doc CA1 EA752 2000622 ENG

Canadian Centre For Foreign Policy Development

Centre canadien pour le développement de la politique étrangère

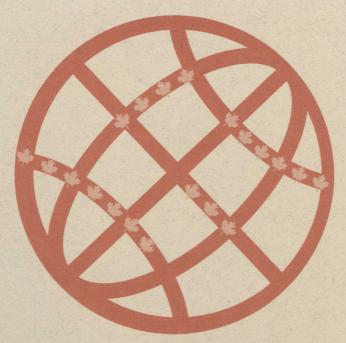

GENDERED DISCOURSES, GENDERED PRACTICES: FEMINISTS (RE)WRITE CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

A Roundtable Report Submitted to the CCFPD

by

Claire Turenne Sjolander (University of Ottawa) Heather Smith (University of Northern British Columbia) Deborah Stienstra (Univesity of Winnipeg)

Winnipeg (May 2000) and Quebec City (July 2000)

Centored Discourses, Gendered Produces

the set Contribut Dente for Foreign Policy Development

GENDERED DISCOURSES, GENDERED PRACTICES: FEMINISTS (RE)WRITE CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

A Roundtable Report Submitted to the CCFPD

by

Claire Turenne Sjolander (University of Ottawa) Heather Smith (University of Northern British Columbia) Deborah Stienstra (Univesity of Winnipeg)

Winnipeg (May 2000) and Quebec City (July 2000)

a new more motion a and parous-focussed foreign action, international operations from the taon anti-personnel land clines to the creation of an international Chimatel Court have a campaig against the transfer of small arms to the protoclicit of children, are in the next of this new mohumano, foreign policy agende.

I continues to be defined by (mostly that study to deconstruct the condered has to study to deconstruct the condered has to so doing, it acts the fundomental events takes topsion policy "officient" from othe period to be toreign golicy-relevant set epithists bother with the study of Chusch institutionalist outward?

with these questions as a backer. 2000, and in Ousbac City is use

Department of Foreign Additions impositive on buintin even.

60057005

Dept. of Foreign Affairs Min. des Affaires étrangères

NOV 1 5 2000

Return to Departmental Library Retourner à la bibliothèque du Ministère

an and the second and

Dept. of Foreign Affairs Min. des Affaires étrangères

NOV 1 5 2000

Return to Departmental Library Retourner à la bibliothèque du Ministère

Gendered Discourses, Gendered Practices: Feminists (Re)Write Canadian Foreign Policy Roundtable

A report for the Canadian Centre for Foreign Policy Development

Claire Turenne Sjolander (University of Ottawa) Heather Smith (University of Northern British Columbia) Deborah Stienstra (University of Winnipeg)

"A humane world where people can live in security and dignity, free from poverty and despair, is still a dream for many but should be enjoyed by all. In such a world, every individual would be guaranteed freedom from fear and freedom from want, with an equal opportunity to develop fully their human potential.

Building human security is essential to achieving this goal. In essence, human security means freedom from pervasive threats to people's rights, their safety or even their lives. Human security has become both a new measure of global security and a new agenda for global action."¹

Canadian foreign policy increasingly appears to be driven by these moral pronouncements, heralding a brave new world of peace and security for all. Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy's rhetorical obsessions with human security, soft power, and capacity building suggest a new, more inclusive and people-focussed foreign policy. International crusades, from the ban on anti-personnel landmines to the creation of an International Criminal Court, from a campaign against the transfer of small arms to the protection of children, are at the heart of this new, more humane, foreign policy agenda.

But who constitutes the "human" in this more humane agenda? Axworthy's claims to motherhood and apple pie notwithstanding, the human security agenda and all that is related to it continues to be defined by (mostly masculinist) state constructs. This research collection seeks to deconstruct the gendered nature of discourse on and about Canadian foreign policy. In so doing, it asks the fundamental question of what constitutes foreign policy as policy. What makes foreign policy "different" from other policy spheres? How do definitions of what is deemed to be foreign policy-relevant keep gender / women out of analyses? Why should feminists bother with the study of Canadian foreign policy at all, given its inherently statist and institutionalist biases?

With these questions as a backdrop, round table participants met twice -- in Winnipeg in May 2000, and in Quebec City in July, 2000. The goal of the roundtable was to discuss how to ¹Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, News Release No. 117, May 20, 1999 ("A perspective on human security" -- Chairman's summary, Lysøen, Norway, 20 May 1999).

Gendered Discourses, Gendered Practices: Feminists (Re)Write Canadian Foreign Policy Roundtable

A report for the Canadian Centre for Foreign Policy Development

Clare Turenne Sjolendar (University of Ottawa) Heather Smith (University of Nonhern Eritath Columbia) Deborah Stienstra (University of Winnibed)

A humano world where people can live to security and algolity, thes from poverty and despair, is all a dream for many but should be emoved by all. In such a world, every individuel would be guage freed treedom from four that und freedom from were, with so secure opportunity to develop fully insir human automate.

Building humas second is essential to achieving this grad, in essence, human security means freedom inclui pervision intratis to people's rights, their safety or evan their lives. Human security has boosing built a new measure of global security and a new agentia to alobal action."

Canadian foreion policy increasingly appears to be driven by these moral pronouncements, heraiding a brave new world of passes and security for all. Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Armonicula metanod boassante with human security, soft power, and capacity building suggest a new, more bobucive and passione with human security, soft power, and capacity building suggest on anti-personnel tendmines to the creation of an International capacity from a campaign regainst the transfer of small arms to the protection of an International Court, from a campaign humane, foreign policy agenda.

Eur who constitutes the 'human' in this more humana againda? Axworthy's claims to motherhood and apple pie notwithstanding, the human security aganda and all that is refitted to it continues to be defined by (mustly mesculinal) state constructs. This research collection seeks to deconstruct the gendered nature of discourse on and about Canadian torsign patoy. In ato doing, it asks the fundamental question of what constitut as foreign policy as policy. What makes to be toreign policy 'different' from other bolicy spheres? How do definitions of what is deemed to be toreign policy relevant keep gender. I women out of analyses? Winy should iterainists bothet with the study of Ganadian foreign policy at all, given its inherently statist and institutionalist biases?

With these questions as a backdrop, round table participants met twice - in Winnibeg in May 2000, and is Quebec City in July, 2000. The goal of the mundtable was to discuss how to deconstruct the dominant concepts of the discourse surrounding Canadian foreign policy as articulated by key government officials and agencies (these central concepts include middle power internationalism, soft power, governance, globalization, human security, human rights, justice, peacebuilding, partnership, humane foreign policy, democratization, and multilateralism). This deconstruction problematizes the notion of who defines policy, and the statements from government are construed as a starting, but not necessarily an end, point.

Department of Foreign Americand International Trade, Naws Release No. 117, May 20, 1999 CA. rerepective on Insman eacurity" – Chelmond's summary, Lyssen, Norway, 20 May 1999).

