waiting for years to derive some benefits promised to them. Why not take his grievance out on the supposed legal advisers who concocted the bill, those supposed experts who sit and try to make things as complicated as possible, but do not know the meaning of the words, "human being" or "poverty"?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare tried to rise in his place last Wednesday and put the record straight. Instead of allowing him to do so, the rules of this institution prevented him, so that the words of confusion could go out to the poverty stricken of this country who wonder now just how much benefit they will get under this bill. The minister, who was listening, made mention that this provision applied only to the children in institutions. This interpretation is confirmed by members of the Department of National Health and Welfare, who indicate that only children who are in the complete care of the parent would lose half the benefit under the present provisions of the bill—I should say who are not in the complete care of the parent.

In another part of his speech, the Leader of the New Democratic Party wondered aloud whether members of the House, and especially those from Newfoundland and Quebec, had even read the bill. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those members, and I can assure him that I have read the bill. And I can tell him that I have read the white paper on income security that was issued back in 1970 containing the government's ideas on family income security and the promises to the poverty stricken in Canada. I read Bill C-264, too, when the government introduced that bill which promised low income families that they would receive increases by May 1, 1972. I read the Throne Speeches since 1968, when I first came here, promising equality of opportunity, and indicating what the government owed to the poverty stricken of this country. I have read and watched and listened, with frustration and confusion to the deliberate political strategy that this government has been using since 1970, using the poverty stricken families of our nation for political advantage and building up their hopes falsely with utter and contemptible disregard for human beings. I do not need anybody to tell me what I have read or missed.

I read thousands of letters from my constituents who sent me here to represent them, letters telling me they do not have enough money to feed their children and have to send them to bed cold and hungry, letters from mothers asking me to help them because they have to go to court for failure to pay their school fees and have to deny their children the right to an education. I read more hundreds of letters from mothers telling me that they cannot send their children to school because they cannot afford to buy them clothing. I read more hundreds and thousands of letters from mothers and fathers asking me for help from the government to buy them enough materials to fix holes in the roofs of their homes, or for bedding or for a stove to heat their homes, because they cannot afford to give these necessities to their children.

Here is one letter from a doctor who says that a certain constituent of mine is mentally defective, is an epileptic and is also suffering with nerves, anxiety and tension while living in a house which is unfit for human habitation. That was on August 10, 1971 and now, almost a year later, the husband writes to me and asks how he is to get a better home for his wife and children when he cannot get anybody to answer his letters.

I read these letters coming into my office at the rate of a couple of hundred a week. I answer each and every one of them myself because I am concerned. I tell them to have a little hope because I want to have a little faith that perhaps the government still has some humane consideration for our children. But after four years I, like these many thousands of mothers of children, am becoming more and more frustrated at the lack of sincerity which exists here. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the words come out from the Trudeau government and everybody else. They flow like water—the millions of words, and the hundreds of bogus promises—but that is where it ends.

I read everything, Mr. Speaker, everything that I can in the time allotted to me. I hope when the minister has the opportunity to speak he will clarify the serious inequities in the bill so that with sincerity we can consult and put the bill in proper order at the committee stage for the greatest benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party are going to vote against passage of this bill at second reading stage, are going to oppose this bill in committee and I presume, unless the government changes its basic philosophy, will vote against this bill on third reading. The reasons are simple. We shall vote against this bill because not only is it wrong in principle but it reverses and wipes out a basic concept established in this country, not by a radical socialist government but by a Liberal government led by Mackenzie King.

The Family Allowances Act, when first introduced, provided for the payment of family allowances to all families with children entitled to receive benefits, regardless of income. Speaking in connection with suggestions that the old age pension should only be paid to those in need, another former Liberal prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, made it clear that he believed in universal old age pensions and that he believed those few old age pensioners with incomes so high they did not really need the old age pension would be relieved of their surplus income by the income tax. We may be old fashioned; however, I suggest to the Liberal Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) that we are not so radical when we continue to stand for the principle of universality, a principle which was not first proposed by a Liberal government but which was first implemented by a Liberal government in connection with the Family Allowances Act and the old age pension.

Under the provisions of this bill, payments will be made on a selective basis. The universal principle contained in the Family Allowances Act and the old age pension legislation will be, as I have already mentioned, wiped out. This, I suggest, is not only a regressive step; it is an unjustifiable step. The payment of benefits will be based on a sliding and complex formula which will make the major difficulties recently experienced by people unfortunate enough to be unemployed seem trivial. I am talking of the difficulties of those people who have had to file claims for unemployment insurance benefits. Their claims have been pushed from pillar to post. They have had to wait six, eight, ten and even 15 weeks for their claims to be processed, the reasons for delay being that the computer broke down, that the people in the Unemployment Insurance Commission did not understand the provisions of the act, and so on. Many reasons, it is alleged, were behind these difficulties. I am certain that the situation in Winnipeg not only can be duplicated, but has been and is being duplicated every day of the week in the home city of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I say that the difficulties experienced by those who could not obtain their unemployment insurance benefits will seem simple and trivial compared with the difficulties which will occur after this bill becomes law.

It has been estimated that the effects of this bill will divide people and neighbours, group by group. Let me attempt to give some concrete illustrations to show how this bill will operate and have that effect. First, 25 per cent of Canadian families will be better off. We have never questioned that. Those who will be better off certainly need the extra assistance they will get under this bill. However, over 40 per cent of all families will receive only partial benefits, and half of this group will get less money than they are getting now. One third of all families will be cut off from all benefits.

I said, when I began, that we oppose this movement away from the principle of universality. We think that principle is a sound one. That principle found favour with the overwhelming proportion of the Canadian people and there is no reason, aside from political reasons which I will speak about later, for the government to wipe out in this legislation the basic principle of universality. As I said before, let us consider some concrete illustrations. Let us see how this bill will work.

The family with an income of $5,001 per year and one child will not receive any baby bonus at all. Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare really believe that a family of three with an income of just over $5,000 has an income so large that it does not need the family allowance? The family with two children under ten years with an income of $9,001 will be cut off. There are many people in Hamilton, many workers in the steel works and other plants, who now earn $9,000 a year. That is the family income, particularly if the wife is working part time. Considering today's cost of living, the cost of food, which is rising every month, the cost of fuel for heating homes, which is rising regularly, and taxes, which are constantly going up, does the minister really believe that a family of four in this country with an income of $9,000 is doing so well that it does not need even the level of assistance being given to it by the family allowances plan at present?

Let us consider the family with five children under 12 years of age with a total income of $11,001 per year. There you have a family of seven, Mr. Speaker, and it will not receive any family allowance under the new act. An income of $11,000 may sound like a pretty fair income. Does the minister think that a family of seven living in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver or Hamilton does not need the assistance it is getting under the Family Allowances Act at present? If he thinks that he has moved a long way from the people he represents since coming to Ottawa in 1962.

My party has always supported the principle of universality in programs of social security. I ask, why has the government party, which introduced in legislative form universal programs, abandoned the principle of universality which it first introduced? The reason is not that it does not believe in universality. The reason is that the government intends to phase out the program of family allowances altogether, because it does not think that program is a successful tool for fighting poverty. The family allowances program, Mr. Speaker, was never introduced for the purpose of fighting poverty. The payments were never considered, by the government which introduced them, by the opposition parties or by the general public, as welfare payments. And they were not welfare payments. If the government wants to help the poor people of this country, goodness knows, there is much that it can do and that needs to be done.

I put some figures on record yesterday which show that the bottom 40 per cent of income earners in this country get just under 16 per cent of the total incomes earned in this country. There is no question about the bottom one third of the population needing assistance. If the government wants to mount a war on poverty, there are much more effective ways of doing it than taking away the family allowance from people in the lower income group. That is what this bill does.

Why does the government not stop the massive give-aways which in the past few years have amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars as the result of programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which supposedly foster the establishment of industries in slow growth areas. Grants have been made of hundreds of millions of dollars. To whom have they been made? They have been made to the most affluent, largest corporations in this country, most of them multi-national corporations in the United States. If the government really wants to fight poverty, why does it not wipe out these give-aways and give the money to those who need it?

If the government wants to fight poverty, it should do something about plugging the loopholes in our tax system. I am not going to repeat the arguments put so well by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), but the facts are as he put them in his famous speech to the Canadian Economic Association. Some of the largest corporations in this country, oil companies such as Imperial Oil and Shell Oil and mining companies such as international Nickel and Noranda, to mention just a few, are legally evading paying the major share of the taxes which they ought to be paying. I do not even want to compare the taxes they pay with what individuals pay, but if they paid their fair share of taxes as other corporations do, they would pay approximately a 50 per cent corporation tax. In fact, they are paying taxes on probably 10 per cent or less of their earnings. Why? Because this government has continued the policy under which this country has suffered for many years by giving special tax concessions to oil and mining companies as well as others.

If the government wants to do something to combat poverty and help the people who are in real need, it should not take away the family allowance from the middle income bracket. It should take money from those who have it. This government will not do that because it is dependent on the 95 largest corporations in this country for the major share of the campaign expenses of the Liberal party at the time of elections. That is why this government will not take that very sensible and equitable step.

This proposal of the government will take away benefits which the moderate income group has had since 1944 and give increased benefits to those who are really poor. We have stated many times that we will support every proposal to increase the economic wellbeing of people in the lower income bracket. However, that should not be done at the expense of those working people in the middle-class group.

The government's proposals will divide the people in this country. Some will not receive anything under the new FISP program. Some will receive less that at present and others will receive more. Neighbors with relatively similar incomes and circumstances will be treated in different ways. I cannot think of a better way to divide the citizens of this country than the plan devised by the minister—I was going to say the minister and his department.

Mr. Munro: What are you doing right now?

Mr. Orlikow: I have too much respect for the ability and social vision of the officials of the minister's department to believe they had anything to do with the formulation of this bill. I think this bill was drafted by the politicians to meet their political ends. If the minister had the courage to table and publish the white paper prepared by his deputy minister, the charge I have just made would be proven conclusively.

Implementation of this bill will create an administrative jungle. The minister estimated that the number of employees required to process FISP cheques will more than double. I am certain that is a gross under-estimate of what will actually happen. Costs of other departments will be as great if not greater than the direct cost the minister outlined when he introduced this bill. The Tax Appeal Board, the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Supply and Services and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will need extra staff. The Department of Manpower and Immigration will be affected. Statistics Canada will also be involved in this. All this will cost money and will create bottlenecks which will mean that people will have to wait for their cheques.

What about the potential recipients of the benefits under this plan? They will have to provide the department with the necessary information, and that is not going to be easy. Every time there is an increase in income, a layoff or a change in the age of a child, the potential benefit will be changed. All this will have to be understood and calculated by the people involved. After the information is gathered, the paperwork must still be done.

Let us look at how this bill operates. As an example, I will refer to a steelworker in Hamilton whom the Minister of National Health and Welfare represents. It is not unusual that in negotiations at the end of a contract a steelworker, a member of a building trade union or of any other organized group in Hamilton, will receive a 25 cent an hour increase in their wage rate. According to my calculations, and I think my arithmetic is correct, an increase of 25 cents an hour in terms of a 40 hour work week in a 52 week year means an increased annual income of just over $500. So, Mr. Speaker, if a worker obtains an increase of just over $500 a year, his income category is changed and he has to recalculate the amount to which he is entitled under the new plan. He has to fill in a new form; it has to be processed and checked. If the wife of a steelworker works full time and earns more than $500, that too, changes the category. If a steelworker is laid off for three or four weeks he will lose more than $500 in pay. He will then be entitled to more money under the plan. Every time there is a change in family income, new calculations will be required and new forms will have to be completed. How can the ordinary citizen be expected to handle all this? Even on the unlikely assumption that citizens follow all these instructions correctly, the work of administering these constantly changing records will create a chaotic jungle.

I am sure no member of parliament who represents ordinary working people can stay long in his office without receiving calls or letters from constituents who are encountering difficulties in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act since the recent changes came into effect. I am not complaining about these calls; I regard attending to them as part of the job of a member of parliament. But the number of calls members of parliament are expected to deal with in connection with unemployment insurance will amount to a minute trickle compared with the enquiries which every member will receive should this new plan become operative.

There is no need, Mr. Speaker, for this administrative jungle to develop, except perhaps, a political need. And what is the political need? It is not difficult to explain. The government understands quite well that people in the lower income brackets are no longer able to manage on the incomes they are receiving, because of the increased cost of living and other factors. It realizes that substantial improvements are needed in the incomes of these people. However, as I indicated earlier, the government is not prepared to get the money necessary to increase the incomes of those in the lower income bracket from those who have it, from those in the higher income brackets and from the corporations which are not paying their fair share of taxes. So, the government is proposing to take money which has been given to people who are, really, poor people in that lower and middle income brackets, and redistribute it to people who are desperately poor. We reject an approach of that kind.

I want to be fair to the government. I do not intend to do what a number of my hon. friends have done by outlining in detail once again what our party thinks should be done. I know the minister would say, with some justification, that I was being partisan. I am partisan, but I try to be fair. I suggest to the minister that he look again, if he has not done so already, at the policy statement issued by the Canadian Council on Social Development in April, 1971. This Council is not a wide-eyed radical organization. It is not an organization whose purpose is to destroy this country and rebuild it on an entirely new set of principles. It is a council of organizations which deals with, and occasionally represents, people who need assistance. Its policy statement amounts to a fundamental rejection of the proposals which the minister is making in this bill.

Let me take just a few minutes in which to put on record what the Canadian Council on Social Development says.

> The Council fully endorses the family allowance goals of help to all families with dependent children, and a greater measure of equality of opportunity for all children, i.e., special emphasis on the needs of low income families. However, it believes that it is needlessly costly and cumbersome to attempt to include these aims and a meaningful attack on poverty for all people in one income maintenance measure, as appears to be the ultimate goal for FISP.
> In relation to the attack on poverty, a comprehensive and integrated income security program is required which takes account of the costs of child-rearing.
> The Council believes that the feasible and desirable approach to a reformed family allowances program is a general family allowance plan that takes care of a substantial proportion of child-rearing costs. The net benefits should be related more closely than now to other income resources, and the balance of the child-rearing costs should be completely covered for low-income people through a separate but integrated guaranteed income program as part of a comprehensive approach to income security.

Let me point out that the Council rejects the government's proposal to cease paying family allowances to all families with dependent children, and that it calls on the government to inaugurate a guaranteed income program. Dealing with the basic elements of any family allowances program, the Council enunciates the following guiding principles. I will quote again:

> The Council believes that:

(a) Family allowances should be universal, paid to all families with dependent children as a social right thus avoiding divisiveness among families and any element of stigma. The present program has this feature but FISP would eliminate it.

