FARM AND FIRESIDE.

Fimely Hints Useful to the Farmer and His Household.

Oftentimes both the farmer's wife and the professional dairymen experience conderable trouble in gathering the butter into a solid mass, even after it appears in the churn in small granules and floats about in the buttermilk. The usual plan is to manipulate with the dash until the butter can be removed from the churn in a more or less compact form. Thus treated, it too often presents a greasy appearance and by the time the usual washing and the proper quantity of salt is well worked in, the granules are mostly broken, and the result is that the output is narked at a low price. Very much of this trouble can be avoided by a simple process, easily understood, and within the reach of all. As soon as the butter anpears and the process of gathering is about to take place, then, for an eight pound churning, pour gradually over the floating butter in the churn two gallons of cold just been dissolved. Let it stand for a oment, then manipulate with the dash as in the usual manner when completing the churning, and the chances are the broken granules. The reason is that the water containing the salt increases the density or specific gravity of the buttermilk, causing the granules to rise to the surface. It also hardens them, removing a certain substance or coating from their surface, allowing them to readily unite under pressure such as is obtained by the use of the dash or revolving churn. Butter gathered by this process is much firmer, better granulated, and consequently better flavored. The only objection to be offered is the addition of salt to the buttermilk; but for feeding purposes, if added to the swill house slops, no ill effects to the swine are ever observed. When fed to hogs at clover pasture, the action of salt removes all danger from bloat by simply increasing their desire for drink.

INCUBATORS FOR INFANTS.

A Substitute for Nature Doing Wonders

For New York's Baby Weaklings.

"He was incubated," the proud mother of some great man of the future will say of her son. For the baby incubator is a success, and has come to stay, according to that incubators have already been the means of saving the lives of one hundred Maud Peck and Miss Blanche Kenney, infants in New York. In fact, the new born , baby, who under old-fashioned methods had no chance of living, now, if put in an incubator, stands about an even chance of becoming a healthy, crowing youngster. Baby incubators are now in use in two hospitals in the city, the Post Graduate Hospital, on East Twentieth street, and the Maternity Hospital of the Woman's Medical College, on East Fifteenth street. A bright voung woman, with a sweet face and modest ways, is in charge of the babies at the maternity hospital. There is a room in the third story there, a room with a great large window which lets in plenty of light and overlooks the tops of the trees in Stuyvesant Park. Around the walls are four cribs of from ten to twelve feet in length. In two of these there were three little lumps.

You discover that these lumps are alive and breathing. They are very small and delicate and dainty and pink. They are babies sure enough—any man can tell that, but nobody would ever think they are incubator-raised. A cosier place for a baby could not be magined. Here the embryo citizens have every opportunity the world affords to hold on to life and to grow healthy and strong, while in the tenements where their parents live, the lives of the frail things would have been snuffed out in less than a day after they first saw the

The incubator is used only for prematurely born babies, and for babies which are so week that the wise young woman doctors are pretty sure they will die if left in the open air. Strangely enough, the incubator is shaped something like a coffin, while its particular aim is to keep babies out of coffins. There are two different kinds of baby incubators and they differ somewhat in construction. The babies are taken out of the incubators at the Maternity Hospital to get their nour ishment directly from their mothers, who live in the building, but the mother of the baby in Post-Graduate Hospital may not see her offspring from one week's end to another. Thefore the youngster must be fed by artificial means, and, after much experiment and study, the doctors have conpleted an incubator by means of which the tended. The sum of twelve dollars and baby is nourished without being removed culation of air is good. The weight is a very important matter. One baby in the incubator is weighed every day. A healthy baby should show a slight diurnal increase in weight, and if the doctors find that the diminutive patient is not growing heavier they seek remtoes, but so far have been agreeably dis- edies for his indispostion. This is the truest model they have of ascertaining the baby's progress, and therefore the greatest care is taken that its clothes shall always be of the same weight, as two or three ounces is a considerable increase for a young man or woman, whose aggregate weight is only six, seven, or eight pounds. About 70 percent of the "incubated" babies have lived, and at least 50 percent of these would have died but for the incubator. The incubator which will be in the babies' ward of the new building of the Post-Graduate Hospital is a great improvement on that at the Maternity Hospital, although it lacks the sentimenta surroundings of the one in charge of the young woman doctors. In this improved affair the patient will not have to be once lifted from his snug nest from the time he is placed inside until he becomes strong nough to be removed with safety.