This deconstruction of discourse is, however, but an initial step. The second goal of the roundtable was to consider the practices of foreign policies, that is, to ask how the discourse becomes/creates/ignores/silences/limits particular policy practices and ways of thinking and doing. Gendered discourses are strengthened and reified through gendered practices, while at the same time, legitimating such practices. Finally, the deconstruction of gendered discourses and the foreign policy practices they construct should point to ideas of what a "reconstructed" foreign policy would look like.

The papers presented at the roundtable are outlined below. They will form the basis for an edited collection that is currently under consideration by Oxford University Press. The round table examined the discourses and practices surrounding Canadian foreign policy as defined around the four themes outlined below. These themes have become central in the articulation of Canada's foreign policy and in the practices engendered by its application into the 21st century. An additional chapter which focuses on the ethical and pedagogical implications of this analysis will be added to the collection.

Section One: Discourses and practices related to human security

"Myths of Canada's Human Security Pursuits: Tales of Tool Boxes, Toy Chests and Tickle Trunks"

Ann Denholm Crosby (York University)

This paper advances the argument that the Canadian government's human security agenda directly contradicts the primacy of the government's economic interests, since pursuing the conditions that would work against processes of "economic privation" and for the ability of peoples to "take charge of their own destinies" (both elements are pillars of the human security agenda) is at odds with pursuing trade and investment initiatives designed to promote the prosperity of Canadians. This contradiction exists given that the global economy as currently constructed thrives on relative 'privation' and necessarily situates the destinies of peoples within that system. The management of this contradiction is the subject of this paper, and the argument outlined suggests that although the human security agenda reflects a change in focus in the Department of Foreign Affairs' foreign policy agenda, it does not represent a significant change in content, and rather serves as a "conditioning framework" for business as usual.

Although there is an ideological component to this conditioning process, the main framework is constructed from the debates that are presently exercising politicians and bureaucrats from both the Department of Foreign Affairs (DFAIT) and the Department of National Defence (DND), as well as a range of interested observers and academics, about the roles of human, as opposed to state-centric, security practices. These debates are essentially about means rather than ends and can be reduced to whether the Canadian state, in its pursuit of prosperity and employment, deconstruct the dominant concepts of the discourse sumptinding Canadian foreign policy as anticulated by key government officials and agencies (these partnal concepts include middle power internationalism, soft power, governance, globalization, human security, human rights, justice, peecelpuliding, partnership, humane foreign policy, dumocratization, and multilateralism). This deconstruction problematizes the notion of who defines policy, and the statements from government are construed as a starting, but not necessarily an end, point.

This deconstruction of discourse is however, but an initial step. The second goal of the noundtable was to consider the preclices of foreign policies, that is, to ask how the discourse becomes/creates/ignores/elistices/inits perdoular policy precises and ways of thisking and doing. Candered discourses are strengthered and relified through gendened practices, while at the same time, legitimating such practices. Finally, the deconstruction of gendened discourses and the foreign policy practices dray construct should point to ideas of what a 'reconstructed' foreign policy would took like.

The papers presented at the roundshap are estimate below. They will form the basis for an earled collection that is currently under consultation by Oxford University Press. The round table examined the discourses and exactives surrounding Canadian foreign policy as defined around the four themes curlined below. These themes have become central in the articulation of Canada s toreign policy and in the practices engendered by its application into the 21° century. An additional chapter which footeass on the emicat and pedagogical implications of this analysis will be added to the collection.

Section Onst. Dispotress and practices related to human security

"Myths of Canada's Human Security Pursuits: Tales of Tool Boxes, Toy Chests and Takie Tranks"

and Leannoise Creatoy (York University)

This paper advances the argument that the Canadran government's humen security agenda directly contradicts the primacy of the government's economic interests, since pursuing the conditions that would work exemisi processes of 'economic privation' and for the ability of peoples to "ake charge of their own destinies" (both elements are pillars of the human security agenda) is at odds with pursuing trade and investment trilletives designed to promote the prosperity of Ganadians. This contradiction exists given that the global economy as currently directored throws on relative (privation and necessarily situates the destinies of peoples within that system. The management of this contradiction is the subject of this paper, and the argument outlined subgests their although the human security agenda relifieds a charge in loous argument outlined subgests their although the human security agenda relifieds a charge in loous argument optimized indices and receiver policy agenda, it does not relied a significant argument outlined subgests their although the human security agenda relifieds a charge in loous argument optimized action serves as a conditioning framework for business as usual.

Although there is an idealogical component to this conditioning process, the main framework a constituted from the debates that are presently exercising politicisms and bureauscate from both the Department of Foreign Affairs (CFAIT) and the Department of Hadronet Defance (DND), as well as a range of Interested observers and accidentics- about the roles of human, as opposed tostate-celeting, security practices. These debates are assemilatly about means rather that ands and can be reduced to whether the Canadian state. In its pursuit of prospenty and employment. should address related and contingent security issues with instruments to be found in DFAIT's tool box of soft power resources, or with the means to be found in DND's toy chest of military technologies. Either way, the debate is implicitly about how to address with one hand the ills we produce with the other, and serves to disguise the fact that this is what is being done. In the latter context, both the soft and hard power advocates are equally skilled and similarly inclined in the art of prestidigitation (or conjury) for both dip into the tickle trunk of disguises to dress the discourse and practice of human security in the garb of humanitarianism.

"Militarized Masculinities and the Politics of Peacekeeping: The Canadian Case" Sandra Whitworth (York University)

Through an analysis of the events surrounding the brutal murder of Shidane Arone at the hands of Canadian soldiers - peacekeepers - in Somalia in 1993, this paper asks to what extent the skills of war are at odds with those required for peace operations. While peacekeeping may have resolved what was a crisis of legitimation for post-Cold War militaries, it did so in a way that is not fully or properly, militaristic. Within traditional military culture, peacekeeping and peace operations are often ridiculed and demeaned; much as they have become increasingly important within the post-Cold War era, there is not the same prestige associated with a 'blue beret fight' for the (mostly) young men trained to do battle who we deploy on these missions. The resolution of the military's legitimation crisis becomes to some extent a crisis of masculinity. The tensions which emerge, and their sometimes horrifying consequences, are made clear by examining the case of the Canadian peacekeeping mission to Somalia. Rarely are the events of Somalia associated with the problems of militarized masculinity and the use of soldiers - people trained to destroy other human beings by force - in peace operations. The events in Somalia, however, reveal not only some of the contradictions of one of Canada's "core myths" about the nature of Canada as a peacekeeping nation, but underscore as well the pervasiveness, and effects of, militarized masculinity within issues of international security.