When I was talking earlier about the divisiveness of this program, the minister suggested, in an interjection which was probably not recorded in Hansard, that my speech would promote division. I would point out that the Canadian Council on Social Development agrees with what I said, and I agree with them that the minister's program will divide the people of Canada. The Council goes on to say:

There should be equity in relation to family responsibilities and to the financial and other resources of families. Three criteria cited by the federal white paper, Income Security for Canadians, are size of family, age of children, and family income. Of these, the present program only takes age into account and FISP only considers income.

There should be the maximum feasible simplicity and efficiency in administration. These features are virtues of the present family allowances program but FISP would undoubtedly be considerably more complicated and costly to administer.

• (1650)

The program should be as fully compatible as possible with long-term social and fiscal policies. This is not evident in the FISP proposals.

The program should have a built-in escalation clause to meet the full amount of annual rises in the cost of living. This feature is not included in either the present program or FISP.

There should be integration of all programs of allowances for dependent children, i.e., youth allowances should be integrated with family allowances as proposed in FISP.

There is the analysis of the minister's proposals made by what I think is a most representative and knowledgeable organization, one with a membership encompassing the vast majority, if not all, of those organizations in Canada, both government and voluntary, that have as their task helping people in need. It is obvious from the short summary that I have put on the record that the Canadian Council on Social Development has the gravest reservations regarding these proposals. When I say that, I am being very cautious and conservative in my estimate of what they say. I really believe they are rejecting out of hand the basic principles on which the minister has based his FISP proposals.

I urge the minister to take the time to consider these basic objections to his proposals by the Canadian Council on Social Development. These are objections made by an organization which cannot, by the wildest stretch of the imagination, be termed a partisan organization, one with any political axe to grind. It has no objective other than to help the people of this country who are in need. The minister may believe that the Canadian Council on Social Development is wrong in its analysis. If so, he ought to take the time at an early date to explain in what way the objections raised to his plan by this very important organization are unacceptable to him.

The minister may believe that the implementation of a program such as that proposed by the Canadian Council on Social Development is financially impracticable. This is the usual reason given for rejecting proposals made by members of the New Democratic Party. In this respect, I would point out that the members of the board of the Canadian Council on Social Development are, in the main, pretty responsible businessmen and civil servants at the federal, provincial or municipal level. There are also one or two representatives from the labour movement, and there may be one or two representatives from what is now commonly known as poor people's organizations. But the overwhelming majority of the members of the board and committees of this organization are responsible, knowledgeable, well informed citizens. If the government is rejecting their proposals and criticisms of its plan because it believes that the country could not afford to adopt them at this time, then the minister ought to say so.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

I suggest that the criticisms and suggestions made by this organization ought not to be dismissed as summarily as they have been dismissed by the minister and the government. As I said earlier, in face of what I consider to be the virtually unanimous rejection of the proposals in this bill by those organizations best able to assess the needs of the people that we hope to help through this type of legislation, I can see no reason why the members of this party, indeed why any member of this parliament, should vote for the bill on second reading, at committee stage, or on third reading. Like the other members of this party I intend to oppose this bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Post Office; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—external affairs; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—transport.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AMENDMENTS TO STRENGTHEN PENALTIES FOR OFFENCES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved that Bill C-13, to amend the Combines Investigation Act (floor penalties, criminal joint tortfeasors, and moieties), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have proposed this bill in view of my long held conviction that the laws of this country ought to apply with some degree of equality to all citizens of this country.

It is not uncommon in this country on any day of the week for one to pick up a newspaper, whether it be in Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg or Vancouver, and read about a person who appeared in a magistrate's court charged with the theft of an article worth a relatively small amount from a store or supermarket. If it is a first offence, the person in question may be let off with a reprimand or a fine. But we can be certain that if it is a second or a third offence, the person so charged will get a jail sentence. It is usual to find in the jails and prisons of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and also in northwestern Ontario that a large percentage, 50 per cent or more, of the inmates are of Indian or Métis origin. Many of them were convicted of some offence which was committed as a result of excessive drinking. Many of them are in jail because they could not pay the fine which the magistrate or judge imposed as an alternative to the jail term.

• (1700)

Recently, in the province of Quebec, there was a strike by Public Service employees. It is certainly not for me to discuss here this afternoon the reasons or justifications for that strike. Suffice to say, for the purpose of my discussions today, that a dozen or more of the people involved in that strike, who did not heed an injunction order that the strike be terminated, were sentenced by a judge to six months in prison. I do not know about other members of this Chamber, but I was struck by the pictures I saw in various newspapers of a group of young women in their twenties being carted off to jail for six months because of their involvement in the strike. I am not going to discuss this afternoon what I consider to be too severe sentences, but I give these illustrations in order to compare this kind of sentence on the part of Canadian judges with the kind of sentences handed out to some of the most prominent and highly respected corporations of this country after convictions under the combines act.

We have had this kind of legislation on our statute books in Canada for more than 50 years, during which time there have been perhaps more than 100 prosecutions and convictions, with something in the neighbourhood of hundreds of thousands of dollars paid in fines following the conviction of the offending corporations. In many cases, in spite of the conviction, and in spite of the fact that a number of the largest corporations in this country have been found guilty not just once but more than once and ordered to cease and desist, the courts have never in any of these cases imposed a penalty other than a fine.

The purpose of my bill is to strengthen the penalties for crime committed in violation of the combines and monopolies act. It will amend a present section of the act which contains no floor for the penalty. The bill does not interfere with the penalty for a first offence, but provides that on a second offence there shall be a mandatory minimum jail term of one year and, on conviction of a third or subsequent offence, a mandatory minimum jail term of two years. The maximum jail term remains at two years.

Before spending a few minutes discussing the history of one of two of these cases, let me refer to a case which was reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail last Saturday, April 23, 1972. The headline reads "Ready-mix firms fined $245,000". Let me quote a few paragraphs of the story as follows:

> Twelve firms that admitted conspiring to prevent or lessen unduly competition in the production, manufacture, sale or supply of ready-mixed concrete between 1961 and 1968 were fined a total of $245,000 by Mr. Justice John Osler yesterday.
> In total, the fine is the largest so far imposed in Ontario for breach of the Combines Investigation Act—considering the number of firms involved and the fact that all are first offenders. Heavier fines have been imposed in the past on other corporations, but they involved companies that operate in more than one province or across Canada.

Later on, the story reads, in part:

> Mr. Justice Osler said the offences were committed over 7½ years, and that not all the firms were in existence for that time or had participated in the combination for the whole period. The firms advertised themselves as suppliers of ready-mixed concrete in the Metro area.
> Representatives of the offending firms met often and discussed prices, Mr. Justice Osler said.

A fine of $245,000 sounds like a lot of money, but when members compare this kind of offence and penalty with offences and penalties in respect of someone who steals $10 worth of groceries or a $50 suit, they must ask themselves how much the people of Metro Toronto overpaid because of the illegal combination by these companies to keep up prices.

It has been estimated by one magazine article recently that the over-payment in the Metropolitan Toronto area by those who have built homes, by municipalities which built roads and by the province which built highways, amounted to something in the neighbourhood of $30 million. I suggest to hon. members that the payment of $245,000 in fines is a pretty small price to pay in comparison with the illegal profits in the neighbourhood of $30 million. That is why I think legislation outlining and regulating combines needs to be strengthened.

Let me put on the record in the few minutes I have left at my disposal some illustrations of companies which have been guilty of violating our laws dealing with combines more than once. In 1960, the Abitibi Power and Paper Company was fined $15,000 for an offence under this legislation. The company's net profit in 1962 was $15.5 million; $13.7 million in 1961 and over $12 million in 1960. I ask again, of what importance is a $15,000 fine to a company which has the kind of profits I have outlined? The St. Lawrence Corporation was fined $3,000 in 1958 and $20,000 in 1960. Its profits in 1959 were over $6 million; in 1960, over $7 million and in 1961 they were over $7 million again. The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company was convicted twice in 1953 and paid a fine of $10,000 on the occasion of each conviction. In 1959, that company made a profit of $2.3 million; in 1960, a profit of $2.9 million, and in 1961 a profit of over $3.5 million.

• (1710)

I could go on with innumerable similar illustrations. However, let me speak for a moment about the kind of people who are involved in these transactions, because after all corporations are not operated by some kind of faceless individuals. They have offices and directors. Let us see who some of these people are. Bathurst Power and Paper Company has been convicted of violating the anti-combines laws. Then, we have the St. Lawrence Corporation which was convicted in 1959. Who were some of its directors? One was Mr. R. H. Winters.

Mr. Béchard: It is very important to mention the name.

Mr. Orlikow: I think it is. It is very important for the people of this country to compare how ordinary citizens are dealt with when they appear in the courts. I suggest to the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto), if he has not done so, that he should take a look at the reports of how two citizens in metropolitan Toronto were dealt with recently as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail and compare their harsh, brusque, insensitive, discourteous treatment by the Justice of the Peace or the judge who dealt with them with the kind of treatment meted out to the officers of corporations such as those to which I have referred. This is precisely the point I am making and the reason I have raised this matter.

The St. Lawrence Corporation which was convicted in 1959 had on its board Mr. McCutcheon, Mr. E. P. Taylor and a host of others. Members will say quite justifiably that writing into the legislation a provision which would make mandatory a jail sentence on the occasion of a second or third offence will not stop illegal combinations. Certainly, members on the government side will say that the new competition act will deal much more effectively with illegal combinations in the future than the combines legislation has up until now. Well, the people of this country have lived for 50 years with anti-combines legislation brought forward by Liberal governments. We have seen the largest corporations of this country ignore the law. We have seen them combine to break the law to illegally maintain prices at an exorbitant height. We have seen governments, both Liberal and Conservative, do virtually nothing about the constant and repeated breaking of a law which is just as important to the people of this country as the laws under which poor people in the cities and Indians in the villages and reservations are sent to jail.

I do not believe the enactment of the provision I propose will make the corporations suddenly live up to the law, but I think it would go some distance towards making the ordinary citizens of this country believe that the law treats the rich in the same way it treats the poor, which in my opinion it does not do at the present time.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a bill in identical terms has been introduced by the hon. member at nearly every session of Parliament since 1963. It has been debated three times, namely, June 5, 1964; November 4, 1966, and March 15, 1968. The references to sections of the Combines Investigation Act in this bill are to those in the act as found in R.S.C. 1970, Chapter C-23, which came into force on July 15, 1971.

The principal part of the bill, sections 1 to 6, is taken up with providing for mandatory minimum terms of imprisonment of one year and two years for second and third breaches respectively of prohibition orders, and for second and third offences respectively against the provisions relating to conspiracy in restraint of trade, merger, monopoly, discriminatory and predatory pricing, discriminatory promotional allowances and resale price maintenance. A court may now impose a sentence of up to two years' imprisonment for a first offence. By virtue of section 646 of the Criminal Code, however, a fine in the discretion of the court may be imposed in addition to or in lieu of imprisonment. The intent of the provisions of the bill, however, is that on conviction for a second or third offence the Court would be required to impose a sentence of imprisonment.

The proposed changes would not affect corporations which, of course, cannot be imprisoned, and under section 647 of the Criminal Code a fine in the discretion of the court may be imposed. To some extent, the proposed amendments are impractical in that corporate officials or employees are not necessarily in one position for too long, so that officials or employees concerned in a second offence could quite likely be different from those convicted in the first instance. The proposed amendments might, therefore, have little practical effect. Also, if the offence concerns a different product line, for example, paperboard, pulpwood, containerboard or fine paper as in the paper industry, the courts do not always appear to have considered an offence, involving a different product line from that in respect of which the firms were first convicted, as a second offence.

Actually, what is intended to be raised by this bill is the perennial question of whether corporate officers, officials or employees should be prosecuted in addition to, or in lieu of, the corporation itself. In the past there has been a practice, when charging corporations, not to charge the particular officers and directors. In recent cases, however, where corporations have disappeared by surrender of charter or amalgamation, it has been decided to proceed against the officials of such corporations who were concerned in the offence. Also, with relatively few exceptions, counsel have recommended that corporations only be charged.

Since requests for opinions normally ask who should be charged as principals, and in conspiracy cases named as co-conspirators, the usual answer to a question of this nature is that the parties prosecuted are those in accordance with the recommendation of counsel. Quite apart from any reluctance there may be to recommend prosecution of individuals, there frequently are sound practical reasons for prosecuting corporations only; for example, evidence of a particular officer or official may be necessary in the prosecution and this would not be available to the prosecution if the individual were charged as a principal in the same indictment and, if his evidence were necessary, there would be little point in preferring a separate indictment against him. Also, a prohibition order is applicable not only to the corporation convicted but to its directors, officers, employees, servants and agents. Since it is a perpetual order, it applies to persons occupying such positions at any time the order is in force. Orders against individuals apply only to that individual, and if he is transferred from his position the order may be of no practical value—for example, if he is transferred from a line to a staff position.

Now, let us examine very briefly the proposed provision for double damages on conviction. This is a very unusual device which presumably appears to have been used in an effort to avoid impinging upon provincial powers. It does not confer any civil right of action for a breach of such a right. The Supreme Court of Canada in Direct Lumber Company Limited versus Western Plywood Company Limited 1962 S.C.R. 646 has held that the then Criminal Code sections 411 (1)(c) relating to conspiracy in restraint of trade and 412 (1)(a) and (2) relating to price discrimination give no cause of action in damages to a person alleging a breach of these sections by another. It would appear that the same holds true for the successor provisions, 32 (1)(b) and 34(1)(a), and (2) respectively, and the other paragraphs of these provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. There may, however, be a right of action for common law conspiracy and also a right of action in Quebec under the civil law, but these points were not dealt with by the court.

The analogy to section 159 of the Excise Act—not section 158 as stated in the explanatory notes—is not an apt one. Section 159 refers to recovering double the amount of the excise duty and licence fee which should have been paid, a definite and readily ascertainable amount. Likewise, section 652 of the Criminal Code, also referred to in the explanatory notes, provides for recovery by civil proceedings of a fine, penalty or forfeiture imposed by law which is not only definite and readily ascertainable but is of course different from damages. The practicability of the section proposed in the bill, I submit, appears to be open to question.

It should be remembered that section 55 of Bill C-256, to enact the Competition Act, which was introduced at the last session of parliament, provides that a person who has suffered loss or damage as a result of a violation of any of the criminal provisions or a breach of an order of the Competitive Practices Tribunal may recover double damages. Also, section 80 provides that at the time sentence is imposed following a conviction the court may order the accused to pay to a person injured by the offence double the damages suffered by such person. This is an alternative to civil proceedings. Bill C-256 is presently being revised and representations have been received with respect to these provisions.