The incubator is set upon bicycle wheels so it may be moved about whenever desired. The fresh air is heated by passing between two strata of hot water, rises un both at head and foot of the matress, and is kept in motion by an aluminum fan run by clock-work thus preventing any possibility of the little patients suffering from the want of air. There is also a tube for the supply of oxygen, liberal quantities of which are good for babies who are hanging on to life by the merest thread, and it is belived this improvement will save a great many lives that would have been lost in the old incubator.

By means of a clever mechancial device the weight of the baby is always registered, so that the physician may discover the slightest variation of any time. Infants are subject to tubercular diseases which develop before the doctors knows what is the matter. Of course, the incubator must be opened in order to feed the baby its artificial food, and by means of a deft sliding of the covers the entrance of any cold A good breeding sow will if bred prop- air from the outside is prevented. The erly yield more profit in a year than many temperature of the incubator is kept as near 98 degree as possible.

The Post-Graduate Hospital gets more subjects for incubators than the Maternity Hospital, and the task of bringing the little ones by slow stages to vigor and health is the more difficult because the mothers are not present to nurse them. The learned snatched life from the jaws of death on although his term had not nearly expired The crime for which Morrison was incarcerated, and the events which preceded his capture, are probably fresh in the minds of many, but the story will bear a brief repetition. The trouble arose in a dispute about his father's farm on the shore of Lake Megantic, and ended in Morrison taking a life, for which he paid the penalty of a long imprisonment, and the penalty of a long imprisonment, and indirectly his own life. Donald, his father and brother, were interested in the farm upon which one McAulay held a mortage, under which the property was sold. Donald alleged he had been cheated out of nine hundred dollars in the sale by McAulay, and sued the latter to recover the amount, losing the suit however. A warrant was subsequently issued against Donald in connexion with the transaction, and placed in the hands of Lucius F. Warren for execution, and it was Warren for execution. He said we were sorry we did not have the Doctor with us oftener, for we always benefited greatly from his intelligent advice and wisdom on agricultural matters.

Dr. Twitchell, on stepping to the front launched directly into his subject, making out a very strong case for the score card system of judging at exhibitions. He after wards gave a practical illustration of how the work is done, using one of Mr. Edwards' handsome chestnuts, and giving an amount of useful information about the horse and the different points of his own ideal. A TREVOR COURT TRAGEDY.

CHAPTER VIII. SENTENCED TO DEATH.

"I do not think that I at first intended to kill Philip Trevor; only to threaten revenge for his cruelty, and to expose him to the contempt of the world for his treatment of me, but when I saw her," with a glance of hatred at Kathleen, who stood with pupils dilated and hands clenched upon the rail before her, "when I saw her, I say, and heard what passed between the two, a red mist seemed to float before my eyes, and the devil overcame me. Directly she left the room, I for you. Try to believe this and be concrept noiselessly up behind Philip Trev- | soled.' or's chair, and stabbed him. He gave ran over my hands, and some fell on my cloak. I took this off quickly, and rolled it up in a bundle, and put on the fur cloak Lady Trevor had thrown off-his gift. 'Lady Trevor'-yes," with a mocking laugh; "but for this she would never know she had any right to the title. My revenge on both was complete. He was dead by the hand of the woman he had scorned, while she, his true wife, should carry to the grave the burden of a nameless shame. If she was suspected of murder, it mattered little to me. I would not have stirred a finger to clear her!" A thrill of disgust ran through the crowd; every face paled at her savage look and tone, as she fixed her glittering eyes on the girl she so fiercely hated. "All this took but a few seconds, then I rushed from the room, for if Sir Philip's cry had been heard, detection was imminent. As I passed through the shrubbery, someone grasped my arm; I wrenched it away with superhuman strength, and ran out through the open gate on to the moor. Some strange instinct guided me onward towards Ilford. I heard the distant rumbling of a train, for the air was keen and frosty, and made for the railway track. I kept along by this, till in the grey of early morning, I got to the town. No one was astir. I reached Dr. Bell's house unseen, and found my keepers in a state of terrible anxiety. The rest you know. My cloak? I threw the bundle into a thick clump of ferze on the moor; probably it is still there, also the knife which I hid with it. The sealskin jacket excited no remark, for I had one like it in my wardrobe, and my jailers did not know how I was dressed when I made