Ironically, it is often the non-military contributions which Canadian peacekeepers make for which they are best remembered. In Somalia, these included re-opening a local school and hospital. In other settings, it has included building parks for children, and serving as mediators in difficult situations. This means that we need to acknowledge that soldiers don't always make the best peacekeepers – sometimes it is carpenters, mediators, and doctors who best perform that function, and who best contribute to a people's meaningful sense of security. It means also that when we do send soldiers on peace operations, they need to be soldiers who have been trained and encouraged to understand that properly masculine behaviour need not be dependent on misogyny, racism, or violence. Keeping the peace positively demands it.

"Masculinities and Femininities in Sustainable Development Strategies: Gender and Canadian Foreign Policy"

Rebecca Tiessen (Dalhousie University)

In this paper, a gender analysis is used to reveal the masculinities and femininities in the sustainable development strategy (SDS) adopted by the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT). The paper argues that despite Canada's national and international should address related and contingent security issues with instruments to be found in DFAIT's tool box of soft power resources, or with the means to be found in DNO's toy chest of military technologies. Either way the debate is implicitly about how to address with one hand the ills we produce with the other, and serves to dispute the technologies with the soft and and continue the intervence of soft and the technologies are advected and the technologies in the soft and the technologies are advected and the soft and the soft and the soft and hand power advected are advected and similarly inclined in the soft and the soft and hand power advected are advected and similarly inclined in the soft and hand power advected are too the soft and the soft and hand power advected are too the soft and the soft and the soft are power advected are too the soft and the soft and hand power advected are too too too and the soft are the debate are advected and single and the debate in the soft and provides to the soft are power advected and too toos a the debate and provides of human security in the gene of human text and provides to dress the decourse and practices of human security in the gene of human text and text and provides to the soft are advected and to the soft are advected and the feature and practices of human security in the gene of human text average.

"Militarized Masoulinhies and the Politics of Pancekeeping: The Canadian Case" Sandra Wiltworth (York University)

Through an analysis of the averts surrounding the bruilal marter of Shidane Arone at the hands of Canadian soldiurs – peacekeaaen – in Somaka in 1993, this paper asks to what extent the same resolvest what was a casis of legitimation for post-Cold War militaties, if did ao in a way that is not fully or property, militariest. Wiske traditional military culture, peacekeeping and peace operations are often inducted and demeaned, much as they have become increasingh important within the post-Cold War et al, there is not the same grastige associated with a blue peace operations are often inducted and demeaned, much as they have become increasingh important within the post-Cold War eta, there is not the same grastige associated with a blue the resolution of the military's legitimation casis recomes to some scient a drais of macounting. The resolution of the military's legitimation casis recomes to some scient a drais of macoulinity, associated with the problems of militarized in do battle who we dealey on these missions. The resolution of the military's legitimation casis recomes to some actent a drais of macoulinity, associated with the problems of militarized macoulinity and the use of soldlers – people from teacted to destroy white harman beings by force – in peace operations. The events in Somala, however, reveal not only come of the contractions of one of Canada's form made south the reacting of Canada's a peacekeeping mator, but underscore as well the pervise in Somala, however, reveal not only come of the contractions of one of Canada's form myles about the reacting of Canada's a peacekeeping nation, but underscore as well the pervisiveness, and however, reveal not one come of the contractions of one of Canada's form myles' about the reacting of Canada as a peacekeeping nation, but underscore as well the pervisiveness, and endeds of militarized mascularity within issues of international security.

Ironically, it is often the non-minary contributions which Canadian peacekeepers make for which they are best remembered. In Somalia, these included re-opening a local school and heapital in other settings, it has included building parts for children, and serving as mediators in difficult situations. This means that we need to acknowledge that addrens don't atways make the best peacekeepers - sometimes it is carpanters, mediators, and dectors who best perform that thinkion, and who best contribute to a people's meaningful sense of security. It means also that when we do send solders on peace operations, they need to be soldiers who have been trained and encouraged to understand that properly masculine behaviour need not be dependent on missionymy, racism, or violence. Keeping the peace positively demands it.

"Masculmilles and Femininities in Sustainable Gevalopment Strategies: Gender and Canadian Foreign Policy"

Hebecca Resten (Daincusie University)

in this paper, a gender analysis is used to reveal the masculinities and raminizess in the sustainable development strategy (SDS) adopted by the Department of Foreign Affoirs and international Trade (DFAT). The paper argues that despite Canada's patienal and international commitments to gender, environment, and sustainable development, masculinities continue to pervade DFAIT's SDS, thus perpetuating gender inequality. This analysis is couched in a broader framework that defines environment and sustainable development as security concerns, a discourse from which gender is notably absent.

The SDS and sustainable development policies are areas for new battles that reveal masculinities in new forms of conflict and struggle. The DFAIT SDS in particular draws on the specific masculinities in Agenda 21, leaving out the femininities and breakthroughs of this document. In so doing, it perpetuates the masculinities in Canadian foreign policy and international relations more generally. Many examples of theses masculinities can be found in the language adopted in DFAIT's SDS as well as in its institutional practices.

Section Two: Discourses and practices related to multilateralism and globalization

"Internationalism in Canadian Foreign Policy: Gendered Constructions for Whom?" Heather Smith (University of Northern British Columbia)

The concept of internationalism is central to literature on Canadian foreign policy. Using the characteristics of internationalism defined by Kim Richard Nossal as a springboard (multilateralism, community, good international citizenship, and voluntarism), this paper argues that the internationalism which is a central feature of government rhetoric on Canadian foreign policy does not match the reality of state practices. To understand the gap between discourse and practice, the paper turns to neo-gramscian feminist theory, and asks the question of "internationalism" for whom? An examination of the gendered nature of the language that infuses the rhetoric of internationalism makes it apparent that the rhetoric and practice of "good international citizenship" does not always translate to practices directed toward those who are "foreign" or "others" within our own borders. This section identifies the various "others" that in an era of market oriented internationalism have no voice or who are viewed as somehow threatening to Canada's well-being. Drawing on cases related to the environment and on the recent example of the Chinese migrants in British Columbia, this analysis encourages us to think carefully about the various components of internationalism. Are we promoting "community" (in itself a gendered concept), or a system of global apartheid? Is "good international citizenship" marked by behaviours which result in environmental degradation?

This paper deconstructs the concept of internationalism. It shows us that we must continue to challenge the myths that are perpetuated by the dominant discourse, and present in government rhetoric. Internationalism is a concept which appears to challenge the sovereignty of states, proposing a model which seeks to build an inclusive community and rests on the gendered assumption that we must provide for the common good. In practice, however, this analysis demonstrates that Canada's internationalism reaffirms the state, perpetuates differences, and silences multiple voices.

commitments to gender, anvironment, and sustainable development, mosculinities continue to pervade DPAT's SDS, thus perpetuating gender meguality. This analysts is couched in a broader framework that defines environment and sustainable development as security concerns a discourse (gon which gander is notably absent.