Section 8 deals with the personal liability of corporations, officers and agents. This clause provides that, where a corporation has committed an offence under the Combines Investigation Act or has failed to comply with an order made under the act, any director, manager or officer of the corporation who does or fails to do, or acquiesces or assents in, any act constituting an offence or any element of such act or neglect, is guilty of the offence personally and jointly with the corporation. As the explanatory note in the proposed bill states, the principle of this provision is already contained in section 38 (e) which applies to refusal to permit entry of premises and examination of documents and failure to file returns of information. This section was first enacted as part of section 22(1) of the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919 and in similar form has been in the present Combines Investigation Act since 1923. There does not appear to have been any debate whatever on the provision, and therefore no indication why it was made applicable only to the foregoing provisions and not to others of a similar nature such as failure to make and submit affidavits when required. There is no other provision of this nature in the Combines Investigation Act.

In Bill C-256, the Competition Act, subsection 73(7) deals with the liability of officers or directors, where offences against the criminal provisions have been committed by a company, as follows:

> (7) Where a company has been convicted of an offence under this section
>
> (a) every director of the company, and
> (b) every officer, servant or agent of the company who was in whole or in part responsible for the conduct of that part of the business of the company that gave rise to the offence, > is a party to the offence unless he satisfies a court that he had no knowledge of any of the acts constituting the offence and could not reasonably be expected to have had such knowledge and that he exercised reasonable diligence to prevent the commission of such an offence.

This provision in its present form has been subject to strong objection as imposing too heavy an onus, and imposing the same responsibility upon directors as upon officers responsible for the day to day operations of the company. In the revision of the bill this provision is being considered in the light of these objections.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, since as much work has and is being done on the whole question of the combines legislation, I would suggest that the questions raised by the hon. member would be better considered in the context of the legislation itself rather than as a separate entity. It is fair to say that the subject of the Combines Investigation Act is one that touches on the very fabric of our commercial structure. As a result, I feel that we owe it to the business community to review it as it relates to business law as a whole and not as an isolated aspect of business.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to say that I agree with most of what the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie) has had to say on this bill, but I think he is going a little too far when he asks that we attempt to solve these problems by approving the proposed competition bill. While some of the things the hon. member had to say concerning the problem in the context of that bill may be all right, like so many other things that are proposed by this government the bill contains some provisions that would make the price too high to pay.

In reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), the sponsor of the bill, I should like to point out that while it is regrettable that companies do combine to the detriment of the public and there have to be laws and punishments to deter such combinations, the examples that he mentioned did not seem to indicate that there was very much recidivism involved.

• (1730)

The hon. member did not produce any examples which would indicate that a jail term, as proposed by this legislation, would ever have been imposed. He referred to the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company having two convictions registered against it in one year, but I would suspect that the offences arose in the same time-frame or in more or less the same transaction. No examples were given of a company committing an offence, say in 1960, another in 1965 and another two or three years ago.

I think one of the biggest problems in this area lies in the fact that the government does not seem able to secure as many convictions as are probably needed. There are many examples of municipalities putting work out to tender where the bids have been identical. This indicates there is something wrong, if not in the administration of the law at least in the manner in which it is framed. I say that the law must be more efficiently administered or adjustments must be made to it. There does not seem to be any evidence of the same people committing the same type of offence over and over again, and therefore there does not seem to be the need to increase the statutory penalties as proposed in this bill.

It is interesting to note that the hon. member who proposed the bill seems to have a different attitude toward this area of the law than he and his party have toward other areas of the criminal law and punishment. I refer particularly to the area of capital punishment and offences against existing drug laws. I am not convinced that jail terms are much of a deterrent; perhaps they are even less so than the mere fact of a conviction registered against an accused person or corporation in the area of law under review.

I am more concerned with clause 7 of the bill than the rest of it, because that clause would appear to allow an injured person to share with the Crown an increased monetary penalty; it appears to propose a 50-50 split. What is much more important here, Mr. Speaker, is that the law be changed to follow the practice in the United States where private prosecutions or private actions are allowed against offenders or monopolists or people who combine to increase prices to the detriment of the public. It may be said that this is a provincial matter, but such actions take place in federal courts in the United States.

Our confederation is slightly more centralized than confederation in the United States, so I do not understand why this practice could not be adopted here. We would probably have much more efficient administration in this respect if private enterprise were given a chance to enforce the law and if provision were made for people who have suffered as a result of unlawful combinations to bring action on their own behalf and to be rewarded for doing so by being awarded double or triple damages. I think the social ill we are striving to cure would be eradicated sooner if this type of incentive were provided to private enterprise.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

In summary, I would say that no evidence has been produced that people repeat the offences referred to in this bill and therefore what is proposed by way of jail term will not be put into force. There is no evidence that it is needed. If damage is done to members of the public, they should be allowed to bring action to recover the damage caused by illegal combinations.

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to Bill C-13 I think it would be fair to say, as has already been said, that it appears to be merely a repetition of similar bills introduced by the hon. member over the last number of years. It has not changed in its proposals in any substantial way, so arguments put forward in past debates which have refuted any possible usefulness and adequacy of the bill and its forerunners are clearly pertinent and applicable now.

I say this particularly in view of the comments made a short while ago by the parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie). He has explained quite well, I believe, that this bill has no particular importance at this time because the whole question of combination law in Canada is under comprehensive review and has been since the introduction at the last session of Bill C-256. Business organizations and consumer groups have, I believe, had admirable opportunity to make their views known in regard to the provisions of Bill C-256, the so-called competition act. I believe they have done so both publicly and privately to the present minister and to his immediate predecessor and departmental officials.

Perhaps, however, it would be a good idea to restate some of the arguments put forward in past-debates against the hon. member's proposals. The gist of Bill C-13 is that it would be mandatory for the courts to impose a sentence of imprisonment on a representative or representatives of a corporate entity for a second or third offence under the Combines Investigation Act. On June 5, 1964, the Honourable Mr. Marvin Gelber pointed out that the Criminal Code then provided for the kind of penalties for which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) was asking. He quoted a decision of Mr. Justice Judson in the case of Direct Lumber Company, Limited v. Western Plywood, Limited in which the justice said that section 21 of the Criminal Code provided as follows:

(1) Every one is a party to an offence who

(a) actually commits it,

(b) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it, or

(c) abets any person in committing it.

Mr. Gelber pointed out that this made redundant the bill then introduced by the hon. member.

Mr. Orlikow: Have the provisions of the present act ever been used?

Mr. Hymmen: On November 4, 1966, the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury), speaking to the bill introduced that year by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, said:

Mr. Speaker, it is time we focused our attention more sharply in this country on our anti-combines legislation. I think there is much concern about the practices of the past. I think the government is indicating that it wishes to concentrate its efforts more and more on this aspect of public policy.

Mr. Speaker, this has now been done through the medium of Bill C-256. While I admit that with the termination of the third session of parliament and the commencement of another session, technically Bill C-256 has no status, I understand that the minister at an appropriate time intends to introduce—

Mr. Orlikow: After the next election, or before?

Mr. Hymmen: —an improved and amended bill.

Mr. Orlikow: Before or after the election?

Mr. Hymmen: May I refer again to the remarks of the hon. member for York-Scarborough in 1966. At that time he made the following further observations which are undoubtedly applicable today:

Surely the net which Bill C-30—

That was the bill's number in 1966.

—attempts to cast to make all directors liable is too broad. For instance, certain conscientious officers might actively seek to prevent breaches of the combines act by their company's policy and would take great care to avoid any participation in or condonation of illegal activities.

• (1740)

The hon. member, who is now Minister of Communications, proposed a little later in his speech that the government be more venturesome in this type of legislation. He said:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the government of Canada could be much more venturesome in attempting to provide some real deterrent in respect of a breach of the law in this field and in providing some protection for consumers. This is something which I do not think Bill C-30 accomplishes at all.

I think that these words also apply to Bill C-13. The hon. member went on to say:

I believe our principal concern should be the protection of the consumers. Under its powers in the field of trade and commerce this parliament should be able to enact legislation which would make it possible to impose a civil liability on offending companies under the Combines Investigation Act.

I think Bill C-30 tends to be impractical in the accomplishment of the aims which it seems to have. Its minimum penalty provisions are not consistent with the trend of thinking in the whole field of criminal law. I believe the remedy, in the field of a deterrent, lies in better trained judges and perhaps prosecutors. I feel this is an area which has been neglected and should be examined most carefully by the new Department of the Registrar General with a view to obtaining some recompense for consumers who have suffered damages as a result of offences under this act.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is precisely what the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, which absorbed the Registrar General's department, is now attempting to do. A couple of years later when the hon. member's bill came forward again as Bill C-27, the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford) spoke to it. That was on March 15, 1968, to be exact. The hon. member for Elgin said:

Few sections of our Criminal Code make such sentences mandatory. There are some, for offences such as theft from the mails. But there are reasons for laying down minimum sentences in such cases. Under the Combines Investigation Act these reasons do not exist. I feel the judge trying the case is in the best position to judge what sentence should be awarded, according to the merits of each case.

There are many reasons for believing that the amendments put forward in this bill will not work. For example, charges are usually laid against corporations—and corporations cannot be imprisoned. The provisions of Bill C-27 would have no effect on the corporations themselves. Moreover officials change, and those concerned in a second offence might well have had no connection whatever with a previous offence. And if the directors or officials of a corporation had changed a judge would hardly be able to sentence them at the time of a second offence, as outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Then again, an offence by a company which had previously been convicted might involve an entirely different product line, and a court might not consider that an offence involving a different product line from that of the first offence did, in fact, amount to a second offence. It can easily be seen that many difficulties would arise and that the law might be much worse if these amendments were agreed to.

I believe I have shown, Mr. Speaker, or should I say the past record has shown, that provisions similar to those of Bill C-13 standing in the hon. member's name have been thoroughly debated in the House on many occasions. The proposals of the hon. member's bill are certainly not substantially changed and have been answered quite adequately, at least to my satisfaction. Furthermore, one hon. member who spoke earlier outlined some of the proposals of the competition bill which will, I feel, cover quite adequately the principles which the hon. member for Winnipeg North has for so long attempted to have enacted into law.

Also, as has been said, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is treating this very far reaching legislation with the delicacy it merits by giving all groups who wish to comment an opportunity to do so. This can only have a beneficial effect on the ultimate legislation, to the advantage of business and consumers alike.

Mr. Steven Otto (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I will not say that this subject does not need refreshing comment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has again brought forward the subject, and I do not object. He reminds me of an old-time socialist who has not kept up with events in the last few years and does not know what has happened to the corporate structure. In his mind, large corporations are like the robber baron entities of 1910. He has never tried to bring himself up to date on how corporations act, and so on. Let us ask, what is the purpose of this bill? Let me say that I am not an apologist for corporations.

In the field of corporations a great deal must be done by this government that has not been done, and by provincial governments. Both levels of government must enact measures in connection with corporate structures, since these structures by and large are not really fulfilling the functions they are supposed to fulfil. Directors do not give a darn about what is going on in the business; they want to make money on the stock exchange. Stock exchanges are vying one with another to be the centre of the great con game. Shareholders no longer seem to carry much weight and the officers who run the company are divorced from the directors in regard to responsibility. The entire corporate structure should be reformed.

However, this bill has absolutely nothing to do with that subject. I feel that the hon. member for Winnipeg North does not actually know how a corporate body functions. I wonder if he can tell us exactly how combines come into being. If he can bring forward evidence, I am sure the Department of Justice would be only too pleased to listen to it. That department would like to know exactly which people in which corporations make deals with people in other corporations, and so on.

Suppose, for a moment, this bill were enacted into law. Do you think for a moment that the directors or officers would ever make a decision? Do you know what they would say? They would say, "Since we are only the representatives of shareholders, let them make the decision." The directors and officers would be afraid to do anything on their own. They would say, if charged with making a bad decision, "We did not make the decision; the shareholders made it". I ask, can you prosecute all the shareholders of a company? They may run into the thousands.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker? Is the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) not aware of a very well known case in the United States involving electrical companies charged with and convicted of combining to increase the price of generators? I think one high-ranking official of General Electric, and there may have been more, went to jail for six months. If the American courts can do that, why cannot the Canadian courts?

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the case to which the hon. member refers. Do not forget that in this country we have prosecuted officials for doing things they were not supposed to do. In this bill the hon. member wants to merge the responsibilities of directors and shareholders. He suggests that a corporation, if convicted, should go to jail. Of course, you cannot send a corporation to jail.

Mr. Orlikow: Who makes the decisions in a corporation?

Mr. Otto: I remind the hon. member that despite his great plea against combines, he nevertheless favours monopolies as they exist in Saskatchewan. If an enterprise is nationalized—in other words, if there is no free competition—a monopoly is created. The hon. member supports that kind of monopoly; it is in line with his political convictions. In that kind of monopoly an industry is in the hands of very few people and there is no competition of any kind.

• (1750)

Let me put this to the hon. member. At the present time, a corporation guilty of acts which may tend to raise prices or result in a combine can be put out of existence. No individual can be put out of existence. If the court feels the crime is sufficiently important, and if the corporation has $5 million in the kitty or $5 million in assets, there is nothing to prevent the court from imposing a fine of $1 million for each day of every infraction, and that corporation is dead so far as business is concerned.

Mr. Orlikow: Have they ever done it?

[Mr. Otto.]

Mr. Otto: I said if the court thinks it is advisable, not if the hon. member thinks it is advisable. We hear a great many complaints about corporations being nasty, and everything else; but when it comes to jobs, the hon. member is the first to say corporations should not be firing but should be hiring more people. The hon. member cannot have it both ways.

If the hon. member presented a bill which contained constructive ideas about how the whole corporate structure can be improved—and I dare say it can be improved, even recognizing some of the American concepts which have been adopted in regard to corporations—I would support it. However, to say this bill will prevent combines is nonsense. Before any legislation or ideas are presented we should find out why we have this state of affairs. Why do corporations try to combine or maintain a certain price level? By and large business is still very competitive. A business, corporate or otherwise, does not like to get into a position where there is no competition because there is no room for growth. It is a matter of distribution.

In most cases where there is any evidence of an attempt to hold a firm price, such as for cement and concrete as the hon. member mentioned, it is because the structure for tendering has broken down. I have been involved in business. A great part of business is tendering. When submitting a tender to a municipality or a large group where the money is secure you tend to reduce your price below that which is profitable. Invariably there is a company or concern which has a big staff and they do not want to get rid of that staff. They decide to put in a low bid for a city contract because it is large, even though they will lose money. They will then be able to continue in business. When the next contract comes along they will be able to tender a higher price because someone else will be underbidding. Then before you know it, everybody is underbidding.

Many companies which have tried to fix prices have gone out of business even with the fixing of prices. Many large corporations such as Perini and McNamara have suffered a great deal under our system of tendering because it is presumed that every corporation or company that tenders a price is thinking of a regular, normal price with a profit mark-up. They are not; in many cases they are in desperate straits or want a contract for some other reason. They make bad decisions just as other people do, with the result that they tumble one after another.

There are many cases presently before the courts where municipalities are being sued by suppliers and labourers in order to make up the difference when a contract has gone down under the tendering system. In effect, what we now have is a faulty system of tendering. For that reason some corporations try to get together. They feel that since they are all going to go down, they should see if they can come to terms. An individual or a corporation might try it but if they are caught, they are dead. The question, is why did they do it?