"No. I should not have confessed, but for hearing from Dr. Bell that Oliver West was accused of the murder, and would probably be sentenced to death for it. As I said, I owe him a debt of gratitiude. I have repaid it now."

Job Hearn, called, deposed to having taken up the speaker, whom he recognized, into his wagon, leaving her at Trevor Court gates on the night stated. Thoroughly frightened, he concealed nothing. The silver flask was sent for, and on close scrutiny, the initials M. L. were found engraved among the chasing covering it. Questioned with severity, he protested sullenly that it had not occurred to him to connect his mysterious passenger in any way with the murder, and to this statement, whether true or not, he firmly

A new complexion was thus entirely given to the case. A few more days were devoted to an enquiry, during which the blood-stained cloak and knife were found in the place indicated by Maraquita Lopez. It was well, indeed, that she had made confession when she did. That very night her overstrained brain gave way. Hopelessly insane, she was sentenced to be confined during Her Majesty's pleasure, in a criminal lunatic asylum, and Oliver West was once more free.

I think it was the shock of hearing of the loss of the yacht, that nearly cost me my life. Had it not been for Jeanne, I must have died. Ah! how I wish I had!"

She was weeping freely now, and Oliver West, knowing the relief which tears give, did not try to check them. "Be comforted, Kathleen," he said, quietly, as he took her hand in his. "Believe me, it is better so. I may tell you lived many years. As a medical man, I and Kelly into the bodies of Lord Fredknew this, and so did he. He asked me to be a friend to you when he was gone.

It is I who should rather kneel at your feet a suppliant for forgiveness. How could I, even in the face of the most overwhelming proofs, have harbored such a suspicion?' His arms were round her, and her head ested against his breast. Here indeed, she had at last found shelter from the storms and buffets of the cold, cruel world. "Tell me all," she whispered at last. "I

He briefly recounted the events of the dreadful night, when Sir Philip's murder had taken place, and as she listened, she understood the ordeal of suffering through which the brave heart, that loved her so well, had passed.

Understood it and secretly resolved that the future should bring with it atonement and compensation. For Katheen knew now that she cared for Oliver West as she had never done for Philip Trevor. Her love for him had been but a transient passion, a girlish fancy born of the false glamour which had dazzled her for the moment only,

"What did that poor woman mean by saying that she owed you a debt of gratitude, Oliver? I can pity her now, in spite of all," she added, softly.

"Years ago, I was travelling in Spain, and while spending a few days in Madrid, I went one evening to the opera. Maraquita Lopez was playing Dinorah. Apgauze skirts took fire; she screamed; the other actors were too paralysed, or afraid of being burned, to attempt to extinguish the flames. My school training did me good service; I leaped from my box on to the stage, and catching up a heavy velvet cloak she had let fall, I wrapped her in it, stiffing the fire before much harm had been done. The curtain fell, and I attended to the prima donna's burns, which were slight. A LIAR AND TRAITOR,

The Woman Who Carried the Knives Swears Parnell was Innocent.

Lying in a darkened room on the ground floor of a tiny frame house in Providence R. I., is the helpless body of a woman who but a few years ago was the focus of horror and hatred for all England. Takes any width of paper or envelope

Easy to understand, learned in five

Weighs only four pounds, most portable. Compact, takes up but little room. Built solid and simple, can't get out of order.

Capital and lower-case keyboard alike, easily mastered. More "margin play" for the small letters which do most of the work. Takes good letter press copies.

Packed securely in handsome case and expressed to any address, on receipt of price, $8.00, Willy-Say, pop. I'm glad you wasn't in registered letter, money order or certified check. We guarantee every machine and are glad to answer all enquiries for further information.