The SDS and sustainable development policies are areas for new bettlee that reveal masculinities in new forms of conflict and singgle. The DF AIT SOS in particular drews on the specific masculinities in Agenda 21, leaving our the transmitties and breakthroughs of this document. In so doing, if perpetuates the masculinities in Cenedian foreign policy and international relations more generally. Many examples of therees masculinities can be found in the language adopted in DFAIT's 806 as well as in its institutional precises.

oregoed two: placourses and practices related to maintenending bus reacting the second

"Internationalism in Ganadian Persign Policy: Geneland Constructions for Whom?" Heather Smith (University of Northern Exists Countrie)

The concept of mean-stronglers is central to iterature on Canadian totelon policy. Using the characteristics of transmissionalism defined to the Richard Nosesi as a springerard, (multileteralism, community, good international discertation to device any observation. This paper argues that the internationalism which is a contract back and the content in the part of Canadian foreign policy does not make the reality of state practices. To understand thebard on Canadian foreign and practice, the paper turns to race grameman femilies theory and asks the quostion of the part of the sections and practices the method for a state practices. To understand the part between discourse and practices the paper turns to race grameman femilies theory and asks the quostion of the paper turns to race grameman femilies theory and asks the quostion of the inguage that the methodo and methods are whon the turns to race grameman that the restore and practice of 'good internationalism method is a pager turns to race grameman femilies theory and asks the quostion of the inguage that the methodo and methods and the sections of the language that the restore of the language that the restore of the content of the taken of the section of the section of the section of the section of the content of the section of the content of the conte

This paper deconstructs the concept of internationalism. It shows us that we must continue to challenge the mythe that are perpetuated by the dominant discourse, and present in government metoric. Internationalism is a concept which appears to challenge the sovereignty of states, proposing a model which seeks to build an inclusive community and reats on the gandered assumption that we must provide for the commen good. In predict, however, this analysis demonstrates that Caractor's internationalism reaffirms the state, perpetuates differences, and silonces multiple volces?

"Insiders Playing Games: Global Competitiveness on the Field of Canadian Multilateralism"

Claire Turenne Sjolander (University of Ottawa)

Multilateralism is an "article of faith" in Canadian foreign policy; in Sergio Marchi's words, it is "part of the Canadian DNA". Starting from the perspective that multilateralism as a process for managing Canada's international economic relations has been at least as, if not more, important to the architects and practitioners of Canadian foreign policy than has multilateralism as a means to the achievement of a specified series of ends, this paper critically examines the economic outcomes which the processes of multilateralism have structured. The outcomes which have emerged and taken hold in the era of globalization are based on the norms of a neo-liberal global economic order and a neo-liberal state, and the Canadian state, through its enthusiastic participation in the multilateral institutions which have structured these outcomes, is a key architect of the global economic order.

The paper examines the discourses surrounding Canada's "insider" participation in multilateral economic institutions and processes, and seeks to uncover the gendered bases of the images of the global economic order concealed therein. In the first instance, what is most evident is the attempt to conceal the political bases of the global economy. Where the imagery of team sports and competition has long been associated with the "high politics" of national security and military deployment, Canadian discourse on international trade and investment increasingly uses this same imagery. Canadians are players on the playing field of globalization, they work together best when they are a team (and here, the entire structure of government programs known under the rubric of Team Canada only serves to underscore the point), and they must do what is necessary to win against the forces of globalization "out there". Politics are absent from this analogy, a discursive turn which mirrors the institutional bifurcation of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade into political and trade commissioner services. The paper then draws parallels between this discursive analogy and the explicit attempt by DFAIT to develop programs which respond to the needs of women in the global economy. Rather than a softening of the "macho" imagery of team sports where there are winners and losers, the gendered language and images of competitive sports are reinforced in those programs targeted specifically to women. In focussing on the potential of gender-less individuals to win and lose in a zero-sum game, the embedded structure of the global economy, and in particular, its gendered nature and consequences, is both obscured and denied.

"Gendering Canadian Trade Policy: The Last Feminist Frontier?"

Laura Macdonald (Carleton University)

This paper examines the specific ways in which gender and trade are linked, given that despite increasing attention in the past couple of years to the social dimensions of trade, DFAIT has paid no attention to the burgeoning literature on gender and trade. The paper begins with an overview of the literature on gender and macroeconomic policy, arguing that trade policies are not gender neutral, but that they often reinforce existing gender, class and racial hierarchies. Using this literature as a starting point, the paper then traces the different manifestations of the problem of gender and trade, focussing in particular on the liberal feminist and the socialist feminist approaches.

"Insidera Playing Games: Global Competitiveness on the Field of Canadian Nutiliateralism"

Giarra Turanne Sjolander (University of Ottawa)

Multilationalism is an "article of faith" in Canadian foreign policy: In Sergio Marchi's words, it is "part of the Canadian DNA". Starting from the perspective that multilateralism as a process for managing Canada's international economic relations has been at least as, if not more, impertant to the architects and practitioners of Canadian foreign policy than has multilateralism as a means to the policyement of a specified raties of ends, this paper officially examines the economic outcomes which the processes of multilateralism nave structured. The outcomes which have emerged and taken hold in the era of olobalization are based on the norms of a neoliberal global economic outer and a neo-liberal state, and the Canadian state, through its enfinestable participation in the multilateral instructors which have structured these outcomes, is a key architect of the global economic creater a key architect of the global economic creater a key architect of the global economic creater.

The pather examines the discourses surrounding Ceneda's "insider generatation in multilateral aconomic matilutors and accesses, and seets to uncare the gendered barks of the images of the global accmomic error concested filterem. In the first matilance, and is must evident is the affernot to concess the patifical bases of the global economy. Where the imageny of team apoint and composition has being been associated with the "high politics" of national security and military deployment. Canadian discourse on international trade and investment increasingly uses the same imageny. Canadian discourse on international trade and investment increasingly uses the basis when they are a team (and here, the entire structure of globalization, they work together analogy, a discourse turn factors of globalization for they must do what is mecessary to win against the factors of globalization of the politics are absent from this analogy, a discourse turn which miners the institutional bifurcation of the Department of Foreign datwo paties and international fue factors a statication cut there. Politics are absent from this analogy, a discourse turn which miners the institutional bifurcation of the Department of Foreign datwo paties between this discurs and policical and trade commissioner statices. The patient han do the "macro" majory of team spons when the spons and policil atternat by DFAIT to develop programs which respond to the needs of vomen and incess and isose programs targeted. do the "macro" majory of team spons when the policil atternat by DFAIT to develop appendicably to vomen. In focussing on the policial of global according, and and avera dependicably to vomen. In focussing on the policial of global according, and in patient has a caro-sum game, the ambedded structure of the global according, and in periodial.