Should we not be thinking of a different method of tendering? For example, in the construction business in Italy, the lowest tenderer does not necessarily get the contract; there is an arrangement by which a tender which is closest to the estimate orginally made by the department or municipality is successful. Other countries have other methods. The construction industry in Canada and the United States has been examining this problem, trying to find a new method by which the most able and most responsible person will get a contract to sell goods and services. We have a problem, but it is not as vast as the hon. member makes out. If we are to do anything about this problem, this bill will certainly not do it.

The hon. member referred to a recent decision of the Quebec court in connection with a contempt of court charge. I would like to refresh his memory. There is a vast difference between a contempt of court decision and a decision under the combines act.

Mr. Orlikow: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Otto: I will in a moment. If there is a court order against an individual within a corporation not to do something, and he does it, he will receive exactly the same punishment. That is the decision of the Quebec court. That case concerned an individual who by his actions displayed contempt of court. If this type of conduct were allowed we would have anarchy. The hon. member cannot on any ground refer to that type of decision and say, "Look at what they are doing there. This is a corporation doing the same thing again." However, it is not doing the same thing again. If there was a court order applying to a corporation executive or officer, and it was disregarded and the officer showed contempt of court, he would receive exactly the same punishment or jail term as in the case in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and the amendment (Mr. Lewis) p. 1448.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the amendment submitted by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). We will readily support that amendment. I would like to be able to support also Bill C-170 introduced by the hon. minister. Unfortunately, I could not congratulate the hon. minister, although we are not against an increase in family allowances, we want them at all costs.

I for one have been asking an increase in family allowances since I was elected as a member of this House in 1962 and family allowances have remained at the same level since then. In fact, the family allowances program did not change so to speak, since its establishment in 1945, except for a few scraps given just before an election to meet families' needs, to get the people's votes. Yet the cost of living increased by almost 300 per cent and all the sectors of the economy followed that increase; Parliament members' emoluments were increased as well as public servants' salaries, judges emoluments and employees salaries, but family allowances were not. Therefore it is about time we do something about family allowances.

We welcome the amendment of the hon. member for York South because we are opposed to a selective family allowance system.

I would like to speak of the right of Canadians to share in the profits derived from the goods of the community at large, a right which every citizen has.

Every citizen in every country, Mr. Speaker, is entitled to a share of the profits derived from the productive capital. Everyone has to be granted this right. This is distributive justice. We talk of the just society. In order to have a just society, you have to distribute its profits. According to distributive justice, profits have to be distributed to the society mostly within a family allowance system.

The objective of distributive justice, Mr. Speaker, is to insure that everyone shares in the collective wealth, for there is a hierarchy in any well-organized group, precisely because of the existence of the group, whose members have to receive their fair share.

This life in society, Mr. Speaker, has allowed for the passing on from one generation to the next of acquired knowledge, of technical advances. In our modern world, family allowances in Canada are still paid, at present, in an outmoded way.

According to the provisions of Bill C-170, payment of family allowances will certainly be made again on the former basis, because no consideration has been given to the needs, rights and prerogatives of every citizen.

The main feature of this bill is that the principle of universality will be replaced by that of selectivity; in other words, we shall cease to pay benefits to children irrespective of family revenue and allocate the amounts thus recuperated to the more disadvantaged.

Will this famous Bill C-170 stand out as a victory or a step backwards? I am convinced that it is rather a step backwards, since the enactment of this bill would be detrimental to families. Our heritage, amassed and increased through successive generations, is being trampled on. Real capital constitute an important factor in contemporary society. If members of this society do not share in the fruits of this capital, in productivity increase or in this vast heritage, they very well deserve being branded as deprived citizens. They are defrauded and dispossessed of their share of inheritance. They are being made outcasts. Distributive justice, Mr. Speaker, will consequently be vioated and brutalized.

This is the case today with family allowances and it is more blatant still, since it is an integral part of the economy of developed countries. This inequity is obvious to the naked eye if we look at the facts as they are and not through the lens of regulations. Such is also the case on a world-wide scale because the people of under-developed countries also belong to the human race.

But our planet and its resources, Mr. Speaker, have been intended for all mankind. Therefore, there is already a certain common wealth, a gift of our Maker, in which everyone should somehow share. We are toying with a fundamental right, that of family allowances. It is more than fundamental; it is a common right given to each member of our society.

Therefore, man as a reasonable being, derived from nature itself the fundamental right to make use of the material riches of the earth, although the practical implementation of this right is left to the human will and to the judicial structures of nations. A basic right is always vested and need not be subject to any other principle; it proceeds from the very nature of man. A basic right cannot be questioned; what we must seek is the most effective means of granting this right more easily in practice.

Any legitimate and perfectly adapted government must offer a choice to its people. It must, however, establish adequate methods of distributing the goods, either domestic or imported, which are available on its territory.

It is neither in an unlimited production nor in the impressive statistics of trade and commerce that one must look for the true image of the actual prosperity of a people. One needs only consider the standard of living of each and every family and individual to determine the adequacy of material possessions. But does this adequacy exist?

Mr. Speaker, the economic wealth of a country does not really consist in abundant goods, measured by a simple appraisal of their actual value, but rather in what such an abundance represents as an adequate material basis for the individual and proper development of its citizens.

If a fair distribution of goods is not or is only partly achieved, the real objective of the national economy would not be attained. However abundant the goods may be, the people are poor because they are deprived of them.

Even though such a fair distribution may be effectively and lastingly achieved, the people will become poor, despite the large amount of available goods. Besides, it is a wrong to say, in our country with its large production, real or potential, that some people's wealth makes others poor.

Mr. Speaker, the rich do not eat all the bread nor do they wear all the clothes. Neither do they keep for themselves all building materials that the country may produce. Some people are ill-fed, poorly dressed, badly housed, but not because the rich are rich. Part of the population is deprived of essential goods taken from Paul's plate, to put something in Peter's empty plate. This does not help at all, when one knows that the larder is full.

Mr. Speaker, this is the ridiculous and disastrous situation we are in. We are against such a legislation that goes against principles or condones the unfair distribution of material goods among the people and the families. However, it is no substitute for civil authorities when it comes to choose formulas or enact nonsensical laws and regulations.

Bill C-170, Mr. Speaker, does not meet the needs of the people.

There are surely some defects that must be eradicated from our present form of capitalism, such as the concentration of wealth and the faulty distribution of its abundant production. But this does not entitle me to replace it with the economic and political formulas of the Communist regime with its tremendous criminal record.

One must be incurably blind not to see them or dishonest to excuse them.

In itself, it is easier to distribute than to produce, when artificial obstacles are not raised. These exist in the economy of wealth of capitalism. They are of a financial order, and nobody can deny it, since this is where governments at all levels are stumbling.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-170 is a violation of familial liberty since it is aimed at a degrading control of income which, rightly so, belongs to the family. It is time for the government to give back other people's property. We should give to anyone the right to distributive justice through national family allowances based on facts and reality.

Mr. Speaker, the facts prove that each citizen is entitled to the necessities of life. When national product goes on increasing, the Canadian standard of living should also rise. Both guaranteed minimum income and guaranteed salary should exist. Trade unions are uttering all kinds of protests demanding guaranteed salaries for workers. Financiers gained recognition of a guaranteed right to interest on their money.

In our society, many properties are so guaranteed but we have not yet given any guarantee to Canadian families and children, so that our country may reach the highest level of affluence and that our population may increase, because we know that in view of our tremendous responsibilities resulting from national, provincial, municipal and educational debts there are not enough citizens to distribute these debts conveniently. We must increase our population at all cost. Are we going to do it by depriving Canadians of their inherent right to justice?

• (2030)

Already we are depriving the Canadian people of their main right, a right to life, to usufruct, to discharge of justice and to distribution of property hoarded over generations. All that property hoarded over generations belongs to the citizens of this country. We know that Canada's population is not large enough. We know that on account of our debts, we would need at least 50 million inhabitants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, everything has been done to restrict the size of our population, to prevent people from developing, to prevent citizens from being born in this country.

We should grant every newborn child a dividend of at least $1,000. We should offer a gift to each father on the birth of his child, since a child means much more than an animal.

This afternoon, we had discussions with representatives of l'Union des cultivateurs. We were told—and we knew it, since a legislation to that end was passed in the House—that the farmers were to receive a $5 dividend for each weanling, whatever the number of weanlings.

But, when human beings are concerned, their number has to be restricted. Family allowances are being limited. Family allowances are being withdrawn from those who build the country, from the most valuable workers in the country, those who build homes, work day and night, develop themselves and our national heritage as well, who indirectly strengthen our economy. We are taking away from them what they are entitled to, that is family allowances. Family allowances are being withdrawn from those who pay the largest share of taxes, who are the biggest consumers, for, devoting most of their time to construction, they are constantly buying all kinds of materials.

We should finance Canadian families since they are the largest consumers within our economy. The larger the family, the higher the consumption. And, at the present time, there are surplus products in our country. This year, we have produced goods worth $95 billion, yet we hardly used up $54 billion. There remain some $40 billion surplus production in warehouses, on counters, that were capitalized. Individuals will have capitalized about $7 billion and corporations $30-odd billion.

Some hon. members say, like the member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme) for instance did last Thursday: Where are you going to get the money? You ask for higher family allowances but you do not even wonder where you will find the money. They find it dreadful to grant an additional $150 million to the population for a most noble and endearing cause. If we had no families we would not need any government. If we had no families we would not need any institution. Institutions are set up to serve families.

So let us put the family allowances at the service of the family, at the service of the nation. Let us give the nation all the encouragement required. The finest, most social, most human investment should be found within the family, within society. We should not subsidize piglets only but human beings as well because they really constitute our society's capital.

And if this society is going to the dogs, where shall we go, Mr. Speaker? Certainly, we need to increase our population, and it is up to us to take the necessary measures. If we have a surplus production of about $40 billion, we can find there all the financial means to help our families, to contribute to their development and we can make available to them the technology we have. We can also help the schools, universities and citizens to develop intellectually and morally, fully, in a word, because we have all the resources needed.

Although we have a surplus production of $40 billion this year, 50 per cent of the population is unemployed and, therefore, does not share in the increase of the national assets. If we were to put all these citizens to work and the necessary capital in the hands of our consumers, of our large families, of all those who have children, so that they may spend and consume more, there would be an upsurge in our economy. Our economy would develop more and these citizens could pay more in taxes and returns to the state, while at the present time the less we give to our society, the more our society declines and our institutions deteriorate.

Mr. Speaker, I beg the hon. members and especially the minister to open their eyes. I beseech the minister to discard this famous bill and to bring out something new which will insure the necessary well being of our people. Our people have needs which we are in a position to meet since we have the necessary resources. At present the resources benefit some 20 per cent of the population at the very time when 80 per cent of that same population has a great number of needs. Therefore we must organize our economy so as to meet those needs, and allow our society to expand further and our families to get bigger and bigger through aid and encouragement.

This bill will deprive those who work in order to give something to those who work less. Generally speaking, those who will produce an income will pay for the others although they are the ones who really work and who do not spare their efforts in order to give the economy the impetus it needs.

I urge once more the minister to thoroughly revise his bill, to introduce a social measure that will be fair for all families, because it is the national distribution of goods which is at stake here. National resources do not belong only to a few individuals, but to all members of the community. And if this distribution is not done as it should, it is unfair, antisocial, inhuman, and it will result in a class struggle, already more pronounced than we suppose it to be.

This must stop, because we are here in order to give justice. We shall do this through an honest administration. The one that the minister proposes to us is not honest, because it is contrary to natural law, according to which each and everyone is entitled to his share of the heritage.

• (2040)

If some people are better off than others, or if they owe any dues to the state, the income tax people will see to it that these are collected. Vast surpluses, if any, could thus be reached through a reasonable system of taxation and basic exemptions.

But to deprive families earning $7,000, $8,000 or $10,000 from the bare necessities of life when they have mortgage payments to meet and other debts to pay, amounts to depriving them of the aspiration to have more children. By so doing, we would deny them the most sacred and important right, that of raising a family.

Families should be given incentives in accordance with the available surplus in our society. A just society should distribute this surplus, and by means of family allowances, we are distributing the value increase of society to everyone and every family and to those really in need.

There is much to be said in respect of Bill C-170. Let me simply mention, at this point, that we are in favour of the amendment moved by the New Democratic Party which partly reads as follows:

—legislation amending the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act to provide for a substantial increase in the allowances paid thereunder, for continuing the principle of universality, and for related changes in the income tax legislation.

We strongly support that suggestion and we congratulate the leader of the New Democratic Party for having presented it and we shall vote for the proposed amendment to give justice to every citizen, to every Canadian family, to provide the family with the necessary development so that it may progress for the good of the nation and that we may be able someday to reduce our national debt.

If society does not grow larger, obligations will be heavier for the taxpayers. Therefore, all necessary encouragement must be given to the family, to a logical and Christian point of view, so that it may develop; our society must take headway. Therefore laws must be just and must enable the family to develop normally. Our legislation should enable the family to take advantage of progress and science. All we have should serve society instead of subduing it.

We would still have much to say but I will not go through all particulars because many other members will do so. We must at all costs give our families the development they need to provide for their maintenance, in so far as the land enables them to get what they need. Land never refused to produce. Right now we have nothing but troubles: too much wheat in the west, too much grain, too many products of all kinds. We have to put restrictions on everything, we have to pay subsidies to prevent citizens from producing.

We realize, for instance, that there is an egg surplus. We have too many products of all sorts to spare. Therefore, we are not faced with a production problem in this country, where we own a hundred times more resources than we need. We could therefore increase our production.

Nearly 35 p. 100 of our population is now unemployed, living at the, expense of this society, because we have too many products to spare, because we do not want to increase our production. Since Providence has blssed us with plenty, it is up to us to manage our resources in such a way that all our people may benefit from them. Instead of boarding this glut, let us distribute it. We live in a land of plenty and we are paying farmers to refrain from producing, and we do it in every way possible. Therefore, let the family enjoy its prime rights, the right to live, and the right to develop, fully and freely.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this amendment, I suppose the first thing that we must consider, is the failure of the present legislation to provide the same level of buying power that was provided when family allowances were first introduced by Mr. Mackenzie King in 1945. If my figures are correct, this bill would provide about 75 per cent of the amount that was provided by the legislation brought forward by Mr. King—and the plan that he introduced was universal. One wonders how far the present government has held on to the principles of what was called the government of reform at one time and is now the government of the so-called just society.

When speaking to this bill originally I brought to the attention of the House the sliding scale of payments under the legislation. At that time the minister was in the House, as he is now. I disagree completely with this type of thing, as I am sure the minister does, because he knows that the cost of administration will increase if the bill ever becomes law. Taking $4,500 as the base, the allowance will be $15 a month for a child up to age 12, and $20 a month for a child between 12 and 17 years of age.

This bill is difficult to interpret, and I do not know how the lay person who has not had the advantage of being in parliament or who does not have the legal talents of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) can understand it. It seems to me that a couple earning $9,000 a year, with a child up to 12 years of age, would not receive any family allowance. This would also apply to a couple earning $10,000 a year, with a child between 12 and 17 years of age. In my opinion, this legislation will open up a bureaucratic nightmare for the civil servants who will have to administer the plan. I hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the government understand this, and that when the bill goes before the committee it will be changed.

This bill will entail a tremendous interlocking of bureaucracy. Let us consider unemployment which last year affected a great many Canadians. Many members of parliament are familiar with the jungle of complexity in which the bureaucrats administering the unemployment insurance scheme were involved. They were so far behind in making unemployment insurance payments that in many cases people went hungry. Many of them have come to my office and complained. This is not an isolated experience; it is the experience of members sitting on both sides of the House.

An hon. Member: You are so right.

Mr. Rynard: The same thing applies to the family allowances plan. In parts of this bill you will note there are provisions requiring the extraction of information from other departments of government. I remember well—those who were in the House at that time and are here today will probably remember it also—when Mr. Pearson was prime minister and everybody was given a social insurance number. These numbers were not to be transmitted from one government department to another and Mr. Pearson gave his word that they would not. When the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked for such an assurance, Mr. Pearson vowed that this would be so. Now we see this information being handed over from government department to government department.

At one time we were assured that information relating to our income would not go beyond the Department of National Revenue. What a change there is now. Now we see that the Department of National Health and Welfare has access to information regarding our income. The same is true of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of Manpower and Immigration, the Department of Supply and Services and other government departments. We are becoming more and more like robots with a number, and the time may not be far distant when we shall be fed and treated as if we were machines and given just what is required to operate us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rynard: I think every member of the House has known individuals who have completed the wrong income tax return form because of lack of knowledge and inability to understand this type of document. Even lawyers and accountants do not understand these forms.

An hon. Member: Wait until you see next year's.

Mr. Rynard: When my accountant asked me what a certain clause meant in the Income Tax Act I told him, "I sit in the House but I do not know." He said, "God knows who does, but we have paid $50,000 to study the act that this government in Ottawa has brought in." A terrible malady has overtaken this "just" government: it is quite a disease. According to the bill, if anybody makes an error it is a criminal offence and he is liable to conviction carrying a penalty of imprisonment up to six months or a fine of $1,000. In order to gain this information the Minister of National Health and Welfare would have to enlarge his Gestapo. The cheque may not necessarily go to the mother now, but to the head of the house or anyone else. The minister says that it will not go to anyone else, but that is not what the bill says.

• (2050)

This legislation will be very difficult for the ordinary person to understand. I should like to read the following excerpt from the bill:

> 18. (1) Every person who knowingly
> (a) makes a false or misleading statement in any application or statement required or permitted by this act or makes any such application or statement that by reason of any non-disclosure of facts is false or misleading,
> (b) provides any person employed in the administration or enforcement of this act or appointed to make an inquiry under this act with any statement or information that is false in any material part . . .
> is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding—

Well, they are going to let him out in six months, or he may be fined $1,000. He may even be faced with a prison sentence and a fine. I do not know whether the minister has read the bill or not. He is not a bad fellow, but I think he must have had bad associates somewhere along the line in order to bring out a bill like this.

An hon. Member: He is too busy putting turf on the Hamilton stadium.

Mr. Rynard: When an application is submitted for family allowance a statement of income will have to be attached, and as soon as there is any change in income another form will have to be submitted. Benefits will be reduced by 33 cents for every $100 of family income above the basic $4,500. I would point out to the minister that by the time one buys stationery, takes the time to write a letter and puts an eight-cent stamp on it, the cost will be about 50 cents. Perhaps the minister will tell us about the economics of spending 50 cents to chase 33 cents. Incomes vary enormously in Canada. They vary amongst trades and professions, between doctor and doctor and farmer and farmer, and every time there is a variance the department will have to be notified. This makes a laughingstock of this bill.

An hon. Member: It is not funny.

Mr. Rynard: The needy people will be hounded by governments, inspectors and government workers. Investigators will travel from place to place checking on the amount of money in the bank account and where the money is being spent. Most welfare officers have done their job as gently and as kindly as it is possible to do a snooping job. This question deals with the frightening bureaucracy and Gestapo which we are gradually setting up in Canada. Imagine having your family allowance reduced by 33 cents per month for every $100 of additional income! If that is not trying to ruin the computers, I do not know what is.

When you consider that it costs eight cents to send a letter, plus the cost of stationery and secretarial services and the difficulty in making your case clear, and what it costs the government to write back and send out the bills, you wonder where this is going to end and how much of the money will go to the people who need it. I see that the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) is not in his seat tonight. He made the statement that nine cents out of every dollar is all that goes to the welfare recipient. I see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not like that, but let him refute it.

Mr. Paproski: Come on John, we are waiting.

Mr. Rynard: There is also a problem when the father and the mother in the family go to work. Their total income is to be considered. This may put them in the income bracket where they will receive no family allowance. Actually, FISP takes the baby bonus away from one-third of our families and only those at the lower income level will receive the $15 or $20 per month. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, 30 per cent will receive no benefit, 18 per cent will receive less, 17 per cent will receive the same amount, and 35 per cent will receive more. This means that only 52 per cent will benefit to some degree.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand how Mr. Mackenzie King, who ran this country in days when it was not so affluent, could come up with a universal program and 25 per cent more payments than the present government. This government claims to be doing something for the people when it is actually depriving them of benefits. The Economic Council of Canada has said that 20 per cent of Canadian families are poor. Many of these families under our present system, would be receiving provincial welfare assistance.

I think the minister said that there are over 100,000, or 200,000 mothers in Canada but an article I read stated that there are over 300,000 mothers in Canada, raising over 700,000 children. These mothers are either unmarried or have been deserted by their husbands. I am putting these figures on the record, and if the minister has a better source of information he can correct them. At the same time, maybe he can tell us how many other people across Canada are on welfare. In the province of Ontario, as I believe is the case in other provinces, the increased baby bonus is deducted from the welfare payment.

Mr. Munro: You had better talk to Mr. Davis about that.

Mr. Rynard: Some time ago the minister and I made an agreement. He told me to go and see Mr. Davis. We were to go together. However, the minister has never phoned me about this. I would be happy to go with him to discuss it.

Mr. Munro: Why don't you just phone him yourself?

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I thought this minister had some communication with government departments across Canada, but apparently he does not and maybe that is what is wrong. To return to the statement that there are 300,000 mothers in Canada, raising over 700,000 children, I followed that by asking the minister how many other people are on welfare. Apparently he is unable to tell me. Maybe he will have that information tomorrow so we will know exactly what is being done.

Under the present baby bonus scheme a mother with children aged 6, 8 and 12 would receive $20 a month. Under FISP she will receive approximately $50 per month. The catch is that it will be immediately deducted from her welfare cheque. If this is not true, I wish the minister would say so In effect, that woman will lose the extra $30 she is given under this plan. She will remain in the same category as before and her financial position will not be improved one bit. Is this how the government is to treat the poor? Is this how the minister is to help the poor with this bill?

An hon. Member: Don't tell us you are going to vote against it.

Mr. Rynard: This is how state control operates. An hon. member to my left seems to be having a hard time making out what I am saying. He cannot understand me now, any more than he could the last time I spoke. Clearly, some people in this House are confused. The provincial governments will save some money because of this cut in welfare payments, and so will Ottawa because it now pays one half through the Canada Assistance Plan. Both levels of government are shaving their costs.

If this is supposed to help the poor, that is not the way it is understood by most of the poor who are supposed to be beneficiaries. Welfare recipients will not be allowed to keep the money they receive, while those in the $30,000 to $40,000 a year bracket, people like the minister, will keep the money they receive, perhaps not in cash but because of the $300 income tax deduction allowed for a child.

An hon Member: That is a good point.

Mr. Rynard: Let us take another look at this bill. The minister said that 1¼ million families will receive full benefits under family allowances. This in my opinion is subject to question and I have already shown why. If the minister can refute my contention, let him do so and let his remarks be on record. Let him tell us how many welfare recipients are in that position. I tell him right now that my figures are different from his. The figure I have given includes those who are on welfare and will not receive the maximum benefit. So in effect 850,000 people will receive benefits which are not as great even as the benefits that were given by Mackenzie King back in 1945, when this program started.

About 1,300,000 families now receiving family allowances will be cut off entirely. Yet this same group will be paying taxes to provide this crossword puzzle trickery of family allowances. As I said before, a couple with one child 12 years of age or under, earning $9,000 per year, will receive no family allowance. A couple with one child between 12 and 17 years old, earning $10,500 a year, will not receive any family allowance. There is also the group earning $7,500 a year and up, which does not make them rich in today's society. These people have families and they are also taxpayers, with all the implications that that carries. These people will receive less in family allowances than they are now.

I never did like the means test, Mr. Speaker. It tends to create stratas in society, the haves and the have-nots, the rich and the poor. The middle-class is being eliminated. Factory people, farmers and office workers are the backbone of this country. They are the people who buy goods and supplies and pay taxes. With inflation running at about 7 per cent in housing and food, these people are poor at $7,000 a year. They are poor at $8,000 and poor at $9,000, and they are being discriminated against.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say that this bill must be changed radically. In some respects the Minister of National Health and Welfare is a reasonable man. I hope that in committee the bill will be changed radically in the way that is necessary. The money supply this year has been greatly increased. I know this is an election year and the government wants to inflate everything; it wants everything going well so that it can say to the people, "You never had it better." This year the money supply has been increased by 30 per cent. It was increased by 21 per cent last year. By and by, if inflation is not running wild, something will be radically wrong, Mr. Speaker.

The government keeps changing its policies and monkeying around with the system. True, they did a little better with the old age pension system when they introduced the guaranteed income supplement and the 2 per cent cost of living escalation feature. The people affected by this bill will not get a nickel to compensate for the effects of inflation; they will not get one cent extra. Inflation this year is likely to run at 5 per cent. Why does this bill not take inflation into account? With inflation running wild, salaries will go ever upward. Consequently, fewer and fewer people will qualify for benefits. The minister will find it hard to say, "This is your manna from heaven," because hardly anyone will qualify.

Also, think of the cost of the bureaucracy that will be necessary to run the program. The demeaning means test must be swept out, Mr. Speaker. An increasing number of wage earners will be disqualified from benefit because of the hungry hands of inflation. Surely an escalator clause to take care of the effects of inflation could be included in the bill. We must also consider, as I have said, the great number of bureaucrats who will be necessary to administer all the necessary services. Why not channel all these services into one service so that administration will not cost as much and so there will be fewer bureaucrats living like parasites on the backs of the people of this nation?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear'

Mr. Rynard: The minister himself admits that a much larger staff will be needed to administer this legislation. If Parkinson's law holds true, 5,000 additional employees will be taken on in the next couple of years.

An hon. Member: That is how the government will fight unemployment.

Mr. Rynard: This is like the front-end loading practised by some companies, only this time the government will be doing the front-end loading. Let us provide benefits for those who really need them. That is the only way to do it. It seems that we are to build a huge bureaucratic jungle to oversee our social programs. We are giving a bit here and a bit there through various departments of government. Why should not all this be done through one department? Let all benefits be paid by one cheque. Let there be one form to be filled out. In that way we could avoid creating the large bureaucracy which apparently is to be created and the people of this country could get value for their tax dollars.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak at this stage in the proceedings on the motion of the New Democratic Party to the effect that Bill C-170 be not read now but that the government rather give consideration and I quote:

> ... to the introduction of legislation amending the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act to provide for a substantial increase in the allowances paid thereunder, for continuing the principle of universality, and for related changes in the income tax legislation.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I call this motion of the NDP the joke of the century. Firstly, the proposal to substantially increase family allowances is made without any specific figures being given, while the government precisely proposes in Bill C-170 to double and even, in somes cases, almost to triple the amount of family allowances.

Therefore, I ask members of the NDP whether they do not think this to be a very substantial increase already, and I ask them why they refuse to accept and acknowledge the effort made by the government to substantially increase family allowances.

Secondly,—

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Because it is an unfair legislation!

Mr. Ouellet: I will come to the remarks of the hon. member for Compton in a few minutes.

Secondly, I would like to say that the proposal of the NDP to preserve the principal of universality is an unbelievable position which seems to me particularly revealing at this time.

That socialist party which has always claimed to be the champion of oppressed and poor Canadians, now that it is given the opportunity to support a measure which is precisely going to help oppressed and poor people in Canada, proposes that this measure not be passed and that consideration of it be deferred.

I think this is completely inconsistent with what they have always advocated. Either they are hypocrites or they have betrayed the cause on account of which this party was created several years ago. And I should like to say that this attitude on the part of the New Democratic Party is very indicative of the fact that its members, under their new leader, are perhaps more concerned about the rich and the people with higher incomes who can afford high legal fees, than about the less privileged classes in our society.

I think that in recent years this government has clearly shown by introducing a whole series of measures and more particularly this proposal to substantially increase family allowances that it wants to bring about a more just society, that it wants to ensure a higher share of income and more generous government subsidies for the underprivileged. And when we ask the opposition to support this legislation, this party which is the self-proclaimed champion of the oppressed, objects to the bill. We shall remember this position and I am sure that the people will remember this reversal of attitude.

I would point out that social security in Canada is quite costly and amounts to about one quarter of each tax dollar. We have found it essential to help the lower income people and the poorest in our society. This is why we endeavoured to take steps to help those people but, while so doing, we recognized that we could no longer increase the burden of the Canadian taxpayers. To correct a situation which we deplored, we needed a better distribution of government expenditures and apply the principle of selectivity.

However, in the proposed motion, we are asked to perpetuate the principle of universality. This means simply that the opposition parties—the NDP supported by the Progressive Conservative Party and the Creditist Party—are prepared to keep on spending considerable amounts of money on people or families who do not need government assistance. In so doing, they are prepared to deprive the have-not families and people of a substantial increase which the present government wants to give them.

When one scrutinizes more closely the NDP's proposal, supported by a number of Social Credit members, one finds that while insisting on universality those members are in fact proposing selectivity. Indeed, they are suggesting universality of payments while in the same breath mentioning selectivity of allowances. This would be achieved by taxing these allowances on a basis which would allow for the recuperation of the total allowances paid to those enjoying a certain level of income. That is to say that the solution considered by the opposition parties only gives the illusion of universality and nothing more.

Moreover—and I think that the hon. members' attention should be drawn to this possibility—this suggestion involves a considerable increase in disbursements and visible expenses. These excessive payments would create a whole series of reimbursement problems.

• (2120)

The recovery of overpaid benefits will unfortunately distort the relation between benefits and needs at the time of recovery.