> "Gendering Canadian Trade Policy: The Last Faminiat Frontier?" Lagra Mactioneld (Canatco University)

This paper exemines the specific ways in which ponder and ande are instead, given that despite thoreasing attention to the past coupts of years to the spoial dimensione of trade. DPAIT has paid no attention to the burgeoning iterature on general and trade. The paper begins with an overwive of the iterature on gender and macrosconomic bolicy, arguing that trade policies are not genuer neutral, but that they often reinforce existing gender, class and radia hieranchies. Using this literature as a stanking point, the paper than traces the different manifestations of the problem of gender and trace, fourissing in periodiar on the liberal femalist and the socialist feminist approaches.

The liberal feminist approach concentrates on increasing the access of women (particularly microentrepreneurs) to credit or markets, and is best exemplified by the Women Leaders' Network in APEC (a network which is heavily supported by CIDA). Noteworthy is the attempt to establish a Women Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the other hand, the socialist feminist approach focuses on an overview of women's (and particularly the National Action Committee on the Status of Women - NAC) advocacy on trade issues beginning with the Canada-US Free Trade Agreement, and leading up to the recent establishment of a Women's Forum in the Hemispheric Social Alliance, and the Centre of Concern meeting in Grenada. In recent years, advocacy on trade issues has led to an increasing internationalization of women's economic analysis and activism. The discussion here also highlights some of the problems with this approach, including the fact that the mainstream women's movement in the US lacks any economic analysis, that Third World women's organizations are less likely to reject trade agreements in the same way NAC does, and the danger of imposing First World perspectives and showing insensitivity to Third World women's perspectives. The paper ends with a discussion of various reasons to explain why Canadian trade policy remains gender blind, and concludes with the possibility that spaces for feminist struggle may be opened up by the consolidation of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA).

Section Three: Discourses and practices related to women's rights

"Women's Human Rights and Canadian Foreign Policy"

Shelagh Day (Canadian Feminist Alliance for International Action)

This paper begins with a discussion of the tradition of the division between civil and political rights on the one hand, and economic, social and cultural rights on the other. This division, initiated by the elaboration of the two UN central Covenants on human rights, has created a distinction between formal equality, and substantive equality. Despite the fact that this division is perpetuated within Canada, for women from other countries, Canada appears to be a leader on women's human rights issues. Canada is considered one of the progressive countries by many. However, Canada's leadership role at the international level is not parallelled by leadership at home. It is noteable that Monica Townson has just reported that women's poverty and economic inequality in Canada has not changed significantly in 30 years, that is since the time of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Consequently, there is a kind of schizophrenia in Canada's approach to women's human rights. Canada has a desire to be, and to be seen to be, a leader on women's human rights at the global level and simultaneously, at home, refuses to treat international human rights commitments to women as serious matters. Some UN treaty bodies are beginning to scratch away at Canada's teflonized reputation on human rights, taking account of representations made by women's organizations and other NGOs regarding Canada's failures to comply with central undertakings in the human rights treaties that Canada has signed. The Concluding Observations of the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1998) and the UN Human Rights Committee (1999) are recent important examples of this. The paper concludes The interal terminist approach concerne ates on increasing the access of women. (particularly microentrepreneurs) to credit or markets, and is best exemplified by the Women Loaders' Network to APEC (a retwork which is heavily supported by CIBA). Noteworthy is the atternet to establish a Wogren Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the establish a Wogren Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the establish a Wogren Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the establish a Wogren Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the establish a Wogren Leaders' Network of the Americas based on this same elitist model. On the big particularly other hand, the Socialita Isminist approach increases on an overview of women's (and particularly be particularly be the values and the Vationar Americas at Women's Canada VS Pree Trace Agreement, and leading up to the recent Comercities on the state of Women's and leading up to the recent because the former the state of a model is to be the terminated at the matrix advocacy on trace testes has the test and the Canada to the particular to the state of the problems with the state of the testes of the testes and the state of the problems with the state of the testes of the testes of the problems with the state of the testes of the testes the test way to be tested to an test biologic table to a state of the testes the test way to be tested to a state of the testes of the testes test with a state state of the testes test with a state of the testes and testes to the state of the testes testes the test test and the testes test with test testes and the testes test with test states and the testes test test with a state state of the testes test test with a state state of the testes test test with a state state of the testes test test with a state state of the testes test test with a state state with test testes test testements testes to the testes test testes test testes and t tribit s'nemos of bood at engine at the appropriate them in the women's numan highris and Canadian Foreign Folloy* Shelagh Day (Deerdum Femiliest Allance for International Action)

High here regime with a decreasion of the tradition of the division between own and political initiated by the elaboration of the two LIX remeat Connects on the other. This division distinction patieness format aquaity and substantive equality. Despite this has created a is perpetuated within Carrada to women from other countries. Canada appears to be a teader on women's human rights issues. Canada is considered one of the progressive countries by many. However, Carrada estimating note at the informational level is not parallelied by many. However, Carrada estimating note at the informational level is not parallelied by readership at home. It is noteable that Monica Townson has just reported that women's powerly the estimated the Royal Commission on the status of Women. Women women is since the time of the Royal Commission on the status of Women.

Canada has a deate to as, and to be seen to be, a leader on women's human rights global level and almuticineocaly, at home, refuses to treat international human rights at the commitments to women as serious matters. Some UN treaty podies and beginning to senatori away at Canada's tetionized reputation on numan rights, taking account of representations made by women's organizations and other NIGO's regarding Canada's failures to comply with commit undertailings to the human rights treates that Canada has symed. The Conclusing bioservations of the UN Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Highs (1998) and his UN chuman Rights Committee (1999) are recent important estimates of this. The canada has the UN with a discussion of the strategies for Canadian women seeking to advance the cause of women's human rights.

"Discourses, Dollars and Feminist Dilemmas: A UPCD Tier 2 Project on Prostitution in the Philippines"

Edna Keeble (St. Mary's University) and Meredith Ralston (Mount St. Vincent University)

Funded as one of the partnership programs of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), the University Partnerships in Cooperation and Development (UPCD) program administered by the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada (AUCC) provides opportunities for Canadian academics to initiate and direct a development project in their area of research expertise. The UPCD program which provides five-year funding for universities is divided into two tiers, depending on the amount of the grant awarded. For Canadian feminist scholars wanting to ameliorate the hardships faced by women abroad, the UPCD program can be a vehicle facilitating their direct involvement in making a difference in the lives of women in other countries. This paper outlines a UPCD Tier 2 project on prostitution in Angeles City, Philippines, and examines the challenges inherent in such a project: facing a discourse that revolves around alleviating poverty, and not sexual exploitation, facing dollars that are limited and constrained by strict guidelines, and facing feminist dilemmas that are numerous and fundamental. At the same time, the paper argues that the space created by, and within, the project, although small, is significant enough to warrant not only action, but optimism, in helping prostituted women in the Philippines.