Universality, Mr. Speaker, engenders excessive diversion of money to the benefit of families that are not poor. According to a recent survey on family and youth allowance programs, only 25 per cent of payments under those programs are paid to families whose income is under $5,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a shameful situation. I believe it has lasted long enough and the government precisely wishes to correct it so that from now on Canadian families earning less than $5,000 may receive family allowances, at least 75 per cent of the money spent for that purpose.

Now the opposition parties' proposal aims precisely at perpetuating that shameful situation. Their objections to the bill as drafted seem unacceptable to me. Their habit, Mr. Speaker—and I cannot help mentioning it—of always unduly prolonging the work of this House through unending and useless debates is unacceptable. The two members who spoke before me tonight spoke for the second time during this debate; they both spoke on second reading and they just told us the same thing again. Only one of their speeches would have been enough, I think. The fact that opposition parties are perpetuating this debate shows how much they are afraid that the Canadian people may see this government proposal accepted and applied. They want to delay passage of that measure because they know it will benefit millions of Canadian families that need such a substantial increase in family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the attitude of the Progressive Conservatives who are against this bill. Their philosophy is such that they are devoted to the protection of the interests of the richest people in Canada. They have never accepted and will never accept that the steps taken be profitable to the smaller interests to the prejudice of the large ones they are protecting.

However, I should say that the position taken by the Social Credit surprises me enormously. The Social Credit party, through its representatives, has made several interventions in the House. Among others, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe), who is here tonight, spoke on two occasions. When examining their interventions in the House, one can see that they have failed to understand this legislation, for each of their speeches contains five or six monumental errors that we will take care to explain in due course to their constituents. Their speeches in the House in no way reflect the feelings of their constituents. I had an opportunity to visit the ridings of those Social Credit members, and the large majority of their electors support the legislation introduced by us.

The people they represent is a rural population, comprising large families with low incomes. Now, the legislation that we are proposing today will considerably help those large families make both ends meet. Therefore, the position taken by the Social Credit members in the House is unspeakable and only shows that they are a gang of people unable to understand a bill. When opposing this one, they err considerably and we will make it a point to return in their ridings and explain to their electors that their Social Credit representatives were against higher family allowances.

I would like to go back to certain allegations made by members of the New Democratic Party to the effect that the tax system and the guaranteed family income supplement tend to favour the better off rather than the needy.

I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that low income citizens will receive, within the framework of our new plan, vastly increased benefits due to the implementation of new exemptions provided for by the recent Income Tax Act. Moreover, their net income will increase. If we want to evaluate the impact of the government's program in relation to income, we must consider the changes that might affect net income, in other words, the amount of money available to a family for its expenses once benefits have been paid and taxes deducted and taking into account the relative importance of supplementary benefits in regard to current family income.

As regards the number of people who will actually benefit from this new plan, we would say that it is appreciable. Almost 70 per cent will receive maximum or partial benefits: 36 per cent will receive maximum benefits and 34 per cent partial benefits. Therefore, only 30 per cent of families will cease to receive benefits, that is families with an only child and earning around $10,000, through and up to those whose income exceeds $14,000, if they have ten children.

It is not true therefore, as some hon. members of the opposition have suggested, that this legislation will penalize families earning $7,000, $8,000 or $9,000. I suggest that they have not understood this bill at all or that they deliberately want to mislead the people.

I would like to point out a statement made by the hon. member for Compton and tell him that it is absolutely false to pretend that a family with six or seven children and earning $7,000 will not receive any benefits. Not only will it continue to receive them, but it will receive increased benefits.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) also made the same mistake in his speech of last Thursday on the same matter. This proves that members of the Social Credit party have not understood a thing about this bill or are deliberately trying to deceive the people.

The hon. member for Lotbinière, as shown at page 1479 of Hansard, gave the example of a head of a family who has eight children and who gets an income of $8,000 per year. I quote:

> His neighbour, another head of a family who lives on welfare, supports three children. The latter will get the maximum allowance.

But according to the member from Lotbinière, the first one will no longer get any allowance. Now, this is completely wrong.

An hon. Member: They are not educated.

An hon. Member: They do not know how to count.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I suggest such comments are quite unacceptable in our debate.

I would think that the members of the opposition, studying such an important measure for thousands of Canadian families, would have found it important to pass this bill quickly, in order to allow the Canadian government to put it into effect and to send, as soon as possible, larger family allowance cheques to families who badly need them and are anxious to see this legislation passed.

I should like, in closing, to point out that several members of the opposition believe that the administrative process we are suggesting will be extremely sophisticated. They say that very competent people will be required to understand and administer this legislation. I am under the impression that they are the only ones who did not quite understand it.

• (2130)

The basic principles of this legislation are quite simple. This program provides for a maximum allowance of $15 for each child under 12 and of $20 for all children from 12 to 17 inclusive for a family whose income does not exceed a strictly defined ceiling. This is quite simple! We want to help the families with the lowest incomes with maximum allowances. The families whose income will exceed this ceiling will be paid partial allowances computed on the basis of a very simple formula also, which the opposition members are trying to make complicated but that surely our citizens will not find hard to understand.

For most families, the family allowances are computed on the basis of the income reported for the calendar year preceding the year for which the allowances are paid. Where there has been a decrease in income and the family suffers also by a substantial decrease in benefits, certain options have been provided in order that the amount of the benefits may remain in keeping with the changes in the financial position. These basic principles are exactly the same which are now applied to the guaranteed income supplement and Canadian senior citizens are quite aware of them. These principles are the very ones we hope to implement for Canadian families.

Therefore, I shall put it this way: I am sure we can have as much confidence in Canadian mothers as in senior citizens who adequately submit their applications for benefits and obtain them promptly.

The arguments of the hon. members of the Opposition are beside the point and groundless. But, over and above all these objections and in spite of the useless extension of the present debate, I am satisfied that the government will pass this bill shortly in the best interests of Canadian families.

[English]

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks by making a prediction. That prediction is that the next addition to the cabinet will be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Ouellet).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rowland: He has shown a complete mastery of the most important qualification necessary for one's inclusion in the cabinet, that is, he talked a lot and said very little. He began by charging members of this party with hypocrisy because we posed as being the defenders of the oppressed and the poor. Here is a bill designed to assist the oppressed and the poor, he said, and we are opposed to it.

• (2130)

I should like him to show me how the oppressed and the poor are being helped by being labelled oppressed and poor, which is what a means test does, a test that is required by this bill. If the government wishes to say that there are some people in this country whose incomes are high enough that they do not require the amount that their family allowance represents, then the proper way to get the money back is through the taxation system, not through a means test.

Secondly, he gave us a big story about how the cost of welfare in this country is rising and how the government must master the problem. All this bill does is increase the cost of welfare assistance even more by adding to an already burgeoning bureaucracy. I shall go into that matter in detail in a moment in order to demonstrate how much it will do so. Finally, he indicated that our claim that the fiscal system, plus FISP benefits the rich rather than the poor is incorrect. If he will listen I shall present him with some figures in a few moments which prove conclusively our contention that it is the rich who benefit from this combination of legislation and not the poor.

I can understand the parliamentary secretary's irritation, because by now hon. members on the government side of the House must be thoroughly sick and tired of New Democrat after New Democrat rising in his or her place to criticize the income security plan on the ground that it is abandoning the principle of universality established in the Family Allowances Act of 1945, on the ground that it creates an administrative nightmare and that the benefits payable, even to those who qualify for the maximum, are in no way consistent with today's needs.

I suggest to hon. members opposite that if they wish an end to this repetition they have two options open to them. Firstly, they can advise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to call an election and we will fight the issue on the hustings, and then they will have to listen to only one New Democrat in their ridings repeating the same arguments rather than 25 of them in this House. Secondly, they can persuade the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) to withdraw the bill and have it redrafted by someone other than the character from Dickens, who obviously put the present bill together, so that it is consistent with life in the twentieth century. Otherwise there is no prospect of relief for hon. members opposite.

Let me deal with the three major objections that this party has to FISP, but in reverse order to that in which I originally listed them. First, the benefits provided in the bill, even at their maximum levels of $15 per child under 12 and $20 per child 12 years of age or over, are unequal to today's needs. Let me say at this point that such criticism is entirely justifiable in relation to a scheme which applies a means test before benefits are paid out.

Obviously, even the maximum benefits do not approach the cost of raising a child, but beyond that at rough estimate only approximately 25 per cent of Canadian families will receive the full benefit. Another 42 per cent will receive only partial benefits, and about half of them at a lesser amount than they now receive. Another one-third of our families will lose the family allowance completely. Moreover, the actual impact of FISP on family income cannot legitimately be considered in isolation from recent income tax legislation. What, for example, are the combined effects of the 3 per cent tax cut and FISP on family income?

Let me cite some figures—these are the figures to which I referred earlier in my remarks regarding the speech made by the parliamentary secretary to the minister—which show the net benefit derived in 1972 from FISP and the 3 per cent tax cut by a family with two children under 12, which is a fairly average family. Combining the 3 per cent tax cut and FISP, for a family with an income of $3,000 the total net benefit will be $216. For a family with an income of $4,000 the total net benefit will be $218.19. If the income is $5,000, the total net benefit will be $225.06. With a $6,000 income it drops to $206.19. At the $8,000 level it drops further to $169.47. At $10,000 it drops even further to $146.07. Then it begins to rise, so that at $15,000 the net benefit is $185.55. At $20,000 the benefit is $260.58. At $30,000 it is $400.68. At $50,000 it is $776.25. At $100,000 the net benefit is $1,611.39. That puts the finish to the parliamentary secretary's argument that these measures combined do not benefit the rich at the expense of the poor. Once again the middle income group in this country carries the can.

All of us have received a letter from Mr. William L. Clink of Willowdale, Ontario, denouncing another defect of FISP in relation to income taxation. I think it is worth while reading his letter into the record. I have had the figures mentioned in his letter checked and to the best of my knowledge they are accurate. The letter reads:

Dear Sitting Member:

If Parliament were asked to consider a measure to increase personal taxes, based on a scale increasing with the number of infant dependents in a family, there would be a vigorous outcry from the people, the newspapers, and your fellow members. But this is what is now being proposed in changes to the family assistance act and there is not a whisper of dissent.

Until now, anyway.

As background, may I bring out a few points:

Family assistance was introduced in the 1940s to ensure that young residents would have a minimum level of sustenance for healthy growth. To direct this assistance where it was most needed and to avoid the difficulties associated with a means test, the Income Tax Act was amended to reduce by $250 the deduction allowed for each dependent "qualified for family assistance". This had the effect of giving to the poor, taxing the rich, and the middle income taxpayers merely exchanged money from one pocket to the other. In this arrangement, the taxpayer who broke even was one whose top tax bracket was either 29 per cent or 38 per cent, depending upon whether the individual dependent was eligible for $6 per month or $8 per month assistance.

This arrangement continued well into the 1960s. Then, the provision in terms of family assistance was dropped and one in terms of equivalent age was substituted, still for the difference of $250 in dependent deduction. This move automatically discriminated against families with dependents not qualified for assistance, as with recent immigrants or citizens supporting non-resident families.

[Mr. Rowland.]

This previously satisfactory arrangement, designed to avoid paying assistance to families not requiring it, is to be continued in the new Income Tax Act but its origins are to be forgotten. Now, additional discrimination is to be layered on top.

Eliminating the present payments to families who do not meet a means test without, at the same time, removing the original tax discrimination is, in effect, a new tax. A tax whose amount is proportional to the size of the family supported.

Then follows a sentence which refers to the actual effect on the person writing the letter and I will leave that out of the record. He goes on to say:

I suggest that there are millions of taxpayers who will be similarly affected and who may not realize the import of the proposed changes until they face them at the next tax period. I also suggest that it would behoove members of parliament to carefully scrutinize this proposed new discrimination and set it right before it is discovered by the affected taxpayers.

I suggest that that is good advice to the government. So much for the adequacy for the proposed payments in relation to today's needs. Let me now turn to our second contention, that the plan is an administrative nightmare, even worse potentially than the new unemployment insurance legislation has been. If this legislation is put into effect, not only will the staff required to administer the plan be more than double that required under the Family Allowances Act—and that figure was supplied by the minister in answer to a question placed on the order paper—but also members of parliament will require extra staff to handle the vast increase in the number of problems that will result. We all know what unemployment insurance cases have done to our workload. But these problems will pale into insignificance compared with the problems that will be generated by FISP.

There are seven distinct circumstances when a statement must be made or a form must or should be filled out and sent to the department, depending upon whether you want the family allowance, whether your income has gone up or down substantially, when in the year your income changed, changes in marital status should they affect income, how many children you have and how old they are. Moreover, a Philadelphia lawyer could not understand the clauses of the bill setting out the circumstances in which statements must be made or forms filled out. How in heaven's name is the average citizen expected to cope with the regulations? But cope he must because failure to do so carries penalties.

False or misleading applications for benefits, cashing a cheque to which the person is not entitled, failing to report that benefits should cease, giving away privileged information all mean a person is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment not exceeding six months or a fine up to $1,000. For failing knowingly to report a change in benefit status a person may be fined up to $100. I would advise parents to begin taking evening courses leading to a degree in law if they want to know what this legislation is all about.

The bill is given an even more Orwellian flavour by the fact that it provides that any information given to the minister under the act may be communicated to the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Manpower and Immigration, National Revenue, Supply and Services and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In addition, the Minister of National Revenue may furnish income information on any individual to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. This is 1984 in spades!

Look at the additional administrative tasks the bill creates. All applications for family allowances must be checked to determine the eligibility of the applicant. In the case of eligible applicants, the benefit payment must be calculated based on family income and age of children. In the case of ineligible applicants, appeals and explanations must be handled. Appeals on the amount of benefit must be handled, statements involving a substantial increase or decrease in income must be processed, with appropriate adjustments to benefits, divorces, separations and marriages of recipients must be reported if family income is affected, and benefits must be adjusted.

In addition, administrative machinery must be set up to recover benefits from ineligible persons. Some of these will be easy to find because, according to the penalties provided, many of them will be in jail. Administrative machinery must be set up to detect frauds involving misrepresentation of income, misrepresentation of the number of children, misrepresentation of the age of children, failure to report income increases and failure to report deaths and marriages. Administrative machinery for liaison with the provinces will have to be established. Surely that list of complications in itself justifies our claim that the plan should be universal and that the tax system is the appropriate way of recovering payments from families which are not in need of assistance.

We believe the social arguments for universality to be even more compelling than this argument which is essentially economic and administrative in nature. Ending the universality of family allowance payments takes them out of the realm of rights to be enjoyed by children and places recipients of benefits under the stigma of receiving welfare. The community is automatically divided into haves and have-nots. Irritations are introduced into relationships between people of approximately equivalent income who receive different amounts in the way of benefits. Cashing FISP cheques at the local drugstore or grocery store will be a sure way for a woman to disclose her family income to all who know her and her family and who see the amount of the cheque.

I could go on and on but I think I have made my point. This bill is totally unacceptable because of its lack of universality, because of the inadequacy of the benefits paid and because of the administrative labyrinth it will establish. I will vote against this bill without any hesitation whatsoever.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to previous speakers. Basically, the government has attempted to bring in a piece of legislation which hopefully would benefit families in low income groups. Once again it seems to me the government will probably be creating a situation in which the cure is worse than the disease this bill hopefully will cure. It seems to me the government is in fact not only creating a situation which will proliferate greatly the bureaucracy which is growing so rapidly in this country, but a situation which will necessitate the consumption of a significant portion of the tax dollars of Canadians. The government is also creating problems in respect of the very social fabrics it proposes are desirous of improvement.

It seems obvious that Canadians are going to be judged to some degree by whether they are unfortunate enough, from a social point of view, to require family assistance. Neighbourhoods will be polarized to a certain extent because people who are dealing with their neighbours will know, as has been pointed out, that so-and-so down the street requires family assistance because he is not doing as well as the fellow who does not require it. All in all, this is not a very desirable situation.

The hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) brought out some very interesting points, as did the previous speaker, in suggesting that some of the provisions of this bill are objectionable simply from a privacy point of view. The information which will be assimilated as a result of this measure will come back to haunt the people. It will be bandied about from one department to another. A great deal must be done in the committee to shape this bill and make it equitable. The part that concerns me most and the issue I should like to discuss in some detail this evening concerns the situation where children are in institutions or in care, as it is sometimes called. The provinces which look after such children will be worse off than they are at the present time.

I believe the minister is in receipt of correspondence from the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association and has received representations from children's aid societies and similar organizations in many provinces. From my own province I have received a great deal of mail about this matter. In particular, I received a letter recently from the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association which sets out some of their objections to the provisions of this bill. Some of the provisions to which this association objects were set out in correspondence to the minister in April of this year. I should like to read part of the letter for the record so it will be placed before the people of this country. It sums up the situation very well, particularly when governments are considering children who happen to be in care in provinces which are not as affluent as some of the so-called have provinces.

This letter is signed by Kevin Burns, president of the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association. It reads in part as follows:

Dear Mr. Munro:

I wrote to you on September 1, 1971, after the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association and member agencies had reviewed the Department of National Health and Welfare white paper, Income Security for Canadians. We were concerned because there was no mention in that document that "children in care" would receive federal income security plan benefits.

This was of very great concern to this organization, as one might expect. The writer continues:

By "children in care" we are referring to wards of children's aid societies and children being maintained in institutions. We were reassured with the introduction of Bill C-264 as it included such children for benefits. We had fears that if "children in care" were excluded from the federal income security plan, there were no guarantees that funds equal to current family allowance benefits or the proposed federal income security plan benefits would be replenished by our provincial government.

• (2150)

As you know, Mr. Speaker, there is a great burden on some of the provinces, including my province, because of shortages of funds for welfare purposes. The writer continues:

> We are again concerned, Mr. Minister, in reading Bill C-170 to learn that only one half of the maximum amounts under federal income security plan will be available to "children in care" because the maintenance of such children is being shared under the Canada Assistance Plan. The end result of this decision will mean, in Nova Scotia at least, that our "children in care" will be little better off than under current family allowances and youth allowance programs, and ironically less well off than many children eligible for federal income security plan benefits in homes of greater affluence.

So, these children who are already disadvantaged and have problems as a result of the situation in which they find themselves will not be helped at all by this so-called enlightened legislation, but will be in fact further disadvantaged. The letter then states:

> Further, with reference to the Canada Assistance Plan, our provincial government has pointed out to you on several occasions that the beneficence of the Canada Assistance Plan is one thing to the citizens of Canada's wealthier provinces, but it is quite another matter to a province such as Nova Scotia.

So, again, this is being perpetrated not only by individuals of the state social strata but by the provinces themselves. The letter continues:

> Under Bill C-170 which you introduced to the House of Commons on March 15, 1972, "children in care" will receive half the maximum amount, but any supplementation to increase the benefits to a more appropriate level will be dependent on the economic situation in a province rather than on individual or family need. This proposal is consistent with neither the principles of family allowance, which has established tradition in Canada nor the Canada Assistance Plan. Further, it does not seem to us to be an effective instrument to help improve the quality of life of children who have endured much suffering and privation.
> Current federal income security plan proposals under Bill C-170 for the most part will help improve the economic situation and the quality of life of many needy and low income Canadian families and children. We endorsed the principle in September of last year and we do so again. However, for wards, for children in our special protection program—juvenile delinquency—and others in care the opportunity to improve the quality of their lives a little will be weighed very carefully against the wishes of an already heavily burdened Nova Scotia taxpayer.

In my province this legislation, which at first glance may appear to be enlightened, has very serious drawbacks when measured against the social fabric and particular economic needs of Nova Scotia. Of course, this goes without saying: it will apply to the provinces in the Atlantic region generally because in the Atlantic region Nova Scotia is perhaps one of the better off provinces. The letter continues:

> Unfortunately the lobby for children in Halifax is no stronger than the lobby for children in Ottawa.

So the president of the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association is very concerned about the implications. He finishes his plea or submission to the minister by saying:

> We urge you and your colleagues to review section 6, subsection (2) of Bill C-170, which limits Federal Income Security Plan benefits to "children in care", and we hope that the appropriate change will be made. We appreciate your consideration of our views.

[Mr. MacKay.]

It seems to me that of all the possible recipients of the beneficence, if you will, of the federal government, surely the pre-eminent people should be the children who are presently disadvantaged. Surely, if this government really cares for the principle of social equity and justice it must reconsider this particular section. If it does not do so, it seems to me the whole concept which prompted it to bring in legislation of this type will be nothing but a hollow mockery.

Again I ask the minister, if he has not already done so, to give every consideration to the submissions made by the Nova Scotia Family and Child Welfare Association and to reply to this group at his earliest possible convenience. I hope that when this bill goes to the committee, the minister will take a very good look at what this group has to say and will also consider some of the other very appropriate suggestions which have been put forward by hon. members who preceded me this evening.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this subject at this late hour I have only very few comments to make. After hearing the submission of the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) I am reminded of the expression the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) uses quite often to describe the opposition of others. I believe the expression is "pusillanimous poppycock." This is what my friend from Papineau indulged in tonight. It reminded me of the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with respect to at least 20 Quebec members having to go. The hon. member, on his performance, was a living example of the statement of the Prime Minister.

I was rather surprised that such a young member who I thought had progressive ideas would stand up and attempt to give an essentially cheap political harangue against the principles we have adopted in criticizing the bill. We have enunciated them so often that I would think they would have penetrated even the mind and heart of the minister himself. But I suppose he has difficulty in stopping smoking and probably in appreciating the principles which we have put forward.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNIONS—REQUEST FOR RECOGNITION OF AQUATIC SPORTS BY ISSUANCE OF STAMP

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, in recent years there has been a decline in administrative efficiency in many government departments, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and so on, but to no department does this apply more than the Post Office Department. I have been asking a series of questions on this matter and I hope I can bring the situation into focus in the remarks I make this evening.

There have been increased costs and a radical decline in the postal service. Rural post offices have been closed and the six-day delivery service has been reduced to a five-day service. Charitable organizations have been penalized by exorbitant increases in rates resulting in loss of business. Of course, there has also been the inevitable loss of morale among the employees. This has all meant a loss of revenue and mounting deficits with which this House is familiar.

• (2200)

I have even noticed that there has been a decline in the quality of the postal stamps issued recently. A correspondent has written, asking that I raise this subject in the House of Commons—perhaps this is the best opportunity afforded—suggesting that the Postmaster General (Mr. Côté) review the membership of the stamp design committee and its cost to the taxpayer as a possible method of decreasing the deficit. The amazing thing is that the Postmaster General recognizes this situation exists because in a recent speech in Vancouver he said, among other things, the following:

> The Post Office productivity has fallen by 12.5 per cent since 1965.

He also said:

> —to reduce the deficit new measures were adopted including the closing of rural post offices and the reduction in the delivery week from six days to five.

He said, further, that although these steps reduced the operating costs it is possible that they also led to the deterioration of postal service. I think we all agree that he can say that again. He said further:

> Several steps are being taken to improve productivity including more consultation between employees and management in connection with new working methods, a better working environment and improved social conditions.

I asked a question today concerning the current negotiations with postal unions, because the results of these negotiations do not bear out the words of the Postmaster General to the effect that a great effort is being made to ensure closer consultation between employees and management. The contract expired a month ago. We have had no statement in the House from either the Postmaster General or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) as to what progress is being made.

It is interesting that the only public utterance on this matter has come from the president of the Letter Carrier's Union in the wake of the speech that was made in Vancouver when the president, Mr. Roger Décarie, said that the minister had better follow more closely the work of his representatives at the bargaining table than let go with all kinds of statements on matters which could influence to a great extent the content of the next collective agreement.

Obviously, postive leadership is needed in the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General spoke about the problems and now there must be action—and not just the kind of action that was referred to in the speech in which he said:

> If we are unable to resolve this problem, we might have to reintroduce a Saturday delivery should that be the best solution.

There are many probables in that quotation such as "we might have to introduce the Saturay delivery should that be the best solution". Obviously, the long suffering public of Canada has come to the conclusion that action is needed now. We trust that the Postmaster General will seize the initiative in these matters and will take some concerted and positive action with regard to the negotiations going on, so that we might have a contract and also do the things that are necessary, including the restoration of the six-day delivery, in order that the efficiency of the Post Office might be restored to its former level.

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I assumed that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) would be referring to the question he put on the "late show" with regard to the initiation of postage stamps to recognize our aquatic sports. We received representations in February of this year to recognize aquatic sports by the issuance of a postage stamp. The outstanding record of Canada's athletes in aquatic sports at the international level is very well known, as are the superb facilities of the Pan-Am pool in Winnipeg which hosted the international diving competition on April 8 and 9 this year.

We will certainly give sympathetic consideration to this suggestion when planning future programs. I should note, however, that we review 200 to 300 excellent suggestions each year which must be reduced to ten or twelve for the number of commemorative stamps issued each year. Many must be rejected or deferred for consideration as future programs. It should also be appreciated that about one year is required for design, printing and distribution after a subject is selected and approved.

Our department has consistently given sport good recognition. Hon. members may recall the four outdoor recreation issues of 1957 which, incidentally, portrayed swimming as well as skiing, canoeing and hunting. We have also honoured curling and lacrosse, the Canada summer and winter games, hockey, the Pan-Am games and recently the world figure skating championships in Calgary.

Sport is becoming an increasing part of our culture. All Canadians should become more aware of the values of sport and recreation. We are continuing our study of the possibilities for making contributions through our postage stamp programs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—POSSIBLE OPENING OF MISSIONS IN ZAMBIA AND BARBADOS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, when on March 20 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) when it was intended to open a Canadian diplomatic mission in Zambia and Barbados, I was repeating an inquiry which I have been making for lo these many months.

I have long been troubled and a bit ashamed that the small country of Barbados could establish in our capital a mission with three very fine external affairs officers, but that this the senior overseas member of the Commonwealth—if I may use that somewhat historic expression—could not reciprocate by opening a mission in Bridgetown. I know, too, that one of the finest diplomats on embassy row today is the High Commissioner for Barbados.

The Barbados High Commission has been in Ottawa since 1967. But apparently austerity has clamped its heavy hand upon the Department of External Affairs and for five years we have not mustered the funds or the interest to open a diplomatic post in the capital of this friendly and charming Caribbean Commonwealth state. The minister in his reply used the expression "the usual financial constraints". But of late we are in an era of big spending, of far-flung largesse. Think of the millions cast about by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier)!

I have long held that our relations with the friendly states of the Commonwealth Caribbean are of tremendous significance to our foreign policy. If Canada cannot carry out a meaningful, useful and effective foreign policy with these our long appreciated and well known neighbours, then our whole external outlook is in question.

Since my inquiry there has been an announcement, not in this House—we rarely expect that courtesy now—to the effect that among new missions to be opened by 1974 Barbados will be included. For this step I must express my approval and not dilate upon the time wasted in strengthening our ties. But must we really wait until 1974? What is the problem? Are we short of staff? Are we so bereft of funds that an area so vital as the Commonwealth Caribbean must be downgraded for another two years?

This government, too, has not hesitated to proclaim its concern for the struggles of the majority in southern Africa, but for long we have demurred from appointing a high commissioner for Zambia, which of all countries must be closest to the struggle being carried on in those African states where the majority has not been given full political rights. In view of our sustained preachments it would have seemed normal and natural that a mission to Zambia be given high priority. But Algeria and several other nations came first. Zambia, too, is on the 1974 list. I suppose we should be thankful that it is on the list at all. Yet, Mr. Speaker, I fear that this is something more than an indication that the austerity squeeze is lingering on at the Department of External Affairs while other departments are embarking upon a glorious free-spending era.

I am troubled lest this is but another indication of the isolationist or withdrawal syndrome which has been a consistent part of the foreign policy of this government. Not long ago I checked the record and found that nearly a dozen countries had embassies here without reciprocal Canadian missions in their countries. I think we should not withdraw from our Commonwealth association. I think we should strengthen our ties with friendly Commonwealth states. I think we should not turn inward but should accept our role on the international stage. I hope that the minister will accelerate the opening of missions in Zambia and Barbados and thus strengthen, reconfirm and underline our strong ties of friendship and good will with the people of these friendly Commonwealth countries.

• (2210)

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that his warm expression of feeling towards Commonwealth countries in the Caribbean is shared to an equal degree by the government. I think the hon. member may have misread the communique of April 10 in which the opening of these missions was announced. Six new posts were announced at that time, being at Barbados, Hungary, Korea, Morocco and Zambia, where there will be either high commissions or embassies and, as well, at Atlanta, Georgia, where there will be a consulate general. The press release said:

> The posts should all be in full operation in 1974.

That is not meant to suggest that the opening of any of these six posts is to be delayed until that date. They will be opened as soon as reasonable accommodation can be found. This will be easy in some of the countries involved. In some where the housing shortage is accute, there may be delay and that delay may extend until 1974. The delay will be as short as reasonable in all cases, Mr. Speaker. I hope that Barbados and Zambia will be among the posts which will be first opened.

TRANSPORT—REPLACEMENT OF CANADIAN BY FOREIGN VESSEL—REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FOR PURCHASE OF VESSELS IN SWEDEN

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago one of those marine legal miracles occurred in which a German built freighter at or near Halifax took on Singapore registry, this action having dire effects on the few vessels now remaining under the Canadian flag, under Canadian ownership and sailing Canadian waters between Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland. The vessel I refer to is the Travetal, manned by German officers and a Spanish crew.