The paper begins with a discussion of Canadian official development assistance (ODA) policy and the discourse around poverty alleviation. Although scholars have long pointed out that ODA is more about serving the interests of donors as opposed to recipients, resulting in the maintenance of a liberal capitalist system, we argue that the focus on class as opposed to gender as the driving force in the disbursement of aid monies becomes particularly problematic for prostitutes in Angeles City. We then move on to a specific discussion of the UPCD Tier 2 program and the role of universities and scholars in development projects. Here, we highlight the opportunities and pitfalls creased by human resource development (HRD) strategies and the focus on "capacity building" over overseas partner institutions. Because of the constraints of the UPCD Tier 2 guidelines, the project is actually indirectly helping the prostituted women in the Philippines. Finally, we discuss the project and ground the discussion on feminist dilemmas of working within the system as opposed to working from outside. Are we, and the women's groups with who we work, in danger of co-optation by the state? Given that, for example, we are working with the Philippine National Police, are we in danger of legitimizing one of the main actors to benefit from and protect the sex trade industry in the Philippines? Are we simply making the police and judges more effective in arresting and prosecuting prostitutes? We end on an optimistic note because as feminists (re)write Canadian foreign policy, we become aware of the premises underlying not only what we read as policy, but also what we know as practice in the way that women organize for change.

with a discussion of the strategies for Canadian women seeking to advance the cause of women's human fights.

"Discourses, Dollars and Reminist Edenmins: A UPCD Tier 2 Project on Prostitution in the Philippines"

Edna Keebla (St. Mary's University) and Mereolth Rotston (Mount St. Vincent University)

Funded as one of the partnership programs of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), the University Partnerships in Cooperation and Development (UPCD) program administrated by the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada (AUCC) provides opportunities for Canadian mademics to inflicte and direct a development project in their area of divided into two ties, depending on the endorm which provides the year funding for universities in scholars wanting to ameliorate the neutrines acad direct by nomen abroad, and UPCD program can be a vehicle facilitating their direct internation in the grant awarded. For Canadian tempet boar vehicle facilitating their direct internation in the grant awarded. For Canadian tempet other countries, and project the neutrines tacked by nomen abroad, the UPCD program can other countries frequenting and mathement in making a difference in the trees of women in other countries. This paper outlines a UPCD Tier 2 emjetion of program in the divided into contrained the cines are noticed in each a project focing a discourse that and contract countries. This paper outlines a UPCD Tier 2 emjetion of program can involves around allowing powery, and not sexual exception in the approximate that are limited international. At the same take, the paper region that the space one ted by, and within, the fundamental. At the same take, the paper region that the space one ted by, and within, the project, although statal is significant anoigh to warrant not only action, but optimism, in helping project, although statal is the Paticalized and the warrant not only action, but optimism, in helping

The paper begins with a discussion of Canadian official development assistance (ODA) policy and the discourse around severity cavieron. Although scholars have long pointed out that ODA is more allout severity cavieron we argue that the focus on class as opposed to maintenance of a liberal solicities events, we argue that the focus on class as opposed to opender as the development force in the discursement of aid monies becomes particularly problematic for presentates in Angeles City. We then move on to a specific discussion of the UPCD Ter 2 program and the role of universities and acholars in development (HRD) attacedes and the orogram and the role of universities and acholars in development (HRD) attacedes and the opportunities and press the project is actually indirectly helping the constraints of ine opportunities and press the project is actually indirectly helping the prostitieted women's program with who we work, in danger of co-optition by the discussion of the tope propaga with who we work, in danger of co-optition by the state? Given the, for example, we are propaga with who we work, in danger of co-optition by the state? Given the, for example, we are actors to benefit from and project in actually indirectly indirectly for prostities on the formation of the opticities to benefit from and project in actually indirectly in the Philippines? Age we simply working with who we work, in danger of co-optition by the state? Given the, for example, we are actors to benefit from and project if a sax trade industry in the Philippines? Age we simply working the premises indicated the sax trade industry in the Philippines? Age we simply actors to benefit from and project if a say trade industry in the Philippines? Age we simply of the premises indicated to be accuss as terminets (envirie Canadian foreign policy, we become avait of the premises indicately for a proving the we are a date; but also wist we move as practed of the premises indicately for a date with we mad as policy, but also what we move as practed in

"Canadian Refugee Policies and Women"

Erin Baines (Dalhousie University)

In the 1980s and 1990s, Canada's interpretation of the 1951 Refugee Convention has made the country a world leader on refugee women's issues. The 1951 Convention provided a definition of refugees based on the applicant's well-founded fear of state persecution based upon grounds of either: race, religion, nationality, political opinion, or participation in a particular social group. The Convention has been criticised because it fails to recognize gender-related forms of persecution; for example, instances in which someone is persecuted as a woman or because she is a woman. In 1993, Canada advanced a set of guidelines on gender persecution which attempted to address some of these critiques, and since then, a number of other states have followed suit.

This paper addresses the challenges of attempting to codify gender-based persecution in international conventions, and the assumptions that the discourse around gender-based persecution contains. In particular, the Canadian discourse assumes that refugee women are vulnerable creatures and need to be protected. More concretely, women who present themselves to Canadian authorities as vulnerable (by crying, for example) have a better chance of getting accepted under current refugee policy. This perpetuates an attitude of Western superiority and the vulnerability of Third World women. Equally, the assumption is prevalent that gender-related persecution always takes place, geographically, in the Third World. This reinforces the cultural "othering" of Third World women, and seeks to mask the injustices at home (where what happens abroad is persecution, while what happens at home is, at worst, discrimination). Despite the leadership shown by the Canadian state, we also need to challenge the assumption that women are granted absolute protection when they arrive in Canada, for in reality, the system often fails them. Finally, the very fact of specifying gender-based persecution as a legitimate criterion for the granting of refugee status, there is still the threat of the further marginalization of women if we don't combat the related assumption that gender persecution equals women, while all other forms of persecution apply to men.

The paper situates these discursive contradictions within the context of developments in Canadian refugee policy, as well as within a global context, where post-Cold War UN interventions and containment strategies to prevent mass migration and displacement have had important ramifications for refugee rights of both women and men.

Section Four: Discourses and practices related to democratization of foreign policy

"Organizing for Beijing: Canadian NGOs and the Fourth World Conference on Women" Elizabeth Riddell-Dixon (University of Western Ontario)

This paper examines the government-sponsored mechanisms that were established to facilitate NGO preparations within Canada for the Beijing Conference on Women. These efforts, part of the broader effort to democratize the foreign policy process in Canada, reflected the more general discussion within government circles as to how NGOs could and should be involved in foreign policy processes. The paper underscores that in providing venues through which the

Canadian Refugee Policies and Woman' Erin Baines (Dathousis University)

In the Teodes and (Sector, Canada's Interpretation of the 1951 Paragee Convention has made the country a world leader on rategee women's issues. The 1951 Convention provided a definition of refugees based on the agaicant's well-founded fear of state persecution based upon grounds of either, race, religion, nationality, political opticion, or participation in a particular social group The Convention has been officiated because it fails to recognize gender-related forms of persecution; for example, instances in whom someons is persecuted as a woman or because she is a woman. In 1993, Canada advanted a set of guidelines on gender persecution which attempted to address state of these officies, and since then, a number of other states have followed suit.

In this paper addresses the challenges of alientiting to codify general-based persecution in international conventions, and the assumptions that the discourse assumes that refugee women are persecution contains. In generation, the C markin discourse assumes that refugee women are vulnerable accuration contains. In generation, the C markin discourse assumes that refugee women are used to be protected. More concertally, women who present of generative areas and eaced to be protected. More concertally, women who present of generative areas and eaced to be protected. More concertally, women who present of generative accuration authorities as vulnerable by oning, for example) have a better chance of generative and the vulnerability of There Worke women. Equally, the assumption is prevalent that reinforces the accurate persecution aways bases place geostabilities in the Third Worke and the prevalent that reinforces the accurate accuration are generative, where what happens at home is all works and the assumption the tastem accurate the tastem of generative and the prevalent that the assumption that the assumption are prevalent that the assumption that the tastem of the persecution are persecution aways bases place geostabilities in the prevalent that discrimination. Despite the tastem of the base prevalent to the descent or mask intervitions at the assumption that tectors are granted assumption while what happens at home is, at works reading the assumption that tectors are granted assertion should all the tastem of the granted assertion when they arrive in Canada, the assumption that tectors are granted assertion to when a state, we also need to challenge tealing, the assumption that tectors are granted assertion should an east one to the teal readers in the assertion of the granted as the test teach associated assumption as a granted assertion assertion as a section generation as a granted assertion assertion assertion as a section of the test of the granten granted assertion assertion assertion assertion as a sp

The paper situates these discursive contradictions within the context of developments in Canadian refugee policy, as well as within a global context, where post-Cold War UN interventions and containment strategies to prevent maks migration and displacement have had important ramifications for refugee rights of poly, women and man.

Section Four, Biscourses and practices related to democratization of foreign policy

Organizing for Beijing: Canadish NGOs and the Fourth World Conference on Woman" Elizabeth Riddall-Dixen (University of Weatern Ontano)

This paper examines the government-sponsored mechanisms that were established to fedillate NGO proparations within Canada for the Beijing Contarence on Women. These allors, part of the broader allor to democratize the foreign policy process in Canada, reflected the more general discussion within government circles as to how MODe could and should be involved in foreign policy processes. The paper underscores that an providing vertices through which the attentive public can express its concerns and opinions, consultations and other governmentsponsored mechanisms to facilitate the participation of civil society in the foreign policy-making process contribute to greater – although by no means complete – democratization.

While the government provided funds to facilitate NGO participation at most of the major international conferences and summits convened in the 1990s, the particular mechanisms set up in the case of the Beijing Conference on Women were unique. In particular, the Canadian Beijing Facilitating Committee, whose members were selected through an exhaustive canvassing of women's groups throughout Canada, had its headquarters wholly within the women's movement. The CBFC fed into the Canadian Preparatory Committee, which was established to facilitate consultations between members of the federal Interdepartmental Committee on the World Conference on Women and NGOs in the preparations of Canada's positions on documents pertaining to the UN Conference on Women. Despite the presence of government-sponsored mechanisms facilitating NGO participation, however, outcomes were not affected. While the process did assist NGOs in developing their positions and it facilitated a two-way flow of information between government officials and NGO representatives, it did not result in the NGOs having significant influence over the substance or direction of Canada's positions.

"(Re) Claiming the Economic: Women's Groups and Canadian Foreign Policy" Deborah Stienstra (University of Winnipeg)

In February 1999, a new coalition of women's groups called the Canadian Feminist Alliance for International Actions (FAFIA) was created. It signalled a significant shift in attention by Canadian equality-seeking women's groups to participate collectively in international activities. Its primary focus is to enable women in Canada to have an effective voice in discussions affected by globalization and the liberalization of trade. The creation of this coalition and its subsequent activity around the Beijing + 5 process have illustrated many challenges and constraints for the federal government and the Canadian women's movement. This paper explores the discursive and practical dynamics that have arisen from the work of this coalition and the challenges it has posed for the development and practice of Canadian foreign policy. The paper traces the history of the involvement of equity-seeking women's groups in the international arena, and presents an analysis of women's groups in Canada in the post-Beijing period. In so doing, it identifies a series of constraints; within the women's movement in Canada, within policy development and implementation, as well as points to the broader structural constraints within the government of Canada which make it difficult to incorporate analysis of women or gender in economic policy-making, and to the constraints within the international system shaping or limiting the framework for international decision-making.

The paper concludes with a discussion of how these constraints have shaped or are reflected in the discourses and practices of Canadian foreign policy. In particular, it identifies three areas characterized by exclusion: the discourse on democratization (where women's groups are often excluded in economic consultations), the discourse on globalization (where an analysis of gender is excluded), and the discourse on human security (where economic analysis is excluded, despite the efforts of women's groups to make these present).

attabilities public can express its concerns and opinions, consultations and other governmentsponsored mechanisms to facilitate the participation of civil society in the foreign policy-making process contribute to greater – although by no means complete – democratization

While the government provided tunds to tabilitate NGO participation of most of the major international contenences and summits convened in the 1990s, me particular mechanisms set op in the case of the Beijing Conference on Vieman were selected through an exhaustive deling Facilitating Commities, where nembers were selected through an exhaustive conversing of women's groups throughout Caneda, the its beadquarters wholy within the women's movement. The CBPC fed into the Caneda, the teatest interdepertmental established to facilitate consultations between memory of the teatest interdepertmental committee on the World Contenence on Vienen and NGO2 in the preparations of Canada's government sponsored mechanisms to the UK Contenence of Women. Despite the presence of government sponsored mechanisms to the UK Contenence on Vienen. Despite the presence of government sponsored mechanisms to the UK Contenence on Vienen. Despite the presence of government sponsored mechanisms to the UK Contenence on Vienen. Despite the presence of government sponsored mechanisms to the UK Contenence on Vienen. Despite the presence of mathected. While the process did sected NGO2 in converging their predicting to the teach rest affected. While the process did sected NGO2 in converging their positions and a tabilitated a two mathected. While the process did sected NGO2 in converging their positions and a tabilitated a two way flow of information between government officials and NGO. sponsentiathes, it did not result in the NGC2 hausing significant licitation over the statistics of Canada teach

> "(Re) Cleiming the Economics Massien's Groups and Canadian Foreign Policy Deborah Bismatra (University of Winniped)