I make nothing of that except to welcome those gentlemen to Canadian waters. I regret that the presence of that ship in Canadian waters means that two Canadian vessels, one Federal Hudson, and the other O.K. Service XI, will probably have to pack up their careers. Some attempts are being made to continue those Canadian vessels in operation. Let us hope they succeed. However, hope is somewhat different from government policy that will ensure that these efforts succeed.

On April 18 I directed the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in this chamber:

> Would the minister investigate the recent waiver by customs which resulted in a foreign vessel, Travetal, and its crew, replacing the Canadian vessel, Federal Hudson, and its Canadian crew on the east coast. Would he also look into the circumstances in which Canadian National is reportedly negotiating in Sweden for two vessels for the Newfoundland trade?

It was agreed between the minister and myself that the position would be made clear this Tuesday evening, and I see that the parliamentary secretary to the minister is here with information. I am not much concerned about the reported dickering of Canadian National in Sweden. That may have been a rumour. If it is, I am sorry that I helped to pass it along or give it some kind of currency. What I am concerned about is the fact that Canadian officers and Canadian seamen will lose their jobs with the laying up of two Canadian vessels.

The Canadian Merchant Service Guild and the Seafarers International Union have both lodged letters of protest over the customs arrangement concerning Travetal. The arrangement, technically, is not a waiver of customs but comes, rather, under the Canada Shipping Act and the Financial Administration Act. This vessel will pay at the rate of one one-hundred-and-twentieth for every month she is allowed to operate in Canada, and she will be allowed to operate here for two months. I am not sure whether at the end of that time she may not undergo some further legal metamorphosis and be allowed to operate here for a longer period. The point is that Canadian ships have just about lost any opportunity for work and Canadian masters, officers and crews not laid off yet face a pretty bleak outlook.

The government does have the Darling report, a study on this whole matter. I pursued this matter with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) when he appeared before the finance committee last Thursday. He seemed sympathetic toward Canadian shipowners and crews. I pursued it further tonight when members of the Canadian Transport Commission appeared before the transport committee. You have to be a nomad who knows all the weigh stations to make a point: you must make one part of your point before one committee of the House and another part before another committee. Anyway, the cry of "marine rape" has been raised. I raised it on many occasions in as many places as I could. I now look forward to whatever reassurance the parliamentary secretary can give in a very sad situation.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) in his question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) last Tuesday raised two distinct and separate matters involving water transport from the mainland to Newfoundland.

I will deal first with the matter of the reported negotiations for vessels in Europe. The short answer to that question is no. There are no CN officials in Sweden negotiating for vessels for the Newfoundland trade at the present time. What the hon. member may have had in mind is that in January an official of CN and another of the Department of Transport went to Europe to assess an older ferry vessel which was steam driven and capable of carrying a limited number of rail cars. However, as it turned out this vessel was not suitable for operation in the Gulf.

The other aspect of the question raised by the hon. member concerned the use of the vessel Travetal and the waiver granted to this vessel by the Department of National Revenue. My understanding of this matter is that CN has neither bought nor chartered the Travetal directly. In order to fulfil cargo commitments with the CNR, Newfoundland-Canada Steamships Limited arranged to charter the Travetal through Trident Steamships Limited of Halifax. They have a specific requirement for a roll-on roll-off vessel, and the Travetal has this facility.

The waiver in question is for a period extending to May 8 and it is for the purpose of transporting automobiles and cargo between Halifax and St. John's. The Canadian laws which are being applied are found under the provisions of section 665 of the Canada Shipping Act and section 17 of the Financial Administration Act.

The hon. member has raised a number of points which I will not have sufficient time to cover this evening, but I have noted them and will bring them to the attention of the Minister of Transport. Perhaps a written reply to the hon. member on these items would be helpful as well.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:21 p.m.

COAL MINING, NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move under Standing Order 43 a motion of urgent importance with regard to the fate of coal mining communities in the province of Nova Scotia, especially those depending upon independent coal mining operations.

In 1967 an agreement was reached between the federal government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia which resulted in the federal government assuming responsibility for the former Dosco mine operations on the understanding that the government of the province of Nova Scotia would assume full responsibility for independent coal mining operations in that province. As a result, the federal government established a Crown corporation known as Devco and the provincial government assumed obligations, including the payment of subventions or a substitute for subventions, for the coal produced by independent coal mine operations. At the present time in Nova Scotia—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that under the provisions of Standing Order 43 he should not make a speech in support of the motion. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 hon. members are entitled to make a motion without notice, but this can only be done in very exceptional circumstances. The hon. member should indicate as quickly as possible the motion he proposes for consideration of the House.

Mr. Coates: I felt it was only proper to give members an opportunity to have some understanding of the agreement I would like to see referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development. The problem is related to the fact that the coal mining operations in a number of communities in Nova Scotia that are the responsibility of the provincial government are now being threatened. I believe that the original agreement between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia is now being breached.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that he should indicate what his motion is. If all hon. members are allowed to make three or four minute speeches in support of proposed motions under Standing Order 43, I suggest that would lead to difficulties. I would hope we can count on the co-operation of hon. members to indicate as quickly as possible any motion they may have in mind.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the agreement between the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. This motion, moved under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

AUTOMOBILES—HIGHER CANADIAN PRICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. It arises out of the revelation today that North American auto producers are reaping an excess profit of $150 million at the expense of the average Canadian as a result of their charging approximately $300 more for a Canadian-made car in Canada than they do for an identical car in the United States. Such prices are not only—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring to the attention of the hon. member the considerations I brought to the attention of the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North. There is no provision at all in the Standing Order or in the practice of the House that allows hon. members to make speeches in support of a motion under Standing Order 43. To do so is entirely against the spirit of that rule. Hon. members should indicate as quickly as possible, without speeches, what the motion is that is proposed under the terms of the Standing Order.

Automobile Prices

Mr. Broadbent: I heed your admonition, Mr. Speaker. I ask leave to move, seconded by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House urges the Prime Minister to summon to Ottawa next week the heads of the North American automotive companies in Canada with a view to instructing them that within a three-month period factory list prices for their products in Canada should be on the average at par with the prices for the identical product sold in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put at this time.

AUTOMOBILES—POSSIBLE UNLAWFUL PRICE PRACTICES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales):

That this House, holding the opinion that offences are being committed under Part V of the Combines Investigation Act, orders the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs forthwith to cause inquiry to be made into the following question: whether all four automobile manufacturers in Canada have committed and are following unlawful trade practices by discriminating against Canadian consumers by charging Canadian dealers what appears to be about 10 per cent more than they charge United States dealers for made-in-Canada cars.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is also proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. I have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), to move a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning the proposed French nuclear tests. I move:

That this House is of the opinion that inasmuch as Canadian government policy is opposed to further nuclear proliferation by all nuclear powers; and inasmuch as a motion was passed by this House on October 15, 1971, protesting the United States underground test at Amchitka,

Therefore be it resolved that this House of Commons express its unequivocal objection to the proposed atmospheric nuclear test scheduled this summer by the government of France over the South Pacific and that we communicate this motion to the President of France forthwith.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS TO RECEIVE ALLOWANCES, AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRACTS WITH EMPLOYERS

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-195, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Question No. 63—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How much money has been allocated under the federal government's Local Initiatives Program to (a) municipalities (b) local groups, etc. in each province?

2. What criteria were used in the provincial allocations for both municipalities and local groups, etc.?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. As at March 17, 1972, the following sums had been allocated to municipalities and local groups in each province under the Local Initiatives Program:

	Private $	Municipal $
Newfoundland	6,603,143	3,312,039
Nova Scotia	7,775,356	2,620,640
Prince Edward Island	1,524,687	522,707
New Brunswick	6,654,816	2,576,686
Quebec	39,008,426	24,069,219
Ontario	14,277,652	7,729,497
Manitoba	3,428,396	1,937,847
Saskatchewan	2,557,885	1,409,231
Alberta	4,240,750	3,714,612
Northwest Territories	602,839	442,131
British Columbia	9,171,991	4,328,213
Yukon Territory	312,269	115,550

2. The allocation was made proportionate to unemployment in the provinces to the base rate of 4.5 percent unemployment and adjusted for out migration and native population that would not otherwise be reflected in unemployment figures.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE ACT

Question No. 123—Mr. Muir:

How much of the subsidy paid to highway carriers under (a) The Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act on shipments from select territory to points outside select territory (b) the Special Regulations issued under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act and approved by Order-in-Council P.C. 1970-2015 dated November 17, 1970, has been paid on shipments having their origin in that part of the Province of Quebec included in the definition of select territory as found in the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission reports as follows: The information is not available in the form requested and the Commission does not have the necessary staff to undertake the large amount of work which would be required to prepare the information in the said form.

SUBSIDIES TO HIGHWAY CARRIERS ON WESTBOUND MOVEMENTS FROM SELECT TERRITORY, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 124—Mr. Muir:

In accordance with the recommendations of the report of May 6, 1970, of the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Transportation, has the government taken any steps to provide for the payment of subsidies on westbound movements out of select territory to highway carriers on the same basis as they are calculated and provided to the railways, thereby bringing the payments to the highway carriers to the same level per unit of traffic as that now paid to the railways?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The government has not taken steps to provide for the payment of subsidies on westbound movements out of the select territory to highway carriers on the same basis as they are calculated and provided to the railways.

SUBSIDY ON USED HOUSEHOLD GOODS CARRIED BY HIGHWAY TRANSPORT FROM SELECT TERRITORY, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 125—Mr. Muir:

1. In accordance with the recommendation of the report of May 6, 1970, of the Federal-Provincial Committee on Atlantic Transportation, has the government taken any action to eliminate the subsidy now being paid on used household goods carried by highway transport from select territory to points outside select territory?

2. How much money has been paid under the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act to highway carriers for the movement of used household goods from the select territory to points outside of select territory since the implementation of the subsidy provision of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission reports as follows: 1. No.

2. $558,726.00 for the period July 9, 1969 to March 1, 1972.

Questions

ALCOHOLISM IN CANADA

Question No. 170—Mr. Mather:

1. What is the estimated number of alcoholics in Canada?

2. On what definition of an alcoholic is this estimate based?

3. What is the alcoholic rate among native Canadian peoples?

4. What is the relationship between alcoholism and homicides?

5. What is the relationship between alcoholism and traffic death?

6. What is the estimated number of years which alcoholism can cut off an imbiber's life?

7. What is the estimated cost to the Canadian economy of alcoholism?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of National Health and Welfare and Transport as follows:
1. It is estimated that over 600,000 Canadians consume a hazardous amount of alcohol, and that of this number one half may be termed alcoholics.

2. The level of hazard referred to above is consumption of 100 millilitres of absolute alcohol daily, and that for the alcoholic 150 millilitres.

3. No precise data are available to answer this question.

4. It seems, from data available, that the incidence of homicides among alcoholics is higher than for the general population.

5. Data obtained by the Department of Transport indicates that drivers who have a drinking problem are 20 times more likely to be killed in a traffic accident than drivers who are not problem drinkers.

6. Estimates vary but range between eight and twelve years.

7. No reliable data is available to answer this question. The estimated cost would include: lost of productive worktime, health and welfare costs, property damages.

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—INSTALLATION OF ADDITIONAL FACILITIES ON VACATIONLAND AND HOLIDAY ISLAND FERRIES

Question No. 206—Mr. MacLean:

1. Has the Department of Transport been in consultation with the Government of Prince Edward Island regarding the inadequacy of the stairs on the Vacationland and the Holiday Island, the two new car ferries operating on the Borden-Tormentine Ferry service and, if so, with what result?

2. Is it the intention of the Department of Transport to provide escalators or elevators on these ships, or to make some other modifications to reduce the amount of stair-climbing that passengers will have to do before the commencement of the 1972 season?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. (note answer to number 2).

2. The investigation by the Department of Transport into the question of the use of the stairs revealed that some people, primarily the elderly and handicapped passengers, found it difficult to climb the stairs to the upper deck where washroom facilities are located. Since major alterations would be required to change the design of the ship superstructure to accommodate escalators or elevators, a decision was made to locate additional washroom facilities on the lower car deck. These new facilities are presently being installed and they will be ready in time for the 1972 summer season. The situation will be monitored during the summer and if further problems occur appropriate action will be taken wherever possible.

CONSTRUCTION OF COAL SLURRY PIPELINE FROM EAST KOOTENAYS TO ROBERTS BANK, B.C.

Question No. 331—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

Is the government currently involved in discussions on the proposed construction of a coal slurry pipeline from the East Kootenays to Roberts Bank, British Columbia and, if so, who are the other parties presently involved in such discussions?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Transportation Development Agency advise as follows: The feasibility of the coal slurry pipeline referred to is being investigated by Shelpac Ltd. (slurry pipeline consultants) for Canadian Pacific Ltd. The proposed pipeline will extend from the East Kootenays to Roberts Bank, British Columbia and thus it is strictly within the jurisdiction of the British Columbia government. No official discussions with the federal government on the proposed pipeline construction have been made or are underway.

NATIONAL REVENUE—DISPOSITION OF OBJECTIONS AND APPEALS

Question No. 336—Mr. Stewart (Okanagan-Kootenay):

What was the disposition of objections and appeals arising from assessments made by (a) the Penticton District Office of the Department of National Revenue (Taxation Division) (b) the other District Offices located in the Province of British Columbia (c) all of the 28 District Offices in Canada, over the past five years?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): In so far as the Department of National Revenue, Taxation, is concerned:

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY ACT—COMPLIANCE LABEL REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 344—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

With regard to regulations under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act requiring all vehicles manufactured in Canada or imported into Canada subsequent to January 1, 1971, to carry a label specifying month and year of manufacture (a) what methods are being taken to enforce these regulations (b) will penalties be invoked for failure to comply and, if so, what are they (c) have any prosecutions been initiated to this date?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) The Department of Transport ensures compliance with the compliance label requirements of the Motor Vehicle Safety Regulations, by obtaining a signed declaration from importers relating to each vehicle, by auditing manufacturers' and importers' records, by inspecting vehicles at Customs Ports of Entry or in possession of importers, by investigating inquiries from the public and by inspecting of manufacturers' operations in Canada. (b) Violators of the Motor Vehicle Safety Act are liable to a fine in summary conviction of $1,000 to $10,000 or upon conviction by indictment of $5,000 to $200,000 depending whether he is an individual or a corporation. (c) No.

PEI NATIONAL PARK—NUMBER OF VISITORS TO COVEHEAD HARBOUR

Question No. 362—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. For the past 20 years, has the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development any estimate of the number of visitors to Covehead Harbour in the Prince Edward Island National Park?

2. For the same period, what amounts have been expended by the government in improving and extending the harbour facilities at this port?

3. What is the estimated expenditure for this port in the forthcoming fiscal year?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Public Works advise as follows:

1.

Year	Visitors	Year	Visitors
1950-51	87,851	1960-61	412,463
1951-52	107,981	1961-62	775,583
1952-53	122,290	1962-63	1,009,021