In Heardany 1998, a new costilises of woman's groups called the Canadian Feminist Alliance for International Actions (FAFA) was created. It signaled a significant shift in attention by Canadian equality-search or some a groups to participate collectively in international activities. Alls primary focus is to anabis storeen a Canada to have an effective voice in discussions affacted by globalization and the thereinstation of trace. The creation of this coalition and its subsequent activity around the Beijing - 5 process have illustrated many challenges and constraints for the returning overcoment and the Canadian women's informant. This paper and the challenges if has beging - 5 process have illustrated many challenges and actions the discussive and president and the Canadian women's informant. This paper and the challenges it has parent by the development and practice of Canadian to the werk of this coalition mand the challenges it has parent by the development and practice of Canadian to the werk of the coalition fragment the definition of the involvement of outly-seeking women's movement. The paper period. In st domin, the practice a series of commands groups in the coards within policy development and the process in the women's movement in thermalional terms, and preserves an analysis of women's groups in the coards in the domine terms of the process of commans, within the women's movement in period. In st domin, the government of counts, seeking women's movement in thermalional constraints within the government of counts, as well as points to the coader tructures constraints within the government of Canada which the women's movement in analysis of women or gender in economic policy-malory, and to the constraints within the international system shapping or limiting the framework for international decision-making international system shapping or limiting the framework for international decision making international system shapping or limiting the framework for international decision makin

The paper concludes with a discussion of now those constraints have whened or are reflected in the discourses and precides of Canadian foreign policy. In particular, it identifies three areas cheracterization the discourse on democratization (where women's groups are often excluded in economic consultations), the discourse on globalization (where an analysis of excluded in economic consultations), the discourse on globalization (where access are often excluded in economic consultations), the discourse on globalization (where an analysis of excluded in economic consultations), the discourse on globalization (where access are often excluded in economic activities of the discourse on major security (where access and the discourse on any security (where access and the discourse on excluded device these access and the discourse on any security (where access and the discourse on excluded device these access and the discourse on any security (where access any security security and the discourse on any security (where access any security security security and the discourse on any security (where access access any security secur

"Canada in Aid of Liberalism: A Feminist Discussion of Cooperation and (Post)Colonialism in the Free Trade Agreement of the Americas" Teresa Healy (Wilfrid Laurier University)

This paper offers a critique of the liberal project framing the Free Trade Agreement of the Americas (FTAA) by linking analyses of marginalised women's experiences of new productive and reproductive forms in different places in the Americas with analyses of the gendered character of the ideal form of state that is being fashioned across the hemisphere. The minimalist liberal state has become the ideal form of state promoted by national governments through their domestic policy and through interstate agreements. This is a patriarchal form of state constructed through the extension of market relations in areas of social provision previously fought for and won by feminist struggle within social movements and the state. The economic marginalisation of women who depended on governmental intervention in social provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritarianism on the part of the state in instituting these marketized economic policies is another, political, outcome. Both are coercive, although obviously, the process is uneven, and does not happen in the same way in every country across the Americas.

Governments, including the Canadian state, are not ushering in a process of restructuring that has material dimensions only, however devastating they may be for many women. The patriarchal liberal state is being constructed discursively as the protector of liberal political freedoms, if not at the national level, then at the level of world order. International declarations in support of the human rights of the individual are the political counterparts to the supposed fairness and predictability of international economics under an open, transparent, rules-based trading system.

The international economic system is left unencumbered by these declarations because of the liberal requirement to maintain the separation of politics and economics. This has the effect of legitimising the institutionalisation of the minimalist state in international trade and investment treaties. In this way, the authoritarianism of the liberal state is brought together with a paternalist nod in the direction of the protection of women's human rights, along with the rights of others who need protecting, such as children and migrant workers. Such declarations are meant precisely not to challenge the imperialism of globalization. Authoritarianism and paternalism are two sides of the patriarchal liberal state and may be considered the gendered aspects of hegemony.

This theoretical critique is explored by examining the World March of Women 2000 against Poverty and Violence, and in particular, NAC's statements surrounding it, as well as the oppositional social movements which have formed a "Hemispheric Social Alliance" in order to protest the construction of the FTAA. "Canada in Aid of Liberalism: A Faninist Bisquesion of Cooperation and (Post)Colonialism in the Pina Frade Agreement of the Americas". Teresa Hoaly (Wilfild Launer University)

This paper others a chique of the liberal project framing the Pres Trade Agreement of the Americas (FTAA) by linking analyses of marginalised women's experiences of new productive and reproductive forms in different places in the Americas with analyses of the gendered character of the ideal form of state that is being fractioned series the hernisphere. The manualist liberal state has become the result form of state precised by millional governments through their domestic policy and through mericate egreaments. This is a patherchart form of state constructed through the extension of market relations in errors of social provision previously fought for and won by feminist strugges with analysis in errors of social provision provision is one direct outcome. The increased on generations in errors of social provision economic merginalisation of varient who depended on generational intervention in social provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritation in social provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritations in accide provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritations in accided provision to an direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritation in social provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritation in accided provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritation in accided expression counting these market economic periods of a social intervention in accided expression active and the function and access is under a social intervention in accided expression actions in actions of the function of authoritation actions and the part of the provision is one direct outcome. The increased expression of authoritation actions and actine expression actions in the function action action action actions and the part of the coentees, although obviously, the process is unreased and does not happen in the same way in every countity access the fineritating the action actions and d

Governments, including the Ganadian state, are net ushoring in a process of reducturing that has material dimensions prover powerer devestating they may be for many women. The particulations liberal state is traing concarted discutatively as the protector of liberal political headoms. If not at the stational sevel, then at the level of world order, thremational declarations a support of the forman rights of the individual are the political contemparts to the supposed laimees and predictability of international reconomics under an open, transparent, mas-based trading system:

The international according system is left unercombered by these declarations because of the optimising the mathematical and the separation of politics and economics. This has the effect of reactes, in this way, the publication of the minimalat state in presentational trade and investment outernalist nod in the direction of the protection of women's burning together with a outernalist nod in the direction of the protection of women's burning together with a of others who need protecting, such as unidered and regrest workers. Such declarations are meand precisely not to challenge the impendiation of globalization. Authomaticanem and outernalism are two sides of the patients of globalization. Authomaticanem and aspects of hegemony.

This theoretical antique is explored by examining the World March of Women 2000 against Poverty and Violence, and to perticular, NAC's statements surrounding it, as well as the oppositional social movements which have formed a "Hemispheric Social Alilance" in order to protest the construction of the 81 vA.

DATE DUE ANA STAND

DOCS

CA1 EA752 2000G22 ENG Turenne Sjolander, Claire Gendered discourses, gendered practices feminists (re)write Canadian foreign policy : a roundtable report submitted to the C

